Preface

The second edition of this encyclopedia builds upon the first by, among other things, including material that reflects alterations in capital punishment laws. Since the first edition appeared in 2001, the United States Supreme Court has issued more than forty opinions addressing capital punishment issues and, when necessary, state and federal capital punishment laws have been amended to reflect the Supreme Court's decisions. Some of the changes brought about as a result of the decisions of the Supreme Court include prohibiting the execution of mentally retarded felons, barring imposition of capital punishment on defendants who commit capital crimes while younger than eighteen, and permitting death row inmates to use civil rights legislation to challenge aspects of the methods in which they are to be executed.

The legal history of capital punishment dates to the founding of the nation. The American colonists brought capital punishment with them from Europe and, except between 1972 and 1976, the punishment has always been a living instrument in Anglo-American jurisprudence. This encyclopedia provides a comprehensive A-to-Z source of information on the legal, social and political history and the status of capital punishment. The breadth of coverage provided by the entries is especially critical at this juncture of capital punishment's history. Tremendous pressure continues to be brought domestically and internationally to remove capital punishment from every penal code in the United States. The outcome of the struggle will be resolved in large part by the understanding or lack of understanding of the punishment by the majority of the citizenry. This encyclopedia should serve not only as a tool for academic researchers, but for laypersons on both sides of the debate.

Every effort has been made to present the material in a manner readily understandable to a lay audience. Of course, the lowest common denominator of some issues simply does not shed its legal trappings, nor its terminology. Cross-references have been provided to enable nonspecialist researchers to gain access to all of the material.

While it is not practical to summarize the entire encyclopedia in this preface, some discussion of its highlights is in order. First, the encyclopedia has an entry for virtually every capital punishment opinion issued by the United States Supreme Court, from its inception through 2006. (Supreme Court case entries do not include memorandum opinions. Also, the Supreme Court, during its early years, periodically issued opinions that did not state what punishment a defendant received; consequently, some cases that appeared to be capital punishment cases were not included simply because of the lack of certainty on the punishment.) The Supreme Court case entries summarize the important legal issue(s) presented by a case. The cases provide a synopsis of the history of capital punishment because they shaped the manner in which capital punishment was allowed to operate.

A second important type of entry is that of each jurisdiction that has (or does not have) capital punishment. These entries summarize the relevant death penalty laws of each jurisdiction, as well as provide information on the judicial structure of each jurisdiction. Several special types of entries have been included. Almost 200 entries set out the status of capital punishment in the nations of the world. Numerous entries summarize famous and not-so-famous capital prosecutions. Entries have been included for many of the organizations that are for or against capital punishment. Special entries discuss the impact of capital punishment on African Americans, Asian Americans, Hispanic Americans, Native Americans, women, and foreign nationals. Entries look at the history of each current method of execution in the nation. Additionally, a special entry examines capital punishment by the military. A wealth of diverse statistical data accompanies many of the entries.

Abandonment Defense The abandonment defense is generally used in criminal prosecutions involving two or more co-defendants. It is usually asserted by a defendant alleging that he or she was part of a conspiracy or plan to commit the crime charged, but that prior to completion of the crime he or she abandoned all involvement in the matter. In capital murder prosecutions, the abandonment defense may be asserted at the guilt phase for the purpose of establishing innocence or at the penalty phase as a mitigating circumstance. It is an affirmative defense that must be proven by the defendant. See also Affirmative Defenses

Abu-Jamal, Mumia Mumia Abu-Jamal (aka Wesley Cook) was sentenced to death on May 25, 1983, by the State of Pennsylvania for the 1981 murder of a police officer. An aborted scheduled execution of Abu-Jamal in 1999 caused protests in cities throughout the United States and in nations around the world. Supporters of Abu-Jamal, who include international heads of states, legislative bodies, celebrities and organizations, believe that he is innocent of murder and should receive a new trial.

Abu-Jamal was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on April 24, 1954. In 1981 he worked as a radio journalist in Philadelphia and moonlighted as a taxicab driver. On the evening of December 9, 1981, Abu-Jamal was moonlighting as a cab driver when he came upon a police officer scuffling in the street with a motorist. The motorist was Abu-Jamal's brother.

The evidence introduced at Abu-Jamal's trial established that he approached the police officer struggling with his brother. Testimony revealed Abu-Jamal had a gun and that it was used to shoot the officer initially in the back. The police officer managed to fire a shot that struck Abu-Jamal in the abdomen. Further testimony during the trial indicated that Abu-Jamal approached the fallen officer and fired point-blank into his face, killing him.

After Abu-Jamal was sentenced to death, his prosecution aroused international attention. Evidence surfaced indicating that someone else at the scene of murder actually shot the police officer and fled. The police were unable to match the bullets that struck the officer with bullets from Abu-Jamal's gun. A key prosecution witness allegedly recanted testimony and stated that a police officer told the witness to lie and say that Abu-Jamal shot the victim. Abu-Jamal has always maintained his innocence.

While on death row, Abu-Jamal wrote two books that received international acclaim: Live from Death Row and Death Blossoms. The support and recognition Abu-Jamal has gained while on death row includes an honorary law degree from the New School of Law in San Francisco, California; being made an honorary vice president of the National Lawyer's Guild; being named an honorary citizen of the Central District of Copenhagen, Denmark, and Palermo, Italy; being a recipient of the Solhvervfonden Foundation Award; and the establishment of the Committee to Save Mumia Abu-Jamal, which included Whoopi Goldberg, Harry Belafonte, Edward Asner, Ossie Davis, Mike Farrell and Julian Bond.

On December 18, 2001, a federal district judge vacated Abu-Jamal's death sentence and ordered a new sentencing hearing. The district court judge's affirmation of the conviction was appealed. On March 27, 2008, a panel of three judges affirmed the district court's decision.

Accessory After the Fact see Law of Parties

Accessory Before the Fact see Law of Parties

Accomplice see Accomplice Liability

Accomplice Liability For all practical purposes, accomplice liability is nothing more than a legal phrase that describes conduct of a principal in the second degree and accessory before the fact, without distinguishing presence or absence at the crime scene. As a general matter, a person is liable as an accomplice if he or she provided assistance or encouragement, or failed to perform a legal duty with the intent thereby to facilitate or promote the commission of a crime.

A defendant can be an accomplice to murder even though his or her participation in the killing, when compared to that of the principal, is relatively passive. To hold a defendant liable as an accomplice for a homicide committed by another, the prosecutor need only show that the defendant intended to promote or facilitate a crime, and there is no need to show that the defendant specifically intended to promote or facilitate a murder. A murder prosecution under the accomplice liability theory does not require the defendant participate in the actual murder.

Where an accomplice purposely aids in the commission of murder, he or she is said to have the same intent as the principal. However, in determining whether murder is the appropriate charge against an accomplice to a homicide, it is necessary to look at his or her state of mind and not that only of the principal. Moreover under the accomplice liability theory, it is not necessary that the defendant be shown to have the intent to commit murder after deliberation and premeditation; it is enough to establish the defendant had the intent purposely to promote the commission of murder.

Imposition of the death penalty on a capital felon found guilty as an accomplice is constitutionally permissible, so long as the guilt phase jury finds the accomplice killed, attempted to kill, or intended that a killing occur.

Accusation Accusation is a legal term used to refer to the three principal types of criminal charging instruments: complaint, information, and indictment. An accusation conveys nothing more than that a person has been charged with a crime. An accusation is not evidence of guilt. See also Complaint; Grand Jury; Prosecution by Information

Accusatory Body In Anglo-American jurisprudence, the phrase “accusatory body” is used to refer to a grand jury. The phrase can be, but rarely is, associated with a prosecutor who charges a person with a crime in an “information”—a criminal charging document that is drafted by a prosecutor and used prosecute defendants—or a citizen who brings a criminal charge against a person through a complaint. An accusatory body does nothing more than charge a person with committing a crime. An accusatory body is distinguished from the petit jury, which has the responsibility of determining a defendant’s innocence or guilt. See also Complaint; Grand Jury; Prosecution by Information

Acquittal Acquittal is a legal pronouncement that a prosecutor failed to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that a defendant committed a charged crime. An acquittal may be rendered by a petit jury or a trial judge. Once an acquittal has been rendered, constitutional double jeopardy principles prohibit re-prosecution of a defendant for the crime to which the acquittal attached. See also Double Jeopardy Clause

Actual Innocence Claim The actual innocence claim is a legal theory that is used by a capital felon who has exhausted direct appeals and initial collateral or habeas corpus attacks on the judgment rendered against him or her. The actual innocence claim permits a court to hear the merits of a successive, abusive, or defaulted claim for relief, if failure to do so would result in a miscarriage of justice. The miscarriage of justice exception applies where a capital felon alleges he or she is “actually innocent” of the capital crime for which he or she was convicted or the death penalty which was imposed.

In order for a capital felon to establish actual innocence of the “crime” for which he or she was convicted, it must be shown that, in light of new evidence, it is more likely than not that no reasonable jury would have found the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. To prove actual innocence of the “punishment” imposed a capital felon, there must be clear and convincing evidence that, but for constitutional error, no reasonable jury would have found the defendant eligible for the death penalty.

Between the period 1973 and 2006, there were 123 people released from death row because of evidence of their innocence. Researchers have estimated that since 1900 there have been twenty-three persons executed who were innocent. See also DNA Evidence; Herrera v. Collins; House v. Actus Reus Actus reus literally means conduct of a person. The phrase is used to refer to the element of an offense that involves prohibited conduct. The actus reus is one of two elements that make up criminal offenses. The second element is called mens rea or mental state. No crime may legally exist without an actus reus, while some regulatory crimes, called strict liability offenses, may exist without a mens rea. Examples of the actus reus element of a capital offense would be causing death, causing death while committing another crime, causing the death of a police officer, and causing death by using a bomb. In each of the examples, the mental state of the defendant is not relevant to actus reus. The mental state is relevant for the second element, i.e., the mens rea. See also Mens Rea

Issue Presented: Whether the decision in Witherspoon v. Illinois was violated by a statute used by Texas to exclude members of the venire from jury service because they were unable to take an oath that the automatic penalty of death would not affect their deliberations on any issue of fact.

Case Holding: The ruling in Witherspoon v. Illinois was violated by a statute used by Texas to exclude members of the venire from jury service because they were unable to take an oath that the automatic penalty of death would not affect their deliberations on any issue of fact.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Adams, was charged with capital murder by the State of Texas. During jury selection, the trial court excluded potential jurors if they stated that they would be “affected” by the fact that the death penalty would be automatically imposed if they answered three statutory penalty phase questions in the affirmative. The exclusion was based upon a State statute that required removal of potential jurors who were unwilling or unable to take an oath that the automatic penalty of death would not affect their deliberations on any issue of fact. The three penalty phase questions concerned (1) whether the defendant’s conduct causing the death at issue was deliberate, (2) whether the defendant's conduct in the future would constitute a continuing threat to society, and (3) whether his conduct in killing the victim was unreasonable in response to the victim's provocation, if any.

The jury that was selected convicted the defendant of capital murder and sentenced him to death. On appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals rejected the defendant's contention that the prospective jurors had been excluded in violation of the United States Supreme Court's decision in Witherspoon v. Illinois, which held that a State may not constitutionally execute a death sentence imposed by a jury culled of all those who revealed during voir dire examination that they had conscientious scruples against or were otherwise opposed to capital punishment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White found that the statute used to exclude potential jurors violated the Court's ruling in Witherspoon. The opinion provided the following basis for its judgment:

Based on our own examination of the record, we have concluded that [the statute] was applied in this case to exclude prospective jurors on grounds impermissible under Witherspoon and related cases. As employed here, the touchstone of the inquiry under [the statute] was not whether putative jurors could and would follow their instructions and answer the posited questions in the affirmative if they honestly believed the evidence warranted it beyond reasonable doubt. Rather, the touchstone was whether the fact that the imposition of the death penalty would follow automatically from affirmative answers to the questions would have any effect at all on the jurors' performance of their duties. Such a test could, and did, exclude jurors who stated that they would be "affected" by the possibility of the death penalty, but who apparently meant only that the potentially lethal consequences of their decision would invest their deliberations with greater seriousness and gravity or would involve them emotionally. Others were excluded only because they were unable positively to state whether or not their deliberations would in any way be "affected." But neither nervousness, emotional involvement, nor inability to deny or confirm any effect whatsoever is equivalent to an unwillingness or an inability on the part of the jurors to follow the court's instructions and obey their oaths, regardless of their feelings about the death penalty. The grounds for excluding these jurors were consequently insufficient under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments. Nor in our view would the Constitution permit the exclusion of jurors from the penalty phase of a Texas murder trial if they aver that they will honestly find the facts and answer the questions in the affirmative if they are convinced beyond reasonable doubt, but not otherwise, yet who frankly concede that the prospects of the death penalty may affect what their honest judgment of the facts will be or what they may deem to be a reasonable doubt. Such assessments and judgments by jurors are inherent in the jury system, and to exclude all jurors who would be in the slightest way affected by the prospect of the death penalty or by their views about such a penalty would be to deprive the defendant of the impartial jury to which he or she is entitled under the law.

We repeat that the State may bar from jury service those whose beliefs about capital punishment would lead them to ignore the law or violate their oaths. But in the present case Texas has applied [the statute] to exclude jurors whose only fault was to take their responsibilities with special seriousness or to acknowledge honestly that they might or might not be affected. It does not appear in the record before us that these individuals were so irrevocably opposed to capital punishment as to frustrate the State's legitimate efforts to administer its constitutionally valid death penalty scheme. Accordingly, the Constitution disentitles the State to execute a sentence of death imposed by a jury from which such prospective jurors have been excluded.

The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals is consequently reversed to the extent that it sustains the imposition of the death penalty.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued a concurring statement indicating, "Although I join the Court's opinion, I continue to believe that the death penalty is, in all circumstances, contrary to the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against imposition of cruel and unusual punishments."

Concurring Statement by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice issued a statement stating that he concurred in the Court's judgment.

Concurring Statement by Justice Marshall: In his concurring statement, Justice Marshall stated that he "continue[d] to believe that the death penalty is, under all circumstances, cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that Texas's exclusion statute did not violate Witherspoon. Justice Rehnquist stated that he saw "no reason why Texas should not be entitled to require each juror to swear that he or she will answer [the three penalty phase] questions without regard to their possible cumulative consequences." It was said that the procedure employed by Texas presented no greater risk to defendants than any capital punishment procedure approved by the Court. See also Witherspoon v. Illinois

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution prohibited the prosecutor from commenting upon the defendant's failure to explain or deny evidence against him.

Case Holding: The Constitution did not prohibit the prosecutor from commenting upon the defendant's failure to explain or deny evidence against him.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Adamson, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. The California Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the Fifth Amendment prohibited the prosecutor from commenting on his failure to explain or deny the evidence against him (the defendant did not take the stand). The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Reed: Justice Reed held that the under laws of California it was permissible for the prosecutor and trial judge to comment on a defendant's failure to explain or deny evidence. It was said that the issue was a State matter insofar as the Fifth Amendment provided only a federal right, not a right imposed upon the States. Justice Reed wrote: "It is settled law that the clause of the Fifth Amendment, protecting a person against being compelled to be a witness against himself, is not made effective by the Fourteenth Amendment as a protection against state action." The judgment of the California Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to indicate that "[l]ess than 10 years ago, Mr. Justice Cardozo announced as settled constitutional law that while the Fifth Amendment, which is not directed to the States, but solely to the federal government, provides that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, the process of law assured by the Fourteenth Amendment does not require such immunity from self-crimination[.]"

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Black, in Which Douglas, J., Joined: Justice Black dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the Fifth Amendment was applicable against states through the Fourteenth Amendment. Justice Black wrote:

In my judgment ... the language of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, taken as a whole, was thought by those responsible for its submission to the people, and by those who opposed its submission, sufficiently explicit to guarantee that thereafter no state could deprive its citizens of the privileges and protections of the Bill of Rights....

I would follow what I believe was the original purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment — to extend to all the people of the nation the complete protection of the Bill of Rights.... I would therefore hold in this case that the full protection of the Fifth Amendment's proscription against compelled testimony must be afforded by California. This I would do because of reliance upon the original purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Murphy, in Which Rutledge, J., Joined: Justice Murphy dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the Fifth Amendment was applicable against the states. Justice Murphy wrote as follows:

Moreover, it is my belief that this guarantee against self-incrimination has been violated in this case. Under California law, the judge or prosecutor may comment on the failure of the defendant in a criminal trial to explain or deny any evidence or facts introduced against him. As interpreted and applied in this case, such a provision compels a defendant to be a witness against himself in one of two ways:

If he does not take the stand, his silence is used as the basis for drawing unfavorable inferences against him as to matters which he might reasonably be expected to explain. Thus he is compelled, through his silence, to testify against himself. And silence can be as effective in this situation as oral statements.

If he does take the stand, thereby opening himself to cross-examination, so as to overcome the effects of the provision in question, he is necessarily compelled to testify against himself. In that case, his testimony on cross-examination is the result of the coercive pressure of the provision rather than his own volition. Much can be said pro and con as to the desirability of allowing comment on the failure of the accused to testify. But policy arguments are to no avail in the face of a clear constitutional command. This guarantee of freedom from self-incrimination is grounded on a deep respect for those who might prefer to remain silent before their accusers.... Accordingly, I would reverse the judgment below.

Case Note: The position taken by the dissenting opinions eventually became the position adopted by the Court.

Admissible Evidence see Rules of Evidence

Adversarial Criminal Justice System The Anglo-American criminal justice system is adversarial. It places the government, represented by a prosecutor, against the defendant. The system requires that a neutral judge preside over the contest. The defendant is constitutionally guaranteed the right to have assistance of counsel and a jury to decide the facts of the case.

In an effort to balance the weight and resources of the government against an individual defendant, the system requires that the defendant's innocence be presumed. The effect of the presumption of innocence is that of placing the burden upon the government to prove a defendant is guilty of a charged crime. Thus, a defendant does not have to prove his or her innocence. Additionally, elaborate rules of evidence and procedure are used in the criminal justice system to ensure fair treatment to the defendant and the government. Although the federal Constitution does not require appellate review of a criminal conviction, all jurisdictions in the criminal justice system provide for an initial right to appeal a conviction. See also Burden of Proof at Guilt Phase; Burden of Proof at Penalty Phase; Rules of Evidence

Adverse or Hostile Witness see Examination of Witness

Advisory Jury see Binding/Nonbinding Jury Sentencing Determination

Affirm see Appellate Review of Conviction and Death Sentence

Affirmative Defenses The Anglo-American criminal justice system is unique in affording defendants a presumption of innocence and requiring prosecutors prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In spite of placing the burden of proof of guilt on prosecutors, defendants are generally required to prove any affirmative defense that is offered. Examples of affirmative defenses include insanity, alibi, self-defense, intoxication and defense of another. In most instances, a defendant must prove an affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence. Failure to prove an affirmative defense does not mean that a defendant is guilty of a crime. The prosecutor must always prove a defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt regardless of the outcome on an affirmative defense. See also Burden of Proof at Guilt Phase Afghanistan The death penalty is carried out in the nation of Afghanistan. The government of Afghanistan was controlled by the Taliban during the 1990s. However, the Taliban was ousted by the United States and allied countries after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States. In 2004 a new constitution was put in place establishing Afghanistan as an Islamic Republic.

The Constitution of Afghanistan provides for a nine-member Supreme Court (called Stera Mahkama) and subordinate High Courts and Appeal Courts. The legal system of the nation is based on Shari'a or Islamic law. The Constitution expressly recognizes capital punishment and requires the approval of the nation's president in order to be enforced. The methods of execution used by Afghanistan include firing squad, stoning, and hanging. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

African Americans and Capital Punishment African Americans have historically condemned capital punishment on a single ground. Blacks make up a disproportionate number death penalty victims. This argument was the primary basis of all death penalty statutes being struck down through the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972).

Historical data supported the pre-Furman racial attack on capital punishment by blacks. For example, between 1930 and 1972, blacks made up 53.5 percent of all persons executed in the United States. However, during this same time period the total black population never surpassed 15 percent of the nation's total population. The decision in Furman recognized the enormous racial disparity and declared that it was not by chance that blacks made up the majority of the people executed in the nation (Bureau of Justice Statistics, Capital Punishment, 1977).

Under post-Furman capital punishment jurisprudence, many blacks are still arguing that the death penalty is imposed in a racially discriminatory manner. However, post-Furman statistical data does not provide the irrefutable supporting evidence of racial discrimination that characterized pre-Furman death penalty data. For example, blacks represented only 34.1 percent of all those executed between the period between 1976 and November 2006. While it is arguable that the percentage of blacks executed during the latter period was high relative to their total population in the nation, this figure would not, standing alone, support changing the death penalty system a second time (Bureau of Justice Statistics, Capital Punishment, 2006).

Left to right: Charles Sanders, Grady B. Cole, and J. C. Levine were executed on January 8, 1943, by the State of Arizona. The three young men were convicted of robbing and killing a taxi driver. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

While the statistical data of executions during the post-Furman era lacks moral persuasion for changing the death penalty system, blacks have made a compelling case for change through evidence of persons actually sentenced to death, but not executed. Blacks contend that a definite pattern has developed, indicating undue racial discrimination in persons actually sentenced to death. A snapshot of the nation's death row population in July of 2006 revealed that blacks made up 41.8 percent.

Additionally, in the case of United States v. Bass, 266 F.3d 532 (2001), reversed 536 U.S. 862 (2002), a survey was submitted showing racial discrimination in the selection of death penalty cases by the federal government. The survey showed a significant difference between the percentage of white and black inmates in the federal prison population and those charged by the United States with death-eligible crimes. The survey revealed that whites made up 57 percent of the population and blacks made up 38 percent. However, only 20 percent of the whites were charged with death-eligible offenses, whereas 48 percent of black prisoners were charged with death-eligible offenses. The survey also "showed that the United States entered into a plea bargain with forty-eight percent of the white defendants against whom it sought the death penalty, compared with twenty-five percent of similarly situated black defendants."

Opponents of the death penalty race theory contend that

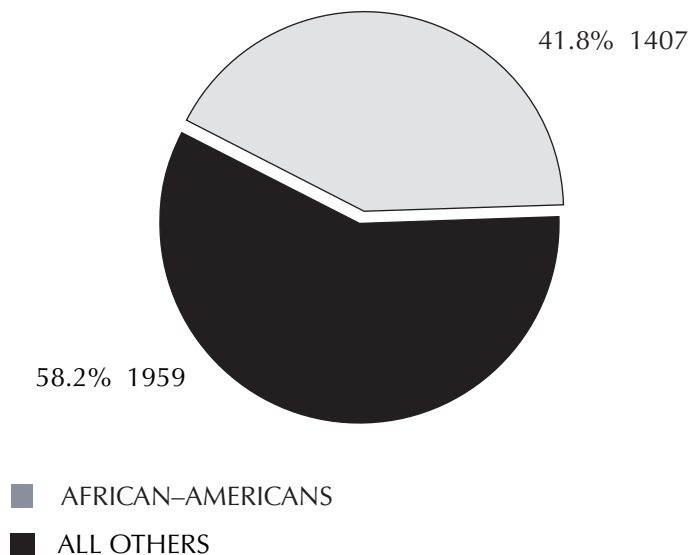

In January 2001, Wanda Jean Allen became the second woman ever executed by the State of Oklahoma. The other woman, Dora Wright, also an African American, was executed in July 1903. Wanda was also the first African American woman executed since the reinstatement of the death penalty in 1976. (Oklahoma Department of Corrections) blacks and their supporters have focused upon the wrong set of numbers in determining whether post-Furman capital punishment is racially dispensed. It has been posited that the correct numbers to look at involve the race of actual murderers. For example, between 1999 and 2005, the number of known black and white murderers totaled 75,161. (During this period, there was a total of 31,954 murderers whose identity was not known.) Out of that total, blacks comprised 52.2 percent of the known black and white murderers. Although known black murderers outnumbered known white murderers during this period, more white murderers received death sentences than black murderers. Thus, it is argued that post-Furman capital punishment is not racially dispensed. See also Asians and Capital Punishment; Hispanics and Capital Punishment; Native Americans and Capital Punishment; Race and Capital Punishment

Age of Felon Mitigator In a majority of capital punishment jurisdictions, the age of felon mitigator is a statutory mitigating circumstance. This mitigator has been affected by the United States Supreme Court decision in Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551

(2005), which held that the death penalty cannot be imposed upon a defendant who was seventeen years old or younger, when he or she committed a capital crime.

The minority/majority status of a capital felon at the time of the offense may be considered by the jury at the penalty phase as a mitigating factor against imposition of the death penalty. Courts have held that, while age may be relevant, age is not dispositive of this mitigator. That is, a capital felon may be chronologically well along in years, but mentally and emotionally, he or she may be an adolescent. Therefore, a capital felon may utilize age as a mitigator where he or she is chronologically old, but mentally and emotionally is child-like. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Age of Victim Aggravator A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide that the age of a victim of murder is a statutory aggravating circumstance that permits the imposition of the death penalty. There is no unity among capital jurisdictions regarding the actual age of a victim which constitutes a statutory aggravator. However, the age of the victim refers generally to children and/or elderly persons.

Research has shown that the murder of teenagers and young adults increased dramatically in the late 1980s while rates for older age groups declined. The murder rate for 14- to 17-year-olds increased almost 150 percent from 1985 to 1993, while 18- to 24-year-olds experienced the highest homicide. Murder rates for children under age 14 have remained stable and low. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Aggravated Battery Aggravator Aggravated battery has been made a statutory aggravating circumstance when murder results therefrom. Two capital punishment jurisdictions, Georgia and Indiana, have made aggravated battery a statutory aggravating circumstance. The crime of aggravated battery is not the same as the crime of battery. Aggravated battery occurs when there is serious injury to a victim. The crime of battery can be a mere touching of a victim.

A subtle legal distinction is made between aggravated battery and murder, insofar as the victim of aggravated battery is also the victim of murder. The aggravated battery component of capital murder requires the victim not die immediately, but suffer severe injuries before eventual death. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Aggravating Circumstances The United States Supreme Court has ruled that the death penalty cannot be imposed arbitrarily upon all persons who commit murder. The imposition of the death penalty must be reserved for a small class of murders that are caused under specific conditions. To comply with this constitutional mandate, legislators in capital punishment jurisdictions have statutorily created certain factors that permit imposition of the death penalty. Four approaches have developed in meeting the narrowing requirement.

First, the majority of capital punishment jurisdictions utilize a procedure that involves narrowing a death penalty prosecution for murder through the use of death-eligible special circumstances and statutory aggravating circumstances. Second, a minority of capital punishment jurisdictions (Oregon and Texas) utilizes death-eligible special circumstances, statutory aggravating circumstances and special statutory issues to impose the sentence of death. Third, one capital punishment jurisdiction (Virginia) utilizes statutory aggravating circumstances and special statutory issues to impose the sentence of death. Fourth, one capital punishment jurisdiction (Utah) only utilizes statutory aggra-

Distinguishing Statutory Aggravators from Death-Eligible Special Circumstances: Death-eligible special circumstances and statutory aggravating circumstances are both factors which are created by legislators. The purpose of death-eligible special circumstances and statutory aggravating circumstances are the same. Both seek to narrow the class of murders and murderers that are subject to death-penalty treatment. The functions of death-eligible special circumstances and statutory aggravating circumstances are different. The function of a death-eligible special circumstance is that of merely triggering death penalty consideration for those whose conduct falls within their sphere of proscriptions. The function of a statutory aggravating circumstance, on the other hand, is that of causing the death penalty to be imposed.

Death-eligible special circumstances are elements of capital offenses and, as such, are constitutionally required to be proven beyond a reasonable doubt at the guilt phase. If a death-eligible special circumstance is not so proven at the guilt phase, then a defendant cannot be subject to capital sentencing. For the majority of capital punishment jurisdictions, statutory aggravating circumstances are not elements of capital offenses. Therefore, they are not constitutionally required to be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, and the proof of their existence is usually made at the penalty phase. However, a minority of capital punishment jurisdictions — Ohio, Oregon, Texas, Utah, Virginia and Washington — require that statutory aggravating circumstances be proven at the guilt phase. Consequently, in those jurisdictions, statutory aggravating circumstances must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, because they are part of the offense.

Distinguishing Statutory Aggravators from Special Statutory Issues: As previously stated, six capital punishment jurisdictions, Ohio, Oregon, Texas, Utah, Virginia and Washington, require statutory aggravating circumstances be proven at the guilt phase. In Jurek v. Texas, 428 U.S. 262 (1976), the United States Supreme Court indicated that the Constitution permitted the death-eligible narrowing process to occur at the guilt phase and does not require more. Notwithstanding the pronouncement in Jurek, three of the jurisdictions (Oregon, Texas, and Virginia) utilize, at the penalty phase, special statutory issues that must be addressed by the factfinder in deciding whether to impose the death penalty. The decision in Jurek upheld the constitutionality of using special statutory issues, instead of statutory aggravating circumstances, at the penalty phase.

Although special statutory issues and statutory aggravating circumstances serve the same purpose — i.e., they both are used to determine whether to impose the death penalty — they differ in one respect: Special statutory issues are constant for all capital felons, in that special statutory issues are a series of questions that are asked in all capital prosecutions. However, statutory aggravating circumstances vary with the particular facts of each capital homicide. See also Death-Eligible Offenses; Mitigating Circumstances

Aider and Abettor An aider and abettor is a person who participates in a crime but who is not considered a principal, i.e., the person who actually committed the crime. Statutes generally permit an aider and abettor to be prosecuted and punished as though he or she actually committed an offense. An exception to this general rule has been constitutionally carved out for capital murder.

Under the U.S. Constitution, an aider and abettor to capital murder may be prosecuted and found guilty for the crime. However, the Constitution has been interpreted to require that specific conduct by the aider and abettor be shown before a death sentence may be imposed upon him or her.

A death sentence may not be imposed upon an aider or abettor who neither took life, attempted to take life, nor intended to take life. An aider and abettor convicted of capital murder may receive a sentence of death if his or her participation in the crime is major and his or her mental state was one of reckless indifference to the value of human life. Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution requires that an indigent defendant have State-appointed access to psychiatric assistance to prepare a defense based on his or her mental condition, when his or her sanity at the time of the offense is seriously in question.

Case Holding: When an indigent defendant has made a preliminary showing that his or her sanity at the time of the offense is likely to be a significant factor at trial, the Constitution requires the State provide the defendant with court-appointed expert psychiatric assistance on this issue

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The record of the case indicated that the defendant, Glen Burton Ake, was arrested and charged in 1979, by the State of Oklahoma, with murdering a couple and wounding their two children. The trial court initially determined that the defendant was incompetent to stand trial and therefore had the defendant committed to a state mental hospital. Six weeks after the defendant's commitment, the State's chief forensic psychiatrist informed the trial court that the defendant had become competent to stand trial.

The defendant was indigent and had court-appointed counsel. To enable defense counsel to prepare and present a defense adequately, defense counsel indicated that a psychiatrist would have to examine the defendant with respect to his mental condition at the time of the offense. Defense counsel argued that the federal Constitution required the trial court to either arrange to have a psychiatrist perform the examination, or to provide funds to allow the defense to arrange for one. The trial court rejected defense counsel's argument that the federal Constitution required that an indigent defendant receive the assistance of a psychiatrist when that assistance is necessary to the defense.

The defendant was tried for two counts of murder in the first degree and for two counts of shooting with intent to kill. At the guilt phase of trial, his sole defense was insanity. The jury rejected the defendant's insanity defense and returned a verdict of guilty on all counts. The defendant was subsequently sentenced to death on each of the two murder counts, and to 500 years' imprisonment on each of the two counts of shooting with intent to kill.

On appeal to the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals, the defendant argued that, as an indigent defendant, he should have been provided the services of a court-appointed psychiatrist. The appellate court rejected this argument, observing: “We have held numerous times that, the unique nature of capital cases notwithstanding, the State does not have the responsibility of providing such services to indigents charged with capital crimes.” The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall made a fundamental legal observation at the outset of the Court’s opinion. It was said that: “This Court has long recognized that when a State brings its judicial power to bear on an indigent defendant in a criminal proceeding, it must take steps to assure that the defendant has a fair opportunity to present his defense. This elementary principle, grounded in significant part on the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process guarantee of fundamental fairness, derives from the belief that justice cannot be equal where, simply as a result of his poverty, a defendant is denied the opportunity to participate meaningfully in a judicial proceeding in which his liberty is at stake.”

The opinion proceeded to focus upon the conditions under which the participation of a psychiatrist was significant enough to the preparation of a defense, so as to require a State to provide an indigent defendant with access to competent psychiatric assistance in preparing his or her defense. Justice Marshall outlined a three-pronged test to address the issue. The first prong of the test seeks a determination as to the private interest that will be affected by the action of the State. Under the second prong, an analysis is required to determine the governmental interest that will be affected if the safeguard is to be provided. The third prong seeks to determine the probable value of the additional or substitute procedural safeguards that are sought and the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the affected interest if those safeguards are not provided.

In applying this test abstractly to the issue of appointment of psychiatric assistance, Justice Marshall reached the following conclusions. First, it was said that the private interest in the accuracy of a criminal proceeding is, in and of itself, compelling. That is, a defendant’s interest in the outcome of the State’s effort to overcome the presumption of innocence is self-evident and is given great weight in the analysis.

Next, in looking at the interest of the State, the opinion refuted Oklahoma’s suggestion that providing such assistance would result in a staggering economic burden to the State. Justice Marshall noted that many States, including the federal government, make psychiatric assistance available to indigent defendants. It was concluded that the State’s interest in denying the assistance of a psychiatrist is not substantial, in view of the compelling interest of both the State and the defendant in an accurate disposition of a case.

In turning to the final issue of the probable value of the psychiatric assistance sought, and the risk of error in the proceeding if such assistance is not offered, Justice Marshall made the following determinations. It was said that when the State has made the defendant’s mental condition relevant to his or her criminal culpability and to the punishment he or she might suffer, the assistance of a psychiatrist is crucial to the defendant’s ability to present a meaningful defense. While acknowledging that psychiatry is not an exact science, Justice Marshall added that “[b]y organizing a defendant’s mental history, examination results and behavior, and other information, interpreting it in light of their expertise, and then laying out their investigative and analytic process to the jury, the psychiatrists for each party enable the jury to make its most accurate determination of the truth on the issue before them.” With that observation in view, the opinion found that there was an extremely high risk of an inaccurate resolution of a case, when necessary psychiatric assistance is denied to a defendant.

The ultimate conclusion from Justice Marshall’s abstract analysis of the application of the three-pronged test was “that when a defendant demonstrates to the trial judge that his sanity at the time of the offense is to be a significant factor at trial, the State must, at a minimum, assure the defendant access to a competent psychiatrist who will conduct an appropriate examination and assist in evaluation, preparation, and presentation of the defense.”

In turning to the facts of the case presented to the Court, the opinion found that the defendant established that he was indigent and that his sanity was a major issue at the trial; therefore, it was constitutional error to deny him free access to psychiatric assistance. The judgment of the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals was reversed and a new trial ordered.

Concurring Opinion by Chief Justice Burger: Chief Justice Burger wrote a brief concurring opinion wherein he pointed out that he believed the Court’s holding should be narrowly interpreted as applying to capital prosecutions and not to non-capital cases.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist dissented on two primary grounds. First, he argued that the facts of the case did not warrant the creation of a rule of law that required appointment of a psychiatrist for an indigent defendant merely upon “a preliminary showing that his sanity at the time of the offense is likely to be a significant factor at trial.” Justice Rehnquist argued that a higher standard should be erected that would entitle a defendant to appointment of psychiatric assistance. He did not believe that the facts of the case reached the level necessary to require appointment of psychiatric assistance.

Next, Justice Rehnquist reasoned that even if the rule announced by the Court was necessary, “the constitutional rule announced by the Court is far too broad.” Justice Rehnquist indicated that the majority opinion should have expressly limited “the rule to capital cases, and make clear that the entitlement is to an independent psychiatric evaluation, not to a defense consultant.”

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established racial discrimination in grand jury selection due to the jury commissioners’ refusal to select more than one black to serve on a grand jury.

Case Holding: The defendant did not establish racial discrimination in grand jury selection due to the jury commissioners' refusal to select more than one black to serve on a grand jury, because the Constitution does not guarantee racial proportionality on a grand jury.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Akins, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Texas. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his prosecution violated the federal Constitution, because the grand jury commissioners would not permit more than one black person to sit on a grand jury. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Reed: Justice Reed held that "[t]he Fourteenth Amendment forbids any discrimination against a race in the selection of a grand jury." However, the opinion indicated that limitations were imposed upon the right of participation on a grand jury. Justice Reed wrote: "Fairness in selection has never been held to require proportional representation of races upon a jury. Purposeful discrimination is not sustained by a showing that on a single grand jury the number of members of one race is less than that race's proportion of the eligible individuals. The number of our races and nationalities stands in the way of evolution of such a conception of due process or equal protection. Defendants under our criminal statutes are not entitled to demand representatives of their racial inheritance upon juries before whom they are tried. But such defendants are entitled to require that those who are trusted with jury selection shall not pursue a course of conduct which results in discrimination in the selection of jurors on racial grounds."

Justice Reed reasoned further that: "The mere fact of inequality in the number selected does not in itself show discrimination. A purpose to discriminate must be present which may be proven by systematic exclusion of eligible jurymen of the proscribed race or by unequal application of the law to such an extent as to show intentional discrimination." The opinion concluded that the record in the case failed to establish "that the commissioners deliberately and intentionally limited the number of [blacks] on the grand jury list. The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Rutledge: Justice Rutledge issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's decision.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Murphy: Justice Murphy dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the Constitution encompassed the defendant's claim and that the defendant's rights were violated. Justice Murphy wrote:

It follows that the State of Texas, in insisting upon one [black] representative on the grand jury panel, has respected no right belonging to [the defendant]. On the contrary, to the extent that this insistence amounts to a definite limitation of [black] grand jurors, a clear constitutional right has been directly invaded. The equal protection clause guarantees [the defendant] not only the right to have [blacks] considered as prospective veniremen but also the right to have them considered without numerical or proportional limitation. If a jury is to be fairly chosen from a cross section of the community, it must be done without limiting the number of persons of a particular color, racial background or faith — all of which are irrelevant factors in setting qualifications for jury service. This may in a particular instance result in the selection of one, six, twelve or even no [blacks] on a jury panel. The important point, however, is that the selections must in no way be limited or restricted by such irrelevant factors....

Our affirmance of this judgment thus tarnishes the fact that we of this nation are one people undivided in ability or freedom by differences in race, color or creed.

Dissenting Statement by Chief Justice Stone and Black, J.: The chief justice and Justice Black issued a statement indicating they dissented from the Court's decision. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection

Alabama The State of Alabama is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on March 5, 1976.

Alabama has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Alabama Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and eight associate justices. The Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals is composed of a presiding judge and four judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called Circuit Courts. Capital offenses against the State of Alabama are tried in the Circuit Courts. It is provided under the laws of Alabama that, in capital cases, an indigent defendant must be appointed legal counsel having no less than five years' prior experience in the active practice of criminal law.

Alabama's capital punishment offenses are set out under Ala. Code § 13A-5-40(a). This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. Murder by the defendant during a kidnapping in the first degree or an attempt thereof committed by the defendant;
2. Murder by the defendant during a robbery in the first degree or an attempt thereof committed by the defendant;
3. Murder by the defendant during a rape in the first or second degree or an attempt thereof committed by the defendant; or murder by the defendant during sodomy in the first or second degree or an attempt thereof committed by the defendant;
4. Murder by the defendant during a burglary in the first or second degree or an attempt thereof committed by the defendant;
5. Murder of any police officer, sheriff, deputy, state trooper, federal law enforcement officer, or any other state or federal peace officer of any kind, or prison or jail guard, while such officer or guard is on duty, regardless of whether the defendant knew or should have known the victim was an officer or guard on duty, or because of some official or job-related act or performance of such officer or guard;
6. Murder committed while the defendant is under sentence of life imprisonment;
7. Murder done for a pecuniary or other valuable consideration or pursuant to a contract or for hire;
8. Murder by the defendant during sexual abuse in the first or second degree or an attempt thereof committed by the defendant;
9. Murder by the defendant during arson in the first or second degree committed by the defendant; or murder by the defendant by means of explosives or explosion;
10. Murder wherein two or more persons are murdered by the defendant by one act or pursuant to one scheme or course of conduct;
11. Murder by the defendant when the victim is a state or federal public official or former public official and the murder stems from or is caused by or is related to his official position, act, or capacity;

12. Murder by the defendant during the act of unlawfully assuming control of any aircraft by use of threats or force with intent to obtain any valuable consideration for the release of said aircraft or any passenger or crewmen thereon or to direct the route or movement of said aircraft, or otherwise exert control over said aircraft;

13. Murder by a defendant who has been convicted of any other murder in the twenty years preceding the crime; provided that the murder which constitutes the capital crime shall be murder as defined in subsection (b. Of this section; and provided further that the prior murder conviction referred to shall include murder in any degree as defined at the time and place of the prior conviction;

14. Murder when the victim is subpoenaed, or has been subpoenaed, to testify, or the victim had testified, in any preliminary hearing, grand jury proceeding, criminal trial or criminal proceeding of whatever nature, or civil trial or civil proceeding of whatever nature, in any municipal, state, or federal court, when the murder stems from, is caused by, or is related to the capacity or role of the victim as a witness;

15. Murder when the victim is less than fourteen years of age;

16. Murder committed by or through the use of a deadly weapon fired or otherwise used from outside a dwelling while the victim is in a dwelling;

17. Murder committed by or through the use of a deadly weapon while the victim is in a vehicle; or

18. Murder committed by or through the use of a deadly weapon fired or otherwise used within or from a vehicle.

In addition, under Ala. Code § 13A-10-152 the crime of terrorism is made a capital offense. This crime is committed when a person commits a homicide with the intent to intimidate or coerce a civilian population, influence the policy of a unit of government by intimidation or coercion, or affect the conduct of a unit of government by murder, assassination, or kidnapping.

Capital murder in Alabama is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Alabama is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial (a defendant may waive the right to have a jury at the penalty phase). It is required that, at the penalty phase, at least ten of twelve jurors must agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to declare a mistrial and convene another penalty phase jury. The decision of a penalty phase jury is not binding on the trial court under the laws of Alabama. The trial court may accept or reject the jury's determination on punishment, and impose whatever sentence he or she believes the evidence established.

Under the laws of Alabama, a defendant may plead guilty to a capital offense. However, the State still requires the prosecutor prove the defendant's guilt of the capital offense beyond a reasonable doubt to a jury. Under Alabama's laws, a guilty plea may be considered in determining whether the prosecutor has met the burden of proof.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Ala. Code § 13A-5-49 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The capital offense was committed by a person under sentence of imprisonment;

2. The defendant was previously convicted of another capital offense or a felony involving the use or threat of violence to the person;

3. The defendant knowingly created a great risk of death to many persons;

4. The capital offense was committed while the defendant was engaged or was an accomplice in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, or flight after committing, or attempting to commit rape, robbery, burglary or kidnapping;

5. The capital offense was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody;

6. The capital offense was committed for pecuniary gain;

7. The capital offense was committed to disrupt or hinder the lawful exercise of any governmental function or the enforcement of laws;

8. The capital offense was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel compared to other capital offenses;

9. The defendant intentionally caused the death of two or more persons by one act or pursuant to one scheme or course of conduct; or

10. The capital offense was one of a series of intentional killings committed by the defendant.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Alabama has provided by statute (Ala. Code § 13A-5-51) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity;

2. The capital offense was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance;

3. The victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to it;

4. The defendant was an accomplice in the capital offense committed by another person and his participation was relatively minor;

5. The defendant acted under extreme duress or under the substantial domination of another person;

6. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired; and

7. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime.

It is also provided by Ala. Code § 13A-5-52 that mitigating circumstances also "include any aspect of a defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that the defendant offers as a basis for a sentence of life imprisonment without parole instead of death, and any other relevant mitigating circumstance which the defendant offers as a basis for a sentence of life imprisonment without parole instead of death."

Under Alabama's capital punishment statute, the Alabama Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Alabama by default uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences, but a prisoner has the option of being put to death in the electric chair. The State's death row facility for men is located in Atmore, Alabama, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Wetumpka, Alabama.

Pursuant to the laws of Alabama, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. Capital felons who have their death sentences commuted to life imprisonment are eligible for a pardon from the State's Board of Pardons and Parole, if the Board obtains sufficient evidence to indicate that the inmate is innocent of the crime and unanimously approves the pardon with the Governor.

Under the laws of Alabama, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Ala. Code § 15-18-83:

a. The following persons may be present at an execution and none other:

1. The executioner and any persons necessary to assist in conducting the execution;
2. The Commissioner of Corrections or his or her representative;
3. Two physicians, including the prison physician;
4. The spiritual advisor of the condemned;
5. The chaplain of Holman Prison;
6. Such newspaper reporters as may be admitted by the warden;
7. Any of the relatives or friends of the condemned person that he or she may request, not exceeding two in number; and
8. Any of the immediate family of the victim, not to exceed two in number; provided that if there was more than one victim, the number and manner of selection of victims' representatives shall be as determined by the Commissioner of Corrections.

b. No convict shall be permitted by the prison authorities to witness the execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Alabama executed 35 capital felons. During this period, Alabama executed one female capital felon. A total of 193 capital felons were on death row in Alabama as of July 2006. The death row population for this period was listed as ninety-five black inmates, ninety-six white inmates, and two Latino inmates. One death row inmate was a female.

NUMBER OF EXECUTIONS BY ALABAMA 1976–OCTOBER 2006

- ALABAMA EXECUTIONS
- ALL OTHER EXECUTIONS

Alaska The death penalty is not carried out by the State of Alaska. The last execution in Alaska was in 1949. The State abolished the punishment in 1957.

Alaskans Against the Death Penalty Alaskans Against the Death Penalty (AADP) was founded for the purpose of educating the community and public officials about the facts and myths of the death penalty. AADP is comprised of individuals and organizations that include students, homemakers, police officers, attorneys, clergy, correctional officers, business owners, and governmental employees. AADP publishes a newsletter called Abolition Alert.

Albania The death penalty is authorized in the country of Albania. However, in 2000, the nation outlawed the punishment for ordinary crimes. The methods of execution authorized include firing squad and hanging. Albania adopted a constitution in 1998. The constitution created a constitutional court, a supreme court, lower appellate courts and district courts. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court committed error by instructing the jury to infer the defendant's guilt from evidence of his flight from the jurisdiction of the court.

Case Holding: The trial court committed error by instructing the jury to infer the defendant's guilt from evidence of his flight from the jurisdiction of the court, therefore the judgment against him could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Alberty, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the trial court committed error by instructing the jury to infer guilt from evidence of his flight from the jurisdiction of the court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brown: Justice Brown held that it was error to instruct the jury to infer the defendant's guilt from evidence that he temporarily fled the county where the crime occurred. The opinion addressed the matter as follows:

[I]t was especially misleading for the court to charge the jury that, from the fact of absconding, they might infer the fact of guilt, and that flight "is a silent admission by the defendant that he is unwilling or unable to face the case against him. It is in some sense ... a confession; and it comes in with the other incidents, the corpus delicti being proved, from which guilt may be cumulatively inferred." While, undoubtedly, the flight of the accused is a circumstance proper to be laid before the jury, as having a tendency to prove his guilt, at the same time ... there are so many reasons for such conduct consistent with innocence that it scarcely comes up to the standard of evidence tending to establish guilt, but this and similar evidence has been allowed upon the theory that the jury will give it such weight as it deserves, depending upon the surrounding circumstances....

[I]t is not universally true that a man who is conscious that he has done a wrong will pursue a certain course not in harmony with the conduct of a man who is conscious of having done an act which is innocent, right, and proper, since it is a matter of common knowledge that men who are entirely innocent do sometimes fly from the scene of a crime through fear of being apprehended as the guilty parties, or from an unwillingness to appear as witnesses. Nor is it true as an accepted axiom of criminal law that "the wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are as bold as a lion." Innocent men sometimes hesitate to confront a jury; not necessarily because they fear that the jury will not protect them, but because they do not wish their names to appear in connection with criminal acts, are humiliated at being obliged to incur the popular odium of an arrest and trial, or because they do not wish to be put to the annoyance or expense of defending themselves.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and a new trial awarded.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied due process of law because of false testimony given by the prosecutor's star witness.

Case Holding: The defendant was denied due process of law because of false testimony given by the prosecutor's star witness.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Alvaro Alcorta, was charged with the capital murder of his wife by the State of Texas. During the trial, the defendant admitted killing his wife, but contended that he killed her in a heat of passion, after discovering her embracing a man called Castilleja. The alleged paramour, Castilleja, testified at trial and denied having any relationship with the defendant's wife. The jury rejected the defense and convicted the defendant of capital murder. The defendant was sentenced to death. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence.

The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a State trial court. During a hearing on the petition, Castilleja confessed to having had sexual intercourse with the defendant's wife on several occasions. He also testified that he had informed the prosecutor of the affair before the trial and that the prosecutor had told him he should not volunteer any information about it. The prosecutor admitted these statements were true. The trial court denied relief. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the denial of relief. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's claim that his conviction violated due process of law. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion held that the defendant was denied due process of law because of Castilleja's false testimony at trial and the prosecutor's conduct in letting him testify falsely. The opinion reasoned as follows:

A hearing was held on the petition for habeas corpus. Castilleja was called as a witness. He confessed [to] having sexual intercourse with [the defendant's] wife on five or six occasions within a relatively brief period before her death. He testified that he had informed the prosecutor of this before trial and the prosecutor had told him he should not volunteer any information about such intercourse but if specifically asked about it to answer truthfully. The prosecutor took the stand and admitted that these statements were true. He conceded that he had not told [the defendant] about Castilleja's illicit intercourse with his wife. He also admitted that he had not included this information in a written statement taken from Castilleja prior to the trial but instead had noted it in a separate record....

Under ... general principles ... [the defendant] was not accorded due process of law. It cannot seriously be disputed that Castilleja's testimony, taken as a whole, gave the jury the false impression that his relationship with [the defendant's] wife was nothing more than that of casual friendship. This testimony was elicited by the prosecutor who knew of the illicit intercourse between Castilleja and [the defendant's] wife. Undoubtedly Castilleja's testimony was seriously prejudicial to [the defendant]. It tended squarely to refute his claim that he had adequate cause for a surge of "sudden passion" in which he killed his wife. If Castilleja's relationship with [the defendant's] wife had been truthfully portrayed to the jury, it would have, apart from impeaching his credibility, tended to corroborate [the defendant's] contention that he had found his wife embracing Castilleja. If [the defendant's] defense had been accepted by the jury, as it might well have been if Castilleja had not been allowed to testify falsely, to the knowledge of the prosecutor, his offense would have been reduced to "murder without malice," precluding the death penalty now imposed upon him.

The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was reversed. See also Actual Innocence Claim

United States, 283 U.S. 308 (1931); Argued: March 16, 1931; Decided: April 20, 1931; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Hughes; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice McReynolds; Appellate Defense Counsel: James Francis Reilly argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Leo A. Issue Presented: Whether the trial court committed reversible error in refusing a request to ask the prospective jury, during jury selection, if they had racial prejudices that would prevent them from fairly deciding the case because the defendant was black and the victim was white.

Case Holding: The trial court committed reversible error in refusing a request to ask the prospective jury, during jury selection, if they had racial prejudices that would prevent them from fairly deciding the case because the defendant was black and the victim was white.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Alfred Scott Aldridge was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the District of Columbia. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the trial court committed error in refusing to ask the prospective jurors, during jury selection, if racial prejudices would prevent them from fairly deciding the case because the defendant was black and the victim was white. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Hughes: The chief justice held that it was reversible error for the trial court to refuse to inquire into racial prejudice when asked by the defendant. The opinion reasoned as follows:

The right to examine jurors on the voir dire as to the existence of a disqualifying state of mind has been upheld with respect to other races than the black race, and in relation to religious and other prejudices of a serious character....

Despite the privileges accorded to [blacks], we do not think that it can be said that the possibility of such prejudice is so remote as to justify the risk in forbidding the inquiry. And this risk becomes most grave when the issue is of life or death.

The argument is advanced on behalf of the government that it would be detrimental to the administration of the law in the courts of the United States to allow questions to jurors as to racial or religious prejudices. We think that it would be far more injurious to permit it to be thought that persons entertaining a disqualifying prejudice were allowed to serve as jurors and that inquiries designed to elicit the fact of disqualification were barred. No surer way could be devised to bring the processes of justice into disrepute.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice McReynolds: Justice McReynolds dissented from the Court's decision on the grounds that the record did not disclose any unfairness to the defendant in failing to make inquiries into racial prejudice. He expressed his opinion as follows:

Nothing is revealed by the record which tends to show that any juror entertained prejudice which might have impaired his ability fairly to pass upon the issues. It is not even argued that considering the evidence presented there was room for reasonable doubt of guilt....

Two local courts could not conclude that there was adequate reason for holding [that] the accused man had suffered deprivation of any substantial right through refusal by the trial judge to ask prospective jurors something relative to racial prejudice. And certainly I am unable to affirm that they were wrong....

Unhappily, the enforcement of our criminal laws is scandalously ineffective. Crimes of violence multiply; punishment walks lamely. Courts ought not to increase the difficulties by magnifying theoretical possibilities. It is their province to deal with matters actual and material; to promote order and not to hinder it by excessive theorizing of or by magnifying what in practice is not really important.

Issue Presented: Whether it was error for the federal district court to force an attorney who was consulted by the defendant to reveal the communication given by the defendant.

Case Holding: It was error for the federal district court to force an attorney who was consulted by the defendant to reveal the communication given by the defendant, because the attorney-client privilege protected such communication from disclosure.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Alexander, was prosecuted for capital murder by the United States. The offense occurred "at the Creek Nation in [Native American] country." The trial was held in a federal district court in the State of Arkansas. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, arguing that it was error for trial court to force an attorney he consulted to reveal to the jury confidential communication between them.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brown: Justice Brown held that it was error for the trial court to force the attorney to disclose communication provided by the defendant. The opinion stated that the common-law attorney-client privilege prohibited disclosure of confidential communication between an attorney and client, unless the client consented to such disclosure. It was also said that neither the payment of a fee nor the pendency of litigation was necessary to invoke the privilege. The opinion found that the defendant consulted with an attorney about the disappearance of the murder victim (the defendant's business partner) and that such communication was protected by the attorney-client privilege, even though the attorney did not represent the defendant in the subsequent murder prosecution. Justice Brown wrote that "[w]hatever facts, therefore, are communicated by a client to a counsel solely on account of that relation, such counsel are not at liberty, even if they wish, to disclose; and the law holds their testimony incompetent."

Justice Brown acknowledged that the attorney-client privilege did not protect communication made to an attorney in furtherance of a scheme to commit a crime. However, he wrote that the defendant did not consult the attorney for the purpose of committing a future crime. It was said that "[h]ad the interview in this case been held for the purpose of preparing his defense, or even for devising a scheme to escape the consequences of his crime, there could be no doubt of its being privileged, although he had made the same statement that his partner was missing and he had not heard from him.” The judgment of the district court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. See also Attorney-Client Privilege

Alford Plea In the context of capital punishment, an Alford Plea is a protestation by a defendant that he or she is innocent, but will plead guilty to avoid the death penalty. The name refers to the case in which the rule of law was announced: North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970). The United States Supreme Court has found that an Alford Plea does not violate the federal Constitution. See also Bradshaw v. Stumpf; Guilty Plea; North Carolina v. Alford

Algeria Algeria imposes the death penalty as punishment for criminal offenses. The method of execution used by Algeria is the firing squad. The legal system of the nation is based on French and Islamic law. A constitution was adopted by Algerians on December 7, 1996.

The Algerian judiciary is generally independent of executive or military control. The court structure of Algeria is divided into a supreme court and forty-eight provincial (trial) courts. The Supreme Court’s review of lower court decisions is limited to questions of procedure, not questions of legal dispute. When overruled, lower court decisions are returned to the lower courts for retrial.

Provincial courts have original jurisdiction over felony offenses. Criminal charges are instituted by the Chamber of Accusation, which serves as a grand jury. Arrested suspects must be informed of the nature of charges against them. No bail system exists in Algeria, but courts have discretion to release suspects on their own recognizance.

A criminal trial is presided over by a panel of three judges and four lay jurors. Defendants usually have access to legal counsel. The Algerian Bar Association provides free legal services to defendants who are unable to pay for legal services. Defendants have the right to confront witnesses and present evidence. Trials are public and defendants have the right to appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Alibi Defense The defense of alibi is an affirmative defense. A capital felon offering such a defense has the burden of proving alibi usually by a preponderance of the evidence. When a defendant presents an alibi defense, the prosecutor must prove the defendant’s presence at the scene of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. See also Affirmative Defenses

Alito, Samuel Anthony, Jr. Samuel Anthony Alito, Jr., was nominated by President George W. Bush to fill an associate justice vacancy on the United States Supreme Court. The nomination was confirmed by the Senate and Alito took his seat on the Supreme Court on January 31, 2006. Alito came to the Supreme Court with a reputation of having a conservative judicial philosophy.

Alito was born in Trenton, New Jersey, on April 1, 1950. He received an undergraduate from Princeton University in 1972 and a law degree from Yale Law School in 1975. Alito served as a law clerk for the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit his first year out of law school. He was subsequently employed as a federal attorney with several agencies from 1977 to 1990. In 1990, Alito was appointed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

Although Alito joined the Supreme Court with a reputation of having a conservative judicial philosophy, he wrote a capital punishment opinion for a unanimous Supreme Court in Holmes v. South Carolina, which suggests he may take a moderate approach in this area of the law. In the Holmes decision, Alito reversed a murder conviction and death sentence because the defendant was not allowed to put on credible evidence that a third-person committed the crime. The evidence had been excluded under a unique rule of evidence adopted by South Carolina. Alito wrote that “the Constitution ... prohibits the exclusion of defense evidence under rules that serve no legitimate purpose or that are disproportionate to the ends that they are asserted to promote.”

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court erroneously instructed the jury on how to receive the defendant’s evidence of self-defense.

Case Holding: The trial court erroneously instructed the jury on how to receive the defendant’s evidence of self-defense; therefore, the judgment against him could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Allison, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, contending that the trial court improperly instructed the jury on how to interpret his evidence of self-defense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that the trial court incorrectly instructed the jury on the defendant’s evidence of self-defense. The opinion explained as follows:

The hypothesis upon which the defense rested on the trial was that John Allison had a gun with him on the morning of the tragedy, in order to hunt deer, and that his stopping at [the place where the victim was] was accidental. His testimony to this effect was corroborated, and was not contradicted....

Justice and the law demanded that, so far as reference was made to the evidence, that which was favorable to the accused should not be excluded. His guilt or innocence turned on a narrow hinge, and great caution should have been used not to complicate and confuse the issue. But the [jury instruction] ignored the evidence tending to show that [the] defendant had not armed himself at all, but had a gun with him for purposes of sport; ... And invited the jury to contemplate the spectacle of [the defendant] hunting up [the victim] with the deliberately preconceived intention of murdering him, unrelieved by allusion to defensive matter, which threw a different light on the transaction.

If [the] defendant were in the right at the time of the killing, the inquiry as to how he came to be armed was immaterial, or, at least, embraced by that expression. If there were evidence—and as to this the record permits no doubt—tending to establish that defendant carried his gun that morning for no purpose of offense or defense, then [the jury instruction] of the court was calculated to darken the light cast on the homicide by the attendant circumstances as [the] defendant claimed them to be; and of this he had just cause to complain....

[T]hreats [by the victim] were recent, and were communicated, and were admissible in evidence as relevant to the question whether defendant had reasonable cause to apprehend an attack fatal to life, or fraught with great bodily injury; and hence was justified in acting on a hostile demonstration, and one of much less pronounced character than if such threats had not preceded it.... The logical inference was that these threats excited apprehension, and another and inconsistent inference could not be arbitrarily substituted. If [the] defendant, to use the graphic language of the court, hunted [the victim] up and shot him down merely because he had made the threats, speculation as to his mental processes was uncalled for. If [the] defendant committed the homicide because of the threats, in the sense of acting upon emotions aroused by them, then some basis must be laid by the evidence other than the threats themselves before a particular emotion different from those they would ordinarily inspire under the circumstances could be imputed as a motive for the fatal shot.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and cause remanded for a new trial. See also Self-Defense

Allocution At common law, it was deemed essential in capital cases that inquiry be made of the defendant, before judgment was passed, whether he or she had anything to say as to why the sentence of death should not be pronounced. The right of allocution at the sentencing stage is deemed of such substantial value to the accused that a judgment will be reversed if the record does not show that it was accorded to him or her. This rule of the common law applies to the court of original jurisdiction which pronounced the sentence and not to an appellate court reviewing a sentence. That is, a defendant does not have a right to be personally present or make a personal statement during appellate proceedings.

All courts afford a capital defendant a narrowly defined right to make a personal, brief, unsworn statement in mitigation to the factfinder. Before a capital defendant speaks, a trial court will instruct him or her, outside the presence of the jury, regarding (1) the limited scope of the right to allocution at the penalty phase, (2) the fact that his or her statement is subject to the court's supervision, and (3) that should the statement go beyond the boundaries permitted, he or she will be subject to corrective action by the court, including reopening the proceeding for cross-examination. *See also Fielden v. Issue Presented: Whether the factual findings of the federal district court were clearly erroneous as support for its conclusion that the defendant successfully established good cause for his failure to raise in the State trial court a constitutional challenge to the composition of the jurors that convicted and sentenced him to death.

Case Holding: The factual findings of the federal district court were not clearly erroneous as support for its conclusion that the defendant successfully established good cause for his failure to raise in the State trial court a constitutional challenge to the composition of the jurors that convicted and sentenced him to death.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Tony B. Amadeo, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by a jury in the Superior Court of Putnam County, Georgia. While the defendant's direct appeal was pending before the Georgia Supreme Court, a federal district judge, in an independent civil action, concluded that the master list from which jurors were called in Putnam County was systematically compiled so as to exclude minorities and women from jury service. As a result of the federal judge's findings and order prohibiting use of the Putnam County master jury list, the defendant, on his direct appeal, raised a challenge to the composition of the Putnam County jurors that had convicted and sentenced him. The Georgia Supreme Court rejected the argument as coming too late to be raised and affirmed the defendant's conviction and sentence.

After exhausting his State post-conviction remedies, the defendant filed a writ of habeas corpus in a federal district court on the basis of the jury composition issue. The district court granted the defendant habeas relief, after finding the defendant had established good cause for his failure to raise the jury challenge in the trial court, as well as having demonstrated sufficient prejudice to excuse the procedural default. A federal Court of Appeals reversed the district court's decision, on the basis that evidence of the systemic jury discrimination was readily discoverable in public records, and that the defendant's lawyers had made a tactical decision not to mount a jury challenge. The appellate court concluded that the defendant had not established good cause for his failure to raise the constitutional challenge in accordance with Georgia procedural law. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall ruled that the factual findings upon which the district court based its conclusion that the defendant had established good cause for his procedural default were not clearly erroneous and should not have been set aside by the Court of Appeals. The opinion noted that although a tactical or intentional decision to forgo a procedural opportunity in State court normally cannot constitute good cause, the failure of counsel to raise a constitutional issue reasonably unknown to him or her is a situation in which the good cause requirement is met. It was further said that showing that the factual or legal basis for a claim was not reasonably available to counsel or that some interference by public officials made compliance impracticable constitutes good cause.

The opinion found that the facts determined by the district court permitted that court's legal conclusion that the defendant had established good cause for his procedural default. The facts before the district court indicated that the evidence of jury discrimination was not reasonably discoverable because it was concealed by officials. Justice Marshall held that the Court of Appeals offered factual, rather than legal, grounds for its reversal of the district court's order. However, it was said that a federal appellate court could set aside a trial court's fact-findings only if they are "clearly erroneous" and must give due regard to the trial court's opportunity to judge the credibility of the witnesses. Justice Marshall stated that the record viewed in its entirety established that the Court of Appeals failed properly to apply the clearly erroneous standard. The Court of Appeals identified no evidence in the record that contradicted the district court's conclusions about the concealment of evidence of jury discrimination. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed. See also Procedural Default of Constitutional Claims American Bar Association The American Bar Association (ABA) is the premier national organization of the legal profession. The ABA was founded in 1878, with a goal of promoting the growth and advancement of the Anglo-American legal system. With more than 400,000 members, the ABA is the largest voluntary professional association in the world. The work of the ABA has included providing accreditation for law schools, continuing legal education for lawyers, general information about the law, programs to assist judges and lawyers in their work, and initiatives to advance the legal system. The ABA has been instrumental in developing models for all areas of the law.

The ABA has taken an active role in seeking changes in areas of the capital punishment system that it considers unfair. In 1983, the ABA issued a resolution opposing, in principle, the imposition of the death penalty upon any defendant for an offense committed while under the age of eighteen. In 1988, a resolution was made by the ABA opposing discrimination in capital sentencing on the basis of the race of either the victim or the defendant; and supporting enactment of legislation to eliminate any racial discrimination in capital sentencing. In 1989, the ABA passed a resolution urging that no person with mental retardation, as defined by the American Association on Mental Retardation, should be sentenced to death or executed; and supporting enactment of legislation barring the execution of mentally retarded defendants. In 1991, the ABA issued a resolution supporting, in principle, legislative measures which would prevent any disproportionate effects of federal death penalty laws on Native Americans subject to federal jurisdiction.

In 1997, the ABA adopted a resolution calling for a moratorium on executions until policies and procedures were put in place to ensure that death penalty cases were administered fairly, impartially and with minimal risk of executing innocent persons. The ABA has taken a position that procedural problems exist in the way capital punishment is carried out. It has not denounced capital punishment. The ABA has only expressed grave concerns with apparent inequities in the implementation of capital punishment. Some criticism has been launched at the ABA because the current capital punishment procedures used by most jurisdictions are patterned after a model previously endorsed by the ABA. See also Moratorium on Capital Punishment

American Civil Liberties Union The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) was founded by Roger Baldwin in 1920. It was the first public interest law firm of its kind. ACLU is a non-profit public interest organization devoted exclusively to protecting the basic civil liberties of all Americans. ACLU is supported by annual dues and contributions from its members, and grants from private foundations and individuals. The stated mission of ACLU is to assure that the federal, constitutional Bill of Rights is preserved, protected, and enforced. ACLU is widely recognized as the country's foremost advocate of individual rights.

Anthony D. Romero serves as the executive director of ACLU. Under Romero's stewardship, ACLU takes on almost 6,000 cases annually. ACLU utilizes a staff of more than sixty attorneys, in collaboration with at least 2,000 volunteer attorneys. New York City serves as the national headquarters of ACLU. National projects that ACLU has been involved with include AIDS, arts censorship, capital punishment, children's rights, education reform, lesbian and gay rights, immigrants' rights, national security, privacy and technology, prisoners' rights, reproductive freedom, voting rights, women's rights and workplace rights.

Anthony D. Romero is an attorney and serves as the executive director of ACLU. (American Civil Liberties Union)

ACLU has taken the public position that the death penalty is cruel and unusual punishment. During the latter half of the 1990s, ACLU called for a moratorium on executions and an end to capital punishment in the nation. It has taken the position that the death penalty is applied throughout the country in an inherently unfair manner. ACLU has cited specific aspects of capital punishment which it contends makes capital punishment unfair and cruel and unusual punishment: (1) murderers who have the economic means to retain private attorneys rarely receive a death sentence; (2) murderers whose victims were nonwhite rarely receive a sentence of death; (3) innocent people have been executed; and (4) the death penalty has no deterrent value.

ACLU has maintained a vigorous campaign to abolish capital punishment. It has filed amicus curiae briefs in courts throughout the nation, including the United States Supreme Court, raising and challenging countless capital punishment issues. It has kept up a relentless lobbying agenda in legislative chambers across the country, including Congress. ACLU has collaborated with national and international organizations that advocate the abolishment of capital punishment in the nation and worldwide. See also Moratorium on Capital Punishment

Amicus Curiae The phrase "amicus curiae" literally means "friend of the court." Usually when the outcome of a capital punishment case will have a significant impact, "outsiders" will seek to inform the appellate court of the legal outcome they believe the case should have. The vehicle by which a person, not a party to a criminal case, may intervene at the appellate level is through seeking permission to file an amicus curiae brief. Appellate courts have discretion to permit or deny amicus curiae briefs. As a practical matter, appellate courts will usually permit the filing of amicus curiae brief. One of the rare instances where an appellate court refused to permit an amicus curiae brief to be filed in an important capital punishment case occurred in Rosenberg v. United States, 346 U.S. 273 (1953), where the United States Supreme Court refused to permit Dr. W. E. B. DuBois to file an amicus curiae brief on behalf of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg. See also Appellate Rules of Procedure; Intervention by Next Friend

Amnesty International In 1961, Amnesty International was formed. Amnesty was founded on the principle that people have fundamental rights that transcend national, cultural, religious, and ideological boundaries. It has worked to obtain prompt and fair trials for all prisoners, to end torture and executions, and to secure the release of prisoners of conscience.

Amnesty's earliest activity involved individual letter-writing on behalf of prisoners of conscience. After the organization investigated a prisoner's case and determined that he or she was indeed a prisoner of conscience, it would "adopt" this prisoner in the group and would write letters to officials in that prisoner's country asking for his or her release. The letter-writing campaigns met with some success.

However, after a while, group members grew restless and wanted to do more than just write reams of letters. During the late 1960s, group members became more active and began to form what were then called Adoption Groups — and, in the 1980s, were renamed Local Groups — to focus additional efforts on an adopted prisoner and specific country or issue campaign.

Despite early mistakes and setbacks, and despite growing international opposition by human rights abusers, the methods, tools, and activities that formed Amnesty began to work and have an impact. In 1977, Amnesty was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for its work. The organization has grown to over 1 million members in over 150 countries.

In 1999, Amnesty launched a vigorous campaign to abolish capital punishment in the United States. Amnesty has given many reasons for seeking to abolish the death penalty in the United States: (1) the punishment is cruel, inhuman, and degrading; (2) the punishment is irrevocable and may be imposed on the innocent; (3) the punishment has not been shown to deter crime more effectively than other punishments; and (4) the punishment is frequently used based upon race and economic status. The work engaged in by Amnesty to end capital punishment in the United States includes lobbying state and federal legislators, collaborating with other abolition groups, and filing amicus briefs in appellate cases. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied the right to counsel.

Case Holding: The defendant was not denied the right to counsel because the defendant did not request counsel.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Andersen, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The United States Supreme Court affirmed the judgment in Andersen v. United States. Subsequently, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal trial court alleging that he was deprived of the right to counsel during his trial. The federal trial court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice rejected the defendant's assertion that he was denied the right to counsel. The opinion indicated that the record did not support the defendant's assertion that the trial court forced his attorney to decline representation because the attorney was representing an accomplice in the case. The chief justice acknowledged that the defendant did not have counsel, but indicated that this was because the defendant did not request counsel. It was said that absent a request for counsel, there was no requirement that counsel be assigned. The judgment of the federal trial court was affirmed. See also Andersen v. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established self-defense as a legal excuse for the murder for which he was convicted and sentenced.

Case Holding: The defendant did not establish self-defense as a legal excuse for the murder for which he was convicted and sentenced, where the evidence indicated he killed the victim in order to avoid prosecution for another murder.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Andersen, was convicted by the United States of capital murder and sentenced to death. The crime occurred onboard an American vessel on the high seas. Although the prosecution was for the murder of the vessel's cook, the defendant had also killed the ship's captain. During the trial, the defendant asserted the defense of self-defense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue of self-defense.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice rejected the defendant's claim that he should have been acquitted on the ground of self-defense. The opinion reasoned as follows:

It is true that a homicide committed in actual defense of life or limb is excusable, if it appear that the slayer was acting under a reasonable belief that he was in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm from the deceased, and that his act in causing death was necessary in order to avoid the death or great bodily harm which was apparently imminent. But where there is manifestly no adequate or reasonable ground for such belief, or the slayer brings on the difficulty for the purpose of killing the deceased, or violation of law on his part is the reason of his expectation of an attack, the plea of self-defense cannot avail....

The captain being dead, [the defendant] knew the [cook] would assume command, and that it would be his duty to arrest him and take him ashore for trial. The imminent danger which threatened him was the danger of the gallows. The inference is irresistible that to avert that danger he killed the [cook], cast the bodies into the sea, burned the ship, and took to the open boat. There can be no pretense that he was acting under a reasonable belief that he was in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm at the hands of the [cook].

The judgment affirmed in the federal trial court was affirmed.

Dissenting Statement by Justice McKenna: Justice McKenna issued a statement indicating he dissented from the Court's decision. See also Andersen v. Treat; Self-Defense

Anderson, Melanie In July of 1994, Melanie Anderson and her boyfriend, Ronald Pierce, left their home in North Carolina and traveled to Pennsylvania to visit a relative of Pierce. While in Pennsylvania, Anderson and Pierce made arrangements to bring back the two-year-old daughter of Pierce's relative. It was understood that Anderson and Pierce would keep the child for a few weeks.

On August 24, 1994, shortly after Anderson and Pierce returned to North Carolina, they took the child to a hospital. The child was unconscious and had suffered severe injuries. The severity of the child's injuries required airlifting her immediately to the pediatric intensive care unit at another hospital. On August 25, 1994, the child died after life support was withdrawn.

Anderson gave hospital officials conflicting accounts of what happened to the child. Anderson initially reported Melanie Anderson was sentenced to death for her role in the murder of a two-year-old child. However, the North Carolina Court of Appeals vacated the death sentence and imposed a sentence of life imprisonment. (North Carolina Department of Corrections) that she heard a gasp in the bedroom of her home and found the child in the room making a gurgling sound. Anderson stated that she grabbed and shook the child. It was also alleged by Anderson that the child had slid on wet carpet, causing the bruises on her face.

Anderson later gave hospital officials a different version of what happened to the child. She reported that earlier in the evening, she had found the child outside, with a dog standing over her. Pierce joined Anderson in this version of what happened.

Anderson and Pierce told the police that a dog jumped on the child and knocked her down. Pierce stated that when he went outside, he found the child lying on the ground, unconscious and not breathing.

Anderson was indicted on January 30, 1995, for first-degree murder and felonious child abuse. During Anderson's trial, in September 1996, her former mother-in-law testified that some time after 11:00 pm, on August 24, 1994, Anderson called her and stated, "I've killed [the child]." Medical evidence during the trial revealed the following:

The State's evidence tended to show that [the child] had numerous injuries extending all over her body, including bruises on her face, cheeks and jaw, chin, forehead, sides of her neck, collarbones, over the front of her chest, on her back, over her right flank, her buttocks, upper and lower legs, her eyelid, and on her shins. Patches of her hair had been pulled out traumatically. [The child] had also suffered injuries caused by a blunt trauma to the mouth. There was evidence of forceful pinching and grabbing and human adult bite marks on [her] body. She had suffered a blunt trauma to her pubic area. Dr. Patrick E. Lantz, the forensic pathologist, found bruises in the forms of grab marks, belt marks, shoe marks, and marks from a radio antenna and a metal tray. [The child's] brain was swollen with a hemorrhage both over the surface of the brain in the lining as well as a subdural hematoma between the skull bone and the brain. There were retinal hemorrhages in the back of her eyes, indicating that she had been shaken violently. Dr. Lantz opined that these injuries had been inflicted at various times, would have been painful, and would have required considerable force.

William Fisher, M.D., ... testified that he did not believe [the child's] injuries were caused by a dog, but instead by "some sort of a beating." Dr. Bowman testified that, based on her observations and on the history given to her by Pierce and [Anderson], she believed that [the child] had "been severely abused over a matter of days to weeks." Sybille Sabastian, a registered nurse ..., opined, based on her experience and her observations of [the child's] injuries, that [the child] "had been beaten." Sarah Sinal, M.D., an expert in pediatric medicine who saw [the child] in the pediatric intensive care unit ..., testified that, in her opinion, [the child] was "a victim of severe child abuse." She concluded that [the child] was a victim of the shaken-baby syndrome and the battered-child syndrome. Dr. Lantz testified that, in his opinion, [the child's] injuries were not caused by a dog, that the injuries were inflicted at various times, and that [the child] was a victim of battered-child syndrome.

Anderson was found guilty of first-degree murder and felonious child abuse. Following a capital sentencing proceeding, the jury recommended a sentence of death for the first-degree murder conviction, and the trial court entered judgment accordingly. The trial court also sentenced Anderson to three years' imprisonment for felonious child abuse. Anderson's sentence and conviction were upheld by the North Carolina Supreme Court. However, the State's Court of Appeals reversed the death sentence and Anderson was given a sentence of life imprisonment. Pierce was tried separately and convicted of capital murder, but received a sentence of life imprisonment. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Andersonville Prison Deaths On February 24, 1864, Andersonville Prison was opened near Americus, Georgia. The prison was used by the Confederate Army for holding Union prisoners of war during the Civil War. By August of 1864, the prison held 45,613 Union prisoners. During the first fourteen months of the prison's operation, it was estimated that 12,912 Union prisoners died. It was found that the vast majority of the deaths were due to deliberate starvation imposed by prison officials and the barbaric conditions maintained at the prison.

During the period that most of the deaths occurred at Andersonville, Confederate Captain Henry Wirz was in charge. Wirz was born in Zurich, Switzerland, in 1822. He was educated at the University of Zurich, and later obtained a medical degree while studying in Paris and Berlin. In 1849, Wirz immigrated to the United States. He set up a medical practice in Kentucky.

When the Civil War broke out, Wirz enlisted in the Confederate Army. He was wounded in 1863 and rendered unfit for the battlefield. In April 1864, Wirz was placed in command of the Andersonville Prison.

After the war ended, Wirz returned to civilian life. Shortly after returning to his medical practice Wirz was arrested and charged with war crimes, as a result of the large number of deaths at the Andersonville Prison. On May 10, 1865, Wirz was transported to Washington, D.C., to stand trial. A military court prosecuted Wirz and found him guilty of war crimes. He was sentenced to death. On November 10, 1865, Wirz was led to the gallows in the Old Capital Prison yard. As hundreds of spectators looked on, Wirz's body swung from the gallows and he entered history as the only Confederate soldier executed for war crimes. See also Confederate Hangings at Gainesville Issue Presented: Whether the trial court's instruction to the jury that its verdict on guilt and punishment had to be unanimous was confusing and misleading.

Case Holding: The trial court's instruction to the jury that its verdict on guilt and punishment had to be unanimous was confusing and misleading.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Timoteo Mariano Andres, was convicted of capital murder in a United States district court for the Territory of Hawaii and sentenced to death. The defendant appealed his conviction to a federal Court of Appeals. In his appeal, the defendant argued that the trial court's instruction on a unanimous verdict was confusing and misleading to the jury. The appellate court rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Reed: Justice Reed held that unanimity in a jury verdict was constitutionally required in federal prosecutions. He wrote that "[i]n criminal cases this requirement of unanimity extends to all issues — character or degree of the crime, guilt and punishment — which are left to the jury." The opinion found that the statute under which the defendant was prosecuted required unanimity on the issue of guilt and punishment. It was said, however, that the manner in which the trial judge instructed the jury could be interpreted as not requiring unanimity on the issue of punishment. Justice Reed concluded: "the instructions given on this issue did not fully protect the [defendant]." The judgment of the federal appellate court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Burton, J., Joined: Justice Frankfurter concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to express his view that trial courts should seek to use basic language when instructing juries, as a way of minimizing confusion and having cases reversed because of imprecise instructions. See also Jury Unanimity Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was entitled to have his appeal heard by the appellate court of New Jersey.

Case Holding: The defendant was not entitled to have his appeal heard by the appellate court of New Jersey, because under that State's laws an appeal is discretionary.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Andrews, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of New Jersey. The defendant filed an appeal with the New Jersey Supreme Court. However, the appellate court declined to hear the appeal. The defendant next filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court. The defendant alleged in the petition that his constitutional rights were violated by the State's appellate court's refusal to hear his appeal. The federal court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan wrote that under the laws of New Jersey a conviction for a capital offense was not appealable as a right, but was discretionary with the State's appellate court. The opinion disposed of the issue as follows:

The contention of appellant is that such a statute is in violation of the Constitution of the United States. If it were necessary, upon this appeal, to consider that question, we would only repeat what was said in McKane v. Durston, 153 U.S. 684 (1894): "An appeal from a judgment of conviction is not a matter of absolute right, independently of constitutional or statutory provisions allowing such appeal. A review by an appellate court of the final judgment in a criminal case, however grave the offense of which the accused is convicted, was not at common law, and is not now, a necessary element of due process of law. It is wholly within the discretion of the state to allow or not to allow such a review." "It is therefore clear that the right of appeal may be accorded by the state to the accused upon such terms as, in its wisdom, may be proper"; and "whether an appeal should be allowed, and, if so, under what circumstances or on what conditions are matters for each state to determine for itself."

The judgment of the federal district court was affirmed.

Another Proximate Cause Mitigator The State of Maryland is the only capital punishment jurisdiction that utilizes "another proximate cause" as a statutory mitigating circumstance. This mitigator refers to some other factor which may have intervened to hasten the death of the victim, even though the defendant was convicted of murdering the victim. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Antigua and Barbuda Capital punishment is carried out in the island nation of Antigua and Barbuda. Antigua and Barbuda utilizes hanging as the method of execution. The legal system used by the nation is based on English common law. Antigua and Barbuda adopted a constitution on November 1, 1981.

The constitution of Antigua and Barbuda sets forth the rights of citizens, including provisions to secure life, liberty, and the protection of person, property, and privacy, as well as freedom of speech, association, and worship.

The judicial branch of Antigua and Barbuda is relatively independent from the executive and legislative branches of government. The court structure consists of magistrate courts for minor offenses and High Courts for major offenses. Appeals from the High Courts are taken to the Supreme Court of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States. Appointments or dismissals of judges to the Supreme Court must be unanimously approved by the heads of government that make up the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States. The prime minister of Antigua and Barbuda casts a vote for such appointment or dismissal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Apelt Brothers Michael Apelt and Rudi Apelt are brothers and German nationals. Michael was born on February 28, 1960, and Rudi's date of birth was August 1, 1963. The Apelt brothers were convicted of capital murder by the State of Arizona. Michael was sentenced to death on August 10, 1990, and Rudi received a death sentence on January 8, 1991.

The Apelt brothers came to the United States in August 1988 with a specific plan. They intended to have Michael marry an American woman, obtain a large life insurance policy on the woman, kill her, and collect the insurance proceeds.

The Apelt brothers arrived in the United States with Rudi's wife Susanne and Michael's former girlfriend Anke Dorn. They landed in San Diego, California, and took up lodging in a motel. Shortly after their arrival, the Apelt brothers began visiting nightclubs in search of a wife for Michael. At one nightclub, they met two women, Cheryl Rubenstein and Trudy Waters. Cheryl and Trudy lived in Phoenix, Arizona, and were in San Diego to cater a party. During the course of the evening, the brothers claimed to be windsurfing board manufacturers and Mercedes importers. Rudi denied being married. Before the brothers left the nightclub, the women gave them their addresses and phone numbers in Phoenix.

A few weeks after the nightclub encounter, the Apelt brothers flew to Phoenix. Cheryl picked them up at the airport and took them to a hotel. After a couple of weeks, the brothers flew back to San Diego, picked up Anke Dorn, and then returned to Phoenix. Rudi's wife Susanne returned to Germany.

Several months went by before the brothers stumbled into the situation they had been looking for. On October 6, they met Annette Clay at a bar. The brothers claimed to be international bankers who were staying at a Holiday Inn. Annette eventually gave Rudi her phone number. Rudi called her the following day and arranged to meet Annette and a friend she would bring along. That evening, the brothers met Annette and her friend, Cindy Monkman. Michael spent the evening dancing with Cindy and telling her, "You're the woman I want to marry."

The Apelts saw Annette and Cindy several times during the next few weeks. The two women became suspicious of the brothers when Cindy discovered she was missing over $100 after the Apelts visited her apartment. They placed a series of calls and learned that the brothers were not staying at a Holiday Inn; they were registered at a Motel 6. The two women went to the Motel 6 and discovered Anke Dorn.

The following day, the Apelts met with Annette and Cindy. The brothers angrily told the two women that their meddling destroyed the brothers' "high security clearance" and cost them their jobs and work visas. They explained away Anke by saying she was a family friend whose husband was in the hospital. Annette and Cindy bought the story and apologized. After suggesting ways to make amends, which the brothers refused, Annette exclaimed, "What do you want us to do, marry you?" The Apelt brothers smiled and replied, "Yes."

Michael moved into Cindy's apartment and Rudi moved into Annette's apartment. Rudi lived with Annette less than a week before she discovered that the story regarding Anke was a lie. Annette threw Rudi out and did not see him again. Rudi moved into a motel with Anke.

After Rudi split up with Annette, Michael lied and told Cindy and Annette that Rudi had returned to Germany. On October 28, 1988, Cindy and Michael were secretly married in Las Vegas. Shortly afterwards Michael suggested they consult an insurance broker about a million-dollar life insurance policy. Cindy was under the impression that Michael was wealthy and that purchasing a large insurance policy was a customary investment practice by Germans. They were able to obtain a $400,000 policy. Cindy wrote a check for the first month's premium.

Once the life insurance policy was obtained, the Apelt brothers plotted the death of Cindy. The plan was for Michael to drive her into the desert, while Rudi and Anke followed in a separate car. Once there she would be killed. The brothers executed their plan on the evening of December 23, 1988. Cindy's body was found in the early afternoon of December 24. She had been stabbed five times. Her head was nearly severed from her body.

The police became suspicious of Michael's role in Cindy's death when they learned of the life insurance policy. The suspicion grew intense after Michael paid a homeless man to call his apartment and leave the following fake message, dictated word for word in Michael's fractured English: "Hear what I have to talk. I have cut through the throat of your wife and I stabbed and more frequently in the stomach in the back with a knife. If I don't get my stuff, your girlfriend is next and then your brother and last it is you. Do it now, if not, you see what happens. My eyes are everywhere.” Michael gave the recorded message to the police, who immediately believed it was fake.

On January 6, 1989, the Apelt brothers and Anke went to police headquarters to report a fictitious story of several people coming to their apartment and threatening them. The police spoke with each of them separately. During Anke’s questioning, the police threatened to prosecute her, but promised immunity if she would tell the truth. Anke confessed and the Apelts were immediately arrested.

Michael and Rudi were tried separately. Anke was granted immunity from prosecution in exchange for her testimony at both trials. The brothers were convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. The death sentences were affirmed by the Arizona Supreme Court.

Appellate Review of Conviction and Death Sentence

Appellate court review of the final judgment in a criminal case was not, at common law, a necessary element of due process of law. Consequently, in the case of McKane v. Durston, 153 U.S. 684 (1894), the United States Supreme Court held that the Constitution did not require States establish appellate courts to hear appeals of criminal convictions and sentences. The pronouncement in McKane has no practical meaning because all jurisdictions have established appellate courts to review criminal convictions and sentences.

The role of appellate courts is very limited. Unlike trial courts, appellate courts do not have jurisdiction to permit live witness testimony. Appellate courts may only review the record produced at the trial court level. Usually, appellate courts will permit attorneys to present oral arguments on the issues in a case. A defendant does not have a right to be present when attorneys make oral arguments to appellate courts.

Distinguishing Review Sentence from Appeal of Conviction:

Prior to capital punishment being abolished by the United States Supreme Court in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), all capital punishment jurisdictions allowed capital felons to bring their conviction and sentence to appellate courts by way of an appeal (or writ of error, as it was sometimes called). When the Supreme Court resurrected the death penalty in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), by approving the capital punishment scheme Georgia created, one feature of Georgia’s new procedures was the automatic review of every death sentence. Georgia’s appellate review of death sentences was not the traditional appeal, which was not automatic and, when taken, involved both conviction and sentence. In approving of this new review process, the Supreme Court did not hold that the Constitution required automatic review of death sentences. The Supreme Court indicated merely that the review process was constitutionally acceptable.

Gregg’s acceptance of Georgia’s automatic appellate review of death sentences was quickly adopted by other capital punishment jurisdictions. As it stands, Utah is the only capital punishment state that does not utilize an automatic death sentence appellate review process.

The automatic death sentence review process involves, ostensibly, only penalty phase sentencing issues. The question of whether a capital felon was erroneously found guilty of the offense is technically not part of appellate review of a sentence. The only issue at stake in the sentence review process is whether a capital felon was sentenced to die in accordance with the law. Actual conviction or guilt phase issues are brought to the appellate level by way of the traditional appeal. In practice, however, what occurs is the consolidation of automatic sentencing issues with conviction appeal issues.

Appellate Review of a Death Sentence: Appellate review of a death sentence involves essentially two areas: (1) examination of aggravating and mitigating findings and (2) determining whether death was the proper sentence.

1. Review of penalty phase aggravating and mitigating findings.

Appellate courts engage in two types of aggravating circumstance review: (1) determine whether an aggravating circumstance is invalid because of vagueness and (2) determine whether an aggravating circumstance was actually proven to exist.

All relevant mitigating evidence must be allowed into evidence at the penalty phase. Relevant mitigating evidence, for appellate review purposes, is divided into two issues: (1) evidence offered to establish the existence of a non-statutory mitigating circumstance and (2) evidence submitted to establish the existence of a statutory mitigating circumstance. Both issues are examined by appellate courts from the perspective that a determination was made that a mitigating circumstance was not established. Therefore, appellate review is concerned with examining whether evidence supported the existence of any mitigating circumstance.

2. Determining whether death is the proper sentence.

Once an appellate court determines that at least one statutory aggravating circumstance was validly found by the factfinder and makes its statutory and non-statutory mitigating circumstance analysis, the next stage in the review process is triggered. At this stage the appellate court must determine whether the sentence of death was proper. This determination involves three separate issues: (1) deciding if passion, prejudice or other arbitrary factor caused death to be imposed; (2) deciding if the sentence was excessive or disproportionate compared to other cases; and (3) making an independent weighing or sufficiency determination of aggravating and mitigating circumstances.

Appellate Review of a Capital Conviction: Review of a conviction involves traditional assignments of error. That is, for conviction review, a defendant must point to specific matters involved with the guilt phase that he or she believes was wrongly decided against him or her. This could include assignments of error to pre-trial issues such as suppression of evidence or dismissal of a charge.

Disposition by Appellate Court: Once an appellate court completes review of a conviction and death sentence, the case must be disposed of based upon the conclusions reached from the review process. A case may be disposed of in any of the following ways: (1) affirm conviction and sentence; (2) affirm conviction, but reverse sentence and remand for further proceedings;

(3) affirm conviction, but reverse sentence and remand for imposition of life sentence; (4) affirm conviction, but reverse sentence and impose life sentence; (5) reverse conviction and sentence and remand for new trial; (6) reverse conviction and sentence and remand for entry of acquittal. See also Andrews v. Swartz; Bergemann v. Backer; Error; Kohl v. Lehlback

Appellate Rules of Procedure All appellate courts have special rules that must be followed in bringing a criminal case for appellate review. Although every appellate court has procedural nuances peculiar to it, appellate rules of procedure are, by and large, the same. The illustrative material that follows represents excerpts from the appellate rules of procedure of the federal Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

a. Filing the Notice of Appeal. An appeal permitted by law as of right from a district court to a court of appeals must be taken by filing a notice of appeal with the clerk of the district court within the time allowed by law.

b. Joint or Consolidated Appeals. If two or more persons are entitled to appeal from a judgment or order of a district court and their interests are such as to make joinder practicable, they may file a joint notice of appeal, or may join in appeal after filing separate, timely notices of appeal, and they may thereafter proceed on appeal as a single appellant. Appeals may be consolidated by order of the court of appeals upon its own motion or upon motion of a party, or by stipulation of the parties to the several appeals.

c. Content of the Notice of Appeal. A notice of appeal must specify the party or parties taking the appeal by naming each appellant in either the caption or the body of the notice of appeal. A notice of appeal also must designate the judgment, order, or part thereof appealed from, and must name the court to which the appeal is taken. An appeal will not be dismissed for informality of form or title of the notice of appeal or for failure to name a party whose intent to appeal is otherwise clear from the notice.

d. Serving the Notice of Appeal. The clerk of the district court shall serve notice of the filing of a notice of appeal by mailing a copy to each party's counsel of record apart from the appellant's. When a defendant appeals in a criminal case, the clerk of the district court shall also serve a copy of the notice of appeal upon the defendant, either by personal service or by mail addressed to the defendant.

e. Appeal in a Criminal Case. In a criminal case, a defendant shall file the notice of appeal in the district court within ten days after the entry either of the judgment or order appealed from or of a notice of appeal by the government. A notice of appeal filed after the announcement of a decision, sentence, or order — but before entry of the judgment or order — is treated as filed on the date of and after the entry.

f. Composition of the Record on Appeal. The record on appeal consists of the original papers and exhibits filed in the district court, the transcript of proceedings, if any, and a certified copy of the docket entries prepared by the clerk of the district court.

g. The Transcript; Duty of Appellant; Notice to Appellee.

1. Within ten days after filing the notice of appeal or entry of an order disposing of the last timely motion outstanding, whichever is later, the appellant shall order from the reporter a transcript of such parts of the proceedings not already on file as the appellant deems necessary, subject to local rules of the courts of appeals. The order shall be in writing and, within the same period, a copy shall be filed with the clerk of the district court.

2. If the appellant intends to urge, on appeal, that a finding or conclusion is unsupported by the evidence or is contrary to the evidence, the appellant shall include in the record a transcript of all evidence relevant to such finding or conclusion.

3. Unless the entire transcript is to be included, the appellant shall file a statement of the issues the appellant intends to present on the appeal, and shall serve on the appellee a copy of the order or certificate and of the statement. An appellee who believes that a transcript of other parts of the proceedings is necessary shall, within ten days after the service of the order or certificate and the statement of the appellant, file and serve on the appellant a designation of additional parts to be included. Unless the appellant has ordered such parts and has so notified the appellee within ten days after service of the designation, the appellee may, within the following ten days, either order the parts or move in the district court for an order requiring the appellant to do so.

4. At the time of ordering, a party must make satisfactory arrangements with the reporter for payment of the cost of the transcript.

h. Statement When No Report Was Made or When the Transcript Is Unavailable. If no report of the evidence or proceedings at a hearing or trial was made, or if a transcript is unavailable, the appellant may prepare a statement of the evidence or proceedings from the best available means, including the appellant's recollection. The statement shall be served on the appellee, who may serve objections or proposed amendments thereto within ten days after service. Thereupon the statement and any objections or proposed amendments shall be submitted to the district court for settlement and approval and as settled and approved shall be included by the clerk of the district court in the record on appeal.

i. Agreed Statement as the Record on Appeal. In lieu of the record on appeal as defined in subdivision a: Of this rule, the parties may prepare and sign a statement of the case showing how the issues presented by the appeal arose and were decided in the district court and setting forth only so many of the facts averred and proved or sought to be proved as are essential to a decision of the issues presented. If the statement conforms to the truth, it, together with such additions as the court may consider necessary fully to present the issues raised by the appeal, shall be approved by the district court and shall then be certified to the court of appeals as the record on appeal and transmitted thereto by the clerk of the district court.

j. Correction or Modification of the Record. If any difference arises as to whether the record truly discloses what occurred in the district court, the difference shall be submitted to and settled by that court and the record made to conform to the truth. If anything material to either party is omitted from the record by error or accident or is misstated therein, the parties, by stipulation, or the district court, either before or after the record is transmitted to the court of appeals, or the court of appeals, on proper suggestion or of its own initiative, may direct that the omission or misstatement be corrected and, if necessary, that a supplemental record be certified and transmitted. All other questions as to the form and content of the record shall be presented to the court of appeals.

k. Appellant's Brief. The brief of the appellant must contain, under appropriate headings and in the order here indicated, the following items:

1. A table of contents with page references and a table of cases alphabetically arranged, statutes, and other authorities cited, with references to the pages of the brief where they are cited.

2. A statement of subject matter and appellate jurisdiction. The statement shall include (i) a statement of the basis for subject matter jurisdiction in the district court or agency, with citation to applicable statutory provisions and with reference to the relevant facts to establish such jurisdiction; (ii) a statement of the basis for jurisdiction in the court of appeals, with citation to applicable statutory provisions and with reference to the relevant facts to establish such jurisdiction; the statement shall include relevant filing dates establishing the timeliness of the appeal or petition for review and (a) shall state that the appeal is from a final order or a final judgment that disposes of all claims with respect to all parties or, if not, (b) shall include information establishing that the court of appeals has jurisdiction on some other basis.

3. A statement of the issues presented for review.

4. A statement of the case. The statement shall first indicate briefly the nature of the case, the course of proceedings, and its disposition in the court below. There shall follow a statement of the facts relevant to the issues presented for review, with appropriate references to the record.

5. A summary of argument. The summary should contain a succinct, clear, and accurate statement of the arguments made in the body of the brief. It should not be a mere repetition of the argument headings.

6. An argument. The argument must contain the contentions of the appellant on the issues presented, and the reasons therefore, with citations to the authorities, statutes, and parts of the record relied on. The argument must also include for each issue a concise statement of the applicable standard of review; this statement may appear in the discussion of each issue or under a separate heading placed before the discussion of the issues.

7. A short conclusion stating the precise relief sought.

l. Appellee's Brief. The brief of the appellee must conform to the requirements outlined for the appellant, except that none of the following need appear unless the appellee is dissatisfied with the statement of the appellant:

1. The jurisdictional statement;

2. The statement of the issues;

3. The statement of the case;

4. The statement of the standard of review.

m. Reply Brief. The appellant may file a brief in reply to the brief of the appellee, and if the appellee has cross-appealed, the appellee may file a brief in reply to the response of the appellant to the issues presented by the cross appeal. No further briefs may be filed except with leave of court. All reply briefs shall contain a table of contents with page references and a table of cases (alphabetically arranged), statutes, and other authorities cited, with references to the pages of the reply brief where they are cited.

n. Brief of Amicus Curiae. A brief of an amicus curiae may be filed only if accompanied by written consent of all parties or by leave of court granted on motion or at the request of the court, except that consent or leave shall not be required when the brief is presented by the United States or an officer or agency thereof, or by a State, Territory or Commonwealth. The brief may be conditionally filed with the motion for leave. A motion for leave shall identify the interest of the applicant and shall state the reasons why a brief of an amicus curiae is desirable. Except in the case that all parties otherwise consent, any amicus curiae shall file its brief within the time allowed the party whose position the amicus brief will support, unless the court, for cause shown, shall grant leave for a later filing, in which event it shall specify within what period an opposing party may answer. A motion of an amicus curiae to participate in the oral argument will be granted only for extraordinary reasons.

Appellee Appellee is the formal designation given to the party who responds to an appeal by the opposing party. See also Appellant

Issue Presented: Whether the State of Idaho placed a constitutionally acceptable limiting construction on the statutory aggravating circumstance of "utter disregard for human life."

Case Holding: The State of Idaho placed a constitutionally acceptable limiting construction on the statutory aggravating circumstance of "utter disregard for human life."

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas Eugene Creech, was charged by the State of Idaho with committing capital murder while he was incarcerated. The defendant entered a plea of guilty to the capital murder charge. During the penalty phase of the prosecution, it was determined that the prosecutor established statutory aggravating circumstance, that in committing the murder the defendant exhibited "utter disregard for human life." The trial court imposed a sentence of death. In affirming the conviction and sentence, the Idaho Supreme Court rejected the defendant's argument that the "utter disregard for human life" aggravating circumstance was unconstitutionally vague. The appellate court indicated that under its prior decisions the statutory aggravating circumstance was defined so that the phrase "utter disregard" was meant to be reflective of a "cold-blooded, pitiless slayer."

The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The district court dismissed the petition. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed the district court's ruling after concluding that the "utter disregard" circumstance was facially invalid and that the narrowing construction given by the Idaho Supreme Court was inadequate to cure the defect. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor held that in light of the narrowing definition given the "utter disregard" aggravating circumstance by the Idaho Supreme Court, the circumstance, on its face, meets constitutional standards.

The opinion held that to satisfy the Constitution, a capital sentencing scheme must channel the sentencer's discretion by clear and objective standards that provide specific and detailed guidance and make rationally reviewable the death sentencing process. Justice O'Connor indicated that in order to decide whether a particular aggravating circumstance meets those requirements, a federal court must determine whether the statutory language defining the circumstance is itself too vague to guide the sentencer; if so, whether the State courts have further defined the vague terms; and, if so, whether those definitions are constitutionally sufficient, i.e., whether they provide some guidance.

Justice O'Connor found that it was not necessary for the Court to decide whether the statutory phrase "utter disregard for human life" itself passed constitutional muster, because the Idaho Supreme Court adopted a limiting construction, and that construction meets constitutional requirements. It was said that the limiting construction was sufficiently clear and objective. The opinion reasoned that in ordinary usage, the phrase "cold-blooded, pitiless slayer" refers to a killer who kills without feeling or sympathy. Thus, the phrase describes a defendant's state of mind or attitude toward his or her conduct and the victim. It was said that although determining whether a capital defendant killed without feeling or sympathy may be difficult, that did not mean that a State cannot, consistent with the Constitution, authorize sentencing judges to make the inquiry and to take their findings into account when deciding whether capital punishment is warranted. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Stevens, J., Joined: Justice Blackmun dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the limiting construction given the aggravating circumstance was itself unconstitutionally vague. Justice Blackmun wrote: "Confronted with an insupportable limiting construction of an unconstitutionally vague statute, the majority in turn concocts its own limiting construction of the state court's formulation. Like 'nonsense upon stilts,' however, the majority's reconstruction only highlights the deficient character of the nebulous formulation that it seeks to advance. Because the metaphor 'cold-blooded' by which Idaho defines its 'utter disregard' circumstance is both vague and unenlightening, and because the majority's recasting of that metaphor is not dictated by common usage, legal usage, or the usage of the Idaho courts, the statute fails to provide meaningful guidance to the sentencer, as required by the Constitution. Accordingly, I dissent."

Argentina Argentina abolished capital punishment for ordinary crimes in 1984, but permits its use for exceptional offenses. The nation's legal system is a mixture of the United States and West European legal systems. Argentina has a constitution which was revised in August of 1994.

The judicial system of Argentina is divided into a federal court system and a provincial court system, with each headed by a supreme court. The federal supreme court is the highest court and court of last resort. Trials are public and defendants have the right to legal counsel and to call witnesses. A panel of judges, not lay jurors, decide guilt or innocence. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Arizona The State of Arizona is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on August 8, 1873.

Arizona has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Arizona Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice, vice chief justice, and three associate justices. The Arizona Court of Appeals is divided into two divisions. The first division is divided into five departments, with each department consisting of a panel of three judges. The second division is divided into two departments, with each department having a panel of three judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the state are called Superior Courts. Capital offenses against the State of Arizona are tried in the Superior Courts. Arizona requires the appointment of two attorneys to represent indigent capital felon defendants. The lead attorney is required to have practiced criminal law for at least five years and been counsel in at least one prior capital prosecution.

Arizona's capital punishment offenses are set out under Ariz. Code § 13-1105. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. Intending or knowing that the person's conduct will cause death, the person causes the death of another person, including an unborn child, with premeditation or, as a result of causing the death of another person with premeditation, causes the death of an unborn child.
2. Acting either alone or with one or more other persons, the person commits or attempts to commit sexual conduct ..., terrorism, ... narcotics offenses ..., kidnapping, burglary, arson, robbery, escape, child abuse, or unlawful flight from a pursuing law enforcement vehicle and in the course of and in furtherance of the offense or immediate flight from the offense, the person or another person causes the death of any person.
3. Intending or knowing that the person's conduct will cause death to a law enforcement officer, the person causes the death of a law enforcement officer who is in the line of duty.

Capital murder in Arizona is punishable by death or life imprisonment with or without parole. A capital prosecution in Arizona is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jury must unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a unanimous verdict, the defendant must be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Ariz. Code § 13-703(F) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The defendant has been convicted of another offense in the United States for which under Arizona law a sentence of life imprisonment or death was impossible;

2. The defendant was previously convicted of a serious offense, whether preparatory or completed;

3. In the commission of the offense, the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to another person or persons in addition to the person murdered during the commission of the offense;

4. The defendant procured the commission of the offense by payment, or promise of payment, of anything of pecuniary value;

5. The defendant committed the offense as consideration for the receipt, or in expectation of the receipt, of anything of pecuniary value;

6. The defendant committed the offense in an especially heinous, cruel, or depraved manner;

7. The defendant committed the offense while:

a. In the custody of or on authorized or unauthorized release from the state department of corrections, a law enforcement agency, or a county or city jail, or

b. On probation for a felony offense;

8. The defendant has been convicted of one or more other homicides ... that were committed during the commission of the offense;

9. The defendant was an adult at the time the offense was committed or was tried as an adult and the murdered person was under fifteen years of age, was an unborn child in the womb at any stage of its development, or was seventy years of age or older;

10. The murdered person was an on-duty peace officer who was killed in the course of performing the officer's official duties and the defendant knew, or should have known, that the murdered person was a peace officer;

11. The defendant committed the offense with the intent to promote, further, or assist the objectives of a criminal street gang or criminal syndicate or to join a criminal street gang or criminal syndicate;

12. The defendant committed the offense to prevent a person's cooperation with an official law enforcement investigation, to prevent a person's testimony in a court proceeding, in retaliation for a person's cooperation with an official law enforcement investigation or in retaliation for a person's testimony in a court proceeding;

13. The offense was committed in a cold, calculated manner without pretense of moral or legal justification;

14. The defendant used a remote stun gun or an authorized remote stun gun in the commission of the offense.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Arizona has provided, by Ariz. Code

§ 13-703(G), the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant's capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was significantly impaired, but not so impaired as to constitute a defense to prosecution.

2. The defendant was under unusual and substantial duress, although not such as to constitute a defense to prosecution;

3. The defendant was legally accountable for the conduct of another, but his participation was relatively minor, although not so minor as to constitute a defense to prosecution;

4. The defendant could not reasonably have foreseen that his conduct in the course of the commission of the offense for which the defendant was convicted would cause, or would create a grave risk of causing, death to another person;

5. The defendant's age.

Additionally, it is provided by Ariz. Code § 13-703(G) that the penalty phase factfinder must also consider any mitigating evidence of the defendant's character, propensities, or record.

Under Arizona's capital punishment statute, the Arizona Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Arizona uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. However, defendants sentenced to death for an offense committed prior to November 23, 1992, may elect between lethal gas or lethal injection as the means of execution. The State's death row facility for men is located in Florence, Arizona, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Perryville, Arizona.

Pursuant to the laws of Arizona, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor is required to obtain the consent of the State's Board of Pardons and Parole before a capital sentence may be commuted.

Under the laws of Arizona, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Ariz. Code § 13-705:

The director of the state department of corrections or the director's designee shall be present at the execution of all death sentences and shall invite the attorney general and at least twelve reputable citizens of the director's selection to be present at the execution. The director shall, at the request of the defendant, permit clergymen, not exceeding two, whom the defendant names, and any persons, relatives, or friends, not exceeding five, to be present at the execution. The director may invite peace officers as the director deems expedient to witness the execution. No persons other than those set forth in this section shall be present at the execution nor shall any minor be allowed to witness the execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Arizona executed 22 capital felons. During this period Arizona did not execute any female capital felons, although two of its death row inmates during this period were female. A total of 125 capital felons were on death row in Arizona as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as twelve black inmates, eighty-nine white inmates, twenty Latino inmates, and three Asian inmates.

Arizona v. Rumsey Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Arizona v. Rumsey, 467 U.S. 203 (1984); Argued: April 23, 1984; Decided: May 29, 1984; Opinion of the Court: Justice O'Connor; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Rehnquist, in which White, J., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: James R. Issue Presented: Whether the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibits the State of Arizona from sentencing the defendant to death after the life sentence he had initially received was set aside on appeal.

Case Holding: The Double Jeopardy Clause bars imposition of the death penalty upon reconviction after an initial conviction, set aside on appeal, has resulted in rejection of the death sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Rumsey, was tried and convicted of capital murder by the State of Arizona. At a non-jury penalty phase, the trial judge found that no statutory aggravating circumstances or mitigating circumstances were present. Accordingly, the defendant was sentenced to life imprisonment. The Arizona Supreme Court found that the trial court had committed an error of law by misinterpreting the application of the “pecuniary gain” aggravating circumstance to contract killings. The appellate court set aside the life sentence and remanded the case for redetermination of aggravating and mitigating circumstances and for resentencing on the murder conviction.

On remand, the trial court held a new sentencing hearing. The trial court found that the “pecuniary gain” aggravating circumstance was present and that there was no mitigating circumstance sufficient to call for leniency. The defendant was sentenced to death. On appeal, the Arizona Supreme Court held that under the United States Supreme Court’s ruling in Bullington v. Missouri, the defendant’s death sentence violated the Double Jeopardy Clause. The appellate court ordered that the death sentence be reduced to life imprisonment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O’Connor: Justice O’Connor found that the case was controlled by Bullington. The opinion stated that “[i]n Bullington v. Missouri this Court held that the double jeopardy clause applies to ... capital sentencing proceeding and thus bars imposition of the death penalty upon reconviction after an initial conviction, set aside on appeal, has resulted in rejection of the death sentence.” It was noted that a capital penalty phase proceeding is comparable to a trial on the issue of guilt, thereby making the Double Jeopardy Clause relevant to such proceeding. Justice O’Connor ruled that the defendant’s initial life sentence constituted an acquittal of the death penalty and the trial court could not subsequently sentence him to death on a retrial of the penalty phase proceeding. The judgment of the Arizona Supreme Court was therefore affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that the majority misconstrued the procedural posture of the case in order to reach its conclusion. The dissent outlined its argument as follows:

Today the Court affirms the decision of the Arizona Supreme Court vacating the death sentence imposed on [the defendant] for a murder committed in the course of an armed robbery. Applying the interpretation given the double jeopardy clause by a bare majority of this Court in Bullington v. Missouri, the Court concludes that in this case the first sentencing also amounted to an implied acquittal of [the defendant’s] eligibility for the death penalty.... I do not believe that the reasoning underlying Bullington applies....

The central premise of the Court’s holding today is that the trial court’s first finding—that there were no aggravating and no mitigating circumstances and therefore only a life sentence could be imposed—amounted to an “implied acquittal” on the merits of [the defendant’s] eligibility for the death sentence, thereby barring the possibility of an enhanced sentence upon resentencing by virtue of the double jeopardy clause. But the Court’s continued reliance on the “implied acquittal” rationale of Bullington is simply inapt. Unlike the jury’s decision in Bullington, where the jury had broad discretion to decide whether capital punishment was appropriate, the trial judge’s discretion in this case was carefully confined and directed to determining whether certain specified aggravating factors existed. It is obvious from the record that the State established at the first hearing that [the defendant] murdered his victim in the course of an armed robbery, a fact which was undisputed at sentencing. In no sense can it be meaningfully argued that the State failed to “prove” its case—the existence of at least one aggravating circumstance. It is hard to see how there has been an “implied acquittal” of a statutory aggravating circumstance when the record explicitly establishes the factual basis that such an aggravating circumstance existed. But for the trial judge’s erroneous construction of governing state law, the judge would have been required to impose the death penalty....

The fact that in this case the legal error was ultimately corrected by the trial court did not mean that the State sought to marshal the same or additional evidence against a capital defendant which had proved insufficient to prove the State's "case" against him the first time. There is no logical reason for a different result here simply because the Arizona Supreme Court remanded the case to the trial court for the purpose of correcting the legal error, particularly when the resentencing did not constitute the kind of "retrial" which the Bullington Court condemned. Accordingly, I would reverse the decision of the Arizona Supreme Court in this case.

Arkansas The State of Arkansas is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on March 23, 1973.

Arkansas has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Arkansas Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Arkansas Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and eleven judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called Circuit Courts. Capital offenses against the State of Arkansas are tried in the Circuit Courts. It is provided under the laws of Arkansas, in capital cases, that an indigent defendant must be appointed two attorneys.

Arkansas' capital punishment offenses are set out under Ark. Code § 1-10-101. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. Acting alone or with one (1) or more other persons: (A) the person commits or attempts to commit: (i) Terrorism; (ii) Rape; (iii) Kidnapping; (iv) Vehicular piracy; (v) Robbery; (vi) Burglary; (vii) a felony violation of the Uniform Controlled Substances Act, involving an actual delivery of a controlled substance; or (viii) First-degree escape; and (B) in the course of and in furtherance of the felony or in immediate flight from the felony, the person or an accomplice causes the death of any person under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life;

2. Acting alone or with one (1) or more other persons: (A) the person commits or attempts to commit arson; and (B) in the course of and in furtherance of the felony or in immediate flight from the felony, the person or an accomplice causes the death of any person;

3. With the premeditated and deliberated purpose of causing the death of any law enforcement officer, jailer, prison official, firefighter, judge or other court official, probation officer, parole officer, any military personnel, or teacher or school employee, when such person is acting in the line of duty, the person causes the death of any person;

4. With the premeditated and deliberated purpose of causing the death of another person, the person causes the death of any person;

5. With the premeditated and deliberated purpose of causing the death of the holder of any public office filled by election or appointment or a candidate for public office, the person causes the death of any person;

6. While incarcerated in the Department of Correction or the Department of Community Correction, the person purposely causes the death of another person after premeditation and deliberation;

7. Pursuant to an agreement that the person cause the death of another person in return for anything of value, he or she causes the death of any person;

8. The person enters into an agreement in which one (1) person is to cause the death of another person in return for anything of value, and the person hired pursuant to the agreement causes the death of any person;

9. (a) Under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life, the person knowingly causes the death of a person fourteen (14) years of age or younger at the time the murder was committed if the defendant was eighteen (18) years of age or older at the time the murder was committed; or (b) it is an affirmative defense to any prosecution under this subdivision (a)(9) arising from the failure of the parent, guardian, or person standing in loco parentis to provide specified medical or surgical treatment, that the parent, guardian, or person standing in loco parentis relied solely on spiritual treatment through prayer in accordance with the tenets and practices of an established church or religious denomination of which he or she is a member; or

10. The person (a) purposely discharges a firearm from a vehicle at a person or at a vehicle, conveyance, or a residential or commercial occupiable structure that he or she knows or has good reason to believe to be occupied by a person; and (b) thereby causes the death of another person under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life.

In addition, it is provided in Ark. Code § 5-51-201 that the crime of treason against the State is a capital offense. Treason is defined as levying war against the State, or adhering to the State's enemies by giving them aid and comfort.

Capital murder in Arkansas is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Arkansas is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, jurors must unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Ark. Code § 5-4-604 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The capital murder was committed by a person imprisoned as a result of a felony conviction;

2. The capital murder was committed by a person unlawfully at liberty after being sentenced to imprisonment as a result of a felony conviction;

3. The person previously committed another felony, an element of which was the use or threat of violence to another person or the creation of a substantial risk of death or serious physical injury to another person;

4. The person in the commission of the capital murder knowingly created a great risk of death to a person other than the victim or caused the death of more than one (1) person in the same criminal episode;

5. The capital murder was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing an arrest or effecting an escape from custody;

6. The capital murder was committed for pecuniary gain;

7. The capital murder was committed for the purpose of disrupting or hindering the lawful exercise of any government or political function;

8. The capital murder was committed in an especially cruel or depraved manner;

9. The capital murder was committed by means of a destructive device, bomb, explosive, or similar device that the person planted, hid, or concealed in any place, area, dwelling, building, or structure, or mailed or delivered, or caused to be planted, hidden, concealed, mailed, or delivered, and the person knew that his or her act would create a great risk of death to human life; or

10. The capital murder was committed against a person whom the defendant knew or reasonably should have known was especially vulnerable to the attack because (a) of either a temporary or permanent severe physical or mental disability which would interfere with the victim's ability to flee or to defend himself or herself; or (b) the person was twelve (12) years of age or younger.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Arkansas has provided by Ark. Code § 5-4-605 the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The capital murder was committed while the defendant was under extreme mental or emotional disturbance;

2. The capital murder was committed while the defendant was acting under unusual pressures or influences or under the domination of another person;

3. The capital murder was committed while the capacity of the defendant to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was impaired as a result of mental disease or defect, intoxication, or drug abuse;

4. The youth of the defendant at the time of the commission of the capital murder;

5. The capital murder was committed by another person and the defendant was an accomplice and his participation relatively minor;

6. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity.

Under Arkansas's capital punishment statute, the Arkansas Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Arkansas uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. However, if that method is found unconstitutional, then death is imposed by electrocution. The State's death row facility for men is located in Tucker, Arkansas, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Pine Bluff, Arkansas.

Pursuant to the laws of Arkansas, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The State's Parole Board is permitted to make a nonbinding recommendation as to whether a death sentence should be commuted.

Under the laws of Arkansas a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Ark. Code § 16-90-502(d):

1. No execution of any person convicted in this state of a capital offense shall be public, but shall be private.

2. At the execution there shall be present the director or an assistant, the Department of Corrections official in charge of medical services or his or her designee, and a number of respectable citizens numbering not fewer than six (6) nor more than twelve (12) whose presence is necessary to verify that the execution was conducted in the manner required by law. Counsel for the person being executed and the spiritual adviser to the person being executed may be present. Other persons designated by the director may be present, but the maximum number of persons at the execution shall not exceed thirty (30).

3. (a) During the execution there shall be a closed-circuit audiovisual monitor placed in a location chosen by the director and any close relatives of the deceased victim or any surviving innocent victims who desire to view the execution may be present. In no case shall the number of viewers exceed five (5) per execution. No audio or video recording shall be made of the execution. (b) "Close relatives of the victim" means the following persons in relation to the victim for whose death an inmate is sentenced to death: (i) the spouse of the victim at the time of the victim's death; (ii) the parents or stepparents of the victim; (iii) the adult brothers, sisters, children, or stepchildren of the victim; or (iv) any other adult relative with a close relationship to the victim. (c) "Surviving innocent victims" means any person innocently present during the commission of the capital offense who sustains an injury, either physical or emotional, and such injury results in a separate conviction for a lesser offense which arises out of the same course of conduct.

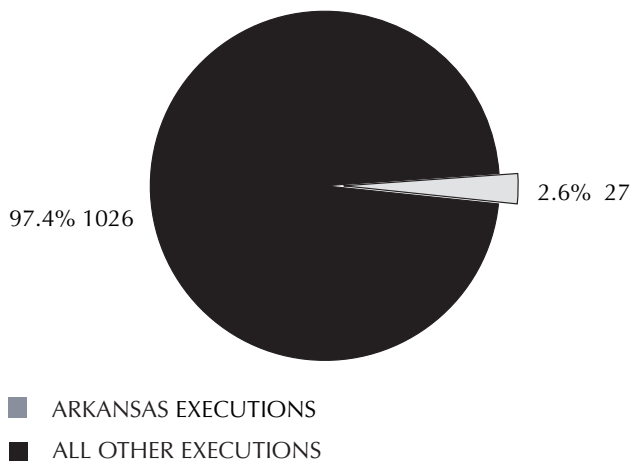

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Arkansas executed twenty-seven capital felons. During this period, Arkansas executed one female capital felon. A total of thirty-seven capital felons were on death row in Arkansas in July 2006. The death row population for this period was listed as twenty-three black inmates and fourteen white inmates.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendants established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted them.

Case Holding: The defendants established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted them, therefore their convictions and sentences could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This capital prosecution involved two defendants, Arnold and Dixon. The defendants were found guilty of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of North Carolina. The North Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the judgments. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendants’ contention that the judgments against them were invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted them. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion found that the defendants established an un rebutted prima facie claim of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted them. It was said that the defendants presented evidence showing that blacks “comprise over 28 percent of persons on the tax records of the county, and over 30 percent of the persons on the poll tax list from which jurors are drawn, and that only one [black] served on a grand jury in 24 years.” The opinion concluded: “The judgment below must be reversed. The [evidence] in itself made out a prima facie case of the denial of the equal protection which the Constitution guarantees.” See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection Arraignment “Arraignment” is a legal term used to describe a procedure for informing a defendant of the nature of the charges against him or her. Two types of an arraignment may occur in a criminal prosecution.

First, if a defendant is charged with a crime by an indictment or information, he or she must be presented or arraigned in open court for the purpose of having the indictment or information read to him or her by a judge. At this arraignment, a defendant must be called upon to enter a plea. If the defendant does not enter a plea, the judge must enter a plea of innocence. The defendant must also be given a copy of the indictment or information before being called upon to plead.

The second type of arraignment, also called initial appearance, occurs when a defendant is arrested on a complaint or without a warrant. A defendant arrested on a complaint or without a warrant has a right under due process of law to be promptly presented to a neutral judicial officer and informed of his or her basic constitutional rights, as well as other procedural matters involved in the prosecution. At this arraignment, a defendant may not be called upon to enter a plea (unless the arrest is for a misdemeanor only). All jurisdictions have outlined in criminal procedure rules the process that immediately follows an arrest of a suspect. The procedure used under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, as illustrated below, fairly represents matters contained in most rules.

Federal Procedure for Initial Appearance

a. In General. Except as otherwise provided in this rule, an officer making an arrest under a warrant issued upon a complaint or any person making an arrest without a warrant shall take the arrested person without unnecessary delay before the nearest available federal magistrate judge or, in the event that a federal magistrate judge is not reasonably available, before a state or local judicial officer authorized by law. If a person arrested without a warrant is brought before a magistrate judge, a complaint, satisfying the probable cause requirements of the law, shall be promptly filed. When a person, arrested with or without a warrant or given a summons, appears initially before the magistrate judge, the magistrate judge shall proceed in accordance with the applicable subdivisions of this rule.

b. Misdemeanors and Other Petty Offenses. If the charge against the defendant is a misdemeanor or other petty offense triable by a United States magistrate judge, the magistrate judge shall proceed in accordance with the law.

c. Offenses Not Triable by the United States Magistrate Judge. If the charge against the defendant is not triable by the United States magistrate judge, the defendant shall not be called upon to plead. The magistrate judge shall inform the defendant of the complaint against the defendant, and of any affidavit filed therewith, of the defendant's right to retain counsel or to request the assignment of counsel, if the defendant is unable to obtain counsel, and of the general circumstances under which the defendant may secure pretrial release. The magistrate judge shall inform the defendant that the defendant is not required to make a statement and that any statement made by the defendant may be used against the defendant. The magistrate judge shall also inform the defendant of the right to a preliminary examination. The magistrate judge shall allow the defendant reasonable time and opportunity to consult counsel and shall detain or conditionally release the defendant as provided by statute or in these rules.

A defendant is entitled to a preliminary examination, unless waived, when charged with any offense, other than a petty offense, which is to be tried by a judge of the district court. If the defendant waives preliminary examination, the magistrate judge shall forthwith hold the defendant to answer in the district court. If the defendant does not waive the preliminary examination, the magistrate judge shall schedule a preliminary examination. Such examination shall be held within a reasonable time but no later than ten days following the initial appearance, if the defendant is in custody, and no later than twenty days if the defendant is not in custody, provided, however, that the preliminary examination shall not be held if the defendant is indicted or if an information against the defendant is filed in district court before the date set for the preliminary examination. With the consent of the defendant and upon a showing of good cause, taking into account the public interest in the prompt disposition of criminal cases, time limits specified in this subdivision may be extended one or more times by a federal magistrate judge. In the absence of such consent by the defendant, time limits may be extended by a judge of the United States only upon a showing that extraordinary circumstances exist and that delay is indispensable to the interests of justice. See also Arrest; Mallory v. United States; United States v. Carignan

Arrest An arrest refers to the physical custody and control of a person by a law enforcement agent. An arrest may occur in one of two ways: (1) pursuant to an arrest warrant or (2) without an arrest warrant. At common law, an arrest for a felony offense can occur without a warrant even if the arresting officer does not see the arrestee commit for felony that results in the arrest. All that is required under the common law for a felony arrest is probable cause that a felony occurs and probable cause to believe that the arrestee commits the crime. The common law only permits an arrest for a misdemeanor offense without a warrant, if the offense occurs in the presence of the arresting officer.

In the context of an arrest of a person for the suspected commission of a capital offense, the issue of whether the arrest of the suspect is with or without a warrant may be critical. Certain rights are accorded to a person arrested without a warrant for a capital offense (and all felonies) that, if not provided, could result in a confession, incriminating statements, or physical evidence being inadmissible at trial. For example, a capital felon arrested without a warrant has a constitutional right to be taken before a neutral judicial officer within forty-eight hours of his or her arrest (barring a medical emergency). This requirement is generally referred to as the prompt presentment rule. If the prompt presentment rule is violated and during its violation the arrestee gives a confession, the confession may be barred from use during the trial.

The procedure for issuing and executing an arrest warrant is fairly standard. The procedure used by federal authorities under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides an illustration.

Federal Procedure for Arrest Warrant:

a. Issuance. If it appears from the complaint, or from an affidavit or affidavits filed with the complaint, that there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the defendant has committed it, a warrant for the arrest of the defendant shall issue to any officer authorized by law to execute it. Upon the request of the attorney for the government, a summons instead of a warrant shall issue. More than one warrant or summons may issue on the same complaint. If a defendant fails to appear in response to the summons, a warrant shall issue.

b. Probable Cause. The finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part.

c. Form.

1. Warrant. The warrant shall be signed by the magistrate judge and shall contain the name of the defendant or, if the defendant's name is unknown, any name or description by which the defendant can be identified with reasonable certainty. It shall describe the offense charged in the complaint. It shall command that the defendant be arrested and brought before the nearest available magistrate judge.

2. Summons. The summons shall be in the same form as the warrant except that it shall summon the defendant to appear before a magistrate at a stated time and place.

d. Execution or Service; and Return.

1. By Whom. The warrant shall be executed by a marshal or by some other officer authorized by law. The summons may be served by any person authorized to serve a summons in a civil action.

2. Territorial Limits. The warrant may be executed or the summons may be served at any place within the jurisdiction of the United States.

3. Manner. The warrant shall be executed by the arrest of the defendant. The officer need not have the warrant at the time of the arrest but upon request shall show the warrant to the defendant as soon as possible. If the officer does not have the warrant at the time of the arrest, the officer shall then inform the defendant of the offense charged and of the fact that a warrant has been issued. The summons shall be served upon a defendant by delivering a copy to the defendant personally or by leaving it at the defendant's dwelling house or usual place of abode with some person of suitable age and discretion then residing therein and by mailing a copy of the summons to the defendant's last known address.

4. Return. The officer executing a warrant shall make return thereof to the magistrate judge or other officer before whom the defendant is brought. At the request of the attorney for the government any unexecuted warrant shall be returned to and canceled by the magistrate judge by whom it was issued. On or before the return day, the person to whom a summons was delivered for service shall make return thereof to the magistrate judge before whom the summons is returnable. By request of the attorney for the government at any time while the complaint is pending, a warrant returned unexecuted and not canceled or summons returned unserved or a duplicate thereof may be delivered by the magistrate judge to the marshal or other authorized person for execution or service.

Arson The crime of arson is a felony offense that was defined at common law as the unlawful burning of an occupied dwelling of another (modern statutes have broadened the definition). Arson, without more, cannot be used to inflict the death penalty. The Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits this as cruel and unusual punishment. However, the crime of arson can play a role in a capital prosecution. If arson occurs during the commission of a homicide it may form the basis of a death-eligible offense, and therefore trigger a capital prosecution. Arson Aggravator The crime of arson committed during the course of a homicide is a statutory aggravating circumstance in half of all capital punishment jurisdictions. As a statutory aggravating circumstance, evidence of arson is used at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution for the factfinder to consider in determining whether to impose the death penalty. Aryan Brotherhood Prosecution The Aryan Brotherhood (also known as the Brand) is a white male prison gang that was organized in 1964 at California's San Quentin maximum security prison. The gang was formed initially as a racial hate group for the purpose of intimidating nonwhite inmates. Over the course of several decades, the gang spread to other California prisons, prisons in other states, and federal prisons. It has been estimated that the gang has a membership of over 15,000 inside and outside of prisons. Although racial hatred inspired the formation of the gang, its focus has shifted to controlling prison drug trafficking, male prostitution, extortion, and gambling among white inmates.

During the period 1982–1989, the FBI investigated the gang. However, the investigation was terminated because the United States Attorney, in Los Angeles, declined to prosecute gang members. Federal involvement resurfaced in 2002, when Assistant U.S. Attorney Gregory Jessner filed a 140-page indictment against forty gang members in prisons across the country. At least twenty-one of the defendants were eligible for the death penalty, which made this the largest non-military death penalty case in the history of the American criminal justice system. The indictment brought racketeering charges against the gang members that included committing or soliciting thirty-two murders and attempted murders, extortion, robbery, and drug trafficking.

In March 2006, the trial of four gang leaders began in Orange County, California. The defendants in the trial were Barry Mills, Tyler Bingham, Edgar Hevle, and Christopher Overton Gibson. The four leaders were charged with ordering or participating in fifteen murders or attempted murders. In July 2006, a jury convicted the four gang leaders of murder, conspiracy, and racketeering. Gibson and Hevle were sentenced to life in prison. Mills and Bingham were faced with a death penalty sentencing hearing. The jury at the death penalty hearing voted not to impose the death penalty on Mills and Bingham. Instead, Mills and Bingham were also sentenced to life in prison.

Issue Presented: Whether the State of Pennsylvania could prosecute the defendant in a single trial for two homicides and not afford him all the peremptory jury strikes he would be entitled to if the crimes were prosecuted separately.

Case Holding: The issue of the defendant's entitlement to peremptory jury strikes in a State prosecution is a matter controlled by State law and cannot be interfered with by federal courts.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Valotta, was charged under separate indictments for the murder of two people by the State of Pennsylvania. The offenses were tried together. He was convicted of second-degree murder on one indictment and capital murder on the other. The defendant was sentenced to death for the capital conviction. On appeal to the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, the judgments were affirmed. The defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court. In the petition, it was alleged that the defendant was denied due process of law in having a single trial on both offenses, because he was not given twenty peremptory jury strikes for each offense, which would have occurred if the offenses were tried separately. The federal district court agreed with the defendant and granted habeas relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Holmes: Justice Holmes ruled that the issue presented by the defendant was purely a State law matter that federal courts could not interfere with. The opinion reasoned as follows:

There is no question that the State Court had jurisdiction. But the much abused suggestion is made that it lost jurisdiction by trying the two indictments together. Manifestly this would not be true even if the trial was not warranted by law. But the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has said that there was no mistake of law, and so far as the law of Pennsylvania was concerned, it was most improper to attempt to go behind the decision of the Supreme Court, to construe statutes as opposed to it, and to hear evidence that the practice of the State had been the other way. The question of constitutional power is the only one that could be raised, if even that were open upon this collateral attack, and as to that we cannot doubt that Pennsylvania could authorize the whole story to be brought out before the jury at once, even though two indictments were involved, without denying due process of law. If any question was made at the trial as to the loss of the right to challenge twenty jurors on each indictment, the only side of it that would be open here would be again the question of constitutional power. That Pennsylvania could limit the challenges on each indictment to ten does not admit doubt....

There was not the shadow of a ground for interference with this sentence by habeas corpus.... In so delicate a matter as interrupting the regular administration of the criminal law of the State by this kind of attack, too much discretion cannot be used and it must be realized that it can be done only upon definitely and narrowly limited grounds.

The judgment of the federal district court was reversed. See also Jury Selection Asians and Capital Punishment The Asian ancestry population in America has historically been a minority group. The Asian population is of two types: Asian Americans and Asian residents. Ironically, though, the first person executed in America by lethal gas, Gee Jon, was Asian. See also African Americans and Capital Punishment; Hispan-

Assault and Battery The crime of assault and battery refers to the physical injury of a victim that does not result in the victim's death. Assault and battery may constitute a misdemeanor or felony, depending upon the severity of the injury to the victim. Assault and battery, without more, cannot be used to inflict the death penalty. The Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits this as cruel and unusual punishment. However, a felony assault and battery can play a role in a capital prosecution. If a felony assault and battery occurs during the commission of a homicide, it may form the basis of a death-eligible offense and therefore trigger a capital prosecution. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Death-Eligible Offenses; Felony Murder Rule

Assignment of Error Assignment of error is a legal term of art that refers to the designation of specific matters that are alleged to have been erroneously resolved at the trial court level. Assignment of error comes into play during the appellate phase of a criminal prosecution. A defendant is generally obligated to inform an appellate court the specific matters the defendant believes were resolved incorrectly at the trial. Examples of assignment of error include (1) the trial court failing to suppress a confession; (2) the indictment not providing adequate notice; and (3) the jury being improperly instructed on self-defense.

As a general rule, appellate courts will deem any issue not raised or improperly raised as waived or forfeited. That is, a defendant has an affirmative obligation to inform an appellate court of the matters he or she believed were wrongly resolved at the trial. In a few capital punishment jurisdictions, legislators have imposed specific issues that appellate courts must examine in a capital case, regardless of whether the defendant raises the matter. This exception to waiver or forfeiture is unique to capital punishment.

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution prohibits executing mentally retarded prisoners.

Case Holding: The Constitution prohibits executing mentally retarded prisoners.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Daryl Renard Atkins, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Virginia for the 1996 murder of Eric Nesbitt. On direct appeal, the State Supreme Court affirmed the conviction, but reversed the death sentence and ordered a new sentencing hearing. During the second penalty phase, the defendant put on evidence to show that he was mentally retarded. The jury rejected the significance of the evidence and sentenced the defendant to death. The second death sentence was affirmed on direct appeal, even though the defendant argued that the death penalty should not be imposed on mentally retarded prisoners. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens held that the Eighth Amendment prohibited executing mentally retarded defendants. He provided the following justification:

[O]ur death penalty jurisprudence provides two reasons consistent with the legislative consensus that the mentally retarded should be categorically excluded from execution. First, there is a serious question as to whether either justification that we have recognized as a basis for the death penalty applies to mentally retarded offenders. [The decision in] Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), identified retribution and deterrence of capital crimes by prospective offenders as the social purposes served by the death penalty. Unless the imposition of the death penalty on a mentally retarded person measurably contributes to one or both of these goals, it is nothing more than the purposeless and needless imposition of pain and suffering, and hence an unconstitutional punishment.

With respect to retribution — the interest in seeing that the offender gets his “just deserts” — the severity of the appropriate punishment necessarily depends on the culpability of the offender. Since Gregg, our jurisprudence has consistently confined the imposition of the death penalty to a narrow category of the most serious crimes. For example, in Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420 (1980), we set aside a death sentence because the petitioner’s crimes did not reflect a consciousness materially more depraved than that of any person guilty of murder. If the culpability of the average murderer is insufficient to justify the most extreme sanction available to the State, the lesser culpability of the mentally retarded offender surely does not merit that form of retribution. Thus, pursuant to our narrowing jurisprudence, which seeks to ensure that only the most deserving of execution are put to death, an exclusion for the mentally retarded is appropriate.

With respect to deterrence — the interest in preventing capital crimes by prospective offenders — it seems likely that capital punishment can serve as a deterrent only when murder is the result of premeditation and deliberation. Exempting the mentally retarded from that punishment will not affect the cold calculus that precedes the decision of other potential murderers. Indeed, that sort of calculus is at the opposite end of the spectrum from behavior of mentally retarded offenders. The theory of deterrence in capital sentencing is predicated upon the notion that the increased severity of the punishment will inhibit criminal actors from carrying out murderous conduct. Yet it is the same cognitive and behavioral impairments that make these defendants less morally culpable — for example, the diminished ability to understand and process information, to learn from experience, to engage in logical reasoning, or to control impulses — that also make it less likely that they can process the information of the possibility of execution as a penalty and, as a result, control their conduct based upon that information. Nor will exempting the mentally retarded from execution lessen the deterrent effect of the death penalty with respect to offenders who are not mentally retarded. Such individuals are unprotected by the exemption and will continue to face the threat of execution. Thus, executing the mentally retarded will not measurably further the goal of deterrence....

Our independent evaluation of the issue reveals no reason to disagree with the judgment of the legislatures that have recently addressed the matter and concluded that death is not a suitable punishment for a mentally retarded criminal. We are not persuaded that the execution of mentally retarded criminals will measurably advance the deterrent or the retributive purpose of the death penalty. Construing and applying the Eighth Amendment in the light of our evolving standards of decency, we therefore conclude that such punishment is excessive and that the Constitution places a substantive restriction on the State’s power to take the life of a mentally retarded offender.

The decision of the Virginia Supreme Court, which had affirmed the death sentence, was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Rehnquist, in Which Scalia and Thomas, JJ., Joined: Chief Justice Rehnquist dissented from the Court’s decision. He argued that simply because a large majority of States prohibit the execution of mentally retarded prisoners, it was not justification for using the Constitution to bar such punishment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented from the Court’s judgment. He took the position that the Constitution did not bar the execution of mentally retarded prisoners.

Case Note: The decision in the case overruled Penry v. Lynaugh, 492 U.S. 302 (1989), which had held that the Constitution did not prohibit executing mentally retarded prisoners. See also Mentally Retarded Capital Felon; Penry v. Lynaugh

Attorney-Client Privilege The attorney-client privilege is of common-law origin. The attorney-client privilege prohibits disclosure of confidential communication between an attorney and client, unless the client consents to such disclosure. Creation of the privilege is not dependent upon the payment of a fee or the pendency of litigation. Whatever facts are communicated by a client to an attorney, solely because of that relationship, such counsel is not at liberty to disclose. The attorney-client privilege does not protect communication made to an attorney in furtherance of a scheme to commit a future crime. See also Alexander v. United States

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied the right of effective assistance of counsel because the trial court denied his attorneys' request to continue the trial date so that they could investigate the case and prepare a defense.

Case Holding: The defendant was not denied the right of effective assistance of counsel because the trial court denied his attorneys' request to continue the trial date so that they could investigate the case and prepare a defense.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Avery, was charged with capital murder by the State of Alabama. He was appointed two attorneys to represent him. Prior to trial, both attorneys requested the trial be continued to another date because they had not been given sufficient time to investigate the case and prepare a defense. The trial court denied a continuance. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the denial of a continuance had deprived him of the equal protection of the laws and due process of law by denying him the right of counsel, with the accustomed incidents of consultation and opportunity of preparation for trial. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black ruled that the defendant was not deprived of effective assistance of counsel because of the trial court's decision not to continue the trial to another date. He set out the Court's position as follows:

Since the Constitution nowhere specifies any period which must intervene between the required appointment of counsel and trial, the fact, standing alone, that a continuance has been denied, does not constitute a denial of the constitutional right to assistance of counsel. In the course of trial, after due appointment of competent counsel, many procedural questions necessarily arise which must be decided by the trial judge in the light of facts then presented and conditions then existing. Disposition of a request for continuance is of this nature and is made in the discretion of the trial judge, the exercise of which will ordinarily not be reviewed....

But the denial of opportunity for appointed counsel to confer, to consult with the accused, and to prepare his defense could convert the appointment of counsel into a sham and nothing more than a formal compliance with the Constitution's requirement that an accused be given the assistance of counsel. The Constitution's guarantee of assistance of counsel cannot be satisfied by mere formal appointment.

Under the particular circumstances appearing in this record, we do not think [the defendant] has been denied the benefit of assistance of counsel guaranteed to him by the Fourteenth Amendment. His appointed counsel, as the Supreme Court of Alabama recognized, have performed their full duty intelligently and well. Not only did they present [the defendant's] defense in the trial court, but ... they carried an appeal to the State Supreme Court. Their appointment and the representation rendered under it were not mere formalities.... [The defendant] has thus been afforded the assistance of zealous and earnest counsel from arraignment to final argument in this Court.

The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Right to Counsel

Issue Presented: Whether a California statutory jury instruction prevented jury from giving consideration to evidence that defendant would lead a constructive life if incarcerated instead of executed.

Case Holding: California's statutory jury instruction did not prevent jury from giving consideration to evidence that defendant would lead a constructive life if incarcerated instead of executed.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Fernando Belmontes, was convicted by a California jury for the 1981 murder of Steacy McConnell. During the sentencing phase, the defendant put on evidence to show that he would not be a threat to anyone if he were sentenced to prison for life. One of the instructions read to the penalty phase jury by the trial judge informed the jury that they could consider any circumstance which extenuated the gravity of the crime even though it was not a legal excuse for the crime. The jury ultimately sentenced the defendant to death. The conviction and sentence were upheld on direct appeal. After unsuccessfully seeking state habeas corpus relief, the defendant filed a habeas petition in federal court.

In the federal habeas proceeding, the defendant argued that California's statutory jury instruction, which informed the jury that they could consider any circumstance which extenuated the gravity of the crime even though it was not a legal excuse for the crime, precluded the jury from considering evidence that he would lead a model life in prison. A federal district court denied relief. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed the death sentence after finding the statutory jury instruction was flawed. The United States Supreme Court issued a memorandum order asking the Court of Appeals to reconsider its ruling in light of the decision in Brown v. Payton, 544 U.S. 133 (2005), which upheld California's statutory jury instruction. On remand, the Court of Appeals once again reversed the death sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy held that California's statutory jury instruction did not prevent the jury from considering all of the defendant's mitigating evidence. The opinion pointed out that the instruction was upheld in two prior decisions of the Court, Boyd v. California, 494 U.S. 370 (1990), and Brown v. Payton, 544 U.S. 133 (2005). Justice Kennedy addressed the matter as follows:

In this case, as in Boyd and as in Payton, the jury heard mitigating evidence, the trial court directed the jury to consider all the evidence presented, and the parties addressed the mitigating evidence in their closing arguments. This Court's cases establish, as a general rule, that a jury in such circumstances is not reasonably likely to believe itself barred from considering the defense's evidence as a factor extenuating the gravity of the crime. The [statutory] instruction is consistent with the constitutional right to present mitigating evidence in capital sentencing proceedings.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the defendant's death sentence was reinstated.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's judgment. He wrote separately to point out that he believed the Constitution permitted States to limit the consideration of mitigating evidence a jury may consider.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's judgment. He argued that the statutory instruction was ambiguous and could be interpreted by a jury as limiting the type of mitigating evidence that could be considered. In support of his position, Justice Stevens pointed out that subsequent to the defendant's trial, both the California Supreme Court and legislature modified the instruction because of its ambiguity. *See also Boyd v. Bahamas The laws of the Bahamas permit imposition of the death penalty. The method of execution used by the Bahamas is hanging. The island nation's legal system is based on English common law. The constitution of the Bahamas was adopted July 10, 1973.

The Bahamian judicial structure consists of a supreme court (trial court) and a court of appeal (the highest court). The court of appeal consists of a president and two other justices. Under the constitution of Bahamas, a final appeal may be made to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Bahrain Capital punishment is allowed in Bahrain. Bahrain uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. The legal system of Bahrain is based on several sources, which include customary tribal law, three separate doctrines of Islamic law, and civil law as embodied in codes, ordinances, and regulations. Bahrain adopted a new constitution on February 14, 2002.

Bahrain has been ruled by the Al-Khalifa extended family since the late eighteenth century. The nation has few democratic institutions and no political parties. Under the nation's constitution, a king is confirmed as the hereditary ruler. The current king, Hamad bin Isa Al-Khalifa, governs the country with the prime minister and an appointed cabinet of ministers.

According to the constitution, the judiciary is an independent and separate branch of government. However, in practice the king is at the pinnacle of the judicial system. Bahrain has a dual court system that consists of civil and Shari'a (Islamic) courts. Shari'a courts have jurisdiction over domestic matters such as marriage, divorce, and inheritance. Civil courts consist of the Supreme Court of Appeal, trial courts, and a special Security Court. The Supreme Court of Appeal is the highest appellate court in the country.

Defendants prosecuted in trial courts are provided with guarantees, such as public trials, the right to counsel (including legal aid if needed), and the right of appeal. Defendants charged with certain security offenses are tried in Security Court, which is composed of members of the Supreme Court of Appeal. Proceedings before the Security Court are held in secret and there is no right of judicial appeal. Defendants may be represented by counsel in Security Court proceedings. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Baker, Lena Lena Baker (b. 1901) was the only woman to ever be executed in the electric chair by the State of Georgia. Lena was an African American woman living in Cuthbert, Georgia, at a time when racial segregation and all its travesties were a way of life in the South. She was an uneducated, single mother who hired herself out to do menial jobs. In 1941, Lena took a job as a maid for Ernest B. Knight, a local gristmill owner. Knight hired Lena to care for him while he recovered from a broken leg. Knight had a reputation as an alcoholic and was prone to being extremely violent.

At some point during Lena's care for Knight, they began a physical relationship. From Lena's perspective, the physical relationship was a means of survival and not one of love. In time, Lena grew tired of being a mistress and made efforts to avoid Knight.

On the night of April 29, 1944, Knight visited Lena's home and attempted to force her to accompany him to the gristmill, where Knight had a bed. Lena refused and fled from her own home. She spent the night sleeping in nearby woods. When Lena awakened on the morning of April 30 and headed to her home, she ran into Knight. He pulled out a pistol and forced her to go to his gristmill, where he locked her in. Knight left the gristmill for a short while, but returned with some food. After Lena ate the food, she asked Knight to let her leave. Knight pulled out his pistol and threatened to kill Lena if she attempted to leave. Lena lunged at Knight and a struggle ensued. During the struggle, the gun went off and Knight fell to the floor—dead.

Lena left the gristmill and reported to the local coroner that she had killed Knight. Lena was later arrested. Lena's trial convened on August 14, 1944. The jury convicted her of murder on the same day and she was sentenced to die. On March 5, 1945 Lena was executed in the electric chair.

Nearly sixty years after Lena's execution, the Georgia Board of Pardons and Paroles granted a pardon to Lena in August 2005. The Board found that, at most, Lena should only have been convicted of manslaughter and given a prison sentence. The decision of the Board is consistent with Lena's last words before her execution: "What I done, I did in self-defense. I have nothing against anyone. I am ready to meet my God." Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution permits a death penalty statute to allow a guilt phase jury to return a sentence of death, but the actual decision to impose such sentence is made by the trial judge after holding a penalty phase hearing.

Case Holding: The Constitution permits a guilt phase jury to return a sentence of death, so long as the actual decision to impose a death sentence is made after holding an independent penalty phase hearing in which a defendant is allowed to proffer mitigating circumstances.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Brian Keith Baldwin, was charged by the State of Alabama with committing capital murder in March 1977 (a co-defendant was also charged). The defendant was tried before a jury. Pursuant to the death penalty statute of the State at that time, the jury found the defendant guilty of capital murder and fixed the punishment at death by electrocution. Under the State's laws, the trial court then held an independent penalty phase hearing for the purpose of determining whether death should actually be imposed. At the penalty phase hearing, the defendant was allowed to present mitigating evidence and the State was allowed to present aggravating circumstantial evidence. After presentation of penalty phase evidence, the trial court weighed the evidence and determined that the aggravating circumstances outweighed the mitigating circumstances and imposed the death penalty.

The Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. When the case went to the Supreme Court of Alabama, the defendant argued that the State's death penalty statute was unconstitutional because it provided for a mandatory sentence by the jury. He further argued that the trial court's sentence was unconstitutional because it was based in part upon consideration of the impermissible jury sentence. The Supreme Court of Alabama rejected the argument and held that even though the jury had no discretion regarding the sentence it would impose, the sentencing procedure was constitutionally valid because it was the trial judge who was the true sentencing authority. Almost simultaneous to this decision, in a different case, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit ruled Alabama's capital sentencing scheme was facially unconstitutional.

The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to resolve this conflict.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun noted Alabama's statute would have been unconstitutional, in view of the Court's precedents, if the jury's mandatory death sentence were dispositive. It was said that while the State's statute did not expressly preclude and might seem to authorize the trial court to consider the jury's sentence in determining whether the death penalty was appropriate, the Alabama appellate courts interpreted the statute to mean that the trial court was to impose a sentence without regard to the jury's mandatory sentence. Justice Blackmun noted that the trial judge did not interpret the statute as requiring him to consider the jury's sentence, because he never mentioned the sentence as a factor in his deliberations. The opinion also rejected the defendant's contention that a trial judge's decision to impose the death penalty had to have been swayed by the fact that the jury returned a sentence of death.

The opinion was noted favorably that if a trial court imposed a death sentence, the State's statute required the trial judge set forth in writing the factual findings from the trial and the sentencing hearing, including the aggravating and mitigating circumstances that formed the basis for the sentence. The statute further guided the trial judge's discretion by requiring that the death penalty be imposed only if the trial judge found specific statutory aggravating circumstances outweighed any statutory and non-statutory mitigating circumstances. The opinion went on to affirm the decision of the Alabama Supreme Court.

Concurring Opinion by Chief Justice Burger: Chief Justice Burger believed that Alabama's statute did require the trial judge to consider the jury's sentence in determining the sentence actually to be imposed. He argued that the majority opinion should have addressed the constitutionality of the statute on this basis and, if it had, the statute would pass constitutional muster. The chief justice did not believe that there was anything constitutionally impermissible about a trial judge considering the decision of the jury.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan reiterated his longstanding position "that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments." He would therefore vacate the defendant's sentence on that ground.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Brennan and Marshall, JJ., Joined: For Justice Stevens, dissent was based on two grounds. First, he argued that the State's statute did in fact require the trial court to consider the jury's decision. He contended that the majority opinion had no basis to say that the appellate courts of Alabama construed the statute as not requiring trial judges to consider the decision of juries. Next, Justice Stevens argued that "it is unrealistic to maintain that such a sentence from the jury does not enter the mind of the sentencing judge." For these reasons, Justice Stevens would have found the statute unconstitutional and vacated the defendant's death sentence.

Case Note: Alabama's death penalty statute has been amended and no longer permits a guilt phase jury to render a death sentence. See also Mandatory Death Penalty Statutes Issue Presented: Whether the indictment against the defendants was fatally defective because it failed to allege the time and place of the charged murder.

Case Holding: The indictment against the defendants was fatally defective because it failed to allege the time and place of the charged murder; therefore, the judgments against them could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, John C. Ball, Robert E. Boutwell and Millard F. Ball, were charged with capital murder by the United States. The crime occurred near Texas, “in the Chickasaw Nation, in [Native American] country.” The defendants were tried together. The jury acquitted Millard, but convicted John and Robert. Both defendants were sentenced to death. In their appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the defendants argued that their convictions were void because the indictment against them was insufficient to charge them with murder.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: Before addressing the issue raised by the defendants, Chief Justice Fuller discussed a technical error in the record of the case. It was said that the record nowhere disclosed that the defendants were present when the sentences were pronounced by the trial court. Fuller wrote that “[a]t common law no judgment for corporal punishment could be pronounced against a man in his absence, and in all capital felonies it was essential that it should appear of record that the defendant was asked before sentence if he had anything to say why it should not be pronounced.” The opinion found that the technical error alone was fatal only as to the sentences, but not the convictions.

In turning to the defendants’ argument that the indictment was fatally defective, the chief justice indicated that the Court agreed with them. He wrote: “[The indictment] fails to aver either the time or place of the death. By the common law, both time and place were required to be alleged. It was necessary that it should appear that the death transpired within a year and a day after the [fatal blow], and the place of death equally with that of the [fatal blow] had to be stated, to show jurisdiction in the court.” The opinion went on to reverse the judgments and award a new trial. See also Ball v. Issue Presented: Whether principles of double jeopardy prohibited a second prosecution of the defendants for the same offense.

Case Holding: Principles of double jeopardy prohibited a second prosecution of Millard F. Ball because he was acquitted in his first trial; however, the remaining two defendants could be prosecuted a second time because judgments were found against them in the first trial and reversed on appeal.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, John C. Ball, Robert E. Boutwell and Millard F. Ball, were charged with capital murder by the United States. The crime occurred near Texas, “in the Chickasaw Nation, in [Native American] country.” The defendants were tried together. The jury acquitted Millard, but convicted John and Robert. Both defendants were sentenced to death. The United States Supreme Court reversed the judgments and awarded a new trial because the indictment against the defendants was fatally defective.

On remand, the grand jury returned an indictment against all three defendants. To this indictment, all three defendants filed motions to quash the indictment based on double jeopardy principles. The trial court rejected the motions. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of capital murder against all three defendants. The trial court sentenced all three defendants to death. The defendants appealed to the United States Supreme Court, arguing double jeopardy principles precluded a second prosecution of them. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Gray: Justice Gray held that “Millard F. Ball’s acquittal by the verdict of the jury could not be deprived of its legitimate effect by the subsequent reversal by this court of the judgment against the other defendants upon the writ of error sued out by them only.” In finding that Millard could not be prosecuted after his initial acquittal, Justice Gray explained:

[A] general verdict of acquittal upon the issue of not guilty to an indictment undertaking to charge murder, and not objected to before the verdict as insufficient in that respect, is a bar to a second indictment for the same killing.

The Constitution of the United States, in the fifth amendment, declares, “nor shall any person be subject to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.” The prohibition is not against being twice punished, but against being twice put in jeopardy; and the accused, whether convicted or acquitted, is equally put in jeopardy at the first trial. An acquittal before a court having no jurisdiction is, of course, like all the proceedings in the case, absolutely void, and therefore no bar to subsequent indictment and trial in a court which has jurisdiction of the offense....

As to the defendant who had been acquitted by the verdict duly returned and received, the court could take no other action than to order his discharge. The verdict of acquittal was final, and could not be reviewed, on error or otherwise, without putting him twice in jeopardy, and thereby violating the Constitution.

The opinion then turned to the claim by defendants John C. Ball and Robert E. Boutwell, that double jeopardy principles barred a second prosecution of them. Justice Gray found that both defendants could be re-prosecuted. He wrote: “[T]heir plea of former conviction cannot be sustained, because upon [an appeal made] by themselves, the judgment and sentence against them were reversed, and the indictment ordered to be dismissed.... [I]t is quite clear that a defendant who procures a judgment against him upon an indictment to be set aside may be tried anew upon the same indictment, or upon another indictment, for the same offense of which he had been convicted.” The judgment against Millard F. Ball was reversed and the judgment against the other defendants affirmed. See also Ball v. United States (I); Double Jeopardy Clause

Bangladesh Bangladesh imposes the death penalty. Bangladesh utilizes the firing squad and hanging to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on English common law. The nation's constitution was first adopted on December 16, 1972.

The constitution of Bangladesh provides for an independent judiciary. However, under a special provision of the constitution, some lower courts are part of the executive branch of government and are subject to its influence. The judicial system is composed of a supreme court, district courts, magistrate courts, and village courts. The Supreme Court is divided into two sections: the High Court and the Appellate Court. The High Court hears original cases and reviews cases from the lower courts. The Appellate Court has jurisdiction to hear appeals of judgments, decrees, orders, or sentences of the High Court. Decisions by the Appellate Court are binding on all other courts.

Criminal trials are open to the public in Bangladesh. A defendant has the right to be represented by counsel, to call witnesses, and to appeal a verdict. Government-funded defense attorneys are rarely provided. In rural areas of the country, defendants usually do not receive legal representation. In urban areas, legal counsel is generally available if defendants are able to afford the expense.

The laws of Bangladesh permit defendants to be tried in absentia, although this is rarely done. The most famous absentia trial involved the prosecution of defendants charged with the 1975 killing of President Sheikh Mujibur Rahman. Fourteen of the defendants involved had fled the country. Twelve of those defendants were convicted and many were sentenced to death. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the Court of Appeals wrongly found that the defendant failed to show his death sentence was affected by the prosecutor's suppression of information about a witness named Robert Farr. (2) Whether the Court of Appeals wrongly denied the defendant a certificate of appealability on his claim that the prosecutor suppressed information about a witness named Charles Cook.

Case Holdings: (1) The Court of Appeals wrongly found that the defendant failed to show his death sentence was affected by the prosecutor's suppression of information about a witness named Robert Farr. (2) The Court of Appeals wrongly denied the defendant a certificate of appealability on his claim that the prosecutor suppressed information about a witness named Charles Cook.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Texas prosecuted the defendant, Delma Banks, Jr., for the 1980 murder of Richard Whitehead. Prior to trial, the defendant requested the prosecutor turn over all information that was exculpatory. The prosecutor informed the defendant that he would receive all such information. However, the prosecutor failed to turn over information regarding two critical witnesses, Charles Cook and Robert Farr. During the trial, Cook and Farr lied about certain matters, but only the prosecution knew of the lies because it failed to turn over information which would have shown that the witnesses lied. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal, and during several State habeas corpus petitions.

During the last of several federal habeas corpus proceedings, the defendant alleged that the prosecutor allowed Farr to testify falsely when he stated that he had not given a statement to the police and that the police did not pay him for testifying. The defendant also alleged that Cook testified falsely when he stated that he had not talked to officials about his testimony prior to testifying at trial. A federal district judge found that the prosecutor wrongfully held back information regarding Farr, but that this information was only relevant at the penalty phase. Therefore, the court reversed the death sentence. The court found that the defendant did not properly present his claim involving Cook, which was relevant to the guilt phase, therefore the conviction would not be overturned. A federal Court of Appeals reversed the district court's decision regarding Farr and reinstated the death penalty. The Court of Appeals found that the information suppressed regarding Farr was not material. With respect to Cook, the Court of Appeals refused to issue a certificate of appealability to allow the issue to be addressed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Ginsburg: Justice Ginsburg found that the Court of Appeals was wrong in reinstating the death sentence. The opinion held that under the decision in Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), the prosecutor had a duty to disclose to the defendant information regarding prior statements given by Farr and the fact that Farr was paid by the police for information. Justice Ginsburg found that this information was material and could have changed the outcome of the sentence. With respect to the Cook claim, the opinion found that the matter was properly presented to the district court and that the Court of Appeals should have issued a certificate of appealability. The opinion went on to reverse the decision of the Court of Appeals and remanded the case.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas, in Which Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Thomas concurred in the Court's resolution of the Cook claim. However, he dissented from the resolution of the Farr claim. Justice Thomas argued that the information withheld regarding Farr was not material and had no impact on the sentence. See also Exculpatory Evidence Barbados Capital punishment is allowed in Barbados. Barbados uses hanging as the method of execution. Barbados utilizes the English common-law legal system. The nation's constitution was adopted on November 30, 1966.

Barbados's judiciary includes a supreme court, which consists of the High Court and the Court of Appeal. Appeals from decisions made by the High Court may be made to the Court of Appeal. The highest appeal is to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England.

The constitution of Barbados provides that persons charged with criminal offenses be given a fair trial. Criminal defendants have the right to counsel, including appointed counsel for indigent defendants. The law presumes defendants innocent until proven guilty. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether a State may constitutionally impose the death penalty when one of the aggravating circumstances relied upon by the trial judge to support the sentence was not among those established by the State's death penalty statute.

Case Holding: A death sentence is not constitutionally invalid because of the consideration of an improper aggravating circumstance, if an appellate court performs an analysis that removes the improper factor and finds that, with the improper factor removed, the sentence of death is supported by the remaining permissible aggravating factors.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Elwood Barclay, was convicted by a Florida jury of committing first-degree murder on June 17, 1974. (A co-defendant was also convicted and sentenced to death.) As required by the Florida death penalty statute, a separate sentencing hearing was held before the same jury. The jury rendered an advisory sentence recommending that Barclay be sentenced to life imprisonment. The trial judge, after receiving a pre-sentence report, decided to sentence the defendant to death. The trial judge made written findings of fact concerning aggravating and mitigating circumstances as required by Florida law. The trial judge found that several of the aggravating circumstances set out in the statute were present. He found that Barclay had knowingly created a great risk of death to many persons, had committed the murder while engaged in a kidnapping, and had endeavored to disrupt governmental functions and law enforcement. Additionally, they found that the murder had been especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel.

The Florida Supreme Court initially affirmed the sentence and conviction, but subsequently reversed the sentence and remanded for a new penalty phase hearing. The defendant was again sentenced to death. One of the issues the defendant raised on a second appeal was that the trial judge improperly found that his prior criminal record was an aggravating circumstance. The Florida Supreme Court found that consideration of the improper aggravating factor was harmless error, in light of the remaining valid aggravating circumstances. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the constitutionality of a death sentence when an invalid factor is considered in the sentencing decision.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Rehnquist Announced

the Court's Judgment and in Which Burger, CJ., and White and O'Connor, JJ., Joined: Justice Rehnquist ruled that the determination of whether the defendant's sentence must be vacated depended on the function of the finding of aggravating circumstances under Florida law and on the reason why the aggravating factor was invalid. It was observed that the trial judge's consideration of the defendant's criminal record as an aggravating circumstance was improper as a matter of Florida law. The death penalty statute of Florida set out statutory aggravating circumstances that may be considered and expressly precluded consideration of non-statutory aggravating circumstances. The prior criminal record of a capital felon did not fall within the definition of any statutory aggravating circumstance provided by statute.

The plurality opinion noted that the Florida Supreme Court had developed a body of case law to address the situation wherein an invalid aggravating circumstance was considered in imposing the death penalty. If the trial court found that some mitigating circumstances existed, the case will generally be remanded for re-sentencing. However, if the trial court properly found that there are no mitigating circumstances, the Florida Supreme Court applied harmless error analysis. In such a case, a reversal of the death sentence will not occur if the Florida Supreme Court determined the error was harmless. In determining whether consideration of an invalid aggravating circumstance was harmless, the appellate court removes the invalid factor and considers whether the remaining aggravating circumstances were sufficient to sustain the death sentence. If so, the sentence is affirmed. If not, the sentence is reversed and a new sentencing hearing is ordered.

Justice Rehnquist held that the harmless error analysis used by the Florida Supreme Court comported with constitutional standards, and that its application was constitutionally sound in the defendant's case. The judgment of the Florida Supreme Court was therefore affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Powell, J., Joined: Justice Stevens noted that the Florida rule that statutory aggravating factors must be exclusive afforded greater protection than the Constitution required. It was said that although a death sentence may not rest solely on a non-statutory aggravating factors, the Constitution did not prohibit consideration of factors not directly related to either statutory aggravating factors, as long as that information is relevant to the character of the defendant or the circumstances of the crime.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Marshall started out his dissent by noting that he continued to adhere to his position that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. He would, therefore, vacate the defendant's death sentence on that basis alone.

The dissent went further and argued that the Florida Supreme Court conducted a perfunctory review of the death sentence in the case. Justice Marshall believed that the "Florida Supreme Court's perfunctory analysis focused on the death sentence imposed on petitioner's codefendant." He contended that the review procedures used by the Florida Supreme Court in the case did not pass constitutional muster. The dissent reasoned succinctly: "First, the trial judge's reliance on aggravating circumstances not permitted under the Florida death penalty scheme is constitutional error that cannot be harmless. Second, the Florida Supreme Court's failure to conduct any meaningful review of the death sentence deprived petitioner of a safeguard that the Court has deemed indispensable to a constitutional capital sentencing scheme." For these reasons, Justice Marshall would have reversed the defendant's death sentence.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun, in brief fashion, stated that "[t]he errors and missteps—intentional or otherwise—come close to making a mockery of the Florida statute and are too much for me to condone." He believed that the Florida Supreme Court did not properly review the case and he would, therefore, reverse the defendant's death sentence.

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the Court of Appeals correctly denied a stay of execution of the defendant's death sentence pending appeal of the district court's judgment. (2) Whether the district court erred on the merits in rejecting the petition for habeas corpus filed by the defendant.

Case Holdings: (1) The Court of Appeals correctly denied a stay of execution of the defendant's death sentence pending appeal of the district court's judgment. (2) The district court did not err on the merits in rejecting the petition for habeas corpus filed by the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas Barefoot, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Texas. During the penalty phase proceeding, one of the questions submitted to the jury, as required by a Texas statute, was whether there was a probability that the defendant would commit further criminal acts of violence and would constitute a continuing threat to society. The prosecutor introduced evidence by two psychiatrists who testified that there was such a probability. The defendant was sentenced to death. On appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals rejected the defendant's contention that such use of psychiatric testimony at the sentencing hearing was unconstitutional and affirmed the conviction and sentence.

After exhausting State post-conviction remedies, the defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus in a federal district court, raising the same claim with respect to the use of psychiatric testimony. The district court rejected the claim and denied relief. The district court did, however, issue a certificate of probable cause, which was required in order for the defendant to appeal. While in the process of preparing his appeal, the defendant's execution date was approaching. The defendant filed an application for stay of execution with the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, but it denied the stay of execution. Shortly thereafter, a federal Court of Appeals also denied a stay of execution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the propriety of denying a stay of execution.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White first addressed the defendant's claim that the Court of Appeals should have granted his application for stay of execution pending appeal. The opinion concluded that the Court of Appeals did not err in refusing to stay the defendant's death sentence.

Justice White reasoned that although the Court of Appeals did not formally affirm the district court's judgment, there was no question that the Court of Appeals ruled on the merits of the appeal in the course of denying the stay. It was said that the parties, as directed, filed briefs and presented oral arguments, thus making it clear that the granting of a stay depended on the probability of success on the merits. Justice White noted that although the Court of Appeals moved swiftly to deny the stay, this did not mean that its treatment of the merits was cursory or inadequate.

Justice White went on to set out procedural guidelines for handling applications for stays of execution on habeas corpus appeals pursuant to a district court's issuance of a certificate of probable cause:

1. A certificate of probable cause requires more than a showing of the absence of frivolity of the appeal. The petitioner must make a substantial showing of the denial of a federal right, the severity of the penalty in itself not sufficing to warrant automatic issuance of a certificate.

2. When a certificate of probable cause is issued, the petitioner must be afforded an opportunity to address the merits, and the Court of Appeals must decide the merits.

3. A Court of Appeals may adopt expedited procedures for resolving the merits of habeas corpus appeals, notwithstanding the issuance of a certificate of probable cause, but local rules should be promulgated stating the manner in which such cases will be handled and informing counsel that the merits of the appeal may be decided on the motion for a stay.

4. Where there are second or successive federal habeas corpus petitions, it is proper for the District Court to expedite consideration of the petition, even where it cannot be concluded that the petition should be dismissed because it fails to allege new or different grounds for relief.

5. Stays of execution are not automatic pending the filing and consideration of a petition for certiorari from the Supreme Court to a Court of Appeals which has denied a writ of habeas corpus. Applications for stays must contain the information and materials necessary to make a careful assessment of the merits and so reliably to determine whether a plenary review and a stay are warranted. A stay of execution should first be sought from the Court of Appeals.

The opinion then turned to the issue of whether the district court correctly denied relief to the defendant. Justice White ruled that the district court did not err on the merits in denying the defendant's habeas corpus petition.

The opinion held that there was no merit to the defendant's argument that psychiatrists, individually and as a group, are incompetent to predict with an acceptable degree of reliability that a particular criminal will commit other crimes in the future and so represent a danger to the community. Justice White stated that to accept such an argument would call into question predictions of future behavior that are constantly made in other contexts. Moreover, he wrote, that despite the view of the American Psychiatric Association supporting the defendant's view, there is no convincing evidence that such testimony is almost entirely unreliable and that the factfinder and the adversary system will not be competent to uncover, recognize, and take due account of its shortcomings. The judgment of the district court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens acknowledged that procedural errors were made by the Court of Appeals, but that “since this Court has now reviewed the merits of [the defendant’s] appeal, and since I agree with the ultimate conclusion that the judgment of the district court must be affirmed, I join the Court’s judgment.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented strongly against the majority in this case. In doing so he accused the majority of fabricating matters to cover up the procedural errors of the Court of Appeals. The dissent stated its position as follows:

I cannot subscribe to the Court’s conclusion that the procedure followed by the Court of Appeals in this case was “not inconsistent with our cases.” Nor can I accept the notion that it would be proper for a court of appeals to adopt special “summary procedures” for capital cases. On the merits, I would vacate [the defendant’s] death sentence....

I frankly do not understand how the Court can conclude that the Court of Appeals’ treatment of this case was “tolerable.” If, as the Court says, the Court of Appeals was “obligated to decide the merits of the appeal,” it most definitely failed to discharge that obligation, for the court never ruled on [the defendant’s] appeal. It is simply false to say that “the Court of Appeals ruled on the merits of the appeal.” The record plainly shows that the Court of Appeals did no such thing. It neither dismissed the appeal as frivolous nor affirmed the judgment of the District Court. The Court of Appeals made one ruling and one ruling only: It refused to stay [the defendant’s] execution. Had this Court not granted a stay, [the defendant] would have been put to death without his appeal ever having been decided one way or the other.

The Court is flatly wrong in suggesting that any defect was merely technical because the Court of Appeals could have “verif[ied] the obvious by expressly affirming the judgment of the District Court” at the same time it denied a stay. The Court of Appeals’ failure to decide [the defendant’s] appeal was no oversight. The court simply had no authority to decide the appeal on the basis of the papers before it....

The Court offers no justification for the procedure followed by the Court of Appeals because there is none. A State has no legitimate interest in executing a prisoner before he has obtained full review of his sentence. A stay of execution pending appeal causes no harm to the State apart from the minimal burden of providing a jail cell for the prisoner for the period of time necessary to decide his appeal. By contrast, a denial of a stay on the basis of a hasty finding that the prisoner is not likely to succeed on his appeal permits the State to execute him prior to full review of a concededly substantial constitutional challenge to his sentence. If the court’s hurried evaluation of the appeal proves erroneous, as is entirely possible when difficult legal issues are decided without adequate time for briefing and full consideration, the execution of the prisoner will make it impossible to undo the mistake.

Once a federal judge has decided, as the District Judge did here, that a prisoner under sentence of death has raised a substantial constitutional claim, it is a travesty of justice to permit the State to execute him before his appeal can be considered and decided. If a prisoner’s statutory right to appeal means anything, a State simply cannot be allowed to kill him and thereby moot his appeal....

In view of the irreversible nature of the death penalty and the extraordinary number of death sentences that have been found to suffer from some constitutional infirmity, it would be grossly improper for a court of appeals to establish special summary procedures for capital cases. The only consolation I can find in today’s decision is that the primary responsibility for selecting the appropriate procedures for these appeals lies, as the Court itself points out, with the courts of appeals. Notwithstanding the profoundly disturbing attitude reflected in today’s opinion, I am hopeful that few circuit judges would ever support the adoption of procedures that would afford less consideration to an appeal in which a man’s life is at stake than to an appeal challenging an ordinary money judgment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Brennan and Marshall, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun dissented from the majority decision. He focused his dissent on the psychiatric evidence proffered at the defendant’s penalty phase hearing:

I agree with most of what Justice Marshall has said in his dissenting opinion. I, too, dissent, but I base my conclusion also on evidentiary factors that the Court rejects with some emphasis. The Court holds that psychiatric testimony about a defendant’s future dangerousness is admissible, despite the fact that such testimony is wrong two times out of three. The Court reaches this result — even in a capital case — because, it is said, the testimony is subject to cross-examination and impeachment. In the present state of psychiatric knowledge, this is too much for me. One may accept this in a routine lawsuit for money damages, but when a person’s life is at stake — no matter how heinous his offense — a requirement of greater reliability should prevail. In a capital case, the specious testimony of a psychiatrist, colored in the eyes of an impressionable jury by the inevitable untouchability of a medical specialist’s words, equates with death itself....

The American Psychiatric Association (APA), participating in this case as amicus curiae, informs us that “[t]he unreliability of psychiatric predictions of long-term future dangerousness is by now an established fact within the profession.” The APA’s best estimate is that two out of three predictions of long-term future violence made by psychiatrists are wrong. The Court does not dispute this proposition, and indeed it could not do so; the evidence is overwhelming.... Neither the Court nor the State of Texas has cited a single reputable scientific source contradicting the unanimous conclusion of professionals in this field that psychiatric predictions of long-term future violence are wrong more often than they are right....

It is impossible to square admission of this purportedly scientific but actually baseless testimony with the Constitution’s paramount concern for reliability in capital sentencing. Death is a permissible punishment in Texas only if the jury finds beyond a reasonable doubt that there is a probability the defendant will commit future acts of criminal violence. The admission of unreliable psychiatric predictions of future violence, offered with unabashed claims of “reasonable medical certainty” or “absolute” professional reliability, creates an intolerable danger that death sentences will be imposed erroneously.

Barfield, Velma Margie Velma Margie Barfield was executed for the capital murder of Stuart Taylor by the State of North Carolina on November 2, 1984. Barfield was the first woman executed by lethal injection and the first woman executed after the United States Supreme Court lifted the moratorium on capital punishment in the case of Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976).

Barfield and Taylor had been dating. On occasion, Barfield stayed with Taylor at his home in St. Pauls, North Carolina. On January 31, 1978, Taylor became ill and had violent vomiting and diarrhea. Taylor’s illness continued for two days before Barfield took him to a local hospital where he was treated. At the time he was examined by an emergency room physician, Taylor was complaining of nausea, vomiting, and diarrhea, as well as general pain in his muscles, chest, and abdomen. After receiving intravenous fluids and vitamins as well as other treatment, Taylor was released from the hospital and Barfield took him back to his home in St. Pauls, where she fed him.

The day after Taylor returned home, he became violently ill and was rushed back to the hospital in an ambulance. While he was in the hospital emergency room, Taylor was given intravenous fluids. A tracheotomy was performed but he died in the emergency room approximately one hour after he was brought in. Taylor’s family requested that an autopsy be performed. The autopsy of Taylor revealed his blood had an arsenic level of .13 milligrams percent. His liver had an arsenic level of one milligram percent. These findings led physicians to conclude that Taylor died from acute arsenic poisoning.

Velma Margie Barfield was the first woman executed by lethal injection and the first woman executed after the 1976 decision by the United States Supreme Court lifting the moratorium on capital punishment. She was executed by the State of North Carolina on November 2, 1984. (North Carolina Department of Corrections)

On March 10, 1978, police officers talked with Barfield. The conversation between Barfield and the police involved a number of Taylor's checks that had been forged. Barfield denied forging the checks during this interrogation. She then proceeded to deny that she was in any way involved with Taylor's death.

On March 13, 1978, Barfield returned to police headquarters. During this interrogation, she made a lengthy statement. In her statement, she admitted that she had forged some checks on Taylor's account, which he found out about when his bank statements came in the mail. Upon finding out about the forgeries, Taylor talked with her and threatened to turn her in to the authorities. Barfield indicated she purchased a bottle of Terro Ant Poison and put some of the poison in Taylor's tea and later put more of the substance in Taylor's beer. She stated that she gave Taylor the poison because she was afraid that he would turn her in for forgery. Barfield concluded her confession by revealing that she had given poison to three other persons besides Taylor and that they too had died.

During Barfield's trial for the murder of Taylor, evidence revealed that she poisoned John Henry Lee, an eighty-year-old man that she lived with and worked for as a housekeeper and nurse's aide in early 1977. Though no autopsy was performed at the time of Lee's death, his body was exhumed, pursuant to a court order, and an autopsy was performed. Toxicological screenings revealed that Lee's liver contained an arsenic level of 2.8 milligrams percent and the muscle tissue contained an arsenic level of 0.3 milligrams percent. Medical testimony concluded that Lee's death was caused by arsenic poisoning.

The trial evidence showed Barfield had poisoned Dolly Taylor Edwards. In early 1976, Barfield moved into the home of Edwards as a live-in helper. Edwards died on March 1, 1977. Though no autopsy was performed on the body of Edwards at the time of her death, pursuant to a court order, her body was exhumed and an autopsy was performed. During the autopsy, toxicological screenings were conducted on samples of Edwards' liver tissue and muscle tissue. In the liver tissue, there was found an arsenic level of 0.4 milligrams percent. In the muscle tissue, there was found an arsenic level of .08 milligrams percent. Medical testimony concluded that Edwards' death was caused by arsenic poisoning.

Finally, trial evidence revealed that Barfield had poisoned her mother, Lillie McMillan Bullard. Her mother died on December 30, 1974. Pursuant to a court order, the body of her mother was exhumed for an autopsy. Medical testimony revealed that Bullard's hair sample had an arsenic concentration of 0.6 milligrams percent, muscle tissue had an arsenic level of 0.3 milligrams percent, and skin samples had an arsenic level of 0.1 milligrams percent. It was concluded that Bullard's death was caused by arsenic poisoning.

Although Barfield did not admit any involvement in the death of her husband, Jennings L. Barfield, his body was exhumed, pursuant to a court order, and an autopsy was performed. Toxicological screenings indicated that varying levels of arsenic were present in his body tissue. Medical testimony concluded that the cause of Mr. Barfield's death was arsenic poisoning. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Issue Presented: Whether the federal Court of Appeals correctly found that the decision in Mills v. Maryland, 486 U.S. 367 (1988), applied retroactively to the defendant's case.

Case Holding: The federal Court of Appeals incorrectly found that the decision in Mills v. Maryland, 486 U.S. 367 (1988), applied retroactively to the defendant's case.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Pennsylvania prosecuted the defendant, George Banks, for the murder of twelve people in 1982. Banks was found guilty of all twelve murders and sentenced to death. The convictions and death sentences were affirmed on direct appeal. Banks eventually filed a state habeas corpus proceeding. In that petition, Banks alleged that his death sentences should be reversed under a decision rendered by the United States Supreme Court in Mills v. Maryland, 486 U.S. 367 (1988). The Mills decision stated that a sentencing jury could not be required to unanimously agree that a mitigating circumstance was shown by a defendant, in order to give weight to it. Banks argued that his sentencing jury was instructed to find unanimously a mitigating circumstance. The state habeas trial court rejected Banks' argument. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court affirmed.

Banks subsequently filed a federal habeas petition alleging a Mills violation. A federal district judge rejected the argument. A federal Court of Appeals found that Banks established a Mills violation and therefore vacated his death sentences. In making its decision, the Court of Appeals, over the prosecutor's objections, refused to perform an analysis to determine whether Mills applied retroactively. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari, summarily reversed the decision, and remanded the case for the Court of Appeals to perform retroactivity analysis. On remand, the Court of Appeals found that Mills applied retroactively to the case. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas held that Mills did not apply retroactive to the defendant's case. In so ruling, the opinion gave the following justification:

[The] bar on retroactive application of new rules of constitutional criminal procedure has two exceptions. First, the bar does not apply to rules forbidding punishment of certain primary conduct or to rules prohibiting a certain category of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense. There is no argument that this exception applies here. The second exception is for watershed rules of criminal procedure implicating the fundamental fairness and accuracy of the criminal proceeding.

We have repeatedly emphasized the limited scope of the second ... exception, explaining that it is clearly meant to apply only to a small core of rules requiring observance of those procedures that ... are implicit in the concept of ordered liberty. And, because any qualifying rule would be so central to an accurate determination of innocence or guilt that it is unlikely that many such components of basic due process have yet to emerge, it should come as no surprise that we have yet to find a new rule that falls under the second ... exception....

However laudable the Mills rule might be, it ... applies fairly narrowly and works no fundamental shift in our understanding of the bedrock procedural elements essential to fundamental fairness. We therefore conclude that the Mills rule does not fall within the second ... exception.

The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the defendant's death sentences were reinstated.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that the Mills decision did not announce a new rule of law and therefore should have been applied to the defendant's case.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Ginsburg, J., Joined: Justice Souter dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that even if Mills announced a new rule, it should have been applied retroactively to the defendant's case. See also Horn v. Banks; Mills v. Beauchamp, Jereboam Orville Jereboam Orville Beauchamp (b. 1802) was a Glasgow, Kentucky, lawyer who was hanged for the murder of Solomon P. Sharp, a former congressman, state attorney general, and, at the time of his death, a member-elect of the Kentucky House of Representatives. Beauchamp's crime was centered around the woman he eventually married, Ann Cook.

In 1820, Cook gave birth to a stillborn child, whose father was reported to be Sharp. Shortly after the child died, Beauchamp began a relationship with Cook and asked her to marry him. Cook agreed to marry Beauchamp on the condition that he kill Sharp. Cook was angry with Sharp because Sharp had refused to marry her (he was already married) and had spoken slanderously about her. Beauchamp agreed to kill Sharp and, in the autumn of 1821, he went to Sharp's home in Frankfort, Kentucky, for that purpose. However, Sharp refused to engage in a duel with Beauchamp. Consequently, Beauchamp returned to his home in Glasgow.

Beauchamp continued to see Cook once he returned home. After being admitted to the Kentucky bar in early 1824, Beauchamp married Cook in June of that year. Later that same year, a rumor was spread to smear Sharp, who was running for the Kentucky House of Representatives. The rumor involved Sharp's affair with Cook. Beauchamp learned of the rumor and became enraged at Sharp.

Beauchamp's rage over the rumor caused him to seek out Sharp again. During the early morning hours of November 6, 1825, Beauchamp knocked at Sharp's door. When Sharp answered, Beauchamp plunged a knife into Sharp's chest and killed him.

Shortly after Sharp was killed, Beauchamp was arrested and charged with the murder. He was found guilty and, on May 19, 1826, he was sentenced to death. While Beauchamp sat in jail waiting to be executed, the jail officials permitted Cook to stay with him. On two occasions, Beauchamp and Cook attempted suicide while in jail. The first attempt was through the use of poison. When the poison failed to kill them, they waited until the appointed day of execution to make a second attempt using a knife. On July 7, 1826, the execution day, Beauchamp and Cook stabbed themselves; however, neither died immediately. Jail officials took Beauchamp to the gallows bleeding from his knife wound and executed him. Cook died from her knife wound around the time that the rope was being placed on Beauchamp's neck. Beauchamp and Cook were eventually buried in the same grave.

Issue Presented: Whether a sentence of death may constitutionally be imposed after a jury verdict of guilt of a capital offense, when the jury was not permitted to consider a verdict of guilt of a lesser included, non-capital offense for which evidence was presented to support such a verdict.

Case Holding: The death sentence may not constitutionally be imposed after a jury verdict of guilt of a capital offense where the jury was not permitted to consider a verdict of guilt of a lesser included, no-capital offense, for which evidence was presented to support such a verdict.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Beck, was charged with capital murder by the State of Alabama. At the time of the prosecution, Alabama's death penalty statute provided that the trial judge was prohibited from giving the guilt phase jury the option of convicting the defendant of any lesser included offense. Instead, the jury had either to convict the defendant of the capital crime or to acquit him.

During the trial, the defendant presented evidence to show that he was guilty of a lesser included offense to capital murder. However, because of Alabama's statute, the trial court refused to instruct the jury that they could return a verdict of guilt of a lesser included offense. The defendant was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. The Alabama appellate courts upheld the conviction and death sentence after rejecting the defendant's contention that the statutory prohibition on lesser included offense instructions violated the U.S. Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens held that a death sentence may not constitutionally be imposed after a jury verdict of guilt of a capital offense where the jury was not permitted to consider a verdict of guilt of a lesser included offense. The opinion reasoned that providing the jury with the option of convicting on a lesser included offense gave assurances that the jury would accord the defendant the full benefit of the reasonable doubt standard. It was said that when the evidence establishes that the defendant is guilty of a serious and violent offense, but leaves some doubt as to an element justifying conviction of a capital offense, the failure to give the jury such a lesser included instruction inevitably enhances the risk of an unwarranted conviction. Justice Stevens ruled that such a risk could not be tolerated in a case in which the defendant's life was at stake. Accordingly, the judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was reversed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued a concurring statement indicating that although he joined the Court's opinion, he "continue[d] to believe that the death penalty is, in all circumstances, contrary to the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against imposition of cruel and unusual punishments."

Concurring Statement by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall's concurring statement indicated that he "continue[d] to believe that the death penalty is, under all circumstances, cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist, in Which White, J., Joined: Justice Rehnquist indicated in his dissent that he could not join the majority decision because the issue it resolved was not properly before the Court. The dissent pointed out that while the defendant presented the issue to the Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals, he did not present the issue to the Alabama Supreme Court. Justice Rehnquist wrote: "I do not believe it suffices, under the jurisdiction granted to us by the Constitution and by Congress, to brush this matter off as the Court does in [a] footnote ... on the grounds that [the defendant] presented his claim 'in some fashion' to the Supreme Court of Alabama."

Becker, Charles Charles Becker was born and raised in the town of Callicoon Center, New York, in 1870. Becker moved to New York City around 1888. He spent his first few years in the City doing odd jobs before he was hired in 1893 as a police officer with the New York Police Department. As a police officer, Becker was known to abuse his authority by falsely arresting and beating citizens. In spite of (or perhaps because of) his record as a "bad cop," Becker eventually rose to the rank of lieutenant around 1910. It was in 1910 that Becker was placed in charge of a special unit to combat gang violence and corruption. It was from this position that Becker used his power to "shake down" gangsters and others engaged in illegal activities. One of the people for whom Becker provided protection was a gambler named Herman Rosenthal. The relationship of Becker and Rosenthal was set out by the New York Court of Appeals in the case of People v. Becker, 104 N.E. 396 (N.Y. 1914), as follows:

It is charged that in the [first] part of the year 1912 [Becker] entered into a partnership with Rosenthal for the equipment and maintenance of a gambling house...; that subsequently Rosenthal became enraged at

Becker because of the conduct of the latter especially in leading a raid on the house and breaking up his business, and thereafter sought to destroy Becker's standing and official character by approaching in turn the newspapers, the mayor, the police authorities, and the district attorney with information of his unlawful relations to the gambling business; that Becker, becoming alarmed by these attempts, formed the purpose of having Rosenthal murdered, and secured promises of help to that end from three gamblers and criminals [Jack Rose, Bridgie Webber, and Harry Vallon], the murder compact between them being struck at a meeting held in a vacant lot in Harlem at night some time in June; that these last-named individuals, after various delays and excuses, through the assistance of others [Jacob Seidenshner, Frank Cirofici, Louis Rosenberg, and Harry Harowitz]..., finally consummated the plan and procured the murder of Rosenthal.

Becker's plan to have Rosenthal murdered was carried out during the early morning hours of July 16, 1912. On that morning Rosenthal was shot to death on the streets of Manhattan by members of the Lenox Avenue Gang, Seidenshner, Cirofici, Rosenberg and Harowitz.

As a result of cooperation by Rose, Webber and Vallon, the police arrested Becker and the Lenox Avenue Gang. Becker was tried first on October 12, 1912. A jury convicted him of ordering Rosenthal's murder and he was sentenced to death. Shortly after Becker's trial, Seidenshner, Cirofici, Rosenberg, and Harowitz went to trial. All four men were found guilty of killing Rosenthal and sentenced to death.

Subsequent to the trial of the Lenox Avenue Gang, the New York Court of Appeals reversed Becker's conviction and ordered a new trial. Prior to the start of Becker's new trial, Seidenshner, Cirofici, Rosenberg, and Harowitz were executed by electrocution on April 13, 1914. Becker's second trial was held on May 6, 1914. At the conclusion of the trial, Becker was again found guilty and sentenced to death. The second conviction withstood attack and on July 30, 1915, Becker was executed by electrocution.

Beets, Betty Lou Betty Lou Beets was born on March 12, 1937. By the time Betty Lou was forty-seven years old, she had been married five times. On August 6, 1983, a boat belonging to Betty Lou's fifth husband, Jimmy Beets, was found drifting empty on Texas's Cedar Creek Lake. The boat was retrieved by strangers in the area. After searching the boat they found a fishing license bearing Jimmy Beets' name. Authorities were notified and an investigation followed. After going through a telephone book, authorities made contact with Jimmy Beets' home and spoke with Betty Lou. Shortly after speaking with law enforcement officials, Betty Lou came to the lake and identified the boat as belonging to her husband.

An extended search was made in the lake in an effort to find Jimmy Beets' body, but authorities were not successful. No immediate suspicion of foul play was directed at Betty Lou, although authorities quickly learned that she had a $110,000 life insurance policy on her husband. Without locating Jimmy Beets' body, Betty Lou could not collect the life insurance money until seven years had passed from the date of her husband's disappearance.

Betty Lou Beets was executed by the State of Texas on February 24, 2000. Her death marked the first execution of an American woman in the twenty-first century. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

Two years after Jimmy Beets disappeared, authorities received information that linked Betty Lou to the disappearance of her husband. On June 8, 1985, Betty Lou was arrested and a search warrant issued that permitted authorities to dig up the ground around her home. Pursuant to the execution of the search warrant, physical remains of the bodies of Jimmy Beets and Doyle Wayne Barker, another former husband of Betty Lou, were found at different locations near her home. Jimmy Beets' remains were found buried in a "wishing well," which was located in the front yard of the residence. Barker's remains were found buried under a storage shed located in the backyard of the residence. Two bullets were recovered from Jimmy Beets' remains. The remains of the two bodies were transported to the Dallas Forensic Science Laboratory, where they were subsequently identified as being the remains of the bodies of Jimmy Beets and Barker.

Betty Lou was indicted for the capital murder of Jimmy Beets. During the trial, her son, Robert Franklin Branson, testified against her. According to Branson, he was living with his mother and Jimmy Beets in 1983. Branson stated that on August 6, 1983, his mother told him that she was going to kill Jimmy Beets that evening. Branson testified that he left the home for two hours because he did not want to be present when the crime occurred. After Branson returned to the residence, he assisted Betty Lou in placing Jimmy Beets' body in the "wishing well." Branson testified that the next day he took Jimmy Beets' boat onto the lake to make it appear as though Jimmy Beets had fallen into the lake and drowned. Branson testified that he knew of Barker, but had only seen him one time and that he did not live with his mother and Barker when they were married and lived together.

There was also trial testimony against Betty Lou by her daughter, Shirley Stegner. Stegner testified that several weeks after Jimmy Beets' reported disappearance, Betty Lou confided in her that he was buried in the "wishing well." Stegner also testified that in October 1981, when her mother and Barker were married and living together, Betty Lou told her that she was going to kill Barker. Approximately three days later, Betty Lou told Stegner "she waited until [Barker] went to sleep and then she got the gun and covered it with a pillow and pulled the trigger and when she pulled the trigger, the pillow [interfered] with the firing pin, so she hesitated for a minute, afraid that [Barker] was going to wake up, and she cocked the gun again and fired and shot him in the head." Stegner testified that she assisted her mother in disposing of Barker's body.

Betty Lou was found guilty of murdering Jimmy Beets and was sentenced to death. On direct appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. Betty Lou was executed by lethal injection on February 24, 2000. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Belarus Capital punishment is carried out in Belarus. Belarus uses the firing squad as the method of execution. Its legal system is based on civil law. Belarus's constitution became effective on November 17, 1996. Belarus has a government in which nearly all power is concentrated in the president. Consequently, the judiciary is not independent.

The criminal justice system of Belarus has three tiers: district courts, regional courts, and a supreme court. In 1994, a constitutional court was established to adjudicate constitutional issues. The Constitutional Court has no means to enforce its decisions.

Generally, defendants are not entitled to a jury trial in Belarus. The only exception occurs in capital offense cases. Defendants charged with capital crimes may demand trial by jury. Criminal defendants have a right to a public trial, right to counsel, and a right to confront witnesses. The law establishes a presumption of innocence. Both the defendant and prosecutor have the right to appeal. The prosecutor may appeal an acquittal and obtain a retrial on the same charge. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Belgium Belgium officially abolished capital punishment in 1996. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Belize Belize imposes the death penalty. Belize utilizes hanging as the method of execution. Its legal system is based on English law. The nation's constitution was adopted on September 21, 1981.

The Belizean legal system is composed of magistrate courts, supreme court (trial court), and Court of Appeal. In cases involving the interpretation of the nation's constitution, appeals may be taken to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England.

Defendants have constitutional rights to presumption of innocence, protection against self-incrimination, double jeopardy, legal counsel, a public trial, and appeal. Legal counsel for indigent defendants is provided by the government only for capital offenses. Trial by jury is mandatory in capital cases. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the federal Court of Appeals applied the correct legal standard in finding the defendant suffered ineffective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase.

Case Holding: The federal Court of Appeals applied the wrong legal standard in finding the defendant suffered ineffective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Gary B. Cone, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Tennessee for the 1980 murders of Shipley and Cleopatra Todd. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal. The defendant then filed a State habeas corpus petition, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase, on the grounds that his attorney failed to put on mitigating evidence and waived the right to make a final argument. The state habeas petition was denied. The defendant later filed a second state habeas petition, which was also denied. Eventually, the defendant filed a federal habeas petition alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. A federal district court dismissed the petition. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed the sentencing aspect of the district court's judgment and vacated the death sentence. The Court of Appeals found that the State courts applied the wrong legal standard when they reviewed the issue. The Court of Appeals determined that under the proper standard, there was a presumption that the defendant suffered prejudice because of his attorney's ineffective assistance. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider whether the Court of Appeals applied the correct legal standard.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Chief Justice Rehnquist: The Chief Justice held that ordinarily there is no presumption of prejudice in a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. The opinion stated that there are only a few situations in which a presumption of prejudice arises in a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, and that this case did not fall into the narrow exceptions. As to the merits of the issue, the opinion found that the defendant did not establish ineffective assistance of counsel merely because his attorney did not put on specific types of mitigating evidence and waived the right to closing argument. The opinion addressed each matter as follows:

[Cone] also assigned error in his counsel's decision not to recall his mother. While counsel recognized that [Cone's] mother could have provided further information about [Cone's] childhood and spoken of her love for him, he concluded that she had not made a good witness at the guilt stage, and he did not wish to subject her to further cross-examination. [Cone] advances no argument that would call his attorney's assessment into question.

In his trial preparations, counsel investigated the possibility of calling other witnesses. He thought [Cone's] sister, who was closest to him, might make a good witness, but she did not want to testify. And even if she had agreed, putting her on the stand would have allowed the prosecutor to question her about the fact that [Cone] called her from the Todds' house just after the killings. After consulting with his client, counsel opted not to call [Cone] himself as a witness. And we think counsel had sound tactical reasons for deciding against it. [Cone] said he was very angry with the prosecutor and thought he might lash out if pressed on cross-examination, which could have only alienated him in the eyes of the jury. There was also the possibility of calling other witnesses from his childhood or days in the Army. But counsel feared that the prosecution might elicit information about [Cone's] criminal history. He further feared that testimony about [Cone's] normal youth might, in the jury's eyes, cut the other way....

When the junior prosecutor delivered a very matter-of-fact closing that did not dwell on any of the brutal aspects of the crime, counsel was faced with a choice. He could make a closing argument and reprise for the jury, perhaps in greater detail than his opening, the primary mitigating evidence concerning his client's drug dependency and posttraumatic stress from Vietnam. And he could plead again for life for his client and impress upon the jurors the importance of what he believed were less significant facts, such as the Bronze Star decoration or his client's expression of remorse. But he knew that if he took this opportunity, he would give the lead prosecutor, who all agreed was very persuasive, the chance to depict his client as a heartless killer just before the jurors began deliberation. Alternatively, counsel could prevent the lead prosecutor from arguing by waiving his own summation and relying on the jurors' familiarity with the case and his opening plea for life made just a few hours before. Neither option, it seems to us, so clearly outweighs the other that it was objectively unreasonable for the Tennessee Court of Appeals to deem counsel's choice to waive argument a tactical decision about which competent lawyers might disagree.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded for further consideration.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens dissented from the judgment of the Court. He argued that the facts of the case fit one of the exceptions that permit a presumption of prejudice to arise. Specifically, Justice Stevens contended that by failing to present all mitigating evidence and a closing argument, the defendant's attorney "entirely failed to subject the prosecution's case to meaningful adversarial testing," which raises a presumption of prejudice. *See also Bell v. Issue Presented: Whether the Court of Appeals failed to give deference to the State court's construction of the penalty phase aggravating circumstance of heinous, atrocious and cruel.

Case Holding: The Court of Appeals failed to give deference to the State court's construction of the penalty phase aggravating circumstance of heinous, atrocious and cruel.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: In 1982, Gary B. Cone was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Tennessee for the 1980 murders of Shipley and Cleopatra Todd. The judgment was affirmed on direct appeal. The defendant then filed two State habeas corpus petitions, which were denied. The defendant later filed a second state habeas petition, which was also denied. Eventually, the defendant filed a federal habeas petition alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. A federal district court dismissed the petition. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed the sentencing aspect of the district court's judgment and vacated the death sentence. The Court of Appeals found that the defendant was presumptively prejudiced during the penalty phase, because of his attorney's failure to put on certain mitigating evidence and to present a closing argument. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari, Bell v. Cone, 535 U.S. 685 (2002), reversed the decision of the Court of Appeals, and remanded the case. While the case was on remand, the Court of Appeals selected another issue as a basis for setting aside the death sentence. The Court of Appeals held that one of the aggravating circumstances found by the jury to impose the death penalty was unconstitutionally vague. The vague aggravating circumstance was "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel." It was said by the Court of Appeals that the Tennessee Supreme Court failed to give a narrow construction to the aggravator that the State high court established in another case. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider whether the Court of Appeals gave proper deference to the decision of the State high court.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court found that the Court of Appeals failed to give the proper deference to the decision of the State high court. The opinion reasoned as follows:

In this case [the Court of Appeals] rejected the possibility that the Tennessee Supreme Court cured any error in the jury instruction by applying a narrowing construction of the statutory "heinous, atrocious, or cruel" aggravator. The court asserted that the State Supreme Court did not apply, or even mention, any narrowing interpretation or cite to [State v. Dicks, 615 S.W.2d 126 (1981)], the case in which the State Supreme Court had adopted a narrowing construction of the aggravating circumstance....

We do not think that a federal court can presume so lightly that a state court failed to apply its own law. As we have said before, [our habeas statute] dictates a highly deferential standard for evaluating state-court rulings, which demands that state-court decisions be given the benefit of the doubt. To the extent that the Court of Appeals rested its decision on the state court's failure to cite Dicks, it was mistaken. Federal courts are not free to presume that a state court did not comply with constitutional dictates on the basis of nothing more than a lack of citation.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded for further consideration.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Ginsburg, in Which Souter and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Ginsburg joined the majority opinion. She wrote separately to point out that she believed the decision in the case had limited application and should not be taken to mean that federal courts must assume that all omitted relevant issues in a State court opinion were considered by such court. Issue Presented: Whether the Ohio death penalty statute violated the Constitution because it prevented the penalty phase judges from considering relevant non-statutory mitigating evidence.

Case Holding: The Ohio death penalty statute violated the Constitution because it prevented the penalty phase judges from considering relevant non-statutory mitigating evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Willie Lee Bell, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Ohio. Under the death penalty statute of the State, the defendant was limited to presenting mitigating circumstances delineated in the statute. During the penalty phase, a three-judge panel sentenced the defendant to death after refusing to consider the particular circumstances of his crime and aspects of his character and record as mitigating factors. The Ohio Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence and rejected the defendant's contention that he had a constitutional right to have non-statutory mitigating circumstances presented and considered. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Burger Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Stewart, Powell and Stevens, JJ., Joined: The Chief Justice found that the Constitution accorded the defendant the right to present and have considered all relevant mitigating evidence. The opinion stated in summary fashion: "For the reasons stated in ... our opinion in Lockett v. Ohio, we have concluded that 'the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments require that the sentencer, in all but the rarest kind of capital case, not be precluded from considering, as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the offense that the defendant proffers.' We also concluded that '[t]he Ohio death penalty statute does not permit the type of individualized consideration of mitigating factors' that is required by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. We therefore agree with Bell's contention." The judgment of Ohio Supreme Court was reversed.

Issue Presented: Whether a federal Court of Appeals may withhold issuance of its mandate five months after the denial of certiorari by the United States Supreme Court.

Case Holding: A federal Court of Appeals cannot withhold issuance of its mandate five months after the denial of certiorari by the United States Supreme Court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Gregory Thompson, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Tennessee for the 1985 killing of Brenda Blanton Lane. The conviction and sentence were upheld on direct appeal and during a State habeas corpus proceeding. The defendant eventually filed a federal habeas petition, alleging that his trial counsel was ineffective in failing to present evidence of his mental instability during the penalty phase. A federal district court denied habeas relief. A federal Court of Appeals issued an opinion affirming the district judge's decision. However, the Court of Appeals stayed issuance of its mandate until the United States Supreme Court considered the case. The Supreme Court issued an order denying certiorari. The defendant thereafter asked the Court of Appeals to continue the stay of its mandate pending application for rehearing before the Supreme Court. The Court of Appeals granted the request. The Supreme Court eventually denied rehearing. Five months after the Supreme Court denied rehearing, the Court of Appeals issued an amended opinion that reversed the district court's decision and awarded the defendant a full evidentiary hearing before the district court. The Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider whether the Court of Appeals acted properly.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy found that the Court of Appeals could not withhold issuance of its mandate after the Supreme Court denied rehearing without issuing a formal stay of the mandate. The opinion addressed the issue as follows:

Prominent among our concerns is the length of time between this Court's denial of certiorari and the Court of Appeals' issuance of its amended opinion. We denied Thompson's petition for certiorari in December 2003 and his petition for rehearing one month later. From this last denial, however, the Court of Appeals delayed issuing its mandate for over five months, releasing its amended opinion in June.

The consequence of delay for the State's criminal justice system was compounded by the Court of Appeals' failure to issue an order or otherwise give notice to the parties that the court was reconsidering its earlier opinion. The Court of Appeals had issued two earlier orders staying its mandate.... Tennessee, acting in reliance on the Court of Appeals' earlier orders and our denial of certiorari and rehearing, could assume that the mandate would — indeed must — issue. While it might have been prudent for the State to verify that the mandate had issued, it is understandable that it proceeded to schedule an execution date. Thompson, after all, had not sought an additional stay of the mandate, and the Court of Appeals had given no indication that it might be revisiting its earlier decision....

The Court of Appeals could have spared the parties and the state judicial system considerable time and resources if it had notified them that it was reviewing its original panel decision. After we denied Thompson's petition for rehearing, Tennessee scheduled his execution date. This, in turn, led to various proceedings in state and federal court to determine Thompson's present competency to be executed. All of these steps were taken in reliance on the mistaken impression that Thompson's first federal habeas case was final....

Tennessee expended considerable time and resources in seeking to enforce a capital sentence rendered 20 years ago, a sentence that reflects the judgment of the citizens of Tennessee that Thompson's crimes merit the ultimate punishment. By withholding the mandate for months — based on evidence that supports only an arguable constitutional claim — while the State prepared to carry out Thompson's sentence, the Court of Appeals did not accord the appropriate level of respect to that judgment.

The decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the district court's decision denying relief was reinstated.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Breyer, in Which Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg, JJ., Joined: Justice Breyer dissented from the majority's decision. In doing so, he argued two points. First, the dissent took the position that "the Federal Rules themselves neither set an unchangeable deadline for issuance of a mandate nor require notice when the court enlarges the time for issuance." Second, Justice Breyer believed that the decision of the Court of Appeals should not have been disturbed, because the defendant presented a meritorious claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the penalty phase. See also Calderon v. Thompson; Mandate Bench Conference A bench conference refers to a meeting at the judge's bench, with the parties and the judge, during a jury trial. The purpose of a bench conference is to permit an issue to be discussed with and resolved by the judge without the jury hearing the issue. A defendant has a constitutional right to be personally present at a bench conference.

Bench Trial A capital offender may waive the right to trial by jury, but nonetheless have a trial. A trial without a jury is called a bench trial. The factfinder in a bench trial is the presiding judge. In a capital prosecution, the issue of a bench trial involves two separate trial proceedings: (1) guilt phase proceeding and (2) penalty phase proceeding.

1. Guilt Phase Proceeding. All capital punishment jurisdictions afford a capital offender the privilege of waiving the right to trial by jury at the guilt phase and having a guilt phase bench trial instead. A guilt phase bench trial is deemed a privilege because the United States Supreme Court held in Singer v. United States, 380 U.S. 24 (1965), that there was no constitutional right to a guilt phase bench trial. A guilt phase bench trial usually will not occur unless three factors are met: (1) the capital felon validly waives his or her right to trial by jury, (2) the prosecutor consents to trial by the bench, and (3) the judge agrees to holding a bench trial. Two jurisdictions, Connecticut and Ohio, require that a capital punishment guilt phase bench trial be presided over by a three-judge panel. In all other jurisdictions, a single judge sits as factfinder in a guilt phase bench trial.

2. Penalty Phase Proceeding.

In Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002), the United States Supreme Court held that the federal Constitution requires that a jury determine the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances at the penalty phase. The decision in Ring did not preclude a defendant from waiving the right to a jury trial at the penalty phase.

Consequently, a judge may determine the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances at the penalty phase, when there has been a valid waiver of the right to a jury. See also Jury Trial; Ring v. Arizona

John Joubert was sentenced to death by a three-judge panel in Nebraska. Under current United States Supreme Court law, Joubert was entitled to have a jury decide his punishment. Joubert was executed by electrocution on July 17, 1996. (Sarpy County Sheriff)

Benin Capital punishment is permitted in Benin. Benin uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. The legal system of Benin is based on French civil law and customary law. The constitution of Benin was adopted on December 2, 1990.

Benin is a democratic government headed by a president and a unicameral legislature. Benin's constitution provides for an independent judiciary. The judicial structure of Benin includes a civilian court system that operates on the national and provincial levels. The nation has a supreme court that is the last resort in all administrative and judicial matters. There is also a constitutional court that is charged with passing on the constitutionality of laws and disputes between the president and the National Assembly and with resolving disputes regarding presidential and National Assembly elections.

Under the constitution of Benin, a defendant has a right to a public trial. A defendant enjoys the presumption of innocence, the right to be present at trial, the right to representation by retained or appointed legal counsel, and the right to confront witnesses. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the United States had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for murder committed on the Fort Leavenworth military reservation.

Case Holding: The United States had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for murder committed on the Fort Leavenworth military reservation, even though the crime occurred on a portion of the reservation that was not used for military purposes.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Benson, was charged by the United States with committing capital murder on the Fort Leavenworth military reservation in Kansas. At the trial the defendant unsuccessfully argued that the federal government did not have jurisdiction over the area in which the crime occurred and therefore could not prosecute him. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death by a federal district court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue of jurisdiction.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer held that the Fort Leavenworth military reservation was within the territorial boundaries of the State of Kansas, and was not excepted from the jurisdiction of the State when the State was admitted to the Union. However, in 1875, the legislature of the State of Kansas passed an act which relinquished jurisdiction to the United States over the territory of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation. Justice Brewer noted that it was “competent for the legislature of a state to cede exclusive jurisdiction over places needed by the general government in the execution of its powers, the use of the places being, in fact, as much for the people of the state as for the people of the United States generally.”

The decision rejected the defendant’s argument that jurisdiction over the area only passed to such portions of the reserve as were actually used for military purposes by the federal government. The defendant had contended that the crime charged was committed on land used solely for farming purposes. Justice Brewer responded: “But in matters of that kind the courts follow the action of the political department of the government. The entire tract had been legally reserved for military purposes. The character and purposes of its occupation having been officially and legally established by that branch of the government which has control over such matters, it is not open to the courts, on a question of jurisdiction, to inquire what may be the actual uses to which any portion of the reserve is temporarily put.” The judgment of the federal district court was affirmed. See also Jurisdiction

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was entitled to habeas relief as a result of the New Jersey Supreme Court’s refusal to hear his appeal.

Case Holding: The defendant was not entitled to habeas relief as a result of the New Jersey Supreme Court’s refusal to hear his appeal because the Constitution does not require States create appellate courts.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, August Bergemann, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of New Jersey. The defendant filed an appeal with the New Jersey Supreme Court, but the appellate court refused to hear the case. The defendant then filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court, alleging his constitutional rights were violated because the State’s appellate court refused to hear his appeal. The petition was dismissed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan held that the defendant did not have a right under the federal constitution to have his case reviewed by the State’s appellate court. It was said that appellate review of a criminal case was not required by the Constitution. Justice Harlan observed that the degree to which a State provides appellate review is a matter firmly controlled by the State. The opinion concluded: “the refusal of the courts of New Jersey to grant the accused [an appeal] ... constituted no reason for interference in his behalf by a writ of habeas corpus issued by a court of the United States.” The judgment of the federal district court was affirmed.

Issue Presented: Whether the president had authority to commute the defendant’s death sentence to life imprisonment without the consent of the defendant.

Case Holding: The president had authority to commute the defendant’s death sentence to life imprisonment without the consent of the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Vuko Perovich, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. An appeal was filed on behalf of the defendant to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the conviction was invalid because the prosecutor failed to prove the identity of the victim of the crime. The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment in Perovich v. United States.

On June 5, 1909, President Taft executed a document commuting the defendant's sentence to imprisonment for life in a penitentiary. The defendant eventually filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court, alleging that the commutation of his sentence and removal to a penitentiary were without his consent. The district court agreed and granted habeas relief. An appeal was taken by the government to a federal Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals thereafter certified the following question to the United States Supreme Court: Did the president have authority to commute the sentence of the defendant from death to life imprisonment?

Opinion of the Court by Justice Holmes: Justice Holmes observed that the answer to the certified question was entangled in the defendant's contention that the president could not commute the sentence without the defendant's consent. Both the certified question and the defendant's contention were addressed as follows:

We will not go into history, but we will say a word about the principles of pardons in the law of the United States. A pardon in our days is not a private act of grace from an individual happening to possess power. It is a part of the constitutional scheme. When granted it is the determination of the ultimate authority that the public welfare will be better served by inflicting less than what the judgment fixed. Just as the original punishment would be imposed without regard to the prisoner's consent and in the teeth of his will, whether he liked it or not, the public welfare, not his consent determines what shall be done. So far as a pardon legitimately cuts down a penalty it affects the judgment imposing it. No one doubts that a reduction of the term of an imprisonment or the amount of a fine would limit the sentence effectively on the one side and on the other would leave the reduced term or fine valid and to be enforced, and that the convict's consent is not required.

When we come to the commutation of death to imprisonment for life it is hard to see how consent has any more to do with it than it has in the cases first put. Supposing that Perovich did not accept the change, he could not have got himself hanged against the Executive order. Supposing that he did accept, he could not affect the judgment to be carried out. The considerations that led to the modification had nothing to do with his will. The only question is whether the substituted punishment was authorized by law — here, whether the change is within the scope of the words of the Constitution, article 2, 2:

We cannot doubt that the power extends to this case. By common understanding imprisonment for life is a less penalty than death.... The opposite answer would permit the President to decide that justice requires the diminution of a term or a fine without consulting the convict, but would deprive him of the power in the most important cases and require him to permit an execution which he had decided ought not to take place unless the change is agreed to by one who on no sound principle ought to have any voice in what the law should do for the welfare of the whole.

The certified question was answered in the affirmative.

Case Note: Chief Justice Taft, who took no part in the case, was the president who commuted the defendant's death sentence. See also Certified Question; Clemency; Perovich v. United States

Bifurcation of Guilt and Penalty Phases see Trial Structure

Bill of Attainder Clause In Article I, Section 9.3 of the federal Constitution, it is expressly stated that “[n]o Bill of Attainder ... shall be passed.” The Bill of Attainder Clause has been interpreted as prohibiting legislatures from enacting laws that impose capital punishment without any conviction within the ordinary course of a judicial proceeding.

Capital felons have unsuccessfully argued that when jurisdictions enact legislation providing for alternative methods of execution, such laws violate the Bill of Attainder Clause. This argument has always been made in the context of a pending constitutional attack on the existing method of execution used by a jurisdiction. That is, capital felons contend that by enacting legislation creating an alternative method of execution while a capital felon has a pending challenge to the constitutionality of the existing method of execution, the new law effectively moots the pending constitutional challenge on the existing method of execution. Courts have consistently ruled that this reasoning stretches the meaning and intent of the Bill of Attainder Clause and, therefore, it has been uniformly rejected. See also Ex Post Facto Clause

Bill of Particulars A bill of particulars is a legal device that a defendant will utilize when he or she needs detailed information about the crime charged against him or her. In practice, a charging instrument will only set out the bare facts that puts a defendant on notice of the charge against him or her. Details such as exact dates, places, types of instrument used, or victim identification are matters which a defendant may request through a bill of particulars.

Bill of Rights The first ten amendments to the United States Constitution are called the Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights enumerates basic Anglo-American civil liberties that cannot be infringed upon by the government. In 1791, the States ratified the Bill of Rights. As originally interpreted by the United States Supreme Court, the Bill of Rights applied only to the federal government. However, through use of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court has made most of the provisions in the Bill of Rights applicable to the States. In capital prosecutions, many of the provisions in the Bill of Rights have been used to affirm and reverse capital convictions and sentences.

Amendment I. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Amendment II. A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

Amendment III. No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Amendment IV. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Amendment V. No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Amendment VI. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defense.

Amendment VII. In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

Amendment VIII. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Amendment IX. The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Amendment X. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. See also Fourteenth Amendment

Binding Authority A new principle of law announced by an appellate court constitutes precedent and binding authority on all lower courts. Binding authority means that a lower court must follow a principle of law announced by a higher court.

In order for an appellate court's decision to have binding authority on a lower court, the lower court must come within the jurisdiction of the appellate court. For example, a new principle of law announced by the Georgia Supreme Court is not binding on the trial courts of Texas, because the Texas trial courts are not under the jurisdiction of the Georgia Supreme Court. If a Texas trial court decided to follow a rule of law announced by the Georgia Supreme Court, it would do so because it found the rule of law to be persuasive authority.

The only appellate court in the nation whose decisions can be binding authority on all courts in the country is the United States Supreme Court. However, the United State Supreme Court's nationwide authority only comes into play when it makes a ruling grounded in the federal Constitution. A decision by the United States Supreme Court that is not based on the Constitution has binding authority only on federal courts.

Binding/Nonbinding Jury Sentencing Determination In Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002), the United States Supreme Court held that the federal Constitution gave a defendant a right to have a penalty phase jury determine the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstance. Although a defendant has a right to have a jury at the penalty phase, the actual decision made by a capital penalty phase jury is not constitutionally required to be followed by the trial judge. That is, the federal Constitution does not prohibit a trial judge from overriding a jury's recommendation to sentence a capital felon to life imprisonment and impose a sentence of death instead. As a general rule, it is only when facts suggesting a sentence of death are so clear and convincing that virtually no reasonable person could differ on a sentence of death may a trial judge override a jury's recommendation of life imprisonment and impose death.

While there is no constitutional right to have a penalty phase jury's decision followed, a majority of jurisdictions that utilize penalty phase juries require that judges impose the verdict returned by the jury. These jurisdictions are called binding jurisdictions. A few jurisdictions permit trial judges to override the penalty phase jury's verdict and impose a different sentence. These jurisdictions are called nonbinding jurisdictions. See also Jury Trial; Ring v. Arizona; Harris v. Alabama; Spaziano v. Florida

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court properly instructed the jury on the law of self-defense.

Case Holding: The trial court did not properly instruct the jury on the law of self-defense; therefore the judgment against the defendant could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Homer Bird, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant filed an appeal with the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the trial court improperly instructed the jury on the law of self-defense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

An Indiana jury recommended that the death penalty not be imposed on Benny Saylor, but the trial judge rejected the recommendation and sentenced him to death on February 17, 1994. In 2002, Indiana removed the authority of judges to reject a jury's recommendation. As a consequence, the Indiana Supreme Court set aside Saylor's death sentence in 2004. (Indiana Department of Corrections)

Opinion of the Court by Justice Shiras: Justice Shiras noted that the issue of whether the defendant killed the victim was not in dispute. The question was whether the killing was justified as self-defense. Justice Harlan found that the following instruction given by the trial court on the issue of self-defense was erroneous:

The court instructs the jury, if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant Homer Bird, on the 27th day of September, 1898, at a point on the Yukon river, about 2 miles below the coal mine known as Camp Dewey and about 85 miles above Anvik and within the district of Alaska, shot and killed one J. H. Hurlin, and that said killing was malicious, premeditated, and wilful, and that said killing was not in the necessary defense of the defendant's life or to prevent the infliction upon him of great bodily harm, then it is your duty to find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment.

Justice Shiras pointed out that the jury instruction was only a partial statement of the law. The instruction should also have said "that if the defendant believed, and had reason to believe, that the killing was necessary for the defense of his life or to prevent the infliction upon him of great bodily harm, then he was not guilty." Justice Shiras concluded that "[i]t is well settled that the defendant has a right to a full statement of the law from the court, and that a neglect to give such full statement, when the jury consequently fall into error, is sufficient reason for reversal." The judgment of the federal district court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. See also Bird v. United States (II); Jury Instructions

Bird v. United States (II) Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Bird v. United States, 187 U.S. 118 (1902); Argued: October 14, 1902; Decided: November 17, 1902; Opinion of the Court: Justice McKenna; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: L. Issue Presented: Whether the trial court committed error in refusing to instruct the jury on accomplice liability principles.

Case Holding: The trial court did not commit error in refusing to instruct the jury on accomplice liability principles, because no evidence was presented which warranted such an instruction.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Homer Bird, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant filed an appeal with the United States Supreme Court. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment and awarded a new trial, because the trial court improperly instructed the jury on the defense of self-defense. At the defendant's second trial, he was again convicted and sentenced to death. The defendant filed a second appeal with the United States Supreme Court, alleging the trial court committed error in refusing to instruct the jury on accomplice liability principles. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice McKenna: Justice McKenna held that the trial court correctly refused to instruct the jury on accomplice liability principles. The opinion pointed out that two witnesses were present when the defendant killed the victim. Both witnesses testified against the defendant. Consequently, the defendant sought to make the two witnesses accomplices, in order to discredit their testimony. Justice McKenna found that the defendant's own testimony precluded a jury instruction on accomplice liability principles, because his defense was self-defense. The opinion concluded that "[a]ssuming, without deciding, that the instruction requested expressed the law correctly, it was nevertheless rightly refused, because there were no facts in the case to justify it." The judgment of the federal trial court was affirmed. See also Bird v. United States (I); Jury Instructions

Black, Hugo L. Hugo L. Black served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1937 to 1971. While on the Supreme Court, Black was known as a moderate who maintained an intractable belief that the Bill of Rights were intended to curtail the authority of States over their citizens.

Black was born in Harlan, Alabama, on February 27, 1886. His higher education began at a medical college, but he soon lost interest and enrolled at the University of Alabama Law School, where he graduated in 1906. Black's early legal career was spent in private practice and as a prosecutor. In 1917 he joined the Army and rose to the rank of captain before resigning his commission. After leaving the Army, Black resumed a private law practice until his election to the United States Senate in 1926. Eleven years later, in 1937, President Franklin D. Roosevelt nominated Black to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Black wrote a number of capital punishment opinions. The capital punishment opinion by Black which best exemplified his belief in the supremacy of the Bill of Rights over States was Chambers v. Florida. The decision in Chambers involved several African American defendants who were sentenced to death for capital murder. The defendants argued on appeal that their confessions were extracted in violation of the Constitution. Black, writing for the Court, agreed with the defendants. In reversing the judgments against the defendants, Black wrote:

The scope and operation of the Fourteenth Amendment have been fruitful sources of controversy in our constitutional history. However, in view of its historical setting and the wrongs which called it into being, the due process provision of the Fourteenth Amendment — just as that in the Fifth — has led few to doubt that it was intended to guarantee procedural standards adequate and appropriate, then and thereafter, to protect, at all times, people charged with or suspected of crime by those holding positions of power and authority. Tyrannical governments had immemorably utilized dictatorial criminal procedure and punishment to make scapegoats of the weak, or of helpless political, religious, or racial minorities and those who differed, who would not conform and who resisted tyranny. The instruments of such governments were, in the main, two. Conduct, innocent when engaged in, was subsequently made by fiat criminally punishable without legislation. And a liberty loving people won the principle that criminal punishments could not be inflicted save for that which proper legislative action had already by "the law of the land" forbidden when done. But even more was needed. From the popular hatred and abhorrence of illegal confinement, torture and extortion of confessions of violations of the "law of the land" evolved the fundamental idea that no man's life, liberty or property be forfeited as criminal punishment for violation of that law until there had been a charge fairly made and fairly tried in a public tribunal free of prejudice, passion, excitement and tyrannical power. Thus, as assurance against ancient evils, our country, in order to preserve "the blessings of liberty," wrote into its basic law the requirement, among others, that the forfeiture of the lives, liberties or property of people accused of crime can only follow if procedural safeguards of due process have been obeyed.

Black resigned from the Supreme Court on September 17, 1971, after serving one of the longest tenures in the Court's history. Within eight days of his resignation Black died.

Blackmun, Harry A. Harry A. Blackmun served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1970 to 1994. Blackmun started out on the Supreme Court with a conservative philosophy that eventually was transformed into a liberal ideology and interpretation of the Constitution, with respect to individual liberties and rights.

Blackmun was born in Nashville, Illinois, on November 12, 1908. His family would eventually move to St. Paul, Minnesota, where Blackmun met his childhood friend Warren Earl Burger (former Supreme Court chief justice). Blackmun attended Harvard University, where he obtained a degree in mathematics. In 1932, he graduated from Harvard Law School.

After leaving law school, he served as a clerk briefly for a federal Court of Appeals judge before going into private practice. During his years in private practice, Blackmun managed to find time to teach law courses at St. Paul College of Law and at the University of Minnesota Law School. In 1959, President Dwight D. Eisenhower nominated Blackmun to the federal Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. As an appeals court judge, Blackmun honed a reputation as a conservative jurist. In 1970, President Richard M. Nixon nominated Blackmun for a position on the Supreme Court.

During Blackmun's tenure on the Supreme Court, he issued a significant number of capital punishment opinions. Blackmun approached capital punishment cases in three stages of his judicial development in this area. In the first stage, he was conservative and leaned toward the government's position. In the second stage, he shifted toward the center and began to question blanket denial of basic constitutional rights to capital defendants. Near the end of his judicial career, Blackmun swung to the left and denounced capital punishment as a violation of the Constitution. Examples of Blackmun's shift away from his conservative philosophy include McCleskey v. Kemp, where he argued in dissent that "[t]he Court today sanctions the execution of a man despite his presentation of evidence that establishes a constitutionally intolerable level of racially based discrimination leading to the imposition of his death sentence." He dissented tersely in Barclay v. Florida, a case questioning the Florida Supreme Court's review of a death sentence, by writing that "[t]he errors and missteps—intentional or otherwise—come close to making a mockery of the Florida statute and are too much for me to condone." Finally, in Walton v. Arizona, a case involving restrictions on evidence by capital defendants at the penalty phase, Blackmun wrote in dissent: "In my view, two Arizona statutory provisions, pertinent here, run afoul of the established Eighth Amendment principle that a capital defendant is entitled to an individualized sentencing determination which involves the consideration of all relevant mitigating evidence. The first is the requirement that the sentencer may consider only those mitigating circumstances proved by a preponderance of the evidence. The second is the provision that the defendant bears the burden of establishing mitigating circumstances 'sufficiently substantial to call for leniency.' I also conclude that Arizona's 'heinous, cruel or depraved' aggravating circumstance, as construed by the Arizona Supreme Court, provides no meaningful guidance to the sentencing authority and, as a consequence, is unconstitutional." Blackmun died March 4, 1999.

Bolivia Bolivia's constitution of 1961 abolished capital punishment. However, capital punishment was restored in October 1971 for terrorism, kidnapping, and crimes against government and security personnel. In 1981, the death penalty was extended to drug trafficking. Bolivia abolished capital punishment for ordinary crimes in 1997, but still retains the death penalty for exceptional crimes. Bolivia uses the firing squad as the method of execution. A death sentence may not be carried out until the nation's president decides against commutation. The president may commute a death penalty to thirty years of hard labor.

The constitution of Bolivia was adopted on February 2, 1967, and revised in August 1994. The nation's legal system is based on Spanish law and the Napoleonic Code. The judicial system of Bolivia consists of the Supreme Court of Justice and Superior District Courts. The Supreme Court of Justice is composed of a president and eleven justices. The legal system in Bolivia does not provide for trial by jury. Defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty, may be granted bail, and have a right to a public trial, to retained or appointed legal counsel, to confront witnesses, to present evidence, and to appeal a judicial decision. See also International Capital Punishment Nations Issue Presented: Whether use of victim impact statements by the prosecutor during the penalty phase violated the Constitution.

Case Holding: Use of victim impact statements by the prosecutor during the penalty phase violated the Constitution because such information served only to inflame the decision-making process of the jury.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Booth, was convicted of two capital murders by the State of Maryland. During the penalty phase, the jury was allowed to consider victim impact statements, which concerned the hardship caused on family members by the victims' deaths. The jury sentenced the defendant to death. The Maryland Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that use of the victim impact statements violated the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Powell: Justice Powell held that the introduction of the victim impact statements at the penalty phase violated the Eighth Amendment. It was said that such information was irrelevant to a capital sentencing decision. Justice Powell found that admission of victim impact statements created a constitutionally unacceptable risk that the jury might impose the death penalty in an arbitrary and capricious manner. It was reasoned that such information might be wholly unrelated to the blameworthiness of a particular defendant, and could cause the sentencing decision to turn on irrelevant factors, such as the degree to which the victim's family was willing and able to articulate its grief or the relative worth of the victim's character. It was concluded that the admission of family members' emotionally charged opinions and characterizations of the crimes could serve no other purpose than to inflame the jury and divert it from deciding the case on the relevant evidence concerning the crime and the defendant. Such admission was therefore inconsistent with the rational decision-making required in capital cases. The judgment of the Maryland Court of Appeals was reversed, to the extent that it affirmed the capital sentence.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice White, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and O'Connor, and Scalia, JJ., Joined: Justice White dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that victim impact statements represented a constitutionally acceptable manner of letting the jury know the full extent of the harm caused by the defendant. Justice White stated his position as follows:

The Court's judgment is based on the premises that the harm that a murderer causes a victim's family does not in general reflect on his blameworthiness, and that only evidence going to blameworthiness is relevant to the capital sentencing decision. Many if not most jurors, however, will look less favorably on a capital defendant when they appreciate the full extent of the harm he caused, including the harm to the victim's family. There is nothing aberrant in a juror's inclination to hold a murderer accountable not only for his internal disposition in committing the crime but also for the full extent of the harm he caused; many if not most persons would also agree, for example, that someone who drove his car recklessly through a stoplight and unintentionally killed a pedestrian merits significantly more punishment than someone who drove his car recklessly through the same stoplight at a time when no pedestrian was there to be hit. I am confident that the Court would not overturn a sentence for reckless homicide by automobile merely because the punishment exceeded the maximum sentence for reckless driving; and I would hope that the Court would not overturn the sentence in such a case if a judge mentioned, as relevant to his sentencing decision, the fact that the victim was a mother or father. But if punishment can be enhanced in noncapital cases on the basis of the harm caused, irrespective of the offender's specific intention to cause such harm, I fail to see why the same approach is unconstitutional in death cases. If anything, I would think that victim impact statements are particularly appropriate evidence in capital sentencing hearings: The State has a legitimate interest in counteracting the mitigating evidence which the defendant is entitled to put in, by reminding the sentencer that just as the murderer should be considered as an individual, so too the victim is an individual whose death represents a unique loss to society and in particular to his family.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and White and O'Connor, JJ., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented from the Court's decision. He stated his objections as follows:

The Court's opinion does not explain why a defendant's eligibility for the death sentence can (and always does) turn upon considerations not relevant to his moral guilt. If a bank robber aims his gun at a guard, pulls the trigger, and kills his target, he may be put to death. If the gun unexpectedly misfires, he may not. His moral guilt in both cases is identical, but his responsibility in the former is greater. Less than two months ago, we held that two brothers who planned and assisted in their father's escape from prison could be sentenced to death because, in the course of the escape, their father and an accomplice murdered a married couple and two children. Had their father allowed the victims to live, the brothers could not be put to death; but because he decided to kill, the brothers may. The difference between life and death for these two defendants was thus a matter "wholly unrelated to the[ir] blameworthiness." But it was related to their personal responsibility, i. e., to the degree of harm that they had caused. In sum, the principle upon which the Court's opinion rests — that the imposition of capital punishment is to be determined solely on the basis of moral guilt — does not exist, neither in the text of the Constitution, nor in the historic practices of our society, nor even in the opinions of this Court.

Case Note: The decision in the case was short lived, as the Court eventually overruled the opinion and held that victim impact statements may be introduced during the penalty phase. See also California v. Brown; Payne v. Tennessee; South Carolina v. Gathers

Boston Strangler Thirteen women were sexually assaulted and murdered in the Boston area between June 1962 and January 1964. As the murders surfaced, the media drew the public's attention to the crimes by calling the killer the "Boston Strangler." The identity of the Boston Strangler was unknown to authorities until the arrest of Albert DeSalvo in November 1964.

Albert DeSalvo confessed to being the infamous Boston Strangler. (Cambridge Police)

DeSalvo was born on September 3, 1931, in Chelsea, Massachusetts. Although DeSalvo developed a juvenile record while growing up, he was not considered a dangerous youth.

Upon reaching adulthood, he joined the Army in 1948. DeSalvo left the Army in 1956 and returned to Massachusetts with a German wife.

After DeSalvo returned to civilian life, he had several arrests for breaking and entering between 1957 and 1960. In spite of his encounters with the law, DeSalvo maintained steady employment and appeared to be a devoted family man. The appearance of hardworking family man was torn asunder in 1964, after DeSalvo was arrested on sexual assault charges. While in custody, DeSalvo confessed to being the infamous Boston Strangler.

Although authorities believed DeSalvo was the Boston Strangler, he was not prosecuted for the capital murders. (His confession was taken under circumstances that would not permit its use at a trial.) Instead, on January 10, 1967, DeSalvo was prosecuted for a series of sexual assault crimes. He was convicted of the sexual assault crimes and sentenced to life in prison. DeSalvo was stabbed to death in prison in November 1973.

Botched Execution Implementing the death penalty is not an exact science. Mistakes are made wherein a capital felon is not put to death after the method of death is inflicted. When this occurs, authorities may make a second or subsequent attempt at executing the capital felon. The crucial constitutional issue involved in making subsequent attempts to carry out an execution involves the reason for the initial failure. So long as the initial or any subsequent failure is due to an honest mistake, further attempts may ensue. The federal Constitution prohibits authorities from purposely tormenting a capital felon by intentionally botching an initial attempt at execution. See also Francis v. Resweber

The botched electrocution of Allen Davis by the State of Florida on July 8, 1999, was a factor in causing the State to enact legislation in 2000 that gives death row inmates an option of death by lethal injection or electrocution. Allen bled profusely from his nose during the execution. (Florida Department of Corrections)

BOTCHED EXECUTIONS 1976–OCTOBER 2006

Botswana Botswana imposes capital punishment. Botswana uses hanging as the method of carrying out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Roman-Dutch law and local customary law. The constitution of Botswana was made effective September 30, 1966. Botswana is a multiparty democracy. Constitutional power is shared between an executive, a unicameral legislature, and a judiciary.

The judicial structure of Botswana consists of both civil and customary court systems. The civil court system is composed of the Court of Appeal, High Court, and Magistrate Court. Under Botswana's constitution, every defendant is entitled to due process, the presumption of innocence, and freedom from arbitrary arrest. Defendants charged with non-capital offenses are released on their own recognizance. Detention without bail is mandated in capital cases. Defendants have the right to counsel and, in capital cases, indigent defendants have the right to appointed counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession was properly introduced into evidence by the prosecutor.

Case Holding: The defendant's confession was properly introduced into evidence by the prosecutor. However, because of an issue not raised in the lower courts involving a Witherspoon v. Illinois jury selection violation, the defendant's conviction was set aside and the case remanded.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Boulden, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Alabama. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court alleging that his conviction was invalid because the prosecutor introduced into evidence his unlawfully obtained confession. After a full hearing, the district court found the confession voluntary. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stewart: Justice Stewart found that the confession was voluntary and therefore admissible into evidence. However, the opinion found that an issue raised for the first time by the defendant, involving jury selection, warranted reversing and remanding the case.

At the time the defendant's case was brought to the Court, the Court rendered its decision in Witherspoon v. Illinois, wherein it was held that a sentence of death could not be carried out if the jury that imposed or recommended the sentence was chosen by excluding potential jurors for "cause" simply because they voiced general objections to the death penalty or expressed conscientious or religious scruples against its infliction. Justice Stewart found that Witherspoon was violated in the defendant's case.

During jury selection in the defendant's case, Alabama had a statute which expressly required rejection of potential jurors that had a fixed opinion against capital punishment. As a result of this statute, the trial court removed fifteen potential jurors. Justice Stewart wrote that under Witherspoon's standard, the most that could be demanded of potential jurors is that they be willing to consider all of the penalties provided and that they not be irrevocably committed, before the trial has begun, to vote against the penalty of death regardless of the facts and circumstances that might emerge in the course of the proceedings. The opinion indicated that if a potential juror is excluded on any broader basis than the Witherspoon standard, the death sentence cannot be carried out. In view of the Witherspoon violation, the Court reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeals and remanded the case to the district court for a full evidentiary hearing on the Witherspoon violation.

Concurring Statement by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a statement concurring in the Court's opinion and judgment.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Harlan, in Which Burger, CJ., and Marshall, J., Joined: Justice Harlan issued an opinion concurring in the Court's decision to remand the case for a Witherspoon hearing. However, he dissented from the Court's ruling that the confession was voluntary. Justice Harlan believed that the issue of the defendant's confession was not thoroughly reviewed by the lower courts and that, consequently, the Court should have remanded that issue as well. Boyd v. California Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Boyd v. California, 494 U.S. 370 (1990); Argued: November 28, 1989; Decided: March 5, 1990; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Rehnquist; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Marshall, J., in which Brennan, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: Dennis A. Bloom on brief; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: 2; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: 1 Issue Presented: Whether two standard capital punishment penalty phase jury instructions used by California were ambiguous and prevented the jury from considering relevant evidence in violation of the Constitution.

Case Holding: When a capital defendant makes a claim that a jury instruction is ambiguous and therefore subject to erroneous interpretation, the test to be used is whether there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury has applied the instruction in a way that prevents the consideration of constitutionally relevant evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Richard Boyd, was found guilty by a jury in the murder of Dickie Gibson on January 15, 1981. During the penalty phase, the trial court read instructions to the jury that included two standard capital punishment jury instructions. One instruction listed eleven factors that the jury "shall" consider in determining whether to impose a sentence of death or life imprisonment, the last of which was the so-called "unadorned version" that read: "Any other circumstance which extenuates the gravity of the crime even though it is not a legal excuse for the crime."

The second jury instruction told the jury to consider all applicable aggravating and mitigating circumstances and directed that it "shall" impose a sentence either of death or of life imprisonment depending upon whether the aggravating circumstances outweighed the mitigating circumstances or vice versa. The jury imposed the death sentence.

The California Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, it rejected the defendant's contention that the aforementioned jury instructions were ambiguous and violated the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: Chief Justice Rehnquist held that the mandatory nature of the language of the jury instruction did not prevent the jury from making an individualized assessment of the appropriateness of death penalty. The instructions satisfied the Constitution insofar as they permitted the jury to consider all relevant mitigating evidence. The decision ruled that there was no constitutional basis for the defendant's contention that the jury must have unfettered discretion to decline to impose the death penalty even if it decides that the aggravating circumstances outweigh the mitigating circumstances. The chief justice indicated: "States are free to structure and shape consideration of mitigating evidence to achieve a more rational and equitable administration of the death penalty."

Focusing on the specific issue presented by the case, the opinion ruled that when a claim is made by a capital defendant that a jury instruction is ambiguous and therefore subject to erroneous interpretation, the test to be used is whether there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury has applied the instruction in a way that prevents the consideration of constitutionally relevant evidence: "Although a defendant need not establish that the jury was more likely than not to have been impermissibly inhibited by the instruction, a capital sentencing proceeding does not violate the Eighth Amendment if there is only a possibility of such an inhibition."

Applying the "reasonable likelihood" test to the facts of the case, the chief justice found that there was no showing by the defendant that there was a reasonable likelihood that the jurors interpreted the trial court's instructions to preclude consideration of mitigating evidence proffered by him. The instructions directed the jury to consider any other circumstance that might excuse a crime. It was said that "reasonable jurors surely would not have felt constrained by the ... instruction to ignore all of Boyd's unobjected-to penalty-phase evidence ... particularly since the jury was also instructed that it 'shall consider all of the evidence ... received during any part of the trial.'" The decision of the California Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall pointed out that "[i]t is a bedrock principle of our capital punishment jurisprudence that, in deciding whether to impose a sentence of death, a sentencer must consider not only the nature of the offense but also the 'character and propensities of the offender.'" The dissent interpreted the majority's opinion as holding that the defendant's death sentence must be affirmed even if the penalty phase jury reasonably could have believed that it could not consider mitigating evidence regarding his character and background.

The dissent rejected the majority's adoption and use of a "reasonable likelihood" test to analyze the issue presented. It was said that the majority's approach "is inconsistent with our longstanding focus, in reviewing challenged instructions in all criminal contexts, on whether a juror could reasonably interpret the instructions in an unconstitutional manner. By adopting its unprecedented standard, the majority places too much of the risk of error in capital sentencing on the defendant.” The dissent concluded that under traditional jury instruction analysis, the defendant’s death sentence would have been reversed. *See also Ayers v. Boykin v. Alabama Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238 (1969); Argued: March 4, 1969; Decided: June 2, 1969; Opinion of the Court: Justice Douglas; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Harlan, in which Black, J., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: E. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant’s guilty pleas to capital offenses were constitutionally void because the trial record failed to disclose if the guilty pleas were made intelligently and voluntarily.

Case Holding: The defendant’s guilty pleas to capital offenses were constitutionally void because the trial record failed to disclose if the guilty pleas were made intelligently and voluntarily.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Boykin, was indicted by the State of Alabama on five counts of robbery. The maximum punishment for robbery was the death penalty. The defendant pled guilty to each robbery charge. Under State law, it was required that a jury fix punishment when a defendant entered a guilty plea. A jury imposed the death penalty for each charge. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the convictions and sentences. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the voluntariness of the defendant’s guilty pleas.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas held that the Constitution required the record to reflect an affirmative showing that a guilty plea was intelligently and voluntarily made. It was said that this stringent requirement was necessary because several constitutional rights are involved when a plea of guilty is entered, including (1) the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination, (2) the right to trial by jury, and (3) the right to confront one’s accusers. Justice Douglas stated that relinquishment of these rights could not be presumed from a silent record. The opinion concluded that the defendant’s guilty pleas constituted reversible error because the record did not disclose that the defendant voluntarily and understandingly entered his pleas of guilty. The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Harlan, in Which Black, J., Joined: Justice Harlan dissented from the Court’s decision. He argued that the Court was wrong to constitutionalize the requirement that a trial record must reflect that a guilty plea was intelligently and voluntarily made. Justice Harlan wrote: “The Court ... in effect fastens upon the States, as a matter of federal constitutional law, the rigid prophylactic requirements of Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.” It was further contended that “the Court does all this at the behest of a [defendant] who has never at any time alleged that his guilty plea was involuntary or made without knowledge of the consequences.” Justice Harlan concluded: “I would hold that ... Boykin is not entitled to outright reversal of his conviction simply because of the ‘inadequacy’ of the record pertaining to his guilty plea. Further, I would not vacate the judgment below and remand for a state-court hearing on voluntariness. For even if it is assumed for the sake of argument that [the defendant] would be entitled to such a hearing if he had alleged that the plea was involuntary, a matter which I find it unnecessary to decide, the fact is that he has never made any such claim. Hence, I consider that [the defendant’s] present arguments relating to his guilty plea entitle him to no federal relief.”

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for robbery without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Guilty Plea

Gramley, 520 U.S. 899 (1997); Argued: April 14, 1997; Decided: June 9, 1997; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Rehnquist; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Not reported; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: Not reported

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established “good cause” to conduct discovery during his habeas corpus proceeding, for the purpose of showing that his trial judge was biased against him.

Case Holding: In showing that his trial judge was convicted of taking bribes from criminal defendants, the defendant established “good cause” to conduct discovery during his habeas corpus proceeding.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William Bracy, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Illinois. The defendant’s conviction and sentence were affirmed on direct appeal by the Illinois Supreme Court.

Subsequent to the defendant’s conviction and sentence, the judge who presided over his trial was convicted of federal charges for taking bribes from criminal defendants. After the trial judge’s conviction, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that his trial judge had an interest in his conviction in order to deflect suspicion that the judge was taking bribes in other murder cases and that this interest violated the fair trial guarantee of the Due Process Clause. The defendant also filed a motion requesting “discovery” to obtain evidence to substantiate his allegations. The district court denied relief the motion to conduct discovery. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. In doing so, the appellate court ruled that the defendant had not shown “good cause” for discovery to prove his claim, as required by habeas corpus rules. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The Chief Justice ruled that the defendant made a sufficient factual showing under the habeas corpus rules to establish “good cause” for discovery on his claim of actual judicial bias in his case. It was said that due process requires a fair trial before a judge without actual bias against the defendant or an interest in the outcome of his or her particular case. The Chief Justice reasoned that if the defendant established his claim that the trial judge had a bias against defendants who did not pay bribes to him, then that would establish a violation of due process. The opinion indicated that the proffered evidence already asserted by the defendant overcame the usual presumption that public officials have properly discharged their official duties. The chief justice noted that the trial judge's conviction proved that he was thoroughly corrupt. Additionally, it was shown that the lawyer appointed to the defendant was a former law partner of the judge. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded for the defendant to engage in discovery. See also Discovery; Habeas Corpus Procedural Rules

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the Court of Appeals properly found that the theory of transferred intent was not permitted for establishing felony murder under Ohio law. (2) Whether the Court of Appeals properly considered evidence that was not presented to Ohio courts.

Case Holdings: (1) The Court of Appeals was wrong in concluding that the theory of transferred intent was not permitted for establishing felony murder under Ohio law. (2) The Court of Appeals should not have considered evidence that was not presented to Ohio courts.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Ohio charged the defendant, Kenneth T. Richey, with killing a child in 1986. The child was killed as a result of Richey setting fire to the building where the child lived. Richey set the fire in an attempt to kill his ex-girlfriend and her new companion. In order to obtain a conviction for felony murder, the prosecutor relied on the theory of transferred intent. This theory allows a defendant's intent to kill a specific person to be transferred, for the purpose establishing a murder conviction in the death of an innocent bystander. Richey was ultimately convicted and sentenced to death. The conviction and sentence were upheld on direct appeal, and in a state habeas corpus proceeding. Richey filed a federal habeas petition. A federal district judge denied relief. However, a Court of Appeals reversed the conviction and sentence. The Court of Appeals concluded that Ohio law did not permit the prosecutor to use the theory of transferred intent and that Richey's lawyer provided ineffective assistance of counsel in regards to arson experts used in the case. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court summarily decided the case without allowing oral arguments. In the per curiam opinion, it was said that the Court of Appeals was wrong in finding that Ohio did not permit the use of transferred intent. The opinion pointed out that the Ohio Supreme Court had expressly indicated, in a prior decision in the case, that the transferred intent theory was part of Ohio law.

The per curiam opinion also found that the Court of Appeals' ruling on the ineffective assistance of counsel claim was wrong, because it was based upon evidence that was not presented to the Ohio courts. The opinion noted that Richey argued that this issue was waived by the prosecutor because the prosecutor failed to raise it before the Court of Appeals. As a result of the waiver argument, the Supreme Court reversed the case in part and remanded for a determination of whether the prosecutor failed to preserve its objection to the Court of Appeals' reliance on evidence not presented in State courts. See also Felony Murder Rule; Transferred Intent Doctrine

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant entered a valid guilty plea to capital murder. (2) Whether the defendant's conviction was valid when the prosecutor pursued a theory against a co-defendant that was inconsistent with the theory against the defendant. (3) Whether the defendant's death sentence was valid when the prosecutor pursued a theory against a co-defendant that was inconsistent with the theory against the defendant.

Case Holdings: (1) The defendant entered a valid guilty plea to capital murder. (2) The defendant's conviction was valid even though the prosecutor pursued a theory against a co-defendant that was inconsistent with the theory against the defendant. (3) The Court of Appeals must consider on remand whether the defendant's death sentence was valid when the prosecutor pursued a theory against a co-defendant that was inconsistent with the theory against the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Ohio charged the defendant, David Stumpf, with the 1984 murder of Mary Jane Stout and the attempted murder of Norman Stout. The State also charged an accomplice, Clyde Wesley, with committing the same crimes. Stumpf alleged that he shot Mr. Stout, but that Wesley killed Mrs. Stout. However, Stumpf eventually entered a guilty plea to murder and attempted murder. A penalty phase proceeding was held before a three-judge panel. During the penalty phase, Stumpf argued that he did not shoot Mrs. Stout. The prosecutor argued that Stumpf shot Mrs. Stout, but that even if he did not, he acted as an aider and abettor. The three-judge panel found that Stumpf shot Mrs. Stout and sentenced him to death.

Subsequent to the proceedings against Stumpf, the prosecutor tried the case against the co-defendant, Clyde Wesley. During the guilt phase of Wesley's jury trial, the prosecutor argued that Wesley shot and killed Mrs. Stout. Wesley alleged that Stumpf killed Mrs. Stout. The jury convicted Wesley, but he was sentenced to life imprisonment with the possibility of parole.

During Stumpf's automatic direct appeal, he argued that his guilty plea was not valid because it was not intelligently made and that his conviction and sentence were invalid because the prosecutor alleged that Wesley killed Mrs. Stout. The conviction and sentence were affirmed on direct appeal and later affirmed in a State habeas corpus proceeding. Stumpf eventually filed a federal habeas proceeding. A federal district court denied relief. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed the decision. The Court of Appeals found that Stumpf's guilty plea was not knowingly and intelligently made and that his due process rights were violated because the prosecutor pursued inconsistent theories in obtaining convictions for Stumpf and Wesley. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor found that the Court of Appeals was wrong on each of the issues it considered. First, the opinion found that Stumpf was fully aware of all the facts when he entered a guilty plea. Second, Justice O'Connor stated that the prosecutor could use inconsistent theories in obtaining convictions of both defendants. A third issue in the case, the impact of inconsistent theories during Stumpf's penalty phase proceeding, could not be resolved based upon the record. Justice O'Connor addressed the issue as follows:

The prosecutor's use of allegedly inconsistent theories may have a more direct effect on Stumpf's sentence, however, for it is at least arguable that the sentencing panel's conclusion about Stumpf's principal role in the offense was material to its sentencing determination. The opinion below leaves some ambiguity as to the overlap between how the lower court resolved Stumpf's due process challenge to his conviction, and how it resolved Stumpf's challenge to his sentence. It is not clear whether the Court of Appeals would have concluded that Stumpf was entitled to resentencing had the court not also considered the conviction invalid.... In these circumstances, it would be premature for this Court to resolve the merits of Stumpf's sentencing claim, and we therefore express no opinion on whether the prosecutor's actions amounted to a due process violation, or whether any such violation would have been prejudicial. The Court of Appeals should have the opportunity to consider, in the first instance, the question of how ... the prosecutor's conduct in the Stumpf and Wesley cases relate to Stumpf's death sentence in particular.

The decision of the Court of Appeals, as it related to the conviction, was reversed and the case was remanded for further consideration of the death sentence issue.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Thomas, in Which Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Thomas joined the majority opinion. Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant was denied due process of law when the prosecutor withheld exculpatory evidence during his trial. (2) Whether the defendant was denied equal protection when the Maryland Court of Appeals restricted his new trial to the issue of punishment.

Case Holdings: (1) The defendant was denied due process of law when the prosecutor withheld exculpatory evidence during his trial. (2) The defendant was not denied equal protection when the Maryland Court of Appeals restricted his new trial to the issue of punishment.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Brady, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Maryland. After the defendant's conviction and sentence were affirmed by the Maryland Court of Appeals, the defendant learned that the prosecutor withheld information that indicated the defendant's accomplice actually committed the murder. During the defendant's trial, Brady admitted to being present when the murder occurred, but that an accomplice did the actual killing.

The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition with the trial court, alleging his constitutional rights were violated by the prosecutor's suppression of exculpatory evidence. The trial court denied relief. On appeal, the Maryland Court of Appeals held that suppression of the evidence by the prosecutor denied the defendant due process of law. The appellate court reversed the death sentence, but not the conviction, and ordered a retrial on issue of punishment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas held that the Court agreed with the Maryland Court of Appeals that suppression of the exculpatory evidence was a violation of the Due Process Clause. It was ruled that suppression by the prosecutor of evidence favorable to an accused who has requested it violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecutor. Justice Douglas wrote: "Such a contrivance by a State to procure the conviction and imprisonment of a defendant is as inconsistent with the rudimentary demands of justice as is the obtaining of a like result by intimidation."

Turning to the issue of the proper relief the defendant was entitled to, the opinion held that when the Maryland Court of Appeals restricted defendant's new trial to the issue of punishment only, it did not deny him due process or equal protection of the laws. Justice Douglas reasoned that the suppressed evidence could not have reduced the defendant's offense below murder in the first degree. The judgment of the Maryland Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White: Justice White concurred in the Court's judgment. He believed, however, that the Court should not have addressed the due process issue because the Maryland Court of Appeals did not indicate if the violation was against federal constitutional due process or State constitutional due process. Justice White wrote: "It certainly is not the case, as it may be suggested, that without [the federal due process issue] we would have only a state law question, for assuming the court below was correct in finding a violation of [the defendant's] rights in the suppression of evidence, the federal question he wants decided here still remains, namely, whether denying him a new trial on guilt as well as punishment deprives him of equal protection. There is thus a federal question to deal with in this Court, wholly aside from the due process question involving the suppression of evidence.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Harlan, in Which Black, J., Joined: Justice Harlan dissented from the Court’s decision. He argued that the only issue that was properly before the Court was the defendant’s claim that it was a violation of equal protection of the law to limit his relief to retrial on punishment. Justice Harlan also contended that the resolution of this issue by the Maryland Court of Appeals was not so clear that the Court should defer to it. He was of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed and the case remanded for further consideration of the equal protection claim.

Case Note: The decision in this case had a tremendous impact on capital prosecutions, as well as criminal prosecutions in general. The decision placed an affirmative duty upon prosecutors and the police to disclose all evidence that tended to show the defendant’s innocence, as well as evidence that a defendant could use to impeach the testimony of witnesses. A Brady violation, as it is called, will usually result in a defendant obtaining a new trial. See also Exculpatory Evidence; Kyles v. Whitley; Strickler v. Greene Issue Presented: Whether the defendant’s confession was voluntarily given.

Case Holding: The defendant’s confession was not voluntarily given, even though physical force was not used against him, as it was enough that he was in a situation that precluded him from exercising free will.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Bram, was indicted for capital murder by the United States. The offense was committed on the high seas. During the trial of the case, the defendant sought to exclude his confession on the grounds that it was involuntarily made. The trial court found the confession was voluntary and admitted it into evidence. The jury convicted the defendant of capital murder and he was sentenced to death. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue the defendant’s confession.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White held that the defendant’s confession was not voluntarily given. The opinion pointed out that “[i]n criminal trials, in the courts of the United States, wherever a question arises whether a confession is incompetent because not voluntary, the issue is controlled by that portion of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States commanding that no person ‘shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.’” Justice White noted that “a confession, in order to be admissible, must be free and voluntary; that is, must not be extracted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight, nor by the exertion of any improper influence. It was also ruled that “[a] confession can never be received in evidence where the prisoner has been influenced by any threat or promise; for the law cannot measure the force of the influence used, or decide upon its effect upon the mind of the prisoner, and therefore excludes the declaration if any degree of influence has been exerted.” The circumstances surrounding the defendant’s involuntary confession were given as follows:

Before analyzing the statement of the police detective as to what took place between himself and the accused, it is necessary to recall the exact situation. The crime had been committed on the high seas. [A co-suspect], Brown, immediately after the homicide, had been arrested by the crew in consequence of suspicion aroused against him, and had been by them placed in irons. As the vessel came in sight of land, and was approaching Halifax, the suspicions of the crew having been also directed to Bram, he was arrested by them, and placed in irons. On reaching port, these two suspected persons were delivered to the custody of the police authorities of Halifax, and were there held in confinement, awaiting the action of the United States consul, which was to determine whether the suspicions which had caused the arrest justified the sending of one or both of the prisoners into the United States for formal charge and trial. Before this examination had taken place, the police detective caused Bram to be brought from jail to his private office; and, when there alone with the detective, he was stripped of his clothing, and either while the detective was in the act of so stripping him, or after he was denuded, the conversation offered as a confession took place....

The fact, then, is that the language of the accused, which was offered in evidence as a confession, was made use of by him as a reply to the statement of the detective that Bram’s co-suspect had charged him with the crime; and, although the answer was in the form of a denial, it was doubtless offered as a confession, because of an implication of guilt which it was conceived the words of the denial might be considered to mean. But the situation of the accused, and the nature of the communication made to him by the detective, necessarily overthrow any possible implication that his reply to the detective could have been the result of a purely voluntary mental action; that is to say, when all the surrounding circumstances are considered in their true relations, not only is the claim that the statement was voluntary overthrown, but the impression is irresistibly produced that it must necessarily have been the result of either hope or fear, or both, operating on the mind.

It cannot be doubted that, placed in the position in which the accused was when the statement was made to him that the other suspected person had charged him with crime, the result was to produce upon his mind the fear that, if he remained silent, it would be considered an admission of guilt, and therefore render certain his being committed for trial as the guilty person; and it cannot be conceived that the converse impression would not also have naturally arisen that, by denying, there was hope of removing the suspicion from himself. If this must have been the state of mind of one situated as was the prisoner when the confession was made, how, in reason, can it be said that the answer which he gave, and which was required by the situation, was wholly voluntary, and in no manner influenced by the force of hope or fear? To so conclude would be to deny the necessary relation of cause and effect.

The judgment of the federal district court was reversed and a new trial ordered.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brewer, in Which Fuller, C.J., and Brown, J., Joined: Justice Brewer dissented from the Court’s decision. He argued that the circumstances surrounding the confession did not cause it to be involuntary. Justice Brewer expressed his thoughts as follows: “The fact that the defendant was in custody and in irons does not destroy the competency of a confession. Confinement or imprisonment is not in itself sufficient to justify the exclusion of a confession, if it appears to have been voluntary, and was not obtained by putting the prisoner in fear or by promises.” See also Right to Remain Silent

Brandeis, Louis D. Louis D. Brandeis served as an associate justice on the United States Supreme Court from 1916 to 1939. While on the Supreme Court, Brandeis was known as a progressive jurist who interpreted the Constitution in a manner that gave the greatest protection to individual freedoms from government encroachment.

Brandeis was born in Louisville, Kentucky, on November 13, 1856. Although he did not obtain an undergraduate college degree, Brandeis was considered a brilliant student of law. He enrolled in Harvard Law School and received a law degree in 1877. After law school, Brandeis embarked on a legal career that, while making him wealthy, brought him immense respect as an intellectual vanguard within the nation's legal community. He wrote articles and books along the way and became affectionately known as the "People's Lawyer."

In 1916, President Woodrow Wilson withstood political controversy to nominate Brandeis as the first Jewish American member of the Supreme Court. While on the Supreme Court, Brandeis wrote a number of progressive-thinking dissenting opinions that were eventually adopted as the constitutional law of the nation. Brandeis was only known to have written one capital punishment case while on the bench. (It is possible that he wrote more but did not indicate the punishment received by defendants in other criminal decisions authored by him.)

In the case of Ziang v. United States, Brandeis was called upon to determine whether a defendant's confession and incriminating statements were obtained in violation of the Constitution. The defendant in Ziang was interrogated by the police for thirteen days before being formally arrested and arraigned. During that period the police obtained a confession and incriminating statements which were used to convict the defendant of capital murder and obtain a sentence of death. Brandeis rejected the government's contention that the confession and incriminating statements were voluntary because of the absence of physical injury or threats. He wrote: "In the federal courts, the requisite of voluntariness is not satisfied by establishing merely that the confession was not induced by a promise or a threat. A confession is voluntary in law if, and only if, it was, in fact, voluntarily made. A confession may have been given voluntarily, although it was made to police officers, while in custody, and in answer to an examination conducted by them. But a confession obtained by compulsion must be excluded whatever may have been the character of the compulsion, and whether the compulsion was applied in a judicial proceeding or otherwise." Brandeis granted the defendant a new trial. On October 5, 1941, Brandeis died.

Brazil Brazil abolished the death penalty for ordinary crimes in 1979, but retained its application for exceptional offenses. The nation's legal system is based on Roman codes. Brazil's constitution was adopted on October 5, 1988. Brazil is a constitutional federal republic composed of twenty-six states and a federal district. The federal political structure consists of an executive branch, legislative branch, and judicial branch.

The judicial system is composed of federal, state, and municipal courts. The federal court system includes a supreme court, the Superior Court of Justice (appeal court), and regional federal courts (trial courts). Each state has its own supreme court. The governor of each state, with approval by the state assembly, appoints the judges to the court. Each state has lower courts called district courts.

Defendants are entitled to retained or appointed counsel and must be made fully aware of the charges against them. Trials are open to the public. Juries decide only cases of crimes against life; judges try all others. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was entitled to raise the issue of a violation of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations for the first time in federal court.

Case Holding: The defendant was not entitled to raise the issue of a violation of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations for the first time in federal court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: Angel Francisco Breard was convicted and sentenced to death in 1993 by the State of Virginia for the murder of Ruth Dickie. On direct appeal, the judgment against Breard was affirmed. Breard filed a State habeas corpus petition, but no relief was granted. Subsequently, Breard filed a federal habeas petition. In the federal petition, Breard raised for the first time the issue that his rights as a Paraguay citizen were violated, because after his arrest he was not informed of his right to assistance by a Paraguay consular as required by Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. The federal district court held that Breard defaulted this issue because it was never raised in State court. A Court of Appeals affirmed.

Before the case was brought to the United States Supreme Court, the nation of Paraguay filed a complaint against the United States in the International Court of Justice. Paraguay argued that Breard should not be executed because his rights under the Vienna Convention were violated. The International Court entered an order urging that Breard not be executed until the Court heard the merits of Paraguay's claim against the United States. After the International Court entered its order and on the day he was scheduled to be executed, Breard and Paraguay filed separate motions for a stay of execution with the United States Supreme Court, along with petitions for certiorari.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court found that Breard defaulted his claim because it was not raised in State court and that Paraguay was not properly in the case. The Court reasoned as follows:

[W]hile we should give respectful consideration to the interpretation of an international treaty rendered by an international court with jurisdiction to interpret such, it has been recognized in international law that, absent a clear and express statement to the contrary, the procedural rules of the forum State govern the implementation of the treaty in that State. This proposition is embodied in the Vienna Convention itself, which provides that the rights expressed in the Convention "shall be exercised in conformity with the laws and regulations of the receiving State," provided that "said laws and regulations must enable full effect to be given to the purposes for which the rights accorded under this Ar-title are intended.” It is the rule in this country that assertions of error in criminal proceedings must first be raised in state court in order to form the basis for relief in habeas. Claims not so raised are considered defaulted. By not asserting his Vienna Convention claim in state court, Breard failed to exercise his rights under the Vienna Convention in conformity with the laws of the United States and the Commonwealth of Virginia. Having failed to do so, he cannot raise a claim of violation of those rights now on federal habeas review....

As for Paraguay’s suits, neither the text nor the history of the Vienna Convention clearly provides a foreign nation a private right of action in United States’ courts to set aside a criminal conviction and sentence for violation of consular notification provisions. The Eleventh Amendment provides a separate reason why Paraguay’s suit might not succeed. That Amendment [provides a] “fundamental principle” that “the States, in the absence of consent, are immune from suits brought against them ... by a foreign State.” Though Paraguay claims that its suit is within an exemption dealing with continuing consequences of past violations of federal rights, we do not agree. The failure to notify the Paraguayan Consul occurred long ago and has no continuing effect.

The Supreme Court went on to deny the stay of execution sought by Breard and Paraguay, as well as their request for certiorari.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Souter: Justice Souter joined the Supreme Court’s decision. He wrote a terse statement indicating that he did not believe the Vienna Convention violation had an impact on the prosecution.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Ginsburg: Justice Ginsburg wrote a terse dissent indicating she would have granted Breard’s application for a stay and certiorari.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens dissented from the majority opinion. He believed that the Court should have treated the case as an ordinary one and granted the stay, pending resolution of the merits of the case.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Breyer: Justice Breyer dissented from the majority opinion. He believed that the issues raised in the case had merit; therefore, a stay should have been granted, pending resolution of the merits of the case.

Case Note: Breard was executed by Virginia on April 14, 1998, the date of the Supreme Court’s decision. Paraguay subsequently withdrew the complaint it filed in the International Court of Justice. See also Foreign Nationals and Capital Punishment; International Court of Justice; Medellin v. Dretke

Brennan, William J., Jr. William J. Brennan, Jr., served as an associate justice on the United States Supreme Court from 1956 to 1990. While on the Supreme Court, Brennan was known as an expansive interpreter of the Constitution, with respect to individual liberties and rights.

Brennan was born in Newark, New Jersey, on April 25, 1906. He received a Bachelor of Science degree from the University of Pennsylvania’s Wharton School of Finance and Commerce. After he receiving a scholarship to attend Harvard University Law School, Brennan studied law under Felix Frankfurter. Both the student of law and professor of law eventually served on the Supreme Court together.

After graduating near the top of his law school class in 1931, Brennan spent a few years in private practice before World War II broke out. While in the Army, he rose to the rank of colonel. Brennan returned home after the war and picked up his legal practice. By 1949, he found himself appointed as a New Jersey trial court judge. His outstanding service as a trial judge earned Brennan an appointment to the New Jersey Supreme Court in 1952.

After four years of service on New Jersey’s highest court, Brennan was tapped by President Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1956 to serve on the United States Supreme Court. Throughout his tenure on the nation’s highest court, Brennan interpreted the Constitution so as to provide the greatest degree of liberty and rights to individuals. In the area of capital punishment, Brennan staunchly held the position that the Constitution prohibited governments from inflicting death as punishment under any circumstances. The anti-death penalty position taken by Brennan eventually led him to be one of two justices to issue the greatest number of capital punishment dissenting opinions, memorandums, and statements than any other person to ever sit on the Supreme Court. Justice Thurgood Marshall shared this distinction with Brennan.

The anti-death penalty banner that was proudly worn by Brennan was articulated best in his concurring opinion in Furman v. Georgia, the 1972 decision that temporarily halted executions in the nation. Brennan wrote in Furman: “Today death is a uniquely and unusually severe punishment. When examined by the principles applicable under the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, death stands condemned as fatally offensive to human dignity. The punishment of death is therefore cruel and unusual, and the States may no longer inflict it as a punishment for crimes.” Brennan’s rejection of the death penalty as offensive to human dignity was underscored by his concern that the death penalty was inflicted almost exclusively on the poor and, in large measure, upon minorities. On July 24, 1997, Brennan died.

Brewer, David Josiah David Josiah Brewer served as an associate justice on the United States Supreme Court from 1890 to 1910. While on the Supreme Court, Brewer was known as a liberal interpreter of the Constitution, with respect to individual liberties and rights.

Brewer was born in Turkey, where his father worked as a missionary, on June 20, 1837. Brewer received an undergraduate degree from Yale in 1856. He went on to Albany Law School where he obtained a law degree in 1858. A few years after law school, Brewer ventured west and settled in Kansas. While in Kansas he served in various judicial positions before being elected to the Kansas Supreme Court in 1870. Brewer would eventually serve as a federal judge before President William H. Harrison nominated him to the federal Supreme Court in 1890.

Brewer wrote a number of capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. His reputation for liberally construing the Constitution when individual rights were involved did not carry over into capital punishment cases. Brewer revealed a conservative trend in favor of the government when writing capital punishment opinions. An example of his conservative approach to the Constitution in capital punishment cases may be gleaned from the decision in Perovich v. United States. In Perovich, the defendant contended that due process of law was violated when the jury convicted him of capital murder, even though no direct proof of the identify of the person murdered was given. Brewer wrote in Perovich as follows: "While it is true there was no witness to the homicide and the identification of the body found in the cabin was not perfect, owing to its condition, caused by fire, yet, taking all the circumstances together, there was clearly enough to warrant the jury in finding that the partially burned body was that of [the named victim] and that he had been killed by the defendant." Brewer died in office on March 28, 1910.

Breyer, Stephen G. Stephen G. Breyer was appointed to the United States Supreme Court in 1994. The opinions by Breyer have evidenced a pragmatic and moderate judicial philosophy.

Breyer was born in San Francisco on August 15, 1938. Prior to attending Harvard Law School, Breyer obtained an A.B. degree from Stanford University and a B.A. degree from Oxford University. Breyer received his law degree from Harvard in 1964.

Prior to his elevation to the Supreme Court, Breyer engaged in a variety of legal work. He clerked for Supreme Court Justice Arthur J. Goldberg after leaving law school. Breyer left his clerkship position after two years and became an assistant U.S. Attorney General. During his employment with the Attorney General's office, Breyer managed to teach courses at Harvard Law School. Breyer was an aide to Senator Edward M. Kennedy during the 1970s, as well as chief counsel for the Senate Judiciary Committee. President Jimmy Carter nominated Breyer to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, but he was confirmed by the Senate under the administration of President Ronald Reagan. As a Court of Appeals judge, Breyer was viewed as a moderate.

In 1994, President Clinton selected Breyer to fill a vacancy on the Supreme Court. The Senate confirmed the nomination on July 29, 1994. Breyer has written a few opinions in capital punishment cases for the Supreme Court. His opinions indicate a moderate position in capital punishment cases. For example, in Lonchar v. Thomas, Breyer did not allow a federal Court of Appeals to discard procedural rules and impose equitable principles in order to expedite the execution of a prisoner. In Deck v. Missouri, Breyer held that the federal Constitution prohibited routinely placing visible restraints on defendants during the guilt and penalty phase of capital punishment proceedings. In the opinion, Breyer wrote that the use of visible shackles during the penalty phase of a capital prosecution "inevitably undermines the jury's ability to weigh accurately all relevant considerations — considerations that are often unquantifiable and elusive — when it determines whether a defendant deserves death. In these ways, the use of shackles can be a 'thumb [on] death's side of the scale.'"

British Democratic Dictatorship Party The British Democratic Dictatorship Party (BDDP) is a political group existing in England. The BDDP was founded in 1983. The chairman of BDDP, Dr. Richard Turner, has been an outspoken proponent of capital punishment. Although England abolished the death penalty for all crimes in 1998, BDDP has maintained a platform advocating capital punishment.

Dr. Turner has written extensively on the merits of capital punishment and has, in many ways, grafted his pro-death penalty ideology as a centerpiece of BDDP. The BDDP takes the position that prison is nothing more than a “hotel” for capital offenders that wastes taxpayer money. The party advocates public executions as a source of revenue. The BDDP does not hold a seat in Parliament, but has actively sought such representation. The membership of BDDP is estimated to be between 1,500 to 4,200.

Brown, Henry B. Henry Billings Brown served as an associate justice on the United States Supreme Court from 1890 to 1906. While on the Supreme Court, Brown was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Brown was born on March 2, 1836, in South Lee, Massachusetts. He received an undergraduate degree from Yale University in 1856. Brown studied law at both Yale and Harvard and was eventually admitted to the bar in Michigan in 1859. While in Michigan, Brown entered private practice for a short time, lectured on the law, published a legal journal, served as an assistant United States Attorney, and served as a State judge.

President Benjamin H. Harrison nominated Brown to the Supreme Court in 1890. Brown wrote several capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. His opinions reflected a strict application of constitutional and non-constitutional principles. For example, in Alexander v. United States, he applied fundamental law which precluded forcing an attorney to disclose communication given by a client. In Alberty v. United States Brown wrote that basic legal doctrines prohibited a trial court from instructing the jury to infer a defendant’s guilt from evidence of his flight from the jurisdiction of the court. Brown died in 1913.

Brown, John John Brown was born in 1800 in Torrington, Connecticut. He grew to become a staunch opponent of American enslavement of blacks. During his early years, Brown moved about the country, settling in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York. During these years, Brown fathered twenty children. He pursued various occupations, including farmer, tanner, land speculator, and wool merchant. While living in Pennsylvania in 1834, Brown began a project to help educate free blacks. Brown moved to a black community in North Elba, New York, in 1849. This community had been established as a result of the philanthropy of Gerrit Smith, who donated land to free black families willing to clear and farm the land. In 1851, Brown helped establish the League of Gileadites, an organization that worked to protect escaped slaves from slave catchers.

Brown moved to the Kansas Territory in 1855. While there, he became the leader of an anti-slavery group that sought revenge for a pro-slavery attack against the anti-slavery town of Lawrence. Brown went to a pro-slavery town and killed five of its settlers. The Kansas Territory events helped propel Brown as a nationally famous irconcilable foe of slavery.

Brown’s intractable position on slavery led him to plan an insurrection to overthrow slavery. In October 1859, Brown led a small group of men to a United States arsenal and armory at Harper’s Ferry, Virginia (now West Virginia). Brown’s plan was to take control of the armory for weapons. On October 16, 1859, Brown put his plan in motion and, along with twenty-one confederates (five blacks and sixteen whites), raided the federal armory at Harper’s Ferry. The plot failed. On the morning of October 18, town citizens and a small group of United States soldiers led by Robert E. Lee broke down the door of the armory. Ten of Brown’s men, including two of his sons, were killed in the ensuing battle. Brown was wounded and quickly captured. He was taken to Charles Town, Virginia, where he was charged with various crimes, including treason and murder. Brown was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death by the Commonwealth of Virginia. On December 2, 1859, Brown was hanged in Charles Town.

John Brown was hanged on December 2, 1859, in Charles Town, Virginia. (Harpers Ferry National Historical Park)

Issue Presented: Whether any weight is to be given to a former refusal of certiorari by the United States Supreme Court, when a lower federal court receives the case again in a habeas corpus proceeding.

Case Holding: No weight is to be given to a former refusal of certiorari by the United States Supreme Court, when a lower federal court receives the case again in a habeas corpus proceeding.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case represented a consolidation of three cases presenting the same issues for resolution. In Case No. 32, the defendant, Brown, was convicted of rape by a North Carolina jury and sentenced to death. In Case No. 22, the defendant, Speller, was convicted of rape by a North Carolina jury and sentenced to death. Case No. 20 involved two defendants who were convicted of murder by a North Carolina jury and sentenced to death.

All four defendants were black. They each had exhausted their State post-conviction remedies. On direct appeal to the United States Supreme Court, certiorari was refused for each defendant. All four defendants filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court alleging that their confessions were involuntary and that blacks were systematically excluded from serving on their juries. The district court denied relief to each defendant and, in doing so, gave weight to the fact that the Supreme Court had previously denied certiorari to each case. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the decision. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Reed: Justice Reed held that a denial of certiorari by the Court (with no statement of reasons therefore) to review a decision of a State court affirming a conviction in a criminal prosecution, should be given no weight by a federal court in passing upon a defendant's petition for habeas relief. It was said that although, in each of the cases presented, the district court erroneously gave consideration to the Court's prior denial of certiorari, it affirmatively appeared from the record that the error could not have affected the result and such error may be and was disregarded as harmless.

In turning to the merits of the claims made by the defendants, Justice Reed found that the defendants' constitutional rights were not violated, either by their confessions or in the selection of jurors. The opinion held that: "Our Constitution requires that jurors be selected without inclusion or exclusion because of race. There must be neither limitation nor representation for color. By that practice, harmony has an opportunity to maintain essential discipline, without that objectionable domination which is so inconsistent with our constitutional democracy." The judgments of the Court of Appeals were affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Jackson: Justice Jackson concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to indicate the circumstances under which he believed a lower federal court should entertain a habeas petition. Justice Jackson stated that habeas petitions should be reviewed on the merits only if: (1) the petition raises a jurisdictional question involving federal law on which the state law allowed no access to its courts, either by habeas corpus or appeal from the conviction; or (2) the petition shows that although the law allows a remedy, the defendant was actually improperly obstructed from making a record upon which the question could be presented. He concluded: "There may be circumstances so extraordinary that I do not now think of them which would justify a departure from this rule, but the run-of-the-mill case certainly does not."

Concurring Statement by Justice Burton and Clark, J.: Justices Burton and Clark issued a concurring statement indicating that they believed no weight should be accorded a denial of certiorari.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Black, in Which Douglas, J., Joined: Justice Black dissented from the Court's decision. In doing so, he stated his position as follows: "In denying habeas corpus in all the cases, the District Court felt constrained to give and did give weight to our prior denials of certiorari. So did the Court of Appeals. I agree with the Court that this was error but disagree with its holding that the error was harmless. It is true that after considering our denials of certiorari as a reason for refusing habeas corpus, the district judge attempted to pass upon the constitutional questions just as if we had not declined to review the convictions. But the record shows the difficulty of his attempt to erase this fact from his mind and I am not willing to act on the assumption that he succeeded in doing so. Both the jury and confession questions raised in these death cases have entirely too much record support to refuse relief on such a questionable assumption. I would therefore reverse and remand all the cases for the district judge to consider and appraise the issues free from his erroneous belief that this Court decided them against petitioners by denying certiorari."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Black and Douglas, JJ., Joined: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the Court was in error in finding the lower courts did not prejudice the cases by giving weight to the Court's denial of certiorari. Justice Frankfurter wrote:

The Court is holding today that a denial of certiorari in habeas corpus cases is without substantive significance. The Court of Appeals sustained denials of applications for writs of habeas corpus chiefly because it treated our denial of a petition for certiorari from the original conviction in each of these cases as a review on the merits and a rejection of the constitutional claims asserted by these petitioners. In short, while the only significance of the denials of certiorari was a refusal to review, the Court of Appeals, for all practical purposes, though disavowing the full technical import of res judicata, treated substantively empty denials as though this Court had examined and approved the holdings of the Supreme Court of North Carolina....

I cannot protest too strongly against affirming a decision of the Court of Appeals patently based on the ground that that court was foreclosed on procedural grounds from considering the merits of constitutional claims, when we now decide that the court was wrong in believing that it was so foreclosed. The affirmance by this Court of the District Court's denial of writs of habeas corpus in these cases is all the more vulnerable in that this Court, without guidance from the Court of Appeals, proceeds to consider the merits of the constitutional claim. This Court concludes that there was not a systematic discrimination.... If this Court deemed it necessary to consider the merits, the merits should equally have been open to the Court of Appeals. As I have already indicated, that court is far better situated than we are to assess the circumstances of jury selection in North Carolina and to draw the appropriate inferences.

Issue Presented: Whether the confessions given by the defendants were obtained in violation of the federal Constitution.

Case Holding: The confessions given by the defendants were obtained in violation of the federal Constitution; therefore, the judgments against them could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved three defendants, Ed Brown, Henry Shields, and a defendant named only as Ellington. The defendants were convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Mississippi. The Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the judgments. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendants' contention that their confessions were involuntary. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Hughes: The Chief Justice held that the confessions given by the defendants were obtained in violation of the Constitution. The opinion set out the circumstances of the confessions as follows:

On [the night of the murder] one Dial, a deputy sheriff, accompanied by others, came to the home of Ellington, one of the defendants, and requested him to accompany them to the house of the deceased, and there a number of white men were gathered, who began to accuse the defendant of the crime. Upon his denial they seized him, and with the participation of the deputy they hanged him by a rope to the limb of a tree, and, having let him down, they hung him again, and when he was let down the second time, and he still protested his innocence, he was tied to a tree and whipped, and, still declining to accede to the demands that he confess, he was finally released, and he returned with some difficulty to his home, suffering intense pain and agony. The record of the testimony shows that the signs of the rope on his neck were plainly visible during the so-called trial. A day or two thereafter the said deputy, accompanied by another, returned to the home of the said defendant and arrested him, and departed with the prisoner towards the jail in an adjoining county, but went by a route which led into the state of Alabama; and while on the way, in that state, the deputy stopped and again severely whipped the defendant, declaring that he would continue the whipping until he confessed, and the defendant then agreed to confess to such a statement as the deputy would dictate, and he did so, after which he was delivered to jail.

The other two defendants, Ed Brown and Henry Shields, were also arrested and taken to the same jail. On Sunday night, April 1, 1934, the same deputy, accompanied by a number of white men, one of whom was also an officer, and by the jailer, came to the jail, and the two last named defendants were made to strip and they were laid over chairs and their backs were cut to pieces with a leather strap with buckles on it, and they were likewise made by the said deputy definitely to understand that the whipping would be continued unless and until they confessed, and not only confessed, but confessed in every matter of detail as demanded by those present; and in this manner the defendants confessed to the crime, and, as the whippings progressed and were repeated, they changed or adjusted their confession in all particulars of detail so as to conform to the demands of their torturers. When the confessions had been obtained in the exact form and contents as desired by the mob, they left with the parting admonition and warning that, if the defendants changed their story at any time in any respect from that last stated, the perpetrators of the outrage would administer the same or equally effective treatment.

After setting forth the facts surrounding the defendants' confessions, the chief justice went on to explain the legal basis for reversing the judgments:

The state is free to regulate the procedure of its courts in accordance with its own conceptions of policy, unless in so doing it offends some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental. The state may abolish trial by jury. It may dispense with indictment by a grand jury and substitute complaint or information. But the freedom of the state in establishing its policy is the freedom of constitutional government and is limited by the requirement of due process of law. Because a state may dispense with a jury trial, it does not follow that it may substitute trial by ordeal. The rack and torture chamber may not be substituted for the witness stand. The state may not permit an accused to be hurried to conviction under mob domination — where the whole proceeding is but a mask — without supplying corrective process. The state may not deny to the accused the aid of counsel. Nor may a state, through the action of its officers, contrive a conviction through the pretense of a trial which in truth is but used as a means of depriving a defendant of liberty through a deliberate deception of court and jury by the presentation of testimony known to be perjured. And the trial equally is a mere pretense where the state authorities have contrived a conviction resting solely upon confessions obtained by violence. The due process clause requires that state action, whether through one agency or another, shall be consistent with the fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions. It would be difficult to conceive of methods more revolting to the sense of justice than those taken to procure the confessions of these [defendants], and the use of the confessions thus obtained as the basis for conviction and sentence was a clear denial of due process....

Coercing the supposed state's criminals into confessions and using such confessions so coerced from them against them in trials has been the curse of all countries. It was the chief iniquity, the crowning infamy of the Star Chamber, and the Inquisition, and other similar institutions. The Constitution recognized the evils that lay behind these practices and prohibited them in this country.... The duty of maintaining constitutional rights of a person on trial for his life rises above mere rules of procedure, and wherever the court is clearly satisfied that such violations exist, it will refuse to sanction such violations and will apply the corrective.

Issue Presented: Whether use of a struck jury deprived the defendant of due process of law.

Case Holding: Use of a struck jury did not deprive the defendant of due process of law and did not present an issue cognizable under the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, James K. Brown, was indicted for capital murder by the State of New Jersey. The jury used in the defendant's trial was selected under a seldom used statute providing for a "struck jury." The procedure for using a "struck jury" involved compiling a list of ninety-six names of potential jurors and letting the defendant and prosecutor each strike twenty-four names from the list. The remaining forty-eight names formed the pool from which the twelve-person jury was ultimately chosen.

The jury selected for the defendant's case found him guilty and he was sentenced to death. The New Jersey Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the "struck jury" procedure denied him due process of law. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer held that New Jersey's statutory provision for a struck jury was a State matter with which the Constitution could not be used to interfere. The opinion reasoned as follows:

In providing for a trial by a struck jury, impaneled in accordance with the provisions of the New Jersey statute, no fundamental right of the defendant is trespassed upon. The manner of selection is one calculated to secure an impartial jury, and the purpose of criminal procedure is not to enable the defendant to select jurors, but to secure an impartial jury. The accused cannot complain if he is still tried by an impartial jury. He can demand nothing more. The right to challenge is the right to reject, not to select, a juror. If from those who remain an impartial jury is obtained, the constitutional right of the accused is maintained.... Within any and all definitions, trial by a struck jury in the manner prescribed must, when authorized by a statute valid under the Constitution of the state, be adjudged due process. A struck jury was not unknown to the common law, though, as urged by counsel for [the defendant], it may never have been resorted to in trials for murder. But if appropriate for and used in criminal trials for certain offenses, it could hardly be deemed essentially bad when applied to other offenses. It gives the defendant a reasonable opportunity to ascertain the qualifications of proposed jurors, and to protect himself against any supposed prejudices in the mind of any particular individual called as a juror. Whether better or no than any other method, it is certainly a fair and reasonable way of securing an impartial jury, was provided for by the laws of the state, and that is all that due process in this respect requires.

The judgment of the New Jersey Supreme Court was affirmed.

Brown v. Payton Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Brown v. Payton, 544 U.S. 133 (2005); Argued: November 10, 2004; Decided: March 22, 2005; Opinion of the Court: Justice Kennedy; Concurring Opinion: Justice Scalia, in which Thomas, J., joined; Concurring Opinion: Justice Breyer; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Souter, in which Stevens and Ginsburg, JJ., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: Dean R. Issue Presented: Whether reversible error occurred during the penalty phase when the prosecutor argued that the jury could not consider post-crime mitigating evidence.

Case Holding: Although it was error for the prosecutor to argue that the jury could not consider post-crime mitigating evidence, this error was harmless.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of California charged William Charles Payton with the 1980 rape and murder of Pamela Montgomery and the attempted murder of two other victims. A jury convicted Payton of all charges. During the penalty phase, Payton put on mitigating evidence showing that he had embraced religion while in jail. The prosecutor argued to the jury that it could not consider post-crime mitigating conduct. The prosecutor also put on penalty phase aggravating evidence showing that Payton had previously been convicted of rape, he had once stabbed his girlfriend, he had a prior drug conviction, and he had made statements indicating he viewed all women as potential victims to stab and rape. The jury recommended the death penalty for the murder and the trial court imposed the sentence.

Payton's conviction and sentence were affirmed by the California Supreme Court. Subsequent to that decision, Payton filed a federal habeas corpus petition arguing that his sentence should be reversed because the prosecutor informed the jury that it could not consider post-crime mitigating evidence. A federal district judge agreed that error occurred because of the prosecutor's argument and reversed the sentence. A three-judge panel on a federal Court of Appeals affirmed the reversal. However, the United States Supreme Court set aside the panel's ruling and asked that it be reconsidered. The case was reconsidered by the Court of Appeals, en banc, but the district judge's decision was once again affirmed. The Supreme Court granted certiorari to the State.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy found that under the Supreme Court's decision in Boyde v. California, pre-crime and post-crime mitigating evidence could be presented by a defendant during the penalty phase. The opinion pointed out that the text of a provision in the State's death penalty statute provided for such evidence to be presented. Justice Kennedy therefore found that it was error for the prosecutor to inform the jury that it could not consider post-crime mitigating evidence. However, the opinion indicated that "it was not unreasonable to find that the jurors did not likely believe Payton's mitigation evidence beyond their reach." Justice Kennedy wrote further as follows:

To be sure, the prosecutor advocated a narrow interpretation of [the law], an interpretation that neither party accepts as correct. There is, however, no indication that the prosecutor's argument was made in bad faith, nor does Payton suggest otherwise. In addition, the first time the jury was exposed to the prosecutor's narrow and incorrect view of [the law], it had already heard the entirety of Payton's mitigating evidence....

The jury was not left without any judicial direction. Before it began deliberations as to what penalty was appropriate, the court instructed it to consider all evidence received "during any part of the trial in this case, except as you may be hereafter instructed," and it was not thereafter instructed to disregard anything....

Testimony about a religious conversion spanning one year and nine months may well have been considered altogether insignificant in light of the brutality of the crimes, the prior offenses, and a proclivity for committing violent acts against women. It was not unreasonable for the state court to determine that the jury most likely believed that the evidence in mitigation ... was simply too insubstantial to overcome the arguments for imposing the death penalty.

The judgment of the en banc Court of Appeals was reversed and the death sentence was reinstated.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia joined the Court's opinion. He wrote separately to emphasize his "view that limiting a jury's discretion to consider all mitigating evidence does not violate the Eighth Amendment."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Breyer: Justice Breyer joined the Court's decision. He wrote separately to point out that "a federal judge must leave in place a state-court decision unless the federal judge believes that it is contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Stevens and Ginsburg, JJ., Joined: Justice Souter dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the jury did not consider the defendant's mitigating evidence because of the prosecutor's statements. Justice Souter wrote: "[A] sentencing jury in a capital case must be able to consider and give effect to all relevant mitigating evidence a defendant offers for a sentence less than death. The prosecutor in Payton's case effectively negated this principle in arguing repeatedly to the jury that the law required it to disregard Payton's mitigating evidence of postcrime religious conversion and rehabilitation." *See also Ayers v. Issue Presented: Whether the invalidity of two out of four special circumstances found by a jury to make a defendant eligible for the death penalty affected the constitutionality of the death sentence ultimately imposed.

Case Holding: The invalidity of two special circumstances found by a jury to make a defendant eligible for the death penalty did not affect the constitutionality of the death sentence ultimately imposed, because the facts relied upon for those two special circumstances were also used to find other valid aggravating circumstances.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ronald Sanders, was charged by the State of California with the 1981 murder of Janice Allen. During the guilt phase part of the trial, the jury found Sanders eligible for the death penalty after finding him guilty of murder that was committed under four special circumstances: murder while committing robbery, murder while committing burglary, murder of a witness to a crime, and murder that was heinous, atrocious, or cruel. During the penalty phase, the jury imposed the death penalty after considering the circumstances of the crime and the death-eligible special circumstances.

Sanders' conviction and sentence were automatically appealed the California Supreme Court. The Supreme Court found that two of the special circumstances — murder while committing burglary and murder that was heinous, atrocious, or cruel — were invalid. However, the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment because the remaining two special circumstances were valid. Sanders eventually filed a habeas corpus petition in federal court, arguing that his death sentence should be vacated because the jury considered two invalid special circumstances. The federal district court denied relief. However, a federal Court of Appeals found that the death sentence had to be reversed because of the jury's consideration of the two invalid special circumstances. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia found that the Court of Appeals committed error in reversing the death sentence. In making this finding, the opinion discussed the case law distinctions between weighing and non-weighing jurisdictions, with respect to consideration by a jury of an invalid death-eligible special circumstance or death sentence aggravating circumstance. Justice Scalia determined that the distinct rules governing this situation were needlessly complex and confusing. As a consequence, Justice Scalia fashioned a test that is to be used generally when considering any type of invalid factors in both weighing and non-weighing jurisdictions. The opinion set out the test as follows:

An invalidated sentencing factor (whether an eligibility factor or not) will render the sentence unconstitutional by reason of its adding an improper element to the aggravation scale in the weighing process unless one of the other sentencing factors enables the sentencer to give aggravating weight to the same facts and circumstances.

Justice Scalia applied the new test to the facts in the case and found that the evidence used for establishing the invalid special circumstances was also needed to establish factors considered during the penalty phase. Consequently, no constitutional violation occurred in the case. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Souter, J., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that the majority should not have abolished the distinctions drawn between weighing and non-weighing jurisdictions, with respect to an invalid special circumstance or penalty phase aggravating circumstance.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Breyer, in Which Ginsburg, J., Joined: Justice Breyer dissented from the majority opinion. He agreed with the majority that there should not be a distinction between weighing and non-weighing jurisdictions. However, Justice Breyer disagreed with the majority's use of admissibility of evidence as the yardstick for deciding whether an invalid special circumstance rendered a death sentence invalid. Instead, he would require a reviewing court determine whether a jury's consideration of an invalid circumstance was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. *See also Invalid Aggravator; Zant v. Issue Presented: Whether it was reversible error to admit evidence of an unrelated conspiracy to commit murder during the defendant's trial.

Case Holding: It was reversible error to admit evidence of an unrelated conspiracy to commit murder during the defendant's trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Brown, was indicted by the United States for the murder of two deputy marshals "at the Cherokee Nation, in [Native American] Territory." The victims were killed while searching for an escaped prisoner. The victims erroneously believed the defendant was the person they were searching for and attempted to arrest him when they were killed.

During the defendant's trial, the prosecutor was allowed to present evidence that the defendant had been part of an unrelated conspiracy to murder the husband of a woman named Mrs. Hitchcock. The jury eventually convicted the defendant of killing both deputy marshals and he was sentenced to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, arguing that the testimony of the alleged conspiracy to murder Mrs. Hitchcock's husband was prejudicial and should not have been allowed into evidence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Jackson: Justice Jackson held that it was reversible error to admit the testimony of the alleged conspiracy. The opinion reasoned as follows:

[T]he court improperly admitted the ... evidence tending to establish a conspiracy between the [defendant] and [Mrs. Hitchcock] and others to kill her husband. It was furthermore objectionable because there was no evidence in the case tending to show that the defendant or his alleged co-conspirators killed either of the [deputy marshals] under the mistaken supposition that either one of them was Hitchcock. In the admission of the statements and declarations of Mrs. Hitchcock, the court assumed that the acts and declarations of one co-conspirator after the completion or abandonment of a criminal enterprise constituted proof against the defendant of the existence of the conspiracy. This is not a sound proposition of law.

Justice Jackson indicated that, assuming a conspiracy had existed, the evidence was not admissible because only those acts and declarations of a conspiracy are admissible which are done and made while the conspiracy is pending and in furtherance of its object. It was said that “[a]fter the conspiracy has come to an end, whether by success or by failure, the admissions of one conspirator by way of narrative of past facts are not admissible in evidence against the others.” The judgment of the federal district court was reversed and a new trial awarded. *See also Brown v. Issue Presented: Whether the trial court erroneously instructed the jury on the lesser included offense of manslaughter.

Case Holding: The trial court erroneously instructed the jury on the lesser included offense of manslaughter; therefore, the conviction and sentence could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Brown, was indicted by the United States for the murder of two deputy marshals “at the Cherokee Nation, in [Native American] Territory.” The victims were killed while searching for an escaped prisoner. The victims erroneously believed the defendant was the person they were searching for and attempted to arrest him when they were killed. The jury eventually convicted the defendant of killing both deputy marshals and he was sentenced to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, which reversed the judgment and awarded a new trial.

On remand, the defendant was again convicted of both murders. The trial court sentenced the defendant to death for one of the murderers, but held the sentence on the second conviction in abeyance pending the defendant's appeal. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, contending that the trial court erroneously instructed the jury on the lesser included offense of manslaughter. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan found that the instruction given to the jury on murder and manslaughter was erroneous and misleading. It was said that “[t]here was some evidence before the jury which, if credited, would have justified a verdict against the defendant for manslaughter only.” However, Justice Harlan said that the trial court's instruction did not allow the jury to properly consider the evidence on manslaughter. The opinion addressed the matter as follows:

[T]he jury might well have inferred, from the instruction ... that they were at liberty to return a verdict of murder because of the way or mode in which the killing was done, even if they believed that, apart from the way in which the life of the deceased was taken, the facts made a case of manslaughter, not of murder. We do not think that a verdict of guilty of manslaughter or murder should have turned alone upon an inquiry as to the way in which the killing was done. The inquiry, rather, should have been whether, at the moment the defendant shot, there were present such circumstances, taking all of them into consideration, including the mode of killing, as made the taking of the life of the deceased manslaughter, and not murder.

The judgment of the federal district court was reversed and a new trial awarded.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendants were denied due process of law because of widespread pre-trial publicity of their trial.

Case Holding: The defendants were not denied due process of law because of widespread pre-trial publicity of their trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved the prosecution of three defendants for capital murder by the State of New York. The defendants were Louis “Lepke”

Buchalter, Case No. 606; Emanuel Weiss, Case No. 610; and Louis Capone, Case No. 619. The defendants were members of an organized crime syndicate called Murder, Inc. All three defendants were convicted and sentenced to death. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed the judgments. In doing so, the appellate court found that the defendants were not denied due process of law because of widespread pre-trial publicity surrounding their trial. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Roberts: Justice Roberts found that the defendants' trial was not held in violation of due process principles. The opinion addressed the due process doctrine as follows: "The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires that action by a state through any of its agencies must be consistent with the fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of our civil and political institutions, which not infrequently are designated as the 'law of the land.' Where this requirement has been disregarded in a criminal trial in a state court, this court has not hesitated to exercise its jurisdiction to enforce the constitutional guarantee. But the Amendment does not draw to itself the provisions of state constitutions or state laws. It leaves the states free to enforce their criminal laws under such statutory provisions and common-law doctrines as they deem appropriate; and does not permit a party to bring to the test of a decision in this court every ruling made in the course of a trial in a state court."

The opinion found that the defendants failed to show actual bias by the jury that presided at their trial. Justice Roberts held that "[t]hrough the statute governing the selection of the jurors and the court's rulings on challenges are asserted to have worked injustice in the impanelling of a jury, such assertion raises no due process question requiring review by this court." The opinion concluded "it is not asking too much that the burden of showing essential unfairness be sustained by him who claims such injustice and seeks to have the result set aside, and that it be sustained not as a matter of speculation but as a demonstrable reality." The judgments of the New York Court of Appeals were affirmed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's opinion. See also Murder, Inc.; Pre-trial Publicity

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution requires that a capital penalty phase jury be instructed on the concept of mitigating evidence generally or on particular statutory mitigating factors.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not require that a capital penalty phase jury be instructed on the concept of mitigating evidence generally or on particular statutory mitigating factors, when the jury is instructed to consider all relevant mitigating evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Douglas Buchanan, was convicted of capital murder by a Virginia jury. During the penalty phase, the defendant requested the trial judge instruct the jury on particular statutory mitigating factors and a general instruction on the concept of mitigating evidence. The trial judge refused the request. The jury returned a verdict of death and the trial judge imposed that sentence. The Virginia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus in a federal district court, alleging that the trial judge committed constitutional error in refusing to instruct the penalty phase jury on particular statutory mitigating factors and a general instruction on the concept of mitigating evidence. The district court dismissed the petition and denied relief. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the decision. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice ruled that the absence of instructions on the concept of mitigation and on particular statutorily defined mitigating factors does not violate the Constitution. It was said that during the penalty phase, the State may shape and structure the jury's consideration of mitigating evidence, so long as restrictions on the sentencing determination do not preclude the jury from giving effect to any such evidence. The opinion pointed out that the determinative standard is whether there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury applied its instructions in a way that prevented consideration of constitutionally relevant evidence. The chief justice concluded that the instructions given in the case did not violate the latter constitutional principles. It was said that the trial judge directed the jurors to base their decision on all the evidence and to impose a life sentence if they believed the evidence so warranted. Therefore, there was not a reasonable likelihood that the jurors understood the instructions to preclude consideration of relevant mitigating evidence. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's decision. He believed that there was "no reasonable likelihood that the jurors in [the defendant's] case understood the challenged instructions to preclude consideration of relevant mitigating evidence." Justice Scalia also wrote that he did not believe the Constitution required sentencing juries be given discretion to consider mitigating evidence.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Breyer, in Which Stevens and Ginsburg, JJ., Joined: Justice Breyer dissented from the Court's decision on the grounds that he believed the instructions given by the trial judge indicated that there was a reasonable likelihood that the jury understood and applied the instructions in a way that prevented it from considering relevant mitigating evidence. He argued: "To uphold the instructions given here is to 'risk that the death penalty will be imposed in spite of factors which may call for a less severe penalty.'"

Buenoano, Judias V. Judias (Judy) V. Buenoano was executed for capital murder by the State of Florida on March 30, 1998. The method of execution used was electrocution. The victim of Buenoano's capital conviction and death sentence was her husband, James Goodyear.

Judias V. Buenoano used poison to kill her husband and a boyfriend. She poisoned her son and eventually drowned him. Her last poison victim, a fiancé, survived and helped send her to Florida's electric chair in 1998. (Florida Department of Corrections)

During Buenoano's trial for the murder of Goodyear, evidence was presented which chronicled the murderous trail she left as her legacy. Trial testimony indicated that upon Goodyear's return to Florida in September 1971, from a tour of duty in Vietnam, he began suffering from nausea, vomiting, and diarrhea. He endured the symptoms for two weeks before being hospitalized at a naval hospital in Orlando on September 13, 1971. While hospitalized, Goodyear suffered fluid overload and pulmonary congestion; he died as a consequence of cardiovascular collapse and renal failure on September 16, 1971. At the time of his death, there was no suspicion of foul play.

Authorities stumbled upon the true cause of Goodyear's death through Buenoano's relationship with John Gentry. In 1981, Buenoano and Gentry began living together and later became engaged. In November 1982, Gentry caught a cold and Buenoano began treating him with vitamins. After experiencing extreme nausea and vomiting, Gentry checked into a hospital on December 15, 1982. He recovered and returned home. On the day he returned home, Buenoano began treating him with vitamins again. Gentry's nausea and vomiting returned. Gentry decided to have the vitamins chemically analyzed. The test results revealed that the vitamins contained paraformaldehyde, a class III poison.

Suspicion did not immediately center on Buenoano as a result of poison being found in the vitamins. As a result, Buenoano took the next step and had a bomb placed in Gentry's car. Gentry survived the blast. Authorities then launched a full-scale investigation into Buenoano. It was learned that the name "Buenoano" was actually taken on by her and represented a rough Spanish adaptation for "Goodyear." Authorities realized that Buenoano changed her name in order to distance herself from the death of her husband.

In 1984, Goodyear's body was exhumed. A forensic toxicologist reported that the level of arsenic found in Goodyear's liver, kidneys, hair and nails indicated chronic exposure to arsenic poison. Medical experts opined that Goodyear's death was the result of chronic arsenic poisoning occurring over a period of time.

The media dubbed Buenoano the "black widow" because of the murder of her husband, the murder of a boyfriend, and the attempted murder of her fiancé. In between the murders and attempted murder, Buenoano murdered her nineteen-year-old son. In March 1984, a Florida jury convicted Buenoano of drowning her son and she was sentenced to life imprisonment. In October 1984, a Florida jury convicted her of the attempted murder of her fiancé and she was sentenced to imprisonment for a term of years. In November 1985, she was found guilty by an Orlando jury of the murder of her husband and sentenced to death.

Trial evidence indicated that Buenoano's son died from drowning on May 13, 1980. His body was eventually exhumed by authorities. It was discovered that her son, who had been paralyzed, was poisoned with arsenic and that the arsenic may have caused his paralysis. Eventually, authorities prosecuted Buenoano for the murder of her son on the theory that she pushed him out of a canoe.

There was also trial evidence showing that Bobby Joe Morris, the man whom Buenoano lived with immediately after Goodyear's death, became ill and died after exhibiting symptoms of vomiting, nausea, and fever. Morris's body was exhumed in 1984. Tissue analysis of Morris's remains revealed acute arsenic poisoning. Buenoano was not prosecuted for Morris' death.

Other trial evidence showed that Buenoano collected the benefits from various life insurance policies on Goodyear's life totaling $33,000. Buenoano also received $62,000 in dependency compensation from the Veterans Administration. After Morris's death, Buenoano received insurance money from three separate policies on his life totaling $23,000. After her son's death, Buenoano collected $125,000 in life insurance proceeds. Buenoano also owned a life insurance policy on Gentry's life totaling $510,000. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Issue Presented: Whether the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibits the State from seeking the death penalty at a second trial of a defendant, when a defendant is granted a new trial and the jury rejected imposition of the death penalty at the first trial.

Case Holding: When a capital penalty phase jury rejects imposition of the death penalty and imposes a lesser punishment on a defendant at a new trial granted to the defendant, the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibits the State from seeking the death penalty at the new trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: In December 1977, the defendant, Robert Bullington, was indicted by the State of Missouri for capital murder. The guilt phase of the defendant's trial resulted in a verdict of guilty of capital murder. The penalty phase jury rejected the death penalty and returned a verdict fixing his punishment at life imprisonment. However, the defendant was granted a new trial. Before the new trial was held, the prosecutor announced it would once again seek the death penalty. The defendant filed a motion with the trial court requesting the prosecutor be prohibited from seeking the death penalty at the second trial based on federal constitutional double jeopardy grounds. The trial court granted the motion and barred the prosecutor from seeking the death penalty. The prosecutor requested a writ of prohibition from the Missouri Court of Appeals to prohibit the trial court from preventing him from seeking the death penalty at the second trial. The Missouri Court of Appeals denied the prosecutor's request for a writ of prohibition. However, the Missouri Supreme Court ultimately granted the prosecutor a writ of prohibition against the trial court. The United States Supreme Court thereafter granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Blackmun: The initial task that Justice Blackmun undertook was to limit the application of Stroud v. United States, 251 U.S. 15 (1919). The decision in Stroud concerned a defendant who was convicted of first-degree murder and sentenced to life imprisonment. However, the conviction in Stroud was reversed a new trial was granted. At the second trial, the defendant was again convicted, but the punishment imposed was the death penalty. The defendant in Stroud argued to the United States Supreme Court that the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibited the jury from imposing the death penalty at the second trial. In a unanimous decision in that case, it was "held that the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment did not bar the imposition of the death penalty when Stroud at his new trial was again convicted."

Rather than overrule Stroud, Justice Blackmun distinguished it from Bullington's case. The opinion noted that when the Stroud decision was rendered, capital punishment prosecutions did not involve independent guilt phase and penalty phase stages. During the Stroud era of capital punishment, which extended to 1972, capital prosecutions were basically unitary proceedings, with no elaborate penalty phase proceeding. However, under modern capital punishment, it has been found that the Constitution requires utilization of a penalty phase proceeding for the purpose of allowing capital defendants to present mitigating evidence. With this distinction in view, Justice Blackmun found that Stroud was not controlling on the outcome of Bullington's case.

The opinion noted that capital punishment penalty phase proceedings have the hallmarks of a trial on guilt or innocence. It was said that the general rule which holds that a defendant may not be retried if he or she obtains a reversal of his or her conviction on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to convict is relevant to capital sentencing schemes. Under modern capital sentencing requirements, a sentence of life imprisonment by a penalty phase jury means that the jury has acquitted a defendant of whatever was necessary to impose the death sentence. Under such a scheme, double jeopardy principles bar consideration of the death penalty upon a second trial. The judgment of the Missouri Supreme Court was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Powell, in Which Burger, C J., and White and Rehnquist, JJ., Joined: Justice Powell argued that the decision in the case was controlled by Stroud and its progeny. The dissent observed: "Since Stroud, it has been settled that a defendant whose conviction is reversed may receive a more severe sentence upon retrial than he received at his first trial." Justice Powell believed that the double jeopardy principles used for considering an acquittal on guilt or innocence as absolutely final simply do not apply equally to a sentencing decision: "The possibility of a higher sentence is acceptable under the Double Jeopardy Clause." Therefore, Justice Blackmun would have affirmed the decision of the Missouri Supreme Court. See also Arizona v. Rumsey; Poland v. Arizona; *Sattazahn v. Bundy, Theodore Theodore Bundy was executed for three capital murders by the State of Florida on January 24, 1989. The method of execution used was electrocution. The victims of Bundy's capital convictions were Lisa Levy, Margaret Bowman, and Kimberly Leach.

Although Bundy was convicted and sentenced to death for killing three persons, authorities believed he was a serial killer who was responsible for the sex-related deaths of more than thirty-six women. Before his execution, Bundy confirmed what authorities knew but could not prove, confessing to killing thirty women from 1973 to 1978: eleven murders in Washington State, eight in Utah, three in Colorado, two in Oregon, three in Florida, two in Idaho, and one in California. Through media coverage, Bundy became America's most famous sexual serial killer.

The facts leading up to the murder of Bowman and Levy began on January 7, 1978, when Bundy rented a room near the Florida State University campus. (On December 30, 1977, Bundy had escaped confinement in Colorado while awaiting murder charges.) Bundy stalked the university area for a week before making his planned attack on female students at a sorority house.

On January 15, 1978, at approximately 3:00 A.M., a student resident at the sorority house arrived and heard the sounds of someone running down a flight of stairs. When the student approached the front entrance hall, she saw a man leaving the building with a large stick in his right hand. The man was later identified by the student as Bundy. After the student proceeded to her room, she informed her roommate of what she saw while entering the sorority house. Within moments, another student entered the room bleeding and bruised. The police and an ambulance were summoned. Authorities quickly discovered that Levy and Bowman had been killed and two other students had been severely beaten. Levy and Bowman were killed by strangulation after receiving severe beatings with a tree branch. Bowman's skull was crushed and literally torn open.

During Bundy's trial for Kimberly Leach's murder, the following facts came out. On February 9, 1978, twelve-year-old Leach was reported missing from her junior high school in Lake City, Florida. Two months later, her partially decomposed body was located in a wooded area near the Suwanee River. The child had been strangled and sexually assaulted.

By chance, Bundy was stopped by a police officer in Pensacola on February 15, 1978, when the officer realized the vehicle Bundy was driving had been reported stolen. As the officer attempted to arrest Bundy for possession of a stolen vehicle, Bundy struck the officer and fled. The officer fired at Bundy before pursuing and capturing him.

Authorities were able to connect Bundy to the deaths of Levy and Bowman based upon teeth marks left on Levy that matched Bundy's teeth prints. Authorities were able to connect Bundy to the murder of Leach based upon an eyewitness who had seen Bundy with the child. Bundy's trial for the murder of Levy and Bowman was separate from his prosecution for the murder of Leach. Bundy defended himself during both trials. See also Serial Killer Burden of Proof at Guilt Phase The doctrine of burden of proof is concerned with the degree of evidence that the law requires to be produced in order to persuade the factfinder of the truth of an allegation. If proffered evidence does not rise to the level required by the law, then the burden has not been sustained and the allegation is deemed not proven. Burden of proof, as a general proposition, means having the obligation of proffering a specific level of evidence to persuade a factfinder of the truth of an allegation.

At the guilt phase of a trial, the federal Constitution has been interpreted as requiring prosecutors to prove beyond a reasonable doubt every element of a charged offense. This burden can never shift to a defendant. The significance in having the prosecutor prove a defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt is best understood through the presumption of innocence doctrine.

Anglo-American jurisprudence affords a person charged with a crime a presumption of innocence. The presumption of innocence is a conclusion drawn by the law in favor of the defendant. The burden of proof is never upon the defendant to establish his or her innocence or to disprove the facts necessary to establish the crime for which he or she is charged. The burden of proof is on the prosecution from the beginning to the end of the trial, and applies to every element necessary to constitute the crime. What this means is that a defendant is not obligated to present any evidence at trial in order to be acquitted of a crime. For example: (1) if the prosecutor presents no evidence during a trial a defendant must be set free; (2) if evidence by a prosecutor only shows that a defendant might have committed a charged crime, the defendant must be acquitted; (3) if a the prosecutor's evidence only establishes that a defendant probably committed a charged crime, a verdict of acquittal must be rendered. In each of the latter three situations, the presumption of innocence combined with the beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard in order to render an acquittal.

Capital felons frequently challenge their convictions based upon alleged erroneous instructions to juries on the meaning of "beyond a reasonable doubt." Occasionally this challenge has proven successful, but in most instances it has failed. This is primarily true because the federal Constitution does not dictate that any particular form of words be used in advising the jury of the government's burden of proof at the guilt phase, so long as, taken as a whole, the instructions correctly convey the concept of reasonable doubt. The proper inquiry into the constitutional validity of a jury instruction on the meaning of "beyond a reasonable doubt" is not whether the instruction "could have" been applied unconstitutionally, but whether there was a reasonable likelihood that the jury in fact applied it unconstitutionally. See also Affirmative Defenses; Cage v. Louisiana; Burden of Proof at Penalty Phase; Victor v. Nebraska

Burden of Proof at Penalty Phase The issue of burden of proof at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution is not simplistic for several reasons. First, the federal Constitution does not require the burden of proof be imposed upon the prosecutor at the penalty phase. The primary reason is that no presumption of innocence exists for a defendant at the penalty phase; his or her guilt has been determined at the guilt phase. Second, the penalty phase only involves evidence of aggravating circumstances and mitigating circumstances. The prosecutor has the burden of presenting aggravating circumstances and the defendant has the burden of presenting mitigating circumstances. As a result, both parties having the burden of presenting some evidence on their respective issue, a mechanism must be used for the jury to determine how to interpret the evidence of both parties. Third, each jurisdiction is free to devise any mechanism it desires, within the limits of due process of law, for determining the interpretation to give to proven mitigating and aggravating circumstances.

The material in this section will unravel the complex nature of burden of proof at the penalty phase under three broad headings: (1) establishing the existence of aggravators and mitigators, (2) comparing proven aggravators and mitigators, and (3) determining the result of comparing proven aggravators and mitigators.

1. Establishing the Existence of Aggravators and Mitigators

a. Proving statutory aggravating circumstances exist. In the case of Woratzek v. Lewis, 863 F.Supp. 1079 (D.Ariz. 1994), the federal district court of Arizona enumerated three key points regarding statutory aggravating circumstances. First, the district court pointed out, "An aggravating factor in the penalty phase of a capital proceeding is not an element of the offense." Second, it was pointed out "that the federal constitution does not require that aggravating factors in a capital sentencing proceeding be proven beyond a reasonable doubt." The final point made by Woratzek is that "the Supreme Court ... has [not] determined what burden of proof must be satisfied when proving the existence of aggravating factors."

Whenever the Constitution is deemed silent on an issue, jurisdictions are generally free to address the matter as they deem appropriate. Capital punishment jurisdictions have responded to the Constitution's silence on the standard of proof needed to establish the existence of statutory aggravating circumstances. The majority of capital punishment jurisdictions require by statute that the existence of statutory aggravating circumstances be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

b. Proving mitigating circumstances exist. In the capital case of Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639 (1990), overruled on other grounds by Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002), the United States Supreme Court held that "a defendant's constitutional rights are not violated by placing on him the burden of proving mitigating circumstances sufficiently substantial to call for leniency." The potential harshness of imposing a burden of proof on capital felons was ameliorated by other Supreme Court rulings which held that requiring jury unanimity on the determination of whether a mitigating circumstance existed was unconstitutional. Therefore, if only one penalty phase juror finds that a capital felon carried his or her burden of proof on the existence of a mitigating circumstance, then the circumstance is deemed proven.

No capital punishment jurisdiction requires capital felons prove the existence of mitigating circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions require by statute that capital felons prove the existence of mitigating circumstances by a preponderance of evidence. One capital punishment jurisdiction, Alabama, provides by statute that the prosecutor must disprove the existence of mitigating circumstances by a preponderance of evidence. The statutes of a majority of capital punishment jurisdictions do not provide any standard of proof for establishing the existence of mitigating circumstances. This statutory silence means that capital felons merely have to raise the issue of mitigating circumstances, i.e., present some evidence on the issue.

2. Comparing Proven Aggravators and Mitigators

Determining the existence of mitigating and statutory aggravating circumstances does not end the burden-of-proof process. Once the existence hurdle is overcome, a second process is triggered: mitigating and statutory aggravating circumstances must be compared with each other. The comparison process is carried out in one of two manners: (a) weighing or (b) non-weighing.

a. Weighing jurisdictions. The Utah Supreme Court described the weighing process in State v. Wood, 648 P.2d 71 (Utah 1981), as follows:

[This] standard require[s] that the sentencing body compare the totality of the mitigating against the totality of the aggravating factors, not in terms of the relative numbers of the aggravating and the mitigating factors, but in terms of their respective substantiality and persuasiveness. Basically, what the sentencing authority must decide is how ... persuasive the totality of the mitigating factors are when compared against the totality of the aggravating factors. The sentencing body [is] making the judgment that aggravating [or mitigating] factors "outweigh," or are more [persuasive] than, the mitigating [or aggravating] factors.

Wood points out that the weighing process does not involve determining if more mitigating circumstances exist than statutory aggravating circumstances. Mere tallying is not the purpose of the weighing process. It matters not that, for example, five statutory aggravating circumstances were proven to exist, but only one mitigating circumstance is found to exist. The factfinder could still determine the mitigating circumstance outweighed the five statutory aggravating circumstances.

The United States Supreme Court noted in Harris v. Alabama, 115 S.Ct. 1031 (1995), that no "specific method for balancing mitigating and aggravating factors in a capital sentencing proceeding is constitutionally required." The "balancing" referred to in Harris is the weighing process. The result of Harris's pronouncement is that capital punishment jurisdictions may devise weighing processes as they see fit. This discretion has led to the development of two classes of weighing jurisdictions: (i) no standard of proof jurisdictions and (ii) standard of proof jurisdictions.

i. No standard of proof jurisdictions. There are two types of weighing jurisdictions that do not impose a standard of proof on the weighing process.

First, the statutes in nine capital punishment jurisdictions require that statutory aggravating circumstances outweigh mitigating circumstances. Under this process, the prosecutor has the burden of showing that statutory aggravating circumstances are more credible than mitigating circumstances. However, no standard of proof is imposed on the prosecutor. That is, in weighing mitigating and statutory aggravating circumstances, the factfinder is free to use his or her own judgment as to why statutory aggravating circumstances appear more credible than mitigating circumstances.

Second, the statutes in twelve capital punishment jurisdictions require that mitigating circumstances outweigh statutory aggravating circumstances. Under this process, the capital felon is given the burden of establishing that mitigating circumstances are more credible than statutory aggravating circumstances. The burden on the capital felon under this weighing process is lessened by the fact that no specific standard of proof is imposed upon the capital felon. The factfinder uses his or her own judgment in determining why more credibility should be given to mitigating circumstances. Further, under this process, if the evidence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances is in equipoise, the death penalty may be imposed. The equipoise possibility was found constitutional in Kansas v. Marsh, 126 S.Ct. 2516 (2006).

ii. Standard of proof jurisdictions. There are two types of weighing jurisdictions that impose a standard of proof on the weighing process. First, in two capital punishment jurisdictions, statutory aggravating circumstances are required to outweigh mitigating circumstances by a preponderance of evidence. These jurisdictions impose the burden of proof on the prosecutor. More significantly, the prosecutor is required to persuade the factfinder by a preponderance of evidence that the statutory aggravating circumstances outweigh the mitigating circumstances.

Second, in six capital punishment jurisdictions, statutory aggravating circumstances must outweigh mitigating circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt. Under this process the prosecutor is strapped with the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the statutory aggravating circumstances outweigh the mitigating circumstances.

b. Non-weighing jurisdictions. The South Carolina Supreme Court held in State v. Bellamy, 359 S.E.2d 63 (S.C. 1987), that the penalty phase jury should not be instructed to weigh statutory aggravating circumstances against mitigating circumstances. Instead, the jury had to be instructed merely to consider the mitigating and statutory aggravating circumstances. The holding in Bellamy was in accord with a ruling by the Supreme Court in Zant v. Stephens, 462 U.S. 862 (1983), that the Constitution does not require weighing mitigating and statutory aggravating circumstances. The decision in Zant fostered what are called non-weighing capital punishment jurisdictions. There are nine non-weighing capital punishment jurisdictions.

In non-weighing jurisdictions, the factfinder is not instructed or guided on how to compare mitigating and statutory aggravating circumstances. As explained in Bellamy, the factfinder in a non-weighing jurisdiction is instructed merely to consider the proffered circumstances for sufficiency. The non-weighing process has developed along three different lines.

First, there are seven non-weighing jurisdictions that require nothing more than the penalty phase factfinder determine whether sufficient mitigating circumstances exist to warrant leniency. The method for making this "sufficiency determination" is left up to the factfinder. Additionally, this particular non-weighing process does not have a standard of proof for measuring sufficiency. The factfinder is allowed to determine for him- or herself what constitutes sufficiency. The burden of proving sufficiency is on the capital felon.

Second, one capital punishment jurisdiction utilizing the non-weighting process requires the factfinder determine whether sufficient mitigating circumstances do not exist beyond a reasonable doubt. In making its sufficiency determination under this process, the factfinder is provided with a standard of proof for measuring sufficiency. The beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard of proof is used. The burden of proof is placed on the prosecutor. The prosecutor must persuade the factfinder that mitigating circumstances are not sufficient beyond a reasonable doubt.

Finally, one capital punishment jurisdiction requires only that the factfinder determine if at least one mitigating circumstance was proven to exist. Nothing else is required under this process.

3. Determining the Result of Comparing Proven Aggravators and Mitigators

In Boyd v. California, 494 U.S. 370 (1990), the United States Supreme Court held that there was no constitutional requirement that a penalty phase jury must be instructed that it can decline to impose the death penalty, even if it decided that statutory aggravating circumstances outweighed mitigating circumstances. The Boyd holding has been interpreted to mean that, once a weighing or sufficiency determination has been made that is favorable to the prosecutor, the Constitution permits the death penalty to be imposed. Nothing further is constitutionally required. The Boyd decision has promoted two types of jurisdictions: (a) death automatic jurisdictions and (b) death discretionary jurisdictions.

a. Death automatic jurisdictions. A majority of all capital punishment jurisdictions require that death must be imposed once a weighing or sufficiency determination is made that is favorable to the prosecutor. There are seventeen weighing capital punishment jurisdictions that require the death penalty be imposed if the weighing process is favorable to the prosecutor. In three non-weighting jurisdictions, no discretion is given to the factfinder once a pro-prosecutor determination is made. The death penalty must be imposed once a sufficiency determination is made that is favorable to the prosecutor.

b. Death discretionary jurisdictions. Notwithstanding a weighing or sufficiency determination that is favorable to the prosecutor, a large majority of all capital punishment jurisdictions provide discretion to the factfinder. The factfinder can refuse to impose the death penalty even though the weighing or sufficiency determination was favorable to the prosecutor.

In fifteen weighing capital punishment jurisdictions, the factfinder may reject imposing the death penalty on the capital felon, even though the weighing process called for imposition of the death penalty. In four non-weighting capital punishment jurisdictions, the factfinder is given death discretion once it makes a sufficiency determination that is favorable to the prosecutor. In these jurisdictions, the capital felon may be spared the death penalty, notwithstanding the fact that the sufficiency determination called for death. See also Burden of Proof at Guilt Phase; Invalid Aggravator; Presumption of Innocence of Aggravators

Boleyn on brief; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: None; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: None

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant received ineffective assistance of counsel based upon an alleged conflict of interest and failure to present mitigating evidence at the penalty phase.

Case Holding: The defendant failed to establish a conflict of interest by his counsel and failed to show that his counsel's decision not to put on the sparse available mitigating evidence was an unreasonable decision.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Christopher Burger, was convicted and sentenced for capital murder by the State of Georgia. A co-defendant was involved in the murder and was tried separately. Counsel for the defendant and counsel for the co-defendant worked in the same law firm. Although the defendant was able to have his death sentence reversed by the Georgia Supreme Court, the defendant was subsequently re-sentenced to death.

After exhausting State collateral remedies, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The defendant alleged ineffective assistance of counsel on the grounds that his attorney had a conflict of interest in representing him while his law party represented the co-defendant and that his attorney failed to present any mitigating circumstances at either penalty phase hearing he had. The district court dismissed the petition. A Court of Appeals ultimately affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens ruled that there was no merit to the defendant's ineffective assistance claim based on defense counsel's alleged conflict of interest. The opinion found that even assuming that law partners are to be considered as one attorney in determining such a claim, permitting a single attorney to represent co-defendants is not per se violative of constitutional guarantees of effective assistance of counsel. It was said that any overlap or shared work by the attorneys did not so infect the legal representation as to constitute an active representation of competing interests.

The opinion also rejected the defendant's ineffective assistance claim on the ground that his attorney failed to develop and present any mitigating evidence at either of the two sentencing hearings. It was said that the evidence that might have been presented would have disclosed that the defendant had an exceptionally unhappy and unstable childhood. Based on interviews with the defendant, his mother, and others, defense counsel decided that the defendant's interest would not be served by presenting such evidence. Justice Stevens held that this decision was supported by reasonable professional judgment. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Brennan, Marshall, and Powell, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun dissented from the majority opinion. He wrote: "In Strickland v. Washington, this Court set forth the standards that are to govern a court's consideration of a criminal defendant's claims that he has been denied his Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel. Burger presents two such claims in this case. I believe each claim meets those specified standards for establishing a constitutional violation. Each therefore calls for a grant of the federal habeas corpus relief sought by [him]. Accordingly, I dissent from the Court's judgment that denies such relief."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Powell, in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Powell dissented on the basis that the defendant established one of his claims. He wrote: "I would reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals on the ground that counsel unreasonably failed to investigate and present to the sentencing jury available mitigating evidence that would have raised a substantial question whether the sentence of death should have been imposed.... I therefore do not reach the question whether there was a conflict of interest resulting from the fact that two law partners represented Burger and [his co-defendant] in their separate trials." Burger, Warren Earl Warren Earl Burger served as chief justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1969 to 1986. While on the Supreme Court, Burger was known as a centrist who never strayed to the left or right in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Burger was born in St. Paul, Minnesota, on September 17, 1907. The humble background of his family caused Burger to resort to nontraditional means for obtaining an education. As a result of financial difficulties, he was unable to accept a scholarship that would have taken him to Princeton University. Instead, Burger worked as an insurance agent while taking undergraduate extension courses from the University of Minnesota. He eventually received a law degree from St. Paul College of Law in 1931, while taking night law school classes.

Burger's career as a private attorney was modest and uneventful. His path to the Supreme Court did not begin in earnest until his appointment in 1952 as an assistant United States Attorney General. That position landed him an appointment in 1956 as an appellate judge on the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. In 1969, President Richard M. Nixon appointed Burger as chief justice of the Supreme Court.

During Burger's tenure as chief justice, he wrote a number of opinions in capital punishment cases. The centrist legal philosophy that became Burger's legacy was evident in capital punishment cases in the manner in which he voted; however, his written opinions in this area tended to lean toward the conservative side of the legal spectrum. This was never more evident than in Burger's dissenting opinion in Furman v. Georgia. The decision in Furman halted executions in the nation on the grounds that juries were permitted to determine arbitrarily who would receive a death sentence. Burger addressed the issue in his dissenting opinion as follows: "The selectivity of juries in imposing the punishment of death is properly viewed as a refinement on, rather than a repudiation of, the statutory authorization for that penalty.... Given the general awareness that death is no longer a routine punishment for the crimes for which it is made available, it is hardly surprising that juries have been increasingly meticulous in their imposition of the penalty. But to assume from the mere fact of relative infrequency that only a random assortment of pariahs are sentenced to death, is to cast grave doubt on the basic integrity of our jury system." Burger died on June 25, 1995.

Burglary The crime of burglary was defined by the common law as breaking and entering the dwelling of another, at night, with the intent to commit a felony. Most jurisdictions have expanded the common-law definition of burglary to include its commission during the day and in structures other than a dwelling. Burglary, without more, cannot be used to inflict the death penalty. The Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits this as cruel and unusual punishment. However, the crime of burglary can play a role in a capital prosecution. If burglary occurs during the commission of a homicide it may form the basis of a death-eligible offense and therefore trigger a capital prosecution. Burglary Aggravator The crime of burglary committed during the course of a homicide is a statutory aggravating circumstance in a majority of capital punishment jurisdictions. As a statutory aggravating circumstance, evidence of burglary is used at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution for the factfinder to consider in determining whether to impose the death penalty. Burkina Faso Capital punishment is carried out in the nation of Burkina Faso. The firing squad is used to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on French civil law system and customary law. The nation's constitution came into existence on June 2, 1991. The political structure of Burkina Faso consists of an executive branch, bicameral legislative branch, and judicial branch.

Under the nation's constitution, the judicial system is composed of a supreme court, two Courts of Appeal, and ten provincial (trial) courts. There is also the High Court of Justice, with authority to try the president and senior government officials for treason and other serious crimes. In addition to the constitutional courts, customary or traditional courts, presided over by village chiefs, handle many local problems, such as divorce and inheritance disputes. Defendants are constitutionally entitled to public trials, access to counsel, bail, and appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Burma Capital punishment is carried out in Burma (Myanmar). Burma uses hanging as the method of carrying out the death penalty. Burma has a legal system that has remnants of the British-era legal system. The nation's constitution was adopted on January 3, 1974, but has been suspended since September 18, 1988.

The court system is composed of trial courts and a supreme court. Defendants have the right to a public trial, to legal counsel, and to cross-examine witnesses. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether federal courts may review anew, in habeas corpus proceedings, the decision of military courts.

Case Holding: Federal courts must defer to the decisions reached by military courts in proceedings that fairly and fully addressed issues raised by defendants in habeas corpus petitions.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, Robert Burns, Calvin Dennis, and Herman Dennis, were tried separately by court martial for murder and rape. They were each found guilty and sentenced to death. After exhausting all remedies available to them under the Articles of War, the defendants applied to a federal district court for writs of habeas corpus, alleging that they had been subjected to illegal detention; that coerced confessions had been extorted from them; that they had been denied counsel of their choice and denied effective representation; that the military authorities had suppressed evidence favorable to them and procured perjured testimony against them; and that their trials were conducted in an atmosphere of terror and vengeance, conducive to mob violence instead of fair play. The district court denied relief summarily without taking evidence. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the decision. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Chief Justice Vinson Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Reed, Burton, and Clark, JJ., Joined: The chief justice held that the defendants received a fair trial and review of their cases by military courts. The opinion indicated that the statute which vests federal courts with jurisdiction over applications for habeas corpus from persons confined by the military courts is the same statute which vests federal courts with jurisdiction over the applications of persons confined by the civil courts. However, the chief justice was of the opinion that in military habeas corpus, the inquiry and the scope of matters open for review by federal courts was more narrow than in civil law cases. He wrote that the law which governed a civil court in the exercise of its jurisdiction over military habeas corpus applications could not be assimilated to the law which governed the exercise of that power in other instances.

It was said that military law, like State law, was a jurisprudence which existed separate and apart from the law which governed the federal judicial process. The chief justice noted that historically the Court had played no role in the development of military law and exerted no supervisory power over the courts which enforce military law. He reasoned that the rights of persons in the armed forces must be conditioned to meet certain overriding demands of discipline and duty and civil courts are not the agencies which must determine the precise balance to be struck in that adjustment.

The chief justice believed that in military habeas corpus cases, even more than in State habeas corpus cases, it would be in disregard of the statutory scheme if the federal civil courts failed to give deference to prior military review proceedings. He stated that Congress had provided that military court martial determinations were final and binding upon all courts. The opinion stated further that the mere fact of habeas jurisdiction by federal courts over military court martial proceedings did not mean that when a military decision dealt fully and fairly with an allegation raised in a habeas petition, it was still open to a federal civil court to grant habeas simply to re-evaluate the evidence.

The opinion recognized the seriousness of the allegations raised by the defendants, but found that the military courts fully and fairly considered the claims. Accordingly, the chief justice indicated that it was not the duty of the civil courts simply to repeat that process. He wrote that habeas review must be limited to determining whether the military gave fair consideration to each claim raised. The opinion concluded that military courts gave fair consideration to each of the claims raised by the defendants in their habeas petition. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Minton: Justice Minton concurred in the Court's judgment. In his concurrence, he said federal civil courts are not empowered to protect the constitutional rights of military defendants, except for limited habeas review of jurisdiction over offenses. Justice Minton wrote more specifically as follows:

This grant to set up military courts is as distinct as the grant to set up civil courts. Congress has acted to implement both grants. Each hierarchy of courts is distinct from the other. We have no supervisory power over the administration of military justice, such as we have over civil justice in the federal courts. Due process of law for military personnel is what Congress has provided for them in the military hierarchy in courts established according to law. If the court is thus established, its action is not reviewable here. Such military court's jurisdiction is exclusive but for the exceptions contained in the statute, and the civil courts are not mentioned in the exceptions.

If error is made by the military courts, to which Congress has committed the protection of the rights of military personnel, that error must be corrected in the military hierarchy of courts provided by Congress. We have but one function, namely, to see that the military court has jurisdiction, not whether it has committed error in the exercise of that jurisdiction.

Concurring Statement by Justice Jackson: Justice Jackson issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's judgment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that some deference should be accorded to military determinations, but he wrote that he did not believe such deference extended to refusal to examine factual determinations made by military courts. Justice Douglas expressed his views as follows:

[T]he Court gives binding effect to the ruling of the military tribunal on the constitutional question, provided it has given fair consideration to it....

If the military agency has fairly and conscientiously applied the standards of due process formulated by this Court, I would agree that a rehash of the same facts by a federal court would not advance the cause of justice. But where the military reviewing agency has not done that, a court should entertain the petition for habeas corpus. In the first place, the military tribunals in question are federal agencies subject to no other judicial supervision except what is afforded by the federal courts. In the second place, the rules of due process which they apply are constitutional rules which we, not they, formulate....

I think [the defendants] are entitled to a judicial hearing on the circumstances surrounding their confessions....

Congress has [constitutional authority] ... "[t]o make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces." The rules which Congress has made relative to trials for offenses by military personnel are contained in the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Those rules do not provide for judicial review. But it is clear from our decisions that habeas corpus may be used to review some aspects of a military trial....

If a prisoner is coerced by torture or other methods to give the evidence against him, if he is beaten or slowly "broken" by third-degree methods, then the "trial" before the military tribunal becomes an empty ritual. The real trial takes place in secret where the accused, without benefit of counsel, succumbs to physical or psychological pressures. A soldier or sailor convicted in that manner has been denied due process of law; and, like the accused in criminal cases he should have relief by way of habeas corpus....

The undisputed facts in this case make a prima facie case that our rule on coerced confessions expressed in Watts v. Indiana was violated here. No court has considered the question whether repetitious questioning over a period of five days while the accused was held incommunicado without benefit of counsel violated the Fifth Amendment.

There has been at no time any considered appraisal of the facts surrounding these confessions in light of our opinions. Before these men go to their death, such an appraisal should be made.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's decision not to have the parties reargue the case. He was not prepared to rule for or against the defendants, because he believed further consideration of the case was required by the Court. Justice Frankfurter also expressed doubts about the Court's position to the degree of deference to be accorded military decisions. He concluded his dissent by stating: "It is my view that this is not just a case involving individuals. Issues of far-reaching import are at stake which call for further consideration. They were not explored in all their significance in the submissions made to the Court.... The short of it is that I believe this case should be set down for reargument."

Case Note: The position taken by Justice Douglas' dissent eventually became the law through a 1983 legislative enactment by Congress which gave the Supreme Court authority to have discretionary direct review of military capital punishment cases. Burton, Harold Hitz Harold Hitz Burton served as an associate justice on the United States Supreme Court from 1944 to 1958. While on the Supreme Court Burton was known as a moderate conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Burton was born in Jamaica Plains, Massachusetts, on June 22, 1888. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1909. In 1912, Burton received a law degree from Harvard Law School. Upon graduation from law school, he established a private law practice in Cleveland. Burton's law practice was interrupted by World War I, when he joined the Army and served in the infantry. Burton rose to the rank of captain before leaving the Army.

After the war Burton launched a political career that included being elected twice as mayor of Cleveland and, in 1940, being elected to the United States Senate. In 1944, President Harry S Truman nominated Burton to the Supreme Court. While on the Supreme Court, Burton is known to have authored only a few capital punishment opinions. The opinion which best illustrated his views of capital punishment and the Constitution was his dissent in Francis v. Resweber.

The issue in Francis was whether or not the Constitution permitted a State to attempt a second execution of a defendant, after the first attempt failed. Burton argued that it was cruel and unusual punishment to attempt a second execution of a defendant. He stated his position on the issue as follows: "Although the failure of the first attempt, in the present case, was unintended, the reapplication of the electric current will be intentional. How many deliberate and intentional reapplications of electric current does it take to produce a cruel, unusual, and unconstitutional punishment? While five applications would be more cruel and unusual than one, the uniqueness of the present case demonstrates that, today, two separated applications are sufficiently 'cruel and unusual' to be prohibited. If five attempts would be 'cruel and unusual,' it would be difficult to draw the line between two, three, four and five." Burton died on October 28, 1964.

Burundi The death penalty is used in Burundi. Burundi utilizes the firing squad and hanging as methods of carrying out the death penalty. The nation has a legal system which is based on German and Belgian civil codes and customary law. Burundi's constitution was adopted March 13, 1992. In July 1996, a military coup ousted the government of the nation's president. The self-proclaimed interim president replaced Burundi's constitution with the Transitional Constitutional Act. After considerable fighting, a new constitution was adopted in 2005.

Under Burundi's new constitution, the judicial system is composed of a supreme court, the Constitutional Court, courts of appeal, and the Tribunals of First Instance. The public generally does not have access to court proceedings. Defendants are presumed innocent, have a right to counsel, and have the right to appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's conviction and sentence violated the Constitution because the laws of Kentucky expressly precluded blacks from serving on grand and petit juries.

Case Holding: The defendant's conviction and sentence violated the Constitution because the laws of Kentucky expressly precluded blacks from serving on grand and petit juries.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Bush, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Kentucky. On appeal, the Kentucky Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The defendant then filed a motion in a federal district court requesting the case be removed to federal court on the grounds that the laws of Kentucky excluded blacks from the grand and petit juries. The federal court agreed with the defendant and ordered his release. Subsequently, the State of Kentucky charged the defendant a second time with the same offense. The defendant was again convicted and sentenced to death. The State's appellate court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the judgment was invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from serving on grand and petit juries under the laws of the State. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan ruled that the defendant's conviction could not stand because the laws of Kentucky expressly precluded blacks from serving on grand and petit juries. The opinion reasoned as follows:

In several cases heretofore decided in this court we have had occasion to consider the general question whether the fourteenth amendment, and the laws passed by congress for the enforcement of its provisions, do not prohibit any discrimination, in the selection of grand and petit jurors, against citizens of African descent because of their race or color....

[We have said] that a denial to citizens of African descent, because of their race, of the right or privilege accorded to white citizens, of participating as jurors in the administration of justice, is a discrimination against the former inconsistent with the amendment, and within the power of congress, by appropriate legislation, to prevent; that to compel a [defendant] to submit to a trial before a jury drawn from a panel from which is excluded, because of their color, every man of his race, however well qualified by education and character to discharge the functions of jurors, is a denial of the equal protection of the laws; and that such exclusion of the black race from juries, because of their color, is not less forbidden by law than would be the exclusion from juries, in the states where the blacks have the majority, of the white race, because of their color. It [has also been said] that the presumption should be indulged, in the first instance, that the state recognizes, as is its plain duty, an amendment of the federal constitution, from the time of its adoption, as binding on all of its citizens and every department of its government, and to be enforced within its limits, without reference to any inconsistent provisions in its own constitution or statutes....

We are of opinion that ... in the absence of any evidence that the selection of grand jurors ... was in fact made without discrimination against [black] citizens, because of their race, it should be assumed that the jury commissioners then appointed followed the statutes of Kentucky so far as they restricted the selections of grand jurors to citizens of the white race.

The judgment of the Kentucky Supreme Court was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Waite, in Which Gray, J., Joined: The chief justice dissented from the Court's decision. He said that the Court wrongly assumed that Kentucky authorities failed to follow the Court's prior decision which held that racial discrimination in jury selection was prohibited by the Constitution. The chief justice wrote: "In my opinion it is not to be presumed that the courts or the officers of Kentucky neglected or refused to follow the rulings in Strauder v. West Virginia after the judgment in that case was pronounced by this court. The court of appeals promptly recognized the authority of that case, and, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, it seems to me we must assume the inferior courts also did."

Dissenting Statement by Justice Field: Justice Field issued a statement indicating he dissented from the Court's judgment. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection

Butler, Pierce Pierce Butler served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1923 to 1939. While on the Supreme Court, Butler was known as a conservative who was philosophically opposed to government regulation of the economy.

Butler was born in Dakota County, Minnesota, on March 17, 1866. He received two undergraduate degrees from Carleton College in 1887. Butler did not receive a formal education in the law. He was a legal apprentice for a law firm in St. Paul. He was eventually admitted to the Minnesota bar in 1888. As a private attorney, Butler established a national reputation representing railroad companies. In 1922, President Warren G. Harding nominated Butler to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Butler was known to issue only one opinion in a capital punishment case. Butler wrote a dissenting opinion in Powell v. Alabama. The decision in Powell involved seven African American defendants (dubbed the Scottsboro Boys) who were convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Alabama. The majority on the Supreme Court held that the judgments could not stand because the defendants were denied the right to counsel. Butler, taking a conservative view of the record in the case, disagreed with the majority. In doing so, Butler argued that two attorneys had volunteered to represent the defendants and that any lack of an adequate opportunity to prepare a defense was not made at the trial court level; therefore, the issue was waived. Butler's dissent concluded tersely: "Their silence requires a finding that the claim is groundless for if it had any merit they would be bound to support it." Butler died on November 16, 1939.

Issue Presented: Whether a new constitutional rule could apply to the defendant's conviction and sentence after his conviction became final.

Case Holding: A new constitutional rule could not apply to the defendant's conviction and sentence after his conviction became final.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Horace Butler, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of South Carolina. The South Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. After exhausting State post-conviction remedies, the defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus in a federal district court. The habeas petition was dismissed. The defendant appealed to a federal Court of Appeals. While the case was pending before the Court of Appeals, the United States Supreme Court issued an opinion in a non-capital case, Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675 (1988), in which it held that the Fifth Amendment bars police-initiated interrogation following a suspect's request for counsel in the context of a separate investigation. The Court of Appeals rejected the argument. It held that the defendant was not entitled to the retroactive benefit of Roberson. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The Chief Justice ruled that the defendant was not entitled to the benefits of Roberson. It was said that Roberson announced a new rule that was not dictated by a precedent existing at the time the defendant's conviction became final and was therefore inapplicable to his collateral attack on his conviction and sentence.

The opinion noted that for Roberson's new rule to apply retroactively to the defendant's case, the new rule had to fit into one of the two exceptions to the general prohibition on retroactive application. The chief justice indicated that the first exception, for a rule that placed an entire category of primary conduct beyond the reach of criminal law or prohibited imposition of a certain type of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense, was clearly inapplicable. The proscribed conduct in the case is capital murder, the prosecution of which was not prohibited by the Roberson rule. It was also determined that the Roberson rule did not establish any principle that would come within the second exception — which involved a watershed rule of criminal procedure implicating a criminal proceeding's fundamental fairness and accuracy. The opinion reasoned that the scope of the second exception was limited to those new procedures without which the likelihood of an accurate conviction was seriously diminished. It was said that a violation of Roberson's prophylactic protection might actually increase the likelihood of obtaining an accurate conviction. The decision of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Brennan dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the Court misinterpreted and misapplied legal principles to reach a desired end. Justice Brennan wrote:

Today, under the guise of fine-tuning the definition of "new rule," the Court strips state prisoners of virtually any meaningful federal review of the constitutionality of their incarceration. A legal ruling sought by a federal habeas petitioner is now deemed "new" as long as the correctness of the rule, based on precedent existing when the petitioner's conviction became final, is "susceptible to debate among reasonable minds." Put another way, a state prisoner can secure habeas relief only by showing that the state court's rejection of the constitutional challenge was so clearly invalid under then-prevailing legal standards that the decision could not be defended by any reasonable jurist. With this requirement, the Court has finally succeeded in its thinly veiled crusade to eviscerate Congress' habeas corpus regime....

It is Congress and not this Court who is "responsible for defining the scope of the writ." Yet the majority, whose Members often pride themselves on their reluctance to play an "activist" judicial role by infringing upon legislative prerogatives, does not hesitate today to dismantle Congress' extension of federal habeas to state prisoners. Hereafter, federal habeas relief will be available in only the most egregious cases, in which state courts have flouted applicable Supreme Court precedent that cannot be distinguished on any arguable basis. I must dissent from this curtailment of the writ's capacity for securing individual liberty.

Issue Presented: Whether a violation of Enmund v. Florida requires a new sentencing hearing before a jury.

Case Holding: A violation of Enmund v. Florida does not require a new sentencing hearing before a jury because a trial judge or appellate court may determine the issue from the record in a case.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Crawford Bullock, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Mississippi. The facts of the case revealed that the defendant held the victim while an accomplice beat the victim to death. The judgment against the defendant was affirmed by the Mississippi Supreme Court. The defendant subsequently filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, which denied relief. The defendant appealed to a federal Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals reversed the sentence, on the grounds that the defendant's sentence was invalid under the intervening decision by the United States Supreme Court in Enmund v. Florida, which held that the Constitution forbids the imposition of the death penalty on "one ... who aids and abets a felony in the course of which a murder is committed by others but who does not himself kill, attempt to kill, or intend that a killing take place or that lethal force will be employed." The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White held that the Court of Appeals "was correct in concluding that neither the jury's verdict of guilt nor its imposition of the death sentence necessarily reflected a finding that [the defendant] killed, attempted to kill, or intended to kill." The opinion found that the Court of Appeals committed error in not remanding the case to the courts of Mississippi for a determination of the defendant's mental state during the crime. Justice White wrote as follows:

The proper course for a federal court faced with a habeas corpus petition raising an Enmund claim when the state courts have failed to make any finding regarding the Enmund criteria is to take steps to require the State's own judicial system to make the factual findings in the first instance. Therefore, it is Mississippi, not the federal habeas corpus court, that should first provide [the defendant] with a reliable determination as to whether he killed, attempted to kill, or intended that a killing take place or that lethal force be used.

Here, the District Court should be directed to issue the habeas corpus writ vacating [the defendant's] death sentence but to leave to the State the choice of either imposing a sentence of life imprisonment or reimposing the death sentence after obtaining a determination from its own courts of the factual question whether respondent killed, attempted to kill, intended to kill, or intended that lethal force would be used.

The proceeding that the state courts must provide Bullock need not take the form of a new sentencing hearing before a jury.... [T]he Eighth Amendment does not require that a jury make the findings required by Enmund. Moreover, the sentence currently in force may stand, provided only that the requisite findings are made in an adequate proceeding before some appropriate tribunal — be it an appellate court, a trial judge, or a jury. A new hearing devoted to the identification and weighing of aggravating and mitigating factors is thus, as far as we are concerned, unnecessary.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was modified so as to require the case be returned to the State for a determination of the defendant's mental state at the time of the crime.

Concurring Opinion by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to indicate that he believed the case did not have to be returned to the courts of Mississippi because "the Mississippi Supreme Court's opinion makes it clear that Enmund's concerns have been fully satisfied in this case." The chief justice believed that language in the decision by the State's appellate court implicitly indicated that the State's appellate court believed the defendant intended the victim be killed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Brennan and Marshall, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackman dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that only a jury could make an Enmund determination before a defendant was sentenced. Justice Blackman also indicated that he believed the Court's decision weakened the constitutional concerns Enmund sought to protect. He wrote as follows:

The central message of Enmund is that the death penalty cannot constitutionally be imposed without an intensely individual appraisal of the "personal responsibility and moral guilt" of the defendant.... Put simply, Enmund establishes a constitutionally required factual predicate for the valid imposition of the death penalty....

The question of how to cure this constitutional violation remains. The Court holds that an adequate remedy for the absence of Enmund findings can be supplied by "any court that has the power to find the facts and vacate the sentence." I believe that, in this case, only a new sentencing proceeding before a jury can guarantee the reliability which the Constitution demands. But the Court's decision today goes beyond a simple determination of how to cure an error that has already occurred. It tells the States, in effect, that it is no error for a jury or a trial judge to say that a defendant should die without first considering his personal responsibility and moral guilt, as Enmund requires. By turning the jury or trial court's determination into what can be viewed only as a preliminary stage in the capital sentencing process, the Court's holding poses the threat of diffusing the sentencer's sense of responsibility.... The Court thus ignores both the proper institutional roles of trial and appellate courts and the pragmatic and constitutional concerns with reliability that underlie those roles. In short, the Court's holding rests on an improper equation of the wholly dissimilar functions of finding facts and of vacating a sentence because no facts have been found. Enmund established a clear constitutional imperative that a death sentence not be imposed by a sentencer who fails to make one of the Enmund findings. The Court confuses this imperative with the guarantee it purports to make today that a death sentence will not be carried out before someone makes an Enmund finding....

Here, Bullock had a legitimate expectation that the sentencing jury would consider his personal responsibility and moral guilt before deciding to send him to die. Under Enmund, the only way to guarantee that such consideration has been given is to require the sentencer to determine that the defendant either killed, or attempted to kill, or intended to kill. That a jury might or could have made such a determination hardly provides a guarantee that this jury did. Because I believe every defendant is entitled to that guarantee, I would vacate the death sentence and remand the case with instructions to provide Bullock with a sentencing hearing before a jury. Inasmuch as the majority refuses to take this essential step, I dissent.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Stevens, in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the Court of Appeals was correct in deciding to return the case for a new penalty phase proceeding before a jury. Justice Stevens wrote as follows: "I believe that the decision whether a death sentence is the only adequate response to the defendant's moral culpability must be made by a single decision-maker, be it the trial court or the jury. The State of Mississippi has wisely decided that the jury is the decision-maker that is best able to express the conscience of the community on the ultimate question of life or death.... It follows, in my view, that a Mississippi jury has not determined that a death sentence is the only response that will satisfy the outrage of the community, and that a new sentencing hearing must be conducted if [the defendant] is ultimately to be sentenced to die. In accordance with this reasoning, I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals."

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court correctly defined “reasonable doubt” to the jury.

Case Holding: The trial court did not correctly define “reasonable doubt” to the jury because its definition allowed a conviction based on less evidence than the Constitution required to sustain a conviction.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Cage, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Louisiana. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant’s argument that the trial court incorrectly defined “reasonable doubt” to the jury. The trial court had instructed the jury that reasonable doubt was “such doubt as would give rise to a grave uncertainty” and “an actual substantial doubt.” The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion held that the trial court incorrectly defined “reasonable doubt”: “In construing the instruction, we consider how reasonable jurors could have understood the charge as a whole. The charge did at one point instruct that, to convict, guilt must be found beyond a reasonable doubt; but it then equated a reasonable doubt with a ‘grave uncertainty’ and an ‘actual substantial doubt,’ and stated that what was required was a ‘moral certainty’ that the defendant was guilty. It is plain to us that the words ‘substantial’ and ‘grave,’ as they are commonly understood, suggest a higher degree of doubt than is required for acquittal under the reasonable doubt standard. When those statements are then considered with the reference to ‘moral certainty,’ rather than evidentiary certainty, it becomes clear that a reasonable juror could have interpreted the instruction to allow a finding of guilt based on a degree of proof below that required by the Due Process Clause.” The judgment of the Louisiana Supreme Court was reversed. *See also Victor v. Issue Presented: Whether California’s constitutional rights were violated by injunctive and declaratory relief granted to a class of death row inmates against the State.

Case Holding: The issue presented need not be resolved because federal courts did not have jurisdiction over the type of class action brought by the death row inmates.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case originated as a class action suit brought in a federal district court by a death row inmate, Troy Ashmus, against various California officials. The suit was brought to prevent California from creating legislation that would enable it to qualify for the expedited habeas corpus death penalty provisions under the Federal Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDP Act). The class which Ashmus represented included all death row inmates in California whose convictions were affirmed on direct appeal after June 6, 1989.

The district court issued a declaratory judgment holding that California did not presently qualify for the expedited habeas procedures under the AEDP Act, therefore the AEDP Act did not apply to any class members. The district court also issued a preliminary injunction enjoining California from seeking to obtain the benefits of the AEDP Act in any State or federal proceeding involving any of the class members. A Court of Appeals affirmed, after rejecting the State’s claim that the Eleventh Amendment barred the class action and that the injunction violated the State’s First Amendment rights. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice indicated that the Court did not need to reach the merits of the State’s position because the dispositive issue in the case was whether the class action involved the type of “case or controversy” constitutionally required to give federal courts jurisdiction. The chief justice determined that the class action brought was not a justiciable case under the authority of Article III of the Constitution. The opinion indicated that federal courts have jurisdiction to enter declaratory judgments in cases where the controversy would admit of specific relief through a decree of a conclusive character, as distinguished from an opinion advising what the law would be upon a hypothetical set of facts. It was found that the class action only sought to have an advance ruling on the AEDP Act, vis-à-vis California. The opinion concluded that if class members file habeas petitions and the State asserts the benefits the AEDP Act, they could litigate California’s compliance with the AEDP Act at that time. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Breyer, in Which Souter, J., Joined: Justice Breyer concurred in the Court’s decision. He indicated that he believed some members of the class should be permitted “to obtain a relatively expeditious judicial answer to the [AEDP Act] question and thereby provide legal guidance for others. That is because, in at least some cases, whether a petitioner can or cannot amend, say, a ‘bare bones’ habeas petition (filed within 180 days) will likely depend upon whether California does, or does not, qualify as an ‘opt-in’ State.” *See also Felker v. Issue Presented: Whether the Court of Appeals applied the correct review standard in reaching the conclusion that the defendant's death sentence was imposed in violation of the Constitution.

Case Holding: The Court of Appeals applied the wrong review standard in reaching the conclusion that the defendant's death sentence was imposed in violation of the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Russell Coleman, was convicted of capital murder by a California jury. Under California law, during the penalty phase, the trial court was required to instruct the jury that the governor may commute a sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole to a sentence that includes the possibility of parole. (This instruction, known as the "Briggs instruction," was incorporated into the California Penal Code as a result of a 1978 voter initiative popularly known as the Briggs Initiative.) At the penalty phase of the defendant's prosecution, the trial judge gave the jury the Briggs instruction. The trial court also instructed the jury that it was not to consider the governor's commutation power in reaching a verdict. The jury returned a verdict of death. The California Supreme Court affirmed the defendant's conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court found that it was error to give the Briggs instruction because it violated the State's constitution, but that the error was not prejudicial because of the trial court's instruction that the jury was not to consider the governor's commutation authority in reaching a verdict.

The defendant then filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court arguing that the Briggs instruction violated the federal Constitution. The district court acknowledged that the United States Supreme Court had ruled in California v. Ramos that the Briggs instruction did not violate the federal Constitution. Nevertheless, the district court found the Briggs instruction in the defendant's case violated the Constitution because it failed to inform the jury that the governor's commutation authority was limited, insofar as the governor needed the concurrence of four judges on the California Supreme Court in order to commute the defendant's sentence. The district court vacated the defendant's death sentence. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the decision after concluding there was a "reasonable likelihood" that the Briggs instruction misled the jury. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion indicated that the Court would not determine whether, consistent with the decision in Ramos, the Briggs instruction violated the Constitution because the State did not ask the Court to do so. Instead, the State argued that the Court of Appeals applied the wrong review standard to the issue. The opinion agreed with the State. It was said that in the review standard used by the Court of Appeals, "reasonable likelihood," was used to determine whether constitutional error prevented a jury from considering relevant error. The opinion ruled that harmless error analysis was the proper review standard for the defendant's claim. Under this standard, it had to be shown that the error had a substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded for harmless error analysis.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the Court misread the Court of Appeals' written decision and that the Court of Appeals did in fact apply harmless error analysis to the case. Justice Stevens contended that, while the decision of the Court of Appeals did not use the magic words "harmless error," the substance of its analysis was consistent with harmless error analysis. *See also California v. Issue Presented: Whether the Court of Appeals abused its discretion in recalling its mandate order denying all habeas relief to the defendant on the grounds that a miscarriage of justice would result from the order.

Case Holding: The Court of Appeals abused its discretion in recalling its mandate order denying all habeas relief to the defendant because no miscarriage of justice would result from the order.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of California convicted the defendant, Thomas M. Thompson, of capital murder and sentenced him to death. The defendant exhausted State post-conviction remedies without success. He filed several habeas corpus petitions in federal court. During the review of one of the federal petitions, a federal district court vacated his death sentence, but a Court of Appeals reversed the decision. Eventually, the Court of Appeals issued an order denying all habeas relief. Subsequent to the Court of Appeals' order, the State issued a death warrant setting an execution date. However, two days before the execution, the Court of Appeals recalled its order denying all habeas relief. The Court of Appeals indicated that the order was the result of an internal procedural misunderstanding and that the decision would lead to a miscarriage of justice if not recalled. The Court of Appeals granted the defendant habeas relief based upon an earlier claim he made alleging actual innocence due to ineffective assistance of counsel. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy held that a Court of Appeals' inherent power to recall an order, subject to review for an abuse of discretion, is a power of last resort, to be held in reserve against grave, unforeseen circumstances. He indicated that the Court of Appeals' recall decision rested on doubtful grounds. It was said that the promptness with which a court acts to correct its mistakes was evidence of the adequacy of its grounds for reopening a case. Justice Kennedy expressed concern that it was just two days before the scheduled execution that the court recalled a judgment on which all authorities had placed heavy reliance. The opinion concluded that the recall was a grave abuse of discretion.

It was ruled that unless a Court of Appeals acts to avoid a miscarriage of justice as defined by the Court's habeas jurisprudence, the Court of Appeals abuses its discretion when it recalls an order to revisit the merits of an earlier decision denying habeas relief. Justice Kennedy found that the Court's miscarriage-of-justice standard was not met in the case. Under the Court's standard, a defendant asserting actual innocence of the underlying conviction must show "it is more likely than not" that no reasonable juror would have convicted him or her in light of the new evidence presented in the habeas petition. However, a defendant challenging his or her death sentence in particular must show "by clear and convincing evidence" that no reasonable juror would have found him or her eligible for the death penalty in light of the new evidence. The opinion found that the defendant's actual innocence claim failed under either standard. Justice Kennedy reasoned that the evidence presented by the defendant did not meet the "more likely than not" showing necessary to vacate his conviction, nor did it establish the "clear and convincing" showing necessary to vacate his sentence of death. Therefore, the judgment of the State would not result in a miscarriage of justice. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Souter dissented from the Court's decision on the grounds that it erected a new and more stringent standard for reviewing the decision to recall an order by a Court of Appeals. He argued that the traditional abuse-of-discretion standard of review was jettisoned "for the sake of solving a systemic problem that does not exist." Justice Souter believed that the recall order was based on tenuous grounds, but that such grounds passed muster under traditional abuse of discretion review.

Issue Presented: Whether a capital sentence is constitutionally valid when the prosecutor leads the sentencing jury to believe that responsibility for determining the appropriateness of a death sentence rests not with the jury, but with the appellate court which later reviews the case.

Case Holding: A capital sentence is not constitutionally valid when the prosecutor leads the sentencing jury to believe that responsibility for determining the appropriateness of a death sentence rests not with the jury, but with the appellate court which later reviews the case.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Caldwell, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Mississippi. During the closing arguments of the penalty phase of the prosecution, defense counsel referred to the defendant's youth, family background, and poverty, as well as to general character evidence, and asked the jury to show mercy. In response to defense counsel's pleas for mercy, the prosecutor urged the jury not to view itself as finally determining whether the defendant would die, because a death sentence would be reviewed for correctness by the Mississippi Supreme Court.

On appeal, the Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the federal Constitution precluded the prosecutor's closing argument to the jury that the ultimate responsibility for a death sentence was made the appellate court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall found the prosecutor's closing remarks presented too great a risk that a death sentence was returned, merely because the jury believed the State's appellate court would make the real decision. He stated his position and the disposition of the case as follows:

In evaluating the prejudicial effect of the prosecutor's argument, we must ... recognize that the argument offers jurors a view of their role which might frequently be highly attractive. A capital sentencing jury is made up of individuals placed in a very unfamiliar situation and called on to make a very difficult and uncomfortable choice. They are confronted with evidence and argument on the issue of whether another should die, and they are asked to decide that issue on behalf of the community. Moreover, they are given only partial guidance as to how their judgment should be exercised, leaving them with substantial discretion. Given such a situation, the uncorrected suggestion that the responsibility for any ultimate determination of death will rest with others presents an intolerable danger that the jury will in fact choose to minimize the importance of its role. Indeed, one can easily imagine that in a case in which the jury is divided on the proper sentence, the presence of appellate review could effectively be used as an argument for why those jurors who are reluctant to invoke the death sentence should nevertheless give in.

This problem is especially serious when the jury is told that the alternative decision-makers are the justices of the state supreme court. It is certainly plausible to believe that many jurors will be tempted to view these respected legal authorities as having more of a "right" to make such an important decision than has the jury. Given that the sentence will be subject to appellate review only if the jury returns a sentence of death, the chance that an invitation to rely on that review will generate a bias toward returning a death sentence is simply too great....

This Court has always premised its capital punishment decisions on the assumption that a capital sentencing jury recognizes the gravity of its task and proceeds with the appropriate awareness of its "truly awesome responsibility." In this case, the State sought to minimize the jury's sense of responsibility for determining the appropriateness of death. Because we cannot say that this effort had no effect on the sentencing decision, that decision does not meet the standard of reliability that the Eighth Amendment requires. The sentence of death must therefore be vacated. Accordingly, the judgment is reversed to the extent that it sustains the imposition of the death penalty, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's judgment. She expressed concerns about the impact the prosecutor's remarks may have had on the jury. Justice O'Connor wrote: "Laypersons cannot be expected to appreciate without explanation the limited nature of appellate review, especially in light of the reassuring picture of 'automatic' review evoked by the sentencing court and the prosecutor in this case. Although the subsequent remarks of the prosecutor ... may have helped to restore the jurors' sense of the importance of their role, I agree with the Court that they failed to correct the impression that the appellate court would be free to reverse the death sentence if it disagreed with the jury's conclusion that death was appropriate. I believe the prosecutor's misleading emphasis on appellate review misinformed the jury concerning the finality of its decision, thereby creating an unacceptable risk that 'the death penalty [may have been] meted out arbitrarily or capriciously,' or through 'whim ... or mistake.'"

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist, in Which Burger, CJ., and White, J., Joined: Justice Rehnquist dissented from the majority opinion in the case. He argued that the majority gave too great an emphasis to the remarks of the prosecutor, in view of the evidence which indicated the death sentence was appropriate. The dissent stated its position as follows:

The Court holds that under the Eighth Amendment it is "constitutionally impermissible to rest a death sentence on a determination made by a sentencer who has been led to believe that the responsibility for the appropriateness of the defendant's death rests elsewhere." Even if I were to agree with this proposition in the abstract, I do not believe that under the circumstances of this case it can properly be applied to justify the overturning of [the defendant's] death sentence....

[Our precedents] teach that a death sentence need not be vacated in every case where the procedures by which it is imposed are in some way flawed. If the prosecutor in this case actually had argued to the jury that it should go ahead and impose the death sentence because it did not really matter — the appellate court would correct any "mistake" the jury might make in choice of sentence — and if the trial judge had not corrected such an argument, I might well agree that the process afforded did not comport with some constitutional norm related to procedural fairness. But despite the Court's sweeping characterization, the argument here fell far short of telling the jury that it would not be responsible for imposing the death penalty. Admittedly, some of the remarks early in the prosecutor's rebuttal indicated that the jury's decision was not "final" because it was subject to appellate review. But viewed in its entirety, it is evident that the thrust of the prosecutor's argument was that the jury was not solely responsible for [the defendant's] sentence. In addition to appellate review, the prosecutor referred to the decision of the Mississippi Legislature to allow capital punishment, to the rules that the jury must follow in determining the appropriate sentence, and to the jury's ultimate responsibility under the law to render a "fair verdict," "without passion, without prejudice, without sympathy."

This Court should avoid turning every perceived departure from what it conceives to be optimum procedure in a capital case into a ground for constitutional reversal. In this case the State of Mississippi proved four aggravating factors, including that [the defendant] previously had been convicted of four crimes involving threat of violence to a person. The jury was instructed to find the facts based upon the evidence and to apply those facts to the law as charged; at the sentencing proceeding it was told that it must find that the aggravating factors outweighed the mitigating factors, and the prosecutor's argument stressed these aspects of the jury's singular duty. There is no indication in the record that the jury returned the death sentence on any basis other than the evidence adduced, nor is there any reason to question the jury's conclusion. Under those circumstances I do not think that the Eighth Amendment or any other provision of the Constitution requires that [the defendant's] death sentence be overturned. I would affirm the judgment of the Mississippi Supreme Court.

California The State of California is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), in 1977. In November 1978, California voters approved Proposition 7, reaffirming the death penalty.

California has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, court of appeals and courts of general jurisdiction. The California Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The California Courts of Appeals are divided into six districts, with one or more divisions. The divisions are composed of a presiding justice and two or more associate justices. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called Superior Courts. Capital offenses against the State of California are tried in the Superior Courts.

California's capital punishment offenses are set out under Cal. Penal Code § 189. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

[P]erpetrated by means of a destructive device or explosive, a weapon of mass destruction, knowing use of ammunition designed primarily to penetrate metal or armor, poison, lying in wait, torture, or by any other kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, or which is committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, arson, rape, carjacking, robbery, burglary, mayhem, kidnapping, train wrecking, or ... perpetrated by means of discharging a firearm from a motor vehicle intentionally at another person outside of the vehicle with the intent to inflict death.

Additionally, under Cal. Penal Code § 128, any person who, by willful perjury or subornation of perjury, procures the conviction and execution of an innocent person may be sentenced to death.

Capital murder in California is punishable by death, life imprisonment without parole, or confinement in the state prison for a term of twenty-five years. A capital prosecution in California is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jury must unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impanel a second penalty phase jury to decide the defendant's fate. If the second jury cannot reach a unanimous verdict, the trial judge is required to impanel a third penalty phase jury to decide the defendant's fate. If the third jury cannot reach a unanimous verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a punishment of confinement in prison for a term of twenty-five years. A unanimous decision by the penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of California.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Cal. Penal Code § 190.2 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The murder was intentional and carried out for financial gain.
2. The defendant was convicted previously of murder in the first or second degree.
3. The defendant ... has been convicted [in the current prosecution] of more than one offense of murder in the first or second degree.
4. The murder was committed by means of a destructive device, bomb, or explosive planted, hidden, or concealed in any place, area, dwelling, building, or structure, and the defendant knew, or reasonably should have known, that his or her act or acts would create a great risk of death to one or more human beings.
5. The murder was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest, or perfecting or attempting to perfect, an escape from lawful custody.
6. The murder was committed by means of a destructive device, bomb, or explosive that the defendant mailed or delivered, attempted to mail or deliver, or caused to be mailed or delivered, and the defendant knew, or reasonably should have known, that his or her act or acts would create a great risk of death to one or more human beings.

7. The victim was a peace officer.
8. The victim was a federal law enforcement officer or agent.
9. The victim was a firefighter.
10. The victim was a witness to a crime who was intentionally killed for the purpose of preventing his or her testimony in any criminal or juvenile proceeding.
11. The victim was a prosecutor or assistant prosecutor or a former prosecutor or assistant prosecutor of any local or state prosecutor's office.
12. The victim was a judge or former judge of any court of record in the local, state, or federal system.
13. The victim was an elected or appointed official or former official of the federal government, or of any local or state government.
14. The murder was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel, manifesting exceptional depravity.
15. The defendant intentionally killed the victim by means of lying in wait.
16. The victim was intentionally killed because of his or her race, color, religion, nationality, or country of origin.
17. The murder was committed while the defendant was engaged in, or was an accomplice in, the commission of, attempted commission of, or the immediate flight after committing, or attempting to commit, the following felonies: a. robbery, b. kidnapping, c. rape, d. sodomy, e. performance of a lewd or lascivious act upon the person of a child under the age of 14 years, f. oral copulation, g. burglary, h. arson, i. train wrecking, j. mayhem, k. rape with an instrument, or l. carjacking.
18. The murder was intentional and involved the infliction of torture.
19. The defendant intentionally killed the victim by the administration of poison.
20. The victim was a juror in any court of record in the local, state, or federal system.
21. The murder was intentional and perpetrated by means of discharging a firearm from a motor vehicle intentionally at another person or persons outside the vehicle with the intent to inflict death.
22. The defendant intentionally killed the victim while the defendant was an active participant in a criminal street gang.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, California has provided by statute Cal. Penal Code § 190.3 the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

- a. The circumstances of the crime of which the defendant was convicted.
- b. The ... absence of criminal activity by the defendant which involved the use or attempted use of force or violence or the express or implied threat to use force or violence.
- c. The ... absence of any prior felony conviction.
- d. [T]he offense was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance.
- e. [T]he victim was a participant in the defendant's homicidal conduct or consented to the homicidal act.
- f. [T]he offense was committed under circumstances which the defendant reasonably believed to be a moral justification or extenuation for his conduct.

g. [The] defendant acted under extreme duress or under the substantial domination of another person.

h. [A]t the time of the offense the capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law was impaired as a result of mental disease or defect, or the affects of intoxication.

i. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime.

j. [T]he defendant was an accomplice to the offense and his participation in the commission of the offense was relatively minor.

k. Any other circumstance which extenuates the gravity of the crime even though it is not a legal excuse for the crime.

Under California's capital punishment statute, the California Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. California uses the lethal gas and lethal injection — a prisoner may choose — to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in San Quentin, California, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Chowchilla, California.

Pursuant to the laws of California, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. If a capital felon has two prior felony convictions, the governor must obtain the recommendation of the State's Supreme Court in order to grant clemency.

Under the laws of California, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Cal. Penal Code § 3605:

a. The warden of the state prison where the execution is to take place shall be present at the execution and shall, subject to any applicable requirement or definition set forth in subdivision b., invite the presence of the Attorney General, the members of the immediate family of the victim or victims of the defendant, and at least 12 reputable citizens, to be selected by the warden. The warden shall, at the request of the defendant, permit those ministers of the Gospel, not exceeding two, as the defendant may name, and any persons, relatives or friends, not to exceed five, to be present at the execution, together with those peace officers or any other Department of Corrections employee as he or she may think expedient, to witness the execution. But no other persons than those specified in this section may be present at the execution, nor may any person under 18 years of age be allowed to witness the execution.

b. 1. For purposes of an invitation required by subdivision a. to members of the immediate family of the victim or victims of the defendant, the warden of the state prison where the execution is to take place shall make the invitation only if a member of the immediate family of the victim or victims of the defendant so requests in writing. In the event that a written request is made, the warden of the state prison where the execution is to take place shall automatically make the invitation 30 days prior to the date of an imminent execution or as close to this date as practicable. 2. For purposes of this section, "immediate family" means those persons who are related by blood, adoption, or marriage, within the second degree of consanguinity or affinity.

c. No physician or any other person invited pursuant to this section, whether or not employed by the Department of Corrections, shall be compelled to attend the execution, and any physician's attendance shall be voluntary. A physician's or any other person's refusal to attend the execution shall not be used in any disciplinary action or negative job performance citation.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, California executed thirteen capital felons. During this period, California did not execute any female capital felons, although fifteen of its death row inmates during this period were females. A total of 657 capital felons were on death row in California as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for that period was listed as 234 black inmates, 253 white inmates, 135 Hispanic inmates, twenty-two Asian inmates, and thirteen Native American inmates.

Issue Presented: Whether an instruction informing jurors that they must not be swayed by mere sentiment, conjecture, sympathy, passion, prejudice, public opinion or public feeling during the penalty phase of a capital murder trial violates the Constitution.

Case Holding: The Constitution is not violated by the giving of an anti-sympathy instruction to a capital penalty phase jury.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: A California guilt phase jury convicted the defendant, Albert Brown, of capital murder. During the penalty phase the defendant presented the testimony of several family members, who recounted the defendant's peaceful nature and expressed disbelief that he was capable of such a brutal crime. The defendant also presented the testimony of a psychiatrist, who stated that the defendant killed the victim because of his shame and fear over sexual dysfunction. The defendant testified, stating that he was ashamed of his prior criminal conduct and asked the jury for mercy.

The trial court instructed the penalty phase jury to consider and weigh the aggravating and mitigating circumstances, but cautioned that the jury must not be swayed by mere sentiment, conjecture, sympathy, passion, prejudice, public opinion or public feeling. The defendant was sentenced to death. On automatic appeal, the California Supreme Court reversed the defendant's death sentence, on the grounds that the anti-sympathy instruction violated federal constitutional law by denying the defendant the right to have sympathy factors raised by the evidence considered by the jury when determining the appropriate penalty. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to determine whether the California Supreme Court correctly interpreted federal constitutional law.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: Chief Justice Rehnquist held that the instruction did not violate the constitutional requirement that capital punishment jurors are not to be given unbridled discretion and that defendants be allowed to introduce any relevant mitigating evidence.

The opinion found that the California Supreme Court improperly focused solely on the word "sympathy" in the instruction. It was said that a reasonable jury would be unlikely to single out the word "sympathy" and would most likely interpret the admonition to avoid basing a decision on mere sympathy as a directive to ignore only the sort of sympathy that was not rooted in the aggravating and mitigating evidence introduced during the penalty phase.

The opinion noted that by limiting the jury's sentencing considerations to actual evidence, the instruction served the useful purpose of cautioning the jury against reliance on extraneous emotional factors; it thereby fostered the constitutional need for reliability in death sentence determinations and ensured the availability of meaningful judicial review. Chief Justice Rehnquist reversed the decision of the California Supreme Court and remanded the case for the California Supreme Court to consider whether the jury was adequately informed of its obligation to consider all of the mitigating evidence introduced by the defendant.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor indicated that she joined with judgment of the majority opinion "[b]ecause the individualized assessment of the appropriateness of the death penalty is a moral inquiry into the culpability of the defendant, and not an emotional response to the mitigating evidence." She cautioned, however, that jury instructions must clearly inform the jury that they are to consider any relevant mitigating evidence about a defendant's background and character or about the circumstances of the crime.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Brennan indicated he would affirm the California Supreme Court, because that court reasonably interpreted the jury instruction as diverting the jury from its constitutional duty to consider all mitigating evidence introduced by a defendant at the penalty phase. It said that a sentencing instruction is invalid if it prevents the jury from considering, as a mitigating factor, any aspect of a defendant's character or record that was proffered by a defendant as a basis for a sentence less than death. The dissenting opinion summarized its position as follows:

The California Supreme Court in this case has provided an eminently reasonable interpretation of the State's antisympathy instruction. The language of the instruction on its face prohibits a jury from relying on sympathy in determining whether to sentence a defendant to death. The defendant literally staked his life in this case on the prospect that a jury confronted with evidence of his psychological problems and harsh family background would react sympathetically, and any instruction that would preclude such a response cannot stand. Furthermore, even acceptance of the State's attenuated interpretation of other instructions does not mean that these provisions cure the problem with the antisympathy instruction, but leads only to the conclusion that the jury was confronted with contradictory instructions, a state of affairs that we have declared intolerable.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Marshall, J., Joined: Justice Blackmun indicated that a penalty phase jury's ability to respond with mercy towards a defendant is a particularly valuable aspect of the capital sentencing procedure. "When, however, a jury member is moved to be merciful to the defendant, an instruction telling the juror that he or she cannot be 'swayed' by sympathy will may arrest or restrain this humane response, with truly fatal consequences for the defendant. This possibility I cannot accept, in light of the special role of mercy in capital sentencing and the stark finality of the death sentence." For these reasons, Justice Blackmun would have affirmed the California Supreme Court's decision. See also Victim Impact Evidence Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution permits a capital penalty phase jury to be instructed regarding a governor's power to commute a sentence of life without possibility of parole to one with parole.

Case Holding: The Constitution permits a capital penalty phase jury to be instructed regarding a governor's power to commute a sentence of life without possibility of parole to one with parole.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Marcelino Ramos, was convicted of capital murder by a California jury. Under California law, during the penalty phase, the trial court was required to instruct the jury that the governor may commute a sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole to a sentence that includes the possibility of parole. (This instruction, known as the "Briggs instruction," was incorporated into the California Penal Code as a result of a 1978, voter initiative popularly known as the Briggs Initiative.) At the penalty phase of the defendant's prosecution the trial judge gave the jury the Briggs instruction. The jury returned a verdict of death. The California Supreme Court affirmed defendant's conviction, but reversed the death penalty after concluding that the Briggs instruction violated the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor held that the Constitution did not prohibit an instruction permitting a capital sentencing jury to consider the governor's power to commute a life sentence without possibility of parole. It was reasoned that the possible commutation of a life sentence does not impermissibly inject an element too speculative for the jury's consideration. The opinion held that by bringing to the jury's attention the possibility that the defendant may be returned to society, the Briggs instruction invited the jury to assess whether the defendant is someone whose probable future behavior made it undesirable that he be permitted to return to society, thus focusing the jury on the defendant's probable future dangerousness.

It was said in the opinion that giving the Briggs instruction did result in any diminution in the reliability of the sentencing decision. The Briggs instruction gave the jury accurate information of which both the defendant and his counsel are aware and it did not preclude the defendant from offering any evidence or argument regarding the governor's power to commute a life sentence.

Justice O'Connor rejected the argument that the Briggs instruction deflected the jury's focus from its central task of undertaking an individualized sentencing determination. She wrote that in the sense that the instruction focused attention on the defendant's future dangerousness, the jury's deliberation was individualized. The Briggs instruction simply placed before the jury an additional element to be considered, along with many other factors, in determining which sentence was appropriate under the circumstances of the defendant's case.

The opinion also ruled that the Briggs instruction was not unconstitutional because it failed also to inform the jury of the governor's power to commute a death sentence. It was said that, assuming arguendo, the Briggs instruction had the impermissible effect of skewing the jury toward imposing the death penalty, so an instruction on the governor's power to commute death sentences as well as life sentences would not restore neutrality or increase the reliability of the sentencing choice. Justice O'Connor reasoned that advising jurors that a death verdict is theoretically modifiable and thus not final may incline them to approach their sentencing decision with less appreciation for the gravity of their choice and for the moral responsibility reposed in them as sentencers. Therefore, an instruction disclosing the governor's power to commute a death sentence may operate to the defendant's distinct disadvantage. The judgment of the California Supreme Court was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan and Blackmun, JJ., Joined: Justice Marshall dissented from the decision of the majority on the basis that he "could not agree that a State may tip the balance in favor of death by informing the jury that the defendant may eventually be released if he is not executed." He believed the Briggs instruction was unconstitutional for three reasons: (1) it was misleading; (2) it invited speculation and guesswork; and (3) it injected into the capital sentencing process a factor that bore no relation to the nature of the offense or the character of the defendant.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun indicated that he dissented from the majority decision because it redefined the issue presented by the case and improperly focused on the dangerousness of the defendant. He concluded: “The issue actually presented is an important one, and there may be arguments supportive of the instruction. The Court, however, chooses to present none. Instead, it approves the Briggs Instruction by substituting an intellectual sleight of hand for legal analysis. This kind of appellate review compounds the original unfairness of the instruction itself, and thereby does the rule of law disservice. I dissent.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens argued in his dissent that the majority was wrong in disturbing the California Supreme Court’s decision. His dissent reasoned as follows:

Even if one were to agree with the Court’s conclusion that the instruction does not violate the defendant’s procedural rights, it would nevertheless be fair to ask what harm would have been done to the administration of justice by state courts if the California court had been left undisturbed in its determination. It is clear that omission of the instruction could not conceivably prejudice the prosecutor’s legitimate interests. Surely if the character of an offense and the character of the offender are such that death is the proper penalty, the omission of a comment on the Governor’s power to commute a life sentence would not preclude the jury from returning the proper verdict. If it were true that this instruction may make the difference between life and death in a case in which the scales are otherwise evenly balanced, that is a reason why the instruction should not be given — not a reason for giving it. For the existence of the rarely exercised power of commutation has absolutely nothing to do with the defendant’s culpability or his capacity for rehabilitation. The Governor’s power to commute is entirely different from any relevant aggravating circumstance that may legitimately impel the jury toward voting for the death penalty. The Briggs Instruction has no greater justification than an instruction to the jury that if the scales are evenly balanced, you should remember that more murders have been committed by people whose names begin with the initial “S” than with any other letter.

No matter how trivial the impact of the instruction may be, it is fundamentally wrong for the presiding judge at the trial — who should personify the evenhanded administration of justice — to tell the jury, indirectly to be sure, that doubt concerning the proper penalty should be resolved in favor of the most certain method of preventing the defendant from ever walking the streets again.

Issue Presented: Whether due process of law was violated because the trial court failed to instruct the jury that it could return a recommendation of life imprisonment.

Case Holding: Due process of law was violated because the trial court failed to instruct the jury that it could return a recommendation of life imprisonment.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Calton, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the Territory of Utah. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant’s argument that the trial court committed reversible error in failing to instruct the jury that it could return a verdict recommendation of life imprisonment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan held that it was reversible error for the trial court to fail to instruct the jury that it could recommend life imprisonment, even though the defendant was found guilty of first-degree murder. The opinion reasoned as follows: “If their attention had been called to [the fact that they could recommend life imprisonment], it may be that they would have made such a recommendation, and thereby enabled the court to reduce the punishment to imprisonment for life. We are of opinion that the court erred in not directing the attention of the jury to this matter. The [Territory of Utah’s law] evidently proceeds upon the ground that there may be cases of murder in the first degree, the punishment for which by imprisonment for life at hard labor will suffice to meet the ends of public justice. Its object could only have been met through a recommendation by the jury that the lesser punishment be inflicted, and it is not to be presumed that they were aware of their right to make such recommendation.” The judgment of the Utah Supreme Court was reversed and a new trial awarded.

Cameroon Cameroon employs capital punishment. Cameroon utilizes the firing squad and hanging as methods of carrying out the death penalty. The legal structure of Cameroon is strongly influenced by the French legal system, although in some provinces certain aspects of the Anglo-Saxon tradition apply. Cameroon’s constitution was adopted on May 20, 1972. The nation’s constitution provides for an independent judiciary; however, the judiciary is part of the executive branch and is subordinate to the Ministry of Justice.

The court system includes a supreme court, courts of appeal in each of the nation’s ten provinces, and trial courts. Traditional or customary courts exist in rural areas of the country. Most traditional courts permit appeal of their decisions to the modern court system. Under the constitution, trials are open to the public. Defendants are presumed innocent and have the right to retained or appointed counsel, the right to bail, and the right to appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Campaign to End the Death Penalty The Campaign to End the Death Penalty (CEDP) is a Chicago-based national organization that was founded in 1995. The CEDP stresses grassroots organizing and regularly organizes to win support for prisoners on death row. The organization launched a successful campaign in the latter part of the 1990s to prevent the re-imposition of the death penalty in Massachusetts. It has also engaged in work to defeat efforts to bring capital punishment to Washington, D.C., and Iowa.

Campbell, Charles Charles Campbell was executed for capital murder by the State of Washington on May 27, 1994. The method of execution used was hanging. The victims of Campbell's capital murder were Renae Wicklund, Shannah Wicklund, and Barbara Hendrickson.

The record in this case indicated that prior to the murders, Campbell had previous contacts with the victims. In 1974, Campbell assaulted and sodomized Renae. Campbell held a knife to the throat of Renae's infant daughter Shannah and threatened to harm her if Renae did not submit. Afterwards, Renae ran to the home of her neighbor Hendrickson for help. In 1976, Campbell was convicted of the 1974 sexual assault and sodomy of Renae. Both Renae and Hendrickson had testified at trial against Campbell.

In 1982, Campbell was an inmate at Everett Work Release Facility. On April 14, 1982, Renae, her eight-year-old daughter Shannah, and Hendrickson were found dead in Renae's home. Evidence produced at trial indicated Renae had been the first victim. She was found nude on her bedroom floor. Shannah, the second victim, had been attacked in the dining room, then dragged into her mother's bedroom and killed. Hendrickson, the third victim, had also been attacked in the dining room and killed in the hallway.

All three victims had been beaten and assaulted prior to death. The right earlobes of Renae and Hendrickson had been torn. The autopsy revealed Renae had received extensive blunt trauma beating on her head, back, and upper chest area. Her jaw and nose were broken and she had been strangled. Her neck had a seven-inch incision across the front, which severed both carotid arteries. She had bled to death from the neck cut. After her death, a blunt object was used to tear a one-inch cut into the upper end of the vaginal wall. Shannah had also been strangled and suffered a seven-and-a-half-inch cut across her upper neck, inflicted by extending her backward and elevating the chin. Hendrickson had a seven-inch cut on her upper neck and died of a massive hemorrhage.

A few days after the murders, Campbell was charged with three counts of aggravated first-degree murder. The prosecution's case was overwhelmingly strong, relying upon numerous witnesses and abundant evidence linking Campbell to the crimes. Campbell's girlfriend, Judith Dirks, testified that Campbell visited her on the morning of April 14. He had been drinking and drank a six-pack of beer at her home. Dirks testified that on April 15 she noticed her butcher knife was missing. Dirks also stated Campbell felt resentment toward Renae and had driven by her home while on work release.

Another witness, Tim Fowler, testified that while riding home from school on the bus at 3:00 P.M. on April 14, he saw a red car parked in an inlet in the woods near the crime scene. Tim's brother, Mike Fowler, testified that he saw the car parked in the woods around 3:15 or 3:20 P.M. Tim's dad, Jim Fowler, testified that at 3:40 P.M. that afternoon he saw the same car backed into the woods. The type of car described by the witnesses was very similar to the one owned by Campbell.

Eleven-year-old Josette Frase, a next-door neighbor of Renae, testified at trial that at about 3:30 P.M. on April 14, she saw a man wiggle around in the bushes by her house and then walk down a gravel road. She testified he was tall, had dark brown curly hair, and was wearing a blue sports jacket with a yellow stripe running across the middle. She identified Campbell in court and at a lineup as the man she saw.

The jury determined the evidence was proof beyond a reasonable doubt of Campbell's guilt and convicted him of three counts of capital murder. He was subsequently sentenced to death.

Canadian Coalition Against the Death Penalty The Canadian Coalition Against the Death Penalty (CCADP) is a nonprofit human rights organization that was founded in 1998. Its primary focus is the abolition of the death penalty in the United States. CCADP has chapters in Ontario and Quebec. Its membership includes activists, professionals, crime victims and their families, persons working within the justice system opposed to capital punishment, persons opposed to capital punishment on religious and moral grounds, and other concerned citizens opposed to capital punishment.

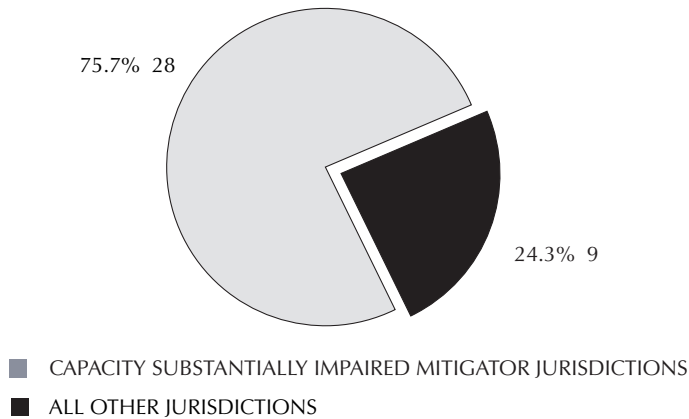

CCADP was founded by its executive officers, Tracy Lamourie and Dave Parkinson. They are both Toronto residents and have a long history of activism in human rights and social issues. Through their guidance, CCADP provides emotional and practical support to inmates, their families and families of murder victims. It also raises funds for legal defense fees for inmates, makes arrangements for Canadian nationwide bookstores to be admitted on the prison mailing list in order to purchase reading and educational material to send to inmates, and seeks and provides penpals for inmates.

Capacity Substantially Impaired Mitigator The "capacity substantially impaired mitigator" is a statutory mitigating circumstance in a majority of capital punishment jurisdictions. Under this mitigator, a capital felon must present evidence that his or her capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of his or her conduct, or to conform that conduct to the requirements of the law, was substantially impaired at the time of the commission of the capital offense. Courts have held that the capacity substantially impaired mitigator is stated in the disjunctive, so that proof of incapacity as to either ability to "appreciate" or "conform" establishes this mitigator.

Usually the capacity substantially impaired mitigator is satisfied only by evidence of a mental disease or psychological defect. Character or personality disorders alone generally are not sufficient to find that a capital defendant's ability to appreciate the criminality of his or her conduct, or to conform that conduct to the requirements of law, was substantially impaired.

Courts generally permit voluntary intoxication or drug addiction to be used in an effort to establish the capacity substantially impaired mitigator. In order to satisfy this mitigator by a showing of intoxication or drug use, substantial evidence must be proffered which shows that intoxication or drug use at the time of the commission of a capital offense was of such degree as to substantially impair the defendant's capacity to appreciate the criminality of his or her conduct or to conform that conduct to the requirements of the law. It has been held that if the alcohol or drug impairment does not rise to the level of the statutory mitigator, trial courts should still consider whether such impairment constitutes a non-statutory mitigator, when viewed in the light of a capital defendant's alleged history of alcohol or drug abuse. See also Intoxication Defense; Intoxication Mitigator; Mitigating Circumstances

NUMBER OF JURISDICTIONS USING CAPACITY

Capano, Thomas Thomas Capano, a wealthy and influential Delaware lawyer, was convicted of capital murder by a jury in 1999 and sentenced to death for causing the death of his mistress, Anne Marie Fahey. The tragic fate of Fahey and Capano began in 1996 when she tried to end their affair. They had been seeing each for three years. Capano, who was married but separated, was a deputy attorney general and Fahey was employed as an aide to the governor of Delaware.

On June 27, 1996, Capano and Fahey were seen together having dinner in a Philadelphia restaurant. Later that evening, thirty-year-old Fahey was murdered by Capano at his home, though she was officially considered a missing person, as her body was not discovered. For over a year, Capano denied any knowledge of what happened to Fahey. However, in November 1997, Capano's younger brother, Gerard, went to authorities and told them that on June 28, 1996, he and Capano dumped Fahey's body from his boat seventy miles off the New Jersey coast. Another brother, Louis, also admitted to helping Capano conceal evidence.

In the face of condemning evidence from his own family, Capano still denied killing Fahey. Capano admitted at trial to dumping Fahey's body in the Atlantic Ocean, but said she was killed by his other mistress, Deborah MacIntyre, after she found them

Thomas Capano, a wealthy and influential Delaware lawyer, was convicted of capital murder in 1999 and sentenced to death. However, the Delaware Supreme Court reversed the death sentence in 2006 and ordered a new sentencing hearing. The prosecutor declined to put on a new hearing, so Capano was sentenced to life in prison. (Wilmington Department of Police) together. Capano's theory was that MacIntyre accidentally shot Fahey in a jealous rage, and that he got rid of the body to protect her. MacIntyre denied being at Capano's house the night Fahey died.

Without a body or a murder weapon, prosecutors relied on a mound of circumstantial evidence to convict Capano of planning and killing Fahey because she wanted to end their affair. On January 17, 1999, the jury convicted Capano of murdering Fahey. The penalty phase jury recommended the death penalty by a vote of ten to two. On March 16, 1999, Capano was sentenced to death by Superior Court Judge William Swain Lee. Capano's conviction and sentence were upheld on direct appeal in Capano v. State, 781 A.2d 556 (Del. 2001). However, Capano later filed a habeas corpus proceeding challenging his death sentence as unconstitutional, because a unanimous verdict was not required to impose the death penalty. In 2006, the Delaware Supreme Court agreed with Capano and reversed the death sentence in Capano v. State, 889 A.2d 968 (Del. 2006). Although the Supreme Court's decision permitted Capano to have a new sentencing hearing, the State's prosecutor declined to retry the death penalty phase of the case. Consequently, Capano's sentence became life imprisonment.

Capital Felon Capital felon is the legal term or phrase used to designate a person charged with or convicted of committing a crime that carries the punishment of death.

Capital Punishment Capital punishment refers to the infliction of death as the legal punishment for a crime. It is the most severe form of punishment inflicted under Anglo-American jurisprudence. Under the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause of the Eighth Amendment, the method of inflicting capital punishment and the crimes so punishable are restricted. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Death-Eligible Offenses

Capital Punishment Jurisdictions The United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), placed a moratorium on capital punishment until procedures were developed that would minimize arbitrary imposition of the punishment. The moratorium was lifted with the Supreme Court's approval of Georgia's new capital punishment procedures in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976). Subsequent to the decision in Gregg, thirty-nine states and the federal government (including military) enacted new capital punishment procedures. The United States Supreme Court invalidated the death penalty statutes in a few States that made capital punishment mandatory (the affected States amended their statutes).

Massachusetts had its new death penalty statute judicially invalidated by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Commonwealth v. Colon-Cruz, 470 N.E.2d 116 (Mass. 1984). The Massachusetts legislature did not pass legislation to amend the statute, though efforts were made. The death penalty laws of

New York were invalidated by the State's highest court in People v. LaValle, 3 N.Y.3d 88 (2004). The New York legislature failed to pass legislation to amend the statute, though efforts were made. The Supreme Court of Kansas invalidated that State's death penalty statute on federal constitutional grounds, but the United States Supreme Court found the statute constitutional in Kansas v. Marsh, 126 S.Ct. 2516 (2006). The New Jersey legislature abolished the death penalty in 2007. See also Impact of the Furman Decision

Kansas's death penalty statute was found to violate the federal Constitution by the State's supreme court, but the United States Supreme Court reversed the decision and found the statute did not violate the federal Constitution.*

Cardona, Ana Marie Ana Marie Cardona was sentenced to death on April 1, 1992, by the State of Florida for the murder of her three-year-old son, Lazaro Figueroa. Cardona was born in Cuba on November 26, 1961.

Cardona's journey to death row began after the death of her common-law spouse Fidel Figueroa. Fidel was an alleged Miami drug kingpin who was killed in 1987. Cardona lived a life of luxury while Fidel was alive. Fidel's death turned Cardona's life upside down.

A month after Fidel's death, Cardona gave birth to Lazaro on September 18, 1987. The initial months after Fidel's death and Lazaro's birth were not difficult for Cardona, because she "inherited" $100,000 from Fidel's estate. This money, however, was quickly depleted. When the money ran out, Cardona took up residence in cheap motels with a female lover named Olivia Mendoza. It was during Cardona's relationship with Mendoza that Lazaro became a scapegoat for Cardona's financial woes.

Cardona beat, choked, starved, confined, emotionally abused and systematically tortured Lazaro. The child spent much of the time tied to a bed, left in a bathtub with the hot or cold water running, or locked in a closet. To avoid changing Lazaro's diaper for as long as possible, Cardona would wrap duct tape around the child's diaper to hold in the excrement. The end for Lazaro started on the last day of October 1990, when Cardona severely beat Lazaro with a baseball bat. After splitting the child's head open, Cardona locked him in the closet where he had been confined for the last two months. The next day, another beating ensued with the baseball bat. This beating killed the child. Cardona and Mendoza took Lazaro to a Miami Beach residence and abandoned him in some bushes. On November 2, 1990, the battered body of the child was found.

When Cardona learned that the child's body had been found, she and Mendoza fled to the Orlando area and then to St. Cloud, where they were later arrested. Cardona told police that the child had fallen off the bed and injured himself. When she could not revive him, she took the child to a Miami Beach residence and left him on a doorstep so the people who owned the house could help him. Men-

Ana Marie Cardona was found guilty and sentenced to death for the brutal murder of her child. However, on appeal, the Florida Supreme Court granted her a new trial. (Florida Department of Corrections) doza concurred in the story. Both women were charged with aggravated child abuse and first-degree murder. Mendoza eventually admitted her role in the abuse, pled guilty to second-degree murder and aggravated child abuse, and agreed to testify against Cardona.

During Cardona's trial in 1992, the medical examiner testified that Lazaro did not die from one particular injury; rather, he died from months of child abuse and neglect. The medical examiner detailed the injuries as follows:

Due to repeated injury, the muscle between the elbow and shoulder of Lazaro's left arm had turned to bone, rendering the arm useless. The child had deep bruises on his left hand and palm that were consistent with defensive wounds. Lazaro's right forearm was fractured, in a manner also consistent with a defensive wound. The child's left leg, which was much thicker than the right, was engorged with blood. His feet and toes also had extensive deep bruises. Some of the child's toenails had been crushed. There were other deep blunt trauma bruises to the child's chest and buttocks. Lazaro's left eye was bruised and there was a laceration on his right eye. There were cigarette burns on the child's cheek and pressure sores all over his body, from being forced to lie in bed for extended periods. The inside of the child's lips was obliterated by scar tissue and his front teeth had been knocked out. There were lacerations to the scalp, the most recent of which was an open festering wound that had allowed meningitis bacteria to invade the child's brain through a skull fracture. The blow that caused that fracture also crushed the child's olfactory nerve. A later blow to the head had sheared the nerves connecting the spinal cord to the rear of the child's brain.

The guilt phase jury found Cardona guilty of both offenses and, at the conclusion of the penalty phase, recommended death by a vote of eight to four. The trial court followed the recommendation and imposed a death sentence. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the judgment in 1994. However, in 2002, during a subsequent proceeding, the Florida Supreme Court granted Cardona a new trial. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Cardoza, Benjamin N. Benjamin N. Cardoza served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1932 to 1938. While on the Supreme Court, Cardoza was known as a moderate who had left-of-center underpinnings in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Cardoza was born on May 24, 1870, in New York City. Cardoza attended Columbia College, where he earned an undergraduate degree in 1889 and a master's degree in 1890. He received a law degree from Columbia Law School in 1891. Cardoza engaged in a private legal practice for over two decades before joining the judiciary. He served as both a trial judge and a judge on New York's highest court. In 1932, President Herbert Hoover nominated Cardoza as the second Jewish American to sit on the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Cardoza is known to have written only two capital punishment opinions. In Snyder v. Massachusetts, the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether the federal Constitution required a defendant be permitted to accompany a jury to view the crime scene. Cardoza, writing for the Court, held in Snyder that: "We consider a bare inspection and nothing more, a view where nothing is said by anyone to direct the attention of the jury to one feature or another. The Fourteenth Amendment does not assure to a defendant the privilege to be present at such a time. There is nothing he could do if he were there and almost nothing he could gain."

Cardoza's opinion in Palko v. Connecticut provided his greatest legacy in the area of capital punishment and criminal law in general. In Palko, the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether the double jeopardy principles contained in the Fifth Amendment were applicable to States. Cardoza, in a far-reaching decision, held that the double jeopardy principles of the Fifth Amendment were applicable against the federal government but had no application to States. The ruling by Cardoza in Palko would eventually be overruled in Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784 (1969). Cardoza died in 1938.

Carjacking Aggravator The crime of carjacking involves forcibly taking a vehicle from its owner or possessor. The crime of carjacking has been elevated to a statutory aggravating circumstance when accompanied by murder. Three capital punishment jurisdictions, California, Indiana, and Maryland, have made this crime a statutory aggravating circumstance that permits the imposition of a death sentence. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant may be deprived of the right to have an evidentiary hearing to challenge an indictment on the grounds that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that returned the indictment.

Case Holding: The defendant may not be deprived of the right to have an evidentiary hearing to challenge an indictment on the grounds that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that returned the indictment, when the challenge is timely and properly made.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Seth Carter, was indicted for capital murder by a grand jury in the State of Texas. Prior to trial, the defendant requested a hearing to challenge the indictment on the ground that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that returned the indictment against him. The trial court denied the request to hold an evidentiary hearing. The defendant was ultimately convicted and sentenced to death. On appeal, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that he was entitled to an evidentiary hearing to challenge the indictment because of alleged racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury members. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Gray: Justice Gray noted: "Whenever by any action of a state, whether through its legislature, through its courts, or through its executive or administrative officers, all persons of the African race are excluded, solely because of their race or color, from serving as grand jurors in the criminal prosecution of a person of the African race, the equal protection of the laws is denied to him, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States." The opinion held that when a defendant does not have an adequate opportunity to challenge the composition of a grand jury before it returns an indictment, the proper procedure is to permit a meaningful opportunity to challenge the indictment before trial. Justice Gray found that the defendant was improperly denied a meaningful opportunity to challenge the indictment through an evidentiary hearing. In ultimately granting the defendant a new trial, the opinion supported the Court's decision follows:

It thus clearly appears by the record that the defendant, having duly and distinctly alleged, in his motion to quash [the indictment], that all persons of the African race were excluded, because of their race and color, from the grand jury which found the indictment, asked leave of the court to introduce witnesses, and offered to introduce witnesses, to prove and sustain that allegation; and that the court refused to hear any evidence upon the subject, and overruled the motion, without investigating whether the allegation was true or false.

The defendant having offered to introduce witnesses to prove the allegations in the motion to quash, and the court having declined to hear any evidence upon the subject, it is quite clear that the omission [of the record] to give the names of the witnesses whom the defendant proposed or intended to call, or to state their testimony in detail, cannot deprive the defendant of the benefit of [challenge to the indictment] and the assumption, in the final opinion of the state [appellate] court, that no evidence was tendered by the defendant in support of the allegations in the motion to quash, is plainly disproved by ... what took place in the trial court.

The necessary conclusion is that the defendant has been denied a right duly set up and claimed by him under the Constitution and laws of the United States; and therefore the judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Issue Presented: Whether it was error for the trial court to admit into evidence statements made by the victim prior to her death.

Case Holding: It was not error for the trial court to admit into evidence the statement made by the victim two days after she was shot, but it was reversible error to admit the statement made by the victim a few weeks after she was shot.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Frank Carver, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, contending the trial court improperly allowed into evidence statements made by the victim prior to her death. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice wrote that two different statements attributed to the victim were introduced into evidence. Both statements concerned the circumstances surrounding the victim being shot by the defendant. The first statement was made two days after the victim was shot. The second statement was made a few weeks after the victim was shot. It was said that the first statement was admissible as a dying declaration, because the victim believed she was going to die at that time. However, the chief justice ruled that the second statement was not admissible as a dying declaration, because the victim believed she was going to recover from the wound (though she did not). The opinion explained the law on the issue as follows: "It has been held that a declaration is admissible if made while hope lingers, if it is afterwards ratified when hope is gone, or if made when the person is without hope, though afterwards he regains confidence. But the repetition of a dying declaration cannot itself be admitted as a reiteration of the alleged facts if made when hope has been regained." The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. See also Hearsay; Hearsay Exceptions

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established his claim of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant established his claim of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted him; therefore, the judgment against him could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Cassell, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Texas. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention the judgment against him was invalid because blacks were excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Reed Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Vinson, CJ., and Black and Clark, JJ., Joined: Justice Reed found that the defendant had established racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted him. The opinion cited the following evidence tendered on the issue by the defendant: "The jury commissioners testified that no [blacks] were selected for the grand jury because they chose jurors only from people with whom they were personally acquainted and they knew no [blacks] who were eligible and available for grand jury service. It also appeared from the record that, from 1942, until [the defendant's] indictment in 1947, there had been 21 grand juries on none of which was there more than one [black], that of the 252 members, 17 (or 6.7 percent) were [black], and that about 15.5 percent of the population of the county and 6.5 percent of the eligible voters were [black]."

Justice Reed pointed out that the statistical evidence proffered by the defendant did not “establish a prima facie case of discrimination.” It was said that the statistical evidence showed that blacks did participate overall in the grand jury process. Justice Reed noted that while the Constitution did not require proportional representation, it prohibited racial discrimination. The plurality opinion explained: “We have recently written why proportional representation of races on a jury is not a constitutional requisite. Succinctly stated, our reason was that the Constitution requires only a fair jury selected without regard to race. Obviously the number of races and nationalities appearing in the ancestry of our citizens would make it impossible to meet a requirement of proportional representation. Similarly, since there can be no exclusion of [blacks] as a race and no discrimination because of color, proportional limitation is not permissible.”

Although the statistical evidence did not provide a prima facie showing of racial discrimination, Justice Reed found the testimony of the jury commissioners provided evidence of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted the defendant. Justice Reed wrote on this issue as follows: “The existence ... of discrimination ... does not depend upon systematic exclusion continuing over a long period and practiced by a succession of jury commissioners. Since the issue must be whether there has been discrimination in the selection of the jury that has indicted [the defendant], it is enough to have direct evidence based on the statements of the jury commissioners in the very case. Discrimination may be proved in other ways than by evidence of long-continued unexplained absence of [blacks] from many panels. The statements of the jury commissioners that they chose only whom they knew, and that they knew no eligible [black] in an area where [blacks] made up so large a proportion of the population, prove the intentional exclusion that is discrimination in violation of [the defendant’s] constitutional rights.” The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Burton and Minton, JJ., Joined: Justice Frankfurter concurred in the Court’s judgment. He wrote separately primarily to express his opinion on the issue of racial proportionality in jury service:

It has been settled law since 1880 that the Civil War Amendments barred the States from discriminating because of race in the selection of juries, whether grand or petty. As a result, a conviction cannot stand which is based on an indictment found by a grand jury from which [blacks] were kept because of discrimination. We ought not to reverse a course of decisions of long standing directed against racial discrimination in the administration of justice. But discrimination in this context means purposeful, systematic non-inclusion because of color. It does not mean an absence of proportional representation of the various racial components of the relevant political unit from which a grand jury is drawn or an isolated instance of disparity among such components. Assuming that the grand jury pool fairly enough reflects the racial composition of the community, there is no basis for a claim of constitutional discrimination if without design it comes to pass that a particular grand jury has no representation of a particular race. The Civil War Amendments did not deprive the States of their power to define qualifications for grand jury service relevant to the functions of a grand jury, nor did they turn matters that are inherently incommensurable into mere matters of arithmetic. The Constitution has not withdrawn the administration of criminal justice, of which the jury system is a part, from the States. It does command that no State purposefully make jury service turn on color.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Clark: Justice Clark concurred in the Court’s judgment. He wrote separately to state that he believed the Court’s prior precedents may have been wrong in requiring reversal of a judgment because of racial discrimination in selection of a grand jury. However, he was not willing to retreat from the Court’s precedents, as he wrote: “I think we must adhere to the settled course of decision by this Court with respect to such exclusion.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Jackson: Justice Jackson dissented from the Court’s decision. He argued that racial discrimination in grand jury selection did not affect a defendant’s guilt or innocence and should therefore not be a basis for reversing a judgment. Justice Jackson expressed his thoughts as follows:

In setting aside this conviction, the Court is moved by a desire to enforce equality in that realm where, above all, it must be enforced — in our judicial system. But this conviction is reversed for errors that have nothing to do with the defendant’s guilt or innocence, or with a fair trial of that issue. This conflicts with another principle important to our law, viz., that no conviction should be set aside for errors not affecting substantial rights of the accused.

This Court has never weighed these competing considerations in cases of this kind. The use of objections to the composition of juries is lately so much resorted to for purposes of delay, however, and the spectacle of a defendant putting the grand jury on trial before he can be tried for a crime is so discrediting to the administration of justice, that it is time to examine the basis for the practice....

The [right of blacks] to be selected for grand jury service is unquestionable and should be directly and uncompromisingly enforced. But I doubt if any good purpose will be served in the long run by identifying the right of the most worthy [blacks] to serve on grand juries with the efforts of the least worthy to defer or escape punishment for crime. I cannot believe that those qualified for grand jury service would fail to return a true bill against a murderer because he is a [black]. But unless they would, this defendant has not been harmed.

I would treat this as a case where the irregularity is not shown to have harmed this defendant, and affirm the conviction.

Catholics Against Capital Punishment Catholics Against Capital Punishment (CACP) is a Virginia-based organization founded in 1992. CACP seeks to promote greater awareness of Catholic Church teachings that characterize capital punishment as inappropriate and unacceptable in today’s world. It does this in three ways: (1) by communicating such teachings to federal and state lawmakers, urging them to oppose proposed legislation imposing or extending the use of the death penalty, and to work for repeal of such laws currently on the books; (2) by encouraging members of the Catholic hierarchy and clergy in the United States to speak out more forcefully against capital punishment; and (3) by mobilizing the support of the Catholic laity to oppose capital punishment through its newsletter, CACP News Notes, and disseminating news of Catholic-oriented anti-death penalty efforts.

Central African Republic Capital punishment is allowed by the Central African Republic, but the punishment has not been used in more than a decade. The Central African Republic utilizes the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. The nation’s legal system is based on French law. The Central African Republic underwent many political changes during the 1990s. In 1994, a new constitution providing for multiparty democracy was approved by a national referendum. A subsequent constitution was adopted in 2004. Under the new constitution, the government is divided into an executive branch, a legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

Under the new constitution, the judicial system is composed of a supreme court, a constitutional court, a court of appeal, criminal courts, and inferior courts. Under the laws of the Central African Republic, defendants are presumed innocent and have the right to legal counsel, to public trial, to be present at their trials, and to confront witnesses. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Certificate of Appealability see Habeas Corpus

Certified Question Very often a court will encounter a legal issue that it is uncertain of how to resolve. When this occurs, a court may seek an answer on how to resolve the matter by submitting a “certified question” to another court. Generally, certified questions come from trial courts and are submitted to appellate courts. However, occasionally, appellate courts submit certified questions to other appellate courts. For example, a federal appellate court may submit a certified question to the highest court of a State, where the issue needing to be resolved involves interpretation of the law of that State. Also, in a jurisdiction having a three-tier legal system, a mid-level appellate court may submit a certified question to the highest appellate court in the jurisdiction. For example, a federal appellate court may submit a certified question to the United States Supreme Court.

The use of certified questions occurs before the merits of the underlying case have been resolved. In every instance, the answer to a certified question is needed to resolve properly the merits of the underlying case. Certified questions are used more frequently in civil litigation than criminal litigation. Occasionally, however, legal issues arise in criminal cases that are ripe for certified questions. *See also Biddle v. Perovich; Ex Parte Milligan; Gooch v. United States; United States v. Certiorari, Writ of The writ of certiorari is an appellate device that is used to address the merits of a case. This writ is used when review by an appellate court is discretionary, as opposed to an appeal of right. In practice, a party will submit a petition for appeal. If the appellate court decides to hear the appeal, based on the merits of the petition, it will issue a writ of certiorari ordering the full record in the case to be produced.

Chad The death penalty is used in the nation of Chad. The firing squad is used as the method of execution. Its legal system is based on French civil law and customary law.

Chad endured tremendous political upheaval during the 1990s. In 1996, Idriss Deby was elected president. He had previously strong-armed his way to the presidency in 1990. Also in 1996, the people of Chad adopted a new constitution. The judicial system has a supreme court, a court of appeal, criminal courts, and magistrate courts. The traditional or customary system of law presided over by local chiefs and sultans has been preserved for property and family affairs and for cases of local petty crime. Decisions of the customary courts are subject to appeal to the regular courts.

Although the nation’s constitution mandates an independent judiciary, it has been reported that the judiciary is ineffective, underfunded, overburdened, and subject to executive interference.

Criminal trials are said to be totally lacking in fundamental due process. Persons accused of crimes have been known to endure up to several years of incarceration before being formally charged or tried. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the confessions given by the defendants were obtained in violation of the Due Process Clause.

Case Holding: The confessions given by the defendants were obtained in violation of the Due Process Clause and, therefore, the judgments against them could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved the prosecution of four defendants, Chambers, Williamson, Woodward, and Davis, for capital murder by the State of Florida. Defendants Williamson, Woodward, and Davis pled guilty to capital murder. Chambers was found guilty by a jury. All four defendants were sentenced to death. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the judgments. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the argument by the defendants that their confessions were taken in violation of the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black held that the confessions given by the defendants were obtained in violation of the Constitution. In describing the circumstances of the confessions, the opinion stated:

For five days [the defendants] were subjected to interrogations.... Over a period of five days they steadily refused to confess and disclaimed any guilt. The very circumstances surrounding their confinement and their questioning without any formal charges having been brought, were such as to fill [the defendants] with terror and frightful misgivings.

These are the confessions utilized by the State to obtain the judgments upon which [the defendants] were sentenced to death. No formal charges had been brought before the confessions. Two days thereafter, [the defendants] were indicted [and] arraigned.... When Chambers was tried, his conviction rested upon his confession and testimony of the other three confessors.... And from arrest until sentenced to death, [the defendants] were never — either in jail or in court — wholly removed from the constant observation, influence, custody and control of those whose persistent pressure brought about the ... confessions.

Justice Black relied upon the Due Process Clause to reject the method used to obtain the confessions. The opinion outlined the contours of the Due Process Clause and the conduct requiring its creation as follows:

The scope and operation of the Fourteenth Amendment have been fruitful sources of controversy in our constitutional history. However, in view of its historical setting and the wrongs which called it into being, the due process provision of the Fourteenth Amendment — just as that in the Fifth — has led few to doubt that it was intended to guarantee procedural standards adequate and appropriate, then and thereafter, to protect, at all times, people charged with or suspected of crime by those holding positions of power and authority. Tyrannical governments had immemorially utilized dictatorial criminal procedure and punishment to make scapegoats of the weak, or of helpless political, religious, or racial minorities and those who differed, who would not conform and who resisted tyranny. The instruments of such governments were, in the main, two. Conduct, innocent when engaged in, was subsequently made by fiat criminally punishable without legislation. And a liberty loving people won the principle that criminal punishments could not be inflicted save for that which proper legislative action had already by "the law of the land" forbidden when done. But even more was needed. From the popular hatred and abhorrence of illegal confinement, torture and extortion of confessions of violations of the "law of the land" evolved the fundamental idea that no man's life, liberty or property be forfeited as criminal punishment for violation of that law until there had been a charge fairly made and fairly tried in a public tribunal free of prejudice, passion, excitement and tyrannical power. Thus, as assurance against ancient evils, our country, in order to preserve "the blessings of liberty," wrote into its basic law the requirement, among others, that the forfeiture of the lives, liberties or property of people accused of crime can only follow if procedural safeguards of due process have been obeyed.

The determination to preserve an accused's right to procedural due process sprang in large part from knowledge of the historical truth that the rights and liberties of people accused of crime could not be safely entrusted to secret inquisitorial processes. The testimony of centuries, in governments of varying kinds over populations of different races and beliefs, stood as proof that physical and mental torture and coercion had brought about the tragically unjust sacrifices of some who were the noblest and most useful of their generations. The rack, the thumbscrew, the wheel, solitary confinement, protracted questioning and cross questioning, and other ingenious forms of entrapment of the helpless or unpopular had left their wake of mutilated bodies and shattered minds along the way to the cross, the guillotine, the stake and the hangman's noose. And they who have suffered most from secret and dictatorial proceedings have almost always been the poor, the ignorant, the numerically weak, the friendless, and the powerless....

We are not impressed by the argument that law enforcement methods such as those under review are necessary to uphold our laws. The Constitution proscribes such lawless means irrespective of the end. And this argument flouts the basic principle that all people must stand on an equality before the bar of justice in every American court. Today, as in ages past, we are not without tragic proof that the exalted power of some governments to punish manufactured crime dictatorially is the handmaid of tyranny. Under our constitutional system, courts stand against any winds that blow as havens of refuge for those who might otherwise suffer because they are helpless, weak, outnumbered, or because they are non-conforming victims of prejudice and public excitement. Due process of law, preserved for all by our Constitution, commands that no such practice as that disclosed by this record shall send any accused to his death. No higher duty, no more solemn responsibility, rests upon this Court, than that of translating into living law and maintaining this constitutional shield deliberately planned and inscribed for the benefit of every human being subject to our Constitution — of whatever race, creed or persuasion.

The judgments of the Florida Supreme Court were reversed. See also Due Process Clause; Right to Remain Silent

Charlotte Serial Murders Henry Louis Wallace (b. 1965) received an honorable discharge from the Navy in 1992, after serving eight years of enlistment. When he got out of the Navy, Wallace found a job as a manager for a Taco Bell restaurant in Charlotte, North Carolina. Between the period June 1992 and March 1994, Wallace raped and murdered nine Charlotte women, all of whom he knew. The victims of the crimes were Caroline Love, Shawna Hawk, Audrey Ann Spain, Valencia M. Jumper, Michelle Stinson, Vanessa Little Mack, Betty Jean Baucom, Brandi June Henderson, and Deborah Slaughter. Wallace was arrested on an unrelated larceny charge on March 12, 1994. During an interrogation, Wallace confessed to killing the women.

Henry Louis Wallace was given nine death sentences for the murder of nine women in Charlotte, North Carolina. (North Carolina Department of Corrections)

The circumstances of each woman's rape and murder was described by the North Carolina Supreme Court in an opinion, State v. Wallace, 528 S.E.2d 326 (N.C. 2000), as follows:

Caroline Love Murder

On 15 June 1992, Caroline Love was living in an apartment with Sadie McKnight, [Wallace's] girlfriend. That night, after completing her shift at the Bojangles' restaurant on Central Avenue in Charlotte, Love asked the night manager if she could buy a roll of quarters to do her laundry. The night manager exchanged a roll of quarters for a ten-dollar bill, and Love left the premises....

In the confession, [Wallace] stated he made a copy of McKnight's house key and went to the apartment when neither McKnight nor Love was there. [Wallace] heard Love enter the apartment. He indicated to Love that he was in the bathroom and would leave as soon as he came out. Upon coming out of the bathroom, however, [Wallace] went into the living room where Love was watching television and kissed her on the cheek. Love promised not to tell McKnight about the kiss if [Wallace] promised not to do it again. [Wallace] then put his arms around Love in a manner similar to a wrestling chokehold. [Wallace] confessed that there was a scuffle, that Love scratched him on his arms and face, and that he kept holding Love until she passed out. [Wallace] then moved Love to her bedroom, removed her clothes, tied her hands behind her back with the cord of a curling iron, and placed tape over her mouth. [Wallace] had oral sex and sexual intercourse with Love, during which she was semiconscious. While engaged in intercourse with Love, [Wallace] continued to apply the chokehold because Love began to regain consciousness. [Wallace] applied the chokehold until Love's body became limp. [Wallace] stated he could tell she was still alive because he could feel her heart and pulse. Afterwards, [Wallace] strangled Love to death.

[Wallace] further confessed that he left the apartment to move his car closer to the stairwell and then returned to the apartment with a large orange trash bag. [Wallace] wrapped Love's body in a bed sheet and put the body inside the trash bag. [Wallace] placed some clothing into another bag to make it appear Love had left. [Wallace] carried the bags down the stairs, placed them in the backseat of his car, and then drove around Charlotte trying to find a place to dump Love's body. [Wallace] stopped the car while driving down Statesville Road, removed the trash bag containing Love's body from his car, and dumped the bag into the woods....

Shawna Hawk Murder

In February 1993, Shawna Hawk was living with her mother, Sylvia Denise Sumpter, in Charlotte. Hawk was a paralegal student at Central Piedmont Community College and worked at a Taco Bell restaurant on Sharon Amity Road, where [Wallace] was her manager. On 19 February 1993, Sumpter arrived home and began to cook dinner. Hawk's car was not there, but Sumpter saw Hawk's coat and purse in a closet.... Sumpter called Hawk's boyfriend, Darryl Kirkpatrick, to ask if he had seen Hawk, but Kirkpatrick said he had not....

Kirkpatrick arrived at the home to comfort Sumpter. Kirkpatrick and Sumpter decided to file a missing person report and called the police. Subsequently, Kirkpatrick walked through the house looking in each room. He entered a bathroom downstairs and noticed the shower curtain outside the bathtub. When Kirkpatrick pulled the shower curtain back, he saw Hawk curled up and submerged in water. Kirkpatrick ran upstairs and told Sumpter to call 911. Emergency personnel arrived, tried to resuscitate Hawk, and then transported her to the hospital, where she was pronounced dead....

[Wallace] confessed that he stopped by Hawk's home to see her and that they talked for a while. As [Wallace] was leaving, Hawk gave him a hug. [Wallace] then told Hawk he wanted her to have sex with him. [Wallace] took Hawk to her bedroom, told her to remove her clothing, and told her to perform oral sex on him, which she did. Then, [Wallace] performed oral sex on Hawk. The two then engaged in sexual intercourse. [Wallace] admitted that Hawk was afraid and cried the whole time. Afterwards, [Wallace] told Hawk to put her clothes on, and he took her into the bathroom. [Wallace] placed Hawk in a chokehold, with her head between his arms, until she passed out. [Wallace] then filled the bathtub with water and placed Hawk in it.

Audrey Spain Murder

In June 1993, Audrey Spain, age twenty-four, lived in an apartment in Charlotte. On 23 June 1993, Spain was to report to work at 6:30 P.M. at a Taco Bell restaurant on Wendover Road. Spain did not show up for work....

On 25 June 1993, maintenance personnel from the apartment complex entered the apartment through a sliding glass door and discovered Spain's body on the bed....

[Wallace] confessed that he went to Spain's house and that they smoked marijuana together. [Wallace] admitted that his motive for visiting Spain was robbery. He stated that he put Spain in a chokehold in her living room and inquired about the combination for the safe at her workplace, but she said she did not know the combination. [Wallace] also asked about money in her personal bank account, but she said she did not have any money because she had just returned from a vacation. [Wallace] said he did not remember asking Spain to remove her clothes. Spain begged [Wallace] not to hurt her, but [Wallace] maintained the chokehold until Spain passed out. [Wallace] then dragged Spain into her bedroom and had intercourse with her. Afterwards, [Wallace] took Spain into the bathroom, where he put her into the shower to wash off any evidence. [Wallace] placed Spain into her bed and tied a T-shirt and bra around her neck....

Valencia Jumper Murder

In August 1993, Valencia Jumper was a senior at Johnson C. Smith University in Charlotte, studying political science. She also worked at Food Lion on Central Avenue and at Hecht's in South Park Mall. On 9 August 1993, a friend of Jumper's, Zachery Douglas, spoke with Jumper on the phone about meeting later that night. Subsequently, Douglas arrived at Jumper's apartment in the early morning hours of 10 August 1993 and noticed smoke coming from her apartment. Douglas testified that he turned the doorknob, and the door was unlocked, so he opened the door. Douglas stated that there was too much smoke for him to enter the apartment any further. Douglas then alerted a neighbor, who called the fire department.

As firefighters arrived on the scene to fight the fire, firefighter Dennis Arney entered the kitchen and noticed that a burner on the stove had been left on. Based on examinations at the fire scene, the information provided by firefighters, and the observed pattern the fire traveled, the investigators believed the fire originated from a pot left burning on the stove. Firefighters found Jumper's body in the bedroom of her apartment....

[Wallace] confessed to Jumper's murder. He indicated that Jumper was like a little sister to him and that they often spent time with one another. On the night in question, [Wallace] stated that he stopped by Jumper's apartment and that they talked for a while and then [Wallace] left. [Wallace] later returned to Jumper's apartment and asked her to call McKnight because they had gotten into a fight. When Jumper reached toward the phone, [Wallace] put her in a chokehold. [Wallace] told Jumper to go to the bedroom. Jumper begged [Wallace] not to hurt her and stated she would do anything he wanted. Jumper removed her clothes. [Wallace] and Jumper engaged in oral sex and sexual intercourse. Afterwards, while Jumper was putting her clothes back on, [Wallace] put a towel around her neck and choked her until she passed out. [Wallace] stated that Jumper started bleeding from the nose, so he kept the pressure on the towel for about five minutes until he felt no pulse. Then [Wallace] wiped his fingerprints from certain areas of the apartment. [Wallace] went into the kitchen and noticed a bottle of rum, so he took the bottle to the bedroom and poured the rum on Jumper's body, on the bed, and on the floor nearby. [Wallace] then went back into the kitchen, opened a can of beans, put the beans in a pot on the stove, and turned the stove on high. [Wallace] took the battery out of the smoke detector. [Wallace] went back into the bedroom, lit a match, and threw it on Jumper's rum-soaked body before leaving the apartment....

Michelle Stinson Murder

In September 1993, Michelle Stinson, age twenty, lived in an apartment in Charlotte, with her two young sons. On 15 September 1993, Stinson's friend, James Mayes, stopped by her apartment to visit with Stinson and her children. Mayes knocked on the front door, but no one answered. Mayes heard the children knocking on the window and telling him their mother was sleeping on the kitchen floor. Mayes thought they were playing a game, but Stinson did not answer. Mayes had turned to leave when the oldest child came out the back door and grabbed him. Mayes picked up the child and went back into the apartment through the back door. Mayes discovered Stinson lying on the kitchen floor with blood around her. Mayes picked up the phone but realized the cord had been cut or jerked out of the wall. Mayes took the children and asked neighbors to help him find a phone. He then called the police....

[Wallace] confessed that he stopped by Stinson's apartment around 11:00 P.M., with the intention of raping and murdering her. They talked for a while, and then [Wallace] got ready to leave and they hugged. At that point, [Wallace] told Stinson that he wanted to have sex with her and that he wanted her to remove her clothes. Stinson told [Wallace] she was sick, but [Wallace] did not believe her and wanted her to produce some sort of medication, which she could not do. [Wallace] began to choke Stinson. Stinson then agreed to have sex with [Wallace] and removed her clothes. [Wallace] told Stinson he wanted her to perform oral sex on him, but she stated she did not know how. [Wallace] responded, "Well you're about to learn." Stinson then performed oral sex on [Wallace]. After having sexual intercourse on the kitchen floor, [Wallace] administered a chokehold until Stinson became unconscious. [Wallace] strangled Stinson with a towel he had retrieved from the bathroom. Stinson began to gasp for air, so [Wallace] took a knife and stabbed her approximately four times. [Wallace] used a washcloth to wipe his fingerprints from a glass, the door, the phone, the wall, and the floor. Before [Wallace] left the apartment, Stinson's oldest son awoke, and [Wallace] told him to go back to bed. [Wallace] left through the back door, using a towel to avoid leaving fingerprints, and threw the knife and washcloth over a fence near the back of Stinson's apartment.

Vanessa Mack Murder

In February 1994, Vanessa Mack was living in an apartment in Charlotte with her two young daughters. She worked at Carolinas Medical Center. On 20 February 1994, Barbara Rippy, the grandmother of Mack's oldest daughter, went to Mack's apartment to pick up Mack's youngest daughter, as she did every Sunday morning so Mack could go to work. Rippy arrived at 6:00 A.M. and went to the back door, but the door was ajar. Rippy called out, but Mack did not respond. As she entered, Rippy noticed Mack's four-month-old daughter lying on the couch, which she felt was unusual. Rippy entered the bedroom and saw Mack's feet hanging off the side of the bed. Rippy testified that Mack's feet were the only part of her body exposed and that they appeared gray and felt cold. Rippy called 911....

[Wallace] confessed that he had been in Mack's neighborhood and had called to see if she was at home. When she answered, he hung up the phone. He then walked over to her apartment. [Wallace] admitted that his motives for going to see Mack were robbery, to support his cocaine addiction, and murder. [Wallace] stated that he tried to find a way to maneuver Mack into the position he needed in order to administer a chokehold, but she refused to give defendant a hug, so he asked for something to drink. When Mack turned her back, [Wallace] pulled out a pillowcase he had brought with him and placed it around her neck. As Mack resisted, [Wallace] put more pressure on the pillowcase and explained that this was a robbery. [Wallace] and Mack went into the bedroom, where [Wallace] commanded Mack to give him all the money she had, including her automated teller machine card and personal identification number. After Mack gave [Wallace] everything, he told her to remove her clothes, which she did. [Wallace] and Mack engaged in sexual intercourse. Afterwards, [Wallace] told Mack to put her clothes back on. [Wallace] then tightened the pillowcase around Mack's neck until she passed out. [Wallace] added another garment to keep the pillowcase from loosening. [Wallace] then checked on Mack's baby and stayed until the baby went to sleep. [Wallace] left the apartment, walked down the street, and called a cab....

Betty Baucom Murder

In March 1994, Betty Baucom lived in an apartment in Charlotte with her adopted daughter. On 9 March 1994, Baucom, an assistant manager at the Bojangles' restaurant on Central Avenue, was scheduled to work, but she did not report to work. Baucom's unit director, Jeffrey Ellis, called Baucom's apartment several times but received no answer. Ellis also talked with some of Baucom's co-workers, but no one had heard from her. Additionally, Ellis called Baucom's mother, but she had not heard from Baucom....

Officer Gregory Norwood of the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Police Department received a call on the morning of 10 March 1994 to respond to an apartment where a young woman had been found. She was not breathing. Maintenance personnel let Norwood into the apartment. Norwood discovered Baucom's body lying facedown on her bed with a towel around her neck....

[Wallace] confessed that he went to Baucom's apartment and told her he needed to use the phone. Baucom let [Wallace] into her apartment. They talked for a while. As [Wallace] was getting ready to leave, he placed a chokehold on Baucom, and she fell to the floor. [Wallace] told her this was a robbery and demanded the alarm code, keys, and combination to the safe for the Bojangles' restaurant where Baucom was the manager. Baucom was very upset, and she took approximately thirty minutes to produce the safe's combination. [Wallace] then released the chokehold. [Wallace] remembered Baucom asking, "Why did you do that to me?" [Wallace] responded that he was a sick person and that he had hurt many people. Baucom then embraced [Wallace], said that she forgave him, and told him he needed help. [Wallace] stated he then became enraged and grabbed Baucom by the throat, slammed her to the floor, and then scuffled with her. [Wallace] got Baucom to her feet and took her into the bedroom, where he told her to remove her clothes. Baucom told [Wallace] she did not want to remove her clothes because she had a medical problem. She then showed [Wallace] a rash, which [Wallace] stated looked like an ordinary rash. [Wallace] then told Baucom he wanted her to perform oral sex on him. She grabbed his penis and started pulling and scratching. [Wallace] and Baucom began to scuffle again, and [Wallace] sustained a bite on his shoulder and scratches on his abdomen. [Wallace] was able to tighten the towel around Baucom's neck until she was nearly unconscious. At this point, Baucom removed her clothes and engaged in sexual intercourse with [Wallace]. Afterwards, [Wallace] told Baucom to put her clothes back on. He then placed a towel around her neck and asked her if she had any money. Baucom gave [Wallace] the money in her purse, and he took a gold chain from around her neck.

After strangling Baucom to death, [Wallace] took her television and left in her car. [Wallace] sold the television for drugs. He then returned to Baucom's apartment to make sure Baucom was dead and to take her VCR. While in Baucom's apartment, [Wallace] used a wet cloth to wipe off the phone, door knobs, and the wall on which some of the struggle took place....

Brandi Henderson Murder

In March 1994, Brandi Henderson was living in an apartment with her boyfriend, Verness Lamar Woods, and their ten-month-old son, T.W. On 9 March 1994, Woods was at the apartment taking care of T.W. because Henderson had a doctor's appointment. As Henderson was leaving, [Wallace] went to the apartment to say he was leaving town. [Wallace] stayed for only a few minutes and then left. Henderson returned during the afternoon. Around five o'clock in the evening, Woods left to go to work. When Woods left, Henderson and T.W. were alone in the apartment, the apartment was neat and clean, and the front door was locked. Woods returned to the apartment around midnight to find the front door unlocked, items scattered about the living room, and the stereo missing. Woods then went through the apartment. He first came to T.W.'s bedroom where he turned on the light and saw T.W. sitting on the bed gasping for air with something white coming out of his mouth and a pair of shorts around his neck. Woods immediately ran to T.W. to remove the shorts, which were tied tightly around T.W.'s neck. Woods then realized that Henderson was lying facedown on the bed. Woods rolled her onto her back and saw that towels were tied around her neck and that her face was blue. Woods removed the two towels from Henderson's neck and then called 911. He moved Henderson's body from the bed to the floor and began administering CPR pursuant to instructions from the 911 operator. When police officers arrived, it was obvious Henderson was dead. T.W. was taken to the hospital....

[Wallace] confessed that he planned to murder Henderson on Tuesday morning, but when he arrived at the apartment, Woods was present. [Wallace] left the apartment, found Baucom's apartment in the same apartment complex, and murdered Baucom. He returned to Henderson's apartment the same night when he knew Woods would be at work. [Wallace] pretended he had something to leave for Woods. Henderson and [Wallace] talked for a while, and then [Wallace] asked for something to drink. When Henderson reached into the cabinet, [Wallace] choked her and told her to go into the bedroom. Henderson begged [Wallace] to allow her to hold her son, but he said, "I don't know if that would be a good idea for what we're about to do." [Wallace] told her this was also going to be a robbery and demanded money. Henderson gave [Wallace] a "Pringle's" can filled with approximately twenty dollars worth of coins and said there was no other money in the house. [Wallace] also told Henderson he would be taking the television and stereo when he left. [Wallace] then told Henderson to remove her clothes, which she did. Henderson grabbed her son, laid him across her chest, and turned his head away so he could not see what was going on. [Wallace] and Henderson started to have sexual intercourse in Henderson's bedroom but moved to T.W.'s bedroom so he would not cry. Once in T.W.'s room, [Wallace] and Henderson continued to have sexual intercourse, with T.W. lying across Henderson's chest. Afterwards, [Wallace] told Henderson to put her clothes back on, and he put his clothes on. [Wallace] went into the bathroom, got a towel, and wiped off everything. Thereafter, [Wallace] folded the towel, put it around Henderson's neck, and strangled her to death. Henderson's body fell to the floor. [Wallace] picked up Henderson's body and put it onto T.W.'s bed. He also tied the towel in a knot around her neck. T.W. started crying, so [Wallace] gave him a pacifier. [Wallace] looked for something T.W. could drink but could not find anything. [Wallace] then took another towel from the bathroom and tied the towel tight around T.W.'s neck so it would be difficult for him to breathe and so he would stop crying. T.W. stopped crying and laid down next to his mother's body. [Wallace] then ran into the living room, disconnected the stereo, and loaded it into Baucom's car. [Wallace] also took a television that was sitting on the floor. Before leaving, [Wallace] took some food that had been delivered and the container of coins.

Deborah Slaughter Murder

In March 1994, Deborah Slaughter lived alone in an apartment in Charlotte. On 12 March 1994, Slaughter's mother, Lovey Slaughter, went to Slaughter's apartment to return a picture she had taken a few days before. Lovey had a key to the apartment and anticipated letting herself in because Slaughter was supposed to be at work. When Lovey arrived, she knocked on the door and got no response. She put the key into the lock and discovered the door was not locked. As Lovey walked through the door, she saw Slaughter's body lying on the floor. Lovey called 911....

[Wallace] confessed that he went to Slaughter's apartment to use drugs with her. [Wallace] realized that Slaughter had some money when she said she could not buy any drugs because she had to make her money last until the next week. [Wallace] asked Slaughter to get him something to drink. As Slaughter turned around, [Wallace] put a towel he brought with him around Slaughter's neck and tightened it. Slaughter fell to her knees. [Wallace] stated that Slaughter then realized that [Wallace] was the one who had killed two other girls in nearby apartments. [Wallace] told Slaughter to remove her clothes and to perform oral sex on him. [Wallace] remembered Slaughter saying, "I don't do that; you might as well go ahead and kill me." [Wallace] tightened the towel and asked if she wanted to change her mind. Slaughter stated that she would not perform oral sex on [Wallace]. [Wallace] engaged in sexual intercourse with Slaughter. Afterwards, [Wallace] told Slaughter to put her clothes on. [Wallace], knowing Slaughter carried a knife in her purse at all times, asked Slaughter to empty the contents of her purse onto the floor, which she did. [Wallace] kicked the knife away and then told Slaughter to open the wallet and give him everything in it. As Slaughter did this, [Wallace] grabbed the knife. Slaughter handed [Wallace] forty dollars from the wallet. Slaughter hit [Wallace] and screamed for the police. [Wallace] then tightened the towel around Slaughter's neck until she fell to the floor and started kicking. [Wallace] tightened the towel more and tried to sit on top of Slaughter's legs to keep Slaughter from alerting the neighbor downstairs. [Wallace] went to the bathroom to retrieve another towel, which he tied with the first around Slaughter's neck. [Wallace] stabbed Slaughter with the knife from her purse approximately twenty times in the abdomen. [Wallace] then washed the knife clean and wiped his fingerprints from it and placed it back with the contents of Slaughter's purse on the floor.

After Wallace confessed to each of the murders, he was prosecuted on capital murder charges. The trial took place between September 1996 and January 1997. On January 7, 1997, the jury found Wallace guilty of nine counts of first-degree murder. During the sentencing phase, the jury recommended a sentence of death for each of the nine counts of first-degree murder. On January 29, 1997, the trial court entered judgment sentencing Wallace to nine death sentences. Wallace's convictions and sentences were upheld on appeal. See also Serial Killer

Chase, Salmon P. Salmon P. Chase served as chief justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1864 to 1873. While on the Supreme Court, Chase was known for his a liberal interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment as a tool to restrict States from infringing upon the rights of African-Americans.

Chase was born in Cornish, New Hampshire, on January 13, 1808. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1826. After graduating from college, Chase moved to Washington, D.C., where he worked as a legal apprentice for a prosecuting attorney. He eventually passed the bar in Washington, D.C., before moving to Cincinnati, Ohio, to start a private practice.

While in Ohio, Chase launched a political career that took him to the United States Senate for two terms. In between his Senate elections, Chase was elected governor of Ohio. In 1861, President Abraham Lincoln nominated Chase to be Secretary of the Treasury. In 1864, Lincoln nominated Chase as chief justice of the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Chase was known to have written only two capital punishment decisions. In Twitchell v. Pennsylvania, the defendant was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Pennsylvania. On appeal, the defendant contended that the indictment returned against him failed to inform him adequately of the nature of the charge against him and therefore violated the Sixth Amendment. Writing for the Court, Chase ruled that the requirements of the Sixth Amendment were not applicable to States. This decision was overruled decades later.

Chase also wrote a concurring opinion in Ex Parte Milligan. The defendant in Milligan was a civilian who was convicted of murder by the Army and sentenced to death. The Supreme Court ruled that the military did not have jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant, because he was a civilian unconnected with military service. Chase agreed with the Court's decision in the case, but noted that he believed that under certain circumstances Congress could authorize the military to prosecute civilians unconnected with military service. Chase died on May 7, 1873.

Issue Presented: Whether the procedure used to reproduce the defendant's trial transcript, after the court reporter died, violated the defendant's due process rights.

Case Holding: The procedure used to reproduce the defendant's trial transcript, after the court reporter died, violated the defendant's due process rights.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Caryl Chessman, was convicted of kidnapping and sentenced to death by the State of California. Shortly after the defendant's sentence, the court reporter of the trial died. Consequently, the transcript of the trial had to be reproduced by another court reporter, from the shorthand notes of the deceased court reporter. The defendant, who represented himself during the trial, did not have direct input or counsel representation during the proceedings that determined how the transcript was reproduced. Once the transcript was reproduced, the defendant appealed his conviction and sentence. The California Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court arguing his due process rights were violated by the way the trial transcript issue was resolved. The district court dismissed the petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan ruled that the defendant's due process rights were violated in the manner in which the trial transcript issue was settled. The opinion stated:

[The defendant] was entitled to be represented either in person or by counsel throughout the proceedings for the settlement of the trial record. [The defendant's] refusal to be represented by counsel at the trial did not constitute a waiver of his right to counsel at the settlement proceedings. The hearings before a federal judge in the habeas corpus proceedings, at which [the defendant] was personally present and represented by counsel, did not cure the lack of procedural due process in the state proceedings. Consistently with procedural due process, the State Supreme Court's affirmation of [the defendant's] conviction upon a seriously disputed record, whose accuracy [the defendant] had no voice in determining, cannot be allowed to stand. A valid appeal to the Constitution, even by a guilty man, does not come too late because courts were not earlier able to enforce what the Constitution demands. The judgments of the Federal District Court and Court of Appeals are vacated, and the case is remanded to the District Court for entry of such orders as may be appropriate allowing the State a reasonable time within which to take further proceedings not inconsistent with this Court's opinion, failing which [the defendant] shall be discharged.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Douglas, in Which Clark, J., Joined: Justice Douglas dissented from the Court's decision. He believed due process was not denied the defendant in the settlement of trial transcript. Justice Douglas wrote as follows:

My dissent is based on the conviction that, in substance, the requirements of due process have been fully satisfied, that to require more is to exalt a technicality. To say that the settlement in this case was ex parte is to be technically accurate. But it is not to state the whole story. Chessman was not present in court when the record was settled. Nor was he represented there by a lawyer, for he had over and again refused to allow a state-appointed lawyer to represent him. Chessman, however, played an active role in the process of the settlement of the record. The early draft prepared by Fraser, the new reporter, was sent to him for his suggestions. That Chessman went over this draft with a fine-tooth comb is evident from a reading of 200-odd corrections which he prepared. Of these proposals, about 80 were adopted and the rest refused....

To order, after this long delay, a new record seems to me a futility. It must be remembered that Chessman was convicted on May 21, 1948 — over nine years ago. It is difficult to see how, after that long lapse of time, the memory of any participant (if he is still alive) would be sharp enough to make any hearing meaningful. We meddle mischievously with the law when we issue the writ today. We do not act to remedy any injustice that has been demonstrated. When the whole history of the case is considered, we seize upon a technicality to undo what has been repeatedly sustained both by the California Supreme Court and by this Court. I would guard the ancient writ jealously, using it only to prevent a gross miscarriage of justice.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Burton: Justice Burton issued a dissenting statement indicating he believed “the State of California has accorded to [the defendant] due process of law within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States.”

Case Note: The State of California executed Caryl Chessman in the gas chamber on May 3, 1960. Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of kidnapping without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death

Chicago Labor Riots of 1886 During the 1880s, Chicago was the site of numerous international labor organizations that advocated the destruction of capitalism and the redistribution of wealth equally to all. The supporters of these organizations were anarchists. From about 1883 to 1886, a great deal of labor violence and unrest occurred in Chicago over wages and working conditions. On May 1, 1886, the violence and unrest reached a critical point when anarchists launched a general strike in Chicago.

On May 3, 1886, bitter fighting erupted at a factory in Chicago and two laborers were killed. The killings sparked a hastily planned protest meeting by the anarchists on May 4 in Chicago's Haymarket Square. The planned protest was initially under control, with the mayor of Chicago present, along with scores of police. Once the mayor left, the protest turned violent.

After the mayor's departure the police ordered the crowd to disperse. As the crowd began to shuffle out of the area, a bomb exploded. Police reacted to the bomb explosion by firing indiscriminately into the crowd. By the time matters were brought under control, sixty-six police officers were wounded, seven of whom later died.

The police arrested eight anarchists who were present at the protest and believed to be responsible for setting off the bomb: George Engel, Samuel Fielden, Adolph Fischer, Louis Lingg, Oscar W. Neebe, Albert R. Parsons, Michael Schwab, and August Spies. The authorities charged all eight anarchists with the murder of only one police officer — officer Mathias J. Degan.

All of the anarchists were prosecuted together on June 21, 1886. The trial was marred by national and international publicity. The jury, as expected, convicted each of the anarchists. Engel, Fielden, Fischer, Lingg, Parsons, Schwab and Spies were all sentenced to death. Neebe was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. After the anarchists exhausted State and federal appeals, four of the anarchists, Spies, Parsons, Fischer and Engel, were executed on November 11, 1887. One anarchist, Lingg, committed suicide while awaiting execution. Prior to the executions, the governor of Illinois commuted the death sentences of Fielden and Schwab to life imprisonment. In June 1893, the governor of Illinois granted a pardon to Neebe, Fielden, and Schwab. See also Ex Parte Spies; Fielden v. Illinois; Schwab v. Berggren

Chief Justice The administrative head of an appellate court is referred to as chief justice (or chief judge or presiding judge in a few jurisdictions). In some jurisdictions, the position of chief justice is rotating, while in others it is permanent. A chief justice's vote among members of an appellate court carries no greater weight than any other member's vote.

Child Abuse Mitigator Courts accept child abuse evidence proffered by capital felons at the penalty phase as being relevant non-statutory mitigating evidence. One jurisdiction, Illinois, has made a defendant's child abuse a statutory aggravating circumstance. Child abuse, for penalty phase purposes, generally occurs when a capital felon is of such tender years that violent beating or repeated beatings by an adult could have a tendency to affect the child's moral capacity by predisposing him or her toward committing violence in later years. The child abuse mitigator may be used by a jury or judge to reject imposition of the death penalty. See also Family Background Mitigator; Mitigating Circumstances

Child Killers Known to the media as the “Child Killers,” Debra Jean Milke, James Styers, and Roger Scott were convicted of capital murder by the State of Arizona for the 1989 death of four-year-old Christopher Milke. The Child Killers were sentenced to death.

The anarchists who were executed were, clockwise: Albert R. Parsons, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, and August Spies. Louis Lingg is in the center. Lingg committed suicide shortly before he was scheduled to be executed. (Chicago Public Library)

Debra was the mother of Christopher. Prior to the child's murder, he lived in a Phoenix apartment with his mother and her male companion, Styers. Milke worked at an insurance agency and Styers was an unemployed and disabled veteran. Milke and Christopher's father were divorced and Debra had legal custody of Christopher.

Debra Jean Milke was sentenced to death for her role in the murder of her child. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

In September 1989, Milke took out a $5000 life insurance policy on Christopher as part of her employee benefit plan. The policy named Milke as the beneficiary. At some point between the time she bought the policy and the time of Christopher's death, Milke and Styers discussed the policy and the benefits.

On the morning of December 2, 1989, Styers took Christopher from the apartment. Styers told Christopher they were going to a mall to see Santa Claus. While en route to the mall, Styers picked up Scott. Later in the day, at about 2:45 P.M., Styers telephoned Milke and told her that Christopher was missing. Milke called her father in Florence, Arizona, and told him that Christopher was missing. Eventually, the Phoenix police were notified. Milke was interviewed several times throughout the night. The next morning, she went to Florence with relatives who had driven over upon learning that Christopher was missing.

The police interviewed Styers and Scott separately. Initially, the two men gave consistent stories. They both said that Christopher walked away from them at the mall and could not be found. The intensity of the interviews broke Scott. He confessed to having taken part in the child's death. Scott led the police out into the desert where the child's body was found shot to death. A Phoenix police detective flew to Florence to interview Milke. She was told that her son had been found shot to death in the desert and that she was under arrest.

Milke told the detective that she was upset with Christopher because she felt he was going to turn out like his father — a convict, an alcoholic, and a drug user. Milke stated that she verbalized these fears to Styers. After doing so, she decided it would be best for Christopher to die. She stated that she had a hard time telling Styers what she wanted, but she finally told him and he agreed to help. Milke and Styers discussed the plan several times and included Scott on at least one occasion. Ultimately, they decided that Styers and Scott would take Christopher, kill him, and then report him missing, but Milke was not to know how Christopher was killed. Milke denied that insurance money was her motivation, but admitted that it may have been Styers's and Scott's because Styers knew of the policy.

At separate trials, Milke, Styers and Scott were each convicted of capital murder. The death penalty was imposed on each. The Child Killers are on Arizona's death row waiting to be executed.

Child or Elderly Abuse Aggravator The crime of abusing a child or elderly person is a statutory aggravating circumstance when accompanied by murder. Four capital punishment jurisdictions, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Wyoming, have made this conduct a statutory aggravating circumstance that permits the imposition of a death sentence. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Chile Capital punishment is used in Chile. Chile's constitution became effective on March 11, 1981. Chile abolished the death penalty in 1930, but re-instituted the punishment for certain crimes in 1937. Chile uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Spanish law, with French and Austrian law influences. Chile is a multiparty democracy with a constitution that provides for an executive branch, a bicameral legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

The judicial system has a supreme court, courts of appeal, and trial courts. The supreme court consists of seventeen members, who select a president from their number for a three-year term. Chile has sixteen courts of appeal. The majority of the courts have four members, although the two largest courts have thirteen and twenty-five members.

In September 1997, legislation was signed into law creating the office of attorney general, as well as national and regional prosecutors. This law displaces the former system that used judges to investigate and prosecute defendants. Under Chile's criminal justice system, defendants are not presumed innocent nor do they have a right to trial by jury. Criminal trials are inquisitorial rather than adversarial. Defendants have the right to legal counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

China China imposes the death penalty. China utilizes the firing squad and lethal injection to carry out the death penalty. China's legal system is a complex amalgam of ancient customary law and statutory law. The nation adopted a constitution in 1993. China is an authoritarian state in which the Chinese Communist Party is the ultimate source of power. The nation's constitution provides for an independent judiciary; however, in practice the judicial system is subject to the policy decisions of the Communist Party.

China's judicial system is divided into four levels: Supreme People's Court, Higher People's Courts (provinces, autonomous regions, and special municipalities), Intermediate People's Courts (prefectures, autonomous prefectures, and municipalities), and Basic People's Courts (autonomous counties, towns, and municipal districts). Under Chinese law, all trials are supposed to be held in public, but, in reality, many trials are not. Defendants are presumed guilty under Chinese law and therefore must prove their innocence. Defendants do not have a right to trial by jury. The conviction rate in criminal cases has been reported at being over 90 percent. This result is attributed to the fact that trials in China are little more than sentencing hearings. Although an appeal process exists, rarely are convictions overturned.

In 1997, China enacted a new criminal law code. Under the new code, death penalty offenses were reduced from over seventy to around sixty. Also, during the latter 1990s, China adopted criminal procedure rules and implemented measures to provide adequately trained lawyers. China's new criminal code sets out the following provisions addressing capital punishment:

Article 48. The death penalty is only to be applied to criminal elements who commit the most heinous crimes. In the case of a criminal element who should be sentenced to death, if immediate execution is not essential, a two-year suspension of execution may be announced at the same time the sentence of death is imposed.

Except for judgments made by the Supreme People's Court according to law, all sentences of death shall be submitted to the Supreme People's Court for approval. Sentences of death with suspension of execution may be decided or approved by a High People's Court.

Article 49. The death penalty is not to be applied to persons who have not reached the age of eighteen at the time the crime is committed or to women who are pregnant at the time of adjudication.

Tremendous international criticism has been launched at China because of the lack of due process in its criminal justice system, particularly in death penalty cases. During the period from 1990 to 2000, it has been estimated that China executed over 18,000 prisoners. Credible reports have surfaced alleging that organs from some executed prisoners are removed and sold. Chinese officials have confirmed that executed prisoners are among the sources of organs for transplant, but maintain that consent is required from prisoners or their relatives before organs are removed. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Mir Aimal Kasi, a Pakistani, was executed November 14, 2002, for the murder of two CIA employees. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

CIA Murders On the morning of January 25, 1993, a random shooting spree occurred outside the federal Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) headquarters in Langley, Virginia. The shooting was carried out by Mir Aimal Kasi, a twenty-nine-year-old Pakistani, using an AK-47 assault rifle. Kasi killed two people and wounded three others. The two victims killed in the incident were Frank Darling, a twenty-eight-year-old covert operative for the CIA, and Lansing Bennett, a sixty-six-year-old physician and intelligence analyst. The three victims wounded in the attack, Nicholas Starr, Calvin Morgan, and Stephen Williams, were also employees of the CIA.

After the shooting, Kasi fled to his home in the Pakistani city of Quetta. Kasi was captured in a Pakistani hotel in 1997 by Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) agents. Kasi confessed to the crimes on the flight back to the United States. On November 14, 1997, a jury in Fairfax County, Virginia, found Kasi guilty of capital murder. On January 23, 1998, the trial judge imposed the jury's recommended sentence of death. At his sentencing hearing, Kasi described his actions as retaliation for United States policies that he said hurt Islamic nations.

In June 1999, the United States Supreme Court rejected an appeal by Kasi. In that failed appeal, Kasi alleged that his seizure by FBI agents in Pakistan violated international treaties, that his confession was illegally obtained, and that other constitutional rights were violated. The Virginia Supreme Court, which had earlier upheld Kasi's conviction, ruled that he lacked the legal right to claim his seizure violated the federal Constitution because he was captured overseas. The rejection of Kasi's appeal by the United States Supreme Court was an affirmation of the State high court ruling.

Kasi's lawyers contended in their brief to the United States Supreme Court that the FBI agents never told him that he had the right to contact a representative of the Pakistani consulate and the United States never requested his extradition from Pakistan. They also claimed that the Virginia courts violated Kasi's constitutional rights by failing to force the FBI and the CIA to produce documents that could contain evidence raising doubts about his guilt. These issues were presumptively meritless due to the United States Supreme Court's refusal to hear Kasi's appeal.

Kasi was executed by lethal injection on November 14, 2002. See also Foreign Nationals and Capital Punishment

Circumstantial Evidence Two types of evidence may be used to obtain conviction of a defendant: direct or circumstantial. Examples of direct evidence include a confession, eyewitness testimony, and a videotaped recording of the crime. Most criminal convictions are obtained without the use of direct evidence.

All courts accept circumstantial evidence as an alternative method of proof in obtaining a criminal conviction. Circumstantial evidence is inferential evidence that is fluid and case specific. This is because circumstantial evidence is any relevant fact from which a jury may reasonably "infer" a defendant's guilt.

At the guilt phase of a capital prosecution, circumstantial evidence must rise to the level of establishing beyond a reasonable doubt every element of the offense charged against the defendant. At the penalty phase of a capital prosecution, circumstantial evidence plays a minimal role because a defendant's guilt has already been determined.

Citizens Against Homicides Citizens Against Homicides (CAH) is a California-based nonprofit organization. A primary activity of CAH is to engage in peaceful protests when designated murderers seek parole. CAH has taken the position that community safety is best served by not releasing murderers. CAH produces a monthly newsletter that profiles murder victims.

Citizens United for Alternatives to the Death Penalty Citizens United for Alternatives to the Death Penalty (CUADP) is a Florida-based national nonprofit organization. The organization was formed for the purpose of working to end the death penalty in the United States. The executive director of CUADP is Abraham J. Bonowitz. Under the leadership of Bonowitz, CUADP engages in direct action to educate the public about the need to abolish capital punishment. To this end, Bonowitz has personally subjected himself on the frontline of CUADP's struggle. He has been arrested on numerous occasions in large cities across the country during peaceful but aggressive campaigns to awaken the public to the "evils" of capital punishment. Most recently, in 1997, Bonowitz was arrested along with other anti-death penalty activists for unfurling a banner in front of the United States Supreme Court which read, "Stop Executions!"

Issue Presented: Whether due process of law was violated by separately prosecuting the defendant for four murders until a death sentence was obtained in the third trial.

Case Holding: Due process of law was not violated by separately prosecuting the defendant for four murders until a death sentence was obtained in the third trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ciucci, was charged by the State of Illinois with murdering his wife and three children. The defendant was prosecuted separately for each murder. In the first two prosecutions, the defendant was found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment for each conviction. In the third trial, the defendant was found guilty and sentenced to death. The defendant appealed the death sentence conviction. The Illinois Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that due process of law prohibited the prosecutor from successively prosecuting him for the sole purpose of obtaining a death sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion found that due process of law was not violated by the repeated prosecution of the defendant: "The State was constitutionally entitled to prosecute these individual offenses singly at separate trials, and to utilize therein all relevant evidence, in the absence of proof establishing that such a course of action entailed fundamental unfairness." The opinion noted that the defendant raised another argument, but that the record on the issue was not submitted to the Court; therefore, the issue was not addressed. The judgment of the Illinois Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Douglas, in Which Warren, CJ., and Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Douglas dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the successive prosecutions of the defendant were motivated by the desire to obtain a death sentence and that such a course violated due process principles. Justice Douglas wrote:

This case presents an instance of the prosecution being allowed to harass the accused with repeated trials and convictions on the same evidence, until it achieves its desired result of a capital verdict....

In my view the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prevents this effort by a State to obtain the death penalty. No constitutional problem would have arisen if [the defendant] had been prosecuted in one trial for as many murders as there were victims. But by using the same evidence in multiple trials the State continued its relentless prosecutions until it got the result it wanted. It in effect tried the accused for four murders three consecutive times, massing in each trial the horrible details of each of the four deaths. This is an unseemly and oppressive use of a criminal trial that violates the concept of due process contained in the Fourteenth Amendment, whatever its ultimate scope is taken to be.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a dissenting statement indicating that he believed "the Fourteenth Amendment bars a State from placing a defendant twice in jeopardy for the same offense."

Clark, Tom C. Tom C. Clark served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1949 to 1967. While on the Supreme Court, Clark was known as a conservative who shifted to the center during his last years on the Court.

Clark was born in Dallas, Texas, on September 23, 1899. In the early 1920s, Clark attended the University of Texas, where he studied law and eventually received a degree. After college, Clark joined his father's law firm for a short period of time. His legal career shifted into full gear when he left private practice and began a long service as a State and federal government attorney in various aspects of the law. From 1945 to 1949, Clark served as United States Attorney General under President Harry S Truman. In 1949, President Truman appointed Clark to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Clark wrote a number of capital punishment opinions. His capital punishment cases, for the most part, reflected the conservative philosophy that Clark was known for during much of his time on the bench. For example, in Leland v. Oregon, the issue confronting the Supreme Court was whether or not Oregon could force defendants to prove insanity beyond a reasonable doubt. Clark, writing for the Court, held that "[w]e are ... reluctant to interfere with Oregon's determination of its policy with respect to the burden of proof on the issue of sanity since we cannot say that policy violates generally accepted concepts of basic standards of justice." In Stroble v. California, Clark was reluctant to disturb a capital conviction. In that case, the Clark held that the defendant was not denied due process of law as a result of his confession, interrogation without counsel, or pre-trial publicity. A decision issued in Clark's later years on the bench which reflected his a shift in his judicial philosophy was Coleman v. Alabama. In Coleman, the defendant contended he was denied a fair trial because African-Americans were excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The actual issue brought to the Supreme Court in Coleman was that the Alabama courts denied him the opportunity to present evidence to prove his claim of jury discrimination. Clark, writing for the Court, agreed with the defendant and reversed and remanded the case for a full evidentiary hearing to so that the defendant could present evidence on his claim of jury discrimination. Clark died on June 13, 1977.

Clarke, John Hessin John Hessin Clarke served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1916 to 1922. While on the Supreme Court, Clarke was known as a liberal interpreter of the Constitution.

Clarke was born on September 18, 1857, in Lisbon, Ohio. He received an undergraduate degree from Western Reserve College in 1877 and a master's degree from the school in 1880. Clarke did not receive a formal legal education. He studied as a legal apprentice with his father, who was a lawyer, and in 1878 passed the Ohio bar. Most of Clarke's adult life was spent practicing law. He developed a good reputation and became quite successful with several firms. In 1914, President Woodrow Wilson appointed Clarke as a federal district court judge in Ohio. Two years later, President Wilson appointed him to the Supreme Court.

During Clarke's relatively brief tenure on the Supreme Court he was known to have written only one capital punishment opinion. In Valdez v. United States, Clarke wrote a dissenting opinion. The primary issue in Valdez was whether the absence of the defendant during the trial judge's visit to the crime scene denied him due process of law. The majority on the Supreme Court held that the defendant was not denied due process. Clarke disagreed with the majority and wrote: "It has long been familiar, textbook, law, that a viewing of the premises where the crime is alleged to have been committed is part of the trial.... It is very clear to my mind ... that the viewing of the scene of the murder by the judge without the presence of the accused requires that it be reversed and a new trial granted." Clarke died in 1945.

Class and Capital Punishment Opponents of capital punishment have argued that it is a poor person's punishment, that is rarely imposed on influential or wealthy people. Although statistical evidence supports the claim that the vast number of defendants receiving capital punishment are at the lower end of the nation's socioeconomic ladder, proponents of capital punishment contend that such statistics do not tell the whole story. It has been argued by proponents of capital punishment that the less privileged in society simply commit the overwhelming number of capital crimes. Therefore, statistics must necessarily reflect the reality of who actually commits capital offenses.

Clemency As a general matter, executive clemency refers to granting a specific form of leniency from a conviction and sentence. Executive clemency is a matter of grace, not of right. No defendant has a right to obtain executive clemency. Power of executive clemency in the United States derived from the practice as it had existed in England. Such power has traditionally rested in governors or the president. Historically, courts have been hesitant to review challenges to the exercise of executive clemency power. Courts have held that death penalty statutes which expressly prohibit commutation of death sentences do not violate the federal Constitution. Between 1977 and 2006, a total of 229 death row inmates had their death sentences vacated, as a result of executive clemency.

Jurisdictions vary as to the autonomy granted chief executive officers in making executive clemency decisions. A few jurisdictions attach no strings to the chief executive officer's authority in this area, while others require involvement of a board. The following statutes illustrate how capital punishment jurisdictions address the matter.

Texas Code C.C.P. Art. 48.01. In all criminal cases, except treason and impeachment, the Governor shall have power, after conviction, on the written signed recommendation and advice of the Board of Pardons and Paroles, or a majority thereof, to grant reprieves and commutations of punishments and pardons.... The Governor shall have the power to grant one reprieve in any capital case for a period not to exceed 30 days; and shall have power to revoke conditional pardons.

Washington Code § 8.01.120. Whenever a prisoner has been sentenced to death, the governor shall have power to commute such sentence to imprisonment for life at hard labor; and in all cases in which the governor is authorized to grant pardons or commute sentence of death, he may, upon the petition of the person convicted, commute a sentence or grant a pardon, upon such conditions, and with such restrictions, and under such limitations as he may think proper.... The governor may also, on good cause shown, grant respites or reprieves from time to time as he may think proper.

730 Illinois Comp. Stat. § 5/3-3-13. (A.) Petitions seeking pardon, commutation or reprieve shall be addressed to the Governor and filed with the Prisoner Review Board. The petition shall be in writing and signed by the person under conviction or by a person on his behalf. It shall contain a brief history of the case and the reasons for executive clemency. (B.) Notice of the proposed application shall be given by the Board to the committing court and the state's attorney of the county where the conviction was had. (C.) The Board shall, if requested and upon due notice, give a hearing to each application, allowing representation by counsel, if desired, after which it shall confidentially advise the Governor by a written report of its recommendations which shall be determined by majority vote. The Board shall meet to consider such petitions no less than 4 times each year. (D.) The Governor shall decide each application and communicate his decision to the Board which shall notify the petitioner.

Executive clemency may manifest itself in three ways: (1) reprieve (sometimes called "respite"), (2) commutation, or (3) pardon. Each type of executive clemency has its own unique consequence for a capital felon.

1. Executive Reprieve. A reprieve merely postpones an execution temporarily. Capital felon reprieves usually occur in one of two contexts. First, if a capital felon has filed a habeas corpus or other type of petition with a court, but the court refuses to grant a stay while the matter is before it, the capital felon can request an executive reprieve while the court evaluates the matter. Second, if a capital felon requests a pardon or commutation, an executive reprieve may be granted while the application for pardon or commutation is under review.

2. Executive Commutation. The court in State ex rel. Maurer v. Steward, 644 N.E.2d 369 (Ohio 1994), defined commutation as "the change of a punishment to which a person has been condemned into a less severe one." Most capital punishment jurisdictions limit commutation of a death sentence to that of life imprisonment. In theory, when this limitation is not imposed, a capital felon can have his or her death sentence commuted to time served — which would mean immediate release.

However, as a practical matter, commutations are always confined to life imprisonment. Usually, commutations are made with a condition that the capital felon will not seek parole. Commutations may also take on any other conditions deemed appropriate and in compliance with general laws. A violation of a condition of commutation can, in theory, result in the death penalty being reinstated and carried out.

3. Executive Pardon. It was pointed out in Ex Parte May, 717 S.W.2d 84 (Tex.Cr.App. 1986), that, unlike commutation and reprieve, "a pardon may be granted by proper authority at any time — even before a criminal charge has been lodged against the offender." The court in State ex rel. Maurer v. Steward, 644 N.E.2d 369 (Ohio 1994), made the following observations regarding a pardon:

A pardon discharges the individual designated from all or some specified penal consequences of his crime. It may be full or partial, absolute or conditional.

A full and absolute pardon

After Henry Lee Lucas was sentenced to death for murder in 1984 by the State of Texas, he confessed to having killed over 300 people. In spite of the confession, on June 26, 1998, Texas Governor George W. Bush commuted Lucas' death sentence to life in prison. Lucas died of a heart attack on March 3, 2001. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice) releases the offender from the entire punishment prescribed for his offense, and from all the disabilities consequent on his conviction.

Marcus Carter, Jr., had his death sentence commuted to life imprisonment by North Carolina Governor Jim Hunt. (North Carolina Department of Corrections)

Pardons for capital felons waiting to be executed have been rare. This is because of the nature of a pardon — it allows the immediate release of the capital felon. Defendants who receive sentences less than death are usually the beneficiaries of pardons. *See also Biddle v. Perovich; Calderon v. Coleman; California v. Ramos; Ex Parte Wells; Lambert v. Issue Presented: Whether it is constitutionally impermissible for a State's appellate court to uphold a death sentence imposed by a jury that has relied in part on an invalid aggravating circumstance.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not prevent a State's appellate court from upholding a death sentence that is based in part on an invalid or improperly defined aggravating circumstance, either by re-weighing of the aggravating and mitigating evidence or by harmless error review.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Chandler Clemons, was convicted by a Mississippi jury of committing capital murder on April 17, 1987. At the penalty phase hearing, the trial court instructed the jury, among other things, that, in deciding whether to impose the death penalty, it should consider the following statutory aggravating circumstances: (1) that the murder was committed during the course of a robbery for pecuniary gain, and (2) that it was an "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel" killing. The jury, finding that both aggravating factors were present and that they outweighed any mitigating circumstances, sentenced the defendant to death.

On appeal, the Mississippi Supreme Court upheld the death sentence. The State's appellate court acknowledged that the "especially heinous" statutory aggravating factor was constitutionally invalid because it was vague. However, it was held that the case did not require reversal, since the appellate court had previously given the factor a constitutionally acceptable limiting construction. The appellate court declared that, beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury's verdict would have been the same without the "especially heinous" factor. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue of what the Constitution requires when an aggravating circumstance is invalid.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: The defendant argued that under State law, only a jury has the authority to impose a death sentence; therefore, he had a constitutional right to have the jury assess the consequences of an invalid statutory aggravating circumstance that was used to impose the death penalty against him.

In rejecting this argument, Justice White observed that nothing in the Constitution requires the jury, as opposed to the appellate court, to impose the death sentence after the appellate court has invalidated one of two or more statutory aggravating circumstances found by the jury. Therefore, it is constitutionally permissible for an appellate court to reweigh the aggravating and mitigating evidence in order to uphold a death sentence that is based in part on an invalid or improperly defined statutory aggravating circumstance.

Justice White noted that nothing in appellate court weighing or re-weighing is at odds with the constitutional standards of fairness, nor is such a process inherently unreliable and likely to result in arbitrary imposition of the death penalty. It was said that appellate courts can and do give each defendant an individualized and reliable sentencing determination based on his or her circumstances, background, and crime. It was pointed out that even if a particular State's law made weighing of aggravating and mitigating circumstances an exclusive jury function, it would still be constitutionally permissible for any State's appellate court to apply harmless error analysis to the jury's consideration of an invalid aggravating circumstance.

Although the opinion found that appellate courts could engage in harmless error analysis, or weighing or re-weighing aggravating and mitigating factors, Justice White found that it was not clear from the record in the case that the Mississippi Supreme Court correctly employed re-weighing analysis. Therefore, the opinion vacated the judgment and remanded the case for reconsideration and re-weighing of aggravating and mitigating factors by the Mississippi Supreme Court.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan wrote succinctly that he concurred solely in the majority's decision to vacate the judgment. He gave two grounds for dissenting. First, he wrote that because of his adherence to the "view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, I would direct that the proceedings on remand be circumscribed so as to preclude the re-imposition of the death sentence." Second, he indicated in dissent that he did not believe a State court could "save a death sentence by 're-weighing' aggravating and mitigating circumstances."

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: In his concurrence, Justice Blackmun wrote that he agreed with the majority that the Mississippi Supreme Court failed to articulate a satisfactory basis for affirming the defendant's death sentence. He therefore concurred in the majority's decision that the judgment must be vacated.

Justice Blackmun dissented "from the majority's strong and gratuitous suggestion that the Mississippi Supreme Court ... may 'salvage' Clemons' death sentence by performing its own weighing of aggravating and mitigating circumstances." Justice Blackmun did not believe that it was appropriate for an appellate court to engage in re-weighing of aggravating and mitigating circumstances to determine whether a sentence of death is appropriate. He wrote that "[t]he logical implication of the majority's approach is that no trial-level sentencing procedure need be conducted at all. Instead, the record of a capital trial (including a sentencing hearing conducted before a court reporter) might as well be shipped to the appellate court, which then would determine the appropriate sentence in the first instance." See also Appellate Cleveland State University Racial Murders In 1982, Frank G. Spisak, Jr., brought terror to the campus of Cleveland State University through a series of random murders. Spisak was a native of Ohio who grew up to be a transvestite known as Ann Spisak. Ridiculed because of his lifestyle, Spisak turned to reading works about Adolf Hitler. Through his readings about Hitler, Spisak found a new identity as a race hater.

Spisak's mind proved to be far too weak for the literature he read concerning Hitler. In time, he believed he was the leader destined to make America a nation of "Arayans" only. On February 1, 1982, Spisak set out to start his leadership role the purifier of America. On that day he visited the campus of Cleveland State University and found his first victim, an African American minister named Reverend Horace Rickerson. Spisak followed Reverend Rickerson into a library restroom and shot him dead.

Spisak's next victim was a maintenance supervisor at Cleveland State University named Timothy Sheehan. Spisak wrongly believed that Sheehan was a Jewish professor at Cleveland State. On August 27, 1982, Spisak followed Sheehan into a university restroom and shot him dead.

On the night of August 29, 1982, Spisak set out to find another victim on the university campus. Spisak drove around the area of the campus until he found Brian Warford, a young black man who was sitting at a bus stop. Spisak parked his car, walked over to Warford, and shot him dead.

In addition to the three murders on campus, Spisak had also attacked and injured several other victims. The police were baffled by the murders and attempted murders. They had no clue whatsoever as to the identity of the perpetrator. A break in the case did not come until after authorities arrested Spisak on September 4, 1982. The arrest resulted from a report that a man fired a gun from a window. The police arrived at the scene, arrested Spisak, and confiscated several weapons from him. He was charged with discharging a weapon within the city limits and for possession of unregistered handguns. Spisak posted bond a few hours after his arrest.

On September 5, 1982, the police received an anonymous call from a woman with information about the Cleveland State murders.

Frank G. Spisak, Jr., was sentenced to death for the murder of two African Americans and a person he thought was Jewish. (Ohio Department of Corrections)

The woman told the police that the guns confiscated from Spisak had been used in the killings. Tests were immediately performed on the weapons and comparisons were made with the pellets and casings found in connection with the murders. After conducting this investigation, the police obtained a warrant for Spisak's arrest. He was eventually arrested at the home of a friend. He was found hiding in a basement crawl space.

Spisak was indicted on for the Cleveland State University murders. The case went to trial on June 7, 1983. On July 15, the jury convicted Spisak of the murders. On July 19, he was sentenced to death. Spisak is on death row in Ohio.

Clifford, Nathan Nathan Clifford served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1858 to 1881. While on the Supreme Court, Clifford was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution who favored States' rights.

Clifford was born in Rumney, New Hampshire, on August 18, 1803. Although Clifford received some formal education during his youth, he was largely self-educated. Clifford served for a time as a legal apprentice and was able to pass the bar in 1827. After passing the bar, Clifford moved to Maine where he began a law practice in the town of Newfield. Clifford eventually entered politics and served in Maine's House of Representatives, as State attorney general, and for two terms in the United States House of Representatives. President James Polk appointed Clifford as United States Attorney General in 1846. President James Buchanan nominated Clifford to the Supreme Court in December 1857 and he assumed his seat in 1858.

While on the Supreme Court, Clifford was known to have written only a few capital punishment opinions. In spite of the paucity of capital punishment opinions by Clifford, his opinion for the Supreme Court in Wilkerson v. Utah became one of the major capital punishment cases decided by the Court. The primary issue in Wilkerson was whether or not death by firing squad was a cruel and unusual punishment. After the opinion in the case analyzed the history of death by firing squad, Clifford concluded that "[c]ruel and unusual punishments are forbidden by the Constitution, but ... the punishment of shooting as a mode of executing the death penalty for the crime of murder in the first degree is not included in that category, within the meaning of the eighth amendment." Clifford died on July 25, 1881.

Coalition of Arizonans to Abolish the Death Penalty

The Coalition of Arizonans to Abolish the Death Penalty (CAADP) is composed of a group of organizations and individuals pledged to end the death penalty in Arizona. The purpose of CAADP is to further a cohesive effort to abolish the death penalty in the state of Arizona, with an emphasis on the legislative process and community education. The organization advocates the use of prayer, public education, dialog, constitutional recourse, and public and legislative action.

Co-Defendant The term "co-defendant" is used when a prosecution involves more than one defendant. A defendant and co-defendant may be tried together or separately. Although a defendant and co-defendant are charged with the exact same offense, the disposition of the case against each may be different. See also Co-Defendant Spared Death Penalty Mitigator

ent sentences for the same offense. This situation occurs most often when a defendant agrees to testify against a co-defendant in exchange for lighter punishment. This situation can result in a capital felon being sentenced to life in prison, while his or her co-defendant is sentenced to death. Two capital punishment jurisdictions, New Hampshire and the federal government, have made “co-defendant spared death penalty” a statutory mitigating circumstance. Some courts preclude evidence of this issue on the grounds that it is not relevant to individualized capital punishment sentencing. See also Individualized Sentencing; Mitigating Circumstances

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution permits imposition of the death penalty for the crime of rape.

Case Holding: The sentence of death for the crime of rape is grossly disproportionate and excessive punishment and is therefore forbidden by the Eighth Amendment as cruel and unusual punishment.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ehrlich Anthony Coker, escaped from a Georgia prison and, on September 2, 1974, while in the course of committing an armed robbery and other offenses, raped a woman. He was convicted of rape, armed robbery, and the other offenses and sentenced to death on the rape charge. The defendant argued that the federal Constitution prohibited imposition of the death penalty for the crime of rape. The Georgia Supreme Court rejected the argument and affirmed the death sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice White Announced the Court’s Judgment and in Which Stewart, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice White’s plurality opinion noted that the Eighth Amendment prohibited not only those punishments that are barbaric, but also those that are excessive in relation to the crime committed. The opinion observed that although rape deserves serious punishment, the death penalty is an excessive penalty for the rapist who, unlike the murderer, does not unjustifiably take human life. It was said that objective evidence demonstrated that death is a disproportionate penalty for rape. The opinion pointed out that Georgia was the only state still to authorize capital punishment for rape of a woman. The opinion indicated that only two states still permitted imposition of the death penalty for rape of a child. The judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court upholding the death sentence was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan wrote that he maintained his belief that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Constitution and, therefore, concurred in the judgment setting aside the death sentence.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall wrote that his views had not changed, insofar as he believed that the Constitution precluded imposition of the death penalty. He, therefore, concurred in the judgment.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Powell: Justice Powell concurred in the judgment based on the facts of the case. He wrote that there was no evidence that the defendant’s “offense was committed with excessive brutality or that the victim sustained serious or lasting injury.”

Justice Powell dissented from the plurality’s position “that capital punishment always—regardless of the circumstances—is a disproportionate penalty for the crime of rape.” He believed that the death penalty may be constitutionally permissible “for the crime of aggravated rape.”

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Burger: Chief Justice Burger argued that, while the Constitution prohibits imposing the death penalty for minor crimes, “rape is not a minor crime.” He believed that the Constitution permitted States to create statutes imposing death for the crime of rape.

Case Note: The decision in the case had a significant impact upon death penalty crimes. Except for treason and espionage (one jurisdiction retains rape of a child as a capital crime), all offenses that have the death penalty as an authorized punishment require a homicide also occur. See also Crimes Not Involving Death

Cole, Carroll Edward Carroll Edward Cole was born at Sioux City, Iowa, on May 9, 1938. Around the age of eight, Cole drowned a childhood friend who teased him about having a girl’s first name. Authorities listed the drowning as accidental. By the time Cole reached the death chamber in Nevada in 1985, he murdered at least twelve women.

While growing up in Iowa, Cole was a troubled youth who was involved in heavy drinking and petty crime. He dropped out of high school and took on odd jobs before finally joining the Navy in 1957. Cole’s tour in the Navy was short-lived because of alcohol use and his continued involvement with petty crime. He was discharged in 1958.

After his discharge from the Navy, Cole returned to Iowa. By that point, he was mentally unstable. In 1961, he reported to a police officer that he had the urge to rape and kill women. As a result of these urges, Cole entered a mental health hospital. Cole was in the hospital for ninety days. Shortly after being released, Cole was arrested for auto theft and given a six-month sentence of confinement. However, Cole was able to convince the judge that he was mentally unstable because he wanted to rape and kill women. The judge had Cole committed to another mental health hospital. Cole stayed at the hospital for six months before being released in 1963.

Between 1963 and 1971, Cole unsuccessfully attempted to kill several women in Texas, California, and Nevada. During this period, he married and divorced Neville Whitworth, spent time in mental health hospitals, and was imprisoned for attempting to rape and kill an eleven-year-old girl in Missouri.

Cole's desire to rape and kill women culminated with his first victim in May 1971. Cole was in San Diego, California, when he met Essie Buck in a bar. He raped and strangled Essie shortly after they met. Within three weeks of Essie's murder, Cole killed two other women he met in the San Diego area. In 1972, Cole killed two more women in the Mexican border town of San Ysidro.

Cole married his second wife, Diana Pashal, in 1973. The couple moved from San Diego to Nevada in 1974. Cole eventually left his wife and drifted to Wyoming. While in the Wyoming town of Casper, Cole met Myrlene Hamer in August 1975. Shortly after they met, Cole raped and strangled Hamer. Two years later, in 1977, Cole went to Nevada, where he met and killed a prostitute named Kathlyn Blum. Several months later, while in Oklahoma, Cole killed another woman and dismembered her body. Cole's next victim, Bonnie Sue O'Neil, was killed in San Diego in August 1979. A month after O'Neil's death, Cole killed his second wife, Diana Pashal, who had returned to San Diego. Not long after Pashal's death, Cole went back to Nevada, where he killed Marie Cushman in November 1979.

In 1980, Cole went to Texas, where, in November, he killed Sally Thompson, Dorothy King, and Wanda Faye Roberts, all in separate incidents. Shortly after the murder of the three women, Cole was arrested. He was prosecuted on April 6, 1981. The jury convicted him of killing all three women and on April 9, 1981, and he was sentenced to prison for life.

Rather than spend the rest of his life in prison, Cole confessed to killing other women, including the murder of Kathlyn Blum and Marie Cushman in Nevada. On March 30, 1984, Cole was extradited to Nevada to stand trial for killing Blum and Cushman. In August of that year, Cole pled guilty to killing Blum and Cushman. On October 12, 1984, Cole was sentenced to death for murdering Cushman (the State had no death penalty at the time of Blum's murder). After Cole was sentenced to death, he refused to appeal his death sentence. However, the Nevada Supreme Court authorized an appeal be taken on his behalf. In the opinion affirming the death sentence, Cole v. State, 707 P.2d 545 (Nev. 1985), the State Supreme Court outlined Cole's death wish as follows:

Carroll Edward Cole, convicted on a plea of guilty to first-degree murder, has been sentenced to die. Cole refused to file an appeal of his sentence, and this court ordered counsel appointed for him to resolve any of the questions as to whether Cole's waiver of appellate review was valid. We conclude that Cole's waiver was valid and that his death sentence conforms with the requirements of the laws of this state....

At the sentencing hearing Cole refused to object to any evidence offered against him. Furthermore, Cole refused to present any mitigating circumstances and objected when the amicus counsel attempted to do so.

From Cole's own admissions he has killed at least 13 people. He expresses no remorse for these murders and freely admits that, given the opportunity, he would kill again:

I was drunk, but that's still not an excuse. I was in my right mind. I knew exactly what I was doing and I'm not sorry for what I did and I have no remorse.

This has been a very frightening experience for me because I know that I would kill again and everything like this. And it seems anymore no woman is safe with me.

Cole also admitted that if given a prison sentence instead of death, he would make every effort to escape because: "I don't think anybody likes to do the rest of their time in a penitentiary."

Cole expressly requested that he be sentenced to die.

Cole's request to die was granted on December 6, 1985, when the State of Nevada executed him by lethal injection. See also Serial Killer

Coleman and Brown Alton Coleman received a death sentence from the States of Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana. Debra Denise Brown received a death sentence from the States of Indiana and Ohio (Ohio was reversed and life sentences imposed). In 1984, Coleman and Brown set out together on a journey across mid-America that resulted in a trail that left eight dead bodies.

Coleman was born in November 6, 1955, and Brown was born on November 11, 1962. At some point during the early 1980s, the two met in Waukegan, Illinois, and became lovers. By the time they met, Coleman had already developed a violent criminal past that included confinement at Joliet State Prison.

The murder spree embarked upon by Coleman and Brown started on May 29, 1984, with the disappearance of nine-year-old Vernita Wheat. The child was taken from her home in Kenosha, Wisconsin, and brought to Waukegan by Coleman and Brown. On June 19, Wheat's corpse was found in an abandoned building.

On June 18, Coleman and Brown appeared in Gary, Indiana. While there, they kidnapped seven-year-old Tamika Turks and her aunt. Tamika was beaten, raped, and strangled to death. The aunt was raped and bludgeoned, but miraculously survived.

Brown and Coleman needed transportation to leave Indiana. To obtain a vehicle, they kidnapped Donna Williams and took her car on June 19. Eventually Williams' body was discovered on July 11. She had been strangled to death with pantyhose.

The next victims for Coleman and Brown were targeted on July 7. On that date, they manage to convince Virginia Temple to let them spend the night at her home with her ten-year-old daughter, Rochelle. Before leaving the home, Coleman and Brown raped and murdered mother and daughter.

Coleman and Brown left Indiana bound for Ohio. On July 11, while in Cincinnati, they found their next victim, fifteen-year-old Tonnie Storey. Storey's raped and strangled body was discovered on July 19. Upon leaving Cincinnati, Coleman and Brown drifted to Norwood. On July 13, while in Norwood, the duo beat to death Marlene Walters and attempted to kill her husband, but he survived. Coleman and Brown stole the Walters' car.

Alton Coleman (left) and Debra Denise Brown (right) went on a killing spree in 1984 that left eight people dead. Coleman was executed by the State of Ohio in 2002. Brown is serving a life sentence in Ohio. (Ohio Department of Corrections)

Upon leaving Ohio, Coleman and Brown journeyed to Indianapolis. When they arrived, they needed another vehicle and obtained one from their next victim, seventy-seven-year-old Eugene Scott. Scott's body was found shot and stabbed to death.

Coleman and Brown ended up in Evanston, Illinois, where an anonymous tip to the police brought their reign of terror to an end. Upon being captured, Coleman and Brown were prosecuted for the Ohio murders of Walters and Storey. They received death sentences for both murders. However, Brown's sentence was reversed on appeal and she was given life sentences. The State of Indiana prosecuted the duo for the murder of Turks. They both received the death penalty for the crime. Illinois prosecuted Coleman for the murder of Wheat. He received a death sentence for that murder. Authorities eventually decided not to continue prosecuting the duo, though the evidence of guilt was available. Coleman was executed by lethal injection by the State of Ohio on April 26, 2002. Brown is being held on her life sentences in Ohio.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was entitled to present evidence on his claim of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that presided at his trial.

Case Holding: The defendant was entitled to present evidence on his claim of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that presided at his trial because the trial court ruled on the merits of the issue without affording him such an opportunity.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Coleman, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by an Alabama jury. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial asserting for the first time deprivation of his constitutional rights through systematic exclusion of blacks from the grand jury that indicted him and petit jury that presided at his trial. The trial judge denied the motion because the issue was not raised before trial. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clark: Justice Clark ruled that the defendant's conviction and sentence had to be reversed because he was not given an opportunity to present evidence on his claim of grand and petit jury discrimination. The opinion rejected the State's claim that the defendant waived the issue by not presenting it before trial. It was said that the trial court actually accepted the motion, but refused to take evidence on the issue. Justice Clark found that once the trial court accepted the motion on its merits, due process required that the defendant be afforded an opportunity to present evidence on his claim. The opinion pointed out that the Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the judgment by indicating the defendant failed to present any evidence on his jury discrimination claim. The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was reversed and the case remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the defendant's jury discrimination claim. See also Coleman v. Issue Presented: Whether the State rebutted the defendant's prima facie case of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand and petit juries involved in his prosecution.

Case Holding: The State failed to rebut the defendant's prima facie case of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand and petit juries involved in his prosecution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Coleman, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by an Alabama jury. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, asserting for the first time deprivation of his constitutional rights through systematic exclusion of blacks from the grand jury that indicted him and petit jury that presided at his trial. The trial judge denied the motion because the issue was not raised before trial. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court reversed the judgment in Coleman v. Alabama (I) and remanded the case for an evidentiary hearing on the defendant's jury discrimination claim. On remand, the defendant was afforded an evidentiary hearing on his claim. The trial court found that the defendant failed to prove his claim. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion found that no black had served on the grand jury that indicted the defendant and no black served on the jury which presided at his trial. It was further found that up to the time of the defendant's trial, no black had ever served on a grand jury panel in the county where he was prosecuted and few, if any, blacks had served on petit jury panels. The opinion held that such evidence made out a prima facie case of the denial of equal protection which the Constitution guaranteed. It was said that the State failed to rebut the prima facie case of discrimination. The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was reversed. See also Coleman v. Issue Presented: Whether double jeopardy principles barred the State of Tennessee from prosecuting the defendant for an offense that he was prosecuted for by the United States military.

Case Holding: Double jeopardy principles did not bar the State of Tennessee from prosecuting the defendant for an offense that he was prosecuted for by the United States military, but, under the rules of war, such prosecution by the State could not occur.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Coleman, was a soldier in the Union Army in 1865. The Union Army prosecuted him for committing capital murder of a civilian on March 7, 1865. The murder occurred in Tennessee, which was an insurgent State at the time and under the jurisdiction of the Union Army. The defendant was found guilty by a military tribunal and sentenced to death. The president, however, did not confirm the defendant's execution as required by law.

In 1874, the State of Tennessee indicted the defendant for the capital murder in which the military had previously convicted and sentenced him. The defendant was found guilty and sentenced to death. The Tennessee Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that double jeopardy principles prohibited the State from prosecuting him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Field: Justice Field held that double jeopardy principles did not bar the defendant's prosecution by the State of Tennessee. He ruled that the prosecution was barred by the rules of war recognized by international law. The opinion reasoned: "When the armies of the United States were in the territory of insurgent States, banded together in hostility to the national government and making war against it ... the military tribunals [of the United States] had, under the laws of war ... exclusive jurisdiction to try and punish offenses of every grade committed by persons in the military service. Officers and soldiers of the armies of the Union were not subject during the war to the laws of the enemy.... They were answerable only to their own government, and only by its laws, as enforced by its armies, could they be punished." The opinion concluded that, because Tennessee was an insurgent State at the time of the offense, it did not have jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant. The judgment of the Tennessee Supreme Court was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Clifford: Justice Clifford dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that Tennessee did not lose its sovereign authority to enforce its criminal laws merely because of military occupation by the Union Army. Justice Clifford reasoned that the issue raised by the defendant before the State courts, i.e., double jeopardy, was the sole dispositive issue in the case. He contended that double jeopardy principles did not prevent the State from enforcing its laws concurrently with the federal government through its military. Justice Clifford also believed that because the president never authorized the defendant's execution, the military judgment became a nullity, which supported the conclusion that double jeopardy did not bar the prosecution. See also Double Jeopardy Clause; Jurisdiction; Military Death Penalty Law

Issue Presented: Whether federal courts may review federal habeas corpus claims that were defaulted on by a defendant in a State habeas corpus proceeding.

Case Holding: Federal courts may not review federal habeas corpus claims that were defaulted on by a defendant in a State habeas corpus proceeding unless the defendant can demonstrate (1) cause for the default; (2) actual prejudice as a result of the alleged violation of federal law; or (3) that failure to consider the claims will result in a fundamental miscarriage of justice.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Roger Keith Coleman, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Virginia. On direct appeal, the Virginia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant then filed a petition for habeas corpus in a State trial court. The State trial court dismissed the habeas petition. He then appealed the dismissal of the habeas petition to the Virginia Supreme Court. The appellate court dismissed the habeas appeal on the grounds that the defendant did not file the appeal within the time frame provided by State law.

The defendant next filed a habeas petition in a federal district court, alleging claims that were brought in his State habeas petition. The district court dismissed the petition on the grounds that the defendant had procedurally defaulted the claims because of the dismissal of his petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal by the district court, after finding the defendant had not shown cause to excuse the default of the claims at the State level. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor held that the defendant's claims presented for the first time in the State habeas proceeding were not subject to review in a federal habeas proceeding. It was reasoned in the opinion that, because of the requirement that States have the first opportunity to correct their own mistakes, federal habeas courts generally may not review a State court's denial of a defendant's constitutional claim, if the State court's decision rests on a State procedural default that is independent of the federal claims and is adequate to support the defendant's continued custody.

It was ruled that in all cases in which a State prisoner has defaulted his or her federal claims in a State court pursuant to an independent and adequate state procedural rule, federal habeas review of the claims is barred unless the defendant can demonstrate (1) cause for the default; (2) actual prejudice as a result of the alleged violation of federal law; or (3) that failure to consider the claims will result in a fundamental miscarriage of justice.

Justice O'Connor rejected the defendant's contention that it was his attorney's error that led to the late filing of his State habeas appeal. She indicated that this did not establish good cause for excusing the default. She reasoned that, because there is no constitutional right to an attorney in State post-conviction proceedings, a defendant cannot claim constitutionally ineffective assistance of counsel in such proceedings. Thus, since any attorney error that led to the default of the defendant's claims could not constitute "cause," he was barred from bringing the claims in a federal habeas proceeding. The decision of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White: Justice White concurred in the Court's opinion. His concurrence addressed the defendant's argument that the Virginia Supreme Court occasionally allowed untimely filed appeals to be considered on the merits. He wrote:

The predicate for this argument is that, on occasion, the Virginia Supreme Court waives the untimeliness rule. If that were true, the rule would not be an adequate and independent state ground barring direct or habeas review. The filing of briefs and their consideration would do no more than buttress the claim that the rule is not strictly enforced.

Petitioner argues that the Virginia court does, in fact, waive the rule on occasion, but I am not now convinced that there is a practice of waiving the rule when constitutional issues are at stake, even fundamental ones. The evidence is too scanty to permit a conclusion that the rule is no longer an adequate and independent state ground barring federal review. The fact that merits briefs were filed and were considered by the court, without more, does not justify a different conclusion.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Marshall and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun dissented from the Court's opinion. He believed the Court wrongly elevated the rights of States over the constitutional rights of defendants. The dissent argued as follows:

One searches the majority's opinion in vain ... for any mention of ... Coleman's right to a criminal proceeding free from constitutional defect or his interest in finding a forum for his constitutional challenge to his conviction and sentence of death.... Rather, displaying obvious exasperation with the breadth of substantive federal habeas doctrine and the expansive protection afforded by the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of fundamental fairness in state criminal proceedings, the Court today continues its crusade to erect petty procedural barriers in the path of any state prisoner seeking review of his federal constitutional claims. Because I believe that the Court is creating a Byzantine morass of arbitrary, unnecessary, and unjustifiable impediments to the vindication of federal rights, I dissent.

The Court cavalierly claims that "[t]his is a case about federalism," and proceeds without explanation to assume that the purposes of federalism are advanced whenever a federal court refrains from reviewing an ambiguous state court judgment. Federalism, however, has no inherent normative value: It does not, as the majority appears to assume, blindly protect the interests of States from any incursion by the federal courts. Rather, federalism secures to citizens the liberties that derive from the diffusion of sovereign power. "Federalism is a device for realizing the concepts of decency and fairness which are among the fundamental principles of liberty and justice lying at the base of all our civil and political institutions." In this context, it cannot lightly be assumed that the interests of federalism are fostered by a rule that impedes federal review of federal constitutional claims.

Coloradans Against the Death Penalty Coloradans Against the Death Penalty (CADP) is an organization that was founded for the purpose of abolishing the death penalty in Colorado. The organization is composed of local residents, religious leaders, political leaders, criminal defense lawyers, and relatives of murder victims. CADP is active in a variety of legislative, lobbying, coalition-building, and educational activities. CADP publishes a newsletter called Abolitionist.

Colorado The State of Colorado is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on January 1, 1975.

Colorado has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Colorado Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Colorado Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and fifteen judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Colorado are tried in the district courts.

Colorado's capital punishment offenses are set out under Colo. Code § 18-3-102. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

a. After deliberation and with the intent to cause the death of a person other than himself, he causes the death of that person or of another person; or

b. Acting either alone or with one or more persons, he commits or attempts to commit arson, robbery, burglary, kidnapping, sexual assault, or the crime of escape and, in the course of or in furtherance of the crime that he is committing or attempting to commit, or of immediate flight therefrom, the death of a person, other than one of the participants, is caused by anyone; or

c. By perjury or subornation of perjury he procures the conviction and execution of any innocent person; or

d. Under circumstances evidencing an attitude of universal malice manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life generally, he knowingly engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of death to a person, or persons, other than himself, and thereby causes the death of another; or

e. He or she commits unlawful distribution, dispensation, or sale of a controlled substance to a person under the age of eighteen years on school grounds, and the death of such person is caused by the use of such controlled substance; or

f. The person knowingly causes the death of a child who has not yet attained twelve years of age and the person committing the offense is one in a position of trust with respect to the victim.

In addition, under Colo. Code § 18-3-107, the killing of a police officer or firefighter is a capital offense. This statute is triggered when police officer or firefighter is killed while engaged in the performance of his or her duties.

Capital murder in Colorado is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Colorado is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jury must unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a unanimous verdict, the defendant must be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Colo. Code § 18-1.3-1201(5) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

- a. The murder was committed by a person under sentence of imprisonment for a felony; or
- b. The defendant was previously convicted of a felony; or
- c. The defendant intentionally killed any of the following persons while such person was engaged in the course of the performance of such person's official duties, and the defendant knew or reasonably should have known that such victim was such a person engaged in the performance of such person's official duties, or the victim was intentionally killed in retaliation for the performance of the victim's official duties:
 - I. A peace officer or former peace officer; or
 - II. A firefighter; or
 - III. A judge, referee, or former judge or referee of any court of record in the state or federal system or in any other state court system or a judge or former judge in any municipal court in this state or in any other state; or
 - IV. An elected state, county, or municipal official; or
 - V. A federal law enforcement officer or agent or former federal law enforcement officer or agent; or
- d. The defendant intentionally killed a person kidnapped or being held as a hostage by the defendant or by anyone associated with the defendant; or
- e. The defendant has been a party to an agreement to kill another person in furtherance of which a person has been intentionally killed; or
- f. The defendant committed the offense while lying in wait, from ambush, or by use of an explosive or incendiary device or a chemical, biological, or radiological weapon; or
- g. The defendant committed a felony and, in the course of or in furtherance of such or immediate flight therefrom, the defendant intentionally caused the death of a person other than one of the participants; or
- h. The murder was committed for pecuniary gain; or
- i. In the commission of the offense, the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to another person in addition to the victim of the offense; or
- j. The defendant committed the offense in an especially heinous, cruel, or depraved manner; or
- k. The murder was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or prosecution or effecting an escape from custody. This factor includes the intentional killing of a witness to a criminal offense.
 - 1. The defendant unlawfully and intentionally, knowingly, or with universal malice manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life generally, killed two or more persons during the commission of the same criminal episode; or
- m. The defendant intentionally killed a child who had not yet attained twelve years of age; or
- n. The defendant committed the murder against the victim because of the victim's race, color, ancestry, religion, or national origin.
- o. The defendant's possession of the weapon used to commit the murder constituted a felony offense under the laws of this state or the United States; or
- p. The defendant intentionally killed more than one person in more than one criminal episode; or

q. The victim was a pregnant woman, and the defendant intentionally killed the victim, knowing she was pregnant.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Colorado has provided by Colo. Code § 18-1.3-1201(4) the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

- a. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime; or
- b. The defendant's capacity to appreciate wrongfulness of the defendant's conduct or to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of law was significantly impaired, but not so impaired as to constitute a defense to prosecution; or
- c. The defendant was under unusual and substantial duress, although not such duress as to constitute a defense to prosecution; or
- d. The defendant was a principal in the offense which was committed by another, but the defendant's participation was relatively minor, although not so minor as to constitute a defense to prosecution; or
- e. The defendant could not reasonably have foreseen that the defendant's conduct in the course of the commission of the offense for which the defendant was convicted would cause, or would create a grave risk of causing, death to another person; or
- f. The emotional state of the defendant at the time the crime was committed; or
- g. The absence of any significant prior conviction; or
- h. The extent of the defendant's cooperation with law enforcement officers or agencies and with the office of the prosecuting district attorney; or
- i. The influence of drugs or alcohol; or
- j. The good faith, although mistaken, belief by the defendant that circumstances existed which constituted a moral justification for the defendant's conduct; or
- k. The defendant is not a continuing threat to society; or
- 1. Any other evidence which in the court's opinion bears on the question of mitigation.

Under Colorado's capital punishment statute, the Colorado Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Colorado uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men and women are located in Canon City, Colorado.

Pursuant to the laws of Colorado, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. Commutation may be life imprisonment or a term of not less than twenty years at hard labor.

Under the laws of Colorado, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Colo. Code § 18-1.3-1206:

The particular day and hour of the execution of said sentence within the week specified in said warrant shall be fixed by the executive director of the department of corrections or the executive director's designee, and the executive director shall be present thereat or shall appoint some other representative among the officials or officers of the correctional facilities at Canon City to be present in his or her place and stead. There shall also be present a physician and such guards, attendants, and other persons as the executive director or the executive director's designee in his or her discretion deems necessary to conduct the execution. In addition, there may be present such witnesses as the executive director or the executive director's designee in his or her discretion deems desirable, not to exceed eighteen persons.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Colorado executed only one inmate. During this period, Colorado did not have any female death row inmates. A total of two capital felons were on death row in Colorado as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as one black inmate and one Hispanic inmate.

Common Design Rule The common design rule (also known as concert of action theory) is an adaptation of the felony murder rule. Under the common design rule, when two or more persons act in concert in the commission of a felony and a victim is killed by one of the felons, the intent of the actual killer is transferred to the co-felon. Some courts have held that criminal liability for murder under the common design rule will not attach unless the defendant has the requisite specific intent to commit murder.

In general, proof of a common design to commit an unlawful act which results in death may be inferred from circumstances such as (1) presence at the scene of the crime without opposition or disapproval, (2) continued close association with the perpetrator after the criminal act, (3) failure to inform authorities of the killing, or (4) concealment or destruction of evidence after the crime. See also Felony Murder Rule

Common Law and Capital Punishment Anglo-American jurisprudence owes its understanding and acceptance of the death penalty to the common law of England. The phrase “common law” and all its implications stem from England. The actual use of the phrase has been traced back to the thirteenth century, during the reign of Edward I (1272–1307). During that period, two types of legal systems existed in England. The island nation had a temporal legal system and an ecclesiastical or religious legal system. The legal principles that fall under the phrase “common law” were developed by judges in the temporal courts of England.

The common law recognized two types of criminal offenses: misdemeanor and felony. While numerous factors distinguished the two types of offenses, the ultimate difference resided in the fact that a convicted misdemeanor was not called upon to relinquish his or her life, but a convicted felon could be punished with death.

Common-Law Nonfatal Criminal Punishment. If one compared the nonfatal criminal punishments that are permitted by Anglo-American jurisprudence today with the nonfatal criminal punishments under the common law, the two would appear as different as night and day. Some of the milder forms of nonfatal criminal punishment under the common law included confinement, hard labor, banishment, the pillory, stocks, and the dunking stool. More drastic forms of punishment included plucking out eyes; castration; cutting off feet, hands, noses, ears, upper lips; and scalping. Additionally, convicted prisoners would also be mercilessly whipped or branded with hot irons on their cheeks or hands.

Common-Law Capital Offenses. The common law created only a few felony offenses, which included murder, arson, larceny, robbery, burglary, rape, treason and petty treason. The limited number of felony offenses under the common law helps explain why the common law adopted the rule that all felony offenses were to be punished with death. Unfortunately for Englanders, however, the number of felony offenses in England expanded beyond what the common law created. As a result of parliamentary statutes, the number of felony offenses in England grew to 263 by the year 1822. Moreover, the common-law rule that all felony offenses were to be punished with death was made applicable to each of the 263 felonies that developed in England. The tragedy of imposing the death penalty on all felony offenses was sarcastically commented upon by the great English jurist, Blackstone. Blackstone pointed out that, as a result of misguided intentions by parliament, it had become a capital offense (1) to tear down the mound of a fish pond and allow fish to escape; (2) to chop down a cherry tree that was in an orchard; and (3) to be publicly seen with a gypsy for one month.

Common-Law Methods of Capital Punishment. The methods by which the death penalty was carried out under the common law represents a journey into the underworld. Many of the capital offenses under the common law had their own special execution methods. A male defendant convicted of treason or the felony crime of falsifying had to be dragged by horse to the place of execution and hung. A conviction for sodomy carried a penalty of death by being buried alive. A convicted heretic had to be burned alive. A conviction for a routine crime like murder, rape, arson, robbery, or burglary was punished by simple hanging. However, if any of the latter offenses was found to be especially vicious, the defendant was beheaded.

The crime of treason by a female was punished initially under the common law by burning alive the defendant. However, in the year 1790, this method was halted and the punishment became strangulation and burning of the corpse. For the crime of high treason (affecting the Crown directly) a defendant was punished by quartering, disemboweling, and beheading. In certain egregious murder prosecutions, a convicted defendant would be publicly dissected while alive.

Commutation of Sentence see Clemency

Comoros The island nation of Comoros imposes the death penalty. Comoros uses the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. The nation’s legal system is based on French and Islamic law. The people of Comoros adopted a new constitution on December 23, 2001.

The judicial system is composed of a supreme court and local courts. Under the laws of Comoros, trials are open to the public. Defendants have a right to counsel, but this right is meaningless because there are very few lawyers in the country and the government does not provide free legal counsel.

Two capital cases illustrate the grave situation for defendants in Comoros. In 1996, a man was charged with killing a pregnant woman. He was prosecuted in a lay criminal court. His trial took two days and he was represented by a paralegal. The defendant was found guilty, sentenced to death, and executed. In 1997, another man was prosecuted for a similar crime. He, too, was represented by a paralegal in a lay criminal court. This defendant was also found guilty, sentenced to death, and executed. Both de-defendants had unsuccessfully appealed their convictions. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Competency Hearing see Insanity

Competency of the Defendant to Be a Witness The disqualification of a defendant as a witness in his or her own trial characterized a principle of law under the common law for centuries. The remote origins of this principle are traced to the contest for judicial hegemony between the developing common-law jury trial and the older modes of trial, such as compurgation and wager of law. Under those old forms, a defendant's oath itself was a means of decision in a case. The jury trial replaced judgment by oath, with judgment of the jury based upon the testimony of witnesses. A result of this change was that a defendant was deemed incapable of being a witness at his or her trial. In time, the principal justification for the rule was the potential untrustworthiness of the defendant's testimony.

By the sixteenth century, it became necessary for a defendant to conduct his or her own defense, a defendant was neither allowed to call witnesses nor permitted the assistance of counsel. In the seventeenth century, rules changed and a defendant was permitted to call witnesses in his or her behalf. The common law drew a distinction between the accused and his or her witnesses—the defendant's witnesses gave evidence, but the defendant did not.

Disqualification for interest was entrenched in the common law when the United States was formed. The early courts in America followed the common law and held that defendants were deemed incompetent as witnesses in their own trial. In the early nineteenth century, American courts began to abandon the disqualification rule. In 1859, Maine created the first statute to permit a defendant to give sworn evidence in the trial of a few crimes. This statute was followed in 1864 with the enactment of a general competency statute for criminal defendants. Within twenty years, most of the States had followed Maine's lead. Before the end of the century, every State except Georgia had abolished the common-law disqualification rule. Georgia retained the rule well into the 1960s.

The greatest negative impact of the disqualification rule was manifested in capital prosecutions, where defendants could not testify to their own defense. Legal historians believe the disqualification rule resulted in countless death sentences being imposed on innocent defendants. See also Ferguson v. Georgia

Complaint A complaint is a criminal-charging instrument that is used primarily in jurisdictions that prosecute by felony offenses by grand jury indictment. A complaint is usually drawn up by a magistrate based upon an affiant's statements that he or she believe, with probable cause, that a crime was committed and that a named defendant committed the crime. A complaint is used to initiate proceedings, but is eventually replaced by an indictment. See also Grand Jury

Compulsory Process Clause Under the Sixth Amendment of the federal Constitution, it states that a defendant shall "have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." The Compulsory Process Clause guarantees a defendant the right to have a witness subpoenaed to appear for examination at trial.

Two types of subpoenas exist. A "subpoena ad testificandum" is an ordinary subpoena that compels the presence of a witness. The second type of subpoena is called a "subpoena duces tecum" and it is used to compel a person having documents to bring them to trial.

Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the Compulsory Process Clause has taken on an added dimension. It is now the source of constitutional authority to compel the attendance of witnesses at both the guilt phase and penalty phase of a capital prosecution. See also Bill of Rights

Confederate Hangings at Gainesville In 1862, Gainesville, Texas, and its surrounding towns were the site of forty-two hangings that were carried out by the Confederate government of Texas. The defendants were convicted of treason and insurrection for alleged allegiance to Union forces. Legal historians have written that most of the defendants hung were in fact innocent of the abolitionist sentiments for which they were prosecuted.

The Great Hanging, as it was later called, resulted from several years of building tension between those who enslaved blacks and those who were against the practice. As a result of a steady migration of people into the northern part of Texas, by 1860 less than 10 percent of the population owned slaves. Consequently, many of the northern counties of Texas voted against secession from the Union. The anti-secession vote brought fear to slave owners. This fear reached a climax when certain individuals attempted to make northern Texas a new free state.

By September 1862, rumors circulated that a Unionist plot was underway to seize the militia arsenals at Gainesville. In response, Confederate authorities ordered the arrest of all able-bodied men who were not enlisted in the Confederate military. More than 150 men were arrested on the morning of October 1. A "citizen's court" was convened to try the men on insurrection or treason charges. Initially, seven men were convicted and hanged. Afterwards, a decision was made to release the other prisoners. However, after two leading rebel figures were assassinated, the trials were started anew. Nineteen more men were convicted and hanged in Gainesville. Sixteen men were tried and hung in the surrounding towns of Sherman and Decatur. See also Andersonville Prison Deaths

Confession see Right to Remain Silent

Confession of Error Under the doctrine of “confession of error,” a prosecutor concedes to an appellate court that an assignment of trial error by the defendant actually occurred. Generally when confession of error is made, the prosecutor will urge a new trial be permitted. Occasionally, however, prosecutors will request the appellate court find that the error was harmless and, therefore, the conviction and sentence should be affirmed. See also Williams v. Georgia Confrontation Clause The Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment of the federal Constitution requires a defendant be permitted to confront witnesses against him or her. The purpose of the Confrontation Clause is to ensure the reliability of evidence against a defendant by subjecting the evidence to rigorous testing in a criminal trial through cross-examination of an adverse witness. The Confrontation Clause generally forbids the introduction of hearsay into a trial unless the evidence falls within a firmly rooted hearsay exception or otherwise possesses particularized guarantees of trustworthiness. See also Bill of Rights; Hearsay; Lilly v. Virginia

Congo (Democratic Republic) The Democratic Republic of Congo imposes the death penalty. The nation’s legal system is based on Belgian civil law and customary law. Congo utilizes the firing squad and hanging as the methods of execution. It was reported that, in 1998, the nation executed 100 prisoners.

In 1997, the government of Congo was overthrown. The new government, however, was short-lived. In 2003, another new transitional government was put in place. On February 18, 2006, a new constitution was adopted. The transitional government was expected to be replaced with a democratically elected government in late 2006.

The judicial system is composed of a supreme court, appellate courts, trial courts, and the Court of State Security. Under the criminal legal code of Congo, defendants have a right to a speedy public trial, the presumption of innocence, and legal counsel at all stages of proceedings. The law provides for court-appointed counsel in capital cases. Defendants have the right to appeal in all cases except those involving national security, armed robbery, and smuggling. The latter offenses are adjudicated by the Court of State Security. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Congo (Republic) The Republic of Congo has capital punishment on its law books, but the punishment is infrequently used. Congo utilizes the firing squad and beheading as methods of execution. The nation’s legal system is based on French law and customary law. A new constitution was adopted on January 20, 2002.

The judicial system of Congo consists of local courts, courts of appeal, a supreme court, and traditional courts. Rights afforded defendants under Congo’s laws include public trial, presumption of innocence, counsel, the right to confront witnesses, and appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Connecticut The State of Connecticut is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on October 1, 1973.

Connecticut has a three-tier legal system. The State’s legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Connecticut Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Connecticut Appellate Court is composed of a chief judge and eight judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called superior courts. Capital offenses against the State of Connecticut are tried in the circuit courts.

Connecticut’s capital punishment offenses are set out under Conn. Code § 53a-54b. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

(1) Murder of a member of the Division of State Police within the Department of Public Safety or of any local police department, a chief inspector or inspector in the Division of Criminal Justice, a state marshal who is exercising authority granted under any provision of the general statutes, a judicial marshal in performance of the duties of a judicial marshal, a constable who performs criminal law enforcement duties, a special policeman..., a conservation officer or special conservation officer..., an employee of the Department of Correction or a person providing services on behalf of said department when such employee or person is acting within the scope of such employee’s or person’s employment or duties in a correctional institution or facility and the actor is confined in such institution or facility, or any firefighter, while such victim was acting within the scope of such victim’s duties; (2) murder committed by a defendant who is hired to commit the same for pecuniary gain or murder committed by one who is hired by the defendant to commit the same for pecuniary gain; (3) murder committed by one who has previously been convicted of intentional murder or of murder committed in the course of commission of a felony; (4) murder committed by one who was, at the time of commission of the murder, under sentence of life imprisonment; (5) murder by a kidnapper of a kidnapped person during the course of the kidnapping or before such person is able to return or be returned to safety; (6) murder committed in the course of the commission of sexual assault in the first degree; (7) murder of two or more persons at the same time or in the course of a single transaction; or (8) murder of a person under sixteen years of age.

Capital murder in Connecticut is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Connecticut is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, that the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment without parole.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Conn. Code § 53a-46a(i) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The defendant committed the offense during the commission or attempted commission of, or during the immediate flight from the commission or attempted commission of, a felony and the defendant had previously been convicted of the same felony; or

2. The defendant committed the offense after having been convicted of two or more state offenses or two or more federal offenses or of one or more state offenses and one or more federal offenses for each of which a penalty of more than one year imprisonment may be imposed, which offenses were committed on different occasions and which involved the infliction of serious bodily injury upon another person; or

3. The defendant committed the offense and in such commission knowingly created a grave risk of death to another person in addition to the victim of the offense; or

4. The defendant committed the offense in an especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner; or

5. The defendant procured the commission of the offense by payment, or promise of payment, of anything of pecuniary value; or

6. The defendant committed the offense as consideration for the receipt, or in expectation of the receipt, of anything of pecuniary value; or

7. The defendant committed the offense with an assault weapon; or

8. The defendant [killed a law enforcement officer, correction officer, or firefighter] to avoid arrest for a criminal act or prevent detection of a criminal act or to hamper or prevent the victim from carrying out any act within the scope of the victim's official duties or to retaliate against the victim for the performance of the victim's official duties.

The federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase. Connecticut does not provide for any specific statutory mitigating circumstances. Instead, Conn. Code § 53a-46a(d) provides that a defendant may present mitigating evidence concerning his or her character, background or history, or the nature and circumstances of the crime. Connecticut, unlike any other capital punishment jurisdiction, has set out a number of factors which prohibit the jury from imposing the death penalty if any of the factors are established by the evidence at the penalty phase. The factors are set out under Conn. Code § 53a-46a(h) and provide as follows:

1. The defendant was under the age of eighteen years (required by federal law); or

2. The defendant was a person with mental retardation (required by federal law); or

3. The defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired or the defendant's ability to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of law was significantly impaired but not so impaired in either case as to constitute a defense to prosecution; or

4. The defendant was criminally liable under for the offense, which was committed by another, but the defendant's participation in such offense was relatively minor, although not so minor as to constitute a defense to prosecution; or

5. The defendant could not reasonably have foreseen that the defendant's conduct in the course of commission of the offense of which the defendant was convicted would cause, or would create a grave risk of causing, death to another person.

Under Connecticut's capital punishment statute, the Connecticut Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Connecticut uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility is located in Somers, Connecticut.

Pursuant to the laws of Connecticut, its Board of Pardons has full authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The State's governor only has authority to grant temporary reprieves. Under the laws of Connecticut, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Conn. Code § 54-100(b):

Besides the warden or deputy warden and such number of correctional staff as he thinks necessary, the following persons may be present at the execution: The Commissioner of Correction, a physician, a clergyman in attendance upon the prisoner and such other adults, as the prisoner may designate, not exceeding three in number, news media representatives and such other persons as the commissioner deems appropriate. The total number of witnesses permitted at an execution shall be governed by space and security requirements and the Commissioner of Correction shall make the final determination of such number. News media representatives present at an execution shall include representatives of newspapers, broadcasters and news services, who shall report on behalf of all news media. The number of news media representatives present at an execution shall be nine, except that the commissioner, in his discretion, may authorize a greater number of such representatives or, for specified reasons of space or security, may reduce such number of representatives. The commissioner may exclude a witness for specified reasons of security.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Connecticut executed only one inmate. During this period, Connecticut did not have any female death row inmates. A total of eight capital felons were on death row in Connecticut as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as three black inmates, three white inmates, and two Hispanic inmates.

Constitution A constitution represents the will of the people expressed through specific principles voted upon by them to regulate certain matters pertaining to their collective existence. The federal Constitution is the supreme constitution in the United States. Each of the States has a constitution, but it is subordinate to the federal Constitution.

Constitution Party The Constitution Party is a national political party. It has fielded candidates for local, statewide, and national offices, including presidential candidates. The national chairman of the organization, James N. Clymer, has taken an active and vigorous position on crime in general and the death penalty in particular. In speaking for the Constitution Party, Clymer has stated, "We favor the right of states and localities to execute criminals convicted of capital crimes and to require restitution for the victims of crime." The pro-death penalty position of the party has been seen by some as a vehicle for giving the party greater credibility and visibility.

Constitutional Error see Appellate Review of Conviction and Death Sentence; Procedural Default of Constitutional Claims

Constitutionality of the Death Penalty The infliction of death as punishment for murder has never been found by the United States Supreme Court to violate the federal Constitution per se. In Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), the Supreme Court placed a moratorium on the death penalty because the procedures used by all capital punishment jurisdictions allowed the punishment to be imposed arbitrarily. When the Supreme Court lifted the moratorium in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), it specifically held that "the infliction of death as a punishment for murder is not without justification and thus is not unconstitutionally severe." See also Furman v. Georgia; Gregg v. Georgia

Cook Islands Capital punishment is permitted in the Cook Islands for extreme crimes. Its legal system is based on New Zealand law and English common law. The nation's constitution was adopted on August 4, 1965. Issues Presented: (1) Whether the United States had criminal jurisdiction over territory called the "Public Land Strip." (2) Whether prejudicial hearsay statements were admitted into evidence against the defendants.

Case Holdings: (1) The United States had criminal jurisdiction over territory called the "Public Land Strip"; therefore, the defendants were properly charged in the federal district court in Texas. (2) Prejudicial hearsay statements were admitted into evidence against the defendants; therefore, the convictions and death sentences obtained against them could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The case involved the prosecution of Cook and other unnamed defendants. The United States charged the defendants with committing capital murder on territory called the "Public Land Strip." The territory was adjacent to the northeastern part of Texas. The defendants were prosecuted in a federal district court in Texas, found guilty, and sentenced to death. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider two claims made by the defendants: (1) that on the date of the murder, the Public Land Strip was not within the jurisdiction of any particular federal or State district and that no court of the United States had jurisdiction to try the offense; and (2) prejudicial hearsay statements were admitted into evidence against them.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan examined the history of the Public Land Strip and concluded that the United States had exerted jurisdiction over the territory and that jurisdiction over the offense was proper in the court that prosecuted the defendants. The opinion stated: "Upon a careful scrutiny of the act of 1889, giving full effect to all of its clauses, according to the reasonable meaning of the words used, yet interpreting it in the light of the previous history of the Public Land Strip, and of the information communicated to congress by public officers, we do not doubt that congress intended to bring that strip ... for limited judicial purposes, to the eastern district of Texas; thus enabling the general government to protect its own interests, as well as the rights of individuals."

In turning to the hearsay argument, Justice Harlan ruled that the hearsay statements introduced against the defendants were prejudicial. The hearsay statements involved a report of the murder for which the defendants were prosecuted. The report contained confessions purported to be made by the defendants. Witnesses testified that the report was inaccurate and that the defendants did not make the confessions alleged in the report. Justice Harlan pointed out that in spite of the unreliability of the report, the trial judge admitted damaging portions of it and instructed the jury to consider it as substantive evidence. The opinion in the case added, "The representatives of the government, in this court, frankly concede, as it was their duty to do, that this action of the court below was so erroneous as to entitle the defendants to a reversal." The judgment of the district court was reversed and a new trial awarded. See also Hearsay; Jurisdiction

Issue Presented: Whether the Due Process Clause permits a State to require a defendant prove incompetent to stand trial by clear and convincing evidence.

Case Holding: The Due Process Clause does not permit a State to require a defendant prove incompetent to stand trial by clear and convincing evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Byron Keith Cooper, was charged with capital murder by the State of Oklahoma. Prior to trial, the defendant argued that he was incompetent and could not be tried. Under Oklahoma's laws, a defendant was presumed to be competent to stand trial unless the defendant proved his or her incompetence by "clear and convincing evidence." Applying that standard to the defendant, the trial judge found the defendant competent to be tried. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death.

On appeal, the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the State's presumption of competence, combined with its clear-and-convincing-evidence standard, placed such an onerous burden on him as to violate due process. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens held that Oklahoma's clear-and-convincing-evidence standard for proving incompetence to stand trial violated due process. The opinion noted that the law was clear that the prosecuting an incompetent defendant violated due process. It was further said that prior precedent by the Court established that a State may presume that the defendant is competent and require him or her to prove incompetence by a preponderance of the evidence. Justice Stevens indicated that such a presumption did not offend due process. However, he wrote, Oklahoma's standard would permit a criminal trial after a defendant has shown that he or she was more likely than not incompetent.

The opinion found that Oklahoma's rule had no roots in historical practice. Both early English and American cases suggested that the common-law standard of proof was preponderance of the evidence. Justice Stevens stated that the common-law standard was used by forty-six States and in the federal courts. Consequently, the Court was convinced that Oklahoma's heightened standard was not necessary to vindicate the State's interest in prompt and orderly disposition of criminal cases.

Justice Stevens stated that Oklahoma's rule did not exhibit fundamental fairness in its operation. He observed that although it was normally within a State's power to establish the procedures through which its laws are given effect, the power to regulate procedural burdens was subject to proscription under the Due Process Clause when the procedures did not sufficiently protect a fundamental constitutional right. It was concluded that Oklahoma's "clear and convincing evidence" standard violated the defendant's right not to be prosecuted while incompetent. The judgment of the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeals was reversed. See also Insanity

Cooperation with Authorities Mitigator Three capital punishment jurisdictions, Colorado, New Mexico, and North Carolina, provide by statute that cooperation with authorities is a statutory mitigating circumstance. This mitigating circumstance involves two types of cooperation: (1) cooperation by a capital felon with authorities investigating the murder for which the capital felon was charged, and (2) cooperation with authorities concerning a felony offense for which the capital felon was not charged with or suspected of committing.

Many defendants have unsuccessfully challenged this statutory mitigating circumstance as being unconstitutional, in that it purportedly "allows for imposition of the death penalty based upon the exercise of the right to remain silent," as stated in State

v. Compton, 726 P.2d 837 (N.M. 1986). This is to say that the statutory mitigating circumstance indirectly punishes a capital felon who remains silent and does not cooperate in bringing about his or her own conviction. This situation, it is contended, violates a capital felon's constitutional right to remain silent.

On the other hand, capital felons also demand the right to take advantage of this statutory mitigating circumstance. In the case of State v. Bacon, 390 S.E.2d 327 (N.C. 1990), the defendant argued that the trial court committed error by failing to instruct the penalty phase jury that his cooperation in helping authorities apprehend another capital felon was a statutory mitigating circumstance. The North Carolina Supreme Court agreed with the defendant in Bacon and reversed his death sentence. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Cora, Charles see Vigilance Committee of San Francisco

Coram Nobis The term "coram nobis" is Latin and means "our court." A writ of coram nobis is a common-law device that permits a trial court to set aside its own judgment in a criminal case, because of an error of fact not apparent on the record. This device is distinguished from an appeal, which enables an appellate court to review an error of law committed by a trial court. The writ of coram nobis brings the error of fact directly before the trial court.

From a procedural standpoint, when the judgment of the trial court has already been affirmed by the judgment of an appellate court, then the trial court is bound by the mandate of the appellate court. Under such circumstances, it is appropriate to require a defendant to secure, from the appellate court, permission to file a petition for writ of coram nobis in the trial court where he or she seeks an order setting aside the judgment already affirmed by the appellate court. See also Lane v. Brown; Taylor v. Alabama

Cornell Death Penalty Project The Cornell Death Penalty Project was started in the 1990s at the Cornell University Law School. The Project provides two clinics for students that give them an opportunity to assist in the representation of capital defendants, at the trial and post-trial stages. The Project also sponsors symposia related to capital punishment and performs research on jury decision making in capital cases.

Corpus Delicti The corpus delicti refers to the body of the crime. It is not constitutionally required that the body of a murdered victim actually be found and identified in order to sustain a capital murder conviction and death sentence. The corpus delicti can be established by circumstantial evidence. It has been held that the corpus delicti cannot be established by the mere statement of a witness, but such statement, taken in connection with other facts, might be used to show that a person was murdered. See also Isaacs v. United States; Perovich v. United States

Correction Officer Aggravator A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have recognized the dangerous work performed by penal correction officers and made the killing of a correction officer a statutory aggravating circumstance. Under the correction officer aggravator, a convicted capital felon may be sentenced to death, if the penalty phase jury finds the victim of the offense was a correctional officer killed while performing his or her duties. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Costs of Capital Punishment Numerous studies have been conducted, which have all concluded that prosecution of a capital felon is more expensive than any other type of criminal prosecution. In a report issued in 2005, it was said that, since 1983, New Jersey spent more than $250 million to prosecute capital felons. A Tennessee study issued in 2004 estimated that each capital punishment trial cost the State $46,791. In a 2003 study by Kansas, it said that the median cost for prosecuting and executing a capital felon was $1.26 million. It was reported in 2000 that Florida could save $51 million annually by not having capital punishment. In a 1993 study done of costs of capital punishment in North Carolina, it was found that the State spent $2.16 million per execution above the costs of a non-death penalty murder case. A 1992 report on Texas indicated that it spent an average of $2.3 million per death penalty case, which was about three times the cost of imprisoning someone for forty years. It was estimated in 1988 that the death penalty costs California $90 million annually above the costs of all prosecutions.

Numerous factors make the cost of prosecuting capital felons more expensive than any other type of criminal case. Additional costs have been traced to complex pre-trial motions, lengthy jury selections, and expenses for expert witnesses. Holding separate guilt phase and penalty phase proceedings factor tremendously in the increased costs. Once a defendant is convicted and sentenced to death, costs continue to accumulate through years of legal battles in appellate courts.

Count The term "count" is used to designate a single charged offense in an indictment that contains several charged offenses. Principles of due process of law require setting out separately and distinctly each charge in an indictment, so as to give a defendant fair notice of each offense that was brought against him or her.

Court-Appointed Counsel The United States Supreme Court recognized in Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), the constitutional right to counsel in capital cases. (Thirty years later, the right to counsel was extended to all criminal proceedings where incarceration was possible.) The constitutional right to counsel in capital cases means that, if a capital defendant cannot afford to retain counsel, the prosecuting jurisdiction must appoint an attorney to represent the defendant.

It is unquestioned that capital prosecutions present the most difficult criminal cases to defend. Capital prosecutions are more complex than any non-capital prosecution. As a result of the complexity of a capital prosecution, it is imperative that experienced counsel represent a capital felon and that adequate financial resources be made available for the defense. All studies that have evaluated capital prosecutions concluded that inexperienced counsel and inadequate financial resources were the norm. This situation exists because the overwhelming majority of capital defendants are poor and must obtain court-appointed counsel.

Examples of inexperienced legal counsel for capital defendants include the following. The attorney appointed for Larry Heath by the State of Alabama filed a six-page brief in the appeal before the Alabama Court of Criminal Appeal and a one-page brief in the appeal to the Alabama Supreme Court. The attorney also failed to show up for oral argument at the Alabama Supreme Court. Heath was eventually executed on March 20, 1992. During the Texas capital trial of Jesus Romero, his court-appointed attorney did not call any witnesses at the penalty phase of the trial. Romero was executed on May 20, 1992. In the case of John Young, who was executed by Georgia on March 10, 1985, it was learned that his court-appointed counsel was on illegal drugs during his trial (the attorney was subsequently disbarred).

In a study done of Mississippi court-appointed attorneys, it was found that 83 percent of the attorneys appointed in capital cases indicated they would refuse any subsequent appointment because of inadequate financial resources. It is generally recognized that a properly conducted capital trial should take a month or more to complete. A random sampling of capital trials in Louisiana from 1978 to 1987 revealed the average length of a trial was three days. Another study of Louisiana revealed that in 85 percent of the capital trials held between 1976 and 1994, defense counsel failed to present the type of mitigating evidence during the penalty phase that is essential for obtaining a life sentence.

Studies have shown that one of the primary factors that determine whether a capital defendant will receive the death penalty is the nature of the legal representation, i.e., court-appointed counsel or retained counsel. A defendant convicted of a capital offense will, more likely than not, receive a death sentence if he or she is represented by court-appointed counsel. On the other hand, studies have shown that a defendant convicted of a capital offense, but represented by retained counsel, will more likely than not receive a life sentence. In a Georgia study, it was shown that the odds of a capital defendant with court-appointed counsel receiving a death sentence were 2.6 times higher than a capital defendant with retained counsel.

A few capital punishment jurisdictions have begun to address the problem of inexperienced counsel and inadequate financial resources. Statutes and court rules have been promulgated in a few capital punishment jurisdictions that require legal counsel have a minimum number of years of experience and make available greater financial resources. The material below involving Montana and Arizona provide examples of how some jurisdictions have responded to the issue of competent counsel; while the material involving Alabama and Mississippi illustrate how some jurisdictions address the issue of paying counsel for indigent defendants.

Montana Supreme Court Standards for Competency of Counsel for Indigent Persons in Death Penalty Cases:

Standard I. Trial Phase

1. A. In any case in which death is a potential punishment, the prosecutor shall comply with § 46-1-401, MCA, and shall file with the district court, within 60 days after arraignment, and serve upon counsel of record a notice stating whether the prosecutor intends to seek the death penalty upon a conviction in the case. B. The prosecutor may withdraw the notice of intent to seek the death penalty provided in this standard at any time by filing with the district court and serving counsel of record with a notice of withdrawal of intent to seek the death penalty.

2. Upon establishment of indigence as provided in Title 46, Chapter 8, Part 1, Montana Code Annotated, and identification of a case as one in which the prosecutor believes sufficient evidence exists to show that one or more statutory aggravating factors under § 46-18-303, MCA, can be proved to the appropriate standard of proof, the district court shall appoint two counsel to represent the defendant.

3. In selecting appointed counsel, the district court shall secure sufficient information from counsel to be appointed either in writing or on the record, to satisfy the district court that counsel possess the following minimum qualifications:

a. Both appointed attorneys must be members in good standing of the State Bar of Montana or admitted to practice before the district court pro hac vice.

b. Both counsel must have completed or taught, in the two-year period prior to appointment or within 90 days after the appointment, a continuing legal education course or courses, approved for credit by the appropriate authority under the rules adopted by the Montana Supreme Court, at least 12 hours of which deal with subjects related to the defense of persons accused or convicted of capital crimes.

c. Counsel, either individually or in combination, must have had significant experience within the past 5 years in the trial of criminal cases to conclusion, including a capital case or a case involving charges of or equivalent to deliberate homicide under Montana law.

d. The nature and volume of the workload of both appointed counsel is such that they will have the ability to spend the time necessary to defend a capital case.

e. Counsel are familiar with and have a copy of the current American Bar Association standards for the defense of capital cases. By adoption of this provision, the Montana Supreme Court does not hold that adherence to the guidelines is required as a condition of providing effective assistance of counsel, or that failure to adhere to the guidelines gives rise to an inference of ineffective assistance of counsel.

Standard II. Appeal Phase

1. If a defendant is sentenced to death and is determined by the district court to be indigent, the district court shall appoint two attorneys to represent the defendant on direct appeal.

2. In selecting appointed counsel for appeal, the district court shall secure sufficient information from counsel to be appointed, either in writing or on the record, to satisfy the district court that counsel possess sufficient appellate experience to provide adequate representation to the defendant on appeal and the following minimum qualifications:

a. Both appointed attorneys must be members in good standing of the State Bar of Montana or admitted to practice before the district court pro hac vice.

b. Both counsel must have completed or taught, in the two-year period prior to appointment or within 90 days after the appointment, a continuing legal education course or courses, approved for credit by the appropriate authority under the rules adopted by the Montana Supreme Court, at least 12 hours of which deal with subjects related to the defense of persons accused or convicted of capital crimes.

c. Counsel, either individually or in combination, must have had significant experience within the past 5 years in the appeal of criminal cases, including a capital case or a case involving charges of or equivalent to deliberate homicide under Montana law.

d. The nature and volume of the workload of both appointed counsel is such that they will have the ability to spend the time necessary to appeal a capital case.

e. Counsel are familiar with and have a copy of the current American Bar Association standards for the defense of capital cases. By adoption of this provision, the Montana Supreme Court does not hold that adherence to the guidelines is required as a condition of providing effective assistance of counsel, or that failure to adhere to the guidelines gives rise to an inference of ineffective assistance of counsel.

Standard III. Post-conviction Phase

The following standards shall apply to counsel appointed by the district court to represent indigent petitioners in post-conviction proceedings under Title 46, Chapter 21, who are sentenced to death.

1. The district court shall follow the procedure set forth in § 46-21-201, MCA, in appointing counsel in state post-conviction cases.

2. The district court shall appoint two counsel. One of the appointed counsel may be an attorney who has been admitted pro hac vice. Lead counsel shall satisfy all of the following:

a. He or she must be an active member in good standing of the Montana State Bar or be admitted pro hac vice.

b. He or she must have at least 5 years criminal trial, criminal appellate, or state or federal post-conviction experience, which experience may have been obtained in Montana or in another jurisdiction.

c. He or she must have completed or taught, in the two-year period prior to appointment or within 90 days after the appointment, a continuing legal education course or courses, approved for credit by the appropriate authority under the rules adopted by the Montana Supreme Court, at least 12 hours of which deal with subjects related to the defense of persons accused or convicted of capital crimes.

3. In addition, the appointed counsel, either individually or in combination, shall have the following qualifications obtained in Montana or another jurisdiction:

a. Experience as counsel for either the defendant or the state in the trial of one deliberate homicide case;

b. Experience as counsel for either the defendant or the state in the trial of three felony cases;

c. Experience as counsel for either the petitioner or the state in three cases involving claims for state post-conviction or federal habeas corpus review.

4. As used in this Order, “trial” means a case concluded with a judgment of acquittal under § 46-18-102(2), MCA, or submission to the trial court or jury for decision and verdict.

Standard IV. Effect of Failure to Adhere to Standards

No error or omission in the procedure outlined in the trial or appellate standards shall constitute a ground for relief from a conviction or sentence unless the defendant shows that the standards were not followed in a material way and that counsel’s performance fell so far below the standard of reasonably effective counsel, and was sufficiently prejudicial [to the] defense of the defendant, as to constitute a denial of effective assistance of counsel as guaranteed by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution or Article II, Section 24 of the Montana Constitution.

Pursuant to § 46-21-201(3)(f), MCA, any failure to adhere to the standards for appointment of post-conviction counsel may not serve as a basis for a claim for post-conviction relief.

Standard V. Registry of Counsel Available for Appointment

1. For the convenience of the district courts, the Clerk of the Supreme Court shall maintain a registry of counsel who are qualified under these standards, who are available for appointment in capital cases in one or more of the phases referred to, and who desire to have their names and pertinent data included in this registry. Qualified counsel wishing to be included in this registry shall submit to the Clerk in writing counsel’s name, address and phone number; along with a current resume, curriculum vitae and statement of qualifications; pertinent legal education courses, training, experience in other capital cases or cases involving charges of or equivalent to deliberate homicide under Montana law; the courts and jurisdictions in which counsel is admitted to practice and is in good standing; and the phase or phases for which counsel is qualified for appointment. Counsel are encouraged to update this data from time to time. For efficiency and convenience, the Clerk may prescribe the use of a form or forms for purposes of marshaling this data and maintaining this registry.

2. On request of a district court, the Clerk shall make available to the district court so much of the data in the registry as the district court may require, provided that [the] Clerk may charge to the district court the reasonable costs of photocopying and mailing or faxing such data.

3. Nothing herein shall be deemed to require the Clerk to independently seek, solicit, gather, update, or verify the accuracy or currency of names of and data pertaining to counsel to be included in, furnished for, or maintained in this registry. It shall be the sole duty of the appointing district court to secure sufficient information from counsel to be appointed to satisfy the district court that counsel possesses the minimum qualifications required by these standards.

Arizona Standards for Appointment of Counsel in Capital Cases:

A. General. To be eligible for appointment in a capital case, an attorney:

1. Shall have been a member in good standing of the State Bar of Arizona for at least five years immediately preceding the appointment;
2. Shall have practiced in the area of state criminal litigation for three years immediately preceding the appointment; and

3. Shall have demonstrated the necessary proficiency and commitment which exemplify the quality of representation appropriate to capital cases.

B. Trial Counsel.

1. Lead Counsel. To be eligible for appointment as lead counsel, an attorney must meet the qualifications set forth in section (a) of this rule and the following:

I. Shall have practiced in the area of state criminal litigation for five years immediately preceding the appointment;

II. Shall have been lead counsel in at least nine felony jury trials that were tried to completion and have been lead counsel or co-counsel in at least one capital murder jury trial;

III. Shall be familiar with the American Bar Association Guidelines for the Appointment and Performance of Counsel in Death Penalty Cases; and

IV. Shall have attended and successfully completed, within one year prior to the initial appointment, at least six hours of relevant training or educational programs in the area of capital defense, and within one year prior to any subsequent appointment, at least twelve hours of relevant training or educational programs in the area of criminal defense.

2. Co-counsel. To be eligible for appointment as co-counsel, an attorney must be a member in good standing of the State Bar of Arizona and shall have attended and successfully completed, within one year prior to the initial appointment, at least six hours of relevant training or educational programs in the area of capital defense, and within one year prior to any subsequent appointment, at least twelve hours of relevant training or educational programs in the area of criminal defense.

C. Appellate and Post-Conviction Counsel. To be eligible for appointment as appellate or post-conviction counsel, an attorney must meet the qualifications set forth in section (a) of this rule and the following:

1. Within three years immediately preceding the appointment have been lead counsel in an appeal or post-conviction proceeding in a case in which a death sentence was imposed, as well as prior experience as lead counsel in the appeal of at least three felony convictions and at least one post-conviction proceeding that resulted in an evidentiary hearing. Alternatively, an attorney must have been lead counsel in the appeal of at least six felony convictions, at least two of which were appeals from first- or second-degree murder convictions, and lead counsel in at least two post-conviction proceedings that resulted in evidentiary hearings.

2. Have attended and successfully completed, within one year prior to the initial appointment, at least six hours of relevant training or educational programs in the area of capital defense, and within one year prior to any subsequent appointment, at least twelve hours of relevant training or educational programs in the area of criminal defense.

D. Exceptional Circumstances. In exceptional circumstances and with the consent of the Supreme Court, an attorney may be appointed who does not meet the qualifications set forth in sections (a)(1) and (2), (b) and (c) of this rule, providing that the attorney’s experience, stature and record enable the Court to conclude that the attorney's ability significantly exceeds the standards set forth in this rule and that the attorney associates with himself or herself a lawyer who does meet the standards set forth in this rule.

Alabama Code § 15-12-21(d) Fee for Counsel:

Counsel appointed in cases ... shall be entitled to receive for their services a fee to be approved by the trial court. The amount of the fee shall be based on the number of hours spent by the attorney in working on the case and shall be computed at the rate of fifty dollars ($50) per hour for time expended in court and thirty dollars ($30) per hour for time reasonably expended out of court in the preparation of the case. Effective October 1, 2000, the amount of the fee shall be based on the number of hours spent by the attorney in working on the case and shall be computed at the rate of sixty dollars ($60) per hour for time expended in court and forty dollars ($40) per hour for time reasonably expended out of court in the preparation of the case. The total fees paid to any one attorney in any one case, from the time of appointment through the trial of the case, including motions for new trial, shall not exceed the following:

1. In cases where the original charge is a capital offense or a charge which carries a possible sentence of life without parole, there shall be no limit on the total fee.

Mississippi Code § 99-15-17 Fee for Counsel:

The compensation for counsel for indigents ... shall be approved and allowed by the appropriate judge and in any one (1) case may not exceed one thousand dollars ($1000.00) for representation in circuit court whether on appeal or originating in said court. Provided, however, if said case is not appealed to or does not originate in a court of record, the maximum compensation shall not exceed two hundred dollars ($200.00) for any one (1) case, the amount of such compensation to be approved by a judge of the chancery court, county court or circuit court in the county where the case arises. Provided, however, in a capital case two (2) attorneys may be appointed, and the compensation may not exceed two thousand dollars ($2,000.00) per case. If the case is appealed to the state supreme court by counsel appointed by the judge, the allowable fee for services on appeal shall not exceed one thousand dollars ($1000.00) per case. In addition, the judge shall allow reimbursement of actual expenses. The attorney or attorneys so appointed shall itemize the time spent in defending said indigents together with an itemized statement of expenses of such defense, and shall present same to the appropriate judge. The fees and expenses as allowed by the appropriate judge shall be paid by the county treasurer out of the general fund of the county in which the prosecution was commenced.

Craemer v. Washington Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Craemer v. Washington, 168 U.S. 124 (1897); Argued: Not reported; Decided: October 25, 1897; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Fuller; Concurring Opinion: None; Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was convicted of a crime other than capital murder when the jury returned a general verdict of guilty as charged.

Case Holding: The defendant was not convicted of a crime other than capital murder when the jury returned a general verdict of guilty as charged, because the defendant was only charged with capital murder.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Henry Craemer, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Washington. The Washington Supreme Court affirmed the judgment and the United States Supreme Court refused to hear an appeal. Subsequently, the defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that the jury convicted him of second-degree murder or manslaughter, but not capital murder; therefore, he could not be executed for a non-capital conviction. The district court dismissed the petition and denied relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice found that the defendant was not entitled to habeas relief. It was said that the jury returned a general verdict of "guilty as charged." The opinion noted that the defendant was "charged" by an information with capital (first-degree) murder. The chief justice indicated that no charge of second-degree murder or manslaughter was lodged against the defendant; therefore, it was clear that the jury found him guilty of capital murder. Therefore, it was concluded "that the rendition of the judgment complained of involved no violation of the constitution of the United States." The judgment of the Washington Supreme Court was affirmed.

Crimes Not Involving Death Under the common law, all felonies were punishable by the infliction of death. The American colonies incorporated the common law's position in their criminal statutes. The first codified capital punishment offenses in the American colonies were drawn up in 1636 by the Massachusetts Bay Colony. The Capital Laws of New England, as they were called, provided the death penalty for the following crimes: rebellion, perjury, manstealing, rape, statutory rape, adultery, buggery, sodomy, murder, blasphemy, idolatry, witchcraft, and assault in sudden anger. All jurisdictions, at some point in the nation's development, provided the death penalty for offenses that did not involve the death of a human being. The constitutional issue of whether or not the death penalty could be inflicted for non-homicide offenses was not addressed by the United States Supreme Court until it heard the case of Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977).

The narrow issue presented to the Supreme Court in Coker was whether or not the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause prohibited imposition of the death penalty for the crime of rape of an adult woman. In addressing this issue the Court observed, "Georgia is the sole jurisdiction in the United States at the present time that authorizes a sentence of death when the rape victim is an adult woman, and only two other jurisdictions provide capital punishment when the victim is a child.” With this observation in sight, the Supreme Court concluded:

Rape is without doubt deserving of serious punishment; but in terms of moral depravity and of the injury to the person and to the public, it does not compare with murder, which does involve the unjustified taking of human life. Although it may be accompanied by another crime, rape by definition does not include the death of or even the serious injury to another person. The murderer kills; the rapist, if no more than that, does not. Life is over for the victim of the murderer; for the rape victim, life may not be nearly so happy as it was, but it is not over and normally is not beyond repair. We have the abiding conviction that the death penalty, which is unique in its severity and irrevocability, is an excessive penalty for the rapist who, as such, does not take human life.

The decision in Coker stands for the proposition that it is unconstitutional to impose capital punishment for the offense of rape of an adult, without more. Whether or not capital punishment may constitutionally be imposed for rape of a child was not directly addressed in Coker. However, the opinion gives an indication that this, too, would be unconstitutional. However, in Upshaw v. State, 350 So.2d 1358 (Miss. 1977), and Leatherwood v. State, 548 So.2d 389 (Miss. 1989), the Mississippi Supreme Court indicated in dicta that Coker did not prohibit the death penalty for rape of a minor. But, in Buford v. State, 403 So.2d 943 (Fla. 1981), the Florida Supreme Court interpreted Coker as invalidating a statute in that jurisdiction which had imposed the death penalty for committing rape of a minor.

SOURCE: Bureau of Justice Statistics, Capital Punishment, 1977.

At this juncture in Anglo-American jurisprudence, courts are almost unanimous in holding that Coker has prohibited imposition of the death penalty for any offense that does not involve the death of a victim. For example, in Cook v. State, 251 S.E.2d 230 (Ga. 1978), the Georgia Supreme Court interpreted Coker as invalidating statutes in that jurisdiction which had imposed the death penalty for armed robbery and kidnapping with bodily injury. Moreover, except for treason and espionage (Mississippi retains rape of a child as a capital crime), all offenses that have the death penalty as an authorized punishment require a homicide also occur. Criminal Justice Legal Foundation The Criminal Justice Legal Foundation is a California-based, victim-oriented, nonprofit organization, created for the purpose of seeking to assure that convicted criminal defendants swiftly receive the punishment they have been given. The Foundation utilizes attorneys to introduce legal arguments in criminal cases before appellate courts to encourage precedent-setting decisions which recognize the rights of victims to justice. The Foundation has obtained some success in judicial decisions that paved the way for reducing the length and complexity of appeals.

The Foundation takes the position that violent crime is the result of deterioration in basic social values. It also believes that the criminal justice system has transformed from an institution that encouraged lawful behavior to one that now permits flagrant violations of the law. A central theme of the Foundation is to restore law enforcement’s ability to assure that crime does not pay. The Foundation produces a quarterly newsletter, Advisory, to report on its activities.

Criminal Record Mitigator A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made the lack of a significant prior criminal record a statutory mitigating circumstance. Crooker v. California Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433 (1958); Argued: April 2, 1958; Decided: June 30, 1958; Opinion of the Court: Justice Clark; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Douglas, in which Warren, CJ., and Black and Brennan, JJ., joined; Appellate Defense Counsel: Robert W. Armstrong argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: William E. James argued; Edmund G. Brown, William B. McKesson, and Fred N. Whichello on brief; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: None; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: 1 Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied due process of law as a result of his confession being given after he requested counsel.

Case Holding: The defendant was not denied due process of law as a result of his confession being given after he requested counsel because under the totality of the circumstances he was not prejudiced.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Crooker, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. The California Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that he was denied due process of law because his confession was involuntary and made after he had requested counsel. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clark: Justice Clark held that the defendant's confession was not involuntary. The opinion pointed out that the defendant was a former law student and understood his right to remain silent. Justice Clark found that no coercion, intimidation, or physical assault was used to obtain the confession. It was also said that the fact that the confession was given after the defendant requested counsel did not invalidate the confession. Justice Clark indicated that the totality of the circumstances did not reveal any prejudice because the confession was obtained after counsel was requested. The judgment of the California Supreme Court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Douglas, in Which Warren, CJ., and Black and Brennan, JJ., Joined: Justice Douglas dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the Constitution required the confession be held inadmissible because it was given after the defendant requested counsel. Justice Douglas wrote as follows: "When [the defendant] was first arrested, and before any real interrogation took place, he asked that his attorney be present.... This demand for an attorney was made over and again prior to the time a confession was extracted from the accused. Its denial was in my view a denial of that due process of law guaranteed the citizen by the Fourteenth Amendment."

Case Note: The position taken by the dissent was eventually adopted by the Supreme Court. See also Right to Counsel; Right to Remain Silent Issue Presented: Whether the United States Supreme Court had jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a habeas corpus proceeding in the courts of the District of Columbia.

Case Holding: The United States Supreme Court did not have jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a habeas corpus proceeding in the courts of the District of Columbia because Congress did not grant such authority.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William D. Cross, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the District of Columbia. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia affirmed the judgment. The defendant filed a petition for appeal with the United States Supreme Court, challenging his conviction and sentence. The government filed a motion to dismiss the petition on the grounds that the Supreme Court did not have appellate jurisdiction over the case. The Supreme Court agreed and dismissed the petition for appeal in Cross v. United States.

The defendant next filed a habeas corpus petition in a trial court for the District of Columbia, which was dismissed. The appellate court of the District of Columbia affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted an appeal. The government filed a motion to dismiss the petition on the grounds that the Supreme Court did not have appellate jurisdiction over the case.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The Chief Justice noted that the Court had previously ruled that Congress had limited its jurisdiction to hear a direct criminal appeal from a court in the District of Columbia. The motion to dismiss filed by the government asked the Court to determine if it had "jurisdiction over the judgments of that court on habeas corpus." In examining the applicable statute, the chief justice found that Congress did not give it authority to entertain a habeas appeal directly from a court in the District of Columbia. The appeal was therefore dismissed. See also Cross v. United States; In Re Cross; Jurisdiction

Issue Presented: Whether the United States Supreme Court had jurisdiction to review a criminal case prosecuted in a trial court of the District of Columbia and initially reviewed by the appellate court of the District of Columbia.

Case Holding: The United States Supreme Court did not have jurisdiction to review a criminal case prosecuted in a trial court of the District of Columbia and initially reviewed by the appellate court of the District of Columbia because Congress limited review to the appellate court of the District of Columbia or the United States Supreme Court, but not both.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William D. Cross, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the District of Columbia. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia affirmed the judgment. The defendant filed a petition for appeal with the United States Supreme Court, challenging his conviction and sentence. The government filed a motion to dismiss the petition on the grounds that the Court did not have appellate jurisdiction over the case.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice ruled that the Court was not given appellate jurisdiction over criminal cases that were reviewed by the appellate court for the District of Columbia. The opinion found that by statute a prosecution in a trial court of the District of Columbia could be reviewed by the Court or the appellate court of the District of Columbia, but not both. Chief Justice Fuller wrote: "The obvious object was to secure a review by some other court than that which passed upon the case at [the trial level]. Such review by two other courts was not within the intention [of the statute]." The petition for appeal was thereby dismissed. See also Cross v. Burke; In Re Cross; Jurisdiction

Issue Presented: Whether the State of California had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for a murder committed during the transportation of United States mail.

Case Holding: The State of California had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for a murder committed during the transportation of United States mail because the crime occurred within the borders of the State.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Worden Crossley, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. The California Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The defendant next filed a habeas corpus petition with a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that California did not have jurisdiction to prosecute the offense because the crime was a federal offense. It was said that the victim, a train engineer, was killed when the defendant derailed a train exclusively engaged in the carrying or transportation of the mail of the United States. The defendant asserted that such conduct constituted an obstruction or stopping of the transmission of United States mail and was a restraint and retarding of the interstate commerce of the United States. The District Court denied relief and dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice ruled that the defendant's argument was without merit. It was said that California had a right to prosecute the defendant for a murder committed within the jurisdiction of the State. The opinion pointed out: "[I]t is settled law that the same act may constitute an offense against the United States and against a state, subjecting the guilty party to punishment under the laws of each government, and may embrace two or more offenses. There is no statute of the United States under which [the defendant] could, on the alleged facts, have been prosecuted for murder in the courts of the United States. He was convicted of that crime in the administration of the laws of California; and the conviction has been sustained by the highest court of the state." The judgment of the federal district court was affirmed. See also Dual Sovereignty

Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause Under the common law, capital punishment was carried out in a variety of agonizing and painful ways. The cruelty of death under the common law was adopted by the American colonists. However, with the ratification of the Eighth Amendment to the federal Constitution, the death knell was sounded for the common law's barbaric methods of execution. The Eighth Amendment provides: "nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."

Origin of the Eighth Amendment. The Eighth Amendment became a part of the Constitution in 1791. The history of this amendment, however, does not begin with its insertion into the federal Constitution. The birth of the Eighth Amendment reaches back to the shores of England and the English Bill of Rights of 1689.

The tenth clause of the English Bill of Rights provided the following: "nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." It was pointed out by Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall that scholars are in debate over "[w]hether the English Bill of Rights prohibition against cruel and unusual punishments is properly read as a response to excessive or illegal punishments, as a reaction to barbaric and objectionable modes of punishment, or both[.]" While there is no unanimous agreement as to why the English Bill of Rights included a clause prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments, there is no dissent to the fact that the Eighth Amendment owes its existence to the English Bill of Rights.

The Eighth Amendment did not leap directly from the English Bill of Rights into the Constitution. The precise language used in the Eighth Amendment first appeared in America on June 12, 1776, in Virginia's Declaration of Rights. A Virginia delegate named George Mason was responsible for taking the tenth clause of the English Bill of Rights and placing it into Virginia's Declaration of Rights. Delegate Mason was also a strong advocate, at the Constitutional Convention, for placing the tenth clause into the federal Constitution as the Eighth Amendment. Delegate Mason's foresight eventually paid off and in 1791 the tenth clause, with slight modifications, became the Constitution's Eighth Amendment.

Interpreting the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. In the case of Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958), the Supreme Court expounded upon the framework in which it viewed the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. In succinct fashion, the Supreme Court stated in Trop: "The basic concept underlying the [Clause] is nothing less than the dignity of man. While the State has the power to punish, the [Clause] stands to assure that this power be exercised within the limits of civilized standards. Fines, imprisonment and even execution may be imposed depending upon the enormity of the crime, but any technique outside the bounds of these traditional penalties is constitutionally suspect."

While Trop set out the general framework in which the Supreme Court views the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, it was Justice William Brennan's concurring opinion in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), that first pulled together the principles of law the Supreme Court historically relied upon to decide whether or not a particular punishment was cruel and unusual. Justice Brennan found the following principles of law guided the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause: (1) the punishment must not be so severe as to be degrading to the dignity of human beings; (2) a government cannot arbitrarily inflict a severe punishment; (3) a severe punishment must not be unacceptable to contemporary society; and (4) a severe punishment must not be excessive. See also Bill of Rights; Excessive Bail Clause

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the evidence was sufficient to sustain the defendant's conviction. (2) Whether the prosecutor made prejudicial remarks to the jury during closing argument. (3) Whether the trial court was obligated to delay the trial so that the defendant could subpoena certain witnesses.

Case Holdings: (1) The evidence was sufficient to sustain the defendant's conviction and, to the extent the evidence was conflicting, it was for the jury to resolve such conflict. (2) The prosecutor did not make prejudicial remarks to the jury during closing argument and, to the extent remarks were improper, defense counsel failed to properly preserve the issue for review by interposing an objection. (3) The trial court was not obligated to delay the trial so that the defendant could subpoena certain witnesses, when the defendant waited until the last day of trial to seek to subpoena the witnesses.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Crumpton, was charged by the United States with committing capital murder "at the Cherokee Nation, in [Native American] country." The defendant was tried in a federal district court in Arkansas. A jury convicted the defendant and he was sentenced to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging (1) the evidence was insufficient to sustain the conviction; (2) defense counsel failed to object to improper remarks by the prosecutor; and (3) the trial court committed error in not delaying the trial so that the defendant could subpoena certain witnesses.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brown: Justice Brown ruled none of the defendant's assignments of error had merit. The opinion found that the evidence was sufficient to establish that the defendant committed the crime, though such evidence was circumstantial: "The weight of this evidence and the extent to which it was contradicted or explained away by witnesses on behalf of the defendant were questions exclusively for the jury, and not reviewable [by the Court]."

The opinion observed that, while the prosecutor made a closing argument comment to the jury that was slightly inappropriate, defense counsel failed to properly object and preserve the issue for review. Justice Brown wrote: "There is no doubt that, in the excitement of an argument, counsel do sometimes make statements which are not fully justified by the evidence. This is not such an error, however, as will necessarily vitiate the verdict or require a new trial. It is the duty of the defendant's counsel at once to call the attention of the court to the objectionable remarks, and request its interposition, and, in case of refusal, to note an exception."

In dispensing with the defendant's third issue, Justice Brown found that the defendant waited until the last day of trial to ask the court to permit him to subpoena certain witnesses. The opinion noted: "It would probably have delayed the trial a number of days to send the [subpoena] into [Native American] Territory, make service of it there, and bring in these witnesses to testify. Whether the trial should be delayed for the production of these witnesses was clearly a matter of discretion and not reviewable[.]" The judgment of the district court was affirmed.

Cuba The death penalty is allowed in Cuba. The nation uses the firing squad as the method of carrying out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Spanish and American law. The nation's constitution was adopted on February 24, 1976.

Cuba is a totalitarian state controlled by President Fidel Castro. President Castro exercises control over all aspects of Cuban life through the Communist Party. The judiciary is completely subordinate to the government and to the Communist Party. The nation's constitution explicitly subordinates the judiciary to the National Assembly of the People's Power and the Council of State, which is headed by President Castro.

The judicial system of Cuba consists of municipal courts, provincial courts, and a supreme court. Under the laws of Cuba, criminal defendants do not have a right to trial by jury. Generally trials are public, but when state security is allegedly involved, proceedings are not public. Defendants have a right to legal counsel. The laws recognize the right of appeal from municipal courts, but limit appeals in provincial courts to cases involving maximum prison terms or the death penalty. Appeals in death penalty cases are automatic. A death sentence must ultimately be affirmed by the Council of State. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Curtis, Benjamin R. Benjamin R. Curtis served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1851 to 1857. While on the Supreme Court, Curtis was viewed as a liberal interpreter of the Constitution.

Curtis was born on November 4, 1809, in Watertown, Massachusetts. He received an undergraduate degree from Harvard College in 1829 and a law degree from Harvard Law School in 1832. Curtis entered private practice after law school. During his years of practice, he became politically active with the Whig Party. In 1851, his political activities earned him a seat in the Massachusetts House of Representatives. A few months after his election to State office, President Millard Fillmore nominated Curtis to the Supreme Court.

Curtis is known to have written only one capital punishment opinion while on the Supreme Court. In Ex Parte Wells, Curtis wrote a dissenting opinion. The issue in Wells was whether or not the president had authority to pardon the defendant's death sentence upon the condition that the defendant remain in prison for life. The majority on the Supreme Court held that the president had such authority. Curtis dissented from the Court's decision on a technical matter. He wrote that the trial court's ruling on the president's conditional pardon was not a collateral matter that the Court had authority to review. Curtis died on September 15, 1874.

Dakota Executions On December 26, 1862, the largest mass execution in the history of the nation occurred. On that date, thirty-eight Dakota Native Americans were hung in Mankato, Minnesota. At that time, the Dakota people comprised seven distinct Native American ethnic groups that were also called Sioux Native Americans.

The events which led to the mass execution involved matters pertaining to longstanding abuses of the Dakota people by unscrupulous federal government agents and treaty violations by the United States. This situation left the Dakota people dying in poverty. On August 17, 1862, the desperate plight of the people turned to war against the federal government. The first incident of war involved the killing of five settlers in Acton, Minnesota. From this incident, Dakota leaders declared an all-out war against the United States. The war lasted less than a month, as the Dakota people did not have the resources to sustain a war against the nation.

Rather than treat the defeated Dakota people as belligerents of war, a military decision was made to prosecute them as pure criminals. A five-member military commission was appointed to preside over the prosecution. Criminal charges of rape, robbery and murder were brought against 392 Dakota men. On September 28, 1862, the trials began. When the last trial was held on November 3, the commission had convicted 323 defendants. The commission sentenced 303 convicted defendants to death, while twenty were sentenced to imprisonment, and sixty-nine were acquitted. None of the defendants had legal counsel.

President Abraham Lincoln was called upon to review the 303 death sentences. On December 6, the President issued a decision commuting the sentences of all but thirty-nine defendants. On December 23, President Lincoln suspended the sentence of one of the thirty-nine defendants.

A scaffold was erected by soldiers that would allow the thirty-eight defendants men to be executed simultaneously. On December 26, the thirty-eight defendants were assembled on the scaffold. An order was given and the men swung from gallows as the crowd cheered.

Several years after the mass execution, two other Dakota men were prosecuted for crimes committed in 1862. A military commission convicted the two defendants in De-

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was tried under such prejudicial circumstances and improper influences that he was denied due process of law.

Case Holding: The defendant failed to produce evidence to establish that he was tried under such prejudicial circumstances and improper influences that he was denied due process of law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Darcy, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court alleging pre-trial publicity denied him a fair trial. The district court dismissed the petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Burton: Justice Burton held that the defendant was not denied a fair trial. It was said that the burden was on the defendant to show such essential unfairness as vitiates his trial, and the burden had to be sustained by more than speculation. The opinion found that the most that was shown by the defendant was that, in certain respects, opportunity for prejudice existed. The evidence failed to support the defendant's claim that the news coverage of the crime and of the proceedings prior to his trial created such an atmosphere of hysteria and prejudice as precluded a fair trial. The opinion concluded: "While this Court stands ready to correct violations of constitutional rights, it also holds that 'it is not asking too much that the burden of showing essential unfairness be sustained by him who claims such injustice and seeks to have the result set aside, and that it be sustained not as a matter of speculation but as a demonstrable reality.' 'If the mere opportunity for prejudice or corruption is to raise a presumption that they exist, it will be hard to maintain jury trial under the conditions of the present day.'" The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Harlan, in Which Frankfurter and Douglas, JJ., Joined: Justice Harlan dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the defendant was denied a fair trial because the judge who presided over the trials of the defendant's two co-defendants was present as a spectator. Justice Harlan noted that this judge had publicly proclaimed his satisfaction with the death sentences given to the defendant's co-defendants. The dissent also pointed out that the spectator judge was highly respected in the community and that his views had to have had an impact on the defendant's trial. See also Pre-trial Publicity Issues Presented: (1) Whether the exclusion for cause of a member of the venire panel violated the defendant's constitutional rights. (2) Whether the prosecutor's closing argument during the guilt phase rendered the defendant's trial fundamentally unfair. (3) Whether the defendant was denied effective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase of his trial.

Case Holdings: (1) The exclusion for cause of a member of the venire panel did not violate the defendant's constitutional rights. (2) The prosecutor's closing argument during the guilt phase did not render the defendant's trial fundamentally unfair. (3) The defendant was not denied effective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase of his trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Florida convicted the defendant, Darden, of capital murder and sentenced him to death. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court. The defendant asserted three primary arguments in federal court. First, that his constitutional rights were violated when the trial judge excluded for "cause," a potential juror who responded affirmatively to the trial judge's voir dire question, "Do you have any moral or religious, conscientious moral or religious principles in opposition to the death penalty so strong that you would be unable without violating your own principles to vote to recommend a death penalty regardless of the facts?" Second, the defendant contended that the prosecutor's closing argument during the guilt phase of the trial rendered the trial fundamentally unfair and deprived the sentencing determination of the reliability required by the Eighth Amendment. Third, the defendant contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase because his attorney was not prepared to adequately represent him at that stage of the prosecution.

The district court denied relief. A Court of Appeals reversed on the claim of improper exclusion of a member of the venire. The United States Supreme Court, in a memorandum order, vacated the Court of Appeals' judgment and remanded for reconsideration in light of its decision in Wainwright v. Witt. On remand, the Court of Appeals denied relief to the defendant. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the merits of the issues in the case.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Powell: Justice Powell first addressed the defendant's issue involving the excluded potential juror. He stated that the record of the jury voir dire, viewed in its entirety, revealed that the trial court's decision to exclude the juror for cause was proper. It was said that the juror's response to the trial judge established that the juror's views on capital punishment would prevent or substantially impair the performance of his duties as a juror in accordance with his instructions and his oath.

The opinion indicated that the record also supported the rejection of the defendant's contention as to the prosecutor's closing argument. Justice Powell wrote that the prosecutor's closing argument included improper remarks that indicated that the defendant was on a weekend furlough from an earlier prison sentence when the capital murder occurred, implying that the death penalty would be the only guarantee against a future similar act. The prosecutor also referred to the defendant as an animal. Justice Powell ruled that the relevant question is whether the comments so infected the trial with unfairness as to make the resulting conviction a denial of due process. Viewed under this standard, he wrote, the prosecutor's comments did not deprive the defendant of a fair trial. The comments did not manipulate or misstate the evidence or implicate other specific rights of the defendant.

With respect to the defendant's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase of the trial, Justice Powell found that he failed to satisfy the first part of the two-part test for determining ineffective representation: That his trial counsels' performance fell below an objective standard of reasonableness. It was said that there was no merit to the defendant's contention that defense counsel devoted only the time between the close of the guilt phase of trial and the start of the penalty phase — approximately a half-hour — to prepare the case in mitigation. Justice Powell found that the record indicated that a great deal of time and effort went into the defense of the case, with a significant portion of that time being devoted to preparation for the penalty phase. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Chief Justice Burger: In his concurring opinion, the chief justice was concerned with what he perceived to be mischaracterization of the case in Justice Blackmun's dissenting opinion. The chief justice wrote:

I concur fully in the opinion for the Court and write separately only to address the suggestion in Justice Blackmun's dissent that the Court rejects Darden's ... claim because of its "impatience with the progress of Darden's constitutional challenges to his conviction."

...The dissent's suggestion that this Court is motivated by impatience with Darden's constitutional claims is refuted by the record; the 13 years of judicial proceedings in this case manifest substantial care and patience. Our rejection of Darden's claims in this the fourth time he has sought review in this Court is once again based on a thoughtful application of the law to the facts of the case. At some point there must be finality.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun argued in his dissenting opinion that the Court incorrectly resolved the issue of the prosecutor's remarks and the exclusion of a juror for cause. He wrote as follows:

Although the Constitution guarantees a criminal defendant only "a fair trial [and] not a perfect one," this Court has stressed repeatedly in the decade since Gregg v. Georgia that the Eighth Amendment requires a heightened degree of reliability in any case where a State seeks to take the defendant's life. Today's opinion, however, reveals a Court willing to tolerate not only imperfection but a level of fairness and reliability so low it should make conscientious prosecutors cringe.

The Court's discussion of Darden's claim of prosecutorial misconduct is noteworthy for its omissions. Despite the fact that earlier this Term the Court relied heavily on standards governing the professional responsibility of defense counsel in ruling that an attorney's actions did not deprive his client of any constitutional right, today it entirely ignores standards governing the professional responsibility of prosecutors in reaching the conclusion that the summations of Darden's prosecutor did not deprive him of a fair trial...

I simply do not believe the evidence in this case was so overwhelming that this Court can conclude, on the basis of the written record before it, that the jury's verdict was not the product of the prosecutor[]'s misconduct. The three most damaging pieces of evidence — the identifications of Darden by [two witnesses] and the ballistics evidence — are all sufficiently problematic that they leave me unconvinced that a jury not exposed to [the prosecutor's] egregious summation would necessarily have convicted Darden....

Even if Darden had been convicted fairly, however, I believe his death sentence should be vacated because of the improper exclusion for cause of a member of the venire who was qualified to serve....

Prior to the voir dire of individual venire members, the trial judge announced his intention to excuse, not only any potential juror whose religious or moral principles made him unable to impose the death penalty, but also any potential juror who, if he did follow the court's instructions, "would be going against his principles." This standard is essentially indistinguishable from the standard employed by Illinois and expressly disapproved by this Court....

I believe this Court must do more than wring its hands when a State uses improper legal standards to select juries in capital cases and permits prosecutors to pervert the adversary process. I therefore dissent.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued a dissenting statement indicating that he joined Justice Blackmun's dissent, and adhered to his position "that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments." See also Jury Selection; Right to Counsel

Davis, David David Davis served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1862 to 1877. While on the Supreme Court, Davis was known as a moderate in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Davis was born on March 9, 1815, in Sassafras Neck, Maryland. At age thirteen, Davis enrolled in Kenyon College and went on to graduate. He subsequently took legal courses at New Haven Law School. Davis eventually moved to Illinois where he passed the bar in 1835 and began a legal practice. In the ensuing years, he was elected to the Illinois House of Representatives and as a trial court judge. Davis was active as a campaign manager for Abraham Lincoln. After Lincoln's election to the presidency he appointed Davis to the Supreme Court in 1862.

Davis is known to have written only one capital punishment opinion while on the Supreme Court. In the case of Ex Parte Milligan, Davis wrote the opinion for the Court. The two issues facing the Court in Milligan concerned whether the president had authority to suspend habeas corpus and whether the military had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant, who was a civilian. Davis wrote that the president did not have authority to suspend habeas corpus. He also held that the military was without authority to prosecute the defendant for capital crimes because he was not in the military. Davis died on June 26, 1886.

Issue Presented: Whether the effect of the repeal and amendment of Idaho's death penalty law prevented the defendant from being executed.

Case Holding: The effect of the repeal and amendment of Idaho's death penalty law did not present a federal question, because the matter was resolved on State law grounds by the State's appellate court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Jack Davis, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Idaho. The Idaho Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. Subsequently, the State's death penalty statute was amended to require executions be carried out in the State penitentiary. In a proceeding brought before the State's appellate court, it was determined that the defendant had to be executed under the law that was in place at the time of the commission of his offense, which meant execution in the yard of a county jail. The defendant shortly thereafter filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that he was being unlawfully held because he could not be executed under the new law and, since the old law was repealed, he could not be executed at all. The district court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brown: Justice Brown held: "The question whether [the defendant] shall be executed ... by the warden of the penitentiary, or ... by the sheriff, or whether he shall escape punishment altogether, was determined adversely to him by the supreme court of the state and involves no question of due process of law under the 14th Amendment." The judgment of the district court was affirmed.

Issue Presented: Whether a death sentence may be deemed constitutionally valid where one prospective juror was excluded from the jury for cause for merely expressing scruples against the death penalty, rather than being irrevocably committed to vote against it.

Case Holding: Unless a venireperson is irrevocably committed, before the trial has begun, to vote against the penalty of death regardless of the facts and circumstances that might emerge in the course of the proceedings, he or she cannot be excluded for cause.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Davis, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. On appeal, the Georgia Supreme Court found that one prospective juror had been excluded for "cause" in violation of the United States Supreme Court's ruling in Witherspoon v. Illinois. The appellate court nevertheless affirmed the conviction and death sentence, reasoning that the erroneous exclusion of one death-scrupled juror did not deny the defendant a jury representing a cross-section of the community. It was further said: "The rationale of Witherspoon and its progeny is not violated where merely one of a qualified class or group is excluded where it is shown, as here, that others of such group were qualified to serve. This record is completely void of any evidence of a systematic and intentional exclusion of a qualified group of jurors so as to deny the [defendant] a jury of veniremen representing a cross-section of the community.” The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion observed that “[t]he Witherspoon case held that ‘a sentence of death cannot be carried out if the jury that imposed or recommended it was chosen by excluding veniremen for cause simply because they voiced general objections to the death penalty or expressed conscientious or religious scruples against its infliction.’” It was said that the record in the case indicated that a Witherspoon violation occurred in the selection of jurors to preside over the defendant’s case. “Accordingly, the ... judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist, in Which Burger, CJ. and Blackmun, J., Joined: Justice Rehnquist dissented from the Court’s judgment. He believed that the Court misread the decision in Witherspoon. The dissent reasoned as follows:

As is clear from the most cursory reading, Witherspoon v. Illinois does not inexorably lead to the result this Court now reaches. Indeed, much of the language in that opinion would support the reasoning, and the result, reached by the Supreme Court of Georgia. The extension of Witherspoon to cover the case where a sole venireman is excluded in violation of its test deserves plenary consideration, not a per se rule that precludes application of even the harmless-error test. There is no indication that the Supreme Court of Georgia was wrong when it observed that the “record is completely void of any evidence of a systematic and intentional exclusion of a qualified group of jurors so as to deny the appellant a jury of veniremen representing a cross section of the community....”

Finally, the defect in this case is not that a juror was improperly excluded because she was not irrevocably opposed to the death penalty; rather, the defect is a failure to question sufficiently to determine whether or not she was irrevocably opposed. It is not inconceivable that a hearing with the excluded juror could be conducted now to finish the aborted questioning and determine whether she would have, in fact, been excludable for cause.

The effects of the arguably improper exclusion, in short, are too murky to warrant summary reversal of the sentence imposed.

Issue Presented: Whether it was correct for the trial court to instruct the jury that it could convict the defendant even if it had a reasonable doubt concerning his sanity at the time of the crime.

Case Holding: It was incorrect for the trial court to instruct the jury that it could convict the defendant even if it had a reasonable doubt concerning his sanity at the time of the crime.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Dennis Davis, was charged with capital murder by the United States. During the trial, the defendant raised the defense of insanity. The defendant put on evidence through witnesses to show that at the time of the crime he was not mentally competent. The jury rejected the defense and convicted the defendant. The trial court sentenced the defendant to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the trial court improperly instructed the jury on the defense of insanity. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan agreed with that the defendant that the trial court incorrectly instructed the jury on the defense of insanity. The opinion examined the issue as follows:

[T]he court below instructed the jury that the defense of insanity could not avail the accused unless it appeared affirmatively to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury that he was not criminally responsible for his acts. The fact of killing being clearly proved, the legal presumption, based upon the common experience of mankind that every man is sane, was sufficient, the court in effect said, to authorize a verdict of guilty, although the jury might entertain a reasonable doubt upon the evidence whether the accused, by reason of his mental condition, was criminally responsible for the killing in question. In other words, if the evidence was in equilibrio as to the accused being sane,—that is, capable of comprehending the nature and effect of his acts,—he was to be treated just as he would be if there were no defense of insanity, or if there were an entire absence of proof that he was insane....

We are unable to assent to the doctrine that in a prosecution for murder, the defense being insanity, and the fact of the killing with a deadly weapon being clearly established, it is the duty of the jury to convict where the evidence is equally balanced on the issue as to the sanity of the accused at the time of the killing. On the contrary, he is entitled to an acquittal of the specific crime charged if, upon all the evidence, there is reasonable doubt whether he was capable in law of committing crime....

One who takes human life cannot be said to be actuated by malice aforethought, or to have deliberately intended to take life, ... unless at the time he had sufficient mind to comprehend the criminality or the right and wrong of such an act. Although the killing of one human being by another human being with a deadly weapon is presumed to be malicious until the contrary appears, yet, in order to constitute a crime, a person must have intelligence and capacity enough to have a criminal intent and purpose; and if his reason and mental powers are either so deficient that he has no will, no conscience, or controlling mental power, or if, through the overwhelming violence of mental disease, his intellectual power is for the time obliterated, he is not a responsible moral agent, and is not punishable for criminal acts. Neither in the adjudged cases nor in the elementary treatises upon criminal law is there to be found any dissent from these general propositions. All admit that the crime of murder necessarily involves the possession by the accused of such mental capacity as will render him criminally responsible for his acts.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. See also Davis v. United States (II); Insanity Defense

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court committed error in refusing to instruct the jury on manslaughter.

Case Holding: The trial court did not commit error in refusing to instruct the jury on manslaughter because no evidence was presented to suggest a conviction for any crime less than murder.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Dennis Davis, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The United States Supreme Court reversed the judgment and ordered a new trial because the trial court improperly instructed the jury on the defense of insanity. At the second trial, the defendant was again convicted and sentenced to death. A second appeal was filed with the United States Supreme Court, wherein the defendant contended the trial court erred in failing to instruct the jury on manslaughter. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer pointed out that at the second trial the defendant again raised the defense of insanity: “On the second trial the court charged the law in accordance with the rule laid down by this court,— quoting the very language of our opinion,— and also defined what was meant by insanity, in language which, under the circumstances of this case, was in no degree prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.”

In turning the issue presented by the appeal, Justice Brewer found that the trial court did not commit error in refusing to instruct the jury on manslaughter. The opinion reasoned as follows: “[U]nder the evidence there was no occasion for any statement of the law on this. There was no testimony to reduce the offense, if any there was, below the grade of murder. If the defendant was sane, and responsible for his actions, there was nothing upon which any suggestion of any inferior degree of homicide could be made, and therefore the court was under no obligation (indeed, it would simply have been confusing the minds of the jury) to give any instruction upon a matter which was not really open for their consideration.” The judgment of the federal trial court was affirmed. See also Davis v. Delaware, 503 U.S. 159 (1992); Argued: November 12, 1991; Decided: March 9, 1992; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Rehnquist; Concurring Opinion: Justice Blackmun; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Thomas; Appellate Defense Counsel: Bernard J. Issue Presented: Whether the First and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit the introduction in a capital sentencing proceeding of the fact that the defendant was a member of a prison gang, where the evidence had no relevance to the issues being decided in the proceeding.

Case Holding: The First and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit the introduction in a capital sentencing proceeding of the fact that the defendant was a member of a prison gang, where the evidence had no relevance to the issues being decided in the proceeding.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: A Delaware jury convicted the defendant, David Dawson, of committing capital murder during an escape from prison. At the penalty phase, the prosecutor introduced evidence that the defendant was a member of a violent prison gang. The defendant was sentenced to death. The Delaware Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence after rejecting the defendant's claim that introduction of evidence of his prison gang membership violated his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice held that the defendant's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated by the admission of evidence of his prison gang membership because the evidence had no relevance to the issues being decided in the proceeding. It was said that the Constitution did not erect a per se barrier to the admission of evidence concerning a defendant's associations at a sentencing hearing simply because those associations are protected by the First Amendment. However, the chief justice found that the evidence in the defendant's case proved only the prison gang's and the defendant's abstract beliefs, not that the gang had committed any unlawful act. Thus, it was concluded that such evidence was not relevant to help prove any aggravating circumstance. The judgment of the Delaware Supreme Court was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun concurred with the Court's opinion and judgment. He wrote separately to note his understanding that the Court did not require application of harmless error review on remand. Justice Blackmun believed that harmless error analysis was inappropriate for a First Amendment violation.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas dissented from the majority's decision. He argued that the prosecutor was entitled to introduce evidence of the defendant's prison gang membership in order to rebut evidence that the defendant proffered which showed “that he had earned good time credits while in prison.”

Day, William R. William R. Day served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1903 to 1922. While on the Supreme Court, Day was known as a moderate in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Day was born in Ravenna, Ohio, on April 17, 1849. He received an undergraduate degree from the University of Michigan in 1870. After attending the university's law school for a year, Day moved to Canton, Ohio, where he was admitted to the bar in 1872. As a result of Day's political activities, President William McKinley appointed him Secretary of State in 1898. A year later, President McKinley appointed Day as an appellate judge for the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals. In 1903, President Theodore Roosevelt appointed Day to the Supreme Court.

Day was known to have written only a few capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. His most noteworthy capital punishment opinion was Stroud v. United States. In Stroud, the Supreme Court was asked to determine whether the Double Jeopardy Clause prohibited re-prosecution of a capital defendant for the same capital offense, when the first judgment is reversed. Day wrote that successive prosecutions, where there has been a reversal of the initial judgment, did not violate double jeopardy principles. Day died on July 9, 1923.

Deadlocked Jury In the context of capital punishment, a deadlocked jury is one that is unable to reach a verdict on a defendant's guilt or punishment. In the case of Allen v. United States, 164 U.S. 492 (1896), the United States Supreme Court approved of an instruction to use when a jury is deadlocked. The instruction, called an Allen charge, advises the jury to give deference to each other's opinions and informs the minority holdout to reconsider the reasonableness of their position, in light of the position taken by the majority. The Allen charge was in great favor for some time, but has been increasingly rejected by State and federal courts as intruding too much on the deliberation process.

During the guilt phase of a capital trial, if the jury is deadlocked and unable to reach a verdict, the trial court will declare a mistrial. A defendant may be re-prosecuted after a mistrial caused by a deadlocked jury.

It is not uncommon for a penalty phase jury to be hopelessly deadlocked and unable to reach a verdict on the sentence. The United States Supreme Court has not declared that the federal Constitution requires a particular procedure be used or disposition rendered, when a penalty phase jury is deadlocked. The Constitution's silence on this issue means that capital punishment jurisdictions have the discretion to determine the resolution of this issue as they deem fair.

A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions require that a capital felon be sentenced to prison for life by the trial judge, if the jury is deadlocked. Alabama and California depart from the majority position, as shown by the statutes below.

Alabama Code § 13A-5-46(G): If the jury is unable to reach [a] verdict recommending a sentence ... the trial court may declare a mistrial of the sentence hearing. Such a mistrial shall not affect the conviction. After such a mistrial or mistrials another sentence hearing shall be conducted before another jury, selected according to the laws and rules governing the selection of a jury for the trial of a capital case.

California Penal Code § 190.4(B): If the ... jury ... has been unable to reach a unanimous verdict as to what the penalty shall be, the court shall dismiss the jury and shall order a new jury impaneled to try the issue as to what the penalty shall be. If such new jury is unable to reach a unanimous verdict as to what the penalty shall be, the court in its discretion shall either order a new jury or impose a punishment of confinement in state prison for a term of life without the possibility of parole.

The issue of a deadlocked penalty phase jury was the basis for the decision by the highest court in New York to invalidate that state's death penalty laws. Under the former death penalty laws of New York, a trial judge was required to instruct the penalty phase jury that they had to unanimously decide whether a defendant should be sentenced to death or to life without parole. The trial court was further required to inform the jury that if they failed to agree, the court would have to sentence the defendant to life imprisonment with parole eligibility. In People v. LaValle, 3 N.Y.3d 88 (2004), the high court of New York declared that this deadlock instruction coerced juries into voting for the death penalty. As a consequence, New York's death penalty laws were invalidated.

Death-Eligible Offenses As a result of the United States Supreme Court's interpretation of the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, capital punishment today does not resemble its common-law counterpart. A principle alteration of capital punishment has been the drastic reduction in the number of crimes that are punishable as capital offenses. Crimes that are punishable with death are called death-eligible offenses. The distinguishing feature of death-eligible offenses is that they are created with "special circumstances."

An underlying premise of special circumstances is that not every murder justifies the consideration of capital punishment. That is, in keeping with constitutional requirements, special circumstances seek to limit the class of murders that will be exposed to death penalty prosecution. In an effort to pull out a subclass of death-eligible murders from among all murders, legislators have singled out specific factors or conduct that may appear in some murders. These specific factors or conduct are called "special circumstances" and form the basis of all death-eligible offenses. As a result of forming the basis of death-eligible offenses, a special circumstance actually constitutes an element of the capital offense. As an element of an offense, the constitution requires a death-eligible special circumstance be proven at the guilt phase beyond a reasonable doubt. Illustrations of death-eligible offenses follow.

Murder-Without-More: The phrase "murder-without-more" refers to the killing of a single human being. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions authorize death penalty consideration for the crime of murder-without-more. A variety of names are used to describe this offense: first-degree murder, murder, deliberate homicide, and aggravated murder.

The special circumstance that is used to make murder-without-more a death-eligible offense is the mental state of a defendant at the time of the commission of the murder. Capital punishment jurisdictions differ on how they describe the mental state. The following are the words that are found in statutes: intentional, willful, deliberate, premeditated, malice, and prior calculation and design.

Homicide in the Commission of Another Offense: A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions make it a death-eligible offense for anyone causing the death of another during the course of committing a crime. This offense is nothing more than felony murder. A few capital punishment jurisdictions do not refer to the offense as such, though they adhere to the principles attendant to felony murder. The justification for making homicide during the commission of a crime a death-eligible offense is to try to deter the taking of life when homicide is not the motive of a crime.

Victim-Specific Murder: Almost a majority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide that victim-specific murder is a death-eligible offense. Victim-specific murder refers to the intentional killing of an individual who has been officially recognized by a statute, such as a law enforcement officer, prison official, firefighter, judge, probation officer, or parole officer. Victim-specific murder statutes seek to provide additional protection for the lives of individuals whose occupations expose them to potential revenge by criminals.

Murder-for-Hire: A large minority of capital punishment jurisdictions allow imposition of the death penalty for a homicide committed pursuant to a contract, i.e., exchange of something of pecuniary value for killing another.

Len Bias Murder: On June 18, 1986, University of Maryland

basketball standout Len Bias signed a lucrative contract to play professional basketball with the Boston Celtics. On June 19, 1986, Len Bias was found dead after allegedly ingesting cocaine. The nation was stunned over the way in which the basketball world had lost a promising superstar. Before national outrage reached its peak over the death of Len Bias, another tragedy struck the sports world. On June 27, 1986, Cleveland Browns defensive back Don Rogers was found dead after allegedly ingesting cocaine. After the death of Bias and Rogers, a national call rang out demanding special punishment for drug pushers if death resulted from the use of their drugs. All jurisdictions responded to this call, one way or another, by toughening their drug laws. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions took the ultimate step by enacting specific death-eligible offenses for deaths that occur from the use of illegal drugs.

Drive-By-Shooting Murder: At the height of the Prohibition Era, traffickers in the sale of illegal alcohol were famous for taking the life of competitors by firing machine guns and pistols from vehicles. This brazen public method of handling disputes lost its luster and subsided as a national problem in the 1940s. Drive-by shooting resurfaced as a national problem during the 1990s. The perpetrators of this deadly resurrection are not bootleggers, however. Drug dealers took up this brazen method of handling disputes between themselves. An unfortunate side effect of the current drive-by-shooting problem is that innocent bystanders (too often children) have been gunned down. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have responded to drive-by-shooting murder by making it a death-eligible offense.

Specific-Device Murder: Specific-device murder refers to a homicide committed by means of a prohibited weapon or instrument, such as a bomb or outlawed handgun. A significant minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have addressed specific-device murder by making this crime a death-eligible offense.

Hostage/Human-Shield Murder: Hostage-murder refers to causing the death of a victim who was seized against his or her will for the purpose of obtaining some political goal (or freedom) in exchange for the release of the hostage. The human-shield offense refers to the killing of a person who was used as protection from bullets. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide that hostage-murder and human-shield murder are death-eligible offenses.

Multiple-Victim Murder: Multiple-victim murder refers to the willful and deliberate killing of more than one person as part of the same act or transaction. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide that multiple-victim murder is a death-eligible offense.

Drug-Trafficking Murder: Drug-trafficking murder occurs when the offender has the specific intent to kill or to inflict great bodily harm while engaged in the distribution, exchange, sale, or purchase of a controlled dangerous substance. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made drug-trafficking murder an independent death-eligible offense.

Murder-on-the-Run: Murder-on-the-run occurs when a homicide is committed by a person while escaping or attempting to escape from lawful custody. A significant minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have responded to homicides committed by escaped inmates by making murder-on-the-run a death-eligible offense.

Grave-Risk Murder: The capital offense of grave-risk murder is triggered when unintended victims are endangered by a capital felon's conduct. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made grave-risk murder a death-eligible offense.

Perjury/Subornation of Perjury Murder: The offense of perjury may be defined as giving false testimony, while under oath, in a matter that involves a felony offense. Subornation of perjury, on the other hand, involves inducing another person to testify falsely, while under oath, in a matter that involves a felony or misdemeanor offense. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made perjury murder and subornation of perjury murder death-eligible offenses.

Forced-Suicide Murder: The death-eligible offense of forced-suicide murder is distinguishable from the crime of assisted suicide, though both produce the same result. Assisted suicide involves intentionally or knowingly making an instrument available for someone who wants to commit suicide voluntarily. Forced-suicide murder, on the other hand, involves intentionally compelling someone to commit suicide when the victim does not want to die. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made forced-suicide murder a death-eligible offense.

Perpetrator-Status Murder: Not infrequently, homicide is committed by someone who is on parole or probation, has had a previous homicide conviction, or is incarcerated at the time of the commission of the homicide. In any of the latter situations, the perpetrator has a legally recognizable status, i.e., parolee, probationer, ex-offender, or inmate. The crime of perpetrator-status murder has as its focal point: the particular status of the perpetrator at the time of the commission of a murder. The significance of status, in this context, is that it implies that the person is a threat to society. A large minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have singled out particular statuses and created death-eligible perpetrator-status murder offenses.

Terrorism Murder: Terrorism murder refers to a homicide committed by a person with the intent to intimidate or coerce a civilian population, influence the policy of a unit of government by intimidation or coercion, or affect the conduct of a unit of government by murder, assassination, or kidnapping. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made terrorism murder a death-eligible offense.

Torture-Murder: Torture-murder refers to the infliction of severe physical or mental pain upon a homicide victim while he or she remains alive and conscious. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have isolated torture-murder and made it a death-eligible offense.

Lying-in-Wait Murder: The elements of lying-in-wait murder are (1) concealment of purpose, (2) substantial period of watching and waiting for an opportune time to act, and (3), immediately thereafter, a surprise attack on an unsuspecting victim from a position of advantage. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have isolated lying-in-wait murder and made it a death-eligible offense.

Victim-Age Murder: The age of the victim of homicide, adolescent or senior citizen, has begun to carve out a path as a distinct death-eligible offense. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions currently have some form of a death-eligible victim-age murder statute. See also Aggravating Circumstances; Crimes Not Involving Death

Death Penalty Clinic The Death Penalty Clinic is a program that was started in 2001 at the Boalt Hall School of Law on the campus of the University of California at Berkeley. The mission of the Clinic is to offer a program that helps law students develop the legal skills needed to provide effective representation to defendants facing capital punishment. The students are taught under the direct supervision of the Clinic's faculty, paralegal, and experienced capital defense investigators. The focus of the Clinic's work is representing capital felons in post-conviction proceedings in Alabama and California.

Death Penalty Focus of California Death Penalty Focus of California (DPFC) was founded in 1988. It is a non-profit organization dedicated to the abolition of capital punishment in California through grassroots organizing, research, and the dissemination of information about the death penalty and its alternatives. DPFC publishes and distributes a quarterly newsletter, The Sentry, which provides comprehensive information and editorials on the death penalty on a local, national, and international scale. The organization distributes thousands of pieces of educational materials, such as the California Death Penalty fact sheet and a brochure called, "Myths and Facts About California's Death Penalty." The staff of DPFC participate in numerous speaking engagements before community groups, schools, church groups, and legal and other professional organizations.

Death Penalty Information Center The Death Penalty Information Center is a non-profit organization based in Washington, D.C., and founded in 1990. The primary work of the Center is to serve the media and the public with analysis and information on issues concerning capital punishment. The Center prepares in-depth reports, issues press releases, conducts briefings for journalists, and serves as a resource to those working on this issue. The Center is widely quoted and consulted by all those concerned with the death penalty. The executive director of the Center, Richard C. Dieter, is an attorney who has written and spoken extensively on this subject.

Since its founding, the Center's reports on issues related to the death penalty have received wide attention. The major reports have included Chattahoochee Judicial District: The Buckle of the Death Belt, concerning racism in the administration of capital punishment (1991); Killing Justice: Government Misconduct and the Death Penalty, detailing abuses by prosecutors in pursuing the death penalty (1992); Millions Misspent: What Politicians Don't Say About the High Costs of the Death Penalty, concerning the exorbitant expense of capital punishment (1994); The Future of the Death Penalty in the U.S.A.: Texas-Sized Crisis, pointing to the severe problems in the implementation of the death penalty in Texas and foreshadowing a similar crisis in the rest of the country (1994); On the Front Line: Law Enforcement Views on the Death Penalty, providing the results of a national survey of police chiefs and their view that the death penalty is not an effective law enforcement tool (1995); With Justice for Few: The Growing Crisis in Death Penalty Representation, illustrating the recurrent problem of unprepared and unqualified attorneys handling the most important cases (1995); Killing for Votes: The Dangers of Politicizing the Death Penalty Process, exposing the political use of the death penalty by judges and prosecutors (1996); Innocence and the Death Penalty: The Increasing Danger of Executing the Innocent, an examination of prisoners released from death row due to evidence of their innocence (1997); and The Death Penalty in Black & White: Who Lives, Who Dies, Who Decides, containing the results of two new studies which underscore the continuing injustice of racism in the application of the death penalty (1998).

Death Penalty Moratorium Implementation Project

The Death Penalty Moratorium Implementation Project was created by the American Bar Association in 2001. The Project was created to monitor and promote progress toward a nationwide moratorium on the death penalty. The Project encourages local bar associations to demand death penalty moratoriums in their respective jurisdictions. The Project is also involved with collecting and monitoring information on domestic and international moratorium developments.

Death Penalty Notice see Notice of Intent to Seek Death Penalty

Death Penalty Representation Project The Death Penalty Representation Project (DPRP) was created by the American Bar Association in 1986. The mission of the DPRP is to raise the awareness about the lack of competent representation available to death row inmates. DPRP has addressed this problem by recruiting competent volunteer attorneys, as well as offering the volunteers training and assistance. DPRP has been very successful in providing effective pro bono legal representation to indigent defendants.

Death Row Death row is a phrase used to describe the place of incarceration of defendants sentenced to death. All death row facilities are maintained in maximum-security prisons. For obvious reasons, intense security is the operating principle for maintaining death row inmates.

Although life on death row necessarily varies among institutions, a few generalizations can be made regarding the conditions of death row. Inmates on death row are isolated from the main population of a prison. This isolation includes, for much of the time, keeping death row inmates locked in their cells and away from each other. Institutions do not place more than one death row inmate to a cell.

Death row cells generally comprise one or more wings in a prison. Each cell has a bed, a lavatory, commode, and a mounted writing table. Some institutions permit death row inmates to have cigarettes, food, radios, and televisions in their cells. Most institutions have death watch cells to incarcerate death row inmates after an authorized official signs a death warrant setting the day and time for the execution. A death watch cell is usually larger than a regular death row cell. The death watch cell is usually adjacent to the execution chamber. The inmate remains in the death watch cell until receiving a stay or until escorted to the execution chamber. An inmate on death watch status is allowed a legal and social phone call while on death watch.

Death row inmates are served food three times a day. Some institutions require the meals be served in the cells, while others permit death row inmates to eat in dining halls. Most institutions do not permit them to leave their cells except for medical reasons, exercise, or for scheduled visits with outside visitors. Institutions provide a visiting area inside the prison where inmates and visitors may see and talk to each other, but have no physical contact. Death row inmates may receive mail.

Institutions do not assign prison jobs to death row inmates other than a requirement that they keep their cells clean. Death row inmates have at least one hour per day for exercise. They are escorted in groups to outdoor or indoor exercise areas.

Florida Death Row Information

Death Row and Death Watch Cells:

A Death Row cell is 6 × 9 × 9.5 feet high. Florida State Prison also has Death Watch cells to incarcerate inmates awaiting execution after the Governor signs a death warrant for them. A Death Watch cell is 12 × 7 × 8.5 feet high.

Meals: Death Row inmates are served meals three times a day: at 5:00 A.M., from 10:30 A.M. to 11:00 A.M. and from 4:00 P.M. to 4:30 P.M. Food is prepared by Florida State Prison personnel and is transported in insulated carts to the cells. Inmates are allowed plates and spoons to eat their meals. Prior to execution, an inmate may request a last meal. To avoid extravagance, the food to prepare the last meal must cost no more than $20 and must be purchased locally.

Visitors: Visitors are allowed every weekend from 9 A.M. to 3 P.M. All visitors must be approved by prison officials before being placed on the inmate visitor list. Visitors traveling over 200 miles may visit both Saturday and Sunday. Members of the news media may request Death Row inmate interviews through the Department of Corrections. Inmates must agree to being interviewed. Because of safety and security concerns, the news media may not interview any prison personnel who are involved in executions except for official Department of Corrections spokesmen.

Showers: The inmates may shower every other day.

Security: Death Row inmates are counted at least once an hour. They are escorted in handcuffs and wear them everywhere except in their cells, the exercise yard, and the shower. They are in their cells at all times except for medical reasons, exercise, social or legal visits or media interviews. When a death warrant is signed the inmate is put under Death Watch status and is allowed a legal and social phone call.

Mail, Magazines and Entertainment: Inmates may receive mail every day except holidays and weekends. They may have cigarettes, snacks, radios and black and white televisions in their cells. They do not have cable television or air-conditioning and they are not allowed to be with each other in a common room. They can watch church services on closed circuit television. While on Death Watch, inmates may have radios and black and white televisions positioned outside their cell bars.

Clothing: Death Row inmates can be distinguished from other inmates by their orange t-shirts. Their pants are the same blue colored pants worn by regular inmates.

North Carolina Death Row Information

The Division of Prisons houses male death row inmates in Central Prison and female death row inmates at the North Carolina Correctional Institution for Women. Both prisons are located in Raleigh.

The men are housed in cellblocks of the maximum-security building at Central Prison. One correction officer in a control center watches the inmates at all times. Each cellblock is divided into two wings, each with 16 single cells in two tiers with eight cells on top and eight cells on the bottom. The cells open into a dayroom area that has a television at one end, stainless steel tables in the middle and showers at the other end. Each cell has a bed, a lavatory, commode, and a wall-mounted writing table.

When correction officers begin the prison's count of inmates at six in the morning, the day begins on death row. The death row population spends nearly all their time in either their cells or the adjacent dayroom. They may stay in their dayroom from 7:00 AM until 11:00 PM. While in the dayroom, they may view television.

Confined to their cellblock, death row inmates are not assigned jobs in the prison like other inmates. However, they are required to keep their cells and dayrooms clean.

The death row inmates have at least one hour per day for exercise and showers. Correction officers escort death row inmates in groups from each cellblock wing to outdoor exercise areas, weather permitting, two days a week where the inmates can play basketball, walk or jog. Correction officers also escort the death row inmates by cellblock to the dining halls for each meal.

Death row inmates may receive one visit a week with a maximum of two visitors. There is a visiting area inside the prison where inmates and visitors may see and talk to each other, but they have no physical contact.

Death row inmates may participate in a one-hour Christian worship service each Sunday, or Islamic worship services for one hour each Friday. A Bible study class is also conducted by the prison's chaplain for 90 minutes each Tuesday morning.

If a death row inmate violates Division of Prisons' regulations, the inmate is placed in a segregation cellblock outside of the death row area. He must eat his meals in his cell and is separated from other death row inmates for his daily hour of exercise and shower.

Conditions are similar for women inmates on death row. The women are housed in a cellblock of the maximum-security building at the North Carolina Correctional Institution for Women. Each of the single cells has a bed, lavatory and commode. The seven cells are side by side down a corridor. At the front of the cellblock is a dayroom with a television, table and chairs. This is where the women eat their meals. This room also serves as the visiting area, and all visits are supervised by correctional staff. As a group, the women inmates are given at least an hour daily for exercise and showers. Volunteers provide Sunday worship services on death row. Chaplains are available for counseling.

When a death row inmate exhausts all appeals and the secretary of correction sets an execution date, that inmate — male or female — is moved into the death watch area of Central Prison three to seven days prior to the execution date. The death watch area is adjacent to the execution chamber and is located in the prison's custody control building.

The inmate moves all personal belongings from the death row cell to one of the four cells in the death watch area. Each cell has a bed, lavatory, commode and a wall-mounted writing table.

The cells are side by side and open into a dayroom where there is a table, a television and shower. With the exception of 15 minutes allowed for a shower, the inmate spends the entire day in the cell. A correction sergeant and a correction officer are stationed just outside the cell in the dayroom 24 hours a day.

The inmate may receive visits from his attorney, chaplains, psychologists and others authorized by the Division of Prisons and may receive non-contact family visits in the prison's regular visiting area. An inmate on death watch is not allowed contact with other inmates. The inmate remains in the death watch area until receiving a stay or until escorted to the execution chamber.

Death Warrant A death warrant is an order signed by an authorized official that sets the day and time for a capital felon's death. Once a death warrant is issued, it must be followed by prison officials unless they receive a written judicial or executive order stopping the execution. See also Lambert v. Barrett (II) (See photograph on page 146.)

Issue Presented: Whether the Due Process Clause prohibits requiring a defendant to wear visible shackles during the penalty phase.

Case Holding: The Due Process Clause prohibits requiring a defendant to wear visible shackles during the penalty phase when it is not justified as an essential interest in courtroom security or to prevent escape.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Missouri prosecuted Carman Deck for murdering an elderly couple in 1996. Deck was found guilty and sentenced to death. On appeal, the Missouri Supreme Court affirmed the convictions, but vacated the death sentence and remanded the case for another sentencing proceeding. During the second sentencing proceeding, Deck was required to wear visible leg and hand shackles. Deck objected to being shackled in front of the jury, but the trial judge overruled the objection. At the conclusion of the penalty phase, Deck was again sentenced to death. On appeal, the State Supreme Court rejected Deck's argument concerning the shackles and affirmed the sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Breyer: Justice Breyer held that the Due Process Clause prohibited requiring a defendant to wear visible shackles during the penalty phase of a prosecution, unless it is necessary for special security needs or escape risks. The opinion found that no justification existed for requiring Deck to wear visible shackles:

Missouri claims that the decision of its high court meets the Constitution's requirements in this case. It argues that the Missouri Supreme Court properly found: (1) that the record lacks evidence that the jury saw the restraints; (2) that the trial court acted within its discretion; and, in any event, (3) that the defendant suffered no prejudice. We find these arguments unconvincing.

The first argument is inconsistent with the record in this case, which makes clear that the jury was aware of the shackles. The argument also overstates the Missouri Supreme Court's holding. The court said, "[T]rial counsel made no record of the extent of the jury's awareness of the restraints throughout the penalty phase, and Appellant does not claim that the restraints impeded him from participating in the proceedings." This statement does not suggest that the jury was unaware of the restraints. Rather, it refers to the degree of the jury's awareness, and hence to the kinds of prejudice that might have occurred.

The second argument—that the trial court acted within its discretion—founders on the record's failure to indicate that the trial judge saw the matter as one calling for discretion. The record contains no formal or informal findings. The judge did not refer to a risk of escape—a risk the State has raised in this Court—or a threat to courtroom security. Rather, he gave as his reason for imposing the shackles the fact that Deck already "has been convicted." While he also said that the shackles would "take any fear out of" the juror's "minds," he nowhere explained any special reason for fear. Nor did he explain why, if shackles were necessary, he chose not to provide for shackles that the jury could not see—apparently the arrangement used at trial. If there is an exceptional case where the record itself makes clear that there are indisputably good reasons for shackling, it is not this one.

The third argument fails to take account of this Court's statement in [a prior case] that shackling is "inherently prejudicial." That statement is rooted in our belief that the practice will often have negative effects, but—like the consequences of compelling a defendant to wear prison clothing or of forcing him to stand trial while medicated—those effects cannot be shown from a trial transcript. Thus, where a court, without adequate justification, orders the defendant to wear shackles that will be seen by the jury, the defendant need not demonstrate actual prejudice to make out a due process violation. The State must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the [shackling] error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained.

The decision of the Missouri Supreme Court was reversed and the case was remanded for re-sentencing.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Thomas, in Which Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Thomas dissented from the majority opinion. He argued that there was no constitutional due process right against requiring a defendant to wear visible shackles during sentencing. See also Shackles Delaware The State of Delaware is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on March 29, 1974.

Delaware has a two-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court and courts of general jurisdiction. The Delaware Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called superior courts. Capital offenses against the State of Delaware are tried in the superior courts.

Delaware's capital punishment offenses are set out under Del. Code tit. 11 § 636. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. The person intentionally causes the death of another person;
2. While engaged in the commission of, or attempt to commit, or flight after committing or attempting to commit any felony, the person recklessly causes the death of another person;
3. The person intentionally causes another person to commit suicide by force or duress;
4. The person recklessly causes the death of a law-enforcement officer, corrections employee or firefighter while such officer is in the lawful performance of duties;
5. The person causes the death of another person by the use of or detonation of any bomb or similar destructive device;
6. The person causes the death of another person in order to avoid or prevent the lawful arrest of any person, or in the course of and in furtherance of the commission or attempted commission of escape in the second degree or escape after conviction.

Capital murder in Delaware is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Delaware is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is not required that, at the penalty phase, the jury must unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. This is because the decision of a penalty phase jury is not binding on the trial court under the laws of Delaware. The trial court may accept or reject the jury's determination on punishment, and impose whatever sentence he or she believes the evidence established.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Del. Code tit. 11 § 4209(e) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

- a. The murder was committed by a person in, or who has escaped from, the custody of a law-enforcement officer or place of confinement.
- b. The murder was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing an arrest or for the purpose of effecting an escape from custody.
- c. The murder was committed against any law enforcement officer, corrections employee or firefighter, while such victim was engaged in the performance of official duties.
- d. The murder was committed against a judicial officer, a former judicial officer, Attorney General, former Attorney General, Assistant or Deputy Attorney General or former Assistant or Deputy Attorney General, State Detective or former State Detective, Special Investigator or former Special Investigator, during, or because of, the exercise of an official duty.
- e. The murder was committed against a person who was held or otherwise detained as a shield or hostage.
- f. The murder was committed against a person who was held or detained by the defendant for ransom or reward.
- g. The murder was committed against a person who was a witness to a crime and who was killed for the purpose of preventing the witness's appearance or testimony in any grand jury, criminal or civil proceeding involving such crime, or in retaliation for the witness' appearance or testimony in any grand jury, criminal or civil proceeding involving such crime.

h. The defendant paid or was paid by another person or had agreed to pay or be paid by another person or had conspired to pay or be paid by another person for the killing of the victim.

i. The defendant was previously convicted of another murder or manslaughter or of a felony involving the use of, or threat of, force or violence upon another person.

j. The murder was committed while the defendant was engaged in the commission of, or attempt to commit, or flight after committing or attempting to commit any degree of rape, unlawful sexual intercourse, arson, kidnapping, robbery, sodomy or burglary.

k. The defendant's course of conduct resulted in the deaths of 2 or more persons where the deaths are a probable consequence of the defendant's conduct.

l. The murder was outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman in that it involved torture, depravity of mind, use of an explosive device or poison or the defendant used such means on the victim prior to murdering the victim.

m. The defendant caused or directed another to commit murder or committed murder as an agent or employee of another person.

n. The defendant was under a sentence of life imprisonment, whether for natural life or otherwise, at the time of the commission of the murder.

o. The murder was committed for pecuniary gain.

p. The victim was pregnant.

q. The victim was severely handicapped or severely disabled.

r. The victim was 62 years of age or older.

s. The victim was a child 14 years of age or younger, and the murder was committed by an individual who is at least 4 years older than the victim.

t. At the time of the killing, the victim was or had been a non-governmental informant or had otherwise provided any investigative, law enforcement or police agency with information concerning criminal activity, and the killing was in retaliation for the victim's activities as a non-governmental informant or in providing information concerning criminal activity to an investigative, law enforcement or police agency.

u. The murder was premeditated and the result of substantial planning. Such planning must be as to the commission of the murder itself and not simply as to the commission or attempted commission of any underlying felony.

v. The murder was committed for the purpose of interfering with the victim's free exercise or enjoyment of any right, privilege or immunity protected by the First Amendment to the United States Constitution, or because the victim has exercised or enjoyed said rights, or because of the victim's race, religion, color, disability, national origin or ancestry.

Delaware does not provide by statute any mitigating circumstances to the imposition of the death penalty. Even though the State does not provide statutory mitigating circumstances, the United States Supreme Court has ruled that all relevant mitigating evidence must be allowed at the penalty phase.

Under Delaware's capital punishment statute, the Delaware

Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Delaware uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State also provides that if lethal injection is found unconstitutional then a death sentence may be carried out by hanging. The State's death row facility for men is located in Smyrna, Delaware, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Claymont, Delaware.

Pursuant to the laws of Delaware, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor must obtain the consent of the State's Board of Pardons in order to grant clemency.

Under the laws of Delaware, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Del. Code tit. 11 § 4209(f):

The imposition of a sentence of death shall be upon such terms and conditions as the trial court may impose in its sentence, including the place, the number of witnesses which shall not exceed 10, and conditions of privacy, and shall occur between the hours of 12:01 A.M. and 3:00 A.M. on the date set by the trial court. The trial court shall permit one adult member of the immediate family of the victim, or the victim's designee, to witness the execution of a sentence of death pursuant to the rules of the court, if the family provides reasonable notice of its desire to be so represented.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Delaware executed fourteen capital felons. During this period, Delaware did not execute any female capital felons, although one of its death row inmates during this period was female. A total of seventeen capital felons were on death row in the State as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as six black inmates, eight white inmates, and three Hispanic inmates.

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution requires a penalty phase jury be instructed on a mitigating circumstance for which no evidence was presented.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not require a penalty phase jury be instructed on a mitigating circumstance when no evidence was presented on the matter.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Frederick Lashley, was convicted of capital murder by a jury in the state of Missouri. During the penalty phase of the trial, defense counsel requested the trial court instruct the jury on the mitigating circumstance of “no significant prior criminal history,” i.e., that the defendant had no significant criminal history. However, no evidence was presented to the jury on the defendant’s prior criminal record, so the trial judge refused to give the requested instruction. The defendant was sentenced to death. In affirming the conviction and sentence, the Missouri Supreme Court ruled that Missouri law required mitigating circumstance instructions to be supported by some evidence before they are given to a jury. Subsequently, a federal Court of Appeals vacated the death sentence after holding that the Constitution required that, if the State failed to come forward with evidence of a criminal history, the trial court had to instruct the jury on the mitigating circumstance. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion noted that the Constitution required juries be given instructions on all relevant mitigating circumstances for which evidence was introduced. However, it was ruled that State courts are not obligated by the Constitution to give juries mitigating circumstance instructions when no evidence is offered to support them. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Blackmun, J., Joined: The dissent argued that the majority refused to address one of the critical, dispositive issues presented by the defendant. The defendant contended, during the penalty phase, the Constitution erected a “presumption of innocence” in having committed any other crime. Therefore, when the State does not present any evidence of a criminal history, the law presumes the defendant is innocent of having committed any other crime.

As a result of this presumption, the trial court is required to instruct the penalty phase jury on the mitigating circumstance even though the defendant did not present any evidence on the issue. It was reasoned by Justice Stevens that “[t]he mitigating factor in question corresponds precisely to the presumption of innocence. When the trial record reveals no prior criminal history at all, the presumption serves as ‘a prima facie case, and in that sense it is, temporarily, the substitute or equivalent for evidence,’ that a criminal defendant is blameless in spite of his indictment, and that, even after conviction of one crime, he is presumptively innocent of all other crimes.” Therefore, Justice Stevens would affirm the Court of Appeals decision.

Case Note: Although the decision in the case was a per curiam opinion, it has had a significant impact on the penalty phase of capital prosecutions. The decision places a burden on capital defendants to come forward with some evidence on all relevant mitigating circumstances or else they will not have the jury instructed to consider the matter for which no evidence was proffered. The decision has been criticized along the lines of Justice Stevens’ dissent. See also Bell v. Ohio; Eddings v. Oklahoma; Hitchcock v. Dugger; Lockett v. Ohio; Mitigating Circumstances; Skipper v. South Carolina

Demonstrative Evidence Demonstrative evidence refers to evidence presented at a trial solely to help demonstrate some issue in dispute, but is not to be used by the jury in determining a defendant’s guilt or innocence. For example, a prosecutor or defendant may use a map to show the location of an event in helping the jury understand some issue in the trial, but the map would not constitute evidence for the jury to consider during its deliberations.

Demosthenes v. Baal Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Demosthenes v. Baal, 495 U.S. 731 (1990); Argued: Not reported; Decided: June 3, 1990; Opinion of the Court: Per Curiam; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Brennan, in which Marshall, J. joined; Dissenting Statement: Justice Blackmun and Stevens, J.; Appellate Defense Counsel: Not reported; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: Not reported; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: Not reported Issue Presented: Whether the defendant’s parents made a proper showing that the defendant was not competent to give up his rights to seek post-conviction relief from his death sentence.

Case Holding: The defendant’s parents failed to make a proper showing that the defendant was not competent to give up his rights to seek post-conviction relief from his death sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Thomas Baal, pled guilty to capital murder and was sentenced to death by a Nevada court. On direct appeal, the Nevada Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant initiated State post-conviction habeas corpus proceedings, but subsequently withdrew his request for post-conviction relief. A hearing was held by a State court to determine his competency to make the decision not to continue the proceedings and to determine if he was aware of his impending execution and the reason for it. The court reviewed psychiatric reports and other evidence and held that the defendant was sane and had made an intelligent waiver of his right to pursue post-conviction relief.

A few hours before the defendant’s scheduled execution, his parents filed a petition for federal habeas corpus relief as his “next friend,” contending that the defendant was not competent to waive federal review of his conviction and sentence. A federal district court denied their application for a stay of execution, holding that it had no jurisdiction to entertain the petition. The district court found that, based on the record before the State court, the defendant was legally competent. A federal Court of Appeals reversed the decision, ruling that the defendant’s parents had made a minimum showing of his incompetence, warranting a basis for a full evidentiary hearing by the district court. The State of Nevada asked the United States Supreme Court to vacate the order of the Court of Appeals granting a stay of the execution of the defendant.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion ruled that no adequate basis for the exercise of federal power existed in the case. It was said that the prerequisite for litigating as a “next friend” is that the real party in interest be unable to litigate his or her own cause due to mental incapacity. The opinion held that this prerequisite was not satisfied where an evidentiary hearing shows that a defendant has given a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver of his or her right to proceed. The Court found the prerequisite was not satisfied in the case. The reasoning and conclusion of the Court were stated as follows:

A state court’s determinations on the merits of a factual issue are entitled to a presumption of correctness on federal habeas review. A federal court may not overturn such determinations unless it concludes that they are not “fairly supported by the record.” We have held that a state court’s conclusion regarding a defendant’s competency is entitled to such a presumption. In this case, the state court’s conclusion that Baal was competent to waive his right to further proceedings was “fairly supported by the record.” Three psychiatrists who examined Baal had determined he was competent; a psychiatrist who had the opportunity to observe and talk to Baal testified that Baal was competent at the hearing; and the trial court concluded that Baal was competent after both observing Baal and questioning him extensively on the record. Accordingly, under [the] presumption of correctness, the state court’s factual finding as to Baal’s competence is binding on a federal habeas court.

We realize that last minute petitions from parents of death row inmates may often be viewed sympathetically. But federal courts are authorized by the federal habeas statutes to interfere with the course of state proceedings only in specified circumstances. Before granting a stay, therefore, federal courts must make certain that an adequate basis exists for the exercise of federal power. In this case, that basis was plainly lacking. The State is entitled to proceed without federal intervention. Accordingly, we grant the State’s motion to vacate the stay entered by the Court of Appeals.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, J. Joined: Justice Brennan dissented from the Court’s decision to vacate the stay. He believed the record in the case was insufficiently developed for the Court to interfere with the ruling of the Court of Appeals. Justice Brennan stated his position as follows:

The Court today vacates a stay of execution that the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit had entered so that it might consider the case in an orderly fashion. For the second time within the span of only a few weeks, this Court has seen fit to interfere with the administration of justice by the lower federal courts by vacating a stay issued in the sound discretion of judges who are much more familiar with the cases than we are. I find this development unfortunate and distressing.

The Court’s action in the instant case is particularly unwise. The Court of Appeals issued the stay so that it could consider Mr. Baal’s first federal habeas petition, filed on his behalf by his parents in their capacity as next friends. It is wholly inappropriate to deny the court an opportunity to consider the case at such an early stage of the collateral review process....

The fact that a state court held an evidentiary hearing one week ago and determined that Mr. Baal was competent offers no support for the Court's action today.... A state court's determination of subsidiary facts may enjoy a presumption of correctness in whatever federal hearing is held. This does not answer the antecedent question, however, whether an evidentiary hearing in federal court is warranted on the basis of the factual allegations made in the federal habeas petition. In addition, of course, the state court's findings would receive deference only if the state hearing provided a full and fair opportunity for resolution of the issue. Because the proceedings in this case have been so hurried, it is not at all clear that the state hearing was "full and fair" and that the findings are supported by the record.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Blackmun and Stevens, J.:

Justices Blackmun and Stevens issued a joint dissenting statement indicating they would deny the application to vacate the stay.

Deposition A deposition refers to testimony given out of court, but under conditions that would permit its use at trial. A deposition may be through video recording or transcribed testimony. The use of deposition testimony in criminal trials is discouraged, though situations arise where it becomes necessary. The primary impediment to deposition testimony at a criminal trial, proffered by the prosecutor, is that a defendant has a constitutional right to confront his or her accusers in open court.

The basic rules for conducting depositions are fairly standard. The guidelines for depositions used in federal prosecutions provide an illustration of the deposition process.

Depositions under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure:

a. When Taken. Whenever, due to exceptional circumstances of the case, it is in the interest of justice that the testimony of a prospective witness of a party be taken and preserved for use at trial, the court may upon motion of such party and notice to the parties order that testimony of such witness be taken by deposition and that any designated book, paper, document, record, recording, or other material not privileged be produced at the same time and place. If a witness is detained pursuant to Federal law, the court on written motion of the witness and upon notice to the parties may direct that the witness' deposition be taken. After the deposition has been subscribed the court may discharge the witness.

b. Notice of Taking. The party at whose instance a deposition is to be taken shall give to every party reasonable written notice of the time and place for taking the deposition. The notice shall state the name and address of each person to be examined. On motion of a party upon whom the notice is served, the court for cause shown may extend or shorten the time or change the place for taking the deposition. The officer having custody of a defendant shall be notified of the time and place set for the examination and shall, unless the defendant waives in writing the right to be present, produce the defendant at the examination and keep the defendant in the presence of the witness during the examination, unless, after being warned by the court that disruptive conduct will cause the defendant's removal from the place of the taking of the deposition, the defendant persists in conduct which is such as to justify exclusion from that place. A defendant not in custody shall have the right to be present at the examination upon request subject to such terms as may be fixed by the court, but a failure, absent good cause shown, to appear after notice and tender of expenses in accordance with subdivi-

c. Payment of Expenses. Whenever a deposition is taken at the instance of the government, or whenever a deposition is taken at the instance of a defendant who is unable to bear the expenses of the taking of the deposition, the court may direct that the expense of travel and subsistence of the defendant and the defendant's attorney for attendance at the examination and the cost of the transcript of the deposition shall be paid by the government.

d. How Taken. Subject to such additional conditions as the court shall provide, a deposition shall be taken and filed in the manner provided in civil actions except as otherwise provided in these rules, provided that (1) in no event shall a deposition be taken of a party defendant without that defendant's consent, and (2) the scope and manner of examination and cross-examination shall be such as would be allowed in the trial itself. The government shall make available to the defendant or the defendant's counsel for examination and use at the taking of the deposition any statement of the witness being deposed which is in the possession of the government and to which the defendant would be entitled at the trial.

e. Use. At the trial or upon any hearing, a part or all of a deposition, so far as otherwise admissible under the rules of evidence, may be used as substantive evidence if the witness is unavailable, or the witness gives testimony at the trial or hearing inconsistent with that witness' deposition. Any deposition may also be used by any party for the purpose of contradicting or impeaching the testimony of the deponent as a witness. If only a part of a deposition is offered in evidence by a party, an adverse party may require the offering of all of it which is relevant to the part offered and any party may offer other parts.

f. Objections to Deposition Testimony. Objections to deposition testimony or evidence or parts thereof and the grounds for the objection shall be stated at the time of the taking of the deposition.

g. Deposition by Agreement Not Precluded. Nothing in this rule shall preclude the taking of a deposition, orally or upon written questions, or the use of a deposition, by agreement of the parties with the consent of the court.

Discovery The term "discovery" is a legal technical word. Discovery is a legal device that permits a defendant and prosecutor to learn the nature of the evidence each will present at trial before the trial begins. The basic idea behind discovery is that neither party should be surprised about what evidence will be introduced at trial. Discovery also serves as a mechanism for encouraging plea agreements. That is, a defendant will be more willing to enter a plea agreement if he or she learns before trial that the prosecutor has strong evidence against him or her. Also, a prosecutor is more likely to seek dismissal of charges if it is learned that the defendant has strong evidence to show his or her innocence.

Generally, discovery must occur before trial. However, in capital prosecutions, discovery may occur at the guilt phase and the penalty phase. Unlike typical criminal prosecutions, the penalty phase of a capital prosecution utilizes witnesses and other evidence. Consequently, courts permit discovery to occur for the penalty phase.

The basic rules for conducting discovery are fairly uniform. The discovery rules used in federal prosecutions provide an illustration of the discovery process.

Federal Discovery Rules:

a. Governmental Disclosure of Evidence

1. Information Subject to Disclosure.

A. Statement of Defendant. Upon request of a defendant, the government must disclose to the defendant and make available for inspection, copying, or photographing: Any relevant written or recorded statements made by the defendant, or copies thereof, within the possession, custody, or control of the government, the existence of which is known, or by the exercise of due diligence may become known, to the attorney for the government; that portion of any written record containing the substance of any relevant oral statement made by the defendant whether before or after arrest in response to interrogation by any person then known to the defendant to be a government agent; and recorded testimony of the defendant before a grand jury which relates to the offense charged. The government must also disclose to the defendant the substance of any other relevant oral statement made by the defendant whether before or after arrest in response to interrogation by any person then known by the defendant to be a government agent if the government intends to use that statement at trial. Upon request of a defendant which is an organization such as a corporation, partnership, association or labor union, the government must disclose to the defendant any of the foregoing statements made by a person who the government contends (1) was, at the time of making the statement, so situated as a director, officer, employee, or agent as to have been able legally to bind the defendant in respect to the subject of the statement, or (2) was, at the time of the offense, personally involved in the alleged conduct constituting the offense and so situated as a director, officer, employee, or agent as to have been able legally to bind the defendant in respect to that alleged conduct in which the person was involved.

B. Defendant's Prior Record. Upon request of the defendant, the government shall furnish to the defendant such copy of the defendant's prior criminal record, if any, as is within the possession, custody, or control of the government, the existence of which is known, or by the exercise of due diligence may become known, to the attorney for the government.

C. Documents and Tangible Objects. Upon request of the defendant the government shall permit the defendant to inspect and copy or photograph books, papers, documents, photographs, tangible objects, buildings or places, or copies or portions thereof, which are within the possession, custody or control of the government, and which are material to the preparation of the defendant's defense or are intended for use by the government as evidence in chief at the trial, or were obtained from or belong to the defendant.

D. Reports of Examinations and Tests. Upon request of a defendant the government shall permit the defendant to inspect and copy or photograph any results or reports of physical or mental examinations, and of scientific tests or experiments, or copies thereof, which are within the possession, custody, or control of the government, the existence of which is known, or by the exercise of due diligence may become known, to the attorney for the government, and which are material to the preparation of the defense or are intended for use by the government as evidence in chief at the trial.

E. Expert Witnesses. At the defendant's request, the government shall disclose to the defendant a written summary of testimony the government intends to use during its case in chief at trial. If the government requests discovery and the defendant complies, the government shall, at the defendant's request, disclose to the defendant a written summary of testimony the government intends to use at trial on the issue of the defendant's mental condition. The summary provided under this subdivision shall describe the witnesses' opinions, the bases and the reasons for those opinions, and the witnesses' qualifications.

2. Information Not Subject to Disclosure. Except as provided by this rule, this rule does not authorize the discovery or inspection of reports, memoranda, or other internal government documents made by the attorney for the government or any other government agent investigating or prosecuting the case. Nor does the rule authorize the discovery or inspection of statements made by government witnesses or prospective government witnesses except as otherwise provided by statute.

3. Grand Jury Transcripts. Except as provided by other rules, this rule does not relate to discovery or inspection of recorded proceedings of a grand jury.

b. The Defendant's Disclosure of Evidence.

1. Information Subject to Disclosure.

A. Documents and Tangible Objects. If the defendant requests disclosure under this rule, upon compliance with such request by the government, the defendant, on request of the government, shall permit the government to inspect and copy or photograph books, papers, documents, photographs, tangible objects, or copies or portions thereof, which are within the possession, custody, or control of the defendant and which the defendant intends to introduce as evidence in chief at the trial.

B. Reports of Examinations and Tests. If the defendant requests disclosure under this rule, upon compliance with such request by the government, the defendant, on request of the government, shall permit the government to inspect and copy or photograph any results or reports of physical or mental examinations and of scientific tests or experiments made in connection with the particular case, or copies thereof, within the possession or control of the defendant, which the defendant intends to introduce as evidence in chief at the trial or which were prepared by a witness whom the defendant intends to call at the trial when the results or reports relate to that witness' testimony.

C. Expert Witnesses. Under the following circumstances, the defendant shall, at the government's request, disclose to the government a written summary of testimony that the defendant intends to use as evidence at trial: (i) if the defendant requests disclosure under this rule and the government complies, or (ii) if the defendant has given notice of an intent to present expert testimony on the defendant's mental condition. This summary shall describe the witnesses' opinions, the bases and reasons for those opinions, and the witnesses' qualifications.

2. Information Not Subject to Disclosure. Except as to scientific or medical reports, this subdivision does not authorize the discovery or inspection of reports, memoranda, or other internal defense documents made by the defendant, or the defendant's attorneys or agents in connection with the investigation or defense of the case, or of statements made by the defendant, or by government or defense witnesses, or by prospective government or defense witnesses, to the defendant, the defendant's agents or attorneys.

c. Continuing Duty to Disclose.

If, prior to or during trial, a party discovers additional evidence or material previously requested or ordered, which is subject to discovery or inspection under this rule, such party shall promptly notify the other party or that other party's attorney or the court of the existence of the additional evidence or material.

d. Regulation of Discovery.

1. Protective and Modifying Orders. Upon a sufficient showing the court may at any time order that the discovery or inspection be denied, restricted, or deferred, or make such other order as is appropriate. Upon motion by a party, the court may permit the party to make such showing, in whole or in part, in the form of a written statement to be inspected by the judge alone. If the court enters an order granting relief following such an ex parte showing, the entire text of the party's statement shall be sealed and preserved in the records of the court to be made available to the appellate court in the event of an appeal.

2. Failure to Comply with a Request. If at any time during the course of the proceedings it is brought to the attention of the court that a party has failed to comply with this rule, the court may order such party to permit the discovery or inspection, grant a continuance, or prohibit the party from introducing evidence not disclosed, or it may enter such other order as it deems just under the circumstances. The court may specify the time, place and manner of making the discovery and inspection and may prescribe such terms and conditions as are just.

Discrimination Aggravator Killing someone because of his/her race, sex, or religion is a statutory aggravating circumstance. Four capital punishment jurisdictions, California, Colorado, Delaware and Nevada, have made such conduct a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon killed someone because of the victim's race, sex, or religion. See also Aggravating Circumstances Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection A criminal defendant is denied the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution if he or she is indicted by a grand jury or tried by a petit jury from which members of his or her race, gender, or religion have been excluded because of their race, gender, or religion. Procedures used to select grand or petit juries may not systematically exclude persons because of their race, gender, or religion.

A claim of discrimination in grand or petit jury selection cannot be sustained on bare allegations. A defendant must present evidence in support of the claim.

During the early history of the development of capital punishment jurisprudence, the United States Supreme Court was called upon on numerous occasions to address the issue of racial discrimination in the composition of grand and petit juries. Beginning with the decision in Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303 (1879), the Supreme Court has been inflexible in holding that, because of the finality of capital punishment prosecutions, racial discrimination cannot be tolerated in the selection of grand or petit juries. The Supreme Court pointed out in the case of Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), that a three-part procedure is used in order for a defendant to show that a prosecutor used peremptory strikes to remove potential jurors because of their race. First, a defendant must make a prima facie showing that a peremptory strike was made based upon race. Second, if such a showing is made, the prosecutor must come forward and offer a race-neutral basis for striking the juror. Third, the trial court must determine, based upon the parties' submission, whether the defendant has demonstrated intentional discrimination. See also Akins v. Texas; *Arnold v. Disposal of Executed Corpse There are five statutorily recognized dispositions for the bodies of executed capital felons. Each disposition is presented below.

1. Permit Relatives to Take the Corpse: Fifteen capital punishment jurisdictions provide by statute that the corpse of an executed felon is to be turned over to a requesting relative. Six of those jurisdictions go so far as to pay the cost of shipping the corpse to a requesting relative, at the last residence of the capital felon.

2. Permit a Friend to Take the Corpse: The statutes in eleven capital punishment jurisdictions provide that the corpse of an executed felon may be turned over to a requesting friend. In this situation, the corpse would only be given to a friend of the capital felon if no relative made a request for the corpse.

3. An Entity Designated by the Capital Felon: Currently, only two capital punishment jurisdictions provide by statute that the corpse of an executed felon may be turned over to an entity designated by the capital felon prior to execution. This type of disposal gives the option of having the corpse sent to a medical facility for research.

4. Unclaimed Corpse Donated to Medical Center: The statutes in five capital punishment jurisdictions provide that the corpse of a capital felon may be turned over to a medical center for research. This type of disposal is only triggered if neither relatives nor friends of the capital felon request the corpse.

5. Unclaimed Corpse Buried by the Jurisdiction: If no claim is made for the corpse of an executed capital felon, the statutes in fourteen capital punishment jurisdictions provide for burial by the jurisdiction. These statutes also provide that the cost of burial is borne by the jurisdiction.

Disrupting Government Function Aggravator The 1995 Oklahoma bombing incident can be viewed from many perspectives. One of those perspectives includes disruption of a governmental function. That is, the deaths that occurred in the bombing resulted from efforts to disrupt the federal governmental operations that took place in the building that was bombed. Seven capital punishment jurisdictions, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Mississippi, Nebraska, North Carolina, and Utah, have made disruption of a government function a statutory aggravating circumstance when death results therefrom. Consequently, in those jurisdictions, the death penalty may be imposed if this aggravator is found to exist in the commission of a capital offense. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Dissenting Opinion When a justice on an appellate court does not agree with the outcome of a case, as decided by the majority on the appellate court, he or she may issue a dissenting opinion. A dissenting opinion expresses the individual view of a justice on how the majority should have decided a case. Dissenting opinions are not binding or controlling authority on any lower court. It is not uncommon, however, for a dissenting opinion to be adopted in a later case by the majority on an appellate court. See also Concurring Opinion; Majority Opinion; Per Curiam Opinion; Plurality Opinion

District of Columbia The death penalty is not carried out by the District of Columbia. The last execution in the District of Columbia was in 1957.

DNA Evidence DNA is the abbreviation for deoxyribonucleic acid. DNA is the genetic material present in the nucleus of cells in all living organisms. DNA has been referred to as the "blueprint of life" because it contains all of the information required to make an organism grow and develop. Researchers have found that the majority of the DNA is identical from one human to another, but there are locations in the DNA that have been found to differ from one individual to another, with the exception of twins. These locations are the regions of DNA that are used to compare the DNA obtained from an unknown evidence sample to the DNA of a known individual in DNA identification testing.

There are three basic types of DNA tests: (1) Restriction Fragment Length Polymorphism Testing; (2) Polymerase Chain Reaction Testing — Nuclear DNA; and (3) Polymerase Chain Reaction Testing — Mitochondrial DNA. While there are different types of DNA testing done, a few basic steps are performed regardless of the type of test used. The general procedure includes (1) isolating the DNA from an evidence sample containing DNA of unknown origin; (2) processing the DNA so that test results may be obtained; (3) determination of the DNA test results from specific regions of the DNA; and (4) comparison and interpretation of the test results to determine whether the known individual is excluded as the source of the DNA or is included as a possible source of the DNA.

DNA samples may be taken from liquid blood or bloodstains, liquid saliva or saliva stains, liquid semen or dried semen stains, pieces of tissue or skin, fingernails, plucked and shed hairs, bone, teeth, fingernails, and tissues from internal organs (including brain).

In 1986, the first known use of DNA to solve a criminal identification occurred in Narborough, England. Authorities there had arrested a seventeen-year-old mentally disturbed youth for a rape/murder incident. Approximately three months after the youth confessed to the crime, authorities used DNA testing to apprehend the true perpetrator. DNA was first introduced into evidence in a United States court in 1986. In little more than a decade, DNA testing became the foremost forensic technique for identifying criminals, eliminating suspects, and freeing innocently convicted defendants. See also Actual Innocence Claim; Innocence Protection Act of 2004

Dobbert v. Florida Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Dobbert v. Florida, 432 U.S. 282 (1977); Argued: March 28, 1977; Decided: June 17, 1977; Opinion of the Court: Justice Rehnquist; Concurring Opinion: Chief Justice Burger; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Stevens, in which Brennan and Marshall, JJ., joined; Dissenting Statement: Justice Brennan and Marshall, J.; Appellate Defense Counsel: Louis O. Frost, Jr., argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Charles W. Musgrove argued; Robert L. Issue Presented: Whether procedural changes to Florida's death penalty law, which were not enacted at the time of the commission of the defendant's capital crime, could be applied to the defendant consistent with the Ex Post Facto Clause.

Case Holding: Procedural changes to Florida's death penalty law, which were not enacted at the time of the commission of the defendant's capital crime, may be applied to the defendant consistent with the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Florida convicted the defendant, Ernest Dobbert, of capital murder. During the penalty phase of the prosecution, the jury recommended life imprisonment, but the trial judge rejected the recommendation and imposed a sentence of death. On appeal to the Florida Supreme Court, the defendant contended that his conviction and sentence violated the Ex Post Facto Clause of the federal Constitution on the grounds that the death penalty statute under which he was prosecuted was not enacted at the time of the commission of his offense. Specifically, the defendant argued that under the old law, which was invalid under Furman v. Georgia, the trial judge could not reject a jury's decision on punishment. The State's appellate court rejected the defendant's claim and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist held that the defendant's conviction and sentence did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. The opinion reasoned that the changes in the death penalty statute between the time of the murder and the time of the trial were procedural and on the whole ameliorative. It was said that the new statute simply altered the methods employed in determining whether the death penalty was to be imposed, but there was no change in the quantum of punishment attached to the crime. Further, Justice Rehnquist indicated that the existence of the earlier statute at the time of the murder served as an operative fact to "warn" the defendant of the penalty which Florida would seek to impose on him if he were convicted of murder. The opinion pointed out that this was sufficient compliance with the ex post facto provision of the Constitution, notwithstanding the subsequent invalidation of the statute. Justice Rehnquist concluded, "Even though it may work to the disadvantage of a defendant, a procedural change is not ex post facto." The judgment of the Florida Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice concurred in the Court's decision. The concurring opinion stated: "A crucial factor in this case, for me, is that, as the Court's opinion recites, when [the defendant] committed the crime, a Florida statute permitted the death penalty for the offense. [The defendant] was at least constructively on notice that this penalty might indeed follow his actions. During the time which elapsed between the commission of the offense and the trial, the statute was changed to provide different procedures for determining whether death was an appropriate punishment. But these new procedures, taken as a whole, were, if anything, more favorable to the [defendant]; consequently the change cannot be read otherwise than as the Court's opinion suggests."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Brennan and Marshall, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented from the majority opinion on the grounds that the Court's decision was reached after altering the meaning of the Ex Post Facto Clause. The dissent argued as follows:

The Court holds that Florida may apply this law to [the defendant] without violating the Ex Post Facto Clause. In its view, the unconstitutional law which was on the Florida statute books at the time of the offense "clearly indicated Florida's view of the severity of murder and of the degree of punishment which the legislature wished to impose upon murderers." The Court concludes that the "fair warning" provided by the invalid statute "was sufficient compliance with the ex post facto provision of the United States Constitution."

This conclusion represents a clear departure from the test the Court has applied in past cases construing the Ex Post Facto Clause....

Fair warning cannot be the touchstone, for two reasons. First, "fair warning" does not provide a workable test for deciding particular cases. Second, ... fair notice is not the only important value underlying the constitutional prohibition; the Ex Post Facto Clause also provides a basic protection against improperly motivated or capricious legislation.

It ensures that the sovereign will govern impartially and that it will be perceived as doing so. The Court's "fair warning" test, if it extends beyond this case, would allow government action that is just the opposite of impartial. If that be so, the "fair warning" rationale will defeat the very purpose of the Clause....

Because a logical application of the Court's "fair warning" rationale would lead to such manifestly intolerable results, I assume that this case will ultimately be regarded as nothing more than an archaic gargoyle. It is nevertheless distressing to witness such a demeaning construction of a majestic bulwark in the framework of our Constitution.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Brennan and Marshall, J.: Justices Brennan and Marshall issued a joint dissenting statement indicating that they adhered to their "views that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."

Issue Presented: Whether the "law of the case doctrine" prevents a federal appellate court from revisiting a previously decided issue when manifest injustice would result from failing to revisit the issue.

Case Holding: The "law of the case doctrine" does not prevent a federal appellate court from revisiting a previously decided issue when manifest injustice would result from failing to do so.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Wilburn Dobbs, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the State of Georgia. After the defendant exhausted his State post-conviction remedies, he filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The defendant alleged ineffective assistance of counsel at the penalty phase of his trial. In rejecting the defendant's claim, the district court was forced to rely upon representations by defense counsel regarding his trial performance because the penalty phase transcript was not available. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's decision.

After the Court of Appeals affirmed the denial of relief, the defendant located a transcript of the penalty phase proceedings which contradicted defense counsel's account of what occurred at the proceeding. At the time of the discovery of the transcript, the Court of Appeals was reviewing another matter presented to it by the defendant. Consequently, the defendant motioned the Court of Appeals to supplement the appellate record with the transcript. The Court of Appeals denied his motion to supplement the appellate record with the transcript. The Court of Appeals reasoned that the "law of the case doctrine" prevented it from revisiting its prior rejection of the ineffective assistance claim. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion held that the Court of Appeals erred by refusing to consider the sentencing hearing transcript. It said that the transcript was no doubt relevant because it called into serious question the factual predicate on which the lower courts relied in deciding the defendant's ineffective assistance claim. The Court rejected the assertion that the law of the case doctrine precluded the Court of Appeals from revisiting the issue. It was said that the manifest injustice exception to the law of the case doctrine allowed the Court of Appeals to revisit the issue. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's judgment. He wrote as follows: "Today's judgment reverses the decision below on the grounds that, in deciding not to apply the 'manifest injustice' exception to the law of the case, the Court of Appeals wrongfully failed to consider a newly discovered transcript from [the defendant's] trial. The judgment is correct, but the judgment is also not worth making, serving no purpose but to extend the scandalous delay in the execution of a death sentence lawfully pronounced more than 18 years ago." See also Law of the Case Doctrine Dominica The death penalty is permitted in the island nation of Dominica. Dominica uses hanging as the method of execution. Its legal system is based on English common law. The nation's constitution was adopted on November 3, 1978. Dominica is a parliamentary democracy and a member of the Commonwealth of Nations. The structure of the government includes an executive branch, a unicameral legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

The judicial system is composed of a high court and magistrate courts. Appeals may be made to the Supreme Court of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States and to the judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. Under the laws of Dominica, criminal trials are public and defendants are presumed innocent, are allowed legal counsel, and have the right to appeal. Free legal counsel is provided to indigent defendants only in capital cases. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Dominican Republic The Dominican Republic abolished the death penalty in 1966. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Double-Counting Aggravators see Rule Against Double-Counting Aggravators

Double Jeopardy Clause The Fifth Amendment to the federal Constitution declares that no person shall "be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." The constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy was designed to protect an individual from being subjected to the hazards of trial and possible conviction more than once for an alleged offense. Under the common law, double jeopardy was grounded in the plea of autrefois acquit or convict (former acquittal or conviction), which represented the universal maxim that no person was to be brought into jeopardy of his or her life more than once for the same offense.

The principle of autrefois was part of the legal tradition of the American colonies. The Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641, a compilation of legal principles taken from the common law and English statutes, provided: "No man shall be twice sentenced by Civill Justice for one and the same Crime, offence, or Trespasse," and that "Everie Action betweene partie and partie, and proceedings against delinquents in Criminall causes shall be briefly and distinctly entered on the Rolles of every Court by the Recorder thereof. That such actions be not afterwards brought againe to the vexation of any man."

Although the colonists were aware of principles against double jeopardy from the common law and English Statutes, New York was the lone jurisdiction to propose an amendment to the Constitution that included a prohibition against double jeopardy. The bill of rights adopted at the New York convention and transmitted to Congress included a declaration that "no Person ought to be put twice in Jeopardy of Life or Limb for one and the same Offence, nor, unless in case of impeachment, be punished more than once for the same Offence."

James Madison was influenced by New York's Double Jeopardy Clause when he drafted the constitutional amendments to be proposed to the States. The words Madison introduced into the House of Representatives were: "No person shall be subject, except in cases of impeachment, to more than one punishment or one trial for the same offence." The double jeopardy principle worded by Madison caused some concern. Representatives feared that, as proposed by Madison, double jeopardy might be taken to prohibit a second trial of a defendant who had his or her conviction reversed on appeal. Representative Benson of New York argued that the double jeopardy principle had to express the idea "that no man's life should be more than once put in jeopardy for the same offence; yet it was well known, that they were entitled to more than one trial." The provision that was ratified as part of the Fifth Amendment was substantially in the language used by Representative Benson.

Under Anglo-American jurisprudence, the Double Jeopardy Clause has been interpreted as protecting against (1) a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal, (2) a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction, and (3) multiple punishments for the same offense.

Under double jeopardy principles, when the same criminal act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not. If additional proof is not required, then the two offenses are the same and double jeopardy may prohibit dual punishment.

A capital penalty phase proceeding has been deemed comparable to a trial on the issue of guilt, thereby making the Double Jeopardy Clause relevant to such proceeding. The Double Jeopardy Clause bars imposition of the death penalty on a defendant being re-sentenced after an initial life imprisonment sentence was set aside on appeal. See also Arizona v. Rumsey; Bill of Rights; Bullington v. Missouri; Poland v. Arizona; Sattazahn v. Pennsylvania; Seeking Death Penalty After Conviction Reversed; Stroud v. United States

Douglas, William O. William O. Douglas served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1939 to 1975. While on the Supreme Court, Douglas was known as a progressive thinker who sought to expand the reach of the Constitution for the protection of individual freedoms from government control.

Douglas was born in Maine, Minnesota, on October 16, 1898.

Douglas graduated from Whitman College in 1920. He went on to attend Columbia Law School where he graduated in 1925. Douglas's resume included teaching at the law schools of Columbia and Yale, as well as an appointment to the Securities and Exchange Commission. In 1939, President Franklin D. Roosevelt nominated Douglas to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Douglas wrote numerous capital punishment opinions. The capital punishment opinion that he was best known for involved his dissent in Rosenberg v. United States. The Rosenberg case brought about a great deal of controversy for Douglas because he granted a stay of execution of the death sentences of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg based upon an appeal by a person not involved in the case. The majority on the Supreme Court lifted the stay. Douglas dissented and defended his decision to issue the temporary stay. He also argued strenuously in Rosenberg that the trial court in the case did not have authority to impose death sentences in the case. He denounced the majority for denying relief to the defendants on the grounds that the issue argued on appeal was never raised previously: "A suggestion is made that the question comes too late, that since the Rosenbergs did not raise this question on appeal, they are barred from raising it now. But the question of an unlawful sentence is never barred. No man or woman should go to death under an unlawful sentence merely because his lawyer failed to raise the point. It is that function among others that the Great Writ serves." Douglas died on January 18, 1980.

Drive-by-Shooting Aggravator In five capital punishment jurisdictions, California, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, and Washington, drive-by-shooting that results in the death of the victim is a statutory aggravating circumstance. As such, the death penalty may be imposed if the penalty phase jury determines that the victim was killed as a result of the defendant shooting from inside a moving vehicle. This aggravator was prompted by drug related drive-by shootings. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Drug-Trafficking Aggravator The proliferation of illegal drugs in the nation has brought the 1930s-style gang warfare back onto the American stage. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions — Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Virginia and the federal government — have responded to drug-related killings by making murder committed during the course of drug trafficking a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, if the penalty phase jury determines a defendant committed murder during the course of trafficking in drugs, the death penalty may be imposed. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Dual Sovereignty Under the dual sovereignty doctrine, when a defendant in a single act violates the law of two sovereign jurisdictions, he or she has committed two distinct offenses and may be prosecuted by both jurisdictions. For constitutional purposes, the United States government and each of the fifty State governments are sovereign jurisdictions. A political subdivision of a State is not a sovereign jurisdiction.

In the context of capital punishment, the dual sovereignty doctrine permits the death penalty to be imposed on a defendant in two jurisdictions for the murder of one victim. This may occur where sufficient acts take place in both jurisdictions concerning the murder, though the victim actually dies in only one of the jurisdictions.

Under federal law, a capital offense that is committed solely on Native American land must be prosecuted by the governing tribal authority unless such authority has consented to prosecution outside of its jurisdiction. Native Americans are subject to capital prosecution like anyone else for murder committed outside of Native American territory. See also Crossley v. California; Heath v. Alabama; Native Americans and Capital Punishment

Due Process Clause The phrase "due process" appears in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the federal Constitution. Due process as it appears in the Fifth Amendment — applicable only against the federal government — was ratified on December 15, 1791. Due process as it appears in the Fourteenth Amendment — applicable against the States — was ratified on July 9, 1868.

The Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause provides that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause provides that "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The legal significance of the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause is that, through it, almost all of the Bill of Rights has been imposed upon the States.

As a general matter, due process of law refers to fundamental fairness in the treatment of citizens by the government. In the context of criminal law, due process of law requires governments utilize fundamentally fair procedures in prosecuting persons accused of committing criminal offenses. See also Bill of Rights; Fourteenth Amendment

Dugan, Eva Eva Dugan was born in 1878. She was hanged on February 21, 1930, by the State of Arizona for the murder of a Tucson rancher named Andrew J. Mathis. Dugan is the only woman ever executed by Arizona.

Dugan worked as a housekeeper for Mathis in January 1927. She was fired after only a few weeks of employment. Shortly after Mathis fired Dugan, he disappeared, along with Dugan. Although authorities suspected foul play in the disappearance of Mathis, they had no leads on what happened to him. Eventually, Pima County Sheriff Jim McDonald began sending missing person notices on Dugan and Mathis throughout the country. Slowly, reports came in revealing that Dugan had sold Mathis's car in Kansas City, Missouri. A background check of Dugan revealed that she had been married at least five times. All of her husbands disappeared under mysterious circumstances and were never located. Sheriff McDonald learned that Dugan had a daughter living in White Plains, New York, and a father residing in California; however, neither had seen Dugan for several years.

Eva Dugan's execution by hanging was botched, which resulted in her being accidentally decapitated. (Arizona Department of Corrections).

About nine months after Dugan's conviction for auto theft, Mathis's corpse was accidentally discovered, buried in a shallow grave on his Tucson ranch.

Dugan was immediately charged with Mathis's murder. The evidence against her was circumstantial and she denied committing the crime. However, after a short trial, she was convicted of the crime and sentenced to death. Dugan sat on death row for two years before she was publicly executed by hanging before an audience of seventy onlookers on February 21, 1930. It was reported that the execution was botched and her body separated from her head. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Case Holding: The Florida Supreme Court's determination that the defendant's failure to raise an issue in State court on direct appeal and initial habeas proceeding resulted in a default of the issue, and therefore precluded federal courts from addressing the defaulted issue.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Sheriff McDonald eventually located Dugan in White Plains, where she was working at a hospital. Extradition proceedings were begun and on March 4, 1927, she was returned to Pima County, Arizona. Dugan was initially prosecuted solely for the theft of Mathis's car and was convicted of the charge and sentenced to prison.

Florida charged the defendant, Aubrey Dennis Adams, with capital murder. During jury selection for the trial, the trial judge instructed the prospective jurors on their responsibility for the sentence they would recommend, stating that the court, not the jury, was responsible for sentencing and that the jury had merely an advisory role. Defense counsel did not object to these instructions. The jury found the defendant guilty of capital murder and recommended the death sentence, which the trial judge imposed.

The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence on direct appeal. The defendant did not raise the issue of the trial judge's instruction to the prospective jurors during jury selection. The defendant subsequently filed unsuccessful State and federal habeas corpus petitions, in which he also failed to raise the issue of the trial judge's instruction to the prospective jurors. Thereafter, it was held by the United States Supreme Court in Caldwell v. Mississippi that the Eighth Amendment prohibited prosecutors from misinforming the jury in a capital case as to their role. Based on Caldwell, the defendant filed another State trial court habeas petition challenging for the first time the instruction given by the trial judge. He contended that the instruction violated the Eighth Amendment by misinforming the jury of its sentencing role under Florida law. The State trial court denied relief. On appeal, the Florida Supreme Court refused to address this argument because the defendant had failed to raise it on direct appeal.

Subsequently, the defendant filed another federal habeas petition, raising for the first time in federal court his Caldwell claim. The federal district court held that the claim was procedurally barred. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed the decision, holding that the claim was so novel at the time of defendant's trial, sentencing, and appeal that its legal basis was not reasonably available and that therefore he had established cause for his procedural default. The Court of Appeals found the instruction violated the Eighth Amendment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White held that the defendant's claim was procedurally defaulted and that he was not entitled to relief. The opinion stated the Court's reasoning as follows:

[The defendant] offers no excuse for his failure to challenge the remarks on state-law grounds, and we discern none that would amount to good cause in a federal habeas corpus proceeding. Had [the defendant] objected at the time and asserted error under state law, and had the trial or appellate court sustained his objection, the error would have been corrected in the state system. Had his objection been overruled and that ruling sustained on appeal, we would very likely know that the instruction was an accurate reflection of state law. In either event, it is doubtful that the later decision in Caldwell would have provoked the filing of a second habeas corpus petition. In these circumstances, the fact that it turns out that the trial court's remarks were objectionable on federal as well as state grounds is not good cause for his failure to follow Florida procedural rules....

Neither do we hold that whenever a defendant has any basis for challenging particular conduct as improper, a failure to preserve that claim under state procedural law bars any subsequently available claim arising out of the same conduct. Indeed, [the defendant] here could have challenged the improper remarks by the trial judge at the time of his trial as a violation of due process. Rather, what is determinative in this case is that the ground for challenging the trial judge's instructions — that they were objectionable under state law — was a necessary element of the subsequently available Caldwell claim. In such a case, the subsequently available federal claim does not excuse the procedural default. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Brennan, Marshall, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun strongly dissented from the majority's decision in the case. He argued that the Caldwell claim was not from consideration in a federal habeas proceeding. The dissent argued its position as follows:

Although this Court repeatedly has ruled that the Eighth Amendment prohibits the arbitrary or capricious imposition of the death penalty, the Court today itself arbitrarily imposes procedural obstacles to thwart the vindication of what apparently is a meritorious Eighth Amendment claim.

In this case, the Eleventh Circuit determined that ... Aubrey Dennis Adams was sentenced to death in violation of the Eighth Amendment, as interpreted in Caldwell v. Mississippi. This Court now reverses that determination, not because it finds the death sentence valid, but because [the defendant] was late in presenting his claim to the Florida courts. In other words, this Court is sending a man to a presumptively unlawful execution because he or his lawyers did not raise his objection at what is felt to be the appropriate time for doing so.

I would understand, and accept, the Court's decision if the federal courts lacked authority to remedy the unconstitutional death sentence. But, manifestly, that is not the case. In reversing the judgment of the Court of Appeals, the majority relegates to a footnote its discussion of established doctrines that, upon full consideration, might entitle [the defendant] to an affirmance, not a reversal, of that judgment. Thus, the majority not only capriciously casts aside precedent to reinstate an unconstitutionally "unreliable" death sentence purely for procedural reasons, but also compounds that capriciousness by issuing an opinion in which decisive issues receive only dismissive consideration....

Even if, somehow, I could be convinced that the Florida Supreme Court's reliance on the [defendant's] procedural default was "adequate," within the meaning of this Court's precedents, I would still conclude that the Court of Appeals properly reached the merits of [the defendant's] Caldwell claim. I have no quarrel with the majority's determination that [the defendant] cannot show "cause" for his procedural default. "That determination, however, does not end our inquiry."

Rather, ... we must consider whether the failure to examine the merits of the Caldwell claim in this habeas action would result in a fundamental miscarriage of justice. The majority believes that no such injustice would occur. Again, I disagree....

[The defendant's] Caldwell claim is precisely the kind of claim that remains reviewable in a federal habeas action even though [the defendant] cannot establish cause for his procedural default. In holding otherwise, the Court sends [the defendant] to an execution that not only is presumptively unlawful, but is presumptively inaccurate as well. Nothing in the habeas corpus precedents of this Court calls for this consummately capricious result.

Issue Presented: Whether application to the defendant of changes in the appellate procedure of Missouri's high court violated ex post facto principles.

Case Holding: Application to the defendant of changes in the appellate procedure of Missouri's high court did not violate ex post facto principles.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Harry Duncan, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Missouri. The defendant appealed the judgment to a special division of the Missouri Supreme Court, which had been established by the State constitution after the commission of the defendant's crime. The special appellate division affirmed the judgment. The defendant next sought review by the full membership of the appellate court on the grounds that application of the new appellate procedure to him violated the Ex Post Facto Clause of the federal Constitution. The full appellate court refused to review the case. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice initially explained, "The amendment to the constitution of the state of Missouri provided for the separation of the supreme court into two divisions for the transaction of business, and that, when a federal question was involved, the cause, on the application of the losing party, should be transferred to the full court for decision." In turning to the substantive issue of ex post facto, the opinion explained: "It may be said, generally speaking, that an ex post facto law is one which imposes a punishment for an act which was not punishable at the time it was committed; or an additional punishment to that then prescribed; or changes the rules of evidence by which less or different testimony is sufficient to convict than was then required; or, in short, in relation to the offense or its consequences, alters the situation of a party to his disadvantage, but the prescribing of different modes of procedure, and the abolition of courts and creation of new ones, leaving untouched all the substantial protections with which the existing law surrounds the person accused of crime, are not considered within the constitutional inhibition."

In addition to finding the Ex Post Facto Clause had no application to the defendant's case, the chief justice found the issue was waived because the defendant did not present it to the special appellate court of the State. The judgment of the Missouri Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Ex Post Facto Clause

Issue Presented: Whether refusal by a trial court to consider relevant mitigating evidence proffered at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution violates the Constitution.

Case Holding: Refusal by a trial court to consider relevant mitigating evidence proffered at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution violates the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Monty Lee Eddings, was convicted in an Oklahoma trial court of capital murder and was sentenced to death. At the time of the offense, the defendant was sixteen years old, but he was tried as an adult. At the penalty phase of the prosecution the defendant presented, as mitigating circumstances, evidence of a turbulent family history, of beatings by a harsh father, and of serious emotional disturbance.

In imposing the death sentence, the trial judge refused, as a matter of law, to consider in mitigation the circumstances of the defendant's unhappy upbringing and emotional disturbance and found that the only mitigating circumstance was his youth, which circumstance was held to be insufficient to outweigh the aggravating circumstances found. The Oklahoma appellate courts affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the punishment in view of the defendant's age. However, the Court only addressed the issue of the trial court's refusal to consider certain mitigating evidence.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Powell: Justice Powell ruled that, in view of the Court's decision in Lockett v. Ohio, all relevant mitigating evidence must be considered during a capital penalty phase proceeding and the defendant's death sentence must be vacated as it was imposed without the type of individualized consideration of mitigating factors required by the Constitution. Justice Powell outlined the Court's reasoning as follows:

Just as the State may not by statute preclude the sentencer from considering any mitigating factor, neither may the sentencer refuse to consider, as a matter of law, any relevant mitigating evidence. In this instance, it was as if the trial judge had instructed a jury to disregard the mitigating evidence Eddings proffered on his behalf. The sentencer, and the Court of Criminal Appeals on review, may determine the weight to be given relevant mitigating evidence. But they may not give it no weight by excluding such evidence from their consideration.

Nor do we doubt that the evidence Eddings offered was relevant mitigating evidence. Eddings was a youth of 16 years at the time of the murder. Evidence of a difficult family history and of emotional disturbance is typically introduced by defendants in mitigation. In some cases, such evidence properly may be given little weight. But when the defendant was 16 years old at the time of the offense there can be no doubt that evidence of a turbulent family history, of beatings by a harsh father, and of severe emotional disturbance is particularly relevant.

The trial judge recognized that youth must be considered a relevant mitigating factor. But youth is more than a chronological fact. It is a time and condition of life when a person may be most susceptible to influence and to psychological damage. Our history is replete with laws and judicial recognition that minors, especially in their earlier years, generally are less mature and responsible than adults. Particularly "during the formative years of childhood and adolescence, minors often lack the experience, perspective, and judgment" expected of adults.

Even the normal 16-year-old customarily lacks the maturity of an adult. In this case, Eddings was not a normal 16-year-old; he had been deprived of the care, concern, and paternal attention that children deserve. On the contrary, it is not disputed that he was a juvenile with serious emotional problems, and had been raised in a neglectful, sometimes even violent, family background. In addition, there was testimony that Eddings' mental and emotional development were at a level several years below his chronological age. All of this does not suggest an absence of responsibility for the crime of murder, deliberately committed in this case. Rather, it is to say that just as the chronological age of a minor is itself a relevant mitigating factor of great weight, so must the background and mental and emotional development of a youthful defendant be duly considered in sentencing.

We are not unaware of the extent to which minors engage increasingly in violent crime. Nor do we suggest an absence of legal responsibility where crime is committed by a minor. We are concerned here only with the manner of the imposition of the ultimate penalty: The death sentence imposed for the crime of murder upon an emotionally disturbed youth with a disturbed child's immaturity.

The Court's opinion vacated the judgment of the Oklahoma Supreme Court, insofar as the sentence of death, and remanded the case for re-sentencing.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued a concurring statement which read: "I join the Court's opinion without, however, departing from my view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's decision. The focus of her concurrence was on the arguments proffered by Chief Justice Burger's dissenting opinion in the case. Justice O'Connor wrote:

I disagree with the suggestion in the dissent that remanding this case may serve no useful purpose. Even though the [defendant] had an opportunity to present evidence in mitigation of the crime, it appears that the trial judge believed that he could not consider some of the mitigating evidence in imposing sentence. In any event, we may not speculate as to whether the trial judge and the Court of Criminal Appeals actually considered all of the mitigating factors and found them insufficient to offset the aggravating circumstances, or whether the difference between this Court's opinion and the trial court's treatment of the [defendant's] evidence is "purely a matter of semantics," as suggested by the dissent. [Our precedents] require us to remove any legitimate basis for finding ambiguity concerning the factors actually considered by the trial court.

The Chief Justice may be correct in concluding that the Court's opinion reflects a decision by some Justices that they would not have imposed the death penalty in this case had they sat as the trial judge. I, however, do not read the Court's opinion either as altering this Court's opinions establishing the constitutionality of the death penalty or as deciding the issue of whether the Constitution permits imposition of the death penalty on an individual who committed a murder at age 16. Rather, by listing in detail some of the circumstances surrounding the petitioner's life, the Court has sought to emphasize the variety of mitigating information that may not have been considered by the trial court in deciding whether to impose the death penalty or some lesser sentence.

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the Court decided the case on an issue for which review was not granted. The dissent went further to indicate the futility in requiring a new sentencing hearing:

To be sure, neither the Court of Criminal Appeals nor the trial court labeled Eddings' family background and personality disturbance as "mitigating factors." It is plain to me, however, that this was purely a matter of semantics associated with the rational belief that "evidence in mitigation" must rise to a certain level of persuasiveness before it can be said to constitute a "mitigating circumstance." In contrast, the Court seems to require that any potentially mitigating evidence be described as a "mitigating factor" — regardless of its weight; the insubstantiality of the evidence is simply to be a factor in the process of weighing the evidence against aggravating circumstances. Yet if this is all the Court's opinion stands for, it provides scant support for the result reached. For it is clearly the choice of the Oklahoma courts — a choice not inconsistent with Lockett or any other decision of this Court — to accord relatively little weight to Eddings' family background and emotional problems as balanced against the circumstances of his crime and his potential for future dangerousness.

Whether the Court's remand will serve any useful purpose remains to be seen, for [the defendant] has already been given an opportunity to introduce whatever evidence he considered relevant to the sentencing determination. Two Oklahoma courts have weighed that evidence and found it insufficient to offset the aggravating circumstances shown by the State. The Court's opinion makes clear that some Justices who join it would not have imposed the death penalty had they sat as the sentencing authority. Indeed, I am not sure I would have done so. But the Constitution does not authorize us to determine whether sentences imposed by state courts are sentences we consider "appropriate"; our only authority is to decide whether they are constitutional under the Eighth Amendment.

Egypt Capital punishment is permitted in Egypt. The nation uses hanging and the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is a mixture of English common law, Islamic law, and the Napoleonic codes. The nation's constitution was adopted on September 11, 1971. Under the constitution of Egypt, the nation is a social democracy in which Islam is the state religion. The judiciary is independent. However, cases that involve national security or terrorism may be handled by military or State Security Emergency courts, in which constitutional protections may not be observed.

Egypt has three levels of courts: primary courts, appeal courts, and the Court of Cassation (the highest court). Defendants have the right to retained or appointed counsel, public trials, and bail. Juries are not used in the judicial system. Felonies that are punishable by imprisonment or the death penalty are heard by three judges. Appeals may be taken to the Court of Cassation. Crimes that carry a possible death sentence include murder, felony-murder, arson, or the use of explosives that caused death, rape, treason, and endangerment of state security. The Court of Cassation and the president review each death sentence. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

El Salvador El Salvador abolished capital punishment for ordinary crimes in 1983, but permits the punishment for exceptional crimes. The method of execution used by El Salvador is the firing squad. Its legal system is based on civil and Roman law, with traces of English common law. El Salvador adopted a constitution on December 20, 1983. El Salvador is a democracy with an executive branch, a unicameral legislature branch, and a judicial branch.

The court structure of El Salvador consists of trial courts, appellate courts, and a Supreme Court. Under the nation's constitution, defendants have the right to a presumption of innocence, protection from self-incrimination, retained or appointed legal counsel, jury trials, freedom from coercion, and compensation for damages due to judicial error. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Elected Official Aggravator The public is periodically reminded of the danger politicians face with incidents like the attempted assassinations of former President Ronald Reagan and former Governor George Wallace and the assassinations of former President John F. Kennedy and his brother, former Senator Robert Kennedy. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have taken a hard stand against the murder of politicians by making the killing of an elected official a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, if the penalty phase jury finds that the victim of the defendant's capital murder was an elected official, the death penalty may be imposed. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Electrocution The use of electricity to execute the death penalty dates back to the late nineteenth century. On January 6, 1885, the governor of New York gave the annual State of the State Address to the New York legislature. In that address, the governor made the following observation and suggestion:

The present mode of executing criminals by hanging has come down to us from the dark ages, and it may well be questioned whether the science of the present day cannot provide a means for taking the life of such as are condemned to die in a less barbarous manner. I commend this suggestion to the consideration of the legislature.

As a result of prompting by the governor, the legislature assembled a commission to determine "the most humane and practical method known to modern science of carrying into effect the sentence of death in capital cases."

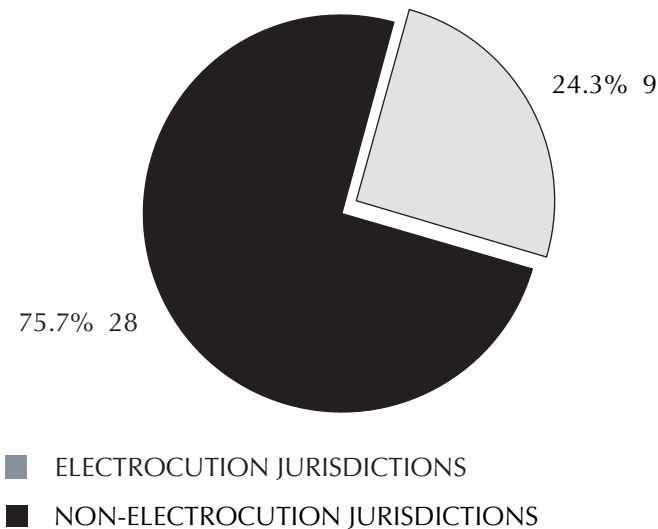

The New York commission evaluated several possible methods of execution, including lethal injection. Eventually, the commission was persuaded by Thomas Edison's proposal to use DC current as the most efficient method for execution. The commission reported back that execution by electricity was the most humane method of imposing the death penalty. The New York legislature heeded the advice and, in 1888, signed into law the first electrocution death penalty statute. The statute by its terms went into effect January 1, 1889. One year later, on August 6, 1890, William Kemmler became the first person executed by electrocution when New York executed him for the crime of murder.

Florida's electric chair is known as "Ol' Sparky." (Florida Department of Corrections)

Electrocution Jurisdictions: A total of nine capital punishment jurisdictions permit electrocution to be used as a method of execution. Four of those jurisdictions, Alabama, Florida, South Carolina, and Virginia, provide electrocution as an option for all capital felons. Three jurisdictions, Arkansas, Illinois, and Oklahoma, utilize electrocution if their primary method of execution is ever found unconstitutional. Two jurisdictions, Kentucky and Tennessee, utilize electrocution as an option for inmates sentenced prior to a specific date.

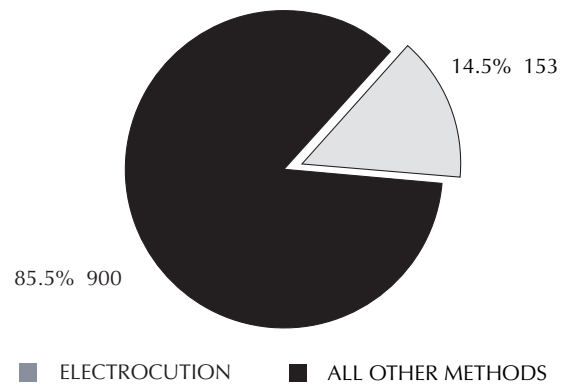

NUMBER OF JURISDICTIONS USING ELECTROCUTION

Constitutionality of Electrocution: Constitutionality of Electrocution: The constitutionality of execution by electrocution was answered by the United States Supreme Court in In re Kemmler, 136 U.S. 436 (1890). In Kemmler, the Supreme Court held that death by electrocution did not violate the federal Constitution. The decision in Kemmler has withstood countless challenges for over one hundred years.

The two major criticisms of death by electrocution are that death is slow and the punishment disfigures the victim. Both criticisms stem from executions that are not carried out properly. When done correctly, death by electrocution is relatively quick and disfigurement minimal. However, when problems arise such as too much electrical current or not enough electrical current, the victim will suffer needlessly.

EXECUTIONS PERFORMED BY ELECTROCUTION 1976–OCTOBER 2006

Electrocution Protocol:

The electric chair apparatus consists of a wooden chair, attached leg electrodes, a leather and sponge helmet with electrode, a drip pan, a plexiglass seat and a non-incremental restraint system. The chair is connected to an electrical power supply. The leg electrodes, which are fabricated onto the leg stock, are composed of solid brass. The helmet consists of an outer helmet of leather and an inner helmet of copper mesh and sponge. The chair design includes a removable drip pan. The straps used include two ankle straps, two wrist straps, and one chest harness.

The actual execution of Allen Davis by the State of Florida on July 8, 1999. Davis began bleeding from the nose during his execution and his mask popped off. (Florida Department of Corrections)

The condemned inmate is led to the chair and strapped in. One of the leg electrodes is attached to a shaved leg. The helmet is attached to the head (a leather strap may also be fastened to the condemned inmate's face). A hood is then placed over the head of the condemned. The actual switch may be a lever, switch, or a three-button system where three people will push each button (only one of them will push the real button). The condemned inmate will be given two sequences of electrical shocks. The initial voltage of electricity will be not less than 2200 volts for ten seconds; a five-second interval must occur; followed by 750 volts or more for 22 seconds. The process is then repeated once. Actual voltage used is calculated by the weight of the condemned inmate. The heavier the inmate, the more voltage is required. If the initial sequence is performed correctly, a physician will examine the condemned to proclaim him or her as heart dead. Issue Presented: Whether it was error for the trial court to instruct the jury that the defendant did not have a right to resist being arrested.

Case Holding: It was error for the trial court to instruct the jury that the defendant did not have a right to resist being arrested because the police officers did not have an arrest warrant and the matter involved a misdemeanor that was not committed in their presence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Bad Elk, was indicted for capital murder by the United States. Both the defendant and the victim were Native American police officers. The crime occurred on a reservation in South Dakota. At the time of the killing, the victim and several other police officers were attempting to arrest the defendant. During the trial, the judge instructed the jury that the arrest was lawful and that the defendant did not have a right to resist. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, arguing that the trial judge committed error in instructing the jury that he did not have a right to resist the attempted arrest. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Peckham: Justice Peckham held that it was reversible error for the trial court to instruct the jury that the defendant did not have a right to resist the attempted arrest. The opinion reasoned as follows:

At common law, if a party resisted arrest by an officer without warrant and who had no right to arrest him, and if in the course of that resistance the officer was killed, the offense of the party resisting arrest would be reduced from what would have been murder if the officer had had the right to arrest, to manslaughter. What would be murder if the officer had the right to arrest might be reduced to manslaughter by the very fact that he had no such right. So an officer, at common law, was not authorized to make an arrest without a warrant, for a mere misdemeanor not committed in his presence. If the officer had no right to arrest, the other party might resist the illegal attempt to arrest him, using no more force than was absolutely necessary to repel the assault constituting the attempt to arrest.

We do not find any statute of the United States or of the state of South Dakota giving any right to these men to arrest an individual without a warrant, on a charge of misdemeanor not committed in their presence. Marshals and their deputies have in each state ... the same powers in executing the laws of the United States as sheriffs and their deputies in such state may have by law in executing the laws thereof. This certainly does not give any power to an officer at the Pine Ridge agency to arrest a person without warrant, even though charged with the commission of a misdemeanor. These policemen were not marshals nor deputies of marshals, and the statutes have no application to them.

It is plain from this review of the subject that the charge of the court below, that the policemen had the right to arrest this [defendant], without warrant, and that, in order to accomplish such arrest, they had the right to show and use their pistols so far as was necessary for that purpose, and that the [defendant] had no right to resist such arrest, was erroneous. That it was a material error, it seems to us, is equally plain. It placed the transaction in a false light before the jury, and denied to the [defendant] those rights which he clearly had.... He, of course, had no right to unnecessarily injure, much less to kill, his assailant; but where the officer is killed in the course of the disorder which naturally accompanies an attempted arrest that is resisted, the law looks with very different eyes upon the transaction, when the officer had the right to make the arrest, from what it does if the officer had no such right. What might be murder in the first case might be nothing more than manslaughter in the other, or the facts might show that no offense had been committed.

The judgment of the trial court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

Issue Presented: Whether a sentence of death is a valid penalty under the Constitution for defendant who neither took life, attempted to take life, nor intended to take life.

Case Holding: The Constitution prohibits imposition of the death penalty upon a defendant who neither took life, attempted to take life, nor intended to take life.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Earl Enmund (with a co-defendant) was convicted by a Florida court of committing felony murder on April 1, 1975, in which two people were killed during the course of a robbery. The evidence showed that the defendant was a lookout, was not present when the murders occurred, and did not know that killings would take place. The defendant was sentenced to death.

On appeal to the Florida Supreme Court, the defendant contended that the federal Constitution prohibited imposition of the death penalty against him because he neither took life, attempted to take life, nor intended to take life. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed. The appellate court held that the mere fact that the defendant was the person in a car parked by at the home where the crimes occurred was enough under Florida law to make him a constructive aider and abettor and hence a principal in first-degree murder upon whom the death penalty could be imposed. The appellate court found that it was thus irrelevant that the defendant did not himself kill and was not present at the killings, or whether he intended that the victims be killed or anticipated that lethal force might be used to effectuate the robbery or escape. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue of whether imposition of the death penalty upon the defendant was constitutionally permissible.

cated that the current judgments of legislatures, juries, and prosecutors weigh heavily on the side of rejecting capital punishment for the crime at issue. It was observed that only a small minority of States allow the death penalty to be imposed solely because the defendant somehow participated in the robbery in the course of which a murder was committed, but did not take or attempt or intend to take life or intend that lethal force be employed. He wrote that the evidence was overwhelming that American juries have repudiated imposition of the death penalty against persons who did not take or attempt or intend to take life or intend that lethal force be employed.

Justice White noted that while robbery is a serious crime deserving serious punishment, it is not a crime "so grievous an affront to humanity that the only adequate response may be the penalty of death." He believed the death penalty was an excessive penalty for the robber who, as such, does not take human life. The opinion held that the focus must be on a defendant's culpability, not on those who committed the robbery and killings. When a robbery defendant did not kill or intend to kill, his or her culpability is different from that of the robbers who killed and it is impermissible for the State to treat them alike and attribute to the defendant the culpability of those who killed.

The opinion ruled that neither deterrence of capital crimes nor retribution is a sufficient justification for executing the defendant. It is said that it was highly unlikely that the threat of the death penalty for murder will measurably deter one such as the defendant, who does not kill or intend to kill. As to retribution, it was said that this depended on the degree of the defendant's culpability, which must be limited to his participation in the robbery. Putting him to death to avenge two killings that he did not commit or cause or intend to commit or cause would not measurably contribute to the retribution end of ensuring that the criminal gets his or her just deserts. The decision of the Florida Supreme Court was, therefore, reversed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued a concurring statement indicating his longstanding "view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which Burger, CJ., and Powell and Rehnquist, JJ., Joined: In her dissent, Justice O'Connor argued: "Today the Court holds that the Eighth Amendment prohibits a State from executing a convicted felony murderer." She believed that such a decision was not supported by the analysis in prior cases and that it "interferes with state criteria for assessing legal guilt by recasting intent as a matter of federal constitutional law."

The dissent urged that the determination of what conduct made a defendant a "principal or merely an accessory before the fact" was a matter uniquely within the authority of the States. She reasoned that "the intent-to-kill requirement is crudely crafted; it fails to take into account the complex picture of the defendant's knowledge of his accomplice's intent and whether he was armed, the defendant's contribution to the planning and success of the crime, and the defendant's actual participation during the commission of the crime. Under the circumstances, the determination of the degree of blameworthiness is best left to the sentencer, who can sift through the facts unique to each case." The dissent concluded: "[T]he death penalty is not disproportionate to the crime of felony murder, even though the defendant did not actually kill or intend to kill his victims."

Case Note: The majority decision was profound in its impact on the common-law doctrine of felony murder. Prior to the decision, all co-defendants convicted of felony murder were subject to the same punishment. The result of the majority's decision, and a subsequent case, was that of creating different categories of felony murder, one of which allows a defendant to escape the death penalty. *See also Felony Murder Rule; Mens Rea; Tison v. Equal Justice USA Equal Justice USA was founded in Maryland in 1990. It is a nonprofit organization created specifically to advocate for human rights in the nation's legal system. The organization has made abolishment of the death penalty a priority goal.

In 1993, the organization launched a campaign to aid death row inmate Mumia Abu-Jamal. As a result of the organization's work, Mumia became the most recognized death row inmate in the world.

In 1997, Equal Justice USA launched its "Moratorium Now!" campaign to bring about a moratorium on capital punishment. The organization has gained national support that is being used to apply pressure at all levels of government. See also Abu-Jamal, Mumia

Equal Protection Clause The Equal Protection Clause is part of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, which was ratified on July 9, 1868. The Equal Protection Clause provides that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The thrust of the Equal Protection Clause is a prohibition against unlawful discriminatory treatment of persons.

Although defendants in capital punishment cases regularly invoke the Equal Protection Clause, the clause has not been called upon to play a large role in capital punishment jurisprudence. The area where the Equal Protection Clause played a prominent role in capital punishment involved the selection of grand and petit juries. During the first half of the twentieth century, the United States Supreme Court was frequently called upon to use the Equal Protection Clause to reverse judgments because grand or petit juries were selected in a racially discriminatory manner. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; Fourteenth Amendment

Equatorial Guinea Equatorial Guinea imposes capital punishment. Equatorial Guinea utilizes the firing squad and hanging as methods of carrying out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Spanish civil law and customary law. The nation's constitution was adopted on November 17, 1991.

The court system of Equatorial Guinea is composed of provincial courts, two appeal courts, and a supreme court. There are also traditional courts in rural areas, in which tribal elders adjudicate minor civil and criminal matters. Criminal defendants have the right to legal counsel and appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Eritrea Eritrea imposes capital punishment. The methods of execution are firing squad and hanging. Eritrea became an independent state in 1993, following a referendum in which its citizens voted for independence from Ethiopia. The nation is still in political infancy. The nation's constitution was adopted May 23, 1997.

The legal system of Eritrea follows the Ethiopian code and customary law. The judicial system consists of village courts, sub-regional courts, regional courts, and the High Court that serves as an appellate court. Under the laws of the nation, minor offenses are brought to village courts and sub-regional courts. More serious crimes are argued before regional courts. Cases involving murder, rape, and other serious felonies are heard by the High Court. All courts except the High Court are presided over by a single judge. In the High Court, panels of three judges hear cases. Defendants have access to retained legal counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Error It is commonly understood in the legal community that no trial is ever error-free. Consequently, appellate courts recognize two types of trial court errors: harmless error and prejudicial error. An error is deemed harmless if it is found to have no impact on the outcome of the trial. If an appellate court cannot conclude that there was no reasonable likelihood that an error affected the outcome of a trial, the error is deemed prejudicial and the judgment reversible. See also Appellate Review of Conviction and Death Sentence; Harmless Error Rule

Escape The crime of escape may constitute a felony or misdemeanor offense, depending upon the circumstances and jurisdiction. Escape may involve fleeing from capture or custody. The crime of escape, without more, cannot be used to inflict the death penalty. The Eighth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits this as cruel and unusual punishment. However, the crime of escape can play a role in a capital prosecution. If escape occurs during the commission of a homicide, it may form the basis of a death-eligible offense and therefore trigger a capital prosecution. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Death-Eligible Offenses; Escape Aggravator; Felony Murder Rule

Issue Presented: Whether the “especially wicked, evil, atrocious or cruel” aggravating circumstance used at the penalty phase of the defendant’s trial was constitutionally vague.

Case Holding: The “especially wicked, evil, atrocious or cruel” aggravating circumstance used at the penalty phase of the defendant’s trial was constitutionally vague and therefore required his death sentence be vacated, notwithstanding the fact that the jury only provided a non-binding sentence recommendation to the trial court.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Henry Jose Espinosa, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Florida. During the penalty phase, the trial court instructed the jury that it could find as an aggravating factor that the murder was “especially wicked, evil, atrocious or cruel.” The jury returned a recommendation that the defendant be sentenced to death. The trial court imposed a death sentence. On appeal, the Florida Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence after rejecting the defendant’s argument that the “especially wicked, evil, atrocious or cruel” factor was constitutionally vague and left the jury with insufficient guidance when finding the existence of the aggravating factor. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion held that the defendant’s death sentence was invalid because the “especially wicked, evil, atrocious or cruel” aggravating factor was constitutionally vague. The opinion rejected the State’s argument that because the jury only provided a non-binding recommendation, the error was harmless insofar as the trial court properly found other valid aggravating factors in which to impose the death sentence. It was noted that, under Florida death penalty law, the trial judge is required to give weight and deference to the recommendation of the jury; therefore, the Court would presume the jury’s consideration of the invalid aggravator affected the trial court’s ultimate decision to impose the death penalty. The judgment of the Florida Supreme Court was reversed.

Dissenting Statement by Chief Justice Rehnquist and White, J.: The chief justice and Justice White issued a joint dissenting statement indicating the Court should have held a full hearing on the case instead of addressing it summarily.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia provided a dissenting statement indicating he dissented for the reasons set out in his concurring and dissenting opinion in Sochor v. Florida. See also Invalid Aggravator Espionage The death penalty statutes of the federal government make espionage, without more, an offense for which the death penalty may be imposed. Prior to the United States Supreme Court decision in Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977), the federal Constitution did not bar imposition of the death penalty when death to a victim did not occur. However, Coker invalidated as a capital offense rape of an adult woman that does not result in death. Courts have interpreted Coker as barring imposition of the death penalty for all crimes that do not result in a homicide. Under decisions decided prior to Coker the Supreme Court permitted the death penalty to be imposed for espionage, without an accompanying homicide. Commentators have suggested that in the wake of Coker, the death penalty may not be imposed for espionage without a resulting death. *See also Coker v. Issue Presented: Whether the prosecutor's use of psychiatric testimony at the penalty phase of the defendant's capital murder trial to establish his future dangerousness violated the defendant's constitutional rights.

Case Holding: The defendant's Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights were violated by the prosecutor's use of psychiatric testimony at the penalty phase of the defendant's capital murder trial to establish his future dangerousness.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ernest Benjamin Smith, was indicted in Texas for capital murder. Prior to trial, the court ordered a psychiatric examination to determine the defendant's competency to stand trial. A psychiatrist conducted the examination at the jail where the defendant was being held and determined that the defendant was competent. Thereafter, the defendant was tried by a jury and convicted of capital murder. One of the statutory issues the penalty phase jury had to resolve was the future dangerousness of the defendant, i.e., whether there was a probability that he would commit criminal acts of violence that would constitute a continuing threat to society. At the sentencing hearing, the doctor who had conducted the pre-trial psychiatric examination was allowed to testify for the prosecutor over defense counsel's objection that the doctor's name did not appear on the list of witnesses the prosecutor planned to use at the penalty phase. The doctor testified that the defendant would be a danger to society. The jury then returned a sentence of death.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and death sentence. After unsuccessfully seeking a writ of habeas corpus in State courts, the defendant petitioned for such relief in a federal district court. That court vacated the death sentence because it found constitutional error in admitting the doctor's testimony at the penalty phase. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's ruling. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice held that the admission of the doctor's testimony at the penalty phase violated the defendant's Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination and his Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel.

Addressing the issue of the defendant's right to remain silent, Chief Justice Burger found that the defendant was not advised before the pre-trial psychiatric examination that he had a right to remain silent and that any statement he made could be used against him at a capital sentencing proceeding. The opinion held that there was no basis for distinguishing between the guilt and penalty phases of the defendant's trial, so far as the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege was concerned. It was said that the prosecutor's attempt to establish the defendant's future dangerousness by relying on the unwarned statements the defendant made to the examining doctor infringed the Fifth Amendment just as much as would have any effort to compel the defendant to testify against his will at the sentencing hearing.

The chief justice indicated that the defendant's statements did not automatically remove them from the reach of the Fifth Amendment merely because they were made in the context of a psychiatric examination. He reasoned that the considerations calling for the accused to be warned prior to custodial interrogation apply with no less force to a pre-trial psychiatric examination. The opinion ruled that an accused who neither initiated a psychiatric evaluation nor attempted to introduce any psychiatric evidence may not be compelled to respond to a psychiatrist if his or her statements can be used against him or her at a capital sentencing proceeding. When faced with a court-ordered psychiatric inquiry, the defendant's statements to the doctor were not given freely and voluntarily without any compelling influences and, as such, could only be used by the prosecutor at the penalty phase if the defendant had been apprised of his rights and had freely and knowingly decided to waive them.

As to the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel, the chief justice found that such right already had attached when the doctor examined the defendant in jail. It was said that defense counsel was not notified in advance that the psychiatric examination would encompass the issue of the defendant's future dangerousness. Therefore, the defendant was denied the assistance of his counsel in making the significant decision of whether to submit to the examination and to what end the psychiatrist's findings could be employed. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued a concurring statement indicating that he joined the Court's opinion and that he maintained his "position that the death penalty is in all circumstances unconstitutional."

Concurring Statement by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall issued a statement concurring in the Court's decision and pointing out that he continued to adhere to his "consistent view that the death penalty is under all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stewart, in Which Powell, J., Joined: Justice Powell concurred in the Court's judgment. He wrote that the case was correctly decided on the Sixth Amendment claim and, as a result, he would not have reached nor decided the Fifth Amendment issue.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist issued an opinion concurring in the Court's judgment. He indicated that the Court should not have gone beyond resolving the Sixth Amendment claim. Justice Rehnquist stated that he was not convinced that any Fifth Amendment rights were implicated by the psychiatric examination of the defendant. He wrote: "Even if there are Fifth Amendment rights involved in this case, [the defendant] never invoked these rights when confronted with [the psychiatrist's] questions. The Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination is not self-executing." See also Powell v. Texas; Right to Counsel; Right to Remain Silent; Satterwhite v. Texas

Ethiopia Ethiopia utilizes the death penalty. The nation uses the firing squad as the method of carrying out the death penalty. Its legal system is based largely on customary law. Ethiopia adopted a constitution in December 1994.

The court structure of Ethiopia consists a federal and state (regional) system. The federal system is composed of a supreme court, high court, and district courts. The federal supreme court and high court adjudicate cases involving federal law, trans-regional issues, and national security. Both courts hear original and appeal cases. The state system is composed of district courts, zonal courts, a high court, and a supreme court.

The laws of Ethiopia recognize religious and customary courts. Both parties to a dispute must agree before a customary or religious court may hear a case. Shari'a (Islamic) courts have authority to hear religious and family cases involving Muslims. Under the laws of Ethiopia, defendants have the right to be released on bail, the right to a public trial, the right to a speedy trial, and the right to retained or appointed counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that his conviction and sentence were invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant established that his conviction and sentence were invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Eubanks, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Louisiana. The Louisiana Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his conviction and sentence were invalid because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black found that the judgment against the defendant could not stand. The opinion noted: "In an unbroken line of cases stretching back almost 80 years this Court has held that a criminal defendant is denied the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment if he is indicted by a grand jury or tried by a petit jury from which members of his race have been excluded because of their race." Justice Black noted that from 1936 to 1954, the county (parish) in which the defendant was indicted selected 432 persons to serve on grand juries. Out of that number, only one grand juror was black. The opinion indicted that "this lone exception apparently resulted from the mistaken impression that the juror was white." In contrast, the opinion found that blacks had been well represented on federal grand juries from the county during the same period. It was concluded that uniform and long-continued exclusion of blacks from grand juries shown by the record in the case could not be attributed to chance or accident or to the fact that no sufficiently qualified blacks have ever been included in the lists submitted to the various local judges for selection as grand jurors. The judgment of the Louisiana Supreme Court was reversed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection European Union Memorandum on the Death Penalty On February 25, 2000, the European Union issued an anti-death penalty memorandum. The text of the memorandum is set out below.

Opening Statement

The European Union (EU) is opposed to the death penalty in all cases and has consistently espoused its universal abolition, working towards this goal. In countries which maintain the death penalty, the EU aims at the progressive restriction of its scope and respect for the strict conditions, set forth in several international human rights instruments, under which the capital punishment may be used, as well as at the establishment of a moratorium on executions so as to completely eliminate the death penalty.

The EU is deeply concerned about the increasing number of executions in the United States of America (USA), all the more since the great majority of executions since reinstatement of the death penalty in 1976 have been carried out in the 1990s. Furthermore, it is permitted to sentence to death and execute young offenders aged under 18 at the time of the commission of the crime, in clear infringement of internationally-recognised human rights norms.

At the dawn of a new millennium the EU wishes to share with the USA the principles, experiences, policies and alternative solutions guiding the European abolitionist movement, all the EU Member States having abolished the death penalty. By doing so, the EU hopes that the USA, which has risen upon the principles of freedom, democracy, the rule of law and respect for human rights, considers joining the abolitionist vanguard, including as a first step towards abolition establishing a moratorium in the use of the death penalty, and by this way becoming itself a paradigm for retentionist countries.

1. Europe: On the Road to Abolition

In Western Europe the death penalty issue aroused the attention of some circles within society at an early stage. Included among the instruments of both criminal law and criminal policy through ages, capital punishment soon raised a debate on humanitarian values. This evolution in attitudes to the death penalty began particularly in the context of the establishment of the democratic State in the 18th century and since then, step by step, it has gained the support of the peoples of the States nowadays assembled in the European Union.

In fact, the questioning of the legitimacy of the death penalty dawned in the context of the Enlightenment, at the end of the 18th century. At that time deprivation of liberty was the preferred means of criminal punishment, in parallel with the rise of classic criminal law. Although early attempts to repeal the death penalty were not a total success, several European countries had by then accepted the limitation of the death penalty to capital crimes and reformed their law accordingly. This trend towards restriction of the scope of capital punishment would continue throughout the next two centuries, although not without various backward steps due to particular political circumstances.

Nevertheless some of those countries went even further and definitively abolished the death penalty in their laws for ordinary crimes. Portugal led the way in 1867, immediately followed by the Netherlands. Sweden and Denmark joined this abolitionist movement after the First World War. After the Second World War, Italy, Finland and Austria did likewise. The mid-century was also the time for Germany to outlaw capital punishment, encompassing abolition for all crimes. In the 1960s and 1970s, the United Kingdom and Spain also became legally abolitionist for civil crimes.

In the meantime the trend towards abolition for all crimes, thus including crimes under military law or committed in exceptional circumstances such as during wartime, was also affirmed. Since the end of the 1960s, all EU Member States have absolutely abandoned the death penalty in law.

From this, it is clear that for the majority of Member States the total abolition of capital punishment was achieved in two stages of which the second was, in general, a lengthy process. Furthermore, it has to be stressed that, although countries such as the United Kingdom, Spain, Luxembourg, France, Ireland, Greece and Belgium maintained the death penalty in their laws into the second half of this century, executions took place quite rarely or else this form of punishment simply remained unused. In fact, a long period of time generally passed between the carrying out of the last execution and abolition of the death penalty, which leads to the conclusion that when European countries formally abandoned capital punishment they were already abolitionist de facto or even by tradition, capital punishment having clearly fallen into disuse in judicial practice.

On the other hand, while in some EU Member States abolitionist measures have met the deep sentiment of the population and thus corresponded to the accomplishment of a national tradition, in others the political decision towards abolition was not taken with the support of the majority of public opinion. Nevertheless in countries where this was the case, the decision did not result in any form of negative reaction, usually leading to minimal debate on the issue. Therefore, mention should be made of the fact that abolition itself contributed favourably to better-informed public opinion, which helped to shape different feelings among community members.

2. The Common Basis for Abolition: Values, Principles and Criminal Policy

The death penalty poses a set of distinct questions of a philosophical, religious, political and criminological nature. Although Member States' experiences in abolition varied in time, they shared common ground – that of the inhumane, unnecessary and irreversible character of capital punishment, no matter how cruel the crime committed by the offender. Besides, this justification now seems to be shared by the international community as a whole, insofar as both the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the United Nations Security Council Resolutions establishing the International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda do not provide the death penalty among the range of sanctions, even when the most serious crimes, including genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes are to be tried.

Humanistic values, ethical points of view and human rights reasons weighed in favour of the abolition of the death penalty. Effectively, for the European Governments the death penalty as a means of State punishment rapidly revealed itself as a denial of human dignity, which is a fundamental basis of the common heritage of the European Union as a union of shared values and principles.

At the same time, there is insufficient justification on either criminal or criminological grounds for maintaining such a punishment. First of all, it is scientifically undemonstrated that the death penalty and its application deter criminality any more effectively than other forms of punishment. Indeed, crime rate and the death penalty are independent realities, capital punishment and its execution failing to have a deterrent effect and thus to produce less violent societies. Besides, maintaining capital punishment would not fit the philosophy of rehabilitation pursued in the criminal justice systems of all EU Member States and according to which one of the penological aims of penalties is that of rehabilitating or resocialising the offender. Furthermore, emphasis is also placed upon the penological goal of prevention, understood as a process ante delictum (before crime) and post delictum (post-crime), implying the rejection of any form of brutality, either physical or psychological, with a view to promoting respect for human rights and preventing the development of an even more crime-ridden society. Last but not the least, capital punishment should not be seen as an appropriate way of compensating the suffering of crime victims' families, as this view turns the justice system into a mere tool of illegitimate private vengeance. This does not mean that European criminal systems are insensitive to victims' rights and interests. Quite the contrary. Legislation safeguarding those rights, as well as victims' assistance agencies and programmes are provided. Besides, there are appropriate alternatives to the death penalty which respond to their needs and ensure adequate assistance to them. Both offenders and victims' families stand in need of rehabilitation. As far as the later are concerned, it is essential that the emotion caused by the loss they suffered is surmounted and this requires the availability of financial and psychological support.

In the realm of judicial practice, the irreversible nature of capital punishment has also to be taken into account. Even highly advanced legal systems, which rest upon the principle of the rule of law, including the principle of due process, are not immune to miscarriages of justice. That irreversibility removes any possibility of correcting such miscarriages of justice, allowing for the execution of innocent people. Judicial error, different interpretations of the law, conviction based on unclear and non-convincing evidence, as well as lack of adequate legal assistance at all stages of the proceedings, in particular where the offender is indigent, are just some of the circumstances which may result in the innocent being executed.

As a result, criminal policy programmes were intentionally humanised in order to pursue the view under which the State's actions should not have human beings as victims, but also that of the promotion of the human person as one of the major purposes of criminology. Maintaining the death penalty would, instead, bring to light undesirable expiatory features of criminal law. Accordingly, major reform initiatives were carried out, restructuring the criminal sanctions so as to make them more conducive mainly to the rationale of social rehabilitation and reintegration of the offender in the community, simultaneously taking into account the need to ensure the protection of society and to prevent crime, rather than punish it.

3. Envisaging Alternative Sanctions

Opting for a more humane, but also more effective, criminal justice system paved the way for considering appropriate alternative criminal sanctions to the death penalty. In fact European lawmakers assumed that crime could be punishable by means of non-lethal penalties, such as long-term or life imprisonment. In practice, even when the death penalty was still contemplated in law, and even mandatory, either the judge would decide upon an alternative penalty by reason of mitigating circumstances or the sentence would be systematically the object of a pardon and thus commuted.

Imprisonment for life remains the usual alternative for very serious crimes. In any case, although nearly all Member States provide for this type of punishment in their respective penal codes either as a possibility or mandatorily, it is understood rather as a principle than as a common practice.

In some countries life imprisonment can indeed be replaced by temporary incarceration once there are mitigating circumstances. Furthermore, in practically all Member States parole can be granted to those sentenced to life after having served a certain term in prison and depending on other factors, such as good behaviour, signs of readaptation or illness. Commutation of the penalty by way of pardon is also provided for in almost all the sanctions systems concerned. Moreover, in some of these countries imprisonment for life simply can not be applied to juveniles or to the mentally ill.

As to long-term imprisonment, the present criminal policy in the EU Member States clearly shows a decreasing trust in the re-socialising effect of long prison sentences and is moving towards keeping imprisonment to an absolute minimum.

It is well established that long-term imprisonment, and above all imprisonment for life, fails to achieve its criminal policy's goals, unless relevant measures are adopted in order to enable the return of the prisoner to social life at the appropriate moment. In this context, the possibility of parole is of paramount importance. In fact, a crime prevention policy which admits maintaining imprisoned for life a convicted person who has served in prison a term corresponding to the gravity of the committed crime and is no longer a danger to society, would fail to meet either recognised minimum standards for the treatment of prisoners or the goal of social rehabilitation which is achieved in view of the willingness and ability of the offender to lead a law-abiding and self-supporting life. Moreover, it must be underlined that the United Nations (UN) Convention on the Rights of the Child expressly deals with the issue of imprisonment for life imposed on minors, stating that life imprisonment without the possibility of release shall not be imposed for offences committed by persons below 18 years of age.

4. The International Context

The de jure abolitionist trend endorsed by European legislators, clearly evident in the second half of this century, was also favoured by the international environment. In fact, abolition of the death penalty soon became an issue of international concern, contributing to the enhancement of human dignity and the gradual development of human rights.

In 1971, the United Nations General Assembly in Resolution 2857 (XXVI) affirmed the desirability of abolishing the death penalty in all countries. As for international abolitionist treaties, the Council of Europe took the first steps in 1983 by adopting Protocol No. 6 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) concerning the Abolition of the Death Penalty. In the framework of the UN a Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) aiming at the abolition of the death penalty was adopted in 1989. More recently, the Inter-American system for the protection of human rights followed the abolitionist vanguard and the Organisation of American States — of which the United States is a member — adopted the Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to Abolish the Death Penalty in 1990.

Furthermore, strict conditions under which the death penalty may be used are laid down in international human rights instruments, such as the ICCPR or the UN Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) Safeguards Guaranteeing Protection of those Facing the Death Penalty. The EU seeks to ensure that in countries where the death penalty has not been abolished executions are carried out in accordance with those generally accepted safeguard standards. It particularly pays attention to: imposition of capital punishment beyond the most serious crimes; retroactive enforcement of the death penalty; imposition of capital punishment on pregnant women or new mothers and on persons suffering from any form of mental disorder; disrespect for procedural safeguards, including the right to a fair trial and the right to petition for clemency; or inhumane enforcement of the death penalty. Executions under these circumstances are contrary to internationally recognised human rights norms and neglect the dignity and worth of the human person.

5. Juvenile Justice

The EU is equally concerned about the imposition of the death penalty on persons below 18 years of age.

All the EU Member States reject the idea of incorrigibility of juveniles. These States hold the view that the problem of juvenile delinquency should be addressed bearing in mind that young offenders are in the process of full development, facing several difficulties of adaptation. In addition, poor backgrounds, lack of success at school and dependence on drugs are just some of the social problems affecting them and fostering their criminal behaviour. As a result, they are less mature, and thus less culpable, and should not be treated as adults, deserving a more lenient criminal sanctions system. This implies, among other things, rejection of death penalty for juveniles.

The European approach to juvenile justice is therefore deeply consistent with internationally-recognised juvenile justice standards, as enshrined in the following international human rights instruments: The UN International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the ECOSOC Safeguards Guaranteeing Protection of those Facing the Death Penalty, the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the American Convention on Human Rights. In fact, the international norms in question expressly prohibit sentencing to death persons below 18 years of age at the time of the commission of the crime. A similar prohibition is set out in the fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War and Additional Protocols of 1977 to the Geneva Conventions.

The EU and its Member States base their action on the inherent dignity of all human beings and on the inviolability of the human person.

Offenders are human beings who committed a crime but who also enjoy an inherent and inalienable dignity, the very same dignity claimed by rationalist philosophy, all relevant religions and by law, the death penalty being a denial of human dignity.

The criminal justice system of a country, and in particular its sanctions system, may reflect traditions and specific historical aspects of a society. However, the death penalty issue is, above political, legal or criminal considerations, a question of humanity. Humanisation of the problem of capital punishment should be a decisive aspect of a people's life.

Long ago European countries, either in practice or in law, made a choice for humanity, abolishing the death penalty and thus fostering respect for human dignity. And this is an ultimate principle that the EU wishes to share with all countries, as it shares other common values and principles such as freedom, democracy, and the rule of law and safeguard of human rights. If it succeeds in reaching this goal, both the EU and those countries will have furthered the cause of humanity, as Beccaria foretold. The EU thus invites the USA to equally embrace this cause.

Evidence Rules see Hearsay; Hearsay Exceptions; Rules of Evidence

Examination of Witness A witness in a criminal trial may be questioned through direct examination or cross-examination. Direct examination and cross-examination have technical meanings in the law.

Direct examination refers to presented the witness with open-ended questions that generally require more than a yes or no response. For example, "Where were you on the night of April 1, 2000?" Under cross-examination a witness may be presented with questions that require only a yes or no answer. For example, "On the night of April 1, 2000, you were at the decedent's home, correct?"

Direct examination is done by the party calling the witness to testify. Cross-examination is performed by the party who did not call the witness to testify. An exception for direct-examination questioning occurs when a witness called becomes adverse or hostile to the party calling him or her. That is, when a witness adversely changes the testimony the party expected the witness to give.

In capital prosecutions the rigid demands of direct examination and cross-examination are generally adhered to during the guilt phase. However, the requirements are generally relaxed during the penalty phase.

Excessive Bail Clause The Eighth Amendment to the federal Constitution states, "Excessive bail shall not be required." The Excessive Bail Clause has been interpreted as not constitutionally requiring bail be established in criminal cases. The United States Supreme Court has ruled that the Excessive Bail Clause only requires that bail not be excessive, if it is imposed. Because there is no federal constitutional right to have bail set, jurisdictions are free to deny bail outright. Some jurisdictions prohibit bail from being set in capital prosecutions, while others allow courts to set bail. When bail is allowed in capital cases, the amount of the bail will generally be in an amount that cannot be posted by the defendant. See also Bill of Rights

Excessive Punishment see Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause

Exclusionary Rule The exclusionary rule is a legal device adopted by the United States Supreme Court for violations of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures. Under the exclusionary rule, evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment may be excluded from evidence during a defendant's trial. The exclusionary rule extends to evidence obtained as a result of information learned from the unlawfully obtained evidence. This extension is called "fruits of the poisonous tree." Some courts have used the exclusionary rule to prohibit the use of unlawfully seized evidence during the penalty phase of a capital prosecution.

One exception to the exclusionary rule is the independent source rule. Under the latter rule, if authorities learn of incriminating evidence from a source independent of unlawfully obtained evidence, the new incriminating evidence may be used at trial. See also Bill of Rights

Exculpatory Evidence The United States Supreme Court has held in Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), that the Constitution provides a defendant with the right to have a prosecutor reveal all material evidence that may tend to show a defendant's innocence or that could be used by a defendant to attack the credibility of a witness. Failure of prosecutors to abide by this constitutional right is called a Brady violation and may result in a conviction being reversed. There are three essential components of a Brady violation: (1) withheld evidence must be favorable to the defendant, either because it is exculpatory or because it is impeaching; (2) the evidence must have been suppressed by the prosecutor, either willfully or inadvertently; and (3) prejudice must have been caused to the defendant. See also Banks v. Dretke; Brady v. Maryland; Discovery

Executing a Capital Felon More Than Once see Botched Execution; Francis v. Resweber

Execution Before Expiration of Prior Prison Sentence Capital offenses are occasionally committed by persons while incarcerated on non-capital convictions. An argument that periodically surfaces in this regard is the claim that the previous prison sentence must be served before the defendant may be executed. This argument has never prevailed. The United States Supreme Court has ruled that the Constitution does not prohibit executing a capital felon before he or she has served the full term of a previous prison sentence. See also Kelley v. Oregon

Execution Chamber The place wherein an execution occurs is called the execution chamber. Modern methods of execution created execution chambers. When hanging and firing squad were the exclusive means of executing condemned prisoners and executions were public, there was no practical need for special chambers to perform the executions.

During the early history of execution chambers, some prisons maintained execution chambers in small buildings built inside prison walls, but separate from inmate buildings. Today, execution chambers are generally found inside the prison building that maintains death row inmates.

Execution Methods see Electrocution; Execution Option Jurisdictions; Firing Squad; Hanging; Lethal Gas; Lethal Injection; Methods of Execution

Execution Option Jurisdictions The phrase “execution option jurisdictions” refers to capital punishment jurisdictions that have statutes which provide more than one method of execution. In jurisdictions that provide alternative methods of execution for capital felons to choose from, capital felons will oftentimes attack such options as infringing upon their religious beliefs. That is, capital felons contend that their religious beliefs prevent them from choosing a method of death. This argument has never found firm footing with courts. The reason that this argument invariably fails is that, when a capital felon has religious qualms about choosing a method of execution, the death penalty statutes provide for the method to be used in such situations. Therefore, a capital felon does not have to violate religious beliefs by choosing a method.

Two types of execution option jurisdictions exist: capital felon option and fallback option.

Capital Felon Option: Capital felon option jurisdictions permit capital murderers to choose the method of their execution. There are eleven capital felon option jurisdictions. Capital felon option jurisdictions provide two methods of execution. The statutes in these jurisdictions provide by that if a capital felon refuses to select a method of execution or fails to select a method within a specified time period, then a statutory “default” method of execution will be used. That is, one of the two methods of execution is designated as the method to use if either of the latter two events occur. Capital felons have on average ten days, prior to the week of the scheduled execution, to select an execution method. There are four categories of capital felon option jurisdictions. Each category is presented seriatim below.

1. Lethal injection–lethal gas jurisdictions. Arizona, California, and Missouri permit capital felons to select between lethal injection and lethal gas as the method of execution. However, in Arizona, the option is only available to inmates sentenced to death prior to a specific date.

2. Electrocution–lethal injection jurisdictions. Six capital punishment jurisdictions, Alabama, Florida, Kentucky, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia, allow capital felons to select between electrocution and lethal injection as the method of execution. In Alabama, Florida, South Carolina, and Virginia, the options are available to all death row inmates. However, in Kentucky and Tennessee, the option is only available to inmates sentenced to death prior to a specific date.

3. Hanging–lethal injection jurisdictions. The State of Washington provides that capital felons may choose between hanging and lethal injection as the method of execution.

4. Firing squad–lethal injection jurisdictions. Only one jurisdiction, Utah, provides the execution option of firing squad and lethal injection. However, the option is only available to inmates sentenced to death prior to a specific date.

Fallback Option: A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have hedged their execution statutes by providing fallback option execution methods. That is, if a designated method of execution is ruled unconstitutional or cannot be used for any reason, an alternative method of execution is provided for by statute. There are two types of fallback option jurisdictions: (1) single fallback option and (2) dual fallback option.

1. Single fallback option. A single fallback option jurisdiction is one that has provided only a single alternative method of execution, should the primary method be found unconstitutional or cannot be used for any reason. Single fallback jurisdictions include Arkansas, Delaware, Idaho, Illinois, New Hampshire, Utah, and Wyoming.

Arkansas and Illinois use lethal injection, but provide that electrocution is used if lethal injection is found unconstitutional. Delaware uses lethal injection, but provides that hanging is used if lethal injection is found unconstitutional. New Hampshire uses lethal injection, but provides that hanging is used if lethal injection cannot be used for any reason. Idaho uses lethal injection, but provides that the firing squad is used if lethal injection cannot be used for any reason. Utah uses lethal injection, but provides that the firing squad is used if lethal injection is found unconstitutional. Wyoming uses lethal injection, but provides that lethal gas is used if lethal injection is found unconstitutional.

2. Dual fallback option. A dual fallback option jurisdiction is one that has provided a fallback option for its fallback option. Oklahoma is the only dual fallback option jurisdiction. Oklahoma provides that lethal injection is used, but that electrocution is used if lethal injection is found unconstitutional. Oklahoma also provides that should both lethal injection and electrocution be found unconstitutional, then the firing squad is used. See also Electrocution; Firing Squad; Hanging; Lethal Gas; Lethal Injection; Methods of Execution

Executioner Under modern capital punishment, the role of the executioner varies with the method of execution used and the jurisdiction employing the method. For example, lethal injection involves injecting two or three (depending on the jurisdiction) chemicals in a condemned prisoner. Some jurisdictions employ a single person to perform the task, while others use a different person to inject each chemical.

The statutes in most jurisdictions require specially selected and trained correction officers to carry out the death penalty. However, prior to the year 2000, when Florida used only the electric chair to carry out the death penalty, its laws required a private individual be employed to carry out executions. Florida paid the executioner $150 for each execution.

The identity of capital punishment executioners is not made public for security reasons. Several challenges have been made by capital felons seeking to learn the identity of executioners. However, courts have been consistent in holding that capital felons do not have a constitutional right to know the identity of their executioners.

Prior to the shroud of secrecy engulfing executioners under modern capital punishment, executioners enjoyed some notoriety (albeit mostly negative). Robert G. Elliott was one of the most well-known executioners. In addition to executing 357 prisoners, Elliott performed the unusual feat of executing six prisoners by electrocution on the same day. He executed three prisoners in New York and three prisoners in Massachusetts.

One of the more tragic tales of executioners was that of John Hurlbert. He was the executioner at New York's Sing Sing Prison during the 1920s. Hurlbert executed over 120 prisoners in the electric chair at Sing Sing. The pressures of constantly executing prisoners took a tragic toll on Hurlbert. He unexpectedly resigned his job as executioner in 1926. Three years after Hurlbert left his job as executioner, the depression that had engulfed him drove him to commit suicide in the basement of his home.

Executive Clemency see Clemency

Exhaustion of State Remedies Doctrine Federal courts have power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of restraint of liberty of any person in custody under the authority of a State in violation of the federal Constitution. However, under the doctrine of exhaustion of State remedies, federal courts will not, except in cases of peculiar urgency, exercise habeas corpus jurisdiction by a discharge of the person in advance of a final determination of his or her case in the courts of the State. This includes all appellate remedies in the State courts and direct appeal for certiorari in the United States Supreme Court. The doctrine of exhaustion of State remedies is frequently invoked in capital punishment cases, when defendants seek federal habeas intervention before exhausting all State avenues of legal redress.

State courts also utilize a version of the exhaustion of remedies doctrine. At the State level, defendants are generally prohibited from bringing collateral constitutional issues, such as ineffective assistance of counsel, on direct appellate review. Alleged collateral errors are usually deferred for habeas corpus or coram nobis proceedings, which follow direct appeals. See also Federal Law Question; Habeas Corpus; Irvin v. Ex Parte Bollman (I) Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Ex Parte Bollman, 8 U.S. 75 (1807); Argued: Not reported; Decided: February 13, 1807; Opinion of the Court: Chief Justice Marshall; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Johnson; Justices Taking No Part in Decision: Justice Cushing and Chase, J.; Appellate Defense Counsel: C. Issue Presented: Whether the United States Supreme Court had authority to issue a writ of habeas corpus upon a motion by the defendants, who were in jail awaiting prosecution.

Case Holding: The United States Supreme Court had authority to issue a writ of habeas corpus upon a motion by the defendants, who were in jail awaiting prosecution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved two defendants, Erick Bollman and Samuel Swartwout. The defendants were charged separately with the capital crime of treason by the United States. The defendants were held without bail pending prosecution. The defendants filed a motion with the United States Supreme Court, requesting the Court issue a writ of habeas corpus, ordering that they be brought before the Court, and a writ of certiorari, bringing the records in their cases to the Court. The defendants requested such relief for the purpose of having the Court ordering them released on bail or dismissing the charges against them.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Marshall: The chief justice held that the Court had the authority by an act of Congress to issue a writ of habeas corpus commanding the defendants be brought before the Court. The opinion reasoned as follows:

The decision that the individual shall be imprisoned must always precede the application for a writ of habeas corpus, and this writ must always be for the purpose of revising that decision, and therefore appellate in its nature....

If at any time the public safety should require the suspension of the powers vested by this act in the courts of the United States, it is for the legislature to say so.

The motion prayed for by the defendants was granted.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Johnson: Justice Johnson dissented from the decision of the Court. He argued that the Court was without authority to issue a writ of habeas corpus. Justice Johnson stated his position as follows: "Let it be remembered that I am not disputing the power of the individual judges who compose this court to issue the writ of habeas corpus. This application is not made to us at chambers, but to us holding the supreme court of the United States — a creature of the constitution, and possessing no greater capacity to receive jurisdiction or power than the constitution gives it." See also Ex Parte Bollman (II)

Issue Presented: Whether the conduct alleged against the defendants established probable cause that they committed treason against the United States.

Case Holding: The conduct alleged against the defendants did not establish probable cause that they committed treason against the United States; therefore, they must be discharged from custody.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved two defendants, Erick Bollman and Samuel Swartwout. The defendants were charged separately with the capital crime of treason by the United States. The defendants were held without bail, pending prosecution. The defendants filed a motion with the United States Supreme Court, requesting the Court issue a writ of habeas corpus, ordering that they be brought before the Court, and writ of certiorari, bringing the records in their cases to the Court. The defendants requested such relief for the purpose of the Court ordering them released on bail or dismissing the charges against them. The Court granted the relief sought and the defendants were brought before the Court, along with the records in the proceedings.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Marshall: Chief Justice Marshall held that the charges of treason against the defendants had to be dismissed. It was said that treason against the United States, as defined by statute, required an actual levying of war against the nation. Chief Justice Marshall found that the records in the case did not establish probable cause that the defendants engaged in treason as defined by law. The opinion reasoned as follows:

To constitute that specific crime for which the prisoners now before the court have been committed, war must be actually levied against the United States. However flagitious may be the crime of conspiring to subvert by force the government of our country, such conspiracy is not treason. To conspire to levy war, and actually levy war, are distinct offenses. The first must be brought into operation by the assemblage of men for a purpose treasonable in itself, or the fact of levying war cannot have been committed....

It is not the intention of the court to say that no individual can be guilty of this crime who has not appeared in arms against his country. On the contrary, if war be actually levied, that is, if a body of men be actually assembled for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable purpose, all those who perform any part, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are to be considered as traitors. But there must be actual assembling of men for the treasonable purpose, to constitute a levying of war....

In the case now before the court, a design to overturn the government of the United States in New Orleans by force, would have been unquestionably a design which, if carried into execution, would have been treason, and the assemblage of a body of men for the purpose of carrying it into execution would amount to levying war against the United States; but no conspiracy for this object, no enlisting of men to effect it, would be an actual levying of war....

That both of the prisoners were engaged in a most culpable enterprise against the dominions of a power at peace with the United States ... cannot [be] doubt[ed]. But that no part of this crime was committed in the district of Columbia is apparent. It is therefore the unanimous opinion of the court that they cannot be tried in this district.

The defendants were ordered discharged from custody. See also Ex Parte Bollman (I)

Issue Presented: Whether the courts of the Territory of Dakota had jurisdiction over the defendant, a member of the Brule Sioux tribe whose victim was also a member of the same tribe.

Case Holding: The courts of the Territory of Dakota did not have jurisdiction over the defendant, a member of the Brule Sioux tribe whose victim was also a member of the same tribe, because, under federal laws and treaties with Native Americans, crimes by and against Native Americans must be prosecuted under the laws and customs of Native Americans.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Kan-Gi-Shun-Ca (as known as Crow Dog), was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the Territory of Dakota. The Dakota Territory Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that the courts of the Dakota Territory did not have jurisdiction over the offense committed by him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Matthews: Justice Matthews ruled that the courts established by the federal government for the Territory of Dakota did not have jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for capital murder. The opinion held that under federal statutes and treaties with Native Americans, crimes committed by Native Americans against other Native Americans had to be prosecuted by Native Americans. It was noted that the defendant was a member of the Brule Sioux tribe and the victim was also a member of the same tribe. Justice Matthews concluded that jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant resided exclusively with the Brule Sioux tribe. The opinion justified its position as follows:

[This] is a case of life and death. It is a case where, against an express exception in the law itself, that law, by argument and inference only, is sought to be extended over aliens and strangers; over the members of a community separated by race, by tradition, by the instincts of a free ... life, from the authority and power which seeks to impose upon them the restraints of an external and unknown code, and to subject them to the responsibilities of civil conduct, according to rules and penalties of which they could have no previous warning; which judges them by a standard made by others and not for them, which takes no account of the conditions which should except them from its exactions, and makes no allowance for their inability to understand it. It tries them, not by their peers, nor by the customs of their people, nor the law of their land, but by [people] of a different race, according to the law of a social state of which they have imperfect conception, and which is opposed to the traditions of their history [and] to the habits of their lives....

To ... uphold the jurisdiction exercised in this case would be to reverse in this instance the general policy of the government towards the [Native Americans], as declared in many statutes and treaties, and recognized in many decisions of this court, from the beginning to the present. To justify such a departure, in such a case, requires a clear expression of the intention of Congress, and that we have not been able to find.

The judgment of the Dakota Territory Supreme Court was reversed. See also Jurisdiction

Issue Presented: Whether the federal district court of the Territory of Arizona had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for committing capital murder in violation of federal law.

Case Holding: The federal district court of the Territory of Arizona did not have jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for committing capital murder in violation of federal law because the defendant was a Native American who had to be tried under the laws of Territory of Arizona.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Gon-shay-ee, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The crime and prosecution occurred in the Territory of Arizona. The defendant was a member of the Apache tribe and the victim was an American citizen. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, arguing that the federal district court did not have jurisdiction to prosecute him for violating a federal law.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Miller: Justice Miller held that the district court did not have jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant for violating federal law. The opinion pointed out that federal trial courts were given two types of jurisdiction. Federal trial courts were authorized to preside over offenses committed against federal law. Under this jurisdiction trial courts applied federal law to criminal prosecutions. The federal trial courts also had jurisdiction to preside over offenses committed in violation of the laws of the territory in which they sat. Under this jurisdiction, federal trial courts had to apply the laws of the territory in which they sat.

The opinion indicated that Congress had enacted a statute which gave federal trial courts authority to prosecute Native Americans for a certain class of offenses, including murder, regardless of where the offense occurred. However, this statute required federal trial courts apply the law of the territory where the offense occurred, not federal law. Justice Miller found that the trial court had authority to prosecute the defendant under the laws of the Territory of Arizona. However, the trial court invoked the laws of the United States. Consequently, the conviction and sentence were reversed. See also Jurisdiction

Issue Presented: Whether the United States Supreme Court could, upon a motion by the defendant, issue a writ of prohibition halting his execution and issue a writ of certiorari commanding the record in the case be brought to the Court for review.

Case Holding: The United States Supreme Court did not have authority, upon a motion by the defendant, to issue a writ of prohibition halting his execution or to issue a writ of certiorari commanding the record in the case be brought to the Court for review.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Nathaniel Gordon, was convicted of piracy (violating the African Slave Trade Act) and sentenced to death by the United States. A death warrant was issued for his execution. The defendant filed a motion with the United States Supreme Court seeking a writ of prohibition to halt his execution and a writ of certiorari to have the record in the case brought to the Court.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Taney: The chief justice held that the Court was not empowered to grant the type of relief sought by the defendant from the Court. The opinion stated:

[I]n criminal cases, the proceedings and judgment of the Circuit Court cannot be revised or controlled here, in any form of proceeding, either by [appeal] or prohibition, and, consequently, we have no authority to examine them by a certiorari....

But this motion asks the court to do even more than exercise an appellate power where none is given by law, for the case has now passed out of the hands of the court, and the [death] warrant is in the hands of the marshal commanding him to execute the judgment of the court. The Circuit Court itself has not now the power to recall it, and, certainly, it would be without precedent in any judicial proceeding to prohibit a ministerial officer from performing a duty which the Circuit Court had a lawful right to command, ... and in a case, too, where no appellate power is given to this court to revise or control in any respect the judgment or proceedings of the Circuit Court. We are not aware of any case in which a similar motion has heretofore been made in this court in a criminal case.

The defendant's motion for relief was denied and the case dismissed. See also Gordon, Nathaniel Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant's conviction and sentence were valid even though the federal court prosecuting him did not have jurisdiction to prosecute capital offenses after the defendant's crime was committed. (2) Whether the judgment against the defendant was valid when he was unlawfully brought within the jurisdiction of the court.

Case Holdings: (1) The defendant's conviction and sentence were valid even though the federal court prosecuting him did not have jurisdiction to prosecute capital offenses after the defendant's crime was committed. (2) The judgment against the defendant was valid because, even though he was not unlawfully brought within the jurisdiction of the court, a criminal court does not lose jurisdiction over a defendant merely because custody was obtained illegally.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Johnson, was indicted by the Federal Southern District Court of Native American Territory, in Texas, for the capital crime of rape. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to death. Subsequently, an indictment was handed down against the defendant for the same offense by the Federal Eastern District Court in Texas. The defendant was turned over to authorities representing the Eastern District Court. The defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in the United States Supreme Court. The defendant alleged that the Southern District Court judgment was void because it did not have jurisdiction over the offense and because the defendant was unlawfully brought before the court. The defendant wanted to be prosecuted by the Eastern District Court because of the possibility of obtaining a sentence of life imprisonment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brown: Justice Brown noted that the Eastern District Court was newly created after the defendant committed the offense. Prior to its creation, the Southern District Court had jurisdiction over the offense. The opinion reasoned that, while the Southern District Court no longer retained jurisdiction to prosecute capital offenses, it had such authority when it prosecuted the defendant.

The opinion rejected the defendant's contention that he should be released because he was improperly brought before the Southern District Court. Justice Brown held that even if the defendant had been unlawfully abducted and brought before the Southern District Court, such conduct would not invalidate the judgment. The opinion presented the law on this issue as follows:

If [defendant] was in the actual custody of the marshal ... his subsequent indictment and trial were valid, though in the first instance he might have been illegally arrested.... Indeed, there are many authorities which go to the extent of holding that in criminal cases a forcible abduction is no sufficient reason why the party should not answer when brought within the jurisdiction of the court which has the right to try him for such an offense, and presents no valid objection to his trial in such court. Although it has been frequently held that, if a defendant in a civil case be brought within the process of the court by a trick or device, the service will be set aside, and he will be discharged from custody. The law will not permit a person to be kidnapped or decoyed within the jurisdiction for the purpose of being compelled to answer to a mere private claim, but in criminal cases the interests of the public override that which is, after all, a mere privilege from arrest. But in this case there was nothing of the kind. The crime was committed and the prisoner arrested within the territory, and within the local jurisdiction of the territorial court. Had he been arrested without warrant by the marshal, or even by a private individual, and detained in custody...., he might then have been indicted, although, perhaps, [a civil lawsuit] might have lain against the person so arresting him for false imprisonment.

The defendant's petition for relief was denied.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Jurisdiction

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the district court had authority to entertain the defendant's habeas corpus petition when the president had suspended habeas relief. (2) Whether the military had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant.

Case Holdings: (1) The district court has authority to entertain the defendant's habeas corpus petition, even though the president had suspended habeas relief, because the Constitution does not permit indefinite suspension of habeas relief. (2) The military did not have jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant because he was a civilian unconnected with military service.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Lambdin P. Milligan, was arrested at his Indiana home on October 21, 1864, by military personnel. The defendant was subsequently prosecuted by a military tribunal for unnamed capital crimes. He was found guilty and sentenced to death. The president signed a death warrant ordering the defendant's execution. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that the military tribunal did not have jurisdiction to prosecute him because he was never in the military. The district court was uncertain as to how to proceed with the petition and, therefore, certified dispositive questions to the United States Supreme Court. The certified questions included if the district court has authority to entertain the habeas petition, in view of the president's suspension of habeas corpus; if the military had jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant; and if the United States Supreme Court could grant certiorari to consider the questions.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Davis: Justice Davis acknowledged that the president, with congressional authorization, suspended habeas corpus by proclamation on September 15, 1863. It was said that such suspension was not absolute in view of the constitutional prohibition against suspending habeas corpus. Justice Davis indicated that habeas corpus relief could not be indefinitely denied a prisoner. The opinion pointed out that, procedurally, the suspension for prisoners had to be for a brief period of confinement, after which the Constitution required prisoners seeking habeas relief be afforded an opportunity to obtain release. Justice Davis found that the district court had authority to en-tain the defendant's habeas petition. The opinion concluded on this issue:

The suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus does not suspend the writ itself. The writ issues as a matter of course; and on the return made to it the court decides whether the party applying is denied the right of proceeding any further with it.

If the military trial of Milligan was contrary to law, then he was entitled, on the facts stated in his petition, to be discharged from custody.

In turning to the question of the military's jurisdiction, Justice Davis ruled that the military did not have jurisdiction to prosecute the defendant. It was said that no authority existed which could give the military authority to prosecute civilians unconnected with military service. Justice Davis wrote: "Congress could grant no such power; and to the honor of our national legislature be it said, it has never been provoked by the state of the country even to attempt its exercise. One of the plainest constitutional provisions was, therefore, infringed when Milligan was tried by a court not ordained and established by Congress."

Justice Davis rebuffed arguments by the government that the defendant could be prosecuted by the military because he was a prisoner of war: "It is not easy to see how he can be treated as a prisoner of war, when he lived in Indiana for the past twenty years, was arrested there, and had not been, during the late troubles, a resident of any of the states in rebellion. If in Indiana he conspired with bad men to assist the enemy, he is punishable for it in the courts of Indiana; but, when tried for the offense, he cannot plead the rights of war; for he was not engaged in legal acts of hostility against the government, and only such persons, when captured, are prisoners of war. If he cannot enjoy the immunities attaching to the character of a prisoner of war, how can he be subject to their pains and penalties?" The district court was, therefore, instructed to dispose of the case consistent with the rulings of the Court's opinion.

Concurring Opinion by Chief Justice Chase, in Which Wayne, Swayne, and Miller, JJ., Joined: The chief justice concurred in the Court's decision. He disagreed, however, with the Court's position that the military could never prosecute civilians unconnected with the military. The chief justice believed that Congress could, in times of emergency, authorize the military to prosecute civilians unconnected with military service. See also Certified Question; Habeas Corpus; Military Death Penalty Law

Issue Presented: Whether the detention and prosecution of the defendants as spies by a military commission, appointed by order of the president, is in conformity to the laws and Constitution of the United States.

Case Holding: The detention and prosecution of the defendants as spies by a military commission, appointed by order of the president, is in conformity to the laws and Constitution of the United States.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendants, Richard Quirin, Ernest Peter Burger, Heinrich Harm Heinck, Edward John Kerling, Werner Thiel, Herman Otto Neubauer, and Herbert Hans Haupt, were all born in Germany, though each had lived in the United States. The defendants returned to Germany between 1933 and 1941. After the declaration of war between the United States and Germany, the defendants received training at a sabotage school near Berlin, Germany, where they were instructed in the use of explosives. The defendants secretly returned to the United States with instructions to destroy war industries and war facilities. (An eighth spy, George John Dasch, accompanied them but was not part of the proceeding before the United States Supreme Court, as he later approached the FBI on his own accord to confess to his part of the plot and to help bring in the others.) They were eventually captured by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. After their capture, the president, by order, on July 2, 1942, appointed a military commission and directed it to try the defendants and Dasch for offenses against the law of war and the Articles of War (the offenses were punishable with death). The president's order also stated that the men were to be access to the courts.

The Commission met on July 8, 1942, and proceeded with the trial. During the course of the trial, the defendants filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, challenging the authority of the president to have them prosecuted. The district court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court convened a special session to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Stone: The chief justice ruled that the president was not prohibited by the Constitution from empowering a military commission to prosecute the defendants: "the detention and trial of [the defendants]—ordered by the President in the declared exercise of his powers as Commander in Chief of the Army in time of war and of grave public danger—are not to be set aside by the courts without the clear conviction that they are in conflict with the Constitution or laws of Congress constitutionally enacted." The chief justice found: "By his Order creating the present Commission he has undertaken to exercise the authority conferred upon him by Congress, and also such authority as the Constitution itself gives the Commander in Chief, to direct the performance of those functions which may constitutionally be performed by the military arm of the nation in time of war." The opinion went on to justify the Court's decision as follows:

By the Articles of War, Congress has provided rules for the government of the Army. It has provided for the trial and punishment, by court martial, of violations of the Articles by members of the armed forces and by specified classes of persons associated or serving with the Army. But the Articles also recognize the "military commission" appointed by military command as an appropriate tribunal for the trial and punishment of offenses against the law of war not ordinarily tried by court martial. Articles 38 and 46 authorize the President, with certain limitations, to prescribe the procedure for military commissions. Articles 81 and 82 authorize trial, either by court martial or military commission, of those charged with relieving, harboring or corresponding with the enemy and those charged with spying. And Article 15 declares that "the provisions of these articles conferring jurisdiction upon courts-martial shall not be construed as depriving military commissions ... or other military tribunals of concurrent jurisdiction in respect of offenders or offenses that by statute or by the law of war may be triable by such military commissions ... or other military tribunals." Article 2 includes among those persons subject to military law the personnel of our own military establishment. But this, as Article 12 provides, does not exclude from that class

“any other person who by the law of war is subject to trial by military tribunals” and who under Article 12 may be tried by court martial or under Article 15 by military commission....

An important incident to the conduct of war is the adoption of measures by the military command not only to repel and defeat the enemy, but to seize and subject to disciplinary measures those enemies who in their attempt to thwart or impede our military effort have violated the law of war. It is unnecessary for present purposes to determine to what extent the President as Commander in Chief has constitutional power to create military commissions without the support of Congressional legislation. For here Congress has authorized trial of offenses against the law of war before such commissions. We are concerned only with the question whether it is within the constitutional power of the national government to place [the defendants] upon trial before a military commission for the offenses with which they are charged. We must therefore first inquire whether any of the acts charged is an offense against the law of war cognizable before a military tribunal, and if so whether the Constitution prohibits the trial. We may assume that there are acts regarded in other countries, or by some writers on international law, as offenses against the law of war which would not be triable by military tribunal here, either because they are not recognized by our courts as violations of the law of war or because they are of that class of offenses constitutionally triable only by a jury. It was upon such grounds that the Court denied the right to proceed by military tribunal in Ex parte Milligan. But as we shall show, these [defendants] were charged with an offense against the law of war which the Constitution does not require to be tried by jury....

By universal agreement and practice the law of war draws a distinction between the armed forces and the peaceful populations of belligerent nations and also between those who are lawful and unlawful combatants. Lawful combatants are subject to capture and detention as prisoners of war by opposing military forces. Unlawful combatants are likewise subject to capture and detention, but in addition they are subject to trial and punishment by military tribunals for acts which render their belligerency unlawful. The spy who secretly and without uniform passes the military lines of a belligerent in time of war, seeking to gather military information and communicate it to the enemy, or an enemy combatant who without uniform comes secretly through the lines for the purpose of waging war by destruction of life or property, are familiar examples of belligerents who are generally deemed not to be entitled to the status of prisoners of war, but to be offenders against the law of war subject to trial and punishment by military tribunals.

But [the defendants] insist that even if the offenses with which they are charged are offenses against the law of war, their trial is subject to the requirement of the Fifth Amendment that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that such trials ... must be by jury in a civil court....

Presentment by a grand jury and trial by a jury of the vicinage where the crime was committed were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution familiar parts of the machinery for criminal trials in the civil courts. But they were procedures unknown to military tribunals, which are not courts in the sense of the Judiciary Article, and which in the natural course of events are usually called upon to function under conditions precluding resort to such procedures. As this Court has often recognized, it was not the purpose or effect of [the Constitution], read in the light of the common law, to enlarge the then existing right to a jury trial. The object was to preserve unimpaired trial by jury in all those cases in which it had been recognized by the common law and in all cases of a like nature as they might arise in the future, but not to bring within the sweep of the guaranty those cases in which it was then well understood that a jury trial could not be demanded as of right....

We need not inquire whether Congress may restrict the power of the Commander in Chief to deal with enemy belligerents. For the Court is unanimous in its conclusion that the [Constitution] could not at any stage of the proceedings afford any basis for issuing the writ [of habeas corpus]....

The judgment of the district court was affirmed. See also Military Death Penalty Law; Nazi Spies

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the jury statute of the State of Illinois deprived the defendants of a fair trial because it did not disqualify jurors who had prior knowledge of a case. (2) Whether one of the defendants, Spies, was forced to testify against himself because the prosecutor cross-examined him about matters he did not testify to.

Case Holdings: (1) The jury statute of the State of Illinois did not deprive the defendants of a fair trial because it did not disqualify jurors who had prior knowledge of a case, in view of the statute's requirement that such jurors give an oath that they can fairly and impartially decide the issues in the case. (2) Spies, one of the defendants, was not forced to testify against himself when the prosecutor cross-examined him about matters he did not testify to because the issues brought out were pertinent to the case.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved the prosecution of eight defendants by the State of Illinois for the capital murder of a police officer. The defendants were August Spies, Michael Schwab, Samuel Fielden, Albert R. Parsons, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, Louis Lingg, and Oscar W. Neebe. All of the defendants were found guilty by a jury. Seven of the defendants were sentenced to death. One defendant, Neebe, was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. The Illinois Supreme Court affirmed the judgments. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendants' contention that they were deprived of a fair trial because of a State statute that allowed biased jurors to be impaneled; and an argument by Spies that he was forced to testify against himself. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Waite: The chief justice addressed the defendants' attack on the State's jury statute as follows. Under the statute, a juror could not be disqualified because he or she had formed an opinion about a case based upon rumor or media reports, if upon oath the juror stated that he or she believed he or she could fairly and impartially render a verdict in accordance with the law. The chief justice ruled that the statute did not violate the Constitution. It was said that several States had statutes with similar language and that such statutes had never been invalidated by any State's appellate court. The chief justice wrote: “[W]e agree entirely with the supreme court of Illinois in its opinion in this case that the statute on its face ... is not repugnant to ... the constitution.”

In turning to Spies's contention that he was forced to testify against himself, the chief justice disagreed. It was said that Spies voluntarily took the stand and testified on his own behalf. The opinion indicated that once Spies took the stand, “he became bound to submit to a proper cross examination under the law.” The prosecutor cross-examined Spies about matters he testified to and about other matters relevant to the case. The chief justice concluded: “It is not contended that the subject to which the cross examination related was not pertinent to the issue to be tried; and whether a cross examination must be confined to matters pertinent to the testimony [given], or may be extended to the matters in issue, is certainly a question of state law, as administered in the courts of the state, and not of federal law.” The judgment of the Illinois Supreme Court was affirmed. *See also Chicago Labor Riots of 1886; Fielden v. Issue Presented: Whether the president had authority to pardon the defendant’s death sentence upon the condition that the defendant remain in prison for life.

Case Holding: The president had authority to pardon the defendant’s death sentence upon the condition that the defendant remain in prison for life because pardons may be absolute as well as conditional.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William Wells, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the District of Columbia. On the date set for his execution, President Fillmore granted him a pardon upon the condition that he be imprisoned for life. The defendant accepted the conditional pardon. Subsequently, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a trial court for the District of Columbia. In the petition, the defendant contended that the president could not grant a conditional pardon and that the pardon had to be absolute. The trial court denied relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Wayne: Justice Wayne ruled that the president had authority to grant a conditional pardon. He wrote: “Such a thing as a pardon without a designation of its kind is not known in the law. Time out of mind, in the earliest books of the English law, every pardon has its particular denomination. They are general, special or particular, conditional or absolute.” Justice Wayne continued: “[T]he language used in the constitution, conferring the power to grant reprieves and pardons, must be construed with reference to its meaning at the time of its adoption. At the time of our separation from Great Britain, that power had been exercised by the king, as the chief executive.... Hence, when the words to grant pardons were used in the constitution, they conveyed to the mind the authority as exercised by the English crown.... In the convention which framed the constitution, no effort was made to define or change its meaning, although it was limited in cases of impeachment.” The opinion concluded that the president’s authority to grant conditional pardons was consistent with law. The judgment of the trial court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice McLean: Justice McLean dissented from the Court’s decision. He argued that the power of the president was different from that of English kings, insofar as the president’s authority was constitutionally and statutorily limited. Justice McLean urged that the president should not have authority to reduce a death sentence to life imprisonment, absent a statute authorizing life imprisonment as a lesser penalty.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Curtis, in Which Campbell, J., Joined: Justice Curtis dissented from the Court’s opinion. He believed the Court lacked jurisdiction to hear the case. Justice Curtis was of the opinion that, for the Court to have jurisdiction, the trial court had to deny habeas relief on an attack of the original death sentence. He believed that the trial court’s ruling on the president’s conditional pardon was not a collateral matter that the Court had authority to review. See also Clemency

Expiration of Execution Date Generally statutes establish the time in which an execution should be carried out. However, under modern capital punishment law, an execution will rarely be carried out during a time period fixed by statute because defendants usually file numerous appeals. The United States Supreme Court has held that the Constitution is not violated because an execution occurs outside the time set out by statute because of appeals by a defendant. See also In Re Cross

Explosives Aggravator The term “explosives” refers to any type of device that causes an incendiary-like explosion, including chemical devices. Unlike a single shot from a gun, the use of explosives to commit a murder carries the high potential that the effects of the blast will harm many. A large minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have sought to deter the use of explosives by designating the use of explosives as a statutory aggravating circumstance. If the penalty phase jury in those jurisdictions find that explosives were used in the commission of capital murder, the death penalty may be imposed. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Ex Post Facto Clause In Article I, Section 9 of the federal Constitution, it is expressly stated: “No ... ex post facto Law shall be passed.” There are four distinct classes of laws embraced by the Ex Post Facto Clause: (1) every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal, and punishes such action; (2) every law that aggravates the crime of makes it greater than it was when committed; (3) every law that changes the punishment and inflicts a greater punishment than was annexed to the crime when committed; and (4) every law that alters the legal rules of evidence and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense in order to convict the offender.

A frequent issue raised in capital prosecutions involves changing the method of execution. Capital felons have contended that when the method of execution changes after the commission of their crimes, the Ex Post Facto Clause prevents the new method of execution from being applied to them. The argument is further extended by the assertion that since the initial method of execution was repealed, their executions cannot be carried out because no valid law exists stating the method of execution. Courts have consistently and unanimously rejected this argument. Whatever method of execution is provided for by statute when it is time to execute a capital felon may be imposed regardless of when the method was authorized.

An issue that frequently arises, which capital felons have prevailed on, involves changing the standard for considering penalty phase evidence at the appellate level. For example, some legislators have altered the way in which appellate courts must treat penalty phase evidence when an invalid aggravating factor has been introduced. The initial post-Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), death penalty statutes in a few jurisdictions required setting aside the death sentence in such circumstances and awarding a new sentencing hearing. However, legislators decided to change this method and permit appellate courts to remove the invalid factor and reweigh the evidence to see if the death sentence should be affirmed. Courts have found that such a change, while procedural, is substantive in effect and cannot be imposed retroactively under ex post facto principles. See also Bill of Attainder Clause; Dobbert v. Florida; Duncan v. Missouri; Holden v. Minnesota; In Re Medley; Kring v. Missouri; Malloy v. South Carolina; McNulty v. California; Rooney v. North Dakota; Thompson v. Missouri

Extradition Extradition refers to the involuntary or voluntary removal of a suspect from one jurisdiction to another jurisdiction for criminal prosecution. Two contentions are frequently raised regarding extradition.

First, usually when a capital murder suspect is apprehended in a state that does not have capital punishment, he or she will argue against being extradited to the demanding state because of the prospect of being put to death if found guilty. Under modern capital punishment, jurisprudence non-capital punishment states will not refuse to extradite a capital murder suspect to a capital punishment state for prosecution. On the international level, during the late 1990s, Israel refused to extradite Samuel Sheinbein to Maryland to face a capital murder prosecution. Sheinbein and another suspect (who committed suicide in a Maryland jail while awaiting prosecution) were accused by Maryland of killing and dismembering the body of nineteen-year-old Alfredo Enrique Tello in 1997. Sheinbein, seventeen years old at the time, fled the United States to Israel. The highest court in Israel refused to permit Sheinbein to be extradited to Maryland because he would face a capital punishment prosecution. Sheinbein was eventually prosecuted in Israel for the Maryland murder and sentenced to prison.

The second extradition argument that finds frequent use involves defendants sentenced to death in one State, but temporarily extradited to another State for prosecution on other charges. In this situation, defendants have argued that the State which imposed the death sentence no longer has jurisdiction to impose the death penalty, as a result of the temporary extradition. Courts unanimously have held that authority to carry out the death penalty is not lost by a State that temporarily extradites a defendant for further prosecution.

Extreme Duress Mitigator A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have provided that being under extreme duress or substantial domination of another is a statutory mitigating circumstance that may preclude imposition of the death penalty. Courts have defined the extreme duress mitigator to refer to any (1) illegal confinement, (2) legal confinement used for illegal purposes, (3) threats of bodily or other harm, or (4) other means amounting to or tending to coerce the will of the capital defendant and actually induces him or her to commit the crime contrary to his or her will. Low intelligence of a capital defendant and his or her susceptibility to influences of others are relevant to the determination of the existence of the extreme duress mitigator. Courts have rejected impulse control problems as sufficient evidence, standing alone, to establish the extreme duress mitigator. See also Mitigating Circumstances

NUMBER OF JURISDICTIONS USING EXTREME DURESS MITIGATOR

Extreme Mental or Emotional Disturbance Mitigator

A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions provide that "extreme mental or emotional disturbance," at the time of the commission of murder, is a statutory mitigating circumstance that may preclude imposition of the death penalty. This statutory mitigating circumstance does not refer to or include mental retardation or mental impairment due to a foreign substance. Its meaning lies somewhere between mental retardation and mental impairment due to a foreign substance. It does not reach insanity, because that is a defense to a prosecution.

Some guidance in fashioning an understanding of this statutory mitigating circumstance was provided by the Kentucky Supreme Court in McClellan v. Commonwealth, 715 S.W.2d 464 (Ky. 1986). The McClellan court held that:

Extreme emotional disturbance is a temporary state of mind so enraged, inflamed, or disturbed as to overcome one's judgment, and to cause one to act uncontrollably from the impelling force of the extreme emotional disturbance rather than from evil or malicious purposes; it is not a mental disease in itself.

The definition provided by McClellan raises more questions than it answers. However, the definition does nail home the point that mental or emotional disturbance is not a mental disease. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Family and Friends' Testimony Capital felons have consistently argued that they have a right to introduce, during the penalty phase, testimony and petition letters from relatives and friends indicating death is not appropriate in their particular cases. It has been urged by capital felons that such evidence is mitigating and relevant. Some courts have rejected such evidence as being irrelevant. Other courts, however, permit such evidence as non-statutory mitigating evidence. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Family Background Mitigator Courts are unanimous in finding that evidence of a capital felon's family background may be relevant penalty-phase non-statutory mitigating evidence. However, a difficult family background is not mitigating in death penalty analysis unless the capital defendant can show that something in his or her background affected his or her behavior in committing the offense. If such evidence is produced, the penalty phase jury may recommend against the death penalty. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Faulder, Joseph Stanley Joseph Stanley Faulder became the first Canadian executed in the United States in almost fifty years when the State of Texas executed him by lethal injection on June 17, 1999. Faulder was born in Canada on October 19, 1937. While living in Canada, he served three years in Stoney Mountain Prison, Manitoba, for auto theft. After his release in 1959, he was subsequently imprisoned in the British Columbia Prison for several years for an unknown offense.

Faulder eventually drifted to the United States, settling in Texas. His occupation was that of an auto mechanic. On July 8, 1975, Faulder and an accomplice, Linda Summers, broke into the Gladewater home of seventy-five-year-old Inez Phillips. The home was robbed and Phillips was brutally stabbed to death by Faulder.

It was not until 1977 that Texas authorities apprehended Faulder. At the time, he was being held by Colorado officials on unrelated charges. Faulder was extradited to Texas. While in custody, Faulder confessed to the crime. In October 1977, Faulder was charged with capital murder and Summers was charged with conspiracy to commit burglary. Faulder was convicted and sentenced to death in 1978. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals reversed the judgment in 1979 after finding Faulder's confession had been obtained under duress. In July 1981, Faulder was tried a second time and again convicted and sentenced to death. All appeals failed to overturn the second judgment.

Faulder's case had sparked an international outcry and strained relations between Canada and the United States. Canada, which abolished the death penalty in 1976, tried to stop Faulder's execution on the grounds that diplomatic protocol established by the Vienna Convention had been violated, since it learned of Faulder's case after he had been imprisoned on death row for fifteen years. Canadian protests had no impact on Texas officials. On June 17, 1999, Faulder was executed by lethal injection. Five members of Phillips family were present at the execution. See also Foreign Nationals and Capital Punishment

Federal Bureau of Investigation The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) is the leading criminal investigative agency in the nation. The FBI was created at the request of President Theodore Roosevelt in 1909. In its earliest beginnings, the agency was simply called Bureau of Investigation. It was not until July 1, 1935, that a congressional enactment gave the agency its present name.

The FBI was an inefficient and unorganized agency until J. Edgar Hoover took over initially as acting director on May 10, 1924, and, subsequently, on December 10, 1924, as permanent director of the agency. Through Hoover's stewardship, the FBI developed into a powerful and effective national criminal investigative agency. Hoover was single-handedly responsible for expanding the investigative authority of the agency, increasing its staff manifold, and obtaining field offices throughout the nation. Hoover initiated recruitment policies that assured the agency of hiring only highly educated individuals. A training facility was established by Hoover that became the model for all law enforcement agencies in the nation, as well as a model for the international community.

barring future FBI directors from holding office longer than ten years.

The FBI has maintained its elite and highly respected status as an investigative agency after Hoover's passing. The single most prominent post-Hoover capital punishment case investigated by the FBI was that of the 1998 Oklahoma bombing, which led to the execution of Timothy McVeigh. See also Flight 629; Kansas City Massacre; Lindbergh Kidnapping; Nazi Spies; Oklahoma Bombing; Rosenberg, Julius and Ethel; Weinberger Kidnapping

Federal Government The federal government is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The federal government reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), in 1988.

The federal government has a three-tier criminal legal system. The federal government's criminal legal system is composed of a supreme court, courts of appeal, and courts of general jurisdiction. The federal Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and eight associate justices. The federal Courts of Appeal are divided into eleven circuits. Each circuit consists of three or more States. The courts of general jurisdiction in for federal government are called district courts. Capital offenses against the federal government are tried in the district courts.

The federal government has numerous statutes which trigger a prosecution for capital punishment. Summaries of the offenses and their respective code citations are set out below:

1. Destruction of aircraft, motor vehicles, or related facilities resulting in death. 18 U.S.C. §§ 32, 33, 34;

2. A person who, in furtherance or to escape detection of a major drug offense and with the intent to intimidate, harass, injure, or maim, fires a weapon into a group of 2 or more persons and who, in the course of such conduct, kills any person. 18 U.S.C. § 36(b)(2);

3. A person who unlawfully and intentionally, using any device, substance, or weapon — (1) performs an act of violence against a person at an airport serving international civil aviation that causes or is likely to cause serious bodily injury or death; or (2) destroys or seriously damages the facilities of an airport serving international civil aviation or a civil aircraft not in service located thereon or disrupts the services of the airport, if such an act endangers or is likely to endanger safety at that airport, or attempts or conspires to do such an act. 18 U.S.C. § 37(a);

4. Retaliatory murder of a member of the immediate family of law enforcement officials. 18 U.S.C. § 115 (b)(3) [by reference to 18 U.S.C. § 1111];

5. Civil rights offenses resulting in death. 18 U.S.C. §§ 241, 242, 245, 247;

6. Murder of a member of Congress, an important executive official, or a Supreme Court Justice. 18 U.S.C. § 351 [by reference to 18 U.S.C. § 1111];

7. Whoever, with intent or reason to believe that it is to be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of a foreign nation, communicates, delivers, or transmits, or attempts to communicate, deliver, or transmit, to any foreign government, or to any faction or party or military or naval force within a foreign country, whether recognized or unrecognized by the United States, or to any representative, officer, agent, employee, subject, or citizen thereof, either directly or indirectly, any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, note, instrument, appliance, or information relating to the national defense.

Whoever, in time of war, with intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, collects, records, publishes, or communicates, or attempts to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the Armed Forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense, which might be useful to the enemy. 18 U.S.C. § 794;

8. Death resulting from offenses involving transportation of explosives, destruction of government property, or destruction of property related to foreign or interstate commerce. 18 U.S.C. § 844(d), (f), (i);

9. Murder committed by the use of a firearm during a crime of violence or a drug trafficking crime. 18 U.S.C. § 924(j);

10. Murder committed in a Federal Government facility. 18 U.S.C. § 930;

41. Murder related to a continuing criminal enterprise or drug trafficking offense, or drug-related murder of a Federal, State, or local law enforcement officer. 21 U.S.C. § 848(e);

42. Death resulting from aircraft piracy. 49 U.S.C. § 46502.

Capital murder under federal law is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in by the federal government is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of the federal government.

The federal government provides specific statutory aggravating circumstances for capital murder committed under its statutes for (1) espionage or treason, (2) homicide, or (3) drug offense. In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant under federal law, it is required that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase, premised upon a conviction for (1) espionage or treason, (2) homicide, or (3) drug offense:

18 U.S.C. § 3592(b) Aggravating Circumstances for Espionage and Treason

1. The defendant has previously been convicted of another offense involving espionage or treason for which a sentence of either life imprisonment or death was authorized by law.

2. In the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of substantial danger to the national security.

3. In the commission of the offense the defendant knowingly created a grave risk of death to another person.

18 U.S.C. § 3592(c) Aggravating Circumstances for Homicide

1. The death, or injury resulting in death, occurred during the commission or attempted commission of, or during the immediate flight from the commission of the destruction of aircraft or aircraft facilities, destruction of motor vehicles or motor vehicle facilities, violence at international airports, violence against Members of Congress, Cabinet officers, or Supreme Court Justices, an offense involving prisoners in custody of institution or officer, gathering or delivering defense information to aid foreign government, transportation of explosives in interstate commerce for certain purposes, destruction of Government property by explosives, prisoners serving life term, kidnapping, destruction of property affecting interstate commerce by explosives, killing or attempted killing of diplomats, hostage taking, wrecking trains, offenses resulting in death, maritime violence, maritime platform violence, terrorist acts abroad against United States nationals, use of weapons of mass destruction, treason, or aircraft piracy.

2. The defendant has previously been convicted of a Federal or State offense punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than 1 year, involving the use or attempted or threatened use of a firearm against another person.

3. The defendant has previously been convicted of another Federal or State offense resulting in the death of a person, for which a sentence of life imprisonment or a sentence of death was authorized by statute.

4. The defendant has previously been convicted of 2 or more Federal or State offenses, punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than 1 year, committed on different occasions, involving the infliction of, or attempted infliction of, serious bodily injury or death upon another person.

5. The defendant, in the commission of the offense, or in escaping apprehension for the violation of the offense, knowingly created a grave risk of death to 1 or more persons in addition to the victim of the offense.

6. The defendant committed the offense in an especially heinous, cruel, or depraved manner in that it involved torture or serious physical abuse to the victim.

7. The defendant procured the commission of the offense by payment, or promise of payment, of anything of pecuniary value.

8. The defendant committed the offense as consideration for the receipt, or in the expectation of the receipt, of anything of pecuniary value.

9. The defendant committed the offense after substantial planning and premeditation to cause the death of a person or commit an act of terrorism.

10. The defendant has previously been convicted of 2 or more State or Federal offenses punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than one year, committed on different occasions, involving the distribution of a controlled substance.

11. The victim was particularly vulnerable due to old age, youth, or infirmity.

12. The defendant had previously been convicted of a drug offense for which a sentence of 5 or more years may be imposed or had previously been convicted of engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise.

13. The defendant committed the offense in the course of engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise that involved the distribution of drugs to persons under the age of 21.

14. The defendant committed the offense against:

A. The President of the United States, the President-elect, the Vice President, the Vice President-elect, the Vice President-designate, or, if there is no Vice President, the officer next in order of succession to the office of the President of the United States, or any person who is acting as President under the Constitution and laws of the United States;

B. A chief of state, head of government, or the political equivalent, of a foreign nation;

C. A foreign official if the official is in the United States on official business; or

D. A Federal public servant who is a judge, a law enforcement officer, or an employee of a United States penal or correctional institution.

15. The defendant had a prior conviction of sexual assault or child molestation.

16. The defendant intentionally killed or attempted to kill more than one person in a single criminal episode.

18 U.S.C. § 3592(d) Aggravating Circumstances for Drug Offense

1. The defendant has previously been convicted of another Federal or State offense resulting in the death of a person, for which a sentence of life imprisonment or death was authorized by statute.

2. The defendant has previously been convicted of two or more Federal or State offenses, each punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than one year, committed on different occasions, involving the importation, manufacture, or distribution of a controlled substance or the infliction of, or attempted infliction of, serious bodily injury or death upon another person.

3. The defendant has previously been convicted of another Federal or State offense involving the manufacture, distribution, importation, or possession of a controlled substance for which a sentence of five or more years of imprisonment was authorized by statute.

4. In committing the offense, or in furtherance of a continuing criminal enterprise of which the offense was a part, the defendant used a firearm or knowingly directed, advised, authorized, or assisted another to use a firearm to threaten, intimidate, assault, or injure a person.

5. The offense, or a continuing criminal enterprise of which the offense was a part, involved distribution to a person under 21 which was committed directly by the defendant.

6. The offense, or a continuing criminal enterprise of which the offense was a part, involved distribution near a school which was committed directly by the defendant.

7. The offense, or a continuing criminal enterprise of which the offense was a part, involved using minors which was committed directly by the defendant.

8. The offense involved the importation, manufacture, or distribution of a controlled substance, mixed with a potentially lethal adulterant, and the defendant was aware of the presence of the adulterant.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, the federal government has provided by statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3592(a), the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant's capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of the defendant's conduct or to conform conduct to the requirements of law was significantly impaired, regardless of whether the capacity was so impaired as to constitute a defense to the charge.

2. The defendant was under unusual and substantial duress, regardless of whether the duress was of such a degree as to constitute a defense to the charge.

3. The defendant is punishable as a principal in the offense, which was committed by another, but the defendant's participation was relatively minor, regardless of whether the participation was so minor as to constitute a defense to the charge.

4. Another defendant or defendants, equally culpable in the crime, will not be punished by death.

5. The defendant did not have a significant prior history of other criminal conduct.

6. The defendant committed the offense under severe mental or emotional disturbance.

7. The victim consented to the criminal conduct that resulted in the victim's death.

8. Other factors in the defendant's background, record, or character or any other circumstance of the offense that mitigate against imposition of the death sentence.

Under the federal government's capital punishment statutes, a sentence of death must be appealed for review by a federal Court of Appeals. Pursuant to a regulation, 28 CFR § 26.3, the federal government uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The federal death row facility is located in Terre Haute, Indiana. Pursuant to federal laws, the president has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases.

Under the laws of the federal government, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by 28 CFR § 26.4(c):

In addition to the Marshal and Warden, the following persons shall be present at the execution:

1. Necessary personnel selected by the Marshal and Warden;

2. Those attorneys of the Department of Justice whom the Deputy Attorney General determines are necessary;

3. Not more than the following numbers of person selected by the prisoner: (i) One spiritual adviser; (ii) Two defense attorneys; and (iii) Three adult friends or relatives; and

4. Not more than the following numbers of persons selected by the Warden: (i) Eight citizens; and (ii) Ten representatives of the press.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, the federal government executed only three capital felons. A total of forty-three capital felons were on federal death row as of July 2006. One death row inmate was a female. The federal death row population for this period was listed as twenty-four black inmates, eighteen white inmates, and one Native American inmate.

Federal Law Question The United States Supreme Court’s jurisdiction over decisions from State courts derives from 28 U.S.C.A. § 1257, which provides; “Final judgments or decrees rendered by the highest court of a State ... may be reviewed by the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari ... where the validity of a statute of any State is drawn in question on the ground of its being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, or where any ... right ... is specially set up or claimed under the Constitution or the treaties or statutes of ... the United States.” As a result of the limitations imposed by the statute, the Supreme Court created the “not pressed or passed upon rule.” Under this rule, the Supreme Court will not, as a general matter, consider any federal law challenge to a State court decision unless the federal law question was either addressed by or properly presented to the State court.

In the non-capital punishment case of Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983), the Supreme Court cited several purposes underlying the not pressed or passed upon rule: (1) questions not raised below are those on which the record is very likely to be inadequate; (2) the relationship of the Supreme Court to State courts demands that State courts be given an opportunity to consider the constitutionality of an issue; and (3) by requiring that a party first argue to a State court his/her federal issue permits a State court to rest its decision on an adequate and independent State ground.

Insofar as the Supreme Court has on occasion addressed federal law issues not properly presented or addressed by a State court, the Supreme Court is ambivalent about whether the “not pressed or passed upon rule” is jurisdictional (non-waivable) or prudential (waivable). *See also Exhaustion of State Remedies Doctrine; Howell v. Issues Presented: (1) Whether the provisions of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 applied to petitions for habeas corpus filed as original matters in the United States Supreme Court. (2) Whether application of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 unconstitutionally suspended habeas relief.

Case Holdings: (1) The Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 did not preclude the Court from entertaining an application for habeas corpus relief filed as an original matter with the Court. (2) Application of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 did not unconstitutionally suspend habeas relief.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ellis Wayne Felker, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. After the defendant exhausted unsuccessfully State post-conviction remedies, he filed a petition for federal habeas corpus relief. The federal courts denied relief.

While the defendant was awaiting execution, the president of the United States signed into law the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDP Act). The AEDP Act changed the procedures involved with State death row inmates’ ability to seek federal habeas relief. Pursuant to the AEDP Act, federal courts must dismiss a habeas petition of a State prisoner that constitutes the prisoner's second or successive federal habeas application if the claim presented was also presented in a prior application. The AEDP Act also required a prisoner seeking to file a second or successive habeas petition to first a motion in a federal Court of Appeals requesting permission to file a second or successive habeas petition in a federal district court. The AEDP Act prohibited review of a Court of Appeals' decision to deny or grant a prisoner authorization to file a second or successive habeas petition.

After the AEDP Act was signed into law, the defendant filed a motion in a Court of Appeals seeking permission to file a second federal habeas petition. The Court of Appeals denied the request. The defendant appealed the denial to the United States Supreme Court. The Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the constitutionality of the AEDP Act.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist. The chief justice ruled that the AEDP Act did not preclude the Court from entertaining an application for habeas corpus relief filed as an original matter with the Court. It was said that the AEDP Act barred consideration of original habeas petitions in the Courts of Appeals. The chief justice reasoned that although the AEDP Act precluded the Court from reviewing, by appeal or certiorari, a Court of Appeals' decision on a request to file a second or successive habeas petition, the AEDP Act did not mention of the Court's original habeas jurisdiction.

The opinion held that the AEDP Act did not violate Article I, Section 9, Clause 2 of the Constitution, which provides: "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended." It was said that the new restrictions on a second or successive habeas petition constituted a restraint on what was called in habeas practice "abuse of the writ." The chief justice wrote that the doctrine of abuse of the writ referred to a complex and evolving body of equitable principles designed to limit frivolous use of habeas corpus. The opinion found that the restrictions imposed by the AEDP Act were consistent with the doctrine of abuse of the writ and therefore did not amount to a suspension of habeas corpus.

The chief justice concluded that the defendant's petition for an original writ of habeas corpus with the Court was baseless because the defendant failed to establish "exceptional circumstances" justifying habeas relief. It was said that the claims made by the defendant did not materially differ from numerous other claims made by him previously.

The Court denied the defendant's petition for writ of certiorari from the Court of Appeals because of lack of jurisdiction to review the decision under the AEDP Act; and denied the defendant's petition for an original writ of habeas corpus with the Court.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Souter and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote that he agreed with the Court that the AEDP Act did not divest it of authority to grant habeas relief on an original petition with the Court. He also believed that the Court did not go far enough in addressing the Court's jurisdiction to entertain appeals that were precluded under the AEDP Act. Justice Stevens believed that the AEDP Act did not divest the Court of jurisdiction to review interlocutory orders issued by appellate courts involving second or successive habeas petitions.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Stevens and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Souter concurred in the Court's decision. He agreed with the Court that the AEDP Act was constitutional, based upon the issues presented. However, Justice Souter believed that if Congress attempted to foreclose other avenues of review of lower court rulings on habeas petitions, a different outcome might result concerning the constitutionality of the AEDP Act.

Case Note: Ellis Wayne Felker was executed by electrocution on November 15, 1996, by the State of Georgia. See also Calderon v. Ashmus; Habeas Corpus; Stewart v. Martinez-Villareal

Felony see Types of Crimes

Felony Murder Rule The felony murder rule is a common-law doctrine that makes it easier for a prosecutor to obtain a murder conviction when a victim is killed during the commission of another felony offense. If a capital felon commits a homicide during the course of committing a non-homicide felony offense, this conduct constitutes a special circumstance that triggers a death penalty prosecution in a majority of capital punishment jurisdictions. In other words, a non-homicide felony combined with a homicide forms a death-eligible offense.

JURISDICTIONS WHERE FELONY MURDER IS A DEATH-ELIGIBLE OFFENSE

- FELONY MURDER JURISDICTIONS
- ALL OTHER JURISDICTIONS

Under the felony murder rule, a person who commits a felony is liable for any homicide that occurs during the commission of that felony, regardless of whether he or she commits, attempts to commit, or intended to commit that murder. The doctrine thus imposes liability on capital felons for killings committed by co-felons during a felony.

The common law did not make a distinction in punishment for co-defendants convicted of felony murder. That is, even though a victim's death may have actually been caused by a single defendant, under the common law, all defendants involved in the underlying felony were subjected to the same punishment that was provided for the defendant who actually killed the victim.

The compact and simplistic punishment interpretation given to the felony murder rule was fragmented and complicated, as a result of decisions reached by the United States Supreme Court in two separate cases. Both cases involved the issue of whether the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause prohibited imposition of capital punishment for felony murder convictions. In addressing this issue, the Supreme Court dissected the felony murder rule into three distinct new doctrines: (1) felony murder simpliciter, (2) felony murder aggravatus, and (3) felony murder supremus or traditional felony murder.

Felony Murder Simpliciter: The first case to begin the dissection of the felony murder rule was Enmund v. Florida, 458 U.S. 782 (1982). Under the traditional felony murder rule, the defendant and a confederate in Enmund were convicted of committing two murders during the course of a robbery in a home. The defendant was convicted of the two murders in spite of the fact that he did not actually kill the victims and was not present in the home at the time of the killings. The defendant was the driver of the getaway car.

In its analysis of the facts of Enmund, the Supreme Court approved of the defendant's convictions based upon the application of the felony murder rule. The Supreme Court viewed the defendant's role in the crime, driver of the getaway car, as sufficient to convict him for homicides committed during the course of the robbery. However, the Supreme Court was disturbed by the punishment the defendant received. In order to rescue the defendant from the death penalty, the Supreme Court created an exception to the punishment component of the common-law felony murder rule. The Supreme Court held in Enmund that the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause prohibits imposition of the death penalty upon a defendant "who aids and abets a felony in the course of which a murder is committed by others[,] but who does not himself kill, attempt to kill, or intend that a killing take place or that lethal force will be employed." This exception to the traditional felony murder rule is known as the felony murder simpliciter doctrine.

Felony Murder Aggravatus: Several years after the Enmund decision, the Supreme Court was asked to apply the felony murder simpliciter doctrine to invalidate the death sentences imposed upon two brothers in Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137 (1987). The defendants in Tison took part in killing four people during the course of helping their father escape from prison.

The defendants in Tison asked the Supreme Court to overturn their death sentences, on the grounds that the sentences were an unconstitutional imposition of capital punishment for felony murder simpliciter. The Supreme Court analyzed the conduct of the brothers under the elements of felony murder simpliciter and concluded that their conduct fell outside of the felony murder simpliciter doctrine.

The Supreme Court next analyzed the conduct of the defendants under the elements of felony murder supremus or traditional felony murder, which it described as a "category of felony murderers for which Enmund explicitly finds the death penalty permissible under the Eighth Amendment." The elements of felony murder supremus are that the defendant (1) actually killed, (2) attempted to kill, or (3) intended to kill. Supreme Court concluded that the conduct of the brothers in Tison did not fall within the elements of felony murder supremus.

The Supreme Court then reduced the conduct of the brothers down to two factors: (1) their participation in the felonies was major and (2) their mental state was one of reckless indifference to the value of human life. Although this conduct did not satisfy the elements of felony murder simpliciter nor felony murder supremus, the Supreme Court determined that it was nevertheless a midrange level of felony murder. This midrange felony murder is the felony murder aggravatus doctrine.

After reducing the conduct of the brothers to felony murder aggravatus, the Supreme Court then concluded that the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause did not prohibit imposition of the death penalty for felony murder aggravatus. See also Enmund v. Florida; Tison v. Arizona; Transferred Intent Doctrine

Ferguson v. Georgia Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Ferguson v. Georgia, 365 U.S. 570 (1961); Argued: November 14–15, 1960; Decided: March 27, 1961; Opinion of the Court: Justice Brennan; Concurring Opinion: Justice Frankfurter, in which Clark, J., joined; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Clark, in which Frankfurter, J., joined; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Paul James Maxwell argued and briefed; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Dan Winn argued; Eugene Cook, John T. Issue Presented: Whether Georgia's statute prohibiting the defendant from testifying under oath and limiting the defendant to giving only an unsworn written statement violated the Constitution.

Case Holding: The question of the constitutionality of that part of Georgia's statute prohibiting the defendant from giving testimony under oath was not properly before the Court and would not be answered. However, that part of Georgia's statute which limited the defendant to giving only an unsworn written statement violated the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Ferguson, was charged with capital murder by the State of Georgia. At the time of his prosecution, Georgia had a statute which prohibited defendants from testifying on their own behalf. Defendants could only offer unsworn written statements. During the defendant's trial, defense counsel called the defendant as a witness to give unsworn testimony, but the trial court precluded the defendant from actually testifying. The jury convicted the defendant and sentenced him to death. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that he was denied his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel because defense counsel could not question him on the witness stand. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan observed that Georgia was the only State to retain the common-law rule that a person charged with a criminal offense was incompetent to testify under oath in his or her own behalf at his or her trial. It was said that Georgia had two distinct disqualification rules. Under one rule, a defendant could not give testimony under oath. Under the second rule, a defendant could give a written unsworn statement, but could not give live unsworn testimony. During the defendant's trial, he sought to testify under the rule regarding unsworn statements.

Because the defendant invoked the unsworn statement rule, Justice Brennan did not believe the Court had jurisdiction to render a decision on the constitutionality of Georgia's rule, which prohibited sworn testimony by a defendant. The opinion, therefore, limited its holding to the second rule. Justice Brennan held that the part of the Georgia statute which denied the defendant the right to give live "unsworn" testimony and be questioned by his counsel denied the defendant his constitutional right to effective assistance of his counsel. The judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Clark, J., Joined: Justice Frankfurter concurred in the Court's judgment. However, he believed the Court had authority to reach the issue of whether Georgia could constitutionally bar defendants from giving sworn testimony on their own behalf. Justice Frankfurter also believed that in addressing the sworn testimony disqualification rule, the Court should find the rule unconstitutional.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Clark, in Which Frankfurter, J., Joined: Justice Clark concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to indicate that he believed the Court should have addressed and resolved the sworn testimony disqualification rule. Justice Clark pointed out that by allowing that rule to remain intact, the Court created the anomalous situation where defendants could give unsworn live testimony that prosecutors could not cross-examine them on. See also Competency of the Defendant to Be a Witness Field, Stephen J. Stephen J. Field served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1863 to 1897. While on the Supreme Court, Field was known as a conservative who interpreted the Constitution to advance the interest of private industry over government interference.

Field was born on November 4, 1816, in Haddam, Connecticut. He attended Williams College, where he graduated in 1833. Field went on to study law as an apprentice to his brother in New York City. After spending several years in private practice in New York City, Field ventured out west to California. His journey to California proved successful in 1857 when he was elected to the State's highest court. In 1863, President Abraham Lincoln nominated Field to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Field was known to have written only a few capital punishment opinions. The capital punishment opinion authored by Field which had some impact on constitutional jurisprudence was Coleman v. Tennessee. In that case, the Supreme Court was asked to decide whether double jeopardy principles barred the State of Tennessee from prosecuting the defendant for a capital offense that he was prosecuted for by the United States military. Writing for the Court in Coleman, Field held that double jeopardy principles did not bar the State of Tennessee from prosecuting the defendant for an offense that he was prosecuted for by the United States military, but, under the rules of war, such prosecution by the State could not occur. Field died on April 9, 1899.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant had a constitutional right to be present in person when the State's appellate court affirmed his death sentence.

Case Holding: The defendant did not have a constitutional right to be present in person when the State's appellate court affirmed his death sentence because such right was only accorded at the trial court level when the original sentence was pronounced.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Samuel Fielden, was prosecuted, along with seven other defendants, for the capital murder of a police officer by the State of Illinois. The other defendants were August Spies, Michael Schwab, Albert R. Parsons, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, Louis Lingg, and Oscar W. Neebe. All of the defendants were found guilty by a jury. Fielden and six of the other defendants were sentenced to death. One defendant, Neebe, was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. The Illinois Supreme Court affirmed all of the judgments. In Ex Parte Spies, the United States Supreme Court affirmed all of the judgments.

The defendant, Fielden, had his sentence commuted to life imprisonment by the governor of Illinois (Schwab's sentence was also commuted to life imprisonment). Subsequently, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging his constitutional rights were violated because he was not present when the State's appellate court affirmed the original death sentence; therefore, his detention under the commutation was unlawful. The petition was dismissed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan initially addressed the defendant's contention that the Illinois Supreme Court should have amended its ruling affirming the death sentence to reflect that the defendant was not present during the appellate proceedings. The opinion stated "that no right secured to the [defendant] by the constitution of the United States was violated by the refusal of the supreme court of Illinois to allow the proposed amendment of its record."

The opinion then addressed the defendant's argument that he had a constitutional right to be present during the State appellate proceedings. Justice Harlan indicated that no such right existed at the appellate level and ruled that the issue was moot because the Court previously ruled in a companion case, Schwab v. Berggren, that there was no right for a defendant to be present at appellate proceedings. The judgment of the district court was affirmed. See also Allocution; Chicago Labor Riots of 1886; Ex Parte Spies; Schwab v. Berggren

Fiji Capital punishment was abolished for ordinary crimes in Fiji in 1979, but the punishment is still possible for exceptional crimes. Fiji has a democratic government consisting of an executive branch, a legislative branch, and a judicial branch. Its legal system is based on British law. The nation's new constitution took effect July 28, 1998.

The judicial system of Fiji is composed of a magistrate court, high court, court of appeal, and supreme court. Defendants have the right to bail, to a public trial, and to legal counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession was involuntary based upon long periods of isolation, even though no physical force was used against him.

Case Holding: The defendant's confession was involuntary based upon long periods of isolation, even though no physical force was used against him.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Fikes, was convicted of burglary with intent to commit rape and was sentenced to death by the State of Alabama. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his confession was involuntary. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Warren: The chief justice held that the defendant's confession was involuntary. The opinion outlined the Court's justification for its ruling as follows:

Here the prisoner was ... certainly of low mentality, if not mentally ill. He was first arrested by civilians, lodged in jail, and then removed to a state prison far from his home. We do not criticize the decision to remove the prisoner before any possibility of violence might mature, but [the defendant's] location and the conditions of his incarceration are facts to be weighed in connection with the issue before us. For a period of a week, he was kept in isolation, except for sessions of questioning. He saw no friend or relative. Both his father and a lawyer were barred in attempts to see him. The protections to be afforded to a prisoner upon preliminary hearing were denied him, contrary to the law of Alabama. He was questioned for several hours at a time over the course of five days preceding the first confession, and again interrogated at length before the written confession was secured.

The judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Frankfurter concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to stress his belief that physical force was not the only method of rendering a confession involuntary.

Justice Frankfurter wrote: "For myself, I cannot see the difference, with respect to the 'voluntariness' of a confession, between the subversion of freedom of the will through physical punishment and the sapping of the will appropriately to be inferred from the circumstances of this case—detention of the accused virtually incommunicado for a long period; failure to arraign him in that period; horse-shedding of the accused at the intermittent pleasure of the police until confession was forthcoming. No single one of these circumstances alone would in my opinion justify a reversal. I cannot escape the conclusion, however, that in combination they bring the result below the Plimsoll line of 'due process.'"

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Harlan, in Which Reed and Burton, JJ., Joined: Justice Harlan dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the tactics used to obtain the defendant's confession were allowed by due process. He wrote: "In this instance I do not think it can be said that the procedures followed in obtaining [the defendant's] confessions violated constitutional due process. The elements usually associated with cases in which this Court has been constrained to act are, in my opinion, not present here in constitutional proportions, separately or in combination. Concededly, there was no brutality or physical coercion. And psychological coercion is by no means manifest. While the total period of interrogation was substantial, the questioning was intermittent; it never exceeded two or three hours at a time, and all of it took place during normal hours."

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of burglary with intent to commit rape without an accompanying homicide. See also Crimes Not Involving Death; Right to Remain Silent

Film Depictions of Capital Punishment With the inception of big-screen movies and television, film producers have had a fascination with capital punishment. The film industry has never taken a fixed position on capital punishment. Movies have appeared which depict the death penalty as a necessary punishment or as a senseless and primitive form of public revenge. Anti-death penalty films tend to center around innocent defendants being sentenced to death, whereas pro-death penalty films have generally involved characters whom everyone could hate. Between these two extremes, there have appeared films that simply tell the story of real-life defendants who received the death penalty.

The film industry's love affair with the death penalty has made the industry the primary medium in which most of the American public obtains its understanding and knowledge about the punishment. This fact has raised opposing critics. Anti-death penalty proponents have argued that the film industry has a duty not to depict capital punishment as a necessary form of punishment. On the other side, pro-death penalty adherents contend that the film industry should not portray capital punishment as a system that executes innocent defendants. Some of the noteworthy American and international films depicting capital punishment appear below.

Issue Presented: Whether principles of equal protection permit the mandatory imposition of the death penalty upon a prisoner who commits murder while serving a life sentence, even though a prisoner serving less than a life sentence would not face a mandatory sentence of death for committing murder.

Case Holding: Principles of equal protection permit the mandatory imposition of the death penalty upon a prisoner who commits murder while serving a life sentence, even though a prisoner serving less than a life sentence would not face a mandatory sentence of death for committing murder, because no other effective punishment exists for a prisoner already serving a life sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, James W. Finley, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. At the time of the defendant's offense, he was serving a life sentence in the state penitentiary. The defendant was prosecuted under a State statute which made a sentence of death automatic for anyone committing murder while serving a life sentence. In the defendant's appeal to the California Supreme Court, he argued that the statute under which he was prosecuted denied him equal protection of the laws because it did not apply to anyone who was serving a prison sentence that was less than life imprisonment. The State's appellate court rejected the argument and affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice McKenna: Justice McKenna held that the State's statute provided a proper basis for having a different classification between prisoners serving life sentences in the state prison and prisoners serving lesser terms. It was said that a clear distinction existed between prisoners serving life sentences and those who were not. With respect to prisoners serving life sentences, Justice McKenna observed that "there could be no extension of the term of imprisonment as a punishment for crimes they might commit." On the other hand, prisoners who were serving less than life sentences faced the possibility of receiving a life sentence for crimes committed while incarcerated. Therefore, it was reasoned, a deterrent existed for the prisoner serving less than a life sentence whereas no such deterrent existed, other than death, for a prisoner serving a life sentence. The judgment of the California Supreme Court was affirmed. See also In Custody Aggravator

Firefighter Aggravator The work of firefighters is inherently dangerous. The danger is not lessened because of fire being accidentally set or purposely started. Firefighters have died in both. A large minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have responded to the death of firefighters in intentionally set fires by making the death of a firefighter a statutory aggravating circumstance. The penalty phase jury may impose the death penalty if it is found that a defendant caused the death of a firefighter while the firefighter was performing his or her duties. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Firing Squad Death by firing squad is traced to military tradition. Mutiny and desertion were among the offenses that the military punished with death by firing squad. The common law did not accept or reject execution by firing squad. Common-law judges simply never resorted to this method of execution.

The exact date that execution by firing squad was adopted by U.S. civilian law is uncertain. Records reflect, however, that by the 1850s death by firing squad was a part of civilian law in the nation.

The most publicized firing squad execution in the last half of the twentieth century was the January 17, 1977, execution of Gary Gilmore by the state of Utah. Gilmore was executed for having killed Ben Bushnell and Max Jensen. Two issues made Gilmore's execution noteworthy. First, Gilmore refused to appeal his conviction. However, his attorneys filed a state court appeal without his permission. Gilmore demanded the appeal be withdrawn. The appeal eventually reached the United States Supreme Court in the name of Gilmore's mother, who sought to halt his execution. The Supreme Court refused to stay the execution and denied the appeal in a memorandum opinion. However, a separate opinion was written by Chief Justice Warren Burger. In Gilmore v. Utah, 429 U.S. 238 (1972) Chief Justice Burger summed up the matter as follows:

This case may be unique in the annals of the Court. Not only does Gary Mark Gilmore request no relief himself, but on the contrary he has expressly and repeatedly stated since his conviction in the Utah courts that he had received a fair trial and had been well treated by the Utah authorities. Nor does he claim to be innocent of the crime for which he was convicted. Indeed, his only complaint against Utah or its judicial process ... has been with respect to the delay on the part of the State in carrying out the sentence.

The second issue making Gilmore's case significant was the fact that the constitutionality of Utah's death penalty statute was still not determined. Utah had enacted a new death penalty statute in response to the moratorium placed on capital punishment by Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972). Although the Supreme Court had approved of lifting the moratorium in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), no express determination had been made about the validity of Utah's new death penalty statute at the time of Gilmore's prosecution. Chief Justice Burger explained the problem as follows in Gilmore:

[Gilmore's attorneys] informed the trial court that they had advised Gilmore ... that the constitutionality of the Utah death penalty statute had not yet been reviewed by either the Utah Supreme Court or the United States Supreme Court, and that in their view there was a chance that the statute would eventually be held unconstitutional. The trial court itself advised Gilmore ... that the constitutional issue had not yet been resolved, and that both counsel for the State and Gilmore's own counsel would attempt to expedite an appeal to avoid unnecessary delay. Gilmore stated that he did not "care to languish in prison for another day," that the decision was his own.

Subsequent to Gilmore's execution, Utah's death penalty statute was found constitutional by a federal Court of Appeals in the case of Andrew v. Shulsen, 802 F.2d 1256 (10th Cir. 1986).

Firing Squad Jurisdictions: Only three capital punishment jurisdictions, Utah, Idaho and Oklahoma, allow execution by firing squad. In Utah, the firing squad is an option for inmates sentenced before a specific date; the firing squad is also designated for use in the event the State's primary method of execution is found unconstitutional. Idaho utilizes the firing squad only in the event that its primary method of execution cannot be used for any that death is slow. A capital felon executed by firing squad literally has to bleed to death while in agony from the wounds.

Firing Squad Protocol: The general procedure for carrying out death by firing squad involves the use of a five-person firing squad. The members of the firing squad use rifles (pistols have been known to be used), some of which have blanks. The use of blanks is done so that the firing squad team will not know who actually killed the prisoner.

The execution is carried out on prison grounds in an area not accessible to view by other prisoners or the public. The prisoner is strapped to a chair facing the firing squad. A hood is placed over the prisoner's head. A circular target is placed on the torso of the prisoner. A designated official gives a synchronized count, while the firing squad takes aim at from thirty to forty feet away from the prisoner. When the designated official shouts, "Fire," the prisoner is put to death. See also Execution Option Jurisdictions; Methods of Execution; Wilkerson v. Utah

First Execution of the Twenty-First Century Oklahoma holds the distinction of carrying out the first execution in the twenty-first century. Johnson was convicted of the 1981 rape and murder of a seventy-six-year-old woman. See also Last Execution of the Twentieth Century

Fish, Albert Hamilton Albert Hamilton Fish was a child molester, serial killer, sadomasochist, and cannibal. Fish was born in Washington, D.C., on May 19, 1870. At around the age of five, after the death of his father, Fish was placed in an orphanage by his mother. He remained at the orphanage for two years before his mother took him back home. Fish later reported that while at the orphanage he was beaten and sexually abused. He also reported that it was at the orphanage that his mind was ruined. In reason. Oklahoma provides for the use of a firing squad in the event that its other two designated methods of execution are found unconstitutional.

Constitutionality of Firing Squad: The constitutionality of execution by firing squad was answered by the United States Supreme Court in Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U.S. 130 (1878). In Wilkerson, the Supreme Court held: "Cruel and unusual punishments are forbidden by the Constitution, but the ... punishment of shooting as a mode of executing the death penalty ... is included in that category."

The decision in Wilkerson has stood unassailable for over 120 years. A major criticism of death by firing squad is 1890, Fish moved to New York City, where he hired himself out as a house painter. In 1898, Fish married and fathered six children. His wife left him in 1917.

Fish's first murder occurred in 1910. The victim of the murder was sexually abused, tortured, and mutilated. Fish did not kill again until 1919. After the second killing, Fish traveled around the country, killing and sexually abusing children. Fish later confessed that he traveled to twenty-three states and killed a child in each state. In addition, he alleged that he sexually assaulted over four hundred children.

The events that led to Fish's downfall began in May 1928, when he responded to an advertisement in a newspaper published by a young man seeking a job. The advertisement was published by Edward Budd, an eighteen-year-old man who was living with his parents and younger siblings. Fish visited the Budd family and introduced himself using the name of Frank Howard. Fish informed the Budd family that he was a farmer from Long Island and looking to employ a young worker. An agreement to employ Edward was reached and Fish promised to return in a week to take Edward to his farm.

When Fish returned to the Budds' home he convinced the family to allow their ten-year-old daughter, Grace, to accompany him to a children's birthday party that a nearby relative was having. When Fish left with Grace, her family never saw her again.

The disappearance of Grace led to an investigation that lasted for seven years. The police unraveled the mystery of Grace's disappearance after her mother received an anonymous letter on November 11, 1934. In the letter, the author wrote that he had abducted Grace, strangled her, dismembered her body, and cooked and eaten her flesh. Mrs. Grace gave the letter to the police. After examining envelope in which the letter was mailed, the police uncovered the imprint of the letters N.Y.P.C.B.A. on the envelope. The letters stood for New York Private Chauffeur's Benevolent Association. After an interview of all the drivers for the Association, the police learned that one of the drivers had left some of the Association's stationery in a boardinghouse where he once stayed. The police went to the boardinghouse and gave the owner a description of the man who had identified himself as Frank Howard. The boardinghouse owner informed the police that a man fitting the description was living there, but that he had not been around for a few days.

On December 13, 1934, three days after the police visited the boardinghouse, the police received a call informing them that their suspect had returned to the boardinghouse. The police rushed to the boardinghouse and arrested Fish. While at the police station, Fish confessed to killing Grace. He told the police that he had originally planned to abduct Edward Budd, but that he changed his mind after seeing how big and strong he was. Fish went on to inform the police where the skeletal remains of Grace were buried. The remains were recovered and Fish was charged with murder.

Albert Hamilton Fish confessed to traveling to twenty-three states and killing a child in each state. He was executed by the State of New York on January 16, 1936. (New York Police Department)

Prior to Fish's trial, he underwent a battery of psychiatric tests. From those tests, it was concluded that Fish was a sadomasochist who enjoyed driving needles into his body, mostly around his genitals. On March 11, 1935, Fish's trial began in White Plains, New York. Fish's defense was insanity; however, a jury found him guilty. On March 25, 1935, the trial judge sentenced him to death. Fish was executed by electrocution on January 16, 1936. An autopsy of his body revealed that, over the course of his life, Fish had inserted 29 needles in his pelvic region. See also Serial Killer

Issue Presented: Whether it was error for the trial court of the District of Columbia to refuse to instruct the jury on the defendant's mental deficiency so as to allow for a sentence less than death.

Case Holding: The Court declined to impose a non-constitutional rule upon the District of Columbia, because the issue was one of local concern.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Fisher, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the District of Columbia. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that it was error for the trial court to refuse to instruct the jury that they should consider the evidence of his psychopathic aggressive tendencies, low emotional response, and borderline mental deficiency to determine whether he was guilty of capital murder or murder in the second degree. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Reed: Justice Reed held that the relief sought by the defendant was for the Court to declare that mental deficiency which does not show legal irresponsibility should be a relevant factor in determining whether an accused is guilty of capital murder or murder in the second degree. It was said that for the "Court to force the District of Columbia to adopt such a requirement for criminal trials would involve a fundamental change in the common law theory of responsibility." Justice Reed ruled that the Court was not prepared to force an evidentiary rule on the courts of the District of Columbia. The opinion concluded: "We express no opinion upon whether the theory for which [the defendant] contends should or should not be made the law of the District of Columbia. Such a radical departure from common law concepts is more properly a subject for the exercise of legislative power or at least for the discretion of the courts of the District. The administration of criminal law in matters not affected by Constitutional limitations or a general federal law is a matter peculiarly of local concern." The judgment of the Court of appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the defendant was entitled to have the jury instructed on his mental deficiency. Justice Frankfurter wrote: "Men ought not to go to their doom because this Court thinks that conflicting legal conclusions of an abstract nature seem to have been 'nicely balanced' by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The deference which this Court pays to that Court's adjudications in ordinary cases involving issues essentially of minor or merely local importance seems out of place when the action of this Court, no matter how phrased, sustains a death sentence at the seat of our Government as a result of a trial over which this Court, by direction of Congress, has the final reviewing power. This Court cannot escape responsibility for the death sentence if it affirms the judgment. One can only hope that even more serious consequences will not follow, which would be the case if the Court's decision were to give encouragement to doctrines of criminal law that have only obscurantist precedents of the past to recommend them."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Murphy, in Which Frankfurter and Rutledge, JJ., Joined: Justice Murphy dissented from the Court's decision in the case. He believed that the Court was wrong in refusing to address the issue and wrong in refusing to adopt the position taken by the defendant. Justice Murphy stated his argument thus:

As this case reaches us, we are not met with any question as to whether [the defendant] killed an individual. That fact is admitted. Our sole concern here is with the charge given to the jury concerning the elements entering into the various degrees of murder for which [the defendant] could be convicted.

The rule that this Court ordinarily will refrain from reviewing decisions dealing with matters of local law in the District of Columbia is a sound and necessary one. But it is not to be applied without discretion. Like most rules, this one has its exceptions. And those exceptions are grounded primarily in considerations of public policy and of sound administration of justice.

Here we have more than an exercise in statutory construction or in local law. It is a capital case involving not a question of innocence or guilt but rather a consideration of the proper standards to be used in judging the degree of guilt. What the Court says and decides here today will affect the life of the [defendant] as well as the lives of countless future criminals in the District and in the various states....

The issue here is narrow yet replete with significance. Stated briefly, it is this: May mental deficiency not amounting to complete insanity properly be considered by the jury in determining whether a homicide has been committed with the deliberation and premeditation necessary to constitute first degree murder? The correct answer, in my opinion, was given by this Court more than sixty years ago ... when it said, "But when a statute establishing different degrees of murder requires deliberate premeditation in order to constitute murder in the first degree, the question whether the accused is in such a condition of mind, by reason of drunkenness or otherwise, as to be capable of deliberate premeditation, necessarily becomes a material subject of consideration by the jury."

More precisely, there are persons who, while not totally insane, possess such low mental powers as to be incapable of the deliberation and premeditation requisite to statutory first degree murder. Yet under the rule adopted by the court below, the jury must either condemn such persons to death on the false premise that they possess the mental requirements of a first degree murderer or free them completely from criminal responsibility and turn them loose among society. The jury is forbidden to find them guilty of a lesser degree of murder by reason of their generally weakened or disordered intellect.

Common sense and logic recoil at such a rule. And it is difficult to marshal support for it from civilized concepts of justice or from the necessity of protecting society. When a man's life or liberty is at stake he should be adjudged according to his personal culpability as well as by the objective seriousness of his crime. That elementary principle of justice is applied to those who kill while intoxicated or in the heat of passion; if such a condition destroys their deliberation and premeditation the jury may properly consider that fact and convict them of a lesser degree of murder. No different principle should be utilized in the case of those whose mental deficiency is of a more permanent character.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rutledge: In setting out his dissent from the Court's decision in the case, Justice Rutledge stated the following: "Because I think the charge was deficient in not including the requested instruction or one substantially similar, thus in my opinion failing to meet the standard set by Congress in the Code, and because the effect of this deficiency was magnified by the failure to point up the instructions given in some more definite relation to the evidence, I think the judgment should be reversed."

Case Note: The position taken by the dissenting justices eventually was adopted by the Court under modern capital punishment. It is a constitutional violation under modern capital punishment to refuse to instruct a penalty phase jury on mitigating evidence of a defendant's mental disease that is short of insanity. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Flight 629 Flight 629 took off from Stapleton Airport in Denver, Colorado, bound for Seattle, Washington, at 6:52 P.M. on November 1, 1955. The plane was carrying thirty-nine passengers and five crew members. Within eleven minutes of the plane's departure, it exploded. All forty-four persons aboard were instantly killed.

Shortly after the explosion, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) launched an investigation into the cause of the explosion. Wreckage from the plane was recovered and analyzed. It was determined that the explosion was not due to a malfunction of the plane. Further investigation of the wreckage led to the conclusion that a bomb was placed in the rear cargo pit of the plane.

The next phase of the investigation involved obtaining a background check on each of the forty-four individual victims. During this phase, investigators found a considerable quantity of personal effects of a passenger named Daisy E. King. Through the personal effects of King, authorities learned that she had a son, Jack Gilbert Graham.

Graham was born on January 23, 1932. He was married, with two infant children, and lived in Denver. His mother had been living in his home before her death. Graham was initially interviewed by authorities on November 10, 1955. Subsequent interviews followed as authorities began to mount suspicion toward Graham. The authorities became particularly suspicious toward him after his wife informed them that Graham had given his mother a wrapped Christmas gift before she boarded the plane. In a separate interview with

Jack Gilbert Graham committed the first aerial mass murder in the nation's history. (Colorado State Archives)

Graham, he told authorities his wife was mistaken and that he had intended to buy his mother a tool set for Christmas but could not find the right kind.

On November 13, FBI agents were sent to make a search of Graham's home. During the search, a small roll of copper wire with yellow insulation was located in a shirt belonging to Graham. The wire appeared to be the type used in detonating primer caps. Authorities also found a travel insurance policy on the life of King, dated November 1, 1955, the day of the explosion. The policy paid $37,500 and named Graham as the beneficiary. The policy was found hidden in a small cedar chest in one of the bedrooms at Graham's home.

Graham was summoned to FBI headquarters and questioned intensely. He eventually confessed. Graham told authorities that he had used a time bomb composed of twenty-five sticks of dynamite, two electric primer caps, a timer, and a six-volt battery. On November 17, Graham was charged with the murder of his mother by the State of Colorado.

The trial started on April 16, 1956, and lasted several weeks. On May 5, after deliberating for less than two hours, the jury found Graham guilty of murder. He was sentenced to death. Graham's attorneys filed a motion for a new trial. However, on May 15, Graham informed the trial judge that he did not want a new trial and that he did not want his case appealed. Graham's attorneys filed an appeal, against his wishes, but the State high court affirmed the judgment. Graham was executed by lethal gas at Colorado State Penitentiary on January 11, 1957. See also Mass Murder Florida The State of Florida is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on December 8, 1972.

Florida has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, courts of appeal, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Florida Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Florida District Courts of Appeal are divided into five districts. Each district has a chief judge and eight or more judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of Florida are tried in the circuit courts.

Florida's capital punishment offenses are set out under Fla. Code § 782.04. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. When perpetrated from a premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed or any human being;

2. When committed by a person engaged in the perpetration of, or in the attempt to perpetrate, any (a) drug trafficking offense; (b) arson; (c) sexual battery; (d) robbery; (e) burglary; (f) kidnapping; (g) escape; (h) aggravated child abuse; (i) aggravated abuse of an elderly person or disabled adult; (j) aircraft piracy; (k) unlawful throwing, placing, or discharging of a destructive device or bomb; (l) carjacking; (m) home-invasion robbery; (n) aggravated stalking; (o) murder of another human being; (p) resisting an officer with violence to his or her person; (q) felony that is an act of terrorism or is in furtherance of an act of terrorism; or

3. Which resulted from the unlawful distribution of cocaine or opium or any synthetic or natural salt, compound, derivative, or preparation of opium by a person 18 years of age or older, when such drug is proven to be the proximate cause of the death of the user.

In addition, Florida has established a number of drug trafficking offenses under Fla. Code § 893.135, which may result in the imposition of the death penalty, if a person is killed.

Capital murder in Florida is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Florida is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, a majority of the jury must agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to sentence the defendant to life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is not binding on the trial court under the laws of Florida. The trial court may accept or reject the jury's determination on punishment and impose whatever sentence he or she believes the evidence established.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Fla. Code § 921.141(5) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

a. The capital felony was committed by a person previously convicted of a felony and under sentence of imprisonment or placed on community control or on felony probation.

b. The defendant was previously convicted of another capital felony or of a felony involving the use or threat of violence to the person.

c. The defendant knowingly created a great risk of death to many persons.

d. The capital felony was committed while the defendant was engaged, or was an accomplice, in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, or flight after committing or attempting to commit, any: robbery; sexual battery; aggravated child abuse; abuse of an elderly person or disabled adult resulting in great bodily harm, permanent disability, or permanent disfigurement; arson; burglary; kidnapping; aircraft piracy; or unlawful throwing, placing, or discharging of a destructive device or bomb.

e. The capital felony was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody.

f. The capital felony was committed for pecuniary gain.

g. The capital felony was committed to disrupt or hinder the lawful exercise of any governmental function or the enforcement of laws.

h. The capital felony was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel.

i. The capital felony was a homicide and was committed in a cold, calculated, and premeditated manner without any pretense of moral or legal justification.

j. The victim of the capital felony was a law enforcement officer engaged in the performance of his or her official duties.

k. The victim of the capital felony was an elected or appointed public official engaged in the performance of his or her official duties if the motive for the capital felony was related, in whole or in part, to the victim's official capacity.

l. The victim of the capital felony was a person less than 12 years of age.

m. The victim of the capital felony was particularly vulnerable due to advanced age or disability, or because the defendant stood in a position of familial or custodial authority over the victim.

n. The capital felony was committed by a criminal street gang member.

o. The capital felony was committed by a person designated as a sexual predator or a person previously designated as a sexual predator who had the sexual predator designation removed.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Florida has provided by Fla. Code § 921.1416 the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

a. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity.

b. The capital felony was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance.

c. The victim was a participant in the defendant's conduct or consented to the act.

d. The defendant was an accomplice in the capital felony committed by another person and his or her participation was relatively minor.

e. The defendant acted under extreme duress or under the substantial domination of another person.

f. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of his or her conduct or to conform his or her conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired.

g. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime.

h. The existence of any other factors in the defendant's background that would mitigate against imposition of the death penalty.

Florida has a separate statute that provides for determining whether to impose the death penalty upon a defendant convicted of capital murder while committing specific drug trafficking offenses under Fla. Code § 893.135. Under the drug trafficking death penalty sentencing statute, Fla. Code § 921.142 6, in order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

a. The capital felony was committed by a person under a sentence of imprisonment.

b. The defendant was previously convicted of another capital felony or of a state or federal offense involving the distribution of a controlled substance that is punishable by a sentence of at least 1 year of imprisonment.

c. The defendant knowingly created grave risk of death to one or more persons such that participation in the offense constituted reckless indifference or disregard for human life.

d. The defendant used a firearm or knowingly directed, advised, authorized, or assisted another to use a firearm to threaten, intimidate, assault, or injure a person in committing the offense or in furtherance of the offense.

e. The offense involved the distribution of controlled substances to persons under the age of 18 years, the distribution of controlled substances within school zones, or the use or employment of persons under the age of 18 years in aid of distribution of controlled substances.

f. The offense involved distribution of controlled substances known to contain a potentially lethal adulterant.

g. The defendant:

1. Intentionally killed the victim;

2. Intentionally inflicted serious bodily injury which resulted in the death of the victim; or

3. Intentionally engaged in conduct intending that the victim be killed or that lethal force be employed against the victim, which resulted in the death of the victim.

h. The defendant committed the offense as consideration for the receipt, or in the expectation of the receipt, of anything of pecuniary value.

i. The defendant committed the offense after planning and premeditation.

j. The defendant committed the offense in a heinous, cruel, or depraved manner in that the offense involved torture or serious physical abuse to the victim.

Under Florida's capital drug trafficking sentencing statute, Fla. Code § 921.142 7, the following statutory mitigating circumstances are set out:

a. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity.

b. The capital felony was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance.

c. The defendant was an accomplice in the capital felony committed by another person, and the defendant's participation was relatively minor.

d. The defendant was under extreme duress or under the substantial domination of another person.

e. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of her or his conduct or to conform her or his conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired.

f. The age of the defendant at the time of the offense.

g. The defendant could not have reasonably foreseen that her or his conduct in the course of the commission of the offense would cause or would create a grave risk of death to one or more persons.

h. The existence of any other factors in the defendant's background that would mitigate against imposition of the death penalty.

Under Florida's capital punishment statute, the Florida Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Florida permits capital felons to choose between death by lethal injection or the electric chair. The State's death row facility for men is located in Starke, Florida, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Pembroke Pines, Florida.

Pursuant to the laws of Florida, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor must obtain the consent of the State's Board of Executive Clemency in order to grant clemency.

Under the laws of Florida, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Fla. Code § 922.11:

1. The warden of the state prison or a deputy designated by him or her shall be present at the execution. The warden shall set the day for execution within the week designated by the Governor in the warrant.

2. Twelve citizens selected by the warden shall witness the execution. A qualified physician shall be present and announce when death has been inflicted. Counsel for the convicted person and ministers of religion requested by the convicted person may be present. Representatives of news media may be present under rules approved by the Secretary of Corrections. All other persons, except prison officers and correctional officers, shall be excluded during the execution.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Florida executed sixty-three capital felons. During this period, Florida executed two female capital felons. A total of 396 capital felons were on death row in Florida as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as 139 black inmates, 220 white inmates, thirty-five Hispanic inmates, one Asian inmate, and one Native American inmate.

Issue Presented: Whether the Florida Supreme Court applied the wrong legal standard in finding the defendant’s attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel by conceding the defendant’s guilt.

Case Holding: The Florida Supreme Court applied the wrong legal standard in finding the defendant’s attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel by conceding the defendant’s guilt.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Florida prosecuted the defendant, Joe Elton Nixon, for the 1984 murder of Jeanne Bickner. As a result of the strong evidence of guilt, the defendant’s attorney attempted to enter a plea agreement with the prosecutor, but the prosecutor refused. The defendant’s attorney informed him that, during the trial, the attorney would concede the defendant’s guilt in order to concentrate on trying to convince the jury not impose the death penalty. The defendant did not agree nor disagree with the strategy. A jury ultimately found the defendant guilty and sentenced him to death. During the appeal the defendant, with new counsel, argued that his trial attorney provided ineffective assistance of counsel by conceding his guilt without express authorization to do so. The Florida Supreme Court agreed and granted the defendant a new trial. In doing so, the court applied the United States Supreme Court decision in United States v. Cronin, 466 U.S. 648 (1984). Under Cronin, if an attorney completely fails to represent a defendant, ineffective assistance and prejudice are presumed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide whether Cronin applied.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Ginsburg: Justice Ginsburg held that Cronin was not applicable because the defendant’s attorney did not fail to represent him. The opinion found that the case should have been analyzed under the standard set out in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984). Justice Ginsburg addressed the matter as follows:

An attorney undoubtedly has a duty to consult with the client regarding important decisions, including questions of overarching defense strategy. That obligation, however, does not require counsel to obtain the defendant’s consent to every tactical decision. But certain decisions regarding the exercise or waiver of basic trial rights are of such moment that they cannot be made for the defendant by a surrogate. A defendant, this Court affirmed, has the ultimate authority to determine whether to plead guilty, waive a jury, testify in his or her own behalf, or take an appeal. Concerning those decisions, an attorney must both consult with the defendant and obtain consent to the recommended course of action....

[Defense counsel] was obliged to, and in fact several times did, explain his proposed trial strategy to Nixon. Given Nixon’s constant resistance to answering inquiries put to him by counsel and court, [counsel] was not additionally required to gain express consent before conceding Nixon’s guilt....

The Florida Supreme Court’s erroneous equation of [defense counsel’s] concession strategy to a guilty plea led it to apply the wrong standard in determining whether counsel’s performance ranked as ineffective assistance. The court first presumed deficient performance, then applied the presumption of prejudice that United States v. Cronin, 466 U.S. 648 (1984), reserved for situations in which counsel has entirely failed to function as the client's advocate. The Florida court therefore did not hold Nixon to the standard prescribed in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984), which would have required Nixon to show that counsel's concession strategy was unreasonable....

On the record thus far developed, [defense counsel's] concession of Nixon's guilt does not rank as a failure to function in any meaningful sense as the Government's adversary. Although such a concession in a run-of-the-mine trial might present a closer question, the gravity of the potential sentence in a capital trial and the proceeding's two-phase structure vitally affect counsel's strategic calculus. Attorneys representing capital defendants face daunting challenges in developing trial strategies, not least because the defendant's guilt is often clear. Prosecutors are more likely to seek the death penalty, and to refuse to accept a plea to a life sentence, when the evidence is overwhelming and the crime heinous. In such cases, avoiding execution may be the best and only realistic result possible.

To summarize, in a capital case, counsel must consider in conjunction both the guilt and penalty phases in determining how best to proceed. When counsel informs the defendant of the strategy counsel believes to be in the defendant's best interest and the defendant is unresponsive, counsel's strategic choice is not impeded by any blanket rule demanding the defendant's explicit consent. Instead, if counsel's strategy, given the evidence bearing on the defendant's guilt, satisfies the Strickland standard, that is the end of the matter; no tenable claim of ineffective assistance would remain.

The decision of the Florida Supreme Court was reversed and the conviction and death sentence were reinstated. See also Right to Counsel Issue Presented: Whether the Eighth Amendment prohibits the execution of a death row inmate while he or she is insane.

Case Holding: The Eighth Amendment prohibits the execution of a death row inmate while he or she is insane.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Alvin Bernard Ford, was convicted by the state of Florida of capital murder in 1974 and sentenced to death. There was no suggestion that he was incompetent at the time of his offense, at trial, or at sentencing. However, he subsequently began to manifest changes in behavior, indicating a mental disorder. This led to extensive separate examinations by two psychiatrists at his counsel's request, one of whom concluded that the defendant was not competent to be put to death. Defense counsel then invoked a Florida statute governing the determination of a death row inmate's competency. In compliance with statutory procedures, the governor of Florida appointed three psychiatrists, who together interviewed the defendant for thirty minutes. The governor's order directed that the attorneys should not participate in the examination in any adversarial manner. Each psychiatrist filed a separate report with the governor, to whom the statute delegated the final decision. The reports reached conflicting diagnoses but were in accord that the defendant was competent to be executed.

Defense counsel attempted to submit to the governor other written materials, including the reports of the two psychiatrists who had previously examined the defendant, but the governor's office refused to inform defense counsel whether the submission would be considered. The governor subsequently signed a death warrant without explanation or statement.

After unsuccessfully seeking a hearing in State court to determine anew the defendant's competency, defense counsel filed a habeas corpus proceeding in federal district court, seeking an evidentiary hearing. The federal court denied the petition without a hearing and the federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall concluded that the Eighth Amendment prohibited the State from inflicting the death penalty upon a prisoner who is insane. The conclusion was justified, in part, by the position taken by the common law. The common law barred execution of an insane prisoner because such an execution had questionable retributive value, presented no example to others and therefore had no deterrence value. The majority opinion found that the common law rationale "have no less logical, moral, and practical force at present."

The opinion also indicated that Florida's statutory procedures for determining a condemned inmate's sanity provided inadequate assurance of accuracy. The first defect in Florida's procedures was its failure to include the defendant in the truth-seeking process. It was said that any procedure was necessarily inadequate that precluded a defendant or defense counsel from presenting material relevant to the issue of sanity or bars consideration of that material by the factfinder. The opinion noted that a related flaw in the procedures was the denial of any opportunity to challenge or impeach the findings of the state-appointed psychiatrists, thus creating a significant possibility that the ultimate decision made in reliance on such experts will be distorted. Justice Marshall found the most striking defect in the procedures was the placement of the ultimate decision wholly within the executive branch of state government. The opinion concluded that the governor, who appointed the experts and ultimately decided whether the State would be able to carry out the death sentence, could not be said to have the neutrality that is necessary for reliability in the factfinding proceedings.

As a result of the defendant being denied a factfinding procedure "adequate to afford a full and fair hearing" on the issue of insanity, the opinion held that the defendant was entitled to an evidentiary hearing in the federal district court on the question of his competence to be executed. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Powell: Justice Powell indicated that he agreed that the Constitution barred executing a defendant who was insane. He indicated, however, that he "would not require the kind of full-scale 'sanity trial' that Justice Marshall appears to find necessary." He believed that the States could satisfy constitutional due process by providing an impartial officer or board to receive evidence and argument from the inmate's counsel, including expert psychiatric evidence. Beyond these requirements, Justice Marshall believed the States retained substantial discretion to create appropriate procedures.

Justice Powell believed that the test for whether an inmate is insane for constitutional purposes is whether the inmate is aware of his or her impending execution and of the reason for it. He believed the defendant's claim fell within this definition and, because the defendant's claim was not adjudicated fairly, he was entitled to have his claim adjudicated on remand by the federal district court.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor indicated that she agreed with the majority opinion insofar as finding that Florida did not provide minimal procedural protections required by due process. But, she "would vacate the judgment and remand to the Court of Appeals with directions that the case be returned to the Florida system so that a hearing can be held in a manner consistent with the requirements of the Due Process Clause. I cannot agree, however, that the federal courts should have any role whatever in the substantive determination of a defendant's competency to be executed."

Justice O'Connor wrote that she was "in full agreement with Justice Rehnquist's conclusion that the Eighth Amendment does not create a substantive right not to be executed while insane. Accordingly, I do not join the Court's reasoning or opinion."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist, in Which Burger, CJ., Joined: Justice Rehnquist argued that the majority was wrong in giving constitutional backing to the issue of an inmate's sanity at the time of execution: "Creating a constitutional right to a judicial determination of sanity before that sentence may be carried out, whether through the Eighth Amendment or the Due Process Clause, needlessly complicates and postpones still further any finality in this area of the law."

Justice Rehnquist reasoned: "The defendant has already had a full trial on the issue of guilt, and a trial on the issue of penalty; the requirement of still a third adjudication offers an invitation to those who have nothing to lose by accepting it to advance entirely spurious claims of insanity. A claim of insanity may be made at any time before sentence and, once rejected, may be raised again; a prisoner found sane two days before execution might claim to have lost his sanity the next day, thus necessitating another judicial determination of his sanity and presumably another stay of his execution."

Case Note: The decision in the case did not have a major impact in spite of rendering the first decision by the United States Supreme Court that the Constitution barred executing an insane defendant. The reason for the lack of an impact by the opinion was due to an observation made in Justice Rehnquist's dissent: "[N]o State sanctions execution of the insane." All jurisdictions had followed the common-law rule (by statute or judicial decision) barring execution of insane prisoners. See also Atkins v. Virginia; Insanity while Awaiting Execution; Mentally Retarded Capital Felon; Penry v. Lynaugh

Foreign Nationals and Capital Punishment For the purpose of capital punishment, a foreign national is a defendant having citizenship in another country, but is a resident in the United States. The critical issue that has consistently clouded capital prosecution of foreign nationals is their right to communicate with their consular representatives in the United States. Unfortunately, this right has been routinely violated, so that consular representatives are rarely notified until long after foreign nationals have been prosecuted. In several instances, foreign nations have sought to halt the execution of foreign nationals in the United States because of the failure of local officials to notify consular representatives. In no instance has such pressure actually halted an execution.

The United States ratified the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations in 1969. Article 36 of the Convention expressly requires local officials to inform consulars in a timely manner when foreign nationals are arrested and to inform arrested foreign nationals of their right to consular assistance. As a general matter, federal and local officials have been extremely relaxed in notifying consulars of the arrest of nationals and of informing foreign nationals of their right to consult with consulars. However, in response to a decision by the International Court of Justice, in the case of Mexico v. United States, 2004 I.C.J. 128 (March 31), President George W. Bush issued a February 28, 2005, memorandum for the Attorney General, wherein it was said that local authorities had to give effect to the Mexico decision. The decision in Mexico required local judicial review of the convictions and death sentences of fifty-one Mexican nationals who were not informed of their right to have consular assistance.

Abdul Hamin Awkal, a Lebanese foreign national, is on death row in Ohio for killing his wife and brother-in-law. (Ohio Department of Corrections)

Communication and Contact with Nationals of the Sending State

1. With a view to facilitating the exercise of consular functions relating to nationals of the sending State: (a) consular officers shall be free to communicate with nationals of the sending State and to have access to them. Nationals of the sending State shall have the same freedom with respect to communication with and access to consular officers of the sending State; (b) if he so requests, the competent authorities of the receiving State shall, without delay, inform the consular post of the sending State if, within its consular district, a national of that State is arrested or committed to prison or to custody pending trial or is detained in any other manner. Any communication addressed to the consular post by the person arrested, in prison, custody or detention shall also be forwarded by the said authorities without delay. The said authorities shall inform the person concerned without delay of his rights under this subparagraph; (c) consular officers shall have the right to visit a national of the sending State who is in prison, custody or detention, to converse and correspond with him and to arrange for his legal representation. They shall also have the right to visit any national of the sending State who is in prison, custody or detention in their district in pursuance of a judgment. Nevertheless, consular officers shall refrain from taking action on behalf of a national who is in prison, custody or detention if he expressly opposes such action.

2. The rights referred to in paragraph 1 of this Article shall be exercised in conformity with the laws and regulations of the receiving State, subject to the proviso, however, that the said laws and regulations must enable full effect to be given to the purposes for which the rights accorded under this Article are intended.

FOREIGN NATIONALS EXECUTED 1976–2006

At least one capital punishment jurisdiction has sought to recognize the consular notification right of foreign nationals. Florida has enacted a statute known as the “Recognition of International Treaties Act.” This statute obligates Florida officials to assure that contact with consular representatives is timely when a foreign national is arrested by the State:

Fla. Code § 901.26 (3) Recognition of International Treaties Act: Wherever in the state a citizen of any sovereign nation to which the United States extends diplomatic recognition shall be arrested or detained for any reason whatsoever, the official who makes the arrest or detention shall immediately notify the nearest consul or other officer of the nation concerned or, if unknown, the Embassy in Washington, D.C., of the nation concerned or, if unknown, the nearest state judicial officer who shall in turn notify either of the above. Failure to give notice shall not be a defense in any criminal proceedings against any citizen of a sovereign nation and shall not be cause for the citizen’s discharge from custody.

Fourteenth Amendment The Fourteenth Amendment was ratified on July 9, 1868. The amendment came at the end of the Civil War and was inspired as an effort to allow federal intervention whenever a State sought to intrude upon the citizenship rights of blacks. Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment provides:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

For criminal prosecution purposes, the two major clauses in the Fourteenth Amendment are the Due Process Clause and Equal Protection Clause. Both of these clauses have been used, in conjunction with provisions of the Bill of Rights, to prevent jurisdictions from encroaching on the rights of capital felons and criminal defendants in general. See also Due Process Clause; Equal Protection Clause Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution prohibits a second attempt to execute a prisoner, when the first attempt unintentionally fails.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not prevent a repeat attempt to execute a prisoner, when the initial attempt unintentionally fails.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Willie Francis, was convicted of murder by the State of Louisiana in sentenced to death by electrocution in September 1945. The defendant was prepared for execution and, on May 3, 1946, pursuant to a death warrant, was placed in the official electric chair of the State. The executioner threw the switch but, presumably because of some mechanical difficulty, death did not result. The defendant was thereupon removed from the chair and returned to prison to await a second attempt at executing him. The governor of Louisiana issued a new death warrant, fixing the second execution for May 9, 1946.

The defendant requested the Supreme Court of Louisiana prevent a second attempt to execute him on federal constitutional grounds. Execution of the sentence was stayed pending the defendant's challenge to a second attempt to execute him. The Supreme Court of Louisiana denied the defendant's request for judicial relief, after concluding there was no violation of state or federal law in attempting to execute him a second time. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Reed Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Vinson, C.J., and Black and Jackson, J.J., Joined: Justice Reed indicated that, based on the record before the Court, "we must and do assume that the state officials carried out their duties under the death warrant in a careful and humane manner. Accidents happen for which no man is to blame."

The opinion addressed the defendant's argument that double jeopardy principles would be violated by a second attempt at executing him. Justice Reed noted that the Double Jeopardy Clause did not prevent a State from retrying a defendant whose conviction and sentence was set aside (for reasons other than insufficiency of evidence). The opinion then held: "For we see no difference from a constitutional point of view between a new trial for error of law at the instance of the state ... and an execution that follows a failure of equipment. When an accident, with no suggestion of malevolence, prevents the consummation of a sentence, the state's subsequent course in the administration of its criminal law is not affected on that account.... We find no double jeopardy here which can be said to amount to a denial of federal due process in the proposed execution."

Justice Reed also rejected the defendant's argument that attempting to execute him a second time was cruel and unusual punishment: "Petitioner's suggestion is that because he once underwent the psychological strain of preparation for electrocution, now to require him to undergo this preparation again subjects him to a lingering or cruel and unusual punishment. Even the fact that petitioner has already been subjected to a current of electricity does not make his subsequent execution any more cruel in the constitutional sense than any other execution. The cruelty against which the Constitution protects a convicted man is cruelty inherent in the method of punishment, not the necessary suffering involved in any method employed to extinguish life humanely. The fact that an unforeseeable accident prevented the prompt consummation of the sentence cannot, it seems to us, add an element of cruelty to a subsequent execution. There is no purpose to inflict unnecessary pain nor any unnecessary pain involved in the proposed execution."

The final issue addressed in the plurality opinion was the defendant's contention that equal protection principles would be violated by a second attempt at executing him. Justice Reed wrote: "This suggestion ... is based on the idea that ... after an attempt at execution has failed, [it] would be a more severe punishment than is imposed upon others guilty of a like offense. That is, since others do not go through the strain of preparation for execution a second time or have not experienced a non-lethal current in a prior attempt at execution, as petitioner did, to compel petitioner to submit to execution after these prior experiences denies to him equal protection. Equal protection does not protect a prisoner against even illegal acts of officers in charge of him, much less against accidents during his detention for execution. Laws cannot prevent accidents nor can a law equally protect all against them. So long as the law applies to all alike, the requirements of equal protection are met." The opinion affirmed the decision of the Louisiana Supreme Court.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter agreed with the judgment in the case. His concurrence indicated that he believed the Constitution "did not withdraw the freedom of a State to enforce its own notions of fairness in the administration of criminal justice." So long as the State did not find it abhorrent to twice attempt to execute a prisoner, the Constitution should not impose a different standard of decency on the State.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Burton, in Which Douglas, Murphy and Rutledge, J.J., Joined: The dissenting opinion indicated that in determining whether a second attempt at execution is unconstitutional must be measured against a lawful electrocution. Justice Burton wrote: "The contrast is that between instantaneous death and death by installments.... Electrocution, when instantaneous, can be inflicted by a state in conformity with due process of law. The all-important consideration is that the execution shall be so instantaneous and substantially painless that the punishment shall be reduced, as nearly as possible, to no more than that of death itself. Electrocution has been approved only in a form that eliminates suffering."

It was argued that if state officials had intentionally placed the defendant in the electric chair five times and each time applied electric current to his body in a manner not sufficient to kill him until the final time, such a form of torture would rival that of burning at the stake. The dissent followed up, saying: "Although the failure of the first attempt, in the present case, was unintended, the reapplication of the electric current will be intentional. How many deliberate and intentional reapplications of electric current does it take to produce a cruel, unusual and unconstitutional punishment? While five applications would be more cruel and unusual than one, the uniqueness of the present case demonstrates that, today, two separated applications are sufficiently 'cruel and unusual' to be prohibited. If five attempts would be 'cruel and unusual,' it would be difficult to draw the line between two, three, four and five." The dissent would have granted the defendant relief from a second attempt at executing him.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's conviction and death sentence were obtained in violation of due process of law because of mob intimidation during his trial.

Case Holding: The defendant's conviction and death sentence were not obtained in violation of due process of law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Leo M. Frank, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Georgia. The Supreme Court of Georgia affirmed the conviction and sentence. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court alleging that his conviction was obtained in violation of the Constitution because: (1) of tremendous disorder in and about the courtroom during the trial; and (2) he was compelled, due to fear of mob violence, not to be present in the courtroom when the jury returned its verdict. The district court denied relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Pitney: Justice Pitney indicated that if a trial was in fact dominated by a mob so that the jury and judge were intimidated and there was an actual interference with the course of justice, due process of law would be violated. In reviewing the record in the case and the decision of the Georgia Supreme Court, Justice Pitney ruled that the defendant's trial was not subject mob disturbance that amounted to a violation of due process: "The Georgia courts ... proceeded upon the theory that Frank would have been entitled to ... relief had his charges been true, and they refused a new trial only because they found his charges untrue save in a few minor particulars not amounting to more than irregularities, and not prejudicial to the accused."

Turning to the issue of the defendant's absence from the trial when the jury returned its verdict, Justice Pitney wrote that under the common law it was the right of an accused to be present throughout the entire trial, from the commencement of the selection of the jury until the verdict was rendered and jury discharged. The opinion found, however, that the defendant waived his right to be present at trial when the jury returned its verdict. Justice Pitney agreed with the Georgia Supreme Court that "[t]he presence of the prisoner when the verdict is rendered is not so essential a part of the hearing that a rule of practice permitting the accused to waive it, and holding him bound by the waiver, amounts to a deprivation of due process of law." The judgment of the district court was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Holmes, in Which Hughes, J., Joined: Justice Holmes dissented from the opinion and judgment of the Court. He believed that due process of law was violated because of the intimidation caused by spectators. Justice Holmes wrote as follows:

The only question before us is whether the petition shows on its face that the writ of habeas corpus should be denied, or whether the district court should have proceeded to try the facts. The allegations that appear to us material are these: The trial began on July 28, 1913, at Atlanta, and was carried on in a court packed with spectators and surrounded by a crowd outside, all strongly hostile to the [defendant]. On Saturday, August 23, this hostility was sufficient to lead the judge to confer in the presence of the jury with the chief of police of Atlanta and the colonel of the Fifth Georgia Regiment, stationed in that city, both of whom were known to the jury. On the same day, the evidence seemingly having been closed, the public press, apprehending danger, united in a request to the court that the proceedings should not continue on that evening. Thereupon the court adjourned until Monday morning. On that morning, when the solicitor general entered the court, he was greeted with applause, stamping of feet and clapping of hands, and the judge, before beginning his charge, had a private conversation with the [defendant's] counsel in which he expressed the opinion that there would be "probable danger of violence" if there should be an acquittal or a disagreement, and that it would be safer for not only the [defendant] but his counsel to be absent from court when the verdict was brought in. At the judge's request they agreed that the [defendant] and [counsel] should be absent, and they kept their word. When the verdict was rendered, and before more than one of the jurymen had been polled, there was such a roar of applause that the polling could not go on until order was restored. The noise outside was such that it was difficult for the judge to hear the answers of the jurors, although he was only 10 feet from them. With these specifications of fact, the [defendant] alleges that the trial was dominated by a hostile mob and was nothing but an empty form.

We lay on one side the question whether the [defendant] could or did waive his right to be present at the polling of the jury. That question was apparent in the form of the trial and was raised by the application for a writ of error; and although, after the application to the full court, we thought that the writ ought to be granted, we never have been impressed by the argument that the presence of the prisoner was required by the Constitution of the United States. But habeas corpus cuts through all forms and goes to the very tissue of the structure. It comes in from the outside, not in subordination to the proceedings, and although every form may have been preserved, opens the inquiry whether they have been more than an empty shell. The argument for the [prosecutor] in substance is that the trial was in a court of competent jurisdiction, that it retains jurisdiction although, in fact, it may be dominated by a mob, and that the rulings of the state court as to the fact of such domination cannot be reviewed. But the argument seems to us inconclusive. Whatever disagreement there may be as to the scope of the phrase "due process of law," there can be no doubt that it embraces the fundamental conception of a fair trial, with opportunity to be heard. Mob law does not become due process of law by securing the assent of a terrorized jury. We are not speaking of mere disorder, or mere irregularities in procedure, but of a case where the processes of justice are actually subverted. In such a case, the Federal court has jurisdiction to issue the writ. The fact that the state court still has its general jurisdiction and is otherwise a competent court does not make it impossible to find that a jury has been subjected to intimidation in a particular case. The loss of jurisdiction is not general, but particular, and proceeds from the control of a hostile influence....

The single question in our minds is whether a petition alleging that the trial took place in the midst of a mob savagely and manifestly intent on a single result is shown on its face unwarranted, by the specifications, which may be presumed to set forth the strongest indications of the fact at the [defendant's] command. This is not a matter for polite presumptions; we must look facts in the face. Any judge who has sat with juries knows that, in spite of forms, they are extremely likely to be impregnated by the environing atmosphere. And when we find the judgment of the expert on the spot, — of the judge whose business it was to preserve not only form, but substance — to have been that if one jurymen yielded to the reasonable doubt that he himself later expressed in court as the result of most anxious deliberation, neither prisoner nor counsel would be safe from the rage of the crowd, we think the presumption overwhelming that the jury responded to the passions of the mob. Of course we are speaking only of the case made by the petition, and whether it ought to be heard. Upon allegations of this gravity in our opinion it ought to be heard, whatever the decision of the state court may have been, and it did not need to set forth contradictory evidence, or matter of rebuttal, or to explain why the motions for a new trial and to set aside the verdict were overruled by the state court. There is no reason to fear an impairment of the authority of the state to punish the guilty. We do not think it impracticable in any part of this country to have trials free from outside control. But to maintain this immunity it may be necessary that the supremacy of the law and of the Federal Constitution should be vindicated in a case like this. It may be that on a hearing a different complexion would be given to the judge's alleged request and expression of fear. But supposing the alleged facts to be true, we are of opinion that if they were before the supreme court, it sanctioned a situation upon which the courts of the United States should act; and if, for any reason, they were not before the supreme court, it is our duty to act upon them now, and to declare lynch law as little valid when practiced by a regularly drawn jury as when administered by one elected by a mob intent on death.

Case Note: The prosecution of Leo M. Frank took place in an atmosphere of anti-Semitism. Frank was Jewish and the victim, Mary Phagan, was a Christian. The governor of Georgia commuted Frank's sentence to life imprisonment in 1915. However, the commutation did not save Frank's life. A mob kidnapped Frank from prison and lynched him on August 16, 1915. It was reported that the mob consisted of twenty-five men, including a clergyman, two former State supreme court justices, and a former sheriff. In 1986, the State of Georgia posthumously granted Frank a pardon.

Frankfurter, Felix Felix Frankfurter served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1939 to 1962. While on the Supreme Court, Frankfurter was known as a liberal constructionist of the Constitution in his early years, but forged a significant shift to the conservative side later.

Frankfurter was born in Vienna on November 15, 1882. His family immigrated to the United States when he was about twelve years old. Frankfurter received an undergraduate degree from New York's City College and obtained a law degree from Harvard Law School. After graduating from law school, Frankfurter spent a number of years as an attorney for the federal government. In 1914, he returned to Harvard Law School to teach. In 1939, President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Frankfurter to the Supreme Court.

Frankfurter issued a number of capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. The capital punishment opinion which scholars cite the most was his dissent in Rosenberg v. United States. In that case, the majority of the Supreme Court affirmed the death sentences handed down against Julius and Ethel Rosenberg. Frankfurter argued strenuously in dissent that under the law applicable to the case, the Atomic Energy Act, the trial judge was without authority to impose a death sentence because the jury did not recommend a death sentence. Frankfurter wrote: "The Government having tried the Rosenbergs for a conspiracy, continuing from 1944 to 1950, to reveal atomic secrets among other things, it flies in the face of the charge made, the evidence adduced and the basis on which the conviction was secured now to contend that the terminal date of the Rosenberg conspiracy preceded the effective date of the Atomic Energy Act." Frankfurter died on February 22, 1965.

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution required the trial court to give certain jury instructions, relating to the consideration of mitigating evidence, that the defendant had requested in the sentencing phase of his capital trial.

Case Holding: The Constitution did not require the trial court to give certain jury instructions, relating to the consideration of mitigating evidence, that the defendant had requested in the sentencing phase of his capital trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Donald Franklin, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Texas. During the penalty phase of the trial, the defendant requested the trial court give the jury five special questions, which, in essence, would have told the jury that any evidence they felt mitigated against the death penalty should be taken into account and could alone be enough to return a verdict less than death. The trial court refused to give the jury the proffered five defense instructions. Instead, the trial court instructed the jury, among other things, to arrive at their verdict based on all the evidence. The jury returned a verdict requiring imposition of the death penalty, which the trial court imposed. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence.

The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court alleging that, absent his specially requested instructions, the jury was limited in its consideration of mitigating evidence in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court rejected the argument and dismissed the petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice White Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and Scalia and Kennedy, JJ., Joined: Justice White ruled that the trial court's refusal to give the defendant's requested special instructions did not violate his Eighth Amendment right to present mitigating evidence. Neither the instructions actually given nor the Texas Special Issues precluded jury consideration of any relevant mitigating circumstances or otherwise unconstitutionally limited the jury's discretion.

The opinion rejected the defendant's contention that the penalty phase jury was deprived of a sufficient opportunity to consider any "residual doubt" it might have harbored about his actual guilt in committing the crime. Justice White pointed out that the Court had never held that a capital defendant had a constitutional right to an instruction telling the jury to revisit the question of guilt as a basis for mitigation. It was said that lingering doubts over the defendant's guilt do not relate to his character, his record, or to the circumstances of the offense, which the sentencing jury must be given a chance to consider in mitigation. Justice White went further and indicated that even if the claimed right existed, the rejection of the defendant's proffered instructions did not impair that right, since the trial court placed no limitation on the defendant's opportunity to press the "residual doubts" issue to the sentencing jury. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which Blackmun, J., Joined: In her concurring opinion, Justice O'Connor concluded that the Texas capital sentencing procedure did not unconstitutionally prevent the jury from giving mitigating effect to any evidence relevant to the defendant's character, background, or the circumstances of the offense. She noted that Texas's procedure did limit consideration of evidence of the defendant's good conduct while incarcerated during various points in his life, but the limitation had no practical or constitutional significance on the facts of the case, because the evidence had no relevance to any aspect of the defendant's character other than a lack of future dangerousness.

In addressing the defendant's residual doubt argument, Justice O'Connor wrote in her concurring opinion: "Although the capital sentencing procedure may have prevented the jury from giving effect to any 'residual doubts' it might have had about [the defendant's] guilt, that limitation did not violate the Eighth Amendment. Rather than being a fact about the defendant's character or background or the circumstances of the particular offense, 'residual doubt' is merely a lingering uncertainty about facts — a state of mind that exists somewhere between 'beyond a reasonable doubt' and 'absolute certainty' — and thus is not a mitigating circumstance under this Court's decisions, which have never required such a heightened burden of proof at capital sentencing."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens, in Which Brennan and Marshall, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens dissented primarily on the Court's determination that restrictions imposed on evidence of the defendant's past good conduct while incarcerated did not rise to a constitutional violation. Addressing what he perceived as being the significance of such evidence, Justice Stevens wrote: "In this case the mitigating evidence submitted by [the defendant] consisted of a stipulation indicating that during two periods of imprisonment aggregating about seven years he committed no disciplinary violations. That evidence militated against imposition of the death sentence in two quite different ways. Looking to the past, it suggested the possibility that [the defendant's] character was not without some redeeming features; a human being who can conform to strict prison rules without incident for several years may have virtues that can fairly be balanced against society's interest in killing him in retribution for his violent crime. Looking to the future, that evidence suggested that a sentence to prison, rather than to death, would adequately protect society from future acts of violence by [the defendant]. The evidence was admissible for both purposes."

The dissent argued that Texas's penalty phase procedures did not adequately allow for the jury to understand the significance of prior incarceration good conduct evidence. Justice Stevens contended that the proffered instructions by the defendant would have clarified the use of such evidence. He concluded: "Under our cases, the substantial risk that the jury failed to perceive the full ambit of consideration to which evidence of [the defendant's] past good conduct was entitled requires us to vacate the death sentence and remand for resentencing."

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant proved that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant failed to prove that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him because he merely made such an allegation without supporting evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Pink Franklin, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of South Carolina. The South Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Day: Justice Day ruled that blacks were not systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted the defendant. It was said that under South Carolina law, jury commissioners have discretion to exclude all persons from grand jury service who were not of "good moral character." The opinion found that the defendant did not produce any evidence to establish that jury commissioners exercised their discretion in a manner that systematically excluded blacks from grand jury service who were of good moral character. Justice Day wrote:

We do not think there is anything in [the State's] statute having the effect to deny rights secured by the Federal Constitution. It gives to the jury commissioners the right to select electors of good moral character, such as they may deem qualified to serve as jurors, being persons of sound judgment and free from all legal exceptions. There is nothing in this statute which discriminates against individuals on account of race or color or previous condition, or which subjects such persons to any other or different treatment than other electors who may be qualified to serve as jurors. The statute simply provides for an exercise of judgment in attempting to secure competent jurors of proper qualifications.

The judgment of the South Carolina Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection

Freeway Killer Between 1979 and 1980, California officials found the dead bodies of fourteen teenaged boys along the state's freeways. Ten of the bodies were found in Los Angeles County and four were found in Orange County. As the bodies were being discovered, the media quickly alerted the public that a "freeway killer" was on the loose. All of the victims had been kidnapped, robbed, and raped before being brutally murdered.

As a result of tireless investigative work, law enforcement officials captured the principal killer and his four accomplices in 1981. The principal killer, William George Bonin, was born January 8, 1947. Bonin had spent much of his life in and out of prison for sexual assaults on male adolescents. Beginning in 1979, Bonin convinced four young men, Vernon Robert Butts, Gregory Matthew Miley, William Ray Pugh, and James Michael Munro, to assist him in seducing and kidnapping young boys. Bonin usually only had one accomplice with him for each of the murders.

During the prosecution of Bonin, the main witness against him was his accomplice Miley. Miley testified that he was a sexual partner of Bonin. Miley described two of the murders as follows. On February 3, 1980, Bonin and Miley picked up a youth in Miley's van in Hollywood. According to Miley, Bonin and the youth had consensual sex in the van as Miley drove. When the sex ended, Bonin whispered to Miley, "The kid's going to die," and then started to tie up the youth. Bonin asked the youth, "What does your dad want for you? How much do you think we can get for ransom? Maybe a couple thousand?" The youth replied, "I don't think that I can get that much." Bonin asked, "How much money do you have?" The youth answered, "About $6." Bonin then instructed Miley to take the money, which he did. Miley then stated, "Well, why don't you let the kid go?" Bonin responded, "No, man, he'll know the van and he'll know us." With Miley's help, Bonin proceeded to strangle the youth with a shirt and to crush his neck with a jack handle. The body was dumped from the van.

After doing the deed, Bonin said, "Well, I'm horny again. I need another one." Miley stated, "Oh, man, no way. I don't want to do it no more. I just want to go home." However, Bonin went ahead and eventually picked up another youth in Huntington Beach in the early afternoon of the same day, February 3. Bonin and the youth engaged in consensual sexual activity in the van. Soon, however, Bonin started to tie up the youth. Bonin asked, "What could you get for ransom? This is a kidnap." Bonin subsequently began to strangle the youth with a shirt and to crush his neck with a jack handle.

Bonin was prosecuted in Los Angeles County for ten murders and sentenced to death for each on March 12, 1982. The co-defendants in that trial—Miley, Pugh, and Munro—received prison sentences (the fourth co-defendant, Butts, committed suicide while in jail). Bonin was subsequently prosecuted in Orange County for four murders and was sentenced to death for each on August 26, 1983. The two co-defendants in that trial, Miley and Munro, received prison sentences.

Bonin was executed by lethal injection February 23, 1996.

Frequency of Executions Between 1976 and 1989, only ninety-eight capital felons were executed in the United States. This figure reflected a willingness of appellate courts to allow capital felons to make repeated attacks on the judgments against them. However, beginning in the 1990s, a trend set in to cut short the number of appeals. As a result, executions began to occur with greater frequency.

Opponents of capital punishment have condemned the efforts of courts and legislators to curb appellate rights of capital felons. The principal argument against expedited executions is that innocent people are more likely to be executed. However, this argument has not met with success in slowing down the pace of executions.

William George Bonin was executed after being found guilty of sodomizing and killing fourteen youth in the State of California. (California Department of Corrections)

Fuller, Melville W. Melville W. Fuller served as chief justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1888 to 1910. While on the Supreme Court, Fuller was known for his conservative interpretation of the Constitution.

Fuller was born in Augusta, Maine, on February 11, 1833. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1853 and afterwards attending Harvard Law School briefly. Fuller’s legal training, for the most part, was obtained as an apprentice in at a law firm operated by relatives. In 1856, Fuller moved to Chicago to start his on law practice. After several decades of establishing an impressive law practice, Fuller was nominated by President Grover Cleveland in 1888 to be chief justice of the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Fuller wrote a number of capital punishment opinions. The opinion written by him which had the greatest impact on capital punishment jurisprudence was the decision in In Re Kemmler. The decision in Kemmler presented the Supreme Court with the first opportunity to determine whether death by electrocution was cruel and unusual punishment. Writing for the Court, Fuller held: “The enactment of this [punishment] was, in itself, within the legitimate sphere of the legislative power of the state, and in the observance of those general rules prescribed by our systems of jurisprudence; and the legislature of the state of New York determined that it did not inflict cruel and unusual punishment, and its courts have sustained that determination. We cannot perceive that the state has thereby abridged the privileges or immunities of the [defendant], or deprived him of due process of law.” Fuller died in 1910.

Issue Presented: Whether the method by which the death penalty was imposed constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Case Holding: The method by which the death penalty was imposed constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The opinion in the case consolidated three capital punishment cases. The defendant in case No. 69-5003 was convicted of murder in Georgia and was sentenced to death. The defendant in case No. 69-5030 was convicted of rape in Georgia and was sentenced to death. The defendant in case No. 69-5031 was convicted of rape in Texas and was sentenced to death. The defendants presented the same argument. The method used to impose the death penalty was arbitrary and capricious. The defendants contended that the Constitution prohibited imposition of capital punishment in an arbitrary and capricious manner. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the matter.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion announcing the judgment of the Court was succinct. The opinion stated: "The Court holds that the imposition and carrying out of the death penalty in these cases constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The judgment in each case is therefore reversed insofar as it leaves undisturbed the death sentence imposed, and the cases are remanded for further proceedings."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas was careful to restrict his concurrence to addressing the constitutionality of the method by which the death penalty was imposed upon the defendants. He did not address the constitutionality of the death penalty as punishment per se. The critical portions of Justice Douglas' concurrence are as follows:

In these three cases the death penalty was imposed, one of them for murder, and two for rape. In each the determination of whether the penalty should be death or a lighter punishment was left by the State to the discretion of the judge or of the jury. In each of the three cases the trial was to a jury. They are here on petitions for certiorari which we granted limited to the question whether the imposition and execution of the death penalty constitute "cruel and unusual punishment" within the meaning of the Eighth Amendment as applied to the States by the Fourteenth. I vote to vacate each judgment, believing that the exaction of the death penalty does violate the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.

That the requirements of due process ban cruel and unusual punishment is now settled. It is also settled that the proscription of cruel and unusual punishments forbids the judicial imposition of them as well their imposition by the legislature....

It has been assumed in our decisions that punishment by death is not cruel, unless the manner of execution can be said to be inhuman and barbarous....

It would seem to be incontestable that the death penalty inflicted on one defendant is "unusual" if it discriminates against him by reason of his race, religion, wealth, social position, or class, or if it is imposed under a procedure that gives room for the play of such prejudices.

There is evidence that the provision of the English Bill of Rights of 1689, from which the language of the Eighth Amendment was taken, was concerned primarily with selective or irregular application of harsh penalties and that its aim was to forbid arbitrary and discriminatory penalties of a severe nature....

The words "cruel and unusual" certainly include penalties that are barbaric. But the words, at least when read in light of the English proscription against selective and irregular use of penalties, suggest that it is "cruel and unusual" to apply the death penalty — or any other penalty — selectively to minorities whose numbers are few, who are outcasts of society, and who are unpopular, but whom society is willing to see suffer though it would not countenance general application of the same penalty across the board....

Juris (or judges, as the case may be) have practically untrammelled discretion to let an accused live or insist that he die....

Former Attorney General Ramsey Clark has said, "It is the poor, the sick, the ignorant, the powerless and the hated who are executed." One searches our chronicles in vain for the execution of any member of the affluent strata of this society. The Leopolds and Loeb are given prison terms, not sentenced to death....

[W]e deal with a system of law and of justice that leaves to the uncontrolled discretion of judges or juries the determination whether defendants ... should die or be imprisoned. Under [current] laws no standards govern the selection of the penalty. People live or die, dependant on the whim of one man or of 12....

Those who wrote the Eighth Amendment knew what price their forebears had paid for a system based, not on equal justice, but on discrimination. In those days the target was not the blacks or the poor, but the dissenters, those who opposed absolutism in government, who struggled for a parliamentary regime, and who opposed governments' recurring efforts to foist a particular religion on the people. But the tool of capital punishment was used with vengeance against the opposition and those unpopular with the regime. One cannot read this history without realizing that the desire for equality was reflected in the ban against "cruel and unusual punishments" contained in the Eighth Amendment.

In a Nation committed to equal protection of the laws there is no permissible "cast" aspect of law enforcement. Yet we know that the discretion of judges and juries in imposing the death penalty enables the penalty to be selectively applied, feeding prejudices against the accused if he is poor and despised, and lacking political clout, or if he is a member of a suspect or unpopular minority, and saving those who by social position may be in a more protected position. In ancient Hindu Law a Brahman was exempt from capital punishment, and under that law, "[g]enerally, in the law books, punishment increased in severity as social status diminished." We have, I fear, taken in practice the same position, partially as a result of making the death penalty discretionary and partially as a result of the ability of the rich to purchase the services of the most respected and most resourceful legal talent in the Nation.

The high service rendered by the "cruel and unusual" punishment clause of the Eighth Amendment is to require legislatures to write penal laws that are evenhanded, nonselective, and nonarbitrary, and to require judges to see to it that general laws are not applied sparsely, selectively, and spottily to unpopular groups....

Thus, these discretionary statutes are unconstitutional in their operation. They are pregnant with discrimination and discrimination is an ingredient not compatible with the idea of equal protection of the laws that is implicit in the ban on "cruel and unusual" punishments.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan's concurrence went to the point of concluding that the Constitution barred imposition of capital punishment per se. The critical features of his concurrence are stated as follows:

We have very little evidence of the Framers' intent in including the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause among those restraints upon the new Government enumerated in the Bill of Rights....

Certainly they intended to ban torturous punishments, but the available evidence does not support the further conclusion that only torturous punishments were to be outlawed.... Nor did [the Framers] intend simply to forbid punishments considered cruel and unusual at the time. The "import" of the Clause is, indeed, indefinite, and for good reason. A constitutional provision is enacted, it is true, from an experience of evils, but its general language should not, therefore, be necessarily confined to the form that evil had theretofore taken. Time works changes, brings into existence new conditions and purposes. Therefore a principle to be vital must be capable of wider application than the mischief which gave it birth....

At bottom, then, the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause prohibits the infliction of uncivilized and inhuman punishments. The State, even as it punishes, must treat its members with respect for their intrinsic worth as human beings. A punishment is cruel and unusual, therefore, if it does not comport with human dignity....

Death is truly an awesome punishment. The calculated killing of a human being by the State involves, by its very nature, a denial of the executed person's humanity. The contrast with the plight of a person punished by imprisonment is evident. An individual in prison does not lose the right to have rights. A prisoner retains, for example, the constitutional rights to the free exercise of religion, to be free of cruel and unusual punishments, and to treatment as a 'person' for purposes of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. A prisoner remains a member of the human family. Moreover, he retains the right of access to the courts. His punishment is not irrevocable.... [T]he finality of death precludes relief. An executed person has indeed lost the right to have rights....

The outstanding characteristic of our present practice of punishing criminals by death is the infrequency with which we resort to it. The evidence is conclusive that death is not the ordinary punishment for any crime.

There has been a steady decline in the infliction of this punishment in every decade since the 1930s, the earliest period for which accurate statistics are available. In the 1930s, executions averaged 167 per year; in the 1940s, the average was 128; in the 1950s, it was 72; and in the years 1960–1962, it was 48. There have been a total of 46 executions since then, 36 of them in 1963–1964. Yet our population and the number of capital crimes committed have increased greatly over the past four decades. The contemporary rarity of the infliction of this punishment is thus the end result of a long-continued decline. That rarity is plainly revealed by an examination of the years 1961–1970, the last 10-year period for which statistics are available. During that time, an average of 106 death sentences was imposed each year. Not nearly that number, however, could be carried out, for many were precluded by [a number of reasons]. On January 1, 1961, the death row population was 219; on December 31, 1970, it was 608; during that span, there were 135 executions. Consequently, had the 389 additions to death row also been executed, the annual average would have been 52. In short, the country might, at most, have executed one criminal each week. In fact, of course, far fewer were executed....

When a country of over 200 million people inflict an unusually severe punishment no more than 50 times a year, the inference is strong that the punishment is not being regularly and fairly applied. To dispel it would indeed require a clear showing of nonarbitrary infliction.

Although there are no exact figures available, we know that thousands of murders and rapes are committed annually in States where death is an authorized punishment for those crimes. However the rate of infliction is characterized — as “freakishly” or “spectacularly” rare, or simply as rare — it would take the purest sophistry to deny that death is inflicted in only a minute fraction of these cases. How much rarer, after all, could the infliction of death be?

When the punishment of death is inflicted in a trivial number of the cases in which it is legally available, the conclusion is virtually inescapable that it is being inflicted arbitrarily. Indeed, it smacks of little more than a lottery system.... Furthermore, our procedures in death cases ... actually sanction an arbitrary selection.... In other words, our procedures are not constructed to guard against the totally capricious selection of criminals for the punishment of death....

Today death is a uniquely and unusually severe punishment. When examined by the principles applicable under the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause, death stands condemned as fatally offensive to human dignity. The punishment of death is therefore cruel and unusual, and the States may no longer inflict it as a punishment for crimes. Rather than kill an arbitrary handful of criminals each year, the States will confine them in prison.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Stewart: Justice Stewart, like Justice Douglas, found that the method of imposition of the death penalty violated the Constitution, but was not prepared to find that the Constitution barred imposition of the death penalty per se. The central aspects of Justice Stewart’s concurrence indicated the following:

The penalty of death differs from all other forms of criminal punishment, not in degree but in kind. It is unique in its total irrevocability. It is unique in its rejection of rehabilitation of the convict as a basic purpose of criminal justice. And it is unique, finally, in its absolute renunciation of all that is embodied in our concept of humanity....

Legislatures — state and federal — have sometimes specified that the penalty of death shall be the mandatory punishment for every person convicted of engaging in certain designated criminal conduct....

If we were reviewing death sentences imposed under these or similar laws, we would be faced with the need to decide whether capital punishment is unconstitutional for all crime and under all circumstances. We would need to decide whether a legislature — state or federal — could constitutionally determine that certain criminal conduct is so atrocious that society’s interest in deterrence and retribution wholly outweighs any considerations of reform or rehabilitation of the perpetrator, and that, despite the inconclusive empirical evidence, only the automatic penalty will provide maximum deterrence.

On that score I would say only that I cannot agree that retribution is a constitutionally impermissible ingredient in the imposition of punishment. The instinct for retribution is part of the nature of man, and channeling that instinct in the administration of criminal justice serves an important purpose in promoting the stability of a society governed by law. When people begin to believe that organized society is unwilling or unable to impose upon criminal offenders the punishment they “deserve,” then there are sown the seeds of anarchy — of self-help, vigilante justice, and lynch law.

The constitutionality of capital punishment in the abstract is not, however, before us in these cases. For the Georgia and Texas Legislatures have not provided that the death penalty shall be imposed upon all those who are found guilty of forcible rape. And the Georgia Legislature has not ordained that death shall be the automatic punishment for murder. In a word, neither State has made a legislative determination that forcible rape and murder can be deterred only by imposing the penalty of death upon all who perpetrate those offenses....

Instead, the death sentences now before us are the product of a legal system that brings them, I believe, within the very core of the Eighth Amendment’s guarantee against cruel and unusual punishments, a guarantee applicable against the States through the Fourteenth Amendment. In the first place, it is clear that these sentences are “cruel” in the sense that they excessively go beyond, not in degree but in kind, the punishments that the state legislatures have determined to be necessary. In the second place, it is equally clear that these sentences are “unusual” in the sense that the penalty of death is infrequently imposed for murder, and that its imposition for rape is extraordinarily rare. But I do not rest my conclusion upon these two propositions alone.

These death sentences are cruel and unusual in the same way that being struck by lightning is cruel and unusual. For, of all the people convicted of rapes and murders in 1967 and 1968, many just as reprehensible as these, the petitioners are among a capriciously selected random handful upon whom the sentence of death has in fact been imposed.... [I] conclude that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments cannot tolerate the infliction of a sentence of death under legal systems that permit this unique penalty to be so wantonly and so freakishly imposed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White: Justice White, while finding the method used to impose the death penalty was unconstitutional, did not go so far as to find that the death penalty was barred by the Constitution per se. The essence of Justice White’s concurrence said the following:

In joining the Court’s judgments ... I do not at all intimate that the death penalty is unconstitutional per se or that there is no system of capital punishment that would comport with the Eighth Amendment. That question, ably argued by several of my Brethren, is not presented by these cases and need not be decided.

The narrower question to which I address myself concerns the constitutionality of capital punishment statutes under which (1) the legislature authorizes the imposition of the death penalty for murder or rape; (2) the legislature does not itself mandate the penalty in any particular class or kind of case (that is, legislative will is not frustrated if the penalty is never imposed), but delegates to judges or juries the decisions as to those cases, if any, in which the penalty will be utilized; and (3) judges and juries have ordered the death penalty with such infrequency that the odds are now very much against imposition and execution of the penalty with respect to any convicted murderer or rapist. It is in this context that we must consider whether the execution of these [defendants] would violate the Eighth Amendment.

I begin with what I consider a near truism: That the death penalty could so seldom be imposed that it would cease to be a credible deterrent or measurably to contribute to any other end of punishment in the criminal justice system. It is perhaps true that no matter how infrequently those convicted of rape or murder are executed, the penalty so imposed is not disproportionate to the crime and those executed may deserve exactly what they received. It would also be clear that executed defendants are finally and completely incapacitated from again committing rape or murder or any other crime. But when imposition of the penalty reaches a certain degree of infrequency, it would be very doubtful that any existing general need for retribution would be measurably satisfied. Nor could it be said with confidence that society's need for specific deterrence justifies death for so few when for so many in like circumstances life imprisonment or shorter prison terms are judged sufficient, or that community values are measurably reinforced by authorizing a penalty so rarely invoked.

Most important, a major goal of the criminal law — to deter others by punishing the convicted criminal — would not be substantially served where the penalty is so seldom invoked that it ceases to be the credible threat essential to influence the conduct of others. For present purposes I accept the morality and utility of punishing one person to influence another. I accept also the effectiveness of punishment generally and need not reject the death penalty as a more effective deterrent than a lesser punishment. But common sense and experience tell us that seldom-enforced laws become ineffective measures for controlling human conduct and that the death penalty, unless imposed with sufficient frequency, will make little contribution to deterring those crimes for which it may be exacted.

The imposition and execution of the death penalty are obviously cruel in the dictionary sense. But the penalty has not been considered cruel and unusual punishment in the constitutional sense because it was thought justified by the social ends it was deemed to serve. At the moment that it ceases realistically to further these purposes, however, the emerging question is whether its imposition in such circumstances would violate the Eighth Amendment. It is my view that it would, for its imposition would then be the pointless and needless extinction of life with only marginal contributions to any discernible social or public purposes. A penalty with such negligible returns to the State would be patently excessive and cruel and unusual punishment violative of the Eighth Amendment.

It is also my judgment that this point has been reached with respect to capital punishment as it is presently administered under the statutes involved in these cases. Concededly, it is difficult to prove as a general proposition that capital punishment, however administered, more effectively serves the ends of the criminal law than does imprisonment. But however that may be, I cannot avoid the conclusion that as the statutes before us are now administered, the penalty is so infrequently imposed that the threat of execution is too attenuated to be of substantial service to criminal justice....

I can do no more than state a conclusion based on 10 years of almost daily exposure to the facts and circumstances of hundreds and hundreds of federal and state criminal cases involving crimes for which death is the authorized penalty. That conclusion, as I have said, is that the death penalty is exacted with great infrequency even for the most atrocious crimes and that there is no meaningful basis for distinguishing the few cases in which it is not. The short of it is that the policy of vesting sentencing authority primarily in juries — a decision largely motivated by the desire to mitigate the harshness of the law and to bring community judgment to bear on the sentence as well as guilt or innocence — has so effectively achieved its aims that capital punishment within the confines of the statutes now before us has for all practical purposes run its course....

I add [finally] that past and present legislative judgment with respect to the death penalty loses much of its force when viewed in light of the recurring practice of delegating sentencing authority to the jury and the fact that a jury, in its own discretion and without violating its trust or any statutory policy, may refuse to impose the death penalty no matter what the circumstances of the crime. Legislative policy is thus necessarily defined not by what is legislatively authorized but by what juries and judges do in exercising the discretion so regularly conferred upon them. In my judgment what was done in these cases violated the Eighth Amendment.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall, like Justice Brennan, argued that the Constitution prohibited the imposition of the death penalty per se. The salient features of Justice Marshall's concurrence stated the following:

The criminal acts with which we are confronted are ugly, vicious, reprehensible acts. Their sheer brutality cannot and should not be minimized. But, we are not called upon to condone the penalized conduct; we are asked only to examine the penalty imposed on each of the [defendants] and to determine whether or not it violates the Eighth Amendment....

Perhaps the most important principle in analyzing cruel and unusual punishment questions is one that is reiterated again and again in the prior opinions of the Court: i.e., the cruel and unusual language must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society. Thus, a penalty that was permissible at one time in our Nation's history is not necessarily permissible today.

The fact, therefore, that the Court, or individual Justices, may have in the past expressed an opinion that the death penalty is constitutional is not now binding on us....

Capital punishment has been used to penalize various forms of conduct by members of society since the beginnings of civilization. Its precise origins are difficult to perceive, but there is some evidence that its roots lie in violent retaliation by members of a tribe or group, or by the tribe or group itself, against persons committing hostile acts toward group members. Thus, infliction of death as a penalty for objectionable conduct appears to have its beginnings in private vengeance.

As individuals gradually ceded their personal prerogatives to a sovereign power, the sovereign accepted the authority to punish wrongdoing as part of its "divine right" to rule. Individual vengeance gave way to the vengeance of the state, and capital punishment became a public function. Capital punishment worked its way into the laws of various countries, and was inflicted in a variety of macabre and horrific ways....

It has often been noted that American citizens know almost nothing about capital punishment.... [E.]g., that the death penalty is no more effective a deterrent than life imprisonment, that convicted murderers are rarely executed, but are usually sentenced to a term in prison; that convicted murderers usually are model prisoners, and that they almost always become law-abiding citizens upon their release from prison; that the costs of executing a capital offender exceed the costs of imprisoning him for life...; and that the death penalty may actually stimulate criminal conduct....

Regarding discrimination, it has been said that [it] is usually the poor, the illiterate, the underprivileged, the member of the minority group — the man who, because he is without means, and is defended by a court-appointed attorney — who becomes society's sacrificial lamb....

It ... is evident that the burden of capital punishment falls upon the poor, the ignorant, and the underprivileged members of society. It is the poor, and the members of minority groups who are least able to voice their complaints against capital punishment. Their impotence leaves them victims of a sanction that the wealthier, better-represented, just-as-guilty person can escape. So long as the capital sanction is used only against the forlorn, easily forgotten members of society, legislators are content to maintain the status quo, because change would draw attention to the problem and concern might develop. Ignorance is perpetuated and apathy soon becomes its mate, and we have today's situation.

Just as Americans know little about who is executed and why, they are unaware of the potential dangers of executing an innocent man. Our "beyond a reasonable doubt" burden of proof in criminal cases is intended to protect the innocent, but we know it is not fool-proof. Various studies have shown that people whose innocence is later convincingly established are convicted and sentenced to death....

No matter how careful courts are, the possibility of perjured testimony, mistaken honest testimony, and human error remain all too real. We have no way of judging how many innocent persons have been executed but we can be certain that there are some.... Surely there will be more as long as capital punishment remains part of our penal law....

In striking down capital punishment, this Court does not malign our system of government. On the contrary, it pays homage to it. Only in a free society could right triumph in difficult times, and could civilization record its magnificent advancement. In recognizing the humanity of our fellow beings, we pay ourselves the highest tribute. We achieve a major milestone in the long road up from barbarism ... by shunning capital punishment.

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Burger: The dissent by the chief justice presented the most comprehensive challenge to the judgment of the Court and the concurring opinions. The thrust of his arguments were presented as follows:

I conclude that the constitutional prohibition against "cruel and unusual punishments" cannot be construed to bar the imposition of the punishment of death....

If we were possessed of legislative power, I would either join with Mr. Justice Brennan and Mr. Justice Marshall or, at the very least, restrict the use of capital punishment to a small category of the most heinous crimes. Our constitutional inquiry, however, must be divorced from personal feelings as to the morality and efficacy of the death penalty, and be confined to the meaning and applicability of the uncertain language of the Eighth Amendment. There is no novelty in being called upon to interpret a constitutional provision that is less than self-defining, but, of all our fundamental guarantees, the ban on "cruel and unusual punishments" is one of the most difficult to translate into judicially manageable terms. The widely divergent views of the Amendment expressed in today's opinions reveal the haze that surrounds this constitutional command. Yet it is essential to our role as a court that we not seize upon the enigmatic character of the guarantee as an invitation to enact our personal predilections into law.

Although the Eighth Amendment literally reads as prohibiting only those punishments that are both "cruel" and "unusual," history compels the conclusion that the Constitution prohibits all punishments of extreme and barbarous cruelty, regardless of how frequently or infrequently imposed....

Counsel for petitioners properly concede that capital punishment was not impermissibly cruel at the time of the adoption of the Eighth Amendment. Not only do the records of the debates indicate that the Founding Fathers were limited in their concern to the prevention of torture, but it is also clear from the language of the Constitution itself that there was no thought whatever of the elimination of capital punishment. The opening sentence of the Fifth Amendment is a guarantee that the death penalty not be imposed "unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury." The Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment is a prohibition against being "twice put in jeopardy of life" for the same offense. Similarly, the Due Process Clause commands "due process of law" before an accused can be "deprived of life, liberty, or property." Thus, the explicit language of the Constitution affirmatively acknowledges the legal power to impose capital punishment; it does not expressly or by implication acknowledge the legal power to impose any of the various punishments that have been banned as cruel since 1791. Since the Eighth Amendment was adopted on the same day in 1791 as the Fifth Amendment, it hardly needs more to establish that the death penalty was not "cruel" in the constitutional sense at that time.

In the 181 years since the enactment of the Eighth Amendment, not a single decision of this Court has cast the slightest shadow of a doubt on the constitutionality of capital punishment. In rejecting Eighth Amendment attacks on particular modes of execution, the Court has more than once implicitly denied that capital punishment is impermissibly "cruel" in the constitutional sense....

Before recognizing such an instant evolution in the law, it seems fair to ask what factors have changed that capital punishment should now be "cruel" in the constitutional sense as it has not been in the past. It is apparent that there has been no change of constitutional significance in the nature of the punishment itself. Twentieth century modes of execution surely involve no greater physical suffering than the means employed at the time of the Eighth Amendment's adoption. And although a man awaiting execution must inevitably experience extraordinary mental anguish, no one suggests that this anguish is materially different from that experienced by condemned men in 1791, even though protracted appellate review processes have greatly increased the waiting time on "death row." To be sure, the ordeal of the condemned man may be thought cruel in the sense that all suffering is thought cruel. But if the Constitution proscribed every punishment producing severe emotional stress, then capital punishment would clearly have been impermissible in 1791.

However, the inquiry cannot end here. For reasons unrelated to any change in intrinsic cruelty, the Eighth Amendment prohibition cannot fairly be limited to those punishments thought excessively cruel and barbarous at the time of the adoption of the Eighth Amendment. A punishment is inordinately cruel, in the sense we must deal with it in these cases, chiefly as perceived by the society so characterizing it. The standard of extreme cruelty is not merely descriptive, but necessarily embodies a moral judgment. The standard itself remains the same, but its applicability must change as the basic mores of society change.... Nevertheless, the Court up to now has never actually held that a punishment has become impermissibly cruel due to a shift in the weight of accepted social values; nor has the Court suggested judicially manageable criteria for measuring such a shift in moral consensus.

The Court's quiescence in this area can be attributed to the fact that in a democratic society legislatures, not courts, are constituted to respond to the will and consequently the moral values of the people. For this reason, early commentators suggested that the "cruel and unusual punishments" clause was an unnecessary constitutional provision. As acknowledged in the principal brief for petitioners, "both in constitutional contemplation and in fact, it is the legislature, not the Court, which responds to public opinion and immediately reflects the society's standards of decency." Accordingly, punishments such as branding and the cutting off of ears, which were commonplace at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, passed from the penal scene without judicial intervention because they became basically offensive to the people and the legislatures responded to this sentiment....

The selectivity of juries in imposing the punishment of death is properly viewed as a refinement on, rather than a repudiation of, the statutory authorization for that penalty. Legislatures prescribe the categories of crimes for which the death penalty should be available, and, acting as "the conscience of the community," juries are entrusted to determine in individual cases that the ultimate punishment is warranted. Juries are undoubtedly influenced in this judgment by myriad factors. The motive or lack of motive of the perpetrator, the degree of injury or suffering of the victim or victims, and the degree of brutality in the commission of the crime would seem to be prominent among these factors. Given the general awareness that death is no longer a routine punishment for the crimes for which it is made available, it is hardly surprising that juries have been increasingly meticulous in their imposition of the penalty. But to assume from the mere fact of relative infrequency that only a random assortment of pariahs are sentenced to death, is to cast grave doubt on the basic integrity of our jury system.

It would, of course, be unrealistic to assume that juries have been perfectly consistent in choosing the cases where the death penalty is to be imposed, for no human institution performs with perfect consistency. There are doubtless prisoners on death row who would not be there had they been tried before a different jury or in a different State. In this sense their fate has been controlled by a fortuitous circumstance. However, this element of fortuity does not stand as an indictment either of the general functioning of juries in capital cases or of the integrity of jury decisions in individual cases. There is no empirical basis for concluding that juries have generally failed to discharge in good faith [their] responsibility ... that of choosing between life and death in individual cases according to the dictates of community values....

Since there is no majority of the Court on the ultimate issue presented in these cases, the future of capital punishment in this country has been left in an uncertain limbo. Rather than providing a final and unambiguous answer on the basic constitutional question, the collective impact of the majority's ruling is to demand an undetermined measure of change from the various state legislatures and the Congress. While I cannot endorse the process of decisionmaking that has yielded today's result and the restraints that result imposes on legislative action, I am not altogether displeased that legislative bodies have been given the opportunity, and indeed unavoidable responsibility, to make a thorough re-evaluation of the entire subject of capital punishment. If today's opinions demonstrate nothing else, they starkly show that this is an area where legislatures can act far more effectively than courts.

The legislatures are free to eliminate capital punishment for specific crimes or to carve out limited exceptions to a general abolition of the penalty, without adherence to the conceptual strictures of the Eighth Amendment. The legislatures can and should make an assessment of the deterrent influence of capital punishment, both generally and as affecting the commission of specific types of crimes. If legislatures come to doubt the efficacy of capital punishment, they can abolish it, either completely or on a selective basis. If new evidence persuades them that they have acted unwisely, they can reverse their field and reinstate the penalty to the extent it is thought warranted. An Eighth Amendment ruling by judges cannot be made with such flexibility or discriminating precision.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun was concerned with the lack of justification for the majority's decision to use the Constitution to invalidate the method by which the death penalty was imposed. He argued that no precedent for such a course was evident. The essence of Justice Blackmun's dissent stated the following:

The several concurring opinions acknowledge, as they must, that until today capital punishment was accepted and assumed as not unconstitutional per se under the Eighth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment....

Suddenly, however, the course of decision is now the opposite way, with the Court evidently persuaded that somehow the passage of time has taken us to a place of greater maturity and outlook. The argument, plausible and high-sounding as it may be, is not persuasive.... The Court has just decided that it is time to strike down the death penalty....

The Court has recognized, and I certainly subscribe to the proposition, that the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause may acquire meaning as public opinion becomes enlightened by a humane justice....

My problem, however, as I have indicated, is the suddenness of the Court's perception of progress in the human attitude since decisions of only a short while ago....

I do not sit on these cases, however, as a legislator, responsive, at least in part, to the will of constituents. Our task here, as must so frequently be emphasized and re-emphasized, is to pass upon the constitutionality of legislation that has been enacted and that is challenged. This is the sole task for judges. We should not allow our personal preferences as to the wisdom of legislative and congressional action, or our distaste for such action, to guide our judicial decision in cases such as these. The temptations to cross that policy line are very great. In fact, as today's decision reveals, they are almost irresistible.

I trust the Court fully appreciates what it is doing when it decides these cases the way it does today. Not only are the capital punishment laws of 39 States and the District of Columbia struck down, but also all those provisions of the federal statutory structure that permit the death penalty apparently are voided....

Although personally I may rejoice at the Court's result, I find it difficult to accept or to justify as a matter of history, of law, or of constitutional pronouncement. I fear the Court has overstepped. It has sought and has achieved an end.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Powell: Justice Powell's dissent displayed concern for the lack of precedent in the judgment of the majority and the possible consequences of the majority's decision. Justice Powell presented the heart of his dissent as follows:

It is the judgment of five Justices that the death penalty, as customarily prescribed and implemented in this country today, offends the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishments. The reasons for that judgment are stated in five separate opinions, expressing as many separate rationales. In my view, none of these opinions provides a constitutionally adequate foundation for the Court's decision....

Whatever uncertainties may hereafter surface, several of the consequences of today's decision are unmistakably clear. The decision is plainly one of the greatest importance the Court's judgment removes the death sentences previously imposed on some 600 persons awaiting punishment in state and federal prisons throughout the country. At least for the present, it also bars the States and the Federal Government from seeking sentences of death for defendants awaiting trial on charges for which capital punishment was heretofore a potential alternative. The happy event for these countable few constitutes, however, only the most visible consequence of this decision. Less measurable, but certainly of no less significance, is the shattering effect this collection of views has on the root principles of stare decisis, federalism, judicial restraint and — most importantly — separation of powers....

In terms of the constitutional role of this Court, the impact of the majority's ruling is all the greater because the decision encroaches upon an area squarely within the historic prerogative of the legislative branch — both state and federal — to protect the citizenry through the designation of penalties for prohibitable conduct. It is the very sort of judgment that the legislative branch is competent to make and for which the judiciary is ill-equipped. Throughout our history, Justices of this Court have emphasized the gravity of decisions invalidating legislative judgments, admonishing the nine men who sit on this bench of the duty of self-restraint, especially when called upon to apply the expansive due process and cruel and unusual punishment rubrics. I can recall no case in which, in the name of deciding constitutional questions, this Court has subordinated national and local democratic processes to such an extent....

On virtually every occasion that any opinion has touched on the question of the constitutionality of the death penalty, it has been asserted affirmatively, or tacitly assumed, that the Constitution does not prohibit the penalty. No Justice of the Court, until today, has dissented from this consistent reading of the Constitution. The petitioners in these cases now before the Court cannot fairly avoid the weight of this substantial body of precedent merely by asserting that there is no prior decision precisely in point. Stare decisis, if it is a doctrine founded on principle, surely applies where there exists a long line of cases endorsing or necessarily assuming the validity of a particular matter of constitutional interpretation....

Members of this Court know, from the petitions and appeals that come before us regularly, that brutish and revolting murders continue to occur with disquieting frequency. Indeed, murders are so commonplace in our society that only the most sensational receive significant and sustained publicity. It could hardly be suggested that in any of these highly publicized murder cases — the several senseless assassinations or the too numerous shocking multiple murders that have stained this country's recent history — the public has exhibited any signs of "revulsion" at the thought of executing the convicted murderers. The public outcry, as we all know, has been quite to the contrary. Furthermore, there is little reason to suspect that the public's reaction would differ significantly in response to other less publicized murders. It is certainly arguable that many such murders, because of their senselessness or barbarousness, would evoke a public demand for the death penalty rather than a public rejection of that alternative. Nor is there any rational basis for arguing that the public reaction to any of these crimes would be muted if the murderer were "rich and powerful." The demand for the ultimate sanction might well be greater, as a wealthy killer is hardly a sympathetic figure. While there might be specific cases in which capital punishment would be regarded as excessive and shocking to the conscience of the community, it can hardly be argued that the public's dissatisfaction with the penalty in particular cases would translate into a demand for absolute abolition.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist expressed concern about the usurpation of power he believed was represented in the judgment of the majority. The critical points of his dissent stated the following:

The Court's judgments today strike down a penalty that our Nation's legislators have thought necessary since our country was founded. My Brothers Douglas, Brennan, and Marshall would at one fell swoop invalidate laws enacted by Congress and 40 of the 50 state legislatures, and would consign to the limbo of unconstitutionality under a single rubric penalties for offenses as varied and unique as murder, piracy, mutiny, highjacking, and desertion in the face of the enemy. My Brothers Stewart and White, asserting reliance on a more limited rationale — the reluctance of judges and juries actually to impose the death penalty in the majority of capital cases — join in the judgments in these cases. Whatever its precise rationale, today's holding necessarily brings into sharp relief the fundamental question of the role of judicial review in a democratic society. How can government by the elected representatives of the people co-exist with the power of the federal judiciary, whose members are constitutionally insulated from responsiveness to the popular will, to declare invalid laws duly enacted by the popular branches of government?...

If there can be said to be one dominant theme in the Constitution, perhaps more fully articulated in the Federalist Papers than in the instrument itself, it is the notion of checks and balances. The Framers were well aware of the natural desire of office holders as well as others to seek to expand the scope and authority of their particular office at the expense of others. They sought to provide against success in such efforts by erecting adequate checks and balances in the form of grants of authority to each branch of the government in order to counteract and prevent usurpation on the part of the others....

While overreaching by the Legislative and Executive Branches may result in the sacrifice of individual protections that the Constitution was designed to secure against action of the State, judicial over-reaching may result in sacrifice of the equally important right of the people to govern themselves. The Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment were "never intended to destroy the States' power to govern themselves."

Case Note: The case was one of three opinions issued by the Court, on the same day, invalidating death penalty statutes. See also Impact of the Furman Decision; Moore v. Illinois; Stewart v. Massachusetts

Future Dangerousness Aggravator The future dangerousness aggravator, also called continuing threat aggravator, is used by a few jurisdictions to permit the imposition of the death penalty. The jurisdictions that use this aggravator include Idaho, Oklahoma, Oregon, Texas, Virginia, and Wyoming. To establish this aggravator, evidence must show that a defendant is still a threat to society. The rationale behind the aggravator is that a sentence of life imprisonment would expose others, inside and outside prison, to danger. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Future Dangerousness Mitigator The future dangerousness mitigator, also called continuing threat mitigator, is used as a statutory mitigating circumstance in five jurisdictions for the purpose of not imposing the death penalty. Those jurisdictions include Colorado, Kansas, Maryland, New Mexico, and Washington. To establish this mitigator, a defendant must show that he/she is not a threat to society. The rationale behind the mitigator is that a sentence of life imprisonment would not expose others to grave danger, if the defendant was spared the death penalty. See also Mitigating Circumstances

G

Gabon Gabon permits the imposition of the death penalty. The firing squad is the method of execution used in Gabon. The nation's legal system is based on French civil law and customary law. Gabon adopted a constitution on March 14, 1991.

The judicial system of Gabon is composed of trial courts, appellate courts, a supreme court, a constitutional court, and a state security court. Criminal defendants have the right to a public trial and the right to legal counsel. Under the laws of Gabon, defendants are presumed guilty. This presumption oftentimes results in judges rendering an immediate verdict at the initial hearing if sufficient evidence is presented by the government. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Gacy, John Wayne From 1972 to 1978, John Wayne Gacy sodomized and killed thirty-three boys and young men in Illinois. For a brief period, Gacy held the distinction of being convicted of more murders than any other person in the history of the United States.

Gacy was born in Chicago on March 17, 1942. He dropped out of high school and wandered through several states before ending up in Waterloo, Iowa, with a wife in 1964. While living in Iowa, Gacy presented himself as a likeable family man who enjoyed being around boys. The facade of Gacy's life crumbled in 1968 when he was charged with sodomizing fifteen- and sixteen-year-old youth. He was sentenced to prison for ten years. His wife divorced him while he was in prison. On June 18, 1970, Gacy was released on parole.

When Gacy left prison, he returned to his native Chicago. Gacy began to pick up the pieces of his life when he returned home. His past did not haunt him and on June 1, 1972, Gacy married for a second time. At the time of his marriage, Gacy had already killed his first victim in January 1972. Gacy's second marriage ended in divorce in 1976.

Two years after Gacy's second marriage failed, the secret life he had been living during and after the marriage was exposed to a horrified public. Gacy's downfall started with the disappearance of fifteen-year-old Robert Piest on December 11, 1978. Gacy had picked up Piest near a pharmacy in Des Plaines, Illinois. Piest had informed his mother that he was going to meet a man to discuss a summer job as a construction worker. Piest was never seen alive again.

When Piest was reported missing, local police immediately suspected Gacy. Although witnesses could only give information about the vehicle Gacy drove at the time he picked up Piest, that was enough for the police to run a thorough background check on him. The background check revealed Gacy's pedophile history. Police were able to obtain a warrant to search Gacy's home, which was executed in his absence on December 13. Authorities were hoping to find Piest in the home, but did not. Numerous items were removed from the home, however. After intense investigation into the items removed from Gacy's home, the police got a break. A ring that was removed from his home belonged to another teenager who had disappeared a year earlier. Armed with this evidence, the police apprehended Gacy and subjected him to interrogation.

Gacy broke down during interrogation. Initially, he admitted to killing one person in self-defense, but later admitted that he had killed approximately thirty individuals, burying most of the bodies in a crawl space under his home and throwing some into the Des Plaines River. The authorities rushed to confirm Gacy's confession. Excavation was begun under the crawl space and the area surrounding Gacy's home. The digging uncovered twenty-nine bodies. In addition, the police recovered four bodies from the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers, downstream from the places where Gacy told them he had thrown the bodies.

Gacy informed authorities that he lured his victims into being handcuffed and then sexually assaulted them. He described how he muffled their screams by stuffing socks or underwear into their mouths. Gacy reported that he would strangle his victims to death as he raped them.

Gacy was indicted for thirty-three murders. Twelve of the murders were committed after Illinois reenacted the death penalty and therefore carried capital punishment. Gacy's trial on all thirty-three murders began on February 6, 1980. The jury in the case convicted Gacy of all thirty-three murders. He was sentenced to death on for each of the twelve capital punishment murders and sentenced to life imprisonment on each of the remaining murder convictions. Gacy was executed by lethal injection on May 10, 1994. See also Serial Killer

Gainsville Ripper Murders In August 1990, authorities in Gainsville, Florida, discovered the mutilated remains of five people. Because of the dismemberment of the bodies, the media dubbed the perpetrator the "Gainsville Ripper."

Investigation of the Gainsville Ripper murders led authorities to Danny Rolling. Rolling was born on May 26, 1954, in Shreveport, Louisiana. He was the troubled son of a police officer. Rolling dropped out of high school and joined the Air Force at the age of seventeen. He was prematurely discharged in 1973 due to drug and alcohol abuse. After his discharge, Rolling returned to Louisiana. He married in 1974 and fathered a daughter during the marriage. The marriage ended in 1977.

After the breakup of his marriage, Rolling embarked on a life of crime. In 1979, he was sentenced to six years in prison for the robbery of a store in Columbus, Georgia. He was also prosecuted for a second robbery in Alabama. Thus, after serving his Georgia sentence in 1982, Rolling was extradited Alabama to serve a ten-year sentence.

Rolling obtained early parole on his Alabama sentence and returned to Shreveport in 1984. Not long after being released, Rolling was prosecuted for robbery in Mississippi in July 1985. He received a fifteen-year sentence, but was released in 1988. After his release, he again returned to Shreveport.

On November 6, 1989, authorities found three family members slaughtered in their Shreveport home. At the time of this incident, authorities did not suspect Rolling of the crimes. In May 1990, Rolling got into an argument with his father and shot him in the head and stomach. Rolling fled Louisiana and ended up in Gainesville, Florida.

Rolling's presence in Gainesville was felt when, on August 26, 1990, authorities found the decomposing bodies of roommates Sonja Larsen and Christina Powell. They were apparently killed two days earlier. Both victims had been mutilated, one with her nipples cut off, the other sodomized. On August 27, the decapitated body of eighteen-year-old Christa Hoyt was found slain at home. On August 28, the dead bodies of roommates Tracy Paules and Manuel Taboada were found their apartment.

The five random murders sent Gainesville into a panic. Authorities were pressured into finding the perpetrator. During the investigation, they learned that similar murders had occurred in Shreveport. This knowledge was meaningless until Rolling was arrested for several robberies in the Gainesville area. A background check informed authorities that he was from Shreveport and was wanted for the attempted murder of his father. The Shreveport connection focused Gainesville authorities on Rolling as the perpetrator of the five mutilation deaths. Evidence began to reveal itself. Pubic hair and tools uncovered at Rolling's hide-out placed him at Gainesville murder scenes. Additionally, Rolling's DNA matched semen traces from the victims he had sodomized.

Rolling was first prosecuted for three robberies he committed in Tampa. In 1991, he was sentenced to three life terms plus 170 years in prison for the robberies. He was subsequently indicted for the Gainesville murders. Hoping to avoid the death penalty, Rolling decided to confess to the murders. On February 15, 1994, he entered a plea of guilty to each murder charge. On April 20, 1994, the trial court sentenced Rolling to death. Rolling was executed by lethal injection on October 25, 2006. See also Serial Killer

Gambia Capital punishment is on the law books in Gambia, but the punishment is not regularly imposed. Its legal system is based on English common law, Islamic law, and customary law. A new constitution was adopted by the nation on August 8, 1996.

Gambia's judicial system is composed of a court of appeal, High court, and magistrate court. Appeals may be taken to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England (though Gambia has considered ending the practice of allowing appeals in England). The judicial system also recognizes customary courts and Shari'a (Islamic) courts. Customary laws have jurisdiction over marriage and divorce for non-Muslims, inheritance, land tenure, and all other traditional and social relations. Shari'a courts have jurisdiction primarily over Muslim marriage and divorce matters.

Defendants have the right to public trials and retained legal counsel. In special situations, trials may not be open to the public. For example, the trial of three defendants in 1997 for complicity in a coup attempt was closed to the public. The three defendants were convicted of treason and sentenced to death. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Gang Member Aggravator The act of killing another when the assailant is a member of a gang is a statutory aggravating circumstance. Six capital punishment jurisdictions, Arizona, California, Florida, Indiana, Missouri, and Washington, have made

Danny Rolling confessed to killing five people in Gainesville, Florida. He was executed by lethal injection on October 25, 2006. (Florida Department of Corrections) killing under such circumstances a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the penalty phase jury may recommend the death penalty if it is determined that a capital felon was a gang member when he or she killed another. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's due process rights were violated when the death sentence imposed against him was based, in part, on information that he had no opportunity to deny or explain.

Case Holding: The defendant's due process rights were violated when the death sentence imposed against him was based, in part, on information that he had no opportunity to deny or explain.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Gardner, was convicted of capital murder by a Florida jury. During the penalty phase, the jury recommended life imprisonment as the punishment. The trial court, after reviewing an undisclosed part of a confidential pre-sentence report, rejected the jury's recommendation and imposed a death sentence. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence without expressly discussing the defendant's contention that the trial court violated his constitutional rights by unilaterally considering the pre-sentence report. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Stevens Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Stewart and Powell, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens held that the Due Process Clause required the defendant be given an opportunity to deny or explain the confidential information which was considered by the trial court in rendering the decision to impose the death penalty. The opinion ruled that no good cause was shown to warrant failing to disclose the confidential part of the pre-sentence report to the defendant. The judgment of the Florida Supreme Court was reversed, with respect to the sentence, and the case was remanded for a new sentencing hearing.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White: Justice White concurred in the Court's judgment. In doing so, he contended that the case should have been resolved under the Eighth Amendment and not on due process ground. He wrote: "Here the sentencing judge indicated that he selected ... Gardner for the death penalty in part because of information contained in a pre-sentence report which information was not disclosed to [the defendant] or to his counsel and to which [the defendant] had no opportunity to respond. A procedure for selecting people for the death penalty which permits consideration of such secret information relevant to the 'character and record of the individual offender,' fails to meet the 'need for reliability in the determination that death is the appropriate punishment.' This conclusion stems solely from the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishments.... I thus see no reason to address in this case the possible application to sentencing proceedings — in death or other cases — of the Due Process Clause, other than as the vehicle by which the strictures of the Eighth Amendment are triggered in this case. For these reasons, I do not join the plurality opinion but concur in the judgment."

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan stated in his brief concurring and dissenting opinion: "I agree for the reasons stated in the plurality opinion that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is violated when a defendant facing a death sentence is not informed of the contents of a pre-sentence investigation report made to the sentencing judge. However, I adhere to my view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. I therefore would vacate the death sentence, and I dissent from the Court's judgment insofar as it remands for further proceedings that could lead to its imposition."

Concurring Statement by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's judgment.

Concurring Statement by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court's judgment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall argued in his dissent that the trial court failed to actually consider the merits of the evidence in rejecting the jury's recommendation. He also argued that the Florida Supreme Court failed to perform a constitutionally acceptable review of the defendant's death sentence. The dissent stated its position as follows:

Last Term, this Court carefully scrutinized the Florida procedures for imposing the death penalty [in Proffitt v. Florida] and concluded that there were sufficient safeguards to insure that the death sentence would not be "wantonly" and "freakishly" imposed. This case, however, belies that hope. While I continue to believe that the death penalty is unconstitutional in all circumstances and therefore would remand this case for re-sentencing to a term of life, nevertheless, now that Florida may legally take a life, we must insist that it be in accordance with the standards enunciated by this Court. In this case I am appalled at the extent to which Florida has deviated from the procedures upon which this Court expressly relied. It is not simply that the trial judge, in overriding the jury's recommendation of life imprisonment, relied on undisclosed portions of the pre-sentence report. Nor is it merely that the Florida Supreme Court affirmed the sentence without discussing the omission and without concern that it did not even have the entire report before it. Obviously that alone is enough to deny due process and require that the death sentence be vacated as the Court now holds. But the blatant disregard exhibited by the courts below for the standards devised to regulate imposition of the death penalty calls into question the very basis for this Court's approval of that system....

In the present case ... the Florida Supreme Court engaged in precisely the "cursory or rubber-stamp review" that the joint opinion in Proffitt trusted would not occur. The jury, after considering the evidence, recommended a life sentence. The judge, however, ignored the jury's findings. His statutorily required written findings consisted of [two brief paragraphs]. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed with two justices dissenting. The per curiam consisted of a statement of the facts of the murder, a verbatim copy of the trial judge's "findings," a conclusion that no new trial was warranted....

[I]t is apparent that the State Supreme Court undertook none of the analysis it had previously proclaimed to be its duty. The opinion does not say that the Supreme Court evaluated the propriety of the death sentence. It merely says the trial judge did so. Despite its professed obligation to do so, the Supreme Court thus failed "to determine independently" whether death was the appropriate penalty. The Supreme Court also appears to have done nothing "to guarantee" consistency with other death sentences. Its opinion makes no comparison with the facts in other similar cases. Nor did it consider whether the trial judge was correct in overriding the jury's recommendation. There was no attempt to ascertain whether the evidence sustaining death was "so clear and convincing that virtually no reasonable person could differ." Indeed, it is impossible for me to believe that that standard can be met in this case....

Clearly, this is not a case where the evidence suggesting death is "so clear and convincing that virtually no reasonable person could differ." Had the Florida Supreme Court examined the evidence in the manner this Court trusted it would, I have no doubt that the jury recommendation of life imprisonment would have been reinstated.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist wrote a brief dissenting opinion indicating that due process analysis was inappropriate for the case. He believed that under Eighth Amendment analysis, the death sentence was validly imposed against the defendant. He "would therefore affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court of Florida."

Garfield's Assassination On July 2, 1881, President James Garfield was fatally shot by Charles Julius Guiteau. The assassination occurred as the president was about to depart for a vacation from the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Station.

Guiteau was born on September 8, 1841, in Freeport, Illinois. He spent much of his adult life moving back and forth between Chicago and New York. Guiteau was married for about five years before his wife divorced him because of abusive behavior. During the early 1860s, he was a practicing attorney in Chicago. However, he abandoned the practice of law and became an itinerant preacher in 1877.

Guiteau took an active interest in national politics in 1880. He initially supported efforts to nominate President Ulysses S. Grant for a third term. However, when that movement failed he turned his support to Garfield. Guiteau performed grassroots work for Garfield's campaign in New York. After Garfield's election in 1881, Guiteau moved to Washington, D.C., in search of a political job as payment for his earlier campaign work.

When Guiteau arrived in Washington, he was surprised to find that the president's staff did not know him from any of the other thousands of volunteer campaign workers. Guiteau made repeated requests for a political appointment, but was rejected. Guiteau felt betrayed by a president who did not support him. On July 2, 1881, Guiteau exacted his revenge by shooting the president in the arm and in the back.

Guiteau was immediately arrested after the shooting. His trial was lengthy, beginning on November 14, 1881, and ending on May 22, 1882. He was found guilty and sentenced to death. On June 30, 1882, Guiteau was hanged at the District of Columbia jail.

Georgia The State of Georgia is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on March 28, 1973.

Georgia has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Georgia Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Georgia Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and nine judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called superior courts. Capital offenses against the State of Georgia are tried in the superior courts. The State has created the Office of the Georgia Capital Defender for the purpose of providing legal counsel to all indigent persons charged with a capital felony for which the death penalty is being sought.

Georgia's capital punishment offenses are set out under Ga. Code § 16-5-1. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

a. A person commits the offense of murder when he unlawfully and with malice aforethought, either express or implied, causes the death of another human being.

b. Express malice is that deliberate intention unlawfully to take the life of another human being which is manifested by external circumstances capable of proof. Malice shall be implied where no considerable provocation appears and where all the circumstances of the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart.

c. A person also commits the offense of murder when, in the commission of a felony, he causes the death of another human being irrespective of malice.

In addition, Ga. Code § 16-11-1 makes the crime of treason a capital offense. The statute defines treason as a person who knowingly levies war against the State, adheres to its enemies, or gives them aid and comfort. Further, under Ga. Code § 16-5-44, the crime of aircraft hijacking is made a capital offense. This crime is committed when a person, by use of force or by intimidation, causes the diversion of an aircraft from its intended destination to a destination dictated by such person. It should be noted that, under Ga. Code § 16-6-1, the crime of rape is punishable with death; under Ga. Code § 16-5-40, the crime of kidnapping is punishable with death; and, under Ga. Code § 16-8-41, the crime of armed robbery is subject to the death penalty. However, under decisions by the United States Supreme Court, the death penalty cannot be imposed for aircraft hijacking, rape, kidnapping, or armed robbery unless a homicide occurs.

Capital murder in Georgia is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Georgia is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment without parole. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Georgia.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Ga. Code § 17-10-30(b) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The offense of murder, rape, armed robbery, or kidnapping was committed by a person with a prior record of conviction for a capital felony;

2. The offense of murder, rape, armed robbery, or kidnapping was committed while the offender was engaged in the commission of another capital felony or aggravated battery, or the offense of murder was committed while the offender was engaged in the commission of burglary or arson in the first degree;

3. The offender, by his act of murder, armed robbery, or kidnapping, knowingly created a great risk of death to more than one person in a public place by means of a weapon or device which would normally be hazardous to the lives of more than one person;

4. The offender committed the offense of murder for himself or another, for the purpose of receiving money or any other thing of monetary value;

5. The murder of a judicial officer, former judicial officer, district attorney or solicitor-general, or former district attorney, solicitor, or solicitor-general was committed during or because of the exercise of his or her official duties;

6. The offender caused or directed another to commit murder or committed murder as an agent or employee of another person;

7. The offense of murder, rape, armed robbery, or kidnapping was outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible, or inhuman in that it involved torture, depravity of mind, or an aggravated battery to the victim;

8. The offense of murder was committed against any peace officer, corrections employee, or firefighter while engaged in the performance of his official duties;

9. The offense of murder was committed by a person in, or who has escaped from, the lawful custody of a peace officer or place of lawful confinement;

10. The murder was committed for the purpose of avoiding, interfering with, or preventing a lawful arrest or custody in a place of lawful confinement, of himself or another; or

11. The offense of murder, rape, or kidnapping was committed by a person previously convicted of rape, aggravated sodomy, aggravated child molestation, or aggravated sexual battery.

Georgia does not provide by statute any mitigating circumstances to the imposition of the death penalty. Even though the State does not provide statutory mitigating circumstances, the United States Supreme Court has ruled that all relevant mitigating evidence must be allowed at the penalty phase.

Under Georgia's capital punishment statute, the Georgia Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Georgia uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Jackson, Georgia, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Atlanta, Georgia.

Pursuant to the laws of Georgia, the State's Board of Pardons and Parole has exclusive jurisdiction to grant or deny clemency.

Under the laws of Georgia, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Ga. Code §:

There shall be present at the execution of a convicted person the superintendent of the state correctional institution or a deputy superintendent thereof, at least three executioners, two physicians to determine when death supervenes, and other correctional officers, assistants, technicians, and witnesses as determined by the commissioner of corrections. In addition, the convicted person may request the presence of his or her counsel, a member of the clergy, and a reasonable number of relatives and friends, provided that the total number of witnesses appearing at the request of the convicted person shall be determined by the commissioner of corrections.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Georgia executed thirty-nine capital felons. During this period, Georgia did not execute any female capital felons, although one of its death row inmates during this period was a female. A total of 107 capital felons were on death row in Georgia as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as fifty black inmates, fifty-three white inmates, three Hispanic inmates, and one Asian inmate.

Ghana Ghana permits the imposition of the death penalty. The method of execution used by Ghana is the firing squad. Its legal system is based on English common law and customary law. Ghana approved a new constitution on April 28, 1992.

The judicial system of Ghana is composed of a supreme court, an appeals court, a high court, and regional tribunals. The government also recognizes customary courts that preside over such matters as divorce, child custody, and property disputes. Under the laws of Ghana, trials are public and defendants are presumed innocent and have a right to appointed or retained counsel. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

ments for removing his State capital murder prosecution into a federal court.

Case Holding: The defendant did not satisfy the requirements for removing his State capital murder prosecution into a federal court because he failed to show that the laws or constitution of Mississippi authorized discrimination against blacks in selecting grand or petit juries.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Gibson, was charged with capital murder by the State of Mississippi. The defendant sought to remove the prosecution into a federal court on the grounds that blacks were systematically excluded from grand and petit juries in the county where he was being prosecuted. The request to remove the case to a federal court was denied. The defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. The Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue of removal of the case to a federal court.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan ruled that the request to remove the prosecution into a federal court was properly denied. The opinion explained the Court's decision as follows: "We ... held, in Neal v. Delaware, that congress had not authorized a removal of the prosecution from the state court where jury commissioners or other subordinate officers had, without authority derived from the constitution and laws of the state, excluded [black] citizens from juries because of their race. In view of this decision, it is clear that the accused in the present case was not entitled to have the case removed into the circuit court of the United States, unless he was denied, by the constitution or laws of Mississippi, some of the fundamental rights of life or liberty that were guaranteed to other citizens resident in that state."

Justice Harlan indicated that neither the laws or constitution of Mississippi authorized discrimination against blacks in grand or petit jury selection. It was further said: "We do not overlook, in this connection, the fact that the petition for the removal of the cause into the federal court alleged that the accused, by reason of the great prejudice against him on account of his color, could not secure a fair and impartial trial in the county, and that he prayed an opportunity to subpoena witnesses to prove that fact. Such evidence, if it had been introduced, and however cogent, could not, as already shown, have entitled the accused to the removal sought; for the alleged existence of race prejudice, interfering with a fair trial, was not to be attributed to the constitution and laws of the state." The judgment of the Mississippi Supreme Court was affirmed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection

Ginsburg, Ruth Bader Ruth Bader Ginsburg was appointed as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1993. Ginsburg's early opinions have indicated a moderate approach to constitutional interpretation.

Ginsburg was born in Brooklyn, New York, on March 15, 1933. She received an undergraduate degree from Cornell University in 1954. Subsequently, she attended Harvard Law School and Columbia Law School, where she obtained a law degree. After law school, Ginsburg clerked for a federal district court judge before taking a teaching position at Rutgers University School of Law.

Ginsburg left teaching in 1972 in order to taking up a legal advocacy position with the Women's Rights Project of the American Civil Liberties Union. In 1993, President Bill Clinton appointed Ginsburg to the Supreme Court.

Ginsburg has written several capital punishment opinions for the Supreme Court. The opinions suggest that Ginsburg has a liberal interpretation of the Constitution as it applies to capital punishment. For example, in Ring v. Arizona, Ginsburg overruled a prior Supreme Court opinion in order to find that the Constitution required a jury decide the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstance at the penalty phase of a capital prosecution. Prior to Ring, the Supreme Court had held that a trial judge could determine the issue, even though a jury presided over the guilt phase.

Issue Presented: Whether the vague statutory aggravating circumstance of outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman, was properly defined so as to sustain the defendant's death sentence.

Case Holding: The vague statutory aggravating circumstance of outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman, was not properly defined so as to sustain the defendant's death sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Georgia charged the defendant, Godfrey, with capital murder in the shooting deaths of his wife and mother-in-law. The jury convicted the defendant of both murders. During the penalty phase, the trial judge instructed the jury that it could return death sentences if it found the murders were "outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman." (This was a statutory aggravating circumstance.) The jury returned death sentences on both murder convictions. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the convictions and sentences, after rejecting the defendant's contention that the statutory aggravating circumstance was unconstitutionally vague. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Stewart Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Blackmun, Powell, and Stevens, JJ., Joined: Justice Stewart announced that it was the judgment of the Court that, in affirming the death sentences in the case, the Georgia Supreme Court adopted such a broad and vague construction of the statutory aggravating circumstance as to violate the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. It was said that if a State wishes to authorize capital punishment, it has a constitutional responsibility to tailor and apply its law in a manner that avoids the arbitrary and capricious infliction of the death penalty. There, States must define the crimes for which death may be imposed in a way that obviates standardless sentencing discretion.

The opinion noted that in earlier decisions interpreting the statutory aggravating circumstance, the Georgia Supreme Court adequately limited the aggravator to mean torture, depravity of mind, or an aggravated battery to the victim. However, this limitation was not used in the defendant's case. The opinion indicated that the defendant did not torture or commit an aggravated battery upon his victims or cause either of them to suffer any physical injury preceding their deaths. Justice Stewart concluded:

Thus, the validity of the [defendant's] death sentences turns on whether, in light of the facts and circumstances of the murders that he was convicted of committing, the Georgia Supreme Court can be said to have applied a constitutional construction of the phrase "outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman in that [they] involved ... depravity of mind." We conclude that the answer must be no. The [defendant's] crimes cannot be said to have reflected a consciousness materially more "depraved" than that of any person guilty of murder. His victims were killed instantaneously. They were members of his family who were causing him extreme emotional trauma. Shortly after the killings, he acknowledged his responsibility and the heinous nature of his crimes. These factors certainly did not remove the criminality from the [defendant's actions]. But, as was said in [previous decisions], it "is of vital importance to the defendant and to the community that any decision to impose the death sentence be, and appear to be, based on reason rather than caprice or emotion."

That cannot be said here. There is no principled way to distinguish this case, in which the death penalty was imposed, from the many cases in which it was not. Accordingly, the judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court insofar as it leaves standing the [defendant's] death sentences is reversed, and the case is remanded to that court for further proceedings.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Marshall, in Which Brennan, J., Joined: Justice Marshall stated in his concurring opinion that he continued to believe that the death penalty was prohibited by the Constitution. He noted that he agreed "with the plurality that the Georgia Supreme Court's construction of the provision at issue in this case is unconstitutionally vague." The opinion concluded that, even under the prevailing view that the death penalty may, in some circumstances, constitutionally be imposed, it is not enough for a reviewing court to apply a narrowing construction to otherwise ambiguous statutory language. It was necessary that the jury be instructed on the proper, narrow construction of the statute.

Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice believed that the Court was wrong to substitute its opinion for that of the Georgia Supreme Court. He believed the jury properly understood the common sense meaning to give the statutory aggravating circumstance and that the State's highest court correctly found the evidence existed to sustain the jury's decision. The chief justice concluded: "In short, I am convinced that the course the plurality embarks on today is sadly mistaken — indeed confused. It is this Court's function to insure that the rights of a defendant are scrupulously respected; and in capital cases we must see to it that the jury has rendered its decision with meticulous care. But it is emphatically not our province to second-guess the jury's judgment or to tell the states which of their 'hideous,' intentional murderers may be given the ultimate penalty. Because the plurality does both, I dissent."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice White, in Which Rehnquist, J., Joined: Justice White argued in his dissenting opinion that the jury was properly instructed on the statutory aggravating circumstance and that the evidence supported the jury's verdict. He further believed that the Court's decision was "an unwarranted invasion into the realm of state law." Ultimately, Justice White indicated that to the extent any error may have occurred in the case, it was not "a genuine error of constitutional magnitude."

Issue Presented: Whether the competency standard for pleading guilty or waiving the right to counsel is higher than the competency standard for standing trial.

Case Holding: The competency standard for pleading guilty or waiving the right to counsel is no higher than the competency standard for standing trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Richard Allan Moran, was charged with three counts of capital murder by the State of Nevada. Initially, the defendant pled not guilty. However, he informed that trial court that he wanted to discharge his attorneys and plead guilty to all three counts of capital murder. The trial court permitted the defendant to discharge his attorneys and plead guilty to three counts of capital murder. The defendant was ultimately sentenced to death.

The defendant subsequently sought State post-conviction relief, alleging that he was mentally incompetent to represent himself. A post-conviction hearing was held by the trial court and it found (1) that the defendant understood the nature of the criminal charges against him and was able to assist in his defense; (2) that he knowingly and intelligently waived his right to the assistance of counsel; and (3) that his guilty pleas were freely and voluntarily given. The trial court denied post-conviction relief and the Nevada Supreme Court affirmed.

The defendant next filed a petition for habeas corpus in a federal district court, but the petition was dismissed. However, a federal Court of Appeals reversed. The Court of Appeals held that due process required the State trial court hold a hearing to evaluate and determine the defendant's competency before it accepted his decisions to waive counsel and plead guilty. It also found that the post-conviction hearing did not cure the error, because the trial court's ruling was premised on the wrong legal standard. It was said by the Court of Appeals that competency to waive constitutional rights requires a higher level of mental functioning than that required to stand trial. The appellate court reasoned that, while a defendant is competent to stand trial if he or she has a rational and factual understanding of the proceedings and is capable of assisting counsel, he or she is competent to waive counsel or plead guilty only if he or she has the capacity for reasoned choice among the available alternatives. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas rejected the reasoning of the Court of Appeals. He held that the competency standard for pleading guilty or waiving the right to counsel is the same as the competency standard for standing trial. That standard was said to be whether the defendant has sufficient present ability to consult with his or her lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him or her.

Justice Thomas said that there was no reason for the competency standard for pleading guilty or waiving the right to counsel to be higher than that for standing trial. He reasoned that the decision to plead guilty, though profound, is no more complicated than the sum total of decisions that a defendant may have to make during the course of a trial, such as whether to testify, whether to waive a jury trial, and whether to cross-examine the prosecution's witnesses. Justice Thomas wrote that the decision to waive counsel did not require an appreciably higher level of mental functioning than the decision to waive other constitutional rights.

The opinion concluded that requiring that a criminal defendant be competent has a modest aim of seeking to ensure that he or she has the capacity to understand the proceedings and to assist counsel. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Kennedy, in Which Scalia, J., Joined: Justice Kennedy wrote a concurring opinion indicating his agreement with the Court's decision. His concurring opinion stated the following:

I am in full agreement with the Court's decision that the competency standard for pleading guilty and waiving the right to counsel is the same as the test of competency to stand trial....

The Due Process Clause does not mandate different standards of competency at various stages of or for different decisions made during the criminal proceedings. That was never the rule at common law, and it would take some extraordinary showing of the inadequacy of a single standard of competency for us to require States to employ heightened standards.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Stevens, J., Joined: Justice Blackmun dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that the defendant's behavior justified imposition of a higher standard for proving competency to waive counsel and plead guilty. Justice Blackmun presented his position as follows:

Today, the majority holds that a standard of competence designed to measure a defendant's ability to consult with counsel and to assist in preparing his defense is constitutionally adequate to assess a defendant's competence to waive the right to counsel and represent himself. In so doing, the majority upholds the death sentence for a person whose decision to discharge counsel, plead guilty, and present no defense well may have been the product of medication or mental illness. I believe the majority's analysis is contrary to both common sense and longstanding case law....

[T]he standard for competence to stand trial is specifically designed to measure a defendant's ability to "consult with counsel" and to "assist in preparing his defense." A finding that a defendant is competent to stand trial establishes only that he is capable of aiding his attorney in making the critical decisions required at trial or in plea negotiations. The reliability or even relevance of such a finding vanishes when its basic premise — that counsel will be present — ceases to exist. The question is no longer whether the defendant can proceed with an attorney, but whether he can proceed alone and uncounseled. I do not believe we place an excessive burden upon a trial court by requiring it to conduct a specific inquiry into that question at the juncture when a defendant whose competency already has been questioned seeks to waive counsel and represent himself....

The record in this case gives rise to grave doubts regarding ... Moran's ability to discharge counsel and represent himself. Just a few months after he attempted to commit suicide, Moran essentially volunteered himself for execution: He sought to waive the right to counsel, to plead guilty to capital murder, and to prevent the presentation of any mitigating evidence on his behalf. The psychiatrists' reports supplied one explanation for Moran's self-destructive behavior: his deep depression. And Moran's own testimony suggested another: The fact that he was being administered simultaneously four different prescription medications....

To try, convict, and punish one so helpless to defend himself contravenes fundamental principles of fairness and impugns the integrity of our criminal justice system. I cannot condone the decision to accept, without further inquiry, the self-destructive "choice" of a person who was so deeply medicated and who might well have been severely mentally ill. I dissent.

Goldberg, Arthur J. Arthur J. Goldberg served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1962 to 1965. While on the Supreme Court, Goldberg was known as a liberal interpreter of the Constitution, particularly with respect to individual liberties and rights.

Goldberg was born in Chicago, Illinois, on August 8, 1908. He was a 1929 graduate of Northwestern University Law School. Much of Goldberg's private law practice was spent representing labor organizations. He was able to gain national prominence as a result of his representation of labor groups. President John F. Kennedy appointed Goldberg as Secretary of Labor in 1961. In 1962, President Kennedy filled a vacancy of the Supreme Court by appointing Goldberg to the position.

Goldberg is known to have written only two capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. In Townsend v. Sain, Goldberg issued a concurring opinion that was largely an attack on the dissenting opinion in the case. In Swain v. Alabama, Goldberg issued a scathing dissenting opinion. In Swain, the defendant contended that his capital conviction was invalid because African Americans were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The majority rejected the contention on the grounds that the defendant failed to present sufficient proof of discrimination. Goldberg dissented harshly: "I deplore the Court's departure from its [precedents]. By affirming [the defendant's] conviction on this clear record of jury exclusion because of race, the Court condones the highly discriminatory procedures used in Talladega County under which [blacks] never have served on any petit jury in that county. By adding to the present heavy burden of proof required of defendants in these cases, the Court creates additional barriers to the elimination of practices which have operated in many communities throughout the Nation to nullify the command of the Equal Protection Clause in this important area in the administration of justice." Goldberg resigned from the Supreme Court in 1965 in order to accept an appointment as United States ambassador to the United Nations. He died on January 19, 1990.

Issue Presented: Whether the federal kidnapping statute allowed a conviction and death sentence under it to be sustained, where the kidnapping was for the purpose of preventing the defendant's arrest only and no monetary value was contemplated.

Case Holding: The federal kidnapping statute allowed a conviction and death sentence under it to be sustained, where the kidnapping was for the purpose of preventing the defendant's arrest only and no monetary value was contemplated.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Gooch, was convicted of kidnapping and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to a federal Court of Appeals. The Court of Appeals thereafter certified the following question to the United States Supreme Court: Is holding an officer to avoid arrest within the meaning of the phrase, "held for ransom or reward or otherwise," under the federal kidnapping statute?

Opinion of the Court by Justice McReynolds: Justice McReynolds held that the certified question had to be answered in the affirmative. The opinion set out the language of the applicable statute as follows:

Whoever shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or aid or abet in transporting, in interstate or foreign commerce, any person who shall have been unlawfully seized, confined, inveigled, decoyed, kidnapped, abducted, or carried away by any means whatsoever and held for ransom or reward or otherwise, except, in the case of a minor, by a parent thereof, shall, upon conviction, be punished (1) by death if the verdict of the jury shall so recommend, provided that the sentence of death shall not be imposed by the court if, prior to its imposition, the kidnapped person has been liberated unharmed, or (2) if the death penalty shall not apply nor be imposed the convicted person shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for such term of years as the court in its discretion shall determine.

Justice McReynolds rejected the defendant's contention that, under the statute, the words "ransom or reward" require some kind of pecuniary consideration or payment of something of value. In rejecting the argument, the opinion reasoned as follows:

Holding an officer to prevent the captor's arrest is something done with the expectation of benefit to the transgressor. So also is kidnapping with purpose to secure money. These benefits, while not the same, are similar in their general nature and the desire to secure either of them may lead to kidnapping. If the word "reward," as commonly understood, is not itself broad enough to include benefits expected to follow the prevention of an arrest, they fall within the broad term “otherwise.” The words “except, in the case of a minor, by a parent thereof” emphasize the intended result of the enactment. They indicate legislative understanding that in their absence a parent, who carried his child away because of affection, might subject himself to condemnation of the statute.

The opinion concluded that the conviction and sentence under the statute were validly maintained.

Case Note: Under modern capital punishment jurisprudence, the death penalty may not be imposed for the crime of kidnapping unless with an accompanying homicide. See also Certified Question

Gordon, Nathaniel Nathaniel Gordon, born around 1834 in Portland, Maine, was the captain of a ship and a notorious slave trader. Gordon became a slave trader at a time when federal law prohibited the abduction of free persons for forced slavery. For several years, Gordon successfully violated the law by abducting people from Africa and transporting them for eventual enslavement in the United States. On August 8, 1860, Gordon was finally caught by federal authorities. On that day, a federal naval vessel apprehended Gordon’s ship off the west coast of Africa, about fifty miles outside the River Congo. The circumstances surrounding Gordon’s last slave trading voyage were set out by a federal court in its jury instructions in the case of United States v. Gordon, 25 F.Cas. 1364 (1861) as follows:

The 5th section of the act of May 15, 1820, under which the [defendant] is indicted, provides, that if any citizen of the United States, ... being of the crew or ship’s company of any ship or vessel, owned [by] ... any citizen ... of the United States, shall forcibly confine or detain, ... on board such ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make him a slave, such person shall be adjudged a pirate, and, on conviction, shall suffer death....

This brings us ... to the merits of the case, and the question is, is [Gordon] guilty or not, of forcibly confining or detaining the negroes on board of this vessel, in the Congo river, with the intent of making them slaves? This is the issue in the case, so far as the real merits are involved. Now ... the evidence, on the part of the government, [consists] of ... four seamen on board of the Erie, who shipped in Havana, in April, 1860, a short time after this alleged sale and transfer. They have detailed ... the circumstances of their employment as seamen, the cargo with which the vessel was laden at that port—some 150 or more hogheads of liquor, a number of barrels of pork and beef, bags of beans, barrels of bread and rice, and some 250 bundles of shooks, with a corresponding number of hoops, for the purpose of being subsequently manufactured into barrels or casks. Now, it may be material ... to inquire ... whether this was a bona fide cargo, for lawful trade and commerce, or whether it was a cargo fitted out and intended to be used in the slave trade. The vessel was of some 500 tons. If this was a fitting out for the purpose of engaging in the slave trade, and [Gordon] had a knowledge of this intended service of the vessel, then that fact would accompany him to the Congo river, ... as to the connection that he had with the transaction that occurred there, in receiving these negroes on board and detaining them....

Now, these four witnesses ... have detailed the progress of the voyage from Havana to the Congo river, and the taking of these negroes on board, and the starting from the river on the return voyage to Havana.... the four concur in the account which they have given of the voyage. They state that, after they had been out some thirty days, and had discovered the provisions and freight on board, a suspicion arose, in the minds of the sailors, that the vessel might be intended for the slave trade, and that they disclosed this suspicion to [Gordon], assigning to him the reason and grounds of it. [Gordon], however, disclaimed any such purpose, rebuked the suspicion, and ordered them forward. They all concur in stating that, after the vessel arrived in the Congo river, and while the persons connected with her, and those who furnished the cargo of negroes, were engaged in putting [eight hundred and ninety-seven African men, women, and children] on board, [Gordon] continued in command of her, so far as they saw, and exercised the same control over the vessel, and her management, and the putting on board of these negroes, as he had previously exercised in the course of the voyage. They also state that, after the negroes were put on board, they were called aft, and were applied to for the purpose of ascertaining whether they would continue to serve as seamen on the return voyage, and were told that, if they would, they should be paid a dollar a head for every negro landed at Cuba. They also state, especially some of them, that [Gordon] gave a direction for hoisting the anchor, and directed the course of the vessel when she came out of the river.

These are the material facts which have been testified to by the witnesses for the prosecution....

Now, ... if [Gordon], as master of this vessel, at Havana, had a knowledge that she was fitted out, equipped, and provisioned for a voyage to the Congo river, on the coast of Africa, for the purpose of engaging in the slave trade, then, in view of the fact of his entering upon that voyage, conducting the vessel to a foreign coast, remaining in her, and coming back with her, or starting to come back with her, before she was captured, this previous knowledge of [Gordon], and his engagement to navigate the vessel for that purpose, will have its influence as to the purpose for which he was found upon the vessel in the Congo river, at the time the negroes were put on board....

Now, ... in order to sustain the charge against [Gordon], it must appear that these negroes were “forcibly” confined and detained on board of that vessel, for the purpose of making them slaves—for the purpose of bringing them to Cuba, or elsewhere, to make them slaves. This word “forcibly,” which is a material element in the crime charged, does not mean physical or manual force. Even the crime of robbery, in which force is a peculiar element of the crime, it being the taking violently the property of another from his person, need not be accompanied with or consist of actual force. Any conduct, on the part of the robber, putting the person deprived of his goods in bodily fear and terror, is equivalent to actual force. And so in this case. These negroes were collected at the place where they were put on board, in barracoons, and were there under restraint by the persons who furnished them at the ship’s side. They were in bondage at the time, and under the control of those persons, who transferred them to the vessel. They came upon the deck of the vessel in that condition, and it would be strange, indeed, if it was made necessary by the law, that it should be shown that they made personal, physical resistance at the time, against being put on board and detained on board, under all these circumstances. It is sufficient that they were under moral restraint and fear—their wills controlled by this superior power exercised over their minds and bodies; and any person participating in that forcible detention, that sort of detention, is a principal, participating in the guilt of the offence.

Gordon’s trial for slave trafficking was held in New York City. On November 9, 1861, a jury convicted Gordon and he was sentenced to death. Gordon was executed by hanging on February 21, 1862. Gordon was the only person executed in the United States for trafficking in slaves. See also Ex Parte Gordon Issue Presented: Whether the trial court properly instructed the jury on how to interpret evidence showing the defendant armed himself after an altercation with the victim.

Case Holding: The trial court did not properly instruct the jury on how to interpret evidence showing the defendant armed himself after an altercation with the victim; therefore, the judgment against him could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, John Gourko, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that the trial committed error in failing to properly instruct the jury that it could return a verdict of manslaughter if it found he armed himself for self-defense only. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan ruled that the trial court improperly instructed the jury on how to interpret the evidence of the defendant arming himself after an altercation with the victim. The opinion explained as follows:

Assuming, for the purposes of the present inquiry, that the defendant was not entitled to an acquittal as having acted in self-defense, the vital question was as to the effect to be given to the fact that he armed himself with a deadly weapon after the angry meeting with [the victim].

If he armed himself for the purpose of pursuing his adversary, or with the intention of putting himself in the way of his adversary, so as to obtain an opportunity to kill him, then he was guilty of murder. But if ... the defendant had reasonable grounds to believe, and in fact believed, that the deceased intended to take his life, or to inflict upon him great bodily harm, and, so believing, armed himself solely for necessary self-defense in the event of his being pursued and attacked, ... then the defendant's arming himself ... did not have, in itself, the effect to convert his crime into that of murder.... [T]he jury were not authorized to find him guilty of murder because of his having deliberately armed himself, provided he rightfully so armed himself for purposes simply of self-defense, and if, independently of the fact of arming himself, the case tested by what occurred on the occasion of the killing was one of manslaughter only.

The judgment of the trial court was reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Graham, Barbara Barbara Graham, née Wood, was known to the press as "Bloody Babs" because of her role in murdering an elderly widow, Mrs. Mabel Monahan. Graham was born in Oakland, California, on June 26, 1923. She was born to a teenaged mother who was forced to abandon her with strangers. Graham grew into a rebellious and promiscuous girl. At the age of fourteen, her behavior caused her to be sent to a reform school. After being released from the reform school, Graham, at age seventeen, married a man named Harry Kleman in 1940. The marriage lasted a year and ended in divorce. Graham went on to have two more brief marriages before marrying her last husband, Henry Graham, in 1951.

Graham's life in the fast lane of marriage was coupled with drugs, prostitution, gambling, and an association with known criminals. Her last husband was involved in criminal activities. He introduced Graham to two of his crime partners, Emmet Perkins and Jack Santo. Graham eventually had an affair with Perkins.

The murder of Monahan resulted from a conspiracy between Graham, Perkins, Santo, and two men named John True and Baxter Shorter. Graham and her accomplices believed that Monahan, who lived in Burbank, California, kept a large amount of cash and jewels at her home and made a plan to rob her. The plan was carried out on March 9, 1953. The details of the crime were reported in the case of People v. Santo, 273 P.2d 249 (Cal. 1954), as follows:

About 6:00 P.M. on March 9, [Graham, Perkins, Santo, True, and Shorter] met at [a] parking lot. True, the only member of the party without gloves, purchased a pair. Perkins gave True a gun and told him not to come back without it. The party drove to Mrs. Monahan's house. Santo told [Graham] to ring the doorbell and if there was anyone home, to detain them until [they] got there. [Graham] entered the house. True followed her and saw her striking Mrs. Monahan on the face and head with a gun. Mrs. Monahan collapsed and [Graham] put a pillow slip over her head. Meanwhile, Santo, Perkins, and Shorter had entered the house. Perkins tied Mrs. Monahan's hands behind her and dragged her to a closet. Santo tied a strip of cloth around her face. [The gang] searched the house for fifteen or twenty minutes; they found no safe, money, or jewels. They left the house together.

Monahan's body was discovered on March 11. The circumstances of her body being found were described in the Santo opinion as follows:

On the morning of March 11, 1953, Mrs. Monahan's gardener, when he came to work, discovered the front door of the house ajar and telephoned the police. The interior of the house was greatly disarranged; apparently it had been ransacked; and there were spots of blood on the walls of the living room and halls. The body of Mrs. Monahan was on the floor, partially in a closet, with her head on a pillowcase which was torn and saturated with blood. Mrs. Monahan's hands were tied behind her. A strip of cloth, knotted but not tightened, was around her neck. The cause of death was asphyxia due to strangulation. On Mrs. Monahan's face and head were severe cuts and bruises which could have been inflicted with the muzzle of a revolver. In a closet among other purses was a purse which contained $474 and jewelry.

Several days after Monahan's body was discovered, the police arrested Shorter, but released him after a few days. Two weeks after he was released, Shorter returned to police headquarters and made a deal to testify against the other gang members. After Shorter gave a statement to the police, he left and was never seen again. It was believed that Shorter was killed by Santo or Perkins.

The police arrested True in April 1953 and informed him that Shorter had implicated him in the murder of Monahan. True denied any knowledge of the crime but eventually agreed to testify against the other gang members in exchange for immunity. On May 4, 1953, Graham, Perkins, and Santo were located by the police and arrested.

Graham, Perkins, and Santo were tried together and found guilty of murdering Monahan. All three were given death sentences. On June 3, 1955, Graham, Perkins, and Santo were executed in the gas chamber at San Quentin Prison.

After Graham's execution, her life story was made into a 1958 movie called I Want to Live. The movie starred Susan Hayward, who later won an Academy Award for playing Graham in the film. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Issue Presented: Whether, under the Texas death penalty scheme, the jury that sentenced the defendant to death was able to give effect to mitigating evidence of youth, family background, and positive character traits.

Case Holding: Because the issue presented by the defendant was brought after his conviction became final, the merit of the claim could not be reached insofar as granting relief to him would require creation of a new constitutional rule.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Texas convicted the defendant, Gary Graham, of capital murder and sentenced him to death. After unsuccessfully seeking post-conviction relief in the State courts, the defendant filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that the three "special issues" his sentencing jury was required to answer under the State capital sentencing statute prevented the jury from giving effect to mitigating evidence of his youth, unstable family background, and positive character traits. The district court denied relief and dismissed the petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White ruled that the defendant's claim was barred because the relief he sought would require announcement of a new rule of constitutional law. It was said that under the Court's precedents, a capital defendant whose conviction has become final may not obtain relief in a federal court if to do so required creation of or application of a new constitutional rule. The opinion pointed out that two narrow exceptions have been carved out from the general prohibition against applying a new constitutional rule to convictions that have become final. Justice White stated that a new rule may be applied retroactively if it (1) placed an entire category of primary conduct beyond the reach of criminal law or prohibited imposition of a certain type of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense; or (2) was a watershed rule of criminal procedure implicating a criminal proceeding's fundamental fairness and accuracy.

The opinion indicated that a rule is new if it was not dictated by precedent existing at the time the defendant's conviction became final. Thus, the determinative question posed by the defendant was whether reasonable jurists, hearing his claim before his conviction became final, would have felt compelled by existing precedent to rule in his favor. Justice White found that it could not be said that reasonable jurists, hearing the defendant's claim before his conviction became final, would have felt that existing precedent dictated vacatur of his death sentence. It was reasoned that before the defendant's conviction became final, the Court approved of Texas's death penalty scheme as being constitutionally valid in Jurek v. Texas. Additionally, other decisions by the Court had embraced the Jurek opinion as providing adequate grounds for defendants to present mitigating evidence. The opinion also concluded that the new rule that the defendant sought would not fall within either of the two exceptions to the bar against retroactive application. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately to argue against the defendant's reliance upon the Court's decision in Penry v. Lynaugh, as precedent that dictated the new rule he sought. Justice Thomas believed that Penry did not foreshadow the rule sought by the defendant and he contended that, even if Penry dictated the new rule sought, he "believe[d] Penry was wrongly decided." In Justice Thomas's opinion, the relief sought by the defendant and the decision in Penry created a risk that sentencing decisions would become arbitrary.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's opinion. He believed that the merits of the defendant's claim should have been addressed and a new rule created to provide relief. Justice Stevens also expressed his disagreement with Justice Thomas's concurring opinion that Penry did not foreshadow the relief sought by the defendant and that Penry was wrongly decided. "More specifically," he wrote, "I do not see how permitting full consideration of a defendant's mental retardation and history of childhood abuse, as in Penry, or of a defendant's youth, as in this case, in any way increases the risk of ... arbitrary decisionmaking."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Blackmun, Stevens, and O'Connor, JJ., Joined: Justice Souter dissented from the majority's decision. He believed that the relief sought by the defendant did not require creation of a new rule and that the relief sought was consistent with the Court's decision in Penry. Justice Souter stated his position as follows:

In Penry v. Lynaugh we concluded that a [defendant] did not seek the benefit of a "new rule" in claiming that the Texas special issues did not permit the sentencing jury in his case to give full mitigating effect to certain mitigating evidence, and we therefore held that the retroactivity doctrine ... did not bar the claim. The only distinctions between the claim in Penry and those presented here go to the kind of mitigating evidence presented for the jury's consideration, and the distance by which the Texas scheme stops short of allowing full effect to be given to some of the evidence considered. Neither distinction makes a difference under Penry or the prior law on which Penry stands. Accordingly, I would find no bar to the present claims, and would reach their merits: whether the mitigating force of [the defendant's] youth, unfortunate background, and traits of decent character could be considered adequately by a jury instructed only on the three Texas special issues. I conclude they could not be, and I would reverse the sentence of death and remand for resentencing. From the Court's contrary judgment, I respectfully dissent.

Grand Jury Depending upon the requirements of a particular jurisdiction, capital murder is prosecuted by an indictment or an information. An indictment is an instrument that is drawn up by a grand jury.

The origin of the grand jury is traditionally traced back to England during the reign of King Henry II. Legal scholars report that in the year 1166, King Henry II created an institution called the Assize of Clarendon. The assize consisted of twelve men who were given the duty of informing the local sheriff, or an itinerant justice of the peace, of any criminal conduct in their community. The assize operated in this fashion until the end of the fourteenth century.

The assize split into two separate institutions by the end of the fourteenth century. One institution was called the petit jury (trial jury) and the other was called le grande inquest or grand jury. At its inception the grand jury had two purposes: (1) prevent unjust prosecutions and (2) initiate just prosecutions.

The grand jury was incorporated into Anglo-American jurisprudence by the colonists. During the early development of the nation, all jurisdictions required felony prosecutions be initiated by the grand jury. The document used by the grand jury to initiate a prosecution was called an indictment. The grand jury may issue an indictment against a person only if it finds (1) probable cause existed that a crime was committed, and (2) probable cause that a named person committed the crime.

As a result of a decision by the United States Supreme Court in Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884), which held that the federal Constitution did not impose the use of grand juries on States, only a minority of jurisdictions now require felony offenses be prosecuted by a grand jury indictment.

The procedures involved with grand juries and indictments are generally consistent with that provided under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The federal requirements for grand juries and indictments are set out below.

Federal Grand Jury Requirements:

a. Summoning Grand Juries

1. Generally. The court shall order one or more grand juries to be summoned at such time as the public interest requires. The grand jury shall consist of not less than 16 nor more than 23 members. The court shall direct that a sufficient number of legally qualified persons be summoned to meet this requirement.

2. Alternate Jurors. The court may direct that alternate jurors may be designated at the time a grand jury is selected. Alternate jurors in the order in which they were designated may thereafter be impanelled as provided in this rule. Alternate jurors shall be drawn in the same manner and shall have the same qualifications as the regular jurors, and if impanelled shall be subject to the same challenges, shall take the same oath and shall have the same functions, powers, facilities and privileges as the regular jurors.

b. Objections to Grand Jury and to Grand Jurors

1. Challenges. The attorney for the government or a defendant who has been held to answer in the district court may challenge the array of jurors on the grounds that the grand jury was not selected, drawn or summoned in accordance with law, and may challenge an individual juror on the grounds that the juror is not legally qualified. Challenges shall be made before the administration of the oath to the jurors and shall be tried by the court.

2. Motion to Dismiss. A motion to dismiss the indictment may be based on objections to the array or on the lack of legal qualification of an individual juror, if not previously determined upon challenge. It shall be made in the manner prescribed by statute and shall be granted under the conditions prescribed in that statute. An indictment shall not be dismissed on the grounds that one or more members of the grand jury were not legally qualified if it appears from the record kept that 12 or more jurors, after deducting the number not legally qualified, concurred in finding the indictment.

c. Foreperson and Deputy Foreperson. The court shall appoint one of the jurors to be foreperson and another to be deputy foreperson. The foreperson shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations and shall sign all indictments. The foreperson or another juror designated by the foreperson shall keep a record of the number of jurors concurring in the finding of every indictment and shall file the record with the clerk of the court, but the record shall not be made public except on order of the court. During the absence of the foreperson, the deputy foreperson shall act as foreperson.

d. Who May Be Present. Attorneys for the government, the witness under examination, interpreters when needed and, for the purpose of taking the evidence, a stenographer or operator of a recording device may be present while the grand jury is in session, but no person other than the jurors may be present while the grand jury is deliberating or voting.

e. Recording and Disclosure of Proceedings.

1. Recording of Proceedings. All proceedings, except when the grand jury is deliberating or voting, shall be recorded stenographically or by an electronic recording device. An unintentional failure of any recording to reproduce all or any portion of a proceeding shall not affect the validity of the prosecution. The recording or reporter's notes or any transcript prepared therefrom shall remain in the custody or control of the attorney for the government unless otherwise ordered by the court in a particular case.

2. General Rule of Secrecy. A grand juror, an interpreter, a stenographer, an operator of a recording device, a typist who transcribes recorded testimony, an attorney for the government, or any person to whom disclosure is made under this subdivision shall not disclose matters occurring before the grand jury, except as otherwise provided for in these rules. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed on any person except in accordance with this rule. A knowing violation of this rule may be punished as a contempt of court.

3. Exceptions.

A. Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury, other than its deliberations and the vote of any grand juror, may be made to (i) an attorney for the government for use in the performance of such attorney's duty; and (ii) such government personnel including personnel of a state or subdivision of a state, as are deemed necessary by an attorney for the government to assist an attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce federal criminal law.

B. Any person to whom matters are disclosed under this paragraph shall not utilize that grand jury material for any purpose other than assisting the attorney for the government in the performance of such attorney's duty to enforce federal criminal law. An attorney for the government shall promptly provide the district court, before which was impaneled the grand jury whose material has been so disclosed, with the names of the persons to whom such disclosure has been made, and shall certify that the attorney has advised such persons of their obligation of secrecy under this rule.

C. Disclosure otherwise prohibited by this rule of matters occurring before the grand jury may also be made (i) when so directed by a court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding; (ii) when permitted by a court at the request of the defendant, upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury; (iii) when the disclosure is made by an attorney for the government to another federal grand jury; or (iv) when permitted by a court at the request of an attorney for the government, upon a showing that such matters may disclose a violation of state criminal law, to an appropriate official of a state or subdivision of a state for the purpose of enforcing such law. If the court orders disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury, the disclosure shall be made in such manner, at such time, and under such conditions as the court may direct.

D. A petition for disclosure shall be filed in the district where the grand jury convened. Unless the hearing is ex parte, which it may be when the petitioner is the government, the petitioner shall serve written notice of the petition upon (i) the attorney for the government, (ii) the parties to the judicial proceeding if disclosure is sought in connection with such a proceeding, and (iii) such other persons as the court may direct. The court shall afford those persons a reasonable opportunity to appear and be heard.

E. If the judicial proceeding giving rise to the petition is in a federal district court in another district, the court shall transfer the matter to that court unless it can reasonably obtain sufficient knowledge of the proceeding to determine whether disclosure is proper. The court shall order transmitted to the court to which the matter is transferred the material sought to be disclosed, if feasible, and a written evaluation of the need for continued grand jury secrecy. The court to which the matter is transferred shall afford the aforementioned persons a reasonable opportunity to appear and be heard.

4. Sealed Indictments. The federal magistrate judge to whom an indictment is returned may direct that the indictment be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has been released pending trial. Thereupon the clerk shall seal the indictment and no person shall disclose the return of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons.

5. Closed Hearing. Subject to any right to an open hearing in contempt proceedings, the court shall order a hearing on matters affecting a grand jury proceeding to be closed to the extent necessary to prevent disclosure of matters occurring before a grand jury.

6. Sealed Records. Records, orders and subpoenas relating to grand jury proceedings shall be kept under seal to the extent and for such time as is necessary to prevent disclosure of matters occurring before a grand jury.

f. Finding and Return of Indictment. An indictment may be found only upon the concurrence of 12 or more jurors. The indictment shall be returned by the grand jury to a federal magistrate judge in open court. If a complaint or information is pending against the defendant and 12 jurors do not concur in finding an indictment, the foreperson shall so report to a federal magistrate judge in writing forthwith.

g. Discharge and Excuse. A grand jury shall serve until discharged by the court, but no grand jury may serve more than 18 months unless the court extends the service of the grand jury for a period of six months or less upon a determination that such exension is in the public interest. At any time for cause shown the court may excuse a juror either temporarily or permanently, and in the latter event the court may impanel another person in place of the juror excused.

Federal Indictment Requirements:

a. Use of Indictment. An offense which may be punished by death shall be prosecuted by indictment. An offense which may be punished by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year or at hard labor shall be prosecuted by indictment or, if indictment is waived, it may be prosecuted by information. Any other offense may be prosecuted by indictment or by information.

b. Waiver of Indictment. An offense which may be punished by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year or at hard labor may be prosecuted by information if the defendant, after having been advised of the nature of the charge and of the rights of the defendant, waives in open court prosecution by indictment.

c. Nature and Contents.

1. In General. The indictment shall be a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged. It shall be signed by the attorney for the government. It need not contain a formal commencement, a formal conclusion or any other matter not necessary to such statement. Allegations made in one count may be incorporated by reference in another count. It may be alleged in a single count that the means by which the defendant committed the offense are unknown or that the defendant committed it by one or more specified means. The indictment shall state for each count the official or customary citation of the statute, rule, regulation or other provision of law which the defendant is alleged therein to have violated.

2. Criminal Forfeiture. No judgment of forfeiture may be entered in a criminal proceeding unless the indictment shall allege the extent of the interest or property subject to forfeiture.

3. Harmless Error. Error in the citation or its omission shall not be grounds for dismissal of the indictment or for reversal of a conviction if the error or omission did not mislead the defendant to the defendant's prejudice.

d. Surplusage. The court on motion of the defendant may strike surplusage from the indictment.

Gray, Henry Judd see Snyder, Ruth

Gray, Horace Horace Gray served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1881 to 1902. While on the Supreme Court, Gray was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution who relied more on precedent than on creating groundbreaking new constitutional law.

Gray was born on March 24, 1828, in Boston, Massachusetts. He was educated at Harvard College and received a law degree from Harvard Law School in 1849. Gray spent several years in private practice before receiving an appointment to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in 1864. President Chester A. Arthur nominated Gray to the Supreme Court in 1881.

While on the Supreme Court, Gray issued a few capital punishment opinions. His opinions in this area typified his conservative approach to the law. For example, in Jones v. United States (I), the Supreme Court was asked to determine whether the federal government had authority to prosecute a murder offense that occurred on the Caribbean island of Navassa. Gray, writing for the Court, relied on precedent rather than establishing new law in order to affirm the federal government's authority over the offense. Similarly, in Ball v. United States (II), Gray stuck close to precedent in ruling that one of the defendants in the case could not be re-prosecuted for murder because he had been acquitted in a former trial. He also relied on precedent in Ball to rule that the remaining defendants could be re-prosecuted for murder because their former convictions were reversed on appeal. Ultimately, Gray's conservative approach earned him the reputation of being the forgotten Supreme Court justice. Gray died on September 15, 1902.

Issue Presented: Whether exclusion of a potential juror for cause violated Witherspoon v. Illinois and its progeny.

Case Holding: The exclusion of the potential juror for cause violated Witherspoon v. Illinois and its progeny.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, David Randolph Gray, was charged with capital murder by the State of Mississippi. During jury selection the trial judge, in eight instances, denied the prosecutor's motions to dismiss for cause venire members who expressed some degree of doubt about the death penalty. The prosecutor used peremptory challenges to remove those eight panel members. When a ninth venire member, although initially somewhat confused in her response, stated that she could reach a guilty verdict and vote to impose the death penalty, the trial judge nevertheless excused her for cause on the motion of the prosecutor. The defendant was ultimately convicted by a jury and a sentence of death was imposed.

The Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the defendant's conviction and death sentence. In doing so, the appellate court acknowledged that the juror excluded for cause was clearly qualified to be a juror, but concluded that her exclusion was harmless error that did not prejudice the defendant. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun ruled that under the Court's decision in Witherspoon v. Illinois and its progeny, the trial court was not authorized to exclude the juror for cause. It was said that a Witherspoon violation constituted reversible constitutional error, and could not be subjected to harmless error review. Justice Blackmun rejected the Mississippi Supreme Court's attempt to find harmless error in the trial court's actions. He reasoned that the nature of the jury selection process defied any attempt to establish that an erroneous Witherspoon exclusion was harmless. The judgment of the Mississippi Supreme Court was reversed insofar as the death sentence was concerned.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Powell: Justice Powell joined most of the Court's opinion and with its judgment. He agreed that the trial court erred in removing the juror for cause. He believed that the exclusion of the other jurors by means of peremptory challenges did not exacerbate the prejudice created by the trial court's erroneous exclusion of the juror for cause. Justice Powell indicated that Witherspoon and its progeny did not restrict the traditional rights of prosecutors to remove peremptorily jurors believed to be unwilling to impose lawful punishment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., and White and O'Connor, JJ., Joined: Justice Scalia dissented from the Court's judgment. He wrote: "The Court holds that [the defendant's] sentence must be vacated because [a juror] was improperly excluded for cause from the sentencing jury. I dissent because it is clear that she should in any event have been excluded on other grounds. The trial judge's error, if any, consisted of no more than giving the wrong reason for lawful action—which could not conceivably have affected the fairness of the sentence." See also Jury Selection; Witherspoon v. Issue Presented: Whether creation of a requirement obligating prosecutors to give adequate notice of penalty phase evidence of uncharged crimes constitutes a new constitutional rule.

Case Holding: Creation of a requirement obligating prosecutors to give adequate notice of penalty phase evidence of uncharged crimes constitutes a new constitutional rule and therefore may not be created and applied in the defendant's case.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Coleman Wayne Gray, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Virginia. During the penalty phase, the defendant objected to the introduction of evidence by the prosecutor which linked the defendant to two other uncharged murders. The trial court permitted the evidence to be introduced. The jury sentenced the defendant to death. After exhausting his State post-convictions remedies unsuccessfully, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that the trial court committed error in allowing the prosecutor to introduce evidence of uncharged murders at the penalty phase because he had inadequate notice about the evidence and because misrepresentations by the prosecutor misled him about the evidence the prosecutor intended to present. The district court granted habeas relief on the grounds that the defendant was denied due process when the prosecutor failed to provide adequate notice of the evidence concerning uncharged murders. A federal Court of Appeals reversed the decision after concluding that granting habeas relief would give the defendant the benefit of a new rule of federal constitutional law, in violation of the non-retroactivity doctrine. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice ruled that recognition of the defendant's notice of evidence claim would require the adoption of a new constitutional rule that would set guidelines for giving fair notice of penalty phase evidence. It was said that under the non-retroactivity doctrine, a defendant whose conviction had become final may not use a subsequently created constitutional rule to attack the conviction in a federal habeas corpus proceeding unless the new rule was foreshadowed by a prior decision of the Court. This prohibition also applied to precluding the creation of a new rule in a case actually being decided by the Court. The chief justice pointed out that two narrow exceptions were carved out from the general prohibition against applying a new constitutional rule to convictions that have become final. It was said that a new rule may be applied retroactively if it (1) placed an entire category of primary conduct beyond the reach of criminal law or prohibited imposition of a certain type of punishment for a class of defendants because of their status or offense; or (2) was a watershed rule of criminal procedure implicating a criminal proceeding's fundamental fairness and accuracy.

The opinion held that none of the Court's prior decisions foreshadowed the rule which the defendant sought. It was also said that the requested new rule did not fall within either of the two exceptions to the non-retroactivity doctrine. However, the Court found that the defendant presented an adequate claim of being misled by the prosecutor. The opinion therefore reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeals and remanded the case for consideration of the defendant's misrepresentation claim.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens dissented from the Court's opinion. He argued that due process required the defendant be given adequate notice of the prosecutor's intent to introduce penalty phase evidence of uncharged crimes. Justice Stevens wrote: "The evidence tending to support the proposition that [the defendant] committed the [other] murders was not even sufficient to support the filing of charges against him. Whatever limits due process places upon the introduction of evidence of unadjudicated conduct in capital cases, they surely were exceeded here. Given the 'vital importance' that 'any decision to impose the death sentence be, and appear to be, based on reason rather than caprice or emotion,' the sentencing proceeding would have been fundamentally unfair even if the prosecutors had given defense counsel fair notice of their intent to offer this evidence."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Ginsburg, in Which Stevens, Souter and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Ginsburg dissented from the Court's decision. She believed that the rule sought by the defendant was not a new rule. Justice Ginsburg argued as follows:

Basic to due process in criminal proceedings is the right to a full, fair, potentially effective opportunity to defend against the State's charges.... Gray was not accorded that fundamental right at the penalty phase of his trial for capital murder. I therefore conclude that no "new rule" is implicated in his petition for habeas corpus....

There is nothing "new" in a rule that capital defendants must be afforded a meaningful opportunity to defend against the State's penalty phase evidence. As this Court affirmed more than a century ago: "Common justice requires that no man shall be condemned in his person or property without ... an opportunity to make his defence."

... I conclude that the District Court's decision vacating Gray's death sentence did not rest on a "new rule" of constitutional law. I would therefore reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals, and respectfully dissent from this Court's decision.

Case Note: Coleman Wayne Gray was executed by lethal injection on February 26, 1997, by the State of Virginia. See also Retroactive Application of a New Constitutional Rule

Great Risk to Others Aggravator The statutory aggravating circumstance called "great risk to others" seeks to punish with death those who, while committing murder, expose other persons to death or great bodily harm. To establish the great risk to others aggravator, the prosecutor must show that the capital felon created a grave risk of death to another person, in addition to the victim of the offense. The other person or persons need not suffer actual harm. If these circumstances are established at the penalty phase, the jury may impose death on the defendant. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions use this aggravator. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Green River Killer Gary Leon Ridgway, known as the Green River Killer, was one of the most prolific serial killers in American history. After being initially charged with the capital murder of seven women, Ridgway escaped the death penalty by agreeing to enter a guilty plea to killing forty-eight women.

Ridgway was born on February 18, 1949, in Salt Lake City, Utah. At about the age of eleven, he moved with his family to King County, Washington. After graduating from high school, Ridgway joined the Navy in 1969. While in the Navy, Ridgway married the first of his three wives. In July 1971, Ridgway was discharged from the Navy and returned to his home in King County. After being discharged, Ridgway found employment as a painter, which he held until his arrest in 2001. In 1972, Ridgway divorced his first wife. In December 1973, he married his second wife. One child was born from the marriage. The second marriage ended in divorce on May 27, 1981. Ridgway remained single until June 1988, when he married his third wife.

The State of Washington permitted Gary Leon Ridgway to enter a guilty plea to killing forty-eight women in exchange for not imposing the death penalty on him. (King County Sheriff)

Shortly after Ridgway divorced his second wife, he embarked on a killing spree between 1982 and 1984. During that period, Ridgway alleged that he killed sixty women and young girls. The bodies of the victims were dumped near or in Washington's Green River.

Ridgway was suspect in the killings at an early stage but no hard evidence linked him to the killings. It was not until 2001 that the police were able to match Ridgway's DNA with pubic hair and vaginal swab DNA taken from a few of the victims. On November 30, 2001, the police arrested Ridgway and charged him with the murder of four women: Carol Christensen, Cynthia Hinds, Marcia Chapman, and Opal Mills. While those charges were pending, the police obtained additional evidence and, on March 27, 2003, charged Ridgway with murdering Wendy Coffield, Debra Bonner, and Debra Estes.

Ridgway was scheduled to go to trial on the seven murders in July of 2004. However, on November 5, 2003, Ridgway entered a guilty plea to forty-eight murder charges in exchange for the prosecutor not seeking the death penalty. On December 18, 2003, a trial judge sentenced Ridgway to forty-eight life sentences with no possibility of parole. Ridgway is serving his sentence at Washington State Penitentiary in Walla Walla, Washington.

The circumstances surrounding the murders of seven of the victims were summarized by the prosecutor in a document filed with the Superior Court of King County, as follows:

1. Wendy Coffield: In July of 1982, sixteen-year-old Wendy Lee Coffield was living with a foster family in Tacoma, Washington. She was known to work as a street prostitute along PHS in King County. On July 8, 1982, Wendy left her foster home and was never seen alive again.

One week later, on July 15, 1982, two young boys bicycling along the Peck Bridge in Kent, King County, Washington, noticed an object floating below them in the Green River. On further inspection, they discovered Wendy's body caught along one of the pilings under the bridge. Wendy was naked, with the exception of her shoes and socks. The remainder of her clothing — jeans, underpants and shirt — were knotted around her neck like a ligature.

An autopsy confirmed that Wendy had been strangled. She suffered a fractured hyoid bone as well as significant hemorrhaging in her neck muscles. In addition, her left humerus (the upper arm bone) was broken. The condition of her body was consistent with death having occurred shortly after her disappearance on July 8, 1982.

... [I]n March of 2003, a private forensic laboratory, Microtrace, reported that it had discovered tiny paint spheres on the jeans which formed the ligature around Wendy's neck. The paint composition of the spheres was identical to the DuPont Imron paint used at the Kenworth truck plant where Ridgway worked in 1982.

In March of 2003, the State charged Ridgway with the murder of Wendy Coffield. In subsequent interviews with the Task Force, he has admitted to killing her and placing her body in the Green River.

2. Debra Bonner: Debra Bonner was last seen alive on the evening of July 25, 1982, when she left a motel on PHS in King County to "catch some dates." Debra was twenty-two and had a history of prostitution; during the previous 30 days, she had been arrested two times for prostitution on PHS.

Two and a half weeks later, on August 12, 1982, Debra's body was discovered in the Green River. Debra's body had apparently floated down river until it was caught in a logjam. There was no clothing on Debra's body.

In March of 2003, Ridgway was charged with the murder of Debra Bonner. In subsequent interviews with the Task Force, he admitted to killing her and placing her body in the Green River.

3. Marcia Chapman, Cynthia Hinds and Opal Mills: In August of 1982, thirty-one-year-old Marcia Chapman was living with her three children in an apartment near PHS. She was involved in prostitution. On August 1, 1982, Marcia left her apartment and was not seen again.

Ten days later, on the night of August 11, 1982, seventeen-year-old Cynthia Hinds was out on PHS working as a prostitute. Her pimp last saw a man driving a black Jeep picking her up. She was never seen again.

One day later, on August 12, 1982, at approximately 1:00 P.M., sixteen-year-old Opal Mills placed a call to her parents from Angle Lake State Park, just off PHS. After that call, she was never heard from again. Friends later reported Opal had been involved in prostitution.

On August 15, 1982, a man rafting down the Green River spotted two bodies in the water, approximately 600 yards from where Debra Bonner's body had been found a few days earlier. The police responded and discovered Marcia Chapman and Cynthia Hinds. They were a few feet apart in the river, pinned to the bottom by several boulders, and nude. Police found Opal Mills' body on the banks of the river a short distance away. All three women had been strangled.

... [I]n 2001, an analysis of DNA evidence linked Ridgway to Opal Mills and Marcia Chapman. He was charged with the murders of Marcia Chapman, Cynthia Hinds and Opal Mills in December of 2001. During interviews with Task Force detectives, Ridgway admitted killing all three women and placing them in the Green River.

4. Debra Estes: On September 20, 1982, fifteen-year-old Debra Estes disappeared. At approximately 3:00 P.M. that day, Debra was last seen near the Stevenson Motel on PHS. She was known to engage in prostitution.

Nearly six years later, on May 30, 1988, construction workers, digging holes for a playground, discovered Debra's remains in a shallow grave in Federal Way. Buried with Estes were two items of clothing: A brassiere and fragments of a black knit sweater/shirt with metallic threads. An acquaintance of Debra's confirmed that she was wearing this sweater/shirt on the afternoon she disappeared.

In March of 2003, Microtrace reported that it had recovered tiny paint spheres from the clothing found with Debra Estes' remains. The paint composition of the spheres is identical to the DuPont Imron paint that was used at the Kenworth truck plant where Ridgway worked in 1982.

In March of 2003, the State charged Ridgway with the murder of Debra Estes. In subsequent interviews with the Task Force, he has admitted to killing her and burying her body.

5. Carol Christensen: On May 3, 1983, at approximately 2:30 P.M., twenty-one-year-old Carol Christensen left the Barn Door Tavern in SeaTac where she worked as a waitress. She was due to return later that day but never came back. Carol was known to hitchhike.

Five days later, on May 8, 1983, her body was found in a wooded area in Maple Valley. She was still dressed, and her body had been posed. She was lying on her back, with two trout placed on her upper torso, an empty bottle of wine across her stomach and sausage on her hands. She had been strangled with a ligature.

In 2001, semen from Carol's body was matched to Ridgway. In December of 2001, he was charged with the murder of Carol Christensen.

In interviews with Task Force detectives, Ridgway admitted that he killed Carol. He said that he posed her body to "throw off" the Task Force. See also Serial Killer

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution prohibited Georgia from using its hearsay rules to preclude a defense witness's testimony at the penalty phase of the defendant's capital trial.

Case Holding: The Constitution prohibited Georgia from using its hearsay rules to preclude a defense witness's testimony at the penalty phase of the defendant's capital trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Georgia charged the defendant, Green, and a co-defendant with rape and murder. They were prosecuted separately. The defendant was found guilty of capital murder. During the penalty phase of the defendant's trial, he sought to introduce testimony from a witness who was going to state that the co-defendant admitted sole responsibility for killing the victim. The trial court refused to admit the testimony, ruling that it constituted inadmissible hearsay under Georgia law. The defendant was sentenced to death. The Georgia Supreme Court upheld the conviction and sentence after rejecting the defendant's claim that he had a constitutional right to introduce the witness's testimony at the penalty phase. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion of the Court held that the defendant's constitutional rights were violated by the exclusion of the witness's testimony. The opinion reasoned:

Regardless of whether the proffered testimony comes within Georgia's hearsay rule, under the facts of this case its exclusion constituted a violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The excluded testimony was highly relevant to a critical issue in the punishment phase of the trial, and substantial reasons existed to assume its reliability. [The co-defendant] made his statement spontaneously to a close friend. The evidence corroborating the confession was ample, and indeed sufficient to procure a conviction of [the co-defendant] and a capital sentence. The statement was against interest, and there was no reason to believe that [the co-defendant] had any ulterior motive in making it. Perhaps most important, the State considered the testimony sufficiently reliable to use it against [the co-defendant], and to base a sentence of death upon it. In these unique circumstances, "the hearsay rule may not be applied mechanistically to defeat the ends of justice." Because the exclusion of [the witness's] testimony denied [the defendant] a fair trial on the issue of punishment, the sentence is vacated and the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan and Marshall, J.: Justices Brennan and Marshall issued a joint statement concurring in the judgment, and indicating that they continue to "adher[e] to their view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, [and] would vacate the death sentence without remanding for further proceedings."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist was strongly opposed to the Court's use of the Constitution to undermine the hearsay rules of Georgia. The dissenting opinion stated his position as follows:

The Court today takes another step toward embalming the law of evidence in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. I think it impossible to find any justification in the Constitution for today's ruling, and take comfort only from the fact that since this is a capital case, it is perhaps an example of the maxim that "hard cases make bad law...."

Nothing in the United States Constitution gives this Court any authority to supersede a State's code of evidence because its application in a particular situation would defeat what this Court conceives to be "the ends of justice." The Court does not disagree that the testimony at issue is hearsay or that it fails to come within any of the exceptions to the hearsay rule provided by Georgia's rules of evidence. The Court obviously is troubled by the fact that the same testimony was admissible at the separate trial of [the defendant's] codefendant at the behest of the State. But this fact by no means demonstrates that the Georgia courts have not evenhandedly applied their code of evidence, with its various hearsay exceptions, so as to deny [the defendant] a fair trial. No practicing lawyer can have failed to note that Georgia's evidentiary rules, like those of every other State and of the United States, are such that certain items of evidence may be introduced by one party, but not by another. This is a fact of trial life, embodied throughout the hearsay rule and its exceptions. This being the case, the United States Constitution must be strained to or beyond the breaking point to conclude that all capital defendants who are unable to introduce all of the evidence which they seek to admit are denied a fair trial. I therefore dissent from the vacation of [the defendant's] sentence.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's conviction for capital murder, on retrial from the reversal of his first conviction, violated double jeopardy principles because he was convicted of second-degree murder in his first trial.

Case Holding: The defendant's conviction for capital murder, on retrial from the reversal of his first conviction, violated double jeopardy principles because he was convicted of second-degree murder in his first trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Everett Green, was indicted and tried for capital murder by the District of Columbia. The jury found him guilty of second-degree murder and he was sentenced to imprisonment. On appeal, his conviction was reversed and the case was remanded for a new trial. On remand, the defendant was tried again for capital murder under the original indictment. He was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention the double jeopardy principles barred a conviction for capital murder. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Black: Justice Black ruled that the defendant's second trial for capital murder placed him in jeopardy twice for the same offense in violation of the Fifth Amendment. It was said that the defendant's jeopardy for the capital murder charge came to an end when the jury was discharged at the conclusion of his first trial and he could not be retried for that offense. Justice Black reasoned that by making a successful appeal from his conviction of second-degree murder, the defendant did not waive his constitutional defense of former jeopardy to a second prosecution on the capital murder charge. Further, he wrote that in order to secure the reversal of an erroneous conviction of one offense, a defendant need not surrender his or her valid defense of former jeopardy on a different offense for which he or she was not convicted and which was not involved in the appeal. Justice Black set out the contours of the legal justification for double jeopardy as follows:

The underlying idea, one that is deeply ingrained in at least the Anglo-American system of jurisprudence, is that the State with all its resources and power should not be allowed to make repeated attempts to convict an individual for an alleged offense, thereby subjecting him to embarrassment, expense and ordeal and compelling him to live in a continuing state of anxiety and insecurity, as well as enhancing the possibility that even though innocent he may be found guilty.

In accordance with this philosophy it has long been settled under the Fifth Amendment that a verdict of acquittal is final, ending a defendant's jeopardy, and even when "not followed by any judgment, is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offence." Thus it is one of the elemental principles of our criminal law that the Government cannot secure a new trial by means of an appeal even though an acquittal may appear to be erroneous. Moreover it is not even essential that a verdict of guilt or innocence be returned for a defendant to have once been placed in jeopardy so as to bar a second trial on the same charge. This Court, as well as most others, has taken the position that a defendant is placed in jeopardy once he is put to trial before a jury so that if the jury is discharged without his consent he cannot be tried again. This prevents a prosecutor or judge from subjecting a defendant to a second prosecution by discontinuing the trial when it appears that the jury might not convict. At the same time jeopardy is not regarded as having come to an end so as to bar a second trial in those cases where "unforeseeable circumstances ... arise during [the first] trial making its completion impossible, such as the failure of a jury to agree on a verdict."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter, in Which Burton, Clark, and Harlan, JJ., Joined: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's decision. He believed that when the defendant appealed his second-degree murder conviction and obtained a reversal, the defendant was subject to re-prosecution on the original capital murder charge. Justice Frankfurter wrote: "Since the propriety of the original proceedings has been called in question by the defendant, a complete re-examination of the issues in dispute is appropriate and not unjust. In the circumstances of the present case, likewise, the reversal of [the defendant's] conviction was a sufficient reason to justify a complete new trial in order that both parties might have one free from errors claimed to be prejudicial."

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed. See also Double Jeopardy Clause

Issue Presented: Whether the imposition of the sentence of death for the crime of murder under the law of Georgia violates the Constitution.

Case Holding: The statutory capital punishment system of Georgia does not violate the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Troy Gregg, was charged with committing capital murder on November 21, 1973, by the State of Georgia. The death penalty statute of Georgia required the defendant be prosecuted under a bifurcated procedure. The bifurcated procedure consisted of a guilt phase and a penalty phase. The death penalty statute also provided for a narrow category of crimes for which capital punishment could be prosecuted, and it listed aggravating and mitigating circumstances. The punishment of death under the statute could only be imposed if at least one of the statutory aggravating circumstances was proven to exist in the commission of the crime. It was also provided by the statute that upon conviction and sentence of death, the Georgia Supreme Court would automatically reviews the death sentence.

The defendant was convicted by a jury of capital murder at the guilt phase. At the penalty phase, the jury found two statutory aggravating circumstances existed in the commission of the crime and returned a sentence of death. The Georgia Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence of death. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the constitutionality of Georgia's death penalty statute.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Stewart Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Powell and Stevens JJ., Joined: Justice Stewart held that, as a general matter, the punishment of death for the crime of murder does not, under all circumstances, violate the Constitution. He indicated that the Eighth Amendment forbids the use of punishment that is excessive either because it involves the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain or because it is grossly disproportionate to the severity of the crime. It was noted that the Framers of the Constitution accepted the existence of capital punishment and, for nearly two centuries, the Court recognized that capital punishment for the crime of murder is not invalid per se.

The opinion stated that retribution and the possibility of deterrence of capital crimes by prospective offenders are not impermissible considerations for a legislature to weigh in deciding whether the death penalty should be imposed. Justice Stewart wrote that capital punishment for the crime of murder cannot be viewed as invariably disproportionate to the severity of that crime.

It was said that the concerns expressed in Furman v. Georgia, that the death penalty not be imposed arbitrarily or capriciously, could be met by a carefully drafted statute that ensures that the sentencing authority is given adequate information and guidance, concerns which could best met by a system that provides for a bifurcated proceeding at which the sentencing authority is apprised of the information relevant to the imposition of sentence and provided with standards to guide its use of that information. Justice Stewart indicated that the Georgia death penalty statute under which the defendant was sentenced to death passed constitutional muster because it provides for specific jury findings as to the circumstances of the crime or the character of the defendant and requires the Georgia Supreme Court review the comparability of each death sentence with the sentences imposed on similarly situated defendants to ensure that the sentence of death in a particular case is not disproportionate. Accordingly, the judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White, in Which Burger, CJ., and Rehnquist, J., Joined: In concurring in the Court's judgment, Justice White wrote that Georgia's new statutory scheme not only guided the jury in its exercise of discretion as to whether or not it will impose the death penalty, but also gave the Georgia Supreme Court the power and imposed the obligation to decide whether in fact the death penalty was being administered for any given class of crime in a discriminatory, standardless, or rare fashion. It was said that if the Georgia Supreme Court properly performed the task assigned to it under the Georgia death penalty statute, death sentences imposed for discriminatory reasons, wantonly, or freakishly for any given category of crime will be set aside. The concurrence concluded that the death penalty may be carried out under the Georgia legislative scheme consistent with the Furman decision.

Concurring Statement by Chief Justice Burger and Rehnquist, J.: Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist issued a joint statement that said: "We concur in the judgment and join the opinion of Mr. Justice White, agreeing with its analysis that Georgia's system of capital punishment comports with the Court's holding in Furman v. Georgia."

Concurring Statement by Blackmun: Justice Blackmun issued a statement which read: "I concur in the judgment."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan wrote in dissent that: "The opinions of Mr. Justice Stewart, Mr. Justice Powell, and Mr. Justice Stevens today hold that 'evolving standards of decency' require focus not on the essence of the death penalty itself but primarily upon the procedures employed by the State to single out persons to suffer the penalty of death. Those opinions hold further that, so viewed, the [Constitution] invalidates the mandatory infliction of the death penalty but not its infliction under sentencing procedures that Mr. Justice Stewart, Mr. Justice Powell, and Mr. Justice Stevens conclude adequately safeguard against the risk that the death penalty was imposed in an arbitrary and capricious manner." The dissent rejected the judgment of the Court and the reasoning of the plurality opinion and concluded that "the punishment of death, for whatever crime and under all circumstances, is 'cruel and unusual' in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall wrote in dissent that the Court was wrong in focusing on Georgia's procedures as a basis for affirming its death penalty statute. He argued: "The death penalty ... is a cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments." Justice Marshall gave two reasons for believing that the death penalty was constitutionally invalid. "First, the death penalty is excessive. And second, the American people, fully informed as to the purposes of the death penalty and its liabilities, would in my view reject it as morally unacceptable."

Case Note: The decision in the case was the first of three cases decided in 1976, wherein the Court approved of death penalty statutes. The decision in Gregg was significant because it marked the end of the moratorium on the death penalty that Furman imposed, and because it provided a constitutional blueprint for how States could reinstitute capital punishment. Grenada Capital punishment is on the law books of Grenada, but the punishment has not been used frequently. Grenada uses hanging as the method of execution. Its legal system is based on English common law. The nation's constitution was adopted on December 19, 1973.

The judiciary of Grenada is a part of the Eastern Caribbean legal system, having magistrate courts for minor offenses and high courts for major offenses. Appeals from the high courts are taken to the Supreme Court of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States.

The laws of Grenada provide defendants with a right to a public trial, a presumption of innocence, the right to bail, the right against self-incrimination, the right to confront his or her accuser, and the right to appeal. Defendants also have the right to retain counsel, but may only obtain appointed counsel when charged with a capital offense. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether suppression of potentially exculpatory evidence by the prosecutor warrants a new trial for the defendant.

Case Holding: The issue presented could not be addressed because the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia failed to make a ruling on whether the evidence would have been admissible at trial.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Baxter Griffin, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the District of Columbia. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court denied certiorari.

Shortly before the defendant's scheduled execution, he discovered potentially exculpatory evidence that had been suppressed by the prosecutor. The defendant filed a motion with the trial court for a new trial based on the newly discovered evidence. The trial court denied the motion. The Court of Appeals summarily affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter wrote that the suppressed evidence, a knife that was found in the victim's pocket, may have been relevant to the defendant's theory of self-defense. However, the Court was reluctant to reverse the judgment because the Court of Appeals did not rule upon the issue of the admissibility of the evidence at trial. Justice Frankfurter indicated that the evidence may have been admissible in a federal court under federal law, but the Court was not prepared to impose a federal rule of evidence on the courts of the District of Columbia. The opinion concluded: "We must therefore remand the case to the Court of Appeals with instructions to decide, in the first instance, what rule should prevail in the District of Columbia. To do otherwise would constitute an unwarranted departure from a wise rule of practice in our consideration of cases coming here from the Court of Appeals of the District. There are cogent reasons why this Court should not undertake to decide questions of local law without the aid of some expression of the views of judges of the local courts who are familiar with the intricacies and trends of local law and practice. We do not ordinarily decide such questions without that aid where they may conveniently be decided in the first instance by the court whose special function it is to resolve questions of the local law of the jurisdiction over which it presides. Only in exceptional cases will this Court review a determination of such a question by the Court of Appeals for the District."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Murphy, in Which Vinson, CJ., and Douglas and Rutledge, JJ., Joined: Justice Murphy dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the Court was wrong in not addressing the issue presented merely because the Court of Appeals did not determine whether the evidence was admissible. Justice Murphy believed that the evidence was admissible and the Court should have so held. He wrote as follows:

Self-limitation of our appellate powers may be a worthy thing, but it is not attractive to me when the behest of Congress is otherwise. Congress has given this Court the ultimate power to review District of Columbia trials. No matter how the decision is phrased, the Court's power in the premises is such that it is responsible for the evidence rule it asks the Court of Appeals to expound.... We should declare the evidence admissible.

If the evidence is admissible, a motion for a new trial should be granted. A contrary determination would be an abuse of discretion, for there is manifestly a reasonable possibility that the jury would lessen the verdict of first degree murder.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed and the case remanded with instructions. See also Exculpatory Evidence Guatemala Guatemala imposes the death penalty and uses lethal injection to carry it out. Its legal system is based on civil law. The nation's constitution became effective on January 14, 1986. Guatemala is a democratic republic with an executive branch, a unicameral legislative branch, and a judicial branch.

The judicial system of Guatemala is composed of a constitutional court, a supreme court, appellate courts, and trial courts. Defendants enjoy a presumption of innocence, the right to a public trial, the right to be present at trial, the right to retained or appointed counsel, and the right to bail. Trials are conducted before a three-judge panel without a jury. Guatemala permits private parties to participate in the prosecution of criminal cases as co-complainants. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Guilty but Mentally Ill The defense of guilty but mentally ill is a public policy response to societal frustration with criminal defendants who successfully assert the defense of insanity. The height of public disfavor with the result of a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity reached its apogee in 1982, when John Hinckley was found not guilty by reason of insanity. Hinckley wounded President Ronald Reagan during an assassination attempt on the president's life in 1980. Hinckley's acquittal by reason of insanity spurred lawmakers around the nation to adopt the previously seldom used plea and verdict of guilty but mentally ill. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have adopted the plea and verdict of guilty but mentally ill.

JURISDICTIONS ADOPTING GUILTY BUT MENTALLY ILL VERDICT

Capital punishment jurisdictions vary on the legal definition given to the phrase "mental illness" and the general requirements of the plea and verdict of guilty but mentally ill. Notwithstanding such differences, the result from a finding of guilty but mentally ill is the same in all capital punishment jurisdictions. That is, the capital felon may be sentenced to death.

South Carolina Code Ann. § 17-24-20

Guilty But Mentally Ill General Requirements

(A) A defendant is guilty but mentally ill if, at the time of the commission of the act constituting the offense, he had the capacity to distinguish right from wrong or to recognize his act as being wrong as defined in Section 17-24-10(A), but because of mental disease or defect he lacked sufficient capacity to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law.

(B) To return a verdict of "guilty but mentally ill" the burden of proof is upon the State to prove beyond a reasonable doubt to the trier of fact that the defendant committed the crime, and the burden of proof is upon the defendant to prove by a preponderance of evidence that when he committed the crime he was mentally ill as defined in subsection (A).

(C) The verdict of guilty but mentally ill may be rendered only during the phase of a trial which determines guilt or innocence and is not a form of verdict which may be rendered in the penalty phase.

(D) A court may not accept a plea of guilty but mentally ill unless, after a hearing, the court makes a finding upon the record that the defendant proved by a preponderance of the evidence that when he committed the crime he was mentally ill as provided in Section 17-24-20(A).

Capital punishment jurisdictions that utilize the plea and verdict of guilty but mentally ill also retain insanity as a defense. Unlike the insanity defense, which provides for acquittal, the defense of guilty but mentally ill will not remove a capital felon from the punishment prescribed by law. Capital felons found guilty but mentally ill are held criminally responsible and may be sentenced to death. Several State high court decisions have upheld the imposition of the death penalty upon capital felons who have been found guilty but mentally ill. See also Insanity Defense

Guilty Plea The federal Constitution does not prohibit a court from accepting a defendant's plea of guilty to a capital offense. However, several federal constitutional rights are implicated and waived when a defendant enters a valid plea of guilty, including the (1) privilege against compulsory self-incrimination, (2) right to trial by jury, and (3) right to confront one's accusers. For a guilty plea to be valid, it is constitutionally required that the trial record reflect an affirmative showing that the guilty plea was intelligently and voluntarily made. The competency standard for pleading guilty is whether the defendant has sufficient present ability to consult with his or her lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him or her.

Westley A. Dodd pled guilty to three capital murder charges brought against him by the State of Washington. Dodd was executed by hanging on January 5, 1993. (Camas Police)

Generally, prosecutors have discretion to enter into any type of constitutionally permissible plea agreement with a capital felon. However, a few courts have held that a prosecutor cannot enter a plea agreement wherein a defendant agrees to enter a plea of guilty to capital murder in exchange for an agreement by the prosecutor to recommend life imprisonment to the penalty phase jury. Courts reason that so long as there is evidence of the existence of at least one statutory aggravating circumstance, a prosecutor is obligated to seek the death penalty once a valid capital offense conviction has been obtained.

Some courts have held that if a plea agreement is made whereby a capital defendant agrees to enter a plea of guilty to non-capital murder, but the agreement is broken, the prosecutor may not thereafter seek a capital murder conviction and sentence. It has been said that regardless of the propriety of increasing an offense charge following a breach of a plea agreement, imposition of the death penalty in such circumstances offends the constitutional principle that capital sentencing determinations require special treatment. When the predictable result of a breach of a plea agreement is the death penalty, imposition of that penalty is arbitrary and in violation of the federal Constitution.

Prosecutors may seek the death penalty against capital felons who reject a plea agreement offer.

The basic procedural requirements used by all capital punishment jurisdictions for entering pleas follows the requirements found in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, as shown below.

Pleas Under the Federal Rules

a. Alternatives

1. In General. A defendant may plead not guilty, guilty, or nolo contendere. If a defendant refuses to plead or if a defendant corporation fails to appear, the court shall enter a plea of not guilty.

2. Conditional Pleas. With the approval of the court and the consent of the government, a defendant may enter a conditional plea of guilty or nolo contendere, reserving in writing the right, on appeal from the judgment, to review of the adverse determination of any specified pre-trial motion. A defendant who prevails on appeal shall be allowed to withdraw the plea.

b. Nolo Contendere. A defendant may plead nolo contendere only with the consent of the court. Such a plea shall be accepted by the court only after due consideration of the views of the parties and the interest of the public in the effective administration of justice.

c. Advice to Defendant. Before accepting a plea of guilty or nolo contendere, the court must address the defendant personally in open court and inform the defendant of, and determine that the defendant understands, the following:

1. The nature of the charge to which the plea is offered, the mandatory minimum penalty provided by law, if any, and the maximum possible penalty provided by law, including the effect of any special parole or supervised release term, the fact that the court is required to consider any applicable sentencing guidelines but may depart from those guidelines under some circumstances, and, when applicable, that the court may also order the defendant to make restitution to any victim of the offense; and

2. If the defendant is not represented by an attorney, that the defendant has the right to be represented by an attorney at every stage of the proceeding and, if necessary, one will be appointed to represent the defendant; and

3. That the defendant has the right to plead not guilty or to persist in that plea if it has already been made, the right to be tried by a jury and at that trial the right to the assistance of counsel, the right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses, and the right against compelled self-incrimination; and

4. That if a plea of guilty or nolo contendere is accepted by the court there will not be a further trial of any kind, so that by pleading guilty or nolo contendere the defendant waives the right to a trial; and

5. If the court intends to question the defendant under oath, on the record, and in the presence of counsel about the offense to which the defendant has pleaded, that the defendant's answers may later be used against the defendant in a prosecution for perjury or false statement.

d. Insuring that the Plea Is Voluntary. The court shall not accept a plea of guilty or nolo contendere without first, by addressing the defendant personally in open court, determining that the plea is voluntary and not the result of force or threats or of promises apart from a plea agreement. The court shall also inquire as to whether the defendant's willingness to plead guilty or nolo contendere results from prior discussions between the attorney for the government and the defendant or the defendant's attorney.

e. Plea Agreement Procedure.

1. In General. The attorney for the government and the attorney for the defendant or the defendant when acting pro se may engage in discussions with a view toward reaching an agreement that, upon the entering of a plea of guilty or nolo contendere to a charged offense or to a lesser or related offense, the attorney for the government will do any of the following:

A. Move for dismissal of other charges; or

B. Make a recommendation, or agree not to oppose the defendant's request, for a particular sentence, with the understanding that such recommendation or request shall not be binding upon the court; or

C. Agree that a specific sentence is the appropriate disposition of the case. The court shall not participate in any such discussions.

2. Notice of Such Agreement. If a plea agreement has been reached by the parties, the court shall, on the record, require the disclosure of the agreement in open court or, on a showing of good cause, in camera, at the time the plea is offered. If the agreement is of the type specified in subdivision e.1.A. or C., the court may accept or reject the agreement, or may defer its decision as to the acceptance or rejection until there has been an opportunity to consider the pre-sentence report. If the agreement is of the type specified in subdivision e.1.B., the court shall advise the defendant that if the court does not accept the recommendation or request the defendant nevertheless has no right to withdraw the plea.

3. Acceptance of a Plea Agreement. If the court accepts the plea agreement, the court shall inform the defendant that it will embody in the judgment and sentence the disposition provided for in the plea agreement.

4. Rejection of a Plea Agreement. If the court rejects the plea agreement, the court shall, on the record, inform the parties of this fact, advise the defendant personally in open court or, on a showing of good cause, in camera, that the court is not bound by the plea agreement, afford the defendant the opportunity to then withdraw the plea, and advise the defendant that if the defendant persists in a guilty plea or plea of nolo contendere the disposition of the case may be less favorable to the defendant than that contemplated by the plea agreement.

5. Time of Plea Agreement Procedure. Except for good cause shown, notification to the court of the existence of a plea agreement shall be given at the arraignment or at such other time, prior to trial, as may be fixed by the court.

6. Inadmissibility of Pleas, Plea Discussions, and Related Statements. Except as otherwise provided in this paragraph, evidence of the following is not, in any civil or criminal proceeding, admissible against the defendant who made the plea or was a participant in the plea discussions:

A. A plea of guilty which was later withdrawn;

B. A plea of nolo contendere;

C. Any statement made in the course of any proceedings under this rule regarding either of the foregoing pleas; or

D. Any statement made in the course of plea discussions with an attorney for the government which do not result in a plea of guilty or which result in a plea of guilty later withdrawn.

However, such a statement is admissible (i) in any proceeding wherein another statement made in the course of the same plea or plea discussions has been introduced and the statement ought in fairness be considered contemporaneously with it, or (ii) in a criminal proceeding for perjury or false statement if the statement was made by the defendant under oath, on the record, and in the presence of counsel.

f. Determining Accuracy of Plea. Notwithstanding the acceptance of a plea of guilty, the court should not enter a judgment upon such plea without making such inquiry as shall satisfy it that there is a factual basis for the plea.

g. Record of Proceedings. A verbatim record of the proceedings at which the defendant enters a plea shall be made and, if there is a plea of guilty or nolo contendere, the record shall include, without limitation, the court's advice to the defendant, the inquiry into the voluntariness of the plea including any plea agreement, and the inquiry into the accuracy of a guilty plea.

h. Harmless Error. Any variance from the procedures required by this rule which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded.

Issue Presented: Whether a stranger to a capital case may intervene on behalf of the defendant and litigate issues for the defendant.

Case Holding: A stranger to a capital case may not intervene on behalf of the defendant and litigate issues for the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: This case involved an undesignated petition filed in a federal district court by A. L. Gusman. Gusman filed the petition on behalf of Samuel Wright. The petition stated that Wright was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape and sentenced to death by the State of Louisiana. It was further alleged in the petition that Wright was prosecuted in violation of due process of law, because the grand jury that indicted Wright consisted of only twelve members, while the law of the State required that the grand jury consist of sixteen members. The State of Louisiana responded to the petition and asked the district court to dismiss the matter as failing to allege any ground for relief. The district court agreed and dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice McKenna: Justice McKenna held that Gusman failed to present any issue upon which he had standing to litigate. The opinion disposed of the case succinctly as follows: "The contention of [the State] is that this is not an application for habeas corpus nor for writ of mandamus, but is an ordinary action. [Gusman] not only concedes the fact, but takes pains to assert it. It follows necessarily that he has no cause of action. However friendly he may be to the doomed man and sympathetic for his situation; however concerned he may be lest unconstitutional laws be enforced, and however laudable such sentiments are,—the grievance they suffer and feel is not special enough to furnish a cause of action in a case like this." The judgment of the district court was affirmed. See also Intervention by Next Friend

Gutierrez Brothers Jose Gutierrez was born in Texas on October 14, 1960. Almost five years after Jose's birth, his brother, Jessie, was born on April 30, 1965. Both brothers dropped out of high school and worked in construction.

On September 5, 1989, the Gutierrez brothers walked into a jewelry store in College Station, Texas, and demanded the store clerk turn over jewelry. The store clerk, forty-two-year-old Dorothy McNew, attempted to flee into another office but was fatally shot by one of the brothers. With McNew lying dead on the floor, the brothers rustled up over $500,000 in jewelry.

The Gutierrez brothers, Jose (left) and Jessie (right). The State of Texas executed Jessie on September 16, 1994, and executed Jose on November 18, 1999. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

When the Gutierrez brothers left the scene of the crime, they fled to Houston. Eight days after the crime, on September 13, authorities arrested both brothers. Only about $375,000 worth of the jewelry was recovered. The brothers were convicted of capital murder in 1990 and sentenced to death. On September 16, 1994, Jessie was executed by lethal injection. On November 18, 1999, Jose was executed by lethal injection.

H

Habeas Corpus The term "habeas corpus" is Latin and means "you have the body." Habeas corpus is a writ or legal device designed to permit a person incarcerated to challenge his or her detention. Habeas corpus cannot be sought by a person who is not under confinement. The origin of habeas corpus is traceable to the common law. The English jurist Blackstone called habeas corpus the most celebrated writ in English law. American jurists have called habeas corpus "the Great Writ."

The legal history of habeas corpus in Anglo-American jurisprudence began with the founding of the nation. In Article I, Section 9, Clause 2 of the U.S. Constitution, it is proclaimed: "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it." Only once in the nation's history, during the Civil War, was habeas corpus suspended. That suspension was ultimately nullified by the United States Supreme Court in Ex Parte Milligan.

Congress codified habeas corpus in Section 14 of the Judiciary Act of 1789. The Judiciary Act authorized federal courts to grant habeas corpus when prisoners were "in custody, under or by colour of the authority of the United States, or [were] committed for trial before some court of the same."

In addition to habeas corpus relief under federal law, habeas corpus is provided directly by constitutions, statutes, or court rules in every State. Both federal and State laws provide limitations on the grounds upon which habeas corpus may be sought. Generally, a petition for habeas corpus relief must assert that (1) confinement is in violation of a constitutional right, (2) the court involved lacked jurisdiction to confine the petitioner, or (3) a sentence was imposed in excess of that provided for by law.

Habeas corpus may be used to challenge pre-trial or post-conviction confinement. The greatest use of habeas comes at the post-conviction confinement stage. Except for the issue of post-conviction bail, all jurisdictions generally limit post-conviction use of habeas corpus until after direct review or appeal of the judgment imposing confinement. The requirement of exhausting direct review before resorting to habeas relief launched the legal term "collateral attack" of judgment as the manner in which to describe the challenge to a judgment through habeas corpus.

Congress enacted significant changes to federal habeas laws in 1996, through its enactment of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDP Act). The AEDP Act provides for expedited review of habeas petitions and limits the scope of review of the merits of habeas petitions. The authority of federal courts to grant habeas relief is expressly set out by statute. In addition to such authority, the statute also imposes limitations on the exercise of that authority. The material that follows sets out federal habeas laws and amendments made thereto by the AEDP Act.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2241: Power to Grant Writ:

a. Writs of habeas corpus may be granted by the Supreme Court, any justice thereof, the district courts and any circuit judge within their respective jurisdictions. The order of a circuit judge shall be entered in the records of the district court of the district wherein the restraint complained of is had.

b. The Supreme Court, any justice thereof, and any circuit judge may decline to entertain an application for a writ of habeas corpus and may transfer the application for hearing and determination to the district court having jurisdiction to entertain it.

c. The writ of habeas corpus shall not extend to a prisoner unless —

1. He is in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States or is committed for trial before some court thereof; or

2. He is in custody for an act done or omitted in pursuance of an Act of Congress, or an order, process, judgment or decree of a court or judge of the United States; or

3. He is in custody in violation of the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States; or

4. He, being a citizen of a foreign state and domiciled therein is in custody for an act done or omitted under any alleged right, title, authority, privilege, protection, or exemption claimed under the commission, order or sanction of any foreign state, or under color thereof, the validity and effect of which depend upon the law of nations; or

5. It is necessary to bring him into court to testify or for trial.

d. Where an application for a writ of habeas corpus is made by a person in custody under the judgment and sentence of a State court of a State which contains two or more Federal judicial districts, the application may be filed in the district court for the district wherein such person is in custody or in the district court for the district within which the State court was held which convicted and sentenced him and each of such district courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction to entertain the application. The district court for the district wherein such an application is filed in the exercise of its discretion and in furtherance of justice may transfer the application to the other district court for hearing and determination.

e. Except as provided in section 1005 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider —

1. An application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; or

2. Any other action against the United States or its agents relating to any aspect of the detention by the Department of Defense of an alien at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who —

A. Is currently in military custody; or

B. has been determined by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in accordance with the procedures set forth in section 1005(e) of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant.

f. Except as provided in section 1405 of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider —

1. An application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; or

2. Any other action against the United States or its agents relating to any aspect of the detention by the Department of Defense of an alien at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who —

A. Is currently in military custody; or

B. has been determined by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in accordance with the procedures set forth in section 1405(e) of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant.

A separate statute provides generally for habeas corpus relief by an inmate confined in a federal institution. This statute was modified by the AEDP Act to impose a one-year statute of limitations.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2255: Federal Habeas Statute for Person in Federal Custody:

A prisoner in custody under sentence of a court established by Act of Congress claiming the right to be released upon the ground that the sentence was imposed in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, or that the court was without jurisdiction to impose such sentence, or that the sentence was in excess of the maximum authorized by law, or is otherwise subject to collateral attack, may move the court which imposed the sentence to vacate, set aside or correct the sentence.

Unless the motion and the files and records of the case conclusively show that the prisoner is entitled to no relief, the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon the United States attorney, grant a prompt hearing thereon, determine the issues and make findings of fact and conclusions of law with respect thereto. If the court finds that the judgment was rendered without jurisdiction, or that the sentence imposed was not authorized by law or otherwise open to collateral attack, or that there has been such a denial or infringement of the constitutional rights of the prisoner as to render the judgment vulnerable to collateral attack, the court shall vacate and set the judgment aside and shall discharge the prisoner or re-sentence him or grant a new trial or correct the sentence as may appear appropriate.

A court may entertain and determine such motion without requiring the production of the prisoner at the hearing.

An appeal may be taken to the court of appeals from the order entered on the motion as from a final judgment on application for a writ of habeas corpus.

An application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a prisoner who is authorized to apply for relief by motion pursuant to this section, shall not be entertained if it appears that the applicant has failed to apply for relief, by motion, to the court which sentenced him, or that such court has denied him relief, unless it also appears that the remedy by motion is inadequate or ineffective to test the legality of his detention.

A one-year period of limitation shall apply to a motion under this section. The limitation period shall run from the latest of—

1. The date on which the judgment of conviction becomes final;

2. The date on which the impediment to making a motion created by governmental action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States is removed, if the movant was prevented from making a motion by such governmental action;

3. The date on which the right asserted was initially recognized by the Supreme Court, if that right has been newly recognized by the Supreme Court and made retroactively applicable to cases on collateral review; or

4. The date on which the facts supporting the claim or claims presented could have been discovered through the exercise of due diligence.

Except as provided in section 408 of the Controlled Substances Act, in all proceedings brought under this section, and any subsequent proceedings on review, the court may appoint counsel, except as provided by a rule promulgated by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. Appointment of counsel under this section shall be governed by section 3006A of title 18.

A second or successive motion must be certified as provided in section 2244 by a panel of the appropriate court of appeals to contain —

1. newly discovered evidence that, if proven and viewed in light of the evidence as a whole, would be sufficient to establish by clear and convincing evidence that no reasonable factfinder would have found the movant guilty of the offense; or

2. A new rule of constitutional law, made retroactive to cases on collateral review by the Supreme Court, that was previously unavailable.

Congress provided for State prisoners to have access to habeas relief in federal courts through an amendment to the Judiciary Act in 1867. Under this amendment, federal courts were authorized to grant habeas corpus “in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States.” The authority of federal courts to grant habeas corpus relief to persons in State custody was not significantly exercised until well into the twentieth century, when the United States Supreme Court decided that federal habeas relief was available to determine whether a State criminal process satisfied the due process requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment.

28 U.S.C. § 2254: Federal Habeas Statute for Person in State Custody:

a. The Supreme Court, a Justice thereof, a circuit judge, or a district court shall entertain an application for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court only on the grounds that he is in custody in violation of the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States.

b. 1. An application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted unless it appears that —

A. The applicant has exhausted the remedies available in the courts of the State; or

B. (i) there is an absence of available State corrective process; or (ii) circumstances exist that render such process ineffective to protect the rights of the applicant.

b. 2. An application for a writ of habeas corpus may be denied on the merits, notwithstanding the failure of the applicant to exhaust the remedies available in the courts of the State.

b. 3. A State shall not be deemed to have waived the exhaustion requirement or be stopped from reliance upon the requirement unless the State, through counsel, expressly waives the requirement.

c. An applicant shall not be deemed to have exhausted the remedies available in the courts of the State, within the meaning of this section, if he has the right under the law of the State to raise, by any available procedure, the question presented.

d. An application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court shall not be granted with respect to any claim that was adjudicated on the merits in State court proceedings unless the adjudication of the claim —

1. resulted in a decision that was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States; or

2. resulted in a decision that was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the State court proceeding.

e.1. In a proceeding instituted by an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court, a determination of a factual issue made by a State court shall be presumed to be correct. The applicant shall have the burden of rebutting the presumption of correctness by clear and convincing evidence.

e.2. If the applicant has failed to develop the factual basis of a claim in State court proceedings, the court shall not hold an evidentiary hearing on the claim unless the applicant shows that —

A. The claim relies on —

(i) a new rule of constitutional law, made retroactive to cases on collateral review by the Supreme Court, that was previously unavailable; or

(ii) a factual predicate that could not have been previously discovered through the exercise of due diligence; and

B. The facts underlying the claim would be sufficient to establish by clear and convincing evidence that but for constitutional error, no reasonable factfinder would have found the applicant guilty of the underlying offense.

f. If the applicant challenges the sufficiency of the evidence adduced in such State court proceeding to support the State court’s determination of a factual issue made therein, the applicant, if able, shall produce that part of the record pertinent to a determination of the sufficiency of the evidence to support such determination. If the applicant, because of indigency or other reason is unable to produce such part of the record, then the State shall produce such part of the record and the Federal court shall direct the State to do so by order directed to an appropriate State official. If the State cannot provide such pertinent part of the record, then the court shall determine under the existing facts and circumstances what weight shall be given to the State court’s factual determination.

g. A copy of the official records of the State court, duly certified by the clerk of such court to be a true and correct copy of a finding, judicial opinion, or other reliable written indicia showing such a factual determination by the State court shall be admissible in the Federal court proceeding.

h. Except as provided in section 408 of the Controlled Substances Act, in all proceedings brought under this section, and any subsequent proceedings on review, the court may appoint counsel for an applicant who is or becomes financially unable to afford counsel, except as provided by a rule promulgated by the Supreme Court pursuant to statutory authority. Appointment of counsel under this section shall be governed by section 3006A of title 18.

i. The ineffectiveness or incompetence of counsel during Federal or State collateral post-conviction proceedings shall not be a ground for relief in a proceeding arising under section 2254.

The general requirements for filing an application for habeas relief are set out by statute. The statute has been supplemented by rules promulgated by the United States Supreme Court.

28 U.S.C.A § 2242: Application for Writ:

Application for a writ of habeas corpus shall be in writing signed and verified by the person for whose relief it is intended or by someone acting in his behalf.

It shall allege the facts concerning the applicant’s commitment or detention, the name of the person who has custody over him and by virtue of what claim or authority, if known.

It may be amended or supplemented as provided in the rules of procedure applicable to civil actions.

If addressed to the Supreme Court, a justice thereof or a circuit judge it shall state the reasons for not making application to the district court of the district in which the applicant is held.

General guidelines for issuing a writ or order to show cause are provided by statute. These general guidelines are supplemented by other specific statutes.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2243: Issuance of Writ:

A court, justice, or judge entertaining an application for a writ of habeas corpus shall forthwith award the writ or issue an order directing the respondent to show cause why the writ should not be granted, unless it appears from the application that the applicant or person detained is not entitled thereto.

The writ or order to show cause shall be directed to the person having custody of the person detained. It shall be returned within three days unless for good cause additional time, not exceeding twenty days, is allowed.

The person to whom the writ or order is directed shall make a return certifying the true cause of the detention.

When the writ or order is returned a day shall be set for hearing, not more than five days after the return unless for good cause additional time is allowed.

Unless the application for the writ and the return present only issues of law the person to whom the writ is directed shall be required to produce at the hearing the body of the person detained.

The applicant or the person detained may, under oath, deny any of the facts set forth in the return or allege any other material facts.

The return and all suggestions made against it may be amended, by leave of court, before or after being filed.

The court shall summarily hear and determine the facts, and dispose of the matter as law and justice require.

It is provided by statute that habeas relief may be denied to a federal prisoner who has previously been denied habeas relief. This statute was amended by the AEDP Act to require that State prisoners seek permission to file a successive habeas petition. The AEDP Act also imposed a one-year limitation for a State prisoner to file a habeas petition.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2244: Finality of Determination:

a. No circuit or district judge shall be required to entertain an application for a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the detention of a person pursuant to a judgment of a court of the United States if it appears that the legality of such detention has been determined by a judge or court of the United States on a prior application for a writ of habeas corpus, except as provided in section 2255.

b. 1. A claim presented in a second or successive habeas corpus application under section 2254 that was presented in a prior application shall be dismissed.

b. 2. A claim presented in a second or successive habeas corpus application under section 2254 that was not presented in a prior application shall be dismissed unless—

A. The applicant shows that the claim relies on a new rule of constitutional law, made retroactive to cases on collateral review by the Supreme Court, that was previously unavailable; or

B. (i) the factual predicate for the claim could not have been discovered previously through the exercise of due diligence; and (ii) the facts underlying the claim, if proven and viewed in light of the evidence as a whole, would be sufficient to establish by clear and convincing evidence that, but for constitutional error, no reasonable factfinder would have found the applicant guilty of the underlying offense.

b. 3. A. Before a second or successive application permitted by this section is filed in the district court, the applicant shall move in the appropriate court of appeals for an order authorizing the district court to consider the application.

B. A motion in the court of appeals for an order authorizing the district court to consider a second or successive application shall be determined by a three-judge panel of the court of appeals.

C. The court of appeals may authorize the filing of a second or successive application only if it determines that the application makes a prima facie showing that the application satisfies the requirements of this subsection.

D. The court of appeals shall grant or deny the authorization to file a second or successive application not later than 30 days after the filing of the motion.

E. The grant or denial of an authorization by a court of appeals to file a second or successive application shall not be appealable and shall not be the subject of a petition for rehearing or for a writ of certiorari.

4. A district court shall dismiss any claim presented in a second or successive application that the court of appeals has authorized to be filed unless the applicant shows that the claim satisfies the requirements of this section.

c. In a habeas corpus proceeding brought on behalf of a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court, a prior judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States on an appeal or review by a writ of certiorari at the instance of the prisoner of the decision of such State court, shall be conclusive as to all issues of fact or law with respect to an asserted denial of a Federal right which constitutes ground for discharge in a habeas corpus proceeding, actually adjudicated by the Supreme Court therein, unless the applicant for the writ of habeas corpus shall plead and the court shall find the existence of a material and controlling fact which did not appear in the record of the proceeding in the Supreme Court and the court shall further find that the applicant for the writ of habeas corpus could not have caused such fact to appear in such record by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

d. 1. A 1-year period of limitation shall apply to an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person in custody pursuant to the judgment of a State court. The limitation period shall run from the latest of—

A. The date on which the judgment became final by the conclusion of direct review or the expiration of the time for seeking such review;

B. The date on which the impediment to filing an application created by State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States is removed, if the applicant was prevented from filing by such State action;

C. The date on which the constitutional right asserted was initially recognized by the Supreme Court, if the right has been newly recognized by the Supreme Court and made retroactively applicable to cases on collateral review; or

D. The date on which the factual predicate of the claim or claims presented could have been discovered through the exercise of due diligence.

2. The time during which a properly filed application for State post-conviction or other collateral review with respect to the pertinent judgment or claim is pending shall not be counted toward any period of limitation under this subsection.

Several statutes set out evidentiary and procedural guidelines for habeas proceedings. These statutes are affected by federal rules of evidence and civil procedure.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2245: Certificate of Trial Judge Admissible:

On the hearing of an application for a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the legality of the detention of a person pursuant to a judgment the certificate of the judge who presided at the trial resulting in the judgment, setting forth the facts occurring at the trial, shall be admissible in evidence. Copies of the certificate shall be filed with the court in which the application is pending and in the court in which the trial took place.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2246: Evidence; Depositions; Affidavits:

On application for a writ of habeas corpus, evidence may be taken orally or by deposition, or, in the discretion of the judge, by affidavit. If affidavits are admitted any party shall have the right to propound written interrogatories to the affiants, or to file answering affidavits.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2247: Documentary Evidence:

On application for a writ of habeas corpus documentary evidence, transcripts of proceedings upon arraignment, plea and sentence and a transcript of the oral testimony introduced on any previous similar application by or in behalf of the same petitioner, shall be admissible in evidence.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2248: Return or Answer:

The allegations of a return to the writ of habeas corpus or of an answer to an order to show cause in a habeas corpus proceeding, if not traversed, shall be accepted as true except to the extent that the judge finds from the evidence that they are not true.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2249: Certified Copies of Indictment and Judgment:

On application for a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the detention of any person pursuant to a judgment of a court of the United States, the respondent shall promptly file with the court certified copies of the indictment, plea of petitioner and the judgment, or such of them as may be material to the questions raised, if the petitioner fails to attach them to his petition, and same shall be attached to the return to the writ, or to the answer to the order to show cause.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2250: Indigent:

If on any application for a writ of habeas corpus an order has been made permitting the petitioner to prosecute the application in forma pauperis, the clerk of any court of the United States shall furnish to the petitioner without cost certified copies of such documents or parts of the record on file in his office as may be required by order of the judge before whom the application is pending.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2251: Stay of State Court Proceedings:

a. In general.—

1. Pending matters.— A justice or judge of the United States before whom a habeas corpus proceeding is pending, may, before final judgment or after final judgment of discharge, or pending appeal, stay any proceeding against the person detained in any State court or by or under the authority of any State for any matter involved in the habeas corpus proceeding.

2. Matter not pending.— For purposes of this section, a habeas corpus proceeding is not pending until the application is filed.

3. Application for appointment of counsel.— If a State prisoner sentenced to death applies for appointment of counsel pursuant to section 3599(a)2 of title 18 in a court that would have jurisdiction to entertain a habeas corpus application regarding that sentence, that court may stay execution of the sentence of death, but such stay shall terminate not later than 90 days after counsel is appointed or the application for appointment of counsel is withdrawn or denied.

b. No further proceedings.— After the granting of such a stay, any such proceeding in any State court or by or under the authority of any State shall be void. If no stay is granted, any such proceeding shall be as valid as if no habeas corpus proceedings or appeal were pending.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2252: Notice:

Prior to the hearing of a habeas corpus proceeding on behalf of a person in custody of State officers or by virtue of State laws notice shall be served on the attorney general or other appropriate officer of such State as the justice or judge at the time of issuing the writ shall direct.

The AEDP Act amended the habeas appeal statute so as to provide that an inmate aggrieved by a ruling of a District Court in a habeas proceeding does not have an automatic right to appeal. In order to seek an appeal an inmate must obtain a “certificate of appealability” (COA) from a District Court or Federal Court of Appeals. The statute permits a COA to be issued only if an inmate demonstrates a substantial showing of the denial of a constitutional right.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2253: Appeal:

a. In a habeas corpus proceeding or a proceeding under section 2255 before a district judge, the final order shall be subject to review, on appeal, by the court of appeals for the circuit in which the proceeding is held.

b. There shall be no right of appeal from a final order in a proceeding to test the validity of a warrant to remove to another district or place for commitment or trial a person charged with a criminal offense against the United States, or to test the validity of such person’s detention pending removal proceedings.

c. 1. Unless a circuit justice or judge issues a certificate of appealability, an appeal may not be taken to the court of appeals from —

A. The final order in a habeas corpus proceeding in which the detention complained of arises out of process issued by a State court; or

B. The final order in a proceeding under section 2255.

2. A certificate of appealability may issue under paragraph (1) only if the applicant has made a substantial showing of the denial of a constitutional right.

3. The certificate of appealability under paragraph (1) shall indicate which specific issue or issues satisfy the showing required by paragraph (2).

The AEDP Act created five statutes, 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 2261–2266, providing for specific matters involved with inmates seeking habeas corpus relief while under a sentence of death. The death penalty sections of the AEDP Act are only applicable in federal habeas proceedings initiated by a State death row inmate if the State involved has “opted in” and qualified under either the procedures set out in 28 U.S.C.A. § 2261 or 18 U.S.C.A. § 2265.

The requirement under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2261 is that a State provide for the appointment of counsel to represent a death row inmate in a habeas proceedings.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2261: Appointment of Counsel for Death Row Inmate:

a. This chapter shall apply to cases arising under section 2254 brought by prisoners in State custody who are subject to a capital sentence. It shall apply only if the provisions of subsections (b) and (c) are satisfied.

b. This chapter is applicable if a State establishes by statute, rule of its court of last resort, or by another agency authorized by State law, a mechanism for the appointment, compensation, and payment of reasonable litigation expenses of competent counsel in State post-conviction proceedings brought by indigent prisoners whose capital convictions and sentences have been upheld on direct appeal to the court of last resort in the State or have otherwise become final for State law purposes. The rule of court or statute must provide standards of competency for the appointment of such counsel.

c. Any mechanism for the appointment, compensation, and reimbursement of counsel as provided in subsection (b) must offer counsel to all State prisoners under capital sentence and must provide for the entry of an order by a court of record

1. Appointing one or more counsels to represent the prisoner upon a finding that the prisoner is indigent and accepted the offer or is unable competently to decide whether to accept or reject the offer;

2. Finding, after a hearing if necessary, that the prisoner rejected the offer of counsel and made the decision with an understanding of its legal consequences; or

3. Denying the appointment of counsel upon a finding that the prisoner is not indigent.

d. No counsel appointed pursuant to subsections (b) and (c) to represent a State prisoner under capital sentence shall have previously represented the prisoner at trial or on direct appeal in the case for which the appointment is made unless the prisoner and counsel expressly request continued representation.

e. The ineffectiveness or incompetence of counsel during State or Federal post-conviction proceedings in a capital case shall not be a ground for relief in a proceeding arising under section 2254. This limitation shall not preclude the appointment of different counsel, on the court's own motion or at the request of the prisoner, at any phase of State or Federal post-conviction proceedings on the basis of the ineffectiveness or incompetence of counsel in such proceedings.

Under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2262 of the AEDP Act, a federal court must issue an order staying the death row inmate's execution pending review of the habeas petition.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2262: Mandatory Stay of Execution:

a. Upon the entry in the appropriate State court of record of an order under section 2261(c), a warrant or order setting an execution date for a State prisoner shall be stayed upon application to any court that would have jurisdiction over any proceedings filed under section 2254. The application shall recite that the State has invoked the post-conviction review procedures of this chapter and that the scheduled execution is subject to stay.

b. A stay of execution granted pursuant to subsection a. shall expire if—

1. A State prisoner fails to file a habeas corpus application under section 2254 within the time required in section 2263;

2. Before a court of competent jurisdiction, in the presence of counsel, unless the prisoner has competently and knowingly waived such counsel, and after having been advised of the consequences, a State prisoner under capital sentence waives the right to pursue habeas corpus review under section 2254; or

3. A State prisoner files a habeas corpus petition under section 2254 within the time required by section 2263 and fails to make a substantial showing of the denial of a Federal right or is denied relief in the district court or at any subsequent stage of review.

c. If one of the conditions in subsection (b) has occurred, no Federal court thereafter shall have the authority to enter a stay of execution in the case, unless the court of appeals approves the filing of a second or successive application under section 2244(b).

Under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2263 of the AEDP Act, the deadline for filing a habeas application is set out.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2263: Filing Time Requirements:

a. Any application under this chapter for habeas corpus relief under section 2254 must be filed in the appropriate district court not later than 180 days after final State court affirmance of the conviction and sentence on direct review or the expiration of the time for seeking such review.

b. The time requirements established by subsection a. shall be tolled—

1. From the date that a petition for certiorari is filed in the Supreme Court until the date of final disposition of the petition if a State prisoner files the petition to secure review by the Supreme Court of the affirmance of a capital sentence on direct review by the court of last resort of the State or other final State court decision on direct review;

2. From the date on which the first petition for post-conviction review or other collateral relief is filed until the final State court disposition of such petition; and

3. During an additional period not to exceed 30 days, if—

A. A motion for an extension of time is filed in the Federal district court that would have jurisdiction over the case upon the filing of a habeas corpus application under section 2254; and

B. A showing of good cause is made for the failure to file the habeas corpus application within the time period established by this section.

Under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2264 of the AEDP Act, a federal court is limited to considering issues raised and addressed by a State court unless the matter falls within one of the exceptions provided by the statute.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2264: Scope of Federal Review

a. Whenever a State prisoner under capital sentence files a petition for habeas corpus relief to which this chapter applies, the district court shall only consider a claim or claims that have been raised and decided on the merits in the State courts, unless the failure to raise the claim properly is—

1. The result of State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States;

2. The result of the Supreme Court's recognition of a new Federal right that is made retroactively applicable; or

3. Based on a factual predicate that could not have been discovered through the exercise of due diligence in time to present the claim for State or Federal post-conviction review.

b. Following review subject to subsections (a), (d), and (e) of section 2254, the court shall rule on the claims properly before it.

Under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2265 of the AEDP Act, a State is required to provide death row inmates with "unitary review" of direct appeal issues and collateral issues.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2265: State Unitary Review Procedure:

a. For purposes of this section, a "unitary review" procedure means a State procedure that authorizes a person under sentence of death to raise, in the course of direct review of the judgment, such claims as could be raised on collateral attack. This chapter shall apply, as provided in this section, in relation to a State unitary review procedure if the State establishes by rule of its court of last resort or by statute a mechanism for the appointment, compensation, and payment of reasonable litigation expenses of competent counsel in the unitary review proceedings, including expenses relating to the litigation of collateral claims in the proceedings. The rule of court or statute must provide standards of competency for the appointment of such counsel.

b. To qualify under this section, a unitary review procedure must include an offer of counsel following trial for the purpose of representation on unitary review, and entry of an order, as provided in section 2261(c), concerning appointment of counsel or waiver or denial of appointment of counsel for that purpose. No counsel appointed to represent the prisoner in the unitary review proceedings shall have previously represented the prisoner at trial in the case for which the appointment is made unless the prisoner and counsel expressly request continued representation.

c. Sections 2262, 2263, 2264, and 2266 shall apply in relation to cases involving a sentence of death from any State having a unitary review procedure that qualifies under this section. References to State “post-conviction review” and “direct review” in such sections shall be understood as referring to unitary review under the State procedure. The reference in section 2262(a) to “an order under section 2261(c)” shall be understood as referring to the post-trial order under subsection (b) concerning representation in the unitary review proceedings, but if a transcript of the trial proceedings is unavailable at the time of the filing of such an order in the appropriate State court, then the start of the 180-day limitation period under section 2263 shall be deferred until a transcript is made available to the prisoner or counsel of the prisoner.

Under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2266 of the AEDP Act, time limitations are imposed on district courts and Courts of Appeal for deciding capital punishment cases.

28 U.S.C.A. § 2266: Limitation Periods:

a. The adjudication of any application under section 2254 that is subject to this chapter, and the adjudication of any motion under section 2255 by a person under sentence of death, shall be given priority by the district court and by the court of appeals over all noncapital matters.

b. 1. A. A district court shall render a final determination and enter a final judgment on any application for a writ of habeas corpus brought under this chapter in a capital case not later than 450 days after the date on which the application is filed, or 60 days after the date on which the case is submitted for decision, whichever is earlier.

B. A district court shall afford the parties at least 120 days in which to complete all actions, including the preparation of all pleadings and briefs, and if necessary, a hearing, prior to the submission of the case for decision.

C. (i) A district court may delay for not more than one additional 30-day period beyond the period specified in subparagraph (A), the rendering of a determination of an application for a writ of habeas corpus if the court issues a written order making a finding, and stating the reasons for the finding, that the ends of justice that would be served by allowing the delay outweigh the best interests of the public and the applicant in a speedy disposition of the application.

(ii) The factors, among others, that a court shall consider in determining whether a delay in the disposition of an application is warranted are as follows:

I. Whether the failure to allow the delay would be likely to result in a miscarriage of justice.

II. Whether the case is so unusual or so complex, due to the number of defendants, the nature of the prosecution, or the existence of novel questions of fact or law, that it is unreasonable to expect adequate briefing within the time limitations established by subparagraph (A).

III. Whether the failure to allow a delay in a case that, taken as a whole, is not so unusual or so complex as described in subclause (II), but would otherwise deny the applicant reasonable time to obtain counsel, would unreasonably deny the applicant or the government continuity of counsel, or would deny counsel for the applicant or the government the reasonable time necessary for effective preparation, taking into account the exercise of due diligence.

(iii) No delay in disposition shall be permissible because of general congestion of the court’s calendar.

(iv) The court shall transmit a copy of any order issued under clause (i) to the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts for inclusion in the report under paragraph (5).

2. The time limitations under paragraph (1) shall apply to —

A. An initial application for a writ of habeas corpus;

B. Any second or successive application for a writ of habeas corpus; and

C. Any redetermination of an application for a writ of habeas corpus following a remand by the court of appeals or the Supreme Court for further proceedings, in which case the limitation period shall run from the date the remand is ordered.

3. A. The time limitations under this section shall not be construed to entitle an applicant to a stay of execution, to which the applicant would otherwise not be entitled, for the purpose of litigating any application or appeal.

3. B. No amendment to an application for a writ of habeas corpus under this chapter shall be permitted after the filing of the answer to the application, except on the grounds specified in section 2244(b).

4. A. The failure of a court to meet or comply with a time limitation under this section shall not be a ground for granting relief from a judgment of conviction or sentence.

4. B. The State may enforce a time limitation under this section by petitioning for a writ of mandamus to the court of appeals. The court of appeals shall act on the petition for a writ of mandamus not later than 30 days after the filing of the petition.

5. A. The Administrative Office of the United States Courts shall submit to Congress an annual report on the compliance by the district courts with the time limitations under this section.

5. B. The report described in subparagraph A. shall include copies of the orders submitted by the district courts under paragraph 1.B.iv.

c. 1. A. A court of appeals shall hear and render a final determination of any appeal of an order granting or denying, in whole or in part, an application brought under this chapter in a capital case not later than 120 days after the date on which the reply brief is filed, or if no reply brief is filed, not later than 120 days after the date on which the answering brief is filed.

B. (i) A court of appeals shall decide whether to grant a petition for rehearing or other request for rehearing en banc not later than 30 days after the date on which the petition for rehearing is filed unless a responsive pleading is required, in which case the court shall decide whether to grant the petition not later than 30 days after the date on which the responsive pleading is filed.

B. (ii) If a petition for rehearing or rehearing en banc is granted, the court of appeals shall hear and render a final determination of the appeal not later than 120 days after the date on which the order granting rehearing or rehearing en banc is entered.

2. The time limitations under paragraph 1. shall apply to —

A. An initial application for a writ of habeas corpus;

B. Any second or successive application for a writ of habeas corpus; and

C. Any redetermination of an application for a writ of habeas corpus or related appeal following a remand by the court of appeals en banc or the Supreme Court for further proceedings, in which case the limitation period shall run from the date the remand is ordered.

3. The time limitations under this section shall not be construed to entitle an applicant to a stay of execution, to which the applicant would otherwise not be entitled, for the purpose of litigating any application or appeal.

4.A. The failure of a court to meet or comply with a time limitation under this section shall not be a ground for granting relief from a judgment of conviction or sentence.

4. B. The State may enforce a time limitation under this section by applying for a writ of mandamus to the Supreme Court.

5. The Administrative Office of the United States Courts shall submit to Congress an annual report on the compliance by the courts of appeals with the time limitations under this section.

Habeas Corpus Procedural Rules All capital punishment jurisdictions provide rules that govern the procedures of a habeas corpus proceeding. The habeas corpus rules promulgated by the United States Supreme Court, for use in federal district courts, embody the general procedural practice of most capital punishment jurisdictions. The Supreme Court has issued two sets of habeas corpus procedural rules. Separate habeas rules are provided for federal prisoners and State prisoners. Only minor differences exist between the two sets of rules. The federal habeas rules reproduced here are used in proceedings involving federal death row inmates. The “comments” that follow each rule have been provided to assist in understanding the substance the rule.

Rule 1. Scope of Rules:

These rules govern the procedure in the district court on a motion under 28 U.S.C. § 2255:

1. By a person in custody pursuant to a judgment of that court for a determination that the judgment was imposed in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, or that the court was without jurisdiction to impose such judgment, or that the sentence was in excess of the maximum authorized by law, or is otherwise subject to collateral attack; and

2. By a person in custody pursuant to a judgment of a state or other federal court and subject to future custody under a judgment of the district court for a determination that such future custody will be in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, or that the district court was without jurisdiction to impose such judgment, or that the sentence was in excess of the maximum authorized by law, or is otherwise subject to collateral attack.

Comment: Rule 1 provides that all of the rules which follow it are applicable to habeas corpus proceedings in Federal District Courts, that are initiated by defendants invoking the Federal statute applicable to persons held in custody by the Federal Government. The rule also indicates that a defendant must file a “motion” to begin the habeas proceeding. A motion is filed instead of a “petition,” because the defendant’s case would already be in the District Court where the habeas relief is sought. There is also a provision in the rule which makes the rules applicable to defendant who is in the custody of a State, but is subject to a criminal judgment by the Federal Government. This latter situation arises when a defendant is prosecuted by both the Federal Government and a State.

Rule 2. Motion:

a. Nature of application for relief. If the person is presently in custody pursuant to the federal judgment in question, or if not presently in custody may be subject to such custody in the future pursuant to such judgment, the application for relief shall be in the form of a motion to vacate, set aside, or correct the sentence.

b. Form of motion. The motion shall be in substantially the form annexed to these rules, except that any district court may by local rule require that motions filed with it shall be in a form prescribed by the local rule. Blank motions in the prescribed form shall be made available without charge by the clerk of the district court to applicants upon their request. It shall specify all the grounds for relief which are available to the movant and of which he has or, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, should have knowledge and shall set forth in summary form the facts supporting each of the grounds thus specified. It shall also state the relief requested. The motion shall be typewritten or legibly handwritten and shall be signed under penalty of perjury by the petitioner.

c. Motion to be directed to one judgment only. A motion shall be limited to the assertion of a claim for relief against one judgment only of the district court. If a movant desires to attack the validity of other judgments of that or any other district court under which he is in custody or may be subject to future custody, as the case may be, he shall do so by separate motions.

d. Return of insufficient motion. If a motion received by the clerk of a district court does not substantially comply with the requirements of Rule 2 or Rule 3, it may be returned to the movant, if a judge of the court so directs, together with a statement of the reason for its return. The clerk shall retain a copy of the motion.

Comment: Rule 2 provides guidelines for the substantive contents of a motion for habeas relief. The rule also cautions that a motion for habeas relief must challenge only one conviction judgment. A single conviction judgment may embody multiple offense convictions. If a motion is not filed in compliance with the rules, it may be denied on that ground.

Rule 3. Filing Motion:

a. Place of filing; copies. A motion under these rules shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the district court. It shall be accompanied by two conformed copies thereof.

b. Filing and service. Upon receipt of the motion and having ascertained that it appears on its face to comply with Rules 2 and 3, the clerk of the district court shall file the motion and enter it on the docket in his office in the criminal action in which was entered the judgment to which it is directed. He shall thereupon deliver or serve a copy of the motion together with a notice of its filing on the United States Attorney of the district in which the judgment under attack was entered. The filing of the motion shall not require said United States Attorney to answer the motion or otherwise move with respect to it unless so ordered by the court.

Comment: Rule 3 directs where a motion is to be filed. It also provides that the Clerk of the District Court is obligated to send a copy of the motion to the Federal prosecuting attorney. Under the rule the prosecuting attorney does not have to respond in writing to the motion until the court requires a response.

Rule 4. Preliminary Consideration by Judge:

a. Reference to judge; dismissal or order to answer. The original motion shall be presented promptly to the judge of the district court who presided at the movant's trial and sentenced him, or, if the judge who imposed sentence was not the trial judge, then it shall go to the judge who was in charge of that part of the proceedings being attacked by the movant. If the appropriate judge is unavailable to consider the motion, it shall be presented to another judge of the district in accordance with the procedure of the court for the assignment of its business.

b. Initial consideration by judge. The motion, together with all the files, records, transcripts, and correspondence relating to the judgment under attack, shall be examined promptly by the judge to whom it is assigned. If it plainly appears from the face of the motion and any annexed exhibits and the prior proceedings in the case that the movant is not entitled to relief in the district court, the judge shall make an order for its summary dismissal and cause the movant to be notified. Otherwise, the judge shall order the United States Attorney to file an answer or other pleading within the period of time fixed by the court or to take such other action as the judge deems appropriate.

Comment: Rule 4 authorizes a District Court judge to dismiss a habeas motion immediately if the motion and record in the case clearly reveal that the defendant is not entitled to relief from the court. If the motion and record of the case indicate grounds for possible relief by the court, the rule requires the judge to order the prosecuting attorney to file a response to the motion.

Rule 5. Answer and Contents:

a. Contents of answer. The answer shall respond to the allegations of the motion. In addition it shall state whether the movant has used any other available federal remedies including any prior post-conviction motions under these rules or those existing previous to the adoption of the present rules. The answer shall also state whether an evidentiary hearing was accorded the movant in a federal court.

b. Supplementing the answer. The court shall examine its files and records to determine whether it has available copies of transcripts and briefs whose existence the answer has indicated. If any of these items should be absent, the government shall be ordered to supplement its answer by filing the needed records. The court shall allow the government an appropriate period of time in which to do so, without unduly delaying the consideration of the motion.

Comment: Rule 6 is directed to the prosecuting attorney. It informs the prosecutor of the substantive matters that must be addressed in a response to a defendant's habeas motion.

Rule 6. Discovery:

a. Leave of court required. A party may invoke the processes of discovery available under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or elsewhere in the usages and principles of law if, and to the extent that, the judge in the exercise of his discretion and for good cause shown grants leave to do so, but not otherwise. If necessary for effective utilization of discovery procedures, counsel shall be appointed by the judge for a movant who qualifies for appointment of counsel under 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(g).

b. Requests for discovery. Requests for discovery shall be accompanied by a statement of the interrogatories or requests for admission and a list of the documents, if any, sought to be produced.

c. Expenses. If the government is granted leave to take the deposition of the movant or any other person, the judge may as a condition of taking it direct that the government pay the expenses of travel and subsistence and fees of counsel for the movant to attend the taking of the deposition.

Comment: Rule 6 governs how the defendant and prosecutor are able to obtain information from each other that is not already in the record. Under the rule a party must obtain permission from the judge in order to conduct discovery of information not in the record. If the judge grants a party's request to engage in discovery, the discovery must take place within the framework of other rules that govern the discovery process. The rule also permits a judge to appoint an attorney for an indigent defendant, if doing so would assist the discovery process.

Rule 7. Expansion of Record:

a. Direction for expansion. If the motion is not dismissed summarily, the judge may direct that the record be expanded by the parties by the inclusion of additional materials relevant to the determination of the merits of the motion.

b. Materials to be added. The expanded record may include, without limitation, letters predating the filing of the motion in the district court, documents, exhibits, and answers under oath, if so directed, to written interrogatories propounded by the judge. Affidavits may be submitted and considered as a part of the record.

c. Submission to opposing party. In any case in which an expanded record is directed, copies of the letters, documents, exhibits, and affidavits proposed to be included shall be submitted to the party against whom they are to be offered, and he shall be afforded an opportunity to admit or deny their correctness.

d. Authentication. The court may require the authentication of any material under subdivision (b) or (c).

Comment: Rule 7 gives the judge authority to permit the record in the case to be expanded beyond that which was created during the actual prosecution. The expansion will generally occur when discovery has taken place.

Rule 8. Evidentiary Hearing:

a. Determination by court. If the motion has not been dismissed at a previous stage in the proceeding, the judge, after the answer is filed and any transcripts or records of prior court actions in the matter are in his possession, shall, upon a review of those proceedings and of the expanded record, if any, determine whether an evidentiary hearing is required. If it appears that an evidentiary hearing is not required, the judge shall make such disposition of the motion as justice dictates.

b. Function of the magistrate.

1. When designated to do so in accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 636(b), a magistrate may conduct hearings, including evidentiary hearings, on the motion, and submit to a judge of the court proposed findings and recommendations for disposition.

2. The magistrate shall file proposed findings and recommendations with the court and a copy shall forthwith be mailed to all parties.

3. Within ten days after being served with a copy, any party may serve and file written objections to such proposed findings and recommendations as provided by rules of court.

4. A judge of the court shall make a de novo determination of those portions of the report or specified proposed findings or recommendations to which objection is made. A judge of the court may accept, reject, or modify in whole or in part any findings or recommendations made by the magistrate.

c. Appointment of counsel; time for hearing. If an evidentiary hearing is required, the judge shall appoint counsel for a movant who qualifies for the appointment of counsel under 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(g) and the hearing shall be conducted as promptly as practicable, having regard for the need of counsel for both parties for adequate time for investigation and preparation. These rules do not limit the appointment of counsel under 18 U.S.C. § 3006A at any stage of the proceeding if the interest of justice so requires.

d. Production of statements at evidentiary hearing.

1. In general. Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 26.2 (a)–(d), and (f) applies at an evidentiary hearing under these rules.

2. Sanctions for failure to produce statement. If a party elects not to comply with an order under Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 26.2(a) to deliver a statement to the moving party, at the evidentiary hearing the court may not consider the testimony of the witness whose statement is withheld.

Comment: Rule 8 authorizes a District Court judge to dispose of habeas case on the merits with or without an evidentiary hearing. An evidentiary hearing is one in which witnesses may be called and testimony taken. If an evidentiary hearing is required, the judge must appoint counsel for an indigent defendant. The rule permits the judge to assign a Federal magistrate to preside over an evidentiary hearing.

Rule 9. Delayed or Successive Motions:

a. Delayed motions. A motion for relief made pursuant to these rules may be dismissed if it appears that the government has been prejudiced in its ability to respond to the motion by delay in its filing unless the movant shows that it is based on grounds of which he could not have had knowledge by the exercise of reasonable diligence before the circumstances prejudicial to the government occurred.

b. Successive motions. A second or successive motion may be dismissed if the judge finds that it fails to allege new or different grounds for relief and the prior determination was on the merits or, if new and different grounds are alleged, the judge finds that the failure of the movant to assert those grounds in a prior motion constituted an abuse of the procedure governed by these rules.

Comment: Rule 9 permits the court to dismiss a habeas motion if it is shown that the motion was brought untimely and the prosecutor is unduly prejudiced by the late filing. The court may also, under the rule, dismiss a second or subsequent habeas motion that fails to allege any issue that was not previously addressed on a prior motion, or if there is an assertion of new allegations that could have been alleged in a prior habeas proceeding.

Rule 10. Powers of Magistrates:

The duties imposed upon the judge of the district court by these rules may be performed by a United States magistrate pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636.

Comment: Rule 10 sets the scope of a Federal magistrate's authority over a habeas proceeding coextensive with that of a District Court judge.

Rule 11. Time for Appeal:

The time for appeal from an order entered on a motion for relief made pursuant to these rules is as provided in Rule 4(a) of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure. Nothing in these rules shall be construed as extending the time to appeal from the original judgment of conviction in the district court.

Comment: Rule 11 makes clear that the time for appealing a habeas decision is that which governs any type of appeal. The rule also cautions defendants that the habeas rules do not extend the time for appealing the underlying judgment in the case.

Rule 12. Rules of Criminal and Civil Procedure Applicability:

If no procedure is specifically prescribed by these rules, the district court may proceed in any lawful manner not inconsistent with these rules, or any applicable statute, and may apply the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, whichever it deems most appropriate, to motions filed under these rules.

Comment: Rule 12 authorizes the District Court judge to use the court's inherent powers to formulate procedures to conduct a habeas proceeding when necessary. The rule also makes available other substantive procedural rules to assist the judge in conducting a habeas proceeding.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant established that blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him; therefore, his conviction and death sentence could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Hale, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Kentucky. The Kentucky Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his conviction violated the federal Constitution because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The per curiam opinion held that the defendant established his claim of grand and petit jury discrimination. It was said "that the affidavits, which by the stipulation of the State were to be taken as proof, and were uncontroverted, sufficed to show a systematic and arbitrary exclusion of [blacks] from the jury lists solely because of their race or color, constituting a denial of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed to [the defendant] by the Fourteenth Amendment." The judgment of the Kentucky Supreme Court was reversed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection Issue Presented: Whether due process of law required a jury determine the degree of guilt to assign to the defendant after he entered a plea of guilty to a homicide.

Case Holding: Due process of law did not require a jury determine the degree of guilt to assign to the defendant after he entered a plea of guilty to a homicide; therefore, a two-judge panel used to ascertain the degree of his guilt was constitutionally acceptable.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Edward W. Hallinger, was indicted for capital murder by the State of New Jersey. The defendant entered a plea of guilty. Under the law of the State, a two-judge panel had to convene to determine what degree of guilt was to be attached to the defendant's plea of guilty. After holding a hearing and taking evidence, the two-judge panel determined that the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree. The defendant was thereafter sentenced to death.

The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that he was denied due process of law because he was not permitted to have a jury determine the degree of guilt to assign to him. The district court denied relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Shiras: Justice Shiras concluded that the defendant was not denied due process of law. The opinion dispensed with the contention as follows:

The right of the accused to a trial was not affected, and we can therefore have no doubt that the proceeding to ascertain the degree of the crime where without a jury, in an indictment for murder, the defendant enters a plea of guilty, is constitutional and valid. Statutes of like or similar import have been enacted in many of the states, and have never been held unconstitutional. On the other hand, they have been repeatedly and uniformly held to be constitutional....

[W]e are readily brought to the conclusion that the [defendant], in voluntarily availing himself of the provisions of the statute and electing to plead guilty, was deprived of no right or privilege within the protection of the fourteenth amendment. The trial seems to have been conducted in strict accordance with the forms prescribed by the constitution and laws of the state, and with special regard to the rights of the accused thereunder. The court refrained from at once accepting his plea of guilty, assigned him counsel, and twice adjourned, for a period of several days, in order that he might be fully advised of the truth, force, and effect of his plea of guilty. Whatever may be thought of the wisdom of departing, in capital cases, from time-honored procedure, there is certainly nothing in the present record to enable this court to perceive that the rights of the [defendant], so far as the laws and constitution of the United States are concerned, have been in any wise infringed.

The judgment of the district court was affirmed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan issued a statement concurring in the Court's judgment and indicating he did not agree in all the reasoning of the opinion. See also Guilty Plea

Handicapped Person Aggravator In 1985, religious extremists attacked a cruise ship called the Achille Lauro, off the Egyptian coast, and killed a helpless wheelchair-bound victim. Six capital punishment jurisdictions, Arkansas, Delaware, Illinois, Tennessee, Wyoming and the federal government, have sought to curb violence against handicapped persons by making the murder of a physically handicapped person a statutory aggravating circumstance. If evidence at the penalty phase establishes the victim was physically handicapped, the death penalty may be imposed by the jury. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Hands Off Cain Hands Off Cain (HOC) is a nonprofit organization that was founded in Brussels at the European Parliament in 1993. The organization was founded for the abolition of the death penalty worldwide. HOC engages in international campaigns against the death penalty. Its work includes lobbying government organs to introduce legislation to abolish the death penalty. HOC also provides support and coordinates the activities of local, national, and international organizations, whose objective is to eliminate the death penalty from legal systems throughout the world.

Hanging The common law accepted death by hanging as a legitimate method of execution. Hanging has also been a traditional part of Anglo-American jurisprudence as a result of its common law lineage. The American colonists used hanging as a form of punishment and the practice continued after the American Revolution.

Hanging Jurisdictions: Only three capital punishment jurisdictions employ hanging as a method of execution. Washington provides hanging as an option for all capital felons. Delaware designated hanging as the method of execution in the event its primary method is found unconstitutional. New Hampshire utilizes hanging in the event its primary method of execution cannot be used for any reason.

Constitutionality of Hanging: The constitutionality of execution by hanging was addressed in dicta by the United States Supreme Court in Wilkerson v. Utah, 99 U.S. 130 (1878). The decision in Wilkerson was directly concerned with the constitution-ality of death by firing squad. However, the Supreme Court discussed hanging by analogy as a constitutionally acceptable method of execution. In the relatively recent decision of Campbell v. Wood, 18 F.3d 662 (1994), it was indicated on the merits that hanging did not violate the Constitution. However, in Rupe v. Wood, 863 F.Supp. 1307 (W.D.Wash. 1994), it was held that hanging was unconstitutional as a method of execution for the defendant in that case because there was a substantial likelihood that he would be decapitated if hung, due to his weight (in excess of 400 pounds).

EXECUTIONS PERFORMED BY HANGING 1976–OCTOBER 2006

Two principal arguments are waged in opposition to hanging as a method of execution. First, there is a risk that death will occur as a result of asphyxiation. This will happen if the execution is not properly done. Death by asphyxiation is slow and painful. As a result of the risk of asphyxiation and its attendant slow and agonizing pain, some commentators argue that hanging should be prohibited as a method of execution.

The second, and most profound, argument against hanging is that there is a risk of decapitation. If the hanging is done improperly, the head of a capital felon could be torn from its trunk during the process. While decapitation was accepted and practiced under the common law as a method of execution, it has not been accepted by Anglo-American jurisprudence. Anti-hanging proponents contend that because of the risk of decapitation, hanging should not be used as a method of execution.

Hanging Protocol: Hanging has evolved as a method of execution. The early gallows are not like those used today. In the past the gallows was nothing more than a large tree from which the condemned prisoner was hung. In time the tree was replaced by an outdoor scaffold from which the condemned prisoner would be dropped.

Under modern capital punishment, hanging is now performed inside of a prison building. A special room with a trapdoor and a ceiling fixture for a rope is used. The condemned prisoner is positioned on the trapdoor. The legs and arms of the condemned are fastened by restraints, and a hood placed over his or her head. If necessary (when a condemned has fainted), a metal frame is used to hold the condemned prisoner's body erect. A rope is lowered from the ceiling and placed around the condemned prisoner's neck. A button is then pushed to release the trapdoor and the condemned prisoner is dropped to his or her death.

When done correctly, the force of the drop and the stop caused by the length of the rope breaks the bones in the capital felon's neck and severs the spinal cord, causing him or her to go into shock and be rendered unconscious. At this point, the capital felon strangles to death.

In carrying out a hanging, the force of the drop is critical. The weight of the capital felon determines the force of the drop. Generally, the heavier the person is, the shorter the drop; and the lighter the person is, the longer the drop. A drop that is of too short a distance will result in the spinal cord not being severed and, in turn, the capital felon will not go into shock and will be conscious during the strangulation period. A drop that is too long a distance will result in decapitation. See also Execution Option Jurisdictions; Methods of Execution

Issue Presented: Whether incriminating statements made by the defendant to a magistrate during a preliminary hearing were admissible at trial.

Case Holding: Incriminating statements made by the defendant to a magistrate during a preliminary hearing were admissible at trial because the statements were voluntary and made after the defendant was warned against making any statements.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Fred Hardy, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that it was error for the trial court to allow into evidence written and oral incriminating statements he made to a magistrate during his preliminary hearing. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer held that the incriminating statements made by the defendant were voluntary and admissible against him at trial. The opinion set out the Court's reasoning as follows:

So the question is whether voluntary statements made by a defendant before and after a preliminary examination are inadmissible in evidence because [they were] made to the magistrate who in fact conducted the preliminary examination. We know of no rule of evidence which excludes such testimony. Of course, statements which are obtained by coercion or threat or promise will be subject to objection. But, so far from anything of that kind appearing, the defendant was cautioned that he was under no obligations to make a statement; that it would be used against him if he made one, and that there was a proper time for him to make one if he so desired. Without even a suggestion, he insisted on making, prior to the examination, a statement which was reduced to writing and by him signed and sworn to, and after the examination was over and he had been placed in jail, he had an interview with the magistrate and volunteered a further statement. Affirmatively and fully it appears that all that he said in the matter was said voluntarily, without any inducement or influence of any kind being brought to bear upon him.... The statements were properly admitted in evidence.

The judgment of the federal trial court was affirmed. See also Right to Remain Silent

Harlan, John M. John M. Harlan served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1877 to 1911. While on the Supreme Court, Harlan was known as a liberal interpreter of the Constitution, particularly in the undeveloped area of civil rights.

Harlan was born on June 1, 1833, in Boyle County, Kentucky. After graduating from Centre College, Harlan studied law at Transylvania University. In 1853, he was admitted to the bar in Kentucky. Harlan maintained a private practice until the Civil War broke out. During the war, he was lieutenant colonel in Union Army. After the war ended, Harlan resumed his legal practice. In 1877, President Rutherford B. Hayes nominated Harlan to the Supreme Court.

Harlan wrote numerous capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. His capital punishment writings provided mature constitutional reasoning that swung between moderate and liberal. For example, in Hurtado v. California, Harlan dissented from the majority's decision to allow States to prosecute capital offenses without use of a grand jury indictment. Harlan argued that due process of law prohibited prosecution of capital crimes without an indictment. In Holden v. Minnesota, Harlan wrote an opinion for the Court where he held that the Constitution did not bar enforcement of a death penalty statute that was repealed and reenacted after the date of the defendant's crime, but did not alter the substantive law existing at the time of the crime. In Neal v. Delaware, Harlan reversed a capital conviction on the grounds that the defendant established that Delaware officials implemented the State's jury laws in such a manner as to systematically exclude African Americans from all jury service. Harlan died on October 14, 1911.

Harlan, John M., II John M. Harlan II (grandson of former Justice Harlan) served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1955 to 1971. While on the Supreme Court, Harlan was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution.

Harlan was born in Chicago, Illinois, on May 20, 1899. He graduated from Princeton University in 1920. He subsequently studied abroad at Oxford University on a Rhodes Scholarship. Upon returning to the United States, Harlan enrolled in New York Law School, where he graduated in 1924. Harlan worked in private practice before taking a job as a federal attorney. Through political connections, Harlan was able to obtain President Dwight D. Eisenhower's nomination for the Supreme Court. The nomination occurred in 1954 and Senate confirmation followed in 1955.

Harlan wrote a number of capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. His opinions were consistent in being conservative approaches to the Constitution. For example, in Brady v. Maryland, Harlan dissented from the majority's decision to find that the defendant was entitled to a new sentencing hearing. Harlan argued that the issue was not properly before the Court and should have been sent back for resolution for the courts of Maryland. In Boykin v. Alabama, Harlan dissented from the majority's decision to require trial records affirmatively show that a defendant voluntarily entered a guilty plea. Harlan argued that the Court was wrong to constitutionalize such a requirement. Harlan died on December 29, 1971.

Harmless Error Rule Harmless error analysis is a standard of review used for determining the prejudicial impact of a constitutional error affecting a conviction or sentence in a case. The harmless error rule provides that any error, defect, irregularity, or variance which does not affect substantial rights of a defendant shall be disregarded. Under this rule, if the prosecutor can prove beyond a reasonable doubt that a constitutional error did not contribute to the verdict, the error is harmless and the verdict may stand. *See also Calderon v. Issue Presented: Whether Alabama's capital sentencing statute is unconstitutional because it does not specify the weight the judge must give to the jury's recommendation.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not require the State to define the weight the sentencing judge must give to an advisory jury verdict.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Louise Harris, was convicted by an Alabama jury of capital murder. Under Alabama law, capital sentencing authority is in the trial judge, but requires the judge to consider an advisory jury verdict. The penalty phase jury recommended that the defendant be imprisoned for life without parole, but the trial judge sentenced her to death upon concluding that the statutory aggravating circumstance found and considered outweighed all of the mitigating circumstances. The Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that Alabama's capital sentencing statute is unconstitutional because it does not specify the weight the judge must give to the jury's recommendation and thus permits the arbitrary imposition of the death penalty. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the defendant's constitutional claim.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor noted that prior precedent of the Court held that the Constitution permits the trial judge, acting alone, to impose a capital sentence. Therefore, it was reasoned, the Constitution is not offended when a State further requires the judge to consider a jury recommendation and trusts the judge to give it the proper weight. The opinion ruled that the hallmark of the analysis is not the particular weight a State chooses to place upon the jury's advice, but whether the scheme adequately channels the sentencer's discretion so as to prevent arbitrary results. It was said that the Constitution should not be used to micromanage tasks that properly rest within the State's discretion in administering its criminal justice system.

The opinion found unpersuasive statistical evidence demonstrating that there have been only five cases in which an Alabama judge rejected an advisory verdict of death, compared to forty-seven instances where the judge imposed a death sentence over a jury recommendation of life. It was said that these numbers do not tell the whole story because they do not indicate how many cases in which a jury recommendation of life that was adopted would have ended differently had the judge not been required to consider the jury's advice. The opinion continued its reasoning and indicated that the statistics say little about whether the Alabama scheme is constitutional, a question which turns not solely on numerical tabulations of sentences, but rather on whether the punishment imposed is the result of properly guided discretion. Accordingly, the opinion affirmed the judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court.

tencing statute is unique. In Alabama, unlike any other State in the Union, the trial judge has unbridled discretion to sentence the defendant to death — even though a jury has determined that death is an inappropriate penalty, and even though no basis exists for believing that any other reasonable, properly instructed jury would impose a death sentence.” In view of the discretion given trial judges by Alabama’s death penalty statute, Justice Stevens indicated he “would conclude that the complete absence of standards to guide the judge’s consideration of the jury’s verdict renders the statute invalid under the Eighth Amendment and the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.”

Justice Stevens believed that “total reliance on judges to pronounce sentences of death is constitutionally unacceptable.” He concluded: “The Court today casts a cloud over the legitimacy of our capital sentencing jurisprudence. The most credible justification for the death penalty is its expression of the community’s outrage. To permit the state to execute a woman in spite of the community’s considered judgment that she should not die is to sever the death penalty from its only legitimate mooring. The absence of any rudder on a judge’s free-floating power to negate the community’s will, in my judgment, renders Alabama’s capital sentencing scheme fundamentally unfair and results in cruel and unusual punishment. I therefore respectfully dissent.” See also Binding/Nonbinding Jury Sentencing Determination; Spaziano v. Florida

Harris v. South Carolina Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Harris v. South Carolina, 338 U.S. 68 (1949); Argued: November 16, 1948; Decided: June 27, 1949; Plurality Opinion: Justice Frankfurter announced the Court’s judgment and delivered an opinion, in which Murphy and Rutledge, JJ., joined; Concurring Opinion: Justice Douglas; Concurring Statement: Justice Black; Dissenting Opinion: Justice Jackson; Dissenting Statement: Chief Justice Vinson and Reed and Burton, JJ.; Appellate Defense Counsel: Julian B. Issue Presented: Whether the defendant’s confession was obtained in violation of due process of law and thereby invalidated his conviction and death sentence.

Case Holding: The defendant’s confession was obtained in violation of due process of law; therefore, his conviction and death sentence were invalid.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Harris, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of South Carolina. The South Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant’s contention that his confession was obtained under circumstances which precluded its admission under the Due Process Clause of the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Frankfurter Announced the Court’s Judgment and in Which Murphy and Rutledge, JJ., Joined: Justice Frankfurter outlined the following facts regarding the arrest of the defendant. It was said that the defendant was not informed of his rights under South Carolina law, such as the right to secure a lawyer, the right to request a preliminary hearing, or the right to remain silent. The opinion observed that the confession did not contain the usual statement that he was told that what he said might be used against him. Justice Frankfurter indicated that during the whole period of interrogation by the police, the defendant was denied the benefit of consultation with family and friends. The opinion also found relevant the fact that the defendant was illiterate. Under these facts, the opinion found the confession was not voluntarily given. Justice Frankfurter concluded:

The trial judge in his charge told the jury that without the confession there was no evidence which would support a conviction and instructed them that they could consider the confession only if they found it to have been “voluntary.” Upon appeal, the highest court of the State made a conscientious effort to measure the circumstances under which [the defendant’s] confession was made against the circumstances surrounding confessions which we have held to be the product of undue pressure. It concluded that this confession was not so tainted. We are constrained to disagree. The systematic persistence of interrogation, the length of the periods of questioning, the failure to advise the [defendant] of his rights, the absence of friends or disinterested persons, and the character of the defendant constitute a complex of circumstances which invokes the same considerations which compelled our decisions in Watts v. Indiana. The judgment is accordingly reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Douglas: Justice Douglas concurred in the Court’s judgment. He found the conditions of the defendant’s interrogation to be offensive to the Constitution. His concurring opinion outlined the details of the interrogations the defendant was subjected to, before he “broke” and confessed to the crime. Justice Douglas concluded:

These interrogations had been held in a small room, eight feet by eleven. Small groups of different officers conducted these interrogations, which went on and on in the heat of the days and nights. But during this time [the defendant] was denied counsel and access to family and friends.

This is another illustration of the use by the police of the custody of an accused to wring a confession from him. The confession so obtained from literate and illiterate alike should [be] condemned.

Concurring Statement by Justice Black: Justice Black issued a statement indicating he concurred in the Court’s judgment.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Jackson: Justice Jackson dissented from the Court’s decision in the case. He referenced to his concurring and dissenting opinion written in a companion case, Watts v. Indiana, as the basis for his dissent. In Watts, Justice Jackson wrote that he believed involuntary confessions were not invalid under the Constitution. He believed such confessions assured the accuracy of convictions. Justice Jackson reasoned as follows in the dissenting part of his Watts opinion: “The seriousness of the Court’s judgment is that no one suggests that any course held promise of solution of these murders other than to take the suspect into custody for questioning. The alternative was to close the books on the crime and forget it, with the suspect at large. This is a grave choice for a society in which two-thirds of the murders already are closed out as insoluble.”

Dissenting Statement by Chief Justice Vinson and Reed and Burton, JJ.: Chief Justice Vinson and Justices Reed and Burton issued a joint statement indicating they dissented from the Court’s decision and believed the judgment should be affirmed.

Case Note: This case was one of three cases decided by the Court, on the same day, involving involuntary confessions. In each of the cases, the Court applied due process principals to invalidate the capital convictions. In subsequent decades, the Court applied the Fifth Amendment right to remain silent to review claims from State prisoners that their confessions were involuntary. See also Right to Remain Silent; Turner v. Pennsylvania; Watts v. Indiana

Hawaii The death penalty is not carried out by the State of Hawaii. There have been no executions in the state of Hawaii since its entry into the United States.

Hearsay Hearsay is a legal technical term that means a statement, other than one made by a declarant while testifying at trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted by the statement. Under Anglo-American jurisprudence, hearsay is generally not allowed at a trial or hearing. The basis of the hearsay exclusion is that the opposing party will not have had an opportunity to cross-examine the declarant making the out-of-court statement. Thus, the veracity of an out-of-court statement is deemed questionable.

In capital prosecutions, the hearsay rule is followed by all jurisdictions during the guilt phase. However, jurisdictions are split on the admissibility of hearsay during the penalty phase. Some jurisdictions generally permit hearsay at the penalty phase, while others apply the hearsay rule at the penalty phase. See also Carver v. United States; Cook v. United States; Green v. Georgia; Hearsay Exceptions; Lilly v. Virginia

Hearsay Exceptions The general rule barring hearsay evidence from a trial or hearing has exceptions. There are two general categories of exceptions to the hearsay: (A) availability of declarant immaterial and (B) declarant unavailable. The exceptions to hearsay contained in the Federal Rules of Evidence, as shown below, represent the two general categories of exceptions which are followed by all jurisdictions.

A. The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:

1. Present sense impression. A statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition or immediately thereafter.

2. Excited utterance. A statement relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition.

3. Then existing mental, emotional, or physical condition. A statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition such as intent, plan, motive, design, mental feeling, pain, and bodily health, but not including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the execution, revocation, identification, or terms of declarant's will.

4. Statements for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment.

5. Recorded recollection. A memorandum or record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge but now has insufficient recollection to enable the witness to testify fully and accurately, shown to have been made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness's memory and to reflect that knowledge correctly. If admitted, the memorandum or record may be read into evidence but may not itself be received as an exhibit unless offered by an adverse party.

6. Records of regularly conducted activity. A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" as used in this paragraph includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.

7. Absence of entry in records properly kept. Evidence that a matter is not included in the memoranda reports, records, or data compilations, in any form, properly kept, to prove the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of the matter, if the matter was of a kind of which a memorandum, report, record, or data compilation was regularly made and preserved, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

8. Public records and reports. Records, reports, statements, or data compilations, in any form, of public offices or agencies, setting forth (i) the activities of the office or agency, or (ii) matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report, excluding, however, in criminal cases matters observed by police officers and other law enforcement personnel, or (iii) in civil actions and proceedings and against the government in criminal cases, factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law, unless the sources of information or other circumstances indicate lack of trustworthiness.

9. Records of vital statistics. Records or data compilations, in any form, of births, fetal deaths, deaths, or marriages, if the report thereof was made to a public office pursuant to requirements of law.

10. Absence of public record or entry. To prove the absence of a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, or the nonoccurrence or nonexistence of a matter of which a record, report, statement, or data compilation, in any form, was regularly made and preserved by a public office or agency, evidence in the form of a certification, or testimony, that diligent search failed to disclose the record, report, statement, or data compilation, or entry.

11. Records of religious organizations. Statements of births, marriages, divorces, deaths, legitimacy, ancestry, relationship by blood or marriage, or other similar facts of personal or family history, contained in a regularly kept record of a religious organization.

12. Marriage, baptismal, and similar certificates. Statements of fact contained in a certificate that the maker performed a marriage or other ceremony or administered a sacrament, made by a clergyman, public official, or other person authorized by the rules or practices of a religious organization or by law to perform the act certified, and purporting to have been issued at the time of the act or within a reasonable time thereafter.

13. Family records. Statements of fact concerning personal or family history contained in family Bibles, genealogies, charts, engravings on rings, inscriptions on family portraits, engravings on urns, crypts, or tombstones, or the like.

14. Records of documents affecting an interest in property. The record of a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property, as proof of the content of the original recorded document and its execution and delivery by each person by whom it purports to have been executed, if the record is a record of a public office and an applicable statute authorizes the recording of documents of that kind in that office.

15. Statements in documents affecting an interest in property. A statement contained in a document purporting to establish or affect an interest in property if the matter stated was relevant to the purpose of the document, unless dealings with the property since the document was made have been inconsistent with the truth of the statement or the purport of the document.

16. Statements in ancient documents. Statements in a document in existence twenty years or more, the authenticity of which is established.

17. Market reports, commercial publications. Market quotations, tabulations, lists, directories, or other published compilations, generally used and relied upon by the public or by persons in particular occupations.

18. Learned treatises. To the extent called to the attention of an expert witness upon cross-examination or relied upon by the expert witness in direct examination, statements contained in published treatises, periodicals, or pamphlets on a subject of history, medicine, or other science or art, established as a reliable authority by the testimony or admission of the witness or by other expert testimony or by judicial notice. If admitted, the statements may be read into evidence but may not be received as exhibits.

19. Reputation concerning personal or family history. Reputation among members of a person's family by blood, adoption, or marriage, or among a person's associates, or in the community, concerning a person's birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, death, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history.

20. Reputation concerning boundaries or general history. Reputation in a community, arising before the controversy, as to boundaries of or customs affecting lands in the community, and reputation as to events of general history important to the community or State or nation in which located.

21. Reputation as to character. Reputation of a person's character among associates or in the community.

22. Judgment of previous conviction. Evidence of a final judgment, entered after a trial or upon a plea of guilty but not upon a plea of nolo contendere, adjudging a person guilty of a crime punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment, but not including, when offered by the Government in a criminal prosecution for purposes other than impeachment, judgments against persons other than the accused. The pendency of an appeal may be shown but does not affect admissibility.

23. Judgment as to personal, family or general history, or boundaries. Judgments as proof of matters of personal, family or general history, or boundaries, essential to the judgment, if the same would be provable by evidence of reputation.

B. The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule if the declarant is unavailable as a witness:

1. Former testimony. Testimony given as a witness at another hearing of the same or a different proceeding, or in a deposition taken in compliance with law in the course of the same or another proceeding, if the party against whom the testimony is now offered, or, in a civil action or proceeding, a predecessor in interest, had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination.

2. Statement under belief of impending death. In a prosecution for homicide or in a civil action or proceeding, a statement made by a declarant while believing that the declarant's death was imminent, concerning the cause or circumstances of what the declarant believed to be impending death.

3. Statement against interest. A statement which was at the time of its making so far contrary to the declarant's pecuniary or proprietary interest, or so far tended to subject the declarant to civil or criminal liability, or to render invalid a claim by the declarant against another, that a reasonable person in the declarant's position would not have made the statement unless believing it to be true. A statement tending to expose the declarant to criminal liability and offered to exculpate the accused is not admissible unless corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement.

4. Statement of personal or family history. A statement concerning the declarant's own birth, adoption, marriage, divorce, legitimacy, relationship by blood, adoption, or marriage, ancestry, or other similar fact of personal or family history, even though declarant had no means of acquiring personal knowledge of the matter stated; or a statement concerning the foregoing matters, and death also, of another person, if the declarant was related to the other by blood, adoption, or marriage or was so intimately associated with the other's family as to be likely to have accurate information concerning the matter declared.

Issue Presented: Whether the Double Jeopardy Clause bars Alabama from trying the defendant for the capital offense of murder during a kidnapping after Georgia convicted him of murder based on the same homicide.

Case Holding: Successive prosecutions by two States for the same conduct are not barred by the Double Jeopardy Clause.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: In August 1981, the defendant, Larry Gene Heath, hired two men to kill his wife. In accordance with the defendant's plan, the two men kidnapped his wife from her home in Alabama. The murdered body of the defendant's wife was later found on the side of a road in Georgia. The defendant was prosecuted for murder by Georgia and he pled guilty to murder in a Georgia trial court in exchange for a sentence of life imprisonment. Subsequently, the defendant was tried and convicted of capital murder and was sentenced to death in an Alabama trial court. The Alabama Court of Criminal Appeals and the Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, both appellate courts rejected the defendant's claim that double jeopardy principles prohibited Alabama from prosecuting him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the double jeopardy claim.

Opinion of the Court by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor wrote that under the dual sovereignty doctrine, successive prosecutions by two States for the same conduct are not barred by the Double Jeopardy Clause; therefore, Alabama was not barred from prosecuting the defendant.

The opinion explained the dual sovereignty doctrine as follows. The dual sovereignty doctrine provides that when a defendant in a single act violates the law of two sovereign jurisdictions, he or she has committed two distinct offenses for double jeopardy purposes. It was said that, in applying the doctrine, the crucial determination is whether the two entities that seek successively to prosecute a defendant for the same course of conduct can be termed separate sovereigns. This determination turns on whether the prosecuting jurisdictions' powers to undertake criminal prosecutions derive from separate and independent sources. The opinion noted that it has been uniformly held that the States are separate sovereigns with respect to the federal government, because each State's power to prosecute derives from its inherent sovereignty. Thus, given the distinct sources of their powers to try a defendant, the opinion held that the States are no less sovereign with respect to each other than they are with respect to the federal government. The opinion affirmed the judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court.

Dissenting Opinion by Brennan: Justice Brennan wrote that he believed double jeopardy principles prohibited successive prosecutions by different sovereigns for the same conduct. He would, therefore, have reversed the judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court.

Dissenting Opinion by Marshall: Justice Marshall argued that the dual sovereignty doctrine permitted the federal government and a State to prosecute a defendant for the same conduct. He drew a line there, however. Justice Marshall wrote: "The 'dual sovereignty' doctrine, heretofore used to permit federal and state prosecutions for the same offense, was born of the need to accommodate complementary state and federal concerns within our system of concurrent territorial jurisdictions. It cannot justify successive prosecutions by different States."

The dissent reasoned as follows: "Where two States seek to prosecute the same defendant for the same crime in two separate proceedings, the justifications found in the federal-state context for an exemption from double jeopardy constraints simply do not hold.... Thus, in contrast to the federal-state context, barring the second prosecution would still permit one government to act upon the broad range of sovereign concerns that have been reserved to the States by the Constitution. The compelling need in the federal-state context to subordinate double jeopardy concerns is thus considerably diminished in cases involving successive prosecutions by different States." Therefore, Justice Marshall would reverse the judgment of the Alabama Supreme Court. See also Dual Sovereignty

Issue Presented: The extent to which determinations by the FDA not to exercise its enforcement authority over the use of drugs used in carrying out the death penalty may be judicially reviewed.

Case Holding: The FDA's decision not to exercise its enforcement authority over the use of drugs used in carrying out the death penalty is not judicially reviewable.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The respondents in the case were prisoners who were convicted of capital offenses and sentenced to death by lethal injection of drugs. The respondents filed a claim with the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), alleging that use of the drugs to execute the death penalty violated federal law. The respondents requested that the FDA take enforcement action to prevent such violations. The FDA refused the request. The respondents then filed a suit in a federal district court against the petitioner, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, making the same claim and seeking the same enforcement actions. The district court dismissed the suit on the grounds that federal law did not indicate a congressional intent to make the FDA's enforcement discretion reviewable by courts. A federal Court of Appeals reversed. The appellate court indicated that federal law only precluded judicial review of federal agency action when it is precluded by statute or is committed to agency discretion by law. It was said that the FDA's refusal to take enforcement action was reviewable by courts. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the matter.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Rehnquist: Justice Rehnquist observed that under federal law, judicial review of an administrative agency's decision is not allowed, if the enabling statute of the agency is written so that a court would have no meaningful standard against which to judge the agency's exercise of discretion. In such a situation, the opinion said, the enabling statute can be taken to have committed the decision making to the agency's judgment absolutely.

Justice Rehnquist ruled that an agency's decision not to take enforcement action is presumed immune from judicial review. Accordingly, such a decision is unreviewable unless Congress has indicated an intent to circumscribe agency enforcement discretion and has provided meaningful standards for defining the limits of that discretion. The opinion concluded: "The fact that the drugs involved in this case are ultimately to be used in imposing the death penalty must not lead this Court or other courts to import profound differences of opinion over the meaning of the Eighth Amendment to the United States Constitution into the domain of administrative law." The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan wrote in concurrence that he agreed with the ruling that individual decisions of the FDA not to take enforcement action in response to citizen requests are presumptively not reviewable. He added: "This general presumption is based on the view that, in the normal course of events, Congress intends to allow broad discretion for its administrative agencies to make particular enforcement decisions, and there often may not exist readily discernible 'law to apply' for courts to conduct judicial review of nonenforcement decisions."

Concurring Opinion by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall concurred in the Court's judgment, but disapproved of its reasoning. He wrote: "[T]he 'presumption of unreviewability' announced today is a product of that lack of discipline that easy cases make all too easy.... [T]his 'presumption of unreviewability' is fundamentally at odds with rule-of-law principles firmly embedded in our jurisprudence." As an alternative reason for the Court's judgment, Justice Marshall wrote that the basis for the decision should be "that refusals to enforce, like other agency actions, are reviewable in the absence of a 'clear and convincing' congressional intent to the contrary, but that such refusals warrant deference when, as in this case, there is nothing to suggest that an agency with enforcement discretion has abused that discretion." Heinous, Atrocious, Cruel, or Depraved Aggravator

Half of all capital punishment jurisdictions have designated murder that is heinous, atrocious, cruel, or depraved as a statutory aggravating circumstance. When this conduct is established at the penalty phase, a death sentence may be imposed. Appellate courts have consistently reversed death sentences, however, when this aggravator has been used without a qualifying definition being given for its terms. Acceptable definitions have included the following: Cruelty refers to the infliction of pain and suffering in a wanton, insensitive, or vindictive manner. Heinous and depraved refer to the mental state and attitude of a capital felon, such as acting in a cold-blooded manner. Atrocious refers to torture or serious physical abuse of the victim. Henderson, Cathy Lynn In late January 1994, the television show America's Most Wanted profiled Cathy Lynn Henderson as a person wanted for kidnapping. Airing photographs of Henderson nationwide helped authorities locate and arrest her in Missouri. The kidnapping charge, however, expanded to include murder.

Henderson was born in Missouri on December 27, 1946. She eventually moved to Texas, where she resided Travis County. Henderson hired herself out as a babysitter. On January 21, 1994, a couple left their three-month-old son with Henderson. The baby was never seen alive again. Henderson mysteriously disappeared with the child on the same day he was left with her.

As a result of being profiled on America's Most Wanted, Henderson was identified in several states as she drove to Missouri. On February 1, Henderson was arrested by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Kansas City, Missouri. Henderson informed authorities that she accidentally dropped the baby on his head and caused his death. She stated that she panicked and buried the body in a wooded area near Waco, Texas, before fleeing to Missouri. The child's dead body was eventually found; he had sustained a fractured skull.

In May 1995, Henderson was convicted of capital murder by a Travis County jury and sentenced to death. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment. Henderson is on death row in Texas. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Issue Presented: Whether federal habeas relief was available to the defendant on the basis of alleged newly discovered evidence of actual innocence ten years after the defendant was convicted.

Case Holding: Claims of actual innocence based on newly discovered evidence have never been held to state a ground for federal habeas relief, absent an independent constitutional violation occurring in the course of the underlying State criminal proceedings.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Texas convicted the defendant, Leonel Torres Herrera, of capital murder in the death of two police officers. The defendant was sentenced to death. The defendant unsuccessfully sought post-conviction relief in State and federal courts. Ten years after his convictions, the defendant filed a second federal habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. His ground for relief was that newly discovered evidence demonstrated that he was actually innocent of the murders and that his deceased brother killed the victims. The district court granted a stay of execution so that the defendant could present his actual innocence claim and supporting evidence in a State court. A federal Court of Appeals vacated the stay and held that the defendant's claim was not cognizable in a federal habeas proceeding. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Rehnquist: The chief justice ruled that the defendant's claim of actual innocence did not entitle him to federal habeas relief. The opinion found that the defendant's constitutional claim for relief based upon his newly discovered evidence of innocence must be evaluated in light of the previous ten years of proceedings in the case. It was said that where a defendant has been afforded a fair trial and convicted of the offense for which he or she was charged, the constitutional presumption of innocence disappears. The opinion ruled that federal habeas courts do not sit to correct errors of fact, but to ensure that individuals are not imprisoned in violation of the Constitution. Thus, claims of actual innocence based on newly discovered evidence have never been held to state a ground for federal habeas relief, absent an independent constitutional violation occurring in the course of the underlying State criminal proceedings.

The chief justice indicated it was inapplicable to the case that the rule that a defendant, subject to defenses of abusive or successive use of the habeas writ, may have his or her federal constitutional claim considered on the merits of if he or she makes a proper showing of actual innocence. It was reasoned that the defendant did not seek relief from a procedural error so that he may bring an independent constitutional claim challenging his conviction or sentence, but rather, he argued that he is entitled to habeas relief because new evidence shows that his conviction is factually incorrect. The opinion said that to allow a federal court to grant him typical habeas relief would, in effect, require a new trial ten years after the first trial, not because of any constitutional violation at the first trial, but simply because of a belief that, in light of his newly found evidence, a jury might find him not guilty at a second trial.

The chief justice noted that the defendant was not left without a forum to raise his actual innocence claim. It was said that he may file a request for clemency under Texas law, which contains specific guidelines for pardons on the ground of innocence. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which Kennedy, J., Joined: Justice O'Connor concurred in the Court's opinion and judgment. She wrote separately to underscore her belief that the defendant was not actually innocent. She wrote as follows:

As the Court explains, [the defendant] is not innocent in the eyes of the law.... He was tried before a jury of his peers, with the full panoply of protections that our Constitution affords criminal defendants. At the conclusion of that trial, the jury found [him] guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. [The defendant] therefore does not appear before us as an innocent man on the verge of execution. He is instead a legally guilty one who, refusing to accept the jury's verdict, demands a hearing in which to have his culpability determined once again.

Consequently, the issue before us is not whether a State can execute the innocent. It is, as the Court notes, whether a fairly convicted and therefore legally guilty person is constitutionally entitled to yet another judicial proceeding in which to adjudicate his guilt anew, 10 years after conviction, notwithstanding his failure to demonstrate that constitutional error infected his trial. In most circumstances, that question would answer itself in the negative. Our society has a high degree of confidence in its criminal trials, in no small part because the Constitution offers unparalleled protections against convicting the innocent.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia, in Which Thomas, J., Joined: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's opinion and judgment. He wrote separately to voice his disagreement with the dissenting opinion in the case. Justice Scalia wrote:

We granted certiorari on the question whether it violates due process or constitutes cruel and unusual punishment for a State to execute a person who, having been convicted of murder after a full and fair trial, later alleges that newly discovered evidence shows him to be "actually innocent." I would have preferred to decide that question, particularly since, as the Court's discussion shows, it is perfectly clear what the answer is: There is no basis in text, tradition, or even in contemporary practice (if that were enough) for finding in the Constitution a right to demand judicial consideration of newly discovered evidence of innocence brought forward after conviction. In saying that such a right exists, the dissenters apply nothing but their personal opinions to invalidate the rules of more than two thirds of the States, and a Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure for which this Court itself is responsible. If the system that has been in place for 200 years (and remains widely approved) "shock[s]" the dissenters' consciences, perhaps they should doubt the calibration of their consciences, or, better still, the usefulness of "conscience shocking" as a legal test.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White: Justice White concurred in the Court's judgment. He indicated that he believed the defendant's claim, in and of itself, was not precluded from review by a federal court. Justice White found that the defendant failed to make a minimal showing that would entitle him to have a federal court address the merits of his claim. He wrote: "To be entitled to relief, [the defendant] would, at the very least, be required to show that, based on proffered newly discovered evidence and the entire record before the jury that convicted him, 'no rational trier of fact could [find] proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.' For the reasons stated in the Court's opinion, [the defendant's] showing falls far short of satisfying even that standard, and I therefore concur in the judgment."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Blackmun, in Which Stevens and Souter, JJ., Joined: Justice Blackmun dissented from the Court's disposition of the case. He believed that the defendant's claim was cognizable in federal court on its merits. Justice Blackmun wrote:

Nothing could be more contrary to contemporary standards of degency, or more shocking to the conscience, than to execute a person who is actually innocent.

I therefore must disagree with the long and general discussion that precedes the Court's disposition of this case.... Because I believe that, in the first instance, the District Court should decide whether [the defendant] is entitled to a hearing and whether he is entitled to relief on the merits of his claim, I would reverse the order of the Court of Appeals and remand this case for further proceedings in the District Court.

Issue Presented: Whether the trial court erroneously instructed the jury on the defense of self-defense.

Case Holding: The trial court erroneously instructed the jury on the defense of self-defense by informing the jury that the defense was inapplicable if the crime occurred without reflection and meditation.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Sam Hickory, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the United States. The victim of the crime was a United States deputy marshal, who had attempted to arrest the defendant. The defendant appealed the judgment to the United States Supreme Court, on the grounds that the trial court erroneously instructed the jury on the defense of self-defense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that the instruction given by the trial court on self-defense was improper. The instruction given by the trial court told the jury that "while premeditation may exist in a criminal sense upon the conception of an instant, the conclusion to kill in self-defense must be arrived at upon more serious deliberation, or it furnishes no excuse." The chief justice pointed out that, "in the matter of self-defense, the deliberation of the slayer in respect of the greatness of the necessity to protect himself from death or great bodily harm, if material, would also be sufficient, although the conclusion to kill was arrived at instantaneously. The swiftness of thought in the latter case would no more exclude the element of deliberation than in the former, and whether the act was excusable or not could only be determined by all the facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence." It was said that the instruction given by the trial court was tantamount to telling the jury not to consider the evidence of self-defense. The opinion concluded: "In short, whether or not a particular homicide is committed in repulsion of an attack, and, if so, justifiably, are questions of fact, not necessarily dependent upon the duration or quality of the reflection by which the act may have been preceded." The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

Issue Presented: Whether it was error for the trial court to instruct the jury to presume the defendant's guilt from testimony of his concealment of crime scene evidence.

Case Holding: It was error for the trial court to instruct the jury to presume the defendant's guilt from testimony of his concealment of crime scene evidence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Sam Hickory, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder by the United States. The defendant appealed the judgment to the United States Supreme Court and the case was reversed and a new trial awarded. At the second trial, the defendant was again convicted and sentenced to death. The defendant appealed again, alleging that the trial court improperly instructed the jury to infer his guilt from testimony of his concealment of crime scene evidence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White held that the trial court's instruction on flight created an erroneous presumption of guilt. The opinion reasoned as follows:

[The instruction] magnified and distorted the proving power of the facts on the subject of the concealment; it made the weight of the evidence depend not so much on the concealment itself as on the manner in which it was done. Considering the entire context of the charge, it practically instructed that the facts were ... conclusive proof of guilt. The statement that no one who was conscious of innocence would resort to concealment was substantially an instruction that all men who did so were necessarily guilty, thus ignoring the fundamental truth, evolved from the experience of mankind, that the innocent do often conceal through fear or other emotion.... Putting this language, in connection with the epithets applied to the acts of concealment and the vituperation which the charge contains, it is justly to be deduced that its effect was to instruct that the defendant was a murderer, and therefore the only province of the jury was to return a verdict of guilty.

The judgment of the federal trial court was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. See also Hickory v. United States (I)

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution requires specific findings authorizing the imposition of the death sentence be made by a jury.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not require that specific findings authorizing the imposition of the death sentence be made by a jury.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Paul C. Hildwin, Jr., was indicted for and convicted of first-degree murder by a Florida court. During the penalty phase, the jury rendered a unanimous advisory sentence of death and the trial judge imposed the death sentence, finding four aggravating circumstances and nothing in mitigation. The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the sentence. In doing so, the court rejected the defendant's argument that Florida's sentencing scheme violated the Constitution because it permitted the imposition of death without a specific finding by the jury that sufficient aggravating circumstances exist to qualify the defendant for capital punishment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the matter.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: It was observed in the per curiam opinion that the Court had previously ruled that the Constitution does not require a jury be used during a capital penalty phase proceeding. Therefore, the opinion concluded, the Constitution does not require that the specific findings authorizing the imposition of the death sentence be made by a jury.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan repeated his fundamental belief "that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments." Therefore, he would have vacated the death sentence in this case.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall restated his longstanding belief "that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments." He would, therefore, have vacated the death sentence in this case. Justice Marshall also criticized the Court for treating the case in a summary disposition, rather than fully developing the defendant's claim.

Hill, Joe Joel Hagglund was born on October 7, 1879, in Gavle, Sweden. He immigrated to the United States in 1902 and changed his name to Joseph Hillstrom. Eventually, the name changed again to simply Joe Hill.

The name has become a legend in the American labor movement. Two things made this so. First, Hill was a prolific songwriter and wrote inspiring labor songs that are still sung today.

Joe Hill was executed by firing squad at the Utah State Prison on November 19, 1915. (Special Collections Dept., J. Willard Marriott Library, University of Utah)

Second, Hill was executed by the State of Utah for a murder that labor union members believe to this day was a frame-up designed to silence Hill's leadership.

When Hill landed on the shores of Ellis Island in 1902, he found that the dream of American prosperity was not reflected in reality. Life was hard, wages were low, and workers were without a voice. Hill traveled about the country, finding work where he could and writing songs about the struggle of workers as he went along.

In 1910, while in San Pedro, California, Hill joined a labor union called the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Over the next five years, Hill helped make IWW a strong organization through his labor songs. The idea caught on that the most effective way to get workers to unite was through songs that expressed their common plight. This formula proved to be successful for IWW.

While still maintaining his membership in IWW, Hill moved to Utah in 1913, where he found employment in the Park City mines near Murray, Utah. While in Utah, Hill continued his active role with IWW and recruited workers as he wrote them songs that spoke of a better tomorrow through unity.

In 1914, Hill's life took a turn for the worse. He was accused of the murder of a Salt Lake City storeowner named John A. Morrison. Hill was convicted of the crime and sentenced to death. An international battle was launched to prevent his execution. His supporters argued that he was the victim of an attempt by business owners to curtail the growing power of IWW. The voice of Hill's supporters caused President Woodrow Wilson twice to intervene in an attempt to prevent his execution. The American Federation of Labor and the Swedish government made valiant efforts to sway authorities in Utah. Hill's supporters failed. Hill was executed by firing squad at the Utah State Prison on November 19, 1915.

Hill's death did not silence his energy and belief in the labor movement. His most famous labor songs, "The Preacher and the Slave," "The Rebel Girl," and "Casey Jones," are still sung today. The labor movement went on to immortalize Hill in a song called "I Dreamed I Saw Joe Hill Last Night."

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant may file a civil rights complaint under § 1983, instead of a habeas corpus petition, to challenge the method used to impose lethal injection.

Case Holding: A defendant may file a civil rights complaint under § 1983, instead of a habeas corpus petition, in order to challenge the method used to impose lethal injection because such a challenge does not affect the underlying death sentence.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Florida convicted Clarence E. Hill of capital murder in 1981 and sentenced him to die. Hill's conviction and sentence were upheld on direct appeal. After filing unsuccessful State habeas corpus petitions challenging the judgment, Hill filed a federal habeas corpus petition. The federal habeas petition was denied. Hill eventually filed a civil rights complaint under § 1983, seeking to stop his execution by lethal injection on the grounds that the drugs used would not prevent him from feeling pain. The federal district court found that Hill's § 1983 complaint could not be used to challenge the method of execution. Consequently, the district court treated Hill's complaint as a petition for habeas relief. The district court then dismissed the petition as being barred by federal law, which prohibits successive habeas petitions. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy, writing for a unanimous Court, found that the decision of the Court of Appeals was in error. In the opinion, Justice Kennedy pointed out that in the case of Nelson v. Campbell, 541 U.S. 637 (2004), the Supreme Court had approved of using § 1983 to challenge the proposed surgical procedure that was necessary to carry out lethal injection on the inmate in that case. Justice Kennedy found that it was not logical to allow § 1983 to be used to challenge a surgical procedure used for carrying out lethal injection, but to deny its use for challenging the medications used. The opinion addressed the matter as follows:

In the case before us we conclude that Hill's § 1983 action is controlled by the holding in Nelson. Here, as in Nelson, Hill's action if successful would not necessarily prevent the State from executing him by lethal injection. The complaint does not challenge the lethal injection sentence as a general matter but seeks instead only to enjoin the respondents from executing [him] in the manner they currently intend. The specific objection is that the anticipated protocol allegedly causes a foreseeable risk of ... gratuitous and unnecessary pain. Hill concedes that other methods of lethal injection the Department could choose to use would be constitutional, and respondents do not contend, at least to this point in the litigation, that granting Hill's injunction would leave the State without any other practicable, legal method of executing Hill by lethal injection. Florida law, moreover, does not require the Department of Corrections to use the challenged procedure. Hill's challenge appears to leave the State free to use an alternative lethal injection procedure. Under these circumstances a grant of injunctive relief could not be seen as barring the execution of Hill's sentence.

As a result of the precedent established by Nelson, the decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant made out a prima facie case of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted him.

Case Holding: The defendant made out a prima facie case of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury that indicted him and the State of Texas failed to rebut the prima facie case; therefore, the defendant's conviction and sentence could not stand.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Hill, was convicted of rape and sentenced to death by the State of Texas. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that his conviction and sentence were invalid because blacks were excluded from the grand jury that indicted him. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Stone: The chief justice held that the defendant made out a prima facie case of racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jurors that indicted him. The opinion set out the Court's reasoning as follows:

An assistant district attorney for the county, who had lived in Dallas County for twenty-seven or twenty-eight years and had served for sixteen years as a judge of the criminal court in which [the defendant] was tried and convicted, testified that he never knew of a [black] being called to serve on a grand jury in the county. The district clerk of the county, whose duty it is to certify the grand jury list to the sheriff, knew of no citations issued for [blacks] to serve upon the grand jury.

We think [the defendant] made out a prima facie case, which the state failed to meet, of racial discrimination in the selection of grand jurors which the equal protection clause forbids. As we pointed out in [a prior decision] chance or accident could hardly have accounted for the continuous omission of [blacks] from the grand jury lists for so long a period as sixteen years or more. The jury commissioners, although the matter was discussed by them, consciously omitted to place the name of any [black] on the jury list. They made no effort to ascertain whether there were within the county members of the [black] race qualified to serve as jurors, and if so who they were. They thus failed to perform their constitutional duty ... not to pursue a course of conduct in the administration of their office which would operate to discriminate in the selection of jurors on racial grounds. Discrimination can arise from the action of commissioners who exclude all [blacks] whom they do not know to be qualified and who neither know nor seek to learn whether there are in fact any qualified to serve. In such a case discrimination necessarily results where there are qualified [blacks] available for jury service....

A prisoner whose conviction is reversed by this Court need not go free if he is in fact guilty, for Texas may indict and try him again by the procedure which conforms to constitutional requirements. But no state is at liberty to impose upon one charged with crime a discrimination in its trial procedure which the Constitution, and an Act of Congress passed pursuant to the Constitution, alike forbid. Nor is this Court at liberty to grant or withhold the benefits of equal protection, which the Constitution commands for all, merely as we may deem the defendant innocent or guilty.

The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was reversed.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's death sentence comports with the Constitution when the trial court refused to consider proffered mitigating evidence at the penalty phase.

Case Holding: The defendant's death sentence did not comport with the Constitution when the trial court refused to consider proffered mitigating evidence at the penalty phase.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Richard Hitchcock, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Florida. During the penalty phase, the trial court instructed the jury that it was not to consider any mitigating evidence that was not enumerated under the State's death penalty statute. The defendant proffered mitigating circumstance evidence that was not listed in the State's death penalty statute. The jury recommended and the trial judge imposed the sentence of death.

The Florida Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that the federal Constitution prohibited exclusion and consideration of mitigating evidence at the penalty phase. Following unsuccessful State collateral proceedings, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court seeking relief. The district court dismissed the petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia, writing for a unanimous Court, held that the defendant's death sentence was rendered in violation of the Constitution. The opinion reasoned and concluded as follows:

We think it could not be clearer that the advisory jury was instructed not to consider, and the sentencing judge refused to consider, evidence of nonstatutory mitigating circumstances, and that the proceedings therefore did not comport with the requirements of Skipper v. South Carolina, Eddings v. Oklahoma, and Lockett v. Ohio. [The prosecutor] has made no attempt to argue that this error was harmless, or that it had no effect on the jury or the sentencing judge. In the absence of such a showing our cases hold that the exclusion of mitigating evidence of the sort at issue here renders the death sentence invalid.... [T]he State is not precluded from seeking to impose a death sentence upon [the defendant], "provided that it does so through a new sentencing hearing at which [the defendant] is permitted to present any and all relevant mitigating evidence that is available."

We reverse the judgment and remand the case to the Court of Appeals. That court is instructed to remand to the District Court with instructions to enter an order granting the application for a writ of habeas corpus, unless the State within a reasonable period of time either resentences [the defendant] in a proceeding that comports with the requirements of Lockett or vacates the death sentence and imposes a lesser sentence consistent with law.

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution prohibits enforcement of a death penalty statute that was repealed and reenacted after the date of the defendant's crime, but did not alter the substantive law existing at the time of the crime.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not bar enforcement of a death penalty statute that was repealed and reenacted after the date of the defendant's crime, but does not alter the substantive law existing at the time of the crime.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Minnesota charged the defendant, Clifton Holden, with committing capital murder on November 23, 1888. He was convicted and sentenced to death by hanging. The Minnesota Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence. The governor issued a death warrant requiring the defendant be put to death on June 27, 1890. After issuance of the death warrant, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that he was being detained in violation of the Constitution because the law under which he was to be executed was enacted after the commission of his crime. The district court denied relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the matter.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan noted that the State repealed and reenacted parts of its capital punishment statute on April 24, 1889, after the defendant's crime was committed. The new law added a provision requiring a convicted and sentenced capital felon be detained in solitary confinement until executed. The opinion indicated that based upon the change in law, the defendant presented two arguments. First, application of the solitary confinement provision to him violated the Ex Post Facto Clause. Second, inasmuch as the new law had no saving clause as to previous capital punishment offenses, there was no statute in force after its enactment which prescribed the punishment of death for murder committed before the date of the new law's enactment. The defendant, wrote Justice Harlan, was in essence claiming that repeal of the old law "was an act of complete amnesty in respect to all offenses of murder in the first degree previously committed, making subsequent imprisonment therefor illegal."

Justice Harlan disagreed with the defendant's contention that repeal of the old statute represented amnesty. He pointed out that the new law only repealed provisions of the old law that were inconsistent with it and that imposition of death by hanging under the new law was the same punishment under the old law. Therefore, "it is inaccurate to say that [the new] statute contained no saving clause whatever. By necessary implication, previous statutes that were consistent with its provisions were unaffected."

The opinion held: "The only part of the act of 1889 that may be deemed ex post facto, if applied to offenses committed before its passage, ... is [the requirement] that, after the issue of the warrant of execution by the governor, 'the prisoner shall be kept in solitary confinement' in the jail." Justice Harlan declined to address the constitutionality of the application of this new provision to the defendant because "there is no proof in the record" that the defendant was being held in solitary confinement. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed.

Concurring Statement by Justice Bradley: Justice Bradley issued a statement concurring in the Court's judgment.

Concurring Statement by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer issued a statement concurring in the Court's judgment. See also Dobbert v. Florida; Ex Post Facto Clause; Kring v. Missouri;

Holmes, Dr. Henry H. see Mudgett, Herman

Holmes, Oliver Wendell Jr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1902 to 1932. While on the Supreme Court, Holmes was known as a moderate and pragmatic interpreter of the Constitution.

Holmes was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on March 8, 1841. He graduated from Harvard College in 1861. With the outbreak of the Civil War, Holmes enlisted in the Union Army as an officer. After the war he went on to graduate from Harvard Law School in 1866. In 1881, Holmes published his famous and influential book, The Common Law. Holmes's legal career included teaching at Harvard Law School and serving on the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts as chief justice. In 1902, President Theodore Roosevelt nominated Holmes to the Supreme Court.

While on the Supreme Court, Holmes wrote a number of capital punishment opinions. The capital punishment opinion that carried the greatest influence was his dissent in Frank v. Mangum. The issue in Frank was whether the defendant's conviction and death sentence were obtained in violation of due process of law because of mob intimidation during his trial. The majority on the Supreme Court found that due process of law was not violated in the case. Holmes dissented strongly: "The argument for the [prosecutor] in substance is that the trial was in a court of competent jurisdiction, that it retains jurisdiction although, in fact, it may be dominated by a mob, and that the rulings of the state court as to the fact of such domination cannot be reviewed. But the argument seems to us inconclusive. Whatever disagreement there may be as to the scope of the phrase 'due process of law,' there can be no doubt that it embraces the fundamental conception of a fair trial, with opportunity to be heard. Mob law does not become due process of law by securing the assent of a terrorized jury. We are not speaking of mere disorder, or mere irregularities in procedure, but of a case where the processes of justice are actually subverted." Holmes died on March 6, 1935.

Issue Presented: Whether the federal Constitution prohibits use of an evidence rule in which a defendant may not introduce evidence of third-party guilt if the prosecution has introduced forensic evidence that strongly supports a guilty verdict.

Case Holding: The federal Constitution prohibits use of an evidence rule in which a defendant may not introduce evidence of third-party guilt if the prosecution has introduced forensic evidence that strongly supports a guilty verdict.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of South Carolina charged Bobby Lee Holmes with the 1989 capital murder of Mary Stewart. Holmes was eventually found guilty by a jury and sentenced to death. The direct appeal of the judgment was affirmed by the South Carolina Supreme Court. However, in a subsequent State habeas corpus proceeding, the conviction and sentence were reversed and Holmes was granted a new trial. During the second trial, Holmes attempted to introduce various witnesses who would have given testimony that implied another person, Jimmy McCaw White, killed the victim. However, the trial judge excluded this evidence under a State rule that barred evidence implicating a third party as committing the crime, the prosecutor has strong evidence of a defendant's guilt. Holmes was eventually convicted a second time and sentenced to death. The South Carolina Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the rule that excluded evidence of a third party committing the crime.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Alito: Justice Alito, writing for a unanimous court, held that the federal Constitution did not permit South Carolina to use an evidentiary rule that barred evidence of a third party's guilt simply because the prosecutor had strong evidence of the defendant's guilt. The opinion observed that as a general matter, trial judges could exclude evidence if its probative value is outweighed by factors such as unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or potential to mislead the jury. However, Justice Alito found that South Carolina's rule went far beyond the permitted basis for excluding evidence. The opinion addressed the issue as follows:

Under [South Carolina's] rule, the trial judge does not focus on the probative value or the potential adverse effects of admitting the defense evidence of third-party guilt. Instead, the critical inquiry concerns the strength of the prosecution's case: If the prosecution's case is strong enough, the evidence of third-party guilt is excluded even if that evidence, if viewed independently, would have great probative value and even if it would not pose an undue risk of harassment, prejudice, or confusion of the issues....

Just because the prosecution's evidence, if credited, would provide strong support for a guilty verdict, it does not follow that evidence of third-party guilt has only a weak logical connection to the central issues in the case. And where the credibility of the prosecution's witnesses or the reliability of its evidence is not conceded, the strength of the prosecution's case cannot be assessed without making the sort of factual findings that have traditionally been reserved for the trier of fact....

The point is that, by evaluating the strength of only one party's evidence, no logical conclusion can be reached regarding the strength of contrary evidence offered by the other side to rebut or cast doubt. Because the rule applied ... in this case did not heed this point, the rule is "arbitrary" in the sense that it does not rationally serve the end that ... other similar third-party guilt rules were designed to further. Nor has the State identified any other legitimate end that the rule serves. It follows that the rule applied in this case ... violates a criminal defendant's right to have a meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense. The judgment of the South Carolina Supreme Court was vacated and the case was remanded for a new trial. See also Rules of Evidence

Issue Presented: Whether Beck v. Alabama required the trial court to instruct the guilt phase jury on offenses that were not lesser included offenses of capital felony murder under Nebraska law.

Case Holding: Beck v. Alabama did not require the trial court to instruct the guilt phase jury on offenses that were not lesser included offenses of capital felony murder under Nebraska law.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Nebraska charged the defendant, Randolph K. Reeves, with capital felony murder (murder committed during the course of a sexual assault). At the close of the guilt phase, the defendant requested the trial court instruct the jury on the lesser included offenses of second-degree murder and manslaughter. The trial court refused the request on the ground that the State Supreme Court consistently had held that those crimes were not lesser included offenses of felony murder. The defendant was convicted of capital felony murder and a three-judge panel sentenced him to death.

After exhausting his State post-conviction remedies, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The defendant alleged that the trial court's failure to give the requested instruction was unconstitutional under the United States Supreme Court decision in Beck v. Alabama, which had invalidated an Alabama law that prohibited lesser included offense instructions in capital cases. The district court rejected the argument, but granted relief on an unrelated due process claim. A federal Court of Appeals disagreed with the basis of the district court's ruling and found, instead, that in failing to give the requested instruction on lesser included offenses, the trial court had committed the same constitutional error that was condemned in Beck. The Court of Appeals granted relief on that basis. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas ruled that Beck did not require State trial courts to instruct juries on offenses that were not lesser included offenses of the charged crime under State law. The opinion found that the facts of Beck were distinguishable from the defendant's case. It was said that the Alabama statute that was condemned in Beck had prohibited lesser included offense instructions in capital cases, but permitted lesser included offense instructions in non-capital cases. On the other hand, the opinion said, in the defendant's case when the Nebraska trial court declined to give the requested lesser included offense instruction, it merely followed the State Supreme Court's one-hundred-year-old rule that second-degree murder and manslaughter were not lesser included offenses of felony murder. Justice Thomas found that by ignoring the distinction, the Court of Appeals limited Nebraska's prerogative to structure its criminal law more severely than did the rule in Beck, for it required in effect that Nebraska create lesser included offenses to all capital crimes when no such lesser included offenses existed under State law. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens dissented from the majority decision. He believed Beck was not distinguishable from the defendant's case and that the defendant was constitutionally entitled to the requested instruction. See also Beck v. Alabama; Hopper v. Evans; Lesser Included Offense Instruction; Schad v. Arizona

Issue Presented: Whether, after invalidation of a state law which precluded instructions on lesser included offenses in capital cases, a new trial is required in a capital case in which the defendant's own evidence negates the possibility that such an instruction might have been warranted.

Case Holding: Invalidation of a state law which precluded instructions on lesser included offenses in the defendant's capital case, did not require a new trial because the defendant's own evidence negated the possibility that such an instruction might have been warranted.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Evans, was convicted and sentenced to death for capital murder in Alabama. At the time of the defendant's trial, an Alabama statute precluded jury instructions on lesser included offenses in capital cases. The Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence on appeal.

Subsequently, a habeas corpus proceeding was brought in a federal district court, seeking to have the conviction set aside on the ground that the defendant had been convicted and sentenced under a statute that unconstitutionally precluded consideration of lesser included offenses. The district court denied relief. While the case was pending, an appeal in a federal Court of Appeals, the Alabama statute precluding lesser included offense instructions in capital cases was invalidated by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Beck v. Alabama. As a result of the Beck decision, the Court of Appeals granted relief and reversed the conviction and sentence. The Court of Appeals reasoned that, under Beck, the defendant had to be retried so that he might have the opportunity to introduce evidence of some lesser included offense. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Chief Justice Burger: The chief justice ruled that the Court of Appeals misread Beck: "Beck held that due process requires that a lesser included offense instruction be given when the evidence warrants such an instruction. But due process requires that a lesser included offense instruction be given only when the evidence warrants such an instruction. The jury's discretion is thus channeled so that it may convict a defendant of any crime fairly supported by the evidence." The chief justice concluded that the Alabama preclusion statute did not prejudice the defendant in any way and he was not entitled to a new trial because his own evidence negated the possibility that a lesser included offense instruction might have been warranted. Accordingly, an instruction on a lesser included offense was not warranted. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed.

Concurring and Dissenting Statement by Justice Brennan and Marshall, J.: Justices Brennan and Marshall issued a statement in part concurring and in part dissenting. The statement read: "We join the opinion of the Court to the extent that it reverses the judgment of the Court of Appeals invalidating [the defendant's] conviction. But we adhere to our view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. Consequently, we would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals to the extent that it invalidates the sentence of death imposed upon [the defendant]." *See also Beck v. Issue Presented: Whether due process of law required the trial court to instruct the jury that if it found the defendant was intoxicated at the time of the murder, it had to return a verdict of guilty of second-degree murder.

Case Holding: Due process of law required the trial court to instruct the jury that if it found the defendant was intoxicated at the time of the murder, it had to return a verdict of guilty of second-degree murder.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Hopt, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the Territory of Utah. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's argument that due process of law required the trial court to instruct the jury that, if it found he was intoxicated at the time of the crime he could only be convicted of murder in the second degree. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Gray: Justice Gray noted that, in common law, voluntary intoxication afforded no excuse, justification, or extenuation of an offense committed under its influence. However, it was said that "when a statute establishing different degrees of murder requires deliberate premeditation in order to constitute murder in the first degree, the question whether the accused is in such a condition of mind, by reason of drunkenness or otherwise, as to be capable of deliberate premeditation, necessarily becomes a material subject of consideration by the jury." Justice Gray found that the evidence was sufficient to show that the defendant was drinking at the time of the offense, so as to warrant an instruction that intoxication could reduce the degree of murder to second degree. He held: "The instruction requested by the defendant clearly and accurately stated the law applicable to the case; and the refusal to give that instruction ... necessarily prejudiced him with the jury." The judgment of the Utah Supreme Court was reversed and a new trial awarded. See also Hopt v. Utah (II); Hopt v. Utah (III); Intoxication Defense

Issue Presented: Whether it was constitutional error to require challenged jurors to be questioned for bias outside the presence of the defendant.

Case Holding: It was constitutional error to require challenged jurors to be questioned for bias outside the presence of the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Hopt, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the Territory of Utah. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court reversed the judgment in Hopt v. Utah (I) and awarded a new trial. Upon retrial, the defendant was again found guilty of capital murder and sentenced to death. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. In doing so, the appellate court rejected the defendant's contention that it was constitutional error for the trial court to require certain jurors challenged by the defendant to be questioned for bias out of the presence of the defendant. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan held that it was constitutional error to require the challenged jurors be questioned out of the presence of the defendant. The opinion reasoned as follows: "The public has an interest in his life and liberty. Neither can be lawfully taken except in the mode prescribed by law. That which the law makes essential in proceedings involving the deprivation of life or liberty cannot be dispensed with.... [T]he legislature has deemed it essential to the protection of one whose life or liberty is involved in a prosecution for felony that he shall be personally present at the trial; that is at every stage of the trial when his substantial rights may be affected by the proceedings against him. If he be deprived of his life or liberty without being so present, such deprivation would be without that due process of law required by the constitution. For these reasons we are of opinion that it was error, which vitiated the verdict and judgment, to permit the trial of the challenges to take place in the absence of the accused." The judgment of the Utah Supreme Court was reversed and a new trial awarded. See also Hopt v. Utah (I); Hopt v. Utah (III); Jury Selection Issue Presented: Whether the failure of the record in the case to report the jury instructions in the manner required by the laws of Utah required the judgment against the defendant be reversed.

Case Holding: The failure of the record in the case to report the jury instructions in the manner required by the laws of Utah required the judgment against the defendant be reversed.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Hopt, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the Territory of Utah. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court reversed the judgment in Hopt v. Utah (I) and awarded a new trial. Upon retrial, the defendant was again found guilty of capital murder and sentenced to death. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court reversed the judgment in Hopt v. Utah (II) and awarded a new trial. Upon the third trial, the defendant was again found guilty of capital murder and sentenced to death. The Utah Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider several issues assigned as error, but the Court decided to address only the issue of whether the record in the case complied with the requirements Utah's laws.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Gray: Justice Gray observed that under the laws of Utah, jury instructions must be reduced to writing before they are given, unless the parties consent to oral instructions. The opinion also pointed out that Utah required the record in the case contain in writing the instructions given to the jury or a written waiver of such recording by the defendant. It was said that "requiring the instructions to be in writing and recorded, is to secure an accurate and authentic report of the instructions, and to insure to the defendant the means of having them revised in an appellate court.” Justice Gray found that the record in the case did not comply with the requirements of Utah’s statutes. He wrote: “The record merely states that the court charged the jury, and does not state whether the charge was written or oral. If the charge was written, it should have been made part of the record, which has not been done. If it was oral, the consent of the defendant was necessary, and that consent does not appear of record, and cannot be presumed.” As a result of this technical error, the judgment of the Utah Supreme Court was reversed and a new trial awarded.

Dissenting Statement by Chief Justice Waite and Harlan, J.: The chief justice and Justice Harlan issued a statement dissenting from the Court’s decision. See also Hopt v. Utah (I); Hopt v. Utah (II)

Horn, Tom Tom Horn was born in Memphis, Missouri, on November 21, 1860. He was raised on a farm and went on to become known in western lore as the last cowboy to go to the gallows.

Horn led a life for which the West was famous. He was an army scout at age sixteen. In 1886, he was involved in the historic battle against Geronimo. Horn tracked Geronimo and his band of warriors to their hideout in the Sierra Gordo, outside of Sonora, Mexico. It was Horn who alone rode into Geronimo’s camp and negotiated the famed Native American’s surrender. Geronimo’s surrender ended the last epic war with Native Americans.

In 1890, Horn joined the Pinkerton Detective Agency and used his gun to capture bank robbers and train thieves throughout Colorado and Wyoming. Legend has it that Horn killed seventeen men as a Pinkerton agent.

Horn left Pinkerton in 1892 and hired his gun to the Wyoming Cattle Growers’ Association. On July 18, 1901, Horn killed for the last time. On that date, he set out to execute a contract to kill a rancher named Kels Nickell. Horn devised a plan to ambush Nickell on the Powder River Road near Cheyenne, Wyoming. When a wagon appeared on the road, Horn believed the driver was Nickell. He fired a shot, striking the driver, then fired a second shot that struck the driver in the back of the head — killing him. At the time, Horn did not realize it, but the person he killed was not Nickell, it was Nickell’s fourteen-year-old son Willie.

Horn fled to Denver after the killing. He was tracked by a Wyoming lawman named Joe Lefors. Although no hard evidence linked Horn to the killing, Lefors believed it was Horn. After Lefors reached Denver, he engaged Horn in a saloon and got him drunk. While intoxicated, Horn began talking about his last killing, believing the victim was Nickell. After Horn’s confession, Lefors immediately arrested him. Horn was taken back to Wyoming to stand trial.

Horn was convicted and sentenced to death. While awaiting execution, Horn escaped from jail, but was quickly captured. On November 20, 1903, Horn Issue Presented: Whether the federal Court of Appeals was required to do an analysis of whether a new rule of law applied retroactively to the defendant’s case before applying the new rule.

Case Holding: The federal Court of Appeals was required to do an analysis of whether a new rule of law applied retroactively to the defendant’s case before applying the new rule.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Pennsylvania prosecuted the defendant, George Banks, for the murder of twelve people in 1982. Banks was found guilty of all twelve murders and sentenced to death. The convictions and death sentences were affirmed on direct appeal. Banks eventually filed a state habeas corpus proceeding. In that petition, Banks alleged that his death sentences should be reversed under a decision rendered by the United States Supreme Court in Mills v. Maryland, 486 U.S. 367 (1988). The Mills decision stated that a sentencing jury could not be required to agree unanimously that a mitigating circumstance was shown by a defendant, in order to give weight to it. Banks argued that his sentencing jury was instructed to find unanimously a mitigating circumstance. The State habeas trial court rejected Banks’s argument. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court affirmed.

Banks subsequently filed a federal habeas petition, alleging a Mills violation. A federal district judge rejected the argument. A federal Court of Appeals found that Banks established a Mills violation and therefore vacated his death sentences. In making its decision, the Court of Appeals, over the prosecutor’s objections, refused to perform an analysis to determine whether Mills applied retroactive. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide whether retroactivity analysis was required.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court issued a summary per curiam opinion in which no oral arguments were made by the parties. The opinion held that the Court of Appeals had to perform a retroactivity analysis before deciding that Mills applied to Banks’s case. Consequently, the decision of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded for retroactivity analysis. See also Beard v. Banks; Retroactive Application of a New Constitutional Rule Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant may raise constitutional issues in a federal habeas corpus proceeding that were not raised in a prior State habeas proceeding and were therefore considered waived under State law. (2) Whether the defendant presented sufficient evidence for a freestanding claim of actual innocence that could be brought independent of his defaulted claims.

Case Holdings: (1) The defendant may seek relief in a federal habeas proceeding after defaulting constitutional claims at the State level if the defendant establishes that, in light of new evidence, it is more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have found the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. (2) The defendant failed to present sufficient evidence for a claim of actual innocence that could be brought independent of his defaulted claims.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: In 1986 Paul Gregory House was convicted by a Tennessee jury of murdering Carolyn Muncey. House was sentenced to death for the crime. The State Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and sentence on direct appeal. Subsequently, House filed two State habeas corpus petitions seeking to overturn the judgment. Both State habeas corpus petitions were denied. House then filed a federal habeas corpus petition. In that petition, House alleged that new evidence, which included DNA evidence, established his actual innocence. The federal district court dismissed the petition, on the grounds that the claims House presented were defaulted at the State level and therefore could not be brought in a federal habeas proceeding. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider whether House presented sufficient new evidence to have a federal court consider the merits of claims defaulted under State law and whether the evidence presented independent grounds of actual innocence for the purposes of federal habeas relief.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy held that the new evidence presented by the defendant failed to support a claim of actual innocence that could be brought independent of his defaulted claims. However, the opinion found that the new evidence was sufficient to permit the defendant to raise his defaulted claims in a federal habeas proceeding. The new evidence included DNA evidence showing that semen found on the victim belonged to the victim's husband; blood stains taken from the defendant's clothing that may have been contaminated and not actually that of the victim; and substantial evidence showing that the victim's husband may have been the killer. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case was remanded to permit the defendant to raise his defaulted claims.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Chief Justice Roberts, in Which Scalia and Thomas, JJ., Joined: The chief justice concurred in the Court's finding that the defendant's evidence failed to support a claim of actual innocence for independent federal habeas relief. However, the chief justice dissented from the Court's finding that sufficient evidence was presented to allow the defendant to raise issues in a federal habeas proceeding that were waived under State law. *See also Actual Innocence Claim; Habeas Corpus; Herrera v. Houston Military Riot of 1917 In 1917, the United States declared war on Germany. In preparation for the war, two military installations, Camp Logan and Ellington Field, were ordered constructed outside the Houston, Texas, area. On July 27, 1917, a segregated battalion of African American soldiers were transported to the area to guard the construction site.

During their encampment in the Houston area, the black soldiers encountered intense racial discrimination from the civilian population. On August 23, 1917, racial tension rose to a racial riot in Houston. The riot was sparked by a false report that local Houston police had killed a well-respected black soldier — corporal Charles Baltimore. Over one hundred black soldiers marched to Houston carrying loaded rifles. Chaos broke loose when the soldiers arrived. The soldiers killed fifteen whites, including four policemen, and seriously wounded twelve others. Four black soldiers were killed.

By the early morning hours of August 24, civil authorities had regained control of Houston. The Army then turned to the black soldiers. Indictments were handed down for 118 soldiers. Between November 1, 1917, and March 26, 1918, the Army held three separate military trials in San Antonio. The military tribunals convicted 110 black soldiers. Nineteen soldiers were summarily hanged and the others sentenced to federal prison for life. See also Military Death Penalty Law

Mississippi, 543 U.S. 440 (2005); Argued: November 29, 2004; Decided: January 24, 2005; Opinion of the Court: Per Curiam; Concurring Opinion: None; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Ronnie Monroe Mitchell argued; William Odum Richardson, Duncan Lott and Andre de Gruy on brief; Appellate Prosecution Counsel: Jim Hood argued; Judy Thomas Martin on brief; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Prosecutor: 1; Amicus Curiae Brief Supporting Defendant: None

Issue Presented: Whether the Mississippi Supreme Court properly found that the defendant was not entitled to an instruction on non-capital murder and manslaughter.

Case Holding: The issue presented would not be addressed because it was not presented to the State high court as a federal claim.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Marlon Howell, was convicted and sentenced to death by the State of Mississippi for the May 2000 murder of Hugh David Pernell. On direct appeal to the Mississippi Supreme Court, the defendant argued that the trial court committed error by not instructing the jury that it could find him guilty of non-capital murder or manslaughter. The State high court rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and death sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court Was Delivered Per Curiam: The Supreme Court decided not to address the issue presented because it was not raised below in the context of federal law. The per curiam opinion addressed the matter as follows:

Congress has given this Court the power to review “[f]inal judgments or decrees rendered by the highest court of a State in which a decision could be had ... where any ... right ... is specially set up or claimed under the Constitution or the treaties or statutes of ... the United States.” Under that statute and its predecessors, this Court has almost unfailingly refused to consider any federal-law challenge to a state-court decision unless the federal claim was either addressed by or properly presented to the state court that rendered the decision we have been asked to review.

[Howell’s] brief in the State Supreme Court did not properly present his claim as one arising under federal law. In the relevant argument, he did not cite the Constitution or even any cases directly construing it, much less any of this Court’s cases. Instead, he argues that he presented his federal claim by citing Harveston v. State, 493 So.2d 365 (Miss.1986), which cited (among other cases) Fairchild v. State, 459 So.2d 793 (Miss.1984), which in turn cited [a federal case], but only by way of acknowledging that Mississippi’s general rule requiring lesser-included-offense instructions takes on constitutional proportions in capital cases. Assuming it constituted adequate briefing of the federal question under state-law standards, [Howell’s] daisy chain — which depends upon a case that was cited by one of the cases that was cited by one of the cases that [Howell] cited — is too lengthy to meet this Court’s standards for proper presentation of a federal claim. As we recently explained in a slightly different context, a litigant wishing to raise a federal issue can easily indicate the federal law basis for his claim in a state-court petition or brief ... by citing in conjunction with the claim the federal source of law on which he relies or a case deciding such a claim on federal grounds, or by simply labeling the claim federal.... [Howell] did none of these things.

The per curiam opinion went on to state that the writ of certiorari would be dismissed as improvidently granted. See also Federal Law Question Hughes, Charles E. Charles E. Hughes served two separate terms on the United States Supreme Court. He was an associate justice from 1910 to 1916 and chief justice from 1930 to 1941. While on the Supreme Court, Hughes was known as a moderate interpreter of the Constitution.

Hughes was born in Glen Falls, New York, on April 11, 1862. He studied law at Columbia University Law School. His legal career included a lucrative private practice and teaching law at Columbia and Cornell. He was twice elected governor of New York. In 1910, President William Howard Taft nominated Hughes to the Supreme Court. Hughes ultimately resigned from the Court in 1916 to run for president. After losing in his run at the presidency, Hughes returned to his private legal practice. Hughes was selected in 1921 by President Warren G. Harding to serve as Secretary of State. In 1938, President Calvin Coolidge nominated Hughes as chief justice of the Supreme Court.

Hughes was known to have written only a few capital punishment opinions while on the Supreme Court. Each of the opinions written by him was issued during his term as chief justice. The capital punishment opinions authored by Hughes revealed a liberal view of the Constitution. Each of the Hughes’s capital punishment opinions was written for the majority of the Supreme Court. In each case, Hughes reversed the death sentences. The opinion which had the most influence upon modern-day capital punishment was Aldridge v. United States. In Aldridge, the defendant made the novel argument that the trial judge should have asked the jury if they would harbor any bias because the defendant was black and the victim was white. Hughes wrote that the trial court committed reversible error in refusing the request to ask the prospective jury if they had racial prejudices that would prevent them from fairly deciding the case because the defendant was black and the victim was white. Hughes died on August 27, 1948.

Human Rights Watch Human Rights Watch (HRW) is an international organization that advocates human rights issues throughout the world. The organization investigates and exposes human rights violations and holds abusers accountable. Accountability is done through enlisting the public and the international community to support the cause of human rights for all.

The HRW has taken a public stance in total opposition to capital punishment anywhere in the world. The organization has targeted capital punishment in the United States and has aligned itself with other organizations to bring about the abolishment of the death penalty in the nation.

Specific work being conducted by HRW in the United States involves tracking death penalty cases and writing letters to clemency boards and governors asking that executions be halted and death sentences commuted. If a case presents a particularly egregious set of circumstances — e.g., the defendant is a juvenile, mentally impaired, or a foreign national — HRW will bring its concerns to the national media and seeks to raise the profile of the case.

Issue Presented: Whether the Constitution requires States prosecute capital offenses by grand jury indictment.

Case Holding: The Constitution does not impose upon States a requirement that capital offenses be prosecuted by grand jury indictment.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: Under the constitution of California adopted in 1879, all criminal offenses were permitted to be prosecuted by an information, rather than by grand jury indictment. On February 20, 1882, a California prosecutor drew up an information charging the defendant, Joseph Hurtado, with committing capital murder. The defendant was prosecuted under the information and a jury found him guilty of capital murder. The trial court imposed the sentence of death. The California Supreme Court affirmed.

The defendant subsequently went before the trial court and challenged his conviction and sentence on the grounds that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment required that he be prosecuted by grand jury indictment. The trial court rejected the argument. The California Supreme Court denied relief on this ground. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Matthews: Justice Matthews wrote: “The proposition of law we are asked to affirm is that an indictment or presentment by a grand jury, as known to the common law of England, is essential to that ‘due process of law,’ when applied to prosecutions for felonies.” The opinion reasoned that “if an indictment or presentment by a grand jury is essential to due process of law in all cases of imprisonment for crime, it applies not only to felonies, but to misdemeanors and petty offenses, and the conclusion would be inevitable that informations as a substitute for indictments would be illegal in all cases.”

The opinion noted that the Fifth Amendment imposed the use of grand jury indictment upon the federal government for infamous crimes. It was also observed that the Fifth Amendment contained a due process provision that was only applicable to the federal government. Justice Matthews thought it significant that the Fifth Amendment contained both due process and grand jury requirements, while the Fourteenth Amendment contained a due process provision but no grand jury provision. The opinion reasoned from this observation that “[t]he natural and obvious inference is that, in the sense of the constitution, ‘due process of law’ was not meant or intended to include ... the institution and procedure of a grand jury in any case. The conclusion is equally irresistible, that when the same phrase was employed in the fourteenth amendment to restrain the action of the states, it was used in the same sense and with no greater extent; and that if in the adoption of that amendment it had been part of its purpose to perpetuate the institution of the grand jury in all the states, it would have embodied, as did the fifth amendment, express declarations to that effect.”

It was concluded by Justice Matthews that due process of law did not require States use grand jury indictments to prosecute capital offenses. “Due process of law ... resides in the right of the people to make their own laws, and alter them at their pleasure. For these reasons, finding no error therein, the judgment of the supreme court of California is affirmed.”

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan wrote in dissent that he could not “agree that the state may, consistently, with due process of law require a person to answer for a capital offense, except upon the presentment or indictment of a grand jury.” The dissent believed that use of grand jury indictment was a basic component of due process. Justice Harlan asked rhetorically: “Does not the fact that the people of the original states required an amendment of the national constitution, securing exemption from prosecution for a capital offense, except upon the indictment or presentment of a grand jury, prove that, in their judgment, such an exemption was essential to protection against accusation and unfounded prosecution, and therefore was a fundamental principle in liberty and justice?”

Justice Harlan took issue with a suggestion by the majority opinion that progress in criminal procedure was pushing aside use of grand jury indictment to prosecute crimes. He wrote: “It is difficult ... to perceive anything in the system of prosecuting human beings for their lives, by information, which suggests that the state which adopts it has entered upon an era of progress and improvement in the law of criminal procedure.” The dissent concluded that the judgment of the California Supreme Court should be reversed. See also Grand Jury; Lem Woon v. Oregon; Prosecution by Information

Idaho The State of Idaho is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on July 1, 1973.

Idaho has a three-tier legal system. The State’s legal system is composed of a supreme court, court of appeals and courts of general jurisdiction. The Idaho Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The Idaho Court of Appeals is composed of a chief judge and two judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called District Courts. Capital offenses against the State of Idaho are tried in the District Courts.

Idaho’s capital punishment offenses are set out under Idaho Code tit. 18 § 4001. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

- a. Murder perpetrated by means of poison, lying in wait, or torture; or
- b. Murder of any peace officer, executive officer, officer of the court, fireman, judicial officer, or prosecuting attorney; or
- c. Murder committed by a person under a sentence for a prior murder, including such persons on parole or probation from such sentence; or
- d. Murder committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, aggravated battery on a child under twelve (12) years of age, arson, rape, robbery, burglary, kidnapping, mayhem, an act of terrorism, or the use of a weapon of mass destruction, biological weapon, or chemical weapon; or
- e. Murder committed by a person incarcerated in a penal institution upon a person employed by the penal institution, another inmate or a visitor to the penal institution; or
- f. Murder committed by a person while escaping or attempting to escape from a penal institution.

In addition, under Idaho Code tit. 18 § 5411, the death penalty may be imposed on any one who, by willful perjury or subornation of perjury, procures the conviction and execution of any innocent person. Further, Idaho Code tit. 18 § 4504 provides the punishment of death for kidnapping. However, the decisions of the United States Supreme Court have held that the death penalty may not be imposed unless a homicide occurred.

Capital murder in Idaho is punishable by death or life imprisonment with or without the possibility of parole. A capital prosecution in Idaho is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jury must unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a unanimous verdict, the defendant must be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Idaho Code tit. 19 § 2515 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

- a. The defendant was previously convicted of another murder.
- b. At the time the murder was committed the defendant also committed another murder.
- c. The defendant knowingly created a great risk of death to many persons.
- d. The murder was committed for remuneration or the promise of remuneration or the defendant employed another to commit the murder for remuneration or the promise of remuneration.
- e. The murder was especially heinous, atrocious or cruel, manifesting exceptional depravity.
- f. By the murder, or circumstances surrounding its commission, the defendant exhibited utter disregard for human life.
- g. The murder was committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, arson, rape, robbery, burglary, kidnapping or mayhem and the defendant killed, intended a killing, or acted with reckless indifference to human life.
- h. The murder was committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, an infamous crime against nature, lewd and lascivious conduct with a minor, sexual abuse of a child under sixteen (16) years of age, ritualized abuse of a child, sexual exploitation of a child, sexual battery of a minor child sixteen (16) or seventeen (17) years of age, or forcible sexual penetration by use of a foreign object, and the defendant killed, intended a killing, or acted with reckless indifference to human life.
- i. The defendant, by his conduct, whether such conduct was before, during or after the commission of the murder at hand, has exhibited a propensity to commit murder which will probably constitute a continuing threat to society.
- j. The murder was committed against a former or present peace officer, executive officer, officer of the court, judicial officer or prosecuting attorney because of the exercise of official duty or because of the victim's former or present official status.
- k. The murder was committed against a witness or potential witness in a criminal or civil legal proceeding because of such proceeding.

Idaho does not provide by statute any mitigating circumstances to the imposition of the death penalty. Even though the State does not provide statutory mitigating circumstances, the United States Supreme Court has ruled that all relevant mitigating evidence must be allowed at the penalty phase.

Under Idaho's capital punishment statute, the Idaho Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Idaho uses lethal injection or the firing squad (if necessary) to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Boise, Idaho, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Pocatello, Idaho.

Pursuant to the laws of Idaho, the Commission of Pardons and Paroles has authority to grant clemency. The governor may grant temporary reprieves.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Idaho executed only one capital felon. A total of twenty capital felons were on death row in Idaho as of July 2006. During this period, Idaho had one female capital felon on death row. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as twenty white inmates.

Illinois The State of Illinois is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on July 1, 1974.

Illinois has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Illinois Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Illinois Appellate Court is divided into five districts. Each district has at least three judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts. Capital offenses against the State of Illinois are tried in the circuit courts. It is provided under the laws of Illinois that, in capital cases, an indigent defendant must be appointed two attorneys who have been certified as members of the State's Capital Litigation Trial Bar.

Illinois's capital punishment offenses are set out under Ill. Code ch. 720 § 5/9-1(a). This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

- 1. He either intends to kill or do great bodily harm to that individual or another, or knows that such acts will cause death to that individual or another; or
- 2. He knows that such acts create a strong probability of death or great bodily harm to that individual or another; or
- 3. He is attempting or committing a forcible felony other than second degree murder.

In addition, under Ill. Code ch. 720 § 5/30-1, the crime of treason is made a capital offense. Treason is defined as levying war against the State or adhering to the enemies of the State, giving them aid or comfort.

Capital murder in Illinois is punishable by death or a term of imprisonment. A capital prosecution in Illinois is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a term of imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Illinois.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Ill. Code ch. 720 § 5/9-1(b) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

- 1. The murdered individual was a peace officer or fireman killed in the course of performing his official duties, to prevent the performance of his official duties, or in retaliation for performing his official duties, and the defendant knew or should have known that the murdered individual was a peace officer or fireman; or

2. The murdered individual was an employee of an institution or facility of the Department of Corrections, or any similar local correctional agency, killed in the course of performing his official duties, to prevent the performance of his official duties, or in retaliation for performing his official duties, or the murdered individual was an inmate at such institution or facility and was killed on the grounds thereof, or the murdered individual was otherwise present in such institution or facility with the knowledge and approval of the chief administrative officer thereof; or

3. The defendant has been convicted of murdering two or more individuals ... regardless of whether the deaths occurred as the result of the same act or of several related or unrelated acts so long as the deaths were the result of either an intent to kill more than one person or of separate acts which the defendant knew would cause death or create a strong probability of death or great bodily harm to the murdered individual or another; or

4. The murdered individual was killed as a result of the hijacking of an airplane, train, ship, bus or other public conveyance; or

5. The defendant committed the murder pursuant to a contract, agreement or understanding by which he was to receive money or anything of value in return for committing the murder or procured another to commit the murder for money or anything of value; or

6. The murdered individual was killed in the course of another felony; or

7. The murdered individual was under 12 years of age and the death resulted from exceptionally brutal or heinous behavior indicative of wanton cruelty; or

8. The murdered individual was a witness; or

9. The defendant committed murder while trafficking in drugs; or

10. The defendant was incarcerated in an institution or facility of the Department of Corrections at the time of the murder; or

11. The murder was committed in a cold, calculated and premeditated manner pursuant to a preconceived plan, scheme or design to take a human life by unlawful means, and the conduct of the defendant created a reasonable expectation that the death of a human being would result therefrom; or

12. The murdered individual was an emergency medical technician — ambulance, emergency medical technician — intermediate, emergency medical technician — paramedic, ambulance driver, or other medical assistance or first aid personnel, employed by a municipality or other governmental unit, killed in the course of performing his official duties, to prevent the performance of his official duties, or in retaliation for performing his official duties, and the defendant knew or should have known that the murdered individual was an emergency medical technician — ambulance, emergency medical technician — intermediate, emergency medical technician — paramedic, ambulance driver, or other medical assistance or first aid personnel; or

13. The defendant was a drug trafficking gang leader and the defendant counseled, commanded, induced, procured, or caused the intentional killing of the murdered person; or

14. The murder was intentional and involved the infliction of torture; or

15. The murder was committed as a result of the intentional discharge of a firearm by the defendant from a motor vehicle and the victim was not present within the motor vehicle; or

16. The murdered individual was 60 years of age or older and the death resulted from exceptionally brutal or heinous behavior indicative of wanton cruelty; or

17. The murdered individual was a disabled person and the defendant knew or should have known that the murdered individual was disabled; or

18. The murder was committed by reason of any person's activity as a community policing volunteer or to prevent any person from engaging in activity as a community policing volunteer; or

19. The murdered individual was subject to an order of protection and the murder was committed by a person against whom the same order of protection was issued under the Illinois Domestic Violence Act of 1986; or

20. The murdered individual was known by the defendant to be a teacher or other person employed in any school and the teacher or other employee is upon the grounds of a school or grounds adjacent to a school, or is in any part of a building used for school purposes; or

21. The murder was committed by the defendant in connection with or as a result of the offense of terrorism.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Illinois has provided by statute, Ill. Code ch. 720 § 5/9-1(c), the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity;

2. The murder was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance, although not such as to constitute a defense to prosecution;

3. The murdered individual was a participant in the defendant's homicidal conduct or consented to the homicidal act;

4. The defendant acted under the compulsion of threat or menace of the imminent infliction of death or great bodily harm;

5. The defendant was not personally present during commission of the act or acts causing death.

6. The defendant's background includes a history of extreme emotional or physical abuse;

7. The defendant suffers from a reduced mental capacity.

Under Illinois' capital punishment statute, the Illinois Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Illinois uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences, but permits electrocution to be used if lethal injection is found unconstitutional. The State's death row facilities for men are located in Tamms, Pontiac, and Menard, Illinois, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Dwight, Illinois.

Pursuant to the laws of Illinois, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The State's Prisoner Review Board makes nonbinding recommendation on clemency requests. On January 23, 2003, former Illinois Governor George Ryan granted clemency to all death row inmates in the State. Under the clemency, 167 inmates who had been convicted of capital offenses had their sentences commuted to life imprisonment (164 inmates) or a term of years (three inmates).

Under the laws of Illinois, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. Ill. Code ch. 725 § 5/119-5(d) provides: "The warden of the penitentiary shall supervise such execution, which shall be conducted in the presence of 6 witnesses who shall certify the execution of the sentence.”

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Illinois executed twelve capital felons. A total of ten capital felons were on death row in Illinois as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as two black inmates, five white inmates, and three Hispanic inmates.

Illinois Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty The Illinois Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty (ICADP) was founded in 1976 to fight for the abolition of the death penalty in Illinois. ICADP provides research and technical support for attorneys working on capital cases and acts as a link between prisoners and the outside world. The organization also tracks State and federal legislation and lobbies on behalf of any initiative that will abolish or curtail the death penalty’s reach and effect. ICADP publishes a quarterly newsletter, maintains an active speakers bureau, holds conferences, gathers statistics, and maintains a comprehensive resource file for students and other interested individuals. Its members also monitor the conditions of Illinois’s death row through monthly inspection visits, distribute donated typewriters and paper supplies and books to inmates, and supply information to inmates and their families.

Impact of the Furman Decision From a legal technical perspective, the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), merely invalidated the death penalty statutes of Georgia and Texas; as only those two States were represented in the consolidated cases. However, the practical effect of the decision was that of invalidating death penalty statutes of all jurisdictions in the nation. The reason for this is that, procedurally, all death penalty statutes mirrored the statutes of Georgia and Texas. (On the same day that the Furman decision was rendered, the nation’s highest court also issued terse opinions in Stewart v. Massachusetts, 408 U.S. 845 (1972), and Moore v. Illinois, 408 U.S. 786 (1972), which directly invalidated the death penalty procedures of Massachusetts and Illinois. Additionally, on the date Furman was decided, the Court issued a memorandum order that invalidated the death penalty in 121 cases that had been pending on its docket.)

Although two justices writing in concurrence in Furman, Justices Marshall and Brennan, believed the constitution barred capital punishment per se, the decision in Furman did not extend that far. Furman left open the possibility of a resumption of capital punishment, provided the procedures used minimized arbitrary and capricious imposition of the punishment.

Immediately after the Furman decision was rendered many jurisdictions passed legislation that created death penalty statutes which provided mechanisms for limiting arbitrary and capricious imposition of capital punishment. The moratorium placed on capital punishment by Furman was lifted in 1976, when the United States Supreme Court reviewed and approved the new death penalty statutes of Georgia, Florida, and Texas. As of December 2006, thirty-seven States and the federal government had valid death penalty statutes.

The decision in Furman has altered capital punishment in several respects. First, as a result of Furman, all capital prosecutions are now bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. This change has been instrumental in allowing capital defendants to proclaim their innocence while also seeking mercy from imposition of the death penalty. Under pre-Furman unitary trials, it was difficult for capital defendants to seek mercy while putting on evidence of innocence.

EXECUTIONS IN THE U.S. 1930-2006

SOURCE: Bureau of Justice Statistics, Capital Punishment (2007)

Next, Furman has been instrumental in leading to contrition in the types of crimes upon which the death penalty may be imposed. Under pre-Furman constitutional jurisprudence, crimes such as robbery, burglary, and rape were punishable with death. For all practical purposes, post-Furman constitutional jurisprudence has limited imposition of the death penalty to crimes involving a homicide (Bureau of Justice Statistics, Capital Punishment, 2007).

Finally, actual executions have dramatically declined in the post-Furman era. During the peak period of executions prior to Furman, 1930 to 1939, there were 1667 inmates executed. In contrast, during the peak period of executions after Furman, 1990 to 1999, there were only 467 inmates executed. *See also Capital Punishment Jurisdictions; Crimes Not Involving Death; Furman v. The term “custody” refers to incarceration in prison or jail. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have made murder committed by a defendant in custody a statutory aggravating circumstance. India India imposes capital punishment. India uses hanging to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on English common law. The country’s constitution was adopted on January 26, 1950.

India’s judicial system is composed of district courts, high courts, and a supreme court. Defendants have a right to a public trial (except in limited circumstances), the right to counsel, and the right to appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Indiana The State of Indiana is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on May 1, 1973.

Indiana has a three-tier legal system. The State’s legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Indiana Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and four associate justices. The Indiana Court of Appeals is divided into five districts. Each district has at least three judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called circuit courts (the State also has courts of general jurisdiction that are called superior courts). Capital offenses against the State of Indiana are tried in the circuit courts.

Indiana’s capital punishment offenses are set out under Ind. Code § 35-42-1-1. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. Knowingly or intentionally kills another human being;
2. Kills another human being while committing or attempting to commit arson, burglary, child molesting, consumer product tampering, criminal deviate conduct, kidnapping, rape, robbery, human trafficking, promotion of human trafficking, sexual trafficking of a minor, or carjacking;
3. Kills another human being while committing or attempting to commit a drug offense; or
4. Knowingly or intentionally kills a fetus that has attained viability.

Capital murder in Indiana is punishable by death or life imprisonment without parole. A capital prosecution in Indiana is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to declare a mistrial and hold a new penalty phase hearing without a jury. The decision of a penalty phase jury is not binding on the trial court under the laws of Indiana. The trial court may accept or reject the jury’s determination on punishment and impose whatever sentence he or she believes the evidence established.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Ind. Code § 35-50-2-9(b) that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The defendant committed the murder by intentionally killing the victim while committing or attempting to commit any of the following: (A) arson; (B) burglary; (C) child molesting; (D) criminal deviate conduct; (E) kidnapping; (F) rape; (G) robbery; (H) carjacking; (I) criminal gang activity; (J) dealing in cocaine or a narcotic drug.

2. The defendant committed the murder by the unlawful detonation of an explosive with intent to injure a person or damage property.

3. The defendant committed the murder by lying in wait.

4. The defendant who committed the murder was hired to kill.

5. The defendant committed the murder by hiring another person to kill.

6. The victim of the murder was a corrections employee, probation officer, parole officer, community corrections worker, home detention officer, fireman, judge, or law enforcement officer.

7. The defendant has been convicted of another murder.

8. The defendant has committed another murder, at any time, regardless of whether the defendant has been convicted of that other murder.

9. The defendant was at the time of the crime: (A) under the custody of the department of correction; (B) under the custody of a county sheriff; (C) on probation after receiving a sentence for the commission of a felony; or (D) on parole.

10. The defendant dismembered the victim.

11. The defendant burned, mutilated, or tortured the victim while the victim was alive.

12. The victim of the murder was less than twelve (12) years of age.

13. The victim was a victim of any of the following offenses for which the defendant was convicted: (A) battery; (B) kidnapping; (C) criminal confinement; (D) a sex crime.

14. The victim of the murder was listed by the state or known by the defendant to be a witness against the defendant and the defendant committed the murder with the intent to prevent the person from testifying.

15. The defendant committed the murder by intentionally discharging a firearm: (A) into an inhabited dwelling; or (B) from a vehicle.

16. The victim of the murder was pregnant and the murder resulted in the intentional killing of a fetus that has attained viability.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Indiana has provided by statute, Ind. Code § 35-50-2-9(c), the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal conduct.

2. The defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance when the murder was committed.

3. The victim was a participant in or consented to the defendant's conduct.

4. The defendant was an accomplice in a murder committed by another person, and the defendant's participation was relatively minor.

5. The defendant acted under the substantial domination of another person.

6. The defendant's capacity to appreciate the criminality of the defendant's conduct or to conform that conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired as a result of mental disease or defect or of intoxication.

7. The defendant was less than eighteen years of age at the time the murder was committed (note: federal law prohibits death penalty in this situation).

8. Any other circumstances appropriate for consideration.

Under Indiana's capital punishment statute, the Indiana Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Indiana uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in Michigan City, Indiana, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Indianapolis, Indiana.

Pursuant to the laws of Indiana, the governor has authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor is required to obtain the consent of the State's Parole Board before clemency may be granted.

Under the laws of Indiana, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Ind. Code § 35-38-6-6:

a. Only the following persons may be present at the execution: (1) the superintendent of the state prison; (2) the person designated by the superintendent of the state prison and any assistants who are necessary to assist in the execution; (3) the prison physician; (4) one other physician; (5) the spiritual advisor of the convicted person; (6) the prison chaplain; (7) not more than five friends or relatives of the convicted person who are invited by the convicted person to attend; (8) except as provided in subsection (b), not more than eight of the following members of the victim's immediate family who are at least eighteen years of age: (A) the victim's spouse; (B) one or more of the victim's children; (C) one or more of the victim's parents; (D) one or more of the victim's grandparents; (E) one or more of the victim's siblings.

b. If there is more than one victim, not more than eight persons who are members of the victims' immediate families may be present at the execution. The department shall determine which persons may be present in accordance with procedures adopted under subsection (c).

c. The department shall develop procedures to determine which family members of a victim may be present at the execution if more than eight family members of a victim desire to be present or if there is more than one victim. Upon the request of a family member of a victim, the department shall establish a support room for the use of: (1) an immediate family member of the victim described in subsection (a) (8) who is not selected to be present at the execution; and (2) a person invited by an immediate family member of the victim described in subsection (a)(8) to offer support to the immediate family member.

d. The superintendent of the state prison may exclude a person from viewing the execution if the superintendent determines that the presence of the person would threaten the safety or security of the state prison and sets forth this determination in writing.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, Indiana executed seventeen capital felons. During this period, Indiana did not execute any female capital felons, although one of its death row inmates during this period was a female. A total of twenty-four capital felons were on death row in Indiana in as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as eight black inmates and sixteen white inmates.

Individualized Sentencing A cornerstone of modern capital punishment is the federal constitutional requirement of individualized sentencing. The basic underlying premise of individualized sentencing is that imposition of capital punishment must, at minimum, be based upon the gravity of the offense, character of the offender and the need to protect the public. Under this formula, the factfinder must consider all relevant mitigating and aggravating evidence in making the determination of whether to impose a sentence of death.

Courts have held that the purpose behind individualized sentencing is not served where the factfinder decides not to impose the death penalty purely out of a personal sense of mercy and in disregard of the presence of aggravating circumstances. Nor is the purpose of individualized sentencing served where the factfinder ignores the presence of mitigating circumstances for personal reasons in order to render a death sentence. Individualized sentencing strikes a delicate balance that demands the factfinder deliberate on a slate that only has superimposed upon it evidence of relevant mitigating and aggravating circumstances. A sentence of death imposed for any reason other than that the penalty is particularized to circumstances of the crime and defendant offends the federal Constitution and is invalid.

Included in the scheme of individualized sentencing is the persistent theme that a capital felon's social, economic, and educational background, personality, character, propensities, and tendencies be given evidentiary expression and consideration. These factors may prove mitigating or aggravating or both. In the final analysis, individualized sentencing seeks to place the whole person before the factfinder, not an abstract notion or preconceived idea of the capital felon.

Individualized sentencing also requires the factfinder consider all the circumstances surrounding the capital crime for which the defendant was convicted. This evidence can be aggravating or mitigating or both. Courts permit evidence of whether capital punishment would have a deterrent effect based upon the particular case before the factfinder. The factfinder may draw inferences from evidence received during the guilt phase.

Although the death penalty may be imposed upon a capital defendant convicted as a party to capital murder, it may not be imposed upon him or her for deliberate conduct of another or future dangerousness of another. The punishment must be imposed in view of the individual conduct of the capital felon whose fate is being determined by the penalty phase jury. See also Aggravating Circumstances; Mitigating Circumstances

Indonesia Indonesia imposes capital punishment. The firing squad is used by Indonesia to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Roman-Dutch law and customary law. Indonesia's constitution was restored on July 5, 1959.

The judicial system is composed of district courts, high courts, and a supreme court. Defendants do not have a right to trial by jury in Indonesia. Guilt or innocence is determined by a panel of judges. The laws of Indonesia provide defendants with the right to retained or appointed counsel. Defendants do not have the right to remain silent and may be compelled to testify against themselves. Both the defense and the prosecution may appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel see Right to Counsel

Informant Aggravator In the context of criminal law, an informant is a person who provides information to the police that implicates a defendant in a crime. Three capital punishment jurisdictions, Arizona, Delaware, and Pennsylvania, have made the killing of an informant a statutory aggravating circumstance. In these jurisdictions, the death penalty may be imposed if evidence establishes at the penalty phase that the killing occurred because of the informant's cooperation with the police. See also Aggravating Circumstances

In Forma Pauperis Under the doctrine of in forma pauperis, an indigent defendant is permitted to have access to legal services, materials, and legal assistance, without having to personally pay the cost of such services and assistance. The in forma pauperis doctrine has constitutional underpinnings, insofar as equal protection principles demand that poor defendants have similar access to legal services as do defendants having personal financial resources.

Informing Jury of How Death Is Imposed Capital felons have argued that evidence of how capital punishment is carried out is relevant mitigating evidence that is required by the federal Constitution to be introduced at the penalty phase. However, courts have consistently ruled that evidence of how capital punishment is imposed is irrelevant and that the federal Constitution does not require introduction of such evidence. The proper focus of the penalty phase is on the capital felon's character, record, and the circumstances of the offense for which he or she was convicted. See also Mitigating Circumstances

Initial Appearance see Arraignment

Injunction An injunction is a legal order issued by a court restraining a person from performing certain conduct. Capital felons will occasionally resort to seeking an injunction as a remedy. For example, if a jurisdiction changes the method of execution after a capital felon's conviction and death sentence, he or she may seek an injunction to prevent use of the new method of execution.

Innocence Protection Act of 2004 The Innocence Protection Act of 2004 establishes procedures for post-conviction DNA testing in federal court. The Act requires a federal court, upon a written motion by a defendant under a sentence of death, to order DNA testing of specific evidence upon the showing of certain factors. The Act also strongly encourages states to offer post-conviction DNA by offering them incentive grants for creating DNA programs. In addition, the Act also provides incentive grants to states to improve the quality of legal representation in capital punishment cases. The Act's post-conviction DNA testing guidelines are set out under 18 U.S.C. § 3600 as follows:

a. In general — Upon a written motion by an individual under a sentence of imprisonment or death pursuant to a conviction for a Federal offense (referred to in this section as the "applicant"), the court that entered the judgment of conviction shall order DNA testing of specific evidence if the court finds that all of the following apply:

1. The applicant asserts, under penalty of perjury, that the applicant is actually innocent of—

A. The Federal offense for which the applicant is under a sentence of imprisonment or death; or

B. Another Federal or State offense, if—

i. Evidence of such offense was admitted during a Federal death sentencing hearing and exonerated of such offense would entitle the applicant to a reduced sentence or new sentencing hearing; and

ii. In the case of a State offense —

I. The applicant demonstrates that there is no adequate remedy under State law to permit DNA testing of the specified evidence relating to the State offense; and

II. To the extent available, the applicant has exhausted all remedies available under State law for requesting DNA testing of specified evidence relating to the State offense.

2. The specific evidence to be tested was secured in relation to the investigation or prosecution of the Federal or State offense referenced in the applicant's assertion under paragraph (1).

3. The specific evidence to be tested —

A. Was not previously subjected to DNA testing and the applicant did not —

i. Knowingly and voluntarily waive the right to request DNA testing of that evidence in a court proceeding after the date of enactment of the Innocence Protection Act of 2004; or

ii. Knowingly fail to request DNA testing of that evidence in a prior motion for post-conviction DNA testing; or

B. Was previously subjected to DNA testing and the applicant is requesting DNA testing using a new method or technology that is substantially more probative than the prior DNA testing.

4. The specific evidence to be tested is in the possession of the Government and has been subject to a chain of custody and retained under conditions sufficient to ensure that such evidence has not been substituted, contaminated, tampered with, replaced, or altered in any respect material to the proposed DNA testing.

5. The proposed DNA testing is reasonable in scope, uses scientifically sound methods, and is consistent with accepted forensic practices.

6. The applicant identifies a theory of defense that —

A. Is not inconsistent with an affirmative defense presented at trial; and

B. Would establish the actual innocence of the applicant of the Federal or State offense referenced in the applicant's assertion under paragraph (1).

7. If the applicant was convicted following a trial, the identity of the perpetrator was at issue in the trial.

8. The proposed DNA testing of the specific evidence may produce new material evidence that would —

A. Support the theory of defense referenced in paragraph (6); and

B. Raise a reasonable probability that the applicant did not commit the offense.

9. The applicant certifies that the applicant will provide a DNA sample for purposes of comparison.

10. The motion is made in a timely fashion, subject to the following conditions:

A. There shall be a rebuttable presumption of timeliness if the motion is made within 60 months of enactment of the Justice for All Act of 2004 or within 36 months of conviction, whichever comes later. Such presumption may be rebutted upon a showing —

i. That the applicant's motion for a DNA test is based solely upon information used in a previously denied motion; or

ii. Of clear and convincing evidence that the applicant's filing is done solely to cause delay or harass.

B. There shall be a rebuttable presumption against timeliness for any motion not satisfying subparagraph (A) above. Such presumption may be rebutted upon the court's finding —

- i. That the applicant was or is incompetent and such incompetence substantially contributed to the delay in the applicant's motion for a DNA test;
 - ii. The evidence to be tested is newly discovered DNA evidence;
 - iii. That the applicant's motion is not based solely upon the applicant's own assertion of innocence and, after considering all relevant facts and circumstances surrounding the motion, a denial would result in a manifest injustice; or
 - iv. Upon good cause shown.
- C. For purposes of this paragraph —
- i. The term "incompetence" has the meaning as defined in section 4241 of title 18, United States Code;
 - ii. The term "manifest" means that which is unmistakable, clear, plain, or indisputable and requires that the opposite conclusion be clearly evident.
- b. Notice to the Government; preservation order; appointment of counsel —
- 1. Notice — Upon the receipt of a motion filed under subsection (a), the court shall —
 - A. Notify the Government; and
 - B. Allow the Government a reasonable time period to respond to the motion.
 - 2. Preservation order — To the extent necessary to carry out proceedings under this section, the court shall direct the Government to preserve the specific evidence relating to a motion under subsection (a).
 - 3. Appointment of counsel — The court may appoint counsel for an indigent applicant under this section in the same manner as in a proceeding under section 3006A(a)(2)(B).
- c. Testing procedures —
- 1. In general — The court shall direct that any DNA testing ordered under this section be carried out by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.
 - 2. Exception — Notwithstanding paragraph (1), the court may order DNA testing by another qualified laboratory if the court makes all necessary orders to ensure the integrity of the specific evidence and the reliability of the testing process and test results.
 - 3. Costs — The costs of any DNA testing ordered under this section shall be paid —
 - A. By the applicant; or
 - B. In the case of an applicant who is indigent, by the Government.
- d. Time limitation in capital cases — In any case in which the applicant is sentenced to death —
- 1. Any DNA testing ordered under this section shall be completed not later than 60 days after the date on which the Government responds to the motion filed under subsection (a); and
 - 2. Not later than 120 days after the date on which the DNA testing ordered under this section is completed, the court shall order any post-testing procedures under subsection (f) or (g), as appropriate.
- e. Reporting of test results —
- 1. In general — The results of any DNA testing ordered under this section shall be simultaneously disclosed to the court, the applicant, and the Government.
- 2. NDIS — The Government shall submit any test results relating to the DNA of the applicant to the National DNA Index System (referred to in this subsection as "NDIS").
 - 3. Retention of DNA sample —
 - A. Entry into NDIS — If the DNA test results obtained under this section are inconclusive or show that the applicant was the source of the DNA evidence, the DNA sample of the applicant may be retained in NDIS.
 - B. Match with other offense — If the DNA test results obtained under this section exclude the applicant as the source of the DNA evidence, and a comparison of the DNA sample of the applicant results in a match between the DNA sample of the applicant and another offense, the Attorney General shall notify the appropriate agency and preserve the DNA sample of the applicant.
 - C. No match — If the DNA test results obtained under this section exclude the applicant as the source of the DNA evidence, and a comparison of the DNA sample of the applicant does not result in a match between the DNA sample of the applicant and another offense, the Attorney General shall destroy the DNA sample of the applicant and ensure that such information is not retained in NDIS if there is no other legal authority to retain the DNA sample of the applicant in NDIS.
- f. Post-testing procedures; inconclusive and inculpatory results —
- 1. Inconclusive results — If DNA test results obtained under this section are inconclusive, the court may order further testing, if appropriate, or may deny the applicant relief.
 - 2. Inculpatory results — If DNA test results obtained under this section show that the applicant was the source of the DNA evidence, the court shall —
 - A. Deny the applicant relief; and
 - B. On motion of the Government —
 - i. Make a determination whether the applicant's assertion of actual innocence was false, and, if the court makes such a finding, the court may hold the applicant in contempt;
 - ii. Assess against the applicant the cost of any DNA testing carried out under this section;
 - iii. Forward the finding to the Director of the Bureau of Prisons, who, upon receipt of such a finding, may deny, wholly or in part, the good conduct credit authorized under section 3632 on the basis of that finding;
 - iv. If the applicant is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States Parole Commission, forward the finding to the Commission so that the Commission may deny parole on the basis of that finding; and
 - v. If the DNA test results relate to a State offense, forward the finding to any appropriate State official.
3. Sentence — In any prosecution of an applicant under chapter 79 for false assertions or other conduct in proceedings under this section, the court, upon conviction of the applicant, shall sentence the applicant to a term of imprisonment of not less than 3 years, which shall run consecutively to any other term of imprisonment the applicant is serving.
- g. Post-testing procedures; motion for new trial or resentencing —
- 1. In general — Notwithstanding any law that would bar a motion under this paragraph as untimely, if DNA test results obtained under this section exclude the applicant as the source of the DNA evidence, the applicant may file a motion for a new trial or resentencing, as appropriate. The court shall establish a reasonable schedule for the applicant to file such a motion and for the Government to respond to the motion.

2. Standard for granting motion for new trial or resentencing—The court shall grant the motion of the applicant for a new trial or resentencing, as appropriate, if the DNA test results, when considered with all other evidence in the case regardless of whether such evidence was introduced at trial, establish by compelling evidence that a new trial would result in an acquittal of—

A. In the case of a motion for a new trial, the Federal offense for which the applicant is under a sentence of imprisonment or death; and

B. In the case of a motion for resentencing, another Federal or State offense, if evidence of such offense was admitted during a Federal death sentencing hearing and exoneration of such offense would entitle the applicant to a reduced sentence or a new sentencing proceeding.

h. Other laws unaffected—

1. Post-conviction relief—Nothing in this section shall affect the circumstances under which a person may obtain DNA testing or post-conviction relief under any other law.

2. Habeas corpus—Nothing in this section shall provide a basis for relief in any Federal habeas corpus proceeding.

3. Not a motion under section 2255—A motion under this section shall not be considered to be a motion under section 2255 for purposes of determining whether the motion or any other motion is a second or successive motion under section 2255.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant could be executed after the time for execution set by law had passed.

Case Holding: The defendant could be executed after the time for execution set by law had passed because the delay in carrying out the execution was caused by appeals initiated by the defendant.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William D. Cross, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the District of Columbia. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia affirmed the judgment. The defendant filed a petition for appeal with the United States Supreme Court, challenging his conviction and sentence. The government filed a motion to dismiss the petition on the grounds that the Supreme Court did not have appellate jurisdiction over the case. The Supreme Court agreed and dismissed the petition for appeal in Cross v. United States.

The defendant next filed a habeas corpus petition in a trial court for the District of Columbia, which was dismissed. The appellate court of the District of Columbia affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted an appeal. The government filed a motion to dismiss the petition on the grounds that the Supreme Court did not have appellate jurisdiction over the case. The Supreme Court agreed and dismissed the petition for appeal in Cross v. Burke.

The defendant then filed an application for habeas corpus relief directly with the Supreme Court, contending that he could not be executed because the time for execution required by law had expired.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice ruled that the defendant's argument was without merit. It was said that the time of execution was not part of the sentence of death unless made so by statute. The chief justice found that under the laws of the District of Columbia, promulgated by Congress, "if the time for execution had passed, in any case, the court could make a new order." The opinion reasoned: "Unquestionably, congress did not intend that the execution of a sentence should not be carried out, if judgment were affirmed on [appeal], except where the appellate court was able to announce a result within the time allowed for the application for the [appeal] to be made. The postponements were rendered necessary by reason of delays occasioned by the acts of the condemned in his own interest, and the position that he thereby became entitled to be set at large cannot be sustained." The defendant's application for habeas relief was denied. See also Cross v. Burke; Cross v. United States

Issue Presented: Whether the State trial court could set an imminent execution date before the United States Supreme Court issued its mandate affirming a federal district court's denial of habeas relief to the defendant.

Case Holding: The State trial court could set an imminent execution date before the United States Supreme Court issued its mandate affirming a federal district court's denial of habeas relief to the defendant, although the better practice would be to wait for the mandate to be issued.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Durrant, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of California. The California Supreme Court affirmed the judgment on appeal. The defendant subsequently filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. The habeas petition was dismissed. The defendant thereafter appealed the habeas dismissal to the United States Supreme Court. The Supreme Court summarily denied the habeas appeal. However, before the Supreme Court sent its mandate to the federal district court affirming the dismissal, the State trial court set an execution date for the defendant. The defendant thereafter motioned the Supreme Court to grant him habeas relief because the State intended to execute him before the mandate was sent to the federal district court.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice referred to the Court's decision in the case of In Re Jugiro, in order to hold that the State trial court could set an execution date even though its mandate affirming the denial of habeas relief had not been sent to the federal district court. The opinion held succinctly: "The judgment of this court affirming [the federal] order was rendered, as we know from our own records, and we have decided that if the state court, after judgment here, proceeds before our mandate issues, its action, though not to be commended, is not void." The defendant's motion for relief was denied and the case dismissed. See also In Re Jugiro; Mandate Issues Presented: (1) Whether New York could set an execution date for the defendant before the United States Supreme Court filed its mandate in a federal district court affirming the district court's denial of habeas relief to the defendant. (2) Whether the defendant's conviction and sentence were invalid because of his claim that Japanese residents were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holdings: (1) New York could set an execution date for the defendant before the United States Supreme Court filed its mandate in a federal district court affirming the district court's denial of habeas relief to the defendant, although it would have been more appropriate to wait for the mandate to be filed. (2) The merits of the defendant's jury discrimination claim could not be addressed by federal courts because the defendant failed to raise the issue before the courts of New York.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Shibuya Jugiro, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of New York. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court challenging his conviction and sentence. The district court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court, by memorandum order, affirmed the district court's decision. Subsequently, a death warrant was issued fixing the date of the defendant's execution. The defendant thereafter filed another habeas corpus petition in a federal district court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that he could not be executed because the United States Supreme Court had not sent a mandate to the district court affirming the district court's decision. The defendant also alleged, for the first time, that his conviction and sentence were invalid because Japanese residents were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The district court dismissed the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan held that New York did not have to postpone the execution because the Court had not sent a mandate to the district court officially affirming its decision on the defendant's first habeas proceeding. The opinion acknowledged "it would have been more appropriate and orderly if the state court had deferred [setting the execution date] until our mandate was issued." However, the Court was not willing to concede that mere filing of the mandate of affirmance with the district court was "absolutely necessary before the state court [could] proceed in the execution of the judgment of conviction."

In turning to the defendant's jury discrimination claim, the Court held that the resolution of the issue was controlled by its decision in the case of In Re Wood. The Wood decision held that a claim of jury discrimination by a State could not be raised for the first time in a federal habeas proceeding. In order for federal courts to have jurisdiction to address the merits of a jury discrimination claim, Wood required the appropriate State courts to have addressed the issue first. Justice Harlan found that the defendant failed to present his jury discrimination claim to the courts of New York. The opinion also stated: "The criminal laws of New York [made] no discrimination against [the defendant] because of his nativity or race. They accord[ed] to him when upon trial for his life or liberty the same rights and privileges that are accorded, under like circumstances, to native or naturalized citizens of this country." The judgment of the district court was affirmed. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; In Re Durrant; In Re Wood; Mandate; Procedural Default of Constitutional Claims Issue Presented: Whether imposition of the death penalty by a current of electricity violates the Constitution as cruel and unusual punishment.

Case Holding: The use of electricity to execute a sentence of death does not violate the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William Kemmler, was indicted for capital murder by the State of New York in 1889. He was convicted and sentenced to death by electrocution. After unsuccessfully challenging his conviction and sentence on direct appeal, the defendant filed a habeas corpus petition arguing that death by electrocution violated the federal Constitution as cruel and unusual punishment. The courts of New York rejected the claim. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the matter.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice wrote: "Difficulty would attend the effort to define with exactness the extent of the constitutional provision which provides that cruel and unusual punishments shall not be inflicted; but it is safe to affirm that punishments of torture, ... and all others in the same line of unnecessary cruelty, are forbidden by that amendment to the constitution." Elaborating on this theme, the opinion observed: "Punishments are cruel when they involve torture or a lingering death; but the punishment of death is not cruel within the meaning of that word as used in the constitution. It implies there something inhuman and barbarous, something more than the mere extinguishment of life."

The chief justice noted: "The courts of New York held that the mode [of punishment] adopted in this instance might be said to be unusual because it was new, but that it could not be assumed to be cruel in the light of that common knowledge which has stamped certain punishments as such; that it was for the legislature to say in what manner sentence of death should be executed; that this [form of punishment] was ... passed in the effort to devise a more humane method of reaching the result."

Ultimately, the chief justice determined that death by electrocution was a matter that was in the sphere of the State of New York to decide, insofar as such punishment was not shown to be in violation of the Constitution. The opinion concluded: "The enactment of this [punishment] was, in itself, within the legitimate sphere of the legislative power of the state, and in the observance of those general rules prescribed by our systems of jurisprudence; and the legislature of the state of New York determined that it did not inflict cruel and unusual punishment, and its courts have sustained that determination. We cannot perceive that the state has thereby abridged the privileges or immunities of the [defendant], or deprived him of due process of law." The judgment of New York's highest court was affirmed. See also Electrocutation

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's conviction and sentence were invalid because he was prosecuted under a statute that was not in existence at the time of his crime.

Case Holding: The defendant's conviction and sentence were invalid because he was prosecuted under a statute that was not in existence at the time of his crime.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, James J. Medley, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to die by the State of Colorado. The Colorado Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The defendant subsequently filed a habeas corpus petition directly with the United States Supreme Court. In the petition, the defendant alleged that he was convicted and sentenced under a statute that was not in existence at the time of the commission of his crime; therefore, the judgment against him violated the Ex Post Facto Clause.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Miller: Justice Miller found that the defendant's conviction and sentence violated the Ex Post Facto Clause. The opinion stated that "it may be said that any law which was passed after the commission of the offense for which the party is being tried is an ex post facto law when it inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime at the time it was committed or which alters the situation of the accused to his disadvantage; and that no one can be criminally punished in this country except according to a law prescribed for his government by the sovereign authority before the imputed offense was committed, or by some law passed afterwards, by which the punishment is not increased." Justice Miller determined that two provisions of the statute under which the defendant was prosecuted were not in existence at the time of his crime.

One of the provisions disapproved of by the Court involved detaining the defendant in solitary confinement until he was executed. Under the law at the time of the defendant's crime, "[t]he prisoner was to be kept in the county jail under the control of the sheriff of the county, who was the officer charged with the execution of the sentence of the court." Justice Miller ruled "that the solitary confinement to which the prisoner was subjected by the [new] statute..., was an additional punishment of the most important and painful character, and is therefore forbidden by [the Ex Post Facto Clause] of the constitution of the United States."

The opinion also disapproved of a provision under the new law which gave the warden the authority to fix the day and time of execution. Under the law at the time of the defendant's crime, the trial court had the authority to fix the day and time of execution. It is obvious that it confers upon the warden of the penitentiary a power which had heretofore been solely confided to the court and is therefore a departure from the law as it stood when the crime was committed. It was concluded by Justice Miller that "this new power of fixing any day and hour during a period of a week for the execution is a new and important power conferred on that officer, and is a departure from the law as it existed at the time the offense was committed, and with its secrecy must be accompanied by an immense mental anxiety amounting to a great increase of the offender's punishment."

Because of the two constitutionally objectionable provisions of the State's new statute, Justice Miller held: "These considerations render it our duty to order the release of the prisoner from the custody of the warden of the penitentiary of Colorado, as he is now held by him under the judgment and order of the court." The judgment of the Colorado Supreme Court was reversed and the defendant ordered released.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Brewer, in Which Bradley, J., Joined: Justice Brewer dissented from the Court's decision. He wrote: "The substantial punishment imposed by each statute is death by hanging. The differences between the two, as to the manner in which this sentence of death shall be carried into execution, are trifling.... Yet, on account of these differences, a convicted murderer is to escape the death he deserves, and be turned loose in society." See also Ex Post Facto Clause Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's appeal was properly before the United States Supreme Court.

Case Holding: The defendant's appeal was not properly before the United States Supreme Court because it was not requested by any justice nor concurred in by any justice.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, William Robertson, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Virginia. The Virginia Supreme Court affirmed the judgment. The defendant then appealed to the United States Supreme Court, which denied review. However, by some mistake, the case was placed on the Supreme Court's docket as being accepted.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice Fuller: The chief justice held that the case was not properly before the Court and application for appeal had to be denied. The opinion explained: "Applications to this court for [appeal] are not entertained, unless at the request of one of the members of the court, concurred in by his associates. In this case there seems to have been some misunderstanding on the part of counsel as to the practice, in view of which, and considering that this is a capital case, and that the day appointed for the execution of the sentence is very near, we have examined the application, and are of opinion that the [issue presented] is not a federal question, and that no federal question appears, upon the record, to have been presented to the supreme court of appeals of Virginia." The appeal was dismissed.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's conviction and death sentence were void because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him.

Case Holding: The jury discrimination issue could not be addressed by federal courts because the defendant failed to raise the issue in the State courts of New York.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Joseph Wood, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of New York. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court, alleging that his conviction violated the federal Constitution because blacks were systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted him and the petit jury that convicted him. The district court rejected the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Harlan: Justice Harlan indicated that under the Court's precedent, Neal v. Delaware, States were prohibited from systematically excluding blacks from grand or petit juries. It was said that the defendant could not invoke the rule observed in Neal because the issue of jury discrimination was never presented to the courts of New York by the defendant. Justice Harlan made clear that, if a defendant desired to raise a claim of unlawful jury discrimination by a State, the defendant must first raise the issue in a State court in order for a federal court to examine the matter in a habeas corpus proceeding. The judgment of the district court was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Field: Justice Field concurred

in the Court's judgment. He wrote that it was his view that the Constitution did not prohibit States from excluding blacks from grand or petit juries. Justice Field argued that States were free to determine the qualifications required to participate in grand or petit juries. See also Discrimination in Grand or Petit Jury Selection; In Re Jugo; Procedural Default of Constitutional Claims Insanity Insanity is a legal term of art that varies in meaning, depending upon the jurisdiction. As a general matter, insanity is a condition of the mind which negates the necessary mens rea or culpability prong of an offense. In the eyes of the law, insanity may be temporary, permanent, or partial.

The issue of insanity may present itself at various stages of a capital murder prosecution. The issue may arise before trial, during the guilt phase, at the penalty phase, as a defense, or while awaiting execution. The United States Constitution requires that a defendant be competent throughout all stages of the prosecution. If a determination is made by the trial judge at any stage of the prosecution that the defendant may not be competent to assist his or her counsel, nor understand the nature of the proceedings, the proceedings must come to a halt. The trial court is obligated, upon a proper showing of possible incompetence, to order a psychiatric examination of the defendant. Usually defense counsel will seek an independent evaluation in conjunction with the evaluation done at the behest of the court. Prosecutors generally will rely upon the testing done by the court ordered psychiatric examination.

After a defendant has undergone psychiatric evaluations, a competency hearing will be held. At that proceeding, the court will hear evidence from all psychiatrists involved. The two key constitutional issues the court is concerned with during the hearing is whether the defendant is capable of understanding the nature of the proceedings against him or her and is able to assist his or her counsel in his or her defense. If the evidence shows that the defendant understands the nature of the proceedings and is able to assist in his or her defense, the prosecution will proceed. Conversely, if the evidence shows that the defendant felon does not understand the nature of the proceedings and is unable to assist in his or her defense, the defendant will be remanded to a correctional facility for treatment aimed at restoring his or her mental competency. Should the defendant remain mentally incompetent after a brief period of treatment, a civil commitment proceeding must occur in order to legally confine the defendant for however long it takes to restore his or her sanity.

The United States Supreme Court has disapproved, on constitutional due process grounds, of imposing upon a defendant the burden of proving competency to "stand trial" by clear and convincing evidence. This high standard has been deemed constitutionally unfair because it would permit an "insane" person to stand trial. The highest burden of proof that may be constitutionally imposed upon a defendant claiming incompetence to stand trial is the preponderance of the evidence standard of proof.

A problem that very often arises in the area of a defendant's competency to stand trial is the issue of forced use of anti-psychotic drugs to enable the defendant to be prosecuted. It has been held by the United States Supreme Court that forced administration of anti-psychotic medication during the defendant's trial may violate a defendant's constitutional right to a fair trial.

In order for a State to force a defendant to use an anti-psychotic drug during a trial, the State must show that the treatment was medically appropriate and, considering less intrusive alternatives, essential for the defendant's own safety or the safety of others. Additionally, the State may justify such treatment if medically appropriate, by showing that an adjudication of guilt or innocence could not be obtained by using less intrusive means. See also Cooper v. Oklahoma; Ford v. Wainwright; Godinez v. Moran; Guilty but Mentally Ill; Insanity Defense; Insanity While Awaiting Execution; Riggins v. Nevada

Insanity Defense The insanity defense is an affirmative defense. Capital punishment jurisdictions vary in the burden of proof imposed on a capital felon asserting the insanity defense. Most jurisdictions impose a preponderance of the evidence burden. However, the United States Supreme Court has approved of requiring a defendant prove insanity beyond a reasonable doubt. Notwithstanding the burden placed on a defendant, the prosecutor must still prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

The issue of insanity as a defense is centered on the defendant's state of mind precisely at the time of the commission of the offense. If, during the guilt phase of trial, the prosecutor fails to show beyond a reasonable doubt that a defendant was sane at the time the offense was being committed, then a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity must be returned by the trial factfinder. The ultimate result of acquittal that follows a successful assertion of the insanity defense caused two capital punishment jurisdictions, Idaho and Montana, to abolish the defense by statute.

The first step in a capital punishment prosecution wherein the defendant asserts the insanity defense is for the trial court to make a determination as to whether the defendant is competent for trial purposes. To make this determination, the trial court will order a psychiatric evaluation of the defendant. The evaluation at this stage is for the purpose of determining whether the defendant is competent to stand trial. As a practical matter, the overwhelming majority of defendants who assert the insanity defense are found to be competent for trial purposes. The statutory procedure for determining sanity used by Colorado illustrates the procedure generally used by all jurisdictions.

Colo. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 16-8-105.5

Insanity Defense Procedure:

1. When a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity is accepted, the court shall forthwith commit the defendant for a sanity examination, specifying the place and period of commitment.
2. Upon receiving the report of the sanity examination, the court shall immediately set the case for trial. Every person is presumed to be sane; but, once any evidence of insanity is introduced, the people have the burden of proving sanity beyond a reasonable doubt.
3. When the affirmative defense of not guilty by reason of insanity has been raised, the jury shall be given special verdict forms containing interrogatories. The trier of fact shall decide first the question of guilt as to felony charges that are before the court. If the trier of fact concludes that guilt has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt as to one or more of the felony charges submitted for consideration, the special interrogatories shall not be answered. Upon completion of its deliberations on the felony charges as previously set forth in this subsection (3), the trier of fact shall consider any other charges before the court in a similar manner; except that it shall not answer the special interrogatories regarding such charges if it has previously found guilt beyond a reasonable doubt with respect to one or more felony charges. The interrogatories shall provide for specific findings of the jury with respect to the affirmative defense of not guilty by reason of insanity. When the court sits as the trier of fact, it shall enter appropriate specific findings with respect to the affirmative defense of not guilty by reason of insanity.

4. If the trier of fact finds the defendant not guilty by reason of insanity, the court shall commit the defendant to the custody of the department of human services until such time as the defendant is found eligible for release. The executive director of the department of human services shall designate the state facility at which the defendant shall be held for care and psychiatric treatment and may transfer the defendant from one facility to another if in the opinion of the director it is desirable to do so in the interest of the proper care, custody, and treatment of the defendant or the protection of the public or the personnel of the facilities in question.

Legal Definitions of Insanity: The most perplexing issue involving the insanity defense has been that of finding a workable legal definition for the defense. Numerous definitions for legal insanity have been crafted by judges, legislators, and commentators on the law. The most reported upon legal definitions of insanity include the M'Naghten rule, Durham rule, Irresistible Impulse test, and the Substantial Capacity test.

M'Naghten Rule. The M'Naghten rule was imported to the United States from England. This test for insanity was developed in an English judicial decision styled M'Naghten's Case, 8 Eng.Rep. 718 (1843). Under the M'Naghten rule, a trial court instructs the jury that the defendant may be found not guilty by reason of insanity if the evidence shows that, at the time of committing the act, the defendant was suffering under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he or she was doing; or, if he or she did know it, that he or she did not know what he or she was doing was wrong. When the M'Naghten rule first hit the legal shores of the United States, it was quickly adopted by almost every court in the nation. Time, however, proved the test to be cumbersome and unworkable.

Durham Rule. The Durham rule represented the initial break with the unworkable M'Naghten rule. The Durham rule was fashioned in the case of Durham v. United States, 214 F.2d 862 (D.C. Cir. 1954). Under the Durham rule, the jury is instructed by the trial court that in order to find the defendant not guilty by reason of insanity, the evidence must establish that the defendant was suffering from a diseased or defective mental condition at the time of the commission of the act charged; and that there was a causal relation between such disease or defective condition and the act. The Durham rule has never been widely adopted.

Irresistible Impulse Test. The Irresistible Impulse test was developed by courts as an alternative to the M'Naghten rule. In the final analysis, the Irresistible Impulse test is broader than the M'Naghten Rule. The Irresistible Impulse test is defined as an impulse to commit a criminal act which cannot be resisted, because a mental disease has destroyed a defendant's freedom of will, power of self-control, and choice of actions. Under this test, a defendant may avoid criminal responsibility for his or her conduct, even though he or she is capable of distinguishing between right and wrong and is fully aware of the nature and quality of his or her conduct, provided he or she establishes that he or she was unable to refrain from acting. A number of courts utilize this test.

Substantial Capacity Test. The Substantial Capacity test was developed by the American Law Institute in 1962 and set out under § 4.01 of the Model Penal Code. Under the Substantial Capacity test, a defendant is not responsible for criminal conduct if at the time of such conduct, as a result of mental disease or defect, he or she lacks substantial capacity either to appreciate the wrongfulness of his or her conduct or to conform his or her conduct to the requirement of the law. The Substantial Capacity test has been widely adopted. As illustrated below, the federal government has adopted a version of the substantial capacity test.

18 U.S.C.A. § 17 Federal Insanity Defense Reform Act of 1984:

a. Affirmative Defense—It is an affirmative defense to a prosecution under any Federal statute that, at the time of the commission of the acts constituting the offense, the defendant, as a result of a severe mental disease or defect, was unable to appreciate the nature and quality or the wrongfulness of his acts. Mental disease or defect does not otherwise constitute a defense.

b. Burden of Proof—The defendant has the burden of proving the defense of insanity by clear and convincing evidence.

Bifurcation of Guilt and Insanity Issues: A few capital punishment jurisdictions have, by statute, instituted a bifurcated trial of the issue of guilt and insanity. The legislatures in Arizona, California, Colorado, and Wyoming created a procedure requiring bifurcated trials whenever a defendant raises the insanity defense. In Arizona and Wyoming, the statutes were found unconstitutional by the supreme courts of each state. The basic idea behind such statutes is simple. First, a trial on the issue of the defendant's guilt is held. Second, if the defendant is found guilty, a trial on the issue of insanity is held. The statutory bifurcation procedures utilized by California, as shown below, illustrate how the matter proceeds.

Cal. Penal Code § 1026(A) Bifurcated Trial of Guilt and Insanity Defense: When a defendant pleads not guilty by reason of insanity, and also joins with it another plea or pleas, the defendant shall first be tried as if only such other plea or pleas had been entered, and in that trial the defendant shall be conclusively presumed to have been sane at the time the offense is alleged to have been committed. If the jury shall find the defendant guilty, or if the defendant pleads only not guilty by reason of insanity, then the question whether the defendant was sane or insane at the time the offense was committed shall be promptly tried, either before the same jury or before a new jury in the discretion of the court. In that trial, the jury shall return a verdict either that the defendant was sane at the time the offense was committed or was insane at the time the offense was committed. If the verdict or finding is that the defendant was sane at the time the offense was committed, the court shall sentence the defendant as provided by law. If the verdict or finding be that the defendant was insane at the time the offense was committed, the court, unless it shall appear to the court that the sanity of the defendant has been recovered fully, shall direct that the defendant be confined in a state hospital for the care and treatment of the mentally disordered or any other appropriate public or private treatment facility approved by the community program director, or the court may order the defendant placed on outpatient status.

Civil Commitment: Although being found not guilty by reason of insanity acquits a defendant of the offense, this does not mean that the defendant will freely leave the courtroom upon hearing the verdict of the factfinder. A defendant found not guilty by reason of insanity will usually be confined to a secure mental institution under the civil commitment laws of the jurisdiction. This is accomplished through a post-acquittal civil commitment proceeding wherein a determination is made as to whether the defendant felon is a substantial danger to him/herself or society by reason of a mental defect that is short of insanity. The procedure used by Utah, as shown below, illustrate the basic procedure used by all jurisdictions.

Utah Code Ann. § 77-16a-302 Persons Found Not Guilty by Reason of Insanity:

1. Upon a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity, the court shall conduct a hearing within ten days to determine whether the defendant is currently mentally ill. The defense counsel and prosecutors may request further evaluations and present testimony from those examiners.

2. After the hearing and upon consideration of the record, the court shall order the defendant committed to the department if it finds by clear and convincing evidence that:

- a. The defendant is still mentally ill; and
- b. Because of that mental illness, the defendant presents a substantial danger to himself or others.

3. The period of commitment described in Subsection (2) may not exceed the period for which the defendant could be incarcerated had he been convicted and received the maximum sentence for the crime of which he was accused. At the time that period expires, involuntary civil commitment proceedings may be instituted.

Insanity While Awaiting Execution The common law prohibited execution of a defendant who had become insane prior to execution. This common law proscriptive rule was adopted by Anglo-American jurisprudence. In addition to the common law rule against executing an insane capital felon, the federal Constitution has been interpreted to bar execution of an insane capital felon, on the grounds of being cruel and unusual punishment. Even though the common law and federal Constitution bar executing an insane capital felon, a majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have codified this prohibition.

JURISDICTIONS CODIFYING BAR AGAINST EXECUTING INSANE CAPITAL FELON

- NON-STATUTE JURISDICTIONS

Capital punishment jurisdictions differ on the disposition of a convicted capital felon who has become insane prior to being executed. Some jurisdictions confine the capital felon until he or she returns to sanity and then executes him or her. Other jurisdictions require the capital felon's sentence be reduced to life imprisonment without parole. The procedure used by Mississippi is illustrated below.

Miss. Code Ann. § 99-19-57(A) Procedure

a. If it is believed that a convict under sentence of death has become insane since the judgment of the court, the following shall be the exclusive procedural and substantive procedure. The convict, or a person acting as his next friend, or the commissioner of corrections may file an appropriate application seeking post conviction relief with the Mississippi Supreme Court. If it is found that the convict is insane, as defined in this subsection, the court shall suspend the execution of the sentence. The convict shall then be committed to the forensic unit of the Mississippi State Hospital at Whitfield. The order of commitment shall require that the convict be examined and a written report be furnished to the court at that time and every month thereafter stating whether there is a substantial probability that the convict will become sane under this subsection within the foreseeable future and whether progress is being made toward that goal. If at any time during such commitment the appropriate official at the state hospital shall consider the convict is sane under this subsection, such official shall promptly notify the court to that effect in writing, and place the convict in the custody of the commissioner of corrections. The court shall thereupon conduct a hearing on the sanity of the convict. The finding of the circuit court is a final order appealable under the terms and conditions of the Mississippi Uniform Post-Conviction Collateral Relief Act.

b. For the purposes of this subsection, a person shall be deemed insane if the court finds the convict does not have sufficient intelligence to understand the nature of the proceedings against him, what he was tried for, the purpose of his punishment, the impending fate which awaits him, and a sufficient understanding to know any fact which might exist which would make his punishment unjust or unlawful and the intelligence requisite to convey such information to his attorneys or the court.

Intermediate Courts of Appeal There are two types of appellate courts: intermediate and final. A majority of capital punishment jurisdictions have both intermediate and final courts of appeal. Capital punishment jurisdictions that do not have intermediate appellate courts include Delaware, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, South Dakota, and Wyoming. The issue of whether a jurisdiction has an intermediate appellate court has significance in those jurisdictions that permit direct capital appeals or capital habeas corpus appeals to be reviewed by intermediate appellate courts. Involvement of an intermediate appellate court will slow done the process between sentence and execution.

INTERMEDIATE APPELLATE COURT JURISDICTIONS

International Capital Punishment Nations A decisive trend was set in motion during the last decade of the twentieth century, which saw the international community moving away from capital punishment. This trend carried over into the twenty-first century so that by the end of 2006, there were eighty-seven nations that had abolished capital punishment for all crimes, while 108 nations still retained the punishment in some form in their legal codes. (A large minority of the nations still retaining capital punishment have severely restricted the circumstances when it may be imposed or have not imposed the punishment in over a decade. Some authorities prefer to include such nations with true non-capital punishment nations, but such inclusion is inaccurate and misleading.)

International agreements have been a prominent impetus for the trend toward international abolishment of capital punishment. The four major international agreements calling for the abolishment of capital punishment that have been ratified by other nations are (1) Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights; (2) Protocol No. 6 to the European Convention for the Protection of Human

International Court of Justice The International Court of Justice is the primary judicial organ of the United Nations. The Court is located in the Netherlands at the Peace Palace in the Hague. The Court was established in 1946, after it replaced its predecessor, the Permanent Court of International Justice. The Court was founded for the purpose of resolving legal disputes submitted to it by countries and to provide advisory opinions on international legal questions. The membership of the Court consists of fifteen judges who are elected to nine-year terms by the United Nations General Assembly and Security Council. Under the rules governing the Court, each judge must be from a different country. If the Court hears a case in which a judge is not of the nationality of a country that is a party to the litigation, that country may appoint someone to sit as a judge ad hoc solely for that case. Seats on the Court are filled for one-third of its membership every three years. To qualify for membership on the Court, a person must be eligible for appointment to the highest judicial office of his/her country or be a jurist with recognized competency in international law.

Under its rules, the Court may only hear cases that are brought in the name of a country. Neither individuals nor organizations may be a party. The Court may hear a dispute only if the countries involved have accepted its jurisdiction in one or more of the following ways: (1) by special agreement between the parties to submit their dispute to the Court; (2) by a treaty in which both parties are signatories and such treaty authorizes the countries to submit a dispute involving the treaty to the Court; or (3) through the United Nation's Statute wherein both parties have made a declaration that jurisdiction of the Court is compulsory in the event of a dispute.

The procedure used by the Court requires both parties to file and exchange pleadings. Oral arguments are made to the Court at public hearings by agents and counsels for the parties. (The Court utilizes English and French as its official languages for speaking and writing.) After oral arguments are concluded, the Court deliberates in chambers to vote on a decision and then delivers its judgment at a public hearing. The Court decides each case in accordance with international treaties, international custom, and general principles of law. The judgment of the Court is final and cannot be appealed. The Court's judgment may be enforced by the Security Council of the United Nations.

From 1946 to 2006, the Court delivered ninety-two judgments that included disputes involving land frontiers and maritime boundaries, territorial sovereignty, interference in the internal affairs of countries, diplomatic relations, hostage-taking, the right of asylum, nationality, and economic rights. As discussed below, two of the cases decided by the Court involved defendants sentenced to death in the United States.

In one case, Federal Republic of Germany v. United States, 2001 I.C.J. 466 (June 27), Germany filed a complaint against the United States on March 2, 1999. It was alleged by Germany that the United States violated Article 36 of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations with respect to the convictions and death sentences of two German nationals, Karl and Walter LaGrand, by the State of Arizona. The violations involved the failure to inform the German consular of the LaGrand brothers' arrest and the failure to inform the LaGrand brothers of their right to consular assistance, as required by Article 36.

The Court rendered a judgment in the case on June 27, 2001. In that judgment, the Court found that the United States did not deny that it had violated Article 36 as alleged by Germany. As for a remedy, the Court pointed out that the United States had agreed to implement a program to ensure that the notification requirements of Article 36 were followed in all jurisdictions. The Court ended its judgment by warning that should future notification problems be brought against the United States, the Court would require the convictions and sentences of affected individuals be reconsidered in light of noncompliance with Article 36. Arizona executed the LaGrand brothers in 1999.

Mexico filed a complaint against the United States on January 9, 2003, in the case of Mexico v. United States, 2004 I.C.J. 128 (March 31). In that case, Mexico alleged that the United States violated Article 36 with respect to fifty-two (originally fifty-four) Mexican nationals who were sentenced to death in various jurisdictions. The Court rendered its judgment in the case on March 31, 2004. In that judgment, the Court held that Article 36 required countries to provide consular information as soon as it is known that an arrested person is a foreign national. The Court concluded that fifty-one of the fifty-two Mexican nationals in the case were not given consular information as required by Article 36. It was also found that in forty-nine of the cases, the United States violated its obligation under Article 36 to allow Mexican consular officials to communicate with the arrested individuals. Further, the Court held that in thirty-four of the cases, the United States failed to permit consular officials to arrange for their legal representation. Although Mexico sought, as a remedy for the violations, to have the convictions and death sentences of the prisoners vacated, the Court declined to impose such a penalty. Instead, the Court held that each prisoner's conviction and death sentence had to be reviewed by the appropriate United States court, in light of the violations of Article 36.

In response to the decision of the Court, President George W. Bush issued a February 28, 2005, memorandum for the Attorney General, wherein it was said that local authorities had to give effect to the Court's decision. Additionally, the Court's decision was recognized by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Medellin v. Dretke, 544 U.S. 660 (2005). The defendant in Medellin, a Mexican national, asked the Supreme Court to set aside his conviction and death sentence because the State of Texas violated Article 36 during his prosecution. The Supreme Court dismissed the appeal to permit a Texas court to review the issue in light of President Bush's memorandum. See also Breard v. Greene; Foreign Nationals and Capital Punishment; LaGrand Brothers; Medellin v. Dretke

Intervention by Next Friend There have been incidents where death row inmates request death and terminate the appeal process. In such situations, the rules of criminal procedure permit relatives, such as parents of the condemned inmate, to seek to intervene on behalf of the inmate as a "next friend." A prerequisite for litigating as a "next friend" is that the real party in interest (the inmate) be unable to litigate his or her own cause due to mental incapacity, lack of access to court, or other similar disability. Courts uniformly hold that this prerequisite is not satisfied where an evidentiary hearing shows that the inmate has given a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver of his or her right to challenge a death sentence. See also Demosthenes v. Baal; Gusman v. Marrero; Rosenberg v. United States; Whitmore v. Arkansas

Intoxication Defense Under the common law, voluntary intoxication afforded no excuse, justification, or extenuation of an offense committed under its influence. All jurisdictions follow the common law insofar as they do not permit the intoxication defense to exonerate a defendant of criminal responsibility. However, jurisdictions do permit intoxication to be used as a defense to reduce capital murder to a lesser included homicide. See also Affirmative Defenses; Hopt v. Utah (I); Intoxication Mitigator

Intoxication Mitigator Courts generally hold that voluntary intoxication or drug use is a weak mitigating factor. Nevertheless, courts permit intoxication or drug use to be used as a non-statutory mitigating circumstance at the penalty phase, when it is relevant and there has been a showing of a history of alcohol or drug abuse. Seven capital punishment jurisdictions, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Kentucky, Louisiana, Nebraska, and Utah, make intoxication or drug use a statutory mitigating circumstance. Courts generally permit evidence of alcohol or drug use to be used in an attempt to satisfy the "capacity substantially impaired" statutory mitigating circumstance. See also Capacity Substantially Impaired Mitigator; Intoxication Defense; Mitigating Circumstances

Invalid Aggravator Statutory aggravating circumstances permit imposition of the death penalty; therefore, statutory aggravating circumstances must be constitutionally valid. That is, statutory aggravators cannot be vague in their meaning or have an over-inclusive application. Statutory aggravating circumstances are not unconstitutionally vague if they have some commonsense core of meaning that the factfinder is capable of understanding.

When faced with a “vagueness” challenge to a statutory aggravating circumstance, courts must determine whether the aggravator is vague on its face and, if so, whether appellate case law decisions have adequately defined the aggravator so as to provide guidance for the penalty phase factfinder. If a particular statutory aggravating circumstance leaves the factfinder without sufficient guidance for determining its evidentiary presence or absence, it will be constitutionally vague and invalid.

Infrequently, a jurisdiction will have a statutory aggravating circumstance that is constitutionally invalid for one reason or another. If a capital felon is sentenced to death based upon presentation of only one statutory aggravating circumstance and that aggravator is found to be constitutionally invalid, the death sentence must be vacated. On the other hand, where multiple aggravators have been used and only one is found to be invalid, the general rule is that a death sentence supported by multiple aggravating circumstances need not always be set aside. This rule is predicated on the fact that even after elimination of the invalid aggravator, the death sentence rests on firm ground. In the case of Brown v. Sanders, 126 S.Ct. 884 (2006), the Supreme Court abolished the case law distinction between “weighing” and “non-weighing” jurisdictions, with respect to determining whether consideration of an invalid guilt phase special circumstance or penalty phase aggravating circumstance warrants setting aside a death sentence. The decision in Brown held: “An invalidated sentencing factor (whether an eligibility factor or not) will render the sentence unconstitutional by reason of its adding an improper element to the aggravation scale in the weighing process unless one of the other sentencing factors enables the sentencer to give aggravating weight to the same facts and circumstances.” In other words, so long as the evidence used for an invalid factor was also used to support another valid factor, a death sentence will be upheld. Iowa The death penalty was abolished in Iowa in 1965.

Iowa Drug Murders In April 1993, a federal grand jury in the Northern District of Iowa indicted Dustin Honken (b. 1968) for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine. However, shortly after the indictment was handed down, two witnesses the government planned to call in the case disappeared. The witnesses were Gregory Nicholson and Terry DeGeus. As a result of the unexplained disappearance of the two witnesses, the government dismissed the drug case against Honken in March 1995.

On April 11, 1996, the federal government again indicted Honken on drug-trafficking charges. Honken eventually pled guilty in the case to conspiracy to distribute drugs and attempting to manufacture methamphetamine. He was sentenced to prison on the charges.

At the same time that Honken was being prosecuted for the drug offenses, the government continued to investigate into the disappearance of Nicholson and DeGeus. The investigation also focused on the disappearance of Nicholson’s girlfriend, Lori Duncan, and her two daughters, Kandi Duncan and Amber Duncan, ages ten and six, respectively. As a result of the investigation into the disappearance of the witnesses, in July 2000, the federal government indicted Honken’s former girlfriend, Angela Jane Johnson (b. 1964). Although the bodies of the victims had not been discovered, Johnson was charged with aiding and abetting the murder of Nicholson, DeGeus, Lori, Kandi, and Amber.

While Johnson was being held in an Iowa county jail awaiting prosecution, the government planted an informant in the jail to spy on her. Johnson eventually told the informant that Honken killed Nicholson, DeGeus, Lori, Kandi, and Amber in 1993 and that she was present when the murders occurred. Johnson provided the informant with a map that showed where the five murder victims were buried. The police recovered all five bodies in shallow graves just outside of Mason City, Iowa.

Following discovery of the bodies, a federal grand jury handed down separate indictments against Honken and Johnson in August 2001. The indictments charged them with five counts of committing murders while engaged in a drug-trafficking conspiracy and five counts of committing murders while engaged in a continuing criminal enterprise.

Honken and Johnson were tried separately for capital murder. On October 27, 2004, a federal jury sentenced Honken to life imprisonment for the murders of Nicholson, DeGeus, and Lori, but sentenced him to death for the murders of the two children. On June 21, 2005, a federal jury handed down a death sentence to Johnson for her role in the crimes.

During the trials of Honken and Johnson, some information was uncovered about how the murders took place. At some point in July 1993, Honken and Johnson concocted a plan to kill Nicholson while he was at Lori’s home. On July 25, 1993 Johnson appeared at Lori’s home, pretending to be a cosmetics saleswoman who was lost. When Lori let Johnson into her home, Honken rushed in and brandished a handgun. There were four people in the home when Honken and Johnson appeared: Nicholson, Lori, Kandi, and Amber.

Once inside the home, Johnson forced Lori, Kandi, and Amber into a bedroom. Honken forced Nicholson into another room and made him record a videotape statement exonerating Honken from any involvement with drug trafficking. After the videotape was made, all four victims were bound, gagged, strangled, and shot in the back of the head. Honken and Johnson took the bodies out of the home and buried them in a field outside Mason City. In November 1993, Johnson contacted DeGeus (he was her former boyfriend) and arranged to meet with him in a secluded area. When DeGeus arrived at the site, he was attacked by Honken and beaten with a baseball bat. Honken eventually shot DeGeus several times and buried his body in a field outside Mason City.

Iran Iran imposes capital punishment. Iran uses the firing squad, stoning, and hanging to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Islamic law. Iran’s constitution was adopted on December 3, 1979.

Iran has two primary court systems: regular courts, which try criminal cases; and Islamic Revolutionary Courts, which try offenses against internal or external security, narcotics crimes, and official corruption. Iran's Supreme Court has limited authority to review cases. Defendants have the right to a public trial, may choose their own lawyer, and have the right of appeal. There is no jury system in Iran. Trials are adjudicated by panels of judges. Defendants do not have the right to confront their accusers. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Iraq Capital punishment is carried out in Iraq. Iraq carries out the death penalty through hanging and the firing squad. Its legal system is based on Islamic law and a mixture of European civil law. Iraq was invaded by the United States in 2003 and, as a consequence, its government was overthrown. A new government was put in place in 2005, along with the ratification of a new constitution.

There are two judicial systems in Iraq: regular courts, which prosecute criminal offenses; and special security courts, which try cases involving espionage, treason, political dissent, smuggling, currency exchange violations, and drug trafficking. In addition to trial-level courts, Iraq has a court of appeal and supreme court.

Trials in the regular courts are public and defendants have the right to retained or appointed counsel. There is no jury system. Iraq uses a panel of three judges to try cases. Defendants have the right to appeal. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Issue Presented: Whether the doctrine of exhaustion of State remedies precluded the defendant from bringing a federal habeas corpus proceeding.

Case Holding: The doctrine of exhaustion of State remedies did not preclude the defendant from bringing a federal habeas corpus proceeding because his federal constitutional claim was addressed by the Indiana Supreme Court on direct appeal.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Irvin, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the State of Indiana. The defendant escaped from custody immediately after judgment was pronounced against him. While the defendant was an escapee, his defense counsel motioned the trial court for a new trial. The trial court, in denying the motion, noted that the defendant was an escapee when the motion was made and denied. After his capture and return to custody, the defendant filed an appeal to the Indiana Supreme Court. The only issue raised by the defendant was that it was error for the trial court to deny his motion for a new trial. The appellate court affirmed the conviction and sentence. In doing so, the appellate court ruled the motion for a new trial was correctly denied because the defendant was an escapee at the time it was made and because the trial did not deprive him of any constitutional right. Subsequently, the defendant petitioner filed a petition for habeas corpus relief in a federal district court. The district court dismissed the petition on the ground that the defendant had not exhausted his State court remedies, as required under federal habeas law. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan held that the defendant's habeas petition was properly before the district court. He wrote that a reasonable interpretation of the decision by the Indiana Supreme Court revealed that the State's appellate court determined that there was no merit to the defendant's constitutional claim. It was said that the doctrine of exhaustion of State remedies, which was codified in federal habeas law, did not bar resort to federal habeas corpus by the defendant because he obtained a decision on his constitutional claim, even though the State's appellate court could have based its decision on another State ground. Justice Brennan ruled that the Court would not reach the question of whether federal habeas corpus would have been available to the defendant had the Indiana Supreme Court rested its decision on the State escape ground. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded.

Concurring Statement by Justice Stewart: Justice Stewart issued a statement concurring in the judgment and the opinion of the Court.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter dissented from the Court's decision. He believed the Indiana Supreme Court did not decide the defendant's federal claim, though it gave the matter passing comments. He argued that the decision was based solely on State grounds:

Even the most benign or latitudinarian attitude in reading state court opinions precludes today's decision. It is not questioned that the Indiana Supreme Court discussed two issues, one indisputably a rule of local law and the other a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment. That court discussed the claim under the Fourteenth Amendment rather summarily, after it had dealt extensively with the problem of local law... What this Court is therefore saying, in effect, is that it interprets the discussion of the Fourteenth Amendment problem which follows the elaborate and potentially conclusive discussion of the state issue not as resting the case on two grounds, state and federal, but as a total abandonment of the state ground, a legal erasing of the seven-page discussion of state law. Concededly, if a state court rests a decision on both an adequate state ground and a federal ground, this Court is without jurisdiction to review the superfluous federal ground. For while state courts are subject to the Supremacy Clause of the United States Constitution, they are so subject only if that Clause becomes operative, and they need not pass on a federal issue if a relevant rule of state law can dispose of the litigation.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Harlan, in Which Frankfurter, Clark, and Whittaker, JJ., Joined: Justice Harlan dissented from the Court's decision. He agreed with the Court that the Indiana Supreme Court addressed the defendant's constitutional claim. Justice Harlan disagreed, however, with the Court's decision to remand the case to determine whether the State's appellate court correctly resolved the defendant's constitutional claim. He expressed his concerns as follows:

I think that the Court's disposition of the matter, which contemplates the overturning of [the defendant's] conviction without the necessity of further proceedings in the state courts if his constitutional contentions are ultimately federally sustained, rests upon an impermissible interpretation of the opinion of the State Supreme Court, and that a different procedural course is required if state and federal concerns in this situation are to be kept in proper balance.

Were we to conclude that the Indiana Supreme Court was correct in its premise that [the defendant's] constitutional points are without merit, the judgment of the Court of Appeals dismissing the writ of habeas corpus should of course be affirmed. If, on the other hand, we should decide that [the defendant] was in fact deprived of due process at trial, I would hold the case and give [the defendant] a reasonable opportunity to seek, through such avenues as may be open to him, a determination by the Indiana Supreme Court as to whether, in light of such a decision, it would nevertheless hold that [the defendant's] failure to comply with the State's procedural rules required affirmance of his conviction. Should no such avenues be open to [the defendant] in Indiana, it would then be time enough to decide what final disposition should be made of this case.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant was denied a fair trial because of pre-trial publicity.

Case Holding: The defendant was denied a fair trial because of pre-trial publicity and must be released, if the State of Indiana did not seek to retry him again.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Irvin, was able to get the United States Supreme Court to remand his case in Irvin v. Dowd (I), for the purpose of making a determination of his claim that he was denied a fair trial in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. A federal Court of Appeals reviewed the issue and found the following facts regarding the defendant's prosecution.

Six highly publicized unsolved murders had been committed in the area of Vanderburgh County, Indiana. Shortly after the defendant was arrested for one of the murders, the prosecutor and local police officials issued press releases, which were extensively publicized, stating that the defendant had confessed to the six murders. As a result of the widespread negative and prejudicial publicity, defense counsel moved the trial court to change the venue of the trial to nearby Gibson County. The motion was granted and the trial was set for prosecution in Gibson County. However, defense counsel soon discovered that the widespread publicity had prejudiced the people of Gibson County against the defendant. Therefore, defense counsel motioned the trial court to change venue once again. The trial court refused the motion.

During jury selection in Gibson County, 430 persons were summoned as potential jurors. The trial court had to remove for "cause" 268 of the potential jurors after they had expressed fixed opinions as to the guilt of the defendant. Out of the twelve jurors chosen, eight of them admitted that they thought the defendant was guilty, but each indicated that, notwithstanding such opinion, they could render an impartial verdict. The jury convicted the defendant and sentenced him to death.

The federal Court of Appeals found on remand that the defendant received a fair trial by an impartial jury and denied habeas relief. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Clark: Justice Clark held that the defendant was not accorded a fair and impartial trial, to which he was entitled under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. It was said that the right to jury trial guarantees to the criminally accused a fair trial by a panel of impartial and indifferent jurors. Justice Clark wrote: "A fair trial in a fair tribunal is a basic requirement of due process. In the ultimate analysis, only the jury can strip a man of his liberty or his life.... His verdict must be based upon the evidence developed at the trial. This is true, regardless of the heinousness of the crime charged, the apparent guilt of the offender or the station in life which he occupies.... The theory of the law is that a juror who has formed an opinion cannot be impartial."

Justice Clark said that the Constitution was not monolithic in the face of modern communication and the impact of such communication in communities. Justice Clark conceded that absolute ignorance of the facts of a crime by jurors in most instances is not possible. The opinion stated: "It is not required, however, that the jurors be totally ignorant of the facts and issues involved. In these days of swift, widespread and diverse methods of communication, an important case can be expected to arouse the interest of the public in the vicinity, and scarcely any of those best qualified to serve as jurors will not have formed some impression or opinion as to the merits of the case. This is particularly true in criminal cases. To hold that the mere existence of any preconceived notion as to the guilt or innocence of an accused, without more, is sufficient to rebut the presumption of a prospective juror's impartiality would be to establish an impossible standard. It is sufficient if the juror can lay aside his impression or opinion and render a verdict based on the evidence presented in court."

The opinion went on to lay out the type of pre-trial prejudice that was generated against the defendant:

Here the build-up of prejudice is clear and convincing. An examination of the then current community pattern of thought as indicated by the popular news media is singularly revealing. For example, [the defendant's] first motion for a change of venue from Gibson County alleged that the awaited trial of [the defendant] had become the cause celebre of this small community — so much so that curbstone opinions, not only as to [the defendant's] guilt but even as to what punishment he should receive, were solicited and recorded on the public streets by a roving reporter, and later were broadcast over the local stations. A reading of the 46 exhibits which [the defendant] attached to his motion indicates that a barrage of newspaper headlines, articles, cartoons and pictures was unleashed against him during the six or seven months preceding his trial. The motion further alleged that the newspapers in which the stories appeared were delivered regularly to approximately 95% of the dwellings in Gibson County and that, in addition, the ... radio and TV stations, which likewise blanketed that county, also carried extensive newscasts covering the same incidents. These stories revealed the details of his background, including a reference to crimes committed when a juvenile, his convictions for arson almost 20 years previously, for burglary and by a court-martial on AWOL charges during the war. He was accused of being a parole violator. The headlines announced his police line-up identification, that he faced a lie detector test, had been placed at the scene of the crime and that the six murders were solved.... [T]hey announced his confession to the six murders.... They reported [the defendant's] offer to plead guilty if promised a 99-year sentence, but also the determination, on the other hand, of the prosecutor to secure the death penalty, and that [the defendant] had confessed to 24 burglaries. One story dramatically relayed the promise of a sheriff to devote his life to securing [the defendant's] execution by the State of Kentucky, where petitioner is alleged to have committed one of the six murders, if Indiana failed to do so. Another characterized [the defendant] as remorseless and without conscience but also as having been found sane by a court-appointed panel of doctors. In many of the stories [the defendant] was described as the "confessed slayer of six," a parole violator and fraudulent-check artist. Petitioner's court-appointed counsel was quoted as having received "much criticism over being Irvin's counsel" and it was pointed out, by way of excusing the attorney, that he would be subject to disbarment should he refuse to represent Irvin.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded with instructions that the defendant was to be released, if the State did not seek to retry him again.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Frankfurter: Justice Frankfurter concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote separately only to share his observations about the growing problem caused by media coverage of criminal cases: "Not a Term passes without this Court being importuned to review convictions, had in States throughout the country, in which substantial claims are made that a jury trial has been distorted because of inflammatory newspaper accounts—too often, as in this case, with the prosecutor's collaboration—exerting pressures upon potential jurors before trial and even during the course of trial, thereby making it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to secure a jury capable of taking in, free of prepossessions, evidence submitted in open court. Indeed such extraneous influences, in violation of the decencies guaranteed by our Constitution, are sometimes so powerful that an accused is forced, as a practical matter, to forego trial by jury." See also Irvin v. Dowd (I); Pre-trial Publicity; Venue

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's confession to committing murder was sufficient to establish the corpus delicti or that a person had actually been murdered.

Case Holding: The defendant's confession to committing murder was not sufficient to establish the corpus delicti or that a person had actually been murdered, but, combined with other evidence, such confession could help establish that a person had been murdered.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Isaacs, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. During the trial, evidence only established that Mike P. Cushing, or an unknown white man, was murdered by the defendant. The corpus delicti or body of the crime was never actually found and identified. On appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the defendant argued that his conviction could not stand based upon only his confession to having killed a man.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brown: Justice Brown held that the corpus delicti cannot be established by the mere statement of a defendant, but that such statement, taken in connection with other facts, might be used to show that a person was murdered. The opinion stated: "The fact that a crime was committed, or the fact that the man charged in the indictment, either as Mike P. Cushing, or an unknown white man, was murdered, must be proven by evidence outside of the confession of the defendant; and that, whenever that state of case is established, then you may take the declarations of the defendant as tending to show his guilt."

The opinion held that there was abundant evidence in the case, outside of the defendant's confession, not only that a man had been murdered, but there was considerable evidence that he was a white man. It was concluded: "The fact that the murdered man was a white man had no bearing upon the question of the corpus delicti, or of the fact that the defendant murdered him, and bore only upon the jurisdiction of the court." The judgment of the lower court was therefore affirmed. See also Corpus Delicti

Israel Israel abolished capital punishment for ordinary crimes in 1954, but retains the authority to impose capital punishment for exceptional and extreme offenses. Israel authorizes execution by hanging. Its legal system is a mixture of English common law, British Mandate regulations, and Jewish, Christian, and Muslim authoritative principles. Israel has no formal constitution.

The judicial system is composed of trial courts and a High Court of Justice. Israeli law provides for the right to representation by counsel. Trials are generally public. Issue Presented: Whether the United States Supreme Court could hear a direct appeal from a federal district court.

Case Holding: The United States Supreme Court could not hear a direct appeal from a federal district court because Congress changed the law and required federal Courts of Appeals hear direct appeals from federal district courts.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, O. Itow, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant filed a direct appeal with the United States Supreme Court. The government moved to dismiss the case on the grounds of lack of jurisdiction.

Opinion of the Court by Chief Justice White: The chief justice ruled that the Court did not have jurisdiction to hear the case on direct appeal. It was said that, as a result of statutory changes, federal Courts of Appeals had to first pass upon cases tried in federal district courts before they could be brought to the Supreme Court. The chief justice noted that the statutory amendments “changed the general rule of the prior law by taking capital cases out of the class which could come, because they were capital cases, directly to this court, and by bringing such cases within the final reviewing power of the circuit court of appeals.” The case was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. See also Jurisdiction

Jackson, Howell E. Howell E. Jackson served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1893 to 1895. Jackson’s brief tenure on the Supreme Court did not enable him to establish a meaningful constitutional philosophy.

Jackson was born in Paris, Tennessee, on April 8, 1832. He received an undergraduate degree from West Tennessee College in 1849 and a law degree from Cumberland University in 1856. Jackson was elected to the United States Senate in 1881. He accepted a federal Court of Appeals judicial position in 1886. President Benjamin Harrison appointed Jackson to the Supreme Court in 1893.

Jackson was known to have written only one capital punishment opinion. In Brown v. United States (I), Jackson, writing for the Supreme Court, reversed the defendant’s convictions for two murders after ruling that the trial court committed reversible error by admitting evidence during the trial of an unrelated conspiracy to commit murder. Jackson died on August 8, 1895.

Jackson, Robert H. Robert H. Jackson served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1941 to 1951. While on the Supreme Court, Jackson was known as a moderate in his interpretation of the Constitution.

Jackson was born on February 13, 1892, in Spring Creek, Pennsylvania. Jackson eventually settled in New York after obtaining a law degree from Albany Law School in 1913. Jackson developed a successful private practice before accepting various federal attorney positions. President Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed Jackson to the Supreme Court in 1941.

While on the Supreme Court, Jackson issued a number of capital punishment opinions. The capital punishment opinion for which he was best known was Stein v. New York. The decision in Stein involved three defendants who were sentenced to death. The defendants asked the Supreme Court to rule that New York’s procedure of requiring the jury to determine whether a confession was voluntary violated the Constitution. Jackson, writing for the Court, rejected the argument. He wrote: “The Fourteenth Amendment does not forbid jury trial of the issue. The states are free to allocate functions as between judge and jury as they see fit.” The decision in Stein was eventually overruled by Jackson v. Denno. Jackson died on October 9, 1954.

Issue Presented: Whether the New York rule of requiring the jury to determine the voluntariness of a confession violated due process of law.

Case Holding: The New York rule of requiring the jury to determine the voluntariness of a confession violated due process of law, as such decision should be determined by the trial judge.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Jackson, was charged with capital murder by the State of New York. The defendant gave two confessions, which he disputed on substantive and voluntariness grounds at trial. Under New York law, the issue of the voluntariness of a confession had to be decided by the jury. Consequently, the trial court told the jury to disregard the confession entirely if it was found involuntary and to determine the guilt or innocence solely from other evidence; or, if it found the confession voluntary, it was to determine its truth or reliability and weigh it accordingly. The jury found the defendant guilty of capital murder and he was sentenced to death.

The New York Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction and sentence and the United States Supreme Court denied certiorari. The defendant filed a habeas corpus petition in a federal district court alleging that the New York procedure for determining voluntariness of a confession was unconstitutional. The district court denied the petition. A federal Court of Appeals affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice White: Justice White ruled that the New York procedure for determining voluntariness of a confession did not provide an adequate and reliable determination of the voluntariness of the confession and did not adequately protect the defendant’s right not to be convicted through the use of a coerced confession. The opinion pointed out that it was a deprivation of due process of law to base a conviction, in whole or in part, on a coerced confession, regardless of its truth, and even though there may be sufficient other evidence to support the conviction.

Justice White stated that the defendant had a constitutional right to a fair hearing and reliable determination of the voluntariness of his confession. He wrote that it was impossible to tell whether the trial jury found the confession voluntary and relied on it, or involuntary and ignored it. It was said that the defendant was entitled to a State court hearing on the issue of the voluntariness of the confession by the trial judge and not by the jury trying his guilt or innocence.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was reversed and the case remanded so that New York courts could either determine the voluntariness of the confession at a hearing or simply grant a new trial. If a hearing was held and it was determined that the confession was voluntary and admissible in evidence, a new trial was not necessary; but if it was determined at the hearing that the confession was involuntary, a new trial, at which the confession would be excluded, was required.

Concurring and Dissenting Opinion by Justice Black, in Which Clark, J., Joined: Justice Black concurred with the Court's decision insofar as the new trial option. He believed the last confession was unconstitutionally obtained and required a new trial. Justice Black dissented from the Court's decision to find New York's procedure for determining the voluntariness of a confession unconstitutional. He questioned the Court's authority to invalidate the procedure and believed that having a judge, rather than a jury, determine voluntariness did not provide any great benefit to defendants. He wrote: "The New York rule does now and apparently always has put on the State the burden of convincing the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that a confession is voluntary. Whatever might be a judge's view of the voluntariness of a confession, the jury in passing on a defendant's guilt or innocence is, in my judgment, entitled to hear and determine voluntariness of a confession along with other factual issues on which its verdict must rest."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Clark: Justice Clark dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that the issue of "the constitutionality of New York's rule [was] not ripe for decision here." Justice Clark indicated that, in his judgment, the facts of the case did not properly bring the constitutionality of the rule before the Court. Justice Clark also believed that the Court was wrong in fashioning the new rule and having it applied retroactively to the defendant's case. He believed that the proper course was simply to order a new trial.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Harlan, in Which Clark and Stewart, JJ., Joined: Justice Harlan dissented from the Court's decision. He argued that it was wrong for the Court to invalidate the New York procedure because that procedure had previously been expressly approved by the Court in the capital case of Stein v. New York. Justice Clark also questioned the authority of the Court to invalidate a procedure that had such a long history in the New York criminal justice system. He wrote: "My disagreement with the majority does not concern the wisdom of the New York procedure. It may be that in the abstract the problems which are created by leaving to the jury the question of coercion should weigh more heavily than traditional use of the jury system. Be as it may, 'the states are free to allocate functions as between judge and jury as they see fit.' I, like the Court in Stein, believe that this Court has no authority to 'strike down as unconstitutional procedures so long established and widely approved by state judiciaries, regardless of our personal opinion as to their wisdom.' This principle, alone here relevant, was founded on a solid constitutional approach, the loss of which will do serious disservice to the healthy working of our federal system in the criminal field." See also Right to Remain Silent; Sims v. Georgia (I); Sims v. Georgia (II); Stein v. New York

Jamaica The death penalty is on the law books of Jamaica. Jamaica uses hanging as the method of carrying out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on English common law. The constitution of the nation was adopted on August 6, 1962.

Criminal cases are prosecuted in three types of courts in Jamaica. Magistrate courts try misdemeanor offenses. All felonies, except those involving firearms, are tried in a supreme court. Other felony offenses are tried in the Gun Court.

Defendants have a right to appointed counsel only for serious crimes. Defendants have the right to appeal a conviction in any of the trial level courts to the Court of Appeal, which is the highest court. Under the constitution of Jamaica, the Court of Appeal may refer cases to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Japan Capital punishment is recognized in Japan. Hanging is the method of execution used by the nation. Its legal system is modeled after European civil law and American law. Japan's constitution was adopted on May 3, 1947.

The judicial system in Japan is composed of district courts, high courts, and a supreme court. Cases are tried in the district court and may be appealed to a high court and the Supreme Court. Both the defendant and the prosecutor may appeal. Defendants have a right to a speedy and public trial. There is no trial by jury in Japan. Defendants have the right to retained or appointed counsel and the right not to be compelled to testify against themselves. Japan's laws protect defendants from the retroactive application of criminal laws. See also International Capital Punishment Nations

Jasper County Dragging Murder On the night of June 7, 1998, Lawrence Russell Brewer, John William King, and Shawn Allen Berry engaged in murderous conduct in Jasper County, Texas, that shook the nation. On that night the trio chained a man, James Byrd, Jr., to the back of a pickup truck and dragged his body for three miles. When the dragging ended, Byrd's head had been ripped off his body.

Byrd was murdered because he was an African American. The trio kidnapped and killed Byrd because they believed their conduct would inspire racial unrest and racial war in the nation.

Law enforcement officials had little difficulty in apprehending the trio. They were each prosecuted separately for capital murder. King was tried first. He was convicted and, on February 25, 1999, a jury sentenced him death.

Lawrence Russell Brewer (left) and John William King (right) are on death row in Texas for their role in the brutal murder of James Byrd, Jr. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

Brewer's trial was next. He was convicted and, on September 23, 1999, a jury sentenced him to death. Berry was then tried. He was also convicted, but on November 18, 1999, the jury recommended life imprisonment.

Jennings, Patricia On November 5, 1990, Patricia Jennings was sentenced to death by the State of North Carolina, after having been convicted of the capital murder of her husband, William Henry Jennings. At the time of his death, William was eighty years old.

Patricia and William met in June of 1983. She was forty years old at the time and was employed as a nurse in a nursing home located in Wilson, North Carolina. William, who was a retired businessman, was summoned to the nursing home as a consultant for an alcoholic patient. Despite their age differences, Patricia and William developed a warm relationship during his consultation visits at the nursing home. Four years later, in February 1987, Patricia and William were married.

Patricia Jennings was given a death sentence for killing her 80-year-old husband. (North Carolina Department of Corrections)

Six months after their marriage, William visited his financial consultant for the purpose of transferring half of his assets, which then totaled about $150,000, to Patricia. A separate account was opened for Patricia and the assets were transferred to her.

In time, William became a victim of spousal abuse. William consulted an attorney in May 1989 and disclosed the abuse he was receiving from Patricia. William told the attorney that Patricia had physically beaten him, dragged him across the room, and stomped him with her cowboy boots. He also told the attorney that Patricia had tried to have him committed.

On September 19, 1989, Patricia and William were staying at a hotel in Wilson. At about 9:30 P.M. that evening, Patricia called the hotel desk clerk requesting medical assistance. When emergency medical personnel arrived they found William lying naked on the floor and Patricia applying CPR on him. She was wearing a black nightgown and brown cowboy boots at the time. Patricia informed the medical team that William had fallen and had been on the floor for about ten minutes. William was taken to a local hospital where he was pronounced dead. Based upon medical evidence of injuries to William, Patricia was indicted for capital murder.

Based upon medical evidence of injuries to William, Patricia was indicted for capital murder.

During the trial, evidence indicated that William was tortured and beaten to death. Testimony established that William had been dead for six to eight hours before he was brought to the hospital. The State's chief medical examiner testified that William had sustained multiple bruises and scrapes on various parts of his head, scalp, face, neck, legs, arms and hands. William had also sustained a large bruise in the mesentery of the abdominal cavity, the tissue which holds in and supports the intestines and contains blood vessels to the intestines. It was determined by the chief medical examiner that a blunt force impact to the abdominal wall caused the tears in the mesentery and that blood loss from those tears caused William's death. The medical examiner opined that the injury was consistent with a kick or stomp to the abdomen, not a fall.

Patricia testified at the trial and denied beating William. She alleged that he fell several times in the hotel bathroom. The jury rejected Patricia's version of events and found her guilty of capital murder. Patricia is now on death row in North Carolina. See also Women and Capital Punishment

Johnson v. Mississippi Court: United States Supreme Court; Case Citation: Johnson v. Mississippi, 486 U.S. 578 (1988); Argued: April 25, 1988; Decided: June 13, 1988; Opinion of the Court: Justice Stevens; Concurring Opinion: Justice White, in which Rehnquist, CJ., joined; Concurring Statement: Justice Brennan, in which Marshall, J., joined; Concurring Statement: Justice O'Connor; Dissenting Opinion: None; Appellate Defense Counsel: Floyd Abrams argued; Laurence T. Issue Presented: Whether the reversal of the defendant's prior rape conviction by a New York court rendered his Mississippi death sentence unconstitutional because the death sentence was imposed in part due to the prosecutor's use of the rape conviction to establish the "prior felony conviction" statutory aggravating circumstance.

Case Holding: The reversal of the defendant's prior rape conviction by a New York court rendered his Mississippi death sentence unconstitutional because the death sentence was imposed in part due to the prosecutor's use of the rape conviction to establish the "prior felony conviction" statutory aggravating circumstance.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Samuel Johnson, was convicted of capital murder by the State of Mississippi. During the penalty phase, the prosecutor produced evidence on three statutory aggravating circumstances. One of the aggravating circumstance involved concerned prior felony conviction. The prosecutor introduced evidence showing that the defendant had previously been convicted of rape by the State of New York. The jury found all three aggravating circumstances were proven and sentenced the defendant to death. The Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the conviction and death sentence.

Subsequent to the State's appellate court's decision affirming the judgment, the New York Court of Appeals issued an opinion reversing the defendant's rape conviction. The defendant then filed a petition for habeas corpus relief with the Mississippi Supreme Court, arguing that his sentence was constitutionally infirm because it was based on a prior felony conviction which was overturned. The appellate court rejected the petition. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens wrote that by allowing the defendant's death sentence to stand despite the fact that it was based in part on the vacated New York conviction, the Mississippi Supreme Court violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. It was said that the New York conviction did not provide any legitimate support for the defendant's sentence. Justice White found that reversal of the rape conviction deprived the prosecutor's sole piece of evidence as to the most significant aggravating circumstance proven against the defendant. It was said that the fact that the defendant served time in prison pursuant to the invalid rape conviction did not make the conviction itself relevant or prove that the defendant was guilty of the crime. The opinion concluded that the New York conviction clearly prejudiced the defendant. The judgment of the Mississippi Supreme Court was reversed, insofar as setting aside the sentence.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White, in Which Rehnquist, CJ., Joined: Justice White concurred briefly in the Court's opinion. He wrote: "I join the Court's opinion, agreeing that the death sentence cannot stand, given the introduction of inadmissible and prejudicial evidence at the hearing before the jury. That evidence, however, was irrelevant to the other two aggravating circumstances found to be present, and I note that the case is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with the Court's opinion. It is left to the Mississippi Supreme Court to decide whether a new sentencing hearing must be held or whether that court should itself decide the appropriate sentence without reference to the inadmissible evidence, thus undertaking to reweigh the two untainted aggravating circumstances against the mitigating circumstances."

Concurring Statement by Justice Brennan, in Which Marshall, J., Joined: Justice Brennan issued a concurring statement indicating that, while he joined the Court's judgment, he "would direct that the resentencing proceedings be circumscribed such that the State may not reimpose the death sentence."

Concurring Statement by Justice O'Connor: Justice O'Connor issued a statement indicating that she concurred in the Court's judgment. See also Prior Felony or Homicide Aggravator Issue Presented: Whether the penalty phase special issues used by Texas adequately allowed the jury to consider the defendant's age as a mitigating factor.

Case Holding: The penalty phase special issues used by Texas adequately allowed the jury to consider the defendant's age as a mitigating factor.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The State of Texas prosecuted the defendant, Dorsey Johnson, for capital murder committed when he was nineteen years old. A jury found him guilty of the crime. During the penalty phase of the prosecution, the trial court instructed the jury to answer two special issues required by statute at that time: (1) whether the defendant's conduct was committed deliberately and with the reasonable expectation that death would result, and (2) whether there was a probability that he would commit criminal acts of violence that would constitute a continuing threat to society. The jury was also instructed that, in determining each of those issues, it could take into consideration all the evidence submitted to it, whether aggravating or mitigating, in either phase of the trial. A unanimous jury answered yes to both special issues and the trial court sentenced the defendant to death.

On appeal to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, the defendant argued that the special issues did not allow the penalty phase jury to give adequate mitigating effect to evidence of his youth and that, under the United States Supreme Court decision in Penry v. Lynaugh, a separate instruction was required on the question of his age. The appellate court rejected the argument and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Kennedy: Justice Kennedy ruled that the Texas death penalty procedures used in the case were consistent with the requirements of the Constitution and the Court's precedents. The opinion indicated that, although a penalty phase jury cannot be precluded from considering, as a mitigating factor, any aspect of the defendant's character or record and any of the circumstances of the particular offense the defendant proffers as a basis for a sentence less than death, States are free to structure and shape consideration of mitigating evidence in an effort to achieve a more rational and equitable administration of the death penalty. Justice Kennedy stated that other cases decided by the Court involving Texas's death penalty statute found that it adequately allowed for penalty phase juries to consider the youth of defendants as mitigating evidence.

It was said that the special issues used in the defendant's case allowed for adequate consideration of his youth. The opinion ruled that there was no reasonable likelihood that the jury would have found itself foreclosed from considering the relevant aspects of the defendant's youth, since it was told to consider all mitigating evidence. Justice Kennedy concluded that, for the Court to find a constitutional defect in the defendant's sentence, it would have to overrule Jurek v. Texas—which approved of Texas's death penalty system—by requiring a further instruction whenever a defendant introduced mitigating evidence that had some arguable relevance beyond the special issues used. The opinion indicated the Court was not prepared to overrule precedent. The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia concurred in the Court's decision. He wrote that the Court's decision was consistent with and a clarification of prior decisions.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas concurred in the decision of the Court. He indicated that the decision was "simply a clarification (and I think a plainly correct one) of this Court's opinions." Justice Thomas also stated: "Because [the defendant's] youth had mitigating relevance to the second special issue, ... this case is readily distinguishable from Penry, and does not compel its reconsideration."

Dissenting Opinion by Justice O'Connor, in Which Blackmun, Stevens, and Souter, JJ., Joined: Justice O'Connor dissented from the Court's decision. She believed that Penry controlled the case and that a special instruction was required to inform the penalty phase jury to consider evidence of the defendant's youth as mitigating circumstances and not aggravating circumstances. Justice O'Connor stated her position as follows:

[The defendant] was 19 years old when he committed the murder that led to his death sentence. Today, the Court upholds that sentence, even though the jurors who considered Johnson's case were not allowed to give full effect to his strongest mitigating evidence: his youth. The Court reaches this result only by invoking a highly selective version of stare decisis and misapplying our habeas precedents to a case on direct review....

By all accounts, [the defendant] was not a model youth. As an adolescent, he frequently missed school, and when he did attend, he often was disruptive. He was drinking and using drugs by the time he was 16, habits that had intensified by the time he was 19. Johnson's father testified that the deaths of Johnson's mother and sister in 1984 and 1985 had affected Johnson deeply, but he primarily attributed Johnson's behavior to drug use and youth. A jury hearing this evidence easily could conclude, as Johnson's jury did, that the answer to the second Texas special question — whether it was probable that Johnson “would commit criminal acts of violence that would constitute a continuing threat to society” — was yes. It is possible that the jury thought Johnson might outgrow his temper and violent behavior as he matured, but it is more likely that the jury considered the pattern of escalating violence to be an indication that Johnson would become even more dangerous as he grew older. Even if the jurors viewed Johnson's youth as a transient circumstance, the dangerousness associated with that youth would not dissipate until sometime in the future, and it is reasonably likely that the jurors still would have understood the second question to require an affirmative answer. Thus, to the extent that Johnson's youth was relevant at all to the second Texas special issue, there is a reasonable likelihood that it was an aggravating factor.

Case Note: Texas executed Dorsey Johnson by lethal injection on June 4, 1997.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant's conviction and sentence were invalid as a result of the prosecutor's failure to prove a motive for the crime.

Case Holding: The defendant's conviction and sentence were not invalid as a result of the prosecutor's failure to prove a motive for the crime because motive is not an element of a crime.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Willie Johnson, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. The defendant appealed the judgment against him to the United States Supreme Court, contending that his conviction was invalid because there was no proof of motive for the killing. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Brewer: Justice Brewer found that the judgment rendered against the defendant was valid, even though the prosecutor failed to establish any motive for the killing. The opinion addressed the issue as follows:

There was nothing in the evidence disclosing previous hostility to the deceased on the part of Johnson, or any reason or motive for the murderous attack. Thereupon, the defendant's counsel asked an instruction that where the evidence shows that the defendant did not commit the actual killing, and when it is uncertain whether he did participate in it, then the jury may regard the absence of any proof of motive for the killing, in finding their verdict. This instruction the court gave, but added to it the observation that the absence or presence of motive is not a necessary requisite to enable the jury to find the guilt of a party, because it is frequently impossible for the government to find a motive.

In thus qualifying the instruction the learned judge committed no error the jury were, in effect, told that they had a right to consider the absence of any proof of motive, but that such proof was not essential to enable them to convict.

The judgment of the federal district court was affirmed.

Johnson, William William Johnson served as an associate justice of the United States Supreme Court from 1804 to 1834. While on the Supreme Court, Johnson was known as a conservative interpreter of the Constitution who espoused absolute federal supremacy in matters involving federal-state relations.

Johnson was born in Charleston, South Carolina, on December 27, 1771. Following his graduation from Princeton in 1790, Johnson worked as a legal apprentice before being admitted to the South Carolina bar in 1793. Johnson served in the State legislature and on the South Carolina Supreme Court, before President Thomas Jefferson appointed him to the Supreme Court in 1804.

While on the Supreme Court Johnson was known to have issued only two capital punishment opinions. The case of United States v. Pirates involved certified questions from a lower court. Johnson wrote the opinion for the Supreme Court. In responding to one of the questions certified, Johnson answered by stating that a foreign defendant who murdered another foreigner aboard an American ship may be prosecuted under the Piracy Act, because national character was lost when piracy was entered into. In the case of Ex Parte Bollman (I), the issue addressed by the Supreme Court was whether it had authority to issue a writ of habeas corpus commanding condemned defendants be brought before the Court. The majority ruled that the Court had such authority. Johnson issued a dissenting opinion. He argued that, while the justices had authority in their individual capacity to issue the writ, the Constitution did not confer such authority on the Court collectively. Johnson died in 1834.

Joint Venture Theory The joint venture theory is a version of the felony murder rule. To convict a defendant for murder under the joint venture theory, the prosecutor must prove (1) the defendant was present at the scene of the crime, (2) the defendant had knowledge another intended to commit a crime, and (3), by agreement, the defendant was willing and available to help the confederate if necessary.

The theory of joint venture murder requires more than mere knowledge of planned criminal conduct or a failure to take affirmative steps to prevent it; rather, a defendant must intend that the victim be killed or know that there is a substantial likelihood of the victim being killed. A joint venturer may be prosecuted for murder if he or she intended that the victim be killed or knew that there was a substantial likelihood that the victim would be killed. Unlike a felony murder rule prosecution, the joint venture theory requires that each participant share the requisite mental state of the principal. See also Felony Murder Rule

Issue Presented: Whether the United States had jurisdiction over the territory in which the defendant committed murder.

Case Holding: The United States had jurisdiction over the territory in which the defendant committed murder; therefore, his prosecution for the offense by the federal government was valid.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Henry Jones, was prosecuted for capital murder by the United States. The offense charged was committed on an island in the Caribbean Sea called Navassa. The defendant was taken to be prosecuted in a federal district court sitting in Maryland. A jury found the defendant guilty and he was sentenced to death. The defendant prosecuted an appeal to the United States Supreme Court, alleging that his conviction was invalid because the United States did not have jurisdiction over Navassa.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Gray: Justice Gray ruled that under the Constitution, a crime committed within any State must be tried in that State, but that a crime not committed within any state of the Union may be tried at such place as Congress may by law have directed. It was said that Congress directed that the trial of all offenses committed upon the high seas, or elsewhere, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state or district shall be in the federal district where the offender is found or into which he or she is first brought. Justice Gray indicated that offenses committed “elsewhere” included murder committed on any land within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States and not within any judicial district, as well as murder committed on the high seas.

The opinion held that the island of Navassa was, at the time of the murder, under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States and out of the jurisdiction of any particular State or district of the United States. Justice Gray noted: “Who is the sovereign, de jure or de facto, of a territory, is not a judicial, but a political question, the determination of which by the legislative and executive departments of any government conclusively binds the judges, as well as all other officers, citizens, and subjects of that government. This principle has always been upheld by this court, and has been affirmed under a great variety of circumstances.” The judgment of the District Court was affirmed. See also Jurisdiction

Issues Presented: (1) Whether the defendant was entitled to an instruction as to the effect of jury deadlock on the issue of punishment. (2) Whether there was a reasonable likelihood that the penalty phase jury was led to believe that the defendant would receive a court imposed sentence less than life imprisonment in the event that they could not reach a unanimous sentence recommendation. (3) Whether the submission to the penalty phase jury of two allegedly duplicative, vague, and overbroad non-statutory aggravating factors was harmless error.

Case Holdings: (1) The Constitution does not require the penalty phase jury be instructed as to the effect of a jury deadlock on the issue of punishment. (2) There was no reasonable likelihood that the penalty phase jury was led to believe that the defendant would receive a court-imposed sentence less than life imprisonment in the event that they could not reach a unanimous sentence recommendation. (3) The two non-statutory aggravating circumstances were not duplicative, vague, or overbroad; assuming, arguendo, that they were duplicative, vague, and overbroad, submission of them to the jury was harmless error beyond a reasonable doubt.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Louis Jones, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death by the United States. On appeal to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, the defendant argued his sentence should be reversed because the trial court committed error in (1) refusing his request to instruct the penalty phase jury as to the consequences of jury deadlock; (2) providing the penalty phase jury with confusing instructions led them to believe that the defendant would receive a court-imposed sentence less than life imprisonment in the event that they could not reach a unanimous sentence recommendation; and (3) providing the penalty phase jury with instructions on two duplicative, vague, and overbroad non-statutory aggravating factors. The Court of Appeals rejected the arguments and affirmed the conviction and sentence. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the three issues.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas ruled that the Constitution did not require that a penalty phase jury be instructed as to the consequences of their failure to agree on a punishment. It was said that such an instruction had no bearing on the jury’s role in the sentencing process. The opinion stated that the jury system’s very object is to secure unanimity and the government has a strong interest in having the jury express the conscience of the community on the ultimate life or death question. Justice Thomas reasoned that a jury instruction of the sort the defendant suggested might well undermine this strong governmental interest. In addition, he wrote that Congress chose not to require such an instruction be given. Under the federal death penalty statute, the trial judge was required to impose the sentence when the jury, after retiring for deliberations, reports itself as unable to reach a unanimous verdict.

Next, Justice Thomas held that there was no reasonable likelihood that the jury was led to believe that the defendant would receive a court-imposed sentence less than life imprisonment, in the event they could not recommend unanimously a sentence of death or life imprisonment without the possibility of release. The opinion noted that this issue was not properly preserved that the trial court level; therefore, the claim of error was subject to a limited appellate review under the plain error rule. Under such review, relief is not granted unless there has been (1) error, (2) error that is plain, and (3) error that affects substantial rights. Justice Thomas found the defendant’s argument fell short of satisfying the first requirement, for no error occurred. It was said that the proper standard for reviewing claims that allegedly ambiguous instructions caused jury confusion was whether there was a reasonable likelihood that the jury applied the challenged instruction in a way that violates the Constitution. It was determined that there was no such likelihood in the case.

Finally, Justice Thomas held that the two non-statutory aggravating circumstances were not duplicative, vague, or overbroad. It was said that assuming, arguendo, that the two factors were vague, overbroad, or duplicative, submission of them to the penalty phase jury was harmless error beyond a reasonable doubt. The opinion found that the jury would have reached the same result without the allegedly erroneous non-statutory aggravating factors. The judgment of the Court of Appeals was affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Ginsburg, in Which Stevens, Souter and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Ginsburg dissented from the Court's decision. Her dissent targeted the majority's ruling on the defendant's claim that it was error for the trial court to (1) provide the penalty phase jury with confusing instructions led them to believe that the defendant would receive a court-imposed sentence less than life imprisonment in the event that they could not reach a unanimous sentence recommendation and (2) provide the penalty phase jury with instructions on two duplicative, vague, and overbroad non-statutory aggravating factors. Justice Ginsburg argued that the defendant's asserted grounds of error were proven in summary, she concluded: "The Fifth Circuit's tolerance of error in this case, and this Court's refusal to face up to it, cannot be reconciled with the recognition ... that 'death is qualitatively different.' If the jury's weighing process is infected by the trial court's misperceptions of the law, the legitimacy of an ensuing death sentence should not hinge on defense counsel's shortfalls or the reviewing court's speculation about the decision the jury would have made absent the infection. I would vacate the jury's sentencing decision and remand the case for a new sentencing hearing." See also Harmless Error Rule; Plain Error Rule Jordan Jordan recognizes capital punishment. Jordan uses hanging and the firing squad to carry out the death penalty. Its legal system is based on Islamic law and French codes. Jordan's constitution was adopted on January 8, 1952.

Jordan is a constitutional monarchy. The constitution of Jordan places a high degree of executive and legislative authority in the king, who determines domestic and foreign policy. The actual daily affairs of the government are managed by a prime minister and a cabinet, all of whom are appointed by the king. The king also appoints the forty members that make up the Senate. The legislative branch has an eighty-member Chamber of Deputies, elected every four years. The constitution of Jordan provides for the independence of the judiciary. However, in practice the judiciary is subject to pressure from the executive branch.

The judicial system consists of trial courts, the Court of Cassation, and the State Security Court. The State Security Court prosecutes cases involving sedition, armed insurrection, financial crimes, drug trafficking, and offenses against the king. Shari'a (Islamic) courts have jurisdiction over domestic relations matters involving Muslims.

Criminal trials are generally open to the public. Defendants are entitled to legal counsel, may cross-examine witnesses, and have the right to appeal. Indigent defendants facing the death penalty have the right to appointed counsel.

Prosecutions in the State Security Court are usually closed to the public. A panel of three judges presides over State Security Court prosecutions. Defendants in the State Security Court have the right to appeal their sentences to the Court of Cassation. Appeals are automatic for cases involving the death penalty. Judge Aggravator The responsibility of judges for imposing sentences upon convicted defendants carries with it the potential for reprisal. A majority of jurisdictions have responded to the potential danger to which judges are exposed by making the murder of a judge a statutory aggravating circumstance. If a penalty phase jury in a capital prosecution determines that a judge was killed because of carrying out his or her official duties, the death penalty may be imposed. Issue Presented: Whether the imposition of the sentence of death for the crime of murder under the law of Texas violates the Constitution.

Case Holding: The imposition of the sentence of death for the crime of murder under the law of Texas does not violate the Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Jerry Lane Jurek, was convicted of murder and sentenced to death by the State of Texas. The defendant was prosecuted under a new death penalty statute enacted by the State in the wake of the United States Supreme Court's decision in Furman v. Georgia.

Under the new law, the death penalty was limited to homicides committed under specific circumstances. Under the new statute, a capital prosecution was divided into a guilt phase and penalty phase. Pursuant to this bifurcation, a capital felon's guilt was first determined. At the second stage, the punishment was determined. During the penalty phase, the jury was required to answer the following three questions: (1) whether the conduct of the defendant causing the death was committed deliberately and with the reasonable expectation that the death would result; (2) whether it is probable that the defendant would commit criminal acts of violence constituting a continuing threat to society; and (3), if raised by the evidence, whether the defendant's conduct was an unreasonable response to the provocation, if any, by the deceased. If the jury finds that the State has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the answer to each of the three questions is affirmative, then death sentence is imposed; if it finds that the answer to any question is negative, a sentence of life imprisonment results.

The defendant challenged the constitutionality of the Texas death penalty statute. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals found that the death penalty procedures did not violate the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to address the matter.

Plurality Opinion in Which Justice Stevens Announced the Court's Judgment and in Which Stewart and Powell, JJ., Joined: Justice Stevens observed that, as a general matter, "The imposition of the death penalty is not per se cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments." After reviewing in detail the procedures used under Texas's new death penalty statute, it was found that the procedures do not violate the Constitution.

The opinion looked upon favorably at the limited circumstances in which a defendant would be subject to a capital prosecution. It was noted that, while the statute did not specifically address mitigating circumstances, the statute had been construed to embrace the jury's consideration of such circumstances. Justice Stevens found the procedures guided and focused the jury's objective consideration of the particularized circumstances of the individual offense and the individual offender before it could impose a sentence of death. Such procedures thus eliminated the arbitrariness and caprice of the system invalidated in Furman. The judgment of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals was, therefore, affirmed.

Concurring Opinion by Justice White, in Which Burger, CJ., and Rehnquist, J., Joined: Justice White concurred in the Court's judgment. In doing so he wrote: "under the revised Texas law the substantive crime of murder is narrowly defined and when murder occurs in one of the five circumstances detailed in the statute, the death penalty must be imposed if the jury makes the certain additional findings against the defendant." The concurrence was satisfied that the new law removed "unconstitutionally arbitrary or discretionary statutory features."

Concurring Statement by Justice Blackmun: Justice Blackmun issued a concurring statement, stating succinctly: "I concur in the judgment."

Concurring Statement by Chief Justice Burger: Chief Justice Burger issued a concurring statement, stating succinctly: "I concur in the judgment."

Dissenting Statement by Justice Brennan: Justice Brennan issued a statement referencing to his dissent in Gregg v. Georgia as the basis for his dissent in this case.

Dissenting Statement by Justice Marshall: Justice Marshall issued a statement referencing to his dissent in Gregg v. Georgia as the basis for his dissent in this case.

Case Note: The decision in this case was significant because it was one of three decisions rendered by the Court in 1976, which had the effect of lifting the moratorium placed on capital punishment in the United States by the 1972 decision in Furman v. Georgia. See also Gregg v. Georgia; Proffitt v. Florida

Jurisdiction The term "jurisdiction" has several meanings in criminal law. The term is used to refer to a sovereign government, i.e., a State or the federal government. Jurisdiction is also used to refer to the specific authority of a court to decide a criminal matter presented to it. In order for any court to address the merits of a criminal matter, the court must have authority over the defendant and the subject matter.

Authority over a defendant requires that alleged unlawful conduct by the defendant must have occurred within the judicial area that the court has jurisdiction over. Subject matter jurisdiction requires a court have specific authority over the substantive issue presented. Trial courts have general jurisdiction over criminal matters. Appellate courts have limited jurisdiction. See also Benson v. United States; Coleman v. Tennessee; Cook v. United States; Cross v. Burke; Cross v. United States; Ex Parte Crow Dog; Ex Parte Gon-Shay-Ee; Ex Parte Johnson; Itow v. United States; Jones v. United States (I); Lambert v. Barrett (I); *Nofire v. Juror Aggravator Jurors in criminal prosecutions are vulnerable to potential threats, as a result of their participation in trials. A minority of capital punishment jurisdictions have decided to make the murder of a juror a statutory aggravating circumstance. Those jurisdictions include California, North Carolina, Oregon, Washington, and Wyoming. In these jurisdictions, if a capital penalty phase jury finds that the victim was killed as a result of his or her participation in a jury, the death penalty may be imposed on the defendant. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Jury see Jury Selection

Jury Deadlock see Deadlocked Jury

Jury Deliberation The phrase "jury deliberation" refers to the sequestration of a jury for the purpose of deciding issues presented to it during a trial. During jury deliberation, no one is allowed in the jury room.

In capital punishment prosecutions, two distinct jury deliberations occur. First, the jury must deliberate to determine whether a defendant is guilty of a capital offense. This deliberation occurs at the guilt phase. Second, if the guilt phase jury renders a verdict finding the defendant guilty of capital murder, the jury must then hear evidence on the issue of punishment. This occurs at the penalty phase. Once the penalty phase jury has heard the evidence on the issue of punishment, it will retire to deliberate on the punishment the defendant should receive.

Jury Instructions Jury instructions embody the law which jurors must apply to the evidentiary facts presented during a prosecution. The trial judge has the exclusive authority to give jury instructions. However, the actual instructions given may incorporate legal principles proffered by the defendant and the prosecutor.

In capital prosecutions, separate jury instructions must be given to the guilt phase jury and penalty phase jury. The jury instructions given at the guilt phase encompass legal doctrines concerned with determining guilt or innocence. The penalty phase jury instructions embody legal principles associated with determining whether to impose a sentence of death or grant mercy and impose a sentence of life imprisonment. See also Bird v. United States (I); Bird v. United States (II); Non-Discrimination Jury Instruction; Nullification Instruction

Jury Selection In determining who will be a juror in a trial, the defendant has a right, along with the prosecutor, to challenge persons summoned as potential jurors. The challenge and removal of prospective jurors are done in two ways: (1) for cause, and (2) by peremptory strikes.

Removal for Cause: Removal of a prospective juror for “cause” is done by the trial judge. In order to remove a prospective juror for “cause,” it must be shown that the juror has a bias or prejudice which prevents him or her from fairly and impartially deciding the issues in the case.

Peremptory Strike: Removal of a juror by a peremptory strike is done by the defendant and prosecutor independently. Both the defendant and prosecutor will have a limited number of peremptory strikes which they may use to remove potential jurors for any reason (other than for racial or gender reasons).

Voir Dire: In order to utilize peremptory strikes and challenges for cause, potential jurors are questioned. The questioning process is called voir dire examination. The right of challenge comes from the common law and has always been held essential to the fairness of trial by jury. Under Anglo-American jurisprudence, it is constitutional error to conduct jury selection out of the presence of the defendant.

Death-Qualified Jury: Selecting jurors for capital prosecutions presents greater difficulties than the selection process in non-capital cases. In non-capital prosecutions, jury selection merely involves selecting a fair and impartial panel. In capital prosecutions, the jury selection involves selecting a fair, impartial, and death-qualified panel. The death-qualified component of jury selection in capital cases is the factor which imposes greater stress in the jury selection process.

Two unique legal principles have developed and become a part of the process of selecting a jury to decide the facts in a capital offense prosecution. The two legal principles in question were developed for the purpose of having a death-qualified jury preside over the trial of a capital punishment prosecution. A death-qualified jury is one that can fairly and impartially hear the evidence of a capital offense prosecution and return a verdict that serves the interests of justice.

The first death-qualified jury principle was developed by the United States Supreme Court in Witherspoon v. Illinois, 391 U.S. 510 (1968), and refined in Wainwright v. Witt, 469 U.S. 412 (1985). The Witherspoon-Wainwright principle holds that a trial court may exclude from a venire panel any potential juror who has acknowledged that he or she is opposed to the death penalty. The second death-qualified jury principle was announced by the United States Supreme Court in Morgan v. Illinois, 112 S.Ct. 2222 (1992). Under the Morgan principle, a trial judge may exclude from the venire panel any potential juror who has made known that he or she would automatically vote for imposition of the death penalty, regardless of the evidence in the case.

Courts have held that jurors in capital prosecutions have an obligation to apply the law which mandates death under certain circumstances. Jurors may not ignore their oath or affirmation and obligation to apply the law by choosing to reject the death penalty due to moral opposition to capital punishment. Consequently, the federal Constitution does not prohibit the removal for “cause” of prospective jurors whose opposition to the death penalty is so strong that it would prevent or substantially impair the performance of their duties as jurors at the penalty phase of the trial. This is true even though death-qualification may produce juries somewhat more conviction-prone than non-death-qualified juries. However, a sentence of death cannot be carried out if the jury that imposed or recommended the sentence was chosen by excluding potential jurors for “cause,” simply because they voiced general objections to the death penalty or expressed conscientious or religious scruples against its infliction.

The standard for determining when a prospective juror may be excused for cause due to his or her views on capital punishment is whether the juror’s views would prevent or substantially impair the performance of his or her duties as a juror in accordance with his or her instructions and oath.

Federal Jury Selection Process: The rules governing the federal jury selection process, as illustrated below, represents the manner in which other jurisdictions provide for the process.

a. Examination. The court may permit the defendant or the defendant’s attorney and the attorney for the government to conduct the examination of prospective jurors or may itself conduct the examination. In the latter event the court shall permit the defendant or the defendant’s attorney and the attorney for the government to supplement the examination by such further inquiry as it deems proper or shall itself submit to the prospective jurors such additional questions by the parties or their attorneys as it deems proper.

b. Peremptory Challenges. If the offense charged is punishable by death, each side is entitled to 20 peremptory challenges. If the offense charged is punishable by imprisonment for more than one year, the government is entitled to 6 peremptory challenges and the defendant or defendants jointly to 10 peremptory challenges. If the offense charged is punishable by imprisonment for not more than one year or by fine or both, each side is entitled to 3 peremptory challenges. If there is more than one defendant, the court may allow the defendants additional peremptory challenges and permit them to be exercised separately or jointly.

c. Alternate Jurors. The court may direct that not more than 6 jurors in addition to the regular jury be called and impaneled to sit as alternate jurors. Alternate jurors in the order in which they are called shall replace jurors who, prior to the time the jury retires to consider its verdict, become or are found to be unable or disqualified to perform their duties. Alternate jurors shall be drawn in the same manner, shall have the same qualifications, shall be subject to the same examination and challenges, shall take the same oath and shall have the same functions, powers, facilities and privileges as the regular jurors. An alternate juror who does not replace a regular juror shall be discharged after the jury retires to consider its verdict. Each side is entitled to 1 peremptory challenge in addition to those otherwise allowed by law if 1 or 2 alternate jurors are to be impaneled, 2 peremptory challenges if 3 or 4 alternate jurors are to be impaneled, and 3 peremptory challenges if 5 or 6 alternate jurors are to be impaneled. The additional peremptory challenges may be used against an alternate juror only, and the other peremptory challenges allowed by these rules may not be used against an alternate juror.

Jury Trial The Sixth Amendment to the federal Constitution provides that “[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to ... an impartial jury.” Qualifications have been made to the constitutional right to trial by jury. In capital prosecutions, the qualifications may be viewed in terms of the guilt phase and penalty phase.

Guilt Phase Jury Right: The determination of a capital offender’s guilt may not occur without a jury unless he or she validly waives the constitutional right to trial by jury. The United States Supreme Court has ruled that, any offense carrying a penalty greater than six months incarceration must be presided over by a jury, unless a defendant validly waives the right to trial by jury.

All capital punishment jurisdictions require that a jury in a capital prosecution consist of twelve members. This requirement is not required by the federal Constitution. The United States Supreme Court has held that the use of a twelve-person jury in a criminal prosecution is not constitutionally required. The Supreme Court has indicated that a jury of less than six persons would violate the Constitution.

Penalty Phase Jury Right: The United States Supreme Court indicated in Walton v. Arizona, 497 U.S. 639 (1990), that the federal Constitution does not extend a right to have a jury preside over the penalty phase of a capital prosecution, for the purpose of determining the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances. However, in Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002) the Supreme Court overruled Walton and held that the federal Constitution required that a jury determine the presence or absence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances at the penalty phase.

In response to the Ring decision, Nebraska amended its laws to require a trifurcated capital trial. The trifurcated capital prosecution consists of a guilt phase, aggravation phase, and mitigation-penalty phase. A jury is used at the guilt phase and aggravation phase, but not at the mitigation-penalty phase. The mitigation-penalty phase is presided over by a three-judge panel.

Under this scheme, after a jury determines guilt, it must then determine whether any statutory aggravating circumstance exists. If the jury finds that an aggravating circumstance exists, a three-judge panel hears mitigating evidence and imposes the sentence. See also Bench Trial; Bill of Rights; Binding/Nonbinding Jury Sentencing Determination; Ring v. Arizona; Walton v. Arizona

Jury Unanimity The United States Supreme Court has held that there is no constitutional right to have a defendant’s guilt determined by a unanimous verdict when a twelve-person jury is used. However, the Supreme Court has indicated that if a six-person jury is used to determine a defendant’s guilt, a verdict of guilty must be unanimous.

It is not constitutionally required that a penalty phase jury return a unanimous punishment verdict. In a majority of jurisdictions that use penalty phase juries, however, it is statutorily required that the punishment verdict be unanimous. See also Andres v. United States; McKoy v. North Carolina; Mills v. Maryland

Jury View The purpose of a jury view is merely to acquaint the jury with a crime scene in order to enable them better to understand trial testimony. As a general rule, observations during a jury view are not part of the trial and should not be considered as evidence. See also Snyder v. Massachusetts; Valdez v. United States

Justice for All Justice for All (JFA) is a Houston-based non-profit organization. JFA was founded in July 1993. Its purpose is to advocate for change in the criminal justice system. JFA takes the position that the criminal justice system is inadequate in protecting the lives and property of citizens. The organizational strategy of JFA is to seek legislative changes in laws.

Justifications for Capital Punishment The two primary theories that are used to justify imposition of capital punishment are: deterrence theory and retribution theory.

Deterrence Theory: Under the deterrence theory, it is posited that certain types of criminal conduct stands as being so reprehensible and detrimental to the existence of society, that all means must be used to deter members of society from taking part in it. Criminal conduct which intentionally and unlawfully takes the life of a human being has been deemed sufficiently reprehensible and detrimental to the existence of society to warrant imposing the death penalty as a means of deterring people from engaging in such conduct.

Opponents of the deterrence theory have argued that capital punishment, per se, does not deter people from committing murder. It is further argued that by killing murderers under the guise of deterrence, society actually reinforces the idea that intentionally taking human life is not morally wrong.

Retribution Theory: The retribution theory of capital punishment is grounded in revenge. Under this theory, loved ones of victims of murder deserve to obtain the maximum degree of revenge against murderers. It is contended that no greater degree of revenge can be extracted from murderers than that of killing them. Opponents of the retribution theory argue that retribution is a primitive instinct that has no place in civilized society.

Juvenile Offenses Juvenile adjudications are generally not permitted to be introduced as evidence during the guilt phase of a capital prosecution. However, for purposes of the penalty phase of a capital prosecution, courts have held that a prior juvenile adjudication constitutes a conviction and may be used as an aggravating circumstance against a capital felon who has a previous juvenile adjudication. See also Aggravating Circumstances

Juveniles From 1776 through 1972, there were approximately 277 executions in the United States of persons under eighteen years of age at the time of the commission of their capital offense. There were four such executions in the American colonies between 1642 and 1775.

Floyd Loveless was seventeen years old when the State of Nevada executed him on September 29, 1944. (Nevada State Library and Archive)

The youngest known person to commit a capital offense and be executed in the nation was a Native American named James Arcene. Arcene was ten years old when he committed capital murder. He was executed by the federal government on June 26, 1885, at the age of twenty-three.

The youngest known persons to be executed in the nation were three twelve-year-old juveniles named Hannah Ocuish, Alfred, and Clem. The last juvenile under the age of sixteen to be executed in the nation was fifteen-year-old James Lewis, who was executed in 1947.

SOURCE: Victor L. Streib, Death Penalty for Juveniles (1987).

An age limit for prosecuting and executing juveniles for capital offenses was constitutionally imposed on the nation initially in 1988. The United States Supreme Court ruled in the case of Thompson v. Oklahoma, 487 U.S. 815 (1988), that the Constitution prohibited the execution of a person who was under sixteen years of age at the time of the commission of his or her capital offense. The result of the ruling in Thompson marked a break with traditional capital punishment jurisprudence in America.

A year after the decision in Thompson, the Supreme Court handed down a ruling in Stanford v. Kentucky, 492 U.S. 361 (1989). The Supreme Court held in Stanford that the imposition of capital punishment on an individual for a capital crime committed at sixteen or seventeen years of age did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the Constitution. The ruling in Stanford was consistent with traditional capital punishment jurisprudence in the nation. From 1776 through 1972, there were thirty-four juveniles put to death in the nation who were sixteen years old at the time of execution. For this same period, eighty-one juveniles were executed who were seventeen years old at the time of execution.

The decision in Stanford was overruled by the decision in Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005). In Roper, the Supreme Court held: "The Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments forbid imposition of the death penalty on offenders who were under the age of 18 when their crimes were committed." Under the decision in

EXECUTION OF INMATES WHO WERE UNDER 18 WHEN THEY COMMITTED MURDER 1976-2004

Roper, no jurisdiction may impose capital punishment on a person who commits a capital offense while under the age of eighteen. See also Roper v. Simmons; Stanford v. Kentucky; Thompson v. Oklahoma

Kansas The State of Kansas is a capital punishment jurisdiction. The State reenacted its death penalty law after the United States Supreme Court decision in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), on April 22, 1994. In the 2004 decision of State v. Marsh, 102 P.3d 445 (Kan. 2004), the Kansas Supreme Court found that the State's death sentencing statute violated the federal Constitution because it permitted a defendant to be sentenced to death when a jury gave equal weight to aggravating and mitigating circumstances. As a consequence of the State Supreme Court decision, the death penalty could not be imposed in Kansas. However, the case was appealed to the United States Supreme Court and in an opinion, Kansas v. Marsh, 126 S.Ct. 2516 (2006), the nation's highest court found that Kansas's death sentencing statute did not violate the federal Constitution. This decision reinstated the death penalty in Kansas.

Kansas has a three-tier legal system. The State's legal system is composed of a supreme court, a court of appeals, and courts of general jurisdiction. The Kansas Supreme Court is presided over by a chief justice and six associate justices. The Kansas Court Appeals is composed of a chief judge and nine judges. The courts of general jurisdiction in the State are called district courts. Capital offenses against the State of Kansas are tried in the district courts.

Kansas' capital punishment offenses are set out under Kan.

Code § 21-3439. This statute is triggered if a person commits a homicide under the following special circumstances:

1. Intentional and premeditated killing of any person in the commission of kidnapping, when the kidnapping was committed with the intent to hold such person for ransom;

2. Intentional and premeditated killing of any person pursuant to a contract or agreement to kill such person or being a party to the contract or agreement pursuant to which such person is killed;

3. Intentional and premeditated killing of any person by an inmate or prisoner confined in a state correctional institution, community correctional institution or jail or while in the custody of an officer or employee of a state correctional institution, community correctional institution or jail;

4. Intentional and premeditated killing of the victim of one of the following crimes: rape, criminal sodomy or aggravated criminal sodomy;

5. Intentional and premeditated killing of a law enforcement officer;

6. Intentional and premeditated killing of more than one person as a part of the same act or transaction or in two or more acts or transactions connected together or constituting parts of a common scheme or course of conduct; or

7. Intentional and premeditated killing of a child under the age of 14 in the commission of kidnapping, when the kidnapping was committed with intent to commit a sex offense upon or with the child or with intent that the child commit or submit to a sex offense.

Capital murder in Kansas is punishable by death or life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. A capital prosecution in Kansas is bifurcated into a guilt phase and penalty phase. A jury is used at both phases of a capital trial. It is required that, at the penalty phase, the jurors unanimously agree that a death sentence is appropriate before it can be imposed. If the penalty phase jury is unable to reach a verdict, the trial judge is required to impose a sentence of life imprisonment. The decision of a penalty phase jury is binding on the trial court under the laws of Kansas.

In order to impose a death sentence upon a defendant, it is required under Kan. Code § 21-4625 that the prosecutor establish the existence of at least one of the following statutory aggravating circumstances at the penalty phase:

1. The defendant was previously convicted of a felony in which the defendant inflicted great bodily harm, disfigurement, dismemberment or death on another.

2. The defendant knowingly or purposely killed or created a great risk of death to more than one person.

3. The defendant committed the crime for the defendant's self or another for the purpose of receiving money or any other thing of monetary value.

4. The defendant authorized or employed another person to commit the crime.

5. The defendant committed the crime in order to avoid or prevent a lawful arrest or prosecution.

6. The defendant committed the crime in an especially heinous, atrocious or cruel manner.

7. The defendant committed the crime while serving a sentence of imprisonment on conviction of a felony.

8. The victim was killed while engaging in, or because of the victim's performance or prospective performance of, the victim's duties as a witness in a criminal proceeding.

Although the federal Constitution will not permit jurisdictions to prevent capital felons from presenting all relevant mitigating evidence at the penalty phase, Kansas has provided by statute, Kan. Code § 21-4626, the following statutory mitigating circumstances that permit a jury to reject imposition of the death penalty:

1. The defendant has no significant history of prior criminal activity.

2. The crime was committed while the defendant was under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbances.

3. The victim was a participant in or consented to the defendant's conduct.

4. The defendant was an accomplice in the crime committed by another person, and the defendant's participation was relatively minor.

5. The defendant acted under extreme distress or under the substantial domination of another person.

6. The capacity of the defendant to appreciate the criminality of the defendant's conduct or to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of law was substantially impaired.

7. The age of the defendant at the time of the crime.

8. At the time of the crime, the defendant was suffering from post-traumatic stress syndrome caused by violence or abuse by the victim.

9. A term of imprisonment is sufficient to defend and protect the people's safety from the defendant.

Under Kansas' capital punishment statute, the Kansas Supreme Court automatically reviews a sentence of death. Kansas uses lethal injection to carry out death sentences. The State's death row facility for men is located in El Dorado, Kansas, while the facility maintaining female death row inmates is located in Topeka, Kansas.

Pursuant to the laws of Kansas, the governor has exclusive authority to grant clemency in capital cases. The governor may commute a death sentence to life imprisonment without parole.

Under the laws of Kansas, a limitation is imposed upon the number of persons who may be present at an execution. The following is provided by Kan. Code § 22-4003:

a. In addition to the secretary of corrections or the warden designated by the secretary, the executioner and persons ... to assist in the execution, the following persons, and no others, may be present at the execution: (1) A member of the clergy attending the prisoner; (2) not more than three persons designated by the prisoner; and (3) not more than 10 persons designated by the secretary of corrections as official witnesses. The secretary shall consider the inclusion of members of the immediate family of any deceased victim of the prisoner as witnesses when designating official witnesses. The identity of persons present at the execution, other than the secretary or the warden designated by the secretary, shall be confidential. A witness may elect to reveal such wit-ness's own identity, but in no event shall a witness reveal the identity of any other person present at the execution.

b. All witnesses shall be 18 years of age or older.

c. The secretary may deny the attendance of any person selected or designated as a witness when the secretary determines it is necessary for reasons of security and order of the institution.

d. As used in this section, "members of the immediate family" means the spouse, a child by birth or adoption, stepchild, parent, grandparent, grandchild, sibling or the spouse of any member of the immediate family specified in this subsection.

From the start of modern capital punishment in 1976 through October 2006, there were 1053 executions in the nation; however, Kansas did not execute any capital felon. A total of eight capital felons were on death row in Kansas as of July 2006. The death row population in the State for this period was listed as three black inmates and five white inmates.

Kansas City Massacre The Kansas City Massacre involved the June 17, 1933, attempt to free a captured federal prisoner named Frank Nash. Three men directly participated in the attempted rescue: Charles Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd, Vernon Miller, and Adam Richetti.

Nash was a career criminal. In 1913, the State of Oklahoma sentenced Nash to life imprisonment for a murder conviction. He was eventually pardoned. In 1920, Nash was sentenced to twenty-five years' imprisonment for burglary, but was again pardoned. In 1924, the federal government sentenced Nash to twenty-five years' imprisonment for assaulting a mail custodian. Nash escaped from federal detention on October 19, 1930. A massive investigation was launched by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) to capture Nash.

It was not until June 16, 1933, that Nash was captured by the FBI. Nash was apprehended in a store in Hot Springs, Arkansas, by two FBI Agents, Frank Smith and F. Joseph Lackey, and a local Oklahoma police chief named Otto Reed. After Nash's capture, arrangements were made to transport him by train to Kansas City, Missouri. Law enforcement agents were not aware of it, but Floyd, Richetti, and Miller were waiting to execute a planned attempt to free Nash when the FBI arrived in Kansas City on June 17.

Floyd was about twenty-nine years old at the time of the Kansas City Massacre. He had an extensive criminal record that began with his arrest in St. Louis, Missouri, on September 16, 1925 for highway robbery. Floyd pled guilty and was sentenced to prison. He was released on March 7, 1929. On May 20, 1930, Floyd was arrested in Toledo, Ohio, on a bank robbery charge and was sentenced to twelve to fifteen years in prison. However, while en route to the penitentiary, Floyd escaped and was a fugitive when the Kansas City Massacre took place.

The FBI hunted down Charles Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd (left) and Adam Richetti (right) after the Kansas City massacre. Floyd was gunned down by the FBI. Richetti was captured and later executed. (U.S. Department of Justice/FBI)

Richetti was about twenty-three years old at the time of the Kansas City Massacre. His first arrest occurred on August 7, 1928, for a robbery in Hammond, Indiana. Richetti was sentenced to prison for one to ten years for the crime. He was paroled in 1930. On March 9, 1932, Richetti was arrested for bank robbery in Sulphur, Oklahoma. While out on bond for the crime, Richetti illegally fled Oklahoma. At the time of the Kansas City Massacre, Richetti was a fugitive.

Miller was about thirty-seven and a native of South Dakota. He was a World War I veteran who became a policeman in 1920. He was elected county sheriff in 1922. After serving one year as sheriff, Miller embarked on a life of crime. On April 4, 1923, he was arrested for embezzling public funds. Miller was convicted of the crime and sentenced to two to ten years in prison. After his release, Miller had various arrests, but no convictions, for petty crimes. It was believed that Miller was a hired gunman for New York crime boss Louis "Lepke" Buchalter.

On the morning of June 17, Miller, Floyd, and Richetti drove to the railroad station to await Nash's arrival. The train arrived with Nash being escorted by agents Lackey and Smith and Sheriff Reed. When they disembarked, they were met by two other FBI agents and two local policemen. Upon leaving the railroad station, they all walked to two waiting cars. Before they could leave, however, they were ambushed by Miller, Floyd, and Richetti. Machine gun fire tore through the air, striking officers and Nash. When the shooting ended, the two local policemen were killed, Sheriff Reed was killed, one FBI agent was killed, and two others were wounded. Nash was also killed in the battle by his rescuers.

Miller, Floyd, and Richetti escaped from the crime scene unscathed. A massive investigation was immediately launched after the murders. Miller fled to Chicago, then to New York, and back to Chicago. On October 31, 1933, the FBI learned of his presence in Chicago, but he escaped capture. On November 29, 1933, the FBI found Miller's corpse in a ditch on the outskirts of Detroit, Michigan. He had been beaten and strangled. It was reported that he was killed by mobsters.

Floyd and Richetti made their way to Toledo, Ohio, after the massacre. They eventually traveled to Buffalo, New York, in September 1933. In October 1934, they decided to drive out to Oklahoma, accompanied by two female companions. Their car ran off the road and was damaged near Wellsville, Ohio. The two men decided to let their female companions drive the car into Wellsville to be repaired, while they waited alongside the road.

Word quickly spread to the local police that two suspicious-looking men were seen on the roadside near the outskirts of town. A routine investigation was made by the local police chief. However, when he came upon Floyd and Richetti, they fired at him. A gun battle ensued. Richetti was captured, but Floyd escaped.

The FBI was called in and an intensive search for Floyd was made. On October 22, a squad of four FBI agents led by Melvin Purvis, along with five local Ohio police officers, spotted Floyd in a car behind a barn near Clarkson, Ohio. Floyd leaped from the car with a pistol, shots were fired, and he was wounded. Floyd surrendered. He died while waiting on an ambulance.

Richetti was returned to Kansas City, where he was indicted on four counts of first-degree murder on March 1, 1935. On June 17, he was found guilty and sentenced to death. He was executed by lethal gas on October 7, 1938.

Issue Presented: Whether Kansas's sentencing statute that allows the imposition of the death penalty when the penalty phase jury determines that the mitigating and aggravating evidence are equally balanced violates the federal Constitution.

Case Holding: Kansas's procedure for weighing aggravating and mitigating evidence during the penalty phase does not violate the federal Constitution.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Michael Lee Marsh, was charged by the State of Kansas with capital murder, first-degree premeditated murder, aggravated arson, and aggravated burglary. A jury convicted Marsh of all charges. During the penalty phase, the jury was instructed that they must impose the death penalty if they unanimously found that evidence of aggravating circumstances were not outweighed by evidence of mitigating circumstances. The jury found that the aggravating circumstances were not outweighed by the mitigating circumstances and, therefore, imposed the death penalty for the capital murder conviction. On direct review by the State Supreme Court, the capital murder conviction and death sentence were reversed. The State Supreme Court found that by allowing a jury to sentence a defendant to death when aggravating and mitigating circumstances were equally balanced violated the federal Constitution. Consequently, the court held that the death penalty could not be imposed under Kansas law. On a petition for appeal by the State, the United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the issue.

Opinion of the Court by Justice Thomas: Justice Thomas held that the federal Constitution is not violated by a capital punishment statute which requires the imposition of the death penalty, when the sentencing jury determines that aggravating evidence and mitigating evidence are equally balanced. The opinion justified its position as follows:

The Kansas death penalty statute satisfies the constitutional mandates of Furman and its progeny because it rationally narrows the class of death-eligible defendants and permits a jury to consider any mitigating evidence relevant to its sentencing determination. It does not interfere, in a constitutionally significant way, with a jury's ability to give independent weight to evidence offered in mitigation.

Kansas' procedure narrows the universe of death-eligible defendants consistent with Eighth Amendment requirements. Under Kansas law, imposition of the death penalty is an option only after a defendant is convicted of capital murder, which requires that one or more specific elements beyond intentional premeditated murder be found. Once convicted of capital murder, a defendant becomes eligible for the death penalty only if the State seeks a separate sentencing hearing, and proves beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of one or more statutorily enumerated aggravating circumstances.

Consonant with the individualized sentencing requirement, a Kansas jury is permitted to consider any evidence relating to any mitigating circumstance in determining the appropriate sentence for a capital defendant, so long as that evidence is relevant....

Contrary to Marsh's argument, [the statute] does not create a general presumption in favor of the death penalty in the State of Kansas. Rather, the Kansas capital sentencing system is dominated by the presumption that life imprisonment is the appropriate sentence for a capital conviction. If the State fails to meet its burden to demonstrate the existence of an aggravating circumstance(s) beyond a reasonable doubt, a sentence of life imprisonment must be imposed. If the State overcomes this hurdle, then it bears the additional burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that aggravating circumstances are not outweighed by mitigating circumstances. Significantly, although the defendant appropriately bears the burden of proffering mitigating circumstances—a burden of production—he never bears the burden of demonstrating that mitigating circumstances outweigh aggravating circumstances. Instead, the State always has the burden of demonstrating that mitigating evidence does not outweigh aggravating evidence. Absent the State's ability to meet that burden, the default is life imprisonment. Moreover, if the jury is unable to reach a unanimous decision—in any respect—a sentence of life must be imposed. This system does not create a presumption that death is the appropriate sentence for capital murder.

Nor is there any force behind Marsh's contention that an equipoise determination reflects juror confusion or inability to decide between life and death, or that a jury may use equipoise as a loophole to shirk its constitutional duty to render a reasoned, moral decision, regarding whether death is an appropriate sentence for a particular defendant. Such an argument rests on an implausible characterization of the Kansas statute—that a jury's determination that aggravators and mitigators are in equipoise is not a decision, much less a decision for death—and thus misses the mark. Weighing is not an end; it is merely a means to reaching a decision. The decision the jury must reach is whether life or death is the appropriate punishment. The Kansas jury instructions clearly inform the jury that a determination that the evidence is in equipoise is a decision for—not a presumption in favor of—death.

The judgment of the Kansas Supreme Court was reversed and the case was remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with the opinion.

Concurring Opinion by Justice Scalia: Justice Scalia joined the Court's opinion. He wrote separately for the purpose of voicing his disagreements with the reasoning of the dissenting opinions.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Stevens: Justice Stevens disapproved of the Court granting certiorari in the case. He argued in his dissent that the issue presented by the case was a State matter that should not have been interfered with by the Court.

Dissenting Opinion by Justice Souter, in Which Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., Joined: Justice Souter disagreed with the outcome of the case. In his dissent, Justice Souter indicated that he agreed "with the Kansas judges that the Constitution forbids a mandatory death penalty in what they describe as 'doubtful cases,' when aggravating and mitigating factors are of equal weight." The essence of the dissent was stated as follows:

Since a valid capital sentence ... requires a choice based upon unique particulars identifying the crime and its perpetrator as heinous to the point of demanding death even within the class of potentially capital offenses, the State's provision for a tie breaker in favor of death fails on both counts. The dispositive fact under the tie breaker is not the details of the crime or the unique identity of the individual defendant. The determining fact is not directly linked to a particular crime or particular criminal at all; the law operates merely on a jury's finding of equipoise in the State's own selected considerations for and against death. Nor does the tie breaker identify the worst of the worst, or even purport to reflect any evidentiary showing that death must be the reasoned moral response; it does the opposite. The statute produces a death sentence exactly when a sentencing impasse demonstrates as a matter of law that the jury does not see the evidence as showing the worst sort of crime committed by the worst sort of criminal, in a combination heinous enough to demand death. It operates, that is, when a jury has applied the State's chosen standards of culpability and mitigation and reached nothing more than what the Supreme Court of Kansas calls a "tie." It mandates death in what that court identifies as "doubtful cases." The statute thus addresses the risk of a morally unjustifiable death sentence, not by minimizing it as precedent unmistakably requires, but by guaranteeing that in equipoise cases the risk will be realized, by placing a thumb [on] death's side of the scale.

Issue Presented: Whether the defendant renounced his United States citizenship and became expatriated by reason of acts committed in Japan during World War II and therefore could not be convicted of treason against the United States.

Case Holding: The defendant did not renounce his United States citizenship and become expatriated by reason of acts committed in Japan during World War II and therefore he could be convicted of treason against the United States.

Factual and Procedural Background of Case: The defendant, Kawakita, was convicted of treason and sentenced to death by the United States. In an appeal to a federal Court of Appeals, the defendant contended that he was not a citizen of the United States and therefore could not be convicted of treason against the nation. The relevant facts on the appeal showed that the defendant was born in the United States in 1921 to Japanese parents who were citizens of Japan. He was thus a citizen of the United States by birth and, by reason of Japanese law, a national of Japan. In 1939, the defendant went to Japan with his father to visit his grandfather. He traveled on a United States passport and, to obtain it, he took the customary oath of allegiance. In 1940, he registered with an American consul in Japan as an American citizen. The defendant remained in Japan, but his father returned to the United States.

In March 1941, the defendant entered Meiji University in Japan and took a commercial course and military training. In April 1941, he renewed his United States passport, once more taking the oath of allegiance to the United States. During this period, he was registered as an alien with the Japanese police. When war broke out between the United States and Japan, the defendant was still a student at Meiji University. He completed his schooling in 1943, at which time it was impossible for him to return to the United States. In 1943, he registered in the Koseki, a family census register. The defendant did not join the Japanese Army. Rather, he obtained employment as an interpreter with the Oeyama Nickel Industry Company, where he worked until Japan's surrender. He was hired to interpret communications between the Japanese and the prisoners of war who were assigned to work at a mine and in a factory owned by his employer. The treasonable acts for which he was convicted involved his conduct toward American prisoners of war.
