SET PREFACE

The Greenwood Encyclopedia of LGBT Issues Worldwide is a multivolume set presenting comprehensive, authoritative, and current data related to the cultural, social, personal, and political experiences of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered (LGBT) people. The set encompasses more than 80 countries with each volume covering major populated world regions: Africa and the Middle East, Asia and Oceania, the Americas and the Caribbean, and Europe. Volumes are organized regionally and then alphabetically by country (including Hong Kong and the European Union, the latter because of its importance to European laws) with chapters that reflect LGBT geopolitical and historical context and follow a broad outline of topics—Overview of the country, Overview of LGBT Issues, Education, Employment and Economics, Social/Government Programs, Sexuality/Sexual Practices, Family, Community, Health, Politics and Law, Religion and Spirituality, Violence, and Outlook for the 21st Century. Under these topics, contributors explore a range of contemporary issues including sodomy, antidiscrimination legislation (in employment, child adoption, housing, immigration), marriage and domestic partnerships, speech and association, transsexualism, intersexualism, AIDS, safe-sex educational efforts, and more. As such, the set provides an unparalleled global perspective on LGBT issues and helps facilitate cross-national comparisons.

The term LGBT was chosen for this encyclopedia as a shorthand, yet inclusive, notation for the class of people who experience marginalization and discrimination perpetrated by heterosexual norms. In the late 19th century, the word heterosexual was invented to denote abnormal sexual behaviors between persons of the opposite sex. Ten years later, the word homosexual was invented for the same purpose of medicalizing same-sex behaviors and psychology. Many people found it offensive to categorize their lifestyle as pathology. They also thought that the emphasis on sex restrictive in describing their experiences and, instead, created and used the term homophile or Uranian. By the mid-20th century, the word gay came into common usage. As the gay political movement took roots in the 1950s and 1960s, it became apparent that, in the eyes of the public, gay women were invisible. In response to that phenomenon, many gay organizations changed their names to include women, as in—“lesbian and gay” or “gay and lesbian.” Still, bisexuals, the transgendered (which includes transsexuals, transvestites, and intersexed people), and those questioning their sexual orientation believed that “lesbian and gay” was not inclusive enough to describe their experiences and challenged the status quo.

By the 1980s and 1990s, more gay organizations modified their names to include their moniker. However, a backlash occurred with many groups because the names became un-wielding. At the same time, radical street organizations, such as Queer Nation and ACT UP, appropriated the epithet queer and embraced its shocking value. This is a common practice by people who are marginalized and discriminated against to defuse the power of hateful words. Further, academia appropriated the word queer since it was a concise term denoting all persons outside heteronormative power structures. Still, many community organizations resisted the attempts to include queer in their names but rather stuck to some version of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered (LGBT). In the chapters, readers will encounter many variations of LGBT. Sometimes this will be written as “gay community,” “lesbian and gay,” LGBT, queer, or other terminology. The word usage reveals much about the community’s level of understanding concerning LGBT issues.

Contributors were chosen based on their expertise in LGBT issues and knowledge of their country. Every effort was made to find contributors who live, or have lived, in the country in question. This was important, as gay people are often a hidden minority not easily quantified. Some contributors are from countries where gay people are routinely rounded up and killed. Contributors from these countries have taken great personal risk to participate in this encyclopedia and we commend their courage. Each contributor provides an authoritative resource guide that strives to include helpful suggested readings, Web sites, organizations, and film/video sources. The chapters and resources are designed for students, academics, and engaged citizens to study contemporary LGBT issues in depth for specific countries and from a global perspective.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This ambitious project has been made possible through the work of many scholars. I wish to thank the advisory board—Robert Aldrich of the University of Sydney, David Foster of Arizona State University, John Goss of the Utopia Asian Gay and Lesbian Resources, Jan Lofstrom of the University of Helsinki, Ruth Morgan of the Gay and Lesbian Archives of South Africa, David Paternotte of the University of Brussels, Gerard Sullivan of the University of Sydney, and Walter Williams of the University of Southern California—for their dedicated work and leads to so many wonderful contributors. I want to thank the Institute for the Study of Human Resources (ISHR), D/B/A One for their generous financial support toward completion of this encyclopedia. With so many essays to review, this project could not have been possible without the help of first-level editing by Jessica Chesnutt, Jennafer Collins, Benjamin de Lee, William “B. J.” Fleming, Winston Gieseke, Aimee Greenfield, Nicholas Grider, Alice Julier, and Bonnie Stewart. A heartfelt thanks goes to Astrid Cook, Gabriel Molina, Matt Moreno, and Rachel Wexelbaum for their editorial review of many of the essays. A special thanks goes to Wendi Schnauffer of Greenwood Press for her editorial assistance over the entire project.

This project took more than two years to complete. Locating experts on LGBT issues, especially for the smaller countries or in countries where it is dangerous to be gay, was a monumental task. In working with the contributors, I was struck by their dedication to making the world safe for all people. They are much more than just writers; they are people interested in changing the world to make it a better place. They understood that the first step toward reducing heterosexism and homophobia is to educate the public on LGBT culture and issues. To that end, they were eager to participate—even if they faced language difficulties or possible persecution from their governments. I commend each writer for the courage to be part of the solution toward overcoming sexual orientation bias. I hope this encyclopedia will further their vision.

THE AMERICAS AND THE CARIBBEAN

INTRODUCTION

THE AMERICAS AND THE CARIBBEAN

Lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered (LGBT) people have endured a long struggle for acceptance and equal rights in the Americas. Only recently has there been significant progress in some geopolitical locations toward full equality. Still, there are many countries where the mere existence of gay people is perceived as a threat to the status quo and they face daily acts of discrimination and violence.

Very little is known about the gender or sexual roles of the indigenous cultures (or original inhabitants) of the Americas, though there are legends of transsexual gods and characters who were neither male nor female but both and who were pivotal in creation myths. Anthropologists have determined that many indigenous groups—Incas, Mayans, and native groups of North America—found value in people who did not conform to standard gender roles. Sexuality and gender roles were often ambiguous and fluid. The thought of disposing of someone who did not behave in a clearly male or female capacity, but somewhere in between, was to deny the spirit of the individual and the value the person brought to the survival of the group. One term used to describe these individuals is two-spirited. The American indigenous cultures not only tolerated but approved of two-spirited persons and often held them in high esteem. To apply the modern term homosexual or gay to these cultures is not appropriate, as the sexual and gender arrangements in these societies were very different from those of the modern West.

The colonization of the Americas by Spain, Portugal, the Netherlands, France, and England and the influx of African slaves radically changed the attitudes and beliefs of the indigenous people. The bi-polar ethics promulgated by Christianity did not allow for sexual or gender ambiguity, and two-spirited persons became marginalized and persecuted. Reports from many Christian explorers displayed shock at the ease with which indigenous people crossed gender and sexual roles. It was not just two-spirited people that shocked Europeans, but homosexual behavior must have been prevalent since many of the reports back to Europe characterized the indigenous people as “savages” and “sodomites.” It was this characterization that justified, in the minds of Christians, the right to use force to enslave and decimate the indigenous people. Ultimately, Christian Europeans largely obliterated the religious beliefs and cultural values of the indigenous people and forced them to convert to Christianity.

The African slave trade also had a major impact on the Americas. Precolonial Africans were much more accepting of gender and sexual diversity. This is a pattern seen throughout the world and throughout history. Societies based on subsistence living tend to accept people the way they are born without question. The survival of the community requires productive work from all members. It would make no sense to exclude members who help support the community. Also, it is not rational for a community that lives in constant fear of starvation to insist on exclusive heterosexual behaviors, since this would lead to overpopulation. Sexuality in these cultures is much more fluid with most of the population not engaging in exclusively heterosexual or homosexual behaviors or relationships.

Africans were also considered to be “savages” and “sodomites” by European slaver traders. By bringing Africans to the Americas, a power hierarchy was established that placed white Europeans at the top, mixed-race people next, the indigenous people third, and black Africans at the bottom. Although slave owners forced their slaves to embrace Christianity, a small number of slaves resisted and continued to practice their native religions—usually in secret. It is these religions that evolved over time to become Voodoo. Voodoo is important in the discussion of LGBT people in the Americas because many gay people in the Caribbean and countries surrounding the Caribbean have sought sanctuary in gay-friendly Voodoo.

In the late 19th century, the seeds of the modern gay liberation movement were planted in Germany and influenced early sexologists in the United States. Eventually, this led to the formation of the first gay liberation organizations in the United States; they rapidly expanded after the Stonewall Riots of 1969 in New York City. Now, there are gay activists groups in virtually every corner of the North and South American continents, including the Caribbean.

Through a half-century of academic research, community organizing, and political activism, gays and lesbians have won most rights, placing them on equal legal footing with heterosexuals in Canada and a few states within the United States; this includes the right to marry a same-sex partner. However, even with these hard-won rights, lesbians and gay men often face discrimination in housing, employment, the military, and child adoption. There continues to be a significant negative social status related to being nonheterosexual. The progress toward equal rights for transsexuals and the intersexed is significantly behind those for lesbians and gay men.

Most countries of Central and South America are still in the middle stages of obtaining equal rights for lesbians and gays. Here, the sodomy statutes have been challenged and sometimes overturned, and LGBT activists are now working to obtain antidiscrimination protection related to employment and housing and overcoming heterosexism and homophobia through education. They are also seeking domestic partnership or civil union privileges. There is still much work to be done to overcome centuries of Christian oppression.

Some countries, such as Haiti, Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago, and Paraguay, are in the earliest stages of gay civil rights. Under constant threat of violence, a handful of gay activists are working almost in secret to secure the most basic level of civil rights to stop the violence perpetrated against them by the populace and police, and to counter the negativity promoted by the Catholic Church and other religious organizations.

SEXUAL AND RELATIONSHIP ARRANGEMENTS IN MACHISMO CULTURES

Latin America consists of approximately 37 countries located between Mexico and Cuba, in the north, to the southern tip of South America. The primary languages in these countries are Spanish and Portuguese. Catholicism is the dominant religion, and it directly influences governmental policy and impacts cultural norms.

It is impossible to discuss LGBT culture and politics in Latin America without a clear understanding of machismo culture.

In machismo cultures, men dominate the top of an elaborate hierarchy with women and children subservient to men. Men are considered the head of the family. Women are expected to be homemakers and raise children. Male children often hold a higher status than the wife, and female children hold the lowest strata within the family. In sex, the man dominates the encounter, actively penetrates his wife, and focuses on his orgasm. The wife, who is penetrated, is considered weak and passive and her needs during sex are inconsequential.

Violence is one of the hallmarks of the machismo culture. These societies tacitly approve men keeping their women and children compliant through violence. Further, men are allowed, if not expected, to have outside sexual relationships to prove their virility. In an obvious double standard, if a wife is found to have engaged in outside sexual relationships, a man has the unspoken approval to beat his wife and, in extreme cases, engage in honor killings.

In this context, this encyclopedia explores the experiences of transvestites, transsexuals, gay men, and gay relationships.

Male transvestites are men who dress as women and “pass” (as a woman) to varying degrees. They are typically homosexual, but not necessarily so. Transvestites are universally despised in machismo cultures. Male-to-female (MTF) transsexuals are equally despised and discriminated against. Regardless of whether they have had surgery to conform to their new gender role or not, their daily experiences as women are fraught with danger and persecution. Machismo men cannot understand why another man would give up male privileges to act and look like a woman. Transvestites and MTF transsexuals are looked down on in society and face severe job discrimination. Many resort to working in the sex industry as prostitutes or engage in illegal activities, such as selling drugs. Customers can act with impunity toward transvestites and MTF transsexuals because authorities often ignore crimes committed toward this underclass. As such, many men who consider themselves heterosexual seek out sex with transvestites and preoperative MTF transsexuals as a way of having sex with men without their partner being a true man. In the machismo man’s mind, he is not gay because he is not having sex with another man, but with a lower-class woman.

Many machismo men have sex with other men (who look and act as men) as long as they penetrate the other man (i.e., performs the “man’s role”). By doing so, these men do not self-identify as gay. This is such a common phenomenon that sex researchers have created the category of “men who have sex with men” (MSM), since these men identify as heterosexuals rather than homosexual or gay.

In machismo culture, power is ascribed to the one who penetrates (also called the “active” or “top”), rather than those who are penetrated (also called the “passive” or “bottom”). Since women are penetrated, they are considered passive and of lower status than men. Men who allow themselves to be penetrated during sex are viewed with scorn and ridicule because they have given up the power associated with being a man and have reduced themselves to the level of powerless women.

As can be imagined, machismo culture has severe implications for men who discover they are sexually attracted to other men. They have grown up hearing a constant barrage of epithets and slurs against gay men and now realize they, too, are gay. The common solution is to stay closeted and marry, have children, and secretly engage in sex with other men. Of course, the closet carries deep negative psychological implications for the man and those around him. The thought of being openly gay is scary in heterosexist and homophobic societies, since the risk of rejection by family and friends is almost certain and physical harm is very possible, and the idea of living with another man seems confusing since the need to play gender roles forces adaptations that are completely foreign to their psyche.

In recent years, the Latin countries have seen a surge in young gay men who live their lives in the open, almost in defiance of the cultural norms. This is a fairly recent development. Transvestites and MTF transsexuals historically have been the ones who shunned (or, some would say, flout) societal expectations to live the life they want. It takes courage to live as such, and many pay a dear price, from physical assaults to police intimidation and killings. The surge in openly gay young men has been a challenge for the machismo cultures. These men are not weak, passive, or playing a woman's role. It is these men who are most responsible for the growth in the Latin LGBT community and political organizing in Latin America.

Women, particularly lesbians, fair poorly in machismo culture. Women are supposed to be married, desire children, and be subservient to men. Since wives are not supposed to work outside the home, they often lack marketable skills to support themselves financially. Not all women live with men. In all societies in the Americas, a large number of families are headed by single women who are either divorced or widows. When a woman seeks employment outside the home, she faces subtle or not-so-subtle discrimination and often has to settle for lower-paying jobs. A woman who discovers that she is a lesbian is faced with a number of choices. She can marry, have children, stay closeted, and live a life of quiet desperation with possible clandestine sexual relationships with other women, but if she is found out, she could be exposed to violence from her husband and an indifferent, if not hostile, governmental system. If she chooses to live as a single woman, she will confuse her family and friends and be exposed to constant sexual advances from men (advances that are so aggressive as to verge on assault or rape). If she declares her lesbianism and/or lives openly with another woman, most likely her family and friends will cease to admit to knowing her and she will still face constant sexual aggression from men who will not respect her homosexuality. It is these women, mostly young, open lesbians, who are instrumental in political and community organizing in Latin America on LGBT issues.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Sodomy

In the quest for gay rights, the first step is to challenge antisodomy statutes. Sodomy has a wide range of definitions. To generalize, sodomy involves sexual behaviors that deviate from cultural norms. With the colonization of the Americas by Christian missionaries and zealots, the cultural norms approved sex between married couples only and restricted it to this sort of relationship. In some states of the United States and some of the Latin countries, statutes are still in effect that criminalize all kinds of sex outside of marriage. In other states and other countries, sodomy is defined exclusively as sex between men. Sometimes it is limited to anal penetration, while other times it must involve men under the age of consent. Not surprising since patriarchy still dominates in the Americas, sex between women is often not included in the sodomy statutes and is legally ignored.

Regardless of the exact details defining sodomy, the mere existence of anti-sodomy statutes makes homosexuality inherently illegal. By association, this opens the door for societal and governmental abuse of homosexuals. Antisodomy statutes still exist in Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago. The existence of these laws makes community and political organizing very dangerous. In these countries, a handful of activists are taking great personal risk to overturn the antisodomy statutes, though the Internet has provided methods of getting information to the LGBT population in ways that reduce individual risk. This is a pattern seen across the globe. For countries where it is dangerous to organize and demonstrate for LGBT rights, the Internet is facilitating the spread of information without the organizers having to live within the boundaries of the country.

Nicaragua is an example of a country in Latin America that once had anti-sodomy statutes, saw them removed by a socialist revolution, but then experienced a subsequent conservative revolution that reinstated the statutes. A change in government in 2007 resulted in the revocation of Nicaragua's antisodomy statutes; this has facilitated a boon in LGBT community organizing.

Antidiscrimination Statutes and Violence

Eliminating antisodomy statutes is the first step toward ensuring safety for LGBT persons. There is not much a gay person can do if he or she, as a classification, is deemed illegal. Not only do these statutes prevent LGBT persons from forming deep relationships with their significant other, they are also prevented from organizing to advocate or the overturning of antisodomy statutes; in effect, they are unable to gainers for equal rights.

The second step toward ensuring safety for LGBT persons is to seek equality with heterosexuals and to reduce societal violence. Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, and Panama are examples of countries that do not have antisodomy statutes, yet are still dangerous for LGBT people. The antigay culture created by Christian beliefs and reinforced through machismo violence clearly demonstrates that these cultures need to go beyond simply eliminating laws that make the acts illegal. Instead, these cultures need to become proactive and make it safe for all their citizens to form relationships, interact with the community, and be safely employed.

In cultures that are not so antigay, the need for antidiscrimination statutes is not as pressing. Uruguay is an example of a Latin country that overturned its antisodomy statutes in 1934 and, decades later, granted homosexual couples virtually the same rights as heterosexual couples (in 2007, except for marriage and the right to adopt children). Antigay violence in Uruguay is minimal, and this has reduced the apparent need to pass antidiscrimination statutes. As the culture became less antigay, it was able to grant virtually all rights to LGBT people.

Canada is at the forefront of gay rights in the Americas. Its sodomy statutes were eliminated in early 1980s and many of the provinces and cities have also enacted their own antidiscrimination statutes to provide protection for LGBT people in housing, the community, and in the workplace. In 2005, Canada became the fourth country in the world to approve gay marriage. This does not mean the struggle for equal rights is over there, since some Canadian fundamentalists still voice strong religious objections to gay rights.

The United States has a weaker central government with regards to civil rights than Canada. Each state controls its own antidiscrimination statutes. Currently, most of the LGBT population is protected in housing, public accommodations, and employment through a patchwork of local city and state antidiscrimination statutes. Even with a few of the states granting same-sex marriages, there is still a need for antidiscrimination statutes, considering that, in some areas, the level of violence (antigay hate crimes) is increasing each year.

Marriage and Child Adoption

The existence of same-sex marriages is not conceivable in the minds of many Latin Americans. and most Latin American countries ignore the possibility of such arrangements. Honduras, for example, specifically prohibits same-sex marriages. LGBT activists are still struggling with overcoming overt discrimination and see same-sex marriage as an issue to be addressed decades from now. Uruguay and Mexico (in two of its states) are the exception and have extended domestic partnerships (or civil unions) to LGBT people, but without the benefit of full marriage. No Latin American country allows same-sex couples to adopt children.

The federal government of the United States does not specify the conditions of marriage, and instead regards marriage as a function of the states. At the federal level, a Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) was enacted to allow states to ignore same-sex marriages performed in other states. Conservatives and religious fundamentalists believed that this was needed to stop the spread of, what they considered to be, immoral behavior. Subsequently, most states (37 in the fall of 2009) have modified their constitutions to define marriage as a contract between one man and one woman. These modifications came about as a backlash to the possibility of same-sex marriages being approved in the early 1990s. Now that same-sex marriages have been approved in several states, it is expected that legal challenges will be mounted against the federal DOMA restrictions. By overturning the DOMA, the states will be open to internal challenges to their constitutional restrictions against same-sex marriages.

Adoptions are also a state function in the United States. Many states allow individuals and couples who are homosexual to adopt children. Florida is the only state to specifically deny homosexuals the right to adopt children.

Canada has no equivalent to the radical right and religious fundamentalists found in the United States. As such, in 2005, it approved full rights for LGBT people to marry and adopt children.

Education

Education is an important tool for overcoming prejudice against LGBT people. Many public schools systems in Canada and the United States have implemented educational programs that are inclusive of family diversity, including lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered people. These “rainbow curriculums” are typically fairly innocuous, only mentioning that families come in all types, including those with two mothers or two fathers. None of the curricula make explicit differentiations between heterosexuality and homosexuality. Still, religious conservatives often complain and are occasionally successful at having the curriculum retracted or modified. Similarly, pro-gay books are sometimes removed from school libraries.

Very few school systems in Latin America have attempted to implement an inclusive curriculum. Often, if the issue of homosexuality is broached, it is through sex education courses. Still, the Catholic Church takes great exception to presenting homosexuality as natural and value-free as heterosexuality. For example, in Uruguay, the school system adopted the ninth grade biology textbook Listen! Learn! Live! The topic of sex included a list of possible arrangements, including masturbation and sex with opposite- or same-sex partners. No other details were given, but the (Catholic) Conference of Bishops complained and eventually the book was pulled from public schools. Religious interference with public schools is an ongoing problem.

One of the major obstacles blocking access to information on homosexuality is poverty. Many Latin American countries are classified as third-world economies where the average household income is the equivalent of only a few hundred American dollars per year. Such poverty often prevents children from attending school and denies them access to books, computers, and the Internet. Particularly in the poor agrarian countryside, children have little chance to hear accurate information about homosexuality.

AIDS

AIDS has spread to every corner of the Americas and the Caribbean. It has been a devastating disease, infecting millions and caused widespread death and grief. Although it was first identified in the gay male communities of the United States, it now infects about the same proportion of heterosexuals as it does homosexuals. The major transmission routes are unprotected sex and/or the sharing of needles with infected partners.

Latin American countries are faced with many factors that have facilitated the spread of AIDS. First, most of these countries are poor—this prevents the dissemination of safe sex programs, hinders medical treatments for those who are infected, and reduces the availability of condoms. Catholicism is critical of birth control, including the use of condoms. Further, many men resist the use of condoms, as their machismo mind-set views the use of condoms as “unmanly.” Taken together, condom use rates in Latin America are extremely low with corresponding appallingly high rates of HIV infection.

Second, some of the Latin American countries, such as Colombia, Peru, and Bolivia, are heavy producers of illegal drugs. Some of the major transportation hubs for illegal drugs include Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Venezuela. Drug use in these countries is extremely high because of drugs’ availability and low price. As such, there is a much higher use of needles for intravenous injections. The risk of infection is much higher for IV drug users because it involves the direct injection of a substance into the blood stream. There is a mind-set of extreme risk taking in people involved in illegal drug production and transportation, which often includes shooting up with possibly infected needles and engaging in risky sexual behaviors.

AIDS has been a double-edged sword for the gay community. Not only has it caused the death of two generations of gay men, it has also provided fodder for religious conservatives to characterize the gay community as diseased and sick. However, AIDS has forced communities to become more open about sex and to discuss homosexuality. AIDS has also become a rallying point for many organizations that would later evolve into gay rights advocates. The disease has forced many conservative communities to acknowledge and engage LGBT people for the first time.

Religion

Religious beliefs have been pivotal for the acceptance of LGBT people. Almost without exception, the indigenous people of the Americas (including the Mayas, Incas, and North American Native Americans) held very different concepts of gender and sex roles than those held by European explorers and conquerors. Often their gods were transgendered and their myths included stories of LGBT people helping the community. Human sexuality was very fluid in her region, and there was little concern about who had sex with whom. Same-sex sexual behaviors and relationships were quite common.

The invading European colonialists brought their views of Christianity to the Americas with the goal of indoctrinating and pacifying the indigenous people. Latin America was colonized by a virulent form of Catholicism that originated in the Spanish Inquisition. The underlying core value for Latin America is antigay Christianity that approves of the subjugation of indigenous people and women. However, centuries of internal strife—civil wars, government coups, capitalist interests, imperialist intervention from the United States, Germany, France, and others, drug wars, and more—have created a range of governments from the liberal-leaning governments of Mexico and Uruguay, to the extremely repressive regimes of El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Jamaica, Paraguay, and Trinidad and Tobago.

Interestingly, some Christian leaders in the most virulently antigay Latin American countries claim that homosexuality is an import from the decadent Western world and, as such, should be condemned. This is part of the movement to reclaim indigenous cultures and recharacterize them as purely heterosexual. The irony of the situation is that these leaders represent Christianity—an import from Europe that decimated the indigenous people. Gay and lesbian activists in these countries are working to uncover the truth of their people in order to counter historical revisionism.

North America, in contrast, was colonized by a wide spectrum of Christian sects, including Catholics, Protestants, Quakers, and non-Christian religions. Both the United States and Canada were formed with the underlying concept of religious tolerance. These countries had their own brutality (such as state-sanctioned slavery and state-sponsored medical treatments to “convert” homosexuals), but their founding constitutions at least planted the idea of tolerance and respect for all people and religions. The long-term consequence of this idea of tolerance is that Canada approved same-sex marriage in 2005, and some of the states of the United States have also approved same-sex marriage.

Voodoo is a common religion found in the Caribbean and countries immediately surrounding the islands. Voodoo is based on the religions brought from Africa by slaves. The indigenous African religions accepted homosexuals and heterosexuals equally. Voodoo, particularly Haitian Voodoo, is gay affirming. Considering the extremely negative treatment of LGBT people in Haiti, it is no wonder that so many gay people have found spiritual solace in Voodoo.

Transgendered People

People who cross-dress and pass as the other gender have existed in every culture throughout history. For women who become men (female-to-male, FTM), this behavior can lead to increased social and financial status. For men who become women (male-to-female, MTF) there is often a decrease in social and financial status. In many countries of the Americas, if a transgendered person is discovered to be transgendered, he or she faces a significant risk of being subjected to discrimination and violence.

As modern medicine has advanced to facilitate the surgical and hormonal treatments needed to achieve gender transformation, ethical questions about application of the new science and its costs are addressed. Some countries, such as Uruguay with universal health care, provide transgender treatment. In most countries, however, the cost for transgender treatment is borne by the recipient. As can be imagined, in poorer countries, the opportunities for transgendered persons to receive treatment are very limited. Often times this leads to dangerous practices. For example, it is common in Ecuador for transgendered persons to seek out non-medical personnel in an attempt to modify their bodies. Cooking oil or industrial silicone is injected with the hope of obtaining a desired shape. The use of these practices in unhygienic conditions has led to many botched surgeries, mangled bodies, infections, and death. Most of the severely antigay countries prohibit transgender operations.

Transgendered persons also challenge the practice of noting a person's sex on birth records, driver's licenses, marriage certificates, and other government-issued identification documents. Only a few countries, such as the United States, Canada, and Colombia allow this practice.

The Intersexed

Intersexed advocacy organizations have formed in Canada and the United States, but not in any of the Latin American countries. These groups advocate the cessation of surgeries commonly performed on newborn babies and children to make them conform to a particular gender. Intersexed groups believe these surgeries are potentially dangerous and unnecessary and that, instead, the family and public should be educated to accept intersexed people as they are. Only when a person has become of legal age, they say, should the decision to engage in treatment be made.

The legal rights of the intersexed have some recognition in Canada and the United States. There are no laws concerning intersexed people in Latin American countries. The intersexed are still considered a curiosity in much of the world and a possible bad omen in superstitious rural settings. Intersexed people face potentially hostile and dangerous living situations with no legal recourse.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

In general, the outlook for LGBT rights in the Americas and the Caribbean in the 21st century looks good. It may take a few decades, but same-sex marriage will probably be fully recognized throughout the United States. Likewise, some of the more liberal governments of Latin America will also approve same-sex marriage. In the meantime, antidiscrimination statutes will likely be passed in most of the countries throughout the Americas, providing some measure of safety for LGBT people.

Economics is a great leveler. For example, when an all-gay cruise ship tried to dock at the Cayman Islands in 1998, it was turned away by the Cayman government in response to local Christian groups who demanded that homosexuals be barred from entering. Hearing the news, Belizean officials contacted the tour company and invited them to Belize City as an alternative docking site, and the government suspended its Immigration Act that prohibited homosexuals from entering the country. Belize's clearly stated that they were more interested in the economic benefits of tourist dollars than keeping homosexuals out. Gay tourist dollars are an important source of income for many poor countries, and this indirectly influences local politics to be less antigay.

Economics, however, can also create greater intolerance. For example, every country that is involved in producing or transporting illegal drugs has virtually lost the rule of law. Without the stability gained from respecting the law, marginalized people experience much greater levels of discrimination and oppression. As long as drugs are illegal and the United States funds the "war on drugs," these countries will be dangerous for LGBT people. Also, the world is slipping into a deep financial recession. Already, it is reported that there is an increase in church attendance. Economic and environmental stressors push societies to become more fundamentalist in their core beliefs. LGBT people will need to form strong alliances with other human rights causes so as to not lose the gains for which they have so valiantly fought.

OVERVIEW

The Central American nation of Belize is one of the world's smallest nations in both size and population. It is only 8,867 square miles in area and has an estimated population of 311,480.¹ The area that is now Belize was originally part of the Mayan civilization, which stretched from Honduras to southern Mexico and the Yucatan peninsula. At its height, around the 12th century, this Native American culture was one of the world's most advanced civilizations. With a prosperous economy based on the farming of corn and other crops, Mayan city-states were able to support large populations and elaborate governing and priestly classes. Mayan knowledge of mathematics, astronomy, architecture, and city planning was superior that of Europe at that time.

Mayan people were also accepting of homosexual behavior. Their religion used penis symbols as a prominent part of their sacred motifs, and they had a belief that homosexuality was brought to humans by a god. When a boy reached adolescence, his parents frequently contracted with the parents of a younger boy whose son would become a "boy wife" for the teenager. The two youths remained together until the elder partner reached about age 30, when he was then expected to marry a woman, and the younger boy, who was by then an adolescent, became the husband of his own young boy wife. Young women believed a man was not suitable to be a good husband unless he had demonstrated that he could be both a good wife and a good husband during his youth. Mayans, as well as Native Americans in general, commonly accepted same-sex eroticism. Especially notable were androgynous individuals, who were considered to have both the spirit of a man and a woman combined within one person. These “Two Spirit People” were considered to be exceptionally spiritual, and were often religious leaders and healers. Transgendered persons had a highly respected special role in Mayan culture. Since the coming of the Spanish, however, this traditional respect declined considerably among some groups of Mayan peoples, but among others homosexuality and transgenderism continue to be accepted.²

In recent decades, archaeologists have documented the ruins of over 5,000 Mayan cities. Major ruins that are known in Belize today, like Altun Ha, Caracol, Lamanai, and Xunantunich are examples of ancient cities that indicated the Mayans’ level of advancement as a people, but eventually military overspending, due to ceaseless wars between the various city-states, plus the expense of supporting large royal courts, became a burden on the people. When drought began due to climate change, the Mayan people revolted and eventually abandoned most of their cities. The area retained its large population, but most Mayans relocated to small villages where they depended on corn and other domesticated plants as their main food source.³

In the early 16th century, when Spain claimed all of Mexico and Central America as part of its empire, the Mayan people still followed their agricultural way of life. They would probably have been able to retain their independence, except for the fact that the Spanish introduced foreign disease pathogens to which the Native Americans had no previous exposure or immunity. Over the following century, Spanish conquistadors fought to subdue the Mayans and other Native Americans of the region, justifying their conquest partly with the complaint that the Indians were “sodomites” and therefore had no right to independence. Under Spanish control, a massive depopulation occurred. Demographers have estimated that 90 to 98 percent of the Mayan people died as a result of warfare and disease. Belize was largely depopulated.⁴

The great wealth that Spain extracted from Mexico was so vast that it attracted other Europeans to the area. Ships full of Mexican gold and silver left from the port of Veracruz for Spain, and the whole Caribbean Sea became a wild, chaotic place where Spanish fleets were attacked by English, Dutch, and French pirates. The Spanish, who stole from the Native Americans, became the victims of theft at the hands of rival Europeans. English pirates established a base along the coastline of what is now Belize. Living in what were essentially all-male societies, and beyond the reach of English law, many of the pirates were involved in homosexual relationships with other pirates or with young boys. Pirate hangouts throughout the Caribbean had the reputation of being “dens of sodomy,” and trials of pirates who had been captured by the British Navy often focused on their homosexual behavior.⁵

Later, more permanent English settlers arrived and used the interior of Belize for harvesting wood. Though the Spanish used Native Americans as their chief labor force, the English brought in slaves from Africa as their main source of labor. As with the Native Americans, and indeed in most areas of the non-Western world, many of the African slaves came from societies that accepted homosexual behavior. Traditions of man-boy love and transgenderism were common in many areas of West and Central Africa, and no doubt some of the slaves secretly developed same-sex relationships. However, English law was strictly against what it called “sodomy” and Africans and Englishmen alike were put to death if convicted of violation of the sodomy law. In Belize, as in its other colonies, the British government of the 1700s and 1800s was ruthless in its persecution of homosexuals.⁶

Though the area that is now Belize continued to be claimed by Spain, the English colony grew because forests in England had been depleted and there was a sharp demand for lumber for the construction of ships and for other uses in England. By stealing Mayan land and expropriating African labor, the English were able to establish extremely profitable wood harvesting operations and sugarcane plantations. Both the Mayans and the Spanish fought back against this English intrusion, and there were perennial battles. In 1798, an English force composed largely of African slaves decisively defeated the Spanish at the Battle of St. George's Caye. Still, the area under English control remained quite small. Due to the influence of the English abolitionist movement, the British government ended slavery in the 1830s and established the West African colony of Sierra Leone as a place of return for freed slaves. Only a small number of the freedmen actually returned to Africa, and Belize's freed slaves remained in Belize. This history explains why the Belize of today is an English-speaking enclave of people, mainly of African descent, situated on a small slice of the Caribbean coastline in Central America where the majority of the population is Native American and Spanish-speaking.

In the early 19th century, both Mexico and Central America declared their independence from Spain. The independent nation of Guatemala laid claim to the area of Belize, but the British held onto it despite repeated conflicts with Mayan and Guatemalan opponents. In the mid-19th century, Mayan people in Yucatan began a major revolt against Mexico with the goal of establishing a separate Mayan nation. This revolt opened an economic opportunity for English settlers in Belize who made great profits selling arms and ammunition to the Mayan rebels. In 1862, the British Empire took advantage of chaos in the United States, which was preoccupied with its own civil war, to declare the area the Crown Colony of British Honduras.

After the collapse of the Mayan revolt in Mexico, many Mayan rebels moved to the northern part of British Honduras. The British government welcomed the refugees as a way to increase the population of the area. The incoming Mayan farmers expanded the agricultural sector of the economy just as the English cut back on their harvesting of wood. The British Empire had recently taken over more territory in Africa, and they now focused on the development of African mahogany harvesting instead of Belizean timber. Later, from the 1970s to the 1990s, more Mayans took refuge in Belize as Guatemala's military government became very oppressive.⁷

Thus, the population of the colony took on the multiracial character that marks Belize today. The largest ethnic group, called "Mestizos," not Spanish, in Belize, lives mostly in the rural areas and towns and is of mixed Spainard and Native American descent. The next largest group, called "Creoles," is mostly urban and is wholly or in part of African descent. In addition to the Creoles there are the Garifuna (formerly known as the Black Caribs) who are descended from African slaves but intermarried with indigenous inhabitants of the Caribbean islands. About 10 percent of the population is wholly Mayan in descent. Together, these groups of African and/or Native American descent constitute about 90 percent of the population. The remaining are a mix of Euro-Americans (including a community of German-speaking Mennonites), East Asians, South Asians, and Arabs.

As intermarriage rates increase with each generation, and ethnic identities become more complex or disappear into a general Belizean identity.

The official language of Belize is English, which is part of the heritage of being a British colony, and English is taught in the schools, but Mayan and Spanish are also spoken. In addition, a local Creole lingo that is a mixture of African and English words and grammar is also common. Many people are trilingual, effortlessly switching languages even within the same sentence.

In the mid 20th century, as the British government converted its colonies into independent members of the British Commonwealth and decided to give independence to British Honduras. Full autonomy was granted in 1964, and the country's name was changed from British Honduras to Belize. Guatemala, however, refused to recognize the independent nation of Belize, and there were conflicts over the location of the border between Guatemala and Belize. In the 1970s, Guatemalan military forces occupied part of Belize. It was not until 1991 that Guatemala gave up its claims and recognized Belize's independence.⁸

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

There is little controversy in Belize regarding LGBT issues because a national discourse on gay rights and the legalization of same-sex marriage is still in the embryonic stage. The discussion currently is in terms of framing human rights and finding mechanisms to apply already written concepts of human rights that exist in the Belize constitution. There is no controversy surrounding gays in the military or instituting reparative therapy into the mental health system, as these institutions historically have not been discriminatory. Openly gay advocates are allowed to participate in public gatherings and speak freely without warnings and harassment. The former Office of the Prime Minister has recognized sociocultural attitudes as a problem in addressing homophobia, and some leaders in the mass media acknowledge self-censorship as a problem in covering LGBT issues.

EDUCATION

Given the government's fiscal constraints and history in education, Belize has long depended on a partnership with church missionary organizations as a means of paying for the education of its youth. The government itself provides free textbooks to students, pays for free lunch programs for primary school students, and provides widely available scholarships for high achieving high school and tertiary students with financial need. There are religious organizations that hire teachers and pay for part of their salaries. Because each sponsoring church effectively controls the teachers, much of the ideology taught to students is biased in that religion's favor.

In the church-affiliated schools, sex education is very limited. These schools typically promote the "ABC" approach: be "A," Abstinent until marriage, "B," Be faithful to the marriage partner, and use "C," Condoms in all other situations. For gay people, such heterocentric education excludes specific information on safer sex techniques for same-sex partners. Sex education efforts undertaken in the schools are often censored completely or to a great extent, and vary greatly within the school system. In addition, there is an evolving approach from within certain religious groups that discourages condom use on the basis that condoms are not 100 percent effective. A number of religious groups find it offensive that women should take responsibility for their sexual and reproductive health. These trends are of considerable concern, as the HIV infection rate continues to climb in Belize. This was a worrisome issue as far back as 1999 when the First Lady of Belize testified before a United Nations Committee that “Belize’s current health policy was based on the hope that young people would not become sexually active.”⁹ A committee of experts concluded that “it was alarming that schools were in the hands of the Catholic Church, while Belize was in dire need of a liberal sex-education policy for young people, and for condom distribution to prevent the further spread of HIV/AIDS. The Government should network with liberal Catholic groups—present in other countries—which had found ways to remain faithful while addressing realities requiring action. Such groups could help tackle the difficult task of opening the Catholic Church to the needs of girls and women.”¹⁰

Finally, the school system has no anti-bullying policy, therefore students who are subjected to homophobic bullying have little recourse in the religiously oriented schools. Since Belize is a patriarchal society that prizes masculinity, very few young persons have the courage to complain about homophobic words or attitudes; they simply remain silent or bear the brunt of their experience in silence.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

The total gross domestic product (GDP) of Belize in 2006, according to the World Bank, was US$1.217 billion. The annual inflation rate was around four percent. Agriculture, especially the cultivation of sugarcane and tropical fruits, has been the mainstay of the economy, but agricultural output fluctuates from year to year. Coastal fishing and shrimp farming have also been both profitable and lackluster in varied years. Tourism is a major source of revenue for Belize, as Americans and Europeans flock to Belize’s beautiful white sand beaches and tropical rainforests. One in four Belizean adults is employed in tourism-related work. Manufacturing, especially of sugar products and beverages, is growing, but the main expansion of the economy in recent years has been led by the growth in services and by new discoveries of petroleum found in the country. Overall though, the economy of Belize remains mixed from year to year. In 2006, the employed labor force was 102,233, with about three-fourths of all adult males and about 40 percent of all adult females participating in paid employment. The unemployment rate was 9.4 percent, and about 39 percent of children below age 18 were living in poverty. The rate of impoverishment in the southern rural district of Toledo was far higher than the rest of the country, at 44 percent.¹¹ There are no statistics focused on the employment and economic status of LGBT people in Belize.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

In 2005, the Belizean national government spent $US1.2 million, or 1.87 percent of the nation’s GDP, on the military. Almost 1,400 troops comprise the Belize Defense Forces, not counting the additional personnel of the Belize Coast Guard, which is operated under the Ministry of Home Affairs. There is no law excluding homosexuals from the military, and thus there has been no controversy surrounding the presence of gay and lesbian soldiers. In addition to the national military, local police departments deal with crime and security issues. In the 1980s, the government attempted to establish a national intelligence agency, but there was such an outcry against it that the idea was dropped. The police depend on community patrols, surveillance, Interpol information, informants, a private sector-based hotline for reporting information about unsolved crimes that, and general phone calls made by the public. The Belizean national government provides rudimentary social security benefits to the elderly, and has been testing a national health insurance plan. Recently, the government started a program for Belize's rural development, a project being funded to support micro-enterprise development projects. The government also has a charitable fund that it uses to provide subventions to organizations like the Salvation Army and other nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that serve the poor and the indigent.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Belizean society features a mixture of traditional Native American and African acceptance of sexual diversity overlaid with homophobic European Christian attitudes of suppression. This mixture of opposites results in a society that has what Belizeans commonly call a "culture of love," with very easy-going attitudes toward sex coupled with the opposing idea that sexual activities are sinful. Both homophobia and acceptance exist in Belizean society. Super-masculine, self-defined Creole "thugs" and Spanish machos alike may look down on feminine males, but cross-dressing males wearing makeup may have it easier to be themselves in the northern part of the country. A new term of self-definition, "Skittles," named after a multicolored candy that reminds some people of the internationally recognized gay rainbow flag, is coming to be adopted by more openly gay men.

FAMILY

Mayan families consist of extended networks of kin living together and contributing economically to each other's support. People of African and European descent, on the other hand, tend to live in nuclear families that are restricted to parents and their children with perhaps one or two elderly grandparents as well. Though statistics are lacking, it seems that most LGBT people live with their parents or siblings, or with a partner of the opposite sex if they have felt social pressure to marry heterosexually. Only a relative few LGBT people live with a same-sex partner.

COMMUNITY

Most homosexuals in Belize are not politically active and seem to have little desire to do more than attend entertaining social events or use Internet chat rooms to find friends or sexual partners. Some LGBT people are quite prominent in the nation's AIDS education efforts, and some of them have been trying to organize LGBT people around the country, including those in Belize City.

HEALTH

This problem of drugs has contributed to HIV infections. As a consequence, Belize has the highest HIV/AIDS rate in Central America. The first recorded case of HIV infection in Belize was in 1986, and in the second quarter of 2007, the Ministry of Health recorded that there were 4,035 persons in the country infected with HIV or AIDS and that 587 persons were taking antiretroviral (ARV) medications. It is not known how many of these infections are from the males who have sex with males (MSM) population. As of 2007, there were no statistics available from the Ministry of Health on the MSM population in Belize, allegedly due to a software design problem in the data collection system. Epidemiologists at the Ministry of Health say that every effort is being made to seek out a practical solution, but they also say that data collection for the MSM population is expensive. The government health service does not have specific programs or services specifically for gay men, lesbians, bisexuals, or transgendered people. Their approach to health care generally makes the LGBT population invisible in the system. This process makes it difficult to understand how the AIDS epidemic is affecting the population.¹²

At present, the United Belize Advocacy Movement (UniBAM) is the only advocacy organization that exists by MSM for MSM and LGBT overall issues to be represented on the National AIDS Commission Policy and Legislation Committee. This committee is currently reviewing laws to make the national policy on HIV/AIDS more effective, and is in the embryonic stages of developing a legislative framework. The activists in UniBAM are conscious of their responsibility to ensure that MSM are not ignored in the development process. Beyond this, the national HIV/AIDS policy has several principles that have been derived from international human rights documents. Specifically, Article 1 of its Human Rights Declaration emphasizes the principle of nondiscrimination and acknowledges that males who have sex with males are a part of the marginalized population that is vulnerable to HIV infection. Also, in the country's Global AIDS Fund Plan, there was a commitment to reach at least 1,000 MSM persons in the project, but it never happened. This effort is ongoing, and the Pan American Social Marketing Organization and UniBAM continue their work in HIV prevention education, service delivery to persons living with AIDS, advocacy, and research.

POLITICS AND LAW

Belize has a democratically elected constitutional government, with a generally efficient and service-oriented governmental tradition. The laws are administered fairly and impartially. There are, however, two laws that impact homosexuals in a discriminatory manner. First, the Belize Criminal Code Chapter 101, Revised Edition 2003 states, in section 53: "Every person who has carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any person or animal shall be liable to imprisonment for 10 years." This law is a direct result of British colonial policies, which criminalized same-sex sexuality.

While the "carnal intercourse" law would seem to have the potential to be discriminatory against homosexuals, the Attorney General's office of the government of Belize defines carnal intercourse strictly as the insertion of a penis into an anus. This law applies equally to male-female couple and male-male couples. According to the prosecuting attorney for the government, there are no cases where adult homosexual couples who engage in consensual anal intercourse in private have been prosecuted; this provision is kept in the criminal code as deterrence for rape and other nonconsensual sexual activity.

Because the law strictly defines “carnal intercourse” as the insertion of a penis into an anus, no other sexual behavior is criminalized among consenting adults over the age of 16. As a result, no sexual interaction between two females is a crime in Belize, nor is oral sex a crime, whether it is between a male and a female, a male and another male, or a female and another female. Therefore, even though Belize retains a sodomy law, the actual legal situation for same-sex couples is much more lenient than in many countries around the world.

The only exception to this leniency is regarding children below age 14, where oral sex and even mutual masturbation are criminalized. Even sex play between two children is theoretically against the law, though actual prosecution of minors for willing sex does not occur. This law seems not to be of much deterrence in actual behavior, since a 1999 survey of Belizean youth by a UCLA researcher indicates that the average age of first sexual intercourse for Belizean youth is 12 years old.¹³

The second law that is discriminatory against homosexuals is a provision in the Immigration Act, Chapter 156, Revised Edition 2000, Section 5.-(1), which equates homosexuals with prostitutes. Section 2 (3)(e) lists the following persons as being prohibited from entering the country: “any prostitute or homosexual or any person who may be living on or receiving or may have been living on or receiving the proceeds of prostitution or homosexual behavior.” Though this law is discriminatory, the seriousness with which it is interpreted is indicated by a significant event that occurred in 1998. A cruise line based in the United States sponsored an all-gay cruise in the Caribbean and attempted to dock at the Cayman Islands. When the government of the Caymans found out that it was a gay cruise, officials refused to let the ship dock at the harbor. The ship then headed back to sea, and there was a flurry of news reports. When Belize officials received a call to dock, they replied with a supportive attitude, which was dramatically different from many other Caribbean governments that refused outright to allow a cruise ship full of gay passengers to dock on their shores. To allow these passengers to enter the country, Belize’s government “suspended” that section of the aforementioned law on immigration.¹⁴ This incident and the fact that no gay or lesbian tourists have reported being refused entry at Belizean border crossings show that this law is not taken seriously. Because of this positive response by the government, several gay-themed cruises have included Belize in their recent itineraries and there have been no negative incidents. Though the discriminatory immigration law provision has not been repealed, it seems to be a dead letter.

Given the nonenforcement of the antihomosexual immigration provision and the “carnal intercourse” law, the potential for LGBT rights in Belize is quite good. Except for these two archaic laws, there are few laws that need to be repealed. For example, since Belize has no law against gay service personnel in the military, there is no need for a campaign to repeal it. Belize has thus been able to avoid controversy, in contrast to the huge conflict regarding gay and lesbian troops in the U.S. armed forces. Taking all of these realities into account, Belize has the most lenient laws of almost any developing nation.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

The biggest event in Belizean gay history of the 20th century has been the publicity generated by the 1998 gay cruise ship landing. When it landed in Belize

City, a small band of about 200 fundamentalist Christians, led by evangelical Pastor Rodney Gordon, showed up to express their disapproval. They chanted homophobic slogans, waved Bibles and placards, and threw rocks at the disembarking tourists, but the police effectively prevented further violence, and the remainder of the experience in Belize was positive for the gay and lesbian tourists. What is most significant is that the major media supported the government officials for trying to increase tourism in Belize and criticized the protesters for harming Belize's struggling tourist industry. Most people in Belize seemed to accept the same-sex couples from the cruise ship, or at least just ignored them, but some went out of their way to show a friendly welcome.

This incident is the only recorded occasion where religious intolerance in Belize took the form of a public action. The Catholic Church in Belize, in sharp contrast to Vatican officials, has encouraged tolerance within the context of its seven social Catholic principles. In Belize there has been no coordinated effort to encourage antigay oppression. On the other hand, gay activists in Belize are wary of Christian antigay movements in other parts of the Caribbean, particularly Jamaica and Trinidad, which have actively opposed human rights legislation processes. Some fundamentalist Protestant Christian groups have been developing a strategic plan for the Caribbean region. Since this is a new development, it is too soon to know what impact their actions will have on Belize.

The area where the Christian churches are having the most significant impact in Belize is within the schools, in cooperation with the government (see the "Education" section above).

This government-church alliance has meant an increased influence of religious organizations in Belize. Since those whose family backgrounds are from Mexico or the Spanish-speaking nations of Central America typically identify as Roman Catholic, the Catholic Church is the most influential. The country's religious breakdown is: Roman Catholic 57 percent, Protestant 16 percent, Anglican five percent, Baha'i three percent, Hindu two percent, other 17 percent. Fundamentalist Protestant Christian churches in the United States have targeted the Caribbean area as a fertile field for converts and in recent years have sent many missionaries to Belize.¹⁵

There are many faith-based initiatives. For example, a recent program for dealing with HIV/AIDS was funded by UNICEF. There was one research project sponsored by the RAND Corporation to understand how such an initiative would work if it tried to incorporate the MSM population. They concluded in a non-hopeful manner that such faith-based groups are not open to dealing productively with such populations.

VIOLENCE

Though antigay violence is not a major factor in Belize, in 2006 and 2007 UniBAM documented a few cases of homophobic individuals harassing gay men, and a few murders and physical assaults. The main concern of gay activists in Belize is with certain sections of the media. The management of the radio station KREM, for example, has shown a pattern of homophobic views that have been expressed in its radio broadcasts. The national newspaper Amandala has allowed homophobic articles to be published that clearly promote myths about gay men and AIDS. One article in particular has been rebutted effectively by the Belize National AIDS

Commission and the Belize Red Cross, which have pointed out that such an untrue statement put at risk years of treatment and care of people living with AIDS, as well as the HIV prevention work being done in Belize.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

As the first advocacy organization that deals solely with stigma for MSM and LGBT persons in Belize, UniBAM has led the way in accomplishing many firsts in the country. It printed the first publication on LGBT issues in Belize, called Core Reports, and has produced the first documentary film, titled Not in My Family. Its leaders have also gone on Belizean national television to discuss homophobia as a problem. UniBAM was the first organization from Belize to join a Central American MSM network and another regional network in the Caribbean, the Caribbean Forum for Lesbians and Gays (CFLAG). It also distributed the first Caribbean regional newsletter, Free Forum, from Trinidad.

UniBAM wants to address many issues. For example, there is no tradition in Belize of gay and lesbian parenting rights. Activists have not pressed this issue out of fear of a homophobic backlash from the government Human Resource Services, however, a report on gay and lesbian parents found that, while the system was cautiously open-minded about a gay father or a lesbian mother retaining custody of his or her biological child, adoption by a nonbiological parent's same-sex partner would be difficult. The report suggested that there was some insinuation that homosexuality might "rub off" on a child, and hence it was not suitable for a child to be adopted by a biological parent's same-sex partner. Still, the report noted that many of the social workers had at least one gay friend.

This report shows that, as is the case in research on homophobia reduction in other countries, a major factor is the personal relationships that people have with their openly gay friends, relatives, and coworkers. As more LGBT people in Belize come out of the closet to their families and friends, as openly gay and lesbian tourists and immigrants continue to come to Belize, and as the mass media covers gay issues more openly and fairly, the potential for improvement of the situation in Belize is high. Globalizing influences on Belize are awakening a new pride among LGBT people in the country.¹⁶

Some activists say that their efforts could be more effective if the numerous LGBT people involved in the tourist industry would exert their influence. Several hotels and guesthouses that cater to LGBT visitors have organized to promote Belize as a tourist destination for same-sex couples. Given the homophobia exhibited in many other Caribbean nations, Belize may have more potential for LGBT rights than any other nation in Central America and the Caribbean.

BOLIVIA

Fabiola Fernández Salek

OVERVIEW

Bolivia is a landlocked country with a population of 9,524,569. At about 425,000 square miles, it is approximately the same size as California and Texas combined. Bolivia gained its independence from Spain on August 6, 1825. The constitutional capital of Bolivia is Sucre, but the administrative capital is La Paz.¹ As of mid-2009, Bolivia's current president was Evo Morales, a former leader of the coca growers union. He has gained worldwide notoriety for being, arguably, the first fully indigenous president of Bolivia (Bolivia has had mestizo heads of states in the past: Andrés de Santa Cruz and Isidoro Belzú).

As home to 39 ethnic linguistic groups, Bolivia has always been a very diverse country, but Spanish was its only official language from the time of its independence until the 1990s, when Aymara and Quechua were added as official languages.² According to Chapter 1, Article 5 of the New Bolivian Constitution, in addition to Spanish, all Bolivian native languages are considered official and at least one of them has to be used in a mandatory fashion according to the predominance in the region.³

Today's Bolivia was once part of the Inca Empire, which stretched across the Andean region. Consequently, a large fraction of the population is Quechua, direct descendants of the Incas. There is also a sizable group of Aymara in the highlands and valleys. The Aymara, who were conquered by the Incas, have historically occupied the territory extending from the south of Cuzco to the northern highlands.⁴ In the eastern lowlands, the original inhabitants were small indigenous groups and tribes, such as the Guaranis and Tupis. According to the National Institute of Statistics, 30 percent of Bolivians are mestizo (mixed race), 28 percent are Quechua, 19 percent Aymara, 12 percent European, and 11 percent other ethnicities (only a small enclave in the area of Yungas is of African descent).⁵

Although early Bolivian colonists did not generally rely upon African slave labor, the indigenous population was subjected to pongueaje, or personal service obligation, a practice similar to indentured servitude. In 1952, an insurrection led by the Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario (MNR) and the Bolivian Workers Confederation (COB) culminated with the National Revolution of 1952. Víctor Paz Estenssoro and Hernán Siles Zuazo, both of whom later became president, were instrumental in creating profound social and political reforms—chief among them were land reform, the nationalization of the mining sector, and universal suffrage. Until 1952 the indigenous population did not have the right to vote—that right belonged only to nonindigenous, literate males. Bolivia now has compulsory suffrage for all citizens age 21 and over (or 18, if married).⁶

Bolivia's GDP in 2007 was 13 billion USD, and the annual per capita income was 1,300 USD. Bolivia's GDP per capita, adjusted by purchasing power parity, ranks 126th in the world, making Bolivia the poorest country in South America and the second poorest in Latin America, only ahead of Haiti.⁷ The military budget in 2006 corresponded to 2 percent of the GDP, placing Bolivia in the world's bottom third in military spending.⁸

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Issues of sexual orientation remain taboo in Bolivian society. Largely as a consequence of the AIDS epidemic, homosexuality and questions of gender have become public topics. This increased attention is due in part to social and medical programs funded by international organizations (e.g., U.S. Agency for International Development and the Pan American Health Organization).⁹

Advances have also been made on the legal front. Prior to 2007, the Bolivian constitution stated that individuals have equal rights, but there was no explicit mention of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.¹⁰ Article 14 of the new constitution, however, prohibits discrimination and imposes sanctions if discrimination is found to have taken place.¹¹ Same sex marriage is not allowed. The new constitution was approved amid controversy following repeated boycotts and in the absence of the opposition. On January 25, 2009, a nationwide referendum approved the New Constitution, which was enacted on February 7. At the center of the debate surrounding the new constitution is the explicit transfer of additional rights to the indigenous population, as well as the nationalization of Bolivia's natural resources.¹² Furthermore, Bolivia's new constitution explicitly states that marriage is legal only when contracted between a man and a woman. Although the Bolivian LGBT community has campaigned on behalf of same-sex marriage and same-sex civil unions, no progress has been made.¹³

The Bolivian military is opposed to the presence of homosexuals in its armed forces. Although Bolivia's constitution states that military service is mandatory for all men, the Bolivian military remains a very homophobic institution.¹⁴ In 2002, General Alvin Anaya, then General-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, stated that

“homosexuals are not useful in the army” and forbade their participation. General Juan Hurtado, Chief of the Bolivian Army, added that accepting gays in the army would introduce promiscuity among soldiers. Moreover, Óscar Guillarte, the Defense Minister, added that “the army is for men” and that it is “difficult to accept cases of homosexuality in the forces.”¹⁵

Bolivian psychologists adhere to the standards of the American Psychological Association, which removed homosexuality from its list of mental disorders in 1973, and the World Health Organization, which removed sexual deviation from its list of illnesses in 1991. Furthermore, there are no educational programs addressing the needs of the LGBT community, and its presence is not acknowledged by the state. Although the freedoms of speech and association are generally respected in Bolivia, public demonstrations by LGBT people have been scorned by the general public. Only very recently has an increase in LGBT visibility eroded existing hostility.

EDUCATION

In 2004, UNESCO estimated that 18.1 percent of Bolivia’s total government expenditures were allocated to education. This amount corresponded to 6.4 percent of its GDP.¹⁶ Bolivia’s public education system is free and state funding is mandatory.¹⁷ Article 79 of the new constitution states that the educational system must provide gender equality, the condemnation of violence, and the defense of human rights.¹⁸ Education on sexual orientation has been limited to the realm of HIV/AIDS programs, and there is no special funding for LGBT students. Furthermore, there are no education statutes against discrimination based on sexual orientation. No data is available regarding cases of discrimination.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

In 2006, the private sector accounted for 75 percent of Bolivia’s employers, and the public sector comprised the remaining 25 percent.¹⁹ Bolivian labor contracts are on an at-will basis, meaning that employers can dismiss employees and employees can resign from a position, as long as sufficient notice is given in both cases; the Bolivian job market is thus governed by the principles of a free market economy. Section Three, Article 46 of the new constitution states that every Bolivian has the right to a safe working environment without discrimination.²⁰

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Bolivia has no special government programs for LGBT people.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

One of the biggest factors contributing to the prevalence of high-risk behavior in the Bolivian LGBT community is closet homosexuality. Because homosexuality is shunned by Bolivian society, most gay Bolivian men lead double lives. Sexual encounters are often casual and anonymous and tend to occur in movie theaters.²¹

Homosexuals in Bolivia can be classified into three groups: travestis, camuflados, and hombres.²² Travestis (transvestites) are considered “easy women in the rough part of town,” and are the only group that conforms to society’s homosexual stereotypes. Travestis fit the stereotypical role of the homosexual in Bolivian society, as they are the only visible homosexuals in conservative Bolivia.

Camuflados (camouflaged) homosexuals are men who “define their ‘femaleness’ in terms of a single sexual practice—the insertee role in anal intercourse.” Moreover, camuflados are further divided according to class: high class, or jailonas (which translates as “snobby rich girls”), and low class, or bagres (which equates poor camuflados with “catfish, scavengers who live of the dregs”).²³ Finally, hombres (men) “do not see themselves as homosexuals, nor are they seen as such within or beyond the ambiente’s boundaries.”²⁴ This means that they only would be identifiable when they visit locations frequented by gay clientele. They lead double lives and continue with the traditional male roles assigned to them in Bolivian society. They are usually married and have children or date women who ignore that they have mostly anonymous homosexual relationships on the side. Members of the hombres category do not consider themselves homosexual; rather, they constitute a dangerous group in terms of health. They are not categorized as homosexuals but as “men who have sex with men.” In fact, AIDS/HIV and other campaigns against STDs have adopted this terminology in order to avoid making explicit reference to homosexuality.²⁵

FAMILY

The composition of a typical Bolivian family is traditional. The “nuclear family” is at the center of nearly all family life. The 2002 Bolivian census reported that 69.3 percent of households were married bi-parental households, 13.2 percent were nonmarried bi-parental households, and 17.5 percent were single parent households.²⁶ No data is available for marriage and divorce rates in Bolivia. Although adoption laws in Bolivia do not explicitly prohibit adoption by homosexual couples, adopting couples must be married. Thus, adoption by homosexuals is effectively barred.²⁷

COMMUNITY

Gay and lesbian issues have never been at the political or social forefront in Bolivia, nor were they ever a part of public discussion.

AIDS and the notion of a “gay community” made a simultaneous debut in Bolivian society. Until then, gente de ambiente (people of the atmosphere, a term used by homosexuals to refer to themselves) were very isolated. Through modern media, the community in general has since become increasingly aware of gay movements throughout Latin American countries, most notably the Movimiento Homosexual de Lima, which has operated in the city of Cochabamba since the late 1980s. The first gay organization in Bolivia was Dignidad (ironically, it was the brainchild of a Roman Catholic priest from the United States). The group now has gained acceptance from the Bolivian Government. In 1994, 40 of its members participated in an AIDS prevention workshop alongside officials of the Ministry of Health. Also in 1994, close to 500 people participated for the first time in Gay Day, which was organized in Santa Cruz by UNELDYS (the Spanish acronym for Unity and Defense of Health), where the main event was the Miss Gay Bolivia pageant.²⁸

Since the institution of the Gay Pride parade, there have been several public incidents of homophobia. During the first parade, in 1995, many participants were simply arrested. In La Paz and Santa Cruz, throwing rotten tomatoes and eggs at the participants is the norm. In La Paz, tensions escalated on June 30, 2007 when a dynamite stick was thrown at a float prepared for the parade, severely injuring six people.²⁹ Still, the Gay Pride parade takes place in the major cities annually, typically on the last Saturday of June. Hundreds of people participate.

There are about 25 gay and lesbian organizations in Bolivia. The main LGBT organizations at the national level are Mesa de Trabajo Nacional de las Poblaciones Clave (National Working Table in Critical Populations) in La Paz, Cochabamba, Santa Cruz, and Tarija; Gays, Lesbianas, Travestis, Transexuales, Transformistas, Transgénero independientes, Homosexuales independientes (Independent Gays, Lesbians, Transvestites, Transsexuals, Drag Queens, Transgender); and Grupo lésbico TriLambda (Lesbian Group TriLambda).

At the regional level, there are many more LGTB organizations.

- In La Paz, Unión Asociación de Travestis de La Paz (Union of Transvestites of La Paz), or ATLP; Amigos Sin Fronteras (Friends Without Borders), or ASIF; Adesproc, Familia Galán (Galán Family); Colectivo Trans Las Divas (Trans Collective The Divas); and Familia Berbety (Berbety Family).
- In Cochabamba, Comité de Diversidades Sexuales (Committee of Sexual Diversity); Plataforma por las Diversidades (Platform for the Diversities); Unión de Travestis de Cochabamba (Union of Transvestites from Cochabamba), or UTC; Grupo Vida (Group Life); Cofradía Amigos por Siempre Virgen de Urkupiña (Friends Forever of the Urkupiña Virgin Confraternity); and Familia Prandy (Family Prandy).
- In Santa Cruz, Alianza GLBT Santa Cruz (Alliance LGBT Santa Cruz); Redcruz (Redcross); and Grupo Juplas (Group Juplas).
- In Tarija: A mi manera (Yacuibá) (My Way); GLBT del Sur (South LGBT); Familia Barzac (Barzac Family); and Grupo Diversidades Sexuales de Tarija (Sexual Diversity Group from Tarija).
- In Sucre: Colectivo GLBT (LGBT Collective) and Amanecer (Dawn).
- In Oruro: Imágenes (Images).³⁰

One of the most active LGBT groups is Galán Family. It is a volunteer group with 50 active members, most of whom are working professionals. Their aim is to educate Bolivians about sexuality and gender through theater, photography, and film. The group has a weekly radio show called “Trans Stage” on 101.7 FM radio. The Galán Family participates actively in the Gay Pride parade on the last Saturday of June.

The most visible lesbian group at the national level is the anarchist group Mujeres Creando (Women Creating). This group has been very active in the Bolivian political and social spheres and has gained visibility through a graffiti campaign defending women’s rights. The leaders of the group, María Galindo and Julieta Paredes, once a couple, became the first open lesbians in the country. Mujeres Creando maintains a community house, Virgen de los Deseos (Virgin of Desires), and over the last decade has produced television shows and staged happenings. It has also acquired a radio station, “Deseo” (Desire), 103.3 FM.

HEALTH

The new constitution states that health care is universal, free, and granted without any kind of discrimination. Since the public administration lacks enough resources to offer acceptable health services, only those who cannot afford private care choose public health services.

Before the AIDS epidemic, there was no organized gay community in Bolivia. The Ministry of Health diagnosed the first official case of AIDS in the country in 1985, and many sociological factors have since exacerbated the seriousness of the disease. First, an endemic problem in Bolivia is the male aversion to the use of condoms. Most males must be persuaded by women to use condoms. Second, misinformation regarding AIDS is widespread. Most people believe that HIV can only be contracted in high-risk populations (e.g., homosexuals and prostitutes). Finally, promiscuity among closeted gay men is socially acceptable and rampant.

In the late 1980s, the United States funded an AIDS prevention project directed at prostitutes in Santa Cruz. The focuses of the program were STD testing and education. In Bolivia, prostitution is legal, and prostitutes have to be tested for STDs every three months in order to maintain valid state registration. In 1993, a U.S.-based health worker expanded the Alcance Gay (Gay Reach) program to include the gay population and promote sexo más seguro (safer sex). Originally, the coordinator did not envision a gay organization because many homosexuals in Bolivia did not identify themselves as such.³¹ In March 1994, the organization rented a space that served as a sexual education and prevention center and where a gay support group, Unidos en la Lucha por la Dignidad y la Salud (United by the Struggle for Dignity and Health) quickly formed.³² The group held the first Bolivian Gay Day celebration on June 25, 1994 (though not without difficulty in obtaining a permit for the event) in order to promote AIDS awareness. For these reasons, in 1994, “it was becoming increasingly obvious in Bolivia that the words ‘gay’ and ‘AIDS,’ while not synonyms, were at least linguistic first cousins.”³³

POLITICS AND LAW

When Latin America was colonized by Spain and Portugal, sodomy was considered a heinous crime. Consequently, when colonists realized that the indigenous populations were more sexually open and less fixated on gender roles, Inquisition tribunals were quickly instituted.³⁴ After Bolivia gained its independence from Spain, these laws were stricken from the constitution. Bolivian law took as its model the Napoleonic Code and its more egalitarian principles. Bolivia’s independent constitution made no mention of sodomy laws.

The previous Bolivian Constitution was established in 1967, and was subsequently reformed in 1994, 1995, 2002, 2004, and 2005.³⁵ The new constitution limits the definition of marriage and civil unions to contracts between a man and a woman. Given that such constraints were not explicit in the prior constitution, such a definition is seen as a setback. Still, the new constitution is generally seen as more progressive, particularly due to its sanctions against discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. There are, however, no records or legal stipulations regarding bisexuals, transsexuals, or intersexuals. Current Bolivian law does not acknowledge their existence.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Bolivia is a mostly Catholic nation (95%), and there is no separation of church and state.³⁶ Indeed, the church frequently intercedes in political conflicts.

Because Bolivian society is predominantly Catholic, most religious institutions do not welcome homosexuals. The Catholic Church still classifies homosexuality as a sin and thus will not accept homosexual members. Only homosexuals who repent of their sins are welcomed.

VIOLENCE

The incarceration rate in Bolivia is 7.8 per 10,000 individuals. Hate crime statistics are nonexistent (except for domestic violence) and therefore we cannot quantify the proportion of hate crimes directed toward the GLBT population.³⁷ Nonetheless, violence against homosexuals is the norm. Indeed, maricones (faggots) is the colloquial, pejorative term for gays used in daily discourse. The only visible gays are transvestites, who are frequently picked up and beaten. In fact, it is quite common for people who have been heavily drinking to say, “vamos a patear maricones” (“let’s go kick some faggots”). The police do not monitor this violence. On the contrary, the secrecy that surrounds homosexuality is often used by law enforcement agents to extort money from LGBT crime victims. Over the last decade, however, since LGBT people have become more visible, these abuses have gradually diminished.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Questions about the legitimacy of the new Bolivian constitution linger. On one hand, the new laws disallow discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, but on the other, same sex marriage remains illegal.

The AIDS epidemic in Bolivia led to the creation of LGBT organizations that then entered the social and political spheres. This new level of visibility is slowly building a less biased view of homosexuality and generating tolerance across Bolivian society in general.

Video/Films

- American Visa*, DVD, directed by Juan Carlos Valdivia (2005; Bolivia. Mexico: Instituto Mexicano de Cinematografía [IMCINE], 2005).
After a Bolivian English teacher is denied a U.S. visa to be reunited with his son, he becomes involved in illicit activities to buy a visa. He is also romantically involved with a prostitute, Blanca, and befriends a gay man in the La Paz hotel while he waits for the visa.
- Dependencia sexual*, DVD, directed by Rodrigo Bellott (2003; Bolivia. United States; BoSD Films LLC, 2003).
Five interrelated stories of young men and women in Bolivia and the United States searching for their identity and sexuality. One of the protagonists presents a lesbian monologue. The other protagonist is an upper class Bolivian male student who is raped in the United States by male football team members.
- La Ley de la noche (The Law of the Night)*, DVD, directed by Diego Torres Cámara (2005; Bolivia: Diegofilms, 2005).
Kiki, an effeminate man, moves to a large city to have a better life as a drag performer, only to discover that discrimination and police extortion are the daily routine. Real transvestites and transgender people appear in the film.
- Jonás y la ballena rosada (Jonah and the Pink Whale)*, DVD, directed by Juan Carlos Valdivia (1995; Bolivia. Mexico: Conacite Uno, 1995).
Jonah has an affair with her young sister-in-law, Julia, who immediately is sent to the United States. There, she marries a drug lord; upon her return to Bolivia she resumes her affair and is killed. The director (Juan Carlos Valdivia) makes an appearance portraying Jonah's gay friend who is falsely accused by Julia of rape.
- Lesbianismo (Lesbianism)*, DVD, directed by Mujeres Creando (1999; Bolivia: Periodistas Asociados Televisión, 1999).
This performance was the first public display of female homosexuality in Bolivia. Julieta Paredes and Maria Galindo (co-founders of Mujeres Creando) embraced in the bed they just have set up. People passing by were given red roses and asked for their opinion of the scene.
- Mamá no me lo dijo (Mom did not tell Me)*, DVD, directed by Maria Galindo and Mujeres Creando (2002; Bolivia: VOSTF, 2002).
TV series with filming episodes that portrays different lifestyle choices: "La novia vendedora" (The Sale Bride), "El sueño la vendedora" (The Salesgirl's Dream), "La puta" (The Whore), "La india" (The Indian), and "La misa religiosa" (The Religious Mass).
- Sexo (Sex)*, DVD, directed by Rodrigo Bellot (2001; Bolivia. United States, 2001).
A short antipornography film showing lesbian nudity and frontal male nudity. Experimental winner of the 2002 PlanetOut.com Short Movie Awards.

BRAZIL

Jen Westmoreland Bouchard

OVERVIEW

Brazil is the fifth largest country in the world by size and population. It is bounded on the east by the Atlantic Ocean with more than 4,577 miles of coastland. It also shares a border with most of the other countries of South America.

Portuguese is its official language, but Spanish, English, and French are also spoken. Eighty-eight percent of the population age 15 and older can read and write (88.4% of males, 88.8% of females).¹

When the first Portuguese colonists reached Brazil in 1500, they were shocked to find that many of the native inhabitants practiced sodomy, which was considered a sin according to Catholic Church doctrine. They were also surprised to discover that women participated in homosexual acts. The Catholic Portuguese population took great effort to reform these practices. The Portuguese also brought over five million Africans to Brazil during nearly four centuries of slavery. One group, the quimbanba, an association of homosexual fetishists from Congo-Angola, defied the Portuguese and continued to develop their practices in their new home, Brazil. Not surprisingly, the quimbanba horrified the conservative Portuguese colonists. During the Inquisition, lesbianism was outlawed and homosexual men were referred to as mulher-macho (“male woman”). After Brazilians gained their independence in 1832, a new constitution was put into place that, influenced by the Napoleonic Code, did not make homosexuality illegal. To this day, the gay population of Brazil is free from legal persecution.

The myriad identities and lifestyles that make up the Brazilian LGBTQ population reflect Brazil's diverse history and culture. Brazil's population is approximately 169.8 million. The population breakdown is as follows: 0–14 years: 25.3 percent (24,554,254 males and 23,613,027 females); 15–64 years: 68.4 percent (64,437,140 males and 65,523,447 females); and 65 years and over: 6.3 percent (4,880,562 males and 7,002,217 females). The median age is 29 years.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Brazil is home to one of the liveliest gay scenes in South America. Undoubtedly, Brazil's homosexual scene and LGBTQ politics have been influenced by both Western European and North American gay cultures.

The historically dominant Portuguese and Catholic value systems provided Brazil with specifications of normative gender and sexuality that still influence most Brazilian views on sex and power today. This perceived power difference between female and male roles can still be observed in the Brazilian homosexual community. Bichas are men who assume a passive role during sex, as opposed to those who penetrate (referred to as bofe or machos).²

Brazil's homosexual community came to prominence in 1978 with the publication of O Lampião, the country's first gay news source. This publication quickly became the most important source of information in Brazil's homosexual community. Shortly after the first issue was released, the country's first homosexual organization was founded, in 1979. The group called themselves Somos ("we are"). Soon, gay organizations began to appear around the country, including Atobá in Rio de Janeiro, Triângulo Rosa ("Pink Triangle") in Rio de Janeiro, Grupo Gay da Bahia, Dialogay in Sergipe, Um Outro Olhar ("Another Look") in São Paulo, The Dignity Group in Curitiba, Gay Group of Amazonas, Lesbian Group of Bahia, Nuances in Porto Alegre, and Arco Iris in Rio de Janeiro. Today, there are approximately 75 homosexual rights groups and associations in Brazil.

When Brazilian homosexual movements began to flourish in the 1980s, many lesbian and feminist voices were pushed aside. This extreme gender imbalance has inhibited lesbian movements from becoming as visible or heard as the country's myriad gay rights organizations. In 1995, the 17th International Lesbian and Gay Association's Conference was held in Rio de Janeiro. This marked a turning point for gays and lesbians working for equal representation within homosexual organizations.³

Each year, Rio de Janeiro hosts one of the largest Gay Pride festivals in the world. Throughout this lively week, Rio's LGBTQ community takes to the streets to celebrate and spread awareness of their sexualities and lifestyles. However, despite this large annual celebration, many Brazilian gays still face blatant discrimination, hate crimes, and limited employment opportunities on a daily basis.

EDUCATION

Since the turn of the 20th century, much progress has been made in the realm of LGBT education in Brazil. In 2004, the Special Secretariat of Human Rights, along with the departments of Health, Justice, Women's Rights, and Racial Equality, launched Brasil Sem Homofobia (Brazil Without Homophobia), a movement dedicated to educating the nation about homosexuality in hopes of eradicating homophobia and the crimes associated with it. As a part of this nationwide initiative, Brazil's Ministry of Education has been training public school teachers how to discuss issues surrounding homosexuality in the classroom more effectively.⁴

Along these same lines, Project Watercolor sponsors LGBT education courses for public school high school and university teachers. The purpose of these courses is to provide a model for integrating LGBT education into curricula and to provide educators with the skills necessary to address questions surrounding these issues when they arise in class.⁵

Grupo Gay da Bahia has been a strong leader in gay rights education in Brazil. The group has published a comprehensive book on lesbianism in Brazil, and they continue to publish articles and pamphlets about the history of Brazilian homosexuals (including the story of the Luso-Brazilian "sodomites" who were persecuted during the Portuguese Inquisition). Grupo Gay da Bahia was the first nongovernmental organization (NGO) to support AIDS prevention education in Brazil (beginning in 1982). Around this time, they also published an HIV prevention pamphlet in Braille for the blind. In 1985, they led a national campaign to omit homosexuality from the list of "sexual deviancies" on the International Classification of Illnesses (according to the World Health Organization), and in the 1990s, the Grupo Gay da Bahia organized hundreds of community and university conferences and roundtable discussions on homosexuality and HIV/AIDS. The Grupo Gay da Bahia has also worked to prevent violence against homosexuals. The group's library holds the largest collection in the world of documents on killings and other acts of violence against homosexuals.⁶

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

The Grupo Gay da Bahia provides counseling and support services to unemployed or underemployed demographic groups throughout the country. The group has indicated that most people who attend their meetings are blacks or metizos and between the ages of 15 and 25. The majority of attendees are transvestites and homosexuals who have had difficulty securing employment as a result of a lack of education or on account of their lifestyle. Likewise, lesbians who have faced discrimination or economic hardship as a result of their sexuality are encouraged to attend the meetings of the Lesbian Group of Bahia.⁷

Studies conducted by Grupo Gay da Bahia reveal that gay men and women are the principal victims of prejudice and employment discrimination in Brazil. Of those surveyed, the level of employment rejection was nearly 80 percent. In Brazil, the percentage of "out" gays and lesbians is less than five percent, even though homosexuals estimate that they make up 10 percent of the Brazilian population. The reason for these differences in statistics is that many homosexuals do not come out for fear of limited employment opportunities. In Brazil, out homosexuals (if employed) typically have a lower income level than their straight counterparts. Consequently, financial support for gay rights organizations, such as the Grupo Gay da Bahia, is not strong.⁸

In the early 2000s, the Grupo Gay da Bahia launched a campaign to stop discrimination and unjust acts against homosexuals. Since this time, the organization has continued to work with government officials to put in place state-funded programs to protect homosexuals from discrimination and violence.

One such initiative is the program Brasil sem Homofobia (“Brazil Against Homophobia”), a national initiative developed to put a stop to violence against LGBTQ individuals. This federal program describes itself as a “national program for combating violence and discrimination against gays, lesbians, transgender people, and bisexuals, and for the promotion of the citizenship of homosexuals.” There is no other organization quite like this in the world. Part of the program’s mission is to educate certain Brazilian demographics (students, law enforcement, doctors, and corporate managers) about gay rights. The program also encourages members of the LGBTQ community who have experienced hate crimes to come forward, share their stories, and file complaints against their attackers so that these situations can be stopped.⁹

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Until the 1950s (and even still) in Brazil, people often thought that men who preferred to engage in sexual acts with other men were feminized or “women in male bodies.” These men still are referred to as bichas. Conversely, the men who penetrated “feminized men” were not considered homosexuals, but rather “real” men who engage in sexual intercourse with feminine men because actual women are, for some reason, not available to them. Thus, a man could maintain, or even augment, his sense of masculinity if he played the role of penetrator or macho. Therefore, if a man had sexual desires for a member of the same sex, he was given two very clear-cut choices: he could either be a bicha or a macho. Once determined, these roles were rarely undone or reversed.

In the late 1950s, certain men decided that they did not want to be pigeon holed into one type of sexual (or gendered) persona. They rejected the notion of constantly having to perform their sexuality (and thus, their genders). These changes (resistance to gender and sexual stagnation) were supported by the gay movements of the 1970s. Despite this sexual revolution of sorts, the culturally ingrained roles of the bicha and the macho can still be observed in everyday interactions. Simultaneously in Brazil, there has been an expanding trend of the masculinization of the homosexual male. Today in Brazil, many gay men lift weights at the gym, wear stylish yet masculine clothes, and maintain an affluent image and lifestyle.

Since the late 1990s, there have been several national initiatives introduced to promote the use of condoms in both heterosexual and homosexual communities. Because Brazilian men are generally uncircumcised (unless they have phimosis, a condition resulting in a tight foreskin that prevents the functioning of the penile glands), greater awareness is needed for the prevention of HIV/AIDS. Studies have found that cases HIV/AIDS occur more frequently in communities that are not circumcised when compared to those that are. As a result of the lack of circumcision, condom use is also more difficult for some Brazilian men. Because it is possible for the foreskin to get caught in the rolled part of the condom, many uncircumcised men find condoms unpleasant or even painful to use.¹⁰

FAMILY

Brazil is a mostly Christian nation, therefore many people regard homosexuality as contrary to family life, and there are myriad “pro family” and antihomosexual conservative religious groups throughout the country. One that has been making headlines lately is the National Vision for a Christian Conscience (VINACC). There have been many protests against this group that fights to preserve heterosexual, Christian religious values. Recently, VINACC was ordered by the court to remove billboards associated with their “In Defense of the Family” campaign, which stated “Homosexuality: God made them man and woman, and saw that it was good!” They were also forced to cancel a “homophobic” public demonstration during which they planned to encourage Christian family values vehemently.¹¹

Rio Grande do Sul was the first Brazilian state to permit civil unions between same-sex couples. The process is not technically considered “gay marriage,” but it is essentially the equivalent. The same-sex union act binds all judges and justices of the peace in the state to conduct civil unions between persons of sound mind, independent of their sexual orientation. It gives homosexual couples many of the same rights as those accompanying marriages regarding inheritance, child custody, insurance benefits, and state pensions. In 2005, a judge in Sao Paulo ruled that homosexual couples have the right to jointly adopt children.

COMMUNITY

One of the most vocal and organized gay rights groups in Brazil is The Grupo Gay da Bahia. In 1980, Luiz Mott, a new professor in anthropology at Federal University of Bahia, founded the group, which is the oldest and longest-lived gay rights group in the country. Mott has since written scholarly essays and books on homosexuality during the colonial period. In 1983, the Grupo Gay da Bahia registered as a nonprofit organization, and in 1987 it officially became a public service organization of the city of Salvador.

In 1976, O Lampiao (The Lantern) was founded. This was the country’s first gay news source and journal. Thanks to this portal of information, the homosexual movement was allowed to flourish in an organized manner throughout the country. The first documented homosexual rights group, Somos (We Are), was founded in Sao Paulo in February 1979. This was one of 22 organizations that were founded nationwide between 1976 and 1980. The principal accomplishments of these early gay rights groups were the abolition of the labels of “deviant” and “sexual invert” to describe gays and the involvement of scientists in promoting gay awareness. With this scientific support, gay rights groups were eventually able to effectively protest antigay discrimination and seek out significant funding for research on homosexuality in men and women. Since this time, these groups have also worked to put an end to homophobic acts of violence. Currently, there is a well-developed gay social scene in Rio de Janeiro and Sao Paulo and over 40 active rights groups throughout the country.

A recent initiative to combat violence against homosexuals was undertaken during Sao Paulo’s 2006 Gay Pride Festival (the theme of which was the eradication of hate crimes). The 2006 organizers claimed that Sao Paulo’s pride parade is the largest of its kind on earth. Each year, participants stream into Paulista Avenue for a week of rainbow flag waving, elaborate costumes, speeches, music, and social action. According to police sources, the 2006 parade drew 2.4 million people, a vast increase from the 2005 count of 1.8 million. Though the festival's theme of hate crimes was rather somber, the event itself was extremely festive.

The 2007 Sao Paulo Pride festival drew over three million participants, as opposed to similar Gay Pride Festivals in New York and San Francisco that draw between 30,000–50,000 people and the World Gay Pride Celebration in Berlin (one of the largest in Europe), which drew 500,000 in 2006.

HEALTH

The year 1983 marked the death of the first Brazilian from AIDS. Since then, the HIV/AIDS epidemic has been a source of concern for the Brazilian homosexual community. The current adult prevalence rate for HIV/AIDS is 0.7 percent. There are 660,000 people living with HIV/AIDS in Brazil.¹² One of the reasons the HIV/AIDS epidemic grew so quickly in Brazil was a lack of HIV prevention information and education in the early to mid-1980s. Since this time, a number of government and social programs have been established in Brazil to educate the general population and serve those with HIV/AIDS. One such program is GAPA-BA (Support Group for AIDS Prevention in Bahia). GAPA-BA began by locating gay sites of contact and educating people in these areas. The organization selects people to reach out to the target gay population, ideally individuals whose ethnic and social backgrounds match those of the communities with which they will be working. HIV/AIDS prevention strategies focus on the social and cultural elements of homosexual behavior and the experiences of violence and exclusion. Through its work, GAPA-BA has managed to establish an information pathway to these gay sites and the communities that access them. They have also been successful in implementing educational programs that serve as a resource center for various homosexual communities.¹³

The Brazilian STD/AIDS Program is a branch of the Ministry of Health. In 2000, the organization implemented the Somos Project. Somos is designed to empower gay men by educating them about HIV/AIDS prevention and training them to educate others. They conduct regional training sessions in conjunction with other governmental organizations (health and social welfare departments and universities) as well as with various NGOs that deal primarily with AIDS education and civil rights activism.¹⁴

In August 2007, it was decided that Brazil's public health system would begin to provide free gender reassignment surgeries for qualified individuals. During the court proceedings that led to this decision, federal prosecutors from the state of Rio Grande do Sul argued that gender reassignment surgery should be covered under the constitutional clause guaranteeing that medical care is a basic human right. The regional federal court justified its ruling by stating that, from a biomedical perspective, gender reassignment surgery is a necessity. Individuals who are in need of this type of surgery and do not receive it are prone to bouts of depression, physical mutilation, or even suicide. Qualifying individuals must be at least 21 years of age and previously diagnosed as transsexuals by a psychologist. They must have no other personality disorders and must undergo a psychological evaluation that lasts a minimum of two years. Transsexuals make up just over 0.001 percent of the Brazilian population. Since 2000, nearly 250 experimental gender reassignment surgeries have been conducted at three Brazilian university hospitals.¹⁵

The Brazilian public health system offers free care to all citizens. This includes most routine surgeries. In addition, Brazil has begun to distribute free HIV/AIDS medications to those in need of them. However, as is often the case in countries with free health care, many medical facilities are poorly equipped and maintained. In addition, the long lines at such facilities mean that individuals who can afford medical treatment usually opt for private hospitals and clinics.¹⁶

POLITICS AND LAW

The Inquisition enacted the first recorded laws against homosexuality in Brazil in 1646. These laws prohibited lesbianism. In 1823, Brazil adopted a new set of laws that were based on the Napoleonic Code. Under these reforms, same-sex acts were no longer illegal.

Currently, no laws exist against consensual same-sex acts between adults over the age of 18. However, members of the Brazilian military who engage in homosexual acts can be sentenced to up to one year in prison. Antidiscrimination protection laws exist in the states of Sergipe, Mato Grosso, Minas Gerais, Santa Catarina, and Rio de Janeiro, and in the cities of Sao Paulo and Salvador. In the state of Rio de Janeiro, heavy fines are imposed on people or institutions found guilty of anti-homosexual discrimination. The state can also close establishments that deny any part of their services to homosexuals.

Brazil's population of 15 million homosexuals was once the country's most discriminated-against social minority. To combat this trend, the Forum of Gay Men, Lesbians, and Transvestites in Politics was formed in 1996. The goal of this group is to present political candidates (to represent homosexuals, who make up over 10 percent of the population). These elected homosexual municipal leaders work to secure legislation against homophobic discrimination, violence, and other social injustices facing the gay community. They have also worked to create human rights councils and organizations that provide sex education and community programs to control the spread of sexually transmitted diseases.¹⁷

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

In terms of religious demographics, Brazil is relatively diverse compared to other South American countries. About 73 percent of the population is Roman Catholic, 15 percent is Protestant, 13 percent is Spiritualist, one percent practices candomblé, one percent is Bantu/voodoo, and eight percent make up the category of unspecified/no religious affiliation.¹⁸

Brazil's pro-homosexual political actions have caused many problems with the Vatican and the Organization of Islamic Conferences. They consider the support (and, on a more basic level, the simple recognition) of homosexuality to be an offense to most organized religions. This has made the relationship between homosexuality and religion quite tenuous in Brazil. Although there are no laws against homosexuality, most of Brazil is still informed by fundamental Christian values (which are traditionally antigay).¹⁹

However, the Episcopal Anglican Church of Brazil has demonstrated relatively progressive theological and moral views on homosexuality. In 1998, the Brazilian Anglican Church decided to host national forums on human sexuality in Rio de Janeiro. At these conferences, they discussed the scientific and moral issues surrounding homosexuality in Brazil. The final report to come out of the conference states that sexuality is a gift from God and that individuals should be free to express their specific preferences with love and respect. This conclusion makes it quite clear that the Anglican Church believes that the privacy of its worshippers and members of the clergy should be respected. Thus, the requirement to expose one's sexual preferences as a prerequisite to ministry or service of any kind within the Church would violate this right to privacy.

Some Brazilians practice candomblé (and other Afro-Brazilian religions such as santeria). During candomblé rituals, participants are possessed by orishas (religious deities). These rituals involve animal sacrifices, healing practices, meditative drumming, and dancing. Candomblé is influenced by the African diaspora in Brazil, and draws inspiration from the Yoruba Orisha religion. Many members of this religion are homosexuals. There are reasons to believe that more people practice candomblé than is indicated by official census information. To compare, there are roughly 19,000 Catholic parishes in Brazil, whereas there are an estimated 12,000 informal candomblé temples in the city of Rio de Janeiro alone. In the candomblé religion, a great number of priests and priestesses are homosexual. Many homosexuals find the refuge and spiritual camaraderie they need within this sometimes hidden religious structure.²⁰

VIOLENCE

Between 1980 and 1998, over 1,600 gays, lesbians and transvestites were killed in Brazil, all of them victims of homophobic rage.²¹ Even though homosexual activists have made significant legislative advancements in this realm, the rate of hate crimes in Brazil has risen at an alarming rate. As is frequently the case, local governments turn a blind eye and do not effectively prosecute the perpetrators of such attacks. In fact, only a very small percentage of these killers and attackers have ever been brought to justice. Studies conducted by the Grupo Gay da Bahia show that fewer than 10 percent of those who commit violent crimes against homosexuals are ever punished for their actions.

Out of Brazil's 26 states, the one in which the most killings of homosexuals occurs is southern state of Sao Paulo (with approximately 24 reported killings per year). According to a study by the Grupo Gay da Bahia, Pernambuco state and the city of Brasilia are two of the most dangerous places in the country for homosexuals. These areas report the highest per capita rate of homosexuals killed through violent acts. In response to this crisis, scholar Luiz Mott published a book entitled Epidemic of Hate. In this book, he discusses the demographic make up of the perpetrators. Of those who are brought to trial, one-fourth are associated with the police force, and one-fifth are michés (individuals involved in homosexual prostitution). Mott claims that this extreme violence is the result of mild homophobia extending, over time, into complete hatred. The brutal killings by the michés reflect their own sexual identity crises. These individuals kill in response to their own feelings of hatred and guilt.²²

Brazil is one of the most supportive countries of homosexual rights and activism in the world. Proof of this widespread support can be seen in legislative action such as the extension of the rights for same-sex couples to join as a union and to adopt children. In addition, the recent public health decision to offer free gender reassignment surgeries to qualifying individuals is a revolutionary pro-LGBTQ initiative. The fact that the state can (and has) shut down places of business for discriminating against homosexuals also speaks to the government's commitment to equal rights.

This is not to say that the road has been an easy one for Brazil's LGBTQ population. Movements such as the original Somos (1980s), Grupo Gay da Bahia (1980s-present) and the myriad other gay rights organizations in Brazil have worked hard to assure this kind of lifestyle for LGBTQ Brazilians. However, there is still much work to be done. LGBTQ Brazilians face rampant discrimination in the job market.

In addition, the violent killings of homosexuals that began in the early 1990s have slowed, but not ceased. The eradication of violence and discrimination will be the two major projects of Brazilian LGBTQ rights organizations as they continue into the 21st century.

As far as health issues are concerned, thanks to the numerous and widespread HIV/AIDS education programs in Brazil, the number of victims of this deadly disease has greatly decreased over the past couple of years. However, the next generation of both LGBTQ and straight youth must be educated to keep the country on its healthy path. It is certain that gay rights groups throughout the country will continue to oversee these education programs in conjunction with the Brazilian government. Queer Literature coming out of Brazil has reached an amazing level of popularity in Latin America and the United States. In addition, there are many scholars working within sociological perspectives on LGBTQ rights in Brazil. However, there is still much work to be done in these areas. It appears that Brazil will see more dynamic literature and scholarship emerging in the areas of Queer Literature and LGBTQ issues and rights in the future.

OVERVIEW

Canada is the second-largest country in the world in terms of area, and has a population of 32 million people. It extends from the U.S. border in the south to the Arctic Circle in the north, and from Cape Race, the most easterly point of North America, to Vancouver Island in the Pacific. Its geography incorporates many different land formations, the most fresh water on earth, and thousands of different ecosystems in a variety of climate zones, including temperate rain forests and frozen tracts of tundra and ice.

Canada's constitutional, regional, demographic, and linguistic realities have shaped its response to the issue of gay and lesbian rights. Developed by Anglo-Saxons and built on the remnants of British North America (which itself was built on the preexisting New France), Canada of the 19th century consisted of four provinces: Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. With the exception of French-speaking Quebec, the provinces were Anglo-Saxon entities that were also home to Scottish, Irish, and French minorities.

The extension of the Canadian Confederation to the Pacific coast in 1871 opened up vast tracts of land that were settled by immigrants from other European countries. The addition of Newfoundland completed the geographic development of Canada in 1949. The explosion of immigration from non-northern European cultures, which began in earnest in the 1950s, would eventually lead to the development of some of the world's most diverse and multicultural cities. In the 1980s, this immigration and demographic shift would also reduce Anglo-Saxon domination in the English-speaking provinces and have a significant impact on Canada's self-perception.

Canada is a federation, with powers divided between a federal government based in Ottawa, its 10 provinces, and three northern territories. Since the 1980s a new level of government has been emerging in the newly recognized jurisdictions of aboriginal nations, primarily in the north and the west of Canada. Provinces have exclusive jurisdiction in areas such as family law, as opposed to the federal government, which has exclusive jurisdiction in areas such as marriage and the criminal code. As a result, gay and lesbian rights have progressed at different paces in each of the provinces and territories.

Canada has two legal systems: the Common Law system, which operates in nine provinces and the three territories, and the Civil Code, which operates in Quebec. This has led to different activist cultures depending upon the different legal systems. In Common Law jurisdictions, courts have been used to overturn laws. In Quebec's more rigid Civil Code jurisdiction, however, judges cannot make laws like their Common Law counterparts can, and so political organizing has taken on a much more prominent role.

Canada is composed of an English-speaking majority and a large French-speaking minority, based primarily in Quebec. The "Quiet Revolution" in Quebec, which began in the 1950s and bloomed in the 1960s, allowed Quebec to free itself from the yoke of the Roman Catholic Church. This had a profound impact on the progression of gay and lesbian rights in Quebec and the province led the country in the extension of rights to gay and lesbian people in all areas of provincial jurisdiction with the notable exceptions of family law and education.

Canada is a liberal democracy that most often adheres to moderate/centrist political philosophies. There is no equivalent in Canada to the radical right-wing movement presently found in the United States. The New Democrat Party and the Bloc Québécois, both social-democrat and center-left, have exerted a pro-gay and lesbian influence on the other parties in the federal House of Commons. The Liberal Party, the most centrist of all federal parties, began supporting gay rights in the 1990s and adopted an inclusive Federal Marriage Act in 2004 after the law had been struck down in several provinces by the courts. The Conservative Party, born from the remnants of the moderate Progressive Conservative Party and the more right-wing Reform Party, has been the most reticent of all federal parties in terms of gay rights, but even it has tempered some of its more homophobic positions. New to power in 2006, the Conservatives' attempts to repeal the inclusive Federal Marriage Act were unsuccessful, and they subsequently declared same-sex marriage a nonissue.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Since the late 1980s, Canada has become one of a select number of countries to eliminate all laws that discriminate against its citizens because of their sexual orientation. Since the late 1990s in particular, this evolution has led to full-fledged legal equality for gay, lesbian, and bisexual Canadians.

Canada enjoys a progressive reputation on an international scale. As early as 1977, the province of Quebec had become the first state to include sexual orientation as an explicit motive for anti-discrimination legislation in their Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. In 1985, former Prime Minister Pierre-Elliot Trudeau established the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms for the nation. The charter delineates the types of discrimination that are illegal in Canada. Although it does not explicitly include discrimination based on sexual orientation, interpretation of the charter by the courts is broad, and the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that sexual orientation is forbidden grounds for discrimination.

On July 20, 2005, to great media fanfare, Canada became the fourth country, after the Netherlands, Belgium, and Spain, to legalize same-sex marriage. In accordance with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Civil Marriage Act (Bill C-38) stipulates that “marriage, for civil purposes, is the lawful union of two persons to the exclusion of all others,” regardless of the spouses’ gender.¹

Despite these favorable conditions, Canada has never explicitly condemned homophobic violence. LGBT people continue to be discriminated against in the workplace and other areas, and many Canadian schools also remain hostile environments for LGBT youth, many of whom report victimization and bullying.

LGBT people, especially women, continue to be marginalized by health care professionals and institutions, particularly in regard to service access and delivery. Also, the HIV crisis continues to affect gay men and gay male communities in Canada, and there is evidence from various parts of Canada that funding for prevention among gay men is less of a priority than it is for other populations.

The recent legalization of same-sex marriage in Canada raises several issues within Canadian LGBT communities. Legal claims from same-sex parents are gaining greater visibility. LGBT parents are also fighting to ensure that their children are not discriminated against in daycare, school, or elsewhere. The growing ethnic diversity of Canadian LGBT communities, as well as the specific problems experienced by transsexuals, bisexuals, and other sexual minorities, is also putting pressure both on LGBT support organizations and on Canada’s legal system.

EDUCATION

The Canadian constitution states that education is the sole jurisdiction of provincial and territorial governments. Therefore, there is no single portrait of what is happening in Canadian schools, but rather many portraits, each reflecting the experience of individual provincial and territorial initiatives. Some of these are pan-Canadian and originate primarily within the structures of the national education association, the Canadian Teachers’ Federation. Others have originated in provincial teachers’ federations (notably Quebec, Alberta, and British Columbia), and still others are rooted in community organizations that work directly with school boards and individual schools (as in Nova Scotia and Manitoba, for example).

Canadian schools are among the environments that have changed the least since discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation was formally outlawed. Gay, lesbian, and bisexual youth consistently rate their school environments as harsh and often unbearable. According to a survey of 1,100 students from the Montreal area conducted between 2006 and 2007, 80 percent reported having heard homophobic insults during the current school year and 31 percent said they have been directly targeted.² In response, some Canadian students have taken school discrimination cases to court.

In 2002, Marc Hall, a student in a provincially funded Catholic high school in Oshawa, Ontario, announced his intention of attending the high school graduation dance with his boyfriend. The Catholic school board intervened, forbidding him to do so. He was forced to seek an injunction from the Ontario Provincial Court, which ordered the school board to respect his Charter of Rights, as they trumped the right of a school to enforce a doctrine in a social context.

Two other landmark cases were heard in British Columbia. The first involved the Surrey School Board, which had ordered that LGBT-positive books be removed from school libraries in the district after receiving religiously motivated complaints from parents. This case went all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada, which ruled in 2002 that the books had to be replaced, stating that gay and lesbian students and same-sex parents had the right to have their lives protected and reflected in the school curriculum. The second decision involved a complaint to the Human Rights Tribunal of British Columbia made by a gay couple, Peter Cook and Murray Warren, charging the school curriculum did not address issues of sexual orientation. As the Tribunal was preparing to hear the case in 2006, the provincial government negotiated a settlement with the couple and ordered a thorough review of the curricula in the province, mandating that any homophobic content be removed. This resulted in the development of a new LGBT-positive curriculum, which has yet to be launched.

Young transpeople are also harassed at school, risk being rejected by their families and friends, and do not benefit from appropriate resources to help them.³ Significant damage is done to LGBT men and women in Canadian school systems. Psychological scars and wounds continue to exact a painful price long into adult life. If it is true that many LGBT people live in the closet for a significant number of their early years, unsafe school environments may force them to fortify their closets out of fear of discovery.

Confronting homophobia in Canada will never be more than a pipe dream available to certain adults in certain environments if Canadians do not tackle school laws, policies, and classrooms. Changing these environments will go a long way in reducing the negative effects of homophobia, as youth realize that there are options open to them if they are gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgendered. The provision of school-mandated sex education programs has been shown to reduce suicides, attempted suicides, depression, bullying, and truancy. Community activists, allied educators, and health professionals are working to influence school environments. They work to change the attitudes of people who see their efforts as “promoting homosexuality” rather than reaching out to sexual minority youth and presenting them with possibilities. Promoting positive images of a future to gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered youth may be the most efficient means of saving their lives, both literally and figuratively.

Two innovative programs should be highlighted here. The first, a community-based outreach program in Nova Scotia, The Youth Project, has had a major impact on the school system of that province. The program offers supportive services to lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered, and questioning youth, and policy development support for schools and school boards wishing to implement anti-homophobic and gay-positive environments. They have also instituted the Health Canada-funded program “Hear Us Out,” which aims to lend youth voices to the policy debates in the Health, Education, and Justice Departments of the Nova Scotian government. The second program, GRIS-Montreal (Groupe de Recherche et d’Intervention Sociale gaies et lesbiennes de Montréal), conducts sensitivity workshops in hundreds of Montreal-area schools, providing students the opportunity to interact with gay and lesbian young adults who talk about their lives. GRIS-Montreal has secured a great deal of media coverage by attracting well-known personalities as spokespersons to denounce homophobia.

Presenting same-sex relationships as valid relationships from the earliest grades is an essential component in any academic curriculum discussing family life or Canadian citizenship. Promoting cultural diversity, the respect of differences, and the rights of minorities breathes life into the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Only one quarter of the schools that volunteered to participate in a recent study of the Conseil permanent de la jeunesse in Quebec had an antidiscriminatory policy in place, and in more than half of these cases, either the policy was not promoted or it did not have a specific method for handling complaints. A majority of schools did not offer any information or sensitization activities either to their staff or to parents. Two-thirds of the schools did offer activities to students, but on an irregular basis. Knowledge of resources and tools to help LGBT students is frequently lacking in Quebec’s schools.⁴

Some believe that a critical eye should be trained on professional schools, colleges, and universities in Canada in regard to homophobia, as, in the 20th century, hatred and rejection of gay and lesbian people often came forth in the teachings of medical, psychology, sexology, and psychiatry departments.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Canada is one of the richest nations in the world. Its capitalist economy is founded on abundant natural resources supported by a highly qualified workforce. Commercially, Canada benefits from its close proximity to the United States, but it also distinguishes itself from its powerful neighbor through greater government involvement in the distribution of wealth.

In terms of employment, discrimination based on sexual orientation is prohibited by the human rights charters of all provinces and territories, and by the Canadian Human Rights Act, which applies to organizations under federal jurisdiction. Gay and lesbian victims of discrimination may use the courts to enforce the charters, but procedures are often long and complicated.

Unionization also offers a certain protection against employers’ arbitrariness. In Canada, 30 percent of the workforce is unionized. In the public sector, the workforce unionization rate is higher (72%) than in the private sector (17%).⁵ Facing pressure from their gay and lesbian members, major labor unions have actively supported legal and political battles for the recognition of same-sex couples and same-sex parents. Nondiscrimination clauses have also been added to several collective bargaining agreements.

Despite the rights gained by workers, homophobia persists in the workplace. Discrimination in the form of discharge or job refusal is often disguised under false pretenses, which makes it difficult to expose. Gay and lesbian employees who do not have job security or union protection are the most vulnerable. The work environment is particularly homophobic in businesses where the workforce is predominantly male and where the organizational culture values traditionally masculine skills, such as physical strength or aggression. Many lesbians are victims of sexual harassment, whether or not they have come out in their workplace. Many gay and lesbian employees also experience other instances of discrimination based on gender, race, or other factors that impede their career advancement.

During the Cold War years, an antihomosexual security campaign was organized at the national level aimed at detecting and eliminating gays and lesbians who worked in the Civil Service, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the military. As a result, many of these workers were fired or displaced. Scientists were asked to create a reliable method in order to detect homosexuals, often called "fruits." The "fruit machine," an experimental device comprised of a series of pseudo-scientific tests, never actually worked, as it was based on false assumptions.⁶ The security program was eliminated in the late 1960s, but this did not change the fact that open gays and lesbians could be discharged from the Canadian Army as late as 1988 for their sexual orientation. In 1992, this motive for discharge was declared to be contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In spite of this, few military men and women risk coming out, and those who do expose themselves to the rejection of their peers, particularly in situations of physical proximity, and other forms of ostracism.⁷

Large Canadian cities such as Vancouver, Toronto, and Montreal promote gay tourism. Montreal hosted the first World Outgames in July 2006, a sporting and cultural event that also included an international conference for the advancement of gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender rights. The first North American Outgames were held in Calgary in April 2007. It is ironic that the conservative province of Alberta, the last to include sexual orientation in its Charter of Rights when it was forced to do so by a Supreme Court of Canada ruling in 1998, is now trying to draw gay tourists to the beautiful scenery where the popular gay-themed movie Brokeback Mountain was filmed.⁸ Some major Canadian companies such as Air Canada are also making efforts to attract the gay market with publicity spots aimed at these consumers.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Far from over, the HIV crisis continues to affect gay men and gay male communities in Canada. Evidence from various parts of Canada shows that gay men are tiring of the prevention message, even though studies indicate that 75 to 80 percent of gay men in Canadian cities practice safer sex.

In many ways, the HIV/AIDS epidemic and its implications are more complex than ever before. A new relationship with HIV appears to have emerged within the gay community, both in Canada and in other parts of the developed world, in which gay men seem to have established survival strategies in regard to HIV infection.

On a societal level, gay men quickly became aware that the government had pigeon-holed all gay issues, health needs, and struggles as HIV issues. By 1985, in Canada, it became impossible to talk about any other health issue when addressing the health of gay men. Because lesbians were perceived to be at low risk for HIV infection, their health issues rarely became part of the public discourse. Gay and lesbian communities are now waging a battle to have policymakers address the broader health issues that affect their communities, as the links between physical health, mental health, and sexual health become increasingly clear.

One of the consequences of reducing gay male health issues to the sole issue of HIV infection was to reduce gay men to the epidemiological category of men who have sex with men (MSM). This category, designed to track the HIV infection among a high-risk population, became the new blanket term to identify gay men. Since 2006, gay men have invested a lot of energy in reassigning the MSM term as an epidemiological category and to advocating for the reappearance of “gay men” as an identity category to be used in all other situations. At the same time, gay men have had to advocate with policymakers, the HIV community, and AIDS service organizations within Canada in order to not fall off the radar as a priority population in HIV prevention and care initiatives.

Canadian MSM account for approximately 50 percent of all cases of HIV infection.⁹ Prevalence rates of HIV infection among Canadian MSM average from 7 to 14 percent, depending on the survey and location.¹⁰ A Montreal ARGUS study showed that approximately one quarter of HIV-positive MSM do not know they are infected.¹¹ HIV infection among gay men is mostly attributed to unprotected anal intercourse with sexual partners of positive or unknown HIV status. For example, rates of Canadian MSM having unprotected anal intercourse with at-risk partners over a six- to 12-month period are estimated to range from 20 to 40 percent. Recent Canadian studies have linked this lack of sexual protection to a number of factors, including: intoxication during sex (particularly with poppers, crystal meth, and ecstasy), the number of partners; finding sexual partners on the Internet, in bathhouses, or in public venues, personality traits such as sexual sensation seeking and sexual compulsivity, relationship status, and the quest for intimacy.¹²

HIV-positive gay men have had to remind the broader gay community not to exclude them from their prevention efforts and to strive to build a community that is more inclusive of HIV-positive gay men and their experiences. Reports from across Canada indicate that most young gay men have never knowingly met an HIV-positive gay man. Clearly this is problematic, as HIV-positive gay men feel they are unable to speak of their status within their own community. Compounded with the increasing, yet limited, efficacy of treatments, most gay and bisexual men do not even notice the presence of HIV-positive men in their environment. This has only exacerbated the misconception that HIV has become a less serious problem for gay men. Added to this is the increasing number of gay men in relationships where at least one person is HIV positive.

Lack of Attention to Women’s Health Issues

One of the most negative consequences of limiting gay health issues to the issue of HIV is that there has been virtually no discussion of lesbian health issues in Canada. Because lesbians are at a much lower risk for HIV infection, their physical and mental health needs have been totally neglected in research and policy. One could hypothesize that this neglect is caused by mainstream and LGBT media coverage of the gay male community as it confronted rabid homophobia, HIV phobia, and the sickness, dying, death, and grieving over those who passed away. This has been exacerbated by the fact that, as Canada moves increasingly into health promotion and population-health-oriented models of caring for gay men, it has not yet begun to address the health needs of lesbian and bisexual women.

Federal and Provincial Gay Health, Lesbian Health, and Gay and Lesbian Health Agendas

Both the HIV/AIDS activist movement and the women's health movement have helped to channel energy and focus expertise on the health needs of LGBT people. LGBT practitioners, consumers, and their allies across Canada have designed and implemented practices specifically addressing gay-positive health care and social services. Gay-positive health centers, counseling resources, and advocacy organizations specifically addressing LGBT health have emerged as a result of the work done by the LGBT community and community organizations. Most notable among them is the establishment of GayWay in Vancouver, which offers health and social services to gay and bisexual men in the Greater Vancouver area. Action Séro-Zéro of Montreal, the largest HIV prevention organization in Canada, has changed its mandate and its name in order to reflect its gay health approach more accurately. In some instances, provincial and federal governments have participated in the development of policy and practice initiatives.

Bisexuals

Studies on bisexuality in Canada do not generally distinguish between homosexual and bisexual behaviors, thereby making it difficult to make in-depth comparisons. Indications from recent epidemiological and qualitative studies highlight the patterns that are specific to bisexuals. A review of the literature on bisexuality in Quebec indicates that people who identify as bisexual appear more likely to display a high level of psychological distress and suicidal thoughts.¹³ Risk-taking with regards to HIV/AIDS is also significant among bisexual men.

Qualitative studies conducted among bisexual men and women show that many of them are resilient in the face of psychosocial difficulties, but prevention strategies regarding STDs and HIV/AIDS remain a problem.¹⁴ Issues of love, sexuality, and relationships, which differ for heterosexual and homosexual relationships, have an impact on preventive strategies. A study of affective modalities in bisexual relationships is essential for understanding resistance to effective STD and HIV/AIDS prevention.

Intersexuals

Increasingly, intersexed people are denouncing medical viewpoints that consider the states of intersexuality as a series of pathologies or disorders of sex development. They consider it a violation of human rights to impose treatment on children that will "normalize" their body appearance, and reclaim their right to affirm their own sex identity without medical or government interference. The Canadian arm of Organisation Intersex International promotes an annual intersex solidarity day every November 8, in commemoration of the life of Herculine Babin, who committed suicide at age 30. Babin (Saint-Jean d'Angély 1838–Paris 1868) stands as one of the earliest documented cases of an intersexual person. Considered a girl and raised as such until age 22, Barbin was legally redesignated as male after she was discovered to have the physical attributes of both male and female.¹⁵

While figures on same-sex unions have been included in the Canadian census since 2001, data from Statistics Canada's 2006 census are the first to attest to the popularity of the well-publicized state of gay marriage. The portrait drawn is undeniable: 7,460 same-sex couples, or 16.5 percent of the 45,350 couples who declared themselves homosexual, had the legality of their union recognized by Canada. Their counterparts (37, 890 couples) declared themselves to be in common-law relationships.

Whether in marriages or common-law unions, same-sex couple declarations are most often concentrated in major urban centers. Montreal, Toronto, and Vancouver alone include 83 percent of Canadian declarations. The high number of declarations in major Canadian cities is partly attributable to their significant gay and lesbian communities.

Family Projects

In Canada, gay and lesbian family projects can result from the intentions of an individual or a couple. Couples who want to have a child can do so biologically (e.g., through natural or artificial insemination or a family project with a friend) or have recourse to adoption. Canadian regulations regarding adoption fall under provincial jurisdiction. This provincial issue also extends to regulations regarding the adoption of one spouse's child (or children) by his or her partner. According to Statistics Canada's 2006 census, 16.3 percent of lesbian couples and 2.9 percent of gay male couples declared having custody of at least one child born from a family project or a previous heterosexual union.¹⁶

While the choice of parental candidates for the adoption of Canadian children is done through regional authorities, the authorities in children's native countries regulate the international adoption of children by same-sex Canadian couples. Throughout Canada, several organizations and associations offer advice and assistance to gays and lesbians in their parental endeavors, including the LGBT Parenting Network (Ontario), the Lesbian Mothers Support Society (Alberta), and the LGBT Family Coalition (Quebec).

Seniors

According to recent Canadian studies, gay and lesbian seniors are less likely to resort to social and health services than their heterosexual peers, as they are more apprehensive about the treatment they will receive in public institutions. Many are reluctant to reveal their sexual orientation, either because they anticipate negative reactions from their peers, relatives, or caregivers, or because they are accustomed to being discreet due to past discrimination.¹⁷ Now that the first baby-boomers are reaching retirement age, seniors' residences will have to welcome these new seniors, who are often more openly gay than the previous generation. If a home for gay seniors in Canada does not yet exist, it will not be long; projects for gay and lesbian senior residences are being developed in Montreal and Vancouver.¹⁸

COMMUNITY

Canadian LGBT activism has played a major role in the growing consciousness of LGBT realities and in the development of full-fledged legal equality for gay and lesbian citizens.

The adoption of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms has resulted in an important shift in the Canadian lesbian and gay movement. While LGBT activism had been aimed at visibility and the fight against homophobia, a number of organizations have leaned on the Charter to lead legal and political fights. Founded in 1986, a mere year after the Charter became effective, Egale Canada has been at the forefront of the equality-seeking efforts ever since.

Gay and lesbian pride festivities are celebrated annually in cities across Canada, and Vancouver, Toronto, and Montreal hold specifically exuberant Gay Pride celebrations, which are important events during which community groups and gay-friendly associations congregate. Although the event is covered as a festive occasion, many Canadians still cringe at the idea that sexual orientation is something to be proud of.

Canadian homosexual activism has tried to present a united front, often at the expense of minority groups, such as lesbians or LGBT people of color. Long marginalized under the imperative of cohesiveness, these groups organized amongst themselves in the latter years of the 20th century in order to confront their specific challenges. Members of organizations such as the Multimundo Coalition in Montreal and Salaam Canada in Toronto receive support that could, in many cases, be found neither in their ethnocultural communities nor in LGBT groups targeting broad membership.

The turn of the century has also seen the Internet change the meaning of LGBT community, with the rise of online communities and resources. Most organizations have Web sites and some operate entirely via the World Wide Web, playing a major role in reaching out to gays, lesbians, and bisexuals living in rural areas and small communities where they are often isolated and where there are frequently no local LGBT social networks.¹⁹

To this day, there are many Canadians who not only remember being institutionalized by health care professionals for simply expressing same-sex attraction, but also remember undergoing therapies or treatments designed to cure them of their “unnatural” and “unhealthy” predisposition, all the while facing stigma and isolation initiated by the health care system. While explicitly oppressive practices such as aversion therapy and electroshock therapy are largely a thing of the past, the underlying prejudices at the root of these practices are still apparent in today’s health care system.

Although the definition of homosexuality as pathology has changed over the past 30 years, health care workers and institutions continue to marginalize LGBT people, especially women, particularly in relation to service access and delivery. At best, the health care and social services system has attempted to create neutral institutions based on the ideological belief that care must be accessible to all, regardless of sexual orientation, and that health care services are best situated when they are developed with no special interest group in mind. However, based on the experiences of LGBT people, this lack of attention to sexual orientation can be harmful, particularly in an environment that continues to be marked by homophobia and heterosexism. What results is a system like the one currently in place, in which, at its worst, the health of many LGBT people is compromised because of oppressive practices, and at its best, LGBT people are simply invisible and their particular needs are not taken into consideration. Given these experiences, it comes as no surprise that LGBT people have a particularly mistrustful, apprehensive, and/or problematic relationship with health care institutions and professionals. It is also no surprise that, until recently, LGBT people have had virtually no say in matters regarding health care policies, health promotion, or disease prevention.

Due to prejudice and the invisibility of the LGBT population, most health care professionals currently know very little about LGBT experiences with the health care system or the issues that LGBT people and their families face in accessing and using community health care services. Many transsexual and transgender people in Canada deplore the lack of access to adequate services, as well as the lack of knowledge of health care workers regarding issues of transsexuality. Without this knowledge, it becomes impossible to address oppression, adapt existing services, or develop new services that more appropriately address the unique health care needs of the LGBT population.

POLITICS AND LAW

In Canada, while homosexuality as such was not punishable, several sections of the Canadian Criminal Code were used to repress homosexual behavior since its creation in 1892. Crimes of buggery, gross indecency, and indecent assault on a male are some of the most notable examples. Until its abrogation in 1987, the law on gross indecency was the one most frequently used against male homosexuals. This law incriminated sexual behavior between two male adults, whether consenting or not, and regardless of whether the acts occurred in a private or public place. Canadian legislation also punished assaults that involved two men and those committed by a man against a woman.

Lesbians seem to have been relatively forgotten by penal law. The situation changed with the revision of the Criminal Code in 1954; thereafter, everyone could be accused of gross indecency or indecent assault. Although researchers found only one documented case of indecent assault by a woman against another woman, municipal by-laws regarding nuisance and similar offences could be used to harass lesbians and women cross-dressing as men in the public sphere.²⁰

According to the new criminal laws adopted in 1954, those who committed the crime of indecent assault (abrogated in 1983) could be put on a list of sexual psychopaths and incarcerated for an undetermined period of time. The inclusion of sodomy and gross indecency in the sexual psychopath law demonstrates that Canadian lawmakers considered homosexuality a danger to the community.

Beginning in 1969, the decriminalization of sexual acts committed in private was initiated with the creation of a law authorizing sexual behavior between individuals of the same sex when they involve two consenting adults over 21 years of age. As for the crime of buggery, secularized in 1988 by the term “anal intercourse,” it was judged to be unconstitutional by the Courts of Appeal of Ontario (1992), Quebec (1998), and British Columbia (2003) for being discriminatory against homosexuals. Since April 2004, the Canadian Criminal Code has punished homophobia rather than homosexuality; Sections 318 and 319 emphasize that hate based on sexual orientation is considered an aggravating circumstance in the commission of an offense.

Canadian and Provincial Charters

In 1977, with its Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, the province of Quebec became the first state in the world to explicitly protect LGBT people against discrimination associated with sexual orientation. This law only applied in areas of provincial jurisdiction. On a federal level, Section 3 of the Canadian Human Rights Act was first judged to be unconstitutional in 1992 by the Ontario Court of Appeal because it did not include sexual orientation as a motive for discrimination.²¹ The Supreme Court of Canada ruled on Alberta's Individual Rights Protection Act in the Vriend ruling in 1998. By that time, all provinces had included sexual orientation as a prohibited motive of discrimination in their Charter.

Recognition of Same-sex Spouses

Paving the way for the legalization of same-sex marriages, a 1999 ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada included same-sex couples in de facto unions. Several provincial court rulings authorizing same-sex marriage followed. Before the federal law on same-sex marriages was passed on June 28, 2005, eight of the 10 provinces and one of the three Canadian territories, comprising 90 percent of the population, already recognized this type of union.²² Passed with a majority of 25 votes, Bill C-38 defines civil marriage as "the lawful union of two persons to the exclusion of all others" without regard for the sex of the spouses. Affixed on July 20, 2005, the Royal Assent made Canada the fourth country in the world to legalize same-sex marriage.

Adoption

The recent visibility of same-sex families has led Canadian lawmakers to examine the recognition of new family structures. For example, in January 2007, the Supreme Court of Ontario allowed for the legal recognition of three parents (two mothers and a father), after the case was initially rejected by the local courts.

The right granted to gay and lesbian couples to marry does not, however, significantly alter their right to start a family, as jurisdiction in this matter lies with the provinces. Furthermore, it is the provincial governments that determine the rules for adoption. However, refusing to allow a same-sex couple to adopt a child because of their sexual orientation would most likely contradict the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The situation is somewhat different in Quebec because the Civil Code also allows parental projects "involving assisted procreation." This has resulted in Quebec having transformed the presumption of paternity into presumption of parenthood, applicable to all married couples and those in civil unions. Unlike their counterparts in Ontario, however, gay and lesbian couples in Quebec cannot use surrogate mothers if they wish to have a child; if they do, the Civil Code will not recognize the contractual agreement.

Transsexual People's Rights

Transsexual individuals are exposed to harassment, violence, and several forms of discrimination, particularly in public places and the workplace. They often do not have access to non-gender-specific facilities, such as public restrooms. Those who work in the sex trade are criminalized and inadequately protected in prison environments.²³ Several associations are now demanding the explicit inclusion of gender identity or gender expression in the provincial and federal human rights charters in order to provide transsexual and transgender people with clear legal recourse in their fight against the many forms of discrimination of which they are victims. Such an addition would also facilitate the resolution of many legal problems in the application of laws and regulations that make reference to the binary categories of male and female. Currently, only the Northwest Territories have adopted laws that protect the rights of transsexual individuals. In Quebec, a 1998 ruling established that it is forbidden to discriminate on the basis of sex, including transsexualism, as well as the transition process. In 2002, male to female transgendered person Micheline Montreuil obtained the right in the Quebec Court of Appeal to have a feminine first name added to her birth certificate.²⁴

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

According to the 2001 census, almost three quarters of Canadians identify their religion as Roman Catholic (43%) or Protestant (30%). Other major religious denominations include Eastern Orthodox Christianity, Judaism, Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism and Sikhism. Sixteen percent of the population declares itself to be nonreligious.²⁵

Many sects of Christianity, Judaism, and Islam disapprove of homosexual conduct on the basis of moral grounds and broad interpretation of religious texts. Most churches officially disagree with the new laws recognizing same-sex couples and same-sex parents, but many religious leaders do not share their point of view. While the conservative Interfaith Coalition on Marriage and Family, composed of four religious groups, expressed its opposition to the legalization of civil marriage for same-sex couples and tried to obstruct the process, the United Church, the Unitarian Church, and most reform Jewish congregations have been open to the idea of gay marriage.²⁶

In many large Canadian cities, the Metropolitan Community Church welcomes LGBT people to their congregations. The church blessed thousands of same-sex unions before the legalization of civil marriage for same-sex couples in 2005 and continues to do so. The Metropolitan Community Church of Toronto, the largest MCC congregation in Canada, played an active role in the fight for gay marriage in Ontario, issuing legal proceedings in order to protect its rights to religious freedom and to celebrate same-sex marriages.²⁷

The United Church, to which close to 10 percent of the Canadian population belongs, encourages discussion of the inclusion of LGBT people in its congregations, the meaning of marriage, and the diversity of modern couples and families.²⁸ Because of its decentralized structure, parishes are invited to take an independent stand on issues related to homosexuality and the celebration of weddings between two people of the same sex. Several parishes openly welcome LGBT people and some offer spirituality groups that are specifically targeted to LGBT people.

Discussions and debates are also taking place in other churches. The Anglican Church of Canada is deeply divided on the subject of allowing active gays and lesbians to become clergy members, and on the subject of blessing same-sex unions. Within the Catholic Church, priests have denounced the official positions of church authorities regarding gay marriage and denying access to priesthood for gay men.²⁹ The Vatican's inflexibility on a number of issues relating to sexuality and the family has led to a massive abandonment of Catholic religious practice in Quebec. The reception that LGBT people receive in Catholic congregations varies from one parish to another.

Movements such as Real Women and Équité Famille, inspired by the religious right, continue to denounce the gay lobby. They accuse the lobby of jeopardizing the natural order of the heterosexual couple and causing irreparable damage to children educated in same-sex families. Real Women of Canada, an antifeminist organization, is currently accusing gay activists of going into schools in order to promote homosexuality among children and youth under the false pretext of fighting homophobic violence and harassment in schools.³⁰

First Nations

Some LGBT people of First Nations origin claim to have a distinct identity as two-spirited people. In several Native cultures, people who held both masculine and feminine attributes were once considered to belong to a third gender that completely integrated the essence of the Great Spirit. While these ancestral figures were once honored, today they have practically disappeared as a result of colonization and forced Christianization. In addition to living with poverty and racism, two-spirited people are marginalized both in Native communities and in Caucasian LGBT communities. They are therefore particularly vulnerable in terms of their physical, sexual, and mental health. For the past two decades, independent organizations for two-spirited people have been offering adapted programs and services, notably for HIV-AIDS.³¹

VIOLENCE

Since the establishment of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1985, Canada has earned an international reputation for its progressive attitudes. Section 15 of the Charter states the grounds on which discrimination is illegal and reads as follows: "Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, color, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability."³² The Canadian judicial system has always recommended a broad interpretation of the Charter to include provisions for similar forms of discrimination, including sexual orientation.

Nevertheless, hundreds of Canadian men and women are assaulted or killed every year in homophobic incidents. It is difficult to draw a Canada-wide portrait of the situation, or even monitor its evolution, since the majority of police records rarely indicate the motive behind an assault or murder, as it cannot be assumed until proven in court. As a result, Canada's large urban centers have minimal data associated with hate crimes or no real statistics at all.³³

In reality, Canada does not have any explicit laws aimed at countering homophobic violence. The Criminal Code provides for the possibility of increasing a prison sentence in cases of hate-motivated crimes, but the application of this law is irregular and is left to the discretion of local judicial authorities.³⁴ In 2004, Canada's House of Commons adopted Bill C-250, aimed at amending the Criminal Code section that deals with hate propaganda, in order to include sexual orientation as illegal grounds for discrimination. In doing so, it theoretically broadened the legal protections granted by the Criminal Code to include individual victims of homophobic violence.

LGBT people, and individuals perceived as sexual minorities, are still the target of hateful words and acts, ranging from simple teasing to brutal murder.³⁵ Douglas Janoff, a criminologist, examined approximately 350 incidents of homophobic violence in Canada. An analysis of these incidents shows the extent to which brutality is used in the perpetration of homophobic violence; more than three-quarters of the incidents involved some form of physical violence. Furthermore, it also suggested that a victim of gay-related homicide is more likely than other victims to die due to the number of severe injuries covering a large part of his body.

Lesbians

Lesbians in Canada are exposed to a different type of violence than gay men. While gay men are more often victims of physical violence involving intimidation, threats, assault, and injury, lesbians tend to experience a more insidious form of violence.³⁶ According to a recent study on homosexuality and the workplace, 15.7 percent of lesbians reported having been harassed or the victim of undesired heterosexual advances in their work environment. Furthermore, lesbian sexuality is often rendered invisible by the instigators of homophobic violence and by the women themselves. Many Canadian lesbians choose not to discuss their sexual orientation in one or more spheres of their lives, and might not display affection for their partner in public or private due to their fear of antilesbian harassment. Many lesbians also pay particular attention to the way they present themselves physically.³⁷

In addition to homophobic, lesbophobic, and transphobic violence, sexual minorities in Canada must also face the issue of domestic violence, which sometimes takes place in LGBT relationships.³⁸ It is difficult to determine the prevalence of this form of abuse in Canada. According to studies on the subject, both lesbians and gays are reluctant to report partner violence, out of fear of perceived or actual homophobia. A 2005 Statistics Canada report³⁹ indicates that the rate of spousal violence among gays and lesbians was twice the rate of their heterosexual counterparts (15% versus 7%), but cautions readers to interpret the results carefully, as they rely on self-reporting (for both violence episodes and sexual orientation). Lesbians in particular grapple with the combined effects of sexism and homophobia and may fear they will not be believed if they disclose the gender of their abuser.

Although presenting important similarities to heterosexual domestic violence, violence among same-sex couples may include specific abusive behaviors, such as threats to reveal a partner's sexual orientation or threats to jeopardize custody of a partner's children, particularly in the case of lesbians.

LGBT organizations stress the importance of addressing relationship violence within same-sex couples. In Quebec, the Centre de solidarité lesbienne (formerly the Groupe d'intervention en violence conjugale chez les lesbiennes) offers training opportunities to hospital staff and crisis organizations workers. A few organizations across Canada provide information and resources targeting gay or bisexual men, such as Violence in Gay Male Relationships (VIGOR) in Calgary, Alberta.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Since the late 1990s Canada has emerged as a leader in defending the rights of LGBT people. At the same time, if recent legal advances such as the legalization of same-sex marriage demonstrate the significant gains that have been made, they also point to some important gaps.

Canada has not yet introduced legislation that explicitly protects citizens who are victims of homophobic violence and harassment, leaving LGBT people to fight for themselves in court. For example, a 2005 British Columbia Court of Appeal decision ruled in favor of Azmi Jubran, a student who filed a human rights complaint against his school district on the grounds that he had been discriminated against and harassed because of his perceived sexual orientation. The Human Rights Tribunal found the school district responsible for the discrimination, and ruled that it should have provided all students, including Jubran, with a safe educational environment. Many Canadian employers saw this decision as opening the door to an increased responsibility for offering a safe work environment.

Canada's population is ethnically diverse. In 2001, close to 20 percent of Canadian citizens were born outside of the country. Canada is also one of the few countries to grant refugee status on the basis of discrimination against sexual orientation. Canadian LGBT communities therefore include people from many different ethnocultural backgrounds, many of whom have paid the price of racism and homophobia. Their specific needs in terms of integration and access to social services still need to be recognized and considered, both by their LGBT community and by members of their own cultural communities.⁴⁰

Even though the Canadian legal system has had to recognize and enforce equality for all citizens according to the requirements of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it seems that social advances sometimes struggle to keep pace with advances in legislation.

- Anatomy of Desire*, DVD, directed by Jean-François Monette and Peter Tyler Boullata (1995; Montreal: National Film Board of Canada/Bare Bone Films, 1995). Documentary examines how science and social politics have shaped notions of homosexuality through history.
- D'ici et d'ailleurs*, DVD, directed by Nada Raphaël (2007; Montreal: Electrochocks Productions, 2008). Explores the lives of nine lesbian women of color living in or around Montreal.
- End of Second Class*, DVD, directed by Nancy Nicol (2006; Toronto: Intervention Video, 2006). Through the voices of three couples from Quebec, Ontario, and British Columbia, as well as key activists, to trace the story of the struggle for the right to marry, a battle won in 2005.
- Eye on the Guy: Alan B. Stone and the Age of Beefcake*, DVD, directed by Philip Lewis and Jean-François Monette (2006; Montreal: Films en vue 2006). Film explores the little-known world of physique photography through the work of one of its most creative figures, Alan B. Stone, who took erotic photographs of men and ran an international mail-order business from his Montreal basement.
- Forbidden Love: The Unashamed Stories of Lesbian Lives*, DVD, directed by Aerlyn Weissman and Lynne Fernie (1992; Toronto: National Film Board of Canada, 1992). Documentary wherein 10 Canadian women talk about being lesbian in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s.
- In Other Words*, DVD, directed by Jan Padgett (2001; Vancouver: National Film Board of Canada, 2001). Documentary with interviews with gay, lesbian, and transgendered teens. Name-calling and homophobic language are common verbal put-downs among young people, but many adults feel uncomfortable responding.

- In The Flesh*, DVD, directed by Gordon McLennan (2000; Vancouver: National Film Board of Canada, 2000). Provocative documentary challenges the rigid conventions about gender labels through the stories of four transsexuals.
- Little Sister's vs. Big Brother*, DVD, directed by Aerlyn Weissman (2002; Vancouver: National Film Board of Canada, 2002). Documentary showing how Little Sister's Book and Art Emporium, a pioneering gay and lesbian bookstore in Vancouver, took on the government's customs office that had seized thousands of gay-themed books and magazines at the border, claiming the material was pornographic.
- Mommy Mommy*, DVD, directed by Sylvie Rosenthal (2007; Quebec: Rezolution Pictures, 2007). Video follows a lesbian couple from Quebec on their quest to create the family they've always dreamed about.
- Open Secrets*, DVD, directed by José Torrealba (2003; Montreal: National Film Board of Canada, 2003). Documentary traces how the Canadian Armed Forces dealt with homosexual behavior among soldiers during and after World War II. A group of veterans break their silence after more than 60 years.
- Politics of the Heart*, DVD, directed by Nancy Nicol (2005; Toronto: Intervention Video, 2005). Documentary portrait of lesbian and gay families who reshaped the cultural and political landscape of Quebec, by fighting for recognition of their relationships, families, and homoparental rights.
- Prisoners of Violence—Same-Sex Partner Abuse*, VHS, directed by Cal Garingan (2003; Vancouver: National Film Board of Canada, 2003). Documentary showing how same-sex partner abuse tends to be unreported, due to the victims' isolation and society's misconceptions about the issue.
- Prom Queen: The Marc Hall Story*, DVD, directed by John L'Écuyer (2004, Hamilton, Ontario: Wolfe Video, 2004). Television movie telling the story of Marc Hall, a Canadian gay teenager whose legal fight to bring his boyfriend to his Catholic high school prom made national headlines in 2002.
- School's Out*, DVD, directed by Lynne Fernie (1996; Toronto: National Film Board of Canada, 1996). Documentary with TEACH (Teens Educating and Confronting Homophobia) members talking about their lives and their classroom visits, provoking discussions about homophobia and sexism in today's school yards.
- "Susan," Skin Deep (Episode 31, "Susan"; Toronto: Inner City Films/Being Human Productions, 2002). Susan, a 48-year-old transsexual, discusses the issues raised by her transsexuality and her efforts to bring her body into congruence with what is going on in her mind.
- Sticks and Stones*, DVD, directed by Jan Padgett (2001; Vancouver: National Film Board of Canada). Documentary where children between the ages five and 12 vividly describe how it feels to be teased when their families do not follow traditional gender roles. They talk about why bullies engage in name-calling and what they think should be done about it.
- Stolen Moments*, DVD directed by Margaret Westcott (1997; Montreal: National Film Board of Canada, 1997). Documentary covers three centuries of lesbian history, from the unique lesbian cultures of Amsterdam, Paris, and Berlin to the more recent North American meccas of Montreal, Vancouver, New York, and San Francisco.
- Two-Spirited/First Stories—vol. III*, DVD, directed by Sharon A. Desjarlais (2007; Vancouver: National Film Board of Canada, 2007). Documentary of the empowering story of Rodney "Geeyo" Poucette's shattering encounter with prejudice and his journey to overcome it.
- Why Thee Wed?* DVD, directed by Cal Garingan (2005; Vancouver: National Film Board of Canada, 2005). In 2003, British Columbia became the second Canadian province to recognize same-sex marriage. This film introduces the eight couples who challenged the law in court and offers diverse perspectives on what it means for gay and lesbian couples to walk down the aisle.

CHILE

Jaime Galgani, Translated by Joseph M. Pierce

OVERVIEW

Officially named the Republic of Chile, this South American country is made up of a long, narrow stretch of land between the Pacific Ocean and the Andes Mountains, bordered on the north by Peru, on the east by Bolivia and Argentina, and on the south by the Drake Passage. In addition, it possesses insular territories in the Pacific Ocean, such as the Juan Fernández Archipelago, Sala y Gómez Island, Desventuradas Islands (“Unfortunate Islands”) and Easter Island (located in Polynesia), with a total surface area of 291,830.9 square miles.

Chile also claims sovereignty over 482,727.1 square miles of Antarctica, stretching from Chile’s southern tip to the South Pole. This claim was halted, but not renounced, with the country’s signing of the Antarctic Treaty. Due to its presence in South America, Oceania, and Antarctica, Chile defines itself as a tri-continental country.

Chile had an estimated population of 16,598,074 in 2007. According to the latest national census undertaken in 2002, the population was 15,116,435, of which 7,447,695 were male and 7,668,740 were female. Due to improved living conditions, the life expectancy of Chileans (which is the highest in Latin America) increased to 77.74 years for the period from 2000 to 2005. The ethnic composition is a relatively homogenous, mostly white mixture. Some 70 percent of Chileans practice Catholicism, with 15.14 percent identifying as Evangelicals, 1.06 percent as Jehovah’s Witnesses, 0.92 percent as Mormons, and 0.13 percent as Jewish; 8.3 percent of the country defines itself as atheist or agnostic, while 4.39 percent claims to follow some other religion.

Pre-Hispanic cultures constitute a clear minority in Chile, a fact that contrasts with the large presence of indigenous populations in the cultural centers of Peru and Mexico. During the Colonial Period and after the first century of independence, the indigenous population experienced slow population growth and did not develop a strong cultural or economic center. As a result, the indigenous population was not able to garner significant cultural weight. The great contribution of this small, narrow country to the rest of the continent is, without a doubt, the development of a historically strong democratic republic, which, from the first independence movements until the latter portion of the 20th century, has proved itself a nation anchored in democratic principles for more than 150 years. Recently, this progress was severely interrupted by the political-economic crisis that brought forth the dictatorship of Augusto Pinochet Ugarte (1973–1990). Because of this difficult experience, the country has endured a slow process of recovering its historic memory and reinstating and modernizing its republican traditions. Currently, Chile has solidified its position through political and institutional reconstruction.

In recent decades, Chile has exercised significant leadership in the economic course of Latin America, despite lacking a large economic or geographic footprint. With high growth levels, a progressive reduction of unemployment, high export levels, and improvement by all macroeconomic indexes, the country has been able to pay all of its external debt, optimally situating itself in the international market. These sound economic practices have been amply rewarded by international institutions. Nevertheless, Chile has not managed to overcome certain persistent hurdles, such as economic inequality and a constant preoccupation with ecological deterioration.

Chile was traditionally considered a frugal country. Its inhabitants liked to be called “the English of Latin America,” and such self-consciousness can be seen in their clothing, customs, diction, and sobriety when expressing emotion. However, this did not inhibit, especially in the 1950s and 1960s, the influence of modernizing currents from around the world. The country’s largest cities, especially Santiago de Chile (its capital), had a nightlife that emulated Paris and Europe in general; a discreet Bohemia was another part of the city culture, which permitted certain levels—while small—of alternative sexual expression. More promising were the changes associated with the sexual revolution that began to appear by the end of the 1960s. Nevertheless, the military coup (in 1973), of conservative cloth and strongly influenced by Spanish Francoism, ended all those movements. The noche santiaguina—Santiago’s nightlife—was put on hold for several years during the prolonged state of emergency that was imposed upon the Chilean population. This repression of alternative expression began to change little by little even before the fall of the military government.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

During the Pre-Columbian age, homoeroticism was considered in many different ways by the indigenous peoples that inhabited the territory that would later become the Republic of Chile. The Mapuche people (the original majority culture) considered sexuality to be equal between men and women; therefore an effeminate man would not lose any social privilege, power, or status, simply because being a man was regarded no differently than being a woman. The machis (Mapuche shamans) of ancient times were usually men adorned and dressed with characteristically feminine elements, given that spiritual power was associated with the female gender. According to some investigators, the machis were weye (a term for “homosexual” in Mapudungun, the language spoken by the Mapuche) and practiced passive pederasty, accompanied by youths who performed the active role; others consider that the idea of the machis as homosexuals or pederasts came forth when the Spanish conquistadors arrived in Chile and attempted to understand the attitudes of the machis from their own perspective (completely different from that of the Mapuche). In the Inca Empire, which dominated a large part of north and central-northern Chile, homosexuality was associated with concepts of a religious and sacred character and was common practice; even lesbian relationships were met with approval.

With the conquest of Chile by the Spanish Empire (starting in 1541) and the advent of the colonial regime, homosexuality was prohibited as it was in the Metropolis following the precepts of the Catholic Church. In Chile, however, the Inquisition was not the agency charged with punishing such crimes, but rather the royal tribunals and the bishopric did this. In 1612, after his expeditions during the War of Arauco, Governor Juan de la Jaraquemada felt compelled to return to Fort Angol in order to judge and sentence six soldiers accused of sodomy and treason to burning at the stake. The influence of Christian morality also affected the indigenous cultures: the majority of the machis were replaced by women, and even centuries later, Claudio Gay (a French naturalist who lived and worked for many years in Chile), would describe the “Indians of Chile” who, despite their belligerence, only imposed the death penalty on those guilty of “sodomy and witchcraft.”

Subsequently, by virtue of the cultural influence associated with the process of colonization, homosexuality is now widely considered a taboo subject within Chilean society, which is characterized as conservative even when compared to other Latin American countries. This attitude is reflected in Chilean private life, which became accustomed to covering dark aspects with silence and “a thick veil.”²¹ For example, the existence of homosexuals within Chilean families was justified with expressions that seemed to make clear that the uncle would never be married, since he was so shrewd, solitary, or difficult to please.

For a large portion of Chilean history, homosexuality was legally prohibited, yet specific methods of repression were not designated. The main exception was the persecution of homosexuals during the first government of Carlos Ibáñez del Campo and the passing of the “Law of Antisocial States” (Ley de Estados Antisociales)² of 1954 that specifically targeted the homeless, the mentally insane, and homosexuals.

After a slight opening to the subject during the years of the socialist government of Salvador Allende (1970–1973), the dictatorial repression that followed imposed a general and implicit crack-down on homosexual activities. Pinochet’s conservative Catholic government severely deterred any incipient gay or lesbian collective organizations. Nevertheless, the same liberal economic model that was implemented during those years began to receive a heavy dose of varied cultural influences from the United States. As a result of the weakening authoritarian structures of the 1980s, progressive cultural advances were made in searching for a transition to democracy. For example, the artistic duo formed by Francisco Casas and Pedro Lemebel (The Mares of the Apocalypse, or “Las yeguas del Apocalipsis”) carried out numerous artistic performances from 1987 to 1995 that helped generate a movement that was meant to politicize several points that had not yet been represented in the national agenda: principally homosexuality and HIV/AIDS. All of this began as common street performance and became more formal later on. The unrest was born of a perspective amply integrated into the fight for human rights that was already taking shape in the country on other fronts.

Little by little, organizations began to emerge. Toward the end of the 1980s, the Chilean Corporation for the Prevention of AIDS (Corporación Chilena de Prevención del SIDA) was born, providing a space for organizing and resisting the dangerous and still largely unknown disease. Several homosexuals came together through this organization and later went on to create the Workshop for Civil Rights (Taller de Derechos Civiles), which in turn became the Unified Movement of Sexual Minorities (Movimiento Unificado de Minorías Sexuales, abbreviated as MUMS). Their intention was to integrate gays, lesbians, transvestites, and transsexuals as they pushed for political consideration for Chile’s minority populations. In 1991, the Homosexual Liberation Movement (Movimiento de Liberación Homosexual, abbreviated as MOVILH) was born, which has led diverse fights against gender discrimination. One fundamental achievement of these groups was the passage of a legal motion to repeal antisodomy laws in 1998. Concretely, Article 365 of Law 11.625 (1954) of the Chilean Penal Code was altered, which had criminalized homosexual relations even between consenting adults.

The campaign directed by MUMS has a wide vector of projection, seeking to integrate the fight for equal rights for sexual minorities with other important processes in Chile’s cultural development in recent years: the feminist movement, the ecological movement, NGOs, and so on. On the one hand, these agencies are engaged in a continuous effort to help the citizenry develop a mature and respectful attitude toward sexual minorities, and on the other, to raise awareness within the LGBT community of its own rights.

The emergence of social movements, the aforementioned legal alteration, the progressive coming out of well-known actors in Chile’s cultural life, the acknowledgement by mainstream media of the rights of sexual minorities, and the representation of gay characters on some telenovelas (for example, Machos, in 2003) are all factors that have helped many men and women to overcome the fears they had previously suffered due to the stigma of their sexual orientations. Each day more people dare to make their sexuality visible; encounters between gays have progressively emerged from the underground to the socially secure spaces offered by discotheques, pubs, and other meeting places, which have also become less isolated or ghettoized and now facilitate meetings that take place among all different members of society. In addition, families have shown an increased tendency to accept family members with different sexual orientations. At the same time, cultural perception, especially in the major cities, seems to show a more permissive attitude toward the formation of new familial structures that allow same-sex couples to live comfortably with social stability. At times, Chilean public opinion has been surprised by the presence of sexual diversity in institutions where it previously would never have been imaginable, such as the case of two policemen who publicly denounced having been expelled from the force for their same-sex relationship in 2007.

With the emergence of active movements against the discrimination of sexual minorities, institutional violence has diminished; there is now less exclusion, less arbitrary detention of homosexuals, less destruction of public meeting places, and fewer tragic attempts on the lives of gays (like the arson of the nightclub Divine in Valparaiso in 2007, which cost the lives of 20 people). Nevertheless, new scenarios of resistance are being faced by sexual minorities, namely neo-fascist nationalist movements that, from time to time, attack individuals for their sexual orientation (especially targeted are the transgender and homosexual communities). This problem is complicated and has roots in movements principally derived from Europe, which are followed by some Chilean citizens (mainly young people) who want to cleanse society of what they consider “scum”: Peruvian immigrants, homosexuals, followers of certain trends or fashions, music, and the like.

The fight for sexual diversity has not been accompanied institutionally by the Catholic Church or by any other churches in Chile. Christian organizations, while in former days were clearly defenders of human rights in Chile, and had assumed a clearly recognized state of protagonism, have not known how to handle the issue of sexual diversity, perhaps because they feel trapped by certain doctrines. Even so, small groups of believers have been formed outside of those social groups previously mentioned. This is the case of one Christian group, known as the Gay and Lesbian Ecumenical Community (Comunidad Ecu mica Gay L sbica, abbreviated as CEGAL). A group of Mormon homosexuals also exists.

EDUCATION

Dating back to the 19th century, Chile has relied on an education system that has grown gradually more extensive and has lowered the rates of illiteracy to a minimum. Currently, every Chilean citizen must complete at least 12 years of formal education, a requirement that makes access to education thoroughly inclusive. The levels of education that are administered in the country include the following: kindergarten, primary school, middle school, and high school. Primary school spans eight years and middle school spans four. Once registered in middle school, the majority of students opt to continue their studies in technical schools or at universities. The access to secondary education has been generalized such that society is no longer able to offer sufficient employment to its well-educated majority. This forces many people, especially youth, to spend a large portion of their professional careers performing jobs for which they were not trained.

During the last few decades, and as a result of the phenomena associated with globalization, the nature of Chilean education has undergone notable transformations, passing from a traditional formal education (influenced by the European Enlightenment) to the incorporation of a new concept of education. Currently, rather than developing knowledge, Chile has seen a generalized tendency to establish competencies or skills; specific abilities rather than generalized knowledge are now considered the best preparation for life in society. These tendencies have been promoted by the educational reform movement that has materialized in Chile in recent years. This movement has had its share of detractors and is a constant source of public debate.

In 2006, the penguin revolution³ (revoluci n ping ina), a prolonged and widely supported protest movement, began from within Chilean classrooms. Students from ages 14 to 18 occupied secondary schools, carried out prolonged strikes, and demanded the renovation of the Constitutional Organic Law of Education (Ley Org nica Constitucional de Educaci n). The result of this movement was the formation of a wide-ranging government commission to study the case. People from across the social spectrum were invited to participate. In addition, the general population became aware of the youth movement that had seemed lethargic in the postdictatorial era.

The history of sex education in Chile can be divided into a few distinct periods. Until 1960, it was governed by university professionals and especially focused on areas such as biology and natural sciences. Between 1960 and 1970, the Ministry of Education created the Committee for Family Life and Sexual Education (Comité de Vida Familiar y Educación Sexual), which proposed and operated the Program for Family Life and Sexual Education (Programa de Vida Familiar y Educación Sexual); this functioned until 1972. From that time until 1990, NGOs developed a sustained but mostly isolated presence in education. The state followed a few proposals made by the Catholic Church, which incorporated a type of sex-education heavily influenced by their specific value-system by way of religious education. Beginning in 1990, increased levels of teen pregnancy and AIDS begin to be taken into consideration. Programs were then organized in order to respond to these problems. One important milestone was the First National Meeting for Sexual Education (Primer Encuentro Nacional de Educación Sexual). From this meeting emerged the “Declaration of Lo Bernechea” (Declaración de Lo Bernechea), which emphasizes the urgent need to implement a policy of sexual education at the national level. Urged by this declaration, in 1993 the “Policy of Sexual Education for the Betterment of the Quality of Education” (Política de Educación en Sexualidad para el Mejoramiento de la Calidad de Educación) was enacted. After this, the Conversations about Emotion and Sexuality (Jornadas de Conversación sobre Afectividad y Sexualidad, abbreviated as JOCAS), become a point of contention in 1995.

The government’s concern for sexual education seeks to integrate dialogue, support the overcoming of sexual issues, and to avoid irresponsible sexuality that could result in the contraction of diseases or undesired pregnancies. Still, it is clear that the government could improve by incorporating emerging issues such as adolescent parenting, gender identity, sexual orientations, and other topics that are still not included in the content or methodologies of sexual education in Chile.

Without a doubt, the current scholastic environment and the vicissitudes of daily life provide an occasion for public and scholarly debate, in the form of school children who publicly declare their lesbian or homosexual orientation, or teachers who are exonerated for openly recognizing their sexuality. In such debates, official positions (more prone to accept sexual diversity) are confronted by more conservative sectors, particularly the Catholic Church, which insists that the state impose a revision of progressive ideologies on sexual education.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Chile has experienced many economic changes in recent decades. After the implementation of a mixed-Keynesian economic model at the beginning of the 1930s, the first three years of the 1970s—under the government of Salvador Allende—attempted to implement a markedly statist and socialist economic model. During these three years, and following a general improvement in the economic conditions of the working class, a crisis came about that brought the most difficult moments of its economic history: shortages and inflation of up to 1,000 percent, which, among other factors, set off a chain reaction that provoked strong social discontent encouraged by certain politicians and right-leaning economists. Many attributed this crisis to the ineptitude and utopianism of the leftist government; others believed that it was due to the scarce support and open economic boycott of wealthy citizens, especially those who had begun to withdraw their wealth from the country before the socialist president could effectively install his government. Nevertheless, Allende's government did manage to nationalize Chilean copper, the principal source of wealth for the country, which had been—until that moment—mostly in hands of international businesses. The nationalization of copper is of similar political and economic importance to Chile as the 1938 Law of Nationalization of Petroleum (Ley de Nacionalización del Petróleo) was to Mexico during the Cárdenas administration. After the economic-institutional crisis, a coup d'état imposed market stability by implementing the neo-liberal economic model of Milton Friedman. Numerous Chilean economists who had been educated in Chicago brought back to the country a model that, supported by the sternly authoritarian military government, was basically applied without restriction. The costs were high in the initial period: the dismantling of national industries (as a result of strong external competition), high indices of unemployment, and periods of internal crisis resulting from the country's vulnerability to international avatars (e.g., when faced with the oil crisis of the second half of the 1970s). During the mid-1980s, the country began to reap the benefits of the free market: sustained growth, low inflation rates, overcoming unemployment levels, raising the quality of life, accelerating growth in the real estate market, etc. From the 1990s on, democratic governments have followed with the same economic system while adopting some social policies meant to address levels of inequality, diminish levels of extreme poverty, reinforce social security systems, implement public health programs, and so on.

The free market economy has, without a doubt, benefited the Chilean population and even immigrant populations (Argentines, Peruvians, Bolivians, and even some Europeans) that have seen in Chile a place of opportunity. Immigration has also brought new social problems that require more dynamic social and educative policies for the sake of nondiscrimination. Chile, a country of immigrants, was accustomed to the influx of Europeans (Basques, Spaniards, Italians, Croatians, and Germans mostly), yet as early as the 19th century immigration resulted in conflict. These conflicts have recently become more acute with the arrival of men and women from neighboring countries. A reality has begun to emerge that had not previously been recognized in a country of supposed "hospitable traditions" (as described by writer Gabriel García Márquez when he received the Nobel Prize), that of the existence of a certain latent xenophobia in a large portion of society and virulent in some extreme sectors. The same people who act out against transgendered and homosexual individuals are those who sometimes attack men and women of foreign nationalities.

Another difficulty brought by the free market economy is related to the exploitation of natural resources, especially in the forests of southern Chile; water contamination by the salmon industry; and increasing erosion in previously fertile areas. Energy needs have resulted in a substantial development of hydroelectric energy and, as a consequence, a need to create new power centers in territories previously occupied by indigenous communities. Political problems have come as a result of conflicts with the indigenous peoples, and became more evident in the 1990s during and after the celebration of the "Fifth Centenary Celebration of the Discovery of America.” This event sparked a growing political and sometimes violent demand for reparation of violated civil rights, a problem that is probably only just emerging and may present many problems for Chilean society in the future.

In regard to labor, Chile is a country that, driven by principally nonreligious governments, has progressed in the field of nondiscrimination. Every day more progress is made toward the incorporation of the handicapped, women, and other minorities into the workplace. Nevertheless, due to Chile’s neo-liberal economic model, companies are ultimately responsible for deciding whom to contract. This has meant a highly mobile labor market with subcontractors, continual firings, and a lack of job security in many ways. While the Chilean worker had traditionally taken pride in working at the same company for his or her entire career, now changes of profession are frequent; there is less loyalty to a specific company or even a specific career, since necessity forces many people to change jobs in order to make ends meet.

In 2007, a widespread debate was waged within the Catholic Church when some of its bishops proclaimed that it was no longer sufficient to think of a minimum wage, but rather an ethical wage. This brought many to think that the market itself should not coldly define what a man or woman should earn in order to live. Instead, a moral, social, and labor awareness should assign to each man and woman the economic retribution that corresponds to his or her efforts. In addition, social security, social wellbeing, retribution, and recognition for good performance should also be taken into account.

In terms of sexual discrimination, a politically correct discourse does exist that emphasizes that no one should suffer employment discrimination for his or her sexual orientation. It is evident that many institutions apply these criteria to their daily operations, yet there are exceptions, apparently for other motives. There are men and women who lose their jobs for being gay or lesbian. Sometimes the notion that “each individual can have his or her sexuality, as long as it is lived out in private” is brought up, which implies a double standard for social behavior; everyone should be able to live their life in private, but gays cannot invite their partners to a company dinner party, comment on who went with them on vacation, place a picture of the person they love on their desk, or let their supervisor know that they are depressed or downhearted because of the death or illness of their partner. This means that discrimination acts socially through more subtle instruments that are by no means less cruel. Faced with this situation, the homosexual community, accustomed to publicly denying its sexuality, oftentimes accepts to live a progressive process of coming out of the closet: first to friends, then to family, and later to other trustworthy individuals. Better times still await those men and women who want to live their lives without hiding their sexuality at work, at home, or in public.

When cases of workplace discrimination based on sexual orientation come to the public’s attention they are always a cause for debate. Examples of policemen, secondary school teachers, judges, or members of social institutions are, generally, those that draw public scrutiny through the mass media. The discussion is normally carried out in terms of the probable incompatibility between the public role fulfilled by some professionals and the sexual orientation that they espouse. In all of these public discussions, remarkably, it is the younger generations that most strongly critique discrimination, which shows a significant turn in Chilean culture, one that has seen notable changes even regarding the existence of different sexualities within family life. In fact, a gay person might often feel more comfortable discussing his or her sexuality with nieces, nephews, or younger siblings than with his or her own parents.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

In general, government policies meant to systematically promote nondiscrimination of the LGBT community have been related to the diverse departments of Chile's government even when there is no specifically designed internal program. In this way, the problems associated with the rights to sexual diversity have crossed over to different areas: justice, education, and health, to name a few. The most prominent area has been health care, which has decided to include HIV/AIDS treatment in the program known as Universal Access with Explicit Guarantees (Acceso Universal con Garantías Explícitas, abbreviated as AUGE). This consists of an integral health system that would benefit all Chileans and take into account all types of diseases, including the most dire and most expensive, in their different stages without discriminating by age, sex, economic disposition, place of residence, or health coverage. In addition, the government has supported different HIV/AIDS prevention campaigns, developed help centers and education programs for the general public, and is associated with agencies interested in protecting the LGBT community from labor and health care discrimination.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Nontraditional sexual practices have always been predominantly invisible in Chilean culture. Until relatively recently, admitting to nonheterosexual desires or being accused of such by one's peers meant banishment and abjection. It relegated gays and lesbians to a shameful condition where public disdain could affect social interactions and job possibilities. Those who were assumed to perform the passive role in a homosexual relationship, exhibited a feminine appearance, liked to cross-dress, or desired to change their gender received special reprobation. In this sense, social ostracism was fundamentally destined for homosexual males, transsexuals, or transvestites, while female homosexuality tended to hide itself beneath other typically macho concerns.

Nevertheless, as is common in other Western cultures, many (apparently) heterosexual men show a fascination for sexual experiences among people of the same sex. In the countryside, it is common to see farmers (the prototypical macho Chilean) occasionally having sexual experiences with effeminate men, without assuming that these experiences represent a change in their heterosexuality. Sometimes while maintaining a successful marriage and family life, they seek out different means of pleasure through sex with other men. The farmer's active role tends to be significant, since the most distinguished sign of ignominy is not so much "penetrating another man" (which, if considered carefully, could be interpreted as a gesture of superiority and domination), but rather "being penetrated," an idea that totally inverts the significance of these practices. A penetrated man thus feels his masculinity subjugated and his self-esteem completely ruined.

In rural areas, that is, in those less globalized and closer to the values associated with the prevailing culture of preceding centuries, to be a "faggot" (maricón) is one's worst destiny. Marica, mariquita, mariposón, colipato, colita, fleto, hucco, maraco, loca, and loquita are some of the epithets that designate scorn or shame and that always refer to the “lower-class homosexual” (homosexual de barrio) who suffers the stigma of being condemned at the same time for this abject sexuality and poverty.

This popular slander differs from the denomination “gay,” which accrues a totally different value. The gay is the upper-class homosexual, distinguished, refined, well-traveled, accepted in social circles, respected for his sexual diversity, admired by many, and even inspirational and a point of cultural reference or value, at least on the level of the mass media, where many gays have found social acceptance, especially those who are related to the worlds of literature, film, and the arts.

In the urban landscape, sexual practices between same-sex couples tend to be more readily accepted, as is the case in the majority of Latin America’s capital cities. There are even certain sectors where the concentration of members of the LGBT community is a majority.

Lately, especially with the advent of new customs and the “urban tribes” (called pokemones, emos, pelolais), there can be seen among young people a more public and uninhibited exhibition of sexual preferences that has also stirred public debate about what this new culture means for Chilean society. It seems that the expression of diversity in this and other aspects has come to stay for a very long time.

FAMILY

The history of the Chilean family has for a long time been marked by the existence of large family groups in the same household that included grandparents, aunts and uncles, children, nieces and nephews, and grandchildren. They contributed to the formation of current cultural patterns thanks to their participation in multiple traditions incorporated by the groups that colonized the country. Beginning in the 1970s, this structure began to experience serious modifications caused in part by growing internal migration from the countryside to the city by those in search of better economic standing. In addition, the sexual revolution, the development of feminist movements, processes of individualization, and the inauguration of the modern family brought other transformations.

After the 1960s, Chilean society began to observe how the family institution was disintegrating as an increasing number of marriages ended in separation. People became less interested in displaying family stability, oftentimes a sham based on appearances or even a double life. In a male-dominated (machista) culture, women were generally the most condemned by norms that demanded the keeping up of appearances and the constant fear of public scandal.

For many years, no laws existed to regulate divorce in Chile. An annulment was required that would serve to eliminate the legal basis for marriage, which would thus be declared inexistent. Toward the latter part of 2004, after extensive legal and social discussion, the “New Law of Civil Matrimony” came into effect, which regulates, among other aspects, those mechanisms associated with divorce.

The reality of sexual diversity within families has had several characteristics: previously, in many families the gay uncle whose sexual orientation was veiled under the guise of a prolonged bachelorhood might have existed; children normally hid their desires and tried to only live them occasionally, or suppressed them in search of heterosexuality that, in many cases, resulted in matrimony; homosexual (or bisexual) parents tended to seek sexual satisfaction with someone other than their spouse. Many, though not all, of these aspects have changed over time. Now many families have dared to accept sexual differences. Female family members, especially mothers, are more prone to accept that their children are homosexual, while fathers tend to be more reticent. Little by little, homosexual children have begun to incorporate their partners into the nuclear family, which accepts them, at least on general terms, with some difficulties and with some negotiating. Evidently, the incorporation of a homosexual partner into the original family nucleus continues to be more problematic than that of the heterosexual partner. This is sometimes attributed not to discrimination within the family, but rather the fear of external reprimand, “of what the children might suffer.” This is related to the idea associated with the feeling that something is still not right, that the homosexual couple does not fit ideal moral values. These prejudices are the result of traditional moral education, masculine ideas that want the son to “continue the lineage,” fears about sexual contamination, promiscuity, and so on.

After the legal steps taken at the end of the 20th century towards decriminalizing sodomy, the discussion has centered on the possibility of offering homosexual couples a legal apparatus that favors their social constitution. The idea is currently under discussion and has been formalized through legal projects. Little by little, the possibility of adopting children or even retaining legal custody of one or more of a couple’s children (from previous relationships) is beginning to form part of the agenda. The legal tendency, up to this point, has been to assign custody of children to the heterosexual parent (father or mother). It seems that the homosexuality of one progenitor closes many more doors to legal access to children than any defects a typical heterosexual person might have.

COMMUNITY

Currently, the two principal advocacy organizations in Chile are the Integral Movement of Homosexual Liberation (Movimiento Integral de Liberación Homosexual, MOVILH) and the Unified Movement of Sexual Minorities (Movimiento Unificado de Minorías Sexuales, MUMS). With a common origin and few historical discrepancies between them, it is certain that both have worked to increase the visibility of gays, lesbians, bisexuals, transvestites, and transsexuals in both public and private spaces. They have also contributed to legal initiatives, contact with social leaders, the organization and dissemination of cultural activities, and to the raised awareness of the minority agenda.

HEALTH

In recent years, Chile has seen an extensive improvement in the quality of its health care services. Nevertheless, limited access to services is one of the weak points of the system. There is an immense difference between the care offered by public health services (often insufficient and of poor quality) and the care offered by the private health system that, being of higher quality, is only accessible for those with greater economic stability.

The state has initiated the previously mentioned AUGE program that guarantees health care for all Chile’s citizens, without distinction. The program is fairly progressive in that it incorporates more and more diseases, and it is not discriminatory since it offers full treatment and care for those people affected by HIV.

With respect to the HIV/AIDS virus, the official statement of the Ministry of Health of the Government of Chile formulates the following policies: The only way to detect HIV is through a specific blood test known as the “ELISA Test for HIV.” This exam can be carried out at the nearest hospital or doctor’s office, in the home, or in private laboratories.

According to Law 19.779, this exam should be voluntary, confidential, and accompanied by a consultation. The result of the test is confidential and every individual has the right to be adequately informed as to the meaning of its results.

Additionally, Law 19.779 protects the rights of citizens, by producing legislation based on prevention, diagnosis, and control of HIV/AIDS, as it also cares for the free and equal exercise of the rights of those citizens that live with HIV, impeding discrimination of any type.

Antiretroviral Treatments for HIV in Chile are guaranteed by the government, which ensures 100 percent access to these treatments for adults and children who need it, in accordance with national protocol. It also guarantees 100 percent access to the Prevention of Vertical Transmission protocol for pregnant women and their children who are living with HIV.

In Chile, the administration of Public Policy in conjunction with the Prevention and Attention of Persons Living with HIV/AIDS, is the responsibility of the National AIDS Commission. The National AIDS Commission is a department that pertains to the Division of the Prevention and Control of Illness, which is dependent on the Undersecretary of Public Health of the Ministry of Health of Chile.

POLITICS AND LAW

For many decades, the principal concern over the application of justice in Chile was linked to the reestablishment of human rights, the prosecution of state-sponsored crimes during the military dictatorship, the reparation of damages to the victims of those abuses, the identification of thousands of disappeared detainees, and the strengthening of legislation meant to avoid the repetition of the atrocious events of that period.

The interest in rights for sexual minorities began to emerge years after the return to democracy in Chile. In fact, it was President Eduardo Frei Ruiz-Tagle who saw demands for civil rights that had not previously been discussed in Chilean history at the beginning of his office (1994–2000). The fight for the creation of legal norms and for protection against discrimination of the LGBT community actually began during this period.

In addition to the decriminalization of sodomy in 1998, other important legal projects include the following:

1. Proposition against Homophobia and Transphobia: The Proposition against Crimes of Homophobia and Transphobia was designed by the Homosexual Liberation Movement (MOVILH) and approved by the Chilean House of Representatives in 2005. The text represents the first proclamation of judicial power that recognizes the discrimination of sexual minorities and sets measures to prevent it and confront it. More background about the history of the project can be found in the 2005 Report on Human Rights of Sexual Minorities (Informe 2005 de los Derechos Humanos de las Minorías Sexuales).
2. Nondiscrimination and Civil Union Contracts: The Proposition to Foment Nondiscrimination and Civil Union Contracts between Persons of the Same Sex was drafted by the MOVILH and entered the National Congress in 2003 with high parliamentary support. This proposition opened public debate in Chile about same-sex parenting, sexual rights, adoption rights, and the need to advance a norm that would regulate relationships between couples of the same sex. Currently, the MOVILH is no longer working toward the passage of the proposition; instead it is focusing its energy on the PUC.

3. The Civil Union Pact (PUC): This project was devised by the MOVILH, with the help of lawyers from the Universidad de Chile and the Universidad Diego Portales, with the goal of offering Chile a law that would regulate the relationships of cohabitating heterosexual and homosexual couples. Supported by 150 social organizations, gays, lesbians, transsexuals, and heterosexuals, the PUC enjoys widespread political backing and only lacks the approval of the Executive Branch to begin its process through the National Congress.
4. Antidiscrimination Proposition: The “Proposition to Establish Anti-Discrimination Measures” (Proyecto de Ley que Establece Medidas contra la Discriminación) was elaborated by the government in conjunction with diverse organizations from civil society. The initiative, which began to progress through Congress in 2005, includes the terms “sexual orientation” and “gender” as protected categories, thanks to work by the MOVILH. It is notable that the original proposition has undergone dozens of modifications and its final version will only be known after the final Senate vote.

Recently, another proposition has been presented that permits name and sex changes without sexual reassignment surgery, in addition to taking this power away from judges.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Chile has a strong Christian tradition. Since 1925, separation between Church and State has existed formally, but the social influence of the Catholic Church and the evangelical churches continues.

The institutional religious presence is highly conservative. Religious groups like Opus Dei and Los Legionarios de Cristo have assumed an important leadership role.

In the last couple of decades, many sexual minorities have not identified with their churches and have moved away from organized religion and do not take part in explicitly religious activities. Some minor groups in the church hierarchy have discussed the issues of sexual minorities.

VIOLENCE

In the 1950s, pursuit of homosexuals became an institutionalized system of violence. Since then there have been isolated incidents that attack the physical or moral integrity, or job security of some LGBT people. In recent years, violence against the LGBT population has been linked to neo-Nazi doctrines.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Since the 1990s there have been great advances in the discourse about the rights of sexual minorities in Chile. Numerous factors have contributed to this: the opening of the country to outside influences, the existence of widespread and persistent political demonstrations, the development of civil organizations, the modernization of legislation, and the collaboration of the four governments lead by the Accord of Parties for Democracy (Concertación de Partidos por la Democracia).

Nevertheless, there is much more work to be done. Conservative political positions of opposition parties weigh heavily, as do the posture of the Catholic Church, conservative traditions, and the existence of reactionary groups that, through violence, attempt to paralyze any progress.

The increased visibility of the reality and lives of sexual minorities is contributing to a healthier social climate in Chile. To be homosexual, gay, lesbian, transsexual, or transvestite in Chile is, over time, becoming less of a problem. Many members of the LGBT community begin to feel pride rather than fear for their condition and continue to see with more hope that there is a space for their vital projects in a country that has traditionally infringed on their rights and silenced their voices.

NOTES

1. The expression “thick veil” (to thickly veil) was used by the Chilean writer Jose Donoso in his novel Country House (1978) to refer to covering the shameful historical events of the past although the expression is used for anything that is kept under wraps.

2. Law 11.625 on Antisocial States, imposed in 1954 by president Carlos Ibáñez del Campo. Homosexuals were treated as if they were hardened criminals, but with one difference: they were considered to be sick and it was possible to rehabilitate them with hospitalization. According to an article in the magazine The Times, published in 1993, del Campo was sweeping homosexuals off the map, like on a ship where a rope was placed around the neck with an enormous stone and then they were thrown out to sea. (Seminar “University, Law and Diversity” organized by the Division of Social Organizations of the Department General Secretariat of Government and the Faculty of Law of the University Diego Portales, Santiago on October 18, 1999.)

3. School children are referred to as “penguins” due to the similarity their uniforms bear to the animals of the same name.

COLOMBIA

Fernando Serrano

OVERVIEW

Colombia is the fourth-largest country in South America and the only one with coastlines in the Caribbean and in the Pacific Ocean. Its surface area (439,73 square miles) covers a wide variety of landscapes and climates that make it a country of diverse regions with specific social, cultural, and political characteristics.

Colombia is a republic with a democratic and decentralized political system. The Colombian Constitution of 1991 defines three branches of public power, each one autonomous and independent. The executive branch is led by the President, who is elected by popular vote every four years and who then designates the Bureau of Ministries. The legislative branch is in charge of creating laws and oversees political control of the government and administration. Its unique body is the Congress, which includes the Senate and the Representatives' Chamber. The judicial branch administers justice and comprises three courts: the Justice Supreme Court (highest tribunal for ordinary justice), the Constitutional Court (in charge of the enforcement of the Constitution), and the State Council (highest administrative tribunal). The sentences provided by the Constitutional Court apply as law, as do the ones enacted by the Senate. The Constitutional Court has played the most significant role of any political body in the development of LGBT rights in Colombia.

According to the 2005 census, there were around 44.9 million Colombians, most of them living in the cities (74%). Of the total population, 4.3 million were Afro-Colombians and

1.4 million were considered Native American, comprising around 80 different ethnic groups. Around 5,000 persons were identified as Roma. With 3.3 million Colombians living abroad, Colombia is one of the Latin American countries with the biggest flow of emigrants.¹ The United States is the main country of destination, receiving 35.4 percent of all Colombian immigrants.² Between 1995 and 2005 around 3.7 million people were internally displaced because of the sociopolitical conflict and the humanitarian crisis the country is currently suffering.³

When Spanish arrived in the 16th century in what is today known as Colombia, they found several indigenous groups with different levels of social and political organization, ranging from small nomadic groups to structured agrarian societies. The impact of the conquest and the establishment of the Colonial Empire reduced the original indigenous population to fewer than 10 percent of the population in the first century of Spanish occupation.⁴ Diseases imported by Spanish and the violence associated with the colonization process were among the main causes of these deaths. From the beginning of the conquest and colonization period, the Spanish brought with them African slaves to serve as a workforce to exploit mines. Indoctrination into Catholicism was part of the colonization process. Groups of Native Americans and Africans have resisted and escaped the colonial system since its inception. In order to maintain and develop their own cultures, they used both group and individual rebellions and other strategies, such as religious practices. The hierarchical interaction between the Spanish colonizers, Native American groups, and African people formed the roots of Colombian society. Small groups of other Europeans, Middle Eastern people, and Asians began arriving in the early 18th and throughout the 19th and 20th centuries, contributing to the development of regional and national cultures.

The colonial ethnic and racial order was not abolished by the independence movements of the early 19th century. The idea of a nation united by Catholicism and Spanish heritage and emerging from the mestizaje of cultures and ethnicities permeated Colombian culture and society during 19th and 20th centuries. This notion left Afro-Colombians and native communities marginalized in the national imaginary, but integrated in the political economy as cheap sources of labor. In 1991, a constitutional reform movement changed the definition of the nation under an ethnically diverse multicultural model and rights perspective.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

The human rights situation of LGBT people has been of particular concern to national and international human rights organizations, LGBT activists, and research centers.⁵ LGBT people have been victims of homicides and extrajudicial killings that have not been properly investigated.⁶ Arbitrary detentions, cruel degradations, and inhuman treatments committed by police members against LGBT persons have been denounced.⁷ LGBT people in the areas affected by conflict and humanitarian crisis have been threatened, displaced, and killed.⁸ There are also cases of LGBT persons who have had to look for political asylum in foreign countries.⁹ The lack of proper public policies to intervene in these situations, the absence of mention of LGBT people in institutional attention systems, and the prejudicial practices of public institutions (such as arbitrary detentions, excessive use of force by the police, or discrimination in the delivery of health services) reflect the existence of institutionalized homophobia and heterosexism.

LGBT people have poor information about their rights and how to demand them. Discrimination legitimized and reproduced in cultural practices and institutions still affects the perception LGBT people have regarding their rights, and they often fear to denounce situations of abuse because of the risk of a double victimization¹⁰ not only because the abuse itself, but also because of the discriminatory treatment and the pointing at their gender identity or their sexual orientation by authorities. In particular, the open expression of gender identity by transgendered and transsexual persons exposes them to systematic patterns of discrimination and exclusion.

Despite this situation, there are vibrant communities of LGBT activists and organizations all around the country and significant progress has been made in terms of LGBT rights legislation. These legal advances have occurred at the level of the highest courts, and particularly the Constitutional Court, but while the law demands immediate application, public and private institutions are reluctant to apply them. Constitutional Court sentences require the development of social policies, administrative measures, communicative and educational strategies, and other actions in order to affect the causes and consequences of discrimination against LGBT people. The distance between constitutional advances and everyday life is even wider if one considers the interaction of LGBT issues within class and race divisions, urban/rural differences, gender hierarchies, educational levels, and other factors that affect the realization of people's rights.

EDUCATION

In 2005, the literacy rate in Colombia was 92.8 percent among people aged 15 and above.¹¹ At that time, while almost all of the population had access to primary education, the school enrollment at the secondary level was 78.1 percent and 29.3 percent at the tertiary level.¹² The ratio of girls to boys in primary and secondary education was 14 to 10.¹³ According to the 1991 Colombian Constitution, education is a right everyone has and a public service with a social function.

Sex education has been mandatory in all primary and secondary schools since 1993. Each school must design a pedagogical project that implements sex education into the different subjects of the curricula; the Minister of Education imparts the main guidelines for this public policy. Between 1993 and 2004, the sex education policy was called "Proyecto Nacional de Educación Sexual" (Sexual Education National Project). The focus of these first guidelines were heterosexual couples and heterosexual sexuality as the space for the realization of sexuality; its approach to youth sexualities offered a perspective focusing only on risk and the prevention of sexually transmitted diseases. After 2004, a new focus, "Educación para la Sexualidad" "Education for Sexuality," began to be developed, using a citizenship, gender, human rights and sexual and reproductive rights approach in which gender identity and sexual orientation were mainstreamed.¹⁴

The Constitutional Court has promoted legal changes and protective measures in cases of discrimination in schools based on gender identity or sexual orientation. In 1998, the Constitutional Court declared unconstitutional an article created in 1949 in the teachers' regulation code that deemed homosexual behavior a cause for disciplinary sanctions.¹⁵ In the case of two students who were expelled of school because of their homosexual identities, the Constitutional Court stated that homosexuality cannot be sanctioned or prohibited by itself in schools.¹⁶ According to the Constitutional Court, the right to education cannot be denied because of gender identity or sexual orientation. However, in other rulings by the Court, a certain idea of the protection of order inside schools is privileged over gender expressions, as in the case of transgendered students wearing clothing considered inappropriate to their physiological gender.¹⁷

Despite the aforementioned progressive legal measures, emergent qualitative and quantitative research reveals that schools are still spaces for the reproduction of gender inequalities and discrimination based on gender identity and sexual orientation.¹⁸ Bullying because of gender expression is part of gender socialization in schools. There are no specific policies that target homophobia or transphobia in schools. Transgendered people leave schools earlier than non-transgendered students because of a lack of support by the educational institutions and the inability of schools to establish gender sensitive approaches. It has been also found that, in some urban settings, tolerant or inclusive attitudes regarding gay and lesbian adolescents have started to be developed among students and teachers, mainly because of media influences and rights discourses.¹⁹ However, transgendered youth (and transgender expression more broadly) are still frequent victims of discrimination.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Colombia has the fourth-largest economy in Latin America, after Brazil, México, and Argentina. Services, industry, and agriculture are, in this order, its main economic activities. In 2006, the GDP was US$135.8 billion, an increase of US$50 billion since the year 2000.²⁰ In terms of annual growth, GDP was 2.9 percent in 2000 and 6.8 percent in 2006. Inflation was 25.13 percent in 1992 and 5.17 percent in 2007.²¹ The growth of the Colombian economy in recent years contrast with the high levels of inequality in the distribution of wealth by region and by social groups. According to official data, in 2007 49.2 percent of the total population lived below the poverty line, on less than US$94 per month; meanwhile, the income of the top 20 percent of the population accounted for 62 percent of all income earned that year in the country; 50 percent of the population earned just 14 percent of the nation's total income.²²

Under the provisions of the 1991 Colombian Constitution, work is defined as a duty and a right for everyone and is specially protected by the state. Labor laws protect workers from discrimination in general, without naming specific situations of protection. There are particular rulings for the protection of women's right to work, such as equity in payment, protection of women's jobs during pregnancy, and guarantees for the participation of women in popular election positions.²³ However, no laws mention the need for the protection of workers from discrimination based on gender identity or sexual orientation.²⁴ Heterosexual couples and families receive certain social security benefits related to the establishment of a labor contract such as life insurance, pensions, licenses, and permits; these same benefits have not yet been extended to same-sex couples and their families.²⁵

LGBT people are afraid of declaring their sexual orientation or gender identity in the workplace because of fear of exclusion or discrimination. For similar reasons and the lack of institutional attention to the topic, they do not claim their rights in cases of abuse. This is particularly problematic for transgendered persons because their gender identity is more visible²⁶ and, in the case of lesbians who are more exposed to employment inequalities than gay men because of their position as women, in the social structure.²⁷

The Constitutional Court has ruled that homosexuality is not contrary to military discipline; because of this ruling, homosexuality cannot be considered a reason to deny someone's right to be part of any military or police institution.²⁸ According to the Constitutional Court, what military codes can sanction is public sex in the military, so long as no distinction is made between heterosexual and homosexual activity.²⁹

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

In the last five years, LGBT rights, sexual diversity, and gender identities have gained recognition in public policies and development plans in the three largest Colombian cities (Bogotá, Medellín, and Cali) and in intermediate cities such as Pasto. This recognition is the result of the mobilization of LGBT organizations and the articulation of local authorities concerned with the protection of rights of populations in particular situations of exclusion, discrimination, or vulnerability. There are no national social programs concerned with LGBT rights.

Between 2004 and 2007, around two million dollars was invested by the Mayor's Office of Bogotá in order to support activities related to LGBT rights, such as the organization of the Marcha por la Ciudadanía LGBT (LGBT Citizenship Parade), cultural activities, LGBT organizational strengthening, and the opening of an LGBT Community Center. At the end of 2007, the mayor of Bogotá signed a decree ordering the permanent implementation of social, educational, health, and participatory programs in order to protect and promote LGBT rights.³⁰ It is expected that, because of this decree, funding for these programs will be increased several times over and that LGBT rights will be made part of the city's development plan. There is a Sexual Diversity Office in the Secretaría Distrital de Planeación (Planning Department of Bogotá), in charge of coordinating public efforts to protect and promote LGBT rights.

In Medellín, the development plan for the years 2004 through 2007 included the recognition of sexual diversity in several of its goals. Because of that, public campaigns were implemented in the city to promote LGBT rights, including training seminars for police officers and public employees intended to increase awareness about hate crimes against LGBT people and to develop institutional attention strategies for meeting LGBT people's needs.³¹ Both Bogotá and Medellín have a police officer in charge of LGBT issues. In Cali, in 2006, an agreement between the Governor of the Department of Valle and several LGBT organizations was signed in order to develop programs to overcome the discrimination, exclusion, and marginalization that LGBT people experience. Funding, public support of LGBT initiatives, and the participation of LGBT organizations in related public decisions were included in that agreement. In Pasto, research studies to recognize LGBT people's needs and potentials were realized in 2006 as part of the gender equity policy. In the mentioned cities, there are also efforts to include women with sexual diversity in women and gender equity governmental programs. The specific needs and demands of transgendered persons are still underrepresented in these programs.

At the national level, LGBT issues are starting to be recognized in social policies. In 2007, LGBT organizations were invited to participate in the planning of the National Human Rights Program coordinated by a national state agency associated with the Office of the President. During early 2008, the Minister of Culture also expressed interest in the inclusion of LGBT topics.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

In Colombian law, the decision whether to have sex, how frequently, and with whom, and the decision whether or not to establish oneself as part of a couple and to procreate are considered free, personal, and private decisions, so long as the other person consents without violence or coercion.³² The age of consent is 14 years old, both for heterosexual or homosexual relations.

Same-sex sexualities in Colombia constitute a complex landscape resulting from the interaction of practices, identities, and politics in a context of rapid and contradictory cultural changes. In Colombia, as in other Latin American countries, sexual behavior is linked to gender hierarchies. While masculinity is associated with activity and superiority, femininity is associated with passivity and subordination. These patterns influence the representations of same-sex sexualities. Same-sex sexualities can be defined by focusing on sexual practices, for example in the case of men, using the activo/pasivo model that associates the penetrative role with masculinity and the receptive role with femininity. This pattern of gender hierarchies is challenged in sexual practices between transgendered women working in the sex industry and their heterosexual-identified male clients who look for their services, in particular, to be penetrated.³³ Same-sex sexualities can also be represented using gender hierarchies, considering lesbianism and sex between women as deviant, filthy, or incomplete, or classifying men who have sex with men as locas (a word used for both effeminate men and insane women) or as non-men.³⁴ Bisexuality is widespread throughout the country, particularly in areas such as the Caribbean lowlands.³⁵ However, bisexuality as an identity term is mainly used in urban settings and in LGBT rights activism.

From another perspective, same-sex sexualities in Colombia are increasingly represented by identity politics and the development of local expressions of global gay, lesbian, transgender, and bisexual cultures. In the Colombian context, this use of identity politics to define same-sex sexualities is associated with differences between urban and rural settings, and references to modernization are in contrast with traditional values and class differences. Lesbian feminists in the larger cities or in academic and activist contexts have claimed that their sexualities are not part of identity politics but instead lie in the milieu of the political emancipation of women.³⁶ At the same time, the use of identity politics to describe same-sex sexualities is being contested and challenged by urban bisexual and queer youth. They have developed new categories to describe themselves and their sexualities, such as lesboflexible—a lesbian identified woman who occasionally has sex with men, or hetero confundido, a straight person who occasionally engages in same sex practices.³⁷

The Colombian Constitution considers family to be the fundamental core of society and orders the state and society to protect it integrally. In the constitution, family is the result of the decision of a man and a woman to marry or to have a marital life. Marriage can be civil or religious. A judge or a notary formalizes the first, while the second is celebrated with a priest or other religious official, but also requires the signatures of a civil registry. Before 1991, there was a difference in the rights that married couples and their children had in comparison with domestic partnerships and their families. After Law 54 of the 1990 and 1991 Constitution, however, both ways to conform a family have almost all the same rights, such as marital society, adoption, social security benefits, mutual care, and health decisions, among others.

Despite the legal and cultural promotion of heterosexual nuclear families, Colombian families cover a wide variety of expressions.³⁸ Afro-Colombian families have kinship links that cover several types of relatives, extending family ties over the nuclear core; some indigenous communities have a matriarchal order; in urban settings some domestic units can be constituted by relatives far from the nuclear core while at the same time increasing the number of people who reside in single units; there is also a growing number of women who raise families by themselves, in some cases by choice, in others because of the impact of internal displacement, violence, and political conflict. In recent years, the reality of same-sex families has gained visibility, mainly because of the activism of lesbian mothers and emergent organizations of gay parents or gay men who want to raise children.

Same-sex couples are not allowed to adopt because of the constitutional definition of the term “family.” However, a single person, man or woman, can apply to adopt a child and his or her sexual orientation cannot be considered an impediment *per se*³⁹ to do it. The fact that there is no legal consideration of same-sex families leaves the situation of same-sex couples who raise a child together unclear and unprotected. This also means that the rights of a child raised in a same-sex couple household are not protected, which is contrary with the superiority of children’s rights as outlined in the Colombian Constitution. Same-sex couples and families are not mentioned in the legal measures to prevent or protect from domestic violence or gender-based violence, thus denying LGBT people their right of access to institutional services and related protective measures.

COMMUNITY

The development of organizations formed around sexual orientation or gender identity in Colombia can be traced to the 1970s, in the context of feminism, Latin American leftist theories, emergent social movements, and academic discussions around sex and politics influenced by European authors.⁴⁰ Some of the first organizations were informal support and discussion groups of just men, just women, or mixed groups based in the main cities of the country. Lesbians have had a parallel history both in feminist movements and in LGBT organizations. They have challenged and contested heterosexism in feminist movements and sexism in LGBT organizations while at the same time actively participating in their construction.⁴¹

In the 1980s, issues of democratization, human rights, and sexual rights expanded the agendas of the initial groups and created new ones. In the early 1980s, gay was a known term but not widely used. The term de ambiente—of the crowd—was more accepted as an identity term. Meanwhile lesbiana was also used, but with concerns by some women because of its derogatory use by heterosexuals. Locas or travestis were and still are terms used by transgendered people to describe themselves. Transgeneristas, an umbrella term for the wide variety of possibilities of gender identities and gender expression, is mainly used by activists or in public policies and rights discussions. Some organizations prefer to use the term trans as a way to include all the mentioned possibilities.⁴² As in other Latin American countries, the activism of some LGBT leaders and groups around HIV issues promoted the development of new and wider LGBT organizations throughout the 1980s and 1990s. By the end of the 1990s, there was a diverse landscape of lesbian, gay, and mixed groups and organizations, not only in the largest cities but also in the intermediate-sized ones, organized around several interests: support and identity affirmation, religion, cultural activities, academic discussions, or rights advocacy. It is in this context that networks of organizations were developed, creating the bases for LGBT rights advocacy with a national perspective. Around 2000, with the support of the NGO Planeta Paz, LGBT organizations and activists started to link LGBT rights with peace-building activities.⁴³ Citizenship became also an important articulating topic and was adapted in cities such as Bogotá as the core of the pride parade. In fact, the notion of gay pride is not the main motto in this parade, which is called “Marcha de la Ciudadanía LGBT,” the LGBT Citizenship Parade.⁴⁴

It was around 2002 that the acronym LGBT started to be used by the organizations articulated around the Planeta Paz experience. The acronym helped as a strategy to connect the grievances of organizations with the international lobby around gender identity and sexual orientation rights and to create a collective identity to articulate particular initiatives. However, organizations, academics, and activists, particularly those who are lesbians and/or transgendered, have contested the use of the acronym because of its supposed unity and its blurring of inner differences.

As mentioned, lesbians have created forms of organization and collective representation that resisted the male dominance of most political spaces.⁴⁵ The use of private spaces, personal networks, and the Internet has been part of these strategies.⁴⁶ Transgendered people have also been internally discriminated or segregated in LGBT organizations, in spite of having a long history of organization and articulation around the spaces that they are socially allowed to occupy, such as beauty parlors or sex work. Bisexuality as a political identity began to gain visibility as part of LGBT activism. Intersex activism is emergent, and currently found most often in support organizations interested in medical services access.

HEALTH

Health and social security are defined in the Colombian Constitution as a public service (not as a right) offered both by private and public organizations and directed, coordinated, and controlled by the state under principles of efficiency, universality, and solidarity. Currently, there are two ways to be connected to the social security system: the contribution regimen and the subsidized regimen. In the first case, every worker pays monthly installments according to his income. In the second case, people who do not have economic resources are subsidized by the state, according to certain conditions and priorities. When this system was created in 1993, it was expected that, by 2000, Colombians would have universal coverage, however by that time 84.14 percent of the expected subsidized population was still not covered.⁴⁷ In 2007, 8.5 million Colombians had not yet been included in the social security system.⁴⁸

Apart from studies of the HIV situation of gay men and men who have sex with men, there are no studies on the health conditions of LGBT people. However, health has been one of the main concerns of LGBT activists. The main health issues for LGBT people are associated with the effects that discrimination and institutional homophobia can have on their whole health situation. In the case of transgendered and transsexual people, the social exclusion most of them face implies they do not have the resources to pay for affiliation with social security. Some of these people do not have proper identity documents, thereby increasing their marginality and limiting even more their access to health services. Experiences of discrimination by health providers make transgendered and transsexual patients reluctant to use those services. In the case of those who can afford the affiliation with social security, the medical interventions they require for their gender identities are not covered by the system. This means that, in practice, transgendered and transsexual persons often look for informal interventions for their bodies practiced by nonmedical personal in improper hygienic conditions. The use of cooking oil or industrial silicone to shape their bodies has been among these practices.⁴⁹ Transgender activists assert that, because of these treatments, some transsexuals have died.⁵⁰

Medical personnel have a deplorable lack of understanding and mistreatment of lesbian health needs because of sexism and their focus on heterosexual women. This is particularly the case among gynecologists. Meanwhile, the health needs of gay men are typically reduced to HIV-related issues, leaving other aspects of their health, such as reproductive system illnesses, unattended.

POLITICS AND LAW

Spanish colonizers imported and transplanted sodomy laws from the Middle Ages into Colombia's colonial legal system. There are several cases in the colonial archives detailing the prosecution of men and women because of their sodomite practices.⁵¹ Sodomy laws were replaced in the 19th century by medical and moral discourses and the regulation of public health. The corruption of youth, abuse, and scandals related to same-sex practices were the punished behaviors in the 19th and early 20th century codes, not the homosexual behavior itself.⁵² The 1936 Civil Code was the first to specifically call for the prosecution of homosexuality in any case and circumstance. This ruling remained in effect until the Civil Code reform of 1980, which does not mention the sanction. The Constitutional Reform of 1991 opened the space for a new consideration of LGBT rights with its emphasis on diversity, human rights, and the participation of citizens in the protection of their rights. "Acción de Tutela" was a protective measure created in the 1991 Constitution that became one of the most important tools developed by the 1991 Constitution, and has been used widely for LGBT rights advocacy.⁵³

Equality, Intimacy and the Free Development of Personality

The right to equal treatment structures the Colombian Constitution. The constitution mentions sex, race, origin, language, religion, and philosophical or political opinions as conditions protected against discrimination. Despite the fact that there is no explicit mention of sexual orientation or gender identity, the reference to "sex" has been extended to include LGBT rights, as has the mandate to create protective measures in favor of discriminated or marginalized groups.⁵⁴

The right to intimacy, also mentioned in the 15th Article of the Constitution, has been developed by the Constitutional Court to recognize the importance of sexuality in human dignity and the right every person has to self determine her or his own sexuality.⁵⁵ Article 16 mentions the right to the free development of one's personality. The combination of these rights with other constitutional principles such as freedom, autonomy, and human dignity have created a frame widely used to claim and protect LGBT rights. However, this protective character has been centered on individual rights, leaving the rights of LGBT couples or same-sex families less developed.

Same-Sex Couples' Rights

Five bills to recognize same-sex couples' rights were discussed in the Colombian Senate between 1999 and 2007. LGBT organizations and activists, with the support of some liberal legislators created these bills, and each initiative advanced the cause. The last one, presented in 2006, was approved by the majority of Senators in 2007, but was defeated in a postadministrative procedure controlled by Christian groups and conservative politicians.

These initiatives created national debates surrounding LGBT rights. On one side of the debates was those advocating the protection of heterosexual marriage, the special place of the family in the constitution, and the superior interest in the protection of children's rights. This last topic was part of public debate even when the topic of adoption was not mentioned in the bill, due to a belief that same-sex couples' rights are a threat to children's rights. The same happened with the notion of marriage; even when LGBT activists and proponents did not bring it up, it was still considered under threat. On the other side were those who considered same-sex couples' rights to be in accord with the constitutional principles of equity and nondiscrimination and a step further in the modernization of the country. The first side was headed by the Catholic Church and other Christian groups, conservative parties, and associations related to the protection of traditional family and values. The other side included some left- and center-wing parties, progressive politicians and intellectuals, and some editors of national newspapers and magazines. In 2006, the current president of the country, Alvaro Uribe, stated his agreement with same-sex couples' right to property ownership and social security, but affirmed his opposition to same-sex marriage and adoption.

While the 2006/2007 project was debated in the Senate, the LGBT human rights NGO Colombia Diversa and Grupo de Derecho de Interés Público in Universidad de los Andes developed a strategy of high-impact litigation to be presented to the Constitutional Court. They challenged the constitutionality of Law 54 of 1990, stating that only covering the domestic partnerships of heterosexual couples was against the right to equality of same-sex partnerships. Academics, legislators, and NGOs (including the New York City Bar Association) presented papers in favor of the initiative. On February 7, 2007, the Constitutional Court, in Sentence C-075, declared that the protective regime expressed in the Law 54 of 1990 must be also applied to same-sex couples. In practice, this dealt only with the rights of property ownership by same-sex couples, since other rights such as insurance, inheritance, and pensions were not considered. Despite its restrictions, the mentioned sentence marked the recognition of same-sex couples by the legal system and was a victory for LGBT rights activism supported by academia.

On October 3, 2007, as a development of this Sentence and in response to another litigation strategy presented by two citizens, the Constitutional Court recognized the right of same-sex couples to social security. According to that Sentence, when a LGBT person is part of the contributive regime, he can affiliate his partner will receive the same social security benefits. In response to another demand presented by Colombia Diversa and Grupo de Derecho de Interés Público, on April 17, 2008, the Constitutional Court acknowledged the right of a member of a same-sex couple to receive the pension of her deceased partner. This strategy of claiming rights one by one in the Constitutional Court can be considered the result of the negative response of the Senate to enact a global bill to protect same-sex couples' rights and is expected to be used for other rights given to heterosexual unions.

On January 28, 2009, in Sentence 029 of 2009, the Colombian Constitutional Court ruled that same-sex couples must be granted the same rights as unmarried heterosexual couples, including civil, economic, political, social, criminal, and immigration rights that were not mentioned in its previous rulings. With this ruling, Colombia and Uruguay are the first two countries in the Latin-American region that recognize rights for same-sex unions. However, because adoption rights are not yet included, same-sex couples are still in an unequal status in relation to heterosexual couples, married or unmarried.

Transgendered and Transsexuals' Rights

Transsexual and transgendered persons in Colombia can change the names they were given at birth by presenting a petition to a judge. They can also change the sex that appears on their identity card, once they have had sexual reassignment surgeries.⁵⁶ Because these surgeries are not covered by the social security system, and because the mentioned legal procedures are not free, some transsexual and transgendered persons are unable to benefit from these rights. LGBT activists have denounced the legal limbo in which transgendered and transsexual people are left and its effects on their access to education and jobs.

Intersexed People

The Colombian Constitutional Court has noted the need for laws related to intersex persons' rights in accordance with constitutional principles and international developments. In several sentences,⁵⁷ the Court has considered the need for informed consent before surgical procedures, the limits of parents' decisions, the autonomy of intersex persons, and their right to make decisions about their bodies, and has even questioned surgeries as a possible discriminatory measure against intersex persons. For the Constitutional Court, the decision to perform a surgery (when a person cannot decide by herself, for example, if the patient is a child) must consider several factors: the need for the procedure, its impact on the current and future autonomy of the child, and her physical and psychological condition. It has also stated that the treatment for intersex persons must be included in the social security system (both in the contributive and in the subsidized tiers) because it is needed for the dignity of the person. This position of the Colombian Constitutional Court has been considered progressive by intersex and LGBT activists in the Latin American context.

LGBT Persons in Jails

The violation of the rights of LGBT people in jails has been a frequent topic of attention by human rights organizations and activists. Discrimination based on gender identity or sexual orientation renders them more vulnerable than other inmates. This situation has caused several pronouncements by the State Council and the Constitutional Court. One of the most important concerns the right of LGBT inmates to intimate visits with their partners. While this right is granted to heterosexual inmates, decisions based on prejudice and discrimination have denied it to LGBT prisoners. In 1994, Martha Alvarez, a lesbian woman in prison, initiated a case for the right to intimate visits that went all the way to the Colombian legal system without adequate answer. In 1999, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights accepted the case, and in 2002 it urged the Colombian state to conciliate and to develop legal measures in order to guarantee the mentioned right. In the conciliation, Colombian representatives argued that the mentioned right was denied because of the intolerance to homosexuality in Latino cultures and the need to protect discipline and morality in jails. There are no clear measures yet, nor enforcement actions in place, to make the exercising of this right a reality. In 2002, Alvarez, Alba Montoya (another lesbian who started a similar legal battle), and their lawyer Marta Tamayo received the Felipa Award from the International Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission for their persistence and efforts to protect women and LGBT rights.

Public Expressions of Gender Identity

Public expressions of gender identity, such as the presence of transgendered sex workers on the streets, the holding of transvestite beauty contests, or the participation of transgendered people in public events such as the Carnival of Barranquilla, have received public attention because of the supposed menace to public morality and children's rights associated with them. As an answer to several demands, the Constitutional Court has stated that there are no reasons to prosecute these expressions, so long as they conform to minimum norms of public behavior.⁵⁸ For the Court, sexual diversity is protected by the Constitution as part of personal autonomy. Accordingly, the state cannot impose ideological or moral criteria on sexual expressions, such as homosexuality. However, the Court also considers that state intervention is required when expressions of diversity threaten coexistence and social organization. This consideration leaves an open space for different interpretations that conservative politicians and public employees, such as the police, can use against LGBT rights. At the same time, transgendered people are gaining recognition in public media; Endry Cardeño, a transgendered woman, has not only participated in soap operas but is also recognized as a public figure and was responsible for opening the space to discuss transgender issues in public opinion.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Catholicism is the most prevalent religion in Colombia and occupies a significant place in Colombian cultures and society. The Catholic Church is one of the most trusted institutions in the country and has important roles in addressing topics such as human rights, peace building, and conflict resolution initiatives. The Church also has a leading role in both education and its position on women's sexual and procreative rights; LGBT rights are still considered in public opinion and politics. While the 1886 constitution granted the Catholic Church a privileged position, the 1991 constitution declared freedom for cults and the respect of religious diversity.

Christian churches, coming mainly from the United States, have gained more members in the last years. They have representatives in political institutions such as the Senate and city councils who have clearly stated their opposition to LGBT rights. In several cases, such as the debates in the Senate on the recognition of same-sex couples' rights in 2002 and 2006/2007, Christian politicians have used antigay materials produced in the United States in order to support their positions. Ex-gay activism and reparative therapy ideas have also been imported in recent years by some Christian priests and representatives.

Since the early 1990s, some LGBT persons have been in touch with United States pro-gay religious groups. As part of the mentioned development of support and identity groups, religious oriented groups have developed in Colombia's largest cities, and some Catholic priests have given implicit or explicit support to these groups as part of their evangelical mission. In Bogotá, one of the oldest LGBT organizations, "Discipulo Amado," Beloved Disciple, offered a space for religious experiences with the support of a local parish.

VIOLENCE

Violence is one of the main topics of concern for all groups in Colombia. Despite a decrease in recent years of homicides and violent deaths, they are still high compared with other countries in the world.⁵⁹ According to official sources, in 2006 there were 38 murders per 100,000 persons.⁶⁰ Ninety-two percent of the deceased persons were men, aged 31.7 on average. Homicide rates increase after 15 years of age, and are predominant among agriculturists and retailers. The impact of these rates is considered to be affecting the demographic structure in some areas and cities, such as Medellín.⁶¹

Since the mid 1990s, human rights activists in Colombia and abroad have denounced the existence of social cleansing squads who carry out extrajudicial killings targeting LGBT people, particularly travestis. This situation is of such concern that violence against LGBT people is one of the topics raised in the reports of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights in the country. In Bogotá, according to LGBT activists, there were 60 registered killings of gay men between 2000 and 2005. In spite of that, there has been no official research conducted on the topic as of yet, and authorities are not prepared to deal with hate crime situations. There is still a tendency among police and the media to consider crimes against LGBT people crimenes pasionales—crimes of passion. In the cases of transsexuals and transgendered sex workers who have been killed, it is common to assume that the crimes were related to their supposed involvement in delinquent activities. These prejudices undermine possible antigay motives and indirectly justify the crimes.⁶² In article 58 of the current penal code it states that crimes with discriminatory reasons must receive a higher punishment, however there are no registered cases in which that ruling was used in relation to gender identity or sexual orientation.

Crimes against LGBT people in regions of sociopolitical conflict or humanitarian crises have recently been considered in human rights reports and qualitative research. There are cases of LGBT people being threatened, displaced, and even killed by paramilitary operatives who consider homosexual or transgendered persons immoral, child molesters, or not to be proper citizens.⁶³ However, there are no legal measures or specific human rights policies to intervene in these situations.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The legal advances in Colombian Law in relation to LGBT rights are an important step toward establishing equity and erasing discrimination. The development of some of the most recent sentences of the Constitutional Court in relation to same-sex couples' rights will impact topics that are still difficult to discuss, such as the family. However, the realization of LGBT rights requires not only the creation of laws but also the articulation of public and private efforts in many levels of society, with a leading role in social policies. Local initiatives in Bogotá, Medellín, and Cali show that it is possible for public institutions to promote cultural changes in order to respect LGBT rights. However, there is a lack of attention at the national level that leaves unattended the situation of LGBT people in intermediate-sized cities and rural areas.

The gaining of political power by Christian politicians represents a challenge to LGBT activists and their organizations as much as the increasing antigay protests in main cities. The development of social policies that undertake discrimination and promote LGBT rights requires strengthening the involvement of LGBT activists in citizen-participatory instances both at the local and national levels. Both situations affect the political strategies implemented before now in LGBT rights advocacy and require a reflection on the types of relationships LGBT movements want to have with the state.

The particular situations of marginality and exclusion faced by transgendered people are still a challenge to LGBT rights activism and related social policies. The same happens with differences within that are not yet fully considered in the LGBT articulation, such as gender, race, and class differences, and that require the development of particular actions in social and public policies.

Studies of Latin American sexualities in the United States' context are mainly focused in Brazil, Argentina, and Mexico. Other countries, such as Colombia, are underrepresented in these studies. This implies the need to open the discussion to inner differences among Latin American countries and to challenge globalized representations of their sexualities. There is a vibrant and fruitful academic production on Latin American sexualities published in Spanish by Latin American scholars that is barely recognized in U.S. academic circles. Another challenge for academics and activists both in North America and in Latin American countries is to increase the exchange of knowledge as equals and peers with equally valuable experience and expertise.

ECUADOR

Eduardo Alfonso Caro Meléndez

OVERVIEW

After nearly 300 years of Spanish colonization, Ecuador gained its independence at the Battle of Pichincha on May 24, 1822, and joined the great nation that at that time was called La Gran Colombia (1821–1831). Eight years later, on May 13, 1830, Ecuador became an independent republic. The official name of the country is the Republic of Ecuador (La República del Ecuador). It is a representative democracy located in South America that shares national borders with Colombia (on the north) and Peru (on the east and south), and is bound by the Pacific Ocean (on the west). Its total area is 256,370 square kilometers (including the Galapagos Islands, which account for approximately 965 kilometers, and are located in the Pacific Ocean).¹

The capital city of Ecuador is Quito, although the largest city is Guayaquil. Other cities of interest include Cuenca, Machala, Santo Domingo, Portoviejo, and Ambato. Ecuador's national motto of is "God, homeland, and liberty" (Dios, patria y libertad); its official language is Spanish and it is home to approximately 13.9 million. Roughly 1.5 million people live in Quito and in Guayaquil. Ecuador's population density is 47 people per square kilometer. The sex ratio at birth is 1.05 males to every female; the approximate annual birthrate is 24.94 births per 1,000, and the approximate death rate is 5.29 deaths per 1,000. Infant mortality is 31.97 per 1,000 live births. According to information released in 2003, female life expectancy at birth is 74.86 years, and it is 69.06 for males. The fertility rate is

2.99 children per woman. In general, the age structure in Ecuador is birth-14 years (34.9%), 15-64 years (60.6%), 65 years and over (4.5%).²

In terms of ethnicity, Ecuador's population is quite diverse: 65 percent, the largest group, are mestizos (i.e., descendants of Spanish colonists and indigenous peoples); Amerindians, the second largest group, make up 25 percent of the population; seven percent are criollos (i.e., white descendants of Spanish colonists or of European or Latin American immigrants). The remaining three percent is made up of Afro-Ecuadorians, including Mulattos and zambos (the child of a black person and an Indian). As a consequence of the 1999 national economic crisis, it is estimated that 700,000 people emigrated from Ecuador to Europe (mainly to Spain or Italy), the United States, Canada, or Japan. At present, be it for economic, political, or reasons of violence, the expatriate Ecuadorian population is estimated to be 2.5 million.³

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Ecuador is the only country in the Americas whose constitution (in Article 23, Section 3) explicitly refers to sexual orientation, yet there continues to be a serious gap between the law and its enforcement. On a daily basis, Ecuadorian LGBT citizens are victims of physical and psychological hostility and authorities fail to enforce their constitutional rights. In addition, the authorities are often active actors and agents of discrimination against these individuals.

AIDS continues to be an issue of great concern not only among civil society in general, but among LGBT citizens in particular. The Ley del Sida (AIDS Law), passed by Congress in 2000, commits the government to providing free AIDS testing and treatment to those who need it, but most Ecuadorians are not covered by the National Security System; the only persons who get full and reliable treatment are select members of the Armed Forces and police who benefit from a special government program. Likewise, marriage between persons of the same gender is not yet accepted or legal in Ecuador. Openly declared LGBT citizens cannot be a part of the military or official government institutions. Given the dominant Christian/Catholic tradition still prevalent in all sectors and levels of Ecuadorian education, LGBT citizens are still seen as defiant against the dominant straight society; therefore, LGBT students are still discriminated against. There are some organizations fighting to voice their concerns and to gain visibility and respect; however, there is no real freedom of speech for them.

EDUCATION

At present, Ecuador has a public education system that is both free and compulsory beginning at age five through 14. However, class sizes are very large and public schools do not have the necessary and sufficient infrastructure needed to service the community. In general, 65 percent of education in Ecuador is public, while 35 percent is private. Roughly speaking, 20 percent of primary and secondary schools alone are privately owned. Although during the 1970s and 1980s there were increased educational opportunities at all levels of instruction, it has been reported that only 76 percent of children will actually finish six years of schooling. It is estimated that, in the less privileged rural areas, only 10 percent continue on to high school. Currently, there are 61 universities and 300 vocational and technical institutes of higher education.⁴

A large number of Ecuadorian teachers lack full accreditation or advanced degrees, particularly at the secondary and higher education levels; these deficiencies are most visible in rural areas. Since 1980, formal education was divided into four cycles: a preliminary cycle of two-years, primary school with a duration of six years, a three-year cycle of secondary school and, finally, higher education. Although the Ecuadorian Constitution states that 30 percent of the national budget should be invested in education, the country's current economic situation fails to provide for this. Nonetheless, there seem to be some government initiatives (e.g., legislation and campaigns to provide institutions with more materials and supplies) trying to deal with the issues of illiteracy both in the cities and in the rural areas. Also, aware of the need for some additional global dialogue and exposure, some institutions—particularly at the higher levels—are promoting exchange programs abroad seeking to create research and development programs.

In the midst of the ups and downs in the education system in Ecuador, quality education is a domain to which only the privileged elite has access. That is, economically speaking, the less privileged and the indigenous and Afro-Ecuadorian communities are kept in the margins of such a social contract. There is also discrimination against LGBT citizens in the educational arena. Young LGBT students do have access to schools, since in the early stages of their school life they learn to keep their gender or sexual identity to themselves, but they can become the prey of bullies or victims of negative social pressure, stigma, and stereotypes that in many cases, if not all, include their own families. The educational institutions do not seem to do much to combat this treatment.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

The economy in Ecuador went through a long recession between the years of 1982 and 1991. During this critical period, the macroeconomic policy focused primarily on short-term stability, but did not produce as many favorable results as had been expected. This policy was implemented in the midst of two important external crises: the 1982 external debt and the fall of oil prices, which began in 1982 and reached its most critical period between the years of 1985 and 1986.

Shortly after 1990, the Ecuadorian economy began a recuperation process with characteristics different from those applied in years before. Some new structural reforms were introduced that sought to strengthen the mechanisms of the market and to eliminate as much as possible state intervention. This new structure brought about important changes in the national economy. The importance of the manufacturing sector, which had been a good source of jobs, declined. Nevertheless, the participation of the primary sectors, such as agriculture, oil, and mining, showed a significant increase. These three sectors, primarily the latter, have had a great impact on the Ecuadorian economy of today.

In regard to actual employment, the agricultural and mining sectors, with their main focus on primary exports, have not generated sufficient job sources. Between the years 1992 and 1997, years of general national economic improvement, these sectors only supplied 7.3 percent of all employment, while 15.7 percent was generated by the manufacturing sector and 60 percent came from the business sector and other services.⁵ These two latter sectors are where low-income jobs have been the most predominant. In addition, the generally scarce jobs, as well as the national deficit, have been marked by both national and international phenomena, including the notorious decrease in oil prices and international financial crises, specifically those in Asia, Russia, and Brazil. Furthermore, the El Niño weather phenomenon of 1998 through 1999 had a devastating, lasting effect on both Ecuador's geography and economy.

Due to these negative economic conditions, one of the most recent government strategies has been to adopt the U.S. dollar as the country's official currency. This move was initiated by then-President Jamil Mahuad on January 9, 2000. In spite of national protests, eight months later, on September 10, 2001, the policy was officially adopted. Similarly, negotiations with the International Monetary Fund were opened by the national government. Other significant initiatives designed to help the economy have efforts to keep the fiscal deficit down, the implementation of structural reforms, an attempt to strengthen the banking system, and efforts to regenerate some private capital markets. In the year 2000, in response to a 1.9 percent increase in the GDP, the Ecuadorian economy showed a modest recovery in spite of the fact that it has been estimated that 70 percent of the population still lives below the poverty line.⁶

In theory, Ecuadorian laws decriminalized homosexual activities in 1998. However, LGBT people still continue to be discriminated against in the workplace. Their rights are ignored and, generally speaking, they are seen as perverts and bad examples for straight society. LGBT communities continue to be stigmatized and marginalized by society at large and by the state apparatus.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

As of this writing, the current president of Ecuador, Rafael Correa, had announced several economic and social programs designed to benefit the Ecuadorian people. On behalf of president Correa, the Finance Minister, Ricardo Patiño, announced that, by the year 2010, the government investment in social welfare would increase to 34.8 percent of the annual budget. Other planned government investments include a two million dollar investment in electric energy development. Another investment of about 2.8 billion dollars in oil exploration and production and in the hydrocarbon sector. With regard to agriculture and cattle, the government aims to increase and improve their production by expanding land capacity and by applying effective and more modern medical and technological treatments, all of which, according to official estimates, will have a positive impact on the national industry.⁷

In addition to the plans outlined above, the government plans to invest in banking affiliated with social security and in housing to benefit the poor and those living in rural areas. In general, concerted government efforts to address social disparities seem to have shown recent positive results; however, given the country's current economic situation and international debt, it appears that it will be quite difficult for Ecuador to fund and implement the spending on social programs that aim to improve the quality of life, especially for the most vulnerable social groups, the indigenous populations and those Ecuadorian families of African descent. Given the widespread social stigma against them, LGBT communities must also be included among these most vulnerable groups. Contrary to what the constitution states in regard to no discrimination on the basis of race, gender, socioeconomic status, or ethnicity, the Ecuadorean government continues to fail to promote and establish an environment that is free of hate, stigmatization, or discrimination against alternative sexualities. No social programs to provide protection and inclusivity to LGBT communities have either been sponsored or created by the government.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Sexuality and sexual practices in Ecuador, in general, follow the common macho or machismo practices found in most of the other Latin American countries. Within the family sphere in particular, and in the whole Ecuadorian social domain in general, women continue to carry a rather passive role. Following hegemonic patriarchal norms, sexually speaking, women continue to be subordinate to and dependent on men. Likewise, those with alternative sexualities (lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender citizens) who do not follow the patriarchal pattern continue to be discriminated against. For the most part, their social practices and cultural production are still considered subculture and taboos. In the mid 1980s, for instance, any sexual activity between men was punishable with eight years in prison. In spite of this, some cultural and literary critics, mainly Ecuadorians living abroad, have written about this issue. Some of them include O. Hugo Benavides, Xavier Andrade, Gioconda Herrera, Patricio Aguirre, and Pablo Palacio.

FAMILY

As is the case for most Latin American countries, families in Ecuador commonly include several generations under one single roof. Although this seems to be changing, particularly in major urban centers, modern families continue to consider themselves one big family and are broadly inclusive. The notion of compadrazco, which implies a relationship of reciprocity between parents and godparents, remains a traditional and powerful relationship. In general, people seem to define themselves not only in terms of the immediate family, but also in terms of their circle of friends and the extended family, all of whom get together and celebrate whenever there is a reason, including such as birthday parties, quinceañeras (girls' 15th birthdays), graduations, baptisms, anniversaries, weddings, and special day saints' days. Gender roles, regardless of the celebration, are clearly defined and upheld; that is, on a daily basis, both women and men perform in ways that are traditionally expected of them.

COMMUNITY

To a greater extent, the gay rights movement in the United States in the early 1950s played a significant role in Latin American countries. Ecuador was no exception. However, in spite of this and the Ecuadorian constitution's lack of sanctions against homosexuality (dating to 1997), LGBT communities continue to be discriminated against in practice and are victims of all sorts of violence, including detentions and physical violence. One example of this climate of discrimination can be found in the massive detention of homosexuals that took place in the city of Cuenca in 1997.

Because of such human rights violations, many of which remain undocumented and go unpunished, it is not surprising that cases of violence against LGBT citizens have been investigated and publicized on Amnesty International's Web site. Also, demonstrations have taken place in major cities in different years, one of which was the Pride Parade 2001 in Guayaquil. LGBT organizations in small cities or towns in Ecuador have yet to emerge, however, in major cities such as Quito and Guayaquil, there are a few organizations that works to fight discrimination and violence against sexual minorities, including Fundación Amigos por la Vida (Friends for Life Foundation) in Guayaquil and Fundación Ecuatoriana de Minorías Sexuales (FEMIS-Ecuadorian Sexual Minorities Foundation) located in Guayaquil and Quito, and Juventud Arco Iris (Rainbow Youth) in Guayaquil, which is part of Fundación Amigos por la vida.

HEALTH

As with discrimination and violence, health in general continues to be a major issue of concern for LGBT citizens in Ecuador, and the situation has worsened since the advent of AIDS. Because of the macho nature of Ecuadorian society at large, safe sex (homosexual and heterosexual) campaigns have not been totally successful. Many men who have sex with other men continue to think of themselves as macho men and believe that such campaigns are meant to be for homosexuals only. In spite of this, the rate of AIDS among the Ecuadorian LGBT people seems to have declined. Conversely, it is a growing concern among people who identify themselves as heterosexuals.

Likewise, some other sexually transmitted diseases, such as syphilis and gonorrhea, continue to be common among both heterosexual and LGBT communities. In regard to health service providers, each particular institution has its own internal structure and policies; this seems to pose a huge challenge to the establishment of an inclusive national health care plan. However, certain public institutions, such as the Ministry of Public Health, the Ecuadorian Social Security Institute, the Armed Forces and Police Health Services (under the Ministries of Defense and Government, respectively), and health services of municipalities, the Guayaquil Welfare Board, the Guayaquil Children's Protection Society, the Cancer Society, and the Ecuadorian Red Cross, do provide some public health services. On the whole, the public health sector oversees about 58 percent of the population.⁸

POLITICS AND LAW

Because of the stigmatized social realities and conditions, many LGBT persons participating in the government sphere continue to live in the closet. In many instances, LGBT citizens discriminate openly against others just to remain unnoticed or unseen, which—given their political position and power—helps to promote and maintain harsh discrimination against these social groups. Before 1998, before the constitutional change, homosexuality was illegal. In regard to marriage, same-sex marriage remains illegal. However, some changes to the constitution are currently being implemented and institutionalized that could include significant changes to the laws regarding LGBT marriage; one of the possibilities being discussed is legalization. Only recently, current Ecuadorian President Rafael Correa has openly affirmed that he is very much in favor of legalizing homosexual unions. Likewise, he expressed support for allowing homosexuals in the military. Given the markedly conservative Ecuadorean society, this official statement constitutes a giant leap towards banning sexual discrimination.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

As is the case in most Latin American countries, Catholicism is the most prevalent religion in Ecuador. About 95 percent of Ecuadorians are Roman Catholic, although the numbers of Protestants are growing. Catholicism continues to promote the man-woman binary and marked gender constructions. Although many Catholic priests and nuns are closeted homosexuals, any sexual manifestation different from this binary continues to be considered an alteration to the norm.⁹ In smaller numbers, Ecuador is also home to Muslims (who number in the low thousands) and Jews (also numbered in the low thousands and mainly of German and Italian heritage). Towards the second half of the 20th century, Evangelical and Pentecostal churches began to make a significant impact on Ecuador's religiosity and cultural mores. Religion, in general, is so significant in Ecuador that a great deal of celebrations (e.g., festivals and annual parades) have a religiously rooted origin. Many lesbians and gay men are, indeed, deeply spiritual and religious. Nonetheless, regardless of the religion or the sectarian group, LGBT citizens continue to be a threat to traditional religious principles, and many religious organizations do not yet welcome or accept them.

VIOLENCE

Like most other countries around the world, Ecuador has gone through several periods of violence throughout its history. There continues to be both social and political violence against the most vulnerable citizens, namely the indigenous populations, women, children, youth and, in general, LGBT citizens. Recently, due to religious and political pressure, religious leaders and activists, journalists, teachers, university professors, and opposition politicians have been threatened, harassed, and subjected to violent attacks. LGBT citizens have been no exception. Many of these incidents of intimidation and attacks are neither openly reported nor documented, and remain unaddressed. It is not surprising, then, that the rate of violent death continues to escalate annually. A 15.9 percent of violent deaths among Ecuadorian youth has recently been estimated.¹⁰

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The legalization of homosexuality as part of the 1998 constitutional reform movement brought about a major improvement in Ecuadorian society and laws. Also, another significant leap forward has been the recent declaration by President Rafael Correa expressing support for the legalization of same-sex marital unions. However, in everyday social life, there is still a great deal of stigma, stereotyping, and violence against LGBT persons who, struggle to be recognized as citizens entitled to the same legal rights as any other person. Sociopolitical Ecuadorian institutions still have a long way to go in regard to providing the same social rights and benefits for all citizens regardless of their race, socioeconomic status, gender, or sexual orientation.

EL SALVADOR

James Daniel Wilets

OVERVIEW

El Salvador is a democratic republic located on the Pacific coast of Central America, bordered by Guatemala on the west and northwest and Honduras on the north and east. To the east is the Bay of Fonseca, which narrowly separates El Salvador from Nicaragua.

El Salvador is one of the most densely populated countries in the Western Hemisphere, with a population of approximately seven million in a land area slightly smaller than the state of Massachusetts. It is the smallest country in land area in Central America. Despite its relatively small land area, the terrain is quite varied, with extensive mountains, a central plateau, and a narrow coast.

The principal and official language of El Salvador is Spanish, although Nahua is spoken by some Amerindians. The principal ethnic group in El Salvador is mestizo, comprising approximately 90 percent of the population, followed by European whites with nine percent, and Amerindians with one percent. The predominant religion is Roman Catholicism, with 83 percent of the population, although there is an ongoing, dramatic increase in the number of Protestant evangelicals in the country, who now number well over one million.

El Salvador became independent from Spain in 1821, along with the other colonies in the Captaincy General of Guatemala. After independence, Mexico briefly annexed El Salvador, but El Salvador regained its freedom in 1823. That same year, the five states of El Salvador, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua formed the United Provinces of Central America, also referred to as the Central American Federation. Constant conflict between conservative and liberal forces led to the dissolution of the Federation in 1838, after which El Salvador became an independent country.

As in much of the rest of Latin America, the elites controlled the vast majority of the land, which, after the mid 19th century, was devoted to coffee growing. Most of independent Salvadoran history is characterized by strong tensions between the landed elite and the vastly poorer peasants. In March 1931, Arturo Araujo, a champion of the Salvadoran lower classes, was elected president. However, in December of the same year, a cadre of young military officers ousted President Araujo in a coup d'état, and Maximiliano Hernandez Martinez, the head of the officers, became president. Nevertheless, resistance against the military leaders continued, and in January 1932 rebels led by Agustín Farabundo Martí attacked the government forces. Within days the uprising was crushed and the military tricked members of the uprising to come into the open for public discussions and pardons. Upon doing so, between 10,000 and 40,000 peasants were slaughtered, leading to the naming of the uprising as "La Matanza" (the massacre).

This uprising set the tone for more recent Salvadoran history as well. An oligarchy continued to rule the country with the backing of the military, and almost every Salvadoran president until 1980 was an army officer. No election during this period could be characterized as free and fair.

The conservative Alianza Republicana Nacionalista (ARENA) earned international opprobrium for its violent tactics, including peasant massacres, murders of religious workers, Catholic missionaries, and the use of death squads.¹ The United States, beginning with the Reagan Administration, was closely aligned with the Salvadoran government during the conflict. Finally, in 1979, the tensions broke out in a full-fledged 12-year-long civil war, pitting the guerrillas under the Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional (FMLN) party against ARENA, who were allied with the government. Peace accords were signed in 1991, and there have subsequently been relatively free and fair elections in the country.

El Salvador's turbulent history has had important ramifications for LGBT individuals as they find themselves caught in the political struggle between an entrenched conservative elite attempting to preserve the social and political hierarchy against groups it deems to be a threat to that social order.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Although homosexuality is legal in El Salvador, LGBT individuals are subject to widespread societal discrimination, including hate-based assassinations and other types of extreme violence.² Three major concerns dominate LGBT issues in the country.

It is impossible to separate LGBT issues from the larger societal historical conflicts that have convulsed the country since its founding. Human rights abuses against sexual minorities occur in the country within a context of a relatively recently ended civil war that deeply polarized Salvadoran society and created the perception that any challenge to the social order should be seen as a political threat as well. Because LGBT individuals challenge deeply felt assumptions by many Salvadorans about the proper gender roles of men and women, sexual minorities have always been considered a threat to the stability of Salvadoran society. As such, what would in many countries be considered a largely social transgression by sexual minorities here takes on a political dimension, vastly augmenting the danger of violent persecution beyond the kinds of antigay violence seen in much of the rest of the Western Hemisphere.

Second, as a result of the Civil War and the polarization of Salvadoran society, the rule of law has become severely compromised. Rule of law is usually defined as the existence and implementation of laws independent of corruption, political partisanship, or irrelevant biases. The Civil War and its resultant polarization meant that law and security became subordinate to political concerns and the goal of subordinating nonconforming sections of society. Without the rule of law, societal groups that are subject to societal or other persecution have little or no recourse to the state for protection, particularly when state actors share the same prejudices as the society at large, if not more so.

Third, the breakdown of the rule of law has greater implications for sexual minorities than simply making them more vulnerable to antigay violence. For example, many Salvadorans—gay and heterosexual—experience a real threat from physical violence at the hands of organized gangs for various motives.³ For gay individuals, however, that risk is exponentially greater because perpetrators of that violence understand that sexual minorities can be physically assaulted and even killed largely with impunity from state prosecution. The widespread social acceptance of antigay discrimination and antigay violence, which is particularly prevalent in organized gangs, aggravates this already deadly situation. From a practical perspective, it is not difficult to appreciate that a person who can be robbed, assaulted, or killed with impunity is much more likely to be a victim of such crimes than a citizen who has recourse to state security forces to protect her or him.

EDUCATION

El Salvador has a literacy rate of approximately 80 percent, with literacy being defined as the ability for those over the age of 10 to read and write. The educational system is severely underfunded, but progress is being made.

The government has undertaken efforts at HIV/AIDS education with limited success. El Salvador has taken no steps to address educational discrimination against the LGBT community or violence against LGBT individuals in the schools.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

El Salvador has traditionally had a relatively strong economy compared to other Central American countries, although its economic growth rate has slowed in recent years. The per capita income as of 2007 was $5,200. The economy consists of 60.5 percent services, 29.3 percent industry, and 10.2 percent agriculture.⁴

The currency of El Salvador is the U.S. dollar, which has prevented El Salvador from stimulating its economy through monetary policy. Nevertheless, El Salvador has a strong export sector, and of the country's membership in the Central America Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) has strengthened this trend, although some argue participation in CAFTA will aggravate the already serious labor problems and economic exploitation that is widespread in the country. El Salvador has had a history of state-tolerated employer interference with workers' rights to organize, with union organizers suffering from violence, harassment, and discrimination in employment.⁵

There is no employment protection for LGBT individuals in El Salvador, and there is, in fact, widespread employment discrimination throughout the country against sexual minorities.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

There are no government programs specifically targeted at the LGBT community. The country has been experiencing a difficult period of relatively low growth rates and the opportunity for government social service programs in general is limited.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

As a Catholic country, sexual practices normatively follow the Catholic tradition, although in practice contraceptives are readily available. As a country with a strong machista tradition, El Salvador's sexual practices typically adhere to traditional gender norms. Thus, there is a dualistic approach towards travesties (male transvestites). On the one hand, travestis are strongly stigmatized and frequently targeted for violence and even murder. On the other hand, because travestis are adopting the social gender role of a female, travestis are sought after for sex by numerous men who would otherwise consider themselves heterosexual. Thus, as in many Latin American and other countries, there is a strong tradition of travesti sex workers.

FAMILY

El Salvador differs somewhat from some Latin American countries with its prevalence of common law marriages. Despite this somewhat reduced lack of religious influence over the family, whether formally recognized by the state or not, family is highly valued, and anything that deviates from an otherwise traditional family structure is viewed with deep suspicion by many elements of Salvadoran society.

For example, the Canadian Refugee Board has documented that gay youth are frequently rejected by the family and "thrown out on the street," thus forcing these youth to seek alternative livelihoods that are frequently dangerous, both to their personal safety and integrity, and because of the risk of exposure to HIV.⁶

COMMUNITY

Although most LGBT individuals in El Salvador lead hidden lives, there is a growing LGBT community with one active political and social LGBT organization, Entre Amigos, based in San Salvador, the capital. El Salvador does have a gay pride parade in late June with dozens of individuals participating.⁷

The principal gay social and political organization, Entre Amigos has seen its members attacked and harassed by both societal actors and police. As of 2006, the

Governance Ministry continued to deny legal status to “En Nombre de la Rosa,” a sexual minority advocacy NGO.⁸

HEALTH

El Salvador has a national health care system, but that system has historically been characterized by insufficient funding and a scarcity of resources.⁹ This has had allocation implications for groups that have traditionally been the victims of discrimination, such as sexual minorities. Sexual minorities with HIV/AIDS are at particular risk, as they are not only discriminated against by society at large, but also within the health system, resulting in a frequently fatal lack of access to scarce and expensive but vitally needed medication.

A 2003 estimate put the number of people living with HIV at 29,000, constituting a 0.7 percent prevalence rate in the adult population.¹⁰ Discrimination against individuals with HIV is widespread,¹¹ although the Ministries of Labor and Health have launched several campaigns to eliminate workplace discrimination based on HIV status and pregnancy.¹² Individuals with HIV/AIDS also suffer from a lack of information and medical supplies.¹³

POLITICS AND LAW

The El Salvadoran legal system is based on the civil law legal system. However, because of the influence of the U.S. legal system, the El Salvadoran legal system does contain certain aspects of the common law system in various aspects of civil and criminal procedure.

As noted, there is no law prohibiting same gender sexual relations, commonly referred to as “sodomy laws,” and the Constitution and national law prohibit discrimination in general. Nevertheless, the reality is that discrimination is widespread and permeates all aspects of society, including the legal and political system. There is widespread discrimination against LGBT individuals and the LGBT community by most sectors of El Salvadoran society.¹⁴

As in most Latin American countries, Roman Catholicism has been dominant in El Salvador, although there is a growing evangelical Protestant movement in the country modeled on the North American version.¹⁵ Despite the prevalence of Catholicism and evangelical Protestantism, El Salvador has nevertheless been relatively more secular than its Central American neighbors, and in this sense bears some resemblance to Mexico’s relationship with Catholicism. Because of poverty, many families have lived together in “free unions” or common law marriages, many families have been headed by women, and many children are born out outside of marriage.

Notwithstanding the relative secularity of El Salvador as a whole, the Church hierarchy itself is generally ideologically very conservative and has traditionally been extremely hostile to LGBT communities. Bishop Monsignore Saenz Lacalle, the bishop of El Salvador and a member of Opus Dei (a conservative sect within the Catholic Church), has been quoted as referring to gays and lesbians as “sick” and “perverted.”¹⁶ Even the Catholic humanitarian agency Caritas, a charitable organization that focuses on the homeless, has stated that the Church will not help anyone who is homosexual.¹⁷

There have been some significant exceptions to the conservative orientation, however, with some members of the hierarchy supporting social justice causes within the context of “social” Christianity.

In part because of these conflicting strains within Catholicism, the conservative elite has become increasingly more identified with the evangelical Protestant movement than with the Roman Catholic Church. This identification results from evangelical Christianity’s emphasis on free market capitalism, entrepreneurship, and its tendency to discount the role of the political state in the country’s economic and social problems. This tendency of evangelical Protestantism not to blame the state derives in part from the belief that salvation will be found in the second coming of Christ, rather than changing the political and economic structure of the country. The growth of evangelical Protestantism poses challenges for the LGBT community because of its fierce hostility to sexual minorities and its resistance to democratic social activism. For example, the head of one large fundamentalist Protestant denomination (the Friends of Israel Church), Brother Tobi, referred to gays as “dirt” and “garbage.” He also urged parents to throw their gay children out of the house.¹⁸

VIOLENCE

Discrimination can frequently take the form of violent attacks perpetrated by gangs, individuals, or state and quasi-state actors.¹⁹ Contrary to the trend in much of Latin America, the level of anti-LGBT violence appears to be increasing in El Salvador as the role of gangs increases.

El Salvador is characterized by extensive violence against the LGBT community, including state actors such as the police.²⁰ Human rights organizations, as well as the U.S. State Department, have documented a close nexus between antigay vigilante groups and the police forces.²¹ As just one example, the 2006 United States Department of State Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for El Salvador, released on March 6, 2007, documents:

There were reports of violence and discrimination by public and private actors against persons with HIV/AIDS, and against homosexual, lesbian, and transgender persons, including denial of legal registration for a homosexual rights advocacy group.²²

The close nexus between societal and governmental actors in the violence against gay and lesbian individuals means that gay individuals cannot turn to the police or other governmental authorities for protection since they are, as often as not, the source of the problem.

A very serious facet of violence against the LGBT community involves violent attacks perpetrated against sexual minorities by gangs, many of whom have their origins in the barrios of Los Angeles and who were deported to El Salvador from the United States.²³ Gang members frequently target sexual minorities for murder or other violent crimes motivated by at least four reasons: (1) initiation into the gang; (2) the impunity they enjoy in committing such crimes against sexual minorities as opposed to other targets; (3) hatred or psychosexual fear of gay people; or (4) simply for pecuniary gain.

Transgendered individuals (travestís) face particularly severe discrimination and are most often the victims of violent attacks from gangs, the police, and other societal actors. Transgendered individuals are particular targets of attacks for at least three reasons.

First, El Salvador is an extremely machista society. There are those who argue that hatred of sexual minorities in general, and in Central America as well, is based more on opposition to gender nonconformity than homosexuality per se. Indeed, it has been argued that, for many in Central American societies and elsewhere in the world, the deep-seated hatred of homosexuality results more from opposition to, or fear of, gender nonconformity than from the homosexual act itself.²⁴ This attitude is obviously the most applicable for hatred of those who are perceived as embracing their sexual nonconformity. This view is supported by the reality that same-gender sexual relations are not considered out of bounds in all respects in El Salvador (and elsewhere), so long as they do not otherwise violate gender norms.²⁵ Examples of this attitude can be seen in the numerous instances of rape of travestís and gay individuals by purportedly heterosexual assailants, and the extensive incidence of same-gender sexual relations in prisons. It is only the individual who is perceived as passive in the sexual activity, or who actively embraces the idea of forming a relationship with an individual of the same gender, that is considered to be an appropriate target of antigay violence. Travestís, for many in Salvadoran society, are the quintessential embodiment of the gender nonconformity that is at the heart of what the society perceives as a threat to the social order.

Second, travestís are more visible in society and are visible in a manner that is perceived as taunting the larger society. Thus, the public expression of a travestí's identity is not perceived as an individual's free expression of her own identity, but rather an assault on the larger societal order. In a society where each level of the social hierarchy has demonstrated a deep insecurity about its continued status in that hierarchy, every perceived threat against a particular social order is taken extremely seriously. Perhaps as El Salvador's democratic institutions develop and the society becomes more securely pluralistic, this rampant insecurity will lessen.

Third, travestís can be violently assaulted with impunity. Although this is somewhat true for all sexual minorities in El Salvador, it is particularly true for the travestí community. As noted, the public display of one's identity is frequently perceived as an offensive act, rather than one of identity, and therefore there is a sense among many in the police forces and society in general that travestís deserve whatever treatment they receive.

As noted by human rights organizations and even the U.S. Department of State, travestís cannot look to the state or the police for protection or justice when their basic human rights have been assaulted and even their lives threatened.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The current situation for the LGBT community is compromised in terms of its physical safety and social and political situation. What makes the current situation so difficult to resolve is that the problem does not lie entirely in generalized anti-LGBT sentiment in the general public, which is a problem that almost every country has had to encounter at some point in its history. Rather, the general societal hostility towards the LGBT community manifests itself in a government and a security apparatus that suffers from a notable lack of rule of law and has been, and is likely to be, resistant to any change in such attitudes dictated from the political sector. Indeed, the murder rate of sexual minorities appears to have increased in the middle of the first decade of the 21st century.²⁶

A small minority of Salvadoran politicians are, however, more supportive of the LGBT community. For example, the LGBT community has enjoyed the political support of the first female mayor of San Salvador.²⁷ This suggests that there are some progressive inroads being made, and presumably levels of anti-LGBT discrimination and violence should ultimately decrease as those changes work their way through society, the political system, and those state entities entrusted with protecting Salvadoran citizens.

GUATEMALA

Eduardo Alfonso Caro Meléndez

OVERVIEW

The official name of Guatemala is the Republic of Guatemala (La República de Guatemala). It shares borders with Mexico to the northwest, the Pacific Ocean to the southwest, Belize and the Caribbean Sea to the northeast, and Honduras and El Salvador to the southeast. The total area of Guatemala is 42,042 square miles. Its capital city is Guatemala City (La Ciudad de Guatemala), with about two million inhabitants within the city limits and more than five million in the surrounding urban areas. Guatemala is the most populous country in Central America. Its population is estimated to be 12.9 million, with a density of 348.6 people per square mile. The population growth rate is 2.152 percent; the birth rate is estimated to be 29.01/1,000, and the death rate is 5.27/1,000; the life expectancy at birth is estimated to be 69.69 years.

The national motto of Guatemala is “The Land of Eternal Spring” (“El país de la eterna primavera”). Although 40 percent of the population speaks Amerindian languages, Spanish is the official language. After centuries of Spanish colonization, Guatemala gained its independence from Spain on September 15, 1821. The development of Guatemala has been affected by a recent history of civil war and military coups, among which resulted in a variety of rapidly changing military and civilian governments and a guerrilla war that lasted for 36 years. Finally, in 1996 a peace agreement was signed between the government and the Unidad Revolucionaria Nacional Guatemalteca, officially ending the sociopolitical conflict that took more than 1,000 lives and created at least 1,000 refugees. Currently, Guatemala is a constitutional democratic republic with three branches of government: legislative, executive, and judicial.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Lesbian, gays, bisexuals, and transgendered citizens continue to be invisible to the heterosexual majority in Guatemala, and homophobia is a major instigator of violence against LGBT citizens. Indeed, common LGBT people as well as activists continue to be the targets of several forms of violence, including intimidation and assassinations that are neither investigated seriously by the authorities nor criminalized. Due to social and family pressures, many teenagers—both male and female—commit suicide even before speaking their minds about their sexuality.¹ There is, indeed, a high suicide rate in Guatemala.

AIDS is one of the major health problems among LGBT people in Guatemala. In spite of many efforts by activists and organizations to educate people about AIDS and the LGBT population, social stigma, stereotyping, and violence against them still persists. The AIDS pandemic has had a negative effect on public attitudes toward homosexuality. Although some educational campaigns have been carried out, it is still commonly believed that AIDS is an epidemic that affects mainly homosexuals. Several groups and organizations, formed mainly in the 1990s, continue to fight discrimination, violence, and social stigma against LGBT people. In general terms, homosexuality is not considered illegal; however, the daily practices and violent actions against LGBT citizens say otherwise. In addition, same-sex marriage is not yet permitted. Homosexuals cannot serve openly in the military, as they are considered neither good citizens nor “real men” who could carry out the tough duties that soldiers are expected to perform.

LGBT people, both those who have come out as well as those who remain in the closet, have to face harsh social realities in Guatemala, and this may have an affect on their mental health. For this reason, some nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), such as USAID Guatemala, offer them psychological and medical assistance.² As expected, in a traditional macho society, the government and government organizations do not seem to care much about the sexual needs and care of the LGBT community in Guatemala.

Receiving a good education appears to be a privilege in Guatemala. Only students from wealthy families can attend good schools, which are usually private. Just as is the case in the broader society, if LGBT students are discovered or come out of the closet, they often become victims of nasty jokes and violent persecution by straight students. This persecution continues in the adult workplace. There have been quite a few recorded cases of LGBT workers losing their jobs due to their sexual orientation or gender identity.

EDUCATION

The education system, including the number of private and public elementary and secondary schools, is centrally controlled by the government. Public school is free, although the costs of school supplies, school uniforms, transportation, and the like has been steadily increasing, making it more difficult for the least privileged Guatemalans to continue to have access to education. The literacy rate among the total population is believed to be 69.1 percent. Many children from the middle and upper social classes go to private schools, which have better facilities and services. Guatemala has one national public university, La Universidad de San Carlos de Guatemala, in addition to nine private ones, including La Universidad del Valle and La Universidad Galileo. Although the Constitution states that there is equal education for all without discrimination, the deeply rooted macho culture and mentality practiced and experienced within the Guatemalan nuclear family helps to promote discrimination against LGBT people in the school system. Serious groups or organizations within public or private schools committed to working against discrimination toward the most vulnerable people in Guatemalan society do not seem to exist. Guatemalan society seems to teach the philosophy “each person must fend for themselves.”

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Guatemala’s natural resources include petroleum, nickel, rare woods, fish, and hydropower. Its main exports are coffee, sugar, and bananas. About one fourth of the GDP comes from the agricultural sector, whereas two-fifths and one half are based on exports and the labor force, respectively. Guatemala has enjoyed important economic reforms and macroeconomic stabilization after the signing of the 1996 peace accords. In 2006, the Central American Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) between the United States and Guatemala was initiated. Nonetheless, the inequality in the distribution of income persists, keeping about 56.5 percent of the total population below the poverty line. At present, other continuing economic challenges in Guatemala include upgrading both government and private financial operations, restraining drug trafficking, and narrowing the trade deficit. Interestingly enough, remittances from a large émigré community in the United States have become the major source of income, greater than the total value of exports and tourism combined. As of 2008, the labor force was estimated to be 3.9 million and the unemployment rate was at about 3.5 percent.³

In regard to the participation of LGBT citizens in the workplace, they can work, provided that their sexual preference is not publicly known. Should they want to keep a job, they must make sure that they do not let their sexual or gender preference show. Otherwise, LGBT Guatemalans can very easily be subjected to humiliation and job loss, and, legally speaking, very little or nothing can be done. As continues to be reported nationally and internationally, the streets of Guatemala, and those of Guatemala City in particular, are full of LGBT youth and adults who survive through prostitution; they are commonly harassed and victimized by the police or other authorities who are supposed to offer them protection against violence. A common reason for arrests or victimization of LGBT people is that they are a threat to normal social behavior.⁴ That is, they are constructed and persecuted as being inherently dangerous to the social order and common decency; therefore, they deserve what they get and are in need of regulation, treatment, and cleansing.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

In spite of the fact that the Guatemalan Constitution states that all citizens of Guatemala are offered equal education, health, work, and social benefits regardless of age, race, ethnicity, cultural background, and sex, the reality of daily social practice indicates otherwise. Although there are some NGOs that provide assistance with LGBT health and AIDS, the Guatemalan government does not provide funding for any social program intended specifically for lesbians, gays, bisexuals, transsexuals, or intersexed citizens.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Because the culture in Guatemala is so macho centered (i.e., men are the ones who have the social power and control), sexual roles are markedly divided. Both women and men have very clear sex or gender roles and any alternative sexual or gender expression that is different from the heterosexual binary is considered a serious transgression against the norm. This is the main reason why many LGBT Guatemalans are the targets of discrimination, threats, attacks, and violence, all committed with impunity. Within families, men are brought up to perform as active macho men, whereas women are brought up to perform the rather passive role, which means that, when it comes to sexual relationships and sexuality, it is the man who seems to have the last word. This tradition is passed on from generation to generation.

Virginity is an enormously important issue in conservative families in Guatemala; women (but not men) are expected to be virgins before marriage. However, the average person in Guatemala has his or her first sexual encounter between the ages of 15 and 18, and many do so without proper protection. About 40.5 percent of Guatemalans report that they were 17 years old or younger when their first sexual encounter happened.⁵ School-aged girls, sometimes as young as 12, get pregnant and have children, so their education suffers. Indeed, sexual education and sexual rights are a chief concern for the Guatemalan educational system and Guatemalan culture and society in general. Not surprisingly, given the rooted Catholic traditions and practices in regard to sexuality and sexual rights, very little about this topic is specified in the Guatemalan Constitution

Guatemalan families and family customs are very much centered on the ideas and pillars of deeply rooted Mayan traditions, Catholic religious principles, and patriarchy. Men and women have very distinct gender roles within the family circle. For instance, women are expected to be gentle and faithful to their husbands, and an act of infidelity committed by a woman is seen and considered differently from male infidelity. Female infidelity is considered more serious and punishable than male infidelity. In actuality, adulteresses are marked and punished, whereas adulterers are unmarked and not necessarily punished; that is, the legal penalties for adultery are more severe and greater for women than for men.⁶

Guatemalan wives, for the most part, have been socially constructed to depend on and obey men, a situation that can very easily lead to domestic violence. This is just one example of the violation of women's rights in Guatemala. In spite of the fact that the Guatemalan Constitution affirms the equality of all persons and equal rights and responsibilities of both women and men in a marriage, the Civil Code still makes the male the head of the household and, at the same time, enables the husband to deny his wife the right to work outside the home, as doing so would compromise her duties of housekeeper and mother.⁷ Legally formed LGBT families are yet to be seen in Guatemalan society. Also, the possibility for openly LGBT persons to adopt children is still out of the question under the Guatemalan legal system. Nonetheless, due to social prejudice, stigma, and the rigid social constructions of men and women's roles, a man or a woman may have a "normal" life with a significant other and, at the same, time, have a "double life" with a homosexual partner.

COMMUNITY

Since the advent of sexual liberation and increased tolerance toward homosexuality in countries like the United States, Central American countries have started to see some slight changes in their LGBT scene. More and more businesses and organizations geared to LGBT citizens have been opening, particularly in the capital city, although they are not totally accepted by the heterosexual population. One of these is "Pandora's Box," a recently remodeled discotheque that appears to be the first gay business to have opened in Guatemala and has survived for over 20 years; little by little it has gained acceptance, although since its beginning and for several years was the target of censorship and rejection. In Guatemala City, some bars and clubs designed predominantly for gays and lesbians have been operating for the past 10 years or so, although visitors and frequent customers have had to visit them with caution, especially late at night, precisely because they can be the target of violent acts.⁸

Because there is little acceptance and tolerance displayed towards them, LGBT people still feel stigmatized and discriminated against. This is why, primarily since the 1990s, LGBT citizens have gotten together to form alliances and organizations to create a sense of community and togetherness, to fight back, to gain visibility, and to fight for the right to be heard. The most salient of these has been the Colectivo Gay de Guatemala, which, in October 2000, changed its name to "Guatemalan Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transsexual and Transgender Community." It has subsequently grown to become one of the most important LGBT voices in Guatemala. Some other organizations of this kind include: OASIS, a Guatemalan HIV/AIDS prevention organization that focuses mostly on gay men and sex workers; Grupo Promotor del Colectivo Gay-Lésbico de Guatemala (Group for the Advancement of the Gay and Lesbian Community in Guatemala); Gente Positiva (Positive People), a group of women and men with HIV/AIDS who work together to gain more visibility and respect; Lesbiradas, an organization for lesbian and bisexual women; and Mujeres Somos (We Are Women), an organization solely for lesbians. That these organizations have been able to form, given the nature of the conservative and patriarchal society in Guatemala, is a quite an achievement.

HEALTH

At present, the national health system in Guatemala is controlled by many organizations. It is made up of the Ministerio de Salud Pública (Ministry of Public Health), The Instituto Guatemalteco de Seguridad Social (Guatemalan Institute of Social Security), the private sector, the Military Health Plan, and a major sector of traditional healers from the Mayan community. The main goal of the Guatemalan Institute of Social Security is precisely the security of the country; one of its responsibilities is to provide health care to workers and their families. There are also various NGOs offering health services through education, prevention, clinics, and hospitals. The Military Health Plan, as the name suggests, caters exclusively to the army and the police with hospitals and clinics. The traditional healers provide health services with traditional medicine based on indigenous beliefs and practices.

As noted, and for different reasons, HIV and AIDS continue to pose serious challenges to the Guatemalan people. On the one hand, the Roman Catholic Church opposes the use of condoms, which worsens with the macho belief that “real men” do not need to use condoms and reinforces the vulnerability of women who have to accept the decisions of their boyfriends and husbands. As of September 2006, it was estimated that there were about 61,000 Guatemalans infected with HIV, of whom 16,000 were women. To make matters worse, as previously noted, HIV-positive Guatemalans face social discrimination and discrimination in the workplace. In the midst of it all, some organizations do offer some assistance, but many are dependent on private funding, which is not always abundant or readily accessible.⁹

POLITICS AND LAW

According to the Guatemalan Constitution, all human beings are free and equal. On paper, men and women have the same rights regardless of their marital status, and they all have the same opportunities and responsibilities. These fair constitutional principles do not match the social reality in Guatemala today. It is well known that discrimination of all kinds against the most vulnerable citizens of the social fabric, such as women, indigenous communities, and LGBT people, does exist. There certainly must be LGBT individuals involved in politics; however, the social system forces them to remain closeted, as they know that, should they come out, the social panorama could very easily change for them. Some gay pride events, like the 2003 Gay Parade organized by Lesbiradas and demonstrations, have taken place in Guatemala City; their main goal is to be heard in regard to gaining access to the same social privileges that other citizens enjoy and, most importantly, to stop the widespread violence that makes them frequent targets in the workplace, in school, in universities, or the general social public sphere. Violence has caused a great number of LGBT citizens to go into exile in other countries, such as Spain, to some countries in South America, Mexico, Canada, or the United States.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Before the Spanish arrived in Guatemala, the Mayans had their own religion and practices associated with nature and the natural world. Interestingly enough, for the Mayans, there was no clearly marked line on gender issues; that is, for them gender and/or sex roles were somewhat ambiguous and, to some extent, interchangeable. It was not until the arrival of the Spanish that sexuality and gender divisions began to be imposed upon an already structured society. The Spanish conquest also imposed Catholicism on the Mayans, converting a great number of them to Christianity. Even though some Mayan religious traditions are still practiced today, since the earthquake of 1976, some evangelical Christian groups have flourished in Guatemala and continue to transform Mayan religious practices and rituals. Nonetheless, as a result of the wave of dictatorships in Guatemala, the Catholic Church has continued to gain and maintain power; this has not been a highly positive result for a large sector of the population.

LGBT Guatemalans can be as religious and as spiritual as heterosexual Guatemalans. The Catholic Church, the largest religious institution in Guatemala, however, does not accept or approve of LGBT identities or sexual practices. For the Catholic Church, the existence of LGBT people and behavior continues to be seen as a threat and a deviation from the compulsory heterosexual binary. In spite of their rejection of homosexuality, it is not a secret that members of the Catholic Church hierarchy continue to be singled out for their homosexual behaviors, or for having relationships with minors. This situation, along with several others related to child molestation, is still on the rise and very little or nothing is being done by the authorities in the country.¹⁰ Indeed, the Catholic Church in Guatemala continues to be one of the institutions that has radically opposed same-sex practices, marriages, and unions throughout history.

VIOLENCE

Guatemalans have endured a series of violent episodes throughout their history. Since the arrival of the Spanish conquistadores around 1518 to the present, the Guatemalan social scene has been plagued by violent acts in many forms and degrees. This widespread violence has been inflicted upon the most vulnerable and marginalized citizens of the social system, namely children, youth, indigenous communities, women, the elderly, and the LGBT population. Since January 2002, 1,183 women have been murdered, and 18 transvestites were victims of violent murder between January and June 2004. Likewise, in 2005, at least 13 transgendered women and gay men were murdered in Guatemala City alone. Similarly, citizens who have spoken their minds or opposed mainstream views and practices, particularly during periods of dictatorship, have been victims of crude violence. One example of this was the case of 19 young protesters who spoke out against the modification of the penal code and were murdered between November 2002 and March 2003. The Guatemalan Constitution states that there is freedom of speech for both men and women, regardless of their marital status; however, what international NGOs have witnessed is totally contrary to what has been written on paper.

Moreover, throughout the 20th century, indigenous cultures, human rights workers, editors, journalists, and the like have been the targets of threats, kidnapping, and murder by sociopolitical forces in power. The literary work I, Rigoberta Menchú: An Indian Woman in Guatemala (1997) by Nobel Prize Winner Rigoberta Menchú Tum, an indigenous leader in Guatemala, provides many examples of such sociopolitical violence. Indeed, there have been many reports in different media on violence against LGBT citizens in Guatemala, particularly in the urban scene of Guatemala City. Because of the lack of freedom, recognition, and opportunities, poor children and youth, lesbian, gay men, and transgendered people continue to be hidden in the shadows or have to work in prostitution in secret or on the streets, making them vulnerable to continuous threats and killings.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The Guatemalan Peace Accords were signed in October 1998, however violence in many different forms and to varying degrees continues to affect many sectors of Guatemalan civil society. In spite of the fact that many organizations, primarily NGOs, continue to combine efforts to stop violations of human rights against LGBT citizens and other persecuted members of the social fabric, social equality is yet to be seen in Guatemala. Guatemalan alternative social groups and popular cultures still have a long way to go for recognition and acceptance in the patriarchal, hegemonic society.

HAITI

Jen Westmoreland Bouchard

OVERVIEW

The island comprised of Haiti and the Dominican Republic is known as Hispaniola. Christopher Columbus first landed on the island in 1492, and it fell under Spanish rule shortly thereafter. The Spanish relinquished the western portion of Hispaniola to the French in 1697; this area later became Haiti. Thanks to the forestry and sugarcane industries, Haiti soon became one of France's wealthiest territories. During the colonial period, the French brought over hundreds of thousands of slaves from the West African colonies of Senegal and Mali. In the late 18th century, a former slave named Toussaint L'Ouverture led an historic slave revolt and gained control of Haiti, naming himself as ruler. Since that time, Haiti has experienced near-constant political turmoil.

As a result of this instability, Haiti is now one of the poorest nations in the world. The average family income is less than US$230 per year, and Haiti has one of the highest infant mortality rates in the Western Hemisphere (64 deaths per 1,000 live births).¹ Out of the country's 8,706,497 inhabitants, over one-third are without basic health care. Most of Haiti's population is underfed, and Haiti has the second-lowest per capita caloric intake in the world.² As a result of these conditions, crime, violence, and prostitution have become the norm for many within the lower strata of Haitian society.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Homosexuality carries a powerful stigma in Haiti. Haitians tend to consider homosexuals humorous and exaggerated. As a result, many homosexuals are often publicly ridiculed. The term pédé (a pejorative French term for gay) is used colloquially as an insult. This attitude is typical of Francophone Caribbean cultures. In fact, most Francophone, Hispanophone, and Anglophone Caribbean cultures are not welcoming of homosexual lifestyles. Despite this harsh social climate, a complex corpus of LGBTQ literature has developed out of the Caribbean islands. Caribbean writers who discuss homosexual themes in their work include: Dionne Brand, Michelle Cliff, Richard Fung, Gerg Henry, Sharon Lim-Hing, and Audre Lorde.³

EDUCATION

Haiti's official languages are French and Creole. French is the language of government and the upper class. The majority of lower class Haitians (many of whom do not have access to French language education) speak Haitian Creole, a language derived from French. As a result, a large sector of the population is excluded from information (government or otherwise) written in French. Only approximately 10 percent of the population is functionally literate in French, and only the elite (5%) speak French fluently. The national illiteracy rate is near 90 percent.⁴ In general, education in Haiti is relatively expensive and reserved for the French-speaking elite. Most schools are overcrowded and teachers are ill prepared to handle disciplinary and academic problems as they arise. Access to any sort of education or communication tools (such as the Internet) is scarce in Haiti and limited to the elite classes living in the larger cities. Consequently, education and information on homosexuality is virtually nonexistent.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

As one of the poorest countries in the Western Hemisphere, Haiti's employment opportunities are extremely limited. Haiti lacks the infrastructure to support a thriving economy. Roads in rural areas tend to be dangerous and unreliable at best. Many roads cannot even be used during the rainy season. With the exception of wealthy households in major cities, most Haitians do not have running water or electricity. Haiti's wealth is dominated by a privileged few. The rest of the population is forced to scavenge for jobs, and employment opportunities in the countryside are extremely limited. Therefore, many men travel to the larger cities to follow often-dubious employment leads. Upon arrival, they learn that there are few jobs to be had in the cities and end up living in slums or returning to their families in the countryside.⁵

If a known homosexual were qualified for one of the few sustainable employment opportunities to be found in Haiti, he or she would surely be denied this privilege. Homosexuals are viewed as not only ridiculous, but also as incompetent and untrustworthy.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

There is very little information available on homosexual practices in Haiti. Given Haiti's homophobic culture, one could infer that homosexual acts are performed in private and that homosexuals find out about one another through word of mouth. In both homosexual and heterosexual practices, the use of condoms is rare, which has led to the spread of AIDS throughout the island. There are several Catholic organizations operating in Haiti that preach abstinence to Haitian teens. Since there are no data on sexual practices of teenagers in Haiti, the outcome of their efforts is unknown.

FAMILY

Family life plays an important role in all Haitian social classes. In many rural communities, the extended family serves as a social outlet. Rural Haitian families typically live in community and children are raised by all of the adults in the family. However, due to the migration of many Haitians to the island's major cities (in search of employment), the shape of the family has shifted somewhat. Now, the model of the nuclear family seems to have replaced the extended family in the urban milieu.

Within the familial unit, men and women take on unique, yet complementary roles. Traditionally, women have taken care of the home and children, and men have been responsible for the finances. Men also perform heavy chores such as repair work and gathering firewood. In rural areas, it is not rare for women to work on the farm.

A typical form of marriage among Haiti's lower social classes is plasaj, a type of common-law marriage. Even if the government does not officially recognize plasaj, these unions are considered commonplace and valid among Haiti's lower social classes. Plasaj is practiced by 85 percent of the Haitian population. Depending on one's social milieu or sexual habits, an individual may have several plasaj relationships over the course of a lifetime. For example, certain plasajs are formed if a man impregnates his mistress and offers to provide support for the child. Frequently, children born from one plasaj couple consider offspring from a parent's other plasaj to be brothers and sisters.

No socially accepted "alternative" family models exist in Haiti. Therefore, homosexual couples who take on parental roles are not considered "normal" by Haitian social standards. No form of marriage, common-law or other, exists for homosexuals in Haiti.

COMMUNITY

Even though homosexuality is legal in Haiti, the majority of gay and lesbian Haitians do not feel comfortable coming out or displaying homosexual behaviors in public.

There is a definite gay and lesbian movement in Haiti. However, given the anti-gay sociopolitical climate of the country, the movement has not been able to make much headway. Though homosexuals are the objects of much humor and mockery among contemporary Haitians, anthropological studies have shown that Haitians tend to be more tolerant of gender nonconformity (transsexuals and cross-dressers are two examples) than their Latin American counterparts.⁶

HEALTH

According to a 2003 report by the Haitian government, 40 percent of Haitians are without basic health care. For every 10,000 Haitians, there are 1.2 doctors, 1.3 nurses, and 0.04 dentists. Most of these specialists reside in Port-au-Prince,

Haiti's capital.⁷ When AIDS appeared in the U.S. consciousness in the 1980s, essayist Randy Shilts proposed a theory that AIDS was transmitted to the United States via the Haitian sexual tourism industry. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, inexpensive travel packages attracted a large number of tourists to Haiti and other islands in the Caribbean, and many assumed that the sex trade in Haiti during that time was responsible for the spread of HIV/AIDS in North America. Shilts's theory was quickly countered by many, including Canadian poet Ian Young, who dismissed the theory as racist and unfounded.⁸

Today, Haiti has a much higher rate of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) than the United States. Since even basic STD treatments are too expensive for most Haitians, additional problems arise. Untreated genital ulcers caused by some STDs make it easier for HIV to spread throughout communities.⁹ In the 1990s, most Haitian men who were infected with the AIDS virus were homosexual or bisexual (or recipients of contaminated blood transfusions). However, the statistics have changed greatly over the past decade. Today, heterosexual intercourse in Haiti is the cause of more new cases of HIV/AIDS than homosexual intercourse. In 2003, four out of five men and three out of five women who were diagnosed with HIV contracted it from a heterosexual partner. There are currently 280,000 Haitians living with HIV/AIDS.¹⁰

POLITICS AND LAW

Homosexual relations have not been illegal in Haiti since the country was under French colonial rule in the 18th century.¹¹ However, same-sex marriage and domestic partnerships are not available. There are also no antidiscrimination statutes based on sexual orientation related to employment, housing, or public accommodation.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

The breakdown of religions in Haiti is as follows: 80 percent of Haitians are Roman Catholic and 16 percent are Protestant (10 percent Baptist, 4 percent Pentecostal, 1 percent Adventist, and 1 percent other), the remaining 6 percent practice other religions or are not religious. Nearly half of the Haitian population practices voodoo, either separately from or in conjunction with Christianity.¹² Although homosexuals are firmly excluded from Catholicism, they are welcomed by voodoo. Within the voodoo ritual, homosexuals are capable of becoming oun-gans and mambos (religious leaders). In fact, some ounfos (voodoo communities) in Port-au-Prince are made up of only gays and lesbians. Moreover, homosexual men are thought to be under the care of the lwa (a spirit character) of femininity, named Metres Ezili Freda Daome. Many lesbians serve Ezili Danto, who represents the independent and hard-working woman. During voodoo ceremonies, both homosexual men and women can be possessed by an lwa.

VIOLENCE

Because most Haitian homosexuals keep their sexuality a secret for fear of being shamed by their communities, violence against homosexuals is not a common occurrence. Furthermore, because most Haitian homosexuals attempt to conceal their sexual orientation, it is hard for potential perpetrators to identify victims.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Given Haiti's antigay climate, it does not seem likely that homosexuals will be able to flourish within this society. However, many gays and lesbians have been able to carve out a place for themselves within the voodoo tradition. In this way, they can freely express themselves, yet still be part of a cultural and religious community. Voodoo communities and ceremonies help give homosexuals the support and psychological resources they need to cope with the secrecy and intimidation they face on a daily basis. If a gay community does emerge in Haiti during the 21st century, it will surely emerge from this context.

HONDURAS

James Daniel Wilets

OVERVIEW

Honduras is a democratic constitutional republic located along the Caribbean coast of Central America. It also has a very short coastline along the Pacific Ocean along the Bay of Fonseca, between El Salvador and Honduras. It is bordered by Guatemala to the northwest, El Salvador to the southwest, and Nicaragua to the south and southeast. The capital of Honduras is Tegucigalpa.

Honduras has a population of 7,639,327 (July 2008 est.)¹ and a land area slightly larger than that of the U.S. state of Tennessee. Spanish is the official and predominant language, although Amerindian languages are also spoken.

Honduras's history largely tracks those of other Central American nations such as El Salvador, Costa Rica, and Guatemala. During Spanish colonial rule, Honduras was part of the Captaincy General of Guatemala, but obtained independence from Spain in 1821. It was annexed to the Mexican Empire, but in 1823 Honduras gained its independence from Mexico and joined the United Provinces of Central America. Between 1838 and 1939, the Federation collapsed due to regional strife, but regional integration remained a central goal of Honduran foreign policy until well into the 20th century.

The lack of economic development in Honduras led to extraordinary economic inequality and a marked lack of infrastructure development. The economy came to be dominated by large United States-based fruit companies and mining companies, which supported puppet authoritarian leaders that protected the companies' interests against the much more numerous landless peasants.

In 1955, after economic unrest among banana workers in northern Honduras, a military coup was staged by relatively young reformist military leaders who took steps to enact a true democracy in the country. There were efforts to separate the military from the civilian government and create a more professional military. However, in 1963, conservative military leaders deposed the reformist leaders in a strikingly violent coup. This coup was followed by El Salvador's invasion of Honduras in a short war known as the "Football War." Despite the continued rule of the conservative military junta, some progressive policies were adopted, including land reform and infrastructure development.

In 1979, the country returned to civil rule. This development, however, was quickly undermined by the United States' encouragement of Honduran involvement in the Nicaraguan contras' efforts to overthrow Nicaragua's Sandinista government. In return for substantial U.S. aid, Honduras became a base for the contras and actively worked with the U.S. military. The Honduran Commission on Human Rights later accused John Negroponte, who served as U.S. Ambassador to Honduras from 1981 to 1985, of involvement in human rights violations against both Hondurans and Americans present in the country, including religious missionaries.²

Finally, in 1986, Honduras experienced a peaceful transfer of power between civilian presidents. Honduras has remained a relatively stable democracy, although the political scene continues to be dominated by two traditional, dominant parties, the Liberal Party of Honduras (PLH) and the National Party of Honduras (PNH). There is little ideological difference between the two parties, resulting in voting based on personalities and regionalism, which only exacerbates already severe issues of corruption and a general lack of accountability.³ On June 28, 2009, President Manuel Zelaya was overthrown in a military coup and was provisionally replaced by Congressional President Roberto Micheletti.

Honduras's history has led to a political and social situation where the rule of law is highly compromised. This has particularly severe consequences for the LGBT community because the security forces, who are mandated with a mission to protect the vulnerable members of society, are themselves unable or unwilling to prevent violent and nonviolent crimes against the LGBT community; and unable or unwilling to prevent members of the security forces themselves from committing such crimes against the LGBT community. Thus, the security forces, rather than protecting the LGBT community, or at least remaining an ineffective bystander, have become a significant source of the violence and discrimination experienced by the LGBT community.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Although same gender sexual relations are not criminalized in Honduras, there is widespread discrimination against LGBT individuals by state actors, including the security forces, and by society in general.⁴

These discriminatory societal attitudes towards LGBT individuals are reflected in a high murder rate and other forms of violence against the LGBT community by those same state and nonstate entities. This situation is reflected in the 2006 U.S. Department of State Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for Honduras, released on March 6, 2007 (the “2006 Report”), which is notable in its very circumspect position on reporting human rights abuses within a country, particularly with respect to countries that are perceived as friendly to the United States.

In addition to widespread societal discrimination, human rights conditions for sexual minorities are aggravated by governmental corruption, virulent gang violence, impunity for lawbreakers, police killings of sexual minorities, and vigilante violence committed by present and former members of the security forces and other entities.⁵

Persecution and other targeting of gay and transgendered individuals by entities acting with explicit or implicit government support is widespread throughout Honduras and is not limited to a particular region.

HIV continues to be a public health problem, with Honduras suffering from the highest HIV prevalence rate in Central America.

EDUCATION

Honduras did not create a national educational system until the late 1950s. Although the Honduran Constitution now states that a free primary education is mandatory for every child between the ages of seven and 14, the Honduran educational system is the least funded and widely considered one of the least effective at accomplishing its educational mission in all of the Central American countries.⁶ According to United Nations statistics, only 32 percent of students finish primary school without repetition; 13.5 percent of children have no access to an education. Private schools have, to some extent, attempted to fill this gap in education, but there is some skepticism about the quality of those schools and they tend to be viewed primarily as profit making institutions. In spite of this, Honduras has made modest progress in combating illiteracy, with sharp reductions in adult illiteracy and increased educational opportunities for younger Hondurans.⁷

In terms of higher education, the principal public university is the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Honduras (National Autonomous University of Honduras). The principal location of the university is in the capital city, Tegucigalpa, though there are branches in La Ceiba and San Pedro Sula. In addition to the public university, there are private universities as well, although they are viewed as much less prestigious than the public university. There are no state educational programs addressing the needs of LGBT youth or adults.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Honduras is the second-poorest country in Central America with a per capita income of $3,300 according to 2007 estimates.⁸ It has an extremely unequal distribution of income and high unemployment rate; over 50 percent of the population lives below the poverty line.⁹ The economy is comprised of 55.5 percent services, 31 percent industry, and 13.5 percent agriculture.

The 2008 Human Development Index (HDI), published by the United Nations Development Programme, ranked Honduras 117th out of 179 countries in the world.¹⁰ The HDI consists of a composite measure of three variables of human development: life expectancy, education, and per capita income based on purchasing-power parity. LGBT¹¹ persons and those with HIV¹² suffer extensive and severe discrimination in the workplace.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

As one of the poorest of the Central American republics, Honduras has an overall dearth of government social programs. Given this reality, it should not be surprising that there are no government social programs specifically targeting the LGBT communities.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Honduras is a very machista society; as such there is a strong emphasis on gender roles. Some argue that the hatred of sexual minorities in general, and in Central America in particular, is based more on opposition to gender nonconformity than the specific sexual acts implicated in homosexuality per se.¹³ Accompanying this emphasis on traditional norms is a high level of domestic violence, as men attempt to enforce their dominant societal position. There is little empirical evidence on the levels of domestic violence within same-sex relationships, but the generally high level of violence within heterosexual relationships is presumably reflected in same-sex relationships.

In a society where a bipolar view of gender and gender roles is predominant, bisexuality is seen simply as a variant of the gay or heterosexual orientation, depending on whether the sexual identity role adopted by the particular individual conforms to a stereotypically perceived gay or heterosexual individual.

FAMILY

The Honduran Constitution was amended in 2005 to prohibit marriage or adoption by same-sex couples. Much of the political impetus for this change came from the growing evangelical Protestant movement in the country.¹⁴

COMMUNITY

There are a number of LGBT rights organizations in Honduras, although their members are frequently the subjects of government harassment and intimidation, including murder, beatings, and other mistreatment.¹⁵ Government hostility to LGBT organizations is reflected in the government requirement that LGBT organizations remove any reference to their LGBT advocacy work in their title or mission.¹⁶ For example, in 2007, the Secretary General of the Ministry of Governance and Justice publicly articulated the rationale for the governmental denial of a LGBT advocacy group's registration, stating that the organization's purpose was not consistent with "good custom."¹⁷ The President of the Asociacion Kukulcan, Javier Medina, filed an appeal in 2007 against the Ministry of Governance and Justice's unilateral modification in 2006 to the legal registration of Colectivo Violeta, Asociacion Kukulcan, and Asociacion de Gay, Lesbianas y Travestis that had removed references to gay rights advocacy in their registration materials.¹⁸ In 2007, according to the 2007 Report, police arbitrarily detained and arrested travesti activist Claudia Spellmant, along with seven other persons, and physically abused them.¹⁹

The Honduran governmental authorities provide no protection to the country's LGBT community and community organizations.²⁰ The U.S. government and human rights organizations have documented that the Honduran government is frequently the source of this serious violence, which includes arbitrary and/or unlawful killings²¹ and other forms of harassment.²² Although this problem is particularly acute for the country's LGBT community, the failure of the state to protect its citizens extends to the entire population.²³ The same report notes that "[t]he constitution and law prohibit arbitrary arrest and detention, but the authorities at times failed to observe these prohibitions [for everyone]."²⁴ It goes on to say that, "[a]lthough the constitution and the law prohibit such practices [torture and other cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatments or punishments], there were instances in which government officials employed them, including police beatings and other abuse of detainees."²⁵

In 1988, a loosely organized lesbian social and political network evolved into Las Hijas del Maíz, a feminist lesbian organization.

Other gay organizations formed in the Tegucigalpa and in the northern Honduran center of San Pedro Sula, a primary industrial center. In 1991, HIV activists formed the Honduran Association of Homosexuals Fighting Against AIDS. In 1994, the Grupo Prisma, a gay/lesbian social organization, was formed, with a strong focus on unity. In 1995, Colectivo Violeta was formed, consisting principally of gay men and transgendered individuals. At roughly the same time, Comunidad Gay Sanpedrana (San Pedro Sula Gay Community) began organizing community activities, including cyber cafes for queer youth.

HEALTH

Honduras has the highest rate of HIV in Central America.²⁶ It accounts for 60 percent of the AIDS cases in Central America, while only accounting for 17 percent of the region's population.²⁷ There is, however, an increasing amount of resources being devoted to HIV/AIDS programs and to efforts to provide cheaper access to antiretroviral treatments,²⁸ although these efforts have yet to demonstrate substantial improvement in the situation.

POLITICS AND LAW

Sodomy

There is no sodomy law in Honduras, although recent legal changes nevertheless give police wider discretion in harassing and arresting LGBT individuals. Moreover, the lack of rule of law effectively gives government security forces even greater latitude to harass and arbitrarily arrest LGBT individuals even without a sodomy statute.

Antidiscrimination Statutes and the Constitution

The Honduran Constitution of 1982 prohibits discrimination based on race, gender, class, or "any other discrimination that is detrimental to human dignity."²⁹ Honduran courts have never interpreted the nondiscrimination clause of the constitution as applying to sexual minorities, and in fact discrimination is widespread both in the government³⁰ and in society at large.³¹ In 2002, the Honduran government passed a statute, the "Ley de Policia y de Covivencia Social" (the Police and Citizen Coexistence Law).³² This law has contributed to harassment of LGBT organizations and individuals who attempt to associate with one another.³³

Bisexuals

In Honduras society, there is no social or political movement particularly focused specifically on bisexuals, as opposed to LGBT individuals in general.

Societal and state actors for discrimination, violence, and death in Honduras and much of Central America have, particularly targeted transsexuals, or travestís. There are three primary concerns surrounding this community.

The intolerant attitude is the most applicable for hatred against those who are perceived as the most embracing their sexual nonconformity, one of the most prominent examples being travestís. This view is supported by the reality that same-gender sexual relations are not considered out of bounds in all aspects of Honduran society (and elsewhere), so long as they do not otherwise violate gender norms.³⁴ Examples of this attitude can be seen in the numerous instances of rape of travestís and gay individuals by purportedly heterosexual assailants, and the extensive incidence of same-gender sexual relations in prisons. It is only the individual who is perceived as passive in the sexual activity, or who actively embraces the idea of forming a relationship with an individual of the same gender, that is considered to be an appropriate target of antigay violence. Travestís, for many in Honduran society, and Central America in general, are the quintessential embodiment of the gender nonconformity that is at the heart of what the society perceives as a threat to the social order.

Second, travestís are more visible in society and are visible in a manner that is perceived as taunting the larger society. Thus, the public expression of a travestí's identity is not perceived as an individual's free expression of her own identity, but rather an assault on the larger societal order. In a society where each level of the social hierarchy has demonstrated a deep insecurity about its continued status in that hierarchy, every perceived threat against a particular social order is taken extremely seriously. It is possible that as Honduras's democratic institutions develop and the society becomes more securely pluralistic, this rampant insecurity will lessen.

Third, travestís can be violently assaulted with impunity. Although this is somewhat true for all sexual minorities in Honduras, it is particularly true for the travestí community. The public display of one's identity is frequently perceived as an offensive act, rather than one of identity, and therefore there is a sense among many in the police forces and society in general that travestís "deserve" whatever treatment they receive.

Although intersexed people exist in Honduras, no particular political or social movement in Honduras focuses specifically on the issues related to intersexuality, separately from the issues facing travestís.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Like most countries in Latin America, Roman Catholicism is the dominant religion in Honduras, with adherents numbering 97 percent of the population and a growing Protestant population constituting the remaining three percent. Religion has a strong influence on the political system.³⁵ The Evangelical Federation, a grouping of 180 evangelical churches in Honduras, has urged the government to withdraw official government recognition from any LGBT organization.³⁶

VIOLENCE

Honduras is one of the most violent countries in Latin America, and the level of violence continues to increase substantially.³⁷ The U.S. government, the Canadian government, and human rights organizations have documented that violence, including murder, against sexual minorities is particularly widespread.³⁸ LGBT individuals are powerless to stop the violence against them because of the ability of government and societal actors to kill or physically attack them with impunity. The number of murders reported is considered to be underreported because of the fear of sexual minorities towards the security forces. The 2007 State Department Report documents that the official numbers of LGBT victims of violence are likely substantially lower than the actual figures because of government intimidation of LGBT victims, fear of reprisal for those reporting violent assaults, police corruption, and fear of reporting by LGBT individuals³⁹ since the police and security forces are frequently the perpetrators.

Freedom House, a widely respected human rights organization founded in 1941,⁴⁰ has documented that unlawful killings and other violations of civil liberties are widespread in Honduras. Freedom House has also documented that many of these abuses are committed by police and security forces, as well as gang members. The abuses include unlawful killings, detainee abuse, disappearance of political opponents, a lack of due process, and lengthy pretrial detention.⁴¹ Freedom House also notes that the situation is aggravated by impunity for those who commit these acts.⁴²

In April 2007, a group of five men attacked travestí activist Josef Fabio Estrada. Numerous reports indicate that the police officers present were laughing and encouraged the men to continue their violent assault. Police were reported to be yelling “Mátalo a este maricón, golpéenlo!” (“Kill the faggot, beat him!”).⁴³

The Honduran LGBT community, like its counterpart in El Salvador⁴⁴ and other Central American countries, faces an additional threat from gangs, many of whose members originated in the United States and who were deported to Honduras from the United States.⁴⁵ Gang members frequently target sexual minorities for murder or other violent crimes motivated by at least four reasons: initiation into the gang, the impunity they enjoy in committing such crimes against sexual minorities as opposed to other targets, hatred or psychosexual fear of gay people, or simply for pecuniary gain.

Violence against women is also widespread and severe in Honduras.⁴⁶ Gendered violence is reflected in extremely high rates of domestic abuse, including murders of wives by husbands. Amnesty International has reported that nearly one third of women who formally submitted complaints to the authorities regarding domestic abuse were ultimately murdered by their spouses.⁴⁷

Much of the governmental abuses against its citizens, and their organized communities and organizations, can be attributed to the lack of effective rule of law in the country. The 2007 State Department Report notes that “[t]he law provides criminal penalties for corruption; however, the government did not implement the law effectively, and officials engaged in corrupt practices with impunity.”⁴⁸

The lack of rule of law particularly affects the LGBT community, since the generally hostile societal attitudes permeate the government as well. LGBT groups have documented that “security force, governmental agencies, and private employers engaged in antigay discriminatory hiring practices.”⁴⁹ The World Policy Institute has reported that the “[H]onduran police frequently charge . . . gay men (and occasionally lesbians) with offending ‘morality and public decency’ if they are seen expressing physical affection in public.”⁵⁰

The near-term outlook for the LGBT community in Honduras is not particularly bright. Part of the reason for this relatively bleak outlook is that Honduras’s social and economic variables are considerably worse than its Central American neighbors. Without a strong middle class that has extensive interaction with the rest of the world, Honduras is likely to continue to be relatively, although not completely, isolated from the inexorable progressive changes affecting some of its neighbors.

There have been incremental gains in community organizing, although the harassment and violence experienced by LGBT organizations render their effectiveness limited. Moreover, Honduras, even more so than its most machista neighbors, suffers from an extraordinarily high rate of violence against women, which political science and sociological research shows is highly correlated with attitudes and violence toward sexual minorities.⁵¹

JAMAICA

Natalie D. A. Bennett

OVERVIEW

Jamaica is the third-largest country in the Caribbean, with a geographic landmass extending 4,400 square miles. The island nation is located in the western part of the Caribbean Sea, lying 90 miles south of Cuba and 110 miles east of Haiti; it is a one-hour flight from Miami, Florida. The island's topography is varied, including coastlines, swamps, fertile valleys, plains, tropical rainforests, and mountain ridges. Jamaica has one of the highest mountain ranges in the region, the Blue Mountains, which reach a maximum elevation of 7,402 feet.

Jamaica was originally named Xaymaca (which means "land of wood and water") by indigenous Taino peoples, and the arrival of Christopher Columbus on the island's north coast in 1494 brought tremendous changes to the physical, cultural, and demographic landscape. The indigenous peoples were decimated by Spain's brutal occupation; trading ports were established to accommodate European merchants, politicians and pirates arrived seeking new means of wealth and political power; and the expansion of the transatlantic slave trade by British slavers brought people from the west coasts of Africa to work on plantations designed to provide wealth to the British Empire.

Following decades of rebellions, revolt, and agitation by enslaved persons, Britain's parliament formally ended its participation in the slave trade effective March 25, 1807. Thirty years later, a policy to end slavery began with an "apprenticeship" period in August 1834, and ended in full freedom in August 1838, after much protest by former enslaved persons and British abolitionists. Jamaica endured five centuries of turbulent yet prosperous colonial rule by Spain and Britain before being granted political independence from Britain in 1962.

Jamaica is divided into 14 parishes, which are the primary administrative units; these are distributed across three counties (Cornwall, Middlesex, and Surrey). The capital city is Kingston; the largest metropolitan area encompasses Kingston, St. Andrew, and St. Catherine. Montego Bay, which is in the northwestern parish of St. James, was designated a city in 1977. Currently, more than half of the country's population—a total of 2.67 million—lives in one of these urban centers. Other major towns and population centers include Ocho Rios (St. Ann), May Pen (Clarendon), Mandeville (Manchester), and Savanna-la-mar (Westmoreland).

The population of Jamaica is primarily of African descent. The major racial/ethnic categories and composition are black, Indian, Chinese, white, mixed, and other. Besides the descendants of the Irish, Scottish, and English planter class and enslaved Africans, subsequent groups migrated to Jamaica from India, China, Syria, Lebanon, and Germany as indentured workers, laborers, merchants, refugees, farmers, and entrepreneurs from the mid-19th to the mid-20th centuries. The largest groups of such migrants were brought from India as indentured workers in order to replace the Afro-Jamaicans who had fled the plantations after emancipation. Chinese laborers were also brought to supplement the workforce, but anti-Chinese hostilities among Afro-Jamaicans soon ended this migration.

The country's official motto "Out of Many, One People" was adopted in 1962 at the moment of Jamaica's independence from Britain, and emphasizes a single national and cultural identity; however, tensions do exist about whether Jamaica is a black or a multiracial nation. Universal suffrage was granted to Jamaicans in 1944, while they were still considered colonial subjects of Britain.

Intergroup dynamics between Afro-Jamaicans and descendants of other immigrant groups are shaped by legacies of racism and economic inequality, as a result of more than three centuries of a plantation-based system that was stratified by class and color; the lowest socioeconomic status was accorded to dark-skinned Afro-Jamaicans; this level was shared with the descendants of Indian indentured workers. Immigrants from Europe quickly became members of the ownership classes. Racial/racist caricatures remain a feature of everyday life in Jamaica, and are frequently expressed in jokes, cartoons, names, and social commentary.¹ In general, social class (defined by the interaction of occupation, education, and family lineage), skin color, and cultural capital strongly influence individuals' access to opportunities for social mobility. One pernicious legacy of colonialism and slavery is the persistence of the color hierarchy, which is based on the assignment of higher social status and privilege to "brown" persons, who are descendants of intermarriages between Europeans, immigrant groups, and mixed-race Jamaicans, and ranking them above darker-skinned persons with African phenotypes. In recent years, the phenomenon of skin bleaching among dark-skinned Jamaicans, and particularly among women and young gay men in urbanized areas, has emerged as a strategy for navigating and perhaps moving up the social hierarchy of desirability.²

Spoken language is also used to demarcate one's social status in Jamaica. While the official language is English, Jamaican Creole is the language used by most persons, especially working-class and poorer people, in everyday communication. Jamaican Creole (also referred to as Patwa) is an amalgam of European and West African languages and is indigenous and distinct from other Creole languages in the region. In recent times, it has also been influenced by African American urban vernacular. Jamaican Creole is also the medium through which cultural traditions and ideals are expressed, from folk sayings to dancehall music. Fluency in Jamaican Standard English is achieved through education and is often taken as an indicator of employability and social status.³ Given the ubiquitous, albeit paradoxical, nature of Jamaican Creole, it is not surprising that it is often the chosen mode of expression for extreme emotions or unadulterated thoughts: sexual humor, name-calling, and abusive language are generally expressed in Patwa. For example, the term "batty man," which literally translates as "a man who likes bottoms/anal sex," is the common derogatory term for a homosexual man. Women who are suspected of being homosexual are called "man royals" (or "royals," for short) or "sodomites"; the term lesbian entered the local vernacular only in the past decade or so. Nonetheless, the use of Jamaican Creole is often considered a problem; many regard it as broken English and a symptom of poor education. There is also intense debate regarding whether it should be considered a language and formally be taught in schools.

Since the 1960s, urban-based cultural and anticolonial nationalist movements have critiqued the dominant Eurocentric values and orientation of Jamaican society. Although there has been much resistance to ideas about Black Power and Afrocentrism, most aspects of social life—from beauty contests, national heroes, and government-sponsored cultural celebrations, to national monuments, literary and visual arts, and styles of dress—have been affected, or even revised, based on these movements. Reggae music and its recent offspring dancehall music continue to shape urban music cultures around the world and are now considered legitimate topics of academic study. Both the reggae and dancehall spheres are dominated by men from the urban ghettos of Kingston, and operate as spaces for reinforcing and contesting mainstream ideas of Jamaican identity, as well as settings that offer insight into the lived experiences of urban, disenfranchised Jamaicans. Since the early 1990s, gender, sexuality, and violence—often together—have been the main foci within the music. The mainstream and religious critiques of dancehall as "slackness" (i.e. sexually explicit, violent, vulgar and antiestablishment) has led to various attempts by government and corporate sponsors to censor the work of targeted artists, to withdraw their support from entire events, and to ban particular songs or words from being broadcast over public airwaves. It is notable that songs containing derogatory language or exhorting violence against gay men and lesbians are not included in this ban.⁴ Nonetheless, reggae and dancehall music continue to thrive in Jamaica and the Caribbean diaspora, and have become a lightning rod for controversy regarding the recent trend of musicians using the songs to deliver trenchant attacks against LGBT persons.⁵

The dominant religion in Jamaica is Christianity, ranging from mainline denominations such as Anglican, Methodist, and Baptist, to millenarian and fundamentalist groups such as Seventh Day Adventists, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Church of God. Conservative interpretations of biblical scripture are widely embraced by observant and nonobservant persons alike, and influence all areas of public life, including the government. Other faith communities include Judaism, Islam, Buddhism, the Ethiopian Coptic Church, Rastafarianism, and indigenous groups like Pocomania and Myal, also known as Revivalism.

Jamaica has a parliamentary democracy. Elected officials serve as members of Parliament, the body responsible for all decision-making on public policy, organization, and resources at the national level. There are three branches of government: the executive (led by the Prime Minister and an appointed Cabinet), the legislative (a bicameral parliament composed of the Prime Minister, an appointed Senate, and elected House of Representatives), and the judiciary (based on English common law, with a Privy Council located in London, England; Court of Appeal; Supreme, Revenue, Family, Traffic, and Resident Magistrates' Courts; and Petty Sessions). The Jamaica Constabulary Force (JCF) is the policing unit, and has primary responsibility for daily security. The Jamaica Defense Force (JDF) is the military arm responsible for national defense. Jamaica is a member of the British Commonwealth of Nations, a body composed of former colonies of Britain. The Governor-General represents the British Crown, and is the titular head of state; this person is appointed by the Prime Minister and serves a purely ceremonial role.

The two major political parties, the Jamaica Labor Party (JLP) and the People's National Party (PNP) have dominated the system since independence. The majority of politically active persons ally themselves with one of these parties. Historically, the PNP has followed a more populist agenda, embarking on a program of democratic socialism in the 1970s, and identifying itself as a party "for the people." For example, the PNP has made the social welfare of the citizens its primary focus, addressing issues of poverty, education, housing, employment, and land redistribution, and enacting various legal protections for women and children. PNP rule in the 1970s was accompanied, and supported, by various attempts to mobilize social rights, especially by and on behalf of women, gays and lesbians, workers, intellectuals, and other marginalized groups.

The JLP has largely been the party of the cultural and economic elite, adopting conservative free market capitalist positions that have primarily benefited the corporate class and promoted private and foreign ownership of key national resources. While these ideological positions were somewhat undermined toward the end of the 1980s with the economic downturn and introduction of liberalization policies through loan agreements with the International Monetary Fund, each political party retains some commitment to its core philosophies and constituencies.

Other political parties, such as the Workers' Party of Jamaica, the New Democratic Movement, and the Imperial Ethiopian World Federation Incorporated Political Party have emerged over time, speaking to ideological positions not reflected in the mainstream political arena. In the years of Jamaica's political independence, the PNP has been the governing party for the largest number of years: from 1972–1980, and then the longest stretch from 1989–2007. During its regime, the PNP presided over the unraveling of the major social reforms it had instituted in previous years, a weakening state, increased corruption and state violence, declining social and human rights, and a liberalized economy leaning heavily towards foreign ownership and control. Despite evidence to the contrary, many have perceived the PNP as being somewhat more favorably inclined towards the goals of sexual equality. It was under the PNP government that the question of revising the constitution to include protections for sexual orientation became an issue of contention, but the then-head of state, P. J. Patterson, did not support such a proposition. After more than 30 years of political participation and despite criticisms of her educational background and her populist appeal, Portia Simpson-Miller became the first woman to be elected Prime Minister in 2006. While she vocalized the need for broader support for the economic and social rights of women, no specific policies or legislation were enacted to put these ideas into effect. The JLP, under the leadership of Bruce Golding, was elected as national government in November 2007. Under his leadership, the government continues to take a strong, proactive stance against the full inclusion of LGBT persons in Jamaican society.

Since the 1960s, the economic system has ebbed and flowed, steadily shifting from one dominated by export agriculture (mostly bananas and sugar) to mineral exports (bauxite and alumina), to the current mix where tourism and hospitality industries are the mainstays, with new growth in telecommunication and financial services. Together these sectors account for 60 percent of the Gross Domestic Product (GDP).⁶ Since beginning a nearly 20-year relationship with the International Monetary Fund in 1977, Jamaica has undergone several changes, including the divestment of government-run entities, such as electricity, telephone, and manufacturing companies, and increased foreign ownership of the country's resources. In the wake of a series of financial crises in the 1990s, Jamaica's external debt rose dramatically.⁷ Currently, Jamaica is the fourth-most indebted country in the world, with debt in excess of US$14 billion dollars, which is approximately one-and-a-half times its gross domestic product. More than 50 percent of all revenue goes toward paying off debts owed to several international lending countries and institutions. Earnings from tourism and remittances from émigrés make the largest contribution to the Jamaican economy, each totaling up to 20 percent of the GDP.⁸ The revenue from these sectors is currently in decline, as they are heavily influenced by the state of the U.S. economy. Given the steady decline in economic productivity across all sectors, the current JLP government has aggressively courted foreign investment in mining and tourism, especially the cruise-ship industry, which in turn has harmed both Jamaican workers as well as physical environment, especially the destruction of the habitats of native species.⁹

Widening economic inequality since the 1990s has produced a larger educated middle class and an urban underclass characterized by inadequate education, low literacy skills, entrenched poverty, deteriorating living conditions, gang warfare, drug trafficking, as well as increased police violence and human rights violations.¹⁰ For the working-age population (i.e., those 14 years and older), the unemployment rate is conservatively estimated at 15 percent, with more than 30 percent of the population reportedly underemployed.¹¹ While there is considerable debate about whether women's achievements in education are occurring at higher rates than, and therefore at the expense of, men's national statistical data shows that women are still more than twice as likely to be un- and underemployed as men.¹² Unemployment among youth (especially young men) has become more acute in recent years, fed by declining quality of schools, increasing illiteracy and drop-out rates, job scarcity, job-skills mismatch, and the changing value of many sex-typed low skill jobs. For example, until the early 1990s, gas station attendants were primarily men; currently, more women than men apply for and secure these jobs. Widespread political corruption and a lack of investment in the social infrastructure has created fertile ground for crimes including gang violence, trafficking in drugs, weapons, and people, petty crime, and homicide.

Since the early 20th century, Jamaicans have been emigrating to England and North America for access to social mobility abroad, or to maximize their opportunities upon return to Jamaica. The 1980s saw a dramatic increase in outward migration, the net effect of which has been a significant brain drain of nurses, teachers, and persons with a college education. Some consequences of this outward movement include increased local dependence on imported goods and remittances and fragmented family networks, which often span several countries and cities. Ease of travel and communication through access to wireless and digital communication technologies (e.g., cell phones, Internet, radio, video, etc.) has helped to intensify feelings of nostalgia and patriotism among Jamaican immigrants, many of whom are actively involved in local debates (e.g., whether the sodomy laws should be removed from the constitution). Various groups have also been organizing and lobbying for recognition of “the diaspora” as a political constituency that would have say in matters of national governance.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

The terms lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender have only recently come into use by Jamaicans to describe themselves or to talk about sexual orientation. More frequent references are made to gay and, to a lesser extent, lesbian as descriptors of sexual behavior and erotic attraction rather than as identity categories. Like the term “homophobia,” these terms emerged in historically specific contexts outside of Jamaica, and thus are not directly applicable to how same-sex sexual orientation is experienced and understood in Jamaica. Nonetheless, the shorthand term “LGBT” is used as a matter of convenience here until there is much better understanding of sexuality in relation to Jamaica’s social and cultural landscape.

Social antipathy toward persons of same-sex sexual orientation has noticeably increased in recent years and is routinely and commonly expressed through physical and rhetorical violence, pejorative language, harassment, and incitement to harm. Since the late 1990s, the radio airwaves, classrooms, newspaper columns, family dinners, political speeches, courtrooms, chance encounters between strangers, popular music, counseling offices, and prayer services have often served as venues for the promotion of antihomosexual sentiments.¹³ It is within this context that the sexual identities of LGBT individuals are being forged and politicized, often pitting them against families, friends, coworkers, each other, and the broader society. In turn, there have been various attempts by LGBT individuals to create spaces—social, political, and cultural—to mitigate the loneliness, isolation, anxiety, and danger posed by the widespread stigmatization of homosexuality. These efforts are often clandestine and mostly short-lived, re-emerging in new forms in order to escape the persistent threats against a growing but still vulnerable community.

The terrain that LGBT persons travel in Jamaica is a complicated one; in this setting, the characterization of Jamaica as a homophobic society does little to aid in understanding the ways attitudes about same-sex sexual orientation are being formed and expressed; the concept certainly does not reveal how LGBT Jamaicans themselves might reasonably respond in the dominant social and political climate as described. On one hand, anger, verbal abuse, chastisement (called “judgments”), and physical violence are the methods by which most individuals and organizations make their attitudes known on any issue that sufficiently provokes them. The most visible targets of hostilities to perceived same-sex sexual orientation in public are usually homosexual men. This is in part because there is higher tolerance for diverse gender displays among Jamaican women; women are perceived in more ambivalent terms than men. Variations in men's gender displays are taken as an indication of deviant sexual orientation.¹⁴ On the other hand, it would be inaccurate to say that lesbians are somehow safer and protected by their gender simply because there are fewer publicized events where women are the targets of physical violence that is driven by antihomosexual attitudes. For example, the brutal deaths of Phoebe Myrie and Candice Williams in 2006, at the hands of Candice's former male lover, show that violence motivated by antihomosexual feelings often works in concert with other socially recognized forms of violence against women.¹⁵ Since the sexual harassment of women in public is so ubiquitous that it is not named as such, and since sexual violence against women and girls is consistently ignored and underrecognized in law, as well as underreported to and under-investigated by the official authorities, it will take much more effort than reliance on crime statistics and images of scarred, mutilated male bodies to understand the complete picture regarding the nature and extent of violence against LGBT persons in Jamaica.

Similarly, public sentiments expressed in newspapers and on radio talk shows do not usually make distinctions among LGBT persons, whether from outside of or within Jamaica. The victims of the mob violence and other attacks that have been broadcast around the world to demonstrate the extent of Jamaica's homophobic environment are quite specific; they have been primarily working-class men. The perpetrators shown, or assumed, also tend to be persons from poor and working-class backgrounds and communities. In general then, conclusions about LGBT lives in Jamaica have been extrapolated from these specific events and have over-emphasized one source of the hostility, homophobia, emerging from specific social groups, while allowing the effects of other aspects—economic oppression, sexism, religious fundamentalism, and nationalism—to be ignored or misrecognized.

For example, the media frenzy and the highly publicized deaths of Brian Williamson and Peter King, both of whom were brown elite men, suggest that class status may not have the protective effect that is often claimed by Jamaicans of all class backgrounds. That is, middle-class gay men may not be as insulated from violence and harassment as one might imagine; it is more likely that they are able to manage their sexual lives—and the related trauma—beyond the public's gaze. More than anything, it is the mainstream media's deferential attitudes towards elites that work to protect men and women of those social groups from undue media exposure, while simultaneously overexposing the violence committed by and against poor and working-class homosexual men.

Since most of LGBT life in Jamaica unfolds beyond of the scope of the camera lenses and public discourse, the picture that has been created about LGBT persons in Jamaica so far is incomplete and quite skewed. Notably missing are the experiences of women, middle and upper-class Jamaicans, and youth. The experiences of LGBT persons in the less visible settings—at work, in congregations, in families of origin as well as families of choice, intimate partnerships, and so on—are no less important, but have yet to be examined with any seriousness. On this basis, it becomes readily evident that the characterization of Jamaica as “the most homophobic country on earth” by LGBT groups in North America and Europe gives short shrift to how LGBT Jamaicans are navigating multiple arenas of social life. On the flipside, there is much public denial within Jamaica about the extent of the marginalization and victimization of LGBT persons. This has the effect of both rebuffing the external critiques of “rampant homophobia” and perpetuating the invisibility of LGBT persons, and denying the validity of the negative treatment they experience. Conspicuously yet unrecognized by both the critics and defenders of homophobia is the steadfast resilience and creativity of LGBT Jamaicans who live out their lives in their birthplace. These experiences are no less valid or meaningful than those of gay and lesbian Jamaicans who have sought political asylum elsewhere on the basis of persecution due to sexual orientation.

For all the reasons noted, reliable research and public information on the lives of LGBT persons in Jamaica is scant. Thus, the task of creating a body of knowledge—including academic research, community histories, archives, works of literature, arts, and other creative activities—which documents the lives and struggles of LGBT Jamaicans is essential to the ongoing movement for full social equality and inclusion.

EDUCATION

Until the 1950s, the majority of working class and poor Jamaicans did not have access to adequate, or sometimes any, schooling. Only students from elite families were able to obtain a secondary and tertiary education in a British-run system. In 1972, Prime Minister Michael Manley introduced several wide-scale reforms, the most significant of which were to make primary, secondary, and tertiary education free and accessible to all, to subsidize the cost of uniforms, transportation, and meals for socially disadvantaged children, and to improve adult literacy. Adult literacy currently stands at 80 percent, meaning that at least 20 percent of persons 15 years and older are unable to read and write adequately.

Since the 1980s, limited financial resources and a lack of political will have led to the deterioration of the government-funded school system; governmental expenditures on education have declined from over 20 percent in the 1970s to approximately 9 percent in 2005. Private schools are completely fee-based and selective; these are generally reserved for children of the upper-middle classes and elites, diplomats, and foreign nationals. Private schools provide students with a direct pipeline into tertiary institutions; the majority of students emigrate to attend college and university in North America or Europe. The following discussion concerns publicly funded institutions.

While various efforts have been made to remove some of the structural barriers that produced unequal quality of and access to education among primary and secondary schools (e.g., subsidizing exam fees, building more schools, changing the examination format), the education system continues to be plagued with problems such as overcrowded classrooms, declining physical infrastructure, low attendance and retention rates among the poorest children, inadequate training of teachers, inefficient administration, low motivation among teachers, and increasing school violence, especially in boys’ and mixed-gender schools.

School attendance is not mandatory; education is still treated as the purview of individual families. As recently as 2006, then-Prime Minister Portia Simpson-Miller proposed major school reforms including making school attendance compulsory for school-age children. However, children living in poor and rural households are far less likely to attend regularly and to complete their schooling, even at the primary level. Girls are more likely than boys to complete the fifth grade.¹⁶ To date, the policy of mandatory education has not been implemented.

There is a three-tiered system of education in Jamaica. Funding for public schools at the primary (basic through grade 6) and secondary levels (first through fifth form, equivalent to grades 7–11) is subsidized by the national government and supplemented by fees assessed to each student. Midway through the sixth grade, students take the Grade Six Achievement Test (GSAT), which determines whether and which type of secondary institution they will attend, as well as their chances for attending university later on. Students' scores and social background directly affect whether they are placed in traditional, hybrid ("upgraded"), or technical/vocational schools. Students may shift between mixed-gender and single-gender schools over their educational lifetime. Traditional high schools, which are perceived as better academically, are generally single-sex; the majority of the schools are designated for girls.

Students graduate from secondary school at around the age of 17, after being tested in academic subjects of their choice in the General Certificate Examination (GCE) and Caribbean Examination Council (CXC); these exams are fee-based. Exiting from secondary school is also stratified; while all students take the Caribbean Secondary Education Certificate (CSEC) examination, those who attend the "upgraded" high schools are less likely to demonstrate competencies in math, English, and social studies than those students enrolled at the traditional high schools. The former are also less likely to be eligible to take the Caribbean Advanced Proficiency Examination (CAPE), which is highly required for entry into tertiary institutions.

In general, girls are more likely than boys to be encouraged to believe that education determines their life chances. Not surprisingly, many more young women aspire to and seek out postsecondary educational opportunities than do young men.

Most of the tertiary institutions are co-educational, but some teachers' colleges are single-sex, admitting only women. Because these institutions have entrance requirements that are based on exam scores, only a small proportion of students who successfully completed high school and take the exams are able to attend these institutions. All the institutions are fee-based but are subsidized by the government and the private sector. The vast majority of university students are women, although the balance shifts within specific academic programs. Most educational institutions also have a religious affiliation (Baptist, Church of God, United Church, Seventh Day Adventist, etc.) or explicitly promote religious belief as a part of students' participation.

Several structural inequalities in the educational system produce dramatically different outcomes for boys and girls and reproduce socioeconomic differences along the way; these also have particular implications for gay and lesbian students. The first is the school environment. Despite claims to the contrary, students are tracked in the Jamaican school system. Girls and boys who are able to attend the traditional high schools experience a better quality education, less corporal punishment, less verbal abuse, and generally develop better social skills. Within these schools, there is high degree of pressure to conform to normative gender and sexual identities. These rules are enforced at every level, from the school's public identity, religious affiliation, and structure of classroom interaction, to its curricular content and peer groups. As such, students are subjected to an inordinate amount of social control that strongly dissuades any fruitful exploration of their sexuality or disclosure of non-normative sexualities. Any such disclosure or questioning is typically met with social disapproval and stigmatization. Students who are suspected or presumed to be gay or lesbian may be subject to teasing, sexual harassment, physical intimidation, and violence by their peers.

Because traditional high schools, more so than the other high schools, are given the task of reproducing the dominant ideas about gender and respectability in the society, the level of scrutiny of students in traditional high schools is fairly high, coming from both media and ordinary citizens alike. The pressure on children within these institutions to conform to idealized notions of masculinity and femininity is reflected in and enhanced by the media reports designed to scare ordinary citizens, politicians, and families of children attending these schools. In 2006, Jamaica Gleaner, one of the national newspapers, presented unsubstantiated anecdotal information on same-sex sexuality, which the paper characterized as a “fungus” that was “going rampant” and “spreading” across the traditional girls’ high schools in Kingston. Principals’ responses to these rumors of girls’ sexual orientation ranged from denial and defensiveness of their school’s identity, to punishment (i.e., expulsion of girls from school) to explicit policies of discrimination. In the latter case, girls who were suspected or who were “professing lesbians” were routinely denied promotion into one of the slots for the highly competitive Sixth Form, the preparatory level for entrance to university.

While most girls in these schools seem to echo the antipathies about same-sex orientation expressed by their teachers—using terms such as “nasty” or blasphemy to characterize lesbian relationships—many also resist the policing of the students’ sexual identities by refusing to betray their scorned peers. From the pointed responses of lesbian and bisexual young women (e.g., declaring their presence by writing on bathroom walls and other public areas and creating their own social groups), it appears that lesbian and bisexual young women have been able to claim spaces of autonomy, however limited, within the constraints of school-based peer culture.

Research on gender-based violence in Jamaican schools show that girls experience regular sexual harassment (touching of their breasts, hips, and buttocks, “grinding” on them) by male peers to the extent that many girls come to think of these violations as normative. Furthermore, the pervasive nature of male teachers making sexual advances toward school-aged girls has prompted politicians to introduce the controversial term of “sexual grooming” into the revised Sexual Offences Act in order to criminalize such conduct.¹⁷ Given that this same statute criminalizes sex between men and was also changed to define sexual contact in explicitly heterosexual terms, it is unclear whether the term would be applied to situations where the teacher and child are the same gender. For boys, the school environment they encounter does not permit the level of uncertainty and debate—however covert—that is more evident in girls’ schools. Whether in traditional or “upgraded” co-ed high schools, the incidence of verbal and physical harassment and violence directed against boys who are perceived as soft is a virtually fixed aspect of boys’ schooling, whether they are the targets, harassers, or onlookers. Adolescent boys who fail to adequately demonstrate normative heterosexual and masculine qualities such as engaging in explicit sex talk with peers or displaying verbal or physical aggression against other boys (and girls) are rewarded with anything from physical threats to accusations from fellow classmates of being “batty-men” or derogatory remarks meted out by teachers. Those who refuse to toe the line or who do not deny their homosexuality quickly and forcefully enough are subject to ongoing teasing and harassment. For the most part, these dynamics in the schools go unnoticed and unaddressed by educators and parents alike. The noticeable rise in violence at the traditional boys' high schools is related to this question of the policing of sexuality, but has received little attention.¹⁸ Even with the escalation in violence against children inside and outside schools, it is unlikely that parents, teachers, or the affected students will take any steps to redress this problem soon. Concerning these issues of school safety, the stance of the current Minister of Education, Andrew Holness, on homosexuality virtually assures that gay and lesbian students will still have far less protection and fewer avenues through which to demand that their safety is guaranteed by administrators, teachers, or school-based security personnel.

Inadequate social support for students experiencing psychological distress in schools also means that LGBT students, as well as students living in LGBT families, will have fewer opportunities to make sense of the source of the distress or to develop collective solutions to navigate the hostile school environment. Withdrawal and isolation can also put gay and lesbian students at higher risk for low academic achievement and for dropping out of school, especially if they attend the upgraded schools where the co-ed school environment is much more punitive and unforgiving.

Lack of confidentiality in the school environment also makes it difficult for students to seek assistance from teachers or guidance counselors. This issue has been particularly important issue for HIV-positive students who are especially reluctant to talk to either teachers or guidance counselors about the problems they experience because of what they experience and observe: teachers failing to inquire about a student's well-being, turning a blind eye to the teasing and harassment by other students, and openly discussing the personal matters of other students. It is highly likely that these scenarios exist for gay and lesbian students as well. Since gay and lesbian students are not members of a protected category, they are likely to be subjected to extreme measures of discrimination and harassment by students and teachers alike, without legal or other recourse.

Students' self-disclosure of sexual orientation to parents and family members is also likely to cause undue emotional and physical harm. Family responses might include worry, concern, and struggle to accept the child. More common, however, are reports of family members who subject the child to beatings, verbal abuse, death threats, sexual assault, and/or expulsion from their homes. In a societal context where corporal punishment is still widely accepted, a negative response by parents is taken for granted and duly expected.

At the curricular level, school-based instruction is heavily laced with religious and moral claims about gender and sexuality. There is little room for students to be introduced to ideas about non-normative sexualities, except as examples of perversion, deviance, and sin. All matters of sexuality are addressed through the Family Life Education Program (FLEP) curriculum, which is designed and mandated by the Ministry of Education. The FLEP curriculum focuses on reproductive issues related to early sexual behavior, such as pregnancy and contraceptives; teachers are more likely to emphasize abstinence over information, especially for girls. International donor organizations such as USAID and Family Health International have also worked with local organizations like Ashe, an LGBT-friendly performance-based peer education troupe, to provide education and training for school personnel about HIV/AIDS in particular and about sexuality more broadly. Still, guidance counselors are not specifically trained in dealing with issues related to sexuality among youth. Despite the efforts to train and introduce guidance counselors to new information about adolescent development and sexual health, they are, in general, uncomfortable talking about sexuality with students. Teachers who try to introduce questions about non-normative sexualities also run the risk of being censured or accused of being gay or lesbian by both students and other teachers. More typically, if teachers persist in going against the grain, they are pushed out or request a transfer to another school.

One recent example is instructive in showing how the school environment actively stymies discussion and suppresses knowledge about same-sex sexuality and, by extension, the recognition and validation of the sexual orientation of its faculty and students. In November 2007, a teacher at a traditional girls' high school was investigated for using a government-approved textbook that contained the following paragraph affirming gay and lesbian unions as a family form:

Today, there is much discussion about what constitutes a family. There seems to be a broadening of the traditional definitions of a family structure. When two women or two men live together in a relationship as lesbians or gays, they may be considered as a family. They may adopt children or have them through artificial insemination.¹⁹

The teacher also required students to find images of all the family forms taught in class, including gay and lesbian families. The school's administrators took great pains to exclude students' opinions about the controversy, and instead sought to demonstrate to the public that there was no deliberate effort on the part of the teacher to introduce, teach, or explain the "offensive clause." Reminiscent of the Rainbow Curriculum debate in New York City in the 1980s, letters of outrage and calls for investigations, firings, and boycotts poured into the newspapers, television, and radio stations, calling such an incident a "sinister strategy to influence [the] acceptability of homosexual practices" and rejecting any effort to "teach homosexuality in schools" and "to normalize" sexual deviance.

Many major institutions, groups, and leaders went on record to denounce the textbook. For example, the Jamaica Teachers' Association stated that "it [homosexual relationships] is not something that we embrace in Jamaica, and we can't ask our teachers to teach such a matter to students." In response, the newly elected Minister of Education, Andrew Holness, mandated that the textbook be removed from all classrooms and declared that teachers were only allowed to use books that were selected from the "approved textbook list" distributed to all secondary schools and posted on the Ministry's Web site.²⁰ Failure to comply would result in a breach of the Education Act of 1980, which gives sole control of public school curricula to the Ministry of Education. All textbooks are currently undergoing a page-by-page review to make sure that no information on gays and lesbians is introduced to students.

Clearly, the nature of the debate and decision by the Ministry can have a significant impact on the healthy development of sexual identities among children at this age, when they are actively exploring their sexual orientation and could benefit from more and better information about their sexuality. Furthermore, the psychological and physical safety of the children of gay and lesbian parents who attend public schools is directly jeopardized by this policy decision. Not only do children regularly receive negative messages about their families inside the classroom, they also cannot risk their peers or teachers knowing about their families. At the very least, teachers, parents, and policymakers alike have acquiesced to fostering an intolerant environment in which all students must learn.

While there are gay and lesbian teachers throughout the education system, the school environment is often a hostile one in which to work, and teachers must prevent any suspicion about their sexuality. The undue influence of speculation, gossip, or malice on the parts of students and other teachers, as well as information that can filter in from outside the school environment, leaves LGBT teachers especially guarded in their relationships with students and colleagues. Both male and female teachers can be fired on grounds of suspicion or for having personal conflicts with school principals. Men are especially on guard because they can be arrested and imprisoned on allegations of homosexual conduct, pederasty, and “gross indecency” without proof or evidence. Given the Jamaica Teachers’ Association general antipathy to homosexuality, gay and lesbian teachers do not have any institutional support. More frequently, teachers who suspect that rumors are circulating will request to be transferred to other schools, or leave the profession altogether.

At the tertiary level, neither faculty nor students are safe from the kind of physical or psychological harassment meted out against their peers at the secondary level.²¹ For the most part, homosexuality is not treated as a legitimate topic of academic study and informed debate at the universities. While individual faculty do conduct research on related topics,²² many faculty avoid doing research on the topic altogether, do not teach or engage with the large body of empirical research on the lives of LGBT persons, nor do they recognize such research as relevant to Jamaican society. Among those university faculty who do engage the topic, some do so in ways that further polarize debate or seek to legitimize antigay views. In a classroom setting, the introduction of the question (e.g., “Should homosexuality be accepted in Jamaica?”) further narrows the scope of inquiry to a one-sided contest heavily weighted toward religious and cultural arguments denouncing homosexuality. Some faculty use public forums to tacitly justify the social attitudes that inform homophobic violence²³; others operate through selective reliance on scholarship that supports cultural-nationalist or psychological interpretations of homosexuality as a legacy of European domination, that is, colonialism and slavery.²⁴ Whether through the use of pejorative language and analogies, reproducing myths and stereotypes about homosexuality, a denial of the social prejudices and forms of discrimination against gays and lesbians, misrepresenting social scientific research on sexual orientation, or worse, claiming that LGBT persons should expect to be punished because they know they are violating a cultural norm, their status as scholars more often serves to legitimize and give wider currency to their problematic views. In a context where knowledge is seen as the purview of the privileged, the views of these scholars are rarely questioned; rather, they are perceived as using scientific knowledge to “defend” the authentic cultural values of the Jamaican people.

For faculty who make critical discussion about LGBT topics a focus of their courses, they are often subjected to verbal harassment, hostility, and resistance from students in the classroom. That hostility comes in various forms: shouting, riotous behavior, students walking out of class while it is still in session, and a refusal to complete assignments. Not surprisingly, the handful of faculty who are perceived by their students as more open to discussion are those who have also developed reputations and followings for trying to create more open classroom environments.

Many also become de facto mentors for the few lesbian and gay students who dare to disclose or suggest their non-normative sexual orientation.

While students at the university often exhibit significant antipathy towards homosexuality in general, their attitudes have been shown to be less hostile towards lesbian and bisexual women than gay men.²⁵ However, these differences are not significant, since both lesbians and gay men have been the subject of attacks by large groups of university students in recent years; men and women alike participate in verbally and physically assaulting other students.

At the private religious universities, there is little information available about the experiences of gay and lesbian faculty and students. However, given the strong stances that the religious denominations take against homosexuality, there is no reason to assume that students or faculty would willingly disclose their sexual orientation to others, or that their experiences in doing so would be positive. For example, the Code of Conduct at the Northern Caribbean University, which is an extension of the Seventh Day Adventist Church, reads:

The University is governed by the Seventh-day Adventist's policy on homosexuality. The Church loves and values the homosexuals as a person but forbids the homosexual act. Severe sanctions will be applied by the institution if individuals are found indulging in this act or if individuals are reported to be propositioning any member of the school family on or off campus.²⁶

Given the sanctioned permissibility of hostility towards homosexuality at this institution, it is no surprise that there have been reports of assaults against men who were suspected of being gay. While participating students were expelled in one incident in 2001, the university also considered it due diligence to investigate the sexual backgrounds of the victims and to punish them if they were found guilty of violating the school code.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMY

Gays and lesbians participate at all levels of the economy. There is rigid sex typing of jobs and appearance in the formal economy, but this is far much less evident in the informal economy. Most workplaces have a designated uniform women are expected to wear (which typically include skirts, pantyhose, and feminine shoes), while men are expected to wear dress or loose-fitting shirts and slacks. Women who work in jobs that are sex-typed as male jobs are particularly conspicuous and are often treated as spectacles. The same is true for women who do not embody traditional femininity. In failing to look the part ascribed to them, women in these fields are regularly subjected to public harassment and pejorative comments about their sexuality. On the other hand, many lesbian and bisexual women invest in traditional femininity in order to dispel any suspicion about their sexual orientation at the workplace, thus protecting themselves.

Suspicion and rumors, more than actual evidence, serve to generate fear among LGBT persons in the workplace and operate as a form of social control. In 2008, various journalists set out to document the existence of LGBT persons in specific occupations such as the police force. While the stated purpose of such exposés was to demonstrate how law enforcement entities themselves had not purged and punished the lawbreakers in their midst, these reports also illustrated some of the challenges that LGBT persons face as they navigate these professions. Furthermore, the reportage highlighted the challenges faced by employers and administrators who are not avowedly hostile to LGBT persons, but who feel that they must respond to pressure from the media, the public, and their peers to act in a discriminatory fashion towards LGBT individuals.

Within the informal economy, working-class men and women appear to have more latitude to challenge normative assumptions about gender and sexuality; this is aided by the fact that they are often self-employed and that their work style is not as heavily regulated in the way that most formal labor sector jobs are (e.g., through official titles, status, salaries, uniforms, physical location and other protocols of gender display). Informal sector jobs in vending, auto mechanics, construction/repair, and domestic work (home and yard) predominate among working-class Jamaicans. Like the formal sector, most informal sector jobs are gendered (i.e., who does the work is defined according to masculine and feminine characteristics). However, there is more fluidity and flexibility in who does what, given that men and women have somewhat more latitude in their social interactions. Because interactions with the general public may be more fleeting, and because workers are not always bound to a specific site, there might be more room for men and women to avoid being punished directly if one is perceived as failing to uphold normative standards of heterosexuality.

Notably, women who are independently employed in the informal economy Informal Commercial Importers (ICIs), that is, traders who buy and sell manufactured goods to the public for a profit, are often accused of being lesbians. Here, the term is not meant as an objective descriptor of women's actual relationships and identities, but instead as a pejorative and acts as a social corrective to women who appear to be economically and socially autonomous of men and whose social networks tend to include other women like themselves. Their business acumen and success clearly challenge the sexual and gender norms of Jamaican society, and ultimately limits what areas and types of work the women can pursue and the function of women's friendships. Certainly, some ICIs are lesbians. But, as is the case for most Jamaicans, ICI men and women tread lightly around issues of privacy, preferring to maintain clear boundaries between their professional and personal lives. While sexual self-confidence is often a means of gaining acceptance and respect from peers, it seems just as likely that many lesbians and gay men who work in this particular sphere will place more emphasis on their business interactions and relationships in public in order to bypass any uncertainties around their sexual orientation, and to neutralize the negative effects of innuendoes, jokes, and gossip.

The un- and under-employment of LGBT persons is not only affected by the broader economic conditions of the society, it is also exacerbated by structural inequalities that punish them for failing to adhere to social norms about gender and sexuality. Given the overall situation in education as described above, gays and lesbians from poor and working-class backgrounds may be at an even higher risk of not completing high school due to unstable family and living situations, incipient mental health issues related to social isolation, physical harassment, and fear of unintended disclosure of their sexual orientation. Inadequate social capital and networks may make the transition to adulthood, a stable job, and income even more difficult.

Most jobs in the Jamaican formal economy require that applicants have taken proficiency exams in various academic subjects at the end of high school. To deal with the problem of how the poor quality of secondary education hampers one's choices in the job market, many persons resort to taking additional subjects at private educational facilities. While an increasingly popular option, the cost and quality of the programs make this avenue a gamble for many. Without a college education, there are even fewer employment options available: self-employment or part-time employment, often in the informal economy; working at low-wage service jobs; or work-exchange programs on farms and tourist resorts overseas.

All the conditions mentioned together pose particular difficulties for young working-class lesbians and gay men, whether they live in rural areas or journey to the urban center of Kingston in hope of finding a niche in a larger LGBT community. As a result of being displaced from somewhat more stable and supportive family situations without the benefit of skills, education, or adequate resources to support themselves, many gay men and transgendered persons as young as 15 years old are increasingly drawn into sex work, relationships involving transactional sex (e.g., sex for school uniforms, fees and books, lunch, a place to live, a cell phone, clothing, etc.), and other illicit high-risk activities. Indeed, research conducted by the Jamaica AIDS Society for Life shows that this group of young men faces an especially high risk for bodily injury and harm in the context of these social interactions; this also increases the likelihood of them contracting sexually transmitted infections, including HIV/AIDS.

Wage discrimination is rampant and adversely affects women, who are overrepresented in low-wage, low-status, and low-productivity sectors, and underrepresented in highly skilled jobs. Jamaica is regularly in violation of international labor laws governing standards for wages and collective bargaining. Jamaican legislation explicitly prohibits discrimination based on race, gender, place of origin, political opinions, color, or creed; however, there is no protection from sexual harassment or from discrimination based on disability, sexual orientation, or HIV status. The existing antidiscrimination laws are rarely enforced; only a few individuals have ever taken action against an employer. While some lesbians and gay men do experience discrimination on the basis of gender, there is little governmental oversight or encouragement to file complaints about the situation. Filing a claim based on one's status also opens the claimant to counter-accusations by employers and other employees that could expose the employee's sexual orientation and put him in jeopardy. Because same-sex sexual orientation is grounds for being fired, gays and lesbians working in the formal economy are especially careful about how they respond to the connections that colleagues and employers choose or try to make between their gender and sexual identities.

Despite the efforts of some governmental bodies to educate workers about their rights and to push for broader and more inclusive public policies, such work has been relatively slow and ineffective. Consequently, many persons remain reluctant or unlikely to use the language of discrimination to talk about their experiences, and thus tend not to see the employer's treatment as actionable or beyond their authority to hire and fire.

After much debate in 2006, the Jamaican government agreed to adopt public policy that prohibits mandatory HIV testing for employment. However, the Workplace Policy on HIV/AIDS is unevenly implemented in part because many employers do not agree with its antidiscrimination clause. Indeed, during the parliamentary debates, some politicians sought to implement it in ways that would give employers more leverage. Still, the debate about the HIV/AIDS policy in workplaces reveal widespread discomfort within the population with allowing employers to have access to confidential health information. Most importantly, there is broad recognition that employers would readily use personal health information to influence their decisions about hiring, firing, and promotions. Because gay men are perceived as the main sources and victims of the disease—despite evidence to the contrary—it is likely that employers might consider using HIV testing as a proxy for identifying and discriminating against gay men. While the policy on HIV testing continues to be debated, mistreatment of HIV-positive persons continues unabated through stigmatization and being denied access to basic care and social resources.

FAMILY

Jamaican family structures are fluid and heterogeneous and highly responsive to social and economic shifts in the society. Alongside, and counter to, the longstanding dominant claim that a “normal” family unit consists of a married couple and their biologically related children, most families and households in Jamaica continue to be organized around women as their central figures or as heads, whether as biological parents or relatives. Formal marriages between men and women account for less than one-fifth of all relationship types in Jamaica at any particular moment. Families organized around the “one man + one woman + biological offspring” formula are among the minority of family forms; this form often shifts to other structures based on aging patterns, migration, divorce, or other changes in circumstance. Since the 19th century when the first census was taken, the majority of Jamaican children have been born into nonmarital relationships. These might be considered common-law unions, where women and men create households and raise families together without being formally married. Another prevalent family form is the visiting relationship, where men and women live in separate households while maintaining a sexually intimate relationship, which might include children. Primary responsibility for the raising of children often lies with the parent (most often the mother) with whom the children are more likely to reside.

Socioeconomic issues affect the family forms that Jamaican children encounter over their lifetime. Children growing up in economically disadvantaged families are far more likely to be raised in households headed by a grandparent, a relative, or a family friend, and to experience more disruption, instability, and physical abuse within their families. Child shifting, where children are shifted from one relative and household to another as financial conditions change, is an enduring feature of Jamaican family life. It is also a flexible strategy that is used by families and households at all economic levels in order to accommodate changes brought on by the demands of divorce, migration, education, and work.

Despite the diversity and complexity of Jamaican family life as noted above, the normative definition of “family” remains the nuclear, heterosexual unit. Marriage, while infrequent, remains the idealized family form; all other family forms are judged inadequate, dysfunctional, or deviant against this standard. This normative model of family is taught in schools through “family life education,” where all children learn that the best and ideal arrangement is to be married to someone of another gender. This model is also enforced through legal and religious norms. For example, recent changes to the Sexual Offences Act include the provision that rape (“marital rape”) is explicitly prohibited in marriages. However, given this effort to distinguish marriage from other relationship statuses and the recent changes in the legal definitions of sexual intercourse (i.e., as that which occurs between a man and a woman, and must include a penis and a vagina), it is not clear how other forms of sexual coercion in intimate relationships, whether heterosexual or homosexual, will be treated in the courts. As previously discussed, the uproar over a single home economics textbook in November 2007 reflects the entrenched commitment of the state and the broader society to maintaining the narrowest possible parameters around the concept of family, and to penalize those (especially lesbian and bisexual women) who do not adhere to these normative values. Despite these prohibitions and constraints, gay men and lesbians in Jamaica—as individuals and as couples—create family arrangements that include biological and nonbiological children. These family situations are also the outcomes of negotiation, rather than predetermined by social norms and dominant cultural attitudes. Since the majority of childbearing among Jamaican women occurs in the late teen and early adult years, it stands to reason that adult lesbian and bisexual women are more likely to have biological children born of a former heterosexual relationship or to be fostering a child-relative while also involved in a lesbian relationship.

One 2005 study of gay and bisexual fathers in Jamaica demonstrated that regardless of socioeconomic status, men foster and informally adopt male children who are relatives; this is consistent with the general patterns of fostering and adoption across the society.²⁷ In addition, gay and bisexual men are more likely to take in male children who have been abandoned, displaced from homes because of their sexual orientation, or are HIV-positive. Participating in raising their own biological children may also be influenced by whether they have disclosed their sexual orientation to their family and extended kin, the child's mother, and the attitudes of these family members toward their sexual orientation. For many LGBT persons, fear of reprisal in response to disclosure of their sexual orientation may preclude persons from living together as a couple while raising children. This arrangement would seem to be especially relevant to lesbians and bisexual women who often come into relationships with biological children in tow. One strategy taken by many lesbian and bisexual women is to allow their children to be raised by a grandmother or an aunt in a separate domicile. In this way, they are able to support and maintain contact with their children, while keeping their intimate/sexual and familial lives separate and not overlapping with each other.

Adoption policies in Jamaica do not specifically prohibit lesbians and gay men from adopting children, but gay men are less likely than lesbian and bisexual women to be able to formally adopt a child because the state prohibits single men from adopting children who are not biological relatives. Since only heterosexual relationships—whether marriage, common-law, visiting, etc.—are recognized socially and legally, gay men cannot petition for adoption as part of a couple. Establishing that one is a “fit” candidate would also require additional documentation as well as gender performance that does not raise the suspicions of adoption administrators. Individuals in a decision-making capacity can deem LGBT persons unfit because of their supposed immoral lifestyle and its potential effect on the children. If there is disclosure of their sexual orientation, it is unlikely that gays and lesbians could claim legal parental rights. It is also highly unlikely that any judge would agree to hear such a case. What is more likely is that decisions about parental rights are made outside juridical frameworks, and within the context of the broader network of relatives and friends.

Thus, on one hand, families of gays and lesbians appear to be one of several variants of the nonmarital family structure that predominates in Jamaica. Indeed, it is likely that the families and households headed by LGBT persons will not appear to be very different from that of other nonmarital households. Any likely differences between heterosexual and LGBT families might come from the dynamics between intimate partners and the children, the social stressors related to maintaining a same-sex family and relationship in a generally hostile society, the definitions and limits of parenting when both parents are the same gender, as well as the extent to which these family units are integrated into the extended families of LGBT persons. Answers to these questions await further inquiry.

On the other hand, any discussion of the relevance of same-sex marriage debates in Jamaica must proceed within this context, where marriage has been an idealized form that is infrequently practiced, and where other equally viable family forms have predominated for many years. Indeed, arguments from Jamaicans against the social acceptance of gays and lesbians increasingly claim that any form of social recognition (e.g., removing the antisodomy statutes) would open the door to bids for same-sex marriage. While this worst case scenario speaks to the real potential effects of North American values on local organizing and agenda-setting, it is also true that same-sex marriage has not been, and probably will not be, a focus of LGBT political activists in Jamaica, in the short- or long-term. Nonetheless, individual gay and lesbian couples have begun adopting the North American model of hosting commitment ceremonies as a means of gaining social recognition for their relationships.²⁸ To the extent that individual actions such as these become more visible and emerge as a political strategy, they will certainly continue to push the question about the meaning of same-sex relationships in the larger society and nullify the question about whether family structures built around same-sex relationships are indeed families.

Overall, LGBT persons in Jamaica currently face an uphill battle in gaining broad recognition for their roles as parents, caregivers, and members of family networks. Being involved in a same-sex intimate relationship can be used as grounds for hostile family members to informally terminate parenting rights of gays and lesbians. Such tactics might include threatening to exclude the parent and child from access to the extended network of blood relatives, intentionally disclosing the parent's sexual orientation to other family members to invoke shame, or refusing to allow the parent to have access to the child.

Within heterosexual Jamaican families, the failure to adopt the normative sexual orientation can be the basis of much conflict. Many gay and lesbian children in heterosexual families face the possibility of being subjected to high levels of psychological abuse and physical violence, should their sexual orientation be suspected or confirmed. Family members, from parents to siblings, routinely threaten, harass, and even attempt to harm family members who are guilty of violating sexual codes. As morality debates about homosexuality have infused the public airwaves, school-aged boys suspected of being homosexual are being forced out of their homes in greater numbers. As previously discussed, they are left to fend for themselves, whether by finding a sympathetic relative, distant family friend, or stranger to take them in, or simply to hustle and learn to survive on the streets. More often than not, these boys end up on the streets or living with persons who are similarly unstable, with no access to education or a legitimate source of income. They become involved in prostitution and other forms of transactional sex as a livelihood and lifestyle. Such involvement virtually assures that the boys cannot return to their blood families, because of the shame and stigma attached to these activities. There is far less anecdotal evidence about whether girls are faced with similar constraints. This is an important arena that deserves further investigation.

Likewise, there are families who choose not to expel their children, while still exerting strong pressures on the children to remain closeted so as not to disgrace the family. It is not readily apparent whether a family's social class or religiosity affects the response of individual family members. While there is a broad perception that families of middle-class and elite social status are more tolerant than working-class and poor families regarding same-sex sexual orientation, this perception seems to conflict with the lived realities of LGBT persons. Indeed, it is fair to suggest that the economic realities of working-class and poor families, which generally produce more constraints for individuals as well as the collective, might even enhance the role of LGBT members within, making sexual orientation less relevant to, but nonetheless a complicated aspect of, membership. Furthermore, given the overall strength of religious and moral perspectives around same-sex sexuality, family members' religiosity and the particular religious affiliation of the head of household might have a stronger effect on their response to a family member's sexual orientation. These issues also await further investigation.

COMMUNITY

To the extent that a single lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender community exists in Jamaica, it is defined primarily by the shared experiences of stigmatization and rejection by the broader society. In the daily rhetoric, LGBT Jamaicans are generally perceived as outsiders or sources of moral contamination and are compelled to hide their sexuality or face expulsion from the national body. While the stigmatized status of homosexuality helps to define a group identity based on collective victimization, LGBT persons in Jamaica still see themselves as citizens, although the rights accorded to them are sharply curtailed in most respects.

Within a social and cultural context heavily shaped by surveillance and the fear of being found out, LGBT persons have created ways of recognizing and identifying with each other in public and private spaces. These include styles of dress and adornment adapted from North American gay culture and constitutes some of the nuanced aspects of emerging LGBT subcultures in Jamaica.

Social events—paid or unpaid, in private or public settings—are the hub of the LGBT community life, where people go to interact with each other and to affirm their mutual existence in an otherwise hostile society. These settings are especially valuable for youth who are searching for both support and advice for dealing with the challenges they face at school and at home. From the mid-1990s until the present, the majority of social events have consisted primarily of fee-based parties held in private, secluded residences or clubs, some of which have come to be identified as gay spaces and are advertised as such. In the urban metropolis of Kingston, new entrepreneurial efforts to create ongoing social events have been somewhat successful. These consist of renting one of many dancehalls located around the area that typically cater to a heterosexual clientele. These spaces-for-hire range from working-class bars to strip clubs that ordinarily cater to elite heterosexual men.

Attendance, as well as willingness to interact with others in these spaces, is shaped by gender and socioeconomic status. Like most aspects of social life, the leisure activities of Jamaicans are generally class-segregated; this pattern of interactions extends to the LGBT community events as well. In the 1990s, the only established dance club in the Kingston area that catered exclusively to LGBT persons also, ironically, sought ways to exclude working-class and poor men from the inner cities. Arbitrary rules and decisions based on attire, speech and gender display were often invoked on a general suspicion that these men intended to disrupt the event by becoming physically violent. Similarly, entry fees, location, and access to information about the events are regularly used to select and limit who is able to attend.

Parties and events held in residential communities located in the hillside periphery of Kingston are often shut down by police because of complaints by neighbors about music and noise. This response is not particular to events held by gays and lesbians, of course, but rather to those that blast dancehall music and violate the cultural codes of respectable conduct in these communities.²⁹ However, the effect of the policing is particularly pernicious for LGBT-related events because access to affordable and safe locations for social events for an already marginalized group becomes even more difficult.

On the other hand, the ordinary spaces inhabited by Jamaicans—bars, public parks, beaches, sporting events, and the like—are also sites for spontaneous LGBT gatherings, increasingly facilitated by technology in the form of text messaging and mobile phones. Athletic and sporting competitions—cricket, football, and track and field—occupy a large part of the Jamaican cultural identity. While mainstream sporting events have long been gender-segregated, many LGBT persons have occasionally created and participated in sports teams that cohere with their non-normative gender identities. These include women's cricket teams and men's netball teams. Cricket is primarily played by men, while netball is regarded as women's sport. Nonetheless, the lack of institutional support for nontraditional teams, as well as participants' heightened awareness of the social consequences of being labeled as a lesbian or gay team, seriously undermines the effectiveness of these groups in building an LGBT community through participation in sports.

Events that celebrate major transitions in the life cycle—such as funerals, commitment ceremonies, baby showers and birthday parties—of LGBT individuals offer opportunities for mutual support, the exchange of information, and a renewal of social networks. Such events have also drawn public ire, as in the case of funerals of gay men that have been disrupted by heterosexual members of the congregation and neighboring community who disapprove of the churching of a sinner's body in their house of worship.

Because fear of being discovered is a driving force shaping how lesbians and gays interact with each other in the wider society, such fear is often expressed in pathological behaviors among LGBT persons. These include blackmailing, threats of disclosure to family, friends and employers, economic manipulation, physical intimidation, and the withholding of important information. Because the consequences are weighty, disclosure of one's sexual orientation, even to other LGBT persons, is not taken lightly. Not surprisingly, these self-protective mechanisms that are fuelled and intensified by the repressive homophobic social climate, are often taken as evidence that violence against gays and lesbians is not a societal problem, but rather an in-group dynamic, and thus a defining characteristic of the "homosexual personality."³⁰ Consequently, violence against LGBT persons that is reported is more likely to be treated as a family affair by police and the public alike, and thus not taken very seriously. That is, investigations of violence perpetrated against LGBT persons are conducted in much the same way as those that affect poor people, where the social status of the persons involved influences the amount of resources brought to bear on the cases.³¹

To ensure their physical and emotional survival, LGBT persons in Jamaica have developed a repertoire of self-protective strategies from which they draw based on the context or situation. To prevent unintended disclosure of their sexual orientation, LGBT persons navigate social landmines in order to find places of relative safety for the moment. In addition, speculation, gossip, and the agility of cell phone technology have affected many people's ability to retain friendships and social networks, to find secure housing, and to participate in community events. Many women and men are unlikely to attend LGBT community events for fear of being seen in the vicinity by someone they know, or of being questioned by a family member or other person in their social network. Others, especially more upwardly mobile men and women, are selective about which events they attend, especially if there is awareness that a particular location or address is becoming known outside of the LGBT community.

Physical mobility is a significant factor that affects participation in community-building. Owning and maintaining a vehicle is beyond the reach of most of the population; only a small proportion of LGBT persons can afford to have private transportation. Reliance on public transportation as the primary mode of travel, especially at night, also poses additional risks, especially for women. It is not uncommon for cabdrivers to make pejorative remarks about LGBT passengers and their destinations over the radio network, or to issue veiled threats against other drivers who are seen in the vicinity of a location frequented by LGBT persons. For these reasons, great care is taken with the selection of taxicab companies and individual drivers.

In recent years, as the LGBT community continues to grow, an informal network of transportation services has emerged, run by working-class LGBT individuals who are self-employed as taxi operators and who earn additional income by providing transportation to and from major events, as well as to individuals on a regular basis.

Despite the many efforts to create and sustain a sense of community, LGBT persons are constantly under surveillance, and not only by inquisitive passersby who become suspicious of single-sex events or one's gender display.³² Police officers often pass through LGBT events out of curiosity and to intimidate community members and remind them of their precarious social status. Widespread corruption and abuses of power among police means that any activity or interactions that are read as suspicious by the police can lead to extortion, battery, rape, detention, or even death. While some LGBT persons may voice resentment of this intrusion into community events, an acute awareness about their collective vulnerability moves others to placate and dissuade lengthy or repeated visits by the police. One form of redress has been for individual gay and lesbian police officers to attend and participate in gatherings, helping to reassure attendees that they will not be unduly harassed. While incidences of community events being shut down by police are not as frequent today as they once were, the naked visibility and unpredictability of the state still creates an atmosphere of unease and tension for many LGBT persons.

While friendships and informal social networks are the hub of LGBT community life in Jamaica, more structured efforts have been attempted, with varying success. The Gay Freedom Movement (GFM) emerged in the 1970s at a time when the dominant ideological framework of the PNP's democratic socialist agenda emphasized grassroots organizing and collective self-determination in order to build a more democratic and egalitarian society. During a time when intimate sexual relations between men ("buggery") was already criminalized by the Offences Against the Person Act, and when prostitution was also illegal, the efforts of a single individual, Larry Chang, to provide support and affirmation to other gay men helped to transform the social landscape where LGBT community and activism in Jamaica is concerned. From its initial beginnings with Larry answering letters from his home in the Kingston metropolitan area, the work of the GFM extended from providing support, consciousness-raising and promoting outreach to youth, prisoners, and prostitutes, to include health education to prevent the spread of sexually transmitted infections. Its primary organ of communication was the Jamaican Gaily News, a newsletter that was published and distributed nationwide until 1984.

In a context where antipathies about same-sex sexuality were not politicized or being stoked by right-wing religious fundamentalist groups inside and outside Jamaica, the individuals who sustained the GFM were able to envision and set out a relatively ambitious and inclusive program centered on those existing on the margins of sexual citizenship.

Much of GFM's work was continued through Jamaica AIDS Support for Life (JASL), a nongovernmental organization that was founded in 1991 by a group of gay men, a few of whom had been associated with the GFM. JASL is located in a middle-class section of the capital city, Kingston. JASL originated as a hospice that cared for persons, primarily men, who were infected with HIV and who were not able to get medical care because of the stigma attached to the disease and the infected person. Homosexual men of lower socioeconomic status and without extensive social support were most likely to use these services. Today, the organization serves all groups and individuals with HIV/AIDS, including a growing number of women and children, with specific programs designed for outreach to male sex workers and men involved in same-sex relationships.

Inequalities based on gender, educational status, and cultural capital permeate all aspects of LGBT community-building, and severely limit the potential for the emergence of a single-issue, sexuality-based movement anytime soon. From their inception until now, both JFLAG and JASL have focused their agendas on men with same-sex sexual orientations, whether under the guise of human rights or via HIV/AIDS. The top-down decision-making style of the organizations makes it difficult for the interests of their various constituencies (lesbian and bisexual women, sex workers, transgendered persons, youth, men and women coming from socially marginalized communities, etc.) to be heard and fairly represented. The rhetoric and organizing models used by JFLAG are based on the mainstream North American movement for LGBT rights, which foreground sexual orientation as a primary basis for discrimination and second class citizenship, to the exclusion of issues based on race/color, gender, or socioeconomic status. At the same time, most middle-class and elite LGBT Jamaicans have created their own networks based on professional or other shared interests and offer little if any political or financial support to the work of these important organizations. As the mandate of JASL has broadened to include more heterosexual board members, clients, and to build relationships with organizations that are at times hostile to overtly lesbian and gay concerns, new tensions have emerged around the organization's relationship and accountability to the LGBT community.

Since the end of the 1990s, JASL has served as an incubator for community groups and functioned as the only partially publicly funded space where working-class LGBT persons could access resources such as information, counseling, shelter, referrals, advocacy, jobs, friendships, and so on to address their social and emotional needs. Under the umbrella of its HIV-related mandate, the organization created a support group GLABCOM, which stands for "gay and lesbian community." JASL also provided important space for the discussions and nascent activism that evolved into the human rights organization Jamaica Forum for Lesbians, All-Sexuals and Gays (JFLAG), which has taken up various issues including constitutional reform and the removal of the sodomy laws, boycotts against dancehall artists, legal advocacy, and crisis intervention for LGBT individuals. JFLAG also functions as a clearinghouse on information on the persecution of LGBT persons in Jamaica.

In response to lesbian and bisexual women's experiences of sexism within GLABCOM, as well as stated desires to have a group that focused on the particular concerns of women, the group "Women for Women" was founded in 1998 to provide social support to lesbian and bisexual women. Through its loose ties with JASL and JFLAG, the women's group has held various programs and workshops on lesbians' health and wellbeing, transgender identity, education and skills development, intimate partner violence, and crisis intervention. The group meets bimonthly and is probably the oldest and longest running lesbian and bisexual women's organization in the Caribbean.

Much of infrastructural and political support for Women for Women comes from outside of Jamaica, through human rights, feminist, and queer women's funding streams in North America and Europe. The development of the women's group has also been hampered by lack of adequate institutional support from both JFLAG and JASL, the absence of its own political agenda, and the need for focused and stable leadership. The lesbian and bisexual women's group is also more invisible and isolated from the broader debates about same-sex sexual orientation. Few people outside of the LGBT community actually know of the group's existence.

The concerns of lesbian and bisexual women, to the extent that these have been articulated, are not taken very seriously by gay men who tend to have wider access to international resources and networks that support LGBT organizing in developing countries. Indeed, there appears to be little support among community leadership for including lesbian and bisexual women's concerns in broader discussions about community mobilization, and other issues. Many argue that, because women are not explicitly targets of the law and public ire in the same ways that men are perceived to be, lesbian and bisexual women are expected to devote their energies to challenging the sodomy laws and defending the sexual rights of gay men. As such, few resources are solicited or directed to support women-specific programs, and little attention has been devoted among the predominantly male social networks to cultivating alliances with women or to understanding the meaning of same-sex sexual orientation in the lives of Jamaican lesbian and bisexual women. The women's group is similarly disconnected from other grassroots social justice groups; its own well-founded fears about how other Jamaican feminist and women's organizations will perceive it provides another obstacle for the group to build necessary alliances and to grow into a viable entity. Furthermore, the lack of experience in community organizing among the women involved in the group, combined with internal power struggles based on education, employment status, and cultural capital, hampers the group's abilities to do its work. Notwithstanding all these challenges, women of all ages—from high school to middle age—continue to participate in and support informal monthly social events, further attesting to the variety of needs that this grassroots group is asked to fulfill.

Transgendered women, effeminate gay men, drag queens, and male sex workers have become increasingly visible to each other and to other Jamaicans in public, in small towns and bigger cities, during both day and night. Much of this increased visibility is due to the unintended effects of the heated morality debates about homosexuality. That is, the undue attention and scrutiny from both international and local media has actually helped to open up the social climate and has generated more dialogue, ambivalence, and even resignation about same-sex sexuality.³³ As such, the venues in which the struggle over sexuality takes place have only multiplied and diffused over a wider number of social contexts.

Today, young gay men and lesbians are more openly defiant than ever of the taboo against public displays of same-gender sexuality, even when there is violent reprisal to their actions.³⁴ Between late 2006 and 2008, several incidents of spontaneous mob attacks against young, working-class gay men in various public settings occurred because these men were perceived as being out of order. That is, through their actions, dress, and styles of interaction, they were perceived—rightly—to be flouting the rules for socially appropriate middle-class masculine behavior. According to media accounts, these young men had chosen to 'flaunt' their sexualities in public by openly dancing with each other on a stage at a music concert, dressing in what was deemed inappropriate attire in a commercial district during daylight, and speaking openly of their sexual desires.³⁵ Moreover, even after individuals chastised the men for their behavior, the reportage claimed that they defiantly refused to act ashamed or to hide themselves from public scrutiny. Gatherings in private settings attended by young men often become the magnets for harassment by neighbors and police.³⁶ Such reportage reflect a broader cultural clash about what constitutes appropriate sexuality and public conduct and who should determine the rules. Many young working-class gay men in Jamaica, men who would not call themselves activists in any sense, are determined to have a say in this debate and are putting their bodies on the line to do so,³⁷ yet, as the violence against them is becoming more visible, frequent, and mob-driven, public sentiment is also beginning to sway towards doubt about the usefulness of these kinds of attacks in silencing gay men and lesbians.³⁸

HEALTH

HIV/AIDS is the only health condition that is explicitly linked to the LGBT community, and the disease is stigmatized partly because of this.³⁹ The HIV prevalence rate in Jamaica's general population is 1.5 percent, equivalent to approximately 35,000 persons, with almost two-thirds of HIV infected persons being unaware of their status.⁴⁰ The majority of HIV cases are from heterosexual transmission; however, small case studies suggest that there is a higher prevalence of HIV in vulnerable groups, especially among men who have sex with men, followed by sex workers and prison inmates. However, it is impossible to correctly estimate the rate of prevalence because persons in these groups are more likely to conceal their HIV status and sexual histories from both sex partners and health care workers because of fear of stigma, discrimination, and violence. Young gay men (14–21 years old) are particularly at risk for being infected with HIV.⁴¹ The conclusions of several studies conducted on this high-risk population suggest that factors such as high rates of multiple sex partners among men, an overall increase in the rates of transactional sex, and an early age of sexual debut explain heightened risk of young men being affected by HIV/AIDS. Such risk factors are driven by poverty, population dynamics, and the cultural emphasis on men acting as sexual decision-makers. For example, research conducted by Nesha Haniff of Jamaica AIDS Support for Life (JASL) shows that young men's vulnerabilities to HIV infection are exacerbated by the increased likelihood of rape and physical harassment by other men, including older or socially secure gay men who see young boys as physically and socially weak and therefore targets. This research shows that the power dynamic of age, male dominance and the vulnerability and powerlessness of young people increases their propensity to be infected with HIV.

Since 2001, Peter Figueroa, the former Chief Medical Officer and head of the Ministry of Health's HIV and AIDS program, has continued to argue that the laws that rendered sex between consenting homosexual adult men as illegal were responsible for driving the AIDS epidemic underground. As such, he called for the decriminalization of homosexual sex between men. Three successive prime ministers—P. J. Patterson, Portia Simpson-Miller, and Bruce Golding—have refused to take the argument seriously and have argued for upholding the “buggery” law. While elected politicians have decided to follow suit, the issue continues to be pushed by local and international coalitions of HIV/AIDS service providers and advocates, even as the rates of HIV infection among men who have sex with men continues to rise virtually unabated.

In many ways, young gay men from socially disadvantaged backgrounds face similar challenges as women of similar backgrounds who are sexually involved with men. Although several targeted prevention programs have been developed to stem the rate of infection among this population of young men, the message and focus on women is more diffuse, with an emphasis on prevention as part of reproductive health. For lesbian and bisexual women who may not be as concerned about contraception or sexually transmitted infections, or for whom men are not their primary sexual partners, there are few targeted education or prevention efforts that address sexual health for women in same-sex relationships.

Because the health of lesbian and bisexual women is generally not given attention, there is no current language, framework, or research to indicate how same-sex sexual orientation might shape this group's health status or outcomes in a Jamaican context. Many women have had sexual relationships with men prior to becoming intimately involved with women. Some women, particularly those with children, also maintain sexual contact with prior male lovers, sometimes to ensure against any claims he might make to deny her parenting rights. In general, concern about women's sexual health is limited to countering effects of heterosexual sexual contact. As feminist scholarship has soundly documented, Jamaican women are generally disempowered in negotiating sexual relationships with men and often are forced to accept men's roles as the decision-makers about the conditions under which sexual relations will take place. Lesbian and bisexual women are often caught in this bind, and are also at high risk for experiencing rape, sexual assault, contracting sexually transmitted infections, and even death at the hands of a former male lover.⁴²

Similarly, individuals who live in Jamaica and who desire to undergo medical treatment to change their gender have limited choices in terms of accessing quality care from local health care providers. With sufficient planning and with the aid of friends who live abroad, anecdotal evidence suggests that most persons travel to Florida or New York to tap into existing networks to access the knowledge and services there. Invariably, their economic circumstances do significantly affect the quality of the treatment, as well as the length of time it takes for persons to completely transition. In a government-run health care system that is already fraught with many problems related to resources and inequality in terms of quality of care, few health care providers in Jamaica are willing to act as caregivers or advocates for transgender persons. This situation will change slowly as the LGBT community grows, and as more transgender persons become more visible within the community as well as act as their own advocates, and as LGBT activists and allies begin to talk more about these issues.⁴³

Arts-based organizations like Ashe Productions use visual arts—theater, film, and musical performance—as a medium for presenting information about HIV prevention and raising awareness about the connections between sexual identity, sexual behaviors, and health outcomes.⁴⁴ In doing so, the organization also provides an important space for LGBT persons, especially youth, who are interested in the performing arts and are seeking positive means of self-expression. Nonetheless, even the innovative work of Ashe does not directly address issues related to same-sex sexuality, because of the larger climate of intolerance that might deter people from hearing its broader message.

POLITICS AND LAW

Jamaica's political and legal climate has had a significant influence on the ways that LGBT persons are perceived and treated and on how groups have mobilized around issues related to homosexuality at any given historical moment.

Homosexuality is not criminalized in Jamaica. Rather, the core of the debates revolve around the statutes encoded in the Offences Against the Person Act, which address matters regarding bodily harm such as murder and physical assault, but focus more heavily on issues related to sexuality such as marital sex, adultery, rape, prostitution, the sexual abuse of children, abortion, and the age of consent for minors. All the statutes explicitly seek to define the limits of appropriate male sexual behaviors, with the assumption that women and girls are, or ought to be, the targets of men's attention. In other words, women are not defined as sexual subjects in the law, or as being sexuality distinct or disconnected from men. Sections 76–79 explicitly forbid and criminalize sexual contact between men; these statutes were first introduced in 1864, and have not been substantially revised since signed into law. Under the category of “unnatural offences,” Section 76 states the crime of anal sex (“buggery”) is punishable by imprisonment for up to 10 years' hard labor. Under the category of “carnal knowledge,” Section 78 notes that the only proof that is required for criminal prosecution is that penetration did occur. Under the category of “outrages of decency,” Section 79 states that any man who witnesses or otherwise participates in committing “an act of gross indecency” (i.e., intimate touching) with another man can be sent to jail for up to two years. In 2009, the Parliament voted in the Sexual Offences Act, which, along with several new provisions relating to rape, incest and other sexual crimes, stipulates that a man who is convicted of buggery (i.e. having consensual anal sex with a man or a woman) may now be listed as a sex offender after his 10-year prison sentence ends. Despite the arguments presented in support of a gender-neutral definition of rape, the parliament chose to define rape in explicitly heterosexual terms (i.e., must involve a penis and a vagina) in order to avoid recognizing same-sex sexual contact as sex. Consequently, forced anal/oral penetration of men or women does not count as rape, but as a lesser form of sexual assault. While individuals and institutions (e.g., churches, schools, prisons, hospitals) often invoke the criminal codes as a justification for discriminating against or denigrating homosexuality, most people believe that the problem is a moral one, therefore, even though there is a general consensus that one's sexual orientation could and should be restricted to private settings, there is also broad support for state regulation of private sexual conduct if those behaviors are deemed immoral, sinful, or wrong, a priori.

Even though homosexuality has been taboo in Jamaica, the topic has not always been a lightning rod for the kind of vitriolic discussions that currently take place among citizens and politicians alike, nor has the question of legal reform necessarily been the direct focus of LGBT activism before now.

By the late 1990s, the political terrain had shifted tremendously for LGBT Jamaicans, and a far more dismal and difficult battle surrounded the possibility of changing the status of second-class sexual citizenship. Several issues emerged at once: antihomosexual sentiments were ignited through the popular culture and legitimized through nationalism and religion, there was an increasing prevalence of HIV/AIDS among homosexual men, and a growing stigma and pervasive discrimination against HIV-infected persons which prevented public health initiatives from stemming the spread of HIV among vulnerable populations, including homosexual men and prostitutes.

In 1998, the newly formed human rights group JFLAG (which originated as the country-specific chapter of C-FLAG, the Caribbean Forum for Lesbians, Allsexuals and Gays) launched a campaign to repeal the buggery laws and to change the terms of the debate about homosexuality in Jamaica. During the period of constitutional review, JFLAG petitioned for the removal of the statutes from the Sexual Offenses Act and for the constitution to be amended to include a bill of rights in which sexual orientation was a protected category, thereby extending full citizenship rights and protections to LGBT persons in Jamaica.⁴⁵ Their strategy and language were explicitly modeled after the success of LGBT groups in getting sexual orientation recognized under the South African constitution. This political action had two immediate effects: it formally brought homosexuality into the national dialogue about equal protection under the law, and transformed a loose-knit group of persons and alliances into a political constituency.

The consequences of this legal strategy continue to be borne out. On the one hand, various political entities have developed more hardened stances against recognizing the social rights of LGBT persons, using whatever opportunity is at hand to introduce new legal initiatives to punish LGBT persons for their "immoral lifestyle." Initiatives proffered by elected political leaders include questioning whether the constitutional right of LGBT persons to freedom of association or to bear firearms should be suspended, explicitly defining sex as heterosexual intercourse in the new rape statute, and recommending changes to the existing marriage laws to ensure that the relationship between two men or two women would not be legally recognized.⁴⁶

Since its founding in 1998, JFLAG's role has primarily been defined around its activism on legislative reform. However, one of the principal roles of JFLAG is to document and bring attention to persecution based on sexual orientation, and to advocate for LGBT individuals. For example, JFLAG has called for better police response to crimes that are reported to the police but are never adequately investigated. Indeed, LGBT persons have often been further victimized and harassed when they tried to make police reports, thus leading to a reluctance of LGBT persons to file reports of physical attacks and other violations. Gareth Henry, a JFLAG activist who was the public face of the organization, has also alleged police harassment against him given his and the organization's overt public stances on behalf of other LGBT persons. Through the high profile international attention brought to the cases of Brian Williamson and Lenford "Steve" Harvey, the Jamaican police were successfully pressured to investigate the murders and to bring the cases to trial. Ironically, the success of these two cases is now used to deny that there is any systematic bias against LGBT persons within the police force. They are held up as a sign that the political conditions in the country have significantly improved for LGBT persons. Despite these claims, at least three gay men have sought and successfully gained asylum in North America and England since 2005. For example, Gareth Henry decided to seek political asylum in Canada in 2008 on the basis of his history of experiencing persecution based on sexual orientation.

Nowhere are the consequences of stigma and discrimination more apparent than in Jamaica's prisons. In 1997, the former Commissioner of Corrections John Prescod recommended that condoms be distributed in the two largest male prisons, St. Catherine District Prison and Tower Street Correctional Center, in order to prevent the spread of sexually transmitted infections, including HIV. In response, the prison guards went on strike for several days, calling for the resignation of the Commissioner on the claim that raising the issue of sexual relations in a male prison cast aspersions on their sexuality as well; they also argued that providing condoms in the prisons encouraged sexual activity that was already explicitly illegal, thus making the guards complicit in this arrangement. As a result of prisoners being deliberately left unsupervised, a riot ensued, leading to the death of 16 inmates who were killed because they were suspected of being homosexuals; at least 40 more inmates were injured. The then-Minister of National Security, K. D. Knight, among many other high-level officials, agreed that condom distribution was not to take place. Subsequent ministers have not moved to change this policy.

As of this writing, the current Commissioner of Corrections Richard Reece continues to uphold this no-condom position and maintains that it is irrelevant whether there is sexual activity taking place in the highly overcrowded prisons, since the no-condom policy is consistent with the buggery laws.⁴⁷ Condoms are treated as contraband and are smuggled in by visitors when possible. Continued lack of access to adequate facilities, including health care, counseling, confidentiality, and safety seriously compromises the health and wellbeing of male (and female) prisoners, especially those who are HIV positive.⁴⁸ Since 2006, male prisoners who disclose that they are homosexual have been housed in a separate wing of a specific prison facility, alongside inmates with psychiatric disorders. While the Commissioner argues that this measure was taken to protect homosexual prisoners from harm, the seclusion of this population also creates new opportunities for abuse: the location of these prisoners is undisclosed, making them even more vulnerable to mistreatment by prison personnel.⁴⁹

The link between the criminalization of sex between men and the spread of HIV/AIDS has been made most consistently by Dr. Peter Figueroa, who is a key figure in the Ministry of Health and has played an active role in trying to shape more responsive and comprehensive legislation and public policy regarding HIV/AIDS. He has consistently argued against the buggery law, by showing how it works to inhibit prevention and treatment measures by further stigmatizing members of socially marginalized groups: prisoners, men and women in prostitution, and other adult homosexual men.⁵⁰ While the significance of Figueroa's work on HIV/AIDS has been recognized through national awards such as the Order of Jamaica, his actual efforts to change public policy have been largely rebuffed by the legislature. As recently as 2006, when Figueroa testified before a parliamentary committee concerning the need for a nondiscrimination clause in the proposed Charter of Rights, members of the legislative body refused to listen to or review any of the scientific evidence and medical scholarship that he presented on the topic.⁵¹ While many legislators frame their refusal to consider the repeal of buggery law as an issue of duty (i.e., that their stances must reflect the opinions of their constituencies and the wider population), it is clear that political expediency rather than commitment to democratic principles inform legislators' decisions to maintain the status quo.⁵²

In 2004, Human Rights Watch (HRW), the international human rights organization, published the report Hated to Death, which argued that homophobia and antigay sentiment have fueled the spread of HIV in Jamaica by exacerbating the stigma surrounding the disease and by making it impossible for gay men to lead open lives that are not framed by fear, abuse, and exploitation.⁵³ According to the HRW report, removal of the antisodomy laws and decriminalization of sex between men would help to create a more open climate that would decrease the physical and psychological risks faced by young gay men, as they would be protected from harm and could access necessary services without fear of retribution by health care workers or the public. This highly controversial report has received considerable attention in the international community, putting Jamaica's human rights record and reputation as a welcoming place for tourists under additional scrutiny.⁵⁴ As a definitive analysis of the political conditions that LGBT persons face in Jamaica, the impact of this widely cited report cannot be overstated, given its controversial claims.

The Jamaican government rejected the report's criticisms as a form of imperialism and the work of the homosexual lobby. The report's claims were questioned or rejected on the grounds that a foreign institution with a vested interest in coercing Jamaica to accept homosexuality had produced it, and that the evidence of the persecution of LGBT individuals was exaggerated or contrived to support this view.⁵⁵ Internationally, the report has been used by grassroots, student groups, and religious and human rights organizations to orchestrate campaigns and protests at Jamaican embassies and consulates in order to pressure the government to respect the human rights of LGBT persons and to overturn the buggery law. For example, the British Broadcasting Corporation as well as Amnesty International's OutFront program followed suit with their own reports to highlight the repressive conditions in Jamaica and to provide an avenue for Jamaican activists to bring awareness to and create coalitions with international groups to bring about change.⁵⁶

In turn, the political and media landscape have also begun to shift under this intensified scrutiny and pressure from outside. That is, mass media, public opinion, and politicians in Jamaica have begun to register a growing, if uneasy, awareness of the repercussions of the negative publicity and reputation gained through the report. Not surprisingly, there has been significant backlash against LGBT persons in the wake of the HRW report. Various opinion polls have been conducted with the intent to show—and perhaps confirm—that the majority of political leaders and citizens alike remain opposed to the decriminalization of homosexual sex between men.⁵⁷

Between 2005 and 2008, there were at least six publicized incidents of mob attacks against men, in addition to the dozens of verbal and physical assaults and threats by individuals against men and women, and the deliberate spreading of rumors in order to foster fear, especially in the wake of the HRW report. In the context of international activism, which has been pressing for a governmental response on the very issue of violence against LGBT persons, the largely absent or ineffectual responses of the Jamaican government to these public and highly publicized episodes of violence have generated a new level of awareness among those who had largely ignored or downplayed the problem before. To this end, political leaders even went so far in 2005 as to invite a discussion about repealing the laws against homosexual sex and prostitution.⁵⁸ Similarly, after extensive media coverage about mob violence against gay men in several parts of the country between 2005 and 2007, local human rights groups and political officials formally called for increased and better responsiveness by the police when investigating and preventing these incidents.⁵⁹

A significant part of the backlash has been the rise of an organized conservative movement, with significant political support from North America, which seeks to influence the legislature to preserve or revise areas of the law in order to prevent any recognition of homosexual sex or same-sex relationships. In 2006, and in direct response to the efforts of JFLAG to petition for a nondiscrimination clause to be included in the proposed Charter of Rights and Freedoms, a coalition of religious fundamentalist groups including Family Life Ministries, Lawyers' Christian Fellowship, Operation Save Jamaica, and the National Church Alliance, with the support of North American groups like Focus on the Family, made a proposal to Parliament calling for various measures to prevent LGBT persons from gaining access to the same social and legal protections as heterosexual persons.⁶⁰

These right-wing groups were able to successfully derail the process by casting doubt on the real effects of extending universal human rights to all citizens, including LGBT persons. The groups argued that the proposed and long-delayed Charter of Rights and Freedom, an amendment to the Constitution to establish the basic human rights and freedoms accorded to all Jamaicans first introduced in early 1990s and that was enthusiastically supported by all the local human rights groups, needed to be carefully scrutinized in order to protect the rights of religious bodies to condemn homosexuality and to prevent any recognition of same-sex sexuality. Raising the specter of same-sex marriage as a logical outcome of extending full human rights to all citizens, the proposal offered by the right-wing groups specifically called for the exclusion of the wording “respect for private and family life, privacy of the home,” which, they argued, was tantamount to social acceptance of homosexual sex, even if it occurred in private.⁶¹ Going further, the group argued that the phrase “free and democratic society” was too vague and permissive, and suggested that it be qualified with the phrase “and in keeping with the aspirations and norms of the Jamaican people” to reflect the importance they placed on public opinion, which supported their anti-LGBT stance. In other words, the group stridently argued against the right to privacy claiming that homosexuals were being unduly protected by such a clause, and claimed that any nondiscrimination clause would “open the door” to decriminalizing buggery, force Jamaicans to accept homosexuals as equal citizens, and thus limit the ability of religious organizations to denounce homosexuality or to refuse to conduct same-sex marriages.

Ironically, while many political leaders found the tenor of the right-wing group’s overall argument to be dangerously antidemocratic, they still ended up siding with the group on the need to preserve the buggery law.⁶² Such a move by these religious groups was important for bringing the Charter of Rights under undue suspicion by positioning it as a mechanism for “protecting” homosexual sex, and the public would probably reject it on that basis. Formal recognition of their position by the legislative body also paved the way for future legislative debates about sexuality-related matters to consider current dissenting public opinion offered by religious groups in deciding whether laws being enacted are “in the public interest.” Indeed, based on these efforts, individual legislators have indicated a willingness to introduce a law that would ban same-sex marriage and legal recognition of same-sex relationships, even though LGBT groups like JFLAG have not indicated any interest in the issue.⁶³

During the 2007 campaigns for national office, the current Prime Minister Bruce Golding made it clear that his future government would not consider a repeal of the buggery laws. In an earlier campaign, he also chose to use music championing antihomosexual sentiments as part of his effort to establish his credibility over the other contender, Percival Patterson, the Prime Minister at the time and who was rumored to be homosexual because he has been unmarried for most of his political life.

Like dancehall musicians who have come under similar scrutiny, elected officials argue that they refuse to be bullied or to “bow” (a pejorative term for anal sex between men) to the dictates of groups seeking to impose their agendas on Jamaica. In refusing to reconsider its role in protecting minority groups, representatives of the Jamaican government have consistently refused to acknowledge that there is a legitimate problem of social persecution of LGBT persons, instead framing the issue as one brought on by LGBT persons themselves and concocted by outsiders, rather than a genuine concern being expressed by Jamaicans at home.

In May 2008, the Prime Minister of Jamaica, Bruce Golding, ignited further controversy and debate during an interview with BBC-TV when he was asked how and whether he planned to address the persecution of LGBT persons in Jamaica. In response, he claimed that LGBT persons were not welcome in his Cabinet.⁶⁴ Reflective of a broader shift in the tenor of public discourse, such an overtly hostile stance that legitimizes discrimination and the mistreatment of LGBT persons is increasingly being met with questions and demands for more careful consideration of the issue of equal treatment of LGBT persons in Jamaica. While many Jamaicans, and especially conservative religious leaders, lauded Bruce Golding for defending what they saw as an issue of Jamaica’s cultural sovereignty, far more open and unexpected disapproval came from all sectors of the society, from religious leaders, journalists, and ordinary citizens alike, critiquing his stance as an embarrassment, a demonstration of poor leadership and myopic vision, pandering to his political supporters and fomenting further division in a society already socially splintered.⁶⁵

As the media reports show, human rights abuses against gay men have become particularly rampant and visible, ranging from police harassment, arbitrary arrests, mob violence, and attacks with various weapons, to the denial of social services, the verbal abuse of prisoners, sex workers, and the forced removal from families and communities.

The record established over the 10-year period, from when the debates about the buggery laws began in earnest in 1997 until early 2008, point to a systematic effort by Jamaican cultural, political, and religious leaders, and with the explicit approval of many in the society, to deny LGBT Jamaicans basic social and human rights: the right of free association, the right to privacy, and the right to be free from persecution. Many individual men have sought asylum in North America and Britain, on the basis that they would be killed because of their sexual orientation if they remained in Jamaica.⁶⁶ The petitioners range from ordinary Jamaicans who have recently left the country, to those who emigrated during childhood and who are being asked to consider returning to Jamaica because of violations of other immigration-related statutes (e.g., expired visas or deportation orders), to LGBT activists like Gareth Henry and Larry Chang, who have sought asylum because the public roles they had taken as advocates and spokespersons in Jamaica also exposed them to more violence and threats against their lives.⁶⁷ Ironically, much of the evidence of these asylum claims are based on the many local media reports which seek to affirm that many Jamaicans desire that the country be, and remain, a largely inhospitable place for gay men. While women are far less likely to petition for asylum, it appears that women are more likely to do so in Britain, whereas men are more likely to make their petition, and successfully, in North America.

In general, the persecution of women on the basis of sexual orientation has only received scant attention by JFLAG or the international movement pushing for the repeal of the buggery law; as such, abuses against women are infrequently documented. Since public discourse has been driven by and focused on legal status of same-sex relations between men as a criminal act, it is only men who are formally recognized as persecuted subjects under these terms. However, lesbian and bisexual women are also subject to social sanctions in the form of verbal and physical harassment, sexual violence, death, ostracism, and estrangement from families, as well as denials of their parental rights. Violence is an effective method of social control of women's and girls' sexuality in Jamaica, and probably works in concert with the dramatic increase in violence at all levels of the society for the past two decades.⁶⁸ And yet far less effort, attention, and public outcry exists surrounding violence against lesbian and bisexual women because the nature of the harm is not, on the face of it, seen as distinct from the harm committed against women in general. As such, most of the public documentation has a built-in bias that shapes the interpretation of what persecution looks like; those records do not reflect women's experiences. For example, because there has not been any systematic investigation of the forms and nature of sexual violence against women in Jamaica, it is far more difficult for Jamaican lesbian and bisexual women who are seeking asylum in another country to gather sufficient documentation to establish that they have a well-founded fear of persecution based on their sexual orientation if they returned to live in Jamaica.⁶⁹ Since attention to gender-based violence is increasing internationally, it remains likely that lesbian and bisexual women's experiences of physical assault and rape, especially when understood as a form of reprisal or punishment meted out against women who are suspected of violating the heterosexual sexual order, will be taken more seriously.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Jamaica is a highly religious society, where there are few recognizable boundaries between the sacred and the secular. In general, antigay bigotry is more routinely expressed by religious leaders from the pulpits and through media venues (e.g., call-in shows, advice columns, religious radio stations) than by any other source, including dancehall music, which is often held up as the bastion of homophobia.⁷⁰ However, there is far less criticism targeted at religious individuals or organizations that promote social intolerance on matters related to sexuality. While the majority of (Christian) religious communities in Jamaica openly denounce homosexuality, many LGBT persons remain connected to and active in the denominations in which they were raised. As such their membership in these religious communities is fraught with anxieties; and yet, few alternatives are available to LGBT persons who wish to practice their religious faiths without harassment or vilification from the pulpit. The extent to which LGBT individuals in Jamaica might be inclined to engage in spiritual practices of indigenous religious communities such as Pocomania, or to reject Christianity altogether, remains an open question.

Even as Christian fundamentalist arguments about the immorality of homosexuality dominate the political landscape and shape public attitudes, clergypersons in more liberal denominations (e.g., the United Church of Christ) have begun to take strong stances against the widespread discrimination and violence against LGBT persons and to call for more dialogue.⁷¹ Some clergypersons do openly defend LGBT persons in the press, while others are willing to quietly offer spiritual support and services for funerals, christenings, and other rites, even if the denomination explicitly forbids clergy from doing so.⁷²

Liberal nondenominational groups from the U.S. have begun establishing places of worship in Jamaica, where they offer nonjudgmental interpretations of biblical scripture and address the spiritual needs of many LGBT people while offering them an opportunity to belong to an affirming faith community. Similarly, in 2007, the Metropolitan Community of Churches of South Florida worked with JFLAG to establish a new congregation, Sunshine Cathedral, in Jamaica.⁷³ In addition to ministering to LGBT persons in Jamaica, the denomination offers a critical community space where personal, political, and spiritual issues related to the ongoing persecution and marginalization of the LGBT community can be treated with the seriousness and compassion that the issues deserve.

MEDIA AND CULTURE

Representations of LGBT Jamaicans in mass media and popular culture are consistently negative, pejorative, and demeaning, further encouraging and justifying the forms of mistreatment described above. Public discourse about and against homosexuality in Jamaica generally takes three forms. First, by invoking conservative interpretations of biblical scripture to argue that homosexuality is a sin as defined in the Old Testament (e.g., the story of Sodom and Gomorrah in Genesis, rules about sexual conduct in Leviticus) and the New Testament (Paul and Jude's letters explaining the consequences of sin). This is the most pervasive argument offered by Christians and non-Christians alike, and it is constantly circulated within the mass media, giving the arguments further traction and legitimacy. Cultural arguments that focus on homosexuality as a foreign import and as a tactic of imperial domination wielded by Europeans and Euro-Americans against persons of African descent also hold sway. The undue emphasis on same-sex sexual orientation as a moral issue (i.e., good vs. sinful/wrong/foreign), rather than as a human rights issue, dominates public debate in every domain, from talk radio to the opinion and advice columns in print media.

The Jamaican mass media has functioned as a core venue for fueling and shaping debates about homosexuality in Jamaica. Nonetheless, the mass media's treatment of JFLAG's petition in 1998, the international pressure to remove the antisodomy statutes from the Jamaican constitution, and the international movement to censure and challenge the role of dancehall music has ranged from openly inflammatory to veiled hostility to dismissive.⁷⁴ Generally speaking, it is fair to say that the absence of informed, balanced treatment of homosexuality by the mass media has helped to legitimize ignorance about and hostile sentiments and behaviors toward LGBT persons. In reporting the various challenges to dominant cultural attitudes—from calls for boycotts of dancehall artists and of Jamaica, to mob violence and the textbook controversy—the major newspapers have often reprinted editorials of other newspapers rather than offer their own analysis, and often present the biased perspectives of fundamentalist religious leaders who are members of antigay advocacy groups without any disclaimers. More common is the use of headlines that treat issues regarding homosexuality in a sensationalist fashion, and intentionally stoke public's resentment and fury. Recent examples include placing headlines that suggested that the police force was being overrun with gay men and lesbians under the watch of the deputy commissioner.⁷⁵ Stories have also been run announcing that adult lesbians were involved in recruiting and converting new members from girls' high schools.⁷⁶

Among newspaper columnists, the treatment of scholarship on homosexuality is fairly dismissive; when research is invoked, it is most often dated information with a conservative slant or misinterpreted altogether. For example, the Jamaica Gleaner presented a series of articles under the banner "Gays in Jamaica" in July and August 2001. The articles represented LGBT persons as sexual deviants with pathological personalities and were framed by specific legal, biological, and religious viewpoints that explained these behaviors. In terms of the content of reportage, not much has improved since the series ran several years ago; most stories that focus on LGBT persons are still not balanced or accurate, and generally present divergent positions about sexual orientation as only matters of opinion and as having equal merit and implications to homophobic arguments.⁷⁷ With the exception of the writings of John Maxwell, a veteran left-leaning journalist in Jamaica, there is a remarkable absence of criticism of how LGBT persons are represented in the Jamaican press; many media personalities simply use their columns to promote antihomosexual attitudes or to reinforce pervasive myths and stereotypes about homosexuality.⁷⁸ Hopefully, this pattern will begin to shift as more research is done by scholars in Jamaica, and as LGBT persons become more active in advocating for better representation of the community.

At the level of the editorial boards, however, there has been a perceptible shift toward more nuanced positions. At least one of the major newspapers, The Daily

Gleaner, has gone so far as to denounce the incitement of violence and discrimination against LGBT persons, has taken a public stance against the buggery laws, and now pushes for the decriminalization of homosexual sex.⁷⁹ The editors also took the bold step of criticizing the stance of Prime Minister Bruce Golding on the matter of LGBT individuals holding political office, citing the explicit discriminatory stance as a failure of leadership and a national embarrassment.

The LGBT community in Jamaica has a complex relationship with dancehall culture. On one hand, as a musical form that emerged in the early 1980s from urban working-class communities, the dancehall aesthetic is decidedly antiestablishment, thumbing its nose at all social conventions, much to the consternation of the middle class, elites, and religious conservatives. From the language that musicians use (only Jamaican Creole), to the settings (urban, poor, inner city communities), the style of dress (flashy, body conscious, sexually provocative, not sex-typed), styles of dance (unrestrained, sexually suggestive movements), to the lyrical content (aligning social critiques with heterosexual male bravado and sexually explicit songs), dancehall music taps into a rebellious spirit that is not visible or so clearly expressed anywhere else in Jamaican society. Many LGBT Jamaicans are also members of the “dancehall generation” and thus identify strongly with this popular cultural form.

On the other hand, the antiestablishment stance of dancehall culture has also promoted vitriolic homophobia and incited violence against LGBT persons. Steeped in nationalist arguments about homosexuality as foreign and corrupting even to the local elite, dancehall musicians operate by regularly calling through their music and performances for the excision and annihilation of the bodies of LGBT persons. In other words, dancehall culture invariably casts poor and working-class LGBT persons as outsiders by virtue of their non-normative sexual orientation. Pejorative references to “battymen,” sodomites, and lesbians, as well as condemnatory statements accompanied by threats of physical and verbal punishment, populate many of the top dancehall hits. Notably, while the cultural elite and social conservatives have criticized dancehall music for its “slackness” (i.e., violent, sexually explicit language in relation to women) and excess, there has been far less attention given to the hostilities against LGBT persons uttered in the music. Dancehall music remains the music of choice at the parties and social events organized by and for the LGBT community in Jamaica, with some (often unsuccessful) censoring of the music played; the most popular songs are often laced with homophobic lyrics that are tightly embedded in the song’s rhythm.

While many Jamaicans, straight or queer, do consider the hostile and violent sentiments directed at LGBT persons by dancehall musicians to be problematic, the charge that dancehall music is homophobic, and thus politically suspect, first emerged with any force outside of Jamaica, and came in 1994 from Britain-based director Isaac Julien in his film A Darker Side of Black. This film was prompted by the 1991 release of the song “Boom Bye Bye,” by Buju Banton, a young and rising star in dancehall music. The song explicitly incites violence against “battymen” and rejects homosexuality with an urgency that is palpable and thus distressing to many LGBT persons. A translation of the lyrics of the song “Boom Bye Bye” from Jamaican Creole into American English, along with its mass distribution through fliers, e-mail, and blogs, was used to galvanize LGBT activists in Europe and North America to protest against this song, and later, dancehall music.⁸⁰ With the initial leadership and local support of JFLAG, dancehall music has been consistently portrayed as the primary conduit for antigay sentiments in Jamaica, and presented as a medium that posed harm to both the local and international LGBT population. Consequently, Buju Banton and his generation of dancehall artists have been a lightning rod for protests by LGBT activists in Europe and North America.

As early as 1997, London-based LGBT activist Peter Tatchell, of the organization OutRage, labeled dancehall music as “murder music,” touching off a series of debates in Britain’s Jamaican immigrant community and in Jamaica about the role of popular culture in shaping the social attitudes of Jamaicans regarding LGBT persons. The “Murder Music” campaign that Tatchell launched in 2005 quickly gained widespread popularity within LGBT communities outside Jamaica. The transnational campaign targeted the concerts of popular dancehall musicians such as Capleton, Beenie Man, Vybz Kartel, Elephant Man, and Baby Cham, who had expressed similarly strong sentiments as Buju Banton did, including inciting violence against gays and lesbians, through their music and on-stage performances. The campaign was waged primarily via the Internet and particularly blogs, spawning numerous protests, community forums, letters, e-mails, and phone calls to political officials, promoters, and sponsors wherever the artists were scheduled to appear.

These protests generated considerable visibility in Jamaican immigrant communities, as well as in LGBT magazines, Web sites, blogs, and political groups outside of Jamaica. As a result of the campaign, some dancehall artists have been banned from performing in major cities like London, and many shows have been cancelled in every major city in North America, causing the loss of publicity, promotion of their music, and most importantly, revenue. At least one artist, Beenie Man, lost a major recording contract. The campaign also created a contract called the Reggae Compassion Act, which is a statement by artists apologizing for writing and performing homophobic songs and pledging to refrain from performing them in the future.

While some artists, even those who have not been the target of the boycott, have felt obligated to sign the document, many deny doing so, for fear of accusations of ‘selling out’ from their supporters in Jamaica and Jamaican immigrant communities in North America. Nonetheless, the campaign succeeded in minimizing the number of high-profile venues accessible to the artists to promote their music outside of Jamaica, and raised public awareness about the content and impact of the music through the debate and the self-censoring it provoked. That effect has extended to Jamaica, where at least one corporation and major donor, Red Stripe, withdrew financial support from major shows, citing the lewd and problematic content and performances of dancehall artists. Supporters of dancehall artists have protested these various efforts, characterizing them as a form of censorship of their freedom of creative expression and threatening the economic wellbeing of the dancehall industry.

Another venue for international protest is Jamaica’s tourism industry. Dissatisfaction with the Jamaican government’s own stance, as well as its support of other Caribbean countries’ refusal to give docking privileges to cruise ships carrying LGBT passengers in the late 1990s, has led to calls for protests against the Jamaica Tourist Board, itself a governmental entity. The negative publicity by organizations like the International Gay and Lesbian Travel Association (IGLTA), the official body representing hundreds of organizations around the world involved in promoting and facilitating gay and lesbian travel, has amounted to an ongoing informal economic boycott of Jamaica by gay and lesbian tourists. As a result of the other controversies and the sustained media attention to the violence against LGBT persons, the concerns first raised by LGBT groups outside Jamaica have come to the attention of mainstream media outlets and has sparked the awareness of heterosexual persons who are also potential visitors to a country that is heavily dependent on tourism for its economic stability. In 2005, Time magazine published an often-cited article labeling Jamaica as “the most homophobic place on earth.” The New York Times has also published articles on the persecution of lesbians and gays and the negative experiences of LGBT persons who traveled there for vacation.

In response to the negative international attention brought by these protests, many Jamaicans have come to herald the song “Boom Bye Bye” as an anthem of cultural resistance to what they perceive as the negative side of globalization. Nationalist sentiments have been heightened by the successful efforts of the campaign to censor some dancehall artists. Decrying the campaign and criticisms as a concerted effort by the gay lobby or gay mafia to force Jamaicans to accept homosexuality, the overwhelming response has been to embrace antipathetic sentiments even more strongly, and to pledge to defend the culture and its “norms” against the global influence of a “worldwide homosexual lobby” represented by mostly white gay men from Western Europe and North America who seek to bully countries they see as powerless and backward, like Jamaica, into “bowing down” and accepting these modern yet alien values.⁸¹

Despite its often vitriolic nature, the debate prompted by the campaign against dancehall music has had a noticeable impact in shifting local discussions about homophobia, same-sex sexual orientation, and the social rights of LGBT persons. Public opinion has become more bifurcated than ever before, even as there is growing recognition among engaged citizens that these pervasive social attitudes do not necessarily serve Jamaicans well in the long or short term. Moreover, while the tone and content offered through various media outlets remains negative and highly polarized, there is a distinct and positive shift in the positions of editors of the major newspapers who have begun to directly challenge the religious arguments, and to point out the flaws and negative effects on social relations in the society. Everyday then, there are more voices—through radio call-in programs, letters to the editor, and cultural programming—who are questioning whether such hatred and contempt for a particular group of people has any place in a democratic society, and are emphasizing the importance of social acceptance for those who are different and the full inclusion of LGBT persons as citizens in the nation.

Positive representations of LGBT persons on local programming are rare. More typical is for insinuations about same-sex orientation to be made as a joke, reminder, or warning to listeners. LGBT persons are often represented in political cartoons by their absence or a symbol (e.g., a closet, a sign), but not as speaking subjects. One exception is a local soap opera, Royal Palm Estate, which began airing in 1994 and centers on the lives of the members of an elite family in contemporary Jamaica. The program dramatically presents the social tensions around race, skin color, and social class, and did include a gay character in the early 1990s. Much suspense was built around the disclosure of his sexuality. He was written out of the show soon thereafter.

More recently, the comedic play Bashment Granny, which was written and produced in Jamaica for a local, working-class audience, has been wildly successful since it was first staged in 2005; there is a follow-up, Bashment Granny 2, and plans are underway for turning the play into a film. The play's immense popularity lies in the performance antics of the character named Shebada, a young man whose sexuality is made ambivalent through his claim that "mi deh pon borderline" ("I stand on the border") but who is simultaneously being "named" as gay through his attire and his mannerisms. Shebada is assigned characteristics (e.g., bleached face, tight clothing, head wrap, style of speech, exaggerated gestures, quick to offer verbal insults and witty put-downs) that are excerpted from the gay subculture that exists in the inner-city communities of Kingston. Shebada's popularity lies precisely in the ways that he displays the very characteristics that the audience might explicitly reject and frown upon outside the theater, but are willing and able to laugh at inside the theater. The play has also been staged in several Jamaican immigrant communities in England and North America, and is often sold out, competing directly with and surpassing the popularity of dancehall artists. The audience's responsiveness to this character has been noted by other established comedians like Owen "Blakka" Ellis, who suggests that Jamaicans are more tolerant about sexual difference than they may be willing to admit, given the heavy-handed ways that musicians and politicians have been driving home the claim that Jamaicans are, by nature, averse to homosexuality.⁸² Noting the paradox of working-class Jamaican theatergoers' relationship to Shebada raises the question of whether the bold existence of a character like Shebada on stage is merely offering new, locally specific stereotypes about gay men that will eventually become used to marginalize them further; or, whether this stereotype does legitimize a particular existence, and thus can be mobilized by poor and working-class gay men in order to demand respect and greater autonomy albeit in limited ways.

Most knowledge and awareness about LGBT issues comes through the Internet and satellite cable, which beams programming from predominantly U.S. stations into the homes of many Jamaicans. There is little censoring of material shown on cable networks so that, depending on the cable company that one chooses, it is possible to get as many channels showing pornography as music videos. This uncensored access to information is a byproduct of the liberalization of the economy in the 1990s, which allowed for the emergence of several telecommunication companies. As such, Jamaicans who have access to cable television are more likely to be exposed to programming such as The "L" Word than many Americans because the structure of Jamaican cable television does not have the same kind of restricted access to the premium channels, such as HBO, Showtime, and Logo, that is present in the United States. Conservative religious groups criticize the wide availability of information and images, arguing that the introduction of cable is partially responsible for increased sexual promiscuity among youth and the sexual abuse of children.

The availability of imported images—and the absence of locally produced images and programming—clearly affect the perceptions and attitudes of Jamaican LGBT and heterosexual persons alike. While heterosexual Jamaicans may have an opportunity to engage with their own stereotypes and misinformation, the obviously foreign (mostly white) content produced for a mostly white North American audience may also legitimize their perceptions of homosexuality as a white or American notion.

Similarly, LGBT persons in Jamaica who look to other countries for both affirmation and information invariably find their society treated as completely intolerant and unlivable, and as if they are not present (i.e., impossible subjects). Furthermore, what is presented in these imported media packages as the normative LGBT identity is highly misleading; consequently, Jamaicans (straight or LGBT) do not always recognize that what they are seeing are products of North American society and media, which are tainted by the social biases and political agendas relevant to those societies.

Currently, the primary forms of documentation of LGBT life in Jamaica are essays and visual documentaries featuring and emphasizing individual narratives of persecution based on sexual orientation (e.g., Johanna Bermudez's Ex-Isles, Phillip Pike's Songs of Freedom, Stacey-Ann Chin's memoir and performance poetry, and Makeda Silvera's critical essay "Man-Royals and Sodomites" and co-edited anthology Maka: Diasporic Juks). Similar themes emphasizing the effects of social prejudice on sexual identity and practice also exist in the form of fictional writing (e.g., Margaret Cezair-Thompson's A True History of Paradise, Patricia Powell's A Small Gathering of Bones and The Pagoda; individual poems and short stories by Michelle Cliff, Thomas Glave and Kei Miller). Notably, the majority of these works are produced by Jamaicans living outside of Jamaica, thus falsely suggesting that such work is not possible in Jamaica itself.

LGBT persons in Jamaica participate in all aspects of the society's cultural life: as popular radio announcers, performers, artists, writers, and cultural workers. While many persons, including LGBT individuals, subscribe to the notion that the arts are more welcoming to individuals with a same-sex sexual orientation, the overt and ubiquitous antipathies towards them makes it unclear whether individuals involved in this arena are more likely to voluntarily disclose their sexual orientations to others, or to question the representation of LGBT life in the broader society. What is more likely is that, within these domains, same-sex sexual orientations are not condemned, but are affirmed partly through the absence of direct questioning or verbal and physical hostilities. The annual and independently run Calabash Literary Festival held in Jamaica certainly operates as one such space, and is one where the presence of LGBT individuals—as writers and audience members—is not treated as a problem per se by the majority of the attendees. Rather, the intimate, literary setting offers an opportunity for persons of multiple perspectives to explore how sexual identity intersects with other forms of belonging. Whether LGBT artists, as individuals or as a community, in Jamaica will come to see their art as a vital tool for expressing social critiques about the relationship between sexuality and other spheres of existence, and articulating alternative visions about art, identity, and politics remains to be seen.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The LGBT movement for equal rights, protection, and recognition in Jamaica is still in its fledgling stages. For such a movement to gain momentum and credibility at home, it must be situated in a broader social justice framework that is steeped in Jamaica's history of social activism. As demonstrated in early models of feminist organization in Jamaica, the social landscape of a postcolonial, debt-ridden society demands a radically different approach to organizing for sexual justice than has been done in the past, or in other venues. Furthermore, a single-issue focus on sexual orientation to the exclusion of issues like sexism, illiteracy, housing rights, family instability, unemployment, absence of adequate or quality health care, police mistreatment, interpersonal violence, and so on means that the material and political concerns of most LGBT persons will not be addressed by the existing organizations or frameworks for mobilizing for social change. LGBT groups in other Caribbean countries (e.g., Guyana, Trinidad and Tobago, Cuba) have developed innovative and successful strategies for addressing how social issues related to economic status, gender, and so on, intersect with and reinforce marginalization based on sexual orientation. There is much that Jamaican LGBT activists can learn from others engaged in similar struggles around the region. Given the growing visibility and strength of conservative antigay religious groups in Jamaica, as well as their ready access to support and resources of established right-wing groups in North America, coalition-building is critical for LGBT activists to gain the kind of legitimacy and broad-based support they need. Building coalitions with women's, environmental, human rights, and social justice groups in Jamaica (and the region) around issues of mutual concern such as violence, poverty, sexual assault, corruption, media reform, family support, and similar topics will also help to promote awareness and dialogue among the various groups about how their concerns are (and can be) linked to sexual rights and justice.

While it is not expected that the current national government will repeal the buggery law, the marginalized status of LGBT persons in Jamaica clearly undermines the democratic project begun in the early 20th century. Consequently, an important issue facing the LGBT community is building its capacity to articulate its diverse needs, perspectives, and visions in relation to a progressive democratic tradition. Whether through collective action focused at the level of national legislative reform or building strong institutions to serve the populations' needs for advocacy at the community level or creating opportunities for education, self-empowerment, and fostering creative self-expression at the individual level, giving form and sustenance to the LGBT struggle for sexual justice is a necessary and worthwhile step in the 21st century.

For scholars of various disciplines, a critical task lying ahead will be to define a comprehensive research agenda and create a body of knowledge about the relationship of sexualities to other aspects of identity and cultural conditions in Jamaica, from the standpoint of LGBT persons. Such knowledge can inform public policy, political organizing, and provide greater insight into what it means to be LGBT and Jamaican. Documenting the struggles of LGBT individuals will provide greater insight about the social dynamics of community formation in relation to sexuality, and make visible the structural and cultural forces that shape the lives and choices of LGBT people, as well as the kinds of identities, politics, and visions they create along the way.

5. For example, the phrase "bun fyah" is used repeatedly by dancehall musicians to call for retribution against both gay men and lesbians. The phrase is loosely translated as "homosexuals should be damned or destroyed." One example is Capleton's song "Bun Out di Chi Chi," which calls for the purification of the society by extermination of gay men who are being likened to termites, or chi chi in local vernacular. The reference to fire as ritual purification originates in Rastafarian ideology and is invoked as a critique, that is, to "bun dung Babylon" (i.e., to burn Babylon, the economic, cultural, and political center of Eurocentric, morally corrupt and politically oppressive ideas and practices that negatively affect the lives of "sufferahs" or poor and working-class black people).

80. In defense of dancehall music, Carolyn Cooper, a scholar of Jamaican popular culture and the first person to legitimize dancehall as a topic of inquiry, has argued that the translation of the lyrics of "Boom Bye Bye" was inaccurate and misleading, even though it was done by a Jamaican-American. As such, she argues, the claim that the song promotes violence against homosexual men is incorrect; in her view, the song is not about actual violence using a real gun. Rather, the reference is to a lyrical or rhetorical gun, that is, using the mouth to express discontent or disapproval. Since there is no formal sanction against incitement to harm in Jamaica, Cooper's argument holds considerable sway in a context where utterances that do lead to harm do not have legal import; only physical acts that lead to death or "grievous assault" are recognized as actionable. In the years since the debate emerged, the expressions of violence against LGBT persons in dancehall lyrics have only become more graphic and specific.

81. The term "to bow" has negative meanings and implications in the Jamaican vernacular. On one hand, the term refers to male homosexual activity, which is represented as men bowing or bending forward to be recipients of anal penetration. Because religious discourse often links homosexuality to the narrative of Sodom and Gomorrah, many people are led to believe that sexual activity between men cannot be consensual; rather, such sexual interaction between men is often viewed as an exercise of immoral power, resulting in something akin to rape of the unwilling, weak, and otherwise innocent man/boy, hence its ready conflation with pedophilia and pederasty. On the other hand, the term "bow" is also used to refer to oral sex (as in the pejorative term "bow cat," that is, a man who performs oral sex on a woman), which many Jamaicans view with disgust. Here, the possibility of Jamaica's recognition of homosexuality as a legitimate social identity and set of sexual practices is treated as synonymous with "bowing" to more powerful nations like the United States and Britain, and would be taken as a sign of the nation's moral and political weakness, as well as the failed masculinity of its political leaders.

OVERVIEW

Officially named the United Mexican States (Estados Unidos Mexicanos), Mexico is bordered on the north by the United States of America and on the south and southeast by Guatemala and Belize. Mexico's territory encompasses 1,220,606 square miles, including two extensive coastlines, which constitute one of its most important geographical characteristics. The country is bordered on the east by the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea and on the west by the Sea of Cortez and the Pacific Ocean. Mexico's climate ranges from extreme desert to snow-capped mountains and tropical rainforests, although the majority of its territory is considered semiarid with a summer rainy season.

The Mexican economy is ranked tenth in the world and second in Latin America (surpassed only by Brazil). While Mexico's per capita income is the highest in Latin America ($8,066 USD), the distribution of wealth is far from equal. This inequality is the main cause for Mexico's annual growth rate of 2.3 percent in the first part of the 21st century.¹ While some of the richest people in the world live in Mexico, approximately 47 percent of the population lives below the official poverty line, and 11 percent live in extreme poverty.² This population with limited economic resources has had to emigrate to areas where transnational companies have opened large assembly plants (known as maquiladoras). Others decide to immigrate to the United States and often send back remittances to their families. These remittances make up the major source of income for a large portion of Mexico's population and are increasingly important in international economics.

In 2005, Mexico's population included 103,263,000 inhabitants, yet intense emigration to the United States has resulted in some 26 million Mexicans (from first to third generation) living in that country. Around 80 percent of Mexicans are Mestiza (primarily of a mix of Spanish, native populations, and Africans), 10 percent are native (indigenous), and 10 percent are white (European). Some 80 percent of the population claims to practice Catholicism, although syncretism between Catholic and pre-Columbian or African religions is one common way of preserving ancestral cultures. The predominance of Catholicism is the principal cause for Mexico's homophobic culture, which has made the development of a tolerant attitude toward sexual diversity difficult.

As the country with the largest Hispanic population in the world, Mexico is also a major cultural reference point for Latin America. Many important newspapers and magazines are headquartered there, and it is a major center of cinematographic and artistic production. This brings a large number of artists and intellectuals to Mexico from all over the Americas, a situation that allows the widespread broadcasting of diverse cultural expressions, including those in favor of sexual diversity that, despite socially rooted homophobia, have had surprising success.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

While there is a fair amount of historic documentation suggesting that homosexual practices were tolerated by various indigenous groups before the arrival of the Spanish in Mexico, the imposition of Catholicism during the colonial period was a determining factor in the prohibition of those practices. The Inquisition habitually organized raids against groups who were known to practice sodomy, a crime also known as the nefarious sin ("el pecado nefando") by canon law. During the 19th century there were few references to homoerotic relations, so perhaps speaking about them in public was not allowed. In November 1901, the police department of Mexico City surprised a party where a group of upper class men were dressed in drag. This event, known as the "dance of the 41" ("el baile de los cuarenta y uno"), makes it clear that homosexual relations during that period had to be carried out in secret because of the high levels of social surveillance. Although Mexican laws ceased to strictly prohibit the practice of sodomy in the first half of the 19th century, a great deal of social pressure still exists against homosexuality, which marks a contrast between written law and Mexico's deeply rooted Catholic tradition. As a part of this tradition, machismo, which remained until recent times a defining element of Mexican national identity, has been one of the factors responsible for the persistence of a homophobic attitude in Mexican society, making it difficult for homosexuals to find any type of social recognition. In the postrevolutionary period (1920s–1930s), a series of controversies about national identity paved the way for the revolutionary elite to define the nation as a virile state, which was subsequently understood to permit the institutionalization of homophobia in all types of public expression. The persistence of homophobia is manifest in different aspects of daily life, in the application of justice, in the media and in the general treatment that major institutions offer this minority group.

In the early 1970s, as a result of the influence of the American gay rights movement, the first organizations in favor of homosexual rights were formed in Mexico. They were the first groups to define strategies and to act against the generalized homophobia in the country. While they may not be characterized by their solid political organization, these pro-gay rights groups have achieved widespread acceptance in the most liberal sectors of society, such that events like gay pride marches; today called “sexual diversity marches” (“marchas de la diversidad sexual”) take place not only in Mexico City, but also in various cities around the country. Another annual event that has continued on from the 1980s is the “Gay Culture Week” (“La semana cultural gay”), during which important intellectuals and artists participate in the activities. One of most recent political advances in favor of sexual diversity has been the passage of laws in favor of homosexual unions, such as the “society of cohabitation” (“Sociedad de convivencia”) in Mexico City and the “civil pact of solidarity” (“Pacto civil de solidaridad”) in the state of Coahuila, both passed in 2006.

Nevertheless, discrimination and antigay hate crimes have reportedly increased in recent years. As with other human rights issues, crimes against homosexuals have, for the most part, been ignored by the authorities, such that they have become one of the most important problems on the political agenda of sexual minorities. Despite the fact that the cultural and commercial proliferation of gay culture has produced favorable economic benefits, Mexico is still a society intolerant of those groups seen as “different”: according to government surveys, 66 percent of Mexicans would not accept having to share their home with a homosexual.³ The authorities show little interest in solving homophobic crimes; perhaps the majority of the population also supports homophobic actions. Therefore, the challenge is not only to reform the justice system, but also to imbue in Mexican culture a respect for diversity.

EDUCATION

Despite the fact that 24 percent of Mexico’s federal budget (which represents 6.8% of the Gross Domestic Product) is dedicated to education, 12 million children between 6 and 12 years of age do not attend school. Of every 100 students that enter primary school, only 14 finish high school, and only 1.7 percent continue on to college or graduate school. Two main obstacles that hinder Mexico’s educational progress include the poverty in large sectors of the population and the control that the Teacher’s Union (“Sindicato de Trabajadores de la Educación”) exerts over both public policy decisions and the use of government funding.⁴ Thus, as with almost all of the country’s social service institutions, education is affected by corruption, social inequality, and a conservative political agenda. Even private institutions are not exempt from this corruption, as their owners determine their educative content.

One of Mexico’s most problematic subjects in the first few years of the 21st century has been the conservative tendency to exclude sex education from primary and secondary school textbooks by order of the federal government and several individual states, as well as the Association of Parents (“Asociación de padres de familia”), an organization that proposes to restore religious control over education.

Members of this organization argue that sex education should be the exclusive domain of parents and not that of the school system. For this reason, they consider it inappropriate to teach students the functions of their sexual organs and the prevention of diseases transmitted by their use, not to mention nondiscrimination against homosexuals. For the defenders of sex education, these limitations instigated by conservative groups (many of whom are well-established in strategic positions, such as the Secretary of Public Education (“Secretaría de Educación Pública”) and constitute one factor that promotes the spread of sexually transmitted diseases, including AIDS). Standing out among these conservative groups is the Coalition for Social Participation in Education (“Coalición para la Participación Social en la Educación”), which has voiced its concern about official textbooks (which have included sex education since the 1970s) that “instigate sexual activity in children of 11 or 12 years of age.”⁵ Among the proposals pushed by these organizations (widely supported by the Catholic Church, business groups, and important conservative politicians) is the prohibition of the use of condoms and other contraceptive methods and the promotion of sexual abstinence and marital fidelity as the only permissible forms of prevention of sexually transmitted diseases. These proposals form part of a political agenda concerning sexual politics that is advocated by the Catholic hierarchy in the Vatican and is opposed to policies of a feminist nature or those in favor of sexual diversity. The central concern of this position is to defend heterosexual marriage and its reproductive function against what these groups see as propaganda for homosexuality and abortion.

One of the cases that best illustrates this controversy is that of the censure of the textbook Biología y ciencias (Biology and Science), by Ana Barhona. This text was removed from classrooms in 2006 by the governments of the states of Morelos, Querétaro, and Baja California and was mutilated in Aguascalientes and Guanajuato. The censure exercised by the aforementioned states came in response to pressure from conservative groups closely linked to those state governments. The Undersecretary of Primary Education (“Subsecretario de Educación Básica”) of Baja California, José Gabriel Posada Gallego, concluded that the content of the book was “inadequate,” since it did not make reference to matrimony (that is, traditional heterosexual matrimony), and because it also invited students to visit Web sites at which they might find arguments in favor of sexual pleasure and homosexuality.⁶ The censure of this book constitutes a violation of the Law of Protection of the Rights of Children and Adolescents (“Ley de Protección de los Derechos de Niñas, Niños y Adolescentes”) that obligates Mexico to offer sex education to its citizens. This law is one of a great number of international laws dealing with human rights that has been ratified by Mexico. Mexico had received (until August of 2006) 78 recommendations from the United Nations’ Committee on the Rights of the Child expressing the need to improve the education of adolescents especially regarding sexuality, undesired pregnancies and sexually transmitted infections.⁷ The effects of this lack of sexual education in Mexico are reflected in these statistics: in the country there are 366,000 births to adolescents each year, only 37 percent of adolescents use a condom during their first sexual interaction, and by the year 2006, more than 128,000 cases of AIDS had been reported.⁸

Homophobia in schools is a theme that has appeared repeatedly in the national press. Even in institutions characterized for their tolerance and widespread democratic participation, such as the National Autonomous University of Mexico (“Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México,” or UNAM), charges have been brought against groups for harassing homosexuals. According to university activists, the UNAM’s ambiguous internal regulations are what allow this discrimination. When students are assaulted on campus on account of their sexuality, they do not know which agency to which to turn for help.⁹ Because AIDS is often associated with homosexuality by much of the population, a group that, in general, is also homophobic, students who are HIV positive are denied entry to, or are later rejected from, certain schools on account of their illness. Thus, another form of discrimination occurs when HIV positive students who are not necessarily homosexual become victims of homophobia.

While it is possible to find an ample number of academic publications that deal with sexual diversity, not one Mexican institution of higher learning offers programs dedicated to the study of homosexuality, not to mention queer studies. There are a few programs at important academic institutions such as the UNAM, the College of Mexico (“Colegio de México”), and the Autonomous Metropolitan University (“Universidad Autónoma Metropolitana”), that focus on gender studies, but they most often prefer to dedicate their resources to women’s studies, relegating projects that deal with sexual diversity to a secondary role. As can be seen in the information made available by the Secretary of Public Education, none of the investigative projects financed by the National Council of Science and Technology (“Consejo Nacional de Ciencia y Tecnología,” commonly known as CONACyT), the government agency that most supports academic investigation, deal thematically with sexual diversity.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

The period of industrialization in Mexico, which began in the 1950s and intensified in the 1970s, has as one of its principle consequences the sudden growth of urban centers because of massive migration from the countryside. This rapid urbanization has an intimate relationship with the transformation of Mexican sexual culture. For homosexuals, migration to a large city offers access to spaces free from discrimination, especially in meeting places. As for the workplace, one can distinguish two strategies employed by the LGBT population: the first is to remain in the closet in the workplace, where most people choose not to talk about their private life, the second is to find employment in a job that is stereotypically acceptable for homosexuals, such as hair dressing, theater, sewing, or fashion design, among others. In the case of the transgendered population, these professions are often the only option.

Mexican laws are often unclear when it comes to defense against discrimination. The first article of the Constitution prohibits discrimination against any person for his or her “ethnic or national origin, gender, age, incapacity, social condition, state of health, religion, opinion, preferences, civil status or anything else that suppresses human dignity” (“origen étnico o nacional, el género, la edad, las discapacidades, la condición social, las condiciones de salud, la religión, las opiniones, las preferencias, el estado civil, o cualquier otra que atente contra la dignidad humana”). This article ratifies international commitments signed by Mexico, especially those that deal with human rights. Nevertheless, Article 3 of the Law of Employment, which prohibits discrimination, does not expressly mention sexual orientation, a fact that creates a legal loophole that is frequently taken advantage of by employers. Factors like age, gender, and race are often considered in order to favor one individual over another when it comes time to award a contract or employment.

It would not be strange to find, for example, a job listing that specifies an age limit or skin color for employment. The maquiladora industry (assembly plants), one of the largest employers in the country, systematically violates the country's employment laws, without any official action taken against them. Under these conditions, discrimination for not being heterosexual is manifest with impunity in a large portion of Mexico's centers of employment.

Violations of employment law have been found in the most productive company in the country, Petróleos Mexicanos (PEMEX), which is owned by the state. In order to be contracted by PEMEX, workers are subject to many prerequisites, including an HIV test, which, if returned positive, disqualifies them from employment. Clause 106 of the collective bargaining agreement signed by the union (Sindicato de Trabajadores de PEMEX) and the company, establishes that this test should be administered yearly and that, if positive, the employee should be fired.¹⁰ This type of discrimination, which labels HIV as a danger to the workplace, has less to do with one's capacity to perform a job function and more to do with homophobia, because HIV infection is so intimately linked to homosexuality. In this way prejudice against a specific disease produces a series of legal contradictions that make discrimination possible.

Another legal contradiction that has facilitated homophobic discrimination in the workplace is one that disqualifies military personnel from service if they test positive for HIV. In 2007, 11 members of the Mexican armed forces brought forth a protective lawsuit to the Supreme Court of Justice of the Nation ("Suprema Corte de Justicia de la Nación") for having been expelled from the army due to their HIV-positive status. In this case, the unconstitutionality of the law proposed by the Institute of Social Security of the Armed Forces ("Instituto de Seguridad Social de las Fuerzas Armadas," also known as the ISSFAM) was made evident, explicitly because it had proposed that, if before completing 20 years of service, a member of the armed forces is debilitated for health reasons, he or she should be suspended and would not have the right to receive medical attention. During the trial, some magistrates judged the HIV-positive individuals to be a "severe biological" risk and "instruments of uncountable contaminations."¹¹ The comments made by the magistrates of this most important judicial organ in Mexico serve as an example of how difficult it is in the country to apply antidiscrimination laws.

One of the most recent and most well known cases of workplace discrimination based on sexual orientation is that of a civil suit brought by Roberto Mendoza Ralph against the consortium Coca-Cola/FEMSA. The Director of Human Resources for the company, Eulalio Cerda Delgadillo, fired Roberto Mendoza Ralph, arguing that while he was an administrator he would not stand for any "faggot" ("puto") as a director. The company offered him a settlement, with which the company thought that all the damages had been settled. Nevertheless, Mendoza Ralph sued the company for emotional damages.¹² Because of this suit, the company retaliated against Mendoza Ralph by convincing other employers not to offer him a contract as punishment for having dared to accuse the second-largest soft drink bottling company in the world of being homophobic. Another reaction by the company has been to pressure the media to not publish anything related to this case.¹³ Roberto Mendoza Ralph vs. Coca-Cola/FEMSA illustrates the state of homosexual rights in the workplace in Mexico. Despite the existence of protective laws and special employment tribunals meant to end discrimination, it is still very difficult to apply justice faced with the influence of multinational corporations.

The First National Survey about Discrimination (“Primera Encuesta Nacional sobre Discriminación”), carried out by the Secretary of Social Development (“Secretaría de Desarrollo Social”) and the National Council to Prevent Discrimination (“Consejo Nacional para Prevenir la Discriminación,” known as CONAPRED) reported that 40 percent of people with nonheterosexual sexual preferences had been discriminated against in their place of work, while 75 percent earn a lesser salary for doing jobs similar to those of heterosexuals.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Regarding the Mexican LGBT community, there are currently no specific programs financed by either the federal or state governments aimed at this population. Private institutions, such as the National Counsel for the Prevention of Discrimination (“Consejo Nacional para Prevenir la Discriminación, or CONAPRED), which has included antihomophobia campaigns among its programs, and the National Center for the Prevention and Control of HIV/AIDS (“Centro Nacional para la Prevención y Control de VIH/SIDA, or CENSIDA), which supports campaigns oriented toward the homosexual population due to the epidemic’s high incidence among that demographic, do exist.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

The array of nonheterosexual practices present in Mexico is ample yet barely visible since the majority of homoerotic practices in the country occur outside of the spectrum of specifically labeled gay and lesbian identities. Until the 1970s, sexual relations between men often took place in the form of an effeminate man playing the passive role (called a “joto,” among other derogatory terms) and a masculine (“macho”) man, who would not consider himself homosexual, yet would play the active role in the relationship (known commonly as a “mayate”). While the joto (faggot) often suffered various types of rejection, the mayate (active-straight) was accepted by society since he performed all the functions of a man by penetrating and placing his partner into a role as his feminine opposite. This traditional structure of the masculine homosexual relationship has coexisted since the 1970s with the international (“internacional” or “inter,” in Spanish), whose sexual position is versatile, and who is associated with a defined gay culture.

Be that as it may, inside the closet one can often encounter practices considered “at risk” for the spread of sexually transmitted diseases. This double standard, a type of bisexuality unaccepted by many men and women, is practiced in total secrecy and has been one of the main causes of the propagation of HIV among the self-identified heterosexual population, especially in rural areas.

In the past few years, a clandestine sexual economy has developed in Mexico that caters to sexual tourism in the main tourist centers of the country. Several criminal organizations have been prostituting children for the sexual service of tourists, and some organizations keep sex-workers (males and females) as slaves. Not only do these practices jeopardize their captives’ physical health, but also constitute criminal offenses of the most basic rights of children.

FAMILY

Nuclear families consisting of a father, mother, and children, or a heterosexual couple without children, make up 69 percent of the Mexican population, while 20 percent co-exist in an extended family setting in which additional family members live under the same roof as a nuclear family; the latter represents the traditional Mexican family. Seven percent of the population lives in single-person households, and one percent lives with nonfamily members.¹⁴ Eight and a half percent of Mexican families are single-parent households, a statistic that does not include the number of families that live separated on account of the emigration of a spouse. Official population figures do not detail the number of homes that are made up of same-sex partners, but it is estimated that close to 250,000 families of this nature exist in the country.¹⁵

Many gays and lesbians are inhibited about coming out of the closet to their families due to the socially conservative views prevalent in traditional Mexican society that privileges parenthood and a sexual double standard as norms of conduct. In the traditional family, the role of the homosexual and the lesbian, in or out of the closet, has been to care for elderly family members. The double standard requires heterosexual matrimony as a way to maintain the appearance of heterosexuality. This traditional form of shrouding homosexuality has been the main obstacle to the social recognition of sexual diversity in Mexico.

While the Mexican legal system is designed to protect and encourage the nuclear family, a few laws like that of the Mexican Institute of Social Security (“Instituto Mexicano del Seguro Social”) recognize the role of common-law unions in order to codify legal inheritance and to protect children born to unmarried couples. Yet, in the case of nonheterosexual families, the right to a common law union does not apply. It was not until 2006 that the Legislative Assembly of the Federal District in Mexico City (“Asamblea Legislativa del Distrito Federal”) voted in favor of a Law of Civil Societies (“Ley de Sociedades de Convivencia”), supporting members of unconventional households when dealing with benefits, the management of property, and civil rights in general. This law was first proposed in 2004, but at that time the Catholic Church managed to exert its influence on several members of Congress, and the passage was blocked by a single vote. In January 2007, the Congress of the State of Coahuila approved the Law of Civil Pacts of Solidarity (“Ley de Pactos Civiles de Solidaridad”), which also offers protection for domestic partners. While both laws open the possibility for protecting a nonheterosexual couple, neither addresses marriage or families, and both are limited to the guaranteeing of benefits and the distribution of property. Heterosexual marriage continues to be the only legal form of marriage, and adoption rights continue to be reserved solely for heterosexual couples. Even so, the gay and lesbian community treats these common law or solidarity pacts as marriage contracts.

COMMUNITY

With the advent of the first organizations formed in the 1970s, the gay and lesbian community has had a notable political and cultural presence in Mexico, especially in Mexico City. From the beginning, these groups’ activities have included participation in the media and the organization of support groups focused on helping gays and lesbians to come out of the closet.¹⁶ Increased visibility and self-defense against police raids (“razzias”) and antigay discrimination were the first main currents of the political agendas of gay and lesbian organizations. The most important of these in the 1970s was the Homosexual Front of Revolutionary Action (“Frente Homosexual de Acción Revolucionaria, abbreviated FHAR), which was identified by a socialist ideology, and for that reason, its activist techniques were influenced by leftist parties. Along with the FHAR, the most notable groups that emerged in the 1970s also identified themselves with leftist movements. In 1982, this characteristic compelled the Revolutionary Workers Party (“Partido Revolucionario de los Trabajadores”), which followed a Trotskyist ideology, to become the first political party to demand sexual diversity as a part of its platform.¹⁷

The first gay pride parade in Mexico City took place in 1978, and since then has been celebrated without interruption. Another annual event that has grown in importance is Lesbian and Gay Culture Week (“Semana Cultural Lésbica Gay”), which was first held in 1987. The event includes theatrical performances, art exhibitions, and conferences, featuring top-rated artists and intellectuals as participants. Gay pride parades are also celebrated in the largest cities in the country and little by little, modest cultural activities have been helping sexual minorities gain visibility.

There are two great threats to the homosexual population in Mexico that keep these various groups active: the homophobia that permeates various sectors of Mexican society and the spread of HIV. Conservative groups continue to attack the gay rights movement and consistently protest against gay civil unions and even against HIV prevention campaigns, considered by them to be homosexual propaganda.

HEALTH

The Mexican government offers medical coverage to all employees and their dependents. The two most important social security institutions in the country at the federal level include the Mexican Institute of Social Security (“Instituto Mexicano del Seguro Social”) and the Institute of Social Security for State Employees (“Instituto de Seguridad Social para los Trabajadores del Estado”). In addition, state governments have their own clinical and hospital systems for the general public that offer services at a reduced rate. Nevertheless, as a consequence of neoliberal policies from the 1990s to the present, the budget for socialized medicine has diminished, which consequently has resulted in the reduced quality of services and supply of medicines. Given the high cost of medical attention, the budget provided for the treatment of AIDS has been classified as a “fund for catastrophic expenditures,” equivalent to those designated for natural disasters.¹⁸ Still, it is not unusual to hear complaints from patients about the shortage of medical supplies.

From 1983 to 2006, 107,625 cases of AIDS were been reported in Mexico. Of those, 83 percent were men and 17 percent women. Up to 2006, some 182,000 people were living with HIV, of which approximately 30,000 had received anti-retroviral treatments. The groups with the highest incidence of HIV are men who have sex with men (MSM) and people who work in the sexual services industry. A large portion of the MSM population and those who contract the virus for having unprotected sex do not identify themselves as homosexuals and in general maintain sexual relations with both men and women. Prevention campaigns have found this population the most difficult to access, despite the cooperation of practically all pro-sexual diversity organizations.

Denialist campaigns, spread in 2007 through television media, claim that the human immunodeficiency virus does not exist and have produced negative consequences since some carriers of this virus have decided to stop treatment. This has resulted in several deaths that could have been avoided with antiretroviral medication.

In addition to financial problems, denialist campaigns, and the difficulties in preventing the spread of the disease, carriers of HIV face social and institutional discrimination. According to polls carried out by the Human Rights Commission of the Federal District (“Comisión de Derechos Humanos del Distrito Federal”), in Mexico City 72 percent of health care professionals believe that HIV-positive individuals are to blame for their condition and, according to the National Youth Survey (“Encuesta Nacional de la Juventud”), 54 percent of young people express rejection toward people with HIV, which is certainly the most ostracized social group.¹⁹

POLITICS AND LAW

While practically all international treaties dealing with human rights have been ratified by Mexican laws, there are still many contradictions and legal loopholes that have obstructed the effective tracking of discrimination. One of these loop-holes can be found in the first article of the constitution in a paragraph dedicated to the prohibition of discrimination. Instead of specifying “sexual preference,” only “preferences” is stipulated, leaving open to interpretation the possibility to discriminate against sexual minorities. The same thing happens in state legislatures and specific laws, as has already been seen in the case of employment laws.

There are still some police divisions and government agencies that include “moral deficiencies” as a justification for the apprehension of any person whose public conduct is considered by the police as immoral. This has been the main rationalization for police abuse against homosexuals throughout the country. Even when local police forces, like that of Mexico City, no longer use the term “moral deficiencies,” the criteria adhered to by its agents in many cases supersedes that of the law. As a result, extortion and illegal police raids, which have been denounced by pro-diversity organizations since the 1970s, continue to manifest themselves in the present day. For example, in May 2006, two guards working in Mexico City’s subway system insulted and battered activist Manuel Amador Vásquez for distributing publicity flyers for the sexual diversity march that year. Neither Vásquez’s accusation presented to the Attorney General’s office nor his complaint filed for the Commission of Human Rights had any effect, and the case, as with many others, remained on record but without any consequences. The absence of accurate definitions of homophobia and hate crimes against the LGBT population is one of the most worrying legal issues affecting sexual minorities.

The legislative agendas that refer to sexual diversity have been focused on the production of laws that permit citizens to secure benefits for their domestic companions. It is in this vein that the Law of Civil Societies in Mexico City, in 2006, and the Law of Civil Pacts of Solidarity in the state of Coahuila, in 2007, were passed. Another initiative that was discussed in 2007 was the Law of Identities (“Ley de Identidades”), which would judicially benefit the transgender and transsexual population by allowing them to change names according to the gender identity of their choice.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

The Metropolitan Community Church, with a chapter founded in Mexico City in 1981, is the only religious body related to the Mexican gay rights movement. Other religious institutions have primarily been hostile to the sexual diversity community. Gay Mexicans, when they come out of the closet, typically leave the Catholic Church (one of the most homophobic institutions in the country) and break with their families—which can be understood as an extension of the Church in its role as creator and enforcer of moral codes. Many members of the Mexican gay population are likely to live a life of double standards.

VIOLENCE

Most cases of homophobic hate crimes reported in Mexico remain unpunished or may even be turned around against the victim. The Citizen's Commission Against Homophobic Hate-Crimes ("Comisión Ciudadana contra los Crímenes de Odio por Homofobia") registered 290 murders of homosexuals and lesbians between 1995 and 2003, although it estimates that, when taking into account the tendency not to accuse one's aggressor, promoted by Mexico's reigning culture of impunity, some 900 homophobic hate-crimes may have been committed during that time.²⁰ This investigation has been undertaken by monitoring certain newspapers in the country, which seem increasingly disinterested in reporting these types of crimes due to the criticism that they have received from pro-diversity organizations based on their sensationalist treatment. One of the obstacles to the proper investigation of these cases in Mexico is the lack of a clear definition of hate-crimes in Mexican legislation. In cases that deal with the death of a homosexual or transsexual, judicial reports often refer to them as "crimes of passion," which can serve to criminalize the victim rather than the aggressor.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The current situation in Mexico reveals a strong antagonism between conservative positions and liberal tendencies. Since the presidential elections of 2000, conservatives have had a heavy influence in politics, economics, and society. Even so, liberal views continue to acquire greater visibility as time progresses. This emerging culture of diversity seems to be motivated by a growing conservative threat. While many institutions are managed by functionaries who may show hostility toward sexual minorities, the number of organizations that fight against homophobia, that work to prevent the spread of HIV and AIDS, and that denounce police abuse has grown in the first years of the 21st century. The same tendency can be seen in film, literature, academic investigations, newspaper reports, and in diverse artistic productions. The fact that two states have passed a law that protects the rights of domestic partners, and that similar laws have already been discussed in the majority of other states, indicates that the situation for sexual minorities in Mexico will gradually improve.

NICARAGUA

Marco Díaz-Muñoz

OVERVIEW

Nicaragua is located in Central America, between Honduras and Costa Rica. It is the largest country in the region with an area of approximately 59,998 square miles—about the size of the American state of New York.¹ Its current population stands at 5,675,356 inhabitants,² and its capital, Managua, has one million inhabitants.³ The country's geography is diverse and includes extensive tropical forests (the largest in Central America), mountains, grasslands, numerous rivers, lagoons, and marshes. In addition, Nicaragua has 40 volcanoes and the two largest freshwater lakes in Central America (Lake Nicaragua and Lake Managua), which sustain a unique variety of fish species that normally live only in salt water. Nicaragua's topography can be subdivided into three major geographical regions: the Pacific coast lowlands or western region, the Caribbean lowlands or eastern region, which covers about half of the national territory, and the central highlands, which are most extensive in the north-west. Although Nicaragua is rich in natural resources, it is located in a region of notable geographic instability, prone to earthquakes on the western side and destructive tropical storms and hurricanes on the eastern side. These conditions have caused great devastation to the country's human settlements throughout its history. In recent decades, a powerful earthquake destroyed a major section of its capital, Managua, in 1972, and Hurricane Mitch devastated the settlements along the Caribbean coast and further inland in 1998, drastically affecting social and economic conditions.

Nicaragua's population is diverse and reflects its complex history and successive migrations. Its first inhabitants migrated to this land approximately 2,000 years ago from what is presently Mexico and settled mostly in the fertile western lowlands along the Pacific coast. Here they developed flourishing cultures with strong ties to their place of origin, the Mexican Nahuatl region. At the same time, minor groups that originated in the Caribbean islands sparsely settled the eastern lowlands prior to the Spanish conquest. Once the Spanish settlers arrived in the early 16th century and settled in the western lowlands, a Spanish-speaking mestizo (persons of mixed European and Native American ancestry) population emerged. With time, this group came to predominate in this region and in the central highlands side by side with a small, but dominant, European minority. Today, only a small number of native Monimbó and Subtiava Indians remain on the western coast. Black slaves who escaped from the West Indies during colonial times settled the Atlantic coast, which continued to be isolated from the rest of the country even after the Spanish conquest. It was during this period that the English forcibly took the area from Spain and brought with them more black slaves and settled in the Caribbean lowlands. This region remained intermittently under English control from the 17th century until well into the late 19th century, when it integrated with the rest of Nicaragua as a nation. During this long period, an African or Creole (English-speaking black) population settled in the region alongside black Caribs, also known as Garifunas (descendants of African slaves and Carib Indians), and the native Indians, the Mosquito (also called Miskito), the Sumo, and the Rama. Today, the number of Spanish-speaking mestizos has surpassed that of the earlier groups, even along the Caribbean coast. Most recently, a growing number of United States citizens have relocated to Nicaragua, attracted by the government's policies providing incentives to U.S. investors and retirees.⁴

As a result of its violent conquest by the Spanish, conditions of servitude have held the majority of the Nicaraguan population subject to the small, white European elite. Marked class and racial distinctions, sustaining a rigid social pyramid, became part of the background of all political dynamics that have ensued in Nicaragua. Today, at the top of the social scale is an elite group of Nicaraguans of white European descent (accounting for 17% of the population), followed by the majority mestizo population (69%), composed mostly of the poor working-class and a very modest middle class⁵ and at the very bottom, the black population (9%) and the native Indians (5%).⁶

Like its climate and unstable geographic setting, Nicaragua's history has not been spared major social turbulence. It is currently the second-poorest country in the Americas, after Haiti.⁷ Prolonged unstable political conditions in the past few decades have exacerbated poor economic conditions, leading to a state of continuous crisis and severe economic measures undertaken on the part of government in an effort to control the declining economy through drastic austerity programs. The impact of these political and economic conditions has disproportionately diminished the current possibilities of development for the majority poor and all marginalized groups, including the sexual minorities that, under more favorable conditions, could hope to rise and form more visible LGBT (called LGBTTTT in Nicaragua) communities.⁸

Distribution of wealth and opportunity in Nicaragua has traditionally been one of the most disparate in the world,⁹ reflecting the country's rigid social stratification.

From time to time, these social inequities have been the cause of violent conflict between the marginalized classes and different elites, as well as between the different elites themselves who sought to hold power through military force when necessary.¹⁰ Thus, in their pursuit of power, Nicaraguan elites established a long line of dictators. In recent history, the social movement that gave rise to the popular Sandinista Revolution (between the 1960s and 1970s), which deposed Nicaragua's last and most notorious dictator, Anastasio Somoza, and brought the Sandinista revolutionaries to power in 1979, also brought significant change to contemporary Nicaragua. Due to a debilitating economic embargo and a counter-revolutionary war, the Contra War,¹¹ promoted by the United States, and on account of the internal conflicts within the revolution itself, structural changes in the economy¹² were not successfully carried out by the socialist-oriented governments. However, substantial changes in societal attitudes did occur during the years of revolutionary government.

The revolutionary process changed the political culture significantly and promoted a new climate fostering citizens' rights. A popular ideology of social inclusion spread to all areas and culminated in the creation of a new constitution in 1987.¹³ One of the most visible changes in the new constitution was in the area of equal rights for women, which reflected women's active participation in the revolutionary process and their eventual inclusion in the decision making process.¹⁴ Gender issues were raised as one of the most pressing social inequities that needed to be urgently addressed. Thus, the momentum of the revolution gave rise to a strong women's movement¹⁵ that has also paved the way for relatively strong lesbian organizations and, in turn, the organization of other marginalized LGBT groups who now claim the right to equality before the law.

Beginning in 1990, after the revolutionary era and the counter-revolutionary war of the 1980s, subsequent neoliberal governments have attempted to restore conservative values and roll back some of these political gains.¹⁶ In the name of austerity measures to combat economic decline, as required by international lending institutions,¹⁷ recent administrations have eroded the strength of newly established civil society institutions and the force of the constitution with new laws that clearly contradicted it, yet were passed by the Nicaraguan National Assembly. One such case is that of an antisodomy law that openly promoted discrimination against LGBT people, and that clearly reflected the moral climate change after the Revolution. In 1992, the Nicaraguan National Assembly passed Law No. 150, the Law of Penal Code Reforms, which contained Article 204,¹⁸ a provision criminalizing sexual intercourse between persons of the same sex, including the act of promoting and/or disseminating information related to the subject. Article 204 clearly forbade the possibility of LGBT people organizing as such for the purpose of educating the public and promoting gay rights. It is against this background that LGBT communities have organized to fight back and the possibilities of development for the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered minorities¹⁹ have evolved in Nicaragua. After much LGBT activism, Article 204 was finally repealed in November 2007, but in spite of this accomplishment by LGBT communities, strong and pervasive prejudices against LGBT people remain a major obstacle to the development of an empowered LGBT community in Nicaragua.

Nicaragua has seen great changes in many areas since the Sandinista Revolution, and religion has not been the exception. Historically, a predominantly Catholic country, Nicaragua's loyalty to the institutional church has wavered notably in the last few decades. With the revolution in the late 1970s and the challenge faced by all Nicaraguan society to reconstruct the country in the 1980s, religion became highly politicized and polarized. As the demand by the masses for more radical changes created a vacuum that was not filled by the traditional stance of the institutional Catholic Church, a growing number of new religious denominations and sects expanded rapidly in the 1980s and have continued to grow; this has been particularly true for evangelical Protestants. Both the Catholic and Protestant churches have constituted a force of opposition to the LGBT movement by backing the neoliberal governments.

Nicaragua's economy ranks amongst the poorest in the world.²⁰ The gross national income (GNI) per capita for 2006 stood at US$1,000.²¹ The country has traditionally been very dependent on foreign markets for its economic subsistence, with ever-stronger ties to the U.S. economy as an export partner in the last century. This condition of economic dependence has drastically limited Nicaragua's possibilities for autonomous development, as the United States has greatly influenced its internal political affairs and decision-making. Prior to the Sandinista Revolution, Nicaragua had developed a robust agro-export economy from which the impoverished masses derived little benefit. The Sandinista Revolution attempted, though unsuccessfully, to redirect the economy away from such a dependence model towards a socialist-oriented mixed economy (combining both state-run public companies and the private sector), but the devastation from civil war and the subsequent economic collapse under the Sandinista government in the late 1980s left Nicaragua highly dependent on foreign aid during the following two decades. Its external debt grew exponentially, affecting even further its possibilities for sovereignty and self-determination. Similarly, its internal debt grew dramatically in the same period,²² and the debt has played a major role in limiting economic growth and drastically reducing social investment on the part of neoliberal governments.

The military has played an unparalleled role in Nicaragua's politics. Until recently, the country's history was characterized by autocratic governments and dictatorships sustained through violence by a national army.²³ The Nicaraguan military reached its apex as the strongest in Central America during the revolutionary years in the 1980s, when the Sandinista government sought to defend the revolution from foreign intervention. Subsequently, as the Contra War came to an end, Nicaragua drastically reduced the size of its army in response to peace treaties and the removal of the U.S. economic embargo.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Nicaragua has experienced significant waves of change over the last three decades, as it has sought to transform itself from a traditionally undemocratic society ruled by autocratic governments, to a more inclusive civil society with the democratic participation of its population. With the Sandinista Revolution, Nicaragua opened itself to a period of questioning the past and rebuilding its foundations. Since the 1980s, issues of gender and women's rights have moved to the forefront, along with all issues dealing with sexuality, equality, and personal freedom. Under this new climate, many sectors of society claimed their right to inclusion; LGBT sexual minorities were no exception. LGBT issues, however, have not played as major a role in Nicaraguan politics as they have in other countries with stronger LGBT movements, nonetheless significant progress has been made.

In Nicaragua, the question of LGBT issues extends to the larger question of the acquisition of basic human rights for most Nicaraguans. Thus, the most heated issues in the international debate about the LGBT cause, such as gay marriage, adoption, gays in the military, reparative therapy, defense of marriage legislation, or the intersex/transgendered controversy, are absent from or in a very distant place in the Nicaraguan agenda. Even LGBT Nicaraguans do not focus on these issues as much as their counterparts in other countries do. The vast majority of the population has experienced historical social exclusion on the basis of class and race and embraced the Sandinista Revolution to bring about change in those areas. Sexual minorities, in addition, have faced multiple other exclusions that do not resonate in the collective consciousness of most Nicaraguans.

To understand exclusion in Nicaragua, one must first and foremost also understand machismo in Nicaragua. Lesbians, gays, bisexuals, and transgendered people, as well as transsexuals, transvestites, and intersexed people, in addition to most women in Nicaragua, are the object of a deep-rooted machismo ideology that maintains rigidly fixed gendered differences. By imposing a strict vertical order, machismo in Nicaragua subordinates sexual minorities through a logic of social control over what is traditionally perceived as “feminine” or different and equated as defective or weaker, so that any cultural deviation away from what is considered truly masculine is repressed. Within the mentality of most Nicaraguans, fixed gender roles leave no other alternative to people who do not adequately perform those sexual roles except to be identified with and be classified under the opposite sex’s assigned gender role. Thus, a gay man who assumes a passive role in sex is immediately equated with the category of woman, as Nicaraguans conceive that category, and a lesbian who assumes an active role in sex is identified with the category of man, as Nicaraguans conceive that category. Both are outcasts for transgressing their assigned gender roles and proving themselves defective, and therefore weaker, more so than for transgressing heterosexuality.²⁴ The same can be said of any sexual minority who transgresses gendered differences. As in most countries in Latin America, LGBT people in Nicaragua experience this form of violence in particular ways, whether as homophobia, lesbophobia, biphobia, or transphobia.

From the machista perspective of most Nicaraguans, other possible options that transgress heterosexuality, though are not necessarily traditional gender roles, may remain unmarked and unnoticed. Thus, a male who assumes an active role in sex with a submissive male may pass unnoticed by the general public and actually reaffirm his masculinity both with a male partner and with a female partner.²⁵ The same can be said of a woman who assumes a passive role in sex with a dominant woman, as she confirms her submissiveness with a man as well as with a woman.²⁶ Regardless of their sexual orientation and in spite of their engaging in same-sex sexual dynamics, a sexually dominant masculine gay man or a sexually submissive feminine lesbian are more socially accepted than a sexually submissive effeminate gay man or a sexually dominant masculine lesbian, and these people will often go unpunished by society.

Being masculine in Nicaragua is reaffirmed whenever a partner, no matter what the sex, assumes a subordinated position during sex, and vice versa, establishing a necessarily unequal and vertical dynamic.²⁷ The sense of power and honor a partner derives in being dominant is also a reaffirmation of the lack of power and the shame experienced by the dominated other. Machista socialization throughout all Nicaraguan society, in turn, echoes this inequality by applying different degrees of disapproval and punishment. In Nicaragua, two individuals engaged in a same-sex sexual relationship are affected by differing degrees of societal phobia and control, exclusion, and subordination, depending on how each one expresses sexual attraction. Thus, members of sexual minorities have differential experiences regarding their sexual identities and carry the burden of discrimination unequally. Machismo socialization affects the members of some sexual minorities more severely than others who are left relatively unaffected, and in some cases reaffirms their own privileged position through the degradation of others.²⁸ The rigid categories and boundaries established by machismo inevitably reinforce social inequalities and create hostile divisions and fragmentation within the LGBT population. This, in turn, results in a lack of solidarity. For instance, although they tend to be more prominent than men in organizations engaged in LGBT activism, lesbians in general are more invisible in social spaces than men due the disempowered and subordinate condition of women in Nicaragua. Such divisions are major obstacles to the integration of a stronger LGBT movement.²⁹ Social class and race only increase these differences. On the other hand, and beyond the scope of machismo in Nicaraguan culture, the revolution brought about changes that also impacted LGBT people, including their machismo. Although the Sandinistas proved incapable of adequately implementing major structural changes in the economy, the Sandinista Revolution indisputably brought about changes that affected the internal political dynamics in Nicaragua. They accomplished this by breaking the power monopoly held by traditional elites and by introducing a new constitution that has become the departure point for all discussions about social change.

This change became evident with the AIDS crisis and its connection to the emergence of LGBT organizing. As the threat of AIDS surfaced in Nicaragua in the late 1980s, making LGBT people more visible than ever to the general population, so did a general awareness of a new component in the national dialogue for change pertaining to the treatment of LGBT people in general and those with HIV/AIDS in particular. The intersection of a new political climate, a new constitution, and the AIDS crisis, as well as external influences, helped fuel LGBT organizing in the second half of the 1980s.

Although initially silenced in 1987 under the revolutionary government, with the support of international organizations,³⁰ LGBT organizing around the AIDS crisis resurfaced with more strength in the early 1990s. It was in this context that, in 1992 under the Violeta Chamorro administration (1990–1996), and as LGBT people were becoming more visible, Article 204 was passed in direct contradiction with the call of the new Nicaraguan constitution for inclusion of all Nicaraguans. This antisodomy law restricted all dimensions of LGBT life, creating a climate of heated debate about general citizens' rights that propelled LGBT organizing even further throughout the 1990s.

As Nicaragua entered the 21st century, LGBT issues had made their public appearance in the national consciousness modestly but successfully, and while there was a resurgence of conservatism with the neoliberal governments that followed the Sandinista defeat of 1990, numerous grassroots organizations and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs)³¹ had also appeared to defend the rights of LGBT people. When Article 204 was passed, these organizations and their allies abroad cooperated together to counter the position of the government with a yearly campaign, using a “Sexuality Free of Prejudice”³² as their banner and carving a niche in the national discourse about human rights. With this campaign, a series of events, including a Pride Week celebrating the Nicaraguan LGBT presence, were inaugurated and have continued to be held since 1992 in June of every year. In many ways, the 15-year history of Article 204 was the catalyst that united and sustained the LGBT movement until recently.

EDUCATION

Nicaragua is not only one of the two poorest nations in the Western Hemisphere; it also has one of the poorest educational systems. While statistics vary, it is estimated that only about 67 percent of the population is able to read and write.³³ Literacy rates are disproportionate nationwide, and it is estimated that, in rural areas, 45 percent of the population is illiterate and only 10 percent of school-age children are able to attend secondary school. Of all the young people in the country, 62 percent do not have a secondary education, and only a privileged few can aspire to higher (tertiary-level) education.³⁴ Many children and adolescents are forced to work due to generalized poverty. This further reduces the educational opportunities for the majority of Nicaraguans, thus creating a never-ending cycle of poverty.³⁵

Despite the efforts made in the revolutionary years to make education a universal right and priority, Nicaragua remains an under-educated society. Its educational system continues to perform poorly, even by Latin American standards. Most affected by these conditions are women and other marginalized populations, such as the indigenous and black people in the Atlantic region communities. LGBT people are also impacted by limited educational opportunities. This manifests itself in the lack of access to scientific information about LGBT issues, in the lack of mobility and privacy with a consequent lack of control over one’s body, and in the perpetuation of machista myths and stereotypes about sexuality. These educational deficiencies are also clearly manifested in the spread of AIDS amongst the poorest and least educated people in Nicaragua. Because the magnitude of the larger problems facing the Nicaraguan educational system renders LGBT issues negligible, the possibility of addressing specific forms of discrimination against LGBT people in educational contexts, such as bullying or denying them access to schools, are drastically reduced. Opportunities for students to access LGBT information through schools has also been absent due not only to a general lack of resources, but also the illegal status that LGBT organizing experienced until recently in Nicaragua. Above these limitations, and with the collaboration of the neoliberal governments, the Catholic Church has also been successful in barring access to information on sexual matters in schools. It has been mostly through the limited efforts of NGOs that any educational programs disseminating LGBT information have reached the public. These efforts have also been limited due to the nature of the educational programs NGOs could officially offer prior to 2007, as these approached LGBT subjects indirectly and only as they related to general sex education in connection to AIDS prevention programs.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Historically, Nicaragua has been characterized by an agro-export oriented economy on one hand, and a drastic imbalance of regional development on the other, particularly in the eastern lowlands of the Atlantic region.³⁶ Poverty in this region is severe and widespread, making Nicaragua one of the poorest nations in the Western Hemisphere.³⁷ Since the fall of the Somoza dictatorship in 1979,³⁸ Nicaragua has experienced drastic swings in government and economic programs. The decade-long Sandinista program for a socialist-oriented mixed economy in the 1980s yielded to powerful external economic pressures³⁹ and to the internal reaction of the population to hyperinflation (reaching 33,500% in 1988)⁴⁰ and general discontent with the Contra War. The Sandinista government itself yielded power to a radically different economic team when it lost the 1990 democratic elections. Since then, and in response to the lifting of the economic embargo imposed by the United States and the end of the active military struggle, Nicaragua's economy and infrastructure are gradually being rebuilt.

During their years in power, the Sandinistas attempted to restructure Nicaragua's economy through the redistribution of land and other resources and by creating small urban and rural cooperatives to benefit the poor. While the Sandinistas were out of power, three consecutive neoliberal governments (1991–2006) attempted to reverse Sandinista policies and reestablish the export-oriented market economy that dominated Nicaragua before the revolution. Although the profile under these governments can be characterized by steady GDP growth and general macro-economic progress in numbers,⁴¹ the growth was achieved at a very high social cost. Positive figures were attained at the expense of privatizing 350⁴² state-run enterprises and the majority of small-scale cooperatives created during the previous decade, as well as drastically reducing urgently needed social programs that benefited the impoverished majorities, thereby simultaneously drastically reducing the rate of public employment.⁴³ Further, the economic gains made have been devoted to the repayment of Nicaragua's huge external debt⁴⁴ and its equally onerous internal debt,⁴⁵ at the expense of condemning the marginalized majorities to continued poverty in the foreseeable future. This general trend towards dissolving social programs and weakening civil institutions and laws protecting workers and marginalized groups such as women also affects the possibilities of development for the LGBT community.⁴⁶

Currently, Nicaragua's economy is experiencing a general deceleration, as it has been hard hit by external factors such as the rising price of imported oil and internal factors, such as a potentially unstable political climate. With the return to power of a Sandinista administration in 2006,⁴⁷ the private sector has reduced its investments, fearing unexpected swings in economic programs with the return of a socialist approach to the economy; this in turn has been followed by a significant reduction in foreign investment. This renewed general instability will affect the economic possibilities of all groups in the following years, and especially the already-marginalized sectors, among them the LGBT population. This will also depend on how events unfold with the new government and whether the reservations of the private sector and those of other sectors affect decision making and the political climate. However, under the current circumstances and the great limitations for any realistic structural deviation from the neoliberal model, the return of the Sandinistas to power may only slow down the economy and not represent an actual change of course in the neoliberal approach to the economy.

The U.S.–Central America Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA) was ratified by Nicaragua in late 2005 and it has been in effect for two years.⁴⁸ It has been shown to have increased trade at both ends, but no clear trend is yet visible in terms of trade balance (imports versus exports) that could be labeled beneficial to the lives of most Nicaraguans. Given the country's grossly unequal wealth distribution patterns, GDP increases in Nicaragua do not necessarily translate into better lives for the masses, as demonstrated under the Somoza regime.

Although foreign aid, specifically that in response to the AIDS crisis, contributed to the emergence of LGBT organizing, foreign aid for Nicaragua has also helped conservative causes to an even greater degree. Aid from around the world was given to the country as it opened up more to foreign influence under the Chamorro administration (1990–1996). However, such aid was given under strict conditions. As a major donor, USAID, in particular, required that Nicaragua not only reduce social spending but also change its nationalist-oriented education curriculum that fosters the notion of an autonomous Nicaragua in favor of a curriculum that portrayed the Nicaragua–United States dependence relationship as favorable to Nicaragua. Sex education and the focus on gender equality of the revolutionary education program were also modified in favor of a return to traditional Nicaraguan values, also at the request of USAID.⁴⁹ Following a similar path, more direly needed economic aid was issued by other major world lending institutions⁵⁰ further affecting Nicaragua's sovereignty.

Under the conservative stance of the Chamorro administration and subsequent neoliberal governments, the Catholic Church regained much of its power and exerted influence over these changes, ushering in a decade of dismantling revolutionary advances that has continued into the new millennium.⁵¹ Nonetheless, though in a significantly lower proportion, progressive donors have countered this conservative wave. Donor nations, such as the Netherlands and Scandinavian countries,⁵² and international NGOs from these and other progressive countries, have offered continued aid for liberal causes such as AIDS prevention, women's reproductive health, and human rights initiatives. This has fomented a liberal climate that helps keep alive the culture of debate that was the legacy of the revolution, which, in turn, has benefitted LGBT organizing. International LGBT organizations are also actively assisting LGBT groups in Nicaragua.⁵³ Notwithstanding these efforts, some LGBT populations remain completely on the margins of economic integration, as is the case for transsexuals.

Outcasted within the LGBT community itself, transsexuals have the least possibility of social integration and are most often denied jobs. In most cases, transsexuals turn to prostitution as their only means for survival. While reliable statistics are unavailable, it is known that most openly transsexual (male-to-female) individuals are sex workers. Even within that sector of society, they are typically rejected by organizations that support sex workers.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

As is the case in most other Latin American countries, the Nicaraguan government does not provide funding for social programs designed specifically for LGBT people. Such funding would have been considered illegal under Article 204 until 2007. However, the Nicaraguan government does provide a universal health care system, and, though extremely underfunded, it offers programs for AIDS and sexually transmitted diseases that reach out to populations at risk, including LGBT people. A great percentage of this funding and influence over these issues comes from international assistance sources.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Since AIDS first appeared in Nicaragua in 1987 and until the late 1990s, the epidemic remained contained and the rate of increase was very low. However, this was followed by alarming increase in the new millennium. In fact, Nicaragua shows an inverse infection rate to that of richer nations like the United States, where the epidemic started to decline in the early 1990s after a previous decade of rapid increases.⁵⁴ In developed nations, aggressive intervention in the form of educational programs to reduce risky behavior has contributed to the decrease in the spread of the epidemics. The limited availability of such resources, along with the widespread ignorance and poverty of the Nicaraguan population, has contributed to the current, steady spread of the disease.

A major obstacle to the success of prevention programs has been the opposition of the Catholic Church to the distribution of condoms, the Church's opposition to the explicit discussion of sexuality in schools, and its general moral influence on the population and government.⁵⁵ In spite of this opposition, the Nicaraguan Ministry of Health (MINSA) and NGOs offer limited services through international cooperation from the United States and Nordic European nations.⁵⁶ However, these resources are scarce relative to the needs of the total population, especially in rural areas. Most efforts are concentrated in the capital and are modeled after campaigns and strategies implemented by contributing organizations in their respective home countries and do not necessarily reflect the specific needs and cultural context of Nicaragua.

Bisexuals

An LGBT population in Nicaragua where cultural differences manifest clearly with respect to sexuality are bisexuals. The concept of bisexuality is much more difficult to apply in Nicaragua than it is in the United States and other developed western societies. The expectation in the American mindset that one sexual category denies the possibility of another renders bisexual people invisible.⁵⁷ On the other hand, and in spite of its unique limitations, sexuality in Nicaragua is much more fluid than it is in the United States. A large number of people in Nicaragua form families around conjugal units, live together, and remain unmarried,⁵⁸ thus allowing for a degree of sexual freedom. This is particularly true for men. Machismo itself allows for a degree of homosexuality without necessarily erasing a man's or a woman's public heterosexuality. Within this system, a great number of LGBT people are rendered invisible and cannot be accounted for as either heterosexual, bisexual, or gay. With the exception of an elite group of Nicaraguans influenced by a more international LGBT worldview and those behind LGBT organizations, it is common and culturally accepted in the mindset of many Nicaraguans for people to maintain different relationships simultaneously. The large number of MSM who are statistically unaccounted for is evidence of the degree to which bisexuality is prevalent in Nicaraguan society. MSM feel no societal or individual need to resolve the duality to one choice, either socially or legally. Bisexual women, on the other hand, remain mostly invisible and their bisexuality clandestine, in reflection of their greater disempowerment and subordinate position in society.⁵⁹

FAMILY

As in most of Latin America, kinship ties are fundamental to the lives of the Nicaraguan people. The nuclear family as the ideal forms the basis of family structure in the national mindset and determines cultural attitudes in the country. Families of origin are of enduring importance, and so are relationships with a large extended family network. This is no different for members of the upper class whose privileged position is closely tied to family connections.⁶⁰

Given the lack of economic mobility for the vast majority of Nicaraguans, other criteria determine a person's place in society. A person's family honor has a strong influence over many aspects in life. Individuals are judged on the basis of family reputations, which in turn are based on how closely one's family conforms to or deviates from prevailing moral values. Moral prestige or the lack of it may open or close access to scarce economic, social, and political opportunities. Family units and the individuals in them establish rigid dynamics of economic and emotional codependence from which it is almost impossible to withdraw.⁶¹

Guaranteeing family unity and prestige are of utmost importance for families as a whole, therefore a family member's noncompliance with norms jeopardizes it on a global level and disrupts the social networking it depends on for survival. The urban poor, in particular, are especially vulnerable, as they depend on mutual assistance among kin for survival. Thus, social control within the family can become quite repressive. Families impose and enforce traditional gender and sexual roles as established by machista and Catholic norms of femininity and masculinity. Any deviation from these norms is immediately controlled. LGBT people, who by definition fall outside prevailing cultural patterns, suffer under this control. Thus, LGBT people are often the objects of domestic abuse, particularly lesbians, whose condition of disempowerment makes them more codependent and vulnerable to family dynamics than their gay male counterparts. Ultimately, repression and silence about homosexuality are the usual forms of handling the condition of LGBT people in most families, and as a result most LGBT people develop only clandestine relationships and only a few dare to or are able to form families apart from their family of origin.⁶² In extremes cases, when a family member's noncompliance with norms cannot be silenced, as is the case for many transsexuals, families adopt drastic measures, and expulsion from the family home is a common decision. Although there are exceptions,⁶³ many transsexuals are rejected by their families, whose machismo traditions cannot accept them as an individual who is not a "real" man or woman.

In spite of such social control, Nicaraguan society exhibits clear double standards with respect to the definition and the actual composition of most families. Households are more often than not female-headed, without a paternal figure present. Outside of the upper and middle classes, heterosexual families are built around conjugal units, and relatively few couples formalize their marriages through the state or a religious body. In addition, due to generalized poverty, family units often include extended family, with several generations living in the same household with no privacy.

Given the machismo culture, men in Nicaragua are allowed a significant degree of sexual freedom, and many have relationships with more than one woman and father children by different women. It is also not uncommon for women to have children by different men. Similarly, while silent about it, many men who have sex with men (MSM) but who do not consider themselves gay maintain heterosexual and homosexual relationships simultaneously. Significantly, a large number of gay men and lesbians in Nicaragua have been married and have children, which makes the possibility of independence more limited. Amongst the younger generations, some LGBT people are choosing to form families or to live single and apart from their family of origin.⁶⁴

Despite this prevailing diversity, the current Nicaraguan family law system is built on the concept of the nuclear family⁶⁵ and it is clearly not accommodating to LGBT people and those few who dare form families. Under the conservative swing of the 1990s and to counter what was perceived as moral disintegration, the administration of Arnaldo Alemán (1997–2002) created a repressive Ministry of the Family in 1998 to safeguard the heterosexual family and ensure that the nuclear family continues to be the only accepted model presented to society. As a result of these measures, a series of repressive consequences have daily been visited upon LGBT people and their families.⁶⁶

COMMUNITY

In spite of state repression and in reaction to it, the first LGBT groups in Nicaragua appeared in 1986 and continued to grow through the 1990s, forming a community of diverse NGOs and grassroots organizations. Their continued existence is the result of international cooperation and the efforts by hundreds of revolutionary activists, many of them feminist women,⁶⁷ who chose to extend the ideal of a social revolution to women and to all Nicaraguans. In many ways, LGBT organizing was the product of the social revolution of the 1980s. Continued state repression under neoliberal governments has also ignited further organization and cooperation amongst LGBT people. These groups strategically coalesced through the AIDS crisis to form NGOs in the 1990s, establishing connections with progressive governments and international LGBT organizations that provided funding. Centered in Managua with some regional offshoots, most of these organizations provide health services, educational workshops, leadership training, support groups, counseling, legal services, and activism.

Until 2007, NGOs could not be officially labeled gay or lesbian directly, nor could they fund services to the community, except for those pertaining to sexual health and AIDS. Article 204, which forbids the organization and dissemination of information concerning LGBT issues, prevented this kind of labeling and activity. Nevertheless, their organizers were mostly LGBT people who furthered LGBT organizing indirectly through AIDS prevention programs and by providing sexual and reproductive health services to marginalized women and youth. Many other groups have formed beyond those that originated at NGOs, particularly at universities, by individuals cooperating to address an individual LGBT population or cause. The Internet has played a major role in facilitating the rise of these groups, as many individuals have created new organizations and blogs in Nicaragua today.

It is true that fierce competition for funding between organizations can result in antagonism and fragmentation, yet the collaboration between organizations in the “Campaign for a Sexuality Free of prejudice” and corresponding Annual Pride Week celebrations that have been held since 1992 have marked an indelible LGBT space in Nicaragua. For the vast majority of people who live their LGBT lives clandestinely, these organizations are slowly paving the way for an ever-larger and more inclusive community. Nonetheless, inclusion in Nicaragua is a gradual process even within the LGBT community itself and it is not experienced the same by all LGBT groups.

Transsexual People

Transsexuals in Nicaragua tend to face greater obstacles to inclusion within the LGBT community than other groups. Yet, in spite of being very small and the least organized segment of the GLBT population, transsexuals are becoming more visible within the community. Until 2007, under Article 204, sex change surgeries were illegal in Nicaragua. Thus, with the few exceptions of those who underwent surgery abroad, most transsexual people in Nicaragua are only candidates for surgery who have, at best, gone through some hormone replacement therapy. Due to the greater moral intolerance of the upper segments of society and their strict class structure, most individuals who decide to adopt a transsexual identity in Nicaragua belong to lower socioeconomic sectors, where standards are more fluid. Individuals with higher social status and resources would be more likely to leave the country to carry on their lives as transsexuals somewhere else. In general, the transsexual community of Nicaragua is made up almost exclusively of individuals who would opt for a male-to-female sex change. They are the most discriminated against group due to pervasive machismo. Together with transvestites and transgendered individuals, transsexuals are the target of most gender-motivated violence and police aggression. Transsexuals, more than any other group, are the objects of unjust application of the law. The Nicaraguan legal system is far from accommodating of the challenges transsexual people and other LGBT people represent to existing laws. Transsexuals are also the least supported population by LGBT groups and their individual agendas—be it gay rights or lesbian rights. Nonetheless, a community is forming and it is establishing contact with important human rights organizations abroad for the support denied to them in Nicaragua.⁶⁸ The community has also created a landmark organization, La red Trans de Nicaragua (the Nicaraguan Trans Network), which is linking to stronger peer organizations in Latin America, particularly those in Mexico and Argentina, and gaining their support.

Intersexed People

While the issue of inclusion of intersexed people is part of the debate in the Nicaraguan LGBT community, and particularly in the voice of the trans community (composed of transvestites, transgendered people, and transsexuals), the possibility of an organized intersexed group has yet to be realized. Information about this population is mostly unavailable or is based on speculation.⁶⁹

Lesbians

Lesbians, for the most part, consider themselves a separate community from that of men. In general, lesbians are less empowered and much more limited than gay men in Nicaragua. Unlike them, they are constantly socially controlled, making independent relationships with other women almost impossible. Following family and social pressure, many of them marry and have children very young and only question their sexuality later. Thus, many have children and are twice as much limited economically as men to develop an independent sexuality after divorce.

As is the case for most LGBT people in Nicaragua, gender identity for lesbians depends heavily on socioeconomic class and opportunities to access education and alternative information about gender and sexuality. Lacking alternative spaces and models, most lesbians tend to fulfill the stereotypical images of what is to be a lesbian and what is a lesbian relationship in a machista society. For most the adoptions of traditional gender roles and machista heterosexual power dynamics is something natural, and they align with one role or the other. Others, although much fewer, but who are more educated, try to distant themselves from such images, and yet some, mostly younger, do not identify with machismo and the traditional division between masculinity and femininity from the beginning and wish to develop dynamics of equality without subordination of either partner.⁷⁰

Given machismo and the subordination of all things feminine, lesbians pass as more invisible than gay men in social spaces, where gay men have a clear presence and an advantage, something that manifests itself also in the lack of attention to women's issues. The increasing spread of AIDS among young women in Nicaragua is an example of such generalized social neglect towards women. Yet, it was precisely this neglect that propelled the strong women's movement in Nicaragua, and lesbian activists have claimed strong support from it and excel in activism more than men.

HEALTH

The poor health of the majority of the Nicaraguan people was one of the clearest expressions of social exclusion that led to the Sandinista Revolution. Thus, one of the aims of the revolutionary government was to provide health care to all Nicaraguans. Neither the revolution in the 1980s nor the neoliberal governments that followed it were able to realize this goal. Nicaraguans have lived under constant economic crisis and under strict austerity programs that have limited public spending on the most basic of social services, such as health care. Even the return of the Sandinistas to power in 2006 has not made it possible to alter the course of the economy and its impact on these issues. The trend of underfunding social programs established by neoliberal governments will continue in the years to come as a required step for complying with economic measures imposed by major foreign aid lenders. Given these limitations, change will be slow and the mortality rate and life expectancy of Nicaraguans will continue to be significantly lower than those of developed nations.⁷¹

While Nicaragua has a universal health care system, the grossly underfunded Ministry of Health⁷² is unable to provide adequate care to the majority of the population. Its hospital infrastructure is severely underdeveloped and often lacks basic equipment. It is also highly centralized with limited resources outside the capital. While there are a number of private clinics serving the population concentrated in Managua, their services reach only the small elite of Nicaraguans who can afford them. This health crisis is particularly evident in connection to the HIV/AIDS epidemic, an area where resources are even more limited for the coverage of patients and for prevention programs. Most work in this area has become the lot of NGOs with external but limited funding based on international cooperation.

Since the appearance of the first HIV/AIDS case in 1987, and continuing until the late 1990s, the number of HIV/AIDS cases remained low in Nicaragua. However, the spread of the disease has increased at an alarming rate in the new millennium.⁷³ AIDS is becoming a growing public health concern, particularly since the overall Nicaraguan health system is deficient and unprepared to handle this or any other major epidemic. According to MINSA 2,296 cases of HIV/AIDS had been reported through September 2006. Of these, 622 people have died; in 94 percent of these cases, the virus was acquired through sexual contact.⁷⁴ This continues to be the case in the present day.⁷⁵ The population affected is mostly young, and 88 percent of those infected are between the ages of 15 and 44.⁷⁶

In the late 1980s, when the disease first appeared in Nicaragua, it was limited almost exclusively to males, gay-identified or bisexual—or MSM.⁷⁷ Male-to-male sex was the most common form of transmission, followed by the sharing of needles associated with drug use, and lastly heterosexual sex. While the predominant mode of transmission continues to be sexual (92%, according to 2005 estimates),⁷⁸ demographics have changed significantly over time and, of those currently infected, many are heterosexual men and women (76%), with a male to female ratio of 2.4:1.⁷⁹ Gay men and MSM are still disproportionately affected, but the disease has spread to women—mostly heterosexual ones—at an increasing rate. The ratio of men to women will continue to approach one to one as the population affected gets younger; it is estimated that more than half of all new infections today occur in young women.⁸⁰ This is a major concern because women represent a severely disempowered segment of the overall population in Nicaragua, and health services for women are often lacking beyond basic prenatal and reproductive care. This shift in the epidemic is also relevant to the lesbian population, many of whom live a double life much like that of MSM. Due to pervasive machismo attitudes in Nicaragua, lesbians can easily become infected by a male partner (possibly an MSM) who refuses to use protection. These risks increase even more for other LGBT populations, such as transsexuals, whose specific anatomical needs with respect to sex and AIDS prevention are overlooked by health organizations, offering them little or no medical attention and leaving them particularly vulnerable.

Another major concern given Nicaragua's machismo culture and ardent Catholicism is the greater invisibility of the masculine population classified as MSM. Due to their own machismo and the stigma associated with homosexuality and gay-identified men, MSM are more reticent about reaching out and are more difficult to reach with HIV prevention programs. On the other hand, as heterosexual transmission represents an ever-greater proportion of new infections in Nicaragua, NGOs and AIDS prevention groups are challenged by finding that their programs and safer-sex campaigns, fashioned primarily for the LGBT population, are not reaching the growing segment of heterosexual male and female victims with the same levels of success. As is the case with the LGBT community, the machismo of the heterosexual population is a major obstacle to overcome.

POLITICS AND LAW

Sodomy Laws

Discrimination is pervasive in Nicaragua and expresses itself daily in many forms of social exclusion, of which discrimination against LGBT people is perhaps the most socially acceptable. While Nicaragua has made great inroads in passing antidiscrimination laws with regards to women, it does not have any legislation preventing discrimination against LGBT people (except for those infected with HIV/AIDS).⁸¹ LGBT people in Nicaragua not only lack protection before the law, but were also legally discriminated against under the law with antisodomy law Article 204, in effect from 1991 until November 2007. Contrary to the international tendency to decriminalize homosexuality in Latin America since the 1990s onward, Nicaragua took an ultra-conservative stance by passing its law in 1992. The struggle to overturn this law and advocacy for the enactment of antidiscrimination laws in its place grouped and propelled LGBT people under a single banner. Ironically, Article 204 became the centerpiece in the legal debate and the struggle for equal rights for LGBT people. And, although it was finally repealed, discrimination as a socially acceptable and hardly unquestioned behavior has not disappeared from Nicaragua; much legal work remains to be done in this area.

Antidiscrimination Legislation

Social exclusion of many types, some of which have yet to be addressed as discrimination, precipitated the Sandinista Revolution. By extension, it facilitated the rise of Nicaragua's strong women's movement. The new constitution reflects these groups' influence in multiple articles addressing discrimination and the right to equality between women and men. It is this right to equality applied to women under the constitution that is now facilitating the rise of the LGBT movement and validating their cry against discrimination. However, discrimination against LGBT people in Nicaragua is not all the same and manifests itself differently depending on a person's self-expression of his or her gender identity and sexuality. Furthermore, Nicaraguans express discrimination in varying degrees of violence, whether as homophobia, lesbophobia, biphobia, or transphobia. Nicaragua does not yet have a visible intersex community. How discrimination manifests itself against this population specifically has yet to be acknowledged.

Discrimination also varies according to region and specific community. Managua, as the largest and most crowded urban center and one fragmented and made up of many different communities,⁸² tends to offer greater anonymity and some degree of tolerance for LGBT people, while smaller cities and rural communities may offer more repressive environments. However, this is not always the case in rural communities, as other criteria besides church and state also influence how LGBT people are treated. Strong kinship ties between members of a community and loyalty to family over religion may override imported notions of discrimination, and a community may extend great tolerance to its LGBT members. Treatment of LGBT persons cannot be generalized, as it really depends on the particular dynamics of specific communities. Cities like Masaya, in the western lowlands, have traditionally displayed great tolerance towards LGBT people and, in fact, incorporate forms of transgenderism and transvestism in its religious and folk festivals with the active participation of its LGBT community.⁸³ In contrast, communities in the Atlantic region, such as Puerto Cabezas and Bluefields, where intolerance is perhaps greatest in Nicaragua, may reflect specific cultural influences, such as Protestantism.⁸⁴

Another facet of discrimination against LGBT people and politics at the community level is the legacy left by the former Sandinista Defense Committees (CDS),⁸⁵ which today forms a massive Community Movement (MC) throughout Nicaragua. These were community-based committees in support of the revolution that fought against any counter-revolutionary movements; they have been instrumental in denouncing social injustice under neoliberal governments. They have also been vigilant against all elements that have attempted to roll back revolutionary gains and have often mistakenly placed LGBT people in that category. As it has been the case under other socialist movements in Latin America, LGBT people have been misunderstood to be a part of the decadent capitalist system. A legacy of the CDS and MC in the popular mindset has been the application of change and justice at the community level. Specific communities have literally assumed the role of taking justice into their own hands and punishing people who do not conform to the community standards—not only of sandinismo but of machismo as well. This is particularly true in larger urban spaces, such as Managua, where neighborhood groups apply their own sense of justice and often discriminate against LGBT people in the community.

While information about discrimination of LGBT people within the military is unavailable, it is well known that individuals who participated in the first organizing of LGBT groups between 1986 and 1987 were expelled from the military. Even during the years of the revolution and the presumably more progressive thinking of the Sandinista era, the military, as with most social spaces in Nicaragua then and now, closed its doors to LGBT people. It persecuted and incarcerated the first men and women who assumed positions of leadership in LGBT groups, but only temporarily stopped the rise of the movement during that decade. As in other socialist regimes in Latin America (such as Cuba), LGBT people were viewed by the military as dangerous to the revolution and as an extension of the old system of corrupt, bourgeois decadence.

Gay Marriage

The question of gay marriage legislation is not seen as realistic by most LGBT people in Nicaragua at this time, but LGBT groups in the country have expressed their enthusiastic support for the current movement in that direction in neighboring Costa Rica. The more democratic climate and progressive tradition of Costa Rica has made it possible to bring such a discussion to the table in its National Assembly. Given the geographic proximity and close relationship between the nations, the debate in Costa Rica is certain to have a strong impact in Nicaraguan politics in the years to come.

Speech and Association

As a more coordinated organizing effort by LGBT groups emerged in the early 1990s, Article 204 attempted to counter the rising movement by criminalizing all dimensions of LGBT life. This included the freedoms of association and speech; it also forbade the “gathering, organizing, educating and disseminating scientific information, and advocating publicly” notions in support of homosexuality. LGBT organizing in all its facets was criminalized. For 15 years, the law succeeded in preventing any LGBT organization from obtaining legal status, but it did not stop their efforts. LGBT organizing was accomplished through AIDS organizations and NGOs (usually lead by LGBT activists) working on human rights and sexual issues, but only as an indirect extension of the work by the host organizations. No funding was legally possible for the purpose of addressing LGBT issues per se. With the abolition of Article 204, new possibilities have opened in Nicaragua to facilitate LGBT organizing and the free dissemination of more scientific LGBT information.⁸⁶ However, pervasive social taboos are still a major obstacle.

Church, State, and Reparative Therapy

In the absence of objective information, and influenced by machismo and strong religious beliefs, most Nicaraguans tend to place homosexuality and other non-heterosexual orientation(s) within the sphere of the pathological—as a perversion and a contagious disease, transmitted and committed by someone who should be cured.⁸⁷ Even the scientific community in Nicaragua tends to see homosexuality as a deviation and a “contagious disease.”⁸⁸ Most psychologists, sociologists, and even biologists seem convinced that homosexuality can be explained in terms of deviant and learned behaviors. They also reinforce the idea that homosexuality is curable, provided intervention is carried out at an early age. This attitude assumes that LGBT people are to be treated differently and are even deserving of punishment. Backed by these misguided views, the Nicaraguan state translated religious and social taboos into legislation, criminalizing homosexuality and other non-heteronormative sexual expressions.⁸⁹ In this context of repression, many LGBT people have been forced to think of themselves as sick. Some have considered the possibility of a cure and have sought some form of reparative therapy, but this is usually limited to those with means to pay for psychological treatment. In other cases, for a significant number of LGBT people, suicide has been the only way out.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Traditionally, religion has been revered in Nicaragua and occupied a privileged position beyond questioning that was only challenged during the revolution, which the Catholic Church initially supported, but soon afterwards moved to block. It is also true that, during the last decade of the Somoza dictatorship (the 1970s), the Catholic Church distanced itself from the Somoza regime. However, it did so cautiously and as only a moderate advocate for change. During these years, as the bishops rejected their traditional alliance with the dictatorship to join the general opposition, the possibility for an alternative and vibrant grassroots church of the people developed from below.⁹⁰ By adopting an independent stance towards the hierarchical church and embracing a liberation theology approach⁹¹ to the conflict, grassroots, community-based Christian churches (CEBs)⁹² expanded rapidly in the 1970s and played a crucial role in the making of the revolution. Seeing themselves as co-participants in the making of a new Nicaragua and not simply as followers of the bishops’ declarations from above, Nicaraguans acted independently of the church and supported the Sandinista movement, a position that would set the stage for postrevolutionary conflict with the institutional church in the 1980s.

As the momentum of the revolution overcame moderation at the grassroots level in the late 1970s, and as the moderate reforms the Catholic bishops advocated were taken from them by a church of the people that supported more radical change after the 1979 Sandinista victory,⁹³ the institutional Catholic Church rose as a force of opposition to the revolutionary process in the 1980s. It showed itself intolerant of change from below, rejecting the CEBs and their liberation theology. Thus, the Nicaraguan Catholic Church adopted an ultra-conservative role in the decades to follow on many issues, including those pertaining to LGBT people.

In the 1990s, under the neoliberal governments that followed the revolution, the Catholic Church regained its power and objected to many of the changes the revolution had brought about in the country. In exchange for a conservative morality, it lent its support to the neoliberal administrations in their objective of overturning revolutionary gains in favor of a neoliberal approach to the economy. This reflected itself in the area of women's rights and public morality. The church blocked the women's movement, calling for a return to the traditional family (or machista family values), and the state ignored the constitutional stance with respect to gender and sexual equality and women's reproductive rights. It was in this context that Article 204 was passed by the Nicaraguan National Assembly in 1992 under great pressure from the Catholic Church and other churches. It was justified by religious dogma offered by the church leaders in spite of any constitutional argument.

In the new millennium, unlike in the past, when the Catholic Church dominated the religious arena unchallenged, religious affiliation in Nicaragua has taken different routes.⁹⁴ Today, it not only reflects the changes since the revolution, it also mirrors Nicaragua's persistent class structure, social divisions, and political schisms. The elites and professional middle classes identify mostly with the traditional, hierarchical Catholic Church, while the working class and poor continue supporting a church of the poor (CEBs). Protestant churches have also claimed extensive membership among the poor, as much international attention was turned toward Nicaragua after the revolution and Protestant churches from the United States expanded their missionary efforts there. Protestant and fundamentalist denominations often show more intolerance for LGBT people than even the Catholic Church, thus playing an important role in blocking LGBT rights.

It is also in this context that new and alternative churches that extend more solidarity to the LGBT community, such as the Metropolitan Church of Nicaragua (with ties abroad),⁹⁵ have formed and coexist in a tense dialogue with the institutional Catholic Church and multiple other denominations.

The power of the Catholic Church and its influence over legislation is a part of everyday life in Nicaragua; so, too, is the opposition the Church may offer to any LGBT movement. However, religious opposition to the LGBT movement in Nicaragua has not yet become well organized, and an organized antigay movement, as it exists in the United States, has thus far been absent in Nicaragua. However, the country is currently experiencing rapid changes due to external influences from fundamentalist Protestant denominations that have been making inroads in the last two decades. These groups have brought with them to the Nicaraguan discussion on national morality the rigid anti-LGBT viewpoint already familiar in the United States. Thus, external fundamentalist Protestant influences are gradually adding another voice against LGBT people and their rights, and they have, at times, combined forces strategically with the Catholic Church to exert influence over legislation, such as abortion.⁹⁶ These groups are, to a significant extent, importing a degree of uncompromising hostility that does not reflect how Nicaraguans have traditionally dealt with LGBT people. While severe discrimination against LGBT people does exist in Nicaragua, it is necessary to say that there is also a degree of tolerance for sexual deviation in the mindset of the Nicaraguan masses that is markedly more flexible and compromising than the rigid position adopted by religious fundamentalist groups in the United States and their local cells in Nicaragua. One area in which these churches are trying to join forces with the Catholic Church to influence government is in the passing of antigay legislation preventing LGBT people from adopting children in Nicaragua.

VIOLENCE

Statistics about hate crimes to measure violence against LGBT people are unreliable or unavailable because, until recently, the law overlooked violence against LGBT people. However, violence in Nicaragua is clearly reflected in everyday epithets used to refer to LGBT people. Pejorative labels express a diversity of cultural attitudes towards different populations and the categories into which Nicaraguans fit and how LGBT people classify themselves.⁹⁷ Labels express differing degrees of hate, according to the degree of deviation from traditional norms (of gender and sexuality) imposed by machismo and Catholicism, and have been known to translate into outward violence. The population most clearly affected by hate crimes are the transgendered and transsexual populations, as well as transvestites and, in particular, sex workers.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Violence in Nicaragua has manifested itself throughout the country's history via many forms of exclusion, poverty, segregation, social stratification, and war. The cumulative effect from each of these forms of violence harnessed unprecedented energy and gained the greatest momentum with the Sandinista Revolution of the 1980s. The revolution was the expression of a massive will for change and its legacy a cultural and political attitude towards the inclusion of all Nicaraguans in spite of widespread bigotry and ignorance. The revolution ended and structural economic changes were unrealized, but the idea most Nicaraguans took away from the experience was that change is possible, even in the midst of insurmountable obstacles. This notion remains alive in the minds of those who lived through the revolution and has been passed on to those who have come after. This is particularly true of the LGBT community in Nicaragua.

In spite of the great divisions of class, race, gender, and sexual expression that put the concept of "community" under serious question, most LGBT people are extremely resilient and aspire to help build a better Nicaragua. The recent repeal of Article 204 signals hope as the veil of fear that shrouded LGBT organizing was lifted and new opportunities for growth and cooperation were revealed. Severe economic conditions are on the horizon for Nicaragua, as its economy is experiencing a marked deceleration. Strong Catholic Church opposition, economic austerity programs, prolonged poverty, greater state control, and the possibility of repression are in the immediate view, but so is the economic and social impact that Nicaragua's integration into the Free Trade Agreement with the United States in 2006 is to have in the near future. Nonetheless, Nicaragua has come a long way and its popular leaders and activists have surprised the world in the past by surmounting even greater obstacles. Given this combination of strong will and resilience, the LGBT cause in Nicaragua is bound to move forward.

The first blog created by transsexual activists in Nicaragua. It is dedicated to the discussion of themes related to activism in the Nicaraguan transsexual community in at the national and international levels, with a focus on Latin America. Silvia Martínez, a key leader in the community, is the contact person.

Red Trans de Nicaragua, <http://www.redtransdenicaragua.es.tl> (under construction).

Organizations

AIDS

Centro para la Educación y Prevención del SIDA (CEPRESI), <http://www.cepresi.org.ni>.

Provides AIDS-related services to sexual minorities, primarily gay men. It claims to be the only group in Nicaragua whose mandate includes the promotion of gay and lesbian rights.

Fundación Puntos de Encuentro, <http://www.puntos.org.ni>.

First established in 1991 by a small group of women from the Nicaraguan women's movement, this group has maintained a feminist approach to addressing social change. While its work does not focus directly on LGBT issues and the population, LGBT issues are addressed indirectly as part of the group's larger work on sexuality. Its target population is primarily youth and women.

Fundación Xochiquetzal, <http://www.myspace.com/fundacionxochiquetzal>.

Founded in 1990, Xochiquetzal is a nongovernmental grassroots organization that works on HIV/AIDS prevention through an integral sex education curriculum free of prejudice. Its target population is primarily persons living with HIV/AIDS, homosexuals, lesbians, prisoners, sexual workers, and the youth of Nicaragua.

Fundación Nimehuatzin, <http://nimehuatzin.org>.

Founded in 1990, this is exclusively an AIDS prevention organization.

Political Action

Nicaragua Network, <http://www.nicanet.org>.

A member of the Alliance for Global Justice, the Network is an organization in the United States devoted to social and economic justice in Nicaragua.

Human Rights

Centro Nicaragüense de Derechos Humanos (CENIDH), <http://www.cenidh.org>.

A human rights organization based in Managua.

Activism

Asociación Movimiento Gay Lésbico Intermunicipal, <http://www.amglim.org>.

This is a regional LGBT organization serving northwestern Nicaragua.

Red de Jóvenes Nicaragüenses por los Derechos Sexuales y Reproductivos, <http://www.jovennica.org>.

Founded in 2000, this group seeks to promote and defend the sexual and reproductive rights of adolescents and youth (young adults) in Nicaragua.

Religious

Iglesia de la Comunidad Metropolitana Paz y Alegria, Managua, Nicaragua, <http://www.icmnic.org>, <http://www.tylerkelly.net/icmnic>.

This is an independent Christian church that is accepting of LGBT people. It holds ties to the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches (UFMCC). In addition to church liturgy, it provides social opportunities for the gay and lesbian community, and particularly gay-identified men.

The notable NGOs still active, all of which formed in the early 1990s, are Xochiquetzal (established in 1990 to focus on health and sexual education services, serving the gay and lesbian community), Nimehuatzin (established in 1990 to focus on AIDS prevention and briefly served as a center for gays and lesbians), and Puntos de Encuentro (established in 1991 to focus on social change from a feminist perspective, serving women and youth). The following groups and collectives no longer exist: Nosotras (established in 1992 as a collective serving the lesbian community), Shomos (established in 1989, a collective serving the gay and lesbian community), and Neconi (established in 1993, a collective serving LGBT community in general). These groups provided a voice and opportunities for LGBT organizing in the early 1990s.

97. Most labels cannot be assigned an equivalent translation in English. Some may be primarily masculine and others primarily feminine, depending on (mal)intention and the gender and sexual identity assigned by society to the individual being labeled. Many labels display the feminine element mari (from the archetypal woman, Maria) combined with an element associated with the gender identity of the opposite sex, macha (from the archetypal man, macho). The following labels are used to refer to both women and men: cochon(a), maricon(a), raro(a), and loca. The feminine ending -a indicates the possibility of applying the same term to either gender/sex. Others are exclusively used for women: marimacha, machista, tractor, tortillera. Yet, others are exclusively used for men: cochonero, pato, mari-posa. The term lesbiana and the English borrowing gay are almost exclusively used by the middle and upper classes. This variety indicates a diversity of attitudes toward the individual labeled and different degrees of rejection and hate.

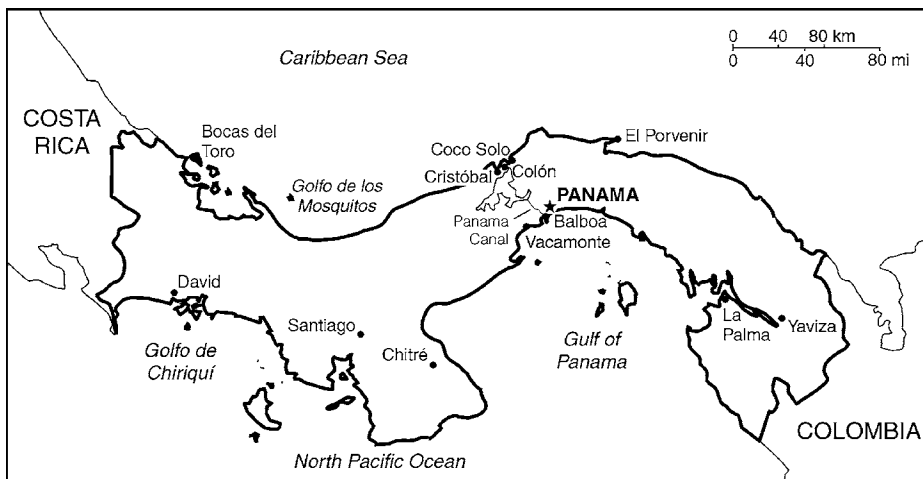

PANAMA

Eduardo Alfonso Caro Meléndez

OVERVIEW

Panamá is officially known as República de Panamá (the Republic of Panama). It is the southernmost country of Central America and connects North and South America. Panama is bordered by the Caribbean Sea to the north, the Pacific Ocean to the south, the Republic of Colombia to the east, and by Costa Rica to the west. Panama has 30,193 square miles of land and 853 square miles of territorial waters. It is divided into nine provinces, four indigenous communities, 74 districts, and 587 jurisdictions.¹

The Spaniard Rodrigo de Bastidas was the first conquistador to visit the Isthmus of Panama, in 1501; however, due to the poor condition of his ships, Bastidas suspended his expedition and returned to Spain. A year later, on October 10, 1502, during his fourth expedition, Cristóbal Colón arrived at the Atlantic coast of the isthmus. It was not until August 15, 1519, facing local fearless indigenous attacks, that Pedro Arias Dávila founded Panama City. With a great deal of indigenous opposition as well as other contributions, Panama City became the starting point not only for the exploration and conquest of Peru but also for the transit route for the gold and other resources that were taken from the Americas to Spain. In 1671, Panama City was attacked by English pirate Henry Morgan's expedition with the intention of plundering it; however, Don Juan Pérez de Guzmán, aided by local citizens, impeded the attack. In 1821, Panama declared its independence from Spain and joined the Gran Colombia of Simón Bolívar. Later, in 1903, Panama declared its separation from Colombia, and Panama City became the capital of the new Panamanian nation.

During World War II, the construction of military bases and the arrival of a large number of American military personnel and civil workers brought new levels of business and prosperity to the city, to the point that, in the 1970s and 1980s, Panama City became one of the strongest banking centers of the world and one of the most powerful financial centers in Latin America. On December 20, 1989, in order to capture General Manuel Antonio Noriega, the U.S Army invaded Panama City. Noriega, the last dictator of Panama, was accused of drug trafficking by American courts. After several decades of sociopolitical conflicts, and with the intervention of the United States, a national referendum approved the reform of the Panamanian constitution, eliminating its army, in and, for the first time, initiating a political process involving transparent elections. In 1994, Ernesto Pérez Balladares was elected president. In 1999, Mireya Moscoso, the widow of ex-president Arnulfo Arias, won the elections, becoming the first woman to be elected president of Panama.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

As is the case throughout Latin America, LGBT citizens in Panama remain largely invisible in the political process and are targets of sociopolitical discrimination. There are no laws in Panama against homosexuality, that is, homosexuality is legal. However, in day-to-day social practice and in the different visible scenes of social life, LGBT persons are discriminated against. There are no laws that protect them, and, for instance, they are banned from serving in the police and armed forces.

As regards the AIDS problem in Panama, it appears that the first cases were identified in 1984. Since then, in general terms, there have been certain controls put in place to keep the epidemic low; however, the most vulnerable citizens continue to suffer the most. According to recent data, there were a total of 25,000 cases of AIDS in people aged 15 to 49; 59 percent of these cases were among adult males. It was estimated that, only in 1999, some 1,200 people died of AIDS in Panama. Out of these cases, 32.9 percent were detected among homosexual men and 50.3 percent were found in heterosexuals.² Regardless of the percentages, LGBT persons with AIDS are targets of discrimination in different forms and in different contexts.

The Panamanian National Constitution, in Article 19 under the section on individual and social rights and responsibilities, states that there will be neither privileges nor discrimination against anyone based on race, birth, social class, sex, religion, or political ideas. However, the situations LGBT citizens have to face and endure are but an example of the contradiction of this particular constitutional statement. Marriages between same-sex partners are not yet legal in Panama, though in June 2004 members of the organization Asociación de Hombres y Mujeres Nuevos de Panamá (Association of New Men and Women in Panama, or AHMNP) initiated a petition to present to the Legislative Assembly to legalize gay marriage and to fight for the rights of equal treatment. A resolution on this is yet to be seen.

According to AHMNP, as of 2004, there were some 300,000 homosexuals, lesbians, and bisexuals in Panama.

Given the sociopolitical situation of LGBT citizens in Panama and the still discriminatory and slow nature of government programs to benefit these individuals, psychology and reparatory programs for this community appear to be nonexistent. If they do exist, not everyone has access to them. That is, having access to certain services and programs is also an issue of socioeconomic status. Similarly, citizens who are openly LGBT are still seen as a threat to decency in the field of education; there still is discrimination in the different types of schooling in Panama. Thus, the voices of LGBT citizens are still unheard and their rights are not always recognized.

EDUCATION

The education system in Panama is made up of two subsystems: regular and nonregular. The former is organized into three levels: first level or basic education (preschool, primary education, and pre-middle school), which is free and compulsory and has duration of 11 years; the second level or middle school, which has a duration of six years for students between six and 11 years of age; and the third level or upper school that lasts three years for students between 12 and 14 years of age. Within all of these, there are programs for the indigenous population that seeks to prepare them and to develop their cultural perspectives and their life projects with dignity and equality.

Law 47 of 1946 establishes that education is a right and a responsibility of all human beings, regardless of their age, ethnicity, sex, religion, socioeconomic status, or sociopolitical ideas. Likewise, this law maintains that Panamanian education is based on fundamental, humanistic, civics, ethical, democratic, scientific, and technological principles on the idiosyncrasy of their communities and national culture. However, on the one hand going back some decades, public education continues to have its problems, mostly economic that, nonetheless, continue to affect the quality of education, yet at the same time, other private organizations seem to have better conditions and a more liberal curriculum. At any rate, openly LGBT citizens, just like in the workplace, are victims of discrimination and are stigmatized in educational settings at all levels.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

The official currency of Panama is the balboa, which corresponds to one American dollar. However, the Panamanian economy uses the American dollar for all sorts of transactions. The economic policies are based on the tertiary sector, which represents about the 63 percent of its national internal production. Because of its geographic location, Panama's economy is mostly serviced-based and heavily weighted towards banking, commerce, and tourism; however, there has been recent growth in the industrial and construction sectors. With the handover of the Panama Canal and American military installations, new construction projects continue to increase. The banking system is made up of 80 banks that are in charge of moving the economy in a nation that is, day by day, growing and becoming more competitive.³

In spite of the large revenues from the canal and tourism, it has been reported that Panama continues to have serious poverty issues, in fact, 95 percent of the indigenous population lives in poverty. Likewise, income inequality is another problem, making it the one of the worst in the whole region, despite Panama's image as one of the wealthiest countries in Central America. Panama has the second-highest rate of unemployment in Central America (8.8%). Still, the percentage of population living in poverty is 27 percent. Nonetheless, it is estimated that the economy grew 8 percent in 2006. LGBT persons who are identified as such continue to suffer discrimination in the workplace. In order to secure a job, ones that are, for the most part, badly paid, LGBT citizens must remain hidden in the closet, otherwise they run the risk of being fired or discriminated against.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

In Panama, neither national nor urban government organizations provide funding for social programs specifically targeted at lesbians, gay men, transsexuals, or intersexed citizens. However, there are some social health programs—many of which are nongovernmental—designed specifically for AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases, some of which have a strong component geared toward LGBT communities.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

The first cases of AIDS were known in Panama in 1984. Since then, the sexual scene in this Central American country has changed in many ways. As in the other Latin American countries, LGBT citizens were often seen as the main carriers of this disease, which worsened their sociopolitical situation and made them more frequent targets of discrimination and stereotyping. There certainly are a great number of contradictions about this topic. Even though there are spaces specifically for gay men and lesbians in different areas of Panama City (for example, at discotheques and bars), and in spite of the fact that LGBT people participate in certain cultural expression (like carnival celebrations), their sexuality is still perceived as abnormal and immoral by the Catholic and the dominant heterosexual society.

In regard to sexual practices and the issue of AIDS, the AHMNP conducted a study in 1997 in which 300 men were interviewed; all of them had some knowledge on AIDS; only 40 percent had been tested; 32 percent reported using condoms: 12 percent use them almost always, 8 percent almost never, and 48 percent never use them.⁴ In other words, there is a 56 percent unsafe sex rate in the country. As a result of this high rate, AHMNP (the biggest organization of its kind in the country) began a campaign of workshops on safe sex and the distribution of condoms in cities like Panama City and Colón. AHMNP was the group allowed to participate in the drafting and editing process associated with the Ley de Salud Sexual y Reproductiva de la República de Panamá (Law of Sexual and Reproductive Health of the Republic of Panama). In general, when it comes to sexuality and sexual practices, the most prevalent attitudes in Panama are of the “we don't talk about that,” “that is not to be done,” or “that is not to be touched” variety.

FAMILY

The family institution in Panama is still mostly male-centered; that is, men are the ones who rule. Women, in general, are considered dependent on men. Even though women have gained certain rights and spaces, especially in the bigger cities, women are expected to stay home taking care of the household and the children, while men have a more independent lifestyle. Given the geographic location and the strong indigenous and African cultural identity associated with Panama, the family unit is often made up of a variety of ethnicities, including European and Asian immigrants. Certainly, there is a high rate of influence from the United States. In general, the idea of family in Panama is traditional: a husband (the active role, the macho who is expected to be stronger than the woman), a wife (the one with the passive role, physically and emotionally dependent on the husband), and the children. As a result of widespread homophobia, LGBT persons are not yet perceived as capable or worthy of organizing a family. Same-sex marriages, for instance, are neither socially nor legally accepted, and legal constitutional rights are still out of the question. Same-sex couples, for the most part, live in secrecy and are not looked upon favorably when it comes to adopting children to build families of their own.

COMMUNITY

The beginnings of the gay rights movement in the United States in the early 1950s affected Latin American countries in many ways. Since then, a number of groups and organizations in Latin America have come together to voice their concerns, to speak their minds, and to gain visibility. Because of the sociopolitical resistance of the heterosexual majority, this has been a slow process for the most part. However, some groups have been more liberal, proactive, and outspoken than others; therefore LGBT people have gained more space and visibility.

In the case of Panama, although it is strongly influenced by American culture, the national Catholic macho ideology, among other reasons, has played a negative central role in the recognition, visibility, and advancement of LGBT citizens to the point that it looks as though, currently, the only prominent alternative group is the AHMNP. The LGBT community in Panama is still invisible, although certain social spaces have been entered and negotiated. Besides what has been mentioned on the participation of gay cultures in the Panamanian Carnival, for instance, in 2008, a gay-lesbian international film event took place on the campus of University of Panama. Nonetheless, government or official funding for LGBT organizations has yet to be granted.

HEALTH

The Panamanian health system is organized around 14 regions. Like some other developing countries, Panama is presently undergoing a process of epidemiological transition characterized by the change in the features of illnesses. On one hand, infectious diseases tend to be minimized at the level of mortality, while on the other, chronic illnesses tend to increase. Illnesses that were supposed to be under control have come back, and even some new ones have emerged. The public health subsector is comprised of the Ministry of Health and the Social Security Office.

The main goal of the current government's health policies is to expand access to integral health programs and to improve the quality of services in order to reduce gaps in care. To achieve this, the Ministry of Health is seeking to advance a new, decentralized model that emphasizes primary care. However, many of these plans and services, for different reasons, do not reach out to all of the communities that are in need of them, namely the indigenous, poor African-Panamanians, poor women in the countryside, poor families, and LGBT citizens. These communities are also hard to reach when it comes to offering and applying programs on sexually transmitted diseases, including AIDS. Because of their socioeconomic status, among other reasons, less privileged communities continue to face serious health problems.

POLITICS AND LAW

The Panamanian Constitution has established that legally recognized and accepted marriages may occur only between a man and a woman; LGBT citizens continue to be invisible in this regard. As a result of political activism, however, LGBT persons have gained certain spaces in Panama, yet they are not openly accepted in politics and are banned from holding political office. They cannot even be a part of the military system. The only organized LGBT group is the AHMNP, and it seems to be the group that fights the most for gay rights and for making sure that the Gay Pride events take place every June. There are certain places, like bars and discotheques, where LGBT persons can go; in addition, some LGBT publications circulate around the country, however there is no open recognition of LGBT persons' legal status and rights, which means that there is not really freedom of speech for them. This constitutes a form of sociopolitical violence beyond the physical violence of which they can so easily be targets.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Although Roman Catholicism remains the largest denomination in the country (about 80%), in recent years there has been an introduction of increasing wide spectrum of religions as a result of the cultural diversity of the Panamanian nation. Some other groups include Evangelical Christians (about 15%); the remaining 5 percent is made up of Jews, Buddhists, Hindus, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Seventh Day Adventists.⁵ Even though LGBT persons can be as spiritual or religious as any other people, they are not openly accepted in many religious organizations. The Catholic Church, in particular, sees LGBT people as a threat to morality and Christian values. Many other priests and religious leaders outside the Catholic Church also prefer for LGBT parishioners to keep their sexual preferences and sexualities in the closet.

VIOLENCE

In spite of the current apparent economic and sociopolitical stability that Panama enjoys, different types of violence still take place in the country. Several studies have focused on physical and psychological violence against children, women, indigenous populations, and LGBT people. When it comes to violence, issues of socioeconomic status, race, age, gender, ethnicity, and sexual preference are still present as defining and influential factors. In other words, social and sexual minorities continue to suffer violations of their human rights. For instance, it has been reported that children and adolescents are victims of sexual assault, as are women and LGBT people. The fact that this latter group is kept invisible in the margins with no legal rights is, indeed, another example of social violence. In a macho society like Panama, LGBT people continue to be stigmatized and targets of daily psychological and physical abusive.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Although LGBT people continue to fight for their legal rights throughout the Americas, they still have a long way to go in Panama. Homosexual acts are not illegal between consenting adults, but strong and widespread stereotyping, stigma, and discrimination against them, bisexuals, and transgendered individuals persists. These groups are, indeed, victims of all kinds of violence not only by society at large but by the police and state apparatuses as well. For this reason, many recognize that the Panamanian government needs to consider these sociopolitical inequalities, make positive changes in the constitution, and, most important, begin to institutionalize and practice social justice, equality, and real freedom of speech for all its citizens in order to promote fair principles for a society free of hate, in which everyone regardless of age, socioeconomic status, political affiliation, gender identity, or sexual preference can live in peace.

PARAGUAY

Eduardo Alfonso Caro Meléndez

OVERVIEW

Paraguay is located in the center of South America and is one of the only two South American countries with no coastline (the other is Bolivia). Its official name is República del Paraguay (Republic of Paraguay), and its capital city is Asunción. Paraguay shares a national border with Argentina (to the south and southwest), Brazil (to the east), and Bolivia (to the northeast).

Paraguay has one of the most homogenous populations in Latin America. The Guarani language is understood by about 90 percent of the population. Most of the population is made up of mestizos, who are the descendants of guaraníes, indigenous peoples, and Europeans. The African presence is almost nonexistent. About 75 percent of the population speaks Spanish. A high percentage of the immigrants who have settled in Paraguay are from Germany, Japan, Korea, China, Brazil, and Argentina.

The population in Paraguay is unevenly distributed. Most of the people live in the eastern region of the country, towards Asunción, the capital and biggest city. The western region, known as El Chaco, contains about 60 percent of the land, but houses only to percent of the population. The country is predominantly Catholic, though the number of Protestant minorities has been growing since the 1990s. The most populated cities are Asunción (about 520,000), Ciudad del Este (about 220,000), San Lorenzo (about 202,000), Lambaré (120,000), and Fernando de la Mora (about 114,000). When the Spanish arrived in Paraguayan territory (the area between the Parana River and Paraguay River), various indigenous ethnicities were already living there; they belonged to three main groups: pámpidos, lágidos, and amazónidos. The first Europeans arrived at the beginning of 16th century and founded Asunción on August 15, 1537.

The first Jesuits arrived in Paraguay under the government of Hernandarias in order to pacify, indoctrinate, and instruct the indigenous people already living there. As part of this plan, the aborigines were taught the principles of the Catholic religion, agriculture, and crafts. After many years of struggle, Paraguay declared its independence from Spain on May 14, 1811; it is said that this was the only victory in the history of independence movements of the American nations that did not involve bloody battles. However, one war that severely marked the history of Paraguay was the Guerra de la Triple Alianza (1865–1870), which led to many deaths (about half of the population at that time) and great destruction of the territory. Around 1870, Paraguay was a land of women, children, and disabled men. Due to territory disputes, the first half of the 20th century saw Paraguay involved in battles against Brazil and Argentina. In 1947, under the government of Higinio Morínigo, Paraguay was once again involved in a civil war that left about 30,000 dead. In 1954, the dictatorship of Alfredo Stroessner began a dark chapter in the recent political history of the country. Stroessner's regime lasted some 34 years, until 1989, when he was deposed. Paraguay returned to a steady democracy, with the Colorado Party (Partido Colorado) being the most visible member of the government. In spite of the country's newly established democracy, corruption and discrimination continue to be prominent social, economic, and political concerns.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Historically, Paraguay has been a country where machismo (and the resulting rigid ideology of heterosexuality and straight culture) has been the norm. In this context, lesbians, gay, bisexuals, and transgendered citizens have been constructed as abject, abnormal, deviant, sick, a threat to straight moral values, and the like. In the whole sociohistorical panorama of Paraguay, LGBT people have been denied freedom of speech and have been kept in the margins. Nonetheless, national and international human rights activists have voiced their concerns in different ways, gaining some visibility and working towards raising social awareness and tolerance towards diversity, particularly sexual and gender identities.

AIDS continues to be a major social and health issue in Paraguay, not only in connection to LGBT citizens, but to all the society as well. The first case of AIDS in Paraguay was reported in 1985. Since then, there have been a good number of campaigns working to raise awareness and fight its spread through safe-sex education. However, the national government has failed to create and promote true massive social programs, not to mention programs designed specifically for LGBT citizens. Likewise, although concerns to fight discrimination and violence towards these individuals continue to be voiced in different ways, there is no constitutional antidiscrimination legislation yet. As a result, discrimination, physical, psychological, and social violence continue to be a common practice. Similarly, gay marriage is neither socially acceptable nor legally recognized. LGBT citizens also have to face discrimination and exclusion when the issue of the military is brought up. If a person with different sexual or gender identities or preferences comes out of the closet while in the military, it is not surprising that they will be required to leave or go through a process called “negotiation,” thus being openly lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgendered and being a part of the military institution is not yet an option in Paraguayan society and culture.

Many LGBT individuals must stay hidden in the sociopolitical closet in Paraguay. Since there are no visible organizations helping them and the process of recognition and legal acceptance and visibility of certain organization is still in its infancy, freedom of speech, integral health assistance, and psychological and/or reparative therapy are yet to be seen.

EDUCATION

According to the National Congress in Paraguay and based on the national constitution, all citizens have the right to an education free of any sort of discrimination. However, given the unfavorable social situation of LGBT citizens, in education, too, they are often subject to unfair practices. Just by analyzing the names and types of educational institutions in Paraguay (many, for the most part, associated with the Catholic Church and religious groups), one can easily see that tolerance towards diversity and pluralism, particularly in regard to sexual orientation or gender identity, is a major issue of concern. Indeed, LGBT students do not have any student organizations per se. They have to continue hiding their preferences and practices as they do not want to face discrimination, hatred, and the like.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Paraguay’s domestic economy is based on agriculture. The formal economy grew about three percent between 1995 and 1997, but the GDP declined in 1998, 1999, and 2000. One of the biggest problems that the economy faces is the illegal trafficking of drugs. The corruption in the government and in the Paraguayan society at large, which is attributed to the Stroessner dictatorship, remains one of the main obstacles for national economic development. Indeed, Transparency International considers Paraguay to be the most corrupt country in South America.¹ Currently, the economy depends on small- and medium-sized businesses that employ about 68 percent of the working population.

About 50 percent of Paraguay’s population works in agriculture. Cattle ranching is found mainly in the region of Gran Chaco, in the west of the country. The main exports come from the agro-cattle activity: soybeans, meat, corn, and vegetable oil. Conversely, Paraguay imports machinery, electrical appliances, cars, and chemicals. The country also imports all of the oil that it consumes. In 2006, the exports totaled US$1.9 million and imports US$5.285 million.²

At present, there does not seem to be any research that focuses on discrimination against LGBT citizens in Paraguay. However, given the well-known discriminatory social practices against these individuals, given the number of reports on how LGBT people have to make their way through such a society, and given information from more informal news outlets, it can be said that LGBT persons are victims of discrimination in the workplace. In the workplace, those suspected or proved to be gay, lesbian, bisexual, or transgendered are subjected to being fired or discriminated against in many ways.³

Currently, neither the national government nor local governments provide any sort of funding for social organizations or programs designed specifically to meet the health, work, and other needs of gay men, lesbians, bisexuals, or transgendered people. However, a few organizations are working on the AIDS issue and other sexually transmitted diseases that affect the whole population.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Like any other Latin American country, Paraguay is a rather macho-centered society. For the most part, society has considered men to be the stronger sex and, therefore, the ones with the social power. Consequently, acceptable and expected sexual practices are those between male and female adults. Also, in theory, for the most part, sexual practices are considered legal and natural when they occur within the confines of heterosexual marriage. In such a strong Catholic-based society, anything contrary to this is often seen as unnatural, unacceptable, and illegal. Within heterosexual marriages, men continue to be constructed and expected to be the dominant authorities. Thus, women are generally seen and expected to be the ones who are emotionally and sexually dependent on men. Similarly, when it comes to financial sources, work independence, and active roles, it is the husband who is supposed to be the visible head, whereas the wife carries the more passive role in the household, staying home, doing the chores, and taking care of the children, especially in the more rural areas and small towns. Persons of the same gender cannot yet legally marry or can they adopt children to form a family. Homosexual sex is not illegal per se.

FAMILY

The Paraguayan constitution, in Articles 50, 51, and 52, clearly states that formation of a family is the responsibility of a man and a woman, and, as such, the state will, theoretically speaking, grant all social rights and benefits. The idea of a family is centered on Catholic principles, given that Catholicism is the most dominant religious ideology and practice in Paraguay. In regard to ethnicity and cultural backgrounds, families in Paraguay come in different forms as result of the high rate of immigration from other South American countries (such as Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina), Europe, and the Asian countries. However, there is a strong presence of mestizos (biracial) and indigenous peoples. A typical immediate or nuclear family consists of the father, the mother, and two or more children. As is the case in all Latin American countries, the idea and presence of the extended family is also important in Paraguay.

COMMUNITY

The gay movement, as well as the promotion of human rights in the United States, in Europe, and in some other Latin American countries, continues to affect countries and regions of the world where this issue has been largely taboo for so many years. In Paraguay, a very macho society, LGBT citizens and organizations have gained more visibility than ever in the last 15 years. Although, as with some other Latin American countries, many LGBT individuals continue to emigrate because of threats, some human rights organizations and LGBT organizations continue to voice their concern and continue to fight for more respect and tolerance. Two of these organizations are Aireana, a group that fights for the rights for lesbians, and the Grupo de Acción Gay-Lésbico (Group of Lesbian-Gay Action). The radio program Dios los Cria (God Raises Them) began airing rather recently; it is the first radio broadcast to focus on gay-lesbian themes. All of these organizations, although actively involved in their cause, face difficulties given the widespread homophobia present in the country.

HEALTH

The public health system is fragmented, although it has a central structure. The national Law of Health, created in 1996, operates on three levels: national, departmental, and municipal, all of which are dependent on the National Ministry of Health. There are, for this reason, many discrepancies between the real needs of the people and the decisions or proposals from the Ministry. The health service does not offer universal health care coverage. AIDS continues to be a major problem that affects the whole population, and particularly LGBT citizens. The first case of AIDS in Paraguay was found in 1985, and since then there have been about 4,500 cases, of which some 1,300 correspond to people suffering of AIDS, and some other 3,200 are infected with HIV.⁴ The public health system is insufficient and does not really provide what it is supposed to provide the community; furthermore, the Ministry does not offer any specific services for LGBT citizens who are suffering from HIV/AIDS.

POLITICS AND LAW

In Paraguay, because of the widespread stigma and negative attitudes towards them, LGBT persons participating in the government sphere continue to be hidden in the closet. In many instances, these people discriminate openly against other LGBT citizens just to remain unnoticed or unseen, which, given their political position and power, helps to promote and maintain discrimination against these social groups. Although homosexuality among consensual individuals is not supposed to be illegal in Paraguay, being homosexual, lesbian, bisexual, or transgendered still carries a great deal of stigma, prejudice, intolerance, and discrimination in all spheres of society. In real social practice, LGBT persons are easy targets of different sorts of violence by the hegemonic straight society. Same-sex marriages, remain illegal, and there does not seem to be any indication that the practice will be legalized in the near future. LGBT citizens are not allowed in the military or to be leaders of state religious groups or organizations or any government-sponsored institution. In this climate, being openly homosexual, lesbian, bisexual, or transgendered is thought of as being against decency and moral values and a threat to Christian, heterosexual principles.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

The most predominant religion in Paraguay is Roman Catholicism, mostly as a result of the evangelization of indigenous peoples by missionaries during the 16th, 17th, and early 18th centuries. However, there are at present some minority religious groups active in the country, identified mostly as Protestants and Jews. The 1967 constitution guarantees freedom of religion; yet, at the same time, it stresses the unique role that Catholicism plays in national life and social identity. Indeed, throughout the sociopolitical history of Paraguay, the Catholic Church and the government have been in an inseparable, twofold association. Certainly, in Paraguay many lesbians, gays, and bisexuals can be very spiritual; however, contrary to what is stated in the constitution, and given the many antigay sentiments and practices found in many religions, including Catholicism, LGBT persons have had to fight back, seek other religious alternatives, or abandon their religion completely.

VIOLENCE

The national constitution in Paraguay, in Articles 4, 5, and 6, clearly states that all persons, even before birth, will be protected by the state. Also, according to this document no one shall be mistreated or the victim of discrimination, torture, or violence. However, throughout its history, Paraguay has seen some of the most violent battles or wars in Latin America, one of which took place during the period between 1865–1870 when the Guerra de la Triple Alianza (The War of Three Alliances) took place and devastated Paraguay to the point of killing most of its men.

Similarly and more recently, there continues to be sociopolitical violence against campesinos (peasants), indigenous peoples and communities, women, children, senior citizens, disabled people, and LGBT citizens. Also, social activists and leaders continue to be targets of many forms of violence. This is contrary to constitutional principles; there is no freedom of speech, and the state does not seem to care about social inequalities and unfairness.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Paraguay has been plagued by many years of sociopolitical violence that continues to be expressed in many forms and applied to the same social groups that have been kept in the peripheries for centuries. Some citizens, such as LGBT persons, continue to be invisible and unheard, although they continue to clamor for respect, tolerance, acceptance, and social justice. It is expected that, in the future, the Paraguayan constitution and government apparatuses will begin to work towards more truly equal civil and legal rights in all senses for children, women, senior citizens, peasants, aborigine cultures, disabled people, and LGBT individuals. Only in this way, with true visibility, respect, tolerance, acceptance, and social justice, will Paraguayans, regardless of age, sex, gender, political ideology, and the like, be able to live in a safer and fairer society with equal opportunities for all and not just for a small, privileged minority.

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO

Jen Westmoreland Bouchard

OVERVIEW

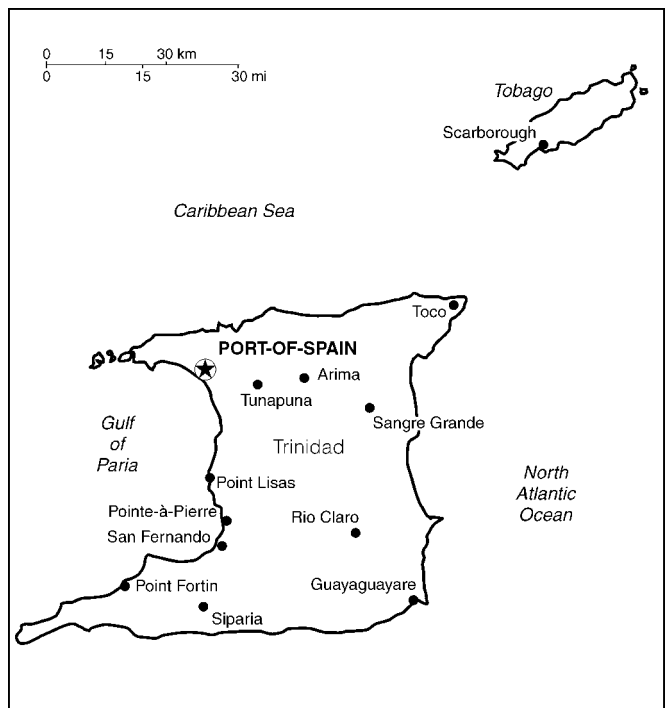

The nation known as Trinidad and Tobago consists of two separate islands located 23 miles apart in the Caribbean Ocean. The Spanish originally colonized these islands in 1498 before falling under British control in the early 19th century. Trinidad and Tobago gained independence in 1962. The islands' main exports have historically been sugar cane, cocoa, and oil. Thanks to the large amounts of petroleum and natural gas production on both islands, the country is one of the richest in the Caribbean.¹

The estimated 2007 population of both islands was 1,056,608. The population breakdown is as follows: Citizens aged 14 and under account for 19.5 percent of the population, with 105,994 males and 100,156 females, citizens 15 to 64 years of age make up 71.6 percent of the population, with 397,699 males and 358,755 females, and those 65 and older make up 8.9 percent of the population, with 42,039 males and 51,965 females.²

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

On the whole, human sexuality is not discussed publicly in Trinidadian circles. The country's youth are never taught about sex in school. On the rare occasion that sexuality is addressed in a public or educational forum, heterosexual reproduction is the sole focus.

As a result of this conservative attitude toward sexuality in general, Trinidadian gays rarely have an accurate understanding of what it means (sexually, socially, and psychologically) to be gay. Moreover, most never explore their homosexual feelings for fear of social rejection.

Socially speaking, as long as an individual is not open about his or her sexual orientation, most Trinidadian society will ignore what they consider to be outside the sexual norm (that is, anything not related to heterosexuality). However, the pressure to conform to a heterosexual lifestyle is constant. Anyone with same-sex preferences is condemned as a sexual deviant and, in some cases, a sinner.³

Trinidadian gays live the lives of second-class citizens. Many gays hope that their homosexual inclinations are only temporary, so they marry and hope that these feelings will shift as soon as they enter into a heteronormative lifestyle.

EDUCATION

There are few educational resources for gays in Trinidad and Tobago. Most of their information comes from the Internet or from other gays who are living in secrecy. In a country that barely offers AIDS education programs, one would not expect much more in terms of awareness and tolerance programs.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Those who are suspected of being gay are regularly discriminated against in the workforce. If they are hired, many gays are targeted and victimized on the job. Since this type of discrimination is so ingrained in Trinidadian society, there is virtually no legal recourse for individuals who find themselves in discriminatory positions. To avoid these experiences, most homosexuals go to great lengths to hide their sexual identities from their co-workers and their employers.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

HIV focus groups have been organized by nongovernmental organizations to educate both homosexuals and heterosexuals about the dangers of HIV and AIDS. However, the government does not do much in the way of following up on these infrequent sessions. Extreme homophobia and a reluctance to appear sympathetic toward homosexuality have prevented the national AIDS program from disseminating HIV/AIDS prevention information within the gay community.⁴

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Since Trinidadian laws regarding sexuality and social mores are inherently anti-homosexual, the majority of the gay population is closeted. Many gay Trinidadians marry to hide their sexuality and subsequently engage in homosexual relations “on the side.”⁵

FAMILY

Homophobia is so pervasive in Trinidadian society that openness and honesty about one’s homosexuality can lead to being rejected from the family and being forced to leave one’s home. In a society where most unmarried young people live with their parents, homosexual behavior brings shame to the entire household. Many members of the gay community have been threatened by their own families.

COMMUNITY

Because homosexuality is illegal in Trinidad and Tobago, homosexuals must be secretive about their public interactions. However, even though the gay scene is not publicly visible, it is definitely still present. Some of the most popular gay clubs are in the city of Port of Spain, the nation's capital. They host parties during which gays are welcome to socialize in a safe environment. According to some Trinidadian gays, the underground homosexual scene in Trinidad and Tobago is larger than that of any other nearby country except Puerto Rico.

During Carnival, which occurs once a year in the days preceding Lent, many Trinidadians drink heavily and revel through the night. During the festival, sexual norms are eschewed and the community seems to be open to the novelty of homosexuality. However, as soon as Carnival ends, the intolerance for homosexuality returns.

One recent event of note was Elton John's highly publicized concert at the Plymouth Jazz Festival in Tobago in 2007. Despite opposition to the concert voiced by a group of fundamentalist Christian leaders based in Tobago, the gay musician was allowed to play. Most citizens of Trinidad and Tobago found the fundamentalist, antigay platform regarding the concert to be ridiculous.

HEALTH

The first cases of AIDS were diagnosed in Trinidad in 1983. Since that time, the epidemic has spread at an alarming rate. Perhaps even more worrisome is the attitude surrounding HIV/AIDS in Trinidad and Tobago. Usually, the idea of publicly admitting that one has HIV/AIDS is more frightening for victims than the actual disease. Families of those who die of AIDS often construct stories stating alternate forms of death (such as heart failure, lung problems, etc.). The shame of having a family member with HIV/AIDS is too much for many families to bear.

There is relatively little information on HIV/AIDS available to homosexuals. Most information available to them regarding HIV/AIDS is transmitted via word of mouth, the local HIV clinic, or the National AIDS Hotline. Instead of turning to these resources, however, many homosexuals who are HIV-positive choose to hide their illness and, in some cases, ignore it. If a gay Trinidadian does actually go to the clinic, he may refuse to give his true identity. Homosexuals who call the National AIDS Hotline often follow a similar pattern. They ask questions "for a friend," instead of being honest about their lifestyles and health concerns.

Those who are ill and dying from AIDS tend to live in anonymity. Society on the whole knows that AIDS exists, but prefers not to acknowledge those who have it. When a member of the middle or upper class dies from AIDS, friends and family are told that they died from a more acceptable disease. If an "out" homosexual dies of AIDS, he is quickly buried and barely given a funeral.⁶

POLITICS AND LAW

Not only is homosexuality illegal in Trinidad and Tobago, gay tourists from other countries are also unwelcome. The laws against homosexuality in Trinidad and Tobago were enacted under the rule of Britain's Queen Victoria, and the current government consistently refuses to repeal these outdated laws. However, the laws are rarely officially enforced. Article 8 of the Trinidad and Tobago Immigration Act states that homosexuals are forbidden to enter the country.⁷

Section 13 of the Sexual Offenses Act outlaws “buggery” and provides a penalty of imprisonment for up to 18 years if both parties are adults, and up to five years if a minor is penetrating an adult. Section 16 of the Sexual Offenses Act (which addresses “serious indecency”) furnishes a penalty of up to 20 years in prison for the somewhat general category of “homosexual acts” between two adults. Though the government does not specifically arrest individuals based on these laws, some have been charged with “buggery” in conjunction with arrests for other crimes.⁸

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Most Trinidadians practice Christianity, Hinduism, indigenous religions (including voodoo), or a mixture of one or more of these. The statistics on religion are as follows: 26 percent are Roman Catholic, 22.5 percent Hindu, 7.8 percent Anglican, 7.2 percent Baptist, 6.8 percent Pentecostal, 5.8 percent Muslim, 4 percent Seventh Day Adventist, 5.8 percent other Christian, 10.8 percent voodoo and similar religions, 1.4 percent unspecified, and 1.9 percent none.⁹ Frequently, members of the aforementioned religions approach LGBT people on the street and ask if they believe in God. The expected answer is typically “no,” since in the minds of the “believers” asking the question, no “true believer” could practice homosexuality.

Regardless of the answer, an immediate effort is launched to “save” the victim of homosexuality. During this salvation effort, the Bible is quoted, religious literature and prayers are thrust upon the individual, and he or she is encouraged to attend religious ceremonies and support groups. These attempts at conversion are so intense and frequent that many homosexuals finally give in to the religious pressures and attend church. The two main factors behind these conversions are the fear of ostracism from peers and the spiritual threat of eternal damnation.¹⁰

VIOLENCE

Due to the fact that homosexuals are openly discriminated against in Trinidadian society, acts of violence against them are frequent and often go unreported. This type of violence is tacitly condoned, and perpetrators face mild forms of punishment, if any. A social organization called The Trinidad and Tobago Anti-Violence Project has carried out many campaigns on the local level to eradicate discriminatory violence. Their most recent efforts have included protesting against songs that include antihomosexual lyrics, calling for a ban on this music in nightclubs throughout the Caribbean.¹¹

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Given that antihomosexual sentiments are so deeply ingrained in the Trinidadian psyche, the future looks bleak for gay rights in Trinidad and Tobago. Both Christianity and Hinduism, two major world religions that feature groups that continue to call for the conversion of gays to a heterosexual lifestyle, inform this pervasive cultural attitude.¹² In addition, the current government’s reluctance to do away with antiquated laws regarding homosexuality further reinforces this mentality.

These sociopolitical conditions, along with the Trinidadian government's refusal to acknowledge or improve the HIV/AIDS situation on the island, does not bode well for homosexuals living in this region as it progresses into the 21st century.

UNITED STATES

Chuck Stewart

OVERVIEW

After China and India, the United States of America is the world's third-largest nation by population; in geographical land area, it is about the same size as China. Only Russia and Canada are larger in land size. The United States stretches almost 3,000 miles from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean and is bordered by Canada to the north and Mexico to the south. This enormous landmass encompasses a wide range of ecosystems and climates.

The first humans to occupy the Western Hemisphere came from northeast Asia in a series of migrations across the Bering Strait and present-day Alaska. These indigenous American Indians (also known as Native Americans or People of the First Nations) controlled all the lands of the Americas for tens of thousands of years. They had prosperous societies with some of the world's largest cities until 1492, when they were devastated by diseases and warfare inflicted upon them by the Spanish and other European imperial powers. With entire indigenous cultures being wiped out, and other native peoples suffering depopulation rates in excess of 90 percent, the Europeans expanded their populations rapidly over the next 400 years. Most of the Europeans came as voluntary immigrants, but they captured millions of Africans and brought them unwillingly to the Americas as a slave labor force. Large numbers of immigrants later came to the United States from Asia and Latin America, in the 20th century. The result is that the United States today is a multiethnic nation of immigrants with a diverse population from all over the world. The mixture of peoples has not been peaceable, and, for much of U.S. history, Americans have been legally segregated by race and national origin.

Many African Americans, Asian Americans, and Hispanics have resisted unequal treatment enforced through segregation. In the 1950s and early 1960s, and with the overturn of the “separate but equal” doctrine by the U.S. Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education, legislators crafted and passed the 1964 Civil Rights Act. It enforced the Fourteenth Amendment, requiring all states and the federal government to protect the rights of all people with regards to due process and equal protection under the law. Many of the concepts promoted through the Civil Rights Act would later be used to secure the rights of LGBT people and protections based on sexual orientation and gender.

Approximately three-fourths of Americans identify themselves as Christians.¹ The predominance of conservative Christians has had a significant impact on the national debate over LGBT rights, and particularly over same-sex marriage. Conservative Christian organizations have been at the forefront of blocking LGBT rights.

The United States has become the world’s superpower both economically and militarily. It is estimated that the U.S. economy constitutes 20 percent (about $13 trillion) of the world’s gross world product and is the world’s largest importer and second-largest exporter of goods.² Its robust economy helps support the world’s largest military. In 2006, the U.S. military spent over $528 billion, which represents 46 percent of all military spending in the world.³ This level of spending exceeds the national military spending by the next 14 largest militaries combined. The United States has more than 770 bases and facilities in virtually every country in the world. With this economic and military might, the United States has a significant influence on policy decisions made by other countries.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

The early 21st century has often seen gay and lesbian issues at the forefront of public discourse in the United States. Whether it is gay marriage, gays in the military, “defense of marriage” legislation, or “reparative” therapies, LGBT concerns and the topic of homosexuality have played a crucial role in national and local politics, sometimes even influencing the outcome of presidential elections.

In the United States, AIDS continues to be a growing public health crisis. In the early 1980s, AIDS was limited mostly to gay males. Now, it has spread to women and racial and ethnic minorities. It is estimated that more than half of all new infections occur in African Americans.⁴ This is a concern because African Americans represent a small percentage of the overall population and health services for underrepresented minorities are often lacking. Further, the use of drug cocktails in the treatment of AIDS has given many young people the impression that AIDS is nothing more than a small nuisance and manageable, like diabetes. Of concern to public health officials, safe-sex programs seem to have begun to lose their effectiveness.

It is legal to discriminate against LGBT people in much of the United States. There are no federal-level antidiscrimination statutes forbidding discrimination against LGBT people with regard to employment, housing, or family relationships. Many states, cities, and local governments have implemented their own antidiscrimination statutes protecting a limited range of rights. As such, the United States is a patchwork of communities of legal safety interspersed with other communities that are dangerous for LGBT people. Hate crimes are a continuing problem against people perceived not to be heterosexual.

The advances made for the rights of people of the same gender to marry have lead to one of the most contentious political battles in the United States. As of 2009, only the states of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Iowa allow full marriage rights for LGBT people. Soon the states of Main and New Hampshire will also allow same-sex marriages. A few other states have civil union or domestic partnership provisions that give some of the rights of marriage, but do not use the word "marriage." Backlash from religious and political conservatives has resulted in many states and the federal government passing antigay marriage laws (known as DOMA, Defense of Marriage Acts) in which marriage is defined as the union of one man and one woman and, further, allows states to refuse to recognize same-sex marriages performed in other states. The prospects of gay marriage will continue to dominate U.S. politics as the antigay stance has proven to be a major source of fund-raising for Republicans and other conservative politicians.

During President Bill Clinton's first term of office (1993–1996), he initially called for lifting the ban on homosexuals serving in the military, but after much public outcry by religious and conservative politicians and leaders, he abandoned this effort. A compromise was reached, and the policy of "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" was adopted in 1993. Instead of reducing the antigay witch hunts conducted by the military against lesbian and gay service personnel, the number of investigations and discharges increased significantly. The issue had died in the media by the late 1990s but was resurrected when Democrats gained majority control of Congress in 2006. The issue of gays in the military has again become a hot topic with the inauguration of President Obama.

Homosexuality was initially deemed a mental illness within the field of psychology. In 1973, the American Psychological Association reclassified homosexuality and removed it from its Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM) as a mental disorder. Currently, anyone who is licensed in the United States to provide psychological counseling or treatment must approach lesbian and gay clients and the topic of homosexuality as being equal to and as valid as heterosexuality. In contrast, the religious right has taken a strong position against homosexuality and often provides spiritual counseling to help lesbians and gay men to become heterosexual through reparative treatment. It is expected that the topic of reparative treatment will continue to be controversial and in the public eye.

There have been and always will be homosexual students and teachers in schools. Great inroads were made in protecting the rights of lesbian and gay students in public schools in the United States through application of the Equal Access statute in 1984. It required all schools receiving federal educational funds to give access to all groups equally. Although this legislation was promoted by Christian groups wanting access to public schools to conduct Bible studies during lunchtimes and after school, it had the unintended consequence of also requiring schools to allow lesbian and gay groups to hold meetings on school grounds. The Gay, Lesbian,

Straight Education Network (GLSEN) has given guidance to many students regarding the formation of their own GLSEN chapters in public schools, often amid an outcry from conservatives. The battle between those who want schools to provide open and safe environments for all students, including lesbian and gay students, and those who want to turn schools into religious centers will continue into the future.

The final area for which continued controversy is expected in the United States concerns speech and association issues related to LGBT people. There are three issues to which this applies: access to the Internet, being open about one's sexual orientation, and the use of the legal argument that religious freedom allows for discrimination against LGBT people.

EDUCATION

The U.S. federal government provides very little funding (less than 10% of the total budget of all school districts) or guidance for public education. Instead, public education is mostly a state function that establishes and funds local kindergarten-12th grade school districts and public colleges and universities. As such, there is great diversity in access, funding, and programs in schools across the nation.

The federal government mostly provides funding for specific programs, such as the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) Title 1 program designed to give additional funding to schools with large numbers of economically disadvantaged students, and the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act (IDEA) Part B, which targets children with disabilities.

However, the federal government has passed legislation related to civil rights that are applied to all public schools. Christian groups pressed Congress in the early 1980s to allow Bible study groups to meet during lunchtimes and after school in public schools. Because of the separation of church and state that is a cornerstone of U.S. policy and belief, schools were in a quandary and inconsistent in making decisions about which groups could meet on campus. Congress passed the Equal Access Act (ESA) in 1984 to clarify that all extracurricular groups had the right to meet on campus without preference. There was a rush by Christian groups to petition their schools for the right to meet. However, a few gay and lesbian groups also petitioned their local schools for this same right. Skirmishes occurred across the nation in many school districts. Attempts were made to classify gay and lesbian groups as not being related to the curriculum and, as such, not covered under the ESA. The courts ruled in favor of the LGBT student groups to the displeasure of the Christian groups. In some cases, schools canceled all extracurricular activities rather than allow gay students to meet.

The organization at the forefront for securing safe schools for LGBT students is the Gay, Lesbian, Straight Education Network (GLSEN). It has grown substantially since the late 1990s and early 2000s, and has chapters in many states. GLSEN has worked with legislators to sponsor anti-bullying bills at both the state and federal level. GLSEN believes schools should be safe for all students and that bullying of all kinds needs to stop.

Another tool used to create a safe environment in schools is the Title IX Education Amendment. It is a short, 37-word law passed in 1972 that states that "No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.”⁵ The law has had far-reaching effects, including normalizing the expenditures in athletics for programs for both boys and girls.

The application of Title IX was clarified in 1997 to apply in sexual harassment cases—including those against LGBT students. This came about after a number of notable court rulings related to gay student harassment. One case in particular, Nabozny v. Podlesny, clearly showed the responsibility schools have for protecting gay students from sexual harassment. Here, Jamie Nabozny, a male Wisconsin high school student, was mock raped in his classroom by two students in front of 20 other students, urinated upon in the bathroom, and kicked so badly that he required surgery to stop his internal bleeding. The school administrators told him that he “had to expect that kind of stuff” and refused to apprehend or punish the perpetrators. Nabozny changed schools, graduated with an equivalency certificate, and filed suit against his old school. A jury found that the Wisconsin school officials had violated his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause and the school district was forced to pay almost $1 million in damages. Sexual harassment, whether against heterosexual or homosexual students, would not be tolerated under Title IX.

Schools can be a dangerous place for many students. It is estimated that a child will hear 25 antigay remarks every day in his or her public school and that, when these comments are made in front of teachers, 97 percent of those teachers will make no effort to stop them.⁶ The consequences of ESA and Title IX are only now filtering down to every school in every school district in the United States. Some states and school districts are crafting their own anti-bullying policies to clarify that bullying of any kind will not be tolerated on school campuses. This will benefit LGBT students.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

The United States has the largest economy in the world. It is a mixture of private capitalism, government programs, and social economic policies. Although the private sector represents almost 88 percent of the total economy, the U.S. government is country’s the single largest employer.

Private employers have nearly absolute control over hiring and firing of employees, as established in the doctrine of “employment at will.”⁷ Slowly, this absolute control is being modified by federal and state policies designed to reduce discrimination. The Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Americans with Disability Act, and subsequent acts have established categories (race, color, religion, sex, national origin, and disability) of people for which fairness must be ensured while making employment decisions to hire or fire. Many states and local governments have implemented their own, more stringent, civil rights laws to include more categories.

Sometimes states and local governments have given sexual orientation protected status during employment decisions. In states and cities that have no antidiscrimination statutes based on sexual orientation, LGBT employees can, and are, fired at will or discriminated against during the hiring process. Similarly, in states without antidiscrimination statutes, often LGBT people are precluded because of their sexual orientation from receiving certificates required for their profession. As such, they are prevented from working in their chosen profession by state mandate.

As early as 1973, the federal government issued a bulletin to the U.S. Civil Service Commission specifying that employment could not be denied to lesbians and gay men solely based on their sexual orientation. This was reinforced in the 1978 Civil Service Reform Act, and again by President Clinton in 1998 by executive order. However, not all federal employment was covered. Jobs in the military, or those that involve security or intelligence, may exclude workers based on sexual orientation. This has come about through the long-held belief that homosexuals pose a security risk (although research has shown this is not true).⁸ The FBI, CIA, and a few other intelligence agencies no longer discriminate against lesbian and gay employees, and it has not affected their ability to handle sensitive intelligence.

All branches of the U.S. military discriminate against homosexuals. This is in direct contrast to all other militaries participating in the NATO alliance. Without exception, each country accepts lesbians and gay personnel into service. Even Great Britain, which lifted its ban on homosexuals serving in the military in 2000, reported no difficulties with integrating them into their service. However, in the United States, the presence of homosexuals in the military remains a controversial topic. When President Clinton attempted to lift the ban on gays in the military in 1993, he instead met with intense political pressure and implemented the “Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell” policy. Under this policy, homosexuals were supposed to be allowed to serve as long as they were not found out (i.e., they stayed in the closet). Instead, major investigations were conducted and the discharge rate skyrocketed.⁹ More and more gay and lesbian military personnel were identified, tried, and discharged from the military. For those few personnel who fought back, the courts often rationalized their antigay position with what could be interpreted as illogical reasoning. For example, the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals ruled in Holmes/Watson v. California Army that the “Don’t Ask” policy was not discriminatory because it treated “homosexuals and heterosexuals equally because neither are allowed to say they are gay.”¹⁰ The policy has failed and there is call for a complete overhaul of the system, if not outright rejection of the ban on gays in the military.

President George W. Bush implemented a “faith-based initiative” in 2004. Its goal was to make public money available to religious groups to provide social services that were typically handled by local governments and nonprofit secular organizations. Many civil libertarians expressed concerns over the initiative because they believed it invariably would lead these religious organizations to promote their religious beliefs at taxpayer expense—a condition expressly prohibited by the U.S. Constitution. Since its implementation, this problem has cropped up in many situations and many lawsuits have been filed. Many religious agencies have discriminated against lesbian and gay employees or clients. These employers claim they have the right to discriminate because homosexuality violates their religious viewpoint and, as a First Amendment Right to free speech, can choose not to hire or serve homosexuals. It is expected that many more lawsuits will be filed over this issue.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Neither the federal, state, nor local governments provide funding for any social programs specifically for lesbians, gay men, transsexuals, or intersexed people. However, there are social health programs, specifically for AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases, that have a strong component of reaching out to the underserved LGBT community.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

In the first decade of the AIDS crisis, the 1980s, the new infection rate soared until the early 1990s when it leveled off and then began to decline. This came about through aggressive educational programs designed to reduce risky behavior. The United States initially shied away from behavioral intervention programs but later came to embrace them, including school-based programs, strategies to limit needle sharing, peer-to-peer interventions, client-centered counseling, and strategies to improve parent-to-child communication.

Initially, implementers of educational programs were reticent to discuss sex explicitly and often did not illustrate the proper use of condoms. Similarly, programs that attempted to distribute free condoms at schools, colleges, and elsewhere were blocked by conservative lawmakers. Political and religious conservatives were uncomfortable with public money being used to discuss sex, even if it was designed to reduce risky sexual behaviors that spread HIV. By the early 1990s, explicit “safer sex” programs were adopted nationwide and the new infection rates plummeted from over 150,000 per year (in the mid-1980s) to fewer than 40,000 per year.¹¹

Some promoters of safer sex programs in the early 2000s decided that it was more effective to combine prevention messages with positive images of sex, for example, a billboard put up in St. Louis showed two bare-chested African American men in an embrace with the message, “Before the love begins, get tested. Know your HIV status.” This program provoked the ire of Republican politicians and the St. Louis mayor ordered the billboards taken down.

FAMILY

American families come in many different forms. The culture promotes the idea that the preferred family arrangement is the nuclear family (consisting of a married husband and wife with their biological children). This may have been true at one time for the middle class, but very few families fit that description today. In 2000, the American family structure consisted of 24 percent nuclear families, 28 percent married but without children, 16 percent other family arrangements (parents, siblings, grandparents, etc. living together in a family unit), 25 percent single, and 6 percent other nonfamily arrangements (friends living as a family unit, or LGBT couples).¹²

The marriage rate has decreased 30 percent since the 1970s, while at the same time the divorce rate has climbed to about 40 percent.¹³ Approximately 50 percent of all first marriages end in divorce by their eighth year.¹⁴ Most Americans will marry and divorce at least one time within their lifetime.

These statistics represent a particular slice in time and do not reveal the reality of the nuclear family concept as a relic of the past. Often people will go through periods of being married, single, single raising children, perhaps raising children from a previous marriage, living together without matrimony, in a gay or lesbian relationship, married again, divorced again, and so on. Within a person’s lifetime, he or she may form many different family structures depending on circumstances, and each of these family structures has more or less differing degrees of legal protections.

The U.S. family legal system is built around the nuclear family concept. As such, it has not been friendly toward LGBT relationships and families. Some of the possible structures LGBT families can take include same-sex couples living together (with or without the legal benefits of being in a civil union, domestic partnership, or marriage), gay or lesbian single persons divorced from a heterosexual spouse, or gay or lesbian single persons who take care of an elderly parent or a child. In each of these family arrangements, there may be children who are from the biological mother or who have been adopted or housed through foster care.

Only Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Iowa allow full marriage for same-sex couples. Soon the states of Vermont and Main will allow same-sex marriages. A few other states allow domestic partnerships (DPs) (California, Oregon) or civil unions (Vermont, Connecticut, New Jersey, New Hampshire) that provide virtually all the same rights as those granted with marriage. However, since DPs or civil unions are not full marriages, there are many pitfalls concerning the rights and responsibilities for medical directives, inheritance, and child custody.

It is estimated that as many as one quarter of all gay men and half of all lesbians have been married at some time in their lives, and many have children.¹⁵ Many LGBT couples want the right to adopt the children of their partner so that both of them will have full responsibility for the child's welfare. Similarly, some LGBT couples want to adopt a child into their family who is not biologically related to either partner. Because there are no federal guidelines concerning adoptions, how these situations are handled depends on the state in which the couple resides. For example, in second-parent adoptions (where a same-sex parent desires to adopt his or her partner's biological or adoptive child without terminating the legal rights of the first parent), eight states (California, Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Vermont) have approved legislation or obtained appellate court rulings in favor such adoptions. There are an additional 18 states (Alabama, Alaska, Delaware, Hawaii, Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, Texas, and Washington) that have granted second-parent adoption rights either through trial court level or other means. Three states (Florida, Nebraska, and Wisconsin) have appellate court decisions ruling that the state adoption laws do not permit second-parent adoptions. Finally, it is unclear in the remaining states whether second-parent adoptions would be legal at all.

The problem is similar when considering outright adoption by gay men or lesbians (as individuals or couples). Most states allow LGBT individuals or couples to adopt children, however six states (Florida, Arkansas, Michigan, Mississippi, Nebraska, and Utah) have specific statutes prohibiting homosexual couples from adopting. The reasons given by these states for prohibiting homosexuals from adopting are in line with the antigay stereotypes that lesbians and gay men are unfit to be parents, that homosexuals molest children, or that homosexuals will turn their adopted children into homosexuals. All of these reasons have been proven by academic research in the past 40 years to be incorrect,¹⁶ but this has not swayed states from changing their adoption rules to allow homosexuals to adopt.

This patchwork of laws concerning adoptions or second-parent adoptions by homosexuals is also reflected in foster care. In some states, the child protective agencies are thrilled to have LGBT people interested in providing support for children through foster care. In other states, legal statutes make it clear that LGBT people cannot provide foster care for children.

One stereotype that seems to work for and sometimes against LGBT people in adoption or foster care decisions is the belief that gays and lesbians have higher than average incomes. In a thorough review of U.S. census data, it has been found that LGBT people earn decidedly less than heterosexual Americans.¹⁷ As a result, LGBT families have lower household incomes than heterosexual ones. This research is also important because it counters one of the arguments made by religious and conservative pundits: they claim that, since LGBT people have higher-than-average incomes, it is obvious that antidiscrimination policies are unnecessary.

COMMUNITY

Since the beginnings of the gay rights movement in the United States in the early 1950s, the LGBT community has grown and been organized through the participation of hundreds of thousands of individuals, rather than through governmental agencies. In fact, many of the demonstrations and organization have been the direct response to oppressive governmental actions.

Currently, most major American cities have some sort of LGBT community services center that is partially funded by the city. These centers are primarily funded to provide health and social services to the LGBT community. They are not gay centers per se as their names imply, but rather centers to provide health and social services to an underserved population. This same rationale is used to substantiate the existence of LGBT student groups at universities.

Thousands of LGBT organizations exist in the United States. They are as varied as the needs of human beings. Most are small, local groups providing support for local functions and include gay pride festivals and parades, AIDS support groups, dance and theater groups, gay rodeos, local politics, police issues, and more. Some LGBT organizations (such as the Human Rights Campaign, and the Lambda Legal and Servicemember Legal Defense Funds) are national in scope and address issues such as marriage, equal rights, antidiscrimination, national organizing, and student rights. These organizations form the backbone of what is termed the “gay community.”

HEALTH

The United States is the only Western nation without universal health care coverage. Instead, the United States uses a system of private insurance and public programs aimed at specific groups (such as the aged and the poor). It is estimated that more than 47 million Americans (or 16% of the population) have no form of health insurance coverage.¹⁸ The primary cause of this large and growing uninsured crisis is the decline in the number of employers who sponsor health insurance for their employees and families. Medical expenses are the most common cause for personal bankruptcy.¹⁹ The state of Massachusetts has become the first state to implement universal health care for its citizens. It is thought that universal health care will be adopted by many more states and, eventually, by the federal government.

AIDS has been a major health concern for the United States. Approximately one million people have contracted HIV in the United States since the beginning of the epidemic in 1981. Half of them have died. Currently, there are about 40,000 new cases diagnose each year. Initially the disease was primarily found in gay white males, but the demographics have shifted so that now more than half of all new infections are found in African Americans; the number of women becoming infected has also increased substantially. Male-to-male sex is still the most common transmission route for HIV, followed by injection drug use and heterosexual contact.²⁰

A primary issue for the United States, given its history of racial strife and homophobia, is that minority men who do not identify as homosexual yet engage in sex with other men (known as men who have sex with men, or MSM) experience greater stigma and are more difficult to reach with HIV prevention messages. Similarly, heterosexual transmission is beginning to become a significant portion of new infections in the United States and the safer-sex campaigns designed mostly for the LGBT community are far less successful at reaching this emerging audience.

Other sexually transmitted diseases, such as syphilis, have increased at an alarming rate in the United States in the first decade of the 21st century. The group seeing the greatest increases is MSM. It is thought that the causes for this include the ease with which it is possible to contact casual sexual partners via the Internet, the resurgence of “bare backing” (i.e., engaging in anal sex without the use of condoms), and the mistaken belief that medical advances have made HIV and other sexually transmitted diseases easy to treat.

The health needs of lesbians have been overlooked in the United States. The Centers for Disease Control (CDC), the National Institutes of Health (NIH), and other government agencies and nonprofit organization all call for greater research into the specific health needs of lesbians, yet virtually no research is conducted. As such, there has been a grassroots approach with lesbians networking and establishing their own resource centers and projects, such as the Mautner Project for Lesbians with Cancer.

Transsexuals require the intervention of medical professionals. It is estimated that tens of thousands of sex-reassignment surgeries have been performed in the United States since the 1960s male-to-female (MTF) surgeries have predominated, but currently it appears that there are an equal number of female-to-male (FTM) surgeries.²¹ There is also a movement within the transsexual community to not seek sex-reassignment surgeries, but rather to cross dress and otherwise stay physically unaltered. The “non-op” movement is gaining ground but is causing greater confusion within an already confusing patchwork of laws and legal interpretation surrounding transsexual issues.

It is estimated that between one and four percent of all humans express a hermaphroditic (intersex) condition.²² That would mean there are approximately 2.8 to 12 million intersexed persons in the United States, and there is ongoing controversy about conducting corrective surgery on intersexed babies to make them conform to one of the sex norms (either male or female). The surgery often destroys the reproductive system and the capacity to feel sexual pleasure. As such, many in the U.S. intersexed community advocate being accepted for who they are without resorting to surgery.

POLITICS AND LAW

Sodomy

Until recently, homosexuality was illegal throughout most of the United States. The cornerstones of that oppression were sex statutes (sodomy laws) that made sexual contact between persons of the same gender illegal. The sodomy statutes were inconsistent from state to state. In some cases, sodomy was defined as sex between persons of the same sex, whereas other states defined sodomy as sex between anyone other than a spouse. Even the sexual acts to characterize sodomy varied from state to state.

Illinois was the first state to eliminate sex statutes against consensual homosexual acts (in 1961). Eventually, half the states eliminated their sodomy statutes. However, that means that it is still unsafe for LGBT people to engage in sex in the remaining states.

Attempts have been made to challenge sodomy statutes on a national level. In 1986, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to strike down a Georgia law criminalizing sodomy (Bowers v. Hardwick).²³ Almost 20 years later, the U.S. Supreme Court revisited the issue in Lawrence v. Texas. Here, the Court recognized that it had erred in Bowers and struck down the Texas sodomy statute because it was applied unequally by criminalizing homosexual sodomy but not heterosexual sodomy. This leaves sodomy statutes enforceable in states where it is defined to apply equally to heterosexual and homosexual situations.

Although sodomy statutes are rarely enforced, they make LGBT people into criminals in many situations. For example, if a state (such as Utah) defines sodomy as any sex between unmarried partners and gay people are precluded from marrying, then LGBT persons who are in relationships are de facto criminals. This argument has been used in child custody cases to paint the homosexual spouse as criminal and therefore unqualified for parental rights.

Antidiscrimination Statutes

Most major cities and a few states in the United States have enacted antidiscrimination statutes based on sexual orientation. The protections are often limited to public employment only. However, a few are more comprehensive and apply to both private employment and accommodations. As LGBT people gain more protections, a backlash from religious and political conservatives often results. There have been many cases where legislatures have passed antidiscrimination statutes only to be overruled by voters at a later election and then overruled again as the result of court review. This seesawing between opposing forces continues throughout the United States and is reflected in the national debate over gay marriage.

Marriage

There has been a 20-year hysteria in the United States over the prospect of allowing same-sex couples to marry (in what is commonly called “gay marriage”). When it looked as though either Hawaii or Vermont was going to allow gay marriages in the 1990s, religious and political conservatives took massive action to thwart those efforts. Hawaii’s case eventually became moot when its citizens overwhelmingly passed legislation defining marriage as the union of one man with one woman, and that the state did not need to recognize gay marriages performed in other states. These DOMA legislations or constitutional amendments were eventually adopted by many states and the federal government.

Vermont took the course of creating a super domestic partnership in 2000 that conferred all the rights and responsibilities of marriage without using the word “marriage” when it created its civil union statute. Other states have passed domestic partnership legislations similar to Vermont's. Massachusetts was faced with the same legal dilemma in 2004 and chose, instead, to allow same-sex couples to marry, thereby becoming the first state in the union to sanction gay marriages.

The political squabbles over gay marriage continue. Often when state legislatures approve domestic partnership or marriage, a backlash occurs and sometimes DOMA statutes are approved by the voters thereby creating a legal conflict between opposing statutes. These battles over gay marriage will likely continue for years as the issue works its way through each state.

An issue that has not been addressed by any legislature in the gay marriage debate is its effect on transgendered or intersexed people. For example, an intersexed person is biologically neither exclusively male nor female but both. Defining marriage as being between one man and one woman does not apply to intersexed people. Surprisingly, none of the laws that state "man" or "woman" define those terms. Most courts have conflated sex with gender in most instances, thereby further confusing the issue.

Speech and Association

The United States guarantees the right to free speech and association through the First Amendment to its Constitution. Courts have upheld the right to discuss homosexuality (through speech, books, magazines, pamphlets, radio, television, and other means), and form organizations (both privately and publicly) to educate about homosexuality and to promote the agendas in support of LGBT people.

Many religious and political conservatives are concerned about access to material on the Internet they believe is harmful to children. Attempts made by Congress to restrict the Internet (such as the Children's Internet Protection Act of 2002) have subsequently been determined by the courts to be unconstitutional. Legislators seem unable to construct an Internet protection law that clearly defines what community standards, harmful, or offensive means, or to devise regulatory schemes that do not violate equal access requirements. As American Civil Liberties Union director Stefan Presser stated, "The technology cannot block simply obscene speech, or speech that is harmful to minors, without blocking an enormous amount of speech that is constitutionally protected."²⁴

One area that is underdeveloped in the law is the right of LGBT people to be out and open about their sexuality. Some courts, such as the California Supreme Court, have ruled that affirming one's homosexuality is analogous to expressing a political view and, as such, is protected under its state labor codes, but is it not clear what it means to affirm one's homosexuality; for example, whether this includes sharing personal information (including sexual details), whether this applies to both children and adults and whether this applies to the workplace, or school, or other public places. For example, there are cases where teachers have shared the status of their homosexuality with other teachers and experienced no problems but sharing the same information with students will often lead to accusations that the teacher engaged in "unprofessional conduct" because he or she "talked about sex" and "promoted homosexuality" and thus was fired.

A legal strategy used by some antigay religious groups in the United States to circumvent antidiscrimination statutes that include sexual orientation as a protected class is to claim "religious freedom" in their employment choices. Here, they claim they have the right not to hire LGBT applicants or to fire LGBT employees because their religious beliefs require them to do so. Since the U.S. Constitution holds the protection of religious belief in the highest regard, they claim that their right to discriminate supersedes local ordinances protecting gay people from employment discrimination. State and local courts have been mixed on these challenges. In general, courts have affirmed antidiscrimination statutes by clarifying that the employer retains the right to his or her religious beliefs, but that those beliefs cannot interfere with decisions concerning public employment.

Bisexuals

Bisexuals are virtually invisible in U.S. society. When bisexuals form opposite-sex relationships, they are viewed to be heterosexual. When they form same-sex relationships, they are presumed to be homosexual. The ability to form relationships with either sex is confusing to many people. Bisexuals, more than any other group, have a unique awareness of the uneven application of laws in the United States when sex or gender is involved. When bisexuals are involved in an opposite-sex relationship, they receive all the rights and benefits provided heterosexuals; when they are in a same-sex relationship, they are exposed to antigay discrimination and hate.

Transsexuals

Transsexuals pose a unique challenge to the U.S. legal system. When they transition from one gender to another, they defy the binary distinction between male and female. Much of the problem stems from U.S. laws that have never defined what is meant by the terms man, woman, male, female, sex, or gender. The “plain” meaning of the words ignores much of the scientific research. Most laws and regulations in the United States use the word sex, yet many courts, legislators, and administrative agencies think gender when interpreting law. Thus, the terms sex and gender have been conflated and are used interchangeably.

There has been a confusing range of court decisions concerning transsexuals. Some courts have decided that transsexuals have protected status under the Gender-Motivated Violence Act, whereas other courts have ruled that Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 does not apply because transsexual’s “sex” does not conform to being either male or female. This is even more challenging if transsexuals are married before transitioning. Once the transition is complete, the married couple (if remaining married) would now be a same-sex couple, a status that is illegal in 49 states.

Intersexuals

Intersexed people pose even a greater challenge to the U.S. legal system than transsexuals. Intersexuals are born with partially or fully developed genitalia, gonads, or chromosomes that are not distinctly male or female, but instead are some combination of both. This creates a life-long series of problems. From the initial birth certificate to the final death certificate, it is unclear how one indicates on a form that has only two boxes (male/female) someone who does not fit into either box. As such, there is a patchwork of court decisions throughout the United States that either recognizes the unique needs of intersexuals or forces them into one of the boxes. For example, altering the sex indicated on a birth certificate is allowed in some states (by petition, court order, or physician's note) yet forbidden in other states.

A wave of lawsuits were filed in the first decade of the 21st century by intersexed adults in the United States who were surgically altered as children to make them better conform to one sex. Many of these people think they were sexually mutilated without their consent and demand that the practice of surgically altering babies and children stop. They believe that only an adult has the right to elect such drastic surgery. As such, the medical profession has become much more cautious about performing surgery on intersexed infants and children.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Many lesbians and gay men are deeply spiritual and religious, however antigay sentiments found in the teachings of some religions have forced some LGBT people to fight back, seek alternatives, and sometime abandon their faith completely. Through years of effort by openly gay and lesbian activists in the United States, a few mainstream denominations have made tremendous strides in their acceptance of homosexuality. The Episcopal Church (U.S.), Reform Judaism, Unitarian Universalists, and United Churches of Christ have come to embrace their lesbian and gay members. Presbyterians and United Methodists have hundreds of "welcoming and affirming" congregations for LGBT people even while the central body still struggles over the acceptance of homosexuals and homosexuality.

The religious right has spearheaded many of the efforts in the United States to deny equal rights to LGBT people. Led by Christian fundamentalists and huge evangelical organizations, the religious right was initially successful at blocking anti-discrimination legislation and stopping the acceptance of gay marriage. However, they are having less and less an impact on people's opinions about homosexuality, as evidenced by the number of cities and states that have passed antidiscrimination legislation that includes sexual orientation, and by the advances made in domestic partnerships and same-sex marriage.

A major tool used by the religious right to keep their members agitated and to bring in money is reparative therapy. Here, the religious right claims that a person's sexual orientation is chosen and can be changed through therapy (i.e., a homosexual can become an "ex-gay"). The religious right has tied ex-gay ministries to its agenda to deny equal rights to LGBT people.

In what is known as the "first wave" of "ex-gay activism," the first therapy treatment program designed to change sexual orientation was set up in San Francisco in 1973. Fundraising by religious right churches linked the "special rights" arguments with the concept that sexual orientation could be changed. They claimed that, because sexual orientation is chosen, then homosexuals should choose to be heterosexual and be rewarded with all the rights and privileges provided heterosexual marriage. As such, homosexuals would have no basis to advocate for equal rights.

At first, churches were uncomfortable with the open talk about homosexuality and the reparative therapy programs remained few in number. The "second wave" hit the media in 1998 when John and Anne Paulk appeared on the cover of Newsweek magazine proclaiming that they were ex-gay and married, giving proof that homosexuals could "heal" themselves and alter their lifestyle choice.²⁵ Ex-gay ministries sprung up everywhere. This all came crashing down a few years later when John Paulk was caught in a Washington, D.C., gay bar. He was forced to resign from his positions with Exodus International and Focus on the Family. Many other leaders of the ex-gay movement were also found still to be active homosexuals. Because of the scandals, many religious organizations have sought to distance themselves from the ex-gay movement.

A strategy change occurred in 2005 with the ex-gay movement redirecting its reparative therapy program toward children and teens. In this “third wave,” there was less emphasis on “curing” adult homosexuals and more on building fear in parents that their children may become gay or lesbian without direct intervention. Counseling programs such as “Refuge” or Focus on the Family’s “Love Won Out” encouraged parents to commit their children for treatment, even if it was against the desires of the child.

It is expected that reparative therapy programs and ex-gay ministries will continue to operate in the United States for some time to come. Although reparative therapy does not work and violates ethical standards established by the American Psychological Association, it keeps religious and political conservatives agitated enough to donate money to their churches and causes, and to engage in antigay political activism.

VIOLENCE

The United States is considered one of the most violent societies in the world, relative to other developed countries. In 2005, there were 5.6 murders per 100,000 persons.²⁶ By contrast, in the same year, Germany had a homicide rate of only 1.0 and Canada had a rate of 1.9 per 100,000 persons.²⁷ The United States also has the highest incarceration rate and total prison population in the world, with approximately 468 people out of every 100,000 Americans in prisons or jails.²⁸ The incarceration rate has more than tripled since 1980 and far exceeds what is found in member countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) by a factor five or more.²⁹ African American males are incarcerated at a rate six times that of white males and three times that of Hispanic males.³⁰

In 1990, the federal government passed the Hate Crime Statistics Act. After much political debate, it was decided that sexual orientation should be included as one of the characteristics of victims of violence to be tracked. The reported incidents of antigay and antilesbian violence have increased significantly since the early 1990s. It is thought that this increase in violence is related to the increased visibility of gay issues as discussed in the media and politics, and the increased number of LGBT persons who are living their lives openly.

Many states have passed hate crime laws that impose additional sentencing in crimes motivated by bias or prejudice toward particular classes of citizens. Almost two-thirds of the states have hate crime laws that include sexual orientation (some also include gender identity). There are on-going efforts to convince the other states and the federal government to pass hate crime legislation that includes sexual orientation.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The modern gay rights movement parallels the civil rights movement. Gays and lesbians have gained many rights, but not all, and are legally positioned where African Americans were before Brown vs. Board of Education. Marriage is a prime example of this problem; only in Massachusetts may same-sex couples marry, but because the marriages are not recognized by most other states or the federal government, same-sex marriages are not equal to opposite-sex marriages. In states with domestic partnerships or civil unions, the legislatures have attempted to craft unions that enjoy all the rights and responsibilities of marriage but do not use the word “marriage.” Here, the inequalities are even greater. Creating unions without making them equal to marriage is an attempt to create a separate-but-equal legal status. It does not work, as was seen with blacks under segregation. Gays and lesbians are fighting to overcome their separate-but-equal status.

It is expected that, in the future, courts will rule that any attempt to define legal rights for LGBT people that are the “same” as those enjoyed by heterosexuals but without giving the exact same rights is inherently unequal. Eventually LGBT people will become fully integrated into society and have full rights equal to those of other Americans.

Antigay Videos

- The Gay Agenda*, DVD, produced by Bill Horn (1990; Lancaster, CA: Springs of Life Ministries, 1990). One of the most famous antigay videos ever made, this film weaves together controversial clips from gay pride parades showing simulated sex, testimony from expert witnesses on the deviancy of homosexuality, and sadomasochistic behaviors. Bill Horn claims to have sold more than 60,000 copies by 1993 and arranged to have a screening for the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The religious right used it to effectively influence members of Congress and state legislators in stopping President Clinton from lifting the band on homosexuality in the military. Currently, The Gay Agenda seems impossible to locate but it is available for viewing at some libraries. Also available at the Stonewall Center, 256 Sunset Ave., Crampton House/SW, Amherst, MA 01003-9324, 413-545-4824, 413-545-6667. www.umass.edu/stonewall/library/videos/tvcoverage.html and at the ONE Institute and Archives, 909 W. URUGUAY

Diego Sempol, Translated by Álvaro Queiruga

OVERVIEW

Uruguay is a small country located between Brazil and Argentina, with an area of 8,037 square miles and a population of 3,509,373.¹ Uruguay is a former Spanish colony that gained its independence in 1830. Most of its population descends from Spanish, Italian, and other European immigrants, although a sector has Indo-American descent. Native cultures were exterminated during the first years of independence. It is also estimated that Afro-Americans amount to 8 percent of the population. To this day, this sector has preserved its distinctive cultural features.²

In the early 20th century, President José Batlle y Ordóñez (1903–1907, 1911–1915) set the foundations for the modern state, promoted a deeply integrated social system, completed the state's secularization process, encouraged the development of a strong and educated middle class, passed major social laws for the lower class sectors, and recognized women's right to divorce by their sole will (1907 and 1913). In 1932, women's right to vote was legally recognized, and between 1933 and 1935 abortion was legalized, although it was criminalized afterward due to pressures from conservative Catholic sectors.

This progress of social legislation added to the state's expansion and the strengthening of public services, and it consolidated a welfare state that made Uruguay stand out in Latin America, enabling it to develop its image as the "Switzerland of South America." But social and economic prosperity eroded in the late 1950s when a new crisis began for the international economic insertion of Uruguay's model, based on agricultural exports.

In the early 1960s, the solid democratic system began feeling the pressure of powerful social unrest due to the recent economic crisis, the emergence of guerrilla groups, and growing government authoritarianism. The process ended on June 27, 1973, with a coup d'état that led to 13 years of harsh military dictatorship. Human rights were systematically violated during this period, with imprisonment, tortures, forced disappearances, and kidnappings for political reasons, as well as serious economic crimes and the censorship of mass media. The failure in 1980 of a referendum that sought to introduce a constitutional reform enabling the armed forces to remain in power marked the beginning of a democratic transition period, and led to the election of President Julio María Sanguinetti in March 1985.

Throughout its history, Uruguay developed a model of agricultural exports based on latifundios (large landholdings) and extensive crops (exporting beef, leather, and, most recently, rice, soybeans, and cellulose), which coexisted in various historical periods with a fragile industrialization process aimed mostly at meeting domestic demand.

Currently, the country is beginning a forestry process (in 2005, 8.6% of all available lands) and the installation of several cellulose paste plants owned by international firms.³ In 2004, Uruguay had imports worth $3.7 billion and exports totaling $4 billion, with a strong foreign debt ($12.4 billion).⁴

Although Uruguay has a strong secular tradition—religion is not taught in the public schools and religious symbols are banned from display in state hospitals and agencies; 66 percent of Uruguayans consider themselves Catholic, 2 percent are Jewish, and 2 percent are Protestant while 30 percent are atheists. This does not stop a large sector of the population from taking part in ceremonies and celebrations involving Afro-Brazilian rites.⁵

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Beginning in 2000, the LGBT agenda in Uruguay took on an important role and has occupied a significant part of the public debate. The gradual strengthening of Uruguayan LGBT organizations, their growing membership, and influence among political parties has led to major legal transformations that have guaranteed the respect of the LGBT community's human rights.

In late 2007, Uruguay became the first country in Latin America to pass a law granting homosexual couples the same rights as heterosexual couples, except for adoption. This process led to an important debate within the ruling Frente Amplio (Broad Front)⁶ party about the need to reinterpret the most classic notions of human rights and to consider the centrality of class struggle in social transformation processes.

EDUCATION

Uruguay has a public, secular, and free education system at the primary, secondary, and higher education levels. This system coexists with a private, three-tiered education system that does not receive government subsidies of any sort and is mostly denominational. The first nine years of the education cycle are compulsory. These systems have brought basic education to Uruguayans: 98 percent of the population is literate and 30 percent have attended university.⁷

In Uruguay there are no measures or programs aimed at preventing bullying or discrimination in schools due to sexual orientation, gender identity, or ethnic origin.

The implementation of sex education in the classrooms has long been discussed in the education system. Between 1990 and 1995, and in 2000, there were two attempts to implement such programs, but these were blocked mostly by pressures from Catholic groups opposed to the notions of homosexuality as normal and that of recreational sexuality.

In November 1990, the National Public Education Administration (ANEP) launched the National Sexuality Education Program. The initiative came from the teachers themselves, and at first the program started training them and forming work teams in the system's various levels. However, in 1995, when almost 7,000 teachers had been trained, the education authorities abruptly decided to cancel the program. Officially it was argued there had been disagreements among Central Directive Council (ANEP's top board) members, especially from its vice-president José Claudio Williman, about the program's general features and the contents of the materials sent out to teachers. The most controversial book, said Williman, showed "a marked inclination towards showing sexual behavior differences as a mere cultural phenomenon, disregarding other values that heterosexual behavior can include, and logically includes."⁸ Neither the National Party,⁹ whose government launched the experience, nor the Colorado Party,¹⁰ which was in power at the time, nor the left defended the plan.

Five years later, a ninth grade biology book titled "¡Escucha, aprende, vive!" (Listen! Learn! Live!)¹¹ led to strong media controversy. The text had been jointly published by the Ministry of Public Health (MSP), ANEP, and the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS), seeking to prevent HIV/AIDS infections, other sexually transmitted diseases, and teenage pregnancy. The book, among other things, said that "There are different ways of achieving sexual satisfaction and pleasure, whether in a transitory or permanent fashion. Achievement can be reached with your own body (self-eroticism, masturbation) or with other people.... These people can be from the opposite sex (heterosexuality) or from your own sex (homosexuality)."¹²

Uruguay's Conference of Bishops complained that ANEP was violating secularism by circulating a book that was not "philosophically neutral"¹³ and recommended that Catholic schools not use it. Halfway through that year, ANEP decided to discontinue distributing the book to students.

When the Frente Amplio party won the elections in 2004 and changed the education authorities, a new discussion process began in education through the creation of a specialized commission. Finally, ANEP authorities decided (after carrying out training workshops for teachers in 2007) that sex education would be taught starting in 2007 at all public education levels, but its contents were not wholly defined, and although the different LGBT organizations had demanded the inclusion of sexual diversity, the commission in charge of designing the contents and work methodology still has not officially decided on the matter.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Uruguay has an emerging capitalist economy. Some 40.2 percent of the population is economically active, with a 17 percent unemployment rate (as of 2004). Most women and men who work do so in the service sector (85% and 62%, respectively).¹⁴ Foreign debt payments amount to 34.9 percent of exports (in 2004) and the GDP per capita in 2004 was $9,421.¹⁵

Although there are social laws and wage councils, the informal workforce is significant. No specific labor laws protect the rights of the LGBT community. The transgender community is the most affected by labor discrimination and its members are often forced to work in the sex industry in order to survive.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Uruguay has no government programs targeting the LGBT population. There are HIV/AIDS programs targeting the population in general and the LGBT community in particular.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

In Uruguay, HIV/AIDS campaigns only started to gain political weight in the public realm by the end of the 1990s. Although at first the recommendation to use condoms was not explicitly included, gradually Health Ministry authorities started to introduce the issue. Therefore, raising awareness about safe sex is relatively recent and was mainly advocated by local NGOs working specifically in the prevention area.

FAMILY

Divorce was legalized in 1907, but while only one couple was divorced that year, another 6,400 were married. In 1969, there were 23,000 marriages and some 2,000 divorces. By 2004, almost a century after the first divorce was granted, the situation had changed dramatically: that year there were 13,123 marriages and 14,300 divorces.¹⁶

Although legislation and civil law continue to include rhetoric about the nuclear family (father, mother, and children), the social reality has undergone major transformations, so much so that civil matrimony as a social institution is in clear crisis. The percentage of couples choosing to live in domestic partnership has tripled in less than 20 years, from 10 percent in 1987 to 30 percent in 2004.¹⁷ There has also been significant growth in cohabitation rates among young people: in 1991, 22.2 percent of couples between 20 and 24 years old were living in domestic partnerships, a figure that rose to 64 percent in 2004. In the 25 to 29 age group, half were in domestic partnerships in 2004.¹⁸

Uruguay was the first country in Latin America to pass nationwide legislation allowing for the union of homosexual couples. The bill that regulates the domestic partnership of heterosexual and homosexual couples was passed by Parliament on December 18, 2007, with the votes of the Frente Amplio and part of the Colorado Party. Almost all of the National Party legislators opposed the bill in both chambers, in support of more traditional notions of the family. Similar regional examples have been much more limited: Argentina has legislated civil unions for the autonomous city of Buenos Aires and the province of Rio Negro, while Mexico has done so only for its federal capital.

The legal vacuum regarding domestic partnerships meant that, up to now, common law marriages in Uruguay left couples, once the union ended due to separation or death, without obligations or rights regarding inheritance, social security, and children. This is why the decision on these matters depended on the discretion of judges and their ethical and ideological convictions. In the best of cases, judges resorted to similar technicalities in order to address the legal vacuum.

The law applies to those couples who have cohabitated for five years without interruption, and consider “domestic partnership the de facto situation derived from the living community of two people—whatever their sex, identity, sexual orientation, or choice—who have an affectionate relationship of the sexual order, being exclusive, singular, stable and permanent, without having been joined in matrimony to each other.”¹⁹ The partners must give each other assistance, and, if their union is dissolved, there is the possibility of claiming alimony from the former partner if such a need arises. The recognition of a union may be sought by the two members or by one of them. A third party may also do so once legal inheritance proceedings have begun for one or both members of the couple. The recognition of the union thus initiates an estate partnership that has the same rights as the joint ownership of property by husband and wife, and that automatically dissolves any previous union or matrimony had by the couple. The dissolution of these unions is carried out by judicial sentence at the request of any of the partners, upon death, or statement of absence. Also, the sentence has to settle on the custody and support of the union’s children and defines who will remain in the family home. In case of death, the surviving partner will enjoy the succession rights the civil code applies to spouses. The law also grants the union all social security benefits, as well as the possibility of receiving pensions in case of death of one member of the couple. The law does not legislate on adoption, a major issue that is still pending. This has been criticized by the organizations advocating for the rights of sexual diversity. Currently in Uruguay, only heterosexual couples can adopt children, although a single person can also do so through legal proceedings called “simple adoption.”

COMMUNITY

The first LGBT group in Uruguay, Escorpio, was formed in September 1984 and had significant activity during the transition toward democracy. Since then, many organizations have been formed, but very few have endured for very long. Also, during the 1990s, in the context of a general crisis in the participation in social movements, the LGBT movement had a drop in membership, although several groups managed to continue working, such as Grupo Diversidad, Encuentro Ecueménico para las Minorías Sexuales, Hermanas de la Perpetua Indulgencia, and La Brújula Queer.

Resurgence only started in 2004, with the appearance of organizations such as the Colectivo Ovejas Negras (Black Sheep Collective), with a nonhierarchical working structure and links to other social movements and political parties. However, a lack of government and private funding has prevented the creation of a community center open to the LGBT population.

Gay pride marches began on June 28, 1992, and since then have continued yearly without interruption, but with low attendance and scarce media impact. However, starting in 2005, sexual diversity marches managed to grow significantly, and every year since then the number of attendees has doubled. Nowadays it is a central event in the year's schedule and receives vast media coverage.

HEALTH

The public health system is state-run and free, and coexists with a private health system. Beginning in 2008, reforms were implemented seeking to improve the quality of public assistance and make the private system economically sustainable.

The first case of HIV/AIDS in Uruguay was diagnosed on July 29, 1983. Since then, 10,084 cases of HIV/AIDS have been reported.²⁰ Nonetheless, HIV/AIDS prevention campaigns had to wait almost a decade before airing on television. The first commercials, in 1990, were excessively vague until a 1991 campaign showed a condom for the first time. Health minister Carlos Delpiazzo banned three commercials funded by the World Health Organization in July 1991, on the grounds that they did not adapt to Uruguay's "idiosyncrasies." The link between Delpiazzo and the strict Roman Catholic group Opus Dei was widely noted in the media at the time.²¹ The measure led to the resignation of the national health director, Eduardo Lasalvia, and the sub-director, Laura Albertini, and a Parliamentary discussion that severely questioned the Minister. Since then, HIV/AIDS prevention campaigns have been scarce and generic, rarely targeting specific groups such as Afro-Uruguayans, women, gay men, or lesbians.

The HIV/AIDS Psychological-Social Impact Commission of the Medical Union of Uruguay was formed in 1992, with members from trade unions and human rights organizations such as PIT CNT (Plenario Intersindical de Trabajadores—Convención Nacional de Trabajadores), ASEPO (Asociación de Ayuda al Seropositivo), SERPAJ (Servicio de Paz y Justicia), and IELSUR (Instituto de Estudios Legales y Sociales del Uruguay). The commission has registered a large number of labor discrimination complaints on behalf of people living with HIV/AIDS.

According to a 2007 report by the Public Health Ministry, in that year Uruguay had 4,661 cases of HIV/AIDS.²² HIV/AIDS was transmitted sexually in 66.3 percent of the cases, and these occurred mostly in heterosexuals (70.1%) and men (65.2%), and although it affected all age groups, those between ages of 15 and 44 were the most likely to contract the disease. At first, there were nine infected men for every infected woman; today that ratio has fallen to two to one, which indicates a growing female presence in the affected population. Also, Uruguay—like other countries such as Bolivia—has a significant number of infected men who have sex with men (13.1%) and bisexuals (12.1%).

Access to drugs for HIV/AIDS is universal and free, but organizations such as ASEPO have complained repeatedly about the quality of the generic drugs acquired by the government for public health system patients and about the lack of health coverage and drugs for people serving time in jail.

University hospital surgeon Manuel Quintela offers free sex reassignment operations for the transsexual population, but the selection and evaluation process takes up to five years. So far, Quintela's hospital has carried out 10 such operations. The Supreme Court of Justice authorized—after a lengthy legal process in May 1997—the first legal name change (consisting in an addendum on the birth certificate) for one person who underwent a sex change operation, but since judicial sentences do not set precedents in Uruguay, each new case has to follow the same proceedings without any guarantee of success.

POLITICS AND LAW

Sodomy was decriminalized in Uruguay when a new penal code was passed in 1934. Since then, neither homosexuality nor cross-dressing has been considered an offense, although throughout Uruguay's history the police have systematically repressed and illegally detained the LGBT population.

On July 9, 2003, the Uruguayan parliament passed an amendment to Section 149 of the penal code regulating incitement to hate: "Whoever publicly or through any means available for their public dissemination incite to hate, contempt, or any other form of moral or physical violence against one or more people because of their skin color, race, religion, national or ethnic origin, sexual orientation, or sexual identity, shall be punished with three to eighteen months in prison."²³ Section 149 was also modified to include moral or physical acts of violence for the same causes with a punishment of six to 24 months in prison.

On August 18, 2004, Parliament passed—with the support of all political parties—Act 17.817, titled "Fighting against racism, xenophobia, and discrimination." The act states that confronting any kind of discrimination is of national interest and defines this situation as "any distinction, exclusion, restriction, preference, or exercise of physical or moral violence, based on reasons of race, skin color, religion, national or ethnic origin, handicap, aesthetic aspect, gender, sexual orientation, and identity, whose object or result it is to cancel or harm the recognition, enjoyment, or exercise, under equal conditions, of human rights and fundamental liberties in the political, economic, social, and cultural spheres, or in any other sphere of public life."²⁴ The law also created the Honorary Commission against Racism, Xenophobia and Any Other Type of Discrimination, which was established in early 2007. Its goal is to receive discrimination reports and answer questions, promote public policies in this area, assess the judicial system, and develop awareness and education activities.

Speech and Association

Uruguay respects freedom of speech and association. Most of the existing LGBT organizations have legal capacity and have their own electronic communications media.

Bisexuals

The bisexual population has remained largely invisible in the LGBT movement. Its scarce political awareness and involvement do not favor change in the short term.

The Transgendered Population

The transgender population systematically suffers from police repression; most are thrown out of their homes at an early age, and few have finished the formal education cycle. The transgender population was organized in 1990, and in 1994 formed the Asociación de Travestis del Uruguay, a group that seeks to improve their social and health conditions.

At present, Parliament is discussing a bill that would stipulate a sex change registry (whether the person has undergone a sex reassignment operation or not), to facilitate this population's integration in the employment market.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

In Uruguay, the Encuentro Ecuménico para las Minorías Sexuales developed a space for religious celebration and reflection, and eventually led to the formation of a Christian Deaconry in Diversity in the Metropolitan Community Church. The Anglican Church has always shown consideration for LGBT issues and has aided the creation of the Deaconry.

Meanwhile, the Catholic Church has historically maintained its condemnation of the LGBT community and has systematically opposed all legal progress. In 2003, the Archbishop of Montevideo, Nicolás Cotugno, publicly stated that homosexuality is a "contagious disease," is "aberrant," and that gays should be isolated from the rest of society.²⁵

VIOLENCE

There are no official data on cases of violence based on sexual orientation or gender identity. However, the first Gay Pride Survey of 2005²⁶ determined that 67 percent of those surveyed had suffered some form of discrimination: 19 percent were the victims of direct aggression (5% suffered physical aggression, 3% suffered sexual aggression, 6% were blackmailed, and 5% were mugged during a sexual encounter in public places). Also, 48 percent reported having been threatened or verbally insulted at least once due to their sexual orientation or identity in open public spaces, within the education system, or in the workplace.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Legal victories for LGBT people achieved in recent years are important but not enough. Currently, the LGBT movement is considering advocating for marriage for same-sex couples (explicitly including adoption) and enhancing its social legitimacy through a mainstreaming of its agenda in all social policies. The health and social situation of the transgender population continues to be very harsh. They are the LGBT community's most vulnerable group.

VENEZUELA

Larry Villegas-Perez

OVERVIEW

The Republic Bolivarian of Venezuela is located in northern South America bordering Colombia and Brazil. It is a country full of natural beauty and a history of freedom, conquest, and liberation that includes constant fights to maintain freedom of speech and other basic human rights. Venezuela was found by Christopher Columbus on his third voyage to the New World in 1498. He named it the “Land of Grace.” Venezuela means “little Venice,” because of the homes he saw on the water on the west coast. Some travelers stayed and others went back to deliver the good news to the Old World. At first they thought they had arrived in India, but later on they realized these were new and unexplored lands. The main objectives of the Spanish conquest, which lasted until the mid-18th century, were to find new resources and to evangelize the indigenous Venezuelan population.

Cocoa became the main Venezuelan product in the 1600s and remained so for the next two centuries. Newer forms of production needed more laborers, so slaves were brought in from African countries to work on cocoa, sugar, cotton, coffee, and tobacco farming. They also brought their traditions, myths, songs, and rhythms to become an ingredient in the Venezuelan culture.

The independence of the United States and the French Revolution provided an opportunity for the Venezuelan liberation movement. Francisco de Miranda led the most significant preindependence movement, which did not motivate enough Venezuelans at that time, but became the first step to promote independence from Spain. For more than three centuries, Spain ruled in Venezuela. The Venezuelan population remained small, and many indigenous peoples were abused by the newcomers and died after contracting new diseases. The economy was based mainly on a few agricultural crops, extensive cattle raising, and a relatively small share of colonial trade; minerals were discovered much later.

Venezuela was one of the first provinces in the New World to declare independence in 1810. Napoleon's invasion of Spain and later Ferdinand VII's subsequent abdication precipitated the independence movement. In 1811 Venezuela adopted a republican constitution. However, it was not until 1821, under the leadership of Simón Bolívar, a blanco criollo (white Creole) Venezuelan born of Spanish parents, that full independence was achieved following the struggle of the War of Independence. Bolívar also liberated Bolivia, Colombia, Peru, and Ecuador from Spanish rule.

The ideas of liberation and equal rights in other new countries like the United States and France and even institutions like the Catholic Church have helped Venezuelan women and other groups to gain more participation in social and political events. LGBT rights have been included among other civil rights and liberties, but never as a unique right for LGBT persons.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Although there is not a wealth of documentation on how the LGBT movement was established in Venezuela, it gained visibility after HIV/AIDS cases were found among Venezuelans. The project to revise the new Bolivarian constitution included protection of rights such as sexual orientation, but the influence of religious and so-called Christian organizations made it impossible to achieve. Because Venezuela, like many Latin American countries, has a very strong religious influence from the Catholic Church and other Christian groups, it has been a challenge for many LGBT Venezuelans to live a life free of violence or gay bashing. They are perceived as living a corrupted and sinful life. There are no laws against discrimination based on sexual orientation and, as a consequence, many LGBT individuals live a double life or stay in the closet.

In the mid-1980s, when the first cases of an unknown disease appeared in hospitals and private clinics, the so-called homosexual cancer became identified as having come from the United States. As a consequence, fear and stigma invaded hospital settings first and then society as a whole. People received treatment for symptoms, but there was nothing else doctors could do because there was no cure. The main concern at that time was that everybody would know who was gay if he or she developed AIDS.

Contrary to statistics in the United States, in Venezuela, HIV/AIDS cases are almost equally distributed between the heterosexual and homosexual populations.¹ According to UNAIDS (a program of the United Nations), Venezuela has one of the largest HIV/AIDS epidemics in Latin America, and the disease is continuing to spread. In the 1980s many males studying or living in the United States came back with HIV/AIDS to die with their families. However, in the last 10 years, the disease has been infecting the lower-income populations—many of whom come from the barrios or other impoverished areas. In 2003, women represented only about 5% of reported HIV/AIDS cases and now they make up about 20 percent to 25 percent.²

EDUCATION

Although HIV/AIDS prevention and education has not become a national priority, the government has implemented public health programs to provide sex education to students and the general population. Some programs and hospitals also provide medications (known as the “cocktail”) to treat HIV/AIDS. However, like in the United States, using the cocktail has given the impression that HIV/AIDS has become like any other disease and is now manageable and under control. The media has not helped much, at least in Venezuela, to eliminate such belief or to explain the side effects of all these drugs. Some people living with HIV/AIDS may not even access those services because of the fear of stigma and gossip. Although there are programs and institutions that promote sex education and responsibility, such education does not reach smaller towns and sometimes programs teach abstinence only as an option.

Since HIV/AIDS arrived to Venezuela, Congress Budget Office (CBO), called Organizaciones No Gubernamentales (ONGs), emerged to provide a helping hand. Some were more organized than others but they all had the same objective: to educate Venezuelans about the spread of HIV, AIDS and its treatment, and safer sex practices. Soon, teaching about HIV/AIDS became a part of the curriculum in many fields and careers; however, eliminating stigma and discrimination was not always addressed. Organizations such as Amigos de la Vida, AID for AIDS, and Acción Solidaria among others provide access to education, medicines, testing, counseling, and referral services and provide a safe network for people living with HIV/AIDS. Within Venezuela, Lambda is the only openly gay organization that promotes pride, sex education, and antihomophobia campaigns. It also organizes the Gay Pride Parade in Caracas and publishes a magazine A&V (Artists for Life) addressing health and diversity issues. The magazine has just celebrated its 16th anniversary.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Venezuela does not have specific antidiscriminatory laws based on sexual orientation; however, its constitution provides protection for the life, physical integrity, privacy and confidentiality, and freedom of its individuals and establishes penalties for discriminatory messages and violations of personal rights.

Venezuela is the second largest provider of oil to the United States. As a consequence, the economic relations between the two countries and with other developed countries are prosperous. The income for a minimum waged employee is approximately US$375 per month and includes free coverage for health care. Because the government has implemented social programs to provide free medications for people living with HIV/AIDS, it is possible to provide medications for more individuals. Those programs exist because of the lobbying of many organizations and thousands of individuals who work everyday for those health benefits.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Most of the funding and programs are related to raising awareness on HIV/AIDS education, counseling and testing, and prevention. It is unknown whether there are any funded programs that are specific for LGBT persons.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

The media tends to reinforce the stereotypes about gay, lesbian, or transgender appearance and behavior. For example, on TV shows and soap operas, a homosexual is shown as a flamboyant, negative, obviously feminine character. This perpetrates stigma on homosexuals as laughable and repulsive individuals, enforcing the belief that feminine traits or characteristics are a sign of weakness. These misrepresentations keep many LGBT persons in the closet and force them to search for love, personal encounters, and intimacy on the Internet and at bath houses, public restrooms, parks, and malls. More conservative LGBT people prefer personal gatherings at homes, movie theaters, or cultural events. There is a large group of younger people who are more assertive about their sexual orientation and who frequently visit bars and clubs until the sun rises. This is one of the reasons why Caracas, for example, is known as the city that never sleeps; parties last all night long.

Anecdotally, it is known that many heterosexuals engage in homosexual behaviors with men and women, and that many are considered bisexuals before they come out of the closet. Many female impersonators as well as transgender persons exchange sex for money and, in many cases, heterosexual men will hire them with the fantasy of being with a female, while they are actually being penetrated. Others who engage in homosexual activities without being fully aware of their actions (known as “the down low”) will not consider using safer sex methods because, in their minds, it is not happening anyway. Like in many other countries, the influence of machismo plays a role during sex where the person penetrated is the homosexual, not the person penetrating; this belief makes it easier for bisexuals to have a girlfriend and a boyfriend, without admitting to themselves that they have homosexual desires. Venezuelans are in general very affectionate and attentive, which makes it easier for foreigners who visit Venezuela to find themselves right at home and even meet others LGBT individuals.

Community-based programs promote activities where sex education is discussed openly and people share their experiences; education includes substance abuse, stress management, and street safety. An example of this is the antihomophobic campaign implemented by Lambda, articles published in the A&V magazine, or the plays in theaters that try to educate people and raise awareness on the importance of diversity and living a fear-free life.

FAMILY

Venezuelan families have all kinds of backgrounds and ethnicities; from the native Venezuelans to the immigrant Spaniards, Portuguese, Italians, Colombians, and Lebanese, among others. Each has their own definition of family and how to conduct family affairs. However, they all have something in common—most parents will do all they can to provide food, shelter, and support for their children as long as they can. Families with mid- to high incomes often pay for private education and support their children until they graduate and start working in the family business. Other families with lower incomes or living under poverty levels will probably have teenagers who start working while in high school and who may not even finish or graduate because they have to work. LGBT individuals with all these different backgrounds gather at the same bars and clubs, and, although race may not be the issue, social class may be taken into consideration in dating settings.

Some more open families will accept the same-sex boyfriend or girlfriend at home because the family members have learned to be more open about it. In cases where the son or daughter, after a certain age, does not marry or have children, the family will then adopt the don't ask, don't tell policy.

COMMUNITY

There are many LGBT individuals in Venezuela, with many of them living in Caracas or other big cities. They are seen at night in clubs, bars, and coffee houses, or during film festivals and gay pride activities. The saying, "there is power in numbers," is very true in this case because there are areas in Caracas known to be predominately gay. Everybody knows where Sabana Grande, El Recreo, Altamira, and Las Mercedes are because of all the coffee houses, stores, bars, and clubs targeting gays and lesbians. However, there is not an actual LGBT political community as perceived in other countries because so many people are in the closet. The organizations previously mentioned and university programs promote equality, social justice, and community gatherings to decrease even further stigma, misconceptions, self-hate, and internal homophobia. Most of the programs that unite members of the LGBT community are geared toward arts and community service that includes helping people living with HIV/AIDS. Usually people talk about gays and lesbians as the only individuals in this community. Bisexuals are rarely mentioned because they probably do not participate openly in LGBT social events, and transgender individuals are still highly stigmatized and have the highest numbers of victims of hate crimes—the victims of which are commonly ridiculed, with the crimes themselves going unpunished.³

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Because Venezuela is a Christian country including many Protestant groups, homosexuality is perceived as a sin and, as a consequence, punishable by God. Many LGBT individuals belong to churches and are looking for inner peace, and some individuals undergo pastoral counseling for years to change to heterosexuality with no results. Many of these individuals also live double lives: the one at church on Saturdays or Sundays, and another one at sunset or online. Their suffering and struggle for acceptance and intimacy creates for them and, also for all others who live in the closet, a high level of stress, mostly related to worries that family members may find out who they really are.

VIOLENCE

Although cities like Caracas may be perceived as dangerous at night, there are other areas where LGBT individual feel safer to gather and celebrate who they are.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Many younger Venezuelans are out of the closet in the bigger cities. Venezuela's natural beauty and its people attract LGBT individuals as a Caribbean paradise: such is the case of Margarita Island in the east coast.

Organizations and individuals are working together lobbying in favor of equal rights and health coverage related to HIV/AIDS.

There is a perceived helping hand within the government that supports gay rights, and allows gatherings, businesses, and activities; however, it does not support LGBT individuals openly. Among LGBT individuals there is the perception that there is an LGBT revolution within the new social-oriented Venezuelan government, and they are gaining respect, participation, and opportunities.

ASIA AND OCEANIA

INTRODUCTION

ASIA AND OCEANIA

The life experiences of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered people in Asia and Oceania are as varied as the religious and political systems found there. Thailand is one of the least homophobic cultures on the planet; this is the result of thousands of years adherence to Buddhism and little influence from outside colonizing forces. In contrast, the Muslim-dominated countries of Bangladesh, Indonesia, and Malaysia are dangerous for LGBT people because of heteronormative and antigay religious beliefs that often influence government policy. Australia and New Zealand are similar to other Western democracies. They are slowly overcoming antigay British cultural sentiments and struggling with the implementation of anti-discrimination statutes concerning employment and housing and also working to create domestic partnerships for LGBT couples. Their gay communities host many organizations and large events, such as Mardi Gras. China, Vietnam, and a few other countries have communist governments that have veered from their Buddhist origins to be less accepting of LGBT people. India, a Hindu-dominated culture, is still bridled with a legal system installed by British colonialists that punishes sodomy and marginalizes all who do not conform to heterosexual norms.

To better understand the sociopolitical status of LGBT culture, it is best to analyze the religious origins within each region; doing so will allow for a greater understanding of the current political situation in each country. Unlike Africa and the Americas, many of the countries of Asia and Oceania have thousands of years of recorded histories from which to glean information on family structure and how nonheterosexual behaviors and relationships were incorporated into the society.

Buddhism is thought to have begun approximately in the fifth century B.C.E. in the northeastern region of India. Over the centuries, many different forms of Buddhism evolved through three main branches—Theravada, Mahayana, and Vajrayana—and spread throughout much of Asia. There are three elements of Buddhism that impact how LGBT persons are perceived and treated. First, the important guiding practice of Buddhism, known as the Middle Way. This is the practice of nonextremism. A life of moderation is one where self-indulgence and self-mortification are kept to a minimum. Second, Buddhism promotes personal happiness and is sex-positive (i.e., sex is viewed as a positive experience). In many Buddhist cultures, sex is openly displayed and presented as a pleasurable activity.

For example, many people wear Buddhist amulets in the shape of penises and a carved wooden penis often adorns the front of a house to provide spiritual protection. In smaller villages located in northeastern Thailand, the Isan culture often engages in public flaunting of sex as part of parades and folk music performances. Third, Buddhism makes no value differentiation between heterosexual or homosexual sexual behaviors. What is important is that sex does not become self-indulgent. Sex is to be pleasurable, practiced in moderation, and the gender of the partner is immaterial.

Does this mean that LGBT persons are viewed as equals to heterosexuals in Buddhist societies? Actually, this question makes no sense in these societies. Buddhists do not have identities related to their sexuality. Sex is something pleasurable to engage in, not an activity used to shape an identity. Instead, personal identity primarily revolves around the family. People are expected to be deeply involved with their families. This is in contrast to how families have evolved in modern Western societies. Wealth has allowed Westerners to live independently and not to worry about illness or old age impacting their survival. This is not true for most of the world's population or throughout history, instead, family provided the seat of security. Without wealth or the state financial support of education, health care, childcare, or old age pensions, it was the family that provided these support services. Children were viewed as sources of security for parents and grandparents against the infirmities associated with old age or injuries leading to disability. Thus, the ultimate goal for any young adult was to work to support the family, marry so as to delineate property ownership, have children to establish the next generation of workers, and provide for the needs of grandparents. Nowhere in this family defining formula is sexuality proscribed. Restricting who has sex with whom is not necessary, as long as marriages are consummated and children are produced.

The histories of Asia are replete with stories and legends of people who marry and produce children but who also have a same-sex love interest. For example, the ancient work Han Fei Zi tells of the love Duke Ling of Wei (534–493 B.C.E.) had for Mizi Xia. While strolling through a garden, they both picked a peach from a tree. Mizi noticed his was sweeter than the Duke's and offered him his half-eaten peach. The Duke was duly impressed. The term for "half-eaten peach" became a word denoting homosexual love. Hundreds of years later, a similar Chinese story reinforced the same idea. The word for homosexual, Tuan Hsiu (passion of the cut sleeve) in ancient China, comes from the tradition of Emperor Ai of Han (27 B.C.E.) who cut off the sleeve of his shirt rather than disturb his lover, Dong Xian, who slept with his head on top of it.

There is also wide acceptance of transgendered people within Buddhist societies. Although gender roles have been strictly defined through cultural mechanisms, a person could transgress and adopt the dress and manners of the opposite sex. In many early cultures, transgendered individuals were often seen as shamans possessing deep spiritual power. As such, they were sought for important events, and served as teachers of the young and as counselors. Even today, throughout many of the smaller villages in of Asia, young men who view themselves more as women than men may join the community of "lady boys" by dressing and acting as women. They often serve as entertainment at community events and marriages. They may or may not seek sexual reassignment surgery. Clearly, many Buddhist communities accept transgendered people as a natural element of their society.

The impact of Buddhism on cultural norms is still evident throughout much of Asia. In general, the more Buddhist a society, the more accepting it is of same-sex sexual behaviors and relationships. This has been modulated through colonialization and war with foreign countries. Early European explorers and missionaries arriving in Asia were shocked by the same-sex behaviors they found. They believed the “heathens” needed religious conversion to Christianity. The encroachment of European powers (the British Empire in particular) into Asia resulted in codification of antisodomy statutes in many countries. These laws were aimed particularly at homosexual behaviors.

Currently, there is a great deal diversity of beliefs in the Buddhist community with regards to homosexuality. Many of the changes have been attributed to the influence of Western religious beliefs and political actions. Tibetan Buddhism, Theravada Buddhism, and Chinese Buddhism have changed to officially become antigay in contrast with Japanese Buddhism, which advocates homosexuality over heterosexuality for its priests. Thailand serves a prime example of this antigay shift. Before AIDS, Thai Buddhism was very gay accepting, and many priests were open about their same-sex sexual attractions and friendships. The stigma of AIDS and its association with homosexual behaviors shifted the perception of Thais regarding gays so much that the supreme governing body in Thailand (the sangha) affirmed that gay priests could not be ordained. Within the last 10 years, thousands of gay priests in Thailand have been ousted.

The other major religion found in Asia is Hinduism. By some accounts, Hinduism has the world’s oldest religious traditions, which emerged from northern India during the Iron Age (second and first millennia B.C.E.). Mostly an oral tradition derived from many different locations, Hindu scriptures were slowly written down by many different authors over many centuries. These authors are considered to be prophets, not gods. Most Hindus regard these writings as guides to everyday life and do not interpret them literally. The Hindu concept of God is complex and has been influenced by particular traditions. Hindus of the Vaishnavism sect believe Vishnu is God (also called Krishna or svayam bhagavan). In another sect, God is organized between three Gods—Vishnu (the preserver), Shiva (the destroyer), and Brahma (the creator). Other sects of Hindus believe in monotheism, polytheism, pantheism, pantheism, and atheism.

Transgenderism or androgyny has a long history within Hinduism. Many deities are presented as being half male and half female. This reinforces the Hindu belief that the entire cosmos is balanced between male and female elements. Shiva, for example, is usually portrayed with half its body being male and the other half female. Many legends tell of deities changing gender and becoming involved with someone of the same gender. The oldest scriptures, the Rig-Veda (1500–1200 B.C.E.), make no mention of homosexuality. It was not until much later, in the third and sixth centuries C.E. the homosexuality was mentioned in Hindu writings, and then it was not negatively portrayed. The Kama Sutra was written in the fourth century C.E., and, among other details, gave explicit instructions for both men and women on how to perform homosexual sex acts and emphasized their pleasures. It was not until the influence of Islamic invaders in the northern part of India in the 12th and 18th centuries C.E. that sexual values in Hinduism changed and took a negative view of homosexual sex and relationships.

As with Buddhism, traditional Hindus form their identities around family, not sexuality. A man or woman was expected to fulfill the familial obligations of marriage, produce children, and take care of parents and grandparents in their old age or disability. If these familial obligations were met, then homosexual sex or relationships were ignored. There is evidence that, in some locations at particular times in history, same-sex marriages were performed and accepted by the community and Hindu religious leaders. Overall, Hinduism was not antigay until modern times.

Religion and culture are self-reinforcing. People's beliefs form their religions and their religious beliefs reinforce cultural values. Thousands of years of gay and transgender-accepting cultures produced Hinduism, which reinforced their acceptance with stories and legends of transgendered gods and gods engaging in homosexual behaviors. For thousands of years, the Hindu and Buddhist lifestyles were similar and there was little conflict between the two. The invasion of Asia by first the Christians, then the Muslims, then the British, and finally the communists changed all that.

In Japan, Shintoism is the native religion and originates from prehistoric times. It is an animist religion based in nature and location and remains one of Japan's official state religions. Shinto does not have a binding dogma or holiest place for worship. Instead, it is mostly a collection of rituals used to mediate the relationships between living humans and kami (spirits of nature). Homosexuality was accepted throughout the history of Shinto and expressed mostly in the warrior (Samurai) and middle classes. The tradition of Shudo ("the way of young men") formalized age-structured homosexuality in the Samurai class. It was thought that the only way a young boy could mature into a man was to be trained in the path of the Samurai. He would be paired with an older warrior who would teach the young boy virtue, honesty, family, and an appreciation of nature's beauty. Their relationship included sexual expressions. Supporting this viewpoint were hundreds of fictional and historical literature praising the beauty of boys and encouraging faithfulness to an older mentor. The general public approved of the arrangement and was eager to have their sons participate in homosexual relationships with older Samurai warriors. Elaborate rituals were used by parents to prepare their sons for initiation into Shudo. Samurai warriors usually fulfilled their familial obligations to marry, bear children, and provide support for parents and grandparents, but they also continued their sexual relationships with young boys.

The other major religion in Japan is Confucianism. It is not a mystical religion in the common sense, but rather a complex system of philosophical, social, moral, political, and quasi-religious ideas. There is no mention of homosexuality in Confucianism although there are a few stories of an older lover with a younger male serving in the passive role.

Japan's primary religions today include Shintoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism. None of these condemned homosexuality and the culture, through the Samurai class, was very supportive of homosexual relationships for at least a period in a man's life. Once Islam, Christianity, and the British legal system invaded Japan, the native religions began to change and adopt an antigay perspective. Only recently, with the advent of the modern gay movement, are people rediscovering their gay-affirming past and are LGBT people asserting their rights as equals.

For centuries, Malaysia, Indonesia, and Bangladesh were dominated by Buddhist and Hindu religious beliefs and were openly accepting of LGBT people. Traders from southern India Islam introduced Islam into the area at the beginning of the second millennium C.E. This was a gentler form of Islam, not the orthodox Islamic tradition from Arabia. The peoples of the coastal regions were the first to adopt Islam. It was absorbed and modified with local traditions and beliefs, transforming Islam into a uniquely Malay construct. Later in the 15th century C.E., the Ming Dynasty's fleet stopped along many of the coastal towns. Admiral Zheng He, who was Muslim, sought out the local mosque to pray. Many Muslim Chinese stayed behind, facilitating a significant change in the power structure in the region concerning the position Islam held in religious and cultural politics. Ultimately, Islam became the dominant religion in Malaysia, Indonesia, and Bangladesh, so much so that Islam is now the official religion of Malaysia. With it came condemnation and persecution of LGBT people.

Islam has rejected homosexuality from its very beginning. Being one of three Abrahamic religions (along with Judaism and Christianity), its core stories are anti-gay and patriarchal. The legal punishment for homosexuality ranges from reprimands and prison time to floggings and stoning to death. Although punishment is rarely carried out, it has a chilling effect on those wanting to come out or advocate for LGBT rights. A minority view held by liberal factions of Islam, such as the Al-Fathia Foundation, is that the Qur'an (Koran) condemns homosexual lust, but not homosexual love. Centuries of literature produced in Islamic cultures tell stories of love between men and between men and boys. It is uncertain how the average Muslim responded to the apparent conflict over the veneration of same-sex love in stories, poems, and song and the Qur'an's antigay rulings. The result of increased Islamic presence has been for the governments of Malaysia, Indonesia, and Bangladesh to outlaw homosexual behaviors and relationships and impose imprisonment and physical punishment.

Another major influence on Asian culture has been its colonialization by European imperialists. Competition between Portuguese, Dutch, French, and English monarchs over the spice trade routes pushed each country to greater and greater incursions into Asian societies from the 14th through the 17th centuries C.E. At first, the Asian powers, such as India, China, and Japan, were able to deny the Europeans complete access to their lands and cities. However, European warships dominated the oceans thereby restricting Asian merchants' full use of trade routes. By the 18th and 19th centuries, the Industrial Revolution gave Europeans much greater technological advances, such as the steam-powered warships, so Asian governments surrendered to their demands. Britain ultimately won the competition among the European powers and made India, the governments along the Indian Ocean, Japan, the Philippines, and China into protectorates of the British Commonwealth. (Australia and New Zealand represent special cases. Neither had very large indigenous populations and Europeans were able to colonize them directly. Thus, from the very start of modern times, Australia and New Zealand were British in culture and law.)

Britain imposed its legal framework over all its conquered countries. British Penal Code 377 made homosexual acts illegal and punishable by flogging and imprisonment, and all the countries in Asia and Oceania incorporated the antisodomy code into their own local judicial system, thereby overwriting centuries, if not millennia, of tolerance toward LGBT people. Only recently, as each country has gained its independence from Britain, have the people questioned the application of antisodomy statutes. Slowly, many of the countries in Asia and Oceania have rescinded their antisodomy statutes, thereby allowing for the growth of LGBT organizations and activism.

The final major influence on Asia has been the European import of communism. Currently, China, Vietnam, Laos, and North Korea have communist political systems with varying degrees of capitalism. Each of these countries has long histories of being primarily Buddhist and/or Hindu. As such, they were once accepting of homosexual behaviors and relationships. The political struggles and wars in the middle of the 20th century lead to an overthrow of European rule and establishment of communist governments. Originally, Marxism was not antigay, but its application to Russian culture in the formation of Russian communism absorbed antigay sentiments from the people. Homosexuality came to be viewed as a mental disorder and disease, and LGBT people were often arrested and imprisoned for treatment. Although communism is atheistic, these Russian beliefs later influenced the communist struggles in Asia. Currently, none of the Asian communist countries have laws against homosexuality, but cultural norms make it dangerous to be out. LGBT people mostly live lives of quiet desperation and stay invisible and unknown.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Sodomy

Currently, Cambodia and Thailand are two of the least antigay countries in the world. It is not that these countries offer extensive rights for LGBT people, but rather that the cultures are relatively unbiased against sexual minorities. Buddhism has been and continues to have a major influence in these countries. Australia, Japan, and New Zealand do not have antisodomy statutes on their books as the result of recent political action precipitated by LGBT activism. They have overcome the most egregious British antigay legislation and have begun to establish minimum equal rights for LGBT people in employment, housing, marriage, and adoption. China and Vietnam, as communist states, have no antisodomy statutes on the books, yet they are not very accepting of LGBT people. There is still the belief that gay people are mentally ill. Mongolia and Hong Kong also do not have any antisodomy statutes, but their cultures rarely acknowledge the existence of LGBT people. The influence of the British legal system is still felt in India and Singapore, with both keeping in place Section 377 of the British Penal Code criminalizing homosexual behaviors. Finally, the Islamic countries of Bangladesh, Indonesia, and Malaysia have strict antisodomy statutes in place, following traditional Sharia law mandating severe punishment for engaging in homosexual behaviors. For example, in 1998, the Prime Minister of Malaysia, Mahathir bin Mohamad, accused the former finance minister and Deputy Prime Minister Anwar Ibrahim of sodomy. This was an act of character assassination designed to discredit Ibrahim. During the trial, Prime Minister Mohamad reiterated the charges on national TV, which garnered him support from those segments of the population that held anti-Western values. Ibrahim was convicted of the charges and sentenced to 15 years in prison. His conviction was overturned in 2004 by federal courts. After the appeal, the judges commented that they thought the charge of homosexuality was valid.

Antidiscrimination Statutes and Violence

Australia and New Zealand have adopted various antidiscrimination statutes concerning sexual orientation as applied to employment and housing. These legal protections have come about as a direct result of LGBT activists being allowed to agitate for political change. This demonstrates the need for all countries to make it safe for LGBT activism. Without this activism, there would be little change in anti-gay sentiments. None of the other countries in Asia or Oceania have adopted any antidiscrimination statutes and, with the exception of Thailand and Cambodia, are dangerous for LGBT people to come out at work or to their families. It is thought that Thailand and Cambodia do not have antidiscrimination statutes concerning sexual orientation because their cultures are so accepting of gay people that such statutes are unneeded.

Singapore had difficulty attracting foreign professionals or retaining local talent in the early 2000s. In a surprising turn of events, the Prime Minister of Singapore announced in 2003 that the country welcomed gays to come and work. The ploy was undermined by the government announcing, at the same time, that gay parades and similar public festivals would be banned. Further, Singapore has compulsory “national service” that does not exclude gays from serving in the military but requires them to undergo medical examination and an interrogation of their parents to determine whether the subjects cross-dressed or played with toys inappropriate for their gender while children. Once the review is completed, the LGBT persons are placed in a special category “302,” deemed unfit for combat duty, restricted to nonofficer ranks, forced into clerical vocations, and sent to camps without barracks, thus requiring them to live off-base. The reality for LGBT people in Singapore is the opposite of what the Prime Minister advocates.

The violence level toward LGBT people varies widely across Asia and Oceania, reflecting the wide range of governmental and religious attitudes found in the region. The Islamic countries of Bangladesh, Indonesia, and Malaysia are the most dangerous for LGBT people. Although there are few reports of violent attacks, the cultures are so antigay that gay people know instinctively to remain closeted. The more violent areas are ones where sexual minorities have gained a few rights and have begun organizing and petitioning for equality with heterosexuals. In the politically Western countries of Australia and New Zealand, the “Homosexual Panic Defense” (HPD) is still approved for use in courts. Here, an alleged victim can claim to have been exposed to an “unwanted sexual advance” that sufficiently “deprives the offender of the power of self-control.” Most Western courts have rejected the HPD as a legal and psychological argument, since it shifts the blame for antigay violence onto the victim.

Marriage and Adoption

None of the countries in Asia or Oceania allow same-sex marriage. China will recognize same-sex marriages performed in foreign countries, but does not allow them to be performed within China. Australia and New Zealand have implemented a form of civil union or domestic partnership, but not full marriage equality. Australia and New Zealand are the only two countries in the region that allow same-sex couples to adopt children. Single LGBT people are not allowed to adopt or foster children. Even still, there are additional roadblocks—such as religious condemnation and familial rejection—to gay couples adopting children that heterosexual couples do not face.

Education

With very few exceptions, the educational systems in Asia and Oceania make no mention of LGBT issues in their curricula, nor have they implemented antidiscrimination policies covering LGBT students or teachers. Australia, New Zealand, and Taiwan have antidiscrimination policies and include some LGBT topics in classroom materials, but there is still a considerable amount of antigay bullying and harassment in the school setting. Sometimes the first step toward equality education occurs at the university level, as has happened in Japan and China. The colleges there allow LGBT students to organize and may offer courses in women's or gender studies. Still, misinformation seems to be common. For example, in Hong Kong, a "Sexual Wholeness" seminar for teachers and social workers included comments that lesbians could be cured by having them wear dresses, lipstick, and high heels. Asia and Oceania's educational systems have a long way to go to make schools safe for LGBT students and staff and to educate the public with accurate information.

AIDS

AIDS has ravaged Asia and Oceania. Thailand and Cambodia have some of the highest infection rates in the world. Combinations of factors have led to this state of affairs. Both cultures have high incidences of intravenous drug use and are fairly sexually liberated. AIDS, a disease that is blood-borne, is effectively transmitted under these conditions. Most of the countries in this region of the world make it a policy to provide AIDS medication free to all those in need. That said, the reality is very different. Many of these countries are very poor and are unable to secure sufficient quantities of medications to make them available to all who need them. India has led the way among impoverished nations by violating international patent laws and producing its own generic AIDS medications. This has created international turmoil between the wealthy nations that developed the medications and the poor countries most hit by high numbers of infections.

AIDS is still viewed primarily a gay male disease. Although statistics show that AIDS is now found mostly in heterosexual communities, it serves a political purpose for many politicians to blame AIDS on a stigmatized group and claim that it is a Western disease, thereby maintaining the purity of their own culture. Another impact from this viewpoint is that the health needs of lesbians are overlooked. Lesbianism is rarely addressed and is virtually invisible in most Asian and Oceania countries. No antisodomy statutes include women, and AIDS is seen as a gay male disease. The result of these viewpoints is that women, and lesbians in particular, are underserved by the medical field.

Religion

The histories of Asia and Oceania give a clearer picture of the changes in attitudes toward LGBT people and their issues than anywhere else in the world. Because there are written records going back for thousands of years, we know that homosexuality, same-sex relationships, and transgenderism were widely accepted and venerated by indigenous religions. Then, as foreign powers that held beliefs stemming from the Abrahamic religions overran and dominated the regions, not only did the cultures become antigay, the indigenous religions also retreated and often began to incorporate antigay elements. Only now, as these countries have broken free of European control and modern technology such as the Internet is allowing for the free access to information, is the modern gay movement having an impact on regional discussions of LGBT issues. There is nothing inherently right or wrong about homosexuality or transgenderism. These are moral beliefs stemming from religions that either allow LGBT people to live as equals or calls for them to be treated with scorn and threats.

The Transgendered and Intersexed

There is a long tradition of accepting transgendered and intersexed people in Asian and Oceania societies. The two dominant religions of the area—Buddhism and Hinduism—have made it safe for thousands of years to be gender nonconforming. Hinduism has many deities that are half-male and half-female and who are capable of changing from one sex to another. This helped to demonstrate for society that there are more than just two genders and that a “third-gender” (as it is termed in Hinduism) is more than just acceptable, and is representative of the behaviors in which the deities engaged. In modern India, there are a number of third-gendered sects. The aravani or ali of Tamil Nadu is a sect located in southern India that holds annual festivals. The ali include both feminine and masculine transgendered people who mostly engage in homosexual behavior and do not practice castration. The Hijra are probably the best-known transgendered sect. Often they have been through gender reassignment surgery and have formed communities in northern India. The Jogappa often serve as dancers and male prostitutes and act as entertainers for temple devadasis of the Hindu deity Durga. Jogappa do not engage in castration. Finally there is the Sakhi-Bekhi sect, wherein homosexual men dress as women to display their romantic feelings for Krishna and engage in sex with cudadharis (men dressed as Krishna). They, too, do not engage in castration. These archetypes found in India can be found throughout Asia and Oceania to varying degrees.

Because of thousands of years of Buddhist influence, Thailand has become a focal point for transsexualism and intersexed people. Animist religions view transgendered people as being spiritually blessed. In Thai, they are called kathoe (translated as “ladyboy”) and are sought out for religious services and often make their living as sex workers. Intersexed people are called kathoe thae and are viewed to be doubly blessed since they have a double spirit. Ladyboys have gained considerable stature in Thailand in recent years because of two events. Volleyball competitions are very popular, and a team made up of ladyboys drew large crowds and eventually won the Thailand National Volleyball Tournament. A movie, The Iron Ladies, was produced in 2000 and was very successful. That led to a sequel. In a similar vein, Nong Toom, a ladyboy, worked his way up in Muay Thai kickboxing. He dressed and acted feminine but, to the amazement of everyone, beat every opponent and captured the National Championship Boxing title in 1998 (reenacted in the movie Beautiful Boxer, 2004). With the money he won he had gender reassignment surgery and is now a well-known actress living in Bangkok.

Thailand has become a global center for gender reassignment surgery (GRS). Medical costs are low and the general acceptance of transgendered people makes it safe for many to seek out these medical procedures. Some LGBT activists believe the focus on GRS is misplaced. They contend that, if society were truly supportive of transsexuals or intersexed persons, then there would be no need for GRS since the person would feel accepted as he or she was born. Activists point out that it is the medicalization of sex by Western thought created the binary construct of gender, thereby forcing people to conform to one gender or the other. Now that Western medicine has advanced far enough to allow for GRS, transgendered and intersexed people are being sold on the idea that they can conform through surgery and hormone treatment.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Asia and Oceania have a complex history and mixed politics, making the outlook for LGBT people problematic. It can be expected that LGBT people will gain more rights and perhaps obtain legal equality with heterosexuals in Australia and New Zealand, similar to the advances made in gay rights in the United States, Canada, and most of the European countries, but the reticence even to discuss sexuality let alone homosexuality in Indian or Chinese cultures is a major block to gaining rights for millions of sexual minorities in those countries. The nonhomophobic cultures of Thailand and Cambodia must take the next steps to recognize the need for distinguishing LGBT for legal recognition. Being nonhomophobic is not enough. The cultural forces delineating family structures, by their very nature, exclude LGBT people from full participation in society. The Islamic-dominated countries of Bangladesh, Indonesia, and Malaysia will probably continue to be dangerous places for sexual minorities.

The Internet is proving to be a liberating force for the LGBT communities in Asia and Oceania. Information on homosexuality, transgenderism, and more is available and helps reduce the isolation felt by many LGBT people. However, many countries engage filters to block unwanted political opinions, including much of the information on homosexuality. Finally, at the time of this writing, the world has sunk into a deep economic recession. History has shown that when a society comes under stressors—including war, famine, ecological disaster, or economic recession—the culture becomes more conservative in attitude and politics. As such, rights for LGBT people in Asia and Oceania can be expected to stay stagnant or even lose ground in the near future.

AUSTRALIA

Cristina Corleto and Gerard Sullivan

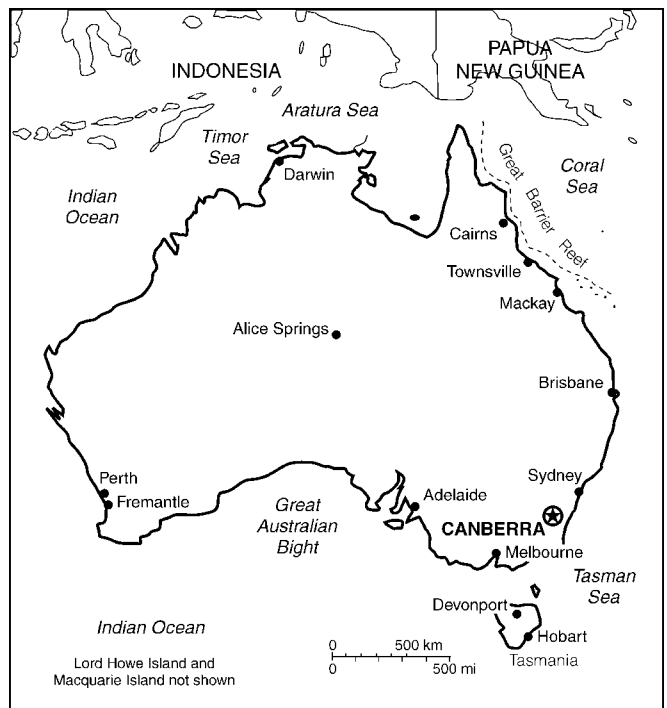

OVERVIEW

Australia is the sixth-largest country in the world, extending 1,988 miles from north to south and 2,485 miles from east to west. It covers 2,966,152 square miles and comprises five percent of the world's land area. The coastline is a stunning 22,826 miles long. The climate varies from temperate in the south to tropical in the north. Much of the country is desert. The seasons are the opposite of those in the northern hemisphere.¹

Australia's population reached 21 million in 2007. The average life expectancy for females is 88 years, while that for males is 85 years. Due to its present global, nondiscriminatory immigration program, Australian society is culturally diverse. English is the official language, with around one-fifth of the population speaking a second language.²

The first inhabitants of Australia were of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander origins. In 1770, Captain James Cook arrived aboard the ship Endeavour and claimed Australia for the British Crown. Roughly half of the first European arrivals in 1788 were convicts. Between 1788 and 1868, an estimated 160,000 additional convicts were transported to Australia. Many free settlers also arrived in order to take advantage of the booming wool and mining industries. The Aboriginal people were largely marginalized economically and socially.³

In 1901, the six independent British colonies on the continent agreed to establish a constitutional monarchy and become states of a single nation to be known as the Commonwealth of Australia. The Commonwealth (or Federal) government is responsible for issues affecting the country as a whole, such as defense and foreign relations, whereas the six state governments are responsible for issues at the state level, such as health, education, and environmental policy. Australia has six states: New South Wales (NSW), Queensland, South Australia, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia and two territories: the Australian Capital Territory (ACT) and the Northern Territory. The territories have a form of representative self-government similar to that of the states, but the Commonwealth may override Territory laws.⁴

OVERVIEW OF GLBT ISSUES

Undoubtedly, the newest frontier in the field of lesbian and gay rights in Australia concerns family issues. The recognition of relationships (or the right to marry) is associated with numerous other entitlements, such as access to artificial insemination, the right to adopt children, inheritance rights, and protection under the legal system in the case of relationship dissolution. While there are many within the gay and lesbian community who do not wish to marry, few deny that the full range of civil liberties should be extended to include members of the GLBT (gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered) community who wish to take advantage of them.

In addition to family issues, concern remains in regard to education, discrimination, violence, and health and aging issues. Nonetheless, extraordinary advances that have been made in the past 35 years in the rights of sexual minorities, their recognition and place in Australian society, and in the development of a vibrant and diverse gay and lesbian community. It is likely that these advances will continue and at an even faster pace in the future.

EDUCATION

There is both good and bad news in regard to gay and lesbian teenagers and schools in Australia. The bad news is that studies show that homophobic abuse is common and profoundly affects same-sex attracted young people's sense of well-being.⁵ Victims of abuse report feeling less safe at home, in school, and during social events than their heterosexual counterparts. They are also more susceptible to harm themselves, contract a sexually transmitted infection, and use recreational drugs.⁶ A recent Australia-wide study conducted among 282 same-sex attracted youth revealed that 75 percent of them had heard negative language to describe same-sex attracted persons in the three months prior to being surveyed. Boys reported more homophobia than girls. In a surprising number of cases, students reported that teachers did not intervene, even when apparently aware of the abuse.⁷

A series of investigations conducted by researchers at La Trobe University did not find the same degree of negativity in the school environments of same-sex attracted teenagers. Nonetheless, a substantial minority of 44 percent of 1,750 same-sex attracted young people aged between 14 and 21 reported verbal abuse, while 16 percent reported physical abuse because of their sexuality. Schools were perceived to be the most dangerous setting for abuse.⁸ Reported incidences of homophobia were found to be strongly related to same-sex attracted young people's sense of safety and connection with their school environment.

The good news is that, in schools where teachers actively engaged in intervention and prevention and were willing to discuss issues dealing with same-sex attraction in a positive way, verbal abuse and homophobic behavior occurred less frequently.⁹ While many schools have a long way to go before they become supportive environments for same-sex attracted young people, gay rights issues are discussed in class in at least some of them, and often in a neutral, if not positive, way. The gay rights movement of the past 30 years or so is at last beginning to affect schools. Gay teenagers are more visible than was the case a generation ago, and many of them are confident and well-adjusted.¹⁰

Some Australian states have initiated efforts to address homophobia in schools. In Queensland, the “Out with Homophobia” workshop has been developed to assist teachers in developing strategies to incorporate this issue into their classes and school programs.¹¹ In Northern Tasmania, a six-week program called “Pride and Prejudice” was introduced in three schools. The program was designed to help teenagers learn to confront homophobic bullying.¹² The Victorian State Education Department’s Web site emphasizes a whole-school approach in the prevention of homophobic bullying and states that schools should communicate to all members of their communities that everyone has the right to feel physically and psychologically safe in school. It further stresses that schools’ curricula and teaching designs, as well as their character and community links, should include the needs of same-sex youths.¹³ While these initiatives are to be supported, there appears to some way to go before their effect is felt uniformly throughout all schools so that same-sex attracted youth feel safe and valued.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

While it likely to be the case that some employers discriminate in hiring and promotion on the basis of sexual orientation, in a number of Australian states, antidiscrimination legislation offers some degree of protection to homosexuals or transgendered people from employment discrimination. The prohibition against homosexuals serving in the armed forces has been lifted. There are some terms and conditions of employment in which lesbians and gay men have yet to achieve equality. A number of these are gradually being addressed, for example, discrimination in hiring, promotion, or job-security practices.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENTAL PROGRAMS

In a national inquiry by the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission in 2006 into discrimination against people in same-sex relationships, it was revealed that same-sex couples and families are not treated equally in the areas of employment, taxation, social security, health, superannuation, and retirement benefits. Same-sex partners are not considered immediate family, and as such are not entitled to a number of benefits available to mixed-sex couples. A female partner is not entitled to parental leave when her same-sex partner gives birth. When employed in federal agencies, same-sex couples are not entitled to subsidized home loans or loans given to surviving spouses of the deceased.¹⁴

Australia’s tax laws are likewise discriminatory. Same-sex couples are required to meet the medical expenses threshold individually rather than collectively when accessing rebates on out-of-pocket expenses, and same-sex couples are not automatically eligible for rebates on childcare expenses. Other social security benefits that are not available to same-sex couples include bereavement allowance, widow’s pensions, and social security allowance transfer to a partner when a recipient is in jail. The Child Support Scheme also excludes same-sex partners, making it harder for them to claim child support.¹⁵

When determining contributions to the national health plan, Medicare, same-sex couples are assessed individually and not as a family unit, which may be disadvantageous for them. Some same-sex families end up paying a third more than their heterosexual counterparts before they can access health care subsidies. Same-sex partners may not be listed on the same Medicare card, which raises questions about what rights they have as a family during medical emergencies.¹⁶

SEXUALITY AND SEXUAL PRACTICES

There is a wide range of sexual identities in Australian society, ranging from lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered, to the intersexed. There are slang terms for particular sexual interests or practices. “Twinks” are young, buff, and groomed men who frequent nightclubs. “Bears” are men who eschew twinks, preferring big and/or hirsute men like themselves. Some are into bondage and discipline or sado-masochism. There are butch (masculine) and femme (feminine) lesbians.

Cities provide a range of opportunities to meet sex partners and have sex. Bars, nightclubs, and Internet dating services such as Gaydar are venues for initiating casual sex or relationships. There are also sex-on-premises venues (e.g., saunas) and beats, which are cruising places such as specific restrooms, beaches, or parks.

FAMILY

In 2001, the Australian Bureau of Statistics reported that there were 11,000 male same-sex couples and 9,000 female same-sex couples living in Australia. Though widely understood to be an under-enumeration, these figures represent a doubling of numbers from the 1996 census and implied an increase in couples willing to identify themselves as being in a same-sex relationship. These couples accounted for 0.1 percent of couples with children and 1 percent of couples without children.¹⁷

Over several decades, the states and territories of passed laws to protect same-sex families and disallow discrimination based on sexual orientation. Following the De Facto Relationships Act of 1984, NSW recognized heterosexual de facto relationships in matters pertaining to inheritance and accident compensation. Lobbying by the Gay and Lesbian Rights Lobby led to the inclusion of same-sex couples in the definition of de facto relationships in the Property (Relationships) Legislation Amendment Act 1999 in NSW. This act applied to laws on property division, family division, and intestacy. The NSW Miscellaneous Acts Amendment of 2002 made it possible to amend 20 laws to give equal treatment to same-sex couples by including them in the definition of de facto relationships.¹⁸ Recently, NSW became the last state to allow the gay partner of an accused person to choose to refrain from giving evidence in court against his or her partner. Previously this privilege was granted only to a de facto spouse.¹⁹

In the ACT, the Legislation (Gay, Lesbian, and Transgender) Amendment Act 2003 introduced a new definition of “domestic partnership” to allow changes in a number of ACT laws to give equal rights to same-sex couples.²⁰

While this extension of rights is most welcome, some areas of same-sex family life remain problematic. The Family Court can divide superannuation (retirement pension) funds between spouses when they separate. However, same-sex partners are not provided for. In the event of death of a superannuation fund owner, only some superannuation plans allow the remaining portion of the fund to be paid to the surviving spouse. Retirement savings account benefits are available only to dependents or legal representatives of account holders. Same-sex partners cannot be declared as dependents.²¹

Legal issues arise when lesbian and gay couples decide to have children either by availing of fertility services or adopting. While Western Australia provides non-discriminatory access to fertility services, South Australia and Victoria exclude lesbians.

A lesbian co-mother does not have a legal relationship with her partner's child under Federal and NSW state laws. Western Australia, the Northern Territory and the ACT now recognize the female partner of a mother as a legal parent from the time of birth.²²

In all of Australia, it is impossible to adopt a child as a single applicant. However, same-sex couples are now allowed to adopt jointly in Western Australia, the ACT, and Tasmania. However, biological parents are allowed to express their preference in regard to sexual orientation of adoptive parents. Furthermore, the laws of the country from which the children originate limit adoption of overseas-born children. Very few countries allow children born in their territory to be adopted by same-sex couples or individual parents.²³

COMMUNITY

The earliest surviving accounts of homosexuality in Australia date from the time of European settlement, over 200 years ago. While these are criminal records, they sometimes indicate the existence of social networks among men who liked to have sex with men. The development of community organizations and events were necessarily curtailed while homosexual acts remained illegal. Nonetheless, bars, beats, and bathhouses (saunas) that catered to homosexual clients developed. These venues provided opportunities for men to interact socially and to meet potential sex partners. They also facilitated the development of an early gay culture. Even before the decriminalization of homosexuality, businesses with substantial homosexual clientele had begun to operate in a number of Australian cities.²⁴ The social status of women in Australia largely precluded them from such opportunities prior to the 1970s, but it is possible that historians will one day uncover earlier informal, noncommercial, or institutional networks of lesbians.

Besides sex, social interaction and commercial interests, important elements in the development of the gay community over the past 30 years have been politics and welfare. In the 1970s, increasing numbers of homosexuals began to agitate for freedom from discrimination and recognition of their civil rights. Thus were the origins of the Sydney Gay and Lesbian Mardi Gras, which began as an illegal demonstration against the criminalization of homosexual acts conducted between consenting adults in private. The early marches were held in (the southern) winter and coincided with Gay Pride events in North America. They resulted in clashes with police at which many gay activists were arrested. Over the years, the event was renamed and moved to (the southern) autumn to coincide with Mardi Gras events and has become a celebration of the gay and lesbian community, attracting crowds of hundreds of thousands of on-lookers. Organizations within the gay and lesbian community are represented, as are friends of the community such as politicians, police, companies, and governmental and nongovernmental organizations that provide support to members of the gay and lesbian community. The parade and massive party thereafter are the culmination of weeks of a cultural festival that precedes it.²⁵ Similar events are now held in other cities. For example, Melbourne has a Midsumma Festival, while the annual Tropical Fruits party is held in Lismore.²⁶

A vitally important aspect of gay and lesbian community development has been the emergence of the gay and lesbian media. While magazines have come and gone over the years, the mainstay of the gay and lesbian press are free, weekly newspapers and magazines such as the Sydney Star Observer or Lesbians on the Loose, which are distributed in businesses catering to the gay and lesbian community, many of which advertise in these publications. The gay press regularly documents issues of interest to the community and its component groups, such as political and rights issues, health, leisure, culture, entertainment, sport, society, and community events. In the past decade, other media types have developed including radio shows, community television, and Internet sites.

The first AIDS cases were diagnosed in Australia in the mid-1980s. The community responded by developing organizations dedicated to serving the health, social, and welfare needs of people living with HIV/AIDS, and assisting with education related to HIV/AIDS and its spread and prevention. Other gay and lesbian organizations support community members with other health concerns such as alcohol or drug abuse.

A plethora of gay and lesbian organizations exists in all large Australian cities, ranging from sports clubs to religious groups, social and welfare groups, and gay rights groups. In regional, rural, and remote areas of the country, far fewer gay and lesbian community groups and services exist, if any, with the result that lesbians and gay men may feel isolated and unsupported. It is also the case that far fewer organizations cater to lesbians than to gay men.

Over the past decade, the cultural and political influence of the gay and lesbian community has remained strong, but its landmarks (e.g., Oxford Street in Sydney or the Sydney Gay and Lesbian Mardi Gras) are less prominent, in part due to mainstreaming or acceptance by an increasing proportion of the population and in part due to the rise of a virtual community rather than one defined by geography.²⁷ Anyone with an Internet connection can now make contact with other lesbians and gay men and learn about the history of homosexuality in a society, its issues, and gay culture. Increasing acceptance and cultural flexibility (such as the emergence of queer culture) means that sexual identity is no longer such a fundamentally defining feature in the lives of many lesbians and gay men. Many young people in particular see their sexual orientation as fluid and changeable. While they often support gay rights and participate in the gay and lesbian community, they may not see that involvement as an exclusive or lifelong commitment.²⁸

Since European settlement began over 200 years ago, Australia has been a multicultural society and immigrants have played a vital role in its economic and social development. Though non-Caucasian immigrants were largely excluded for the first 70 years of the past century, subsequent antidiscrimination policies have allowed the rapid growth of an interracial society. Australians of Asian ancestry now constitute well over five percent of the population and there are growing communities of African immigrants. These statistics are reflected in the composition of the GLBT communities.²⁹

HEALTH

In the past two decades, there has been an increasing recognition that a number of health issues are associated with membership of the GLBT community. Some of these issues may be responses to living with discrimination and a lack of acceptance by family members. For example, young GLBT people are also reported to have increased rates of depression, suicide, illicit drug use and self-harm.³⁰ Another issue affecting the GLBT community is the higher incidence of drug and alcohol abuse. Among lesbians, a reduced rate of breast and cervical cancer screenings, and insufficient knowledge of the risks of sexually transmitted disease have also been raised as issues in need of attention.³¹

The 2007 Annual Surveillance Report by the National Centre in HIV Epidemiology and Clinical Research reports that the primary transmission of HIV continues to be through sexual contact between men. In 2005, sexual contact between men accounted for 86 percent of newly acquired HIV infections. In metropolitan Sydney, the percentage of gay and homosexually active men diagnosed with HIV in sexual health clinics doubled among men 25 years old and younger and tripled among men 25 years and older between 2003 and 2005. By the beginning of 2007, there had been 26,267 diagnoses of HIV infection, 10,125 diagnoses of AIDS, and 6,723 deaths due to AIDS in Australia. Almost one-third of new diagnoses occurred after 2000, with 304 new cases in 2006. This has occurred in spite of strong community education campaigns. NSW had the highest rate of infection, at 6.1 per 100,000. In recent years, there have been substantial increases in sexually transmitted infections other than HIV. Chlamydia infection rates increased 12 percent in 2006 to a rate of 232 per 100,000. Substantial increases in gonorrhea (42.2 per 100,000) and infectious syphilis (4.0 per 100,000) have also occurred in recent years, largely among homosexual men.³²

Depression also appears to be a major health concern for gay men and transgendered people. One study in 2000 found that 27 percent of the 403 gay men surveyed showed symptoms of depressive illness.³³ Transgendered people experience a great deal of discrimination and, as a group, experience even higher rates of depression. They are also at risk of morbidity secondary to surgical or pharmacologic treatments.³⁴

Although equity in access and service are stated goals of the Australian public health system, some GLBT people perceive discrimination in health service delivery. The Gay Men and Lesbians Against Discrimination Survey of 1002 people in Melbourne in 1994 found that 17 percent of the 492 female and 16 percent of the 510 male respondents reported discrimination in medical and dental services ranging from breaches of confidentiality to inadequate treatment or refusal to treat.³⁵ Negative attitudes towards homosexuality and a lack of familiarity with conditions that affect GLBT people in particular can have deleterious effects on the quality of their health care. Some physicians are reluctant to discuss matters related to a patient's sexual orientation, which may in turn preclude an in-depth investigation of symptoms. Patients are also less likely to trust physicians if they perceive an unwillingness to accept them.³⁶ Certainly, any improvement in the collective attitude of health care professionals will translate to a reduction in the physical and psychological morbidity rates for the GLBT population.³⁷

Several states in Australia have initiated steps to address this apparent inequality in health care. The state of Victoria has developed an action plan to review the health status and needs of its GLBT population. Initiatives in the areas of HIV/AIDS prevention, drug prevention, homelessness, women's health and well-being promotion, disability plans, aged care, and primary care partnerships have been launched. The Victorian GLBT health policy has prioritized combating homophobia, maximizing access to health care services, and providing services that are specially needed in the GLBT population.³⁸

POLITICS AND LAW

Gay rights groups were first established in Australia in the late 1960s. In 1969, a local chapter of the United States-based lesbian group the Daughters of Bilitis was established in Melbourne. The same year, the Australian Capital Territory Homosexual Law Reform Society was formed in Canberra after the conviction of two Canberra men who were arrested by police in a parked car in the outskirts of Canberra. The following year, the Daughters of Bilitis changed its name to the Australian Lesbian Reform Movement. In their quest for social inclusion, these organizations tried to present a respectable image. To become a member of the Daughters of Bilitis, applicants had to be at least 21 years of age and assessed by a social worker. Married women were asked to obtain their husband's written consent. Other groups soon followed that took a more liberationist perspective. John Ware and Christabel Poll established the Campaign Against Moral Persecution (CAMP) in Sydney in 1970. Many CAMP members were openly homosexual and spoke of homosexual pride. With CAMP, the approach to social change for homosexuals changed from discourses of sexual privacy and tolerance of difference, to one of activism, rights, and acceptance.³⁹

In October 1971, CAMP held its first demonstration outside the headquarters of the Liberal Party in Sydney. The gay press also began in 1971 with the publication of a commercial magazine, William and John. This was a period of great social change in which minorities searched for a new place in society. However, it was not a period of unity between emerging organizations and services. The younger, university-educated liberationists came into conflict with the majority of CAMP members who wanted to project an image of responsibility, and left to establish the group Gay Liberation. Also in 1971, University of Sydney academic Dennis Altman published the influential book Homosexual: Oppression and Liberation.⁴⁰ Unlike the liberal reformers of the late 1960s, gay liberationists imagined sexuality as a central organizing feature of the self and society. Sydney Gay Liberation's Manifesto, which was issued in May 1972, closely linked sexual and gender oppression, reflecting the belief that gays and women were natural allies. However, it did not take long for many lesbians to feel as if neither the women's movement nor the gay movement was meeting their needs. Sydney Gay Liberation eventually disbanded and a collection of smaller independent groups combined under the banner of the Gay Liberation Front.⁴¹ During this period, the focus of gay rights was on decriminalization and antidiscrimination legislation.

Homosexual acts were illegal in Australia until 1973, when South Australia became the first Australian jurisdiction to decriminalize them. Over the next nine years, from 1976 to 1984, the ACT, Victoria, the Northern Territory, and NSW followed suit. Five years later, Western Australia acknowledged that it was inappropriate for criminal law to intrude on consensual sex in private. It decriminalized homosexual acts, but nonetheless made it a point to condemn homosexual acts in the preamble to the legislation. Queensland reformed its laws in 1990 but also included a preamble against homosexuality.⁴² In 1997, Tasmania became the last state to have gay law reform, ending a 25-year-long campaign to remove criminal laws that prohibit homosexual activity.⁴³

Although homosexual acts have been decriminalized, there are still many areas in which the law discriminates against GLBT people. In relation to homosexual acts, one area of discrimination is in relation to the age of consent. In Victoria, the ACT, South Australia, and Tasmania, there is no distinction as to gender or sex with regard to age of consent. In NSW, the age of consent is 16 years for heterosexual and lesbian sex and 17 years for homosexual sex. In the Northern Territory, it is 16 years for heterosexual sex and 18 years for homosexual sex. Queensland has set 16 years as the legal age for vaginal sex, whereas for anal sex, 18 years is the legal age. West Australia has the widest disparity: 16 year olds may engage in consensual heterosexual or lesbian sex acts, but according to the law, male homosexual acts are illegal for those under 21 years of age. Interestingly, lesbian sex is usually classified with heterosexual sex when determining legal ages of consent.⁴⁴

Throughout the late 1980s and for much of the 1990s, much of the gay community's energy was diverted into coping with the AIDS crisis. Thousands of community members died of the disease, and many organizations were established to support people affected by HIV/AIDS. The focus on AIDS revealed the degree of sexual diversity in Australian society, and by the 1990s, the notion of queer had arrived. The idea that a person's identity, group membership, and sexual preferences could change over time was attractive to a younger generation of activists who were interested in various causes such as antiracism, reconciliation with Indigenous groups, and antiglobalization protests. In late 1998, the Sydney Star Observer, arguably the main gay newspaper, altered its mission statement so that its target audience "now officially includes members of the community who identify as transgender, bisexual or queer."⁴⁵

Recognition of same-sex relationships remains a challenging GLBT issue. In the ACT, the Domestic Relationships Act of 1994 was the first major piece of legislation passed moving towards the recognition of committed homosexual relationships. Under this act, same-sex couples were allowed property ownership rights previously granted only to heterosexual couples. The ACT also presented the Civil Partnerships Bill of 2006 to the Attorney General; however, the Federal Government rejected the bill, which intended to allow same-sex marriage, in February 2007.⁴⁶

In 2003, Tasmania became the only state to introduce the umbrella term "personal relationship" to include noncohabiting heterosexual and same-sex couples in the process of amending 73 statutes. Despite being the last to decriminalize homosexual acts, Tasmania became the first state to legally register relationships, beginning January 1, 2004. Same-sex couples in registered relationships may adopt children. However, the law provides an opportunity for biological parents to express their preference as regards the sexual orientation of adoptive parents.⁴⁷

The NSW Same-Sex Marriage Bill was in the process of introduction as this chapter was being written.⁴⁸ A major setback in the efforts towards recognition is the Federal Government's current stand on same-sex marriage. In 2004, Prime Minister John Howard pushed the Amendment of the Commonwealth Marriage Act 1961 to limit marriage to heterosexual relationships. The Australian

Constitution grants the Federal Government the ultimate power to legislate regarding marriage.⁴⁹

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

In 2006, 25.8 percent of Australians identified themselves as Catholic; 18.7 percent were Anglicans, and another 18.7 percent reported that they had no religion. The Australian Catholic and Anglican churches have both found themselves embroiled in controversy over views held by their leaders in relation to homosexuality. Some years ago, the Catholic Archbishop of Melbourne, George Pell, refused on several occasions to give communion to openly gay members of the Catholic Church when a group of parishioners wearing rainbow sashes sought the sacrament of communion. News stories often resulted when they were denied. Since being promoted to Cardinal, Pell has refused to give communion or even bless the group, stating that an ideological demonstration during Mass was inappropriate.⁵⁰ More recently, the Archdiocese of Sydney, under Cardinal Pell's leadership, has required senior staff in the Catholic school system, such as principals and religious education coordinators, to take an oath of fidelity to the traditional teachings of the Catholic Church, which includes an opposition to homosexuality, birth control, and women's ordination.⁵¹

Sydney's Anglican Archbishop, Peter Jensen, has consistently maintained that he is committed to his position of refusing to bless same-sex unions. He views such blessings as divisive in the Anglican Church. Jensen has been criticized by high profile gay Anglicans, such as High Court Judge Michael Kirby, who remains committed to the church. Jensen has also been critical of the ordination of homosexuals by some dioceses in the United States and Canada. He has gone so far as to say that expulsion could be an option in these cases.⁵²

In spite of closed views held by the leadership of the two most prominent churches in Australia, smaller congregations welcome and provide a haven for GLBT people. Principal among these are the Metropolitan Community Church (MCC), a Christian denomination originating in the United States that is dedicated to serving the needs of the GLBT community. The MCC has branches in Sydney, Melbourne, Brisbane, and Newcastle.⁵³

Though not sanctioned by the leadership of the major religious denominations, other branches cater for GLBT people. Acceptance Sydney provides a safe, spiritual and social environment for GLBT Catholics and their families, and St. Luke's Church in Sydney offers outreach services and a friendship group to GLBT Anglicans. Certain branches around the country of the Uniting Church, a union of Congregationalists, Methodists, and Presbyterians, welcome people regardless of their sexual orientation. In 2007, the Religious Society of Friends, or Quakers, celebrated a same-sex marriage in one of their meeting houses in Canberra. In Sydney, Dayenu provides outreach, education, information, resources, and social support to Jewish lesbians and gay men, their friends, families, and partners.⁵⁴

A 2005 study by the Australia Institute, "Mapping Homophobia in Australia," found that, despite the views espoused by its leaders, Catholics are among the least homophobic people in Australia. While two-thirds of the Baptists and evangelical Christians who participated in the study believe homosexuality to be immoral, Catholics, Anglicans, and Uniting church members were the most tolerant, with only one-third saying homosexuality is immoral. Of the 24,719 people who participated in the study, those who said they had no religion were the most tolerant toward homosexuality, with only 19 percent saying homosexuality was immoral.⁵⁵

In addition to the more traditional branches of Judeo-Christian religions, evangelical Christian denominations are growing rapidly in Australia. Principal among other religions catering largely to growing immigrant communities are Islam and Hinduism. These religious denominations do not yet have the same presence and institutional complexity as religions with longer histories in Australia, and, to date, tend to maintain conservative attitudes in regard to homosexuality.

VIOLENCE

Extreme forms of homophobia and prejudice can lead to violence and even homicide, or in some cases, suicide. A report released by the Attorney General's Department of New South Wales in 2003 revealed that 56 percent of 600 gay, lesbian, or bisexual respondents across NSW had endured one or more forms of homophobic abuse, harassment, or violence in the past 12 months, ranging from verbal abuse, offensive gestures, vandalism, and hate mail to physical assault. A majority (69%) reported feeling vulnerable to attacks from strangers.⁵⁶

The New South Wales Police Service recorded 37 gay hate-related homicide cases in the 10-year period between 1989 and 1999. These cases were examined for evidence suggesting that the victims were gay or perceived to be gay and that the perpetrator's actions were spurred on by prejudice or homophobia. Most victims were 35 years and above, while most offenders fell in the 18 to 24 years age range. It was common for victims to be attacked by multiple offenders. Bashing was the most common form of violence used in these attacks. These crimes often involved a high level of brutality, such as savage beatings and repeated stabbings.⁵⁷ Incidents of bashings or murders still occur on occasion, commonly at beats (or cruising locations), and sometimes late at night near gay nightclubs or in neighborhoods with a high proportion of gay residents.⁵⁸

Incidents of domestic violence in same-sex relationships have been reported to police and gay and lesbian support groups; however, no comprehensive statistics are available and there is a paucity of research studies that have looked into this issue. However, a 2006 study of 308 Australian respondents revealed that, just as in heterosexual relationships, a significant minority experienced violence or abuse ranging from controlling-jealous behavior to humiliation, physical abuse, social isolation, sexual abuse, and outing.⁵⁹

Among government-sponsored and community supported programs to reduce discrimination and violence against sexual minorities has been the introduction of Gay and Lesbian Liaison Police Officers in some states. Of even greater importance perhaps is the development of preventive measures such as the provision of early educational opportunities to teach against homophobia and the creation of environments where sexual diversity is recognized and accepted.⁶⁰

The outlook for sexual minorities in coming years is bright. Reviewing the past 35 years, the pace of rights and recognition has been rapid. While the onset of the AIDS epidemic took a terrible toll on the gay community in particular, it also had a galvanizing influence, and the gay and lesbian community developed with the assistance of government support. Conservative governments have been, and will be, less encouraging than progressive ones, but it seems likely that within the next decade or two that the full range of family supports will be extended to all members of society and the right to marry will come to include same-sex couples. The extension of rights should have a positive effect on institutions such as school systems, and health issues related to social disadvantages should diminish. Cultural change generally occurs more slowly, but as rights are extended, social attitudes toward sexual minorities are likely to become less discriminatory and more inclusive, even among traditional and conservative institutions (such as many religious denominations) and individuals.

Ironically, improvements in social standing may lead to the decline of gay and lesbian community institutions and organizations. It is anticipated that the development of a range of groups catering to special interests (e.g., a gay baseball league, South Asian lesbians, transgender parents, or older bisexuals), but this may result in a less unified or cohesive community as a whole. As sexual minorities become part of the mainstream, the rallying point of fighting for rights and equality is less apparent. Accordingly, it is likely to bring about the demise of gay and lesbian neighborhoods but a rise in services and the development of virtual communities using modern communication devices such as Internet sites that assist people in connecting with each other regardless of geographic location.

Australians anticipate a greater emphasis on diversity in a range of ways in coming years. GLBT communities currently revolve around young and middle-aged adults. However, with greater social acceptance, the development of nonheterosexual sexual identities is likely to occur at an increasingly younger age. Similarly, older GLBT people will be more prominent and a range of services to meet the needs of ageing and prosperous baby boomers (such as retirement villages) will develop. As the age range of members of GLBT communities widens, so will the generation gap. Older members of these communities may be concerned that younger people take gay rights, sexual equality, and social acceptance for granted. Older people may also be dismayed when younger people are more fluid in the expression of their sexuality and, in the process, eschew an exclusive identity as members of a sexual minority. Overall, Australia looks forward to a future of increased equality and social acceptance for members of its sexual minority groups.

BANGLADESH

Adnan Hossain

OVERVIEW

Bangladesh, officially named the People's Republic of Bangladesh (literally, "the land of the Bengalee" or "the land of Bangla," the language predominantly spoken in Bangladesh), is the seventh-most populous country in the world with approximately 150 million people spread over 55,599 square miles (2,706 persons per square mile). Bangladesh came into existence in 1971 after a bloody war with Pakistan, of which it was made a part during partition of undivided British India in 1947. Nevertheless, political and economic marginalization and, more importantly, the imposition of Urdu as the state language by Pakistan, led to its war of independence. Bangladesh is bordered on all sides by India except for the far southeast, where it borders Myanmar and the Bay of Bengal to the south.

Ethnically, Bangladesh is comprised of 98 percent Bengalis, and has some 49 ethnic minorities dispersed across the country.¹ Moreover, 86 percent of the population is Muslim, with only 12 percent Hindu, and other religious minorities like Christians and Buddhists making up only two percent. With a population growth rate of 4 to 5 percent annually, 49.8 percent of the population still lives below the poverty line. Life expectancy is 62.8 years, while the literacy rate is 44.2 percent. Bangladesh has a parliamentary democracy with 300 members in the national assembly. Only 25 percent of Bangladesh is urbanized, with the vast majority of the populace living in villages. With an estimated unemployment rate of 3.3 percent, Bangladesh is facing massive development challenges ranging from corruption and governance to poverty.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Traditionally, marginal genders and sexualities in Bangladesh have not been configured along the Western-style LGBT identity lines.² This is evident in the lack of linguistic substitutes for LGBT in Bengali. This is, however, not to suggest that same-sex sexualities and transgendered identities are nonexistent. In fact, most forms of same-sex sexualities have remained linguistically unmarked and culturally unrecognized. Moreover, sexuality has not been considered a marker of self or identity. In other words, people do not identify themselves as “homosexual” or “heterosexual” on the basis of sexual preference. Besides, heterosexual marriage has been a predominant obligatory social institution. Thus, alternative sexual practices have remained inextricably entwined with heteronormative social institutions, rather than existing outside of them. That is, most people who are engaged in same-sex relationships also participate in a heterosexual marriage. This has been made possible primarily because of the homosocial nature of Bangladeshi society; intimate relationships between two people of the same sex are not generally accorded any homoerotic connotations. This applies equally to males and females. This is in contrast to heterosexual interaction outside of marriage, which is frowned upon.

Given this structure of social relationships, socially visible alternative same-sex pair-bonding has been practically nonexistent. This is, however, not to suggest a theory that same-sex sexualities are made possible owing to a limited space for heterosexual interaction. In fact, the extent to which homosociality enables or restrains the expression of alternative same-sex eroticisms is still subject to research.³

While the nature of sexualities described might lead one to conclude that a widespread bisexuality is the dominant norm, people engaged in same-sex eroticism do not necessarily identify as bisexuals either. Indeed, sexual attraction or desire is not a basis for identity formation in Bangladesh.

Alongside these general patterns there are also two socially known and extremely stigmatized gender/sexual subcultures in Bangladesh. One such subculture is called the hijra, or the so-called “the third sex.”⁴

The word hijra literally means “impotent” and is used to refer to males incapable of erection and procreation. While hijra is a standard word used by the wider society to vilify any male falling short of putative masculinity, those who self-identify as hijra have appropriated the word as a positive label for identification.

Hijra is a community of phenotypic⁵ males (most of those joining the community are often raised by their natal families as males on the basis of external male genitals) identifying as females and desiring to be the passive partners for males in sexual intercourse. In Bangladesh, for one to be a part of this community, one has to prove one’s effeminacy and desire for masculine males. Only males identifying as “not male and desiring to be penetrated by other males” can be a part of this community. Males having sex with the hijras, or the active partners of hijras, are excluded from the hijra community and are referred to as panthi and parik. While panthi is used as a label to refer to any male outside the hijra community, parik is used to refer to males taking hijras as husbands.

Hijra is a ritualistically bound cultic community presided over by a goddess called Maha Maya Ji. Hijras believe Maha Maja Ji was the first primordial hijra archetype and was the one who introduced the rituals that hijras follow to this day. Through a ritual called nirban, (literally meaning “freedom from worldly desires”), the scrotum and testicles are removed by a trained cutter, or what hijras call “ka-tial.” This marks a rebirth for the person undergoing the ritualistic shedding of male genitalia. While ritual emasculation is a desired option for many hijras, there are also nonemasculated members in the hijra community.

Hijra is also a hierarchical community with a stern guru-chela (preceptor-disciple) divide. Gurus are highly venerated, and chelas or disciples are instructed into hijra ways of living through gurus. The hijra community is based on a quasi-feminine kinship pattern, as is evident in the hijra way of addressing one another with female-identified names. While chelas or disciples of a guru consider each other sisters, the guru is like a mother to them. Hijras traditionally dress in a sari, a female-identified garment, and claim to be born without any trace of genitalia. Hijras speak a clandestine argot understood mostly by hijra-identified people. Most members in the hijra community come from low socioeconomic backgrounds, and in this sense hijra is a highly class-specific community. Though hijra is often translated as “eunuch” in the Anglo-American press, the hijra identity is far too complex to allow any English word to encapsulate the varied gender expressions and sexual orientations that the community embodies.

Apart from the hijra, there is another relatively less known subculture, the kothi, literally meaning “effeminate males.”⁶ Kothis have a spatially bound subject position in the sense that there are some designated spaces, like parks, where kothi-identified people cruise and mimic appropriate feminine comportments. Kothis, however, also vanish into mainstream society and live as normal males, unlike the hijras. Kothis are also generally nonemasculated, unlike the hijras, and are highly likely to take females as wives. One commonality that binds the hijra and kothi is their renunciation of socially imposed masculinity. Moreover, there is also a considerable inter-community migration between the hijra and kothi groups, a fact that makes any coherent distinction between the two difficult.

Alongside these hijra and kothi, there is now at least one secretive gay male subculture springing up in urban centers, with members emanating only from middle- and high-income backgrounds. Initially organized through the Internet in 2002, this fledgling gay group, called BOB (Boys Only Bangladesh), has become widely known among the LGBT-identified community. In 2008, a few more e-groups, like Gay Bangla and Queer Bangla, came into existence with the motto of coalitional alliance among middle- and high-income LGBT people.

The recently emerged public health discourse has increasingly drawn attention to diverse forms of same-sex sexuality and gender. Too often the indigenous hijra and kothi and their partners, or panthis in this discourse, have been pigeonholed as men who have sex with men.⁷ The national AIDS policy acknowledges the existence of same-sex relations between men, but not other LGBT identities. Beginning the 1990s, a number of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) appeared in Bangladesh to cater to the needs of the hijra, kothi, and panthi communities.

Same-sex relations between females are still not a part of academic or policy analysis in Bangladesh. This indifference is perhaps explainable in terms of two factors. First, owing to a pervasive patriarchy, there is no visibly organized subculture of female same-sex sexuality in contemporary Bangladesh. Second, sexuality is generally conceptualized within a penetrative frame of reference; that is, eroticism devoid of penile insertion is generally not accorded the status of sex.

The very few newspaper features that have appeared in the last decade mostly focused on the hijra community. Moreover, some articles have also appeared in some English-language dailies in the last decade denouncing the gay and lesbian identities of the West.⁸ There is a widespread societal assumption that homosexuality is nonexistent in Bangladesh, and the visible hijra community is often considered largely as asexual or hermaphroditic in the popular imagination.

EDUCATION

Education in Bangladesh is highly subsidized from the primary to the tertiary levels, with a national education budget of $7.7 billion (2.4% of the gross domestic product in 2006).⁹ Primary education (the first five years of schooling) is compulsory and free, in line with Article 17 of the Bangladeshi Constitution. The education system of Bangladesh is three-tiered, with primary levels (grades 1 to 5), secondary school (grades 6 to 12), and tertiary education (university). Moreover, instruction is carried out in three languages, Bengali, English, and Arabic. The state-sponsored education is mostly conducted in Bengali, while institutions instructing in English are privatized and mostly cater to the middle and upper classes. Arabic/Islamic education is simultaneously state-sponsored and privately supported. While the predominant Bengali medium follows the national curriculum, the privatized English-language education system follows United Kingdom and United States-style curricula. The Islamic education mostly imparts religious training to produce Islamic clerics.

To date, sex education has largely been excluded from these three streams. In response to the growing awareness of sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), including HIV/AIDS,¹⁰ information on AIDS has been phased into the secondary and higher secondary school curricula for grades 6 to 12 since January 2007. Moreover, United Nations agencies in Bangladesh have also launched educational programs to instruct the madrasa (religious schools producing Islamic clerics) students in sex education and HIV/AIDS awareness. However, very little information is included within these newly introduced programs regarding alternative sexualities and gender identities.

There is a dearth of data on the experiences of violence and bullying faced by children in academic institutions, as no systematic research or documentation on this has yet been carried out. Nevertheless, anecdotal evidence suggests that there is widespread bullying of effeminate boys in all types of schools by their peers, and at times even by their teachers. Many hijra and kothi-identified people report their early childhood experience of bullying and sexual harassment in state-sponsored primary schools, and many eventually drop out. Many middle- and high-income gay people have also voiced similar discontent.¹¹ Despite this, there are no anti-bullying or antidiscrimination laws in place to stop the violence.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Bangladesh is one of the poorest countries in the world, with a reported 82.8 percent of the population living on less than $2 per day.¹² Currently, Bangladesh is the fourth-largest rice producing country in the world. In response to steady economic liberalization over the last two decades, Bangladesh now has one of the largest garment industries in the world.¹³ While public sector jobs have traditionally been regarded as prestigious, a sizeable private service industry now attracts mostly the urban middle- and upper-class job seekers.

There are now three sectors of employment in Bangladesh, the private, public, and NGO. NGOs in particular focus on male sexual health by periodically employing kothi- and hijra-identified people as low-ranking employees to facilitate service delivery among the low-income hijra/kothi community and their partners. These jobs are mostly low-paying and precarious, with regular reports of firings and drastic wage cuts.¹⁴ The urban, educated LGBT people tend not to disclose their sexual orientations to coworkers, and often pass as “normal.” There is no research on the incidence of discrimination among people with alternative gender identities and sexualities, nor are there any workplace antidiscrimination laws in place.

The widely visible hijra community, however, sticks to the pristine occupation claimed to have been prescribed by the goddess Maha Maya Ji. Traditionally, the hijra way of living, or what hijras call hijragiri or “the occupation of Maya Ji,” revolves around badhai (the practice of dancing with newborn children and blessing the child and the family), birit manga (the practice of collecting alms both in cash and in kind from marketplaces), and entertaining people at social gatherings like matrimonial festivities. Every hijra group has access to certain areas, and their activities (or hijragiri) are restricted to that locale. These hijra ways of living were made possible owing to the rampant belief in the supernatural power of the hijras as people capable of blessing and cursing. However, in recent times, this traditional source of hijra income has fallen into disuse due to a dwindling number of patrons.

A large number of kothi and hijra-identified people also work as prostitutes. Hijra prostitution is not a new phenomenon in the wake of the declining belief in their supernatural powers, but has coexisted alongside the traditional hijra livelihood style. In 2004, there was a reported murder of a university teacher at the hand of a hijra prostitute over an alleged dispute over payment,¹⁵ however the news was given very little attention in the media.

Many kothi and hijra-identified people also often work as cooks in the rapidly urbanizing metropolitan centers of Bangladesh. The hijra and kothi working as cooks are in many ways a separate community, though one with rules and rituals modeled after the hijra. The hijra and kothi community of cooks are mostly daily wage laborers earning little more than $2 per day.¹⁶ The hijra and kothi people take up cooking, as it is traditionally gendered as feminine in Bangladeshi society.¹⁷

There are no government programs specifically designed to address the needs of people with alternative gender identities and sexuality at present. Nevertheless, the government of Bangladesh has formulated a national policy on HIV/AIDS and STD-related issues, known as the National AIDS/STD (NASP) program, in 1997.¹⁸ NASP makes a passing reference to males having sex with males, and considers males having sex with males as an at-risk community needing attention.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

There is acknowledgement in the government and among NGOs that the community of men having sex with men engages in risky sexual practices. Though the incidence of HIV is low in this community,¹⁹ growing concerns have been voiced about the possible spread of HIV through this community. Recent studies also demonstrate the need for increasing preventive efforts among the men having sex with men, as many of these men are also sexually active with women and intravenous drug users.²⁰ In recent times, the Ministry of Health, in conjunction with international agencies, has undertaken AIDS prevention publicity in the form of television advertisements, posters, and billboards. However, same-sex sexualities as possible routes of infection have mostly been brushed aside from the campaign.

FAMILY

The dominant marriage and family patterns in Bangladesh are modeled on heterosexual coupling. Structurally, family has mostly been a joint or extended unit consisting of three or more generations. It is only with the recent upsurge of an urban middle class that the nuclear family has begun to be adopted as the preferred family system, though compared to the extended family system this shift is still insignificant. Divorce is unpopular and socially undesirable. Moreover, owing to a strong patriarchy, women always bear the disproportionately greater brunt of divorce, both in rural and urban Bangladesh. However, legal provisions are now in place to secure benefits for divorced women.

Among the recently emerged gay-identified community, as well as the low-income hijra and kothi, same-sex cohabitation is practiced surreptitiously. Given the dominant understanding of family as a procreative unit, the coupling of two same-sex people is not generally accorded any marital or familial import. While this may facilitate same-sex cohabitation, the societal and familial pressure on individuals to enter into heterosexual marriages often stands as a roadblock to sustained same-sex familial bonding.

The hijra community has a widespread practice of forming alternative families. Interestingly, hijras generally do not conceive their ritual marriages with males as being same-sex marriages. Most hijra- and kothi-identified people (including both the emasculated and nonemasculated) consider their sexual relations and family establishment with males in heterosexual/heterogendered terms (i.e., hijra and kothi people tend to position themselves as typical housewives staying in the inner chamber of the house, cooking, and cleaning for their husbands). Though the hijra practice of family formation with other males remains criminalized,²¹ there is no reported persecution. Moreover, adoption of children by the hijra community is not popular, though not uncommon.²²

COMMUNITY

Traditionally, hijra and kothi have been the only organized and visible communities of alternative sexualities and desirers on the subcontinent. These communities have mostly catered to the psychological needs of effeminate males who desire masculine males, or who identify as females or “not males.” From the late 1990s onward, a number of NGOs have come into being to provide services related mostly to safe-sex practices. These NGO premises have also served as new platforms for interaction and community building. One notable NGO with a widespread reach across Bangladesh is the Bondhu Social Welfare Society (BSWS), which was formed in 1997. With support from Family Health International and Naz Foundation

International, BSWWS now runs a sexual health project for men having sex with men in nine Bangladeshi cities. Moreover, there are also two sexual health projects specifically for the hijra community, one of which, Sushtho Jibon (meaning “safe life”), is supported by BSWWS. In 2000, with support from Care Bangladesh, a new organization, Badhon Hijra Shongho, was formed. However, community services provided by NGOs like BSWWS or Care Bangladesh are still focused on little more than the transmission of knowledge about safe sex. The impact of such programs is also often disputed by some sections of the hijra and kothi communities, who complain about a burgeoning polarization in the community with some (people in the upper echelons of the management of the NGOs) becoming unscrupulously rich through the exploitation of the poor in the kothi and hijra community.²³ In recent times, drastic cuts in funding from international donors have stymied the service delivery for the men having sex with men community.²⁴

Alongside the NGOs and the traditional hijra and kothi, there is at least one popular gay group in Bangladesh, BOB (mentioned previously), which acts as a platform for the middle- and upper-class gay-identified people in Bangladesh. First organized in 2002, BOB is mainly an Internet-based community of gay-identified people with periodic, clandestine public appearances in the form of disco parties and gatherings. Popular issues often broached on the BOB Internet discussion board range from partner-hunting to aspects of gay life to organizing for rights-based praxis. In the last few years, BOB has taken some bold strides out of the virtual world to tap into the networks of established organizations; for example, BOB sent many gay-identified members to ICDDR-B (the International Center for Diarrhoeal Disease Research, Bangladesh) for voluntary HIV/AIDS testing.²⁵ Moreover, BOB has also worked with Ayeen O Salish Kendro, a human rights center in Bangladesh, to undertake a situation analysis of the Bangladeshi LGBT community.²⁶ In 2008, BOB e-celebrated the International Day Against Homophobia for the first time in a public restaurant featuring explicitly gay-themed banners. Moreover, in September 2008 Shakhawat Hossain, the first publicly gay-identified Bangladeshi, represented BOB in a South Asian LGBT workshop in Nepal.²⁷ Despite these efforts, BOB remains an Internet-based group with no concrete establishment.

In the first part of 2008 a few more groups, namely Queer Bangla and Gay Bangla, have been launched as coalitional platforms for LGBT-identified people, though the majority of members are gay-identified males and there are very few lesbians or transgendered people included. These newly formed groups intend to work on issues of visibility of LGBT people in Bangladesh, among other concerns related to human rights and HIV/AIDS.

HEALTH

The extant health care system in Bangladesh is extremely ill-equipped to provide for the needs of its citizens; fewer than 40 percent of the population has access to even basic health care.²⁸ Owing to the marked socioeconomic differences in health status and health care access, ill health often acts as a robust deterrent to the economic mobility of the marginal populace.

The burgeoning acknowledgement of the global spread of HIV/AIDS and its effects on society and the economy has led the government to carry out surveillance research on HIV/AIDS in collaboration with international donors. So far, the reported prevalence of HIV in the general population has been found to be low (less than 0.2%).²⁹ The six rounds of surveillance so far undertaken have singled out intravenous drug users, commercial sex workers, truck drivers, migrant workers, rickshaw pullers, and men having sex with men as groups particularly at risk for infection. The highest concentration of HIV has been among intravenous drug users, and the prevalence of HIV/AIDS among men having sex with men is still less than one percent.³⁰ Nevertheless, recent research highlights the close proximity of men having sex with men to intravenous drug users and other groups.³¹ Additionally, the vulnerability of men having sex with men has become further compounded by low rates of condom use, high numbers of sexual partners, and generally low awareness of HIV and other STDs.

There is no state-sponsored program that specifically addresses the needs of men having sex with men, or even middle- and upper-class LGBT people. However, some NGO-based awareness programs are in operation to educate men having sex with men about safe sex. HIV/STD testing and treatment services are not provided.³²

The cultural constituency of men having sex with men³³ is still poorly understood and not well defined in the public health literature. In fact, the term “MSM” often encompasses hijras, kothis, and panthis (the partners of both hijra and kothi) and other males not identifying with any of these labels. While most of those males who are the receptive partners in intercourse identify as kothi or hijra, many do not. Besides, the dominant partners (those assuming the penetrative role) often do not identify with any label and also engage in sexual relations with women. There are also many hijra- and kothi-identified people taking on both active (penetrative) and passive (receptive) roles in sexual intercourse with males. This group is often pejoratively labeled as do-porotha, or “double decker” by the hijra and kothi. Additionally, many hijra and kothi also have sexual relations with females.

Given this complex nature of divergent behaviors, identities, and meanings, the ubiquitous use of the shorthand MSM in policy documents is more confounding than clarifying. The dominant HIV/AIDS prevention strategy designed through the lens of reductive MSM in the context of Bangladesh has always kept the focus restricted to “risky sexual behaviors,” condoning the broader social arrangements that keep the community of men having sex with men at bay.

There is no accessible sex reassignment surgery (SRS) available in the country, and the legal stance on sex changes is also unclear, with no such reported cases. However the practice of ritualistic emasculation among the hijra is widely popular and is conducted secretly at the hands of specially trained ritual cutters, called katials, as noted previously. Despite the katials' skill, the cutting practice involves massive health hazards, as they generally use traditional knives made of sharp bamboo slices and cauterize the wounds with burnt clothing, flour, and hot water. The blood oozing out of the wound is allowed to drain completely, as this marks the purging of the body of masculinity, hence signifying a rebirth as a real hijra. Amazingly, very few undergoing this process of emasculation are reported to have died. Established mainstream medical facilities still tend to not have any standard procedures for SRS.

Sex-change surgeries are infrequently reported in the newspapers, where doctors who detect ambiguous genitalia in newborns conduct surgery to assign a sex to the infant. There is still no lobbying or activist group challenging such nonconsensual sex assignment at birth.

There is also anecdotal evidence of rampant harassment and maltreatment of the LGBT population in the psychiatric establishments in Bangladesh.³⁴ Though the psychiatric community follows the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM) of the American Psychological Association as its source book for treatment and diagnosis, many gay-identified people have reported being treated as pathological on the basis of their sexual orientation. In several instances, homosexual or gay-identified people have been subjected to curative therapies for years, further damaging their mental and physical well-being.

POLITICS AND LAW

As a British postcolonial nation-state, Bangladesh retains the antisodomy statute known as Section 377 of the Penal Code. This British antisodomy law, first passed in 1533, was later incorporated into the Indian penal code in 1860 in British India.³⁵ The law reads:

Unnatural offences section 377: Whoever voluntarily has carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman or animal shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable of fine.

Explanation: Penetration is sufficient to constitute the carnal intercourse necessary to the offense described in this section.

Comment: This section is intended to punish the offense of sodomy, buggery and bestiality. The offense consists in a carnal knowledge committed against the order of nature by a person with a man, or in the same unnatural manner with a woman or by a man or woman in any manner with an animal.

The aforesaid law is the only statute existing in the legal system of Bangladesh against sexualities that run counter to the order of nature. However the phrase “order of nature” is ambiguous and can be stretched to penalize even heterosexual cunnilingus and fellatio.

Despite this legal inheritance, the use of this law in the context of Bangladesh is nominal, with no reported cases in history filed or tried under this section. Nevertheless, anecdotal evidence suggests that the law is often invoked by the law-enforcing agencies to harass the hijra and kothi communities. There is in fact little activism in place to press for the repeal of Section 377, though in recent times some NGOs have begun to draw attention to the need for the abrogation of the antisodomy law.

Recent research has amply demonstrated that alternative gender identities and sexualities in the subcontinent underwent a process of criminalization only with the advent of British colonialism.³⁶ There is now considerable agreement among scholars that what was once a minor veneer of homophobia in pre-British India ossified with the consolidation of British rule.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Religion and spirituality stand at the center of the hijra worldview. Though Bangladesh has a predominantly Muslim population, the hijra community is tied to a Hindu-identified goddess, Maha Maya Ji. Despite the majority of the members of the hijra community being Muslim by birth, the hijra community in Bangladesh worships the goddess while simultaneously retaining their Muslim identification. Moreover, the hijra community also has a close affinity with Sufi-identified rituals and shrines across Bangladesh. Thus, hijras represent an extremely syncretic form of religiosity, with devout adherence to both Hindu and Muslim-identified practices.

Apart from the hijra religious and spiritual eclecticism, there is a widespread societal understanding that Islam disapproves of homosexuality and transgenderism. A number of competing perspectives have arisen in recent scholarly and activist domains about the Islamic injunction against same-sex relationships and transgendered people.

In particular, two strands of argumentation on homosexuality and transgenderism are concurrently prevalent. One group of gay-identified people considers Islam³⁷ absolutely antithetical to all forms of same-sex relationships and cross-gender demeanors, and denounces it outright. The other group, however, points to the heterosexual cooptation of Quran and hadith (sayings and doings of the Prophet) in the hands of some narrow-minded Islamic scholars, and continues to identify as both gay and Muslim.

VIOLENCE

In recent times, Bangladesh has attained considerable notoriety for its state-sponsored extra-judicial killings, along with persecution of minority communities and opposition voices. Though invocation of Section 377 of penal code is rare, gross infringements of the rights of sexual minorities have been reported, particularly in the forms of abduction, arbitrary arrest, detention, beatings, and gang rape by law-enforcing agencies and local thugs.³⁸ The hijra and kothi communities have been particularly vulnerable to these forms of violation. Moreover, rampant bullying and molestation by law enforcers has posed severe threats to the successful promotion of HIV/AIDS awareness programs.

Due to the invisibility of LGBT-identified people and their class status, the incidence of hate crimes and related forms of violence is still unknown, though they commonly occur.³⁹ Nevertheless, in the Internet-based like Queer Bangla and BOB, concerns have often been raised about organizing for rights movements.

There are now two competing views on coming out concurrently held among the LGBT-identified community in Bangladesh. One camp argues for moving toward coming out⁴⁰ while the other considers it suicidal, claiming that societal ignorance and indifference may well transform into massive homophobia and transphobia in response to mobilization efforts, and may eventually lead to the enactment of separation based on sexual orientation.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

In contemporary Bangladesh there are now at least two groups with the potential to fight for the rights of the sexual minorities. On the one hand, NGO-based activism with an exclusive focus on men having sex with men, hijra, and kothi kicked off from the late 1990s. On the other hand, LGBT-identified communities have also become somewhat organized since 2000. Nonetheless, these two groups are sharply divided along the lines of class and language, and often tend to be hostile to each other.⁴⁰

More importantly, the drive for rights and visibility based on sexual preference is apt to be caught in a double bind. Though the social configuration is heteronormative, it allows strong homosocial bonding and a wide range of linguistically unmarked and socially invisible forms of same-sex attraction to exist alongside the publicly institutionalized hijra and kotbi. However, same-sex sexuality remains criminalized, even though enforcement of the law is rare. Given this paradoxical situation, the sudden rights-based mobilization around visibility and identity might very well lead to an upsurge of unprecedented homophobia and precipitate a social situation where these previously tolerated alternative sexualities and gender identities might come under increasing social policing with the added disadvantage of persecution under Section 377 of the penal code. Perhaps more than anything else, the contemporary nascent sexual minority politics has to tread a judicious line between these two options in the coming decades of 21st century.

NOTES

1. There is debate over the exact number of indigenous communities in Bangladesh. The number 45 is reported on the Web page of VSO Bangladesh, <http://www.vso.org.uk/where-we-work/bangladesh.asp>.

2. Most of the details on the LGBT and hijra, kothi, and panthi communities of Bangladesh are taken from ethnographic research conducted from 2000 to 2007 by the author of this chapter. A detailed ethnographic analysis of these communities is forthcoming.

3. For an interesting analysis of this issue, see Paul Boyce, "Moral Ambivalence and Irregular Practices: Contextualizing Male-to-Male Sexualities in Calcutta/India," Feminist Review 83 (2006): 79–98.

4. Serena Nanda, in her book The Hijras of India: Neither Man nor Woman, 2nd ed. (London: Wadsworth, 1999), projects the hijras of India as a third sex/gender. However, recent scholarship has demonstrated that hijra identity is far more complex than a nondichotomous third sex. For interesting arguments against the third sex, see Lawrence Cohen, "The Pleasures of Castration: The Postoperative Status of Hijras Jankhas and Academics," in Sexual Nature Sexual Culture, ed. Paul R. Abramson, et al. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995).

5. I use "phenotypic" for lack of a better term and in a nonjudgmental way.

6. Kothi is basically a derivation from hijra clandestine argot. Hijras use the word to refer to any males desiring macho males. While all hijras consider themselves kothi, all kothis do not identify as hijra. While hijras are relatively ritually bound, kothis are part of the mainstream society and tend to appropriate feminine deportments only in specific spaces. Nevertheless, the distinction often tends to get blurred real life situations. For a detailed account on the relationship between the hijra and kothi see Gayatri Reddy, With Respect to Sex: Negotiating Hijra Identity in South India (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2005). An analysis of the Bangladeshi context is forthcoming from the author of this chapter.

7. Instead of using the shorthand MSM, I have used "men having sex with men" to denaturalize the reifying proclivity of the MSM as an umbrella term that in recent academic and activist literature has become an unquestioned social scientific given. Moreover, MSM negates the subjectivity of the hijra and kothi-identified persons who resist being labeled as men.

10. One workshop reports that 91.5 percent adolescents have no knowledge of HIV and AIDS. See <http://www.aids2006.org/Web/WEAX0204.ppt> (accessed on May 5, 2008). Another survey conducted in 2005 also found low prevalence of knowledge of HIV and AIDS (22.3%) among both males and females (cited in 2008 UNGASS Country Progress Report, http://data.unaids.org/pub/Report/2008/bangladesh_2008_country_progress_report_en.pdf).

11. While the hijra and kothi who recounted their early experiences of bullying in the schools eventually discontinued education, the upper class students in most cases continued to attend school.

13. The number of ready-made garments (RMG) factories shot up to around 2,900 in 1999. For more details on the growth of this sector, see http://banglapedia.search.com.bd/HT/G_0041.htm (accessed January 6, 2008).

14. One study by Bandhu Social Welfare Society reports that, out of a sample of 124 MSM interviewed, 56 percent have a monthly income of taka 1,000 to 3,000 (US$0.60–1.70 per day) and only 8 percent of the respondents earned more than taka 5,000 a month (US$2.80 per day). Cited in Susie Jolly, Gender Myths and Feminist Fables: Repositioning Gender in Development Policy and Practice (Sussex, United Kingdom: University of Sussex, 2003). Moreover, many of the hijra and kothi interviewed by the author in the last few years have reported low wages and frequent firings. Too often, wage cuts and firings occur as a result of kothi and hijra employee's failure to bring in a fixed number of kothi, hijra, or panthi or males practicing same sex sexualities to drop-in centers of the NGOs. Many kothis and hijras opined that NGOs need to show the donors that they have a large number of beneficiaries so that the flow of funding is not obstructed.

There was once a spate of discussion on this issue on the BOB message board and many opined that it was a ploy by the asylum seekers to gain Australian citizenship. <http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/asia-pacific/2927639.stm> (accessed October 5, 2008).

Most members also hail from middle and upper socio-economic backgrounds, as opposed to the low-income hijra and kothi who speak Bengali. However, this is not to suggest that all LGBT-identified people use English. Because of the class status of LGBT-identified persons, they have higher social capital, such as access to the Internet, education, and higher incomes.

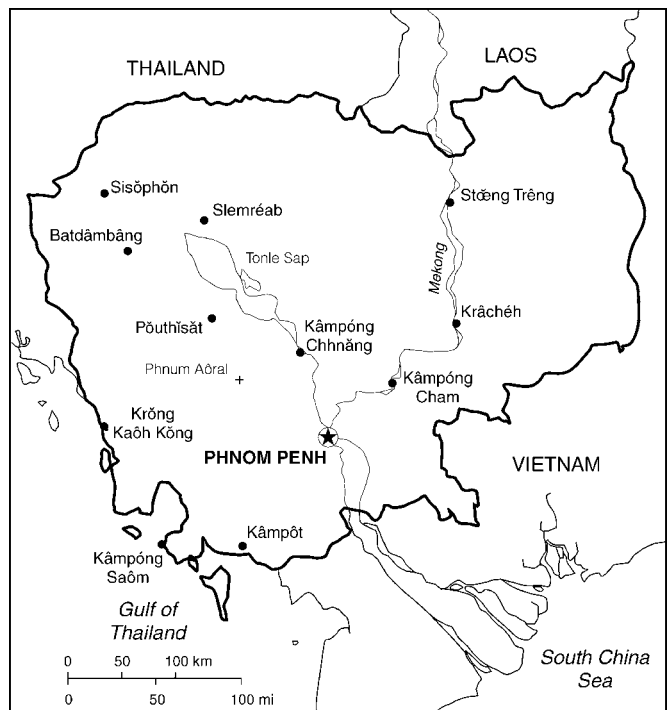

CAMBODIA

OVERVIEW

Cambodia is a small Southeast Asian nation that is just now recovering from a disastrous civil war, but it offers much potential as a welcoming country for LGBT immigrants. Because its national religion is Buddhism and over 95 percent of its population is Buddhist, like its neighbor Thailand, Cambodians do not harbor religiously motivated hatred of homosexuals. The country has an interesting history, with penis worship as part of its religious heritage. With its current king having the reputation of being a gay man, and with its powerful prime minister having spoken out in favor of equality for LGBT people, in its own quiet way Cambodia offers a safe haven for LGBT people.

Over 95 percent of Cambodia's population is Khmer, descendants of the most ancient settlers in Southeast Asia. About 2,000 years ago, when seafaring traders from India began arriving in large numbers in the Mekong River delta area, the Khmer were intensely impacted by Indian culture. They adopted the worship of the Hindu deity Shiva, as well as writing systems that were based on Indian scripts. Indian science, law, political theory, and especially religion, had a huge impact on the Khmer people. With India as their inspiration, over the next few centuries large state-level political organizations emerged as those who gained the economic advantage from new Eurasian trade networks used the profits to build big water irrigation projects. Farmers gave their loyalty and support to a central leader because irrigation vastly increased the yield of their rice farming. Populations increased dramatically.

The political organizations that emerged among the Khmer were city-states, similar to those of ancient Greece. In 802 C.E., a military leader named Jayavarman united all the Khmer city-states, founding the Kambuja Empire. This is where the name Kampuchia, or Cambodia, came from. Shortly after he had consolidated power, Jayavarman was proclaimed to be the god-king of a new religion in a huge Hindu religious ceremony. Jayavarman established a new version of the Hindu religion that was focused around penis worship. What historians call a “Linga Cult” emerged as central to Khmer kingship, religion, and art. The penis was said to represent the Hindu god Shiva, but a major underlying reason for the idea of a Sacred Penis is that it symbolizes the fertilization of life. Just as the farmer needs to scatter seeds in the fields, the penis begins new life by scattering sperm. Documents do not tell what personal reasons led Jayavarman to emphasize penises so much, but for whatever reason he was the instigator for the penis symbols to become a prominent part of religion in Southeast Asia.

Most of the carved stone penises that were central objects of worship in Khmer temples have been stolen over the centuries, though many are now on display in the Cambodian National Museum in Phnom Penh. Water basins were built within the temples, and the water that was poured over one of these stone penises was considered sacred. People coming to the temple washed their face and body in the sacred water, which was believed to bring them good luck and protection from illness.

The Khmer religion strongly emphasized penis worship. In Phnom Kulen, and also at Kbal Spean, in northern Cambodia, 1,000 penises were carved into solid rock in a riverbed, in order to fertilize the waters that fed the surrounding rice paddies. Today these sites are known as “The River of a Thousand Lingas.” The idea of a magical penis is thus engrained into Southeast Asian culture. This belief is reflected, even today, in Southeast Asian religions. Carved penis symbols are blessed by Buddhist monks and have become part of some Buddhist shrines.

After establishing the Kambuja or Khmer Empire, Jayavarman expanded his rule and enlarged the empire from Cambodia into parts of present day Thailand and southern Laos. Once he conquered the warring city-states and established unification, peace and prosperity existed in this area of Southeast Asia. This penis-worshipping king is one of the most important people of medieval world history. He reigned successfully until his death in the year 850 C.E. At a time when Europe was languishing in the Dark Ages, the Khmer Empire became one of the most prosperous societies of that epoch.

Successor kings established their capital at Angkor, which became one of the world’s largest cities with over one million people in residence. By the early 1100s, the Khmer Empire united present-day Cambodia, Thailand, Laos, the southern third of Vietnam, and parts of Myanmar. Many thousands of pilgrims journeyed to Angkor each year to receive blessings from the water that was poured over stone penis symbols. Angkor became a religious center comparable to Mecca for Islam and the Vatican for Catholics. Over the years, millions of religious devotees came to Angkor to worship the Sacred Penis.

In 1181, King Jayavarman VII converted to Buddhism, but he did not remove the stone penises, probably because penis worship was so central to the Khmer religion. Buddhism incorporated the idea of a sacred penis, and even today it is not unusual to see boys and men wearing a small stone carved penis attached to a cord around their waist. This symbol is believed to bring good luck and spiritual protection.

For the rest of his life, Jayavarman VII ruled over a vast Buddhist empire stretching from the shores of Vietnam on the South China Sea, to the plains of Burma. His was one of the world's largest political structures, governing many millions of people. However, in 1351, Thai separatists established their independence as the Kingdom of Siam, and in following centuries Vietnam unified and also expanded over Khmer territory in the Mekong Delta. The Khmer Empire was critically weakened, and never regained its former glory. The Khmer capital was removed to Phnom Penh after the capital at Angkor was captured, and the city of Angkor went into decline and the great temples were abandoned.

By the 1860s, France had expanded its colonial empire into Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. The French retained control until 1942, when the Japanese Empire invaded Southeast Asia. When the Japanese were defeated by the United States in 1945, however, the French tried to reestablish their colonial possessions. Cambodia's royal lineage continued under French patronage, but in the late 1940s, Khmer King Sihanouk reacted against the French and became determined to make Cambodia independent once again. Sihanouk proclaimed independence in 1953, and an era of progress ensued. However, in the 1960s, as Vietnam became embroiled in civil war, Cambodia was drawn into the fighting despite Sihanouk's attempts to remain neutral.

In 1970, American President Richard M. Nixon secretly supported a coup to overthrow King Sihanouk and install a pro-American government. This administration, under Lon Nol, became corrupt. This unpopular American-backed government was opposed by the Chinese-backed Khmer Rouge rebels in 1975. Though many Cambodians supported the Khmer Rouge because they did not like the pro-American government, as soon as the Khmer Rouge established control these ardent communists became even more oppressive than the previous government had been. The Khmer Rouge began a ruthless campaign of terror from which Cambodia has still not completely recovered. The Khmer Rouge ordered all residents of Cambodia's cities to leave them and become peasants. Both Buddhism and Western-style liberal education were declared to be counter-revolutionary. Schools and Buddhist temples were closed and ransacked. Leading monks, intellectuals, artists, and pop musicians, were rounded up and executed. Torture chambers and death camps were established, on the order of what the Nazis and the Stalinists had done in Europe and Russia in the 1940s. Anyone who complained was immediately shot or clubbed to death. Even many young children were killed.

The Khmer Rouge, under the leadership of Pol Pot, ran the economy into the ground, and Cambodia became an economic wasteland. Somewhere between two and three million Cambodians (out of a total population of 10 million) died as a result of mass executions, mass starvation, fighting, and American bombings in the 1970s. In 1979, the Vietnamese communist government invaded Cambodia and installed a government under the leadership of Hun Sen. In a complex struggle for power, with Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge fighting in the forests, the Cambodian civil war continued to bring despair and devastation to the Khmer people into the 1990s.

In 1993, the Kingdom of Cambodia was reestablished as a constitutional democracy, even while the Khmer Rouge continued to resist, and Sihanouk was reinstated as king. Though he had remained popular with the majority of Cambodians, this time he did not have much power, and he had to face a strong Prime Minister in Hun Sen, who was backed by Vietnam. After defusing many crises, by 2004 King Sihanouk had had enough of partisan politics and announced his abdication and retirement.¹

One of the last public announcements that Sihanouk made was his statement that same-sex marriages should be legalized in Cambodia. He said he was inspired by television news reports of gay and lesbian couples in the United States petitioning for legal marriage rights.² This may also have been a calculated political move on his part to legitimate his son as the new king.

Under the 1993 Cambodian constitution, the Royal Council of the Throne selects the successor to the king from among the male members of the dynasty who are age 30 or older. In 2004, the Council bypassed King Sihanouk's eldest son and logical heir, Prince Ranariddh, because he was the head of the Royalist Party and considered too politically partisan to be given the title of king. The Council wanted a king who would remain in largely an apolitical ceremonial role. The Council chose King Sihanouk's seventh son, Prince Norodom Sihamoni, as the new king.

King Sihamoni was born in 1953 and grew up in Europe. From an early age he had a great interest in European classical ballet, an interest his mother encouraged. He was sent to Europe to be educated, and while there he became a star ballet dancer. Later, Prince Sihamoni became director of the Prague Ballet Company. He speaks fluent Czech, French, and English. In the 1990s he became Cambodia's representative to the United Nations and a leader of cultural affairs for the United Nations organization. He has never married or sired children.³

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

What is most crucial for understanding LGBT issues in Cambodia is that all of Khmer society is still recovering from the devastation of the Khmer Rouge years and the civil war that engulfed Cambodia from the 1970s through the 1990s. As a consequence, all aspects of Cambodian society are still in the beginning stages of development. There is, therefore, understandably little organization of an LGBT community or movement. Nevertheless, gay community businesses are starting to spring up. In the capital city of Phnom Penh, within a stone's throw of the National Palace, is a nightclub with a well produced drag show that is popular with ladyboys. Several gay bars and a gay men's saunas also exist in the city, as well as one bar and one sauna in the northern city of Siem Reap. A Cambodian business owner in the seaside resort of Sihanoukville is planning to open a gay disco there.

The mood of Cambodians seems quite accepting of gay people, with little discrimination evident. LGBT people are often open to their families and accepted by their relatives. Same-sex couples can dance together in trendy discos without negative reaction. In 2003, Mu Sochua, the Minister of Women's Affairs in the Cambodian government, made a public statement in support of equal rights for transgendered people, whom she said should be included in women's affairs questions. Gay rights received a big boost in 2007 when Prime Minister Hun Sen made a public statement saying that he favored equal rights for LGBT people. Though no action to pass a nondiscrimination law has been taken by the national legislature, this statement by the Prime Minister has set a tone of acceptance that has helped LGBT people and their families to feel positive about the future.⁴

EDUCATION

Cambodia does not have compulsory education laws, so poor people often do not send their children to school, or if they do attend it is only irregularly and for a few years. Those children whose parents cannot afford to send them to school spend their time playing, fishing, and doing other work to help the family. Given the poverty of Cambodia and the lack of government resources, public schools in Cambodia are substandard. Government schools typically pack 40 to 50 students into each classroom. One of the big problems with Cambodia's government school system is that each student is expected to pay the teacher a certain amount of money each day. Without these daily payments, the teachers could not afford to live, as the monthly salaries provided by the government are so small. The result is that if parents do not have enough money that day, their children cannot go to school. Even with these individual payments, however, the income level for public school teachers is so low that talented people do not go into this field. There is a strong need for teachers and other educated and highly skilled people in Cambodia.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

As a result of the disastrous economic policies of the Khmer Rouge and the long civil war, Cambodia is one of the most impoverished nations in the world today. Considering what the nation was like in the 1990s, Cambodia has made amazing progress within the last decade, but the majority of the population is still desperately poor. Khmer people are industrious, though, and determined to make a better life for themselves and their children in the future. Small businesses and markets have sprung up everywhere, and even with the stress of not knowing if they will have enough money to buy food, there still seems a desire among people to enjoy life.

A major part of the current economic revival is based on tourism. Cambodia benefits from the nearby location of Thailand, which is one of Asia's leading tourist sites. In 2007, over one million people visited Angkor Wat, and the government is making major efforts to encourage tourists to visit other parts of the country and to stay for longer lengths of time. Within this context, LGBT tourists are welcomed in Cambodia, and LGBT businesses are not discriminated against by the government. The Cambodian government is anxious to attract immigrants, who they feel will bring with them skills and experience to help Cambodia's economy grow. While a one-month tourist visa can only be extended for a single additional month, for a bit more money the government offers an extremely flexible business visa, which a foreigner may use to extend his or her stay in Cambodia indefinitely. Little except a cash payment is expected in terms of proving that a business actually exists. Even retired people manage to live in Cambodia on extended business visas.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

The Khmer Rouge considered dance and art to be decadent, and had almost completely wiped out Khmer classical dance and Cambodian folk dancing, but since his coronation, King Sihamoni has emphasized a revitalization of Khmer culture, with art, dance and music being given particular attention. The Royal Academy of the Arts and a fine National Museum are located right next to the National Palace.

When the new constitutional government was established under the 1993 constitution, many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) from Europe and the United States offered to help Cambodia deal with its many problems. Faced with limited resources and a traumatized population in need of many social services, the Cambodian government enthusiastically welcomed these NGOs. Though they have performed many vital services, especially for the poor and for children, and numerous officials have been selflessly devoted to humanitarian goals, the impact of the NGOs has not always been constructive. First, a number of these organizations spent more money on outlandishly high salaries for their Western employees than on the poor Khmer people the organizations were meant to serve. Second, the NGOs have sometimes imposed their own foreign ideologies onto Cambodia in ways that are counter to traditional Khmer values. This is particularly true for sexual issues, especially in imposing Western notions that persons under the age of 18 should not be sexually active. In response to these Western concerns, Cambodia's police enforce strict policies that no one below age 18 should have sex.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Homosexual behavior among adults seems to be a topic of little remark by Cambodians, whose Buddhist religion offers no prohibitions on consensual sex except for monks. Khmer people seem comfortable with LGBT people, both Cambodian and foreign. Cambodians are generally friendly people, and it is not difficult to arrange a sexual liaison with people of either sex. Few prohibitions seem to exist in terms of popular attitudes.

FAMILY

Family relations are strong in Cambodia. Indeed, the family was often the only social institution by which people survived the horrors of the civil war years. Families tend to accept their LGBT members equally without discrimination.

HEALTH

Though some fine hospitals exist in Phnom Penh, Cambodia does not have a good health care system. Many poor people cannot afford medical care and die early. This pattern spelled disaster for many when HIV infections first reached Cambodia in 1990. Soon, Cambodia had the highest rate of people with AIDS of any country in Southeast Asia. Remarkably, though, within the last decade government public awareness campaigns promoting condom use have been extremely successful, to the point that HIV infection rates are now low.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

After the Khmer Rouge killed so many Buddhist monks and tried to suppress Buddhism, there was a pro-Buddhist reaction in Cambodia. Buddhism is once again officially the state religion, and the Cambodian people generally support a Buddhist revival. Government offices and public schools often have statues of the Buddha on prominent display, and Buddhist monks give lectures in public schools. Buddhist schools are also quite prominent in providing an education for students whose parents are too poor for them to afford even the minor costs of attending government high schools.

Buddhist attitudes toward sexuality grew out of the teachings of the Buddha, who lived in northern India 2,500 years ago. Though the Buddha taught that life is inevitably filled with suffering, he also taught that there is a way out of this suffering by letting go of greed and living a simple life. By suppressing greed, anger, and delusion, and instead emphasizing happiness, learning, creativity, and devotion to helping others, a person can aim toward an enlightened state of existence. By recognizing that one can make oneself miserable simply by desiring something that one does not have, the Buddha counseled his followers not to let their desires overtake them. Rather than practicing extreme denial or extreme indulgence, he said that a “Middle Way” approach is best. Rather than repressing one’s desires, or conversely overindulging in them, Buddhists advocate moderation. Happiness is gained, not by indulging in selfish desires to others’ detriment, but by spreading happiness to others.

Rather than seeing sex, including homosexual sex, as sinful, Buddhist ethics focus on creating happiness. If a person rapes another person, or imposes himself sexually on another person against their will, then that causes unhappiness and is morally condemned. On the other hand, if a person gives happiness to another person, whether through sexual enjoyment or through other means, that is considered a moral good. Whether sexual happiness is provided to a person of the other sex or of the same sex is immaterial. Buddhism thus takes a neutral attitude on homosexuality or heterosexuality. Above all, the Buddha stressed the need to show compassion and respect toward all people and toward all sentient beings of the earth and the wider universe. An accurate understanding of Khmer attitudes toward sexuality necessitates an understanding of Buddhist ethics. Buddhism so thoroughly permeates Khmer society today that it is a crucial element in Khmer tolerance of gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered people.

VIOLENCE

Though Cambodia was an extremely violent society into the 1990s, with heavily armed factions battling each other in the civil war, in recent years there has been a strong government program to confiscate firearms. As a result, violence is no longer a major problem in Cambodia. There is no noticeable violence directed against LGBT people because of their sexual orientation or gender expression.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Though Cambodia’s recent history has been full of tragedy, and though it remains among the world’s most impoverished countries, it has the potential to become a significant haven for LGBT people fleeing oppression in other countries. Foremost in importance is the lack of religiously inspired homophobia, due to Buddhism’s attitude of compassion and respect for all people. With recent public statements by King Sihanouk and by Prime Minister Hun Sen in support of LGBT equality, if the government will follow up with passage of an antidiscrimination law and with legalization of same-sex marriage, Cambodia could become a leading nation in the area of gay rights.

CHINA

Hongwei Bao

OVERVIEW

The People's Republic of China (Zhonghua Renmin Gongheguo) is located in East Asia and is one of the largest countries in the world. It has diverse climates, ranging from tropics in the south to subarctic in the north, and various terrains, including mountains, high plateaus and deserts in the west, and plains, deltas, and hills in the east.

China is one of the oldest continuous civilizations in the world. The history of China is told in historical records that date back 5,000 years. Archaeological discoveries date Chinese history to the 16th century B.C.E. Emperor Qinshihuang unified the different city-states of the Yellow River Valley into a large empire in 221 B.C.E.

China's long dynastic history came to an end in 1912 when the Republic of China was founded by Sun Yat-sen. The Communist Party took power in 1949 and the socialist era began. After the death of Mao Zedong, China launched its "reform and open-up" policy in 1978 and began to transform from a centrally planned system to a more market-orientated economy with a rapidly growing private sector.

China has 23 provinces, five autonomous regions, four municipalities, and two special administrative regions (Hong Kong and Macau).¹ China is a communist state run by the Communist Party of China. China practices socialism with Chinese characteristics, in other words, state socialism with a market economy. It has the world's fourth-largest economy and second-largest purchasing power parity.² However, there are wide gaps in wealth distribution in China between the eastern coastal regions and the western mountainous regions, between the economically developed south and the developing north, and between urban and rural areas.

China is the most populous country in the world (1.3 billion) and is home to about one fifth of the world's total population. China has 56 ethnic groups, though 91.9 percent of the population is Han Chinese and the other 55 groups comprise the remaining 8.1 percent of the population.³ The main dialects under the umbrella term Chinese (Zhongwen or Hanyu) include Putonghua (Standard Chinese or Mandarin), Yue (Cantonese), Wu (Shanghainese), Minbei (Fuzhou), Minnan (Hokkien-Taiwanese), Xiang, Gan, and Hakka. These dialects mostly share the same written form, though people from other ethnic groups in China have their own spoken languages and written scripts.

Officially, China is an atheist country, but the major religions practiced include Daoism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam, among others. Traditional Chinese society manifested a blending of Confucianism, Taoism, and Buddhism. Maoist communism, neoliberalism, and other philosophical modes of thought have also taken hold in socialist and postsocialist China.

Gender equality is advocated by the Chinese government. Women are officially entitled to the same rights as men, such as suffrage and employment, and have been since the Maoist era. In reality, there are still considerable gender and sexual disparities in Chinese society.⁴ China's male and female populations are unbalanced after three decades of the implementation of the birth control policy.⁵ The sex ratio of males to females is 1.06.⁶

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Historical records reveal that homoerotic behaviors were widely practiced in China's imperial court by the 8th and 7th century B.C.E.⁷ The homoerotic tradition, also referred to as "passions of the cut sleeve," came to an end at the beginning of the 20th century when China imported Western sexology as part of its modernization process. In Chinese history, there are numerous terms to describe homoerotic behaviors, most of which are historical tropes (e.g., longyang, fentao, duanxiu) or descriptions of people's preferences or behaviors (e.g., nanse, nanfeng, nanyu, nanyin, dapengpeng), or references to people's social roles and statuses (waichong, ningxing, airen, qixiong, qidi, xiaochang, xianggong), depending on specific historical contexts.⁸

Homoerotic behaviors were largely tolerated in premodern Chinese societies mainly because they did not challenge the Confucian idea of the patrilineal social and familial order, as most people who practiced homoeroticism were also part of a heterosexual marriage in order to perform their social and familial duties. Premodern Chinese homoeroticisms also did not disrupt social hierarchies, as there were distinct power distances in most of the relationships, for instance, between emperors and ministers, between masters and servants, between patrons and prostitutes, between patrons and theatre actors, and between elders and younger people. The major Chinese religions and systems of ethics did not condemn homoeroticism.

The early 20th century saw the introduction of ideas of gender and sexual binaries and sexual perversions when China was invaded by Western imperial and colonial powers. The concept of homosexuality was constructed but homoerotic behaviors were still practiced as before in Republican China (1912–1949). Mao's socialist China (1949–1976) practiced sexual asceticism, and homosexuality, depicted either as “feudal remnants” or as “decadence from the West,” was erased from socialist history. After 1978, postsocialist China's “reform and open-up” policy witnessed the influence of global capitalism, the rise of individualism, and the emergence of gay identities.

An LGBT subculture is booming in major Chinese cities like Beijing, Shanghai, Guangzhou, and others, as evidenced by the appearance of bars, saunas, salons, and sex venues. The rise of the mass media (especially the Internet), the HIV/AIDS campaign, and community-building efforts by academics, social workers, and activists has also contributed to the emergence of LGBT communities in China. The society is, in general, tolerant of LGBT persons, in that there are no laws or religious edicts against LGBT practices in China. Besides, Chinese society shows different cultural understandings of same-sex friendship and intimacy, especially between females, than is found in the West and accepts varied expressions of masculinities and homosociality.⁹ The biggest pressure for LGBT people is not homophobia, legal persecution, or religious condemnation per se, but the pressure from families and society to undertake a heterosexual marriage and to perform the traditional filial role.

At present, some of the challenges LGBT people face include: (1) the pressure from families and society to enter into heterosexual marriages and the performance of traditional filial role; (2) no law or antidiscrimination legislation guarantees LGBT persons' legal rights; (3) there is limited community support and few LGBT public spaces; and (4) a lack of empathetic representations in media and social life. Most people do not have much knowledge about LGBT people; some deny their existence, and some hold a negative opinion of them and relate them to abnormality (biantai), psychiatric disease (xinli jibing), moral decadence (daode baihuai), lifestyle decadence (shenghuo zuofeng youwenti), and as carriers of HIV/AIDS.

The current Chinese government takes an ambiguous attitude towards LGBT issues. It does not initiate laws to protect LGBT rights, but neither does it enact laws against LGBT people. It allows some representations of LGBT issues in the mass media, especially related to HIV/AIDS campaigns, and allows some NGOs and community support, but within certain limits. The government strictly forbids public demonstrations. Most LGBT people have to conceal their sexual identities at school, at work, in the army, and in different walks of life. Many LGBT activists in China do not support the coming out strategy and the public demand for political rights common in the West. Some advocate an indigenous tongzhi (“gay” or “queer,” depending on the context) politics that is less confrontational and more embedded in traditional Chinese family values.¹⁰

Some of the major events in Chinese LGBT history include: the deletion of hooliganism (liumangzui) from the Chinese criminal law in 1997, which is generally considered to be the decriminalization of homosexuality in China, and the excision of homosexuality as a mental disorder in the Chinese Classification of Mental Disorders (CCMD-3) in 2001, which is regarded as the depathologization of homosexuality in China.

The terms used to refer to LGBT people in the modern Chinese language are extremely diverse both geographically and historically. The most commonly used indigenous terms for gays and lesbians are tongxinglian and tongzhi (gay man: nan tongxinglian or nan tongzhi; lesbian: nü tongxinglian or nü tongzhi). The English words gay, lesbian, and their derivatives are also in use (e.g., les, leisi, leisibian, lazi, lala). Different regions, provinces, and cities also have their local terms, such as piaopiao (Sichuan province), bingzi (Wuhan), boli (Nanjing, Taiwan), gei-lou (Guangdong), ban (Lanzhou), and huo (Urumqi), to name only a few.

The most commonly used term for bisexuality is shuangxinglian; for transsexuality bianxing; for transvestism yizhuang; for sadomasochism nuelian; for queer ku'er; and for straight people yixinglian or zhiren. Gay men generally receive more public attention and thus more representation than lesbians, bisexuals, transgendered people, and those of other sexualities in China.

EDUCATION

China has a nine-year compulsory education system. All children are required to receive elementary and junior middle school education, although the policy has been poorly implemented in some rural and remote regions. Most of the schools and universities in China are government-funded and operate using a state-regulated curriculum. Most students have to take English (or other foreign/ethnic languages) and political science (mainly Marxism and Maoism) from primary school through the university level. Many universities have expanded the number of enrollments in the past decade, but the state-regulated university undergraduate and postgraduate entrance examinations are still very competitive. In recent years, more and more private schools and universities have been founded and some students choose to go to private schools or to study abroad.

Chinese education advocates gender equality, but many female students still face unequal treatment at school. There are always LGBT teachers and students in schools, but there are no laws or policies to protect their rights. Some LGBT people are discriminated against and bullied by straight people. Most choose to keep silent at school about their sexuality.

Most schools and universities do not offer gender and sexuality education programs. Sex and sexualities, in particular, are usually taboo or sensitive topics in classroom settings. Within the limited gender, sex, and sexuality education programs in some schools, heteronormativity is assumed and advocated. Naturally, some LGBT people get help and support from their teachers, parents, friends, books, and the Internet, but the lack of support in the public education system is frustrating to some LGBT people.

In the past decade, several universities have begun to offer women's studies, gender studies, and sexuality studies courses; for instance, the Institute for Research on Sexuality and Gender at Renmin University of China in Beijing; the Center for Women and Gender Studies at Sun Yat-sen University in Guangzhou;

Fudan University–Michigan University Centre for Gender Studies in Shanghai; and the Women’s Studies Center at Peking University in Beijing. In 1985, Pan Suiming taught postsocialist China’s first course in sexual sociology at Renmin University of China. In 2003, the School of Public Health at Fudan University offered China’s first postgraduate course in LGBT education, tongxinglian jiankang shehui kexxue (homosexual health social sciences).¹¹ This was followed in 2005 by tongxinglian yanjiu (homosexuality studies), the first optional course available to all undergraduate students at Fudan University. Meanwhile, many universities, including Peking University, Renmin University of China, and Sun Yat-sen University offer public lectures in gender and sexuality to their students, and more and more postgraduate students choose topics on gender and sexuality studies for their papers or dissertations.¹² The Institute for Research on Sexuality and Gender at Renmin University of China offers funding for schools and teachers to start courses on sexuality studies; it also offers scholarships for students to undertake gender and sexuality research.¹³

Beginning in the 1990s, gender and sexuality research began to surface in the fields of gender studies, sociology, health science, and sexology. Some of the important scholars and researchers include: Dai Jinhua, Fang Gang, Li Xiaojiang, Li Yinhe, Liu Dalin, Pan Suiming, Zhang Beichuan, Tong Ge, Guo Xiaofei, and Wei Wei. Li Yinhe published the first book of sociological research on Chinese gay men (Tamen de Shijie, Their World) in 1992 in Hong Kong. Li was also one of the first Chinese academics to introduce Foucault and queer theory to China. Zhang Beichuan, a medical doctor, published the first book on homosexual medical research (Tongxing'ai, Same Sex Love) in 1994. Pan Suiming has conducted many sociological studies on gender and sexuality, most notably prostitution, in contemporary China in the last decade.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

In socialist China, most workers were employed by state-owned enterprises and farmers worked for the state-owned communes. People have more choices in postsocialist China. Some urban citizens work for private enterprises and joint ventures.

Some researchers have pointed out that members of the LGBT community in China generally have higher levels of education and better jobs than members of other communities,¹⁴ yet there have not been many convincing statistics produced to date to support this assertion.

There are no anti-discrimination statutes in China to protect LGBT people’s rights in employment. Many LGBT people have to conceal their sexual identities at work.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

There are some governmental and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that work with the LGBT community on HIV/AIDS prevention. They include the Ministry of Health, the Chinese Center for Disease Control and Prevention, the Chinese Association of STD/AIDS Prevention and Control, the Chi Heng Foundation, Love Knowledge (Aizhi) Action, and the Beijing Gender Health Education Institute.¹⁵ Social and government programs that target the LGBT community with no connection to HIV/AIDS are very rare.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

A survey of 195 LGBT people conducted between 1991 and 1992 shows the various sexual practices that LGBT people engage in: masturbation (85.6%), skin touching (97.4%), hugging (87.2%), kissing (79%), anal sex (36.9%), oral sex (26.2%), and the use of sex toys (3.1%).¹⁶ It is interesting to note that anal sex, oral sex, and toys were not the most common forms of LGBT sexual practice in China. It would seem that the deepest expression of intimacy in China is not xing (sex) per se, but qing (deep sentiment or passion).¹⁷

Another of the interesting observations about LGBT sexual practices in China is the division of distinct sexual roles and the terms associated with them. Some of the most common are: 1 (top), 0 (bottom), 1/0 douke (versatile), T (butch lesbian), P (femme lesbian), bufen (versatile lesbian). Jargon including 69 (mutual, simultaneous oral sex), 419 (one night stand), MB (money boy), and zuo (have sex) are also often used.

The major cities in China have gay bars, saunas, and other sexual venues for LGBT people. Some people also cruise in beats including parks and public toilets. Group sex and sex in the public are not only considered promiscuous and obscene, but are also illegal. People who have sex in public are often detained for a short time (up to 15 days) under the charge of disrupting public order (raoluan gonggong zhi'an).

Safe sex is a big problem in the LGBT community. In one survey of 2,500 people, 79.7 percent of the participants considered it necessary to use condoms in sexual intercourse, yet only 30.9 percent reported using condoms every time and 50 percent admitted that they seldom or never use condoms.¹⁸ This has been given attention to by governmental and NGOs working on HIV/AIDS prevention.

FAMILY

As a Confucian society, China places family (jia) as the top priority in a person's social relationships, hence the importance of marriage and posterity. Extended families used to be the traditional family structure in China; in postsocialist China, with the one-child policy and young people's increasing financial independence from their extended families, nuclear families have become the primary family structure in urban areas. With the reform of the marriage law and the changing concepts of marriage, many single families and DINK (double income, no kids) families also began to appear. Some young people choose not to get married and have children. In this social and cultural context, LGBT people negotiate in different ways with the institution of heterosexual marriage.

More than 90 percent of Chinese LGBT people choose to enter into a heterosexual marriage.¹⁹ The institution of marriage is so deeply rooted in China that sometimes marriage becomes a public matter instead of a private matter: parents worry about it; neighbors talk about it; colleagues offer suggestions, and everyone looks for different ways to be helpful, serving as matchmakers and gossiping about other people's sexualities if they are not married by a certain age. Marriage is also related to other social institutions, including housing, social welfare, and jobs. It is hard for LGBT people to remain single due to pressures from their families, colleagues, and society.

Under such circumstances, LGBT people have come up with different solutions: getting married and trying to lead a heterosexual family lifestyle, getting married and then divorcing, finding another LGBT person and having a marriage of convenience, remaining single and coming out to the family if necessary, or bringing the LGBT partner home and making him or her a part of the family.²⁰

Family is an important theme in the Chinese LGBT community. Most LGBT people would like to find a long-term relationship and lead a heteronormative lifestyle with their partner. Many consider 419 (one-night stand) and MB (money boys, male prostitutes) to be promiscuous (luan) or 'low quality' (sushi di) practices.²¹

Under China's marriage law, marriage is defined as being between people of opposite sexes. Although there have been some LGBT marriages in China, most of them were not officially registered or legally protected.²² Chinese law, however, acknowledges the validity of LGBT marriages involving Chinese citizens when they are held and registered in other countries.²³

Lin Yinhe, one of the country's leading sociologists in sexuality studies, proposed the legalization of same-sex marriage to the National People's Congress in 2003, 2005, and 2006. She also advocated the legalization of sex between consensual adults (e.g., luan'ou, exchanging sex partners between consensual couples) in 2006.²⁴ Despite strong public opposition, her opinions have triggered heated discussion in the media.

COMMUNITY

China's LGBT community began to emerge in the 1990s. In 1992, Wan Yanhai started the first HIV/AIDS hotline targeting the LGBT community. On November 22, 1992, the China Health Education Institute, in Beijing, hosted the Men's World salon, an LGBT social club. February 14, 1993 witnessed a special Valentine's Day celebration sponsored by Men's World at the Seahorse Dance Club (Haima Gewuting). In 1994, Wan Yanhai initiated Aizhi Action (Aizhi Xingdong), China's first NGO devoted to HIV/AIDS prevention and the LGBT community, and published the Aizhi Newsletter (Aizhi Jianbao) in the following year. In 1995, China Rainbow, an LGBT group in Beijing, wrote a letter addressing LGBT liberation in China to the overseas media. These were some of the earliest community activities, and they attracted great attention from domestic and international media.

This was also the time when the Fourth World Conference on Women was held in Beijing (1995) and the First World Tongzhi Conference was held in Hong Kong. Meanwhile, LGBT bars began to appear in big cities in China. In 1997, LGBT hotlines were started in Beijing; in 1998, LGBT activists from all over China met in Beijing and discussed community building issues. In December 2001, the first Beijing Gay and Lesbian Film Festival was held at Peking University; in April 2005, the second Gay and Lesbian Film Festival was held at Peking University.²⁵ On December 16, 2005, the first Gay and Lesbian Culture Festival was held in Beijing.²⁶ In 2006, the first officially registered LGBT student group, the Rainbow Society (caihongshe), was established at Sun Yat-sen University. In 2007, a Lesbian Leaders Training Camp was held in Zhuhai, the First University Tongzhi Art Summer Camp was held in Beijing, the First Tongzhi Karaoke Singing Competition (Feichang Shuaige) was held in Beijing, and the third Queer Film Forum was held in Beijing as a continuation of the Beijing Gay and Lesbian Festival. China's LGBT community activities are gaining more participation and public attention.

On June 7–11, 2009, the Shanghai LGBT Group held the first LGBT Pride Week in Shanghai, which received wide media and public attention. Meanwhile, The First Polysexuality Art Exhibition (July 14–21, 2009) and the Fourth Queer Film Festival (June 17–21, 2009) were successfully held in Songzhuang, Beijing.

By 2006, there were more than 60 LGBT groups in China. Some of them are NGOs registered with Administration for Civil Affairs (minzheng bumen) at different levels, and some are nonprofit organizations registered with Administration for Industry and Commerce (gongshang bumen) at different levels; most are unofficial grassroots organizations.

From 1998 to 2000, with the growth of computer and Internet use, online LGBT communities began to boom in China.²⁷ By the end of May 2004, there were about 360 LGBT Web sites in China.²⁸ Most of the LGBT sites are officially registered with the Ministry of Information Industry and are not sexually explicit. The services the most LGBT Web sites offer include news and information, personal ads, bulletin boards, chat rooms, blogs, Q & As, and information on HIV/AIDS prevention. Some sites host hotlines and organize parties and clubs.

HEALTH

China's health care system is administered by the Ministry of Health. Most hospitals are public ones, though there is an increasing number of private hospitals and also an increasing number of public hospitals being privatized in recent years. For urban citizens who are affiliated with a work unit (danwei), medical expenses are generally covered by the state. Many rural citizens do not have medical insurance. There are few, if any, hospitals and clinics designed specifically for the LGBT community. Major hospitals in China typically have a men's clinic, a women's clinic, a skin clinic, and a blood clinic; some hospitals also have a sexual disease clinic. The services offered in private practices can be extremely varied.

Homosexuality as a concept did not emerge in China until the beginning of the 20th century when Western medicine, sexology, and psychology were introduced to China. Works by Havelock Ellis, Sigmund Freud, Magnus Hirschfeld, and Richard von Krafft-Ebing introduced China to the concepts of sexuality and homosexuality and the words were translated into Chinese. "Dr. Sex," Zhang Jingsheng, even associated Chinese people's androgyny, gender reversion, sexual incompetence, and homosexuality with China's racial inferiority.²⁹ However, homosexuality was widely interpreted as a "temporary aberration, a mental disease or an 'inversion'" and sodomy was considered "an act of social transgression acquired like a bad habit" that could be changed by time and experts.³⁰ This nonessentialist understanding of homosexuality is still popular among many Chinese people.

Beginning in the mid-1980s, the communists' hostility towards sex was challenged by the translations of Havelock Ellis, Magnus Hirschfeld, and the Kinsey Report and the emergence of medical sexology in China. The first book on sexology in postsocialist China was published in 1982,³¹ and the first article on homosexuality written by medical professionals was published in 1985.³² From 1989–1990, Liu Dalin, from Shanghai University, conducted postsocialist China's first xingwenming (sexual civilization) survey involving 20,000 participants.³³ In 1993, Pan Suiming and Wu Zongjian conducted a survey of 810 LGBT people in 18 Chinese cities sponsored by the World Health Organization.³⁴ In 1989 and 1994, homosexuality was included in the second edition of Chinese Classification of Mental Disorders (CCMD-2) and its revised edition. In 2001, homosexuality was deleted from the third edition of Chinese Classification of Mental Disorder (CCMD-3), an act generally regarded as the depathologization of homosexuality in China. In spite of these developments some medical professionals and sociologists still insist that LGBT people who are not self-harmonious (ziwo hexie) need treatment.³⁵ In the 1980s and 1990s, Lu Longguang, a medical doctor from Nanjing Medical University, treated 1,000 homosexual patients with shudao jiaozheng xinli zhiliao (guided psychotherapy for correction), a method that combines psychological counseling with aversion therapy, with an alleged success rate of 13.5 percent.³⁶

China's first HIV/AIDS case was reported in 1985. By the end of 2007, China had 700,000 people living with HIV/AIDS, including 85,000 AIDS patients. Two thirds of the AIDS infections were caused by blood transfusions and are found mainly among drug users.³⁷ The majority of new HIV/AIDS infections have occurred as a result of heterosexual sex (44.7%), intravenous drug use (42%), men who have sex with men (12.2%) and mother to infant transmission (1.1%).³⁸ The LGBT community works actively with the Chinese government and health organizations on HIV/AIDS prevention and education.

The National Plan of HIV/AIDS Prevention (1988–1991) asserted that homosexuality had been strictly banned to prevent HIV/AIDS beginning 1984, and the Mid-Term Plan for HIV/AIDS Prevention and Control (1990–1992) declared that homosexuality was illegal in China, demonstrating a lack of knowledge about Chinese law.³⁹ On the other hand, the HIV/AIDS campaign helped the visibility and development of the LGBT community. The Chinese government did not officially address the issue of LGBT people until 2004 when the Ministry of Health publicized the number of gay men (five to 10 million) in China in its HIV/AIDS report. In 2005, China's national television network (China Central Television) interviewed a gay man with AIDS on its news program, and followed the interview up with a number of reports on the LGBT community and HIV/AIDS in various Chinese media.⁴⁰ Chinese academics, LGBT activists, and social workers appropriated the HIV/AIDS discourse and increased the visibility of the LGBT community in this way.

POLITICS AND LAW

There is no law against homosexuality in China. Even in premodern China, laws against homosexuality were quite lenient compared to some European countries. The Zhenhe era (1111–1118) of the Song dynasty witnessed laws against male prostitutes, (nanchang) with a punishment of 100 blows with a heavy bamboo cane and a fine paid to whomever reported the case to the judge. Cross-dressing male prostitutes were also punished for “not being male” (bunan) during the Song dynasty.⁴¹ This law was targeted at the prostitution rampant in society at that time, rather than against LGBT people themselves.

The earliest legal code explicitly banning male same-sex sexual intercourse appeared during the Jiajing Reign (1522–1567) of the Ming dynasty. The punishment was 100 blows with a heavy bamboo cane. The 1679 Qing Law marked the first appearance of the word jijian (male same-sex sodomy) in Chinese law. Most notably, consensual sodomy between males (hetong jijian) was also punished with 100 blows with a heavy bamboo cane.⁴² Historical records revealed that the law was mainly targeted at male rape and sexual violence against adolescents, and that the eroticism between consenting male adults was seldom punished. Consensual same-sex sexual intercourse has not appeared in China's laws since the 1903 Qing law deleted hetong jijian from the legal code.⁴³

Modern Chinese law belongs to the Civil Law (or Continental Law) system, in which judges refer to general rules before referencing to case law. The socialist Criminal Law is quite ambiguous about same-sex sexual behaviors. The legal explanation from the Supreme People's Court regarding a male same-sex consensual sexual behavior case in Heilongjiang Province in 1957 declared that the case should be dropped for lack of legal code support. This principle was also applied to a 1991 lesbian case in Anhui Province.⁴⁴ The 1979 Criminal Law applied less than seven years of imprisonment to "other hooligan activities" (qita liumang huodong) that "broke the public social order to a great extent" (pohuai gonggong zhixu, qingjie elie). In 1984, the Supreme People's Court and the Supreme People's Procuratorate specified six forms of hooliganism (liumangzui), including sodomy (jijian), focusing on sexual violence and sex with minors.⁴⁵

Although written law does not target LGBT people, the law in action has seen some judges and policemen punishing LGBT people, especially gay men who have sex in public, with the charge of hooliganism (liumangzui).

China's Criminal Law in 1997 deleted hooliganism, an act considered by the Chinese LGBT community to be the decriminalization of homosexuality. Illegal behaviors including prostitution, pedophilia, incest, rape, sadism, and group sex apply to LGBT people as much as to straight people. Another symbolically significant case for China's LGBT community was the Fang Gang case of 1999, in which the Beijing Xuanwu District Court deleted the sentence "homosexuality is seen as an abnormal sexual behavior; it is not accepted by the public" from the judge's ruling.⁴⁶ In 2000, the Ministry of Public Security stated that it was a citizen's individual right to choose one's gender and sex for themselves. These events are both hailed by LGBT scholars and activists as efforts to destigmatize LGBT people and to contribute to the construction of LGBT communities and identities in China.

In spite of these advances, it would be problematic to assume that LGBT people are not discriminated against or mistreated in China, despite the lack of law against homosexuality. There is no law to protect LGBT people's rights including privacy, antidiscrimination, antibullying, or the right to free speech and association. During the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976) and in the postsocialist era (after 1978), many LGBT people were badly treated when their sexualities were discovered, or when caught by the police while cruising.⁴⁷ The ambiguous law leaves policemen much room for inconsistent treatment of the LGBT population. Before 1997, some LGBT people having sex in public cruising venues were caught and detained (generally for 15 days). The most severe punishment for LGBT acts in postsocialist China came in response to a consensual sex case between an adult and a 16-year-old boy, which led to seven years of imprisonment for the adult.⁴⁸ Arbitrary administrative sanctions were also a common form of punishment. Since most Chinese are affiliated with a work unit, punishments including job loss, economic sanctions, public criticism, and deprivation or loss of Communist Party membership could bring much suffering and injustice to LGBT workers. The situation improved after the implementation of the new Criminal Law in 1997, but still many LGBT people are afraid of coming out for fear of losing their jobs and encountering social discrimination.

Discriminatory rules and regulations still exist in China. According to the Blood Bank Regulations issued by the Ministry of Health in 1998, gays and lesbians are not allowed to donate blood. China's LGBT communities still have a long way to go to negotiate with the government for official and public support.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Traditional Han Chinese spirituality is a combination of Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism. None of these traditions is strongly anti-homosexual. Some Catholic, Protestant Christian, and Islamic groups are anti-LGBT, but they have never made any public condemnations against the LGBT community in China.

Confucianism, the dominant ideology in premodern China, is more concerned with achieving social harmony by maintaining the Three Cardinal Guides (san'gang) and Five Constant Virtues (wuchang).⁴⁹ Maintaining the patrilineal family line through marriage and posterity and the social order by performing one's role in the family and society are often stressed. Premodern China was tolerant of homoeroticism, in that homoeroticism itself does not transgress social hierarchy and familial order. However, under the Ming and Qing dynasties, sodomy was punished by law because the behavior itself endangered the social order by transgressing the gender norms and hence a man's social status.⁵⁰ Confucian values of family and posterity often pose difficult and complex problems for LGBT people when they are faced with pressures from society and family to marry.

Taoism is China's oldest religion. It is based on a rejection of essentialism and an understanding of the cosmos as an equilibrium of interaction between two forces: yin and yang. While yin is basically associated with femininity and yang with masculinity, neither is stable and both are interdependent and inter-transformable. Having sex is considered an exchange of yin and yang life energies (qi); appropriate and moderate sexual activities are beneficial to people's health. Men have a limited supply of yang and women an unlimited supply of yin. Same-sex eroticism does not affect the equilibrium as for two men, homoerotic sexual behavior is considered as exchanging yang energy and nothing is lost; for two women, nothing matters, as they have inexhaustible supply of yin energy.⁵¹ This yin/yang or wen/wu (martial/civil) dichotomy of gender also frees Chinese people from the masculinity and femininity gender stereotypes common in many Western countries. Gender (yin/yang or wen/wu) is not fixed and essentialized in a person; nor is it strictly bound up with sex (man/woman).⁵² Thus, the Taoist concepts of sex as an exchange of energy (qi) so as to enhance health and gender as mixed and changing forms of yin/yang play a positive role in people's perception of LGBT gender and sexuality.

Buddhism did not come to China until the first century B.C.E. Most Chinese, deeply influenced by Confucianism and Taoism, frown at its asceticism, its future-orientation, and its lack of responsibility for the family and society. Homoeroticism in Buddhist temples and nunneries and the intimate relationship between the master and students in Tibetan Buddhism, however, were often recorded in premodern vernacular literature.

Christianity was introduced into China in 635, according to historical records, but it has never been a strong influence on the culture. Christian missionaries sent to China were shocked by premodern China's tolerance of homoeroticism and portrayed China as a new Sodom.⁵³ In recent years, some evangelical churches have begun to appear in China and condemn homosexuality online and in other public spaces.

VIOLENCE

Homophobia has never been a big issue in Chinese society due to China's lack of the Christian tradition of considering sodomy a sin. However, violence against LGBT people has occurred in different periods of Chinese history, especially during the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976) and before China's decriminalization (1997) and depathologization (2001) of homosexuality.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

China is a country with a long homoerotic tradition. It is also a country with a strong tolerance of homosexuality. Homosexuality has been decriminalized and depathologized in China, yet homophobia and violence against LGBT people is not common. Perhaps reflective of this, the outdated sexology of deeming homosexuality a disease is also prevalent in Chinese society. Many people hold strong biases against LGBT people and associate them with disease and deviance. Most Chinese LGBT people face pressure from their families and society to marry, and many do. They also do not often dare to come out and challenge the heteronormativity in the society.

LGBT academics, activists, social workers, and NGOs have appropriated the government discourse of HIV/AIDS prevention and have fought for increasing LGBT rights and public visibility. In many cities, a gay subculture has begun to emerge with an increase in the number of bars, saunas, clubs, social groups, and publications. Gay culture is booming now, especially on the Internet, with more and more LGBT people constructing their identities and communities in cyberspace. Many people seem to agree that the Stonewall form of gay politics, including coming out and fighting for political rights, does not work in the Chinese context. Instead, the Chinese LGBT community needs to build its own indigenous politics for individual and group empowerment.⁵⁴

With these challenges in mind, LGBT people in China have reason to hope for and to work toward a better future.

Video/Film

- A Queer Story (Jilao Sisbi)*, DVD, directed by Shu Kei. (1996; Hong Kong: Golen Harvest Entertainment, 1996). Tells the tale of the joys and sorrows of a middle-aged gay man in Hong Kong.
- Bishonen (Meishaonian Zhilian)*, DVD, directed by Yon Fan (1998; Hong Kong: Far Sun Films, 1998). The love story between several handsome young men, one of those well-crafted bishonen (beautiful boy) stories with a tragic ending, popularly enjoyed by youth in transnational Asia.
- Butterfly (Hudie)*, DVD, directed by Mak Yan Yan (2004; Hollywood: Paramount Pictures, 2004). Based on Chen Xue's novel The Mark of Butterfly (Hudie de Jihao). A Hong Kong lesbian film narrating lesbian love and aspiration for freedom of love set in a complex historical setting. The film was chosen as the opening film at Venice Film Festival Critics Week and Tian Yuan, one of the leading actresses, was awarded the Best New Artist prize at the Hong Kong Film Festival in 2005. The film was also nominated at the Taiwan Golden Horse Awards in 2004 for Best Adapted Screenplay (Yan Man Mak) and Best New Performer (Tian Yuan).
- East Palace, West Palace (Donggong Xigong)*, also known as Behind the Forbidden City, DVD, directed by Zhang Yuan (1996; Amazon Entertainment/Cean Films/ Quelqu'un d'Autre Productions, 1996). Adapted from renowned Chinese writer Wang Xiaobo's fiction. Queer desire challenges the state of masculinity. Transgenderism and sadomasochism are involved. This is an art film with deep meanings and rich symbolism.
- Enter the Clowns (Choujue Dengchang)*, DVD, directed by Cui Zi'en (2001; Beijing: Cuizi Film Studio, 2001). Cui is one of the most famous queer directors and activists in mainland China. This is one of his early queer films. The film depicts transgender people's lives and explores queer ethics.
- Farewell, My Concubine (Baiwang Bieji)*, DVD, directed by Chen Kaige (1993; Hong Kong: Tompson Films/ Beijing: China Film Co-Production Corporation/ Beijing: Beijing Film Studio, 1993). This film depicts the life-long love entanglement between two Beijing Opera singers and their fate in different historical eras in modern China. One of the best films directed by Chen Kaige. Famous actors/actress Leslie Cheung, Gong Li, and Zhang Fengyi give brilliant performances in the film. The Beijing Opera and Kunqu Opera scene in the film is absolutely beautiful. This is also a good film to learn about the histories of classical Chinese theatre (Beijing Opera), the city of Beijing, and even China in the first half of the 20th century. The film won numerous awards, including the Palme d'Or, Cannes Film Festival, 1993 and Best Film not in the English language, BAFTA (British Academy Awards), 1993.
- Feeding Boys Ayaya (Ayaya, Qu Buru)*, DVD, directed by Cui Zi'en. (2003; Beijing: Cui Zi'en Film Studio, 2003). A film about gigolos in Beijing, this is an allegory about resistance to official ideology and refusal of redemption.
- Fish and Elephant (Jinnian Xiatian)*, DVD, directed by Li Yu (2001; Studio City, USA: Ariztical Entertainment, 2006). This was the first Mainland Chinese film about lesbian love, and winner of the Elvira Notari Prize, Venice Film Festival, 2001 and Best Asian Film Prize at Forum of New Cinema, Berlin International Film Festival, 2002.

- Happy Together (Chunguang Zhaxie)*, DVD, directed by Wong Kar-wai (1997; Hong Kong: Block 2 Pictures/ Premon H./ Seowoo Films/ Jet Tone, 1997). This is a love story between two gay men from Hong Kong who travel to Argentina. The film was made before Hong Kong returned to China in 1997, and narrates Hong Kong's anxiety about belonging and an unknown future. The performances by Leslie Cheung and Tony Leung Chiu Wai are fantastic. The film also features the beautiful music and impressive camera shots typical of Wang Kar-wai's film style. The film won numerous awards, including Best Director (Wong Kar-wai), Palme d'Or Nominated, Cannes Film Festival, 1997. Highly recommended.
- Intimates (Zishu)*, DVD, directed by Cheung Chi Leung (1997; Hong Kong: Golden Harvest Entertainment, 1997). A love story between zishunü; portrays lesbianism in southern China.

HONG KONG

Sam Winter and Mark E. King

OVERVIEW

Hong Kong (the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region) is one of two such regions of the People's Republic of China, the other being Macau. Hong Kong occupies 422 square miles (1,092 sq. km) of islands and mainland on the Pearl River Delta, bordering Guangdong province and facing the South China Sea. It is now home to over 7 million people, making it one of the world's most densely populated areas (around 6,420 per sq. km). The population is predominantly Han Chinese (almost 95% of the population). The rest are a mix of Asian and Western communities.

Hong Kong was once a small fishing village and haven for travelers and pirates. Occupied by the British in 1841, it was used as a naval base during their Opium Wars with China. China (in the Treaty of Nanking, 1842) ceded Hong Kong Island to Britain. Following later conflicts with the Chinese, the Treaty of Beijing (1860) ceded territory on the mainland side of the harbor. The Second Convention of Peking (1898) ceded rural expanses further inland (albeit on a 99-year contract, the end of which prompted the Britain's handover of Hong Kong to China).

Under the Sino-British Joint Declaration (1984), Britain undertook to return control of all Hong Kong to China in 1997. For its part, China undertook under a "one country, two systems" formula to ensure that Hong Kong enjoyed great autonomy (except regarding foreign and defense matters) until 2047. Under the Basic Law (a mini-constitution enacted in 2001), Hong Kong exercises executive, legislative, and independent judicial power in its own affairs. Civil liberties remain largely intact. The press enjoys great freedom, yet also faces challenges (including pressures for self-censorship arising from the reluctance of some media owners to antagonize the central Chinese government in Beijing).

Most of Hong Kong's people are ethnic Chinese, many of them originating from China. On one hand, Hong Kong's history as a British colony for 155 years, as well as its current position as a global finance, trade, and communication center, make it a cosmopolitan city of people holding somewhat Westernized world-views. On the other hand, Hong Kong people still maintains important oriental values, such as acceptance in the face of suffering and respect for tradition, parents, the elderly, and authority.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

No generally accepted figures are available regarding the prevalence of same-sex attraction and behavior in Hong Kong. Similarly, no clear data exists regarding the numbers of people identifying as homosexual or transgender (or any corresponding Chinese terms), though it seems that more individuals seem willing to identify publicly as such in recent years.

Same-sex behavior and gender variance have been consistent strands in Chinese culture. For much of Chinese history both seem to have enjoyed a guarded tolerance. Same-sex relations were apparently regarded as sexual play, with little social approbation, so long as the participants eventually satisfied family and society expectations to marry and procreate. Much same-sex behavior appeared to occur without implications for sexual identity, a situation that might be described as "homosexuality without homosexuals." References to same-sex behavior are common in Chinese art, literature, and history. Most are to male-male sexual relations, though some refer to female-female relations.¹

Attitudes appear to have changed during the late imperial era. The Manchu (Qing) dynasty (ruling from A.D. 1644) criminalized sodomy (anal intercourse) in 1740. Enforcement of the law was unclear. Qing art and literature made common reference to same-sex relations, and some early Western travelers to China expressed shock at the same-sex sexual behavior they observed.² Western and Christian ideas about same-sex relations increasingly infiltrated Chinese attitudes, to the extent that, by the 1949 revolution, they were seen, along with much Western thought, as expressions of modern thinking and a rejection of China's feudal past. In postrevolutionary China, homosexuality was seen as a sickness or crime.³

Throughout much of Hong Kong's British colonial period homosexual behavior was regarded as a mental disorder. This was continued until it was removed from key diagnostic manuals (the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual in 1973, and the World Health Organization's International Classification of Diseases in 1990). Homosexuality was also criminalized until 1991. The view persists among much of the Hong Kong public that homosexuality is a mental disorder. As for transpeople, the Hong Kong medical establishment, in line with much of the rest of the world, views gender identity variant persons as mentally disordered, suffering from transsexualism or gender identity disorder, depending on the manual used.⁴

Hong Kong Chinese lesbians and gay men often identify as tongzhi (literally “of the same intent”), a term appropriated in the late 1980s from the word for comrade used by Chinese communists until after the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976). By using this term, gays and lesbians sought to differentiate the Chinese experience of same-sex love, while at the same time seeking to present same-sex relationships in a positive light.⁵ Several terms are used by transpeople to describe themselves. Some are commonly known in the general population; for example yik sing je (alter sex person), bin sing yan (change sex person) and kwa sing bit yen sih (crossing gender person). Such terms are seldom used outside the community, except by the more informed and in more formal media news stories.⁶ Instead a more common term is yan yiu, (human monster).

Both homophobia and transphobia are common within the general population.⁷ In at least one group (university students), men seem more prejudiced than women.⁸ Both genders are more strongly prejudiced against transwomen than against transmen.⁹ Such prejudice is often expressed in discriminatory behavior. However, there is no law against discrimination on the grounds of sexuality or gender identity in Hong Kong. The government has so far withstood pressure from LGBT and human rights groups to enact such laws.

With such laws absent, those who discriminate enjoy a free hand. Two cases involving the media, and touching on the interests of homosexual and transgender people (transpeople) respectively, merit mention. The (government-appointed) Broadcasting Authority (BA) in 2007 judged as both partial and unsuitable for early evening viewing a television documentary (“Gay Lovers”) that allowed gays and lesbians to put forward their case for same-sex marriage. The judgment was subsequently ruled by Hong Kong’s High Court as unlawful.¹⁰ A local Chinese television channel, in July 2008, ran a documentary on transpeople that relentlessly (28 times in 12 minutes) used the term yan yiu (human monster) to describe transpeople. No other terms were used. Representatives of the Hong Kong LGBT community made a complaint to the BA. The program was judged as “not of an offensive nature,” and the complaint was judged unsubstantiated.

The response of many gay and lesbian individuals to homophobia is to conceal their sexuality from friends, co-workers and employers, and (most especially) family. Those who do choose to come out to the broader community often do so at an age several years older than their Western counterparts.¹¹ Transpeople, on account of their gender expression, find it harder to conceal their identities. All Hong Kong residents must carry an ID card, which is often needed in dealing with commercial interests (at banks and other financial institutions, when renting accommodation, and sometimes at entertainment venues and retail outlets) and government agencies and institutions (educational establishments, government offices, and immigration points). The ID card carries a gender marker so that, even if transpeople are otherwise able to pass, their ID card outs them. The Hong Kong government, aware of the difficulties this causes for the transgender community, has compromised by allowing those who have undergone sex reassignment surgery (SRS) the opportunity to get a new ID card that reflects their new gender. However, those who have not yet undergone SRS (or choose not to do so) have no such opportunity.

EDUCATION

Education in Hong Kong is free and compulsory from the ages of six to 15. While primary education is fully under government control, some secondary education is administered by educational bodies, some of which are linked to religious organizations.

Sex education in schools is problematic.¹² The government advocates sex education from kindergarten onwards through secondary (high) school, and issues guidelines to schools, however schools are free to interpret the guidelines as they see fit, teaching sex education as they choose (or indeed not teaching it at all). Many teachers are severely constrained by their parent bodies and their management.¹³ Some teach little other than the basic biology of reproduction and abstinence. Consequently, many Hong Kong adolescents come out of school naive in knowledge and experience and ill-prepared for their own adult sexuality.¹⁴ Much of the sexual information that adolescents get comes from mass media and friends, with little coming from parents.¹⁵

The government guidelines on school sex education encourage schools to deal with sexual and gender diversity in a positive and nonjudgmental fashion. Many teachers doubtless find it difficult to teach on this basis, on account of their own views. In an unpublished 2006 study, half of student teachers were found to believe that homosexuality endangered the institution of the family, and a quarter thought that homosexuality was immoral. A similar number avoided homosexuals wherever possible, and about one in seven believed homosexuals should not be allowed to work with children, and would not be comfortable working with another student who was homosexual. In addition, one in five believed homosexuals with AIDS deserve their fate, and one in 20 believed homosexuality is a mental disorder.¹⁶

Given this and other problems implementing progressive sex education, many young people leave school ill-informed about and ill-disposed towards LGBT people. In a 1996 survey, only a fifth of boys and a third of girls were found to be accepting of male homosexuality (both figures were slightly higher for female homosexuality).¹⁷

There is little hope that schools will become more liberal places. The Society for Truth and Light (STL), a local Christian-based action group that opposes proposals for same-sex marriage rights and antidiscrimination laws for sexual and gender minorities, nevertheless won a 2005 government contract to produce work for schools to be used in human rights courses for teachers in secondary (i.e., junior high and high) schools.

Universities in Hong Kong typically provide sex and sexuality education for their undergraduates, though it is often extracurricular and piecemeal and organized by campus health or counseling centers. A notable exception (since 2003) is a credit-bearing course entitled “Sexual and Gender Diversity” offered to undergraduates at the University of Hong Kong. The course teaches a wide range of topics, bringing students into contact (many for the first time) with gays, lesbians, transpeople, and members of other sexual and gender communities. The course currently admits up to 500 students each year.

In the broader Hong Kong community, various groups offer education on sexuality. STL is one of them. A “Sexual Wholeness” seminar it ran for teachers and social workers was widely reported to have claimed that lesbians could be cured by wearing high heels, dresses and lipstick.¹⁸

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

According to the Index of Economic Freedom, Hong Kong enjoys the freest economy on earth.¹⁹ It is the world's 11th largest trading entity and 13th largest banking center. Annual economic growth has averaged around 4 percent for the period 1998–2008, despite three major crises in that period (the East Asian economic downturn, the bursting of the dot.com bubble, and SARS). Hong Kong is currently China's richest city, with a GDP per capita of US$44,050 (purchasing power parity) in 2007.²⁰ Unemployment is around 3–4 percent (as of late 2008). Economic success is built on international trade, and its importance is reflected in the number of consulates it hosts, currently more than any other city in the world.

With many gay and lesbian people commonly facing homophobia (and no legal protection against sexual orientation discrimination), many choose to remain discrete about their sexual preferences and behavior, especially in terms of what they divulge to co-workers and bosses (and indeed prospective employers). Transpeople, faced with the prospect of prejudice against them, often do not have this choice, and are outed by their appearance. Worse, those who have not undergone surgery are outed by their ID card. Those who have undergone surgery do not have this problem, so long as they apply for a new ID card that reflects their adopted gender. None benefit from any legal protection against gender identity discrimination, except the dubious protection provided by a law against disability discrimination (a law useful only for those transpeople who would claim they are mentally disordered). Those transpeople lucky enough to get a job often seek vigorously to preserve privacy about their gender status. Some employers have been known to make such privacy a condition of the transperson's employment; a condition that may sometimes be backed up with the threat of dismissal.

Notwithstanding all of the aforementioned, more LGBT people are willing nowadays to come out in their workplaces and in the broader Hong Kong community. As more do so, the Hong Kong public (and the government) have become aware of the "pink dollar." A large number of gay and gay-friendly bars, cafes, bookshops, and saunas now exist. Hong Kong now boasts an annual Lesbian and Gay Film Festival. However, given the persistent reluctance of many LGBT people to come out, a Gay Pride event (and all that it could bring to Hong Kong in commerce and tourism) currently seems out of the question.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Limited LGBT activism in Hong Kong has so far resulted in small steps forward. In 2004, the Hong Kong government initiated a Sexual Minorities Forum (SMF), which meets quarterly to provide an opportunity for LGBT groups to press their case on rights issues and to call upon government officials to report on LGBT-related issues. A wide variety of LGBT and related groups (including women's groups, the Hong Kong Human Rights Monitor, and Amnesty International) participate.

Despite its regular meetings, the forum has been criticized as ineffective. LGBT representatives have on several counts questioned the government's commitment to sexual and gender minority issues. They point out that the government also organizes a "Family Values" Forum, providing a voice on LGBT issues for more conservative voices in Hong Kong society (such as STL). They note, for example, that the government has allowed an association conducting conversion/reparative therapy to join the SMF. Finally, they lament a series of discriminatory actions by government and government-appointed bodies against the LGBT community that have taken place since (and despite) the SMF's inception.

The 2005 formation of a government-run Gender Identity and Sexual Orientation Unit (GISOU) seems to be a surer foot forward. GISOU is charged, among other duties, with dispersing funds for educational and other initiatives promoting equal opportunities for the LGBT community and with collating complaints from LGBT people regarding discrimination. LGBT groups have welcomed the funds, accessing them for a wide range of activities aimed at public education. However, the response to the GISOU complaints service has been cool. The absence of legal protection against sexual or gender identity discrimination means that GISOU has no power, beyond attempts at mediation, to resolve grievances. Very few LGBT people have therefore been willing to report cases of discrimination. The low complaints rate in turn feeds arguments by other segments of Hong Kong society that there is no need for antidiscrimination legislation.

A more definite step forward is the University of Hong Kong's creation of a full-time research and teaching post in sexual and gender diversity. The post, linked to a project to examine the Hong Kong LGBT experience, is perhaps the first of its kind in Asia. The research promises to inform social and governmental programs for the LGBT community in the years to come.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Prevailing Hong Kong sexual and gender mores draw on predominant traditional Chinese philosophies (Confucianism and Taoism), as well as Buddhist and Christian influences, and are somewhat conservative.²¹ A few examples illustrate this point. Commercial sex, though legal, is tightly constrained by laws that leave sex workers isolated, unable to work together, to make effective arrangements for their own security, to solicit customers, or to advertise. A 2003 child pornography law is among the strictest internationally and is vigorously policed. The media are tightly controlled in regard to sexual matters. A government-appointed Obscene Articles Tribunal (OAT) energetically guards public morals against images it considers sexual. In 1995, it famously ruled a photo of Michelangelo's David indecent because of its uncovered genitals. In 2007, it ruled a campus newspaper's sex questionnaire indecent because it included questions on bestiality and incest. Since 1997, STL has worked strenuously against modern trends of radical libertarianism, feminism and extreme individualism. It has received funding from several government departments.

Homosexuality was criminalized until 1991. It is not surprising, then, that a 1991 study revealed that only two percent of boys and three percent of girls reported having same-sex inclinations. In 1996, several years after the decriminalization of same-sex behavior, those figures had apparently increased, to four percent and nine percent, respectively.²² The increase likely indicated a greater willingness for persons to report their same-sex orientations. Recent studies confirm an increasing willingness. A 2001 population-based Hong Kong study estimated that about five percent of the Hong Kong male population had ever engaged in same-sex behaviors (2% in the previous six months).²³ A 2002 study revealed that seven percent of Hong Kong tertiary institution students reported being homosexual, and two percent bisexual.²⁴

All of these figures are likely to be underestimates, since many LGBT people conceal their sexuality to protect the privacy of their romantic and sex lives. Many same-sex relationships occur outside marriage, sometimes because one or both partners have surrendered to pressure from their family to take a husband or a wife. Gays and lesbians have great difficulty in maintaining any long-term romantic or sexual relationship. Restaurants have been known to refuse same-sex couples a table. Given these difficulties, some same-sex couples limit themselves to short-term sexual encounters. Gay saunas provide a service here, as do short-term (hourly rental) hotels (commonly called “Love Hotels”). However, recent news reports show that some of the latter refuse gay and lesbian business.²⁵

FAMILY

The Chinese family has historically been characterized by a culture of patriarchy and male domination, with men inheriting property and brides becoming members of their husband’s family’s household, and parents preferring sons to daughters. In sexual relations, men enjoyed freedoms denied to women; many took multiple wives and concubines where financial resources allowed, and others employed the services of commercial sex workers.²⁶

For Hong Kong LGBT people, family poses a twofold problem. First, young men or women sensing same-sex attraction or identifying as homosexual face the dilemma of whether or not to tell their parents and other family members. Many remain focused on this “coming home” challenge (opening up to family members) for a long period, rather than on the challenge of a broader community-based “coming out.”²⁷ Second, their own attempts to form stable relationships are viewed by much of Hong Kong society as undermining the concept of family and maintenance of the family line. The government refuses to legitimize same-sex partnerships by allowing same-sex marriages or civil unions. It also refuses to recognize those same-sex partnerships that have been legitimized overseas. This impacts next-of-kin rights (in inheritance and hospital visiting, for example), access to public (government) housing, and married couple tax benefits.

Hong Kong transpeople, even those who have undergone SRS and have obtained a gender-appropriate ID card, are unable to get a new birth certificate to affirm their gender status, and thus find themselves in a legal limbo concerning marriage.²⁸ With mixed sex partnerships, the only ones recognized in law, transpeople may only legally marry those who identify and present in the same gender as they do. In short, a transwoman may only marry a woman, and a transman only marry a man. That transpeople may only marry within their birth gender but gays and lesbians may not marry homosexually is an irony not lost on the LGBT community.

Leaving marriage aside, those gay couples who decide to live together encounter further difficulties. Housing costs are high in Hong Kong, and many young people live with their parents well into adulthood. Gays and lesbian partners find that, as unmarried couples, they have no rights to public (government subsidized) housing. Those who can afford to rent on the open market find some landlords refuse to rent out to gay couples. Finally, adoption agencies do not look favorably upon unmarried or nontraditional couples.

Anxieties about possible reactions of family members (let alone friends and employers), as well as the absence of any legitimacy for gay and lesbian relationships and the problems in setting up a home, all undermine the viability of long-term and visible relationships involving the LGBT community, driving many Hong Kong couples to keep their long-term relationships very private, or indeed discouraging such relationships altogether.

COMMUNITY

The concerns many LGBT people have for privacy in sexual and gender identity matters undermines their involvement in the broader LGBT community. Some avoid contact with the community altogether (something particularly common among transpeople once they have undergone their SRS). Notwithstanding, Hong Kong's LGBT community is, compared to some other Asian cities, both visible and well-organized. The gay and lesbian social and cultural scene has grown steadily since decriminalization in 1991, this despite the continuing background prejudice in the city. The late 1990s saw a wave of gay saunas, bars, cafes, and bookshops and currently there are a large number of lesbian and gay organizations organizing events and conferences.

Increasing social awareness has led to a raised level of activism, proliferation of LGBT groups, and high levels of intergroup collaboration and organization. Much of the activism has been directed at (so far unsuccessful) calls for enactment of antidiscrimination legislation. Some have been controversial in their methods; for example a protest against Catholic teachings on homosexuality, mounted during a service at the Catholic Cathedral.²⁹

The transgender community has been a comparative latecomer to activism, with the first group (Transgender Equality and Acceptance Movement, or TEAM) forming in 2002, and a new group (Transgender Resource Center) forming in 2008. Much of their energy has so far been directed at public education.

Much of the LGBT community still shies away from public activist events. The 2008 IDAHO (International Day Against Homophobia) rally (the fourth organized in Hong Kong) reflected the reluctance of local LGBT people to come out. The Hong Kong rally organizers estimated that around 300 people attended, perhaps one in 1,000 members of the LGBT community (at a conservative estimate).

HEALTH

The Hong Kong government (through its Hospital Authority) provides almost fully subsidized health care for all citizens of Hong Kong. Individuals may, at their own expense, seek treatment from private physicians.

HIV/AIDS care has become a higher health priority in recent years. The first Hong Kong case of HIV was identified in 1984. A total of 3,612 HIV infections and 934 AIDS cases were reported by the latter part of 2007, with the major mode of transmission being sexual contact (heterosexual or homosexual). The government's Hospital Authority has provided clinical care for people living with HIV/AIDS since the 1980s. A detailed health care framework has been prepared for the delivery of clinical care.³⁰ A number of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have focused considerable effort on public education and prevention of HIV/AIDS.

HIV/AIDS remains a continuing concern for the LGBT community. In 2007, the government's Department of Health recorded the most new HIV cases so far: 414, of which 103 involved heterosexual exposure and 168 involved homosexual or bisexual contact. The HIV rate has grown significantly amongst men who have sex with men (MSM). Increasing attention is therefore placed upon high-risk behaviors, prevention education, and intervention strategies.³¹ Little if any research has been conducted on transmission to and from women (either lesbians or transgender people).

Approaching a doctor can pose a challenge for LGBT persons seeking health care. Persons identifying themselves (or identified) to health workers as homosexual run the risk of encountering homophobia. A local research paper reported that a quarter of medical students believed homosexuals to be psychologically disordered and in need of therapy (despite the removal of homosexuality from the two major psychiatric manuals in 1973 and 1990). Around 40 percent believed the presence of homosexuals would affect the reputation of their training institution.³²

Unusually for Asia, Hong Kong's government provides subsidized specialized health care for transpeople diagnosed as "gender identity disordered" or "transsexual" (the precise term depending on the diagnostic manual employed) and who need medical support for their gender transition. The government subsidies for transition-related health care greatly facilitate gender transition for transpeople, and stand in stark contrast to the refusal of the government's Security Bureau to allow them a change in legal gender status.

The first documented SRS in Hong Kong was performed in 1981. Between 1986 and 2005 there was one (centralized) Gender Clinic, with a multidisciplinary team headed by a psychiatrist and including clinical psychologists, a geneticist, a reconstructive surgeon, a social worker, an endocrinologist, a gynecologist, and a barrister.³³ Subsidized care covered consultations (except legal advice) and SRS surgical fees. Other surgeries did not appear to be covered, nor was hair removal, though hormones appeared to be available at below market price. By 1998, 78 gender variant patients had been assessed, with 48 having received SRS.³⁴

The number of transpeople approaching the central gender clinic and seeking medical support for their gender transition appeared to rise over the period of its existence.³⁵ By 2003, one report estimated the rate of "clinically presented transsexualism" in Hong Kong was about one per 200,000 people, with rather more transmen (female-to-male transpeople) making use of the central government clinic than transwomen (male-to-female).³⁶ This was a gender imbalance opposite to that normally found in Western studies.

In 2005, the government, with little warning, restructured services into several (poorly resourced and poorly prepared) regional clinics. Subsidies for care appear to have remained unchanged. The immediate effect was that health care workers who had little previous experience of working with gender variant clients were now charged with providing a service to them. Faced with the delays and frustrations of government health care, an unknown number of transpeople have turned to other health care sources, such as contraceptive hormones available over the counter at pharmacies or through the Internet, and surgery in nearby Thailand.

It is likely that the classification of transpeople (gender identity variant people) as mentally disordered (gender identity disordered) exacerbates the stigma, prejudice, and discrimination transpeople suffer. For example, there is clear evidence that Hong Kong people (like people elsewhere in Asia, the United States and the United Kingdom) who believe transwomen are mentally disordered also tend to deny them the rights to be treated as women and avoid any contact with them.³⁷

Western research indicates that the experience and anticipation of prejudice and discrimination can lead to minority stress and to anxiety, low self-esteem, depression, risk behaviors, and self-harm (including suicide). Local research suggests that much of this may be true for Hong Kong's homosexuals.³⁸ It also indicates that the coming out process may be therapeutic for those who experience it.³⁹ No similar research has yet been done with transpeople in Hong Kong.

The numbers for suicide in the general population of Hong Kong have been rising in the last decade. In 2003, suicide deaths reached 1,264 (18.6 per 100,000, compared to the world average of 14.5). No data exists regarding the LGBT suicide rate, yet it is possibly a significant cause of death within the transgender population, as mental health problems are apparently common among transpeople.⁴⁰ Informal contacts with Hong Kong's transpeople confirm that a majority has attempted suicide on at least one occasion, with some reporting multiple attempts. At least two have committed suicide in the last five years.

POLITICS AND LAW

Hong Kong's legislative, executive, and judiciary branches are nominally independent of each other. In practice, the executive branch, led by a Chief Executive appointed by the Beijing government, controls the introduction of most legislation. The legislature, structured so as to be pro-business, is also widely seen as pro-government. In recent years, the power of the executive branch has been checked not by the legislature but by the judiciary, which has played an important role in furthering the rights of LGBT people in Hong Kong, sometimes despite opposition from the government.

Hong Kong is a party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR).⁴¹ It has incorporated its provisions into the Hong Kong Bill Of Rights Ordinance (BORO, enacted in 1991). However, BORO covers only the activities of government and public bodies. Broader legislation designed to protect civil rights is patchy, affording protection against discrimination on the basis of sex, family status, and disablement only, and (since 2008) race.⁴² For some years there has been public debate concerning the need for a Sexual Orientation Discrimination Ordinance (SODO) that would prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity, but the government has refused to present a bill to the legislature, claiming that the time is not right. This is despite evidence from its own survey of public attitudes that more than six in 10 Hong Kong people were either in favor of or neutrally disposed towards such legislation.⁴³ It has been claimed that the government's failure to enact SODO puts it in breach of its domestic and international legal obligations.⁴⁴

Homosexual behavior was criminalized until 1991, and incurred a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. Government moves to decriminalize homosexuality in 1968 failed due to opposition in the local (predominantly Chinese) community. A fresh wave of debate on the merits of decriminalization began after 1980, when a senior police officer at risk of being outed as a homosexual committed suicide. The 1991 decriminalization was highly controversial, particularly for Hong Kong's Christian community.

Notwithstanding the move towards decriminalization, the government has for some time legislated an age of consent for anal intercourse grossly inconsistent with that for vaginal intercourse; 21 years (compared to 16 years), with a penalty up to life imprisonment for both partners where underage anal intercourse took place. Only under pressure from the public and legal commentators did the government in 2006 reluctantly accept a High Court ruling that the age discrepancy was unconstitutional, breaching both the Basic Law and BORO.

It may be argued that this and other policies (e.g., reluctance to enact a SODO, refusal to recognize same-sex unions) reveal the Hong Kong government to be an important (if not the primary) perpetrator of discrimination against sexual and gender minorities in Hong Kong.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Approximately four out of 10 people in Hong Kong participate in some form of religious practice, with Buddhism, Taoism, Confucianism, Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Sikhism, and Judaism all practiced in the city. Hong Kong's people enjoy great religious freedom. Falun Gong followers practice freely in Hong Kong in a way not possible elsewhere in China.

A small section of the Christian community has been very vocal in opposing sexual and gender minority rights, particularly the right to marry or contract a civil union, and to have such a union recognized where conducted overseas and the right to legal protection from discrimination on the basis of sexuality or gender identity (by way of a SODO law). The STL, which has at times funded its activities with government money, is highly active in opposing these rights. It has argued that antidiscrimination legislation would undermine freedom of expression and of religious worship. The New Century Association (NCA), which has a strong Christian base, energetically promotes reparative/conversion therapy, and has gained membership in the SMF. As elsewhere in the world, the Catholic Church has also spoken out strongly against same-sex marriage, a stance that prompted LGBT activists on one occasion to storm a religious service, a controversial move inside as well as outside the LGBT community.⁴⁵

VIOLENCE

United Nations statistics reveal Hong Kong to be one of least violent cities worldwide, with the overall recorded crime rate being lower than countries such as Singapore, Japan, South Korea, Italy, France, Canada, England, and Wales.⁴⁶ For all the prejudice and discrimination, violence directed against LGBT groups does not seem common. A study of Hong Kong attitudes towards transpeople revealed that key attitudes linked to violence were lower than a comparable sample in Canada.⁴⁷

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Commentators point out a continuing need in Hong Kong for better education (for the general public and students) relating to sex and sexuality. Beyond this, they note the importance of legislation to protect LGBT people from discrimination (a SODO), as well as the removal of discriminatory laws and administrative practices by the Hong Kong government itself, in particular so as to provide for same-sex marriage (or civil unions) and for changes to transpeople's legal gender status. While the government appears willing to support the LGBT's own efforts to educate the public, little evidence suggests that the government intends to support major education initiatives of its own, or to make legislative changes aimed at furthering LGBT rights. Under such circumstances, LGBT activism is expected to continue or even increase.

OVERVIEW

The Republic of India is located in South Asia and New Delhi is its capital. Not only is it the seventh-largest country (by geographical area) in the world, it is also the most heavily populated democracy. India is bordered by the Indian Ocean to the south, the Arabian Sea and Pakistan to the west, the Bay of Bengal and Bangladesh on the east, and China, Nepal, and Bhutan to the northeast. India's climate is quite varied and ranges from deserts in the west, to alpine tundra and glacial landscapes in the north, and humid tropical regions supporting rainforests in the south-west and the neighboring island territories. India has four distinct seasons. Winter is typically in January and February, and summer lasts from March to May. The rainy monsoon season begins in June and lasts until September, followed by the post-monsoon season from October to December. India's landscape is as varied as its climate and includes the Deccan Plateau (upland plain) in the south, the Ganges River in the west (surrounded by flat or gently rolling plains), deserts in the west, and the Himalayan mountains in the north. India's natural resources include coal, iron ore, manganese, mica, bauxite, titanium ore, chromite, natural gas, diamonds, petroleum, and limestone.

In 2008, India's estimated population was 1,147,995,898. Thirty-one percent of the population is under the age of 14, 63.3 percent are between the ages of 15 and 64, and 5.2 percent are 65 or older. Seventy-two percent of the population is categorized as Indo-Aryan, 25 percent are Dravidian,¹ and the remaining three percent are Mongoloid or other. India's central or union government oversees a federal republic consisting of 28 states and seven union territories. In 2007, the Indian people elected their first female president, Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil; India's Prime Minister is Manmohan Singh.

English and Hindi are the two most commonly spoken languages in India. English is the most important language for politics and commerce, but Hindi is the national language and the primary language of over 30 percent of the Indian population. However, there are 21 other official languages, including Assamese, Bengali, Bodo, Dogri, Gujarati, Kannada, Kashmiri, Konkani, Maithili, Malayalam, Manipuri, Marathi, Nepali, Oriya, Punjabi, Sanscrit, Santhali, Sindhi, Tamil, Telugu, and Urdu. Though not an official language, Hindustani is a dialect of Hindi/Urdu and is spoken widely throughout northern India.

India operates under the caste system. According to Indian sociohistoriography, the caste system came into being with the arrival of the Aryans in India around 1500 B.C.E. The caste system also has a religious significance. According to a set of ancient Hindu scriptures called the Rig Veda, the primal man, Purush, tore himself apart in order to create the human race. The various varnas (levels of the caste system) were created from each part of his body. The hierarchy was decided according to which body part became each caste. According to this theory, the brahmans were created from his head, his hands became the kshatrias, his thighs became the vaishias, and the sudras were his feet. Today, these four castes still exist, along with the harijans (the untouchables). Within each of these five categories one finds the jatis (castes) into which people are born in which they will marry, and in which they will die. In keeping with the socialist and democratic ideals on which the nation was founded, the Indian Constitution outlaws discrimination based on caste. Most cast barriers hardly exist in larger cities, though some inborn, caste-based discrimination still exists. However, the caste system continues to thrive and dictate social norms in rural areas.

India has a rich and diverse history, much of which, after the 15th century, has to do with colonization by various Western forces including Portugal, France, the Netherlands, and Britain. The British held India as a colony from the 17th through the 20th centuries, and it is this cultural paradigm and legal system that has most affected homosexuals in India today. Queen Elizabeth I of England established the East India Company in 1600. Through England's trade with India, the English gradually entered into Indian politics and colonized the country. By the end of the 19th century, British territory spanned from Burma (Myanmar) to Afghanistan, and included India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh. The British also occupied Bhutan and Ceylon (present-day Sri Lanka). The Indian movement for independence began in the first half of the 20th century, with the Indian National Congress and the Muslim League at the helm. The Indian subcontinent achieved independence from Great Britain in 1947 and split into is the present-day countries of India and Pakistan. The eastern portion of Pakistan became Bangladesh in 1971.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

As a result both of traditional Indian values and four centuries of British colonial influence, homosexuality is illegal in India and thus rarely discussed in society and ignored by the Indian government. In fact, discussions of sexuality in general are limited in the Indian social milieu. However, in recent years, there has been a proliferation of homosexual representations in Bollywood films. This, combined with more frequent depictions of homosexuality in Indian news and media, has opened up discussions regarding sexuality over the past few years. To fully comprehend Indian attitudes regarding homosexuality, one must first recognize that the traditional family model (heterosexual) is the backbone of Indian culture and society. Typically, marriages are arranged between families and all young Indians are expected to marry and have children. Due to this very heterosexually oriented mentality, there is very little room for homosexuals to live a fulfilling “out” life. Both gays and lesbians are frequently subject to harassment and discrimination by the government and in the workforce. On the whole, Indian society remains highly patriarchal. Due to this power imbalance within society at large, lesbians tend to be more discriminated against than gay men.

EDUCATION

According to the 2008 CIA statistics, over 61 percent of the Indian population older than age 15 can read and write.

Considering the fact that homosexuality is rarely discussed in Indian society, it would follow that there exist very few presentations of homosexuals in Indian schools or curricula. In addition, for homosexual education to become commonplace in schools, sexuality would have to first be a part of the curriculum. When images of romance or couples are shown, they are always heteropatriarchal in nature. This type of implied heteronormativity, without even presenting homosexuality as an option, breeds attitudes of homophobia that manifest themselves in Indian society as a whole.

Outside of the classroom, present-day Indian youth have more access to information regarding sexuality than their parents did at the same age. This information comes to them through various sources, including movies, magazines, books, and, most importantly, the Internet. Traditionally, parents have held the responsibility of educating their children when it comes to sex education, sexuality, and health. However, some parents have reservations about discussing sexual matters with their children. Moreover, others admit to not knowing enough about sex in modern society to respond to all of their children’s queries. As a result, most Indian youth glean their sexual information from other sources. Due to the amount of misinformation regarding sexuality that exists online and elsewhere, the Indian government has considered implementing sex education as a part of public school curricula beginning in secondary school. However, in following with traditional Indian mores, it can be assumed that the lessons included in these courses will be strictly heterosexual in nature.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

In 2007, India’s unemployment rate was at 7.2 percent, with 25 percent of the population living below the poverty line. Due to its sheer size and population, India’s economy is incredibly diverse. Common sectors include traditional village farming, modern agriculture, handicrafts, and a variety of modern industries. Since 1997, the economy has grown at an annual rate of more than seven percent. This steady economic growth has reduced the nation's poverty rate by nearly 10 percent. India's biggest economic (and environmental) challenges in the years to come will be providing the means for its already large and steadily growing population to become and stay employed and providing adequate housing for them.

In the past decade, there have been many reported incidents of gays and lesbians (either out or suspected of being homosexual by their employers) who were wrongfully terminated from their employment due to their sexual preferences.² In addition, it is not uncommon for gay and lesbian couples to be evicted from their homes due to "immoral behavior."³ In some parts of India, both heterosexual and homosexual victims of HIV/AIDS are openly discriminated against and denied employment, medical care, and housing.⁴ However, government officials are currently addressing these issues. In 2008, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh made a public statement asking for more awareness and sensitivity towards HIV/AIDS patients in order to put an end to these human rights injustices.⁵

The fact that homosexual acts are illegal in India, in concert with the notion that homosexual themes have not historically been part of social discourse, means that there are no government programs in place to support homosexuals. In the past decade, however, myriad social networks, programs and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that support homosexuals have sprung up throughout the country. Most of these organizations were founded in response to India's growing HIV/AIDS epidemic.

One of the leaders of the homosexual movement in India is the NGO Naz India, founded by Anjali Gopalan. Though the focus of the Naz India Foundation is HIV/AIDS prevention, it has also become a valuable resource for accurate information on homosexuality in India. Naz India is based in New Delhi and has been working on projects involving HIV/AIDS and sexual health since 1994. Naz works in collaboration with groups such as the Lawyers Collective, the Human Right Law Network, Amnesty International, and the International Gay and Lesbian Human Rights Commission. Naz India has collaborated with these agencies to address cases of sexual rights abuse. It also works with the police services in New Delhi, conducting weekly training workshops for police personnel. The training aims to build awareness of HIV/AIDS and tackles issues of discrimination, physical harassment, corruption, and human rights.

In 2006, the Men's Community Development Society (MCDS) was founded in the city of Chennai (formerly known as Madras) in the Tamil Nadu province. MCDS aims to provide a community and forum for homosexual men and to equip them with AIDS prevention resources and medical treatment for those already infected with the virus. The organization was founded with support from the Indian Community Welfare Organisation and the Tamil Nadu State AIDS Control Society. "Voices Against 377" is a nationwide NGO that works for the abolishment of India's antisodomy laws. Voices Against 377 is supported by 13 nonprofits that work for human rights in India. These nonprofits are: Amnesty International India (AI India), Anjuman, Breakthrough, Creating Resources for Empowerment in Action (CREA), Haq: the Centre for Child Rights, Jagori, Nigah, Nirantar, Partners for Law in Development (PLD), Prism, Saheli, Sama, and Talking about Reproductive and Sexual Health Issues (TARSHI).

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Indian society is traditionally sexually repressive; even straight men and women do not discuss sex openly. Desire is also tightly regulated, and there have been cases of heterosexual partners who were killed for transgressing caste boundaries.⁶ Considering how heterosexual practices are restricted in many parts of the country, one can logically understand why homosexuality is strictly forbidden. Many traditional Indians believe that homosexuals should be harassed, beaten, or put to death by the authorities for engaging in immoral sexual acts.⁷ Therefore, many homosexuals believe they must act out their same-sex desires in hiding. Until recently, there were very few ways for homosexuals to meet others in a safe social environment. Therefore, many visited prostitutes to fulfill their sexual needs. Homosexual prostitution clients hail from nearly every socioeconomic class. To make matters more dangerous, condom usage throughout India is particularly low.

Anyone who goes against the heterosexual norm is considered homosexual, including gender-conflicted, transgendered individuals, and cross-dressers. One of the most conspicuous forms of gender deviation in India is the group known as hijras (an Urdu term for eunuchs). The hijras belong to a Hindu caste of men who dress as women. Their primary religious task is to act as mediums for female goddesses and they are often involved in marriage ceremonies. Members of the hijra community typically leave their families when they are teenagers and take up residence with adult hijras in nearby large cities. Their social roles include providing entertainment such as singing and dancing at weddings and cultural festivals and engaging in anal intercourse (typically in a passive role) with men. They make their living primarily through these activities.

FAMILY

The traditional family model (heterosexual) is a mainstay of Indian culture and society. Traditional Indian marriages are arranged between families of the same caste, and all Indians are expected to maintain a heterosexual lifestyle by marrying and having children. Some homosexual men marry but also engage in homosexual activities on the side, either in the form of prostitution, through various casual encounters, or with a long-term partner. They either live in denial of their homosexuality or fear that their families will discover their hidden lifestyles. If this were to happen, the homosexual man would face severe isolation, and in some cases banishment from the family or violence.⁸

When it comes to familial expectations, lesbians are faced with challenges quite different from those experienced by homosexual men. Traditionally, Indian women are expected to uphold the honor of the nation by playing the roles of obedient daughter, submissive wife, and loving mother. Women's interactions with others are closely watched, and they must always be aware of their actions, both in the public and private milieus. Naturally, no other option exists for women outside of matrimony. By engaging in romantic relationships with other women, Indian lesbians operate outside the constraints of male domination. Therefore, the very notion of lesbianism rejects the very foundation of Indian society and is perceived by traditional Indians as a threat to traditional patriarchal structures and a moral abomination. Homosexual human rights activists have examined the ways in which the traditional Indian family model contributes to the violation of homosexual rights. There have been cases of lesbians committing suicide as a result of their family's and society's rejection of their love and their lack of autonomy as homosexual women in this strictly heteropatriarchal society.⁹

COMMUNITY

The Indian cities of Delhi, Mumbai, Hyderabad, and Bangalore boast a vibrant underground gay nightlife that began in the 1990s. At first, police carefully monitored the gay hotspots and regularly harassed homosexuals. Since 2004, however, reports of this type of harassment have diminished, and police regularly turn a blind eye to these gatherings. Both magazines and Web sites dedicated to Indian tourism now include columns dedicated to covering gay happenings in Delhi and other major Indian cities on a weekly basis.¹⁰

The Internet has provided myriad opportunities for a gay South Asian cyber culture to flourish over the past decade. Popular gay dating sites include Gay Dia and IndusGay. Another avenue through which to connect with fellow gays is the online community Gay Bombay. In addition, Facebook has become a common way to connect with fellow homosexuals both in India and with members of the Indian Diaspora throughout the world, especially through the Facebook group "Queer and Trans Desis (South Asians)." There now exist hundreds of gay blogs, such as the popular Queeristan, that offer articles, anecdotes, and resources for Indian homosexuals.

Gay Pride celebrations among Indians have become increasingly more popular and conspicuous since 2000. In 2007 and 2008, diasporic "Queer Desis" in New York demonstrated for their own rights and for those of their gay counterparts in India. On the other side of the world, Indian gay organizations banded together in New Dehli to protest antigay laws. They held signs and shouted "377 quit India," a chant combining the antigay law (Section 377 of the Penal Code), that dates back to the colonial era, with a slogan used by the Quit India Movement, which sought to end British rule in the 1940s. In 2008, the major Indian cities of New Dehli, Bangalore, and Kolkata all hosted substantial Pride celebrations with parades and other events.

HEALTH

In general, HIV/AIDS has been a concern in India. According to a report put forth by UNAIDS in 2007, over 5 million Indians were infected with HIV at that time. However, in 2008 they issued a statement indicating that these estimates were inaccurate, and provided a new estimate of 3.5 million people, which is less than one percent of the total Indian population. Nevertheless, HIV/AIDS prevention programs are necessary so that this percentage does not increase.¹¹

The aforementioned Naz India Foundation is at the forefront of this effort, and has been dedicating large amounts of time and resources to holistic approaches to HIV/AIDS prevention and education. Their efforts are a response to the fact that many homosexual men who are infected with HIV do not seek medical treatment for fear of social exclusion or, in some cases, legal prosecution.

Due to the rigid heterosexual constraints imposed by Indian society, homosexual men and women face many mental health issues that sometimes culminate in suicide. There are over 30 documented cases of lesbians committing suicide between the years of 2001 and 2005.¹² Most of these women were from working class, traditional Indian communities in which they experienced marginalization due to their sexual orientation and refusal to marry. Some of these women were from such rural communities that they had never heard of lesbianism or homosexual politics. Their suicides were the result of desires that had been labeled shameful and that they could not identify or name. Unlike women from affluent families who could move to major cities to meet other lesbians and engage in healthy relationships, rural women have no support system and often end up depressed and suicidal as a result of their geographic and ideological isolation.

Homosexual Indian men face many of the same pressures and mental health issues as their female counterparts. Because homosexuality has been illegal in India, many gay men try to pass as straight to protect their families and their careers. The persistent monitoring of their behavior and mannerisms can drive these men to develop complexes and distorted self-images. They can become hateful of the society that forces them to hide their true identities, and this hatred often bleeds into their social and professional relationships. There are numerous reports of doctors prescribing drugs to homosexual men that, in combination with therapy, will supposedly change their sexual orientation and allow them to live traditional heterosexual lives. This type of extreme psychiatric treatment only augments feelings of anxiety, depression, and resentment in these patients. The Milan Project, an offshoot of Naz India, has filed several complaints with the National Human Rights Commission of India detailing this type of psychiatric abuse among homosexual men.¹³

POLITICS AND LAW

The fundamental civil and criminal laws that govern India are included in the Indian Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code. Due to Britain's colonial influence on India, the Indian legal system is based on the English Common and Statutory Law. India accepts International Court of Justice jurisdiction with several exceptions. In addition, separate personal law codes apply to Muslims, Christians, and Hindus.

Due to a British colonial-era statute from 1860, Section 377 of the Indian Penal Code, homosexuality was illegal in India for hundreds of years. Section 377 rendered criminal "carnal intercourse against the order of nature." The punishment for these crimes varied from 10 years to life in prison. The relevant part of Section 377 reads:

Whoever voluntarily has carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman or animal, shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

This law was rarely upheld in the 1990s and 2000s (when it was still in effect). In fact, since the mid-1980s there have been no convictions for homosexual activities in India. Due to its rather vague nature, the law was used in multiple ways, namely to threaten and blackmail homosexuals, to harass those involved in condom distribution amongst homosexuals and homosexual prostitutes, or to force homosexuals to return to their families (via police arrest), even if they are of legal age.

In response to these human rights violations, organizations like Naz India, the National AIDS Control Organization, the Law Commission of India, and the Planning Commission of India expressed support for the decriminalization of homosexuality and advocated for tolerance and equal rights for LGBT individuals. In addition, the People's Union of Civic Liberties wrote two reports on human rights violations faced by homosexuals and transsexuals (namely hijras) in India. Through their combined efforts, these groups raised awareness about homosexual rights issues and brought about several hearings to repeal section 377. In May 2008, the case was first heard in the Delhi High Court. In July 2009, homosexuality was fully decriminalized in India.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Over 80 percent of the Indian population is Hindu, 13 percent are Muslim, two percent are Christian, two percent are Sikh, and the remaining three percent are unspecified/other. As the major religion, Hinduism has played an important role in shaping Indian customs and traditions. The oldest known set of scriptures, the Rig Veda, which dates from 1500–1200 B.C.E., makes no mention of homosexuality. Ancient religious texts written between the third and sixth centuries C.E., such as the Manu Smriti, Arthashastra, Kamasutra, Upanishads and Puranas, do include references to homosexuality. The Kamasutra includes an entire chapter on the practice of fellatio between men and eunuchs. In this text, both hetero and homosexual sex are discussed in terms not only of procreation, but also pleasure.

Throughout India's medieval period, between the 12th and 18th centuries C.E., the northern part of the country was dominated by Islamic values. The practice of pederasty was introduced and women were forced to withdraw from public life. The open attitudes toward sex that were enjoyed throughout the ancient era were transformed by Islamic values. During the colonial period, the British established an elite class of highly educated Indians that took on even stricter Christian heterosexual values.

In Hinduism, androgyny has historically been viewed as a divine quality. Many of the main deities are imaged as half male and half female, mirroring the Hindu belief that gods are made up of all of the elements of the cosmos, both male and female. One of the most recognized deities is Shiva, who is pictured as being male on the right side and female on the left. Hindus who worship Krishna, principally members of the Sakibhava cult, maintain that Krishna is the only male and that all other beings are female. In the past, male followers of this belief dressed like women and engaged in homosexual activities as a part of their worship rituals. Interestingly, in scripture, various Hindu deities change gender to participate in homosexual activities.

VIOLENCE

The open nature and adaptability of Section 377 of the Indian Penal Code has historically provided sufficient justification for the harassment and beating of gays by police. Families and medical professionals have also used Section 377 to rationalize forcing gays to undergo radical therapies (including drastic psychological medication) in order to cure them of their homosexuality. Many homosexual activists believe that these forms of justified violence are so ingrained in Indian society that they will not come to an end until well after Section 377 is repealed.

Lesbian women face a double threat of violence by virtue of both their gender and their sexuality in a heteropatriarchal society. Due to their status as women in this long-standing, male-dominated social climate, they are denied access to the support systems gay men enjoy upon coming out. Public spaces are both heterosexist and highly gendered. Typically, men have more access to all public spaces than women. Therefore, lesbians do not even have the right to congregate in public parks, an opportunity enjoyed by some gay men (when they are not being harassed by police). Due to this lack of public access for lesbians, there are far fewer instances of lesbians being harassed or raped than their male counterparts.

Both psychological and physical forms of violence by students and teachers directed against suspected homosexuals have been prevalent in schools, but due to the fact that most of these cases go unreported, they are difficult to document. Typically, if the young victim reports violence enacted at school, it is repeated by the parents in an attempt to scare the child away from homosexuality and save the family from public shame. Furthermore, in some rural areas, there have been cases of young girls being lynched for engaging in activities deemed immoral.¹⁴

Due to the fact that homosexuality was illegal until very recently, the future will be difficult for Indian homosexuals as they continue to negotiate their positions in a society that violently rejects them. Despite vehement public opposition, organizations such as the Naz India Foundation are working tirelessly toward the legalization of homosexuality in India. If homosexuality were to become fully legal, this would resolve a number of problems that currently exist for homosexuals in the country, including the spread of HIV/AIDS in their communities and violence directed against them. From a human rights perspective, the next political step toward equality would be the legalization of same-sex unions. However, legalizing homosexuality would not necessarily put a stop to the violence that is visited upon homosexuals in the private and public spheres by both family members and strangers. Therefore, antidiscrimination and antiviolence laws need to be put in place to protect homosexuals in all venues.

Even after homosexuality is fully legalized, it will be a long time before this lifestyle is accepted and before homosexuals will be able to live like other Indians. The aforementioned political strides will only change the appearance of homosexual rights, but not necessarily the reality. Ideologies that have been ingrained in the Indian psyche for centuries will have to shift, and this can only begin through an awareness of issues regarding homosexuality. This, of course, requires open discussion and education for all Indians on the truth about Indian homosexuals to dispel the cultural myths that have been built up around them. This type of public awareness and education, in schools and otherwise, will be the key to India's acceptance of homosexuals and the reclamation of their basic human rights. The major questions involve whether the Indian gay and lesbian communities will be influenced by Western manifestations of homosexuality, or if they will find their own, distinctively Indian, gay and lesbian cultures.

INDONESIA

Ferdiansyah Thajib

OVERVIEW

Indonesia is a country comprising 17,508 islands, about 6,000 of which are inhabited. The archipelagic state is the 16th-largest in the world, covering a total area of 1,919,440 square kilometers¹ of land and water, with neighboring countries including Malaysia, Timor Leste, Papua New Guinea, Singapore, the Philippines, and Australia. Straddling the Equator, the tropical country of Indonesia is home to more than 500 ethnolinguistic groups and thus embraces great cultural diversity.

In terms of population, Indonesia's is the fourth-highest in the world, with a projected number of 231 million people in 2007.² In 2006, the population growth was 1.2 percent annually, marking a decline partly attributable to a successful government-backed family planning program. The average population density is about 121 persons per square kilometer, highly concentrated on Java Island, especially in Jakarta, which is the capital city and located on the island's western end with the largest urban agglomeration of some 13.2 million people.

The Republic of Indonesia was declared in 1945 after a three-year period of Japanese occupation during World War II. This came after the country had proclaimed its independence from the colonial Dutch Empire, whose rule dated back to the 17th century. However, it was not until late 1949 that the Dutch formally transferred sovereignty over the archipelago to the state. Fused by a democratic vision of nation-state building, the country has undergone several major political tribulations, including the violent transition from the first authoritarian government of Sukarno (1945–1967) to the next one, led by Suharto, and that saw the death and imprisonment of thousands of alleged communist sympathizers during the period of 1965–1966.

Suharto's leadership and his military-backed New Order regime (1967–1998) drove rapid, yet vulnerable, economic development of the country. Nevertheless, his success in bringing about Indonesia's economic stability was founded on pervasive practices of cronyism and the total silencing of political dissent. After ruling the country for more than 32 years, Suharto was forced to resign by a surge of student-led demonstrations amidst the 1997–1998 Asian financial crisis.

Entering the current democratic and decentralized political setting of the nation-state, Indonesia has yet to face new challenges prompted by the increasingly virulent Islamic fundamentalist forces in the society. This has virtually been reflected by the growing number of local policies adopting prosecution against LGBT people, a condition that was uncommon in the past despite Indonesia's known status as the country with the largest Muslim population (almost 90%). In the recent past, at worst the state, and also informed by a certain degree of Islamic conservatism, the state denied recognizing the existence of LGBT citizens and/or their rights, but did not do this in so far as to relegate them to an illegal offense category.

Indonesia was among the hardest hit during the mid-1990s Asian economic crisis and has steadily worked to regain its footing, with a reported 2007 gross domestic product (GDP) of approximately US$432 billion.³ The service sector made up the largest share of the GDP in that year, followed by manufacturing and agriculture. Military expenses equal one percent of the Gross National Product.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

The role of the mainstream media has been crucial to the current formations of LGBT issues in Indonesian public discourse following greater freedom of the press in the post-Suharto era. Issues of same-sex marriage, rights activism, and empowering voices of sexual minority communities have been crucial aspects that feature the visibility of Indonesian LGBT identities. On the contrary, the media representations as such have also sparked stronger reactions in the public sphere, especially those coming from the state and Islamic religious authorities. If culturally infused same-sex relations and gender-transgressing subjects had widely been ignored before 1998, if they were not strongly denied or casually ridiculed, there is now a system of overt discrimination, stigmatization, marginalization, and Islamic religious-based hostility targeting lesbian, gay, waria (male to female transgender) and tomboi (female to male transgender) populations. Meanwhile, bisexuals are virtually invisible in Indonesian society. This is partly attributed to the fact that bisexuality as an identity is somehow not adopted by many whose behavior is such, and partly due to the fact that many ordinary women and men, without identifying as lesbian or gay, might engage in same-sex sexual relations or with transgendered people.

The prevalence of HIV in Indonesia is growing, and the increasing number of new HIV infections makes the epidemic there one of the fastest growing in Asia, even though the aggregate national prevalence is as low as 0.16 percent.⁴ In the late 1980s, AIDS was widely perceived as the disease of white foreigners, women in prostitution, and homosexual men, but recent reports have shown that HIV infections mostly occur among intravenous drug-users through sharing needles, unprotected (hetero-)sexual contact and, to a lesser extent, unprotected sex between males. It is estimated that by the year 2010 the number of AIDS cases will have increased to 400,000, with 100,000 infected people having died; the number is expected to almost triple by 2015.⁵

Despite the country's adoption of Human Rights Law Number 39/1999 and the 2000 Amendment of the 1945 Constitution, which seeks to protect basic human rights, no articles guarantee protection for Indonesian citizens against discrimination and violence on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity. There is also a considerable absence of laws recognizing same-sex marriage, civil unions, or domestic partnership benefits.

Complying with international pressures to remove homosexuality from the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM) as a mental disorder, a move initiated by the American Psychological Association in 1973, by 1983 the Ministry of Health no longer applied a pathologizing category to homosexuality. This was confirmed again in the 1993 Guidelines for the Categorization and Diagnosis of Mental Disorders III, Indonesia's version of the DSM. Gender identity, however, is still categorized as a disorder. Yet, by popular and religious conventions, homosexuality is still understood as a deviance and abnormality from the social norms, a social sickness that could be cured and normalized by getting help from psychiatrists, religious leaders, or through the patient's own willingness.

Freedom of speech and association were also instigated by the democratic transformation after Suharto stepped down. Applied in an LGBT rights context, more and more people, including a moderate circle of Islamic and Christian leaders, have publicly stated their acceptance of sexual minorities as part of the spirit of diversity echoed by the country's national motto, "bhinneka tunggal ika" (unity in diversity). Despite the atmosphere conducive to speaking one's mind in public, whether through statements in mainstream media or on the Internet, the climate has also been tainted by hate speech practices, which, again, are imposed by representatives of Islamic fundamentalist groups. Today, the intensifying debates on LGBT issues between two opposite poles of the society have taken center stage in Indonesian public discourse.

EDUCATION

In 1984 the government launched the six-year compulsory education system (Wajib Belajar) for elementary school children, which was extended in 1994 to junior high school level, thus making education compulsory for nine years from ages 6 to 15. However, there has been great reluctance by the state to instill sexuality education within the school curricula. At best, the grade 7 biology textbook has a few pages about the anatomy of the reproductive organs and the biological changes associated with puberty, but there is no demonstrable teachings about HIV and AIDS, the importance of safer sex, or about sexuality in general.

The conventional disinterest toward institutionalizing sexual and reproductive health education in Indonesian schools is visible in the common presumptions that sexuality education will encourage students to engage in premarital sex by providing students the means to experiment with sex and thus indirectly condone these activities. Back in 1994, the Soeharto government expressed commitment to the agenda of promoting the right of adolescents to sexual and reproductive health information resulting from the 1994 Cairo International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD). Yet until now the state has remained ambivalent on the grounds that such approaches are based on Western ideas and would be culturally and religiously inappropriate in Indonesia.

Right now, only nongovernmental organizations are actively advocating and developing sexuality information for youth, while the role of parents has been idle in this regard. Many parents still think that sexuality is a taboo subject, thus leaving their children in the dark without any information about sexuality, to say nothing of issues of sexual diversity.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Despite the decelerating outlook of the global economy in 2008, Indonesia has succeeded in maintaining its growth. The country grew by 6.3 percent in 2007, a 10-year high since the economic crisis of the 1990s.⁶ The employment slow-down during the past decade has taken a reverse, with an increase of 4.5 million workers. Most of the increase in employment has come from the labor participation of previously inactive women. Meanwhile, the country's economy has also been supported by a large proportion of the labor force working in informal sectors, especially in service occupations sprawling within urban centers, yet these are workers with generally low incomes and the jobs are often unregulated and unreported in official statistics.

The burgeoning private sectors in Indonesia have also become employment opportunities for many gays and lesbians. Some gay men and lesbians have high-paying jobs in corporate management; the media usually conflates them with the executive classes.⁷ However, like most other Indonesian people, more gays and lesbians belong to the working-class and fill the various lines of lower-paid occupations, ranging from shop keeper to school teacher.

Because Indonesia has not implemented any form of antidiscrimination statutes based on sexual orientation in the workplace, many lesbian and gay employees choose not to be open about their sexuality due to the risk of losing their jobs. A similar condition also applies in civil service occupations. Meanwhile, some job opportunities involving transnational mobility have also become an option for nonheterosexual subjects who do not conform to the implicit repression in local employment scheme, as exemplified by the numerous women-who-love-women moving to Hong Kong or elsewhere abroad and becoming migrant workers.⁸

Stigma has been the main barrier for gender nonconforming subjects, such as tomboi and waria, to accessing employment. The fact that some transgendered people hold secondary education degrees does not grant them job opportunities in corporate environment, as many companies show reluctance to employ transgendered people for fear of losing their reputations and costumers.

Due to their visibly embodied gender nonconformity, female to male transgendered people have limited job opportunities compared to normative women in general, and sometimes find an option by working in conventional male domains,⁹ such as taxi-driving, parking vehicles, and so on. While in the waria context, the jobs they are associated with are petty commodity trading, street singing, and sex work. Other prototypical professions for waria include hairdressers, beauticians, and television entertainers and hosts. Since the early 2000s, the visibility of waria or other forms of transvestism has been amplified in Indonesian televised comedy shows. Recently, the National Commission of Broadcasting, as part of a respond to a fatwa (religious ruling) by the Islamic Cleric Council of Indonesia against transvestism in the media,¹⁰ has warned several private television stations not to exploit waria or banci representations (the latter being one of several derogatory Indonesian words for effeminate men), which could exposed younger audiences to gender-identity confusion.

SOCIAL/ GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

There are no specific assistance programs provided for LGBT in either the national or local levels of government. One carried out by the Jakarta Social Services department implicated a stigmatizing policy towards waria when the office sub-categorized the transgendered group under the auspices of handicapped persons. After receiving criticism from local waria rights groups in 2008, the department changed the policy and created instead a subdivision in charge of rehabilitating waria off the streets, namely the Subdinas Rehabilitasi Tuna Sosial, or Rehabilitation Services for Socially Differently abled.¹¹

On the other hand, another policy that recognizes LGBT as a category is Presidential Decree Number 75/2006, which provides state funding for the implementation of a three-year HIV and AIDS response program conducted by the National AIDS Commission. The targeted subjects for the prevention, care, support, and treatment strategies are most-at-risk populations, including men who have sex with men (MSM) and waria.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Consideration of the concept of sexuality, dubbed seksualitas in Indonesian, has always been conflated with religions and the nation-state discourses. Both institutions see that active sexuality should only occur within marriage, thus confining sexual practices within the social norms of heterosexuality and reproduction. Sexual practices outside the marital bond (pre- or extra-) sanctioned by the state and religions are overtly prohibited.

The silence about sexuality in official or state discourse has been reinforced by the nonexistent educational curriculum about sexuality, the importance of safer sex, and HIV and AIDS. Some junior high school textbook materials have a few pages explaining the anatomy of the reproductive organs and the biological changes associated with puberty, but there is no curricular requirement or acknowledged need to teach about sexuality in health and social contexts. The strong tendency to adhere to the discourse of sexuality under certain moral and ideological values has also been evident in the current moral panic surrounding the debate over the proposed antipornography legislation in the country.

It was within this precarious framework of sexuality that reports of AIDS first emerged in the national health scene in 1987. In the 20 years since, the epidemic has grown from a low level, concentrated epidemic transmitted largely through the sharing of injecting equipment, to an estimated 190,000 HIV infections increasingly transmitted through unprotected sex.¹²

The fact that condoms are relatively easy to obtain does not translate into widespread protection. This is partly due to regular and systematic reproaches against safer-sex advocacy in Indonesia led by religious authorities who the movement of condoning sexual promiscuity. There is also Family Welfare Law Number 10/1992, which states that family planning services are only to be provided to married couples. While it is not illegal for unmarried people to use contraception, and they can legally procure contraceptives through public stores, this regulation has led many people to assume that it is illegal for unmarried people to use protection.

Heated debates on sexuality fused with moral and political undertones are demonstrated in a case when the government revoked a public service announcement of AIDS prevention within just two days after its first airing. The decision came after the ad campaign by Aksi Stop AIDS (Stop AIDS Action), a program developed by Family Health International, USAID, and the Ministry of Health, yielded protests from Islamic exponents. Similar scenes were also manifest following the recent government plan to install condom vending machines in Yogyakarta public areas.

FAMILY

The modern institution of the state has shaped the current composition of Indonesian families into a single model: the patriarchal and heterosexual nuclear family. Central to the fabrication of this model is the family planning program initiated in 1970 by the founding of Badan Koordinasi Keluarga Berencana Nasional–BKKBN (National Family Planning Coordination Board). During the 32 years of Suharto's New Order regime, the state embedded the basic construction of the ideal family, a heterosexual couple with two children, as early as the first level of elementary education. Ten years after the fall of the regime, the formation of the nuclear family has been widely accepted as an essential part of the social and cultural imagining of modern Indonesia. This, for example, can be viewed from the recurrent representations of a middle-class, professional nuclear family represented in today's consumer goods television commercials.

The family law system in Indonesia only acknowledges heterosexual marriage. The hegemony of marriage in the country is deeply entrenched within the narratives of religion, tradition, and nation.¹³ This social imperative to marry is so pervasive that, should any lesbian or gay man choose not to marry, there would be enormous social and economic repercussions.

Across Indonesia, the current customary age for a man to marry is in his late twenties, and the pressure escalates as he turns older. To remain unmarried into one's thirties would indicate some kind of ineptitude; one would be perceived as socially immature or economically incomplete. For women, the range of age for marriage has increased from early twenties to late twenties. This is attributed to women's wider access to employment fields. However, there endures the myth of an ideal biomedical age used by the demands for women to get married and begin the whole reproduction cycle, from which they can ultimately reach woman- or motherhood.

Indonesian lesbians and gay men have practiced diverse agencies against the dominant pressure to marry. Some gay men choose to identify with the notion that being a husband and a father is the only way to become an adult member of society, and so opt to get married. From those who have chosen to marry, some even continue having same-sex relations without sensing a contradiction in their actions. There are also cases where gay men are forced to marry. In some of the most violent cases, the idea of having to go through with a marriage has been so distressing that these men choose to commit suicide. On the other hand, some who do not conform to the idea of marriage simply remain single throughout their adult life. Lesbians also choose more or less similar scenarios available in the spectrum of agency related to marriage, yet the challenges are far greater for women, not excluding tomboi,¹⁴ as they also have to face the prevailing issues of gender inequality within patriarchal Indonesian society. Meanwhile, being historically and culturally known in Indonesian contemporary society, the waria is the only major group of persons, other than the differently abled, who are excluded from compulsory heterosexual marriage. This allowance however does not necessarily mean that waria are more accepted by the society.

In the past, the mass media have highlighted the issue of same-sex marriage in Indonesia, such as that involving a lesbian couple, Jossie and Bonnie, in 1981¹⁵ and a more recent one, a gay marriage in Yogyakarta between Wim, a foreigner of Dutch origin, and a local man named Phillip, in 2003. These publicly consecrated same-sex marriages, however, remain practices located at the fringes of the society, and they have not led to more organized movements advocating the issue. Indonesian Law of Marriage Number 1/1974 still only recognizes marriage as being between a man and a woman.

COMMUNITY

The first organization of waria was established in the capital city of Jakarta in the late 1960s; the Himpunan Wadam Djakarta (Hiwad, the Jakarta Transvestite Association) was facilitated by then-Governor Ali Sadikin. Many other cities saw the formation of waria communities and organizations. In 1982, Lambda Indonesia, a gay organization, was formed in Solo, Central Java by Dédé Oetomo and a few friends. At about the same time, Perlesin (Persatuan Lesbian Indonesia, the Indonesian Lesbian Association) was formed by lesbians in Jakarta, however the latter organization folded soon after. In five years' time Lambda Indonesia expanded, but the national leadership fizzled out. Oetomo and his then-partner, Ruddy Mustapha went on to establish GAYa NUSANTARA in 1987.

Until now, organizations have been one of the prototypical realizations of the LGBT movement in Indonesia as it continues to engage actively with sexual diversity issues in the country. In their early period, these organizations functioned more as the pivotal point linking various gay and waria activist groups located in various cities across the islands, such as GAYa PRLAngan in West Java, GAYa DEWATA in Bali, GAYa CELEBES in Makassar, Sulawesi, and so on. Recently, their approach has become more inclusive and integrative of general LGBT movements, with activities ranging from HIV-AIDS campaigns in grassroots communities, community center provision for lesbians, gay men, and waria, the publication of magazines and seminal texts, to policy advocacy.

Within the last 30 years, a handful of LGBT-related groups have flourished and disbanded. Some gay and waria organizations gained momentum through an HIV-AIDS response program boosted in early 1990s, while lesbian groups were fuelled by the women's movements thriving later in the same decade. The 1998 political reform movement also became a crucial turning point for LGBT identity politics in Indonesia.

These LGBT organizations have been working through the many strands of approaches and activism, in line with local, regional, and global contexts. Organizations like Gessang in Solo, Central Java and Abiasa, based in West Java are focusing on HIV-AIDS prevention, care, support, and treatment among gay men, waria, and other MSM. Community-based lesbian support groups such as Ardhanary Institute and Institut Pelangi Perempuan (Women's Rainbow Institute) were founded to empower and advocate for the rights of lesbians, bisexual women, and female to male transgenders. Arus Pelangi (Rainbow Current) and its network of community-based groups scattering in different provinces are spearheading antidiscrimination and rights protection for all LGBT people. Based in Jakarta, Qmunity has organized the Q!Film Festival, one of the largest queer film festivals in Asia, since 2001. During the eight years of the film festival's existence, approximately 85,000 people nationwide have participated.

Most of the organizations mentioned here are nonprofit and accept support from international funders while working to develop their own linkages through regional or global networks. Many of the organizations' programs are concentrated in urban centers, such as Jakarta, Surabaya, and Yogyakarta. Moreover, in the urban settings (but increasingly in rural settings as well) the rise of Internet technology in late 1990s has also endorsed the formation of Indonesian LGBT communities in cyberspace. Catering to the needs of some gay men and lesbians unwilling to expose their sexuality in heterosexual society, the Internet-based media of e-mail forums, mailing lists, Internet Relay Chat (IRC), and memberships in Web sites has become effective means for these people to communicate, socialize, and create a community.

Apart from the burgeoning LGBT communities in Indonesian urban sites, however, there remain questions about how LGBT subjects socialize as a community within the rural areas, in view of the fact that more than 80 percent of Indonesians are based in villages,¹⁶ even if they live to work in the cities. This is added to the fact that there are also many nonheterosexual people who may not identify with the available pretexts of LGBT formations developed in the urban locations.

HEALTH

The state does not contribute much to health expenditures in the country. Health care is mostly provided via the private sector. While in recent years there has been an increase in general spending on health attributed to the support of local administrations, the total amount allocated is much lower compared to the overall spending on health and its improving outcome in neighboring countries such as Malaysia, the Philippines, and Vietnam.

Tuberculosis, measles, malaria, and dengue fever remain high profile on the national health scene, while diagnoses of other conditions, such as diabetes, cancer, and heart disease continue to rise rapidly. In the context of AIDS, while the estimated annual number of new HIV infections decreased in other Asian countries in 2007, in Indonesia the prevalence of HIV is growing. In fact, the increasing number of new HIV infections in Indonesia makes the epidemic one of the fastest growing in Asia. The most common mode of transmission of HIV is through the use of contaminated needles, unprotected sex and, to a lesser extent, unprotected same-sex practices among men (including waria). Since 2004, the government has guaranteed that antiretroviral medication can be obtained free of charge.

There is no specific health support provided for the needs of sexual minority groups. On the other hand, stigma and rhetorical blame have been actively hindering attempts by gay men and waria to access HIV and AIDS information, voluntary counseling, and testing services, as well as care, support, and treatment for those already living with the virus.

The national social health insurance program for the poor, Askeskin, appears only to provide minimal relief, mainly assigned to opportunistic infections, tuberculosis, and pediatric care. There have even been reports of obstacles for poor people living with HIV in accessing this type of insurance.

Transgendered persons take on different views on sex-reassignment surgery. Among waria, who generally perceive themselves as women trapped in male bodies, body modification practices are common. The most traditional forms of body modification for waria include consuming jamu (traditional herbal medicines) or inserting padding inside one's clothes to create breasts. The latter method is increasingly rare nowadays, and is more often replaced by more permanent body modifications. The most common is by consuming of female hormones by taking birth-control pills or via hormone injections. The second-most common type of body modification comes from injecting liquid silicone. Due to its lower cost, this method, which focuses on the facial and chest areas, is more popular among waria when compared to optional, yet costly, plastic surgery. Nevertheless, a number of health problems have arisen from injecting silicone under the skin, due to improper procedures that can cause infections. The last and least commonly practiced body modification method is gender reassignment surgery, which is unpopular among waria, despite the fact that this procedure has been available since 1973 and has been undertaken by some local transsexual celebrities. There remain a few waria who have gone through with the operation for many different reasons. Some waria are financially unable to have the operation, while others do not wish to do so out of religiosity or fear. There are also those who simply accept themselves as waria, a woman trapped inside a man's body.¹⁷ For tomboi, hormone therapy has also become a more viable way to adopt some male physical attributes, but there have not yet been any reports of gender reassignment surgeries conducted on an Indonesian female-to-male patient.

POLITICS AND LAW

Indonesian LGBT subjects' participation in politics and the law has begun to grab the limelight of the political stage. Political recognition of LGBT rights in Indonesia is exemplified by the reports by the National Human Rights Commission's inclusion of LGBT persons in their list of populations in need of rights protection. During the first multiparty democratic elections in 1999, the now badly splintered People's Democratic Party (PRD) demanded full rights and recognition for "homosexuals and transsexuals."

Even so, the increasing numbers and voices of people and pressure groups working to advocate for LGBT political and legal interests at the executive and legislative levels have been relatively too small and ephemeral to generate effective results.

In terms of laws and regulations, the National Civil Code of Indonesia, inherited from the Dutch Civil Code, which was based on the Napoleonic Code, does not hold homosexuality and transgenderism under the rubric of penal law. The state has also adopted Human Rights Law Number 39/1999 and the 2000 Amendment of the 1945 Constitution, which seek to protect basic human rights, yet local bylaws and regulations have all the inclination to work against the framework of minority rights protection stipulated in the national legislation.

Local ordinances that currently criminalize LGBT are, among others, the anti-prostitution bylaw issued by the Palembang Municipal Administration in 2004, which defines prostitution as including homosexuality, lesbianism, sodomy, sexual harassment, and other pornographic acts. The anti-prostitution ordinances in Tangerang and Indramayu (both in West Java) endanger the freedom of expression, assembly, and association by barring anyone who exhibits a behavior that raises the suspicion of being a prostitute from the public site. This article could impinge on waria as well as normative women simply suspecting they are carrying out prostitution work.¹⁸

The latest controversy on the proposed Pornography Bill also highlights some LGBT stigmatization, instead of recognition, conducted by the state by defining deviant sexual intercourse as intercourse or other forms of sexual activity with corpses or animals, oral sex, anal sex, and lesbian and homosexual sex.

Discriminatory practices of the state are also indicative in the Civil Administration Law Number 23/ 2006 and its bylaw, which recognizes the binary nature of male and female genders only, while excluding transgendered identities such waria and tomboi. As a consequence, transgendered people are regularly unable to get hold of basic legal documentation on equal terms with other citizens, often with dire consequences in terms of access to health care and other services requiring identity documentation.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Despite Indonesia's constitutional recognition of world's major religions such as Protestantism, Roman Catholicism, Hinduism, and Buddhism, Islam is by far the dominant one. Islamic teachings and traditions in the country date back at least to the 13th century, when it was spreading through the archipelago via the global trade networks connecting the Far East with the Arab World, Africa, and Europe. A vast majority of lesbians, gay men, tomboi, and waria in the country are registered Muslims.

The paramount religious stance on homosexuality is that it is a sinful, deviant, and unnatural behavior, and should be contained through disciplinary and prescriptive measures so as not to incite social and religious disorder. The utmost homophobic Islamic hardliners have sometimes cited the Koranic story of Lot to justify discrimination and violence against sexual minority groups.

The explicit condemnation and intimidation based on sexual orientation and gender identity, however, does not compel LGBT people to stop embracing and practicing their religion. Access to prayer, transcendence, and faith are creatively initiated and reinterpreted by sexual minorities, as exemplified by the establishment of the pesantren (Islamic boarding school) for waria in Yogyakarta,¹⁹ or the existing LGBT prayer groups in East Java cities, initiated in a response to the homophobic stance of Christian orthodoxy.

Since the early 2000s, more and more progressive religious figures, above all those from the Muslim liberal forefront, have declared their acceptance of homosexuality and thus challenged dominant Islam's position in contemporary Indonesia.²⁰ At any rate, the heated debates on homosexuality and religion have brought the Indonesian public to a new level of discourse.

VIOLENCE

The historical trajectory of human rights enforcement in Indonesia has been tainted many times by violent abuses imposed by the ruling powers. Direct involvement of the state in the death and imprisonment of thousands accused of being communist affiliates between 1965 and 1966, as well as various sectarian clashes in Aceh, the former East Timor and Papua between the 1970s and late 1990s, has gained notoriety for the country among global human rights watchdogs and advocates. The long list of state-imposed acts of violence has also been marked by the Suharto regime's suspected conspiracy in the May 1998 riots, which led to the mass rapes of ethnic Chinese women and the burning alive of working class and urban poor who were goaded into looting shops in Jakarta.

Until the recent past, along with other potential dissenting voices, LGBT voices had also been repressed into silence by the state's hegemonic discourse on family, marriage, and nationalism. Any indications of nonheterosexuality were barred from the public, such as in the government's intervention in the folk-art performance of reog in Ponorogo, East Java, in 1983.²¹ This institutionalized tradition of sexual relations between reog's male practitioners (warok and gemblak) was silenced and discouraged, with demands that the reog troupes replace gemblak dancers with young girls.²²

The indigenous transgendered or multigendered ritual positions practiced by all four genders in the Bugis culture of South Sulawesi, known as bissu, had also been a target of state repression and violence. The gender transcendent role that bissu fill in the local society included providing advice when a particular approval from the powers of the spiritual world is required. The group-specific "inter-sexuality" is not exclusively connected to their anatomy, but to their point in the Bugis culture, their genderless (or all all-encompassing gender) identity and their exhibit of many types that can not be accurately allocated to any one sex. In the mid 1960s, however, the traditional ritual practices and the profession of bissu were forbidden, and they were accused of being un-Islamic and linked to the Communist Party of Indonesia.

Since the authoritarian government was ousted in 1998, state-imposed violence has receded, but has also been replaced by a new form of violence, this time involving paramilitary groups formed by the radical forces Islam that deny the development of democratic and plural civil society that recognizes, among others, the right of sexual diversity.

In 2000, a gathering of gay men and waria in Kaliurang, Yogyakarta, held in observance of solidarity among sexual minorities and AIDS campaign activists, was attacked by some 150 men claiming to be members of the local Islamic youth group, Gerakan Pemuda Ka'bah (Ka'bah Youth Movement). The celebratory event, called Kerlap-Kerlip Warna Kedaton 2000 (KKWK 2000,—literally, Flickering Colors of the Royal Court) turned into a bloody incident that left several injured and hospitalized. Starting in 1997, and especially since that moment, death threats, armed group raids, and hostile harassment have been the constant troubles that loom over every public LGBT-related event, such as was the case of the 2005 Miss Waria pageant in Jakarta, which was broken up by another paramilitary Islamic group, dubbed Front Pembela Islam (FPI-Islam Defenders Front) or the continuous threats received by John Badalu and other members of Qmunity, the organization in charge for the annual holding of Q!Film Festival.

Another form of violence is also found in the media industry, where homosexuality is currently being demonized and criminalized in the press coverage of a serial murder involving a local gay man. The media has conflated such crime offenses to the pretext of social deviancy and abnormality constructed around homosexuality, and in doing so has incited public hatred towards gay men.

Meanwhile, with the ongoing decentralization process at the executive level, local bureaucrats and state apparatuses have seemingly reproduced homophobic violence through physical abuse and torture. This case was materialized, for instance, in the recent police abuse of two gay men in Aceh province, where they were detained for committing adultery among men. Local human rights watch groups have also recorded other cases of abuse towards lesbians, gay men, tomboi, and waria in different locales and forms.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Indonesia's LGBT movement faces considerable challenges in every aspect of its contemporary Islamic society. Although there have been dramatic transformations in terms of LGBT visibility in public, as well as in the political, economic, and cultural landscapes in the country, comprehensive efforts still need to be made. The list of activism work starts with advocating for sexual minority rights, ending phobic narratives about lesbians, gay men, tomboi, and waria, deconstructing modern invented heteronormative cultures, and promoting sustained and equal access for nonheterosexual and transgendered individuals.

One of the most pressing needs in the struggle for equal LGBT rights is to continue empowering the increased number of LGBT persons who are now living openly.

Video/Films

- Arisan! (The Gathering)*, DVD, directed by Nia Dinata (2003; Kalyana Shira Films, 2003). A comedy that pokes fun at Indonesia's upper crust. The main character is a young gay man who hides his sexual orientation from his family only to soon become involved in a same-sex relationship, and he must cope with the societal realities of being out of the closet. The film has garnered international attention for its gay-positive message.
- Detik Terakhir (Last Second)*, DVD, directed by Nanang Istiabudi (2005; Indika Entertainment, 2005). A lesbian couple deals with the harsh realities of illicit drug-abuse, prostitution, and troubled family. The script is adapted from the novel Jangan Beri Aku Narkoba (Don't Give Me Illicit Drugs), by Alberthiene Endah.
- The Last Bissu*, DVD, directed by Rhoda Grauer (2004; Manitou Media Ltd. and Salto Films, 2005). This documentary follows the daily life of Saidi, a high priest of an almost extinct religious sect, who is determined not to be the last of the Bissu.
- Renita, Renita*, DVD, directed by Tonny Trimarasanto (2006). Documentary about Renita, who was born a male but wanted to be female since she was a child. Her parents forced her to study at an Islamic school where she was bullied and ostracized. She rebelled by becoming a sex worker in the hope of finding freedom, but instead found that it came at a cost. Won Best Short Movie at the Cinemanila International Film Festival in 2007.

This prohibition was predicated on the belief that the resulting loss of sperm would deplete their supernatural powers. To aid them in their endeavor, each warok enlisted the aid of a young boy known as a gemblak who acted as a “substitute” woman.

OVERVIEW

Japan is an archipelago located in eastern Asia. It consists of four main islands, Hokkaidō, Honshū, Shikoku, and Kyūshū, as well as many smaller islands. To the west, it is separated from Korea and Russia by the Sea of Japan, while it faces the Pacific Ocean to the east, and the East China Sea to the south. With a total area of about 378,000 square kilometers, Japan has a population of over 125 million people.¹ The consistent decline in the birth rate since the 1970s (1.26 as of 2005) combined with high standards of health care and life expectancy (78.53 for men and 85.49 for women, as of 2005)² means that Japan is an aging country with one of the longest life spans in the world.

Many Japanese people regard Japan as a culturally and linguistically homogenous nation. Despite the fact that Japan has small populations of ethnic minorities, referred to as zainichi (residents of Japan) mainly of Korean and Chinese descent, as well as social minorities such as buraku (“hamlet” people, a formerly untouchable caste) and the indigenous Ainu tribe of Hokkaidō, most Japanese commonly assume that Japan is a monoethnic society. Claims of social and cultural homogeneity in Japan are expected to be challenged in years to come, however, as Japan will need to rely more on migrant workers to deal with its shrinking population.

Despite its legacy of cultural insularity, Japan has a rich history of interaction with other cultures. Japan has imported a great deal from the Chinese culture since the seventh century, including the religions of Buddhism and Confucianism. It can be said that Shintō (“the way of gods”), which was adopted as a national religion during the Meiji period (1868–1912), and it is often considered Japan’s indigenous religion. It came into existence by combining Buddhism and Confucianism with Japanese nativist ideology.

Cultural interaction between Japan and foreign states was largely suspended in the early 17th century due to the nation’s self-seclusion policy, which allowed only limited cultural and economic trade and diplomatic exchange with a few countries, such as the Netherlands and China. By the mid 19th century, however, Japan began to emerge from its seclusion and rigorously transformed its government, military, and industry to conform to Western practices. The national project of “civilization and enlightenment” dating from the Meiji Restoration of 1868, resulted in Japan being more influenced by the West than by other neighboring nations in Asia. A slogan pioneered by political and cultural leaders of the Meiji period, datsua-ron (“theory for leaving Asia”) is emblematic of the Japanese nation’s preference for the West over the East. Borrowing from the West and attempts to attain parity therewith, however, resulted in conflict with Western and Asian nations alike, leading up to the Second World War. During the war, Japan rejected Western democracy and turned once again toward Asia, this time as a colonizer, a project that itself began in the late 19th century. In the postwar period, Japan quickly recovered from its defeat and has once again rebuilt its self-esteem under the strong influence of the United States.

The project of nation building in Japan has had a long history of interaction with other cultures. LGBT culture in Japan has similarly been strongly influenced by cross-cultural contacts.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

In the premodern context, the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered cultures of Japan each has had their own history within the literary and social spheres. Since the 1990s, however, there has been a surge of what can be termed collective LGBT activism by those who consider themselves to be part of the general category of “sexual minorities.”

In the immediate postwar period, homosexual individuals were skeptical about the medical theories imported and expanded upon from the early 20th century that defined homosexuality and transgenderism as perverse,³ but such dissent did not amount to a collective force for challenging the hegemony of the discourse. Although homosexuality was declassified as a mental disorder in the United States in 1973 with the publication of the new Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM), a move that was reported in the Japanese media, the public and medical institutions of Japan continued to relegate homosexuality to the realm of abnormality.

The advent of a collective gay rights movement in Japan was closely related to the AIDS crisis that occurred in the mid-1980s. Despite the fact that the majority of Japanese people who contracted HIV during that decade were hemophiliacs exposed to nonsterilized blood products, in 1988 the government passed the controversial AIDS Prevention Law, which was intended to identify male homosexuals and other sexual minorities, including sex workers, as the fundamental source of HIV infection.⁴ The law infuriated gay activists, who suspected that the government was utilizing male homosexuals as a scapegoat to deflect public criticism away from government involvement in the circulation of nonsterilized blood products. The mobilization of gay activism was pursued in an unprecedented manner in the 1990s in response to the government's neglect of and disrespect for homosexual people. Prominent activist groups such as the Japanese International Lesbian and Gay Association (JILGA) and Japan Association for Lesbian and Gay Movement (OCCUR) were established in 1984 and 1986, respectively.

The 1990s were also the period when Japanese homosexual cultures became more open and visible in the public domain. Two major elements were central to this social phenomenon. One was related to the increasing interest of the Japanese media in gay culture, particularly lifestyle magazines aimed at women that disseminated the idea that gay men are trendier and more sensitive than straight men.⁵ Other media, such as comics and movies, and especially those of the genres YAOI (Yama nashi, Ochi nashi, Imi nashi [no climax, no resolution, no meaning]) and BL (Boys Love) also played a substantial role in promulgating these depictions of gay men. This Japanese fascination with gay culture in the early 1990s is now termed the "Gay Boom" phenomenon.

Another factor that contributed to the social visibility of homosexual culture in Japan came from Japanese homosexuals themselves. Partially to subvert the stereotypes of gays and lesbians that proliferated at the time, Japanese gays and lesbians began to speak out in public on their own terms. A range of what can be described as "coming out books" were published during the 1990s by Japanese gay and lesbian authors. Among these, Fushimi Noriaki's Private Gay Life (1991), Kakefuda Hiroko's On Being a "Lesbian" (1992), and Hirano Hiroaki's Anti-Heterosexism (1994) are now considered the classic texts for the Japanese gay and lesbian liberation movements. In 1991, the activist group OCCUR was involved in the first court case in Japanese history where the rights of homosexual citizens were discussed. OCCUR sued the Tokyo Metropolitan government for denying the group access to a government-run youth facility (Fuchū seinen no ie) because the government agency considered the characteristics and nature of homosexuals to be unfit and improper. The Tokyo district court decided in favor of OCCUR in 1994, and a higher court upheld the decision after a government appeal in 1997.⁶

From the middle of the 1990s, academic journals in the humanities began publishing translated articles from foreign queer theorists such as Teresa de Lauretis, Judith Butler, and Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick. As a result, the kuia, a Japanese transliteration of the English word "queer," began to appear in many LGBT-related Japanese publications. Earlier in the decade, the first lesbian and gay Tokyo film festival and street parades were held, albeit on a small scale and budget, and set the basic parameters for other similar gay-themed events in other major cities in subsequent years. The organization of these events depended on the collaboration among diverse groups within the Japanese LGBT community.

Beginning in the late 1990s, a range of publications, including academic books and popular magazines, started to specifically address the notion or possibility of same-sex partnerships in Japan. LGBT activism took a critical turn from focusing on the de-pathologization of homosexuality in the early 1990s to claiming partnership rights in the 21st century. In the 2000s, Otsuji Kanako, the first out lesbian politician in Japan, has been instrumental in bringing about changes in the legal conditions facing sexual minorities in Japan, and has further helped to invigorate LGBT community activism.

Compared with the postwar history of gay men and lesbians, very little is known about transgendered people, transvestites, and transsexuals in Japan, except limited gender-bending performances in traditional theatre culture such as kabuki and the more contemporary, all-female Takarazuka musical revue. Both transvestism and transsexualism in general were treated as a subcategory of homosexuality in medial discourse for a long time. In the 1980s, the gradual separation of the categories homosexuality and transgender took place alongside changes to the DSM-III. The medicalization of transgenderism as a category of mental disorder has continued in Japan, especially after doctors from Saitama Medial University submitted a research proposal on sex reassignment surgery (SRS) to the university's ethical committee in 1995. In 1997, the Japanese Society of Psychiatry and Neurology (JSPN) announced their guidelines for the treatment for people with gender identity disorder (GID). In October 1998, the first SRS on a male to female (MTF hereafter) patient was conducted under the guidelines, and another was performed on a second MTF in July 1999.

The 2003 election of transwoman Kamikawa Aya added further impetus to Japanese transgender activism. Kamikawa became a member of a ward assembly in Tokyo in April 2003, and played an important role in lobbying for legislation concerning people with GID (known as the Law Concerning Special Rules Regarding the Sex Status of Persons with Gender Identity Disorder), which passed in July 2003 and gave people diagnosed with GID the right to change their gender in official records under certain conditions.⁷

Alongside the advent of transgender activism, social support groups for intersexuals (or DSD, people with disorders of sexual development) also started to emerge in the early 1990s. These include Himawarino kai (Sunflower Club, 1991) in Osaka, and Hijura Nippon (Hijras Japan, 1995; the group changed its name to Peer Support for Intersexuals [PESFIS] in 1997). During this period, a number of intersex activists collaborated closely with transgender activists with the aim of criticizing the gender binary embedded in Japanese society. Thanks to such activism, by the late 1990s the existence of intersexed people began to be acknowledged in Japanese society, and educational materials used in public schools now make reference to intersexuality as a legitimate sexual identity. Furthermore, Rokuhana Chiyo's graphic novel IS, based on the theme of intersexuality, was awarded the Manga Prize from the prestigious Japanese publisher Kodansha and has subsequently been widely read and garnered high recognition.

EDUCATION

The Ministry of Education, Culture, Sports, Science, and Technology, which has authority over education in Japan, has yet to adequately harness its political power in order to make school environments more friendly to LGBT students and teachers. Recent research shows that more than half of gay and bisexual men who were interviewed experienced bullying at school that resulted in a lack of confidence about their own sexuality. They also reported struggling at school due to an educational environment that fails to recognize nonheteronormative sexuality. It is said that two out of three gay and bisexual youth in school have considered committing suicide, and 15 percent of them have actually attempted it.⁸ No Japanese studies have been conducted on lesbian youth in schools.

Similar to the situation of gay youth, students with GID suffer tremendously from not being able to cope with the heterogender-normative school environment. Statistics show that there is a huge disparity in education between female to male transgenders (FTM) and MTF transgenders. While fewer than half of FTMs go on to college, more than 70 percent of MTFs do. The number of transwomen who go to college is far greater than the national average.⁹

Community support groups designed specifically for LGBT youth are still very few in number. It was only in 2009 when university students across Japan collaborated to create a support group called Reinbō karejji (“Rainbow College”) as a space where LGBT youth could meet each other and discuss their challenges. Some positive steps in terms of exposing the problematic realities of the education system in Japan were made when school teachers such as Ikeda Kumiko (1999), came out in public by voicing their critiques in published books. In 2001, a peer support group for LGBT teachers in Japan, the Sexual Minority Teachers’ Network was organized.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

In recent decades, Japan has developed an economy roughly half the size of the U.S. economy. In 2005, Japan’s gross domestic product (GDP) was $5,066 (US$ bn.), as opposed to the United States’ GDP of $11,140 (US$ bn.).¹⁰ Since the “bubble economy” of the late 1980s collapsed at the beginning of the 1990s, Japan has faced a severe economic recession and has struggled with high unemployment rates relative to those during the economic boom (e.g., 5.3% as of 2003).¹¹

The Japanese economy has gradually recovered in the 21st century. The Japanese government has continued to innovate and implement deregulation of the private and public sectors, following the United States’ model of neoliberalism. This has led to increased income disparity and a reduction of social security, which threatens to create a society in which the strong prey upon the weak. Under such circumstances, the primary concern of the general public will tend to be their everyday needs. For this reason, public attention will be deflected from such issues as LGBT politics.

Issues of discrimination against LGBT people in the workplace have yet to appear in public debates. This lack of discussion, however, does not indicate the absence of such discrimination. Given that radical gay and lesbian identity politics began only in the late 1980s, the majority of homosexuals in Japan are still by and large closeted in the workplace. In the case of gay men, the postwar lifetime employment system, called shūshin koyōsei, in which marital status is considered important for promotion, has put tremendous pressure on them to marry, forcing many to reluctantly enter into marriage with a woman. In recent years, this employment pattern has been under radical reconstruction due to the economic recession and foreign pressure for Japanese companies to be compatible with the global standard of economic rationalism. As a result, the marital status of gay men in the workplace has tended to cause fewer obstacles for promotion or job security today than it did in the past.

Although there has been no academic research conducted on employment rates and income levels for lesbians and bisexual women in Japan, they are assumed to parallel, to some degree, those of Japanese women in general. A substantial income gap exists between men and women in Japan; records show that full-time female workers earned less than 70 percent of that earned by their male counterparts in 2008. In addition, the number of companies that employ women solely as contract workers has increased significantly in recent years; as of 2008, 53.5 percent of female workers were contract-based employees, compared to 31.9 percent in 1985. The average income of casual female employees has been consistently lower than the 50 percent of that of full-time male workers in the last 20 years, and thus far shown no sign of improvement.¹² Under such unequal social conditions, Japanese lesbians and bisexual women remain economically disadvantaged in society.

Transgendered people face great difficulty in pursuing careers in mainstream work environments. The frequency of changing occupations is high for transgendered workers, and their average incomes tend to be lower than the national standard. Furthermore, a study shows that 35 percent of them live alone. In the workplace, 30 percent decide not to disclose their GID condition and remain closeted, and 20 percent have experienced discrimination due to their gender identity. One can observe a pattern in employment: FTMs tend to be employed in the blue-collar sector, as opposed to MTFs, who primarily work in white-collar occupations. As previously mentioned, MTFs tend to have more education than FTMs. At the same time, the employment rate of MTFs is significantly lower than for nontransgendered people with similar educational qualifications. Only 18.2 percent of MTFs were successful in gaining employment in 2003.¹³ These numbers demonstrate the significant difficulties facing transgendered people in Japan.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENTAL PROGRAMS

While there has been extensive activity by nonprofit organizations and non-governmental organizations in support of sexual minorities in Japan, the government has been reluctant to organize any special programs geared to the needs of LGBT people. There is a nationally funded research institute for HIV, the AIDS Research Center of the National Institute of Infectious Diseases, yet it is normally considered a state-sponsored project for the general public, not one exclusively for LGBT people. As an alternative, LGBT community-based organizations for HIV prevention and AIDS patients, such as Pureisu Tokyo (Place Tokyo), have been far more effective in terms of providing direct services and support for sexual minorities. The situation is similar in other social sectors, including education and employment.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

In contemporary Japan, the general public's view on homosexual relations varies. According to the Japanese General Social Survey of 2000, the younger generation tends to be more understanding of homosexual relations than older generations. Moreover, women, in general, are more inclined than men to show tolerance.¹⁴

Same-sex intimacy existed in premodern and early modern Japan; historical literature and art depicting male-male homoeroticism is well documented. From the medieval era until the fall of the Edo period (1603–1868), social and cultural customs related to male-male eroticism, if not male homosexual behavior, were widely accepted and known as nanshoku (male-male eroticism), shūdō, or wakashūdō (the way of male youths). Homoerotic intimacy was almost exclusively between a senior and junior partner, and it functioned as cultural ethos. In the Meiji period, male-male eroticism continued to be prevalent, especially among male students in school, yet also began to be perceived as feudal and outdated by supporters of Western practices, so much so that it was considered as a negative benchmark against which the newly civilized cultural code that the Meiji government envisaged was measured. Up until this point in Japanese history, homosexuality was primarily a matter of physical acts and behaviors rather than an identity or subject position. In the early decades of the 20th century, Western medical and sexological discourse about homosexuality began to reshape the Japanese understanding of same-sex sexuality and transgenderism in general. This Western influence has been credited with the increasing prevalence of the misconceptions of homosexuality and transgenderism as pathological mental and/or physical conditions. This essentialist conceptualization of homosexuality and its identity was gradually cemented in postwar Japan.

While Japan has adopted Western theories of sexology, intimate relationships between women, especially in girls' schools, were known as ome or esu. The archetypal pattern for romantic intimacy among girls was considered to be a relationship between an older and a younger student. Whether this image was accurate or not, such hierarchical relationships were generally regarded as both an extension of friendship and limited to youth, and thus not threatening to the social order. A prominent double suicide in July 1911 by two girls' school graduates, however, triggered a media sensation that saw intensified popular discussion of intimacy between women. Nonetheless, even after the incident, the subject of esu remained less threatening to the Japanese social order than its male counterpart.

Although it can be said that the custom of esu is on the verge of disappearing in Japan due to the decrease in the number of girls' schools after postwar educational reform, the reality remains unknown in present day. One survey conducted on women who do not identify as heterosexual indicates that the majority of them first fell in love with female friends in school. The first sexual experience for these women often took place when they were in their teens and twenties; for half of them, their first sexual experience was with a female partner. Kissing, foreplay, and vaginal stimulation are the most common sexual behaviors between these women. Gender role-playing, where relationships form between a masculine and a feminine partner, was not considered negative among the women surveyed.¹⁵

A postwar transgender community first emerged in the 1950s. It has consisted primarily of two groups: MTF transgenders themselves, and heterosexual men who fancy them. In 1979, a transgender salon called the Elizabeth Club opened to cater exclusively to MTF transgenders. In 1981, the club launched the journal Kuīn (Queen), which addresses Japanese MTF transgender culture. One of the main features of the journal was a self-photo shoot competition among subscribers. This kind of competition for perfecting female mannerisms and attire among MTF transgenders themselves led to a situation where the practice of MTF transgenderism/transvestism was often pursued as a competition among peers, instead of being aimed at a heterosexual male audience.

Since guidelines permitting sex reassignment surgery were introduced in 1997, a hierarchal categorization within the transgendered community has developed. Those who are medically diagnosed with gender identity disorder and choose to undergo SRS have been granted the greatest legitimacy. On the other hand, people who cannot or have not undergone SRS are considered "inferior" transgenders, and transvestites are placed at the very bottom of the hierarchy. Such taxonomical validation has reinforced the traditional discourse on transgenders in general, which says “they are trapped in the wrong body.”

In terms of sexual preferences, demographically FTMs are generally attracted to females and thus desire heterosexual relationships. Among MTFs, the majority are attracted to men and similarly pursue heterosexual relationships, but a sizeable minority are also attracted to women.¹⁶

FAMILY

In Japan, it is the general consensus that the current constitution does not grant anyone the right to marry a person of the same sex due to Article 24, which states that a married couple consists of a male and a female. Since it would be necessary to win over two-thirds of the vote in both houses of the national Diet, and a majority of votes in a national referendum, in order to amend Japan’s Constitution, it is at present considered too difficult to expand the definition of marriage to include homosexual couples. Although Japan’s divorce rate over the last decade has been much higher than its past average,¹⁷ the heterosexual married couple continues to hold normative status in society. In this regard, it is more reasonable and realistic for LGBT activists to lobby for the legalization of same-sex partnerships. In the meantime, there is a law available for homosexual couples to utilize strategically in order for their relationship to be legally recognized; they can claim the legal guardianship of their partner through the adoption law, futsū yōshien gumi, as defined in Article 792 of the Civil Code. Despite the fact that this law mainly applies to persons who wish to adopt minors, the law technically allows homosexual couples to claim a familial relationship whereby related legal rights are granted.¹⁸

Within Japan, all individuals with Japanese nationality are listed in a family register, or koseki, which renders the family the basic sociolegal unit to which individuals belong. The koseki normally consists of a married couple and their unmarried children. When children marry, their names are removed from the parents’ koseki and registered on a new koseki with their spouse. Although the newly married couple has the right to designate either the female or the male partner as the head of household on the koseki, in contemporary Japan the majority of newly married couples assign this title to male partner.¹⁹

The aforementioned 2003 law concerning GID allows individuals who have undergone SRS to change their gender on their koseki, but only under a strict set of criteria. An individual may only change her or his legal sex upon reaching the age of majority, which is currently 20 years of age. He or she must not be married at the time of application, must not have children, must have the reproductive organs removed as a part of SRS, and, finally, must have surgically obtained the external genitalia of the gender to which she or he wishes to be legally reassigned.²⁰ Thus, the law only affords formal recognition to those willing to undergo pathologization as suffering from GID and surgical correction of that disorder, who subsequently will not intervene or impose any threat to the traditional definition of marriage and parenthood in Japan.

COMMUNITY

The concept of an LGBT community is relatively recent in the history of Japanese LGBT culture. There is very little documentation of groups or associations of homosexual people with the specific aim of initiating political movements prior to the postwar era. Soon after the war, however, numerous groups and social communities for homosexual people, almost exclusively for gay men, started to appear. Liberated from wartime repression of speech and expression, the immediate postwar Japan saw a burst of publications on sexual customs. Literature, magazines, and movies were the main media that gave both representation of and voice to homosexuals. Among these, from the late 1940s to the 1950s, writers and readers of what can be termed as kasutori zasshi (pulp magazines) or hentai zasshi (perverse magazines) enthusiastically discussed a diverse range of human sexuality, including homosexuality, bisexuality, and sadomasochism. Over time, the writers and readers of those magazines who were homosexuals began to create groups for men with homosexual desires and interests. A group called Fuzoku kagaku kenkyūkai (Research Group for Sexual Customs) was one of the earliest of these.²¹ Some prominent writers were involved in launching the first exclusively gay male oriented magazine in the history of Japan, called ADONIS, a noncommercial publication available only by subscription and published between 1952 and 1962. From 1971 onwards, a sense of community among gay men was further developed through the birth of the nationally distributed gay magazine Barazoku.

While there has been an increasing amount of collaboration between the lesbian and gay communities in recent years, the lesbian community has its own distinct history. By the late 1960s, more than 20 lesbian bars, called rezu bā (lez bars), existed in Tokyo.²² Those bars were usually frequented by heterosexual customers, however, but patrons were served by female hostesses in male clothes. Those bars started to disappear by the mid- to late 1970s. In June 1985, the first female-run bar to target lesbian-identified customers opened for business in Shinjuku ni-chōme, the biggest gay neighborhood in Tokyo. Today, there are fewer than 10 lesbian bars in Shinjuku ni-chōme, and a few in other major metropolitan areas, a paltry sum in comparison with the impressively large number of gay bars around the country.

While lesbian bar history seems to contradict this, the establishment of the Japanese lesbian community is generally considered to have occurred with the inauguration of the Tokyo-based lesbian organization Wakakusa no kai (Young Grass Club) in 1971. During its 15 years of existence, at least 500 women were members.²³ The main purpose of the group was to help women meet other women who were interested in pursuing romantic relationships. In contrast with the lack of social activism displayed by the Young Grass Club, in the mid-1970s self-identified lesbian feminists began to fight for social and political rights. Lesbian feminism developed from the women's liberation movement, which itself emerged in 1970. Lesbian feminists went on to publish several small magazines in 1976 through which to pursue their own activism.²⁴ In 1987, the community center for lesbians, Regumi Sutajio Tokyo (Lesbian Group Studio Tokyo), was created, and became the networking hub for lesbians in Japan.

In 1990s, the lesbian writer Kakefuda Hiroko played a significant role in critiquing Japanese heterosexism from a lesbian point of view. She was also involved in publishing a new lesbian community-based magazine, LABRYS (1992–1995), and establishing a community center for lesbians and bisexual women called LOUD (Lesbians of Undeniable Drive) in Tokyo (1995–present) to encourage the generation of Japanese lesbians who were born in the 1960s and 1970s to participate in activism.

Until the first half of the 1990s, there was criticism of bisexual women among the lesbian community. The controversy was in regard to whether bisexual women should be allowed to take part in lesbian events. Although discrimination against bisexual women within the lesbian community did not entirely disappear, Uiminzu uikendo (Women's Weekends) was inaugurated as a community event mainly for bisexual women in 1993, followed by Uiminzu Bainetto (the Women's Bisexual-Network) in 1994. Kakefuda assured her readers that her magazine and organized community centers such as LABRYS and LOUD were devoted to "lesbian and bisexual women" in order to show her consideration and support for bisexual women. Furthermore, the commercial magazines such as Furiine (Phryné, 1995), and Aniisu (Anise, 1996–1997, 2001–2003) also expressed their understanding of and support for bisexual women by formally describing themselves as being targeted at "women who love women," and also prominently featured bisexual women in their pages, which served to increase the visibility of bisexual women in the community. As a result of these efforts, by the late 1990s, explicit discrimination against bisexual women among lesbians became increasingly rare.

As for the transgendered activist community, Torai Masae published the first Japanese self-help magazine for people with gender identity disorder, FTM Nippon (FtM Japan, Asian TS Club), in 1994. At the same time, as the Saitama Medical University worked to conduct the first SRS surgery in Japan, the transgender organization Trans-Net Japan (TNJ) was established. TNJ worked with a coalition of medical institutions and authorities and organized workshops and study groups for transgendered people and their families. However, as the medicalization of GID increased, fewer transgendered people allied themselves with other gender minorities, especially feminists, critiquing the gender binary in society. In particular, transgendered people located in the Tokyo area withdrew from the coalition and went so far as to create a group exclusively for transsexuals. On the other hand, it seems that groups in Osaka continue to be more willing to network politically with other gender and social minorities, such as buraku people.

HEALTH

In response to fears of harassment and prejudice, many LGBT people in Japan seek medical treatment and attention without disclosing their sexual and gender orientation. They are also denied the right to extend their health insurance to their partner, subjecting LGBT people to mental and economic vulnerability.

In Japan, access to reproductive medical technologies is limited to married or de-facto heterosexual couples. Therefore, lesbian and bisexual women are excluded from a supportive environment for reproduction. As a consequence, they are forced to seek opportunities for insemination independently through their male peer network or via foreign artificial insemination services. Successful cases through such procedures are still rare, and lesbian mothers can expect to face economic and social difficulties in raising their children. One support group, re mazā no kai (1993-present), does its best to provide a supportive environment and information for lesbian mothers.

There has been little research conducted on the mental health of lesbians in Japan. There exists only one survey from 1998 addressing lesbian and bisexual women's concerns and experience regarding their sexuality. According to the data, 73.2 percent had never seen or consulted with counselors or psychiatrists in order to come to terms with their own sexuality, whereas 24.2 percent said that they had, and 1.6 percent were even hospitalized for that reason. Of the women surveyed, 18.7 percent had attempted suicide at some time, and 56.2 percent had considered it but never pursued it. Other results from the survey indicated that lesbians and bisexual women tended to suffer from a sense of isolation caused by anxiety about their own sexuality.²⁵ As for the mental health of gay men, studies show that 64 percent have thought of committing suicide, and 15.1 percent have actually attempted it.²⁶ Gay men who have come out to many people, as compared with those who have not, tend to have less anxiety about their inner self and maintain high levels of self-esteem. Furthermore, the more acceptance they receive, the less internalized homophobia they have.²⁷ Among reported cases of HIV infection, gay men make up more than 50 percent of the total in Japan. The younger generation of gay and bisexual men makes up a much higher percentage of those infected than other population groups.²⁸ The increasing infection rate is a serious concern for the gay community in Japan.

Since the late 1990s, the discussion of health for transgendered people has revolved around the treatment of GID. As noted, the Japanese Society of Psychiatry and Neurology acknowledged GID as a mental disorder in 1997, and specified treatment guidelines closely following foreign precedents such as those established by the Henry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association (e.g., Standards of Care [SOC]). They include a specific requirement that a significant number of medical institutions need to be jointly involved in the treatment process.

Following the SOC and DSM-IV, treatment was initially conducted in multiple stages. First, the patients went through counseling with psychiatrists, and then proceeded to hormone therapy. After these two stages were completed, patients could have sex reassignment surgery. However, the national health insurance only covered the initial counseling costs. In 2006, the guidelines were revised so that now the three-stage procedure is no longer compulsory. The new guidelines also specify that the choice of treatment should be made on an individual basis. While these changes can be perceived as positive steps for many transgendered patients, it is worth noting that the revisions also advise that patients should be solely held responsible for any problems caused by the choices or decisions they make during the course of their treatment. This way of shifting the responsibility onto individuals can be read as another example of the rapidly accelerating neoliberalist condition of present-day Japan.

By 2003, it was reported that approximately 2,200 people had been diagnosed as GID patients. Many issues concerning patients with GID still largely remain unresolved. They are still made to bear sole responsibility for the costs of hormone therapy and SRS. Furthermore, the market price for the hormone pills is extremely arbitrary. As a result, patients are often vulnerable to manipulation by the dealers. Some have no other choice but to purchase cheaper hormone pills from overseas through the Internet and face the higher risk of suffering from related side effects. A parallel can be found in the costs of surgery. Because of the high cost of surgery in Japan, a growing number of Japanese patients choose to go overseas, especially to countries such as Thailand, to have the surgery done at a relatively lower cost.

Lastly, the media has used the notion of eugenics to manipulate the condition of intersexed people in Japan. Most newborn babies with ambiguous reproductive organs have been forced to undergo surgery to determine their gender. In 1989, categories such Congenital Adrenal Hyperplasia were added to the guidelines for conducting mass-screening for birth defects in all newborn babies, further pathologizing intersexed people. Since the late 1990s, intersex activist have criticized such guidelines as “eugenics fundamentalism.” In Japan, a parent has two weeks to submit a birth certificate for a newborn infant, including a report of the gender. If the sex of the infant cannot be determined by its external genitalia, the period can be extended until the child reaches 20 years of age. Some intersex activists and feminists have argued that such legal conditions should be expanded and applied to all individuals in order to determine their own sex based on their own will, rather than having parents or the medical authorities make the decision.

POLITICS AND LAW

In Japan, an individual’s gender is legally recorded in the koseki (family register). After the first sex reassignment surgery was conducted in 1998, the government was confronted with the need to propose legislative measures to accommodate the needs of postoperative transsexuals. Since the government was reluctant to amend the relevant clause of the Civil Code, it sought a solution by enacting a special amendment to the existing family register law. This was how the aforementioned law concerning GID people was passed in 2003. Since the law became effective in July 2004, more than 500 applications from individuals who wish to change their legal gender have been approved.

Further advancement of LGBT civil rights in Japan goes hand in hand with the nation’s recent campaign for human rights education. In response to external pressure, such as the United Nations Decade for Human Rights Education (1995–2004), the Japanese government passed the Human Rights Protection Act in 1996. The Human Rights Protection Bill, which was proposed to the Diet in 2002, was the first comprehensive legal outline of human rights protection in Japan in which the term “sexual orientation” was included in the list of socially disadvantaged groups in need of fair treatment and respect in society. At the same time, the bill was subject to severe criticism for its inclusion of provisions that would restrict the media and its potential to limit the rights of citizens to access information. As a consequence, the bill was rejected in 2005, and has not since been resubmitted to the legislature. Although the government’s proposal of the bill was largely in reaction to external pressure, efforts by LGBT activists and lobbyists have also pushed the government toward creating better social conditions for sexual minorities.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

The relationship between LGBT culture and religion in Japan is complex. Unlike many other countries, there is no proscription of either homosexuality or homosexual acts in the postwar Japanese constitution and criminal laws, nor was there ever, except during a brief period in the 19th century. Moreover, in contrast to Christian and Muslim doctrines, which in some cases have been formally adopted as state religions, there have been few instances of the chief Japanese religions, Buddhism and Shinto, aggressively condemning homosexual behavior in terms of morality. Consequently, the gay and lesbian liberation movement since the latter half of the 20th century has never identified any religious group as a fundamental source of homophobia in Japan. Activists have instead criticized traditional dimensions of the Japanese social structure that deems homosexuality as ultimately “beyond the pale.” This criticism is in reference to the idea that homosexual behavior can be tolerated as long as an individual pursues his or her social responsibility and familial obligations. For a male, so long as he fulfills his duties of marriage, reproduction, and looking after the welfare of his family, covert homosexual behavior would not create any social disturbance. This notion of family obligation was rigorously enforced under the Meiji Civil Code, in which the smallest unit in society was inscribed within the category of the ie (house or family), which today is formalized via the previously mentioned koseki system. Similar to a religion, the ideology of what can be termed as family centrism in Japan functions to hinder many LGBT people from pursuing nonheterosexual lifestyles and identities. Explicit conflict between religious conservatives and LGBT activism has yet to be observed in Japan, with the exception of certain Christian communities.

VIOLENCE

Japan’s crime rate is one of the lowest among developed countries.²⁹ However, the notion of hate crimes against LGBT people has not been recognized in Japan. In February 2000, one gay man was murdered by several attackers in Yumenoshima Ryokudō Park, located in Shinkiba, Tokyo. The park is widely known in the area as a cruising spot for gay men. A similar incident occurred at the same location in July 2006. This time, a gay man who was cruising for a sex partner was brutally bashed and robbed by high school students. Neither case led to rigorous public discussion about the need to protect sexual minorities from violence and hate crimes based on their sexual orientation.

There have been no reported cases of hate crimes against lesbians or bisexual women.

Because the lesbian community has been strongly influenced by lesbian feminist discourse, which strongly links violence and masculinity, violence between women was not sufficiently recognized within the community until the 1980s. However, after the notion of domestic violence was introduced into Japan in the 1990s, this issue has gradually come to the surface. Meanwhile, the Law for the Prevention of Spousal Violence and the Protection of Victims (2001, revised in 2004) defines domestic partners in terms of conjugal or nonmarital heterosexual relations, thereby not accommodating homosexual couples in its legislation. As a consequence, homosexual people, whether the victim or assailant in cases of domestic violence, do not have access to public support and counseling services, and are forced to solve such problems on their own.

Overt forms of violence against LGBT people in Japan from the police, religious groups, and society in general are a rare occurrence. However, representations of LGBT people on television and in other media are often manipulated. For example, such representational violence is salient within the aforementioned YA/OI/slash genre of comic books, in which women readers consume and appropriate images of sexual and romantic intimacy between men.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

In discussing the future prospects of Japanese LGBT culture, one needs to take into serious account the complex relationships that they have and will continue to have with the ever-growing influence of globalization. The development of media technologies such as the Internet, which transcends national and cultural boundaries in an unprecedented manner, will confront Japan with the need to come up with new ways of understanding what constitutes a Japanese LGBT culture.

OVERVIEW

Malaysia, which is in Southeast Asia, occupies two landmasses on the South China Sea. To the west, there is peninsular Malaysia bordering Thailand and Singapore, and to the east, there is Malaysian Borneo bordering Indonesia, Brunei, and the Philippines. Malaysia is classified as a newly industrialized country. It has a strong economy based on manufacturing and international trade, bolstered by bountiful natural resources. The government of Malaysia is a constitutional monarchy, with a similar structure to the government of Great Britain. The population, as of 2007, was some 26.6 million people.

Sixty-two percent of the population is Malay, an ethnic group long settled on the island of Borneo and speaking Malay, an Austronesian language of ancient origin. The next largest ethnic communities are Malaysians of Chinese descent, making up 24 percent of the population, and Malaysians of Indian descent, at 8 percent. There are also many non-Malay indigenous groups (orang asli), mostly in the states of Sabah and Sarawak in Malaysian Borneo. Malaysians of European, Middle Eastern, and Eurasian descent also exist in still smaller numbers. Ethnic tension has been a factor in Malaysian politics throughout the 20th century and continues to the present day.

Malaysia is a former colony of the British Empire. British Malaya, carved out from separate Malay fiefdoms, was established over the course of the 18th and 19th centuries and was subjected to Japanese occupation from 1942 to 1945. After the conclusion of World War II, a Federation of Malaya was established with British protection. Almost immediately, the federation became the target of a communist insurgency that lasted from 1948 to 1960. The insurgency was put down, allowing for the formation of an independent Malaysia, including all of the former colonies of British Malaya, such as Singapore. The 1960s saw Malaysia participating in regional conflicts with Indonesia, ideological fissures with Singapore leading to an independent republic in 1965, and, in 1969, the eruption of race riots. In the years since, Malaysia's goal has been to develop stable relations with neighboring countries and to keep a delicate balance of power between all the country's major ethnic groups. LGBT Malaysians have tended to advocate for increased rights using the tactics established by other oppressed communities in Southeast Asia. The LGBT community strives to have equal participation of ethnic groups in much the same way that the Malaysian government does.

The spread of the AIDS epidemic into Southeast Asia has encouraged the formation of nonprofit organizations to raise awareness of prevention and treatment of the disease and to build LGBT communities along the way. Pink Triangle, founded in 1987, was the first of these organizations in Malaysia.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

In modern Malaysia, LGBT discourse is dominated by debates on social acceptance for the male-to-female transsexual community, on laws regulating sexual behavior, and on the treatment and prevention of HIV/AIDS. LGBT issues are effectively a microcosm of the broader discussions that Malaysians engage in every day: discussions on gender, ethnicity, the position of the country at home and abroad, the individual in society, and the rights of the media. The concerns of lesbians and LGBT couples are not as prominently featured as they are in the West.

Historical accounts verify that transsexual men (called mak nyahs in Malay) and effeminate men (pondans) were once accepted into mainstream Malay society, and even took up important community roles. The emergence of AIDS as a public health crisis in the 1980s caused a major shift in attitudes. AIDS was popularly linked to drugs and deviant sexual behavior, and the terms "homosexual" and "gay" entered public discourse as threats to the well-being of Malaysia.

Mahathir bin Mohamad, prime minister of Malaysia from 1981 to 2003, took advantage of the changing social climate and used charges of sodomy as part of a character assassination designed to remove from power the former finance minister and deputy prime minister, Anwar Ibrahim, in 1998. Although the charges against Anwar Ibrahim were widely thought to have been false, the forthrightness of the prime minister's accusations—he even appeared on television to declare Anwar guilty of sodomy while Anwar's trial was still pending—garnered him the support of the segment of the population that shared his opposition to Western values such as acceptance of homosexual behavior. In 1999–2000, Anwar Ibrahim was convicted of charges of corruption and sodomy and sentenced to 15 years imprisonment. Although the sentence was overturned in 2004 in the federal courts—mere months after Mahathir Mohamad left office, justices commented that they considered the charge of homosexual behavior to be valid.

AIDS/HIV statistics began to emerge in the late 1980s, as health professionals were required by law to report cases of infectious diseases. There were panicked reactions to the crisis, including vitriolic speeches and homosexual witch hunts by Muslim imams in some states. Awareness of the issue was by contrast quite different in the more cosmopolitan capital city of Kuala Lumpur, where a group of “concerned gays and lesbians” began a very public effort to care of the sick and to promote awareness of how HIV/AIDS is actually transmitted.¹ This first non-governmental organization (NGO) in Malaysia devoted to AIDS treatment and awareness, known as Pink Triangle, managed to obtain tentative approval from the Ministry of Public Health. Pink Triangle became a venue for many gays and lesbians to come together and talk about their marginalization, in large part because of the association of AIDS with LGBT Malaysians.

By the 1990s, reports in the media about enforcement of the Penal Code 377, deeming sodomy an illegal act, made their way to the international media, giving an otherwise ignorable country—known mostly as a third-world country—prominence for hewing closely to Islamic orthodoxy and being intolerant. Refugee review boards in Western nations saw an increase of homosexual Malaysians seeking asylum under the UN Human Rights charter.²

Meanwhile, the continued development of Pink Triangle in Kuala Lumpur fostered derivative organizations, including new performance and creative artists. Press coverage of LGBT issues softened somewhat, especially with a public call against discrimination from Marina Mahathir, the activist daughter of Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamad. Other media figures followed, creating ever-larger rifts between the media and the government stance. A slow movement toward less morality-based government is being emboldened by similar developments in Singapore.

EDUCATION

The Malaysian Ministry of Education subsidizes and administers both K–12 and postsecondary education. While language and ethnicity remain major issues for education, LGBT communities are not.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Malaysia is a newly industrialized country, with the 29th largest economy in the world, based primarily in international trade, manufacturing, and tourism. Malaysia has been a founding member of the Association of Asian Nations (ASEAN) Free Trade Network.

Social/Government Programs since 1992

Since the 1997 Asian Financial Crisis, Malaysia has maintained a strongly controlled banking system and keeps its currency, the Ringgit, tied to the U.S. dollar.

Between 1970 and 1990, Malaysia applied a relatively unique affirmative action program as part of the New Economic Policy (NEP). This policy was designed to relieve racial tension between ethnic Malays, ethnic Chinese, and other minorities, but was popularly judged to have privileged Malays and reduced members of other ethnicities to the rank of second-class citizens. Debate over the NEP and affirmative action still play a part in contemporary Malaysian economic and social policy.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Malaysia does not have government-sponsored programs to promote LGBT communities.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Safe sex gradually became a publicly discussed issue as HIV/AIDS infection rates grew in Malaysia in the 1980s and early 1990s. In 1992, the Malaysian Government formed the Malaysian AIDS Council (MAC) to coordinate the efforts all NGOs working on AIDS in Malaysia.

COMMUNITY

Transsexual men (mak nyahs) and effeminate men (pondans) were a historical part of Malay society before the large influx of migrants from China and India in the 19th and 20th centuries. The extent to which communities have learned to live with mak nyahs and pondans varies: from the acceptance of the few mak nyahs who have ceremonial roles in weddings for instance, to social isolation for the others. Some mak nyahs took on traditional household chores done by women, whereas pondans, if they can pass muster as masculine enough, have many more employment opportunities. Female-to-male transsexuals have had a much more difficult time carving out a niche for themselves, as women in general have limited autonomy.

The social climate for LGBT entertainers and performers in clubs and burlesque acts improved somewhat during the British tenure, in part to supply the colonialists' demand for night life. An uneasy coexistence for LGBT people followed the establishment of the independent Malay states in 1957. At the time, the logistics of nation-building preoccupied the public.

A conscious move towards eschewing imports in favor of cultivating local talent in the nascent broadcasting industry opened the gates for entertainers—who are excused from upholding societal norms because they are on the radio and television to put on a show. While some LGBT individuals found safe havens in the film and radio business, others continued to face community and familial pressures to conform and set up traditional opposite-sex households.

Burgeoning industrial demands in cities such as Kuala Lumpur, Penang, and Ipoh in the 1970s and 1980s drew on rural labor. Likewise, LGBT villagers migrated to the metropolis to seek out new jobs, forming communities along the way. The one pondan or mak nyah make-up artist/hairstylist in a hamlet could now be with others. Some of the pondans and mak nyahs entered the underground sex-industry.³ Documentation on lesbians and bisexual women is scarce, but available anecdotal commentary suggests that women's groups do not have much to do with the pondans or mak nyahs.

HEALTH

More open hostility toward gender- and sexually variant individuals gathered steam in the 1980s when reports that the main vectors of transmission for HIV were homosexual/bisexual men, prostitutes, and abusers of intravenous drugs.

Foreign corruption and leftover colonial sensibilities were already being blamed as the main culprits for widespread recreational drug use as well as for prostitution, and the spread of HIV in Malaysia was soon appended to this list.

Politicians and government ministers were quick to denounce the immorality of intravenous drug users and men who had sex with other men. The Malaysian leadership had been sanguine in reassuring the Malaysian populace that the spread of HIV was confined to drug addicts and homosexual/bisexual men. However, concerned citizens in the capital city of Kuala Lumpur were worried about the lack of care and support given to people with AIDS. In 1987, a coalition of individuals, initially called the Pink Triangle, became the first registered NGO to launch educational campaigns in the Kuala Lumpur metropolitan region on HIV/AIDS.

Although Pink Triangle was not officially formed to support LGBT individuals, it was widely known that Pink Triangle comprised mainly LGBT people. Even so, the Malaysian AIDS Council and the Ministry of Health chose to ignore the gayness of the group when they gave Pink Triangle—now artfully concealed under its nom de guerre as PT Foundation—public funds for HIV-prevention work and counseling for AIDS patients. This ambiguous attitude continues to the present day, as shown in the case of official pronouncements on condom use and safe sex. Although condoms are known to be effective in HIV prevention, Malaysian officials vigorously denounce their use, citing the Qur'an and the so-called laws of nature. Meanwhile, government aid is being channeled to organizations such as PT Foundation to disseminate information on safe sex practices.

Such double-speak is also evident in the business community. A growing demand for rubber prophylactics has caused a boom in the Malaysian latex industry, especially those manufacturing condoms and single-use medical gloves. As Malaysia is one of the largest producers of rubber, local latex manufacturers emerged as powerful players in the global marketplace. However, the local condom industry claims that their products are for export while underplaying their role in supplying condoms and money to PT and other organizations for education on safer-sex practices. Monetary backing from both the government and private sectors has helped PT in its work of dispelling myths about HIV and homosexuals.

Around the nation, LGBT people primarily heard the thunder of opprobrium: moralistic rants of religious and civic leaders, who in some extreme cases have proposed leprosy-type colonies and confinement for high-risk individuals such as homosexual, bisexual, and transsexual men and intravenous drug users. Official literature from MAC, which was distributed nationwide, focused on educating drug users not to share needles and exhorting Malaysians not to engage in “homosexual sex.” PT Foundation was able to get Malaysian AIDS Council to amend the literature to say “avoid unsafe sex” instead.⁴

POLITICS AND LAW

In a climate of increasing prejudice toward LGBT people in, former Prime Minister, Mahathir Mohamad summarily dismissed then-rival Deputy Prime Minister Anwar Ibrahim, on purported sodomy charges. Mahathir Mohamad seized on the increasing homophobic sentiment to gain support for throwing a political adversary in jail, while effectively deflecting criticisms that this was a political sabotage of Anwar Ibrahim.

Like many countries that inherited British statutes upon emancipation from the empire, Malaysia retained its Victorian legal sanctions against sodomy in the law books. Penal Code 377, also known by the same name in many other British Commonwealth nations, prohibits sexual relations between men. Although there have been no official statistics on the enforcement of code 377, there is widespread belief that it was only invoked sporadically. Human rights groups such as Amnesty International and government tribunals in Australia and Canada have made contradictory inferences about the frequency and severity with which code 377 has been officially used to intimidate, blackmail, or punish suspected persons.

But the invocation of code 377 by a sitting prime minister has encouraged greater institutional vigilance by the police and magnified the fear, anxiety, and unease among LGBT people in Malaysia. After years of sensational courtroom exposés, and legal reversals, Anwar Ibrahim was released after Mahathir Mohamad stepped down as prime minister in 2003. The frenzy and rhetoric of outrage over so-called deviant sexual behaviors has abated somewhat in the post-Mahathir administrations, but the psychosocial damage wrecked on the citizenry remains. Policing of LGBT groups and gatherings seems to have stabilized: there is now a continual dance of inaction followed by periodic raids of LGBT clubs and venues by the vice squad.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

The four major religions of Malaysia are Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism, and Christianity. The official religion of Malaysia is Islam. The Malaysian constitution grants religious freedom but also provides for Sharia courts with independent jurisdiction of the civil courts, to oversee such matters as marriage and apostasy among Muslims. Homosexual acts are illegal in the eyes of both civil courts and Sharia courts, but punishments are harsher under the Sharia code. The potential for prosecution makes it difficult for LGBT Malaysians to live openly and to form communities, but efforts at keeping the peace between Malay, Chinese, and Indian communities have created broad-based respect for privacy. Homosexuality has become more widely represented in the last 20 years in film, television, theater, and the mainstream press. However, the Malaysian government has politicized morality by accusing public figures of illicit behavior, including homosexuality.

VIOLENCE

Violence against LGBT people does not seem to be a major issue in Malaysia at this time.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

LGBT individuals have come together to form groups, whether in person or through the Web, to plan social events and to offer help and support to community members. LGBT Malaysians may also be encouraged that their neighbor across the bridge, Singapore, has begun to adopt more progressive social agendas. High-ranking Singapore ministers are stating in public that LGBT people should be left to live their own lives. There is hope yet for LGBT people, as Malaysia often looks across to Singapore to emulate its economic and social successes.

OVERVIEW

Mongolia is located in Central Asia, and lies between China and Russia. It is a vast land and one of the last few places on the planet where nomadic life is still a living tradition.

The country is more than twice the size of Texas and even bigger than Alaska. It covers 618,000 square miles, which is four times the size of Japan, three times that of the Philippines, and almost the size of all Eastern Europe. This makes Mongolia the sixth-largest country in Asia and 18th-largest in the world, however its population is only 2.7 million people, thus making Mongolia one of the least dense areas in Asia. Forty percent of the population lives in the capital city, Ulaanbaatar. The Gobi desert region is even less densely populated.¹

Almost 40 percent of the population is scattered across Mongolia with their 30-plus million head of sheep, goats, cattle, horses, and camels. There are 21 aimag (provinces) and each has a central city or town; there are 15–22 subprovinces, called soum.

Seventy percent of Mongolia's population is under the age of 35. The gender ratio is close even. Ethnicity breaks down to 84 percent Khalkha Mongols, 6 percent Kazakhs, and 10 percent other groups.

More than half of Mongolia's people are Buddhists with a mix of Shamanism. Close to 10 percent are Christians, and 4 percent follow Islam. The rest identify themselves as atheists.

The official Mongolian language is Khalkha Mongol, and many people can understand both English and Russian although they are rarely spoken. Mongolians appreciate it when foreigners attempt to speak a few words in Khalkha.

Mongolia's geography is varied, with the Gobi desert in the south and cold, mountainous regions in the north and west. Mongolia consists of relatively flat steppes. The highest point in Mongolia is the KhA1/4iten Peak in the Tavan Bogd massif in the far west, with a height of 4,374 meters (14,350 feet). The basin of the lake Uvs Nuur, shared with the Tuva Republic in Russia, is a natural World Heritage Site.

The country is hot during summer and extremely cold during winter. January temperatures drop as low as -22 degrees Fahrenheit. It is also subject to occasional harsh climatic conditions, known as zud. A zud is a Mongolian term for a heavy snowy winter during which livestock face challenges to find fodder and grass through the snow cover, and huge numbers of animals die as a result of starvation and the cold. The average temperature in Ulaanbaatar is lower than any other capital in the world. In short, Mongolia is high, cold, and windy. It has an extreme continental climate with long, cold winters and short summers, during which most of the country's annual precipitation falls. There are approximately 257 cloudless days per year, and it is usually at the center of a region of high atmospheric pressure. Precipitation is highest in the north (with an average of eight to 14 inches per year) and lowest in the south, which receives four to eight inches annually. The extreme south is dominated by the Gobi desert, some areas of which receive no precipitation at all in most years.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

There are no special rights for LGBT people in modern Mongolia.

Mongolian society was traditionally a shamanic society until the late 17th century. Homosexuality was historically recognized and accepted as normal, even praised, according to ethnographic studies made in the late 19th and early 20th century by Russian and French ethnographers. This idea was supported by the revered status that shamans occupied in society, thanks to their spiritual importance in the lives of the local people. They connected the natural and spirit worlds to the human world. According to these ethnographic documents, the gender roles of shamans were often reversed: female shamans often married other women and lived the lifestyle of a man—dressing in male clothing, hunting, and drinking alcohol with other men—while male shamans were often married to men and lived a woman's lifestyle—dressing in female clothing, doing female chores together with other women, repairing and making clothing, and so on. Only the shamans, who had been able to rise above their birth gender due to the tradition of the shaman, were recognized to have achieved the true distinguished status of a shaman.

With the introduction of Buddhism in the late 17th century, the traditional acceptance of homosexuality did not appear to lessen, but was instead even further supported through the Buddhist doctrine of karma.²

According to the law of karma, a soul must journey through many earthly states from lifetime to lifetime, from incarnation to reincarnation, including a different gender every time it is reincarnated, in order to achieve spiritual enlightenment. If the soul was supposed to be born into this world as a woman according to its karma, but ends up in a man's body, the soul will still retain its karma, that is, it will still have the life experiences of a woman. For a soul that was supposed to be reincarnated as a man according to its karma but is born as a woman, the soul will still go through the life experiences of a man. Furthermore, Tantric Buddhism preaches that homosexual activities are one of the ways to raise one's creative energy (kundalini) and gain enlightenment. One of the most amazing examples of the Buddhist normalization of homosexuality in Mongolia is a Mongolian religious sculpture of two clean shaven-headed male monks embracing in a sexual position. It is located in the Choijin Lama's Museum in Ulaanbaatar.

During socialist times, the government did not outlaw LGBT identities per se, but rather outlawed the immoral gratification of one's carnal needs via Section 113 of the Criminal Code of Mongolia. This section was modified after similar sections of criminal codes had been deleted from laws of the former Soviet republics. Historically, discussions about LGBT people were based on the socialist ideology, which was both good and bad. Since the government chose not to propagate extreme intolerance regarding the LGBT population, there was no public rhetoric on LGBT issues, and very little social awareness that LGBT people existed. On the other hand, being LGBT was made much more dangerous than before, since, if one was found to be homosexual, he or she could face years of imprisonment or incarceration in reform institutions, along with other human rights violations and social isolation.

However, the socialist system also discouraged "un-socialist immoral behavior," which gave rise to extreme fear and silence of LGBT people on concerning homosexuality-related issues and made it difficult for the LGBT community to discuss their problems openly before the democratization process began in the early 1990s.

The new constitution of 1992 recognizes fundamental human rights as well as civil liberties and political freedoms. However, it does not include nondiscrimination against the LGBT community. From early 1991 and 1992, with the introduction of cable television in Mongolia and the introduction of foreign movies and music channels, and the like, social attitudes began to change as people saw more examples of homosexuality in the foreign media. This made it possible for the LGBT community to make its issues public for the first time. The new freedom of the press also helped gay issues to reach the media. For example, two openly gay men, Gambuush and Naraa, were interviewed by the press in 2000.³ However, the mass media's ignorance of LGBT issues also led to poor reporting or sensationalizing LGBT people as being un-Mongolian. Also, due to the increased visibility of gay people, the risks for LGBT also increased in that they faced stigma and discrimination from society. Social attitudes toward LGBT became more intolerant than before and discrimination (even in art and television) and violence against homosexuals increased.⁴ Increased visibility always brings more risks to the marginalized communities; since there was more awareness in the straight community of the LGBT community that existed in their midst, the social attitudes toward LGBT persons became markedly intolerant when compared with those of socialist times. This gave rise to systemic discrimination, homophobic violence, and an incitement of violence against LGBT people through various homophobic television talk shows and popular art.

Now that the LGBT community is more aware of their rights, there have been more efforts made to desensationalize and improve the LGBT community's image through advocacy and community mobilization. However, one of the most troubling issues in regard to LGBT rights in Mongolia since democratization is the fact that the government began calling homosexuals a "threat to the national security" in early 2004 as a result of the HIV/AIDS panic in the country.

EDUCATION

The Mongolian education system was largely developed during the socialist period. As a result, illiteracy was virtually eliminated, in part through the use of seasonal boarding schools for the children of nomadic families. Funding for these boarding schools was cut in the 1990s, resulting in slightly increased illiteracy rate in recent years.

Primary and secondary formal education has recently been expanded to 11 years and is set to be expanded further, to 12 years, in the near future. Mongolian national universities are all subsidiaries of the National University of Mongolia and the Mongolian University of Science and Technology.

The broad liberalization of the 1990s led to a boom in private institutions of higher education, although many of these establishments have difficulty living up to their name of "college" or "university."

Sex education in schools does not exist. Many Mongolian parents, school teachers, and decision makers are too preoccupied with basic and more important subjects, including mathematics, chemistry, and Mongolian language to think about including sex education in their curricula. Education is regarded as the most important way to get ahead in social life, and therefore many Mongolians do not see any point in a sex education system.

One will find no information on homosexuality in public libraries in Ulaanbaatar. Instead, Mongolians learn the basics of sex education from their parents, who explain simple things about sexual organs and their functions through a well-established set of concepts or phrases. Generally, Mongolians do not openly and directly discuss sexuality concepts such as masturbation.

The Mongolian educational system is designed in such a way that it provides technical knowledge and skills for job performance, as in the Russian model. The social aspect is disregarded nowadays because there are no resources for sex education and people assume the society (traditions, family, or other groups) takes care of such things. Homosexuality is not mentioned in schools, and many people have no idea of its existence outside prisons and except for a few "mad," outspoken transvestites.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMIC

The Mongolian economy is based on agriculture and mining. Mongolia has rich mineral resources, including copper, coal, molybdenum, tin, tungsten, and gold, which account for a large part of its industrial production.

There are over 30,000 independent businesses in Mongolia, mainly in Ulaanbaatar. The majority of Mongolians who live in rural areas participate in subsistence herding. Livestock typically consists of sheep, goats, cattle, horses, and Bactrian camels. Agricultural crops include wheat, barley, vegetables, tomatoes, watermelon, sea-buckthorn, and fodder crops. The per capita Gross Domestic Product (GDP) in 2006 was $2,100. Although the GDP has risen steadily since 2002, at the annual rate of 7.5 percent in an official 2006 estimate,⁵ the state is still working to overcome a sizable trade deficit. A massive ($11 billion) foreign debt to Russia was settled by the Mongolian government in 2004 with a $250 million payment. Despite growth, the proportion of the population living below the poverty line was estimated to be 35.6 percent in 1998, 36.1 percent in 2002–2003, and 32.2 percent in 2006; both the unemployment and inflation rates in 2006 were relatively high, at 3.2 percent and 6.0 percent, respectively.⁶ In 1991, the Mongolian Stock Exchange was established in Ulaanbaatar; it is the world's smallest stock exchange.

The government of Mongolia does not officially recognize the existence of LGBT persons within its territory. There is an overwhelming legal silence regarding the LGBT community, and no protection for homosexuals in the workplace. The words homosexual, lesbian, gay, transgendered, and transsexual do not appear in any of the country's laws or regulations. The only specific reference to gays or lesbians in Mongolian law is to identify homosexual men as a high-risk group for HIV/AIDS. Similar to other Asian countries, most transgendered Mongolians engage in sex work, since it is one of their only choices for employment. There is still considerable stigma and discrimination against homosexual people in the workplace, especially in the public sector. Heteronormativity is institutionalized in both social and legal spheres as a result of the state's silence and disregard of such issues as harassment against LGBT people, especially those who are transgendered.

Mongolia, a country of 2.7 million people, theoretically has nearly 300,000 LGBT citizens, though these numbers are unverified due to the complex problems of structural adjustment from a centrally planned economy to a market economy and the building of a democratic and open society have relegated basic human rights to the periphery. The government of Mongolia claims that only the development of the country is of the highest priority. In its efforts to alleviate increasing poverty and endemic social inequalities, the government is choosing the "Asian Way," a model of economic development that considers human rights to be incompatible with the overall goal of development. However, development that brings with it a more or less modified, but essentially the same old socialist/dictatorial regime of limited civil and political liberties is not development, but rather a reversal and regression to older, totalitarian conditions.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS, SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

One of the changes in recent years has been a dramatic increase in sexual activity among adolescents, which has led to increased numbers of sexually transmitted infections and unwanted pregnancies and a heightened risk of HIV. When the Ministry of Health became aware of the health problems facing Mongolia's youth, it stepped forward to respond to the problem by proposing that sex education be made a mandatory component of health education in the school setting.⁷

International experience shows that early knowledge of HIV infection is necessary for stopping the spread of HIV infection. Fourteen years ago, Mongolia had only one gay man registered as HIV-positive. However, the situation has changed. As of July 2009 Mongolia has 56 cases of HIV infection and is considered at high risk of an epidemic. All 56 cases were transmitted through unprotected sex.⁸ Of these cases, more than half were reported among the gay community. Stigma and discrimination and limited access to health, social, and legal services forces gays and bisexuals underground. This increases the chance that depressed individuals will engage in high risk behaviors, such as alcohol abuse, secret sex, and sex in situations where the use of condoms is unlikely. Unsafe sexual practices between men who have sex with men (MSM) are common, despite the implementation of a number of HIV preventive programs. The newspapers and media report that being gay is not normal and that HIV/AIDS seems a disease only for MSM (called gomo in the Mongolian language, which carries a negative connotation). On the other hand, this is the expression of knowledge and awareness of the Mongolian people about sexuality and HIV/AIDS.

FAMILY

Mongolians have never valued complex, extended families. During the 1980s, most lived in nuclear families composed of a married couple, their children, and perhaps a widowed parent. Families in urban area are larger than families in rural areas. It is thought that rural people tend to marry earlier and to set up new households at younger ages. The average size of families of rural areas also may reflect the high rates of migration to cities.

The tradition of herders calls for each married couple to have their own tent. At the time of their marriage, sons receive their share of the family herd. Usually one son, but not necessarily the oldest one, inherits the headship of the parental herd and tent. Other sons form new families with equivalent shares of the family herd. Daughters marry and follow their partners and do not receive a share of the natal family's herd. Adult sons and brothers often continue their close association as members of the same herding camp, but they may leave to join other herding camps whenever they wish. During the 1980s, herders were likely to continue to work closely with patrimony kinds, as suuri, a subdivision of the negdel, herding camps, consisted of fathers and sons or groups of elder brothers and their families. Herders no longer inherited livestock from their parents, but instead inherited membership in a herding cooperation. If cooperative officials granted custody of collectively owned animals and permission to hold privately owned stock on a family basis, which was how private plots were allotted in Soviet collective farms in the 1980s, then it would be to the advantage of newly married sons to declare themselves new families.

An important component of social status in Mongolia is one's family background, and social stratification has a certain implicit hereditary element. The shortage of skilled labor and the great expansion of white-collar occupations in the 1970s and the 1980s meant that families belonging to the administrative and professional elite were able to pass their status on to their many children, who acquired educational qualifications and professional jobs. At the other end of the social scale, only children of herders became herders. Some herders' children, perhaps as many as half, moved into skilled trades or administrative positions, while the rest remained with the flocks.

The modern family lifestyle is different from 1950s because most of the time herders' children live far from their families for almost the entire year. Children between the ages of seven and 15 live in boarding houses of the center of soum.⁹

Most Mongolian women are now in the paid work force, and many infants and young children are looked after on a daily or weekly basis in day-care centers or in all-day or boarding kindergartens. The efforts to bring women into the formal work force and to educate the dispersed herders have resulted in the separation of parents and children. There is some historical precedent for this in the practice of sending young boys to monasteries as apprentice lamas, which had previously been the only way to obtain a formal education for them.

As for acceptance of homosexuality in Mongolian families, this depends greatly on geography. Urban parents will not likely be too shocked to learn that their son is having sex with a girl, and rural Mongolians may actually have been more relaxed about these things in past years and they see sex as a part of natural, everyday routine. Homosexuality is a completely different story; all parents are likely to be shocked and initial reactions will be that of anger, desperation, and incomprehension. Fathers are often especially upset because boys are regarded in Mongolian families as the ones who continue the family's traditions and bloodline.

COMMUNITY

There are a few local LGBT community-based organizations (CBO) initiatives and one run by the United States Embassy in Mongolia.

Tavilan (Destiny), a nongovernmental organization (NGO), was founded in March 1999 by several Mongolian gay men and expatriate gay men then living in Mongolia. It was officially active between early 1999 and 2000. Since March 2000, after the NGO's registration license expired, it has continued its activities informally. The group's areas of concern and engagement within the LGBT community were in the gay male community of Ulaanbaatar, covering health, human rights, and advocacy. Tavilan provided safe-sex counseling to gay males, conducted small-scale advocacy among gay men aimed at empowering the community, and provided a psychological counseling hotline for all LGBT people in Ulaanbaatar from late 2000 through early 2001. The major achievement of the organization was that it established recognition of the idea that gay people exist in Mongolia.

The Mongolian Lesbian Community Information Centre (MILC) was founded in January 2004 as a project unit of the Mongolian Women's Fund, with funding provided by the Astraea Lesbian Foundation for Justice. It operated from January through October 2004. Since October 2004, it has operated as an online community center through its Web site for LGBT people of and in Mongolia—the first of its kind to be established in Mongolia. Since the initial Astraea funding concluded, the Web site's hosting funding has been provided through the personal donations of two lesbian women. The site's main areas of concern within the LGBT community are rooted in the lesbian and bisexual female community of Ulaanbaatar, as well as overall support and information provision for LGBT people throughout the country.

The organization has faced many problems, including a lack of human resources, harassment by national security agents calling the hotline and saying that the organization was guilty of propagating obscenity, and a loss of the host agency (Mongolian Women's Fund) support due to the potential loss of donors who may not want to support lesbian activities. The Mongolian Women's Fund did not list the project's name, the Mongolian Lesbian Information and Community Center, in their annual report, but instead called it a "Feminist Studies Centre."

However, its achievements included connecting, both online and in person, many younger lesbians and gays and helping them to feel confident enough to come out to their families and friends.

In May 2005, the U.S. Embassy in Ulaanbaatar asked for an official report on the status of LGBT people and dangers of living as an LGBT person in Mongolia in response to the many asylum applications that the U.S. State Department processes every year from Mongolian gays and lesbians. The U.S. Ambassador to Mongolia commented that it was time that the U.S. government taught the Mongolian government about human rights. However, this was difficult, as the Mongolian government continued with its public rhetoric of claiming gays were a threat to national security. Where internal security is concerned, the government of Mongolia has taken every chance to ignore the U.S. Embassy and the Department of State recommendations about the LGBT human rights citing governmental sovereignty in justification for its actions.

The NGO the “Youth for Health” Centre, was founded with the initiative of the gay community in Mongolia and was officially recognized by the government. The center obtained legal registration in 2003 from the Ministry of Justice and Home Affairs. Initial support was provided from the Mongolian National AIDS Foundation.

The Youth for Health NGO provides information and safe sex and STI/HIV prevention education not only in Ulaanbaatar, but also in two other major cities of Mongolia, Erdenet and Darkhan, through occasional visits there.

Many Red Cross Youth Peer Education activities are targeted at mainstream youth. Increasingly, the Red Cross is recognizing that the most vulnerable in a society often miss out on these educational opportunities and are at far greater risk of HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted infections. MSM are one group that may not always define themselves as distinct or separate from heterosexuals. Some men may only have sex with another man once, others only occasionally, and still others engage in sex with other men regularly. Some may identify as homosexual, but most will not. Designing specific activities for MSM is possible, for example, if the gay groups outreach projects targets cruising areas and gay nightclubs, but many MSM (especially young men) are more likely to attend mainstream projects for information without disclosing their sexual practice.

The We are Family NGO has as its mission to provide information about how MSM can stay healthy and helps them to learn how to protect themselves and their partners from HIV/AIDS and change the social understanding of sexuality. The group also works to prevent sexual violence against the LGBT community. It provides peer educators for the MSM program, condom promotions are organized in MSM cruising areas once per month, and they provide LGBT consultancy, hotline consultancy, and HIV/AIDS prevention education. The LGBT community of Mongolia is involved in the organization’s activities for capacity building and the student volunteer program.

We are Family cooperates with journalists and health workers to give the right message to the general public about sexuality. Surprisingly, correct information and articles on LGBT sexuality does appear in the daily newspapers. We are Family also sponsors group discussions. The group discussions by MSM peer educators among the heterosexual community and with MSM groups gives more information about sexuality and HIV/AIDS, including: reproductive health education development, sexuality and gender, myths and word of mouth, sexual behaviors, sexual relations, sexually transmitted infections, HIV/AIDS, sexual harassment, drug and alcohol abuse, assertiveness training (how to say no), and how to use a condom.

HEALTH

Health care in Mongolia is rapidly improving, leading to a longer life expectancy and a drop in infant and child mortality. The average fertility rate is around 2.25–1.87 per woman (2007) and average life expectancy is 67–68 years. Infant mortality is at 1.9–4 percent, and the child mortality rate is at 4.3 percent.

There are 27.7 physicians and 75.7 hospital beds per 10,000 inhabitants. There are very few LGBT health workers in Mongolia, and these are found only in Ulaanbaatar.

POLITICS AND LAW

Mongolia is a parliamentary republic. The people elect the Parliament and it, in turn, elects the government. Members of Parliament are usually elected every four years. Mongolia's constitution guarantees full freedoms of expression, religion, and others. There are many political parties in Mongolia; the largest among them are the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party (MPRP) and the Democratic Party (DP).

The MPRP formed the government of the country from 1921 to 1996 (until 1990 in a one-party system) and again from 2000 to 2004. From 2004 to 2006, it was the part of a coalition with the DP and two other parties. Since 2006, it has been the dominant party in two other coalitions. These government changes were initiated by the MPRP in 2004. The DP was the dominant force in the ruling coalition between 1996 and 2000, and also an approximately equal partner with the MPRP in the 2004–2006 coalition.

Mongolian law does not specifically proscribe homosexuality, however Amnesty International and the International Lesbian and Gay Association have criticized a section of its penal code that refers to "immoral gratification of sexual desires," arguing that this phrasing could be used against homosexuals. Homosexuals have reported harassment by police, but remain divided over the overall level of societal discrimination. There is no official discrimination against those with HIV/AIDS; however, some societal discrimination exists.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Various forms of tengrism and shamanism have been widely practiced throughout the history of what is now Mongolia, as such beliefs were common among the nomadic people of Asia. Such beliefs gradually gave way to Tibetan Buddhism, but shamanism has left a mark on Mongolia's religious culture. Indeed, some shamanistic practices and traditions, such as the use of ovoo as religious sites, are still practiced.¹⁰

The communist government ensured that the religious practices of the Mongolian people were largely repressed. Khorloogiin Choibalsan complied with the orders of Joseph Stalin, destroying almost all of Mongolia's approximate 700 Buddhist monasteries and killing thousands of monks. In 1991, the public religious practices restored the legality of Tibetan Buddhism, which had been the predominant religion in the region before the rise of communism; it has again risen to become the most widely practiced religion in Mongolia. The end of religious repression during 1990s also allowed for other religions, such as Islam and Christianity, to spread in the country. According to the Barnabas Fund, the number of Christians grew from just 4 in 1989 to around 40,000 as of 2008.¹¹

VIOLENCE

It is estimated that 80 percent of LGBT people in Mongolia have experienced some form of gay bashing or discrimination.¹² Heteronormativity is institutionalized in both the social and legal environment. Since there is no concept of hate crimes in the country, there is no legal protection that requires the police to accept and follow through with formal complaints regarding antigay attacks.

Suicides, attempted suicides, and chronic depression among LGBT people are another form of antigay violence. Despite the lack of firm statistics on LGBT suicide, it is likely that, as a result of societal oppression and widespread homophobia, LGBT people suffer from mental health and well-being problems.

Gays and lesbians also experience legal and social invisibility and subsequent marginalization, a denial of their fundamental human rights, a lack of recognition and acceptance of their LGBT identities, noncitizen/secondary citizen status, secondary victimization by various state agencies, and a lack of understanding of same-sex domestic violence.

The government has even referred to gays as “a threat to national security” since early 2006, when the 15th case of HIV was diagnosed in the country.¹³ The fact that the government can say that national security is being compromised by the gay minority raises concerns about human rights not only of LGBT people in Mongolia, but also those of other social minorities, such as sex workers.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Despite the Mongolian government’s recognition of the importance of human rights domestically and internationally, it still does not include homosexual rights in its human rights discussions. It seems that the government is only pro-human rights in its rhetoric, given that human rights, basic freedoms, and liberties for LGBT persons have been repeatedly ignored by the state under the pretext of “public safety and social stability.”

MSM and LGBT-based NGOs are working to create and expand the public’s awareness of LGBT human rights. These groups’ key areas of concern are education for the police and national security agents, workshops and human rights trainings on hate crimes, the victimization of the LGBT by the police, and on the nature of HIV/AIDS being a nondiscriminatory disease, public campaigns, securing cooperation with local and international human rights organizations in Mongolia, media campaigns aimed at de-sensationalizing LGBT identities and stopping the “un-Mongolian”-ness of LGBT identities, holding an international LGBT human rights forum/conference in Ulaanbaatar to discuss the foundation of LGBT rights, establishing cooperation with the National Human Rights Commission and other human rights bodies regarding pertinent and pressing human rights violations, and organizing public events such as an LGBT movie festival. The groups also aim to gain recognition of the widespread existence of hate crimes against LGBT people and are asking for a constitutional amendment to include “non-discrimination based on sexual orientation.”

Mongolia faces the problems of changing from a centrally planned economy to a market economy and building a democratic and open society. These forces have forced LGBT issues to the side, as the government claims that the economic development of the country is its highest priority. In its efforts to end poverty and social inequality, the government may continue to marginalize and discriminate against LGBT citizens, as it has with the HIV/AIDS issue. The progress of LGBT rights in Mongolia will be a test for the success of Mongolia’s future democracy.

NEW ZEALAND

Christopher Burke

OVERVIEW

New Zealand lies in the southwestern Pacific Ocean, 1,600 kilometers southeast of Australia, and is also known by its Māori (indigenous) name, Aotearoa (“the land of the long white cloud”). Measuring 268,680 square kilometers in total land size, New Zealand is a relatively small and geographically isolated island state. The country is comprised of two main islands, the North and South Islands (Te-Ika-a-Maui and Te Pounamu), as well as a number of lesser ones, most notably Stewart Island (Rakiura), a small island 30 kilometers south of the mainland, and the Chatham Islands (Wharekauri), an archipelago of 10 islands situated 800 kilometers east of Christchurch, the South Island’s largest urban center. New Zealand features a range of diverse ecosystems and, due to its long isolation from the rest of the world, is characterized by unique flora and fauna.

Beginning with the arrival of explorers from East Polynesia in the 13th century, human settlement in New Zealand has been a relatively recent phenomenon. Known today as the Māori, these tribes were not known by a collective name until the arrival of European settlers. Dutch explorer Abel Tasman made the first confirmed European discovery of New Zealand in 1642. European settlement was initially sporadic, with the population remaining predominantly Māori—both ethnically and culturally—well into the 19th century. British colonization followed the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi in 1840, a document signed by representatives of the British Crown and Māori chiefs. While the Treaty remained largely neglected until the 1970s and has been a source of contention historically, it is often cited today as New Zealand's founding document and is the basis for the nation's purported bicultural principles.

New Zealand was made a member of the Dominion of Great Britain in 1907 and gained complete independence from Britain in 1947. It remains a member of the British Commonwealth. As a former British colony, much of the legal and cultural discourse is of a European and British derivation. However, New Zealand is increasingly ethnically and culturally diverse. As of June 30, 2007, New Zealand has a resident population of 4.3 million people, with a population density of 14.9 people per square kilometer. In 2001, New Zealanders of European descent (known in New Zealand as Pākehā) made up the majority of the population (around 70%), with Māori (15%), Asian (7%), and Pacific Islanders (7%) accounting for the remainder.¹ While these communities do not always have equal access to governance or decision-making processes, large differentiations exist in outlooks pertaining to sexuality and LGBT issues in New Zealand. This is particularly the case for Māori and Pacific Islander communities where a number of indigenous and non-Western paradigms (such as Māori concepts of takataapui/takatāpui and Samoan notions of fā'afāfine) are increasingly significant.²

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

New Zealand has undergone a number of major legislative reforms in recent years. Although New Zealand led the way when it gave women the vote in 1893 (the first country in the world to do so), decriminalization of male-to-male sex occurred only in 1986. Subsequent reform has been relatively swift with antidiscrimination legislation passed in 1990 and 1993, equal property rights in 2000, and, more recently, the right for homosexuals to enter into civil partnerships (though not marriage) in 2004.

The country continues to experience a number of other challenges. The incidence of HIV/AIDS among homosexual men and men who have sex with men (MSM) has steadily increased in recent years. LGBT families continue to experience poor access to adoption and reproductive technology, while LGBT children are themselves subject to increased rates of bullying and depressive illness. LGBT individuals continue to face a number of social inequalities not experienced by their heterosexual counterparts.

EDUCATION

New Zealand enjoys a high rate of adult literacy (99%), with Māori language (or te reo) increasingly taught in schools. Education is mostly state-funded and is compulsory from the ages of six to 16 years. State and state-integrated schools receive all (100%) of their funding from the government. Private schools are partially (25%) state and independently funded. Most children are therefore directly subject to state education policies, and schools operate under the central authority of the government.³

Students are protected by antidiscrimination laws. The New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 was created to enshrine certain rights considered central to New Zealand's status as a democratic and multicultural society. While it defends the individual's democratic and civil rights, it also reinforces everyone's right to freedom from discrimination on the grounds set out under the Human Rights Act (HRA) 1993. The HRA lists 13 grounds upon which discrimination is prohibited; this includes gender and sexual orientation. A school is at risk of breaching the Act if it allows a learning environment to become hostile to LGBT youth. Section 57 of the Act also makes it unlawful for an education provider to refuse or fail to admit a person as a pupil or to exclude them as a student or subject him or her to “any other detriment” on account of sexual preference.

Despite these provisions, education policies are varied, with no single national driver or set of guidelines specific to LGBT students. The Ministry of Education describes its overall mission as one that is to “raise educational achievement and remove disparity.” Its “overarching outcome” is to equip “all New Zealanders with the knowledge, skills, and values to be successful citizens in the 21st century.”⁴ Similar rhetoric is enshrined in the government’s National Education Goals (1990), which seek to “enable all students to realize their full potential as individuals” and to provide “educational opportunit[ies] for all New Zealanders.” The guidelines include the requirement that schools provide safe physical and emotional environments.⁵ The Professional Standards for Teachers (1998) also requires the implementation of strategies to develop and maintain learning environments conducive to the learning needs of a “diversity” of students.⁶

Explicit references to the LGBT community appear in only a handful of educational programs. Youth Health: A Guide to Action (2002) identifies at-risk young people deemed vulnerable to “mental and physical health problems” and includes LGBT students in this definition.⁷ The Ministry of Youth Development initiative Youth Development Strategy Aotearoa (2002) similarly encourages the establishment of “positive connections” for LGBT students with their primary “social environments” and calls for increased access to support groups and programs.⁸ It is not apparent how many schools are, in fact, enacting these changes.

LGBT students continue to experience high degrees of verbal and physical harassment in many schools. Research indicates high rates of depressive illness among New Zealand LGBT young people as well as increased levels of bullying and intimidation. An increased propensity for suicide is also seen as a significant factor for many LGBT youth.⁹ Such factors appear to be connected to heterosexist norms and presumptions that presuppose—whether stated or implied—that heterosexuality is superior (morally or otherwise) to non-normative sexual and gender identities.¹⁰

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

As of 2006, New Zealand had a national gross domestic product (GDP) of US$106 billion. It enjoys a high standard of living, with GDP measured at US$24,943 per capita.¹¹ Most New Zealanders are engaged in some form of paid employment, and the unemployment rate was measured at 3.6 percent of the national population in the June quarter of 2007.¹² New Zealand is a growing economy with a high dependence on agriculture and tourism, as well as international trade with Australia, Japan, and the United Kingdom, among other countries.

New Zealand LGBT workers are protected by a number of legislative provisions. While discrimination on the grounds of sexuality remains an offense, the extent to which this protection extends is unclear. The BOR applies only to acts committed by the three branches of government or anyone in the “performance of any public function, power, or duty” created by law (Section 3). Further, Section 4 of the BOR specifically denies the Act supremacy over other statutory provisions, while Section 5 asserts that rights are subject to “reasonable limits.” The HRA is itself governed by the Human Rights Commission, an agency funded by the Ministry of Justice and charged with an advocacy and mediation role. The Commission functions under a conciliation and disputes resolution-based mandate, stressing “fair and effective” resolutions and “informal intervention,” rather than civil (or criminal) prosecution.¹³

Section 104 of the Employment Relations Act (ERA) 2000 does specify that direct and indirect discrimination against employees on the 13 grounds set out in section 21(1) of the HRA is unlawful. Sexual orientation is set out explicitly in the ERA. Section 108 of the Act also makes explicit protection from sexual harassment that is “detrimental” to an employee’s work, job performance, or job satisfaction. This includes harassment by co-workers or customers. The Equal Pay Act 1972 made it illegal to offer different pay rates for men and women doing the same job. Job marketing and promotion is therefore gender neutral and usually geared towards skill-based descriptions.

The Human Rights Amendment Act 2001 established the role of an Equal Employment Opportunities (EEO) Commissioner. The Human Rights Commission operates New Zealand’s EEO Program. The agency affirms access to “decent and productive work” for all and promotes antidiscrimination and diverse workplaces. Those workplaces that are members of the EEO Employers Group are obliged to meet EEO principles, including “all aspects of recruitment.”¹⁴ A number of organizations, particularly government departments, are members, and most run informal gay and lesbian mentoring and support networks. Others, such as the New Zealand Police Force and New Zealand Armed Forces, actively recruit LGBT members and liaise with gay communities.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

No gay-specific government initiatives or government agencies exist in New Zealand. There are, however, a number of health and youth services that assist LGBT communities and many exist with state or community funding.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

New Zealand experienced its first AIDS-related death in 1983. Since then, HIV and AIDS have shaped the formation and experiences of most gay communities. Community support and mobilization have been key to both the effective treatment of those with the illness and for combating its spread amongst at-risk groups.¹⁵ Groups such as the National Gay Rights Coalition were active in providing educational and support programs, as well as in combating the confusion and cultural stigma that quickly generated around the illness.¹⁶

New Zealand has largely continued to experience increasing rates of HIV infection. The New Zealand epidemic is comprised of two distinct “subgroups.” The first and largest is infection among MSM and is largely “locally acquired,” while the second and more recent is confined to heterosexual immigrants for whom the infection was “acquired overseas.”¹⁷ The number of new infections amongst MSM has increased rapidly in the last half-decade: from 38 in 2001 to 88 in 2005.¹⁸

These increases are attributed to a number of factors, ranging from increased rates of casual sex made possible through Internet dating sites, increased and deliberately unprotected anal intercourse (“barebacking”), and the perception that condom use is no longer vital.

The New Zealand AIDS Foundation (NZAF) has played an integral part in maintaining and promoting safe-sex messages in New Zealand. The Foundation provides information, counseling, and research on HIV and AIDS in all of the major New Zealand urban centers (Auckland, Hamilton, Wellington, and Christchurch), while The Hau Ora Takatāpui program provides Māori-specific initiatives. The NZAF’s Wellness Fund provides further peer support and grants for the care and support of those within the HIV-positive community. The Foundation is also active in local pride events and often provides political comment on key policy and law reform matters likely to affect its constituent members. Unlike its Australian counterpart, which, in 1996, adopted the “Talk Test Test Trust” campaign (which advocated testing and trust as the central means for combating sexually transmitted HIV and AIDS infections), the New Zealand Foundation has continued to stress condom use as the standard and central means for preventing transmission of the disease.

FAMILY

Public discourse continues to promote the nuclear and child-focused family as the central mode of familial life for most New Zealanders. Legislation and social policy also continue to make these connections. The Labour government’s Working for Families program, for example, offers tax credits, housing relief, and childcare assistance to “almost all families with children, earning under $70,000 a year.”¹⁹ The forthcoming Employment Relations (Flexible Working Arrangements) Amendment Bill will also give employees with young and dependent children the additional statutory right to request part-time and flexible hours, and a framework in which they can negotiate reduced working hours.

LGBT families are not excluded from such provisions. In the recent Lavender Islands survey—New Zealand’s largest national study of lesbian, gay and bisexual New Zealanders—researchers found that 25 percent of LGBT respondents had “borne or parented children in a constellation of different ways.” This included those with children from previous (or ongoing) heterosexual relationships, co-parents to a long-term, same-sex partner’s children, parties to fostering arrangements, and long-term partnerships where children are biologically produced through donor involvement.²⁰

An increasing majority of New Zealanders are themselves creating and maintaining families in relational modes outside the traditional nuclear and procreative model. In 2006, couples with children made up 42.0 percent of all families in New Zealand, while couples without children made up 39.9 percent of all families. Single parent families made up 18.1 percent of families in New Zealand. A further 17.4 percent of all persons were separated, divorced, or widowed, while 27.2 percent of people aged 15 years and over had never been married and live with a partner in de facto arrangements.²¹

Māori conceptions of family offer further modes of familial life outside of the Eurocentric nuclear model. Many Māori families observe tikanga (Māori customs and beliefs) that include notions of whānau, a familial grouping that is tribally based and includes both extended family and non-blood-related kin, and wbhangai, an informal fostering arrangement made between extended family for the care of (often) nonbiological offspring.

Current legal provisions provide only single LGBT persons with the ability to formally adopt. De facto and gay couples are excluded because they are unmarried. A Private Member's Bill, the Adoption (Equity) Bill, proposes to confer on same-sex partners the right to adopt, however it has yet to be selected from the Parliamentary ballot.

COMMUNITY

New Zealand is, in general, a highly urbanized society. Over half of all New Zealanders (53.1%) live in the country's four main urban areas, and approximately 1.3 million people live in Auckland alone (New Zealand's largest city).²² The public imagination also locates New Zealand's largest LGBT communities here. The city's central and eastern suburbs contain possibly the most visible LGBT presence in New Zealand, with a notable LGBT presence in the suburbs of Ponsonby and Grey Lynn. Karangahape Road, located in the city's central business district, also has a well-known LGBT scene with a number of bars, cafes, nightclubs, saunas, and sex-on-site establishments.

The LGBT community, which is diverse and embraces a number of ethnic and cultural subgroupings, is supported by a range of urban and regional events. The largest, Auckland's Hero Parade, attracted as many as 200,000 spectators at its peak and functioned as both a festive and political outlet.²³ It has since been replaced by a range of smaller events designed to cater to the fullest extent of New Zealand's diverse LGBT community. The Big Gay Out, a "family friendly" fair day, held annually at Coyle Park in Point Chevalier, is perhaps the largest event and, in addition to many LGBT attendees, attracts a range of nongay community leaders and other personalities. Most urban centers run some form of pride celebration, and there has been considerable regional renewal in the last few years.

Political activism has largely followed North American trajectories. This saw the establishment of The Dorian Society, a homophile society, in 1962, its legal subcommittee, the Homosexual Law Reform Society (HLRS), in 1963, and the Gay Liberation Front in 1972. The NZAF is actively involved in a wide range of contemporary issues facing LGBT people and makes frequent submissions to parliamentary select committees. Further community groups, such as Rainbow Youth, OUT THERE, and Gayline (also known as Gay and Lesbian Line), offer significant support and outreach programs to New Zealand's young people. Most function as voluntary organizations with significant and ongoing involvement from the communities they serve.

HEALTH

New Zealand operates a universal health care program. Health care is administered through the Ministry of Health, whose central role is to provide "policy advice on improving health outcomes, reducing inequalities and increasing participation."²⁴ Although some New Zealanders utilize privately funded services, primary health care for most New Zealanders is handled through national and state-funded services.

Health and ideas surrounding the construction of homosexual identities have been closely connected matters throughout New Zealand's history. Until the mid-1970s, homosexuality was often understood as a "psychological" illness, and parliamentary debates often mobilized against LGBT law reform using discourses that positioned homosexual bodies as diseased or socially harmful.²⁵ While this has changed in subsequent decades, many transsexual New Zealanders continue to experience a degree of marginalization and often struggle to communicate their needs to the medical profession. This may include negotiating perceptions that transsexuality is a gender disorder (or dysphoria), or addressing deeper "inner ambiguities" of identity and expression.²⁶

Along with increasing rates of HIV and AIDS among gay males and MSM, New Zealand is also experiencing higher levels of syphilis and gonorrhea, both of which can be transmitted through (unprotected) oral intercourse. In the recent Gay Auckland Periodic Sex Survey (2006), gonorrhea and chlamydia were found to be the most common STDs reported in the previous 12 months. Gonorrhea remains the most common STD reported over the lifetime of respondents (17.3%), while one in eight respondents reported a lifetime history of chlamydia, nonspecific urethritis (NSU), or genital warts. Drug use is also high among this sample group, with 56.9 percent reporting "any" recreational drug use in the last six months and 27.8 percent noting a "high frequency" of consumption.²⁷

The New Zealand Blood Service (NZBS) does not permit MSM or any male who has had anal sex in the previous 10 years to donate blood to the national blood bank. Although all blood samples are screened for HIV and other infectious diseases the Health Amendment Act 1998 and subsequent New Zealand Health and Disability Act 2000 requires that NZBS take "all reasonable precautions" in ensuring that blood is safe for use. MSM, as well as gay and bisexual men, are similarly excluded from providing sperm samples to New Zealand fertility clinics for the purposes of assisted reproduction. Attempts to reverse these policies are ongoing but have so far not been successful.²⁸

POLITICS AND LAW

New Zealand's legislative body is unicameral and typically consists of 120 Members of Parliament (MPs). New Zealand adopted the Mixed Member Proportional (MMP) electoral system in 1996. Representation is based on the principle that "that the number of seats a party receives should be directly proportional to the number of votes it wins."²⁹ The voter has two votes: one for a constituency candidate (a member representing his local electorate) and a second for a preferred political party (known as a party list vote). The number of list seats, aggregated against the number of electorate seats won, determines the extent of a party's influence and its ability to govern.

A party may govern as a majority coalition, a single party minority, or a minority coalition.³⁰ The opportunities for minorities to wield significant legislative power are therefore relatively high and has allowed for an increasingly pluralistic representation of people. In the 2005 general election, the already incumbent Chris Carter, Georgina Beyer, and Tim Barnett, all MPs with publicly LGBT identities, were joined by a Labour colleague, Maryan Street, New Zealand's first self-identified lesbian politician, and Chris Finlayson, a self-identified gay man and member of the National Party. Finlayson's inclusion is significant, given "queers'" historical opposition to conservative political structures. Labour list candidate Charles Chauvel, a self-identified gay man, was also admitted to the House in 2006, followed by Louisa Wall, a self-identified lesbian, in 2008. These additions brought the body of gay politicians in Parliament to five percent of the total House, with members aligned across a spectrum of both sexual identities (gay, lesbian, and transgendered) and political views.

Advancement of LGBT legislation has been largely successful under successive Labour governments. While there has been support for these initiatives from a multitude of MPs, most are from center-left affiliations (the New Zealand Labour Party, Green Party, Progressive Party, and Māori Party). Center-right and right-leaning political parties remain largely antagonistic (United Future, New Zealand National Party, New Zealand First) or apathetic (ACT) to LGBT aspirations. Reform efforts have been also met by a vocal and often militant opposition from Christian organizations. With the exception of the Catholic Church, which has, for the most part, remained steadfastly opposed to LGBT reform, most of these institutions are evangelical or fundamentalist in their views of Christian doctrine.

Sodomy remained a criminal offense between men until the passing of the Homosexual Law Reform Act in 1986. This gave men the right to engage in anal intercourse and provided a universal age of consent of 16. Legal provisions that criminalized homosexual sex previous to 1986 were modeled on British principles and, from 1867, all “erotic acts,” not just anal penetration, constituted assault and grounds for divorce.³¹ Life imprisonment remained a legal recourse for lawmakers until 1961, though a conviction of sodomy typically “attracted the minimum ten-year sentence” and only a small number of men were convicted annually.³²

The Property (Relationships) Amendment Act 2001 renamed and amended the Matrimonial Property Act 1976 and conferred on LGBT partners (along with heterosexual de facto couples) the same property rights as married spouses. This includes certain testamentary powers, as well as property protection and division when relationships end acrimoniously. The Act provides an assumption of equal asset division unless “extraordinary circumstances” can be proven (Sections 11 and 13).

Heteronormative presumptions and protections surrounding marriage were challenged in the New Zealand courts from the mid-1990s. The unanimous Court of Appeal decision in *Quilter v AG*³³ found that, under the then-contemporary legislation, Parliament had “intended” that marriage be confined to heterosexual relationships. Such views, they felt, were enshrined under the Marriage Act 1955, and, while minority communities were deserving of “equal treatment under the law,” any discrimination against same-sex couples had been clearly sanctioned by Parliament. While LGBT couples have yet to be granted access to marriage, the Civil Union Act 2004 now provides same-sex couples with the ability to register civil partnerships, amending the 1955 Act. In addition, the Relationships (Statutory References) Act 2004 removed statutory bases for the discrimination of peoples on the basis of marital status.

While the Human Rights Amendment Act 2001 required that all government provisions comply with the antidiscrimination regulations established under the BOR, a modicum of uncertainty exists as to whether transgendered (and, indeed, intersexed) persons are captured within the ambit of “sexual orientation” and “sex discrimination.” The proposed Human Rights (Gender Identity) Amendment Bill 2004 sought to make this protection explicit. However, a subsequent finding by the Solicitor-General argued that “there is currently no reason to suppose that ‘sex discrimination’ would be construed narrowly to deprive transgender people of protection under the Human Rights Act.”³⁴ This has yet to be tested in a New Zealand court.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Over half of New Zealand’s general population adheres to a Christian belief system, of which Anglican (17%), Catholic (14%), and Presbyterian (11%) are the largest religious groupings.³⁵ Since 1901, New Zealand has experienced a steady decline in Christian religious observance. While this has generated an increasingly diverse secular minority, immigration and perceived dissatisfaction with conventional religious systems have also generated increased participation in non-Christian religious affiliations. Of these, Buddhist, Hindu, Muslim, and New Age groupings have significant minority representations.³⁶

LGBT peoples in New Zealand belong to a number of faith systems. As with the main population, a significant number of LGBT people affirm Christian modes of faith. Despite this, the Lavender Islands survey found that LGBT Christians were “disaffiliating” from Christianity at 2.37 times the rate than the general population and that gay-identifying individuals reported that “their religious tradition was more difficulty than a support.”³⁷ Increasing numbers of LGBT New Zealanders belong to religious groups outside of traditional Christian denominations or profess no religious affiliation.³⁸

Christianity’s stance on homosexuality has remained mostly prohibitive during much of New Zealand’s history. However, certain denominations have remained active supporters of LGBT law reform and LGBT peoples more generally. The Methodist Church became the first Christian denomination in New Zealand to support the decriminalization of homosexuality in 1961. New Zealand clergy also ranked among some of the earliest members of the New Zealand Homosexual Law Reform Society (NZHLRS).³⁹ A number of Christian groups continue to be active in the gay community, with many running Christian outreach programs specifically for LGBT congregations. Many are LGBT-led or operate with significant LGBT input, despite formal or informal embargos on LGBT (and sometimes de facto) leadership by their host organizations.⁴⁰

Opposition by Christian Pentecostal and fundamentalist organizations has been sustained since the mid-1980s. Evangelical protests have been highly politicized, vocal, and, at times, militant. During the run up to the (successful) Civil Unions Act 2004, several evangelical groups, led by Brian Tamaki and the Destiny Church movement, marched on Parliament with 5,000 supporters. They demanded that the institution of marriage be protected from a perceived climate of moral (and sexual) permissiveness and condemned what they called the radical homosexual agenda in New Zealand. LGBT reform, they argue, constitutes examples of “secular humanism, liberalism, relativism, [and] pluralism” by a “Government gone evil.”⁴¹

Under Richard Lewis, Tamaki formed a political party, Destiny New Zealand, in 2003. Destiny failed to win a seat during the 2005 general election and the party has since been deregistered. Following an underage sex scandal involving former leader David Capill in 2005, the Christian Heritage Party, and older grouping, was also disbanded.

The evangelical ex-gay movement has not been active in New Zealand. Although some organizations, such as Exodus New Zealand, offer conversion therapy, the prevailing medical opinion is one that substantially rejects the notion of reparative treatments. Such groups are now in cessation due to insufficient support.⁴²

New Zealand has seen a small increase in violent crime between 1996 and 2005. In 2005, this accounted for 12 percent of all recorded crime (or 48,377 offenses), the most common being serious assaults, minor assaults, intimidation, and threats.⁴³ While the New Zealand government does not record the statistical incidence of assaults committed against sexual minorities, there have been a number of high profile attacks, and, in some cases, homicides committed against LGBT people in recent times.

Section 9(1)(h) of the Sentencing Act 2002 makes hate crime an “aggravating factor” for consideration when sentencing violent offenders. Sexual orientation is one of several possible grounds for construing the incidence of hate crime. The Act asserts that hostility towards a victim must be because of a “common characteristic shared with others” and the offender must have “believed that the victim has that characteristic.” Its status as an aggravating factor means that offenders cannot be tried on the basis of hate crime, merely that the attack will be one of a number of contributory factors to be taken into account when prescribing punishment.⁴⁴

Under Section 169 the Crimes Act 1961, offenders may also argue the “Homosexual Panic Defense” (HPD) as grounds for provocation. To do so, a defendant must prove that he or she was the object of unwanted sexual advances by the alleged victim. This must be sufficient to “deprive the offender of the power of self control” and influence the offender to be “induced” to commit an act of murder. Where grounds are proven, a homicide that might otherwise be deemed murder can be reduced to the less severe grounds of manslaughter. The New Zealand Law Commission recommended the repeal of the HPD as early as 2001. In 2007, the Commission issued a paper again arguing for its immediate repeal, stating that “intentional killing in anger in any circumstances is inexcusable.”⁴⁵

New Zealand has made significant steps toward LGBT integration since 1986. However, while New Zealanders are now free to solemnize their relationships in civil unions, LGBT persons continue to be excluded from the institution of marriage. This is a major inequality that is likely to be addressed in the future.

Subsequent and more general LGBT advances are also likely with increasing LGBT representation within the House of Representatives and, with this, the ability to keep LGBT issues live in the public consciousness. Debates surrounding adoption and reproductive rights are perhaps most pressing, with debate likely to fuel further dissension between progressive and conservative political groupings.

LGBT groups are increasingly seeking to safeguard the interests of LGBT youth and young people. The protection of LGBT youth will ensure the long term well-being of the LGBT community and assist in fostering a community spirit that acknowledges sexual and cultural diversity from an early age. While this is also likely to face significant opposition from conservative groups, such policies will signal New Zealand's growing national maturity and its valuing in real terms of an increasingly pluralistic and tolerant society.

Videos/Films

- 50 Ways of Saying Fabulous*, DVD, directed by Stewart Main (2005; Olive Films, 2005). Feature film based on the novel by New Zealand novelist Graeme Aitken. It follows the story of a young boy, Billy, a farmer's son, living in provincial New Zealand in the 1950s.
- Desperate Remedies*, DVD, directed by Stewart Main (1995; Avalon/NFU Studios, James Wallace Productions, New Zealand Film Commission, New Zealand On Air, 1995). An art house film that parodies historical romances and melodrama. The film features several homoerotic and lesbian scenes and engages in sophisticated political and cultural satire.
- Haunting Douglas*, DVD, directed by Leanne Pooley (2003; Specific Films, 2003). Documentary that explores the life and work of gay dance choreographer, author and artist Douglas Wright.
- The People Next Door*, DVD, directed by Ray Waru (1994; Television New Zealand, 1994). A made-for-television documentary that explores the lives of several gay New Zealanders from a variety of backgrounds and cultural affiliations.

Antigay Video

A Nation under Siege: A Social Disaster Has Hit Our Nation, DVD, directed by J. Cardno. (2005; Destiny Church, 2005). A documentary funded and created by the evangelical Christian church, Destiny Church. It suggests that New Zealand is experiencing a “state of emergency” that is attributed to a government “gone evil.” Brian Tamaki attacks homosexuality and homosexuals as evil and calls for New Zealanders to reject the “radical homosexual agenda.”

Laurence Wai-Teng Leong

OVERVIEW

This tropical island is located in Southeast Asia, near Malaysia and Indonesia. Its small size of 270 square miles and 4.6 million residents makes it a densely populated country. Colonized by England, Singapore emerged as a trading post relying on Malaysia as a hinterland that was once rich in rubber, tin, and spices. After Singapore became independent in 1965, it became evident that the colonial experience had left its mark on Singapore's demography, polity, and sexuality laws.

Beginning in the 1850s, the British encouraged immigration from China and India to ensure a supply of labor for the growth of mercantile capitalism in the Straits Settlement (comprising Singapore, Penang, and Malacca). Today, Singapore's population can be broken down into four officially recognized ethnic groups: 76 percent Chinese, 13.4 percent Malays, 8.2 percent Indians, and 2.4 percent other ethnicities. In practice, ethnic diversity is far more complex because of internal variations within each group, and because of a liberal immigration policy that accepts mostly professionals and skilled workers from other nations to work and reside in Singapore.

Given that the Chinese are the demographic majority, about half of the Singaporean population affiliates themselves with Buddhism and Taoism. Fifteen percent are Muslims, while four percent are Hindus. The latter two religions are roughly correlated with Malays and Indians, and their numbers have remained stable over the years. The Chinese, on the other hand, are increasingly moving away from their traditional religions to embrace the postcolonial mantle of Christianity. The proportion of Christians has risen from 10 percent in 1980 to 14 percent in 1990, and 16.5 percent in 2000.¹ As of October 2007, the fastest-growing religious organizations by congregation size and wealth were the City Harvest Church, Campus Crusade Asia, Faith Community Baptist Church, New Creation Church, and Trinity Christian Center.² These represent fundamentalist and charismatic denominations, and they have a major impact on shaping the country's sexuality policies.

Singapore's political system follows the Westminster parliamentary model, but a single dominant political party (the People's Action Party, or PAP) has been running the state for nearly half a century. This monopoly of power means that the judiciary, the legislature, and the executive arms of government are not distinct from one another. Indeed, the hegemony of PAP's rule has led residents to conflate the state with the political party.

The PAP's style of governance is authoritarian; the freedoms of speech, association, and assembly are severely constrained, and police powers are swiftly exercised against protest and dissent. This political milieu makes the struggle for LGBT rights a painful and arduous one. Human rights in Singapore are, in fact, a generic issue, and not confined to sexual minorities. The civil liberties of all residents are downplayed in favor of economic growth. Singaporeans are socially engineered to be laboring subjects, bent on making a living rather than given autonomy as individual citizens with rights and privileges. They are driven to be productive units or factors of production in a fast-paced global economy. Not surprisingly, Singapore has experienced high economic growth rates, and has a per capita gross domestic product of $30,000.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Singapore is a first world nation in its economic achievements, but a third world nation in terms of its treatment of sexual minorities. As a city-state, it has all the trappings of a global commercial center, yet its sexuality laws originated more than 150 years ago when the British colonial administration instituted the Penal Code that outlawed "unnatural sex" (including oral and anal sex committed by heterosexuals) and "gross indecency" between men.

The criminalization of homosexual acts is the clearest indication of official opprobrium toward men who are attracted to other men. For many gay men in Singapore, Section 377 of the Penal Code is the legal instrument that poses the gravest threat to their existence and identity. In the 1980s and 1990s, men caught engaging in homosexual acts in public settings were sentenced to prison, fined, and subject to caning. Raids on gay bars and discos were periodic and common enough to cause establishments to shut down.

Appalled by state harassment, some gays with the requisite capital and resources became "sexual exiles," immigrating to places like Australia, England, the United States, Canada, and even China, where the climate is less hostile towards gays. Lesbians have not been subject to criminal penalties because, under the Victorian legal philosophy, women were not conceptualized as capable of physical intimacy among themselves.

In October 2007, after much heated debate to revise the Penal Code, the state decided to lift the ban on oral and anal sex engaged in by heterosexuals, but to retain the criminal code against the same acts committed by two men. Thus, the state has officially articulated its antipathy toward gays and its view of them as lesser beings.

Criminal law is the primary and fundamental source of disadvantage for gay men because no civil law can advance ahead of something that is defined legally as criminal. As long as homosexual acts are punishable under the Penal Code, there can be no fairness in gay employment, no provisions for civil unions, no adoption rights for gay couples, and none of the other privileges enjoyed by other citizens.

The Penal Code against gays also trumps other ostensibly favorable policies. In July 2003, the Prime Minister announced a welcome policy designed to draw gays to work in Singapore. This was in line with the need to attract foreign professionals and to retain talented locals, but the boundary was drawn against civil rights; thus gay parades would be prohibited. Once again, gays were regarded as production units based on what they could contribute to the economy, and not as living breathing subjects with identities, relationships, and social needs.

In spite of the touted welcome policy towards gays in public employment, media expressions of gays were frowned upon. The popular Taiwanese film "Formula 17," about happy gay teens, was banned, a television station was fined for airing a talk show about American comedian Ellen DeGeneres's relationship with actress Anne Heche, a gay magazine had its circulation reduced for featuring raunchy male models, and a gay Web site portal was ordered to tone down its contents.

The ban against gay expression has been exacerbated by the blame-game of AIDS. In 2005, the health minister attributed a rise in AIDS cases to gay circuit parties. Singapore once hosted popular rave parties attended by gays from across Asia and the Pacific region. Henceforth, such parties have been banned and the sociability of gays thus restricted by what the international community calls the "nanny state."

EDUCATION

The reach of the state in Singapore is so tenacious that all schools come under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Education. Except for expatriate populations who can send their children to American, Canadian, Australian, Japanese, or other nationality-based franchised schools in Singapore, all Singaporean citizens go through the national education system. Under the economic imperative that imbues the whole society, schools prepare students to be competent in subjects for future employment prospects. Teachers are therefore trained to teach math and science, rather than sexuality and rights.

Singapore is a signatory to the Convention on the Rights of the Child, yet students are not taught about basic rights, and most are not even aware that their country has ratified the United Nations treaty. Next to rights education, quality sex education is lacking in national schools. Because classroom teachers are not competent to teach sexuality, the job is often outsourced to external organizations. These organizations may have secular and innocuous names like the Liberty League or the Family Life Society, but they tend to be faith-based.

In January 2006, Anderson Junior College students exposed the religious underpinnings of the Family Life Society. The sex instruction there was revealed to be a particular type of moral education that called for the rejection of contraception, abortion, masturbation, in vitro fertilization, and homosexuality. The messages of virginity and abstinence found in American Christian groups' literature were also reproduced by this organization.

Given that homosexual acts are still criminal in Singapore, it would be extremely challenging to educate youth about equality, discrimination, and fairness. It is unclear how one would discourage students from practicing homophobia or discrimination against LGBT people when the law still officially prohibits gay male activities. If teachers were themselves subjects of discrimination, it would be difficult for them to impart that knowledge. Accordingly, most LGBT teachers stay in the closet in order to keep their jobs.

In September 2007, Otto Fong, a gay teacher from a prestigious and elite school in Singapore came out on his blog. He aired his grievances and misgivings about being a gay teacher in a stifling environment. His story was taken up in the news, and the education authorities pressed him to delete his coming out story.

In May 2007, another out gay man, Alfian Sa'at, was teaching temporarily in a school. A month later, he was dismissed not by the school principal, but by the Ministry of Education, in spite of his being an accomplished and award-winning poet and playwright. Although no explicit reasons were given for his dismissal, his poems were known to be critical of the government and his plays centered on gay themes.

These two examples of gay teachers illustrate that Singaporean authorities are not yet ready to acknowledge and accept the role of LGBT teachers in education. If the state does not lead in sexuality education and does not want gay teachers to come out, then one can expect bullying, antigay slurs, and homophobic taunts to persist in schools. Transgendered students face the harshest of verbal assaults because of their visibility and nonconformity to conventional gender roles, and the lack of rights education does not equip students with resources to arm themselves against such negative threats.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

As Singapore's society is driven by the relentless pursuit of economic growth, state policies have always been pro-employer rather than pro-employee. Employment laws favor managers who can hire and fire without any explanation for their decisions. Many workers are not unionized, and those who do belong to unions are incapacitated by the fact that all unions are co-opted by the state and lack autonomous powers.

When the state takes the side of employers, there is very little incentive for private sector employers to offer partnership benefits to their LGBT employees. Companies such as American Express, IBM, Starbucks, Prudential, and Reebok have branch offices in Singapore, but while they are reputed to have a policy of inclusion in America, the privilege is not extended to their LGBT workers in Singapore. Presumably, the logic of cost-savings, which motivates many of these global corporations to set bases overseas, overrides the principle of inclusion. If same-gender domestic partner benefits are not forthcoming, gays find little strategic advantage in declaring their sexual orientation in the workplace.

In the workplace, LGBT people often have to sacrifice their vacation time to make way for married colleagues to go first. Heterosexual coworkers with children usually take first choice of vacation periods under the rubric of quality family time. LGBT people are defined as single (that is, not heterosexually married, and without a family), even if they have same-gender partners; they are thus consigned to less popular times for their vacation leave. This problem is critical in settings that require shift work and when there is a shortage of staff.

In July 2003, Prime Minister Goh Chok Tong announced in TIME magazine that gays were allowed to work in “certain positions in government.”³ Pitched to an international audience, he was explicitly courting foreign talent to work and live in Singapore. This policy shift was heavily influenced by Richard Florida’s idea that gays have critical roles to play in the global economy. Using bohemian, diversity, and gay indices, Florida demonstrated that all cities caught in the global circuit of competitive business thrive on a creative class of gays, geeks, and bohemians.⁴ In the drive to attract foreign professionals and to retain talented citizens, Singapore needs to relax its stance towards gays.

Goh’s welcoming of gays for employment appeared to be a positive step toward official acknowledgement of LGBT people, but it was a rhetorical pronouncement not translated into concrete changes in policy. There are no antidiscrimination statutes, partnership benefits, or lists of gay-friendly companies noted anywhere either in the laws or official charters of the country. In fact, Goh’s acceptance was conditional: gay sex would remain in the criminal statutes (even if not enforced), and there would be no flaunting of sexuality. Hence, gay parades, for example, are taboo.

Whereas the presence of gays in the military is a contentious issue in many countries, all able-bodied Singaporean males at the age of 18 are conscripted into the armed forces. Because conscription is compulsory and labeled as national service, gays who disclose their sexual orientation are not exempted from serving the military. They are first subject to a medical board and their parents are then interviewed to determine if the subject has cross-dressed or if he played with dolls during childhood. Here, gays are assumed to be the same as transgendered people, and are placed into a special category, “302,” where they are deemed as less than fit for combat duties and consigned to non-officer ranks and clerical vocations, often sent to camps that have no barracks (in which case they return home to live instead of residing in the camps).

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

In October 2005, Time magazine journalist Jake Smith asked the new prime minister Lee Hsien Loong if his government was homophobic, given that it had banned gay parties in August of that year. Lee denied the allegation that he had an irrational fear of gays, and insisted that he was merely sensitive to those segments of the population that were uncomfortable with gays.

Whether Singapore’s government is in reality homophobic can be ascertained by deeds rather than words. How enlightened a government is can be measured by the way it treats minorities—in this case, sexual minorities. Under Lee Hsien Loong’s rule, gay parties were banned and blamed for a rise in AIDS cases, and restrictions on gay media and mainstream cinema were increased.

The ban and restriction regime is at odds with any social programs for LGBT people. Such programs would be construed as “promoting a gay lifestyle,” which the PAP has consciously tried to avoid. The government has not provided any funding for LGBT counseling, for LGBT suicide prevention, or for LGBT communities in general. Even community efforts to fill the void by creating their own programs have not been approved by authorities. A concert by musicians Jason and deMarco, organized by Safehaven, a gay Christian group, to raise funds for HIV/AIDS causes, was banned in 2005 because it was thought that “their performance will promote a gay lifestyle which would be against the public interest.”⁵

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

HIV cases in Singapore have been rising steadily since 1985. Although the Ministry of Health officially runs an HIV awareness programs, restrictions placed on communicative channels undermine their effectiveness. Safe sex messages cannot be aired on television, even if this is the most popular medium. If they appear on billboards or in print media, the imagery is subdued with a “G” (general audience) rating because the common denominator includes children.

Condoms seldom appear in health promotional campaigns, and sex is mentioned only in surreptitious ways. The multiethnic composition of the population is often used by the state to craft conservative approaches to sexuality campaigns. For example, Malays are assumed to be religiously prohibitive against sex, and so no overt messages are addressed to this ethnic group.

The absence of sexuality awareness programs is mostly filled in by the nongovernmental organization Action For AIDS (AFA). Founded by doctors, lawyers, and volunteers in 1988, AFA is gay supportive, but also takes a broader approach to educating the public on sexual health. It offers counseling and outreach programs in various languages for different ethnic constituencies, publishes a free journal called The Act, and conducts awareness campaigns in schools.

FAMILY

Because the Singaporean state does not recognize civil unions or gay marriage, LGBT people are likely to be counted by the census as single in terms of marital status and “no family nucleus” in household structure. “Family nucleus” is defined in terms of blood relations or marriage ties. Overall trends indicate a rise in single status and in “no family nucleus.” The marriage rate in Singapore is low, at 6 per 1,000 residents. About 15 percent of the population constitutes people who are likely to remain unmarried permanently. In 2001, out of those between 30 and 34 years of age, about 35 percent of males and 20 percent of females were unmarried.⁶

In terms of household structure, nuclear families have declined somewhat, from 84.6 percent of total households in 1990, to 82 percent in 2000, while “no family nucleus” increased from 8.7 percent in 1990 to 12.3 percent in 2000.⁷ Because land is scarce in Singapore and property prices soar progressively, young, unmarried working and middle class people tend to reside with their parents. Many LGBT people are therefore subsumed into “one-family nuclear” households.

The fertility rate in Singapore is one of the lowest in the world, at 1.24 children per woman in 2004.⁸ For nearly three decades, the birth rate fell below the replacement rate required to maintain the population. Declining birth rates, the rise in single status, and “no family nucleus” units are facts that are slowly recasting the traditional definition of family in the country. Marriage, sex, and procreation are neither coterminous with each nor necessarily tied to the concept of a family.

These trends have led conservative constituencies to condemn LGBT people as threats to the family institution. Those who oppose the decriminalization of gay sex laws have resorted to arguments such as claiming that the repeal of such laws would dilute the significance of the family. As in the United States, “the family” has become a rhetorical device for right-wing resistance to social change.

COMMUNITY

LGBT communities in Singapore are forged out of contexts of oppression. In the 1970s and 1980s, LGBT networks were focused around bars, discos, and informal gatherings. The arrest and punishment of men cruising for sex in public places in the 1980s angered many gay men who then banded together to form a group, People Like Us (PLU). Tasked with the goals of decriminalizing gay sex and petitioning for equality, this movement began in 1993 and grew to a point where its members soon sought legal status. However, its application was rejected twice by the Registrar of Societies. PLU then turned to cyberspace by setting up a web discussion group called “Signal,” and its membership increased because of the benefits of anonymity and freedom of expression.

Given the authoritarian state that suppresses civil liberties, PLU has not managed to reverse state policies that disfavor LGBT people. Nevertheless, PLU’s success at the forefront of the LGBT movement can be seen in three examples. First, the term “PLU” has become a part of the popular vocabulary to refer to gays and lesbians in Singapore and its neighbor state, Malaysia.⁹ Just as “friends of Dorothy” was a code used by Americans in the 1970s to refer to gays and lesbians, PLU is now an identity badge for gays and lesbians.

Second, one of the founding members of PLU, Alex Au, has created a weblog called “Yawning Bread” that is read and cited by many. The blog serves as a LGBT resource because all LGBT matters in Singapore are meticulously documented and archived within it. Since the news media has no power in an authoritarian state, Au’s “Yawning Bread” plays the role of a watchdog that reports and monitors not just acts of injustice against gays, but also issues of public concern such as elections and government policies.

Third, PLU’s success is evident in the way it has spawned or inspired new groups that cover the wide spectrum of LGBT issues. Red Queen and Sayoni are for lesbian and bisexual women, SgButterfly is for transgendered people, PLUME advocates for young LGBT people under 24 years of age, PLU.EDU. SG is for gay teachers, SAFE is for parents and friends of LGBT people, ADLUS appeals to sports-oriented LGBT people, Heartland.Sg represents LGBT Buddhists, Safehaven does the same for LGBT Christians, and Oogachaga is for those seeking counseling. Cyberspace has paved the way for the formation of these groups that otherwise would face great obstacles operating in a state-controlled environment. Gays also take advantage of chat rooms for socializing. As a consequence, many gays and lesbians in Singapore are tech-savvy and adept in digital media.¹⁰

The diverse gay groups come together annually in August under the banner of IndigNation, which is a subdued version of the gay pride events found in other countries. IndigNation consists of a series of art displays, literary readings, film screenings, talks, and events organized by PLU over two weeks that coincide with National Day celebrations in Singapore. The term “IndigNation” signals the disenchantment with the new Prime Minister who banned the “Nation” circuit parties that were held during the National Day holidays. Both the Nation party and IndigNation events challenge the meaning of sexual citizenship in Singapore; as the country is swept up in the fervor of nationalism on National Day, LGBT people feel they have been excluded and marginalized by the state and so seek to reaffirm themselves through LGBT communities.

HEALTH

In 1985, when the HIV virus surfaced in Singapore, there were two cases. As of June 2007, there were a total of 3,244 people with HIV, out of which 1,092 had died from AIDS-related illnesses.¹¹ The most common mode via which HIV cases are transmitted is through sexual intercourse. Sixty-eight percent (2,223) of all HIV cases in Singapore come from heterosexual sex. Gays constituted 16 percent (554), while bisexuals accounted for seven percent (227) of all reported HIV-positive people.¹²

When the health minister blamed gay parties for causing a rise in HIV transmissions in 2005, this attribution did not help AIDS education. Targeting a social group rather than social practices merely reinforces old prejudices that “only gays get AIDS.” On the other hand, heterosexual men who are sex tourists in neighboring islands of Bintang and Batam and countries like Thailand, Vietnam, and Cambodia have not been publicly identified as objects of health policy or moral opprobrium.

The category of men who have sex with men (MSM) has never been officially recognized in Singaporean health interventions, and so this contingent of sexual minorities is submerged in official statistics. Sometimes, they are classified as heterosexual, sometimes as bisexual, and sometimes as gay, or as a residual “unknown.” Health policies in this way symbolically annul their existence.

Because AIDS is seldom defined as a lesbian issue, and because lesbians have never been subject to criminal penalties for their sexual orientation, the health concerns of lesbians have not been elevated to the status of public interest. Lesbians are thus subsumed under general women’s health matters.

Transgendered people’s health issues have evolved over time. In the colonial past, Singapore had an international reputation for being a transgender capital in Asia. First, Bugis Street was an important tourist Mecca from the 1950s through the 1970s, and a favorite destination for ANZUK (Australian/New Zealand and United Kingdom) soldiers during their rest and recreation leaves. At night, Bugis Street was graced by transgendered entertainers from around the world, and regularly hosted beauty pageants. A feature film of the same name was made by a Hong Kong director in 1997 to recapture the street’s rich historical moments.

Second, Singapore was a capital for gender reassignment in the 1970s. S. S. Ratnam pioneered male-to-female surgical operations, and transgendered people from across the world traveled to Singapore for gender-reassignment surgery. Over 500 operations were performed over a span of three decades.¹³ In 1973, the state enabled those who went through such operations to change their identity cards.

However, urban renewal has turned Bugis Street into a shopping mall, and authorities have directed hospitals to cease gender-reassignment operations on foreigners based on the assumption that transgendered people were a high-risk AIDS group. Today, Thailand has taken over Singapore’s role as a tourist draw for transgendered performers and as a medical center for operations.

POLITICS AND LAW

The relationship between LGBT people and the state is mediated by legal statutes, which in turn were imposed by the British in 1871. Section 377 of the Penal Code decrees that “carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman or animal” is punishable with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment for up to 10 years. Section 377A punishes men who commit “gross indecency,” even if these acts were conducted in private and between consenting adults.

While England decriminalized homosexual acts in 1967, Singapore continued to arrest men for homosexual encounters through 1990; these arrests peaked in the 1980s when police decoys were used to entrap men cruising for sex. The punishment included not just fines and caning, but also public shaming, as newspapers regularly featured such criminal trials.¹⁴

Because the Penal Code outlawed oral sex regardless of consent, age, and sexual orientation, the wider heterosexual population was drawn to a 2003 criminal case where a man who received oral sex from a consenting female was sentenced to two years in jail. Public outcry against the absurdity of the law exerted pressures to repeal such archaic Victorian codes.

In October 2007, after much debate over the Penal Code, and in spite of two petitions signed by thousands of people, the state decided to retain the gay sex ban, but to legalize oral and anal sex between heterosexuals. The Prime Minister repeatedly used the “Singapore is a conservative society” argument to emphasize its reluctance to accede to legal reforms for gays. Although there was a proviso that the law against gay sex would not be strictly enforced, the fact remains that the criminal statute sets double standards and symbolically marginalizes gay men.

As long as the criminal law against gay men stands, it would be irrelevant to consider antidiscrimination statutes for LGBT people. In fact, this failure to abrogate the criminal law is symptomatic of the curtailment of other rights in Singapore. During the third IndigNation celebration held in August 2007, authorities banned four events (an exhibition of photos of same-sex couples kissing, a gay literature reading session, an academic lecture on gay laws around the world, and an outing where gays were supposed to wear pink to the national park).

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Many LGBT people in Singapore think that, next to law, religion is the chief source of public intolerance towards them. Predictably, the pressure groups that most vociferously object to decriminalization of gay sex and to LGBT people in general are Christians. The Methodist Church of Singapore, Focus on the Family Singapore, and the National Council of Churches of Singapore have all urged the state to refuse any concessions to LGBT people. These Christian denominations are all Western imports to Asia. In the immigrant history of Singapore, the predominantly Chinese majority were Buddhists and Taoists; these traditional Asian religions did not condemn homosexuality as sin, sickness, or an “order against nature,” but instead preached compassion towards all.

The ex-gay movements founded in America have arrived in Singapore. In November 2000, the Church of Our Savior (COOS) ran the “Choices” ministry, which sought to change gays. Law professor Thio-Li Ann, who became a public icon for the retention of the gay sex law, has adopted the same rhetoric of the ex-gay and fundamentalist movements. In this sense, conservative branches of Christianity have played a critical role in policies related to sexuality.

In spite of a checkered relationship with religion, gays who feel the need to bond spiritually are served by two major groups: Heartland, a Buddhist group, and Safehaven, a Christian group that gathers for prayer, Bible study, and fellowship.

VIOLENCE

The environment for LGBT people in Singapore is one marked by political conservatism but somewhat greater social tolerance in the sense that society has moved far ahead of the state. State authorities have insistently harped on the idea that Singapore is an “Asian society” with a “conservative majority,” and that sexual policies must reflect rather than transcend this conservative Asian majority. In reality, Singaporeans are not as insular or provincial as the authorities have made them out to be. In the age of transnational mobility and Internet connectivity, Singaporeans travel widely and are exposed to many cosmopolitan frameworks. Moreover, in a densely populated city-state, most people are personally acquainted with LGBT people in schools and work settings. There has been no record of any physical violence inflicted on LGBT people. Gays and lesbians in Singapore have to contend less with homophobia from ordinary people than with institutionalized bans and restrictions by the state on sexual expression.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Singapore is a schizophrenic society that takes one step forward and another one or two steps backwards. The economy moves head with high growth rates, but the polity lags behind as participation and expression are repressed; the skyscrapers seem modern, but the sexual laws are antiquated. Authorities claim that Singapore is Asian, and yet they are guided by Western legal and religious codes. Government ministers say they are not homophobic, but then ban gay parties and gay media; they also welcome gays to the workforce, but then offer no antidiscrimination legislation to protect gays. There are gay bars and saunas in the country, yet gay sex remains illegal.

Gays have to live within this milieu of contradictions and paradoxes. When there is a gap between rhetoric and reality, when nothing ever seems consistent, and when policies shift but remain essentially unchanged, gays learn to be deeply cynical or apathetic. As more and more countries acknowledge gay rights and make progress toward marriage, immigration, adoption, and so forth for their LGBT citizens, Singapore is frozen in a time warp, oblivious to such advancements. As Singapore is a small country dependent on links to the globalized world, resident gays who travel, read, and learn about developments in other countries are increasingly frustrated with the slow pace of reform at home. Cosmopolitanism implies that more and more gays and lesbians with connections to the global community will come out with confidence and greater articulation, but these same gays will also press for change in their home environment.

Given that the “nanny state” is the institution that prohibits, bans, and controls, the future for gays in Singapore hinges on changes in the state. Official recognition of LGBT people as sexual citizens with equal rights and entitlements will be contingent on democratic reforms that honor greater freedoms of expression, assembly, and association.

TAIWAN

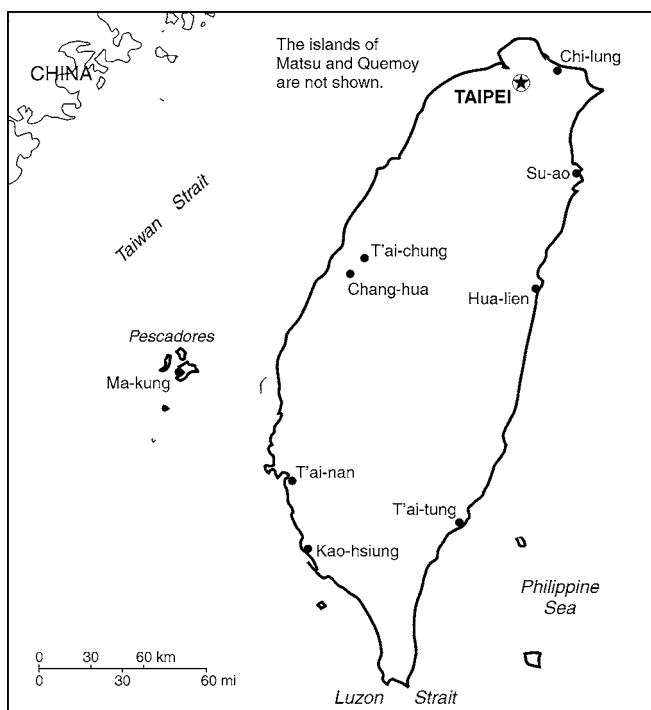

Dau-Chuan Chung

OVERVIEW

The formal name of Taiwan is the Republic of China (R.O.C.). It is an eastern Asian island nation located in the Western Pacific Ocean between Japan and the Philippines off the southeast coast of People's Republic of China. Taiwan has an area of 13,969 square miles, and a population of approximately 23 million with a density of 1,649 people per square mile.¹ In 2008, the annual birth rate was 8.6 per 1,000; the annual death rate was 6.3 per 1000, and the average life expectancy at birth is 78.4 years. Taiwan's literacy rate is 97.8 percent, and 67.8 percent of Taiwanese have earned a high school diploma.² In 2008, the per capita gross domestic product (GDP) was $17,083, the growth rate was 0.1 percent, inflation was 3.52 percent, and the unemployment rate was 4.14 percent.³

In its 400-year history, Taiwan has been occupied by Portugal, Spain, the Netherlands, and Japan, and forcefully influenced by Chinese, Japanese, and American cultures.

The relationship between Taiwan and China is complicated. Many Chinese immigrated to Taiwan after the island was discovered in the late 16th century, but the Chinese government did not make territorial claim to Taiwan until 1885. Ten years later, Taiwan became a Japanese colony. In 1945, Taiwan was reunited with China. In 1949, the Kuomintang government was defeated in mainland China, moved to Taiwan, and then controlled Taiwanese society under strict martial law.⁴

Meanwhile, mainland China argued that Taiwan is a province under Chinese control, and prevented Taiwan from building official relationships with other countries or joining international organizations, such as the United Nations or the World Health Organization.⁵ At an international level, Taiwan is very isolated. Based on this perspective, the status of Taiwan in the world is similar to the status of homosexuals in some societies: it exists, but is neglected.

After the lifting of martial law in 1987, marginalized, underrepresented, and stigmatized groups of the past, such as women, aborigines, and homosexuals, aggressively demonstrated their existence and voiced their opinions. The liberal social conditions helped the emergence and visibility of the current gay and lesbian movement in Taiwan.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Taiwan has gained a reputation for having a progressive attitude regarding LGBT issues. To some extent, it is well-deserved. The LGBT communities in Taiwan are vigorous, and LGBT organizations are active and positive. There are many LGBT social, cultural, and commercial materials, places, and activities. The quality of LGBT literature, art, and academic studies is impressive as well. The government of Taipei has also provided financial support for LGBT festivals, marches, and a free gay guide to the LGBT communities.⁶

At the same time, discrimination against LGBT people still exists in most areas of Taiwan, although there are two governmental acts declaring that discrimination based on sexual orientation in educational institutions and employment illegal.

The Taiwanese LGBT movement began in the 1990s, after the appearance of HIV/AIDS and the lifting of martial law. The major issue for Taiwanese gay men is to fight against the stigma related to HIV/AIDS. For lesbians, bisexuals, transgendered people, and other sexual minorities, the priority is to increase their visibility in Taiwanese society. The latest mission for the LGBT movement is to relieve LGBT people of the conservative control over their erotic activities.

EDUCATION

Taiwan's education system was under tight government control before 1996 and there were standardized curricula and textbooks for schools. After 1996, however, school principals and committees gradually acquired more power to manage their schools.⁷ The main concern for committees, especially at the junior and senior high levels, is to help students to obtain higher exam scores for different joint entrance examinations.⁸ Therefore, the curriculum in almost every junior and senior high school is exam-focused.

According to the Gender Equity Education Act, schools may not treat LGBT students and teachers differently from others, and the rights of every individual should be protected.⁹ However, Taiwanese schools are still far from LGBT-friendly. For example, some teachers unintentionally express LGBT-unfriendly remarks, while some institutions refuse to believe that students can be LGBT, or label LGBT students as pseudo-homosexuals. Some institutions still consider nonheterosexuality to be a mental illness and employ counseling or psychotherapy in hopes of changing the sexual orientation of students. Furthermore, textbooks in schools are heterosexist, and representation of LGBT issues in textbooks remains insufficient and inappropriate. Not only is information about LGBT lifestyles seldom found in textbooks, whatever information is provided often promotes misunderstandings about LGBT people. For example, some textbooks for junior high school students still suggest that homosexuality is a psychological dysfunction.¹⁰ This condition, however, has improved slightly since the establishment of the Committee of Gender Equality Education in 1997. Many commissioners on that committee are LGBT-friendly scholars.¹¹

Many schools assume that every student is a heterosexual, or that students are too young to know whether they are LGBT. This provides temporarily safe situations for LGBT students so that they may hide their sexual orientation. This condition also prevents LGBT students from being known, meeting other LGBT students, or receiving support from their teachers and peers. Students or teachers who are easily recognized or misunderstood as LGBT, or those who behave in ways that do not conform to gender norms; for example, tomboyish females or effeminate males are much more likely to be victims of disciplining violence. For these LGBT students and teachers, “passing” becomes a necessary strategy to survive.

In contrast, however, some qualitative studies have found that, when LGBT students or teachers who behave in ways that conform to gender norms come out to their peers or classmates, they are likely to be accepted and supported.¹² Some students may have difficulty accepting their LGBT classmates; however, their attitudes can be changed after direct and open communication with LGBT-friendly teachers or their LGBT classmates.¹³

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Sexual orientation has been included in the Employment Services Act to ensure that employers make fair employment decisions. One of the major problems for LGBT personnel, however, is an unfriendly working environment, not unfair treatment. For example, LGBT persons who are single are often considered immature or unready to shoulder responsibility in the workplace. Women are expected to dress in suits with skirts, and men are expected to behave in masculine ways. These conditions form a glass ceiling in offices to prevent LGBT workers from being promoted to high-level positions.

Officially, the Employment Services Act protects any employee from discriminatory treatment based on his sexual orientation, and current numbers of reported cases of discrimination in the workplace based on sexual orientation are quite low. This does not suggest that discrimination against LGBT people has disappeared. Many persecuted LGBT people may not fight back for fear of outing themselves.

Economically, an unfriendly social environment also affects LGBT companies. Owners do not lease shops to LGBT business, a chain of leading bookstores does not sell books published by LGBT publishers, and police intentionally check and harass LGBT companies, shops, and pubs. Some companies that have targeted gay and lesbian consumers, such as the *Kaixin yangguang*¹⁴ publisher¹⁵ and To Go magazine,¹⁶ were forced to close due to financial losses. The Reai (G&L) magazine¹⁷ and the Gingin bookstore¹⁸ experienced some flat periods when revenues and expenditures were unbalanced.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

The Taiwanese government does not provide specific social programs for LGBT people. It argues that every Taiwanese citizen can equally access and obtain services from the government, therefore it is unnecessary to provide specific services for LGBT people. This heterosexism, however, is fundamentally flawed. Heterosexual families are the basic unit for most social policies in Taiwan. When LGBT people do not choose to participate in heterosexual marriages or families, they are automatically excluded from some social programs and policies, even though they are Taiwanese citizens. The policies do not purposefully discriminate against LGBT people, but they affect and create disadvantages for many LGBT people nonetheless.

Some services provided by nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) also unintentionally harm LGBT people due to their inappropriate perspectives regarding LGBT issues or the pathologization of LGBT people. For example, when a lesbian was depressed due to a failed relationship with her girlfriend, a counselor suggested that she change her sexual orientation or to find a boyfriend to cure her broken heart.¹⁹ In addition, in 2007 a lesbian was not allowed to adopt her niece because an NGO suggested to a court that she, as a lesbian, might be an inappropriate mother and cause much trouble for the girl.²⁰

Because the government and some NGOs do not provide adequate services for LGBT people, some LGBT organizations have been established to provide related services. The most remarkable function these organizations provide is to help LGBT individuals connect socially with each other. For example, the first lesbian organization, Women zhijian (Between Us), was established in 1990 based on an acknowledgement of the importance of establishing a social network among lesbians. Kuifumu tongxin xiehui (PFLAG Taiwan) was founded in 2006 to provide a social network for families and friends of LGBT people. A second important mission for LGBT organizations is to advocate for LGBT rights and to deal with related torts. Tongzhi gongzuofang (the Tongzhi Workshop), founded in 1993, but no longer operational, Xingbie renquan xiehui (the Gender/Sexuality Rights Association), founded in 1999, and Tongzhi renquan xiehui (the Tongzhi Rights Association), founded in 2000, were established for fulfilling this mission. The provision of LGBT-friendly counseling has been suggested as another important issue, and Tongzhi zixun rexizn xiehui (the Tongzhi Hotline Association), founded in 1998 and Lalashou xiehui (the LesHand Association), founded in 2006, pay a great deal of attention to this underserved issue. These LGBT associations have close and strong relationships with each other and related LGBT and non-LGBT organizations. They form coalitions to respond to specific events and work collaboratively to handle critical activities, such as festivals or pride parades. After the establishment of LGBT organizations, some governmental bodies, such as the Taipei city government, have begun to provide funding for or work with the LGBT organizations, though sometimes the funding is limited.

Taiwanese LGBT organizations concentrate not only on LGBT issues, but also connect or collaborate with other oppressed groups, such as women, laborers, foreign wives, and people living with HIV/AIDS. A few international LGBT gatherings have also been held in the years since 1990, such as the Asian Lesbian Network meeting in 1995, and the Chinese Tongzhi Conference in 2001. Festivals (starting from 1995) or parades (starting from 2003) are other methods employed to publicize the existence of the LGBT communities and to challenge the biased images of LGBT people often put forth by the public media in Taiwan.

Some special issues, however, have not been carefully covered by the current services or programs provided by LGBT organizations, such as domestic violence between same-sex partners, care for LGBT elderly, handicapped LGBT individuals, or the health needs of bisexuals, transsexuals, and intersexuals. To narrow the gap between what should be done and what has been done, and removing the exacting barriers so that LGBT people may obtain related social services, LGBT organizations must pay attention to communicating with, educating, and establishing working relationships with other organizations in different fields.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Generally speaking, sex was considered a normal part of human life in traditional Chinese culture (like taking food), and male-male sex or love was not a concern in ancient Chinese society. Homosexual behavior between kings and their male partners, and nan jiyuan (brothels for male-male sex) can easily be found in historical records. Furthermore, jijian (anal sex) between men was not considered a crime, except in the cases of rape or forced sex.²¹ On the other hand, female-female sex or love was relatively difficult to identify in the traditional Chinese culture, although such stories may be found in ancient novels or plays.

Male-male sex or female-female sex is considered neither a crime nor sin in modern Taiwan. After the introduction of Western sexology and psychoanalysis, however, homosexuality was considered as an abnormal psychological condition. This concept is still held by some Taiwanese.

Chinese culture has a long history of cross-dressing. In some famous stories, such as *Mulan*²² or Lian shanbo and Zhu yingtai,²³ cross-dressing women are the main characters. In traditional Taiwanese operas, known as koa-a-hi, most male characters are played by actresses, and some cross-dressing actresses, usually in the leading male roles, are overwhelmingly loved by female Taiwanese fans.

Despite these characters' popularity in literature and on the stage, Taiwanese government treats ordinary cross-dressing individuals, whether they are transgendered people who like to cross-dress or butch lesbians, unfairly. They are considered mentally ill or criminals whose behaviors are against the social order. Negative terms such as bu nan bu nu (a gender-bender) and weifan shehui zhixu (contravening social law or order), are popularly used to taunt cross-dressing individuals in Taiwan.

Sex work is seriously stigmatized and is an illegal occupation in Taiwan. Therefore, male-to-male sex workers have to advertise themselves using a secret approach, such as providing male-to-male massage services. Female-to-female sex workers are invisible in Taiwan. Furthermore, the population that practices sado-masochism (S+M, or bondage) is also stigmatized and marginalized in Taiwan, and is misunderstood by most Taiwanese. In recent LGBT festivals and parades in Taiwan, however, a few S+M groups have appeared, thereby increasing the visibility of this population.

A total of 19,744 people in Taiwan were reported to be HIV positive as of the end of 2008. Intravenous drug users accounted for 30.54 percent of those diagnosed as infected with HIV, followed by men who have sex with men (26.5%), and heterosexual people (20.4%).²⁴ AIDS prevention work in Taiwan began in 1985, and includes safer-sex education, harm reduction programs, HIV testing, and free treatment for people living with HIV.²⁵ Although safer-sex education used to stigmatize sexual minorities, such as sex workers and gay men, the situation has gradually improved in recent years.²⁶

FAMILY

The family has traditionally been the basic unit in Chinese society, and the extended family was idealized in Chinese culture. In an idealized extended Chinese family, parents should supply basic needs, care, and instruction for their children; siblings should show brotherliness and respect for each other; children are expected to contribute their income to the family, and sons are strongly expected to take care of their parents in their old age.²⁷ Chinese immigrants originally brought this ideology to Taiwan. The number of extended families has decreased in modern Taiwan, but the notion of the idealized family persists. Divorced and single parents once were stereotyped, but they are now considered no more than different life-style options for contemporary Taiwanese.

Although Taiwanese society has gradually come to hold more liberal attitudes towards divorce, companionate marriage, or single-parent families, it is not so easy for Taiwanese LGBT persons to come out to their families. Homosexuality is stigmatized, so being a homosexual is considered shameful or disgraceful for other family members. This shame or disgrace sometimes results in domestic violence against LGBT persons. Furthermore, Taiwan is a collectivist country where the relationship with family is an individual's most important social resource, so some LGBT people are afraid to risk their relationships with family and choose not to come out.

When LGBT people decide not to come out to their families, they often encounter other difficulties, especially the stress of marriage. In Chinese culture, heterosexual marriages have been constructed as the better life choice, and unmarried individuals are usually thought of as immature or irresponsible. LGBT people, like unmarried heterosexuals, usually encounter numerous pressures to marry from family members, relatives, or even neighbors. In addition, males are expected to have a son to carry on the family name, so gay men typically feel more frustrated about the stress of marriage than their lesbian counterparts.

It is almost impossible for LGBT people to sever all emotional and physical ties with their families, especially their parents. It is traditionally expected that children, especially sons, will take care of their parents, regardless of what the parents may say or do. This traditional expectation indirectly produces other potential troubles for elderly LGBT people, because it suggests that they might not receive care due to the lack of offspring.

In Taiwan, some LGBT people decide to accept a heterosexual marriage, or to enter into a false marriage with an opposite-sex LGBT person. Being in a heterosexual marriage however, when their partners do not know the truth, can create the problem of the double closets. LGBT people in heterosexual marriages have to hide their LGBT identities from their husbands or wives while hiding their marriage status from their LGBT friends or potential same-sex partners. Being in an opposite-sex marriage with a LGBT person will lead to other problems, such as the continuing camouflage for the marriage, and the worry that the false marriage and true sexual orientations of the partners will be revealed.

Although there is no exact definition of marriage in the Taiwanese legal system that restricts the unions to one man with one woman, same-sex marriage is not allowed. Civil unions and domestic partnerships are not included in legal system, either. In 2000, the government announced that it intended to legalize same-sex marriage, and a few public hearings were held in the Legislation Yuan,²⁸ but no related bills have been passed.

Openly LGBT individuals or couples are not allowed to adopt children in Taiwan, as it is assumed that lesbians and gay men might make for inappropriate parents. However, a closeted LGBT person, or LGBT people who are in heterosexual marriages, is not prohibited from adopting children.

COMMUNITY

Beginning in the mid-20th century, some Taiwanese males started to use places such as gardens, parks, or public toilets to meet or to have sex with other males. Although the places are thought of as cruising grounds, there are some distinctions between the ones in Taiwan and those in the West. First, the places used in Taiwan are not only for quick and anonymous sex between men, but also places for meeting other gay males, or for friends to gather together. For this reason, it is not unusual for Taiwanese gay people in pairs or groups to talk, laugh, or play in these places. Second, almost all of these places in Taiwan are situated in or close to very busy locations, such as main train stations or bus stops, to make it easy for people to come and go. Third, specific subcultures have developed in these places, and they also have become critical community bases for Taiwanese gay men. Parks, especially the Peace Park (previously known as the New Park) in Taipei, have been nicknamed gongsi (offices) for gay men. Going to parks has been merrily called qu gongsi shangban (going to the office for work). A famous Taiwanese gay novel, Crystal Boys, was based on the New Park. Potential risks still exist in these places, though, such as being harassed by policemen or being threatened or extorted by gangsters.

After the 1970s, a few gay-owned cafes, restaurants, and bars opened in Taipei to provide other alternatives for gay men to meet friends or to pass their leisure time. Some Japanese-style tearooms hired cross-dressing male sex workers to solicit male customers. Gay men have also appeared at springs, baths, or saunas. In the mid-1980s, male-seeking-male advertisements secretly and indirectly emerged in the personals sections in magazines. The Internet has been a popular tool for gay men to connect with others, after its development in the 1990s.

Because of limited erotic resources for women in Taiwan, there were few places for lesbians to go and meet other lesbians in earlier times. Before the first T-bar (this term is used to refer to lesbian bars in Taiwan) opened in 1986, many lesbians went to hotel ballrooms or gay bars to socialize with other lesbians.²⁹ Once some lesbian-owned restaurants and T-bars opened, they provided private, safer places for lesbians to meet friends or to enjoy leisure time. The appearance of female support groups, feminist organizations, and the Internet have provided safer environments for lesbians to get to know one another.

Quznzi (a circle) is a term used by Taiwanese LGBT people to refer their communities. Jin quznzi (joining the circle) means becoming a member of the LGBT community, or physically going to places where LGBT people congregate. This also refers to a psychological process of leaving familiar heterosexual environments, and physically and psychologically going to a new and unfamiliar homosexual quznzi. Taiwan is a geographically small, culturally collectivist country, so for Taiwanese LGBT people, it is difficult and unusual to totally sever relationships with their families or heterosexual friends. Therefore, although they can physically and psychologically jin quznzi, they can only leave their heterosexual environments psychologically.

Broadly speaking, for gay men of the pre-Internet generation, entering the New Park was a symbol of jin quznzi, and, for lesbians of the same generation, going to T-bars was the symbol. For LGBT members of the post-Internet generation, jin quznzi means that they create accounts on LGBT social networking Web sites or join LGBT organizations.

Because the LGBT quznzi, an imaginable and invisible circle, is different from those of heterosexual communities, it is unavoidable for LGBT newcomers to encounter some culture shock when they jin quznzi. An important task for LGBT newcomers is to learn the culture of the LGBT quznzi. On account of the lack of established social institutions or mechanisms in the LGBT quznzi, such as families or schools, most LGBT newcomers must learn about the culture on their own, or by observing how other LGBT individuals behave. The formation of some LGBT districts in Taiwan makes the quznzi more visible.

A visible LGBT quznzi in Taiwan has gradually been forming, thanks to the establishment of LGBT and LGBT-friendly organizations, cafes, bookshops, and publishers. Examples include the Gongguan and Ximen areas in Taipei. In the Gongguan area, where traditionally marginalized voices or opinions can exist and be heard, many LGBT organizations and LGBT-owned cafes and shops are located, such as Taida nantongxinglian wenti yanjiushe (the Gay Chat) and Taida nutongxinglian wenhua yanjiushe (the Lambda), which were the first gay and lesbian student associations, the Gingin bookstore (the first LGBT bookstore), and Tongzhi zixun rexizn xiehui (the first registered LGBT organization). These shops and organizations, along with other LGBT-friendly stores in the Gongguan area, formed the first LGBT district in Taiwan. Many LGBT activities and festivals are held in this area. In the Ximen area, the Peace Park, Honglou Square (the Honglou was a cinema where gay men collected to have anonymous sex), and other LGBT-owned cafes, restaurants, and saunas form the second LGBT district in Taiwan.

In addition to these visible LGBT districts, the publication of some important novels and books, such as Crystal Boys (by Bai Xian-yong, and published in 1990), Zhongguoren de tongxinglian (Chinese Homosexuality) (edited by Zhuang Hui-qiu, and published in 1992), Notes of a Desolate Man (by Chu T'ien-wen, and published in 1997), has been another force to construct the imaginable LGBT communities and to push the broader Taiwanese society to consider LGBT issues from a more friendly perspective. The publication of these books also provided positive and empowering information for LGBT individuals who previously had only received biased or stereotyped messages about LGBT from public resources.

The formation of LGBT districts in Taiwan, on the one hand, provides LGBT individuals with visible places to go to socialize with other LGBT individuals and to construct their LGBT identity. On the other hand, the visibility of the LGBT quznzi increases the harassment by anti-LGBT individuals and organizations. For example, the gay-owned AG Gym in the Ximen area was only open for one year, after countless intentional checks and harassment by police officials and LGBT-unfriendly neighbors forced its closure.³⁰ The glass walls of the Gingin bookstore have also been smashed many times.

The terms top and bottom, or active and passive, commonly employed to describe male-male sex roles in Western gay communities, have been introduced and integrated into Taiwanese gay society, but Taiwanese gay men seem to prefer the local terms 1-0-6-9 to identify themselves in sex. The numbers 1-0-6-9 clearly, in a pictographic way, represent the preferred sex roles for Taiwanese gay men. The number, 1, yihao, refers to being top; the number, 0, linghao, refers to being bottom; and the number, 10, yiling shuangxiu, refers to being versatile. The numbers 6 and 9 stand for an oral sex between two men.

The terms used in the Chinese family system, such as, ge (older brothers), jie (older sisters), di (younger brothers), and mei (younger sisters) are translated to describe the gender categories in the Taiwanese gay male population. Ge and di are used to name the gay men who are more masculine, meanwhile jie and mei are used to name the gay men who are more feminine. However, there are no clear distinctions between sex roles and gender roles, so the usage of yihao jiejie or linghao gege is not uncommon. In addition, two simplistic terms C (sissy) and M (masculine) are generally employed to describe the gender roles in the Taiwanese gay male population. However, there are still many arguments about what ge/jie/di/mei or C/M mean.

Unlike their gay male counterparts, gender roles, not sex roles, are more meaningful for lesbians, although specific gender roles suggest possible roles and behaviors in female-female sex. There are three basic gender roles in the Taiwanese lesbian community: T, po, and bufen. “T” is short for the Western term tomboy, and it implies that a T is probably a butch lesbian. Po originally referred to man’s wife in the Chinese family system, so the term was translated to describe a T’s female partner, a femme lesbian. Bufen means unclassified or undifferentiated. The creation of bufen was based on the deconstruction of the T-po relationship.

A T-po pair has been thought of as a typical lesbian relationship. Following the introduction of Western feminism, and the creation of bufen, the types of alternative relationships in the lesbian community, such as T-T pairs or po-po pairs, have gradually emerged and become visible. The ideas of T and po have also transformed to conceptual prototypes, and there are many subtypes under T and po, such as shtoui T (stone T), rou T (tender T), han po (intrepid po), or mei po (beautiful po). However, although the gender roles in the lesbian community are more flexible today, this does not suggest that the meaning of bufen is superior to the meaning of T or po, they are merely the three most common descriptors for gender roles or categories.

In addition to the terms used to name their sex or gender roles in the gay and lesbian communities, other terms have been produced or translated to differentiate homosexuals from heterosexuals, such as quanneiren (people in the same circle), tongxinglian (homosexuals), and tongzhi, kuer, or kuaitai (queer). Specific terms for gay men include tongnan or gay; while for lesbians the terms are tongnu, lesbians, la, or lazi. These terms imply variable meanings socially and politically, and are used in different conditions by LGBT persons.³¹

The Taiwanese government has been neglectful of the health of LGBT people. The only LGBT health issue to which the government has paid attention is HIV/AIDS. This disease was considered a gay disease even before any HIV/AIDS cases were reported in Taiwan, and it was stigmatized due to its close relationship with gay men. As early as was possible, the government provided resources to prevent the disease from entering Taiwan, but the stigmatized messages employed in education and prevention programs ironically intensified Taiwanese's misunderstanding about HIV/AIDS. The first gay and lesbian march in Taiwan was put on to protest against a research report regarding the HIV/AIDS issue that seriously stigmatized gay men.³² Meanwhile, adequate resources for gay men in need were not delivered. The government's neglect of the HIV/AIDS issues pushed gay men to devote themselves to HIV/AIDS education. It also resulted in the emergence of the modern gay movement in Taiwan. For example, in the late 1980s a gay man came out as an HIV/AIDS volunteer and performed significant HIV/AIDS education and prevention work. Gay-friendly booklets were produced, and HIV/AIDS units were established in registered LGBT organizations.

In addition, in 2007, Nutongzhi jiankang fuli lianmeng (the Coalition of Advocating Lesbians' Health Welfare) was founded to investigate the health conditions and health needs of Taiwanese lesbians.³³ The findings revealed that only 6.4 percent of 1,523 respondents disclosed their sexuality to medical service providers, and only 28.8 percent of them were content with the service they received after such disclosure. Due to their lesbian identity, 13.9 percent of respondents felt harassed or embarrassed when they received medical services; and 59 percent of them were T. In addition, only 8.7 percent of the lesbian sample received tests for cervical cancer or breast cancer. The study, therefore, concluded that Taiwanese medical services did not pay sufficient attention to lesbians, and were not lesbian-friendly; it also revealed that the lesbian population was not aware of their medical rights.³⁴

In addition to the HIV/AIDS issues and the investigation made by LGBT NGOs, the understanding about other health needs and issues of concern to LGBT people is minimal. For instance, some health care workers still consider homosexuality a sin or abnormal behavior, and regard the desires of transgendered people as funny and ridiculous. The health needs and issues of bisexuals, transsexuals, and intersexed people are totally ignored and unknown, owing to their invisibility and stigmatization in Taiwanese society.

POLITICS AND LAW

Only two acts in the Taiwanese legal code mention sexual orientation. One is the Gender Equality Education Act, and the other is the Employment Services Act. These two acts formally declare that discrimination against people based on their sexual orientation in educational institutions and employment, or treating them differently because of their sexual orientation, is not allowed. There is no specific antidiscrimination act in the current Taiwanese legal system to protect LGBT people from discrimination across the board, however there are no sodomy laws to criminalize homosexual sex, either. One legislator, in late 2006, proposed a bill to legalize same-sex marriage, but the bill was rejected.

Weifan shehui shanliang fengsu (breaching socially virtuous manners) and fanghai fenghua (behaving indecently) are two broad and ambiguous terms employed to criminalize any behavior that is against mainstream social norms. The possible behaviors that could be against social norms include gambling, pornography, nudity, cross-dressing, participating in orgies, and homosexual sex. For example, the owner of the Gingin bookstore was accused of fanghai fenghua because man-to-man erotic magazines were sold, although all erotic magazines were carefully wrapped and labeled as X-rated books. A respected feminist scholar was accused because on her university homepage there were links to other Web sites that contained information about bestiality. In other words, although there are two acts that formally declare that people with different sexual orientations should be protected from discrimination, LGBT people and sexual minorities are strictly monitored and controlled because their behaviors are against mainstream ideas of socially virtuous manners.

A few Taiwanese politicians have publicly expressed their support for the LGBT population. In 1993, there was a public hearing, guanhuai tongxinglian (cares for homosexuals), to discuss the possibility of including homosexuals in the draft of an antidiscrimination bill before the Legislation Yuan., and in 2000 the President of Taiwan granted an interview with LGBT activists and announced that “homosexuality is not a mental illness” and that he “totally supports LGBT movement.”³⁵ These examples seem to demonstrate that a few Taiwanese politicians are more LGBT-friendly than some politicians who oppose the LGBT populations in other countries, because, at least, they openly express their support for LGBT individuals and communities. Substantial measures for protecting LGBT individuals from prejudice and discrimination, however, are still lacking in Taiwan, in spite of the vocal support of some politicians.

Four gay men campaigned for positions in local and national parliaments in the recent Taiwanese elections in the hope of reducing the marginalization of LGBT issues in policy making. Although all of them were defeated, the xuanju guanchatuan (the committee of observers to elections) established for evaluating candidates’ LGBT policies in national and municipal elections provides an appropriate model for LGBT involvement in political issues. Under the influence of the xuanju guanchatuan, a pair of candidates for the presidential election in 2000 provided a LGBT-friendly policy in their campaign, and some candidates for national parliaments also campaigned specifically for the political support of the LGBT community.

In the 1980s, some LGBT individuals tried to challenge the heterosexist-oriented policies and systems in Taiwan. For example, in 1986, a gay couple submitted an application for marriage.³⁶ Although the application was rejected, the event created much discussion about the definition of marriage in general and LGBT marriage in particular.

In the 1990s, an organizational and systematic LGBT movement appeared. The first lesbian organization, Women zhijian (Between Us), was established in 1990. In 1993, the first gay student association, Taida nantongxinglian wenti yanjiushe (the Gay Chat) was founded at the National Taiwan University. In 1995, a coalition, Tongzhen, formed to respond the Taipei City Government’s unconsidered redevelopment plan of the New Park (currently known as the Peace Park). Tongzhi zixun rexizn xiehui (the Tongzhi Hotline Association) was founded in 1998 to provide LGBT-friendly counseling and support services, and became the nation’s first registered LGBT organization in 2000. Meanwhile, Tongzhi renquan xiehui (the Tongzhi Rights Association) was established in Kaohsiung.

Due to severe pressure against coming out as individuals, a strategy called jiti xianshen (collective coming out) is often employed in Taiwan. This strategy emphasizes the representation of the existence of the collective communities, not individuals. The specific method is for those LGBT people who are afraid of the potential risks of coming out associated with attending LGBT activities, festivals, or marches, to wear masks to cover their faces. On the one hand, for individuals, this reduces the potential risk of coming out in person, yet on the other hand, it powerfully demonstrates the existence of the LGBT communities.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

The main religions in Taiwan are Taoism, Buddhism, and Christianity; each of these holds a different perspective on homosexuality based on its religious principles. Buddhism and Taoism consider that, like other love relationships, homosexuality is just one of the earthly obstacles that prevents people from attaining nirvana. Christianity seems to promote the concept that homosexuality is an abnormal and an unnatural behavior.

In the past, Taiwanese Christian leaders, however, did not openly declare homosexuality to be an abnormal and unnatural behavior in the mass media, or even in religious magazines. The possible reasons for this situation were that the images of homosexuality and homosexuals in Taiwanese mass media remained negative, and that there were no openly LGBT people, therefore it may have seemed unnecessary for Taiwanese Christian leaders and groups to publicly express their beliefs on homosexuality.

The first material in Taiwan discussing homosexuality from theological perspective was the book Tongzhi shenxue (Theology of Gay and Lesbians, 1994) by an LGBT-friendly sociologist. It explained the theology based on LGBT perspectives. Then, some LGBT-friendly or LGBT communions and churches were established in Taiwan, such as Yuenadan tuanqi (Jonathan Fellowship) in 1995, Tongguang tongzhi zhanglao jiaohui (Tongkuang Light House Presbyterian Church) in 1996, and Tongxin jiaohui (Unity Church) in 2002. Furthermore, almost all scholarly journal papers and theses regarding homosexuality and religion were LGBT-friendly and supported the rights of LGBT individuals.³⁷

Following the establishment of LGBT communions and churches, and the publication of LGBT-friendly journal papers and theses, anti-LGBT comments expressed by the religious right publicly emerged in the mass media, in sermons, and in other church publications. For example one scholar of theology in Hong Kong, in 2004, wrote an essay in a Taiwanese religious magazine arguing that every Chinese church should face the challenges of homosexuals, fight the possible marginalization of Christianity and Catholicism in broader Chinese society, and avoid the long-term risks resulting from homosexuality.³⁸ He also argued that homosexuals should not have “special rights,” and that people of every faith should be protected from the pollution of LGBT people. After the Taipei City Government financially subsidized LGBT festivals or parades, the religious right aggressively argued for the inappropriateness of financial support for LGBT organizations, and strategically excluded LGBT organizations from attending public festivals and events. For example, in 2006, a bookstore festival was held in the Gongguan area of Taipei, but a few LGBT and LGBT-friendly bookstores were quietly excluded because the festival was located on church premises.³⁹

The political actions of the religious right forced LGBT organizations to respond discretely. For example, they had to open active lines of communication with religious groups, supply LGBT-friendly information to schools, argue against reparative therapy, and maintain good relationships with politicians. These are all preventative measures designed to eliminate possible political exclusion by the religious right.

VIOLENCE

In Taiwan, incidents of physical violence against LGBT persons were not considered crimes or heard of or reported until the early 2000s. Besides physical assault, there are many types of violence, such as verbal abuse, bullying, harassment, threats, gossip, or psychological abuse. A recent qualitative study reveals that Taiwanese LGBT individuals experience more verbal abuse than physical violence.⁴⁰ Being harassed or overlooked by policemen and threatened or extorted by gangsters are other examples of serious incidents of violence against LGBT persons.

Besides anti-LGBT violence committed by strangers, the reported incidents of violence related to LGBT individuals include domestic violence between same-sex partners, murders of partners, suicide attempts, and domestic violence committed by family members against LGBT children or siblings. Forms of domestic violence committed by family members against LGBT people include oral condemnation, assaults, beatings, house confinement, the cutting off of financial support, and discontinuing family relationships.

It is unclear how serious these problems of violence are and how much violence is experienced by LGBT people in Taiwan. It is also hard to tell whether the suicide rate among LGBT Taiwanese is higher than in the heterosexual Taiwanese population, since it is unknown how many LGBT youth or adults in Taiwan commit suicide due to their sexual orientation unless they leave suicide notes.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Taiwan seems quite LGBT-friendly because Taiwanese LGBT organizations are active, there are many LGBT activities and businesses, and some politicians show their support for LGBT issues, however there is much to improve. Only two legislative acts formally declare that people with different sexual orientations should be protected, and the general antidiscrimination bill has not been passed in the Legislation Yuan. This leaves LGBT people in Taiwan in an uncertain, unprotected position.

Furthermore, the heterosexual family remains the basic unit for most social policies and programs in Taiwan. This automatically excludes LGBT persons who are not in heterosexual marriages from enjoying their basic rights, so it is critical for LGBT activists to challenge this social logic and to provide an appropriate approach to displace it.

Following the emergence and visibility of individual and collective LGBT movements in Taiwan, anti-LGBT backlash and measures have gradually appeared, and a few hate crimes occurred. Therefore, it is important for LGBT activists to work carefully to design a method to protect LGBT people from avoidable harms and risks.

8. In Taiwan, junior high schools and senior high schools are two different educational institutions. If junior high school graduates want to be enrolled in more reputable senior high schools, they have to earn higher exam scores on joint senior high school entrance examinations. Similarly, senior high school graduates' admission to good universities and colleges are also based on exam results. Therefore, helping students to earn good exam results is the priority for school principals and committees.

THAILAND

Walter L. Williams

OVERVIEW

Thailand is one of the most welcoming countries in the world for gay, lesbian, bisexual, and especially transgendered people. This is due to Thailand's distinctive history and lack of condemnation of homosexual behavior as a sin in the Thai Buddhist religion. Buddhism promotes an attitude of compassion and kindness for everyone.

Southeast Asia is the setting of the country, which boasts one of the world's most ancient civilizations. Archaeological findings at Ban Chiang and other sites suggest that agriculture may have originated in Thailand earlier than in any other area of the world. Beginning about 6,000 years ago, the world's first Bronze Age civilization lived in this area. The earliest peoples in the area were the Khmer and the Mon, and the Thai migrated from China sometime before the beginning of the Common Era. As in other areas of the world, the earliest religion in Southeast Asia was animism. This religion, rather than focusing on the idea of an all-powerful god, emphasized the spirituality of all things that exist. According to this religious worldview, everything has a spirit, and the spirits are responsible for protecting humans and other beings when certain rites and ceremonies are conducted. A shaman, who could be either a man or a woman, was a person with spiritual inclinations who could assist other people in their spiritual needs. In animist religions, transgendered people were often considered spiritually blessed, with both the spirit of a man and the spirit of a woman united in one body. Such persons were called kathoy in the Thai language, which translates variously as "ladyboy, transgender, androgynous, feminine male, or hermaphrodite" in English; in the medical field, the term kathoy thae is used to describe intersexed persons. The kathoy were considered twice as spiritual as the average person, and were highly respected by their families and society in general. It is likely this ancient animist heritage is responsible for the continued respect that transgendered people have among traditionalist Southeast Asians up to this day.

Beginning about 2,000 years ago, however, the Khmer absorbed major cultural influences from trade with South Asian seafarers, and they gradually adopted Indian writing and number systems, and the Hindu religion. Major kingdoms emerged. In the year 802 C.E., a military leader, Jayavarman, successfully united all the competing warring Khmer kingdoms and established the Kambuja or Khmer Empire. King Jayavarman declared himself a god, and founded a form of Hinduism that emphasized penis worship. Khmer Hindu temples were constructed throughout the empire with linga representations of erect penises as major motifs in the temples. Eventually, the Khmer Empire encompassed all of present-day Cambodia, Thailand, Laos, the southern half of Vietnam, and parts of Myanmar (formerly known as Burma). It was one of the world's largest empires at the time, and its capital at Angkor surpassed the grandeur of anything built in Europe during that era. Khmer King Jayavarman VII converted to Buddhism and built the magnificent capital at Angkor Thom in the early 1200s. However, after his death a subsequent king tried to convert the empire back to Hinduism, and many Buddhists were angered. The Thai people, who had adopted Theravada Buddhism from Sri Lankan missionaries in the 700s, were especially fervent Buddhists. They began a strong resistance movement, based initially in the Sukothai kingdom of north Thailand, about 700 years ago. Eventually, the Thai rebels wrested their independence away from the Khmer Empire, in 1351, and established the Kingdom of Siam with its capital at Ayutthaya. Within a few years, a Thai army invaded the Khmer capital at Angkor and forced the Khmer to cede several Khmer-speaking provinces that today remain part of eastern Thailand. Over the following centuries there were several wars between Siam and the Khmer Empire. In 1431, after a seven-month siege at Angkor, Khmer King Ponhea Yat escaped and reestablished the Khmer capital in Phnom Penh, where he hoped it would be less vulnerable to Thai attack. The King of Siam captured the entire Khmer royal court and ordered all of the court artists, musicians, dancers, and intellectuals to be brought en masse to Ayutthaya. In response to this heavy Khmer cultural influence, much of Thai classical culture was adopted directly from Khmer styles. In subsequent centuries, Ayutthaya became the predominant city of Southeast Asia, and Angkor lapsed into decline. The Khmer Empire never regained its former glory, and Siam gradually took more and more territory from the Khmer. At this point, Siam exerted its cultural influence on the Khmer people, who eventually abandoned Hinduism and converted to the Thai form of Theravada Buddhism.

Once Thai-speaking areas became independent, Buddhism flourished. However, though the Thai people absorbed Buddhism, they retained many of their animist beliefs. Buddhist monks continued many of the same spiritual functions as the animist shamans, and even today they may perform healings and hold ceremonies that show a strong animist heritage. They also absorbed much of Khmer Hindu penis worship, and penises hold special religious significance in Thai Buddhism. The Thai religion today is thus an amalgamation of animist, Hindu, and Buddhist ideas. Though kathoey, transgender people lost the special spiritual role that they had in the animist religion, nevertheless the continuation of animist traditions has included continued respect for transgender people.

From the 14th to the 18th centuries, Siam developed a prosperous and extensive trade network with China, Japan, India, and Arabia. When early Portuguese and Dutch traders first arrived in Ayutthaya, they reported amazement at the well-planned, beautiful city. In many aspects, the Thai culture was more advanced than the European cultures of the time. Though Ayutthaya was protected by a huge moat that surrounded the entire city, in 1767 the army of Burma invaded and destroyed the city. Its extensive ruins are still impressive and give an indication of the kingdom's grandeur.

After the fall of Ayutthaya, new Thai leaders emerged in the south, which was less damaged by Burmese invasion. They reestablished the Kingdom of Siam with a new capital at Krung Thep (Bangkok), and in 1782 King Rama I began the progressive Chakri Dynasty, which has ruled ever since. King Chulalongkorn, who reigned from 1869 to 1910 as Rama V, was responsible for brilliant diplomacy that skillfully played the European powers against each other, and he managed to save Siam from being subjected to foreign colonial domination. Ironically, he established his credibility as a king by adopting European clothing and the trappings of royalty, and by instituting measures to show the Europeans that Siam was a kingdom like their own. The Thai people are proud of their long history of freedom, and Thailand is known as "the land of the free." Even today Thai people venerate King Rama V above all other Thai kings, and Thai households often have a picture of him displayed in their living room. Chulalongkorn University, among Thailand's most prominent academic institutions, is named for him.

Siam's borders changed as King Chulalongkorn had to give up slices of territory to keep the French and the English at bay, but Siam managed to retain about half of the area of Lao-speaking people (referred to as Isan in Thai), even as Laos became part of French Indochina. Many Lao people escaped to independent Siam to get away from the French, and during the recent decades of turmoil as a communist government was established in independent Laos, even more Laotian people came to Thailand. Today, the northeastern section of Thailand is the Lao-speaking Isan culture area. There are also Khmer areas along the border with Cambodia, and Mon areas along the border of Myanmar, which have increased in size due to actions by the governments in those nations. Thailand today continues its history of welcoming people of other ethnicities who have suffered persecution in their home countries. Some have suggested that the long-suffering, impoverished peoples of Laos, Cambodia, and Myanmar would have been better off in recent decades if Thailand had incorporated those territories into its multiethnic nation.¹

King Chulalongkorn had a very accepting attitude toward transgendered people, and sponsored kathoey dancers in his court.² His son, King Rama VI, who reigned from 1910 to 1925, was reputed to have had male lovers. He brought in the pro-gay French attorney and writer René Guyon (1876–1963), who is best known for his publications on sexual ethics. While living in Siam as a personal friend of the king, and as an affiliate of his court, Guyon drafted a modern legal code for Siam. The king eventually appointed him as the chief justice of Siam's Supreme Court, on which he served for three decades. Significantly, Guyon advocated the decriminalization of all sexual acts engaged in by willing participants without fraud. Because of this Frenchman's influence with the king, homosexual behavior was not criminalized.³ Ever since then, Thai law has not considered homosexuality or transgenderism to be a matter for persecution.

Socially accepted transgender traditions existed in many other areas of Asia, and transgendered people often enjoyed high status, but when the European colonialists came into power, they suppressed transgendered people and criminalized homosexual behaviors. Even countries with nominal independence, like Ming Dynasty China, were influenced by European prejudices and took a condemnatory attitude toward their bisexual past. Asia became homophobic. One of the great ironies of modern history is that many Asian people today do not realize that their cultures originally accepted same-sex attraction and transgenderism, and they now incorrectly see gay liberation as a foreign import from the West. In reality, the most prominent foreign import from the West has been sexual repression and homophobia.

In sharp contrast to colonized Asia, the Kingdom of Siam, which became a constitutional monarchy in 1932 and changed its name to Thailand, has proudly held onto its independence and indigenous cultural traditions. Even today, Thais refuse to adopt the Roman alphabet and continue to use their own Indian-based alphabet and use the Buddhist calendar rather than the European calendar. Thus, Thai calendars for the year 2008 C.E. are labeled with the year 2551, dated from the enlightenment of the Buddha. Thai traditions of accepting LGBT people are part of this larger cultural pattern. Thailand, with its legal and social acceptance of transgenderism and same-sex attraction, is what most of Asia probably would have looked like if European imperialism had not been able to establish itself and export homophobia to this area of the world.

Thailand's current King, Bhumibol Adulyadej (Rama IX) is, like his predecessors, strongly committed to the welfare of his people. He is venerated by the Thai people for his programs to help the poor and is admired globally for his progressive environmentalist stance. In his youth he was a Buddhist monk, and he exhibits a Buddhist ethic of compassion for everyone, including LGBT people. Now in his eighties, King Rama IX is the longest reigning king in the nation's history, and his picture is displayed prominently in almost every Thai household. Although the king has recently become more controversial because of his opposition to certain politicians, many in Thailand believe that the current king is the best leader the country has had since Chulalongkorn.⁴

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

The acceptance of sexual and gender variance is a product of Thailand's long Buddhist heritage combined with a probable prominent religious role for transgendered people in the animist religions that predated the arrival of Buddhism. Thai culture has strong values of respect for individual freedom and also for a whimsical enjoyment of life. The combination of religious, social, and family influences from ancient times, notions that were not interfered with by European colonialism, means that Thailand is likely representative of what Southeast Asian cultures would have looked like if the European colonialists had not expanded into other areas of Asia.

EDUCATION

Though Thailand holds onto its traditions, it also selectively adopts elements of Western influence as a means of improving the nation. This is especially true in education. Since the time of Chulalongkorn, Thai kings have been sent to Europe and America to receive higher education, thus they are thoroughly familiar with Western customs. Thailand has emphasized establishing first-rate universities, and there are a number of prominent institutions of higher learning with international faculties. Young people entering the medical field are especially encouraged to pursue their degrees at Western universities. As a direct result, Thailand today has an excellent medical system, with sophisticated hospitals that can perform complex surgeries.

Thailand requires all children to attend primary school, but many students (especially in the rural areas) drop out before graduating from high school. High schools charge fees for textbooks, school uniforms (with different outfits for different days of the week), and lunch, making it onerous for poor parents to send their children to high school. In addition, teenagers are often needed by the family to help out on the farm or to generate income. Besides this limitation, Thailand's public education system is not as good as its universities. English instruction, for example, is not as effective as foreign language learning programs in other Southeast Asian countries. This may be partly a result of Thai peoples' lack of familiarity with European languages to which other areas of Asia were exposed during the age of imperialism. Thai is a tonal language, extremely different in its spoken and written forms from English, and English has many sounds that Thai does not contain. Consequently, it is not easy for Thai people to pronounce English words. Because Thais have fiercely retained their unique alphabet, their lack of familiarity with the internationally standard Roman alphabet makes it all the more difficult for them to learn to write English. Thais' low level of English proficiency is also due to outmoded methods of language instruction in government schools. English classes, which typically last no more than two or three hours per week, focus on training students to pass a grammar exam, rather than teaching students correct pronunciation and comprehension of what they might read or hear in a real-world setting. In many private international schools, by contrast, English language programs are much more effective. These effective private school programs are not available to students from poor families. Because of a lack of overt discrimination against LGBT students in Thai schools, there seem to be few LGBT issues applicable to education in Thailand.⁵

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Though Thailand has had its share of political instability during the constitutional era, due to several coups by ambitious military leaders, it has had much more economic stability than its neighbors. The other countries of Southeast Asia have gone through extreme turmoil as they wrestled independence from their European colonial masters and revolutionary leaders who had little experience with self-government attempted to establish new independent governments. Compared to them, Thailand has been able to provide a more stable economic setting. Though many rural Thai farmers continue to live in poverty, Thailand has made good economic progress in recent decades. Many urban Thais live a comfortable, middle-class existence, and a wealthy upper class is also prominent. Thailand has a mixed economy, with multiple sources of trade and wealth. Bangkok is one of the major cities of the world, bustling with trade and other economic activities. With a relatively unencumbered business climate, Thailand is a center of capitalist activism. By the 1990s, Thailand had become known as one of the emerging "Asian Economic Tigers."⁶

While this freewheeling capitalist system has brought prosperity to Thailand, it has also brought chaos. Particularly in 1997, when a boom period suddenly crashed, the collapse of the Thai economy caused economic chaos throughout Southeast Asia. Rural farmers in Thailand, who had little opportunity to profit from the booming urban economy, were caught in an economic bind. To a visitor from a developed country, Thailand seems incredibly inexpensive. However, for a Thai farmer with a small income, the prices of everyday necessities can be burdensome.

Many Thai villages are able to survive economically only because so many of their young adults leave home to take jobs in Bangkok or other cities around the world. Emigration is a huge factor in Thailand, as people send money back to support their families in the village. Nowhere is this trend more widespread than in the impoverished northeast Isan area. Isan people are among the most traditional of Thailand's people, with an image among urban Thais as uncouth "country bumpkins." However, they are also more familiar with the outside world because so many of them have immigrated to other countries out of economic necessity. Many of the workers in the sweatshops of clothing production companies in Los Angeles and New York are Isan people. Though they may have little education or knowledge of English when they first arrive, many Thai immigrants have become successful in their adopted homes. The success of Thai restaurants throughout Europe and the Americas is only one example of Thai emigration abroad.

In addition to money coming from Thai workers in developed countries, the Thai economy is also buoyed by tourism. Money spent by tourists represents the largest transfer of wealth from developed countries to developing countries. Tourism is a major source of income for Thailand, which is one of the world's leading tour destinations.⁷

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Thailand has a strong extended family system. Family members feel a strong sense of duty to take care of their relatives because there are few socialized governmental programs in the country. There is no social security program for the elderly, and those who are too old to work depend entirely on their children and other relatives for support in their old age.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Thai Buddhism stresses personal happiness as a major purpose of life, and Thai culture has a very strong ethic of sanook (enjoyment). Children are much loved, and they are encouraged to have fun and enjoy their young childhood before they have to take up the serious work of helping to support the family, by adolescence and adulthood. Though girls are expected to be more restrained than boys, this emphasis on sanook includes sexual enjoyment, which, at least for males, is seen as something good and positive in life. Children see the evidence of sex all around them. Buddhist amulets shaped like penises are commonly displayed, and carved wooden penises are sometimes placed at the front of a house to provide spiritual protection for the family. The villages of the northeastern Thailand Isan culture are especially noted for their bawdy public flaunting of sex. Sexual innuendo and pictures of nude bodies or sexual acts, or representations of genitalia, are not uncommon in Isan parades and folk music performances. Though many children observe these public displays, neither they nor their elders get the least bit upset over what a prudish American would consider a scandal for a child to observe. There is a sense of comfort about sex that Thai children grow up with, to the point that most Thai adults (except for the more sexually conservative ethnic Chinese, Muslims, and those who have been influenced by Western values) are far more accepting of sexuality than is typical in many countries.

The one area of glaring exception to this attitude deals with Buddhist monks, who are supposed to renounce the ways of general society by denying themselves in many areas of life. Monks have many rules to follow, including sexual restrictions, but this is not framed in terms of opposition to homosexuality, because monks are not supposed to experience any kind of sexual activity. Monks are supposed to voluntarily renounce all kinds of desire, in an attempt to live as simple and uncomplicated lives as possible. The fact that monks are seen as so exceptional to the general rules of life means that a monk's ordination may be accompanied by dancing by kathoeyes, and no one sees any contradiction between the two roles. The rules for monks do not translate into rules for lay people. As a result, after a man leaves the monkhood, if he becomes sexually active (with either sex), there is no problem with either his religious ideas or his self-esteem. Thais have an open attitude toward the body that many people from Christian, Muslim, and Jewish cultures lack. Thai Buddhism does not emphasize scriptures telling people that the body is sinful, or that the matters of the spirit are in opposition to the matters of the flesh (as St. Paul stressed to early Christians).

In contrast, Thai Buddhism even has a tradition of body massage training centers at Buddhist temples. These massages are not explicitly erotic, but they do impart a comfort with the body that is lacking in the Abrahamic religions. Traditional Thai massage is not sexual per se, but it is not a great leap for Thai people to extend the massage of other parts of the body to massage of the genitals. The purpose of Thai massage is to relax and enjoy the experience of being touched all over by another person.

The boundary between traditional Thai massage and explicitly erotic massage is fuzzy, as is the boundary between Thai general enjoyment of life and sexual enjoyment. Thai males are so at ease with bodily contact and with touching other people, mainly of the same sex, that such arbitrary Western boundaries are rather meaningless. Male Isan folk singers will sometimes reach out and touch the genitals of another male while giving a musical performance, with not the slightest awareness that the listener might find such behavior offensive. At public events it is not unusual to see young men caressing each other casually, with their arms draped around each others' shoulders and their hands on the others' thigh. Touching is part of showing friendship. The lack of homophobia in Thai culture means that it is normal even for completely heterosexually inclined men to touch their friends.

Because their history has conditioned them to emphasize their freedom, at least for males, sexual freedom is considered a part of Thais' valued heritage. Freedom to do what one wants with one's own life, as well as freedom from Western imperialism, is part of the people's conception of Thailand as "the land of the free." Kathoeyes are seen as having the freedom to dress and act like the other sex, just as other eccentricities go overlooked or unchallenged. Individual differences are part of the Thai conception of what freedom is all about. Thus, people are not expected to fit into one of two opposite categories labeled "heterosexual" and "homosexual." In Thailand, there are gradations in between these two orientations. One person may enjoy touching another's chest, rear, or genitals, but nothing more. Another person might enjoy playing with a dildo with a same-sex friend, but wants no direct genital-to-genital sexual contact. Still others might enjoy having fellatio performed on them, but will not reciprocate. Still others find that they are comfortable in engaging in same-sex experiences, but only after they have had enough alcohol to give them the excuse of not remembering what they did while drunk. This is not so much a denial of one's sexuality as it is a ruse to avoid forming serious permanent relationships with their attendant financial obligations. Few of these people would define themselves as "bisexual," even though they have had extensive same-sex experiences as well as perhaps some other-sex experiences. These people simply see themselves as unique individuals who have the right to enjoy themselves and act in freedom, just like all other Thai people. Happiness, enjoyment of life, and personal freedom are the great constants of Thai philosophies of life.

This flexibility does not mean that no one in the country identifies himself as homosexual or heterosexual. Some academic theorists, speaking with great authority but little actual ethnographic data, surmise that if homophobia were overcome there would be no more gay people or straight people. Thailand is a very nonhomophobic place, but there are plenty of people there who identify as gay. Contrary to the fears of many heterosexists, though, homophobia is not necessary to ensure that most people grow up to be straight. Thailand proves that, even in a nonhomophobic society, the majority of people are completely heterosexual. That is, both total heterosexuals and total homosexuals are conscious of their sexual proclivities being entirely for a single sex, and they have absolutely no erotic interest in the other sex.

In addition, Thai gay men (who often distinguish themselves as "gey king" as a top inserter, "gey queen" as a bottom insertee, and "quing" as versatile), male-to-female transgendered kathoey (who might be either bottoms or tops in their private sexual behavior), and both masculine females and female-to-male transgendered "toms" (after the English word "tomboy") and their feminine female partners (who often call themselves "dee" after the English word "lady"), have an identity of being different from the norm in their gender nonconformity and in their exclusive same-sex inclinations. Just as with people in the middle who have a mixture of erotic inclinations and experiences, those inclinations are considered simply another part of the complex eccentricities that make up human personalities. If anything, what might sometimes be considered weird by some relatives of masculine acting gay men is that they do not dress and act femininely.

It can be argued that Thai attitudes go beyond tolerance of sexual minorities. Beyond simply tolerating homosexuals and transgendered people, many Thai people seem to welcome and cherish such people. Though some families (especially ethnic Chinese, those who have more Western education, and those who are followers of Islam or Christianity) might reject their LGBT relatives, the vast majority of Thai families treat their queer relatives as full-fledged members of the family. This level of family acceptance is so high in Isan villages that gender and sexual nonconformity is completely unremarkable. Every Isan village seems to have at least a few transgendered people, and it is impossible to attend any public event without seeing at least one or two. Whether one is going to a market, a Buddhist temple, or to other daily events, a sharp eye will notice the sexual and gender minorities.

FAMILY

Though most Thai people do not identify as gay, a considerable number may agree to engage in some level of same-sex activity if the offer of money is sufficient.

The idea that sex and good looks are commodities that can be sold, just like anything else, seems rather ingrained in Thai culture. The older and more financially established partner is, one way or another, expected to provide some kind of financial payment or support for the younger partner. The older partner is perceived as having the advantage of a more stable financial position in society, while the younger partner has the advantage of good looks. This is a simple balancing of assets, conceived as part of the natural order of the way people interact. People exchange what they have for what they do not have. The instability of two young people, who are both often in a precarious financial situations, leads to same-age relationships being quite unstable. A more common pattern in Thai sexual partnerships, as with nonsexual partnerships, often involves an older mentor/younger disciple relationship, which fits into the larger family situation.

This relationship between financial considerations and sex is not something that applies only to same-sex activities. In heterosexual relations, marriage, and family, money and sex are intimately tied together. When a man gains a steady girlfriend and becomes sexually active with her, he typically is expected to turn part of his income over to her. Providing money regularly and dependably is part of the way he proves that he will be a good husband. When a couple gets married, the husband will be expected to provide a substantial payment of money to his new wife's parents. The more beautiful and desirable the young woman, the larger the payment will be. This bride payment is not perceived as the husband buying the wife, as occurs in some patriarchal cultures, but rather as an expected payment for her granting her sexual assets to him. In fact, Thai wives have considerable power in their marriages, especially because the new husband is expected to live with the wife's family and contribute to her family's continued financial well-being.

This connection between marriage and finances is one reason why Thai women, *kathoey*s, and gay Thai men, so often wish to seek out a wealthy farang (foreigner) as a partner. Good looks and age are considered less important characteristics in the partner than their agreeable personality and financial well-being. In contrast to the average Thai salary, even a common laborer from a developed country can seem wealthy in comparison, thus it is not uncommon to see a beautiful young woman or man paired with an older foreigner. If he is a good husband, one who is typically expected to build a nice house for the family and be something of a walking ATM for the parents, he will fit right in and be treated royally by his spouse and in-laws.

Traditionally, if a man establishes an extramarital relationship with another woman, or (with his first wife's permission) if he takes a second wife, he is also expected to make payments to her. If he does not have enough money to do this, he may just visit a prostitute periodically to keep things simple. Thai men who want to have sex with multiple women, then, have a great incentive to make a lot of money so that they can afford these multiple sex partnerships. This sexual pattern may explain at least part of the history of Thai economic entrepreneurship, which is so evident both in Thailand and in Thai communities abroad.

It is in this context that prostitution in Thailand must be understood. Receiving money for a single sexual act is just one extreme of the larger continuum tying together the financial and affectional relationships that exist among Thai people. Of course, this is not to deny that sexual exploitation occurs in Thailand. Cases have been publicized involving men who approach gullible young women and their parents, promising to get them a good job in a big city for a small fee. Instead, when the young woman is taken to the city, the good job turns out to be work in a house of prostitution, and the small fee turns into a large payment to the man as his commission. The young woman is forced to continue the work until her fee is paid.

Though such exploitive situations exist, the Thai police have made efforts to prevent such horrors. Thailand has antiprostitution laws, but they seem to be on the books mainly to prevent the coerced holding of a person against her will. Thai police do not bother most Thai people who are freely engaging in the exchange of sex for money. Most sex work is done not because people are forced against their will, but because people feel that they have no other alternative to meet their financial needs. Thai young people, both males and females, feel a strong desire to help their parents financially. Unless they are a student, a person in his late teens or twenties who is not sending money regularly to his parents will typically feel an intense sense of personal shame. This is especially true if the parent is in poor health and needs medical treatment; then, the child may practically be in panic. Worries about parents is a source of great stress for Thai young adults. Because most jobs for unskilled young people pay little more than basic survival needs, the way that many young people—both male and female—see as the only way to generate significant profits is to engage in sex for pay. Thai parents, especially among the poor, often look the other way and do not ask many questions about the source of their offspring's income. Some parents do not hesitate to place guilt upon their offspring on this matter, further increasing the feelings of pressure.

COMMUNITY

Today Bangkok has one of the largest annual gay pride parades in Asia and is home to innumerable gay establishments ranging from upscale restaurants to raunchy nude all-male sex shows. It is internationally prominent as a gay-friendly tourist destination and retirement center. Pattaya is home to the annual Miss International Transgender Beauty Queen contest. Bangkok, Chiang Mai, Pattaya, Phuket, and other Thai cities have huge Broadway-type musicals featuring beautiful transgendered performers and openly gay dancers that are commonly viewed by Thai families in attendance with their children and elders. Gay Thai publications, beginning with magazines like Mithuna, Jr., and Neon in the 1980s, have tended to be more social than political in emphasis. While the nature of their work is to try to improve the situation for LGBT people in Thailand, and thus they focus on the areas where they want the government to change, LGBT social networks and activist groups exist openly in ways that would be impossible in many developing countries. In 2008, the third Asian regional conference of the International Lesbian and Gay Association was held in Chiang Mai, which also had a gay pride parade that was favorably received by residents of the city. However, in 2009 the parade met with controversy due to protests by homophobes. Chiang Mai police, although present, did not intervene to protect participants when “red shirt” homophobes engaged in minor violence. This has been unprecedented in Thai history, and speaks to the rising influence of homophobia from the West among some urban Thais.

HEALTH

Throughout the nation, the Thai government operates a fine system of clinics and hospitals that provide basic health care at low cost, but budgets are not big enough for these public health programs to offer more expensive treatments involving complex diseases, and the average Thai family is not able to pay the costs. As a consequence, people die earlier than they might if they had access to more advanced levels of care.

This is true of people with AIDS and other diseases. Perhaps because sex is so prominent in Thailand, it was the first Asian country to be hit hard by the AIDS epidemic. The medical system was overwhelmed. Buddhist monasteries took in people who were dying of AIDS, and some Buddhist monks have made heroic special outreaches to people suffering with the disease. While dealing with the reality of limited budgets, the government's public health department has responded more effectively than in many other countries. Rather than trying to deny the realities of sexual behaviors that lead to HIV infection, as many governments have done, or ignoring the realities of female and male prostitution, Thai public health officials quickly accepted the advice of pioneering gay AIDS educators and have widely advocated for condom use. Large billboards along major highways, announcements in the mass media, and health education programs in the schools (including Buddhist schools for novice monks) explicitly advise people on how to avoid HIV infection. Condoms are available free of charge from public health projects and at low cost at many stores. By focusing on prevention rather than spending most of their funds on the treatment of those who are already sick, the Thai government has helped to bring the AIDS crisis under control in Thailand. HIV infection remains a problem, and some Thai people with AIDS are rejected by their families, but the situation is much better there than in many other developing nations.

Gay men and transgendered ladyboys, being well aware of the realities of HIV transmission from gay networks in Europe and North America, have become prominent in HIV prevention educational efforts and have emerged as committed heroes in the effort to improve public health. Today, though medical schools may practice some discrimination among M.D. candidates, gay men, lesbians, and transgendered people often go into nursing and work as public health workers and administrators in the health care field, as a visit to many Thai hospitals will attest.

Practically every village in Thailand has access to a nearby government health clinic staffed by professionally trained doctors and nurses, and every major city has at least one full-fledged hospital. Because of its excellent health care system and very accepting attitude toward transgendered people, Thailand has become world famous as a global center for transsexual surgeries. The low cost of medical care in Thailand makes it even more popular as a destination for transgendered people from around the world seeking to undergo sex change operations. Sexual reassignment surgery is mostly a commercially driven enterprise that is done to bring in money, and while the quality of the surgery itself is good, the medical supervision in terms of follow-up, counseling, and hormone use is not emphasized adequately in many hospitals.

POLITICS AND LAW

For the historical reasons highlighted here, Thailand has no antigay laws. However, there have been periodic political controversies. In the 1990s, a Western-educated Minister of Education attempted to pass a regulation saying that LGBT people would not be permitted to be trained as public school teachers in Thailand's government-supported universities. The outcry against this homophobic and transphobic proposal was so widespread that the idea was dropped completely. Today, transgendered persons can be seen on every major university campus, and there is little resistance to their full participation there. The one exception to this trend seems to be in the field of psychiatry, where some older Western-trained psychiatrists still hold to the outdated view that homosexuality and transgenderism are mental illnesses. In the northeastern Isan area, which in some respects seems more accepting even than the rest of Thailand, transgendered teenagers in many public high schools cross-dress with no apparent negative reactions from teachers, parents, or administrators.

Pioneering gay rights advocates like Seri Wongmontha, who was openly gay in the 1970s and 1980s while being a prominent scholar and a flamboyant celebrity, helped to set the stage for more public gay acceptance in Thailand. In 1987, he produced a play with a gay theme, in which he was the star performer. His play ran with sold-out performances for some time, packing crowds into a major theatre venue in Bangkok. Another big influence on public attitudes was due to General Prem, who was generally perceived to be homosexual. Nothing about his preferences appeared in print in the Thai media, but it was commonly believed by many Thai people that the general was gay. He surrounded himself with handsome adjutants who went everywhere with him. After he retired from the army, Prem became Thailand's Prime Minister. He was lauded as being the most effective leader that the nation had had for some time. Although Prem never spoke out publicly about gay rights, he lived his life openly and never felt the need to showcase a female companion. He continued to have handsome personal assistants who went everywhere with him, and it was commonly assumed that these men were his boyfriends. There was no controversy about his sexuality, as would have been the case in the United States and many other countries. Prem was the most highly respected government official of his era, and even now, in his eighties, he remains a close advisor to the King.⁸

Thailand is also subject to outside influences that are condemnatory of sexual freedom. The most recent political controversy in terms of same-sex attraction has had to do with the suppression of youth sexuality. Pressured by the United States government, recent Thai administrations have passed "age of consent" laws to prevent Thai young people from engaging in sex. Partly this is a justified attempt to inhibit child prostitution, but such measures also run the risk of countering traditionally casual attitudes toward sexual experimentation among children and adolescents. With more Thai social workers and law enforcement officials being trained in the United States, with its current hypersensitive attitude toward any kind of sexual expression among youths, some gay Thai activists are afraid that Thailand might become afflicted with the same kind of sex scandals that often erupt in American politics.

"Miss Kathoei Beauty Pageants" are sponsored by local governments, in even small towns, with the top prizes being handed out by high-ranking government officials. Politicians in Thailand seem pleased to have their photograph taken with the transgendered contestants. Lesbian and gay troops serve openly in the Thai military without discrimination.

Though it does not criminalize or persecute LGBT people, Thai law also does not offer many protections against discrimination. The Thai government is very rigid in issuing national identification cards and Thai passports only reflective of the gender of a person's birth. Consequently, even transgendered people who have been living as the other gender for many years still have to undergo the indignity of having their birth gender listed on all their official documents. Transgender activists feel that the Thai government needs to make a policy change and allow transpeople to change the gender by which they are listed, or better yet to remove all references to a person's gender from these official documents.

With a mobilized LGBT community, some people have become activists and formed political groups like the Rainbow Sky Association, Bangkok Rainbow, M-Plus, Swing, Sisters, Anjaree, and Sapaan. These organizations have formed a Sexual Diversity Network that is the driving force in lobbying for legislative changes.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Though under Thailand's democratic constitution every Thai person has the freedom to practice whatever religion he or she wishes, over 90 percent of Thai people are Buddhist. Because formerly Buddhist countries like Indonesia and Malaysia have in the last few centuries converted to Islam, Thai people are determined that Thailand should remain a Buddhist country. Government offices and public schools often have statues of the Buddha on prominent display, and Buddhist monks give lectures in public schools. Buddhist monks were, traditionally, the teachers of youth before the rise of the public school system. Even today, Buddhist schools are quite prominent in providing an education for students whose parents are too poor for them to afford even the minor costs of attending government high schools.

Though the Buddha taught that life is inevitably filled with suffering, he also taught that there is a way out of this suffering by letting go of greed and living a simple life. By suppressing greed, anger, and delusion, and instead emphasizing happiness, learning, creativity, and devotion to helping others, a person can aim toward an enlightened state of existence. By recognizing that one can make oneself miserable simply by desiring something that one does not have, the Buddha counseled his followers not to let their desires overtake them. Rather than practicing extreme denial or extreme indulgence, he said that a "Middle Way" approach is best. Rather than repressing one's desires, or conversely overindulging in them, Buddhists advocate moderation. Happiness is gained, though, not by indulging in selfish desires to others' detriment, but by spreading happiness to others.⁹

Rather than seeing sex, and especially homosexual sex, as sinful, Buddhist ethics focus on creating happiness. If a person rapes another person, or imposes himself sexually on another person against his will, then that causes unhappiness and is morally condemned. On the other hand, if a person gives happiness to another person, whether through sexual enjoyment or through other means, that is considered a moral good. Whether sexual happiness is provided to a person of the other sex or of the same sex is immaterial. Buddhism thus takes a neutral attitude on homosexuality or heterosexuality. Thai Buddhist leaders say that it makes no sense for a religion to oppose a condition of being, or a basic sense of who a person is attracted to, for such large numbers of people as exist in reality. Buddhist thought is, therefore, realistic rather than dogmatic. Above all, the Buddha stressed the need to show compassion and respect toward all people and toward all sentient beings of the earth and the wider universe.¹⁰

An accurate understanding of Thai attitudes toward sexuality necessitates an understanding of Buddhist ethics. Buddhism so thoroughly permeates Thai culture that it is a crucial element in Thai tolerance of gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered people.

VIOLENCE

Due to the influence of Buddhism, Thai society has much lower levels of violence than is found in many other countries. One of the reasons Thailand has become such a popular tourist destination is because tourists are much safer in Thailand than in most parts of the world. Tourists might suffer theft if their property is stolen by a Thai person, and Thai public opinion is quick to condemn such thievery, but such thefts in Thailand are rarely committed in conjunction with violence. Religiously motivated violence does not exist in Thailand, except in the southern provinces near Malaysia where most of the people are Islamic. There is no such thing, for example, as a fundamentalist Buddhist kidnapping and murdering people in the name of God. Placard-waving Buddhists have never lined the shores of Thailand as a gay cruise ship approaches, shouting condemnations and throwing stones, as has occurred when gay-themed cruises have sought to dock in predominantly Christian countries. Any person claiming to do such things in the name of the Buddha would be considered insane.

Nevertheless, given its Buddhist heritage, one would expect that there would be no violence in Thai society. This is not the case, and violent mistreatment of people does occur. Rape and sexual violence, both of women and of ladyboys, exists in Thai society. Thai people commonly explain this by saying that there are good Thais and bad Thais, the latter of which are not truly following the teachings of the Buddha. It is important to acknowledge that people are people, with all their flaws and shortcomings, and even a philosophy like Buddhism is not enough to prevent some people from mistreating others. The Thai government's Human Rights Commission has, in response to complaints and lobbying from LGBT activists, criminalized rape against kathoeyes and men, as well as nonvaginal forms of rape.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

With the major acceptance of LGBT people and the vitality of the LGBT community, the outlook for the 21st century in Thailand seems not just favorable, but ideal.¹¹

Such positive events are occurring in Thailand for LGBT people that it is easy to overlook the negatives. Though many queer people from more oppressive nations are envious, transgendered and gay Thais are not always in the best position that they could be. Though they must be accepted by their families and community, job discrimination exists. Especially among Western-educated Thais, transgendered people may be considered base and low-class.

Furthermore, despite the fact that LGBT people can live with their same-sex partner without a problem, and may be accepted in their village or neighborhood as a couple just as a heterosexual married couple would be, there is no legalized marriage available to same-sex couples in Thailand. Certain rights that exist in Thai law for married couples, including the right to travel or immigrate to another country as a couple, do not exist for LGBT couples. Marriage is not considered a religious ceremony (Buddhist monks do not officiate at, or even attend, wedding ceremonies), so this is an issue for the Thai government itself.

Beyond these specific legal issues, the main problems facing Thai LGBT people are the same one that face other people in this freewheeling capitalistic nation with few governmental safety nets. Most notably, when Thai LGBT people are asked about their hopes for the future, a common response is to say that they want a stable relationship. This, however, is not easy because of family pressures for young adults to marry heterosexually. Many ladyboys have felt dejected and abandoned when their boyfriend's parents forced him to marry a "real woman" so that the parents could have grandchildren. Because of this, many Thai ladyboys despair of finding and keeping a permanent partner, and this is often the biggest cause for their unhappiness.

LGBT people are also often concerned about who will care for them once they are old and can no longer care for themselves. Most people in Thailand depend upon their children for elder care. While Thai queer people are not hated or demonized, they may be pitied, mostly because they do not reproduce. There is no Thai tradition of adoption outside of the extended family, and Thai LGBT people seldom talk about the option of adopting homeless children.

Finally, like other Thai young people, Thai LGBT people often worry that they will not make enough money to support their parents in their old age. Because heterosexual siblings marry and settle down with children of their own, it is the childless queer adult member of the family who often feels the most pressure to leave the village and travel to the big city or to another country to earn cash for their parents' support. Thus, they may leave the gay-positive conditions of Thailand to move to another country, where they may be subjected to homophobic discrimination or violence. Ironically, it is because of their strong devotion to financially supporting their family that LGBT Thai people may neglect saving money and making investments for their own elder years. While the strong Thai family system might provide support for such individuals, further study needs to be done to understand trends for elderly LGBT people in Thailand.

Attention to these problems, however, should not detract from the extremely favorable conditions for LGBT people in Thailand, especially among the more traditional people in the rural areas. In sharp contrast to many countries, where the more educated and Westernized class is more accepting of LGBT people, in Thailand it is the more traditional people, those often stereotyped as "uneducated," who are the most accepting. A vision of what life can be like in a nonhomophobic world can be gained by living in a simple Thai village. Many queer people in other countries, those who are in danger of being executed or imprisoned by fundamentalist governments, murdered by rampaging lynch mobs, thrown out of their homes by homophobic relatives or landlords, or considered a shame to their family and religion, would give anything to experience this kind of freedom. Thailand, as "the land of the free," is truly one of the world's most favorable nations for sexual and gender minorities.

VIETNAM

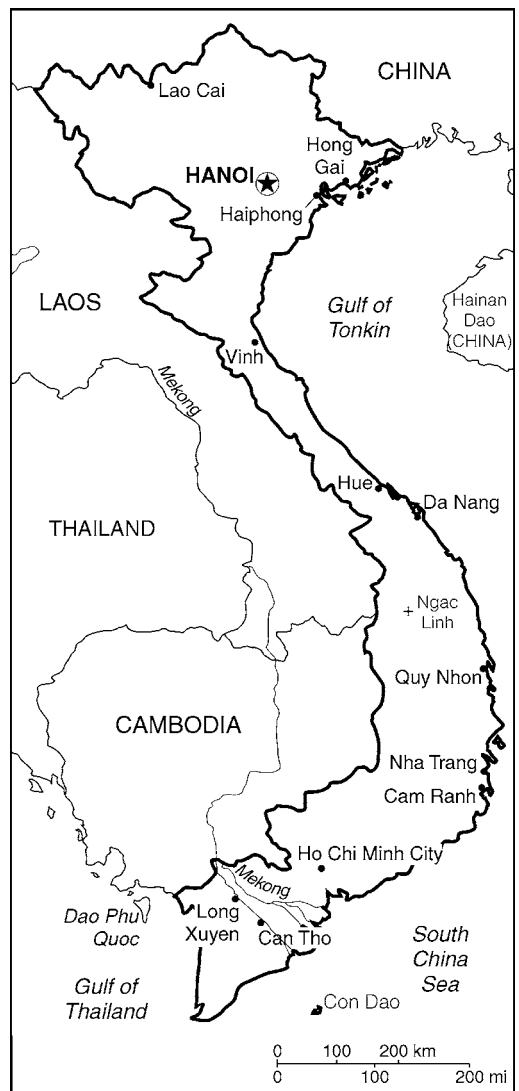

Donn Colby

OVERVIEW

Vietnam had 87 million people in 2007, making it, at that time, the 13th-largest country in the world in terms of population. It covers a land area of 127,000 square miles, making it a little smaller than the American state of California. The wide, densely populated agricultural areas of the Red River and Mekong River deltas are joined by a narrow ribbon of relatively infertile land between the South China Sea and the Truong Son Mountains, giving the country the shape of a dumbbell standing on end. Vietnam shares borders with China to the north and Cambodia and Laos to the west.

The Vietnamese people trace their origins to the Red River Delta in the north of the country. Over hundreds of years, they slowly conquered and assimilated their southern neighbors: first the Hindu kingdom of Champa and then large parts of the Khmer kingdom in the Mekong Delta. Vietnam took on its final shape in the 18th century as the Vietnamese and Thais whittled away at the declining and divided Khmer empire.

Vietnamese history can be read as one long struggle to overthrow foreign domination. The first foreign conquerors were the Chinese, who arrived in the first century C.E. and stayed for 1,000 years. The Chinese brought rice cultivation, a written language, the mandarin administrative system, Confucianism, Taoism, and Buddhism to Vietnam. In the 13th century, the Vietnamese general Tran Hung Dao repelled 500,000 Mongol warriors under Kublai Khan at the Bach Dang River in the north of the country; to this day riverside roads throughout the country are named Bach Dang in memory of that battle.

The French came to Vietnam in the 17th century. One of the first to arrive was the missionary Alexandre de Rhodes, the inventor of quoc ngu, the Roman alphabet script that later became the official writing system for the Vietnamese language. French rule continued until 1954, when the Geneva Accords divided the country between north and south at the 17th parallel.

When the French pulled out of Vietnam, the Americans came in; Vietnam came to be seen as an integral part of the worldwide struggle against communist expansion. Under the domino theory, if Vietnam fell to the communists, then the other countries of Southeast Asia would follow one-by-one, like a “row of dominos.”¹ It took more than 20 years, 58,000 American lives, and more than two million Vietnamese casualties to prove that theory wrong.²

The Vietnam War defined a generation and left a deep scar on the psyche of the American people. By contrast, what the Vietnamese call the “American War” was but one brief struggle in over 2,000 years of almost continuous fighting against foreign invaders. It was neither the longest nor the most brutal war they endured. It was not even the final war; in 1978, Vietnam invaded Cambodia to dislodge the Khmer Rouge, and in 1979 they repelled yet another Chinese invasion on the northern border.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Perhaps the most noticeable aspect of LGBT issues in Vietnam is their almost complete absence from the culture and people’s minds. The average person in Vietnam never thinks about homosexuality. The state-controlled press mostly avoids the subject. Doctors and psychologists never learn about homosexuality in their professional training. In a crowded society where face saving is important, people instinctively avoid situations that are difficult or unpleasant.

This lack of attention gives a certain amount of freedom to Vietnamese LGBT people. The absence of a gay rights movement, or even of a homosexual identity, allows a more fluid expression of sexuality without the requirement of a label or a sexual identity. Two men or two women can hold hands in public without attracting attention. The country is crowded: two people of the same sex sharing the same bed is considered completely normal. If “gay” is not an identity, then a man having sex with another man does not have to question his sexuality. Furthermore, with Buddhism as the predominant religion in the country, there is no religious prohibition against homosexuality.

In spite of these advantages, the lack of a homosexual culture or community also limits how LGBT people can express their sexuality and sexual identity. Having sex with a member of the same sex may be neither illegal nor socially proscribed, but openly declaring oneself a homosexual and rejecting marriage and what is typically considered a normal lifestyle is completely unacceptable to the average family and to society in general.

LGBT people in Vietnam learn to live with the contradictions between their sexuality, sexual identity, and the roles that they must play in the family and in society. Their homosexuality remains largely hidden, shared only with close friends and other LGBT friends. Without role models or social support, few same-sex relationships last for very long. Most LGBT Vietnamese do eventually marry out of obligation and a sense of duty to their families.

EDUCATION

Education is very important in Vietnam and is seen as the way to a better life. Educated people, such as teachers, professors, and doctors, are highly respected in society, even if their professions are poorly paid in the government system. Technically, education through secondary school is mandatory and provided free of charge, but in reality only a minority of children complete high school, and the fees associated with schooling make education an expensive option for many poor families.

The adult literacy rate is high, at 94 percent, according to the United Nations Development Program (UNDP). Primary school enrollment encompasses 88 percent of eligible children, while secondary school enrollment is 69 percent.

University education is expensive and the government now provides low-cost loans to eligible students from poor families. However, the number of university enrollments is quite limited, and the yearly entrance exams given to graduating high school seniors are fiercely competitive. The wealthy, including almost all high-level government officials, send their children overseas to Western universities.

School curricula are centrally controlled by the communist government and completely ignore LGBT issues. Likewise, homosexuality is not covered in the training of medical professionals such as doctors, nurses, and psychologists. There are very few trained counselors in Vietnam, and only a very small percentage of those have any experience with LGBT patients.

There is evidence that Vietnamese students recognize and accept the existence of LGBT classmates despite official inattention to the issue. A recent poll of high school students in Ho Chi Minh City showed that 80 percent disagreed with the statement that “homosexuality is bad” and 72 percent of those with homosexual classmates remained friends after knowing about their peer’s sexual orientation.³ One quarter of the students surveyed estimated that at least 10 percent of their classmates were homosexual, highlighting the increased visibility of gay and lesbian youth in Vietnam.

The law in Vietnam prohibits discriminating against students who are infected with HIV. Schools cannot force a student to have an HIV test, must accept HIV infected students, and cannot separate them from other students.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

There are no laws against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in the workplace in Vietnam. Therefore, most homosexuals in the country keep their sexual orientation a secret from their employers for fear of losing their jobs. Discrimination against transgendered employees is very common. Perhaps the only profession where transgenders are openly seen is in hairdressing and beauty salons. Many transgenders turn to prostitution as their only other option for earning money.

Discrimination on the basis of HIV status is prohibited in the workplace. Employers cannot require a worker to have an HIV test and cannot fire a worker because of HIV infection.

Vietnam has one of the fastest growing economies in the world, chalking up growth rates of seven to eight percent each year for the past decade.⁴ Since the government threw off its communist economic policies in the doi moi (renewal) reforms of 1986, Vietnam has gone from being one of the poorest countries in the world to one of the new Asian tigers. It left the World Bank's list of least-developed countries years ago and is poised to become a middle-income country by the end of 2008. The government has set the goal of becoming a modern developed country by 2020.

Massive inflows of foreign investment have fueled a boom in manufacturing and services, such that those two sectors now account for 80 percent of the Vietnamese gross domestic product. The South China Sea, off the southern coast of the country, has oil, which accounts for 23 percent of Vietnam's exports.⁵ Vietnam is also a net exporter of agricultural products; it is the world's first or second-largest exporter of a number of goods, from coffee and rice to pistachios and cashews. It did so well at exporting catfish that the southern catfish farmers in the United States had the Vietnamese fish declared a different species. When the rebranded Vietnamese basa fish still outsold their American cousins, the catfish farmers lobbied for and won further restrictions on its importation.

Although the economy is growing at breakneck speed, most of the investment and growth in the country is concentrated in its urban areas. Growth is slower in the rural areas, where 70 percent of the population still resides despite large numbers of migrants moving to the cities in search of jobs. Incomes for agricultural workers and unskilled factory workers are low, an average of $50 to $60 per month. Strikes at factories in Ho Chi Minh City and Hanoi have become more common as rising inflation eats into workers' buying power. Inflation reached 20 percent in the first quarter of 2008, a challenge to government economic policies as rising world prices for food and energy affected the Vietnamese economy.⁶

It is a paradox that in a communist country where homosexuality is largely hidden there are several government-sponsored programs that provide outreach services to men who have sex with men (MSM). Over the past few years, as MSM were recognized as a high-risk group for HIV/AIDS and international donors made funding available, it became acceptable for local government agencies to work with MSM under the umbrella of HIV prevention. The first program opened as part of a men's sexual health project in Nha Trang City in 2003.⁷ By 2008, there were programs providing services to MSM in six of the country's largest cities. The more progressive programs have expanded to include activities such as reduction of stigma and discrimination against homosexuals and job placement services, in their efforts to reduce the risk for HIV infection among their MSM clients.

As of 2008 there were no specific social programs for lesbians in Vietnam, however several organizations have proposed working with women who have sex with women as extensions of their MSM programs and may begin operating as soon as funding becomes available.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

The two most common terms for homosexual men in Vietnam are bong kin and bong lo.⁸ The former are masculine-appearing men who prefer to have sex with other men. The latter are effeminized men who act and dress like women and may also be categorized as transgendered. Although bong kin (kin means "hidden" in Vietnamese) are more numerous, they cannot be identified as homosexual from their outward appearance and largely avoid stigma and discrimination in society.

Bong lo (lo means “revealed” in Vietnamese) take on female gender roles, dressing and acting as women, and using feminine pronouns to refer to themselves in conversation. They may also be referred to using the English term ladyboy. Because they are easily recognized as homosexuals, they are heavily stigmatized and marginalized in Vietnamese society. Bong lo have few employment opportunities other than as hairdressers, and many turn to prostitution in order to survive.

Only a very few Vietnamese bong lo have had sex-reassignment surgery to become transsexuals. The surgery is not available in Vietnam, but is readily available in nearby Thailand for just a few thousand dollars. The profile of transsexuals in Vietnam has recently been raised by the career of Cindy Thai Tai, the country’s most famous transsexual. She works as a model, singer, and actress, in addition to running her own beauty salon in Ho Chi Minh City. Her first music album, “Noi Long Co Don (Lonely Heart)” was released in 2006 after she secured the necessary license from the Ministry of Information and Culture, proving that, at least in the arts, the government does not discriminate against homosexuals or transsexuals.

The English term “gay” is becoming more common in Vietnam, especially in the urban centers of Ho Chi Minh City and Hanoi where exposure to Westerners and Western ideas is more prevalent. Although there are numerous places where homosexual men go to meet and socialize, there are very few places where they would be in the majority, and there is nothing like a gay neighborhood or gay community as would be found in most large Western cities.

Although probably more common than bong kin and bong lo, bisexuals have a much lower profile in Vietnam. It is very common for MSM to report both male and female sexual partners, and there are strong social and family pressures to marry and have children, thus fulfilling the responsibility to one’s family and ancestors to reproduce and continue the family line. Even most self-identified gay or bong kin men eventually succumb to family pressure and marry.

FAMILY

The family is the central unit in Vietnamese life, and a good son or daughter is expected to place obligations to the family ahead of their own needs. Most Vietnamese people live with their parents until they are married, at which point the wife will often move into the home of her husband’s parents. Married women do not change their names, but the children will be given the father’s family name. Divorce rates in Vietnam remain low, but are rising as the society becomes more developed.

In modern Vietnam, people still live in extended families, with several generations typically living under one roof and regular contact kept with a multitude of close and distant cousins, aunts, uncles, nephews, nieces, and grandparents. In the past, large families were the norm and it was common for family members to be nicknamed according to their birth order. The oldest was called “number two,” (referring to someone as “number one” would be considered presumptuous and would surely attract the unwanted attention of evil spirits), the second born was “number three,” and so on. Thus, families are full of people referred to as “Big Sister Two,” “Uncle Five,” or “Great Aunt Nine.”

There has been very little research on issues of sexuality within families in Vietnam, and the research that does exist completely ignores homosexuality. The majority of gay men and lesbians hide their sexual orientation from their families. Most eventually marry due to social pressure or out of a sense of familial obligation, and forced marriages are not uncommon as a way of dealing with the problem of a homosexual family member.

After marriage, Vietnamese couples generally spend less time together compared to married couples in the United States, allowing both husbands and wives the space to continue socializing with their same-sex friends, whether heterosexual or homosexual.

With a large and growing population and a limited land area, the government actively promotes family planning. Families are encouraged to have only two children, and contraception is widely available free or at low cost. Abortion is legal and readily available at public hospitals. For many years, government officials who had more than two children were penalized with lower salaries and loss of promotions, but population control in Vietnam was never mandatory or as draconian at the one-child policy in neighboring China. By 2005, the fertility rate had dropped to 2.3 and is expected to reach the replacement level of 2.1 by 2010.

Gender and Society

One of the positive aspects of communism has been the egalitarian treatment of women. However, women have played a prominent role in Vietnamese society from the beginning. Female names are common on streets and public buildings throughout the country, most of which are named for heroines of the many liberation struggles of the Vietnamese people. The most famous women in Vietnamese history are the Two Trung Sisters (Hai Ba Trung), who led a successful revolt against the Chinese in 40 C.E. When the Chinese invaded the country again three years later, the sisters killed themselves rather than surrender. Today, every town and city in Vietnam has a street named Hai Ba Trung.

Women are commonly found in professional fields, and are often the directors of public institutions and companies. Within the family, however, the wife is expected to play the traditional role of mother and homemaker. Career women in Vietnam face the same challenges of juggling work and family responsibilities as their harried sisters in Western countries.

COMMUNITY

Vietnamese law makes no provision for nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). This stems from the communist government's desire to dominate every aspect of the society, along with paranoia about any organization beyond their control. The few local NGOs that operate owe their existence to close connections with individuals high up in the government power structure. Foreign NGOs are allowed to operate as long as they are registered with the government and partner with local organizations.

This does not mean that the communist government does not recognize the importance of social and civil organizations for the country. Quite the contrary, "mass organizations," as they are known in Vietnam, are too important to be trusted to anyone other than the Communist Party. Many organizations, such as the Women's

Union and the Youth Union, have branches from the central down to the district levels. As government agencies, their first priority is to promote the interests of the Communist Party. The interests of the groups that they purportedly represent come second. However, these organizations do advocate on issues for their groups and will be well placed to form the basis of a civil society if and when they are ever given freedom from political control.

The hidden nature of homosexuality in Vietnam, in combination with the official prohibition of NGOs, results in the lack of an LGBT community as might be found in more developed and open societies. All publications in Vietnam must be approved by government censors, and to date there are no magazines or newspapers that specifically address LGBT issues. The few Web sites that target MSM from within Vietnam are controlled by government agencies and limit their content to HIV prevention and health information (see resources at the end of this chapter). The Vietnamese-language Web sites that offer more than public health messages to the LGBT population are hosted outside the country (and beyond the reach of government censors), although their content may be created and managed from within the country.

The few LGBT community-based organizations that do exist must keep a low profile in order to avoid attention and possible sanctions from government security agencies. Publicly advocating for LGBT rights would not be tolerated, but quietly working on HIV/AIDS prevention for homosexuals appears to be acceptable. However, the lack of an official registration system for NGOs, which cannot even open bank accounts, limits their ability to grow and obtain funding for their work.

HEALTH

The provision of health care in Vietnam has been hit hard by the transition from socialism to capitalism. Under communist rule, health care was provided for free, and a highly organized care delivery system was developed from the central to the provincial, district, and commune levels. Health stations, staffed by nurses and physician's assistants, were built in every community. In reality, however, there was little medicine or diagnostic testing available, and the underpaid staff may or may not have shown up for work on a given day.

Along with economic growth, the availability and quality of health care services has boomed. Insurance is available for government employees and the truly poor, but insurance covers only a limited range of medicines and services, and only in the overcrowded public facilities. As of 2007, all medical care for children less than six years old, including basic immunizations, is provided by the government. Treatment for certain infectious diseases seen as public health threats, such as tuberculosis and HIV/AIDS, is also provided for free through government programs.

Most medical care in Vietnam is provided in a fee-for-service context. Emergency rooms are required by law to provide care, but hospital admission and medications may be denied unless the patient or his or her family can pay for the service, up front, and in cash. This applies to the public sector as well as the growing private sector, where costs are slightly higher but the quality of services is considered much better.

By Western standards, medical care in Vietnam is extremely inexpensive. A hospital bed may cost only a few dollars per day, and an appendectomy would only be about $200, but even these costs would be a significant burden on a factory worker who may take home only $60 per month. It is not uncommon for hospitalized patients to abscond in the middle of the night once they start to feel better, in order to avoid paying their hospital bills.

HIV/AIDS

The HIV epidemic came late to Vietnam, but exploded rapidly among high-risk populations. The first case of HIV infection was identified only in 1990, in a woman who was married to a foreign man. In the mid 1990s, an epidemic of injection drug use (IDU) among young men in the cities and northern border provinces allowed HIV, along with hepatitis C, to spread quickly throughout the country. By 2005, there were an estimated 240,000 drug users in Vietnam and the HIV prevalence rate in this group was 34 percent.⁹

The other factor driving the HIV epidemic in Vietnam is the widespread nature of commercial sex work. Massage parlors and karaoke bars are often fronts for prostitution and can be found throughout the country, even in the smallest towns. An estimated five to 10 percent of all men utilize the services of sex workers each year. Among female sex workers, the HIV rate in 2005 was 16 percent nationwide.¹⁰ Male sex work also exists, but is more hidden and seems to be limited to the larger cities and tourist sites. Prostitution is illegal in Vietnam, and if caught offenders could face up to two years in a re-education camp.

By the end of 2005, an estimated 310,000 people in Vietnam were infected with HIV, representing 0.5 percent of the adult population.¹¹

Antiretroviral therapy (ART) for HIV infection became increasingly available in 2005, largely through donations from the Global Fund for AIDS, TB, and Malaria and the United States government's President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR). In addition, the Vietnam government provides free ART for limited numbers of patients in each of the country's 63 provinces. By the end of 2008, over 28,000 people were on ART provided free by the government and international donors.

MSM are a recognized high-risk group for HIV and are specifically mentioned in the Vietnam Ministry of Health's program for HIV prevention and harm reduction. Since 2004, the government has included MSM in regular HIV surveillance surveys in Ho Chi Minh City, and in 2009 they plan to expand surveillance of MSM to Hanoi, Hai Phong, and Can Tho. In 2006, HIV prevalence among MSM was 5.3 percent in Ho Chi Minh City and 9.4 percent in Hanoi.¹²

HIV prevalence appears to be lower in the smaller cities and rural areas; one survey completed in 2005 in the city of Nha Trang and surrounding rural areas found that none of the 295 MSM tested were infected with HIV.¹³

POLITICS AND LAW

In economics, Vietnam has embraced capitalism and is racing full speed ahead to meet its goal of being a developed country by 2020. Politically, however, communism still reigns. Vietnam is a one-party state, and the communists have made it clear that they will do whatever is necessary to keep it that way. Any display of opposition to the Communist Party or challenges to one-party rule are swiftly squashed.

There are three people at the top of the political structure in Vietnam: the President, Prime Minister, and the Secretary General of the Communist Party. Unlike China, where one person can hold several important positions, the three top posts in Vietnam are always held by three different people. The current group of leaders rose to the top at the most recent party congress in 2006, and are seen to be reformers.

Vietnam has a National Assembly that is directly elected by the people. The government (in effect, the Communist Party) screens all candidates for office, and no more than a token few noncommunists are allowed to run or to win seats. Previously a rubber stamp for the ruling politburo, the National Assembly now actually debates bills and can send them back for revision before giving their stamp of approval.

At the local level, the government is run People's Committees. Each province, city, district, and sub-district has a People's Committee of appointed (nonelected) members. As membership in People's Committees is a key to power and patronage, the positions are coveted and bitterly fought over. Although not a legal requirement, membership in the Communist Party is, in reality, a prerequisite for any government position above the most basic level.

There are no laws in Vietnam against homosexuality, a fact that owes more to the hidden nature of homosexuals in Vietnamese society rather than to any enlightened nature on the part of the government. Another factor is the influence of Buddhism on the culture, which is more tolerant of sexual diversity than the monotheistic religions of the West. On the other hand, there are also no legal protections against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, and no provision for homosexual marriage in the law. Homosexuals are not barred from military service.

Stigma and discrimination against homosexuals is still quite common in Vietnam. Only in the urban metropolis of Ho Chi Minh City is there anything approaching a "gay scene," but even there, most gay men and lesbians keep their sexual orientation hidden from their families and friends. Homosexuality is even more hidden in the workplace. The combination of social stigmatization and lack of legal protection creates an environment where coming out in the workplace could easily result in a loss of employment without any legal recourse.

In 2006, the National Assembly passed a revised "Law on HIV/AIDS prevention and control." The new law guarantees the right to privacy and medical care for HIV-infected individuals and prohibits compulsory HIV testing. Homosexuals are listed as one of the high-risk groups that "will be given priority access to information, education and communication on HIV prevention." Discrimination against HIV-infected persons is prohibited, with specific protections listed for education and employment.

Speech and Association

"Freedom" and "independence" are enshrined in the Vietnamese constitution, and everything in the Socialist Republic of Vietnam is done "for the people," but the rights and privileges provided to the communist government and its highest officials are clearly different than those enjoyed by the common man.

Freedom of association does not exist in Vietnam. In theory, any gathering of more than a few people requires a permit from the local authorities. Although rarely enforced, the law can be applied to break up or prevent any meeting. In the past few years, the government has allowed limited demonstrations of dissent, such as farmers and rural residents protesting against developers encroaching on or taking their land. However, any questioning of the inalienable right of the Communist Party to lead the country would not be tolerated and would lead to swift reprisals. Activists continue to be jailed for the crime of simply calling for greater democracy in the running of the country.

Early on, the Communist Party of Vietnam recognized the importance of the mass media in informing and controlling the population. There are over 600 daily or weekly publications in the country, and each of the country's more than 60 provinces seems to have at least one television station. The media is 100 percent controlled by the state, and therefore represents the views of the Communist Party. There is no official censor in Vietnam, but all publications practice self-censorship under the knowledge that going too far can result in arrests and closure.

With the opening up of the economy in the past few years, the press has become more vociferous. Many publications take the safe route of sensationalism, using tales of violent crime, drugs, and prostitution to sell newspapers, but several newspapers have taken their roles as journalists seriously, actively investigating and reporting on abuses of power and corruption. This role appears to be encouraged by the central government, whose top leaders also openly and frequently bemoan the high level of corruption in the government. Every year the press seems to get more daring in their reporting, but also every year at least a few journalists learn the limits of free speech the hard way.

Publications have been reprimanded with temporary closures for reporting that angered the wrong people in high government or communist party positions. In May 2008, two journalists from two of the country's most popular daily newspapers (Tuoi Tre and Thanh Nien) were arrested for "abuse of power" after reporting on a Ministry of Transportation official who had gambled away more than $750,000 in government funds and then spent another $75,000 bribing 40 others to cover up the incident. Because nothing that they had reported was proven to be false, it was not clear how they had abused their power.

The Internet has taken off in Vietnam. Even the smallest villages have Internet shops where the public can surf to their heart's delight for as little as US$0.20 per hour. High-speed lines are available throughout most of the large cities. All Internet traffic in Vietnam passes through a filter that is designed to prevent access to anticommunist political material from outside the country. Pornography is supposedly off-limits as well, but this seems to be less vigorously enforced than the ban on political material. LGBT sites are not blocked.

Perhaps realizing how difficult it is to totally control access to the Internet, in 2006, the government enlisted Internet shop owners in their campaign to prevent politically dangerous ideas from entering the country; a new law was passed making shop owners responsible for any material downloaded or viewed on their premises. Many shops responded by posting signs barring access to prohibited sites, and at least one shop owner was arrested as a warning to others. The campaign was seemingly short-lived, however, and in 2007 there were few signs of interfering with Internet access beyond the blocking of a list of anticommunist Vietnamese-language sites.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Centuries of repeated foreign occupation and domination have left their mark on the religious beliefs of the Vietnamese people. The majority of the population, about 85 percent, follows what has been termed the triple religion, which blends Buddhism, Confucianism and Taoism. About 10 percent of the population is Catholic, a result of French missionaries who first came to Vietnam in the 17th century. There are also small numbers of Protestants and Muslims, as well as several indigenous religions such as Cao Dai and the Hoa Hao.

The Chinese influence on Vietnamese Buddhism can clearly be seen in the architecture of the Buddhist temples throughout the country. In addition to a statue of the Buddha, most temples will have numerous statues of Chinese gods for praying and making offerings. Buddhist monks are expected to lead austere lives. They wear dull brown or gray robes, in contrast to the bright orange robes worn by monks in Cambodia, Thailand, and Laos. Monks eat a vegetarian diet, do not smoke or drink alcohol, and are celibate. Unlike other Southeast Asian countries, there is no tradition of young men becoming monks for periods of time during their adolescence.

A central part of Vietnamese culture is the veneration of one's ancestors. The commonly used term ancestor worship is a misnomer because ancestors are not treated as gods, but rather as spirits who watch over and protect the family. Every house in Vietnam has a family altar with photographs of deceased ancestors in a prominent location. Lighting incense and making offerings on a regular basis keeps the spirits happily grounded and prevents them from wondering away where they might cause all kinds of trouble. Especially important is the death anniversary of ancestors, when the entire family gathers together to make offerings and enjoy a feast.

Buddhism is largely silent on the issue of homosexuality. Therefore, for the majority of people in Vietnam, there is no religious proscription against homosexual sex and homosexual persons are not perceived as sinners. The communist government's official atheism and its unofficial suppression of all religions has the result that the Catholic Church's views on homosexuality are not be publicized and are only known to the 10 percent of the population who belong to the Church.

VIOLENCE

In comparison to the United States and other Western countries, the level of violence in Vietnamese society is very low. Petty crimes such as purse snatching and pick-pocketing are common, and most middle-class Vietnamese families seem almost paranoid about security, keeping their houses locked and their windows barred. Violent crime, however, is extremely rare. The streets of the large cities are safe any time of day or night, and it is not uncommon to see young women bicycling home alone after midnight.

Violence against gays and lesbians is also extremely rare. There are no reports of violence directed at homosexuals or transgenders because of their sexual orientation or outward appearance.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Vietnam is rushing full speed ahead into the 21st century. For the first time in recorded history, the country is at peace without fear of foreign invasion. The wars of the recent past are ancient history for the majority of the population born within the last 25 years, and the country is getting richer by the minute. Vietnam may not make the list of high-income countries by 2020, but no one doubts that its hard working and energetic people will get there eventually.

With rapid economic change there is also social change. The move from a closed communist society to an open capitalist one means that Vietnamese people are traveling to other countries and are exposed to foreign cultures and ideas in unprecedented numbers. In the urban hub of Ho Chi Minh City, the term “gay” is becoming more common, and there are the beginning stirrings of an LGBT population, if not yet a community. More businesses cater to the LGBT crowd, and the younger generation appears more comfortable with nonconformity. There are no laws with which the government can repress homosexuals. The rise of the AIDS epidemic has brought recognition for MSM as a group deserving of intervention from public health authorities.

Still, social change takes time, and Vietnamese society remains rooted in its traditions and veneration for the family unit. How the society and culture at large will respond to a growing and more confident LGBT presence remains to be seen.

Video/Films

- Gai Nhay (Dancing Girls)*, DVD, directed by Le Hoang. (2002; Ho Chi Minh City: Giai Phong Film Studio, 2003). The first of a breed of new cinema to come out of the Vietnamese state-controlled studios. The film follows a group of bar girls who deal with drug addiction, organized crime, and AIDS. This was the first Vietnamese film to feature a gay character.
- Trai Nhay (Call Boys)*, DVD, directed by Le Hoang. (2006; Ho Chi Minh City: Thien Ngan Film Studio, 2007). Le Hoang’s follow-up to his hugely successful Gai Nhay. He pushes the boundaries of acceptability of the communist country’s censors further in this film, dealing openly with homosexuality and transgenders.

SET PREFACE

The Greenwood Encyclopedia of LGBT Issues Worldwide is a multivolume set presenting comprehensive, authoritative, and current data related to the cultural, social, personal, and political experiences of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered (LGBT) people. The set encompasses more than 80 countries with each volume covering major populated world regions: Africa and the Middle East, Asia and Oceania, the Americas and the Caribbean, and Europe. Volumes are organized regionally and then alphabetically by country (including Hong Kong and the European Union, the latter because of its importance to European laws) with chapters that reflect LGBT geopolitical and historical context and follow a broad outline of topics—Overview of the country, Overview of LGBT Issues, Education, Employment and Economics, Social/Government Programs, Sexuality/Sexual Practices, Family, Community, Health, Politics and Law, Religion and Spirituality, Violence, and Outlook for the 21st Century. Under these topics, contributors explore a range of contemporary issues including sodomy, antidiscrimination legislation (in employment, child adoption, housing, immigration), marriage and domestic partnerships, speech and association, transsexualism, intersexualism, AIDS, safe-sex educational efforts, and more. As such, the set provides an unparalleled global perspective on LGBT issues and helps facilitate cross-national comparisons.

The term LGBT was chosen for this encyclopedia as a shorthand, yet inclusive, notation for the class of people who experience marginalization and discrimination perpetrated by heterosexual norms. In the late 19th century, the word heterosexual was invented to denote abnormal sexual behaviors between persons of the opposite sex. Ten years later, the word homosexual was invented for the same purpose of medicalizing same-sex behaviors and psychology. Many people found it offensive to categorize their lifestyle as pathology. They also thought that the emphasis on sex restrictive in describing their experiences and, instead, created and used the term homophile or Uranian. By the mid-20th century, the word gay came into common usage. As the gay political movement took roots in the 1950s and 1960s, it became apparent that, in the eyes of the public, gay women were invisible. In response to that phenomenon, many gay organizations changed their names to include women, as in—“lesbian and gay” or “gay and lesbian.” Still, bisexuals, the transgendered (which includes transsexuals, transvestites, and intersexed people), and those questioning their sexual orientation believed that “lesbian and gay” was not inclusive enough to describe their experiences and challenged the status quo.

By the 1980s and 1990s, more gay organizations modified their names to include their moniker. However, a backlash occurred with many groups because the names became un-wielding. At the same time, radical street organizations, such as Queer Nation and ACT UP, appropriated the epithet queer and embraced its shocking value. This is a common practice by people who are marginalized and discriminated against to defuse the power of hateful words. Further, academia appropriated the word queer since it was a concise term denoting all persons outside heteronormative power structures. Still, many community organizations resisted the attempts to include queer in their names but rather stuck to some version of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered (LGBT). In the chapters, readers will encounter many variations of LGBT. Sometimes this will be written as “gay community,” “lesbian and gay,” LGBT, queer, or other terminology. The word usage reveals much about the community’s level of understanding concerning LGBT issues.

Contributors were chosen based on their expertise in LGBT issues and knowledge of their country. Every effort was made to find contributors who live, or have lived, in the country in question. This was important, as gay people are often a hidden minority not easily quantified. Some contributors are from countries where gay people are routinely rounded up and killed. Contributors from these countries have taken great personal risk to participate in this encyclopedia and we commend their courage. Each contributor provides an authoritative resource guide that strives to include helpful suggested readings, Web sites, organizations, and film/video sources. The chapters and resources are designed for students, academics, and engaged citizens to study contemporary LGBT issues in depth for specific countries and from a global perspective.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This ambitious project has been made possible through the work of many scholars. I wish to thank the advisory board—Robert Aldrich of the University of Sydney, David Foster of Arizona State University, John Goss of the Utopia Asian Gay and Lesbian Resources, Jan Lofstrom of the University of Helsinki, Ruth Morgan of the Gay and Lesbian Archives of South Africa, David Paternotte of the University of Brussels, Gerard Sullivan of the University of Sydney, and Walter Williams of the University of Southern California—for their dedicated work and leads to so many wonderful contributors. I want to thank the Institute for the Study of Human Resources (ISHR), D/B/A One for their generous financial support toward completion of this encyclopedia. With so many essays to review, this project could not have been possible without the help of first-level editing by Jessica Chesnutt, Jennafer Collins, Benjamin de Lee, William “B. J.” Fleming, Winston Gieseke, Aimee Greenfield, Nicholas Grider, Alice Julier, and Bonnie Stewart. A heartfelt thanks goes to Astrid Cook, Gabriel Molina, Matt Moreno, and Rachel Wexelbaum for their editorial review of many of the essays. A special thanks goes to Wendi Schnauffer of Greenwood Press for her editorial assistance over the entire project.

This project took more than two years to complete. Locating experts on LGBT issues, especially for the smaller countries or in countries where it is dangerous to be gay, was a monumental task. In working with the contributors, I was struck by their dedication to making the world safe for all people. They are much more than just writers; they are people interested in changing the world to make it a better place. They understood that the first step toward reducing heterosexism and homophobia is to educate the public on LGBT culture and issues. To that end, they were eager to participate—even if they faced language difficulties or possible persecution from their governments. I commend each writer for the courage to be part of the solution toward overcoming sexual orientation bias. I hope this encyclopedia will further their vision.

EUROPE

INTRODUCTION

OVERVIEW OF EUROPE

The histories and sociopolitical forces in Europe are deeply complex. With each change in governments or ruling powers, the life experiences of lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgendered (LGBT) people change. The current status of LGBT rights is dependent upon these forces.

Poland is a prime example of this process. The Polish state is considered to have come into existence in 966 C.E. when the ruler, Mieszko I, converted to Christianity and pulled together regional warlords into one country that approximated the boundaries of modern Poland. Before then, the local religion was an amalgam of various pagan religions, some accepting of homosexuality and some not. Even after the conversion to Christianity, homosexual behaviors were sometimes accepted and at other times they were not, depending on various cultural forces. Over the next 1,000 years, Poland went through periods of empire building; it was later divided between neighboring rulers and then went back to being one country. Poland declared itself a kingdom in 1025 C.E. Five hundred years later, in 1569, it cemented a relationship with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to form the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. War led to its collapse 200 years later, and it was divided between Russia, Prussia, and Austro-Hungary in 1795. Poland aligned with the French at the beginning of the French expansion into Europe in the late 19th century and adopted the criminal code developed by the French National Constituent Assembly (1789–1791) that decriminalized sodomy. This was further codified under Napoleon in the penal codes of 1810. As such, there was a brief period in which homosexuality was not legally persecuted. Napoleon's march to Russia in the first decade of the 19th century allowed Poland to recapture land that had been taken by Russia. The reunification was brief, as Germany overran Poland in World War I and replaced its government with one friendly to Germany. With the onslaught of Germany, paragraph 175 of the German criminal code that made male homosexual acts a crime was enforced against Polish homosexuals. With the defeat of Germany, Poland reorganized and became an independent state in 1918, but kept the German criminal code and its antigay statutes intact. Unification was short-lived, as Poland was soon divided between Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union. Again, Germany was defeated; this time, the Soviet Union took complete control of Poland, annexing it into the Soviet bloc. The Polish legal system was modified to conform to communist thought. Initially, homosexuality was ignored and not criminalized. However, the medical profession in the Soviet Union reconceptualized homosexuality as a pathology, which influenced all the satellite states, like Poland, to adopt the same view. As a result, Polish homosexuals were in constant fear of being rounded up and sent to reeducation camps or mental hospitals. The collapse of the Soviet Union in 1989, due in part to the Polish Solidarity movement, allowed Poland to regain its independence. The return of freedom of speech and association allowed LGBT people to begin organizing and advocating for equal rights. Poland was interested in joining the European Union (EU). A condition of membership was to implement national antidiscrimination legislation that included a ban on employment discrimination based on sexual orientation. Poland adopted such a policy, met all of the other conditions for membership, and officially joined the EU in 2004. The Polish constitution now officially affords some protection for LGBT people.

War and occupation change societal views concerning homosexuality. For more than 2,000 years, most of Europe has been in a constant state of war and occupation from such sources as the Romans, Christian crusaders, Protestant reformers, border wars, Christian inquisitions and witch hunts, the Ottoman Empire, Napoleon's conquests, World War I and II, and the communist revolution. With each change in government, LGBT people embraced the hope of freedom or the fear of possible extinction. But it does not require full-scale war for conditions to change drastically for LGBT people. Instead, a minor shift in political power within a country can have a major effect on LGBT rights. For example, a majority of EU countries were politically center-left for much of the 1970s through to the late 1990s. The influx of foreign workers from Islamic countries, combined with the fears generated by the terrorist attacks on the United States in 2001, saw a shift in many European countries toward the political right. So far, the rights of LGBT people have not been jeopardized, but there is always the fear that xenophobia and Islamophobia could be applied against homosexuals, and that their hard-fought gains in securing equal rights could be reversed.

The most significant factor that has influenced LGBT rights in modern Europe has been the formation of the European Union. Originating in 1957 with the Treaty of Rome, the European Economic Community (EEC) was established and later renamed the European Community (EC). Its goals were to create internal markets where trade and services could circulate without barriers. By 1992, the EC was expanded to introduce monetary and economic normalization, and its name was changed to the European Union. This allowed for the development of a common currency (the euro) and many other rights such as the right to move and reside in any of the member states. By 2008, 27 countries belonged to the EU as member states, including most of Europe and what used to be the western satellites of the Soviet Union. The EU is approximately half the size of the United States, but with a population that is 50 percent larger, making it the third largest geopolitical center after China and India. Its gross domestic product (GDP) exceeds that of the United States.

The EU has been committed to the active promotion of human rights. In 2000, the Employment Framework Directive was formulated to "take appropriate action to combat discrimination based on sex, racial, or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age, or sexual orientation." The directive obliges all member states to introduce legislation to their governments to implement the directive. As of 2009, most of the member states have passed legislation in their countries implementing the directive. Countries applying to join the EU must also pass legislation implementing the directive. Considering the number of countries and population affected by the Employment Framework Directive, it is arguably the single most important piece of legislation in the history of Europe for protecting the rights of LGBT people.

The impact of the directive has been significant. Many of the early members of the EU were socialist states with liberal values and politically active gay communities. For these countries, it was not a big step to pass antidiscrimination legislation. For other countries, such as the ones that were at one time part of the Soviet Union, the thought of passing antidiscrimination legislation based on sexual orientation was considered a far-off dream for many LGBT people. Most human rights political process requires a bottom-up approach, with community activism slowly creating legal, political, and cultural change. Here, gay rights were affirmed in many cases before there were active LGBT political groups in these countries. Romania is an example. By many estimates, Romania is considered to be the most homophobic country in Europe, and has a highly traumatized and hidden gay community. By joining the EU, it was forced to recognize the existence of LGBT people and legally protect their rights to employment before there was a visible gay community. Romanian activists are scrambling to organize and bring to public attention the employment protections based on sexual orientation. However, LGBT people still need to come out and demand the laws be applied effectively. It will take years of organizing in Romania to make the culture less homophobic.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Sodomy

For hundreds of years, most European countries had antisodomy laws and customs in place that made male-to-male sexual behaviors illegal. Sodomy was punishable by death in many cases (burning at the stake). This was due to the influence of Christianity. Women, who held a much lower caste than men, were overlooked in the laws. The idea of woman-on-woman sex was incomprehensible for most European cultures. Virtually no European country had antisodomy laws that included women. The French Revolution (1789–1799) instigated a change in the French criminal code by adopting ideas from the 18th-century Enlightenment. Homosexuality was decriminalized along with the offenses of heresy, witchcraft, blasphemy, incest, and bestiality. The 1810 penal code promulgated by Napoleon adopted much of the French criminal code, decriminalizing homosexuality by simply leaving same-sex sexual behaviors out of the legal code. Because of the imperialistic expansion of France into Europe and the Napoleonic Wars, the penal code was adopted throughout most of Europe. Even after the defeat of Napoleon, the penal code remained, and most European countries had no antigay sodomy law.

However, over time, many countries implemented some form of legislation of sexual mores that included phrases such as “unnatural debauchery” (Greece), “offense against nature” (Denmark), and “unnatural fornication” (Croatia). The vague terminology allowed for the prosecution of anyone for behaviors deemed offensive to the ruling power. In some countries, like the Netherlands, although antisodomy statutes dealing with adult men were abolished in 1811, they were later reintroduced by defining sodomy as sex occurring between an adult and minor child. A different strategy used by antigay countries wanting to enter the European Union was to redefine sodomy to include the use of force, or threat of force, in conjunction with male-on-male or female-on-female sex. For example, Moldova replaced “homosexuality” with “forced homosexuality” in its first revision of its antisodomy statutes in 1995 to comply with the Council of Europe’s standards. A similar tactic was used by Russia in 1996 to make its legal system appear more modernized when it removed an outright ban on LGBT people.

At this time, no European country has antisodomy laws on its books.

Antidiscrimination Statutes and Violence

The European Parliament has been the primary driving force behind the development of LGBT rights within the European Union. The Roth report, commissioned by the parliament in 1994, recommended full and equal rights for “homosexuals and lesbians” in the European Union. Input was received over the next decade from member states, public meetings, and professionals that reinforced the Roth report. The recommendations were later refined at a summit in Nice (2000) with the creation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms in the EU. Article 21 of the charter explicitly prohibited discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. By 2007, the charter acquired the same legally binding character as other European treaties. All member states are required to comply with the charter. A newly established fundamental rights agency was established to oversee compliance with the charter of fundamental rights. Part of the work of the agency is to conduct research on homophobia in the EU.

The adoption of the charter of fundamental rights and establishment of the Fundamental Rights Agency are extremely important for the future of antidiscrimination statutes in Europe. Since the Roth report, it has taken over a decade for all the member states to approve their own antidiscrimination statutes for employment protections based on sexual orientation. If history is any guide, it will probably take another decade or so to fully implement antidiscrimination protections for LGBT people as they relate to housing, services, and public accommodations besides hate crime reporting as specified in the charter of fundamental rights.

Violence against LGBT people has continued to increase across Europe for the past 20 years. Although there are variations in intensity and methodology in specific localities, the general trend has been toward greater and greater violence. As has been observed elsewhere in the world, the act of coming out, organizing, and bringing attention to LGBT people and issues increases acts of violence. Eventually, the violence levels off and then begins to decline as LGBT people become assimilated and LGBT issues are normalized in society. A problem that has spilled over into the LGBT community has been nationalistic hate directed toward immigrants by conservatives. Europe has experienced a massive immigration of workers, many from Islamic countries. As the world economies have entered into recession, the job market has tightened and many people have lost their jobs. The war on terrorism, initiated by the United States, has enlisted the help of many European countries. The synergy between the loss of jobs, tightening economic conditions, and heightening tensions over possible terrorist attacks has given conservative politicians the opportunity to blame Muslims for their problems. Conservatives have traditionally been antigay. There seems to be a convergence between xenophobia and homophobia that has increased the level of hate-motivated crimes against LGBT people.

Marriage and Child Adoption

Of the six countries in the world that allow same-sex marriages, four are found in Europe: Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway, and Spain. The Netherlands led the way by approving same-sex marriages in 2001, becoming the first country in the world to do so in modern times. Initially, there were limitations within same-sex marriages with regards to child adoption and foster care. These have now been lifted. Same-sex marriages in these European countries have been fully harmonized with existing marital laws and are legally equivalent to heterosexual marriages, with exactly the same rights. For many people, both gay and straight, it was thought that gay marriage represented full LGBT emancipation, and that the struggle for equal rights was over. This has not been proven to be true. It has become clear that legal equality does not necessarily translate into social equality. LGBT people still face many acts of discrimination in the workplace, in housing and public accommodations, in medical access, and elsewhere. Legal equality is necessary, but there is still considerable work to be done to break down antigay social barriers.

In a modern context, same-sex marriage may seem new and exotic. Yet there is a long history of different cultures in different times that not only allowed, but also venerated gay marriages. Worldwide, there is considerable evidence of the acceptance of same-sex marriages. For example, during the Ming dynasty period, many women in the southern Chinese province of Fujian bound themselves to younger females in elaborate rituals. The Japanese tradition of Shudo practiced during the medieval period and up to the 19th century instituted age-structured homosexuality analogous to the ancient Greek tradition of pederasty (paiderastia). In Europe, the Roman emperor Nero married his slave boy. Same-sex marriages were recorded throughout Europe during the Middle Ages. Legal contracts have been found in France dating from the 14th century that establish a brotherhood between two men. Similar documents are found in many European countries in which the brothers pledged to live as a couple, sharing the joys of life and “one purse” (meaning they shared property jointly). The contracts were sworn before witnesses and legally notarized. Many of these marriages were performed in a church.

Before same-sex marriages were approved in modern Europe, an intermediate step was taken in recognizing same-sex relationships with civil unions and/or domestic partnerships. Many European countries do not provide same-sex couples with the option to marry, but do allow civil unions or partnerships. Currently, Andorra, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Iceland, Luxembourg, Portugal, Slovenia, Sweden, Switzerland, and the United Kingdom provide some form of union for same sex couples. How civil unions or domestic partnerships are structured varies from country to country. Sometimes, they are limited to living arrangements and financial entanglement. Other times they include childcare, adoption, and foster care. Within the LGBT community, classifications of civil unions and domestic partnerships are considered one step toward obtaining equality with heterosexuals; ultimately, however, full marriage is desired.

Marriage is problematic for transgendered and intersexual individuals in Europe and elsewhere. For transgendered individuals, changing from one gender to another causes difficulties with identification documents and marriage. In countries such as the United Kingdom, which does not provide for same-sex marriage but does provide for civil partnership, a transgendered person must dissolve his/her civil partnership or marriage before obtaining legal recognition (what is called a gender recognition certificate in the United Kingdom) within the new gender. Once the new gender is established, the person can enter into either marriage or civil partnership, depending on whether the relationship is opposite-sex or same-sex.

Education

Only a few European countries include LGBT issues in their public school curriculum. Typically, they are only addressed within the context of health education and, perhaps, as a safe sex lesson designed to reduce the transmission of HIV. Rarely is homosexuality presented without judgment and as a viable alternative to the heterosexual lifestyle. Most European countries still have state-supported religion, and religious study is required in public education. As such, there is still strong influence of religious thought enforced in public schools. In predominantly Catholic and Protestant countries, an antigay message is still being fostered in elementary and high schools. School is typically a dangerous setting for LGBT students. However, this is slowly being mediated by the greater tolerance shown by society and the changes in antidiscrimination laws that include sexual orientation. Religion, in general, is on the decline in Europe, and its impact on the social discourse is weakening.

Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway, and Spain, the four countries that have approved same-sex marriage, have fairly well-developed antidiscrimination programs in their public schools, even though they have state-supported religion. These programs include LGBT issues and promote the idea that homosexuality and heterosexuality are equivalent in terms of legal rights and responsibilities, and represent a personal status that does not require justification. In 2006, Spain implemented its new law on education, which explicitly states in its preamble that respect for sexual and familial diversity is to be taught in schools, and that openly gay or lesbian teachers cannot be fired from their jobs.

In many of the previous Western bloc countries of the former Soviet Union, the situation is more complex. They are atheistic states, and religion is not promoted in schools. However, lingering antigay beliefs from the previous communist régime has had a negative affect on LGBT students and teachers. For example, in 2003, the Ministry of Science, Education, and Sport in Croatia implemented curriculum materials that stated that homosexuality was wrong, categorizing it with incest, prostitution, and pedophilia. In the Czech Republic, although textbooks state that homosexuality is not an illness, it is included in a chapter on sexual deviation along with necrophilia and pedophilia. Mirosław Orzechowski, deputy minister of education in Poland, introduced legislation in 2007 that condemned attempts to bring LGBT topics into schools. He claims that such materials promote sexual deviance. He further advocated the dismissal of openly gay and lesbian teachers.

A few countries like Greece have no sex education in public schools. Likewise, there is no safe sex campaign. Homosexuals are presented in police academies and law schools as criminals and primary suspects related to drug addiction and pedophilia.

AIDS

The health care needs of LGBT people and the issue of AIDS run the gamut from progressive intervention programs to outright denial that there is an AIDS problem. Denmark and a few other European countries not only have extensive safe sex programs, but these programs specifically target male-to-male sexual behaviors in their advertising campaigns. They do not shy away from including homosexuality in their health programs, and health providers are trained to work with the LGBT population. Russia, Croatia, Belarus, and a few of the previous satellite countries of the defunct Soviet Union are at the other extreme. Although they may no longer officially persecute LGBT people, their cultures are extremely antigay. Their medical professionals still see homosexuality as a mental disorder and believe that sexuality can be treated (changed) through medical procedures. They grudgingly admit that some of the population is infected with HIV. AIDS is commonly presented as a Western import, and true citizens of the state have nothing to fear. There are no safe sex campaigns. As can be imagined, it is very difficult to ascertain the true extent of the AIDS problem, and obtaining adequate medical care is difficult. International health organizations believe that AIDS infections are exploding in Russia, faster than almost anywhere else on the planet.

Most European countries fall somewhere between these two extremes, and have implemented safe sex campaigns. In some cases, like in the campaigns found in Italy, the safe sex materials do not mention anything about homosexuality or male-to-male sexual behaviors. In Spain, the Ministry of Health launched its first safe sex advertising campaign targeting men who have sex with men (MSM) in 2007. The minister banned the ads that contained images of two men kissing. Similarly, some countries, like Andorra and Greece, do not allow LGBT people to donate blood. All European countries provide free HIV testing and free HIV medication. However, in the poorer countries, medical services are at a minimum, and the free HIV medications are often unavailable. The international AIDS organizations based in Belgium have seen more gay men engaging in unsafe sexual behaviors and a subsequent rise in HIV infections.

Lesbian health needs are overlooked in virtually all European countries. A few studies of lesbian sexuality and health have been conducted in Denmark, the Netherlands, Belgium, and the United Kingdom, but they have not had a major impact on national health policy.

Religion and Spirituality

Most of the countries of central and western Europe are secular states with a state-recognized and state-supported religion (usually some form of Christianity). Germany typifies this arrangement. Citizens may elect to have 1 percent of their taxes go to their local church. The local churches keep records of who participate in the tax and those who do not. By becoming an official member of the local church, citizens reap additional benefits, including employment opportunities, since the local church controls many sources of employment—schools, hospitals, and social services. Although it is not mandatory to contribute taxes or belong to the local church, the economic benefits of doing so are substantial. Germany is a member of the European Union and has adopted the antidiscrimination statutes related to employment and sexual orientation. This provides LGBT citizens with some level of job protection. However, the law provides exemptions that allow religious groups to discriminate. Within Germany, several million jobs are controlled by the Catholic Church. LGBT people can work at these jobs, but must do so without revealing their sexual orientation; if they do, it is possible that they will be harassed and fired.

The influx of Muslim workers into Europe has created a great deal of tension. The incidence of violence against immigrants has increased. The conservative factions of many political parties have seen an increase in membership and power, primarily due to the controversy over immigration issues. At the same time, antigay Islamic beliefs fuel Muslim violence against LGBT people. In a strange twist of events, the hate crimes being committed against LGBT people by Muslim immigrants are being exploited by conservatives to advocate for immigration restrictions.

The ex-Communist states are all secular countries with no state-recognized religion. With the fall of the Soviet Union and the breakup of the satellite states into independent countries, there has been an increase in the number of people reclaiming their religious heritage. In many cases, this heritage involves orthodox and fundamentalist religions with antigay core beliefs. LGBT people often feel that they are trapped in societies that have not only medicalized homosexuality as a pathology, but ones in which religious condemnation is on the rise. The antidiscrimination laws required by members of the EU give hope in the context of the rising tide of religious hate.

Transgender

Because transgendered individuals cross gender lines, they are often the most visible members of the LGBT community. Not surprisingly, the beginnings of the modern gay rights movement were often led by transgendered people. For example, the Stonewall Bar in New York is where transvestites, transsexuals, and other marginal sexual minorities rioted against police in 1969. This event is often credited with launching the gay civil rights movement in the United States (although it had been already going on for 20 years). This is still true today. In the more repressive European countries (like the ex-Communist countries), transgendered people often found and lead gay rights organizations.

Transsexuals and intersexual people are mostly concerned with gender issues rather than sexual orientation issues. In many cases, they require medical intervention to achieve their gender goals. Because medicine can achieve a certain level of gender and sexual conformity through surgical and hormonal treatments, the community at large often seems to be more accepting of their needs than of homosexuality. For example, in Italy, transgendered individuals obtained the right to sex change operations in 1982. Furthermore, the ex-Communist states seem to be more accepting of a transsexual request for medical intervention than they are to grant equal rights to homosexuals. In contrast, many transgendered people in Denmark, Belgium, France, and elsewhere believe there has been too much medicalizing of transgenderism. They advocate a cessation of medical services and call for the acceptance of nonoperative transgenderism (i.e., the choice to forego sexual reassignment surgery).

The European Union has been instrumental in advancing the rights of LGBT people within Europe through the adoption of antidiscrimination resolutions. At this point, the resolutions have focused primarily on sexual orientation and not so much on transgenderism or intersexuality. Expansion in the rights of transgendered and intersexual people has mostly come about through case law developed by the European Court. This process should continue into the foreseeable future.

Intersexuality

Intersexual people are faced with even greater challenges when approaching marriage. Intersexual people, by definition, are between the sexes or of indeterminate sex. Actually, humans are complex and have gender roles (masculinity or femininity), sex roles (biological functioning as male or female), sexual orientation (homosexual or heterosexual), primary and secondary sexual characteristics (hormones, sexual glands, etc.), social roles (mother, father, sister, brother, etc.), and more. Their feelings and identities are very complex and reflect an interplay between biology and social constructs. Most legal systems conflate sex with gender, adding to the confusion. Throughout Europe and elsewhere, many legal systems limit humans to one pole or the other—male or female, gay or straight. As such, birth certificates and driver's licenses are restricted to indicating male or female, with no other option. Intersexual people are often forced into one box or the other at birth, when doctors and parents choose the gender they think is most appropriate for the newborn and perform surgery to obtain outward compliance to societal norms. Many intersexual individuals later feel that the gender and sexual roles assigned to them do not fit. International intersex organizations advocate a cessation of gender assignment surgeries performed on newborn children, leaving such a drastic decision to the individual upon reaching the age of majority. In most European countries, marriage is still limited to opposite-sex couples. An intersexual individual may or may not have legal documents clearly defining the sex to which he or she is assigned, and the documents may or may not reflect how the person feels and identifies. Furthermore, the intersexual individual may be contemplating surgery and hormonal treatments and transitioning from one gender to another. As such, the individual may be unable to conform to legal restrictions related to marriage.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The primary source of change for LGBT rights in Europe is the people themselves, those who put themselves on the front line, demanding equal treatment under the law and full inclusion in society. Their determination has influenced the European Union and its parliament and courts to champion LGBT rights. Passage of the Employment Framework Directive forces member states to introduce and pass legislation in their countries that provides antidiscrimination employment protection based on sexual orientation. Even countries in which there is limited gay organizing have been forced to adopt antidiscrimination protections, thereby giving hope to a highly marginalized community.

The establishment of the EU Fundamental Rights Agency is very important for the future progress of LGBT rights. The agency's purpose is to assure compliance in implementing antidiscrimination provisions within member states. It is also charged with conducting research concerning LGBT issues. The agency should prove to be very influential throughout Europe in helping LGBT people to gain and maintain their rights.

The world's economies have sustained a major contraction, and Europe has not been exempt from this. Already, there has been a rise in conservative thinking and conservative political leaders. Historically, marginalized people fare poorly under conservative political systems. LGBT people hope that their rights will be maintained and improved through these difficult economic and political times.

ANDORRA

Joel Samper Marbà

OVERVIEW

The Principality of Andorra is a tiny country in southwestern Europe, located in the Pyrenees Mountains between Spain and France. It has a surface of 180 square miles, where only approximately 29 square miles comprise urban space. Its main river is Valira, which is shaped like a Y. One of its valleys is Madriu, which has been declared a World Heritage Site by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). Its highest mountain is Comapedrosa, at 9,652 feet. The estimated population is 83,137, and only 37 percent have Andorran nationality. The rest come from Spain (33%), Portugal (16%), France (6%), or elsewhere.¹ Andorra has seven administrative regions: Canillo, Encamp, Ordino, la Massana, Andorra la Vella, Sant Julià de Lòria, and Escaldes-Engordany. The capital is Andorra la Vella.

Andorra was founded with the signing of the 1278–1288 Pariages by the Bishop of Urgell and the Count of Foix. This agreement established their cosovereignty over the valleys of Andorra after a period of conflict. From that time on, Andorra has never been involved in a war and lacks an army. Always neutral, it has tried to maintain a balance of power between the French side and the Bishop; this was only interrupted for a few years during the French Revolution. Although there are no known cases of prosecution of homosexuals in Andorra, the Spanish Inquisition courts did conduct trials there. The 1419 Council of Land was created as a form of parliament formed by the heads of house, that is, the patriarchs of all the families in Andorra. In 1933, universal male suffrage was established; women were not able to vote until 1970.

The 1993 Constitution describes the unique political status of Andorra as a Parliamentary Co-principate, being an independent state. This implies that it has two co-princes as heads of state. One of them is the President of the French Republic, and is known as the French co-prince; the other is the Bishop of La Seu d'Urgell, from the village of La Seu d'Urgell in the bordering Spanish region of Catalunya, known as the Episcopalian co-prince. Also in 1993, Andorra gained wide international recognition when it became a member of the United Nations (UN). Óscar Ribas, then Prime Minister, made the first UN speech in Catalan, the official national language. The currency of Andorra is the euro. Its economy is mainly sustained by tourism. In addition, it is still considered an uncooperative tax haven by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD).

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Andorra belongs to the Council of Europe, but to date is still not a member state of the European Union (EU). Lack of EU membership has been one of the obstacles to improving LGBT rights in areas such as employment. In spite of this, Member of European Parliament (MEP) Raül Romeva of the European Green Party posed a Written Question² to the European Commission regarding the rejection of blood donations from homosexuals in Andorra, in terms of the cooperation agreement with the European Community.

Contact with the outside world has not led to a more open-minded society. In fact, 80 percent of the population of Andorra thinks that Andorran society is quite or very conservative, and 50 percent consider it to have little or no tolerance in general. In relation to homosexuality, 28 percent of citizens of Andorra think that their society is tolerant, whereas 55 percent say that it has little or no tolerance for LGBT people.³

EDUCATION

Three educational systems coexist in Andorra: the French system, the Spanish system, and the Andorran system. Each is controlled by a different state, so LGBT issues do not receive the same coverage. Lycée Comte de Foix's students organized an NGO (nongovernmental organization) forum that included an LGBT organization. In all Spanish schools, the curriculum includes the subject of education for civic behavior, which addresses the existence and issues of sexual minorities. Educational activities on the subject of sexual minorities have been conducted at the Andorran School of Ordino. The Green Party has been especially active in promoting educational activities and policies dealing with LGBT issues, with the participation of Inclou (Include), a Catalan LGBT association. Several materials are available at the national resource center and the government's public library.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Discrimination exists against HIV-positive people who apply for residence and work permits. Applicants for such permits must have a medical examination that includes an HIV test. The liberal government—and liberal here refers to liberal economic politics—claimed that HIV-positive applicants are not suitable because HIV is considered a “chronic infection which disables one from labor and is a threat to public health.”⁴ In 1996, however, Andorra had ratified the European Convention on Human Rights, which establishes the universal right to work under the sole condition of required professional competence.

Some doctors have argued that HIV tests are conducted without consent.⁵ Furthermore, employment discrimination based on health also affects people under other circumstances. In 2005, 7,960 medical examinations were performed for work permits. At least five of them were denied because of HIV, and four were denied due to diabetes. In 2007, a case was issued to the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg when an applicant was denied both work and residence permits based on her medical history. The applicant had an operation on her colon, and another for liver metastasis, but she had completely recovered, as stated by migration services’ medical staff. As proof of her recovery, she was already working in Puigcerdà, a town outside of Andorra.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

The Ministry of Health has reported that there are fewer AIDS cases in Andorra than in Spain. This may be due to the preference of HIV-positive people from Andorra to move to areas where treatments are more accessible and where there is less prejudice against them. On December 1, 2006, the first campaign aimed at promoting healthy behaviors and the fight against AIDS was announced by the Ministry of Health. The campaign does not mention any specific community, and suggests four ways to prevent sexual transmission: abstaining; engaging in non-penetrative sexual practices, such as petting; using condoms; and “being careful with whom you engage sexual relationships, you never know who is infected.”⁶ Condoms are available at health centers and other youth centers.

FAMILY

Some parliamentary groups supported the law proposal of De Facto Family Unions presented on October 30, 1997. It included same-sex couples, giving them the same rights as heterosexual couples. It was introduced by Member of Parliament (MP) Rosa Ferrer of New Democracy at the parliamentary session. Yet, this proposal was only included in the National Democratic Initiative’s electoral program for the February 1997 general elections. According to the liberal government’s criteria, family must be defined as a stable union between a man and woman with the possibility of descendants, so it should be protected as such. Concerns about its implications in obtaining the Andorran nationality were also raised. Former French Co-prince Jacques Chirac made it clear to the Andorran Government that he was reluctant to approve such a law, especially regarding the rights that were to be granted to homosexuals. The law was not passed.

In 2003, the Social Democratic Party resumed political work on the Stable Union of Couples Act,⁷ which was enforced two years later. The act establishes duties and benefits for same-sex partners in social security, division of labor, civil service, and inheritance rights. Register officers affirmed that same-sex couples were able to adopt children, a statement that was later denied by Prime Minister Albert Pintat. Same-sex couples in Andorra cannot adopt children.

Same-sex marriage is still not legal in Andorra, and same-sex couples married in Spain have no rights in Andorra. The Episcopalian Co-prince Joan Enric Vives has opposed same-sex marriage. Legally, there is nothing in the Constitution to hinder same-sex couples from marrying.⁸ At the same time, the constitution prohibits discrimination, and makes the Universal Declaration of Human Rights binding in Andorra. On April 26, 2004, the Green Party issued a political statement supporting LGBT rights, including same-sex marriage, adoption, civil partnership, and asylum rights. It was the first time a political party supported same-sex marriage. It also proposed a set of public policies aimed to promote nondiscrimination in education, research, civic participation, solidarity, health, old age, and gender identity. One year later, they launched the Marriage for Everybody campaign to raise awareness and explain the importance of supporting LGBT relationships.

COMMUNITY

The homosexual community of Andorra first made itself public when an anonymous group published a press release through a Web site on September 6, 2002. They denounced the unconstitutional discrimination against homosexuals in blood donations. The first and only LGBT organization in Andorra was founded on June 28, 2003. The organization, called Som Com Som (We Are Like We Are), set up an information booth that day in the main square of the capital, Andorra la Vella, and hosted the country's first gay pride celebration, 34 years after the Stonewall riots in New York. Lesbian, gay, and transgender people were present. A presentation ceremony was held at the Congress Hall of the local council (known as Comú) of Andorra la Vella, with the attendance and support of numerous public figures.

Later, a number of contacts were made with political parties, including young members of the Liberal Party currently in power. Som Com Som also ran a Vote Pink campaign before the local elections, consisting of a 33-question survey submitted to political parties. The questionnaire was promptly answered by the Green Party of Andorra (94% affirmative answers), the Democratic Renewal (76%), and the Social Democratic Party (73%), while the Andorran Democratic Center preferred to have a meeting and the Liberal Party delayed responding.⁹ The same year, the organization participated in the 25th Andorra la Vella Fair, and received special mention from journalists.¹⁰ On December 2, 2003, Som Com Som organized a conference about AIDS at the main hall of the local council of Escaldes-Engordany. A documentary was screened at the Cultural and Congress Center of Sant Julià de Lòria. Som Com Som has also actively campaigned for gay marriage.

In the first year after the creation of Som Com Som, chaired by Nicolás Pérez, some other Andorran public figures came out. Belén Rojas and Paloma Olea were the first lesbians to come out. Marc Pons of the Social Democratic Party was the first elected politician to come out in 2004. He was a local councilor in Andorra la Vella in the areas of Youth, Culture, Tourism, and Environment between 2003 and 2007. He has been especially active on the blood donations issue. Juli Fernández, Secretary General of the Green Party of Andorra since 2005, member of the Administration Council of the Social Security Fund of Andorra since 2006, and elected Andorran of the Year in 2007,¹¹ also came out. He has promoted an educational project on LGBT issues and been very active in seeking support from institutions and public representatives.

For the first time, a delegation of four Andorran people of diverse sexual orientations participated in Eurogames Barcelona 2008. The Eurogames are a huge European gay sport event open to everyone. This was also the first time the Eurogames were held in Southern Europe. From July 24 to 28, around 35,000 people enjoyed sports, culture, debates, and fun in Barcelona. The members of the Andorran delegation participated in bowls-pétanque and cycling. The Secretary of State of Sports, Youth, and Volunteering from the Government of Andorra, Víctor Filloy, was present at the opening ceremony.

HEALTH

The discrimination against homosexuals in blood donations was the first issue to be denounced by the Andorran gay movement when it first appeared in 2002. Blood donation campaigns are organized by the Red Cross of Andorra, but are performed by the staff of the Établissement Français du Sang (EFS). The EFS has an internal directive not to allow gays to donate blood, as they are considered an at risk group. Meanwhile, the World Health Organization (WHO) and other organizations talk about sexual practices of risk, not groups at risk. Candidates must fill out a form and sit for an interview prior to blood extraction. An Oral Question¹² was posed by MP Maria Pilar Riba of the Social Democratic Party to the government in 2006. The National Ministry of Health claimed that gays were not to be discriminated against, but year after year, gay men are still rejected as blood donors. According to Prime Minister Albert Pintat, this has been for the sake of public health. Historically, the right to donate blood has been, and still is, one of the major demands of the gay community in Andorra.

POLITICS AND LAW

In 2001, the Superior Court dictated in the Nuno case that “the term sex cannot include sexuality or sexual orientation, but the difference between male and female.”¹³ An aggravating factor for homophobic crime could not be addressed because, at that time, Andorran legislation did not cover this possibility. Som Com Som issued a proposal for reforming the law to the Ombudsman, which was later delivered to the 28-seat parliament (known as the Consell General). In 2005, the reformed penal code¹⁴ prohibited discrimination against sexual orientation in public services, labor, salary, violent acts, murder, and personal data protection.

The co-princes of Andorra, that is, the Bishop of La Seu d’Urgell and the President of the French Republic, are constitutionally recognized figures (as heads of state) with feudal origin. They have membership competences in the Superior Board of Justice and the Constitutional Court. They can hold unconstitutionality appeals, sanction acts, and have the competencies of international representation, ratification of international treaties, and pardon granting. They also have diplomatic bureaus in Andorra. At the same time, Andorran citizens have no power or influence in the election of their co-princes. This means that the co-princes have overwhelming power over national civil institutions. Moreover, both the Catholic Church and French co-prince enjoy privileges such as tax exemption.

Political influence has been used by co-princes. Former French co-prince François Mitterrand did not sign the Nationality Law in 1993. Former Episcopalian co-prince Joan Martí Alanis did not sign the Marriage Law in 1995. Moreover, the Episcopal co-prince Joan Enric Vives did not sign the Stable Union of Couples Law in 2005. Laws may be approved by both co-princes, but if one of them holds an unconstitutionality appeal and this appeal fails, then only the approval of the other co-prince is needed. At the same time, “when there may be circumstances preventing one of the co-princes from formalizing the acts,”¹⁵ his or her signature is not needed. In practice, only one signature of either co-prince is needed, so the aforementioned acts could be passed.

Andorra has traditionally been more conservative over controversial issues than its bordering countries. Abortion, prostitution, and panhandling are always illegal and prosecuted. The 2005 penal code made the distribution of pornographic material legal, and some time later, the first sex shops appeared. The age of consent, 16, is the same for same-sex relationships as it is in opposite sex relationships, but is higher than in Spain and France. Currently, sex changes are by no means legally recognized in Andorra, and sex reassignment surgery is not covered under the national health care system.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

The Constitution of Andorra was written by the Tripartite Commission, formed by representatives of each co-prince and a representative of the citizens. It was approved on March 14, 1993, with 74 percent affirmative votes, but it was not until April 30 that it came into effect, after being ratified by both co-princes. In opposition to the act sanctioning ordinary procedures, any change to the Constitution must be ratified by both co-princes. The representation costs of the co-princes are established by the annual budgets from the public assets. In 2007, they had an overall cost of 428,000 euros each.¹⁶ However, they do not have to justify their expenses.

The Constitution of Andorra states the following:

Art. 11: 1. The Constitution guarantees the freedom of ideas, religion and cult, and no one is bound to state or disclose his or her ideology, religion or beliefs. 2. Freedom to manifest one’s religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in the interests of public safety, order, health or morals, or for the protection of the fundamental rights and freedoms of others. 3. The Constitution guarantees the Roman Catholic Church free and public exercise of its activities and the preservation of the relationship of special co-operation with the State in accordance with Andorran tradition.

Art. 20.3: Parents have the right to decide the type of education for their children. They also have the right to moral or religious instruction for their children in accordance with their own convictions.

It is not explicitly stated in the Constitution that Andorra is a lay and nonconfessional state. On one hand, this means that the French co-prince is a prince of a non-lay state; he also has competences that can override what is resolved by the three classic powers, such as pardon granting or act sanctioning. This is totally contradictory to the French tradition. On the other hand, this allows the Vatican to impose political decisions in line with its moral values over Andorran public affairs.

Albert Pintat’s liberal government, after 10 years of negotiations and without the intervention of Parliament, agreed on March 17, 2008, on a concordat with the Holy See. Its preamble claims that the agreement is sustained by a tradition of more than 700 years, the Constitution, and the fact that a large portion of the Andorran population professes to be Catholic. It ratifies that the designation of the Episcopalian co-prince lies solely on the jurisdiction of the Holy See, so Andorra still has no power in its designation. Priests practicing in Andorra enjoy Andorran nationality. Catholic Church assets are not subject to taxes, but enjoy state guardianship. The concordat also establishes that Andorran schools must offer lectures on Catholicism. These lectures will be optional for the students, and the lecturers must be authorized by the Church. The definition of lecture contents and the proposal of books and other didactic materials are solely determined by the Church.

In 2005, there was a reform in the Andorran Penal Code concerning abortion or attempted abortion. While this establishes different punishments depending on the case, the law prohibits abortion in all cases. This makes Andorra, besides Malta, the only European state (including Russia, Turkey, and all Eastern European states) with this peculiar status, despite the recommendations of the Council of Europe. Even further, the Episcopalian co-prince declared that he would resign if abortion were to be made legal, which would make the status of the Andorran institutions uncertain.

Only 55 percent of the population of Andorra consider themselves Catholic,¹⁷ compared to 79 percent in Spain. Forty-seven percent of the population of Andorra consider its society quite or very religious, whereas 44 percent consider that it is not or not very religious.¹⁸ In Andorra, there are no religious lobbies outside the Catholic hierarchy like the ones in Spain and other countries. The religion and state issues are more political than civil.

VIOLENCE

Prior to the Andorran gay rights movement, on April 13, 2000, an event of extreme homophobic violence occurred in Andorra la Vella. That night, the 17-year-old Portuguese Nuno Miguel Oliveira died from a brutal beating committed outside a disco by two aggressive young men in their early 20s who looked like skinheads. The young men referred to the sexual orientation of their victim as the reason for their attack.¹⁹ Since this event, several gay clubs have appeared in Andorra, and at least one case of aggression against a same-sex couple has been reported.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

Antisodomy laws have never existed in Andorra. However, the conservative-minded society and small population may make it difficult for LGBT people to come out. The social, political, and historical peculiarities of Andorra could help researchers and the general public to understand why the LGBT rights movement did not appear there until late 2002.

After the rise of the LGBT rights movement in Andorra and the appearance of openly gay people, there has been a wider acceptance of homosexuality. Non-scientific polls conducted by newspapers show that 62 percent of the Andorran population support same-sex marriage.²⁰ Furthermore, in the 2007 local elections, 13 out of 19 candidates supported it.²¹ The fact that same-sex marriage has already been approved in Spain suggests that, sooner or later, this will be a logical step for Andorra. If so, it remains uncertain whether the French co-prince would sign such a law, or whether the Episcopalian co-prince would resign.

While many nations strive to create a clear distinction between religion and state, Andorra still includes the Catholic Church as part of its public powers. Consequently, the question of the traditional role of co-princes versus the popular democratic will still remains unresolved. However, there is growing public debate over a redefinition of the co-princes' constitutional role, or even a referendum on a Republic of Andorra.

AUSTRIA

Kurt Krickler

OVERVIEW

Austria is situated in central Europe. It comprises a total area of 32,000 square miles. It borders Germany and the Czech Republic to the north, Slovakia and Hungary to the east, Slovenia and Italy to the south, and Switzerland and Liechtenstein to the west. It is landlocked, without access to the sea. The capital city is Vienna.

It is a republic composed of nine federal states, and is one of six European countries that have declared neutrality. It has been a member of the European Union (EU) since 1995.

Austria has a population of just above eight million, of which a quarter live in Vienna (more than 1.6 million, 2.2 million with suburbs). The capital is the only city with a population of more than one million. The second largest city, Graz, has 250,000 inhabitants, followed by Linz (190,000), Salzburg (150,000), and Innsbruck (117,000).

German-speaking Austrians are by far the country's largest group (roughly 90%). In addition, there are autochthonous minorities (Slovenes and Croats). Austria also has a large immigrant population. Around 12 percent of today's population was not born in the country. There are more than 700,000 foreign nationals living in Austria.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

In the European spectrum of countries, Austria's position in terms of the social and political status of LGBT individuals somewhat reflects the country's geographic position in the heart of the continent: Austria is certainly not as advanced as the Nordic countries, England, Spain, or even neighboring Switzerland, but neither is it as conservative as some of the countries in eastern Europe or in the Balkans.

There are a few important historic features that explain why Austria, in comparison with many similar countries, has made less progress in the field of LGBT emancipation and equality. One of these is the fact that Austria's democratic tradition in general is relatively short; it did not really have any liberal revolution deserving this label in the 19th century, and it is a predominantly Catholic country where the Roman Catholic Church continues to have a very strong influence on both politics and society.

Moreover, the Nazis' short but intense antihomosexual brainwash during the years of the Anschluss of Austria to the German (Third) Reich from 1938 to 1945 also left its traces in the minds of people, even long after the end of Nazi rule. This is also reflected by the fact that the Federal Nazi Victims Compensation Act (Opferfürsorgegesetz) was only amended in 2005 to include those Nazi victims persecuted and sent to concentration camps on the grounds of their sexual orientation. It took the LGBT movement more than 20 years of lobbying to achieve this. Until then, the law restricted compensation to persons persecuted on political, religious, or racial grounds, while homosexual victims were considered common criminals, as homosexuality was forbidden both before and after the Anschluss. Therefore, homosexual victims were denied official recognition and, consequently, any legal entitlement to compensation. The amendment in 2005, however, came only at a time when no known Pink Triangle concentration camp survivor was still alive who could make use of the new legislation.

Another important feature of the general LGBT situation is that Austria—between the end of World War II and today—only had a very short period of 13 years (1971–1983) with a left/progressive majority in parliament. Most of the time since 1945, Austria has been governed by a grand coalition between the Socialist (later Social Democratic) Party (SPÖ) and the conservative People's Party (ÖVP). Even when the SPÖ was the stronger and leading coalition partner, the ÖVP could and, indeed, did block any pro-LGBT legal reform with reference to the party's Christian basis and ideology.

However, over the last 30 years, tremendous change has been observed, both in the attitudes of society in general and the media in particular. The change in public opinion is obviously more significant than change at the political level. While homosexuality was a complete taboo up to the 1980s, and was only mentioned in the media in the context of crime—homosexuals had been considered criminals who were topped only by murderers on the hit list of abominable outcasts of society—this has completely changed. Today, the topic of homosexuality is covered and mainstreamed in its many aspects and facets by the mass media. Gays and lesbians are represented in a positive, supportive, or at least neutral and objective way. Hostile media coverage has become an exception.

The change in society's attitudes has coincided with the emergence and growth of a lesbian and gay liberation and emancipation movement and, of course, has been an international phenomenon.

EDUCATION

Austria has a free and public school system, and nine years of education are mandatory. Schools offer a series of vocational-technical and university preparatory tracks, involving one to four additional years of education beyond the minimum mandatory level. Private schools providing primary and secondary education are run mainly, but not exclusively, by the Roman Catholic Church, and account for approximately 10 percent of the 6,800 schools and 120,000 teachers.

There is no tradition of private university education in Austria. Therefore, the state has a quasi monopoly on higher education. This has only been changing slowly in recent years with the establishment of a few private universities.

The positive or at least neutral portrayal of LGBT people and issues in the mass media has actually been the main source of unbiased information for the population at large. In schools, although sexual education is part of the curriculum, homosexuality is not addressed in a systematic and standardized format. In most cases, the topic is ignored by teachers, or at best taken up in a superficial way.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Austria is one of the 10 richest countries in the world in terms of gross domestic product (GDP) per capita, and has a well-developed social market economy, as well as a very high standard of living. It is a welfare state based on the Scandinavian model. In 2008, the unemployment rate was 4 percent, which, according to the definition of the European Union, is equivalent to full employment.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

There are no government-funded social programs targeted specifically at LGBT people, but many LGBT initiatives and projects have received subsidies by federal, state, and local governments during the last 25 years.

FAMILY

Traditional family patterns continue to be promoted, although today's reality already paints quite a different picture, illustrated by the following features:

- The divorce rate is 40 percent, meaning that 40 out of 100 marriages are dissolved sooner or later;
- The absolute number of marriages is in decline. While 50,000 couples got married in 1950, only 40,000 couples tied the knot 50 years later, in 2000;
- A third of all children in Austria are born out of wedlock;
- A quarter of all families are single parent families.

COMMUNITY

The first informal gay groups appeared in Austria in the mid-1970s. At that time, lesbians were more likely to be involved in the feminist women's movement. The first gay organization, Homosexuelle Initiative (HOSI) Wien, was founded in 1979, at a time when article 221 of the criminal code (see below) still prohibited the founding of and membership in an association facilitating or promoting homosexuality. In talks between the proponents of the new organization and the competent ministries, it was agreed that article 221 is open to different interpretations: Such an organization would only be illegal if it caused public offence. That is why HOSI Wien was able to register as the first gay association in January 1980. Today, it is still Austria's largest and leading gay and lesbian organization.

After this precedent, independent regional gay organizations were founded in other cities such as Salzburg, Linz, Graz, and Innsbruck. Soon, the LGBT movement started to diversify. Many informal groups and associations popped up, dealing with specific interests and issues, such as religion and belief, leisure activities, and so on. They also organized around party politics (there are LGBT caucuses within both the Green Party and the SPÖ), cultural activities (film festivals, etc.), and professional interests (for example, gays and lesbians in the medical professions or, most recently, in the police force).

There has also been a growing LGBT community both in Vienna and other major cities, which provides all kinds of services, including free counseling for young lesbians and gays or those who have coming-out problems. More and more commercial businesses serving the LGBT community have sprung up.

Several highlights in the annual calendar of events have been established, attracting more and more participants, including both LGBT people and their heterosexual friends and supporters. The biggest of these events is the annual Rainbow Parade organized by HOSI Wien. This pride parade, along the spectacular scenery of the world famous Ringstrasse in Vienna, attracts more than 100,000 people marching and watching—which is a huge crowd in a city of 1.6 million inhabitants.

Other events of that kind include the Life Ball, the largest HIV/AIDS charity event in Europe, which takes place in the Vienna City Hall every May. Although presented as a mainstream event, it is very much linked to the LGBT community.

HEALTH

Paradoxically, the development regarding the more positive portrayal of homosexuality by the mass media started with the emergence of the AIDS crisis in the mid-1980s. In the context of this disease, the media began to shed light on gay lifestyles and, for the first time, the public was confronted with the fact that homosexuality and homosexuals do exist in society, and not only on its edges.

The AIDS crisis in the 1980s was also the first big probation test for the young LGBT movement that, indeed, passed this test with great bravura. HOSI Wien used the crisis to establish itself as an important player in the fight against AIDS and, together with physicians and other experts, co-founded Austria's first AIDS service organization, offering free and anonymous HIV testing and counseling, as well as doing large-scale prevention campaigns. This turned out to be a great success story. In this context, homosexuality was finally and officially deleted as a diagnosis in Austria's version of the international classification of diseases in 1991.

POLITICS AND LAW

The lack of a democratic tradition, the domination of the Catholic Church, and the oppression of the Nazi years all account for why Austria has had an especially long history of criminalizing and oppressing lesbians and gay men. In 1971, Austria was one of the last countries in Europe to repeal the total ban on homosexuality that also included female homosexuality. The price of this reform, however, that had to be paid to the conservative forces in society and to the powerful Catholic Church, was the introduction of four antihomosexual law provisions into the penal code in 1971:

- Article 210 (prohibition of male same-sex prostitution): this provision was abolished in 1989 in order to allow the health control of male-to-male prostitutes as part of HIV/AIDS prevention;
- Articles 220 and 221 (ban on positive information about homosexuality and on gay and lesbian associations): the repeal of these articles was voted on by parliament in November 1996 and came into force on March 1, 1997; and
- Article 209, which stipulated a higher age of consent for male-to-male relations (18 years) compared to heterosexual and lesbian relations (14 years) in case one of the partners was of age (18 years; this age of liability for breaches of article 209 was raised to 19 years in 1988; thus, sexual relations between young men were not punishable if both partners were between the ages of 14 and 19).

Contrary to articles 220 and 221, which were hardly ever applied in all the years of their existence and were considered dead law, article 209 had been enforced consistently until its abolition in 2002. Again, Austria was one of the last countries in Europe to equalize the age of consent for heterosexual and homosexual acts.

Antidiscrimination Legislation

Austria also has a very poor record of legal provisions protecting LGBT people from discrimination. It was only in 2004 that antidiscrimination legislation was adopted to ban discrimination based on sexual orientation in the workplace. However, this was not something that the Austrian government—at that time the infamous coalition between the ÖVP and Jörg Haider’s right-wing Freedom Party (FPÖ) and later its split-off, the Alliance for the Future of Austria (Bündnis Zukunft Österreich, BZÖ)—was eager to do of its own initiative. The Austrian government and parliament were basically forced to do so, as they had to implement a European Union directive.¹ And although pressured by many civil society organizations to introduce comprehensive antidiscrimination legislation on that occasion, they chose to transpose only the minimum provisions as prescribed by the EU. Thus, LGBT people still wait for efficient and effective legal protection from discrimination in all other areas, such as in access to goods and services.

Partnership Legislation

There is still no same-sex marriage or registered partnership legislation in Austria. However, same-sex couples have the same legal rights as unmarried opposite-sex couples (common-law couples) who, in fact, do already enjoy a wide range of legal rights (and duties), although not exactly the same ones as spouses.

The equal treatment in law of same-sex and opposite-sex domestic partners is owing to a landmark judgment of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in Strasbourg delivered in July 2003. The case—Karner versus Austria—which was supported by HOSI Wien, concerned a gay man who was evicted from the apartment of his deceased partner because, due to the jurisprudence of Austria’s supreme court, he was not entitled to take over the lease contract from his deceased partner. While the wording of the Austrian Rent Act is neutral and does not distinguish between same-sex and opposite-sex unmarried domestic partners, the Austrian court argued that the neutral language was for linguistic, but not legal, reasons. The ECtHR, however, ruled that this decision was a violation of the European Human Rights Convention.² It also argued that a government must have convincing and weighty reasons to justify a different legal treatment of same-sex and opposite-sex domestic partners. There is hardly any legal area where such weighty reasons could be put forward to exclude same-sex couples from rights granted to opposite-sex unmarried couples.

Since this decision, Austrian courts, therefore, must interpret all laws stipulating rights for domestic partners to cover same-sex partners. And the few laws that explicitly restricted their application to different-sex domestic partners were later ordered to be amended by the Federal Constitutional Court, which indeed, had to change also its own jurisprudence in light of the ECtHR's judgment in Karner versus Austria.

In the absence of any registered partnership or marriage legislation for same-sex couples, they have still no access to a lot of rights reserved for spouses. Although many of these legal provisions do not play a significant role in the daily life of most couples, some of these rights are quite important and are highlighted here:

- Inheritance law discriminates against same-sex partners because, if no last will is made, the surviving partner has no right to inherit, as domestic partners, unlike spouses, do not have a legal right of succession;
- The immigration laws only allow privileged treatment for spouses of Austrian citizens or of aliens with legal permission to stay in Austria. Noncitizens, especially those from non-EU countries, have practically no chance of obtaining permission to legally stay and work in Austria by virtue of their same-sex relationship with an Austrian national;
- Widow(er) pension under the state pension schemes, which is the most common basis for retirement pensions in Austria, is restricted to spouses. In the absence of same-sex marriage or registered partnerships, same-sex partners have no legal entitlement to a widow(er) pension;
- There is also discrimination against same-sex partners in income tax provisions.

Adoption and Artificial Insemination

Same-sex partners cannot jointly adopt a child. In theory, a lesbian or a gay man could adopt a child as an individual; in practice, however, the few adoptable children in Austria would be given to couples only—there is a long waiting list of couples wanting to adopt. International adoption by single (homosexual) persons is an alternative, and there has recently been such a case: A man who is living in a same-sex relationship has adopted a black girl from the United States who is growing up with the couple. However, the partner of the adoptive father has no legal relationship to the child. It is also impossible to co-adopt the biological child of one's same-sex partner.

However, in some parts of Austria, children are placed with same-sex couples as foster parents. The city of Vienna, indeed, has run publicity campaigns geared at same-sex couples to enlist them as foster parents.

In some cases, divorcing partners would use the fact that the ex-wife or ex-husband is homosexual as a weapon in the fight for exclusive custody/parenting rights over the couple's children. This has also been used to restrict the right of the divorced partner to visit and see the children on a regular basis, or even to completely deny him or her this right.

The 1992 Reproductive Medicine Act explicitly excludes lesbians (and all single women) from the benefit of artificial insemination or in vitro fertilization methods. These are restricted to married women or women in a long-term, heterosexual partnership.

Asylum Law

Austria has been one of the first countries to recognize gays and lesbians as potentially belonging to a distinct social group that, in case of persecution, would fall under one of the five asylum grounds listed in the Geneva Refugee Convention. In the explanatory notes to the 1991 Asylum Act, the legislator clearly stated that persecution based on sexual orientation could constitute a reason to flee, and thus a reason to be granted political asylum in Austria. Meanwhile, this interpretation of the Geneva Convention has become standard throughout the European Union due to a recent EU directive.³

There have been no (known) cases in which asylum was granted to gays and lesbians solely on the grounds of persecution because of their sexuality. However, at least six gay men (five Iranians and one Romanian) have been granted refugee status in the past (the first—Iranian—case dating back to 1984). None of the reasons given in the decisions mentioned persecution because of homosexuality, but this was the only additional reason put forward by those men in their appeals after their initial applications for asylum on other grounds had been rejected.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Austria is a predominantly Catholic country. About 74 percent of the population is registered as Roman Catholics, while about 5 percent are Protestants. Both of these groups have been in decline for decades. About 12 percent of the population declares that they have no religion. Of the remaining people, about 180,000 are members of Eastern Orthodox churches and more than 8,000 are Jewish. The influx of people, especially from the former Yugoslav nations, Albania, and particularly from Turkey, have largely contributed to a substantial Muslim minority in Austria. The Muslim community is increasing, comprising around 340,000 people today. Muslims will soon outnumber Protestants. Buddhism, which was legally recognized as a religion in 1983, has around 20,000 followers.

The Roman Catholic Church has a long tradition of interfering in politics and society. Its bishops and its diverse institutions would publish hostile and negative statements on a regular basis regarding all relevant issues of LGBT equality, such as registered partnership.

VIOLENCE

There is no protection whatsoever against hate speech or incitement to hatred on the grounds of sexual orientation or gender identity. There are no legal provisions establishing aggravated circumstances in the case of crimes or violence motivated by homophobia or transphobia.

However, homophobic and transphobic hate speech and violence is no urgent or burning problem in Austria. Most homophobic hate speech originates from reactionary representatives of the Roman Catholic Church or right-wing parties, but is hardly echoed in the media. In most cases, these statements are not taken seriously, and are usually ignored or ridiculed by the mainstream media.

Of course, incidents of homophobic or transphobic violence do occur, but these seem to be single events. In addition, homophobic bullying certainly exists in school, but does not seem to be such a widespread phenomenon as it is in other countries.

Underreporting of cases of homophobic violence or ordinary crimes is certainly a problem, as victims who are not out as gay or lesbian may prefer not to report the crime to the police in order to avoid mentioning this. Such persons, of course, are especially vulnerable victims, and perpetrators may even consider their victims' reluctance to report to the police when choosing them as targets.

Normally, LGBT victims do not need to fear being badly treated or victimized by the police when reporting a crime. In 1993, the current Police Security Act (Sicherheitspolizeigesetz) was adopted. This regulates the competence of the police force and their lawful ways of acting. A decree issued in this context by the minister of the interior provides guidelines and instructions for police interventions, and the nondiscriminatory behavior prescribed by the decree also covers sexual orientation. It reads: "In performing their tasks, members of the police forces must refrain from doing anything that could create the impression of bias or could be perceived as discrimination on the grounds of sex, race or color, national or ethnic origin, religious belief, political conviction or sexual orientation." Moreover, LGBT organizations will also support crime victims when dealing with the police.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The improvements and progress made over the last 30 years are rooted in society's political awakening in the 1970s, once Bruno Kreisky took over the government in 1970, leading socialist governments until 1983. As one of his first landmark reforms, the total ban on male and female homosexuality was repealed in 1971.

This awakening caught hold of all walks of life and aired a society that had been completely fossilized in the rigidity of traditions and conventions. This development was accompanied by the rejection, to a certain degree, of the suffocating influence of the Catholic Church and its political arm, the conservative Christian Democratic Party, ÖVP.

Another important political element not to be underestimated was the appearance on the political scene of the Green Party. Voted into the national parliament for the first time in 1986, the Green Party has supported and pushed for LGBT rights ever since, keeping these issues unrelentingly on the political agenda.

However, when the ÖVP returned into government (as the junior partner in a coalition with the Social Democratic Party) in 1986, it started to try everything to slow down and completely stop this positive development.

Thus, the ÖVP has been vetoing and blocking any improvement for gays and lesbians over the past 20 years. It has been the clear ideological program of this party to make gays and lesbians second-class citizens and do everything to prevent them from obtaining full equal rights. The repeal in 1996 of the two penal code provisions, articles 220 and 221, was only possible because the SPÖ/ÖVP coalition government had finally agreed on a free vote in parliament; members of parliament (MPs) from the Freedom Party voted in favor of repealing article 221 (ban on gay and lesbian associations), and two MPs missed the vote on article 220 (ban on positive information about homosexuality). While the Freedom Party only voted against the repeal of article 220, the ÖVP voted against the repeal of both provisions.

It is one of the great paradoxes of history that all significant progay reforms have happened during the coalition government between the conservative ÖVP and Jörg Haider's right-wing party at the beginning of the 21st century. In all these cases, the reforms have occurred due to European pressure and against the determination of the ÖVP.

In the case of the repeal of article 209, ÖVP Federal Chancellor Wolfgang Schüssel had defended, in a newspaper interview,⁴ the discriminatory age of consent for male homosexuality as late as two weeks before the Federal Constitutional Court declared this provision to be unconstitutional in June 2002. And again, the constitutional court had to correct its own jurisprudence because, in several applications in the 1980s and 1990s, it did not consider article 209 as unconstitutional. But in 1997, the European Human Rights Commission of the Council of Europe in Strasbourg finally found in *Sutherland versus the United Kingdom*⁵ that the British higher age of consent provision was in breach of the European Human Rights Convention. In June 2002, several Austrian applications were pending before the Strasbourg court, and it was clear that the ECtHR would rule in favor of the applicants. The Austrian constitutional court obviously did not want to risk being overruled by the Strasbourg court. Thus, it deviated from its previous rulings in article 209 applications and declared the provision to be unconstitutional. And indeed, in January 2003, the Strasbourg court condemned Austria for violating the convention in three article 209 cases.⁶

Granting equal rights to same-sex unmarried partners occurred due to a judgment of the Strasbourg court in July 2003, which was again a slap in the face for the conservative People's Party, which had always defended the different legal treatment of same-sex and opposite-sex domestic partners.

Furthermore, protection from discrimination in the workplace as stipulated in the 2004 Federal Equality Act was imposed on the Austrian government by the European Union. It can be concluded that all recent progress and positive developments for LGBT people in Austria were achieved through pressure from European institutions and against the declared will of the conservative government in Austria.

After its landslide defeat in the 2006 general elections—Wolfgang Schüssel lost the chancellery to the Social Democrats—the ÖVP was trying to determine the causes for their unexpected downfall as, for example, the economic situation was very good at that time. One conclusion that the ÖVP drew, along with many commentators, was that the ÖVP had simply taken a much too conservative course, especially in matters of societal relevance. In the pursuit to become the biggest political party again, a huge internal debate about new political perspectives began within the ÖVP. After a lengthy process, in October 2007, the party came up with some new ideas for a future program, including the proposal to introduce registered partnership for same-sex couples based on the Swiss model. At the same time, however, the ÖVP continued to insist that marriage was a distinct institution for opposite-sex couples and would not be touched. The Swiss registered partnership legislation basically grants the same rights and obligations to same-sex couples as marriage grants to spouses—only adoption and services of reproductive health are excluded. The Swiss legislation, thus, is comparable with the legislation in the five Nordic countries and the United Kingdom. In Europe, only the Netherlands, Belgium, and Spain have gone further in opening up civil marriage for same-sex couples.

It is unclear and, indeed, still doubtful whether this project will become reality. While in April 2008, the federal minister of justice (SPÖ) presented a bill to introduce registered partnership, certain powerful fractions within the ÖVP are still trying to derail the project or water it down to the extent that the LGBT movement would finally say, “No, thanks. If we can only get that little, we prefer to wait and continue to fight for more.” In any case, partnership legislation is the last legal challenge of the LGBT movement in the country. The decision to pursue same-sex registered partnership based on the Swiss model was the first time the conservative ÖVP came up with a proactive proposal to improve the situation of LGBT people.

It is generally fair to say that in Austria, LGBT people have finally arrived from the edges to the center of society, although exclusion and discrimination still exist. And of course, there are the usual differences between bigger cities and smaller towns and rural areas, such as differences in terms of exposure to negative reactions in certain professions; these differences certainly make it difficult to generalize. However, on a general note, it can be stated that today, there is a climate in Austria that would allow every gay man and every lesbian woman to come out, provided she or he is equipped with some courage and the will to cope with possible negative reactions. Young gays and lesbians should have fewer and fewer problems when coming out.

OVERVIEW

Belarus is a landlocked republic located in eastern Europe. It borders Lithuania and Latvia in the north, the Ukraine in the south, the Russian Federation in the east, and Poland in the west. The capital of Belarus is Minsk. The position of the country is of strategic importance for communication between the CIS (Commonwealth of Independent States) member states and the countries of western Europe. It has an area of 80,154 square miles and a population of 9,689,700.¹

Belarus gained its independence from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) in 1991. It was one of the most affluent parts of the USSR, but since independence it has experienced economic decline. President Alyaksandr Lukashenka has been in power since 1994, and has preserved state control of the economy and civil society, along with all the symbols of Soviet power. This means that Belarus has been sheltered from the worst effects of the painful transition to a market economy that other post-Soviet countries have faced. At the same time, disregard for political freedoms and human rights has led to international condemnation and isolation of the country. Belarus has very close ties with Russia, but relations cooled recently when Russia raised the price of the gas it is supplying to Belarus.

Lukashenka's state-centered economic model is designed to perpetuate tight government control over the political and economic space of Belarus, and to prevent the destabilizing social unrest that he feels has marred the transition to a capitalist economy in other post-Soviet countries. By ensuring high employment levels, widespread subsidies, and rising real wages, he has retained considerable popular support.²

Of all the former Soviet republics, Belarus has suffered the most from the consequences of the Chernobyl nuclear power station failure in 1986. Twenty-three percent of the territory of the country has suffered from radiation. As a result of the radiation release, agriculture was destroyed in a large part of the country, and many villages were abandoned. Resettlement and medical costs were substantial and long term.

Since 1993, the death rate in Belarus has exceeded the birth rate, resulting in the depopulation of urban as well as rural areas.³

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

While homosexual activity is no longer considered a crime in Belarus, and the age of consent for heterosexual and homosexual relations is equal, LGBT rights still remains a marginal topic in public discourse and does not play any role in national or local politics.

Homophobia remains widespread throughout the country, and instances of harassment and discrimination occur regularly.⁴ Many Belarusians consider homosexuality a disease, and some see it as a sin, but few consider it a legitimate sexual orientation. President Lukashenka and members of parliament often make negative statements about homosexuals, strengthening the homophobia in society. Homosexuality is frowned upon in Belarusian society and condemned by the church. Belarus is conservative in this respect, with homosexuals generally being socially stigmatized. Gay life in Belarus remains largely underground, and only a few homosexuals openly declare their sexual orientation.

The government-controlled media often attempts to smear the domestic political opposition by associating it with homosexuality.⁵ This strategy is also used against foreign countries; in one two year period, three foreign diplomats were expelled from Belarus on claims of homosexuality.⁶ Homosexuality is often seen by the government as allied with Western paths to development.

While the Belarusian constitution says it forbids discrimination, this prohibition has not extended to discrimination based on sexual orientation. Belarusian law does not provide protection for LGBT people against discrimination with regard to employment, housing, or family relationships. Although many people live together outside of marriage, domestic partnership and cohabitation are not recognized by the government and LGBT Belarusian couples do not have any of the rights of heterosexual couples.⁷ Gay men are also not allowed to serve in the armed forces.⁸

Although hate crimes against homosexuals are not uncommon, homophobia is not recognized as an independent motive for crimes. LGBT people continue to face harassment and discrimination by the general population; they cannot count on police protection, as the police often refuse to protect the rights of LGBT citizens.⁹ There is evidence that LGBT people are targeted for violence; in 2001–2002, five LGBT people were tortured and killed in Minsk.¹⁰ Other countries have granted asylum to Belarusians who claimed discrimination based on sexual orientation.

There is no official recognition of LGBT organizations in Belarus, although many groups continue to operate without registering, which makes them illegal. These groups face difficulties such as armed militia storming into their meetings to threaten and arrest their members; LGBT individuals and groups are also the target of hate crimes. Recent changes to Belarus's criminal code have given the authorities even more latitude to treat the activities of LGBT groups as illegal attempts to discredit or bring harm to Belarus.¹¹

Societal Homophobia

Homophobia remains strong within Belarusian society. In 2002, 47 percent of respondents to a survey by the Belarusian Lambda League for Sexual Equality (Lambda Belarus) believed that gay people should be imprisoned.¹² Attitudes such as this continue to keep LGBT people from revealing their sexual orientation.

But the situation is changing. A 2007 poll of young people within the Gomel region conducted by the Tema information center revealed that only 12 percent of respondents think of lesbians and gays as criminals. Forty-eight percent of respondents accept LGBT people.¹³ A younger generation is showing increased tolerance and an interest in gay culture, although many critics attribute this to their age and assume that this trend will ultimately be outgrown and forgotten. In spite of the attitudes of young people, common stereotypes and myths, as well as a lack of information on LGBT issues or firsthand experience with LGBT people, affect the general public's attitude toward them.

President Lukashenko has rarely addressed homosexuality. In September 2004, he made a statement about homosexuality at the consultation meeting with the Belarusian Security Council.¹⁴ In April 2005, a new attempt was made to criminalize homosexuality. Speaking in favor of this at a parliamentary session, member of parliament (MP) Viktor Kuchynski stated that "all 'queers' and others are to be punished to the maximum."¹⁵ The measure, to amend the criminal code, did not pass.

There is no serious discussion about LGBT issues in the media, 95 percent of which is controlled by the government. Pro-government media expresses negative views of LGBT people, and has so far served to foster negative attitudes toward LGBT people and issues in Belarusian society. Positive or objective information about homosexuality is often considered promotion of homosexuality. One example occurred with staged footage that purported to show a demonstration by sexual minorities at the Opposition Congress of October 2004. This footage included bystanders' comments that "gays are evil" and a suggestion from the broadcasters that homosexuality is tied to Western development theories.¹⁶ Homosexuality is often viewed as incompatible with the Belarusian identity and threatening to the nation.

Civil society does not provide support to LGBT groups in Belarus. The organizing committee of the First Belarusian Youth Congress voted against the inclusion of delegates from Lambda Belarus. One of the largest youth organizations, Young Front, issued a press release that contained extremely homophobic language. Pavel Severinets, Young Front's leader, directly referred to homosexuality as "a sin and perversion deserving death," and stated that the very existence of LGBT people was the "result of decay and sinfulness."¹⁷

EDUCATION

Homosexuality is still not dealt with adequately in the Belarusian education system, and is not presented as an equal alternative to the heterosexual lifestyle. No discussion of sexuality of any kind is included in the curriculum. Besides silencing and ignoring LGBT issues in the school curriculum, teachers and textbooks often present LGBT issues in negative ways, including as a disease, a sin, or an unnatural way of being, which only strengthens old, well-known stereotypes.

School is a dangerous place for many LGBT students. No original publications with any scientific value on this topic are yet available, but some authors stress that homophobia is widespread and instances of harassment occur in public schools.¹⁸ Antibullying policies have not even been considered for discussion.

LGBT studies is still a marginal subject at Belarusian universities. Several students are interested in studies concerning sexual minorities, but the main problem they face is a lack of adequate professors and literature.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Efforts of the Belarusian government, and some favorable factors such as the Union with Russia, which opened vast markets for Belarusian goods, and also allowed Belarus to buy oil and gas at Russia's internal price. This has allowed Belarus to bypass the severe economic hardships and crises that many former Soviet Union transition economies have encountered, and has resulted in the economic growth seen in recent years. According to the UN World Economic Situation and Prospects 2006 report, Belarus registers major economic growth: the gross domestic product (GDP) growth rate, as low as 3 percent in 1999, was 11 percent (second place in the CIS) in 2004, and 8.5 percent (fourth place after Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan—oil and gas exporters—and Armenia) in 2005. In terms of the GDP growth rate, Belarus also outperforms neighboring Poland, Latvia, and Lithuania.¹⁹ About 80 percent of all industry remains in state hands.

The Belarusian labor market is highly regulated. Important elements of the central planning system are still in place. The government can affect the structure of wages through the tariff system, a type of centrally determined wage grid. The tariff system is binding in the budget sector, including enterprises and organizations mainly financed and subsidized within state and/or local budgets. The private sector, representing only a small share of employment, has little autonomy.

Current personnel in the armed forces number 72,940, although a reduction to 60,000 is planned. Most soldiers are conscripts serving for a period 12 months (with higher education) or 18 months (without).

The labor code of Belarus prohibits discrimination in employment and in the workplace, but excludes sexual orientation from the list of characteristics against which discrimination is prohibited. Therefore, employers are free to refuse employment to LGBT people, or to dismiss employees because of their sexual orientation or gender identity.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Neither the state nor local governments provide funding for any programs specifically for lesbians, gay men, or transgender people in Belarus.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

Sexuality and sexual practices are not dealt with on a regular basis in the education system of Belarus. A number of pilot HIV prevention projects have been created by nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in several public schools around the country since the mid-1990s. Most of the programs, funded by foreign donors, have been designed to reduce risky sexual behavior through a strong peer-to-peer intervention component. Educational programs cited male-to-male sex as the most common transmission route of HIV and AIDS without further discussion. Implementers of programs often did not illustrate the proper use of condoms. In Belarus, the distribution of condoms at schools, colleges, and other educational institutions is illegal.

A 2007 poll of Web site visitors conducted by the Belarusian Web portal Gay. By revealed that 54 percent of respondents did not use condoms during their last sexual encounter. Fifteen percent of the visitors never use condoms. Fifty-eight percent of respondents tested for HIV and/or other sexually transmitted diseases. According to another poll by Gay. By, 17 percent of respondents have HIV-positive friends who are gays and lesbians.²⁰

The situation of families, women, and children has dramatically worsened during the process of political and economic reform in society. The reforms have affected the majority of families, reduced their ability to provide economically for those family members unable to work, had negative effects on consumption (particularly food), prevented their cultural and educational needs from being satisfied, and been detrimental to the health of children and adult family members. Against the background of ever-increasing complexities in family life, those hardest hit have been families with numerous children, single-parent families, and families with one or more members with physical or mental disabilities. New categories of families needing social support have also appeared, including evacuees, refugees, and the unemployed. The difficulties the family faces in fulfilling its functions are complicated by the radical stratification of society; the decreasing social mobility of the majority of citizens; the absence of a legislative base that would adequately and effectively regulate social relations; the break-up of conventional values, including those of marriage and family; and uncertainty in parents as to which personal qualities they should develop in their children to help them achieve success in life.

Lack of social success increases conflicts within the family and frequently leads to its destruction. Belarus has one of the highest divorce rates in the world. In the period from January to September 2007, Belarus had 64,410 registered marriages and 26,459 registered divorces. Compared to 2006 figures, the number of registered marriages had increased by 7.1 percent, but the number of divorces had increased by 14.8 percent.²¹ More than 15 percent of Belarusian families consist of single mothers with children.

Since the early 1990s the Belarusian family's function of bringing up children has been significantly distorted because of worsening socioeconomic conditions in the country. Statistics confirm that parental responsibility for bringing up children is insufficient. In 1996, parents had 3,600 children taken away from them, including the denial of parental rights in some cases. The term social orphans refers to children abandoned while their parents are still alive, and they are becoming a significant social problem. In 1996, there were 18,200 orphans left without parental care in the republic (there were 11,200 such children in 1990). Around 90 percent of these children are social orphans. The numbers of parents indulging in antisocial behavior (alcoholism, drug abuse, and so on) have risen, as have the cases of especially dangerous violence against children.

The majority of the Belarusian LGBT population is involved in a heterosexual marriage, or had once been involved in a heterosexual marriage. Often, LGBT people hide their sexual orientation from spouses and family members. Many also have children. Very few same-sex couples dare to live together, and even fewer do so openly. Same-sex couples are frequently the targets of public condemnation, and sometimes become victims of hate crimes motivated by homophobia.

No information on Belarusian LGBT families is available. Marriage is inaccessible to same-sex couples. These issues are not discussed in public debate, and are not on the agenda of the Belarusian LGBT movement or any political force in Belarus.

COMMUNITY

During the 70 years of Communism, the Belarusian LGBT community existed in tight, discreet social networks that were absolutely invisible to the general public. The risk of criminal persecution united people in a secret brotherhood. In the 1990s, Belarus became the first former Soviet state where a popular magazine, Vstrecha, appeared with a special section on LGBT issues.²² A few years later, the first gay bars started to open in Minsk, where the first Belarusian gay activists began to gather. The emergence of the Belarusian LGBT movement has been connected with the birth of the nationwide LGBT rights group, Lambda Belarus, in 1998. Lambda Belarus was quite active between 1998 and 2002, organizing the first Belarusian gay pride events and conferences, and publishing an LGBT magazine. After four years of silence, in January 2007 the group came out with fresh initiatives, including the new bimonthly publication Taboo.

One of the oldest Belarusian gay groups, Vstrecha (Meeting), is exclusively involved in HIV prevention among men who have sex with men (MSM). They also serve as a support group for HIV-positive gay men. Funded by large grants from the Global Fund, Vstrecha operates offices in all regional centers of Belarus. Their publication of a bulletin for gays of the same name started in February 2007.

Amnesty International's Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Network-Belarus (AILGBT-Belarus) began its work in 1999 and focuses on advocacy, research, campaigning, and education initiatives. AILGBT-Belarus has co-organized gay pride events in Minsk in 1999 and 2000, prepared numerous publications on LGBT issues, run many workshops and seminars in Belarus and abroad, and represented the Belarusian LGBT movement at international conferences. The International Lesbian and Gay Cultural Network awarded the group its Grizzly Bear Award in 2004 for its attempts to organize an international LGBT conference in Minsk.

Two new organizations—BelQueer in Minsk, and Volunteers without Borders in Gomel, were created in 2006. BelQueer was devoted to building gay culture in Belarusian society. The goal of Volunteers without Borders is to increase the level of civic engagement within the LGBT population and promote volunteerism among the LGBT people in Gomel.

The Internet plays the most important role in building community for LGBT people in Belarus, especially outside of Minsk. For the greater part of the community, the Internet is the main source of information on LGBT life, and very often the only way of finding a partner as well. Only one gay club exists in all of Belarus, and it is located in Minsk.

In February 2007, AILGBT-Belarus initiated the first meeting of Belarusian LGBT leaders in Minsk. Participants discussed the opportunities for joint projects, information exchange, working with state structures, promotion of LGBT culture, and many other issues. The participants came to some important agreements, including the necessity of maintaining the positive image of the Belarusian LGBT rights movement. In addition, the group discussed strategic approaches to advancing their common cause, including outreach to civil institutions, businesses, and other state structures. This was a historic moment in the movement for LGBT rights in Belarus, and AILGBT is planning more of these meetings in the future. It now works as a permanent forum and is open to newcomers.

HEALTH

The Belarusian health care system is a combination of public and commercial medical services. Basic medical services are provided by the state at no cost to Belarusian citizens. LGBT people do not face any problems in regard to medical care until they disclose their sexual orientation.

Despite the adoption of the 10th revision of the International Classification of Diseases in the late 1990s, Belarusian military doctors still maintain the outdated belief that homosexuality is a kind of personality disorder, and that gay men are unsuitable for military service. According to the list of diseases adopted by the Ministry of Health and Ministry of Defense, homosexuality (along with transsexuality and pedophilia) is classified as “a personality disorder of moderate degree.”²³ As a result, homosexuals may not serve in the army during peacetime, but may be enlisted in wartime as partially able. This provision is more than welcome to young gay men who would like to avoid compulsory military service. They are mostly afraid of the physical and psychological harassment they might endure in the army under homophobic military personnel.

AIDS has been a serious health concern for Belarus. The first case of HIV infection involved a foreign citizen, and was registered in 1986. The first HIV-positive Belarusian, who also happened to be the first HIV-positive citizen of the entire USSR, was identified in 1997 in the Gomel region. He happened to be gay. As of December 1, 2007, there were 8,631 cases of HIV infection registered in Belarus. Nearly 35 percent of them were women and over 65 percent were men. Eight hundred and eighty-four new cases of HIV infection were registered between January and November 2007. Intravenous drug use is the most common transmission route, followed by sexual contact. There are no official statistics on cases of HIV infection through same-sex activity in Belarus. According to the nationwide HIV-prevention gay group Vstrecha, 30 of such cases have been registered by the National Center for Public Health, and 14 of these people have already died. Vstrecha believes that real number of HIV-positive gays and lesbians may be higher, but many people hide their sexual orientation.²⁴

People suffering from HIV/AIDS still face significant societal discrimination. Reports of this type of discrimination continue, and many of those affected are afraid to disclose their status.

An alarming increase in other sexually transmitted diseases, such as syphilis, was recorded in Belarus in 1996. Although this is now decreasing, there is insufficient data on STD (sexually transmitted disease) cases within MSM. Vstrecha provided approximately 250 MSM with medical treatment for sexually transmitted diseases.²⁵

Transsexuals need special attention from medical personnel. The first sex reassignment surgery in Belarus occurred at the National Center for Plastic and Reconstruction Surgeries in 1992. More than 100 surgeries have been performed since that time. As in other post-Soviet states, the number of people who request female-to-male (FTM) transition is five times higher than the number who request male-to-female (MTF) transition.²⁶ Researchers attribute this phenomenon to conditions imposed by the Soviet model of socialism, where Soviet men enjoyed greater economic opportunities and public respect. Soviet men had traditionally been war heroes, space conquerors, and famous politicians. Although the majority of transsexuals manage to create families, hold down a permanent job, and advance in their careers, Belarusian society at large does not tolerate openly transsexual and transgendered people. Besides experiencing hormone therapy and sex reassignment surgery, they are forced to change their entire lives—their names and surnames, their professions, their place of residence, or even their citizenship status.²⁷

No sufficient information is available on intersexual persons in Belarus.

POLITICS AND LAW

In 1994, male homosexual activity in Belarus was decriminalized for the first time under pressure from the Council of Europe and international human rights groups by repealing paragraph 1 of article 119 of the criminal code, which punished homosexual activity between consenting adults. According to the Ministry of Justice, 15 people were sentenced under article 119 during the first six months of 1993, but it was not revealed how many of these sentences were for adult consensual homosexual activity.²⁸ The current criminal code was passed in 1999, and the only homosexual acts that are still criminalized are those that violate consent.

Chapter 20 of the criminal code, which addresses crimes against sexual inviolability or sexual freedom, contains the sections pertaining to homosexuality. Article 167 addresses forced sexual activities and makes male homosexual behavior (muzhelozhstvo), lesbianism, and other forced nonheterosexual acts punishable by 3 to 7 years in prison. If the victim is underage, or if the incident is a repeat offence, the term can rise to 5 to 12 years. Nonconsensual sex with a person under 14 year old, or nonconsensual sex that causes death or serious damage to health, can be punished with a term of 8 to 15 years. Article 168 covers the same crimes, but establishes different penalties when the act is committed by a person over 18 years old on a person under 16 years old. Article 170 covers crimes of coercion, establishing sentences of up to 3 years for crimes committed with coercion by use of “blackmail, threat of destruction, damage or withdrawal of property, etc.”²⁹ When committed against an underage person, these same actions may be punished with sentences up to 4 years of house arrest or 5 years of imprisonment. In these sections, particular sexual acts are not listed, and there is no distinction made between same-sex and opposite-sex crimes. While rape laws specify female victims, all other defined sexual crimes recognize that the victim or perpetrator can be of either gender. The age of consent for participation in sexual activity is 16 years old for both men and women.³⁰

Although the Belarusian constitution claims to uphold equality of citizens as a fundamental principle, there is no antidiscrimination law that pertains to LGBT people. Theoretically, article 22 of the constitution provides protection to LGBT people, stating that “All are equal before the law,” but this protection is not elaborated upon. In practice, usage of the constitution for the protection of LGBT people is impossible.

Belarusian immigration law does not recognize persecution based on sexual orientation, nor does it recognize same-sex partnerships for immigration purposes. Belarus is a member of the Geneva Refugee Convention, however, and might potentially recognize LGBT people as members of a social group facing persecution. So far, there have been no recorded cases of LGBT people seeking asylum in Belarus on the grounds of persecution because of their sexual orientation or gender identity.

The Belarusian constitution and the marriage and family code affirm that marriage is a specific civil contract between a man and a woman. Belarus does not recognize domestic partnerships, whether homosexual or heterosexual, and confers no rights upon the partners of such relationships. Domestic partnership does not serve as a legal basis for changing one’s name or to any claim for material support. Commercial laws can be used when partners have a common business. If cohabitating partners separate, they have no rights similar to spousal rights, such as the right to alimony or other forms of financial support. Cohabitation does not lead to inheritance without a last will and testament. In such cases, the surviving partner will face higher taxes than would a legal spouse, and will not receive the right to claim the other half of the estate. Should cohabitating partners have children, a nonbiological partner has no parental rights unless he or she can legally adopt the biological child of the partner. The adopting partner must not be incapacitated, must be at least 16 years older than the child, and must not have lost parental rights in the past. Cohabitating couples may not adopt orphans, as this right is limited to legally married people.

Although the law in Belarus claims to provide freedom of speech and association, it is in fact severely restricted. Many restrictions attempt to prevent the formation of organizations that are likely to criticize the government. The law requires all NGOs, political parties, and trade unions to register with the government. Any activity on behalf of unregistered organizations is considered illegal. In order to register, applicants must go through a lengthy procedure that includes disclosing the names of the founder and members, a legal address in a nonresidential building, and the payment of a large fee. Activists are hesitant to list their names for fear of retribution. Many organizations cannot afford private space, and are blocked by the government from renting space before they are registered. Thus, organizations are forced to work out of residential spaces, leaving them open to action by the government. Applications for registration are reviewed by the government, which bases its decision largely on the political and ideological compatibility between the goals of the organization and the government’s own authoritarian philosophy.

Most LGBT groups in Belarus are unregistered and, therefore, operate illegally. There are a few exceptions to this rule. Yana is registered as an NGO for young women, but focuses its efforts on the needs of lesbians and its membership is primarily, if not entirely, lesbian. The organization organizes social and educational events in several Belarusian cities. The other exception is Vstrecha, a group that registered as an HIV prevention organization that focuses on young people.

In reality, they target men who have sex with men in their outreach, and face regular and ongoing resistance from the authorities. In 1999, Lambda Belarus, which was the most active LGBT group at that time, was denied the opportunity to officially register as an NGO. The government claimed there were technical reasons for denying the application, although it was believed that government rejection was due to their mission of promoting LGBT rights.

In 2002, the only Belarusian publication for sexual minorities, Forum Lambda, had its registration annulled by the State Press Committee. Since 1999, it has been impossible to hold public LGBT events. Earlier attempts to hold gay pride celebrations in 1999 and 2000 were broken up by police, as were attempted international conferences in 2004 and 2006.

Internet censorship is another way in which the government suppresses the LGBT rights movement. In 2002, the Belarusian State University banned access to all online LGBT resources in their computer labs. In 2003, Soyuz Online, the largest Internet café in Minsk, and which once had a significant LGBT customer base, blocked the Belarusian gay site Apagay. In 2004, the Belarusian National Anti-pornography and Violence Commission declared that three Russian LGBT Web sites contained obscene language and pornography, and blocked access to these sites as well.³¹ Online dating sites are also prohibited, and LGBT people have even been denied the opportunity to post messages on a televised dating chat room.

Recently, criminal penalties have been introduced to punish any suspended or liquidated organization still in operation. Given the illegal status of most Belarusian LGBT groups, this represents an even larger barrier. Penalties range from a fine and six months' imprisonment to imprisonment for two years for vaguely defined serious cases. Another new regulation prescribes penalties between six months and three years for organizing or funding mass demonstrations. Additionally, organizing group activities that "grossly violate public order" or financing such activities can also lead to a two-year prison term. Providing false information to a foreign organization or government, defined as "information intended to misrepresent or discredit Belarus," is punishable by sentences ranging from six months to two years.³²

Bisexuals are virtually invisible in Belarusian society, and are stigmatized as much as lesbians and gays.

Only people with the official diagnosis of transsexualism (or sex denial syndrome) are eligible for passport and biological sex change. A special interdepartmental commission makes decisions on passport sex change, hormonal therapy, and sex reassignment surgery. The commission consists of at least 16 leading specialists from the ministries of health, defense, internal affairs, justice, and education. It takes at least one year from the day of the initial appointment with the secretary of the commission, who serves as a sexologist, and the day of the meeting regarding the passport sex change decision. In the case of a positive decision, the person will receive a new passport, and six months later can apply for authorization of his or her hormone therapy or sex reassignment surgery. At the time of the first appointment with the secretary of the commission, a person who wants to change his or her biological sex should be at least 21 years of age. People with serious "deformation of social adaptation," such as the homeless or unemployed, homosexuals and cross-dressers, people who have their own biological children, and married people are not eligible for sex changes.³³

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Approximately 50 percent of Belarusians consider themselves religious. Of persons professing a religious faith, approximately 80 percent belong to the Belarusian Orthodox Church, 14 percent belong to the Catholic Church, 4 percent are members of Eastern religious groups, and 2 percent are Protestant.³⁴ The predominance of conservative Christians has had a significant impact on general public attitudes towards homosexuality.

None of the mainstream denominations demonstrate acceptance of homosexuality. The Belarusian Orthodox Church considers homosexuality “the gravest of sins,” and Lambda Belarus stated that church officials have called for the execution of LGBT people.³⁵ The European Humanities University prohibited an event sponsored by Amnesty International that included the screening of Outlawed, a documentary about discrimination against LGBT people worldwide.³⁶ The university pointed to pressure from the Orthodox Church as the reason for the ban.

VIOLENCE

The authorities in Belarus do not track data on hate crimes based on homophobia, which makes it difficult to determine the scope of the problem other than through NGO estimates or sporadic media reports. From January 2001 to January 2003, Lambda Belarus documented at least 33 hate crimes based on sexual orientation or gender identity.³⁷ These crimes ranged from burglary, destruction of property, and dissemination of hate material to threats, assaults, rape, and murder.

Despite the number of such crimes, the police most often refuse to investigate thoroughly, if they register the complaint in the first place. Incidents of police brutality against LGBT people have also been documented.³⁸ Homosexuals from the Brest region were being entered into a special database following the murder of a homosexual.³⁹ It is not uncommon for police to collect personal information of those who visit cruising areas, and they have been known to enter bars frequented by LGBT people for the purpose of harassing them. On various occasions, the police have invaded lesbian and gay discos and assaulted partygoers. LGBT persons fear contacting the police in cases of domestic violence, recognizing that they may be arrested and that the offending partner is also at great risk of serious mistreatment in police custody.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The Belarusian LGBT movement is one of the youngest in Europe. It operates in one of the most repressive political environments, nearly in full international isolation, without public support inside the country. Attempts at consolidation undertaken by LGBT groups in 2007 give vital hope for a growing movement to benefit the Belarusian LGBT community as a whole. The most important step in the near future is seen to be a public campaign to change the legislation affecting the relationship between NGOs and the government; this will allow LGBT groups to work openly and more effectively. The second step is the promotion of antidiscrimination legislation. The Belarusian LGBT movement can only achieve these goals by working in alliance with other organizations that fight for human rights, women’s rights, and other progressive causes in the country.

Undoubtedly, gradual change in the political regime and future integration within the European Union will play an important role in the improvement of the situation of LGBT people in Belarus.

BELGIUM

David Paternotte and Alexis Dewaele

OVERVIEW

Belgium is a small constitutional monarchy that was founded in 1830. It is situated in the west of Europe, between the North Sea, the Netherlands, Germany, the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, and France. It covers 12,570 square miles and has about 10 million inhabitants. The main cities are Brussels, Antwerp, Ghent, Charleroi, and Liège. There are three official languages: Dutch, French, and German. Belgium also hosts most of the European Union (EU) institutions (the European Commission, the European Council, and the European Parliament) and the NATO headquarters. The International Lesbian and Gay Association (ILGA) and ILGA-Europe are located in Brussels.

For historical reasons, Belgium is divided along cultural, linguistic, religious, and philosophical lines. However, culture and language are the most relevant cleavages, and the opposition between Dutch-speaking people (60% of the population) and French-speaking people (40%) is one of the main keys to understanding the functioning of the country. In 1993, cultural conflicts and regional disparities led to the federalization of the state, which is now composed of three regions (the Flemish Region, the Walloon Region, and the Brussels Capital Region) and three communities (the Flemish Community, the French Community, and the German Community). Because of a complex distribution of powers, the federal state, communities, regions, and local authorities are all considered relevant actors concerning LGBT policies.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

After many decades of liberal tolerance and moral conservatism, the situation of LGBT people has changed dramatically. In recent years, legal reforms, including those related to same-sex marriage and adoption, have been passed, and public policies dealing with LGBT matters are being implemented. However, LGBT themes remain poorly explored in university, which explains a lack of knowledge about many aspects of the history and the situation of LGBTs in the country.¹

LGBs are a difficult research population with specific characteristics.² They are called a hidden population because of their optional coming out.³ Only those who choose to come out as gay, lesbian, or bisexual (and thus identify themselves as an LGB) are visible, and the authorities hardly register sexual orientation in research or population surveys, which explicates a scarcity of information. However, several efforts have been recently made to get a better view of the social status of this minority. Transgendered Belgians are even less visible. They have recently begun to organize, and the trans issue is brand new on the political agenda.⁴ The first research project investigating the social situation of transgendered people in Belgium has started recently.

EDUCATION

In 1980, a French-speaking lesbian teacher, Eliane Morrissens, was fired because she revealed the professional problems caused by her sexual orientation on television.⁵ Since then, the situation of homosexuality and bisexuality at school has noticeably changed, especially in Flanders, where ambitious public policies have been implemented to tackle this issue. However, recent data concerning teenagers' attitudes remain worrying, as many of them do not support equal rights for LGBs.⁶

In Flanders, LGBs appear to be less educated than heterosexuals, even after controlling for age and the educational level of the father. Twice the proportion of LGBs (12%) have no current job compared to heterosexuals (5%).⁷ Although it is always difficult to compare a relatively large group of heterosexuals with a small subsample of LGBs, these data might indicate the vulnerability of LGBs at school, as well as during their educational trajectories. It comes as no surprise that several reports refer to the school environment as one dominated by heteronormativity, and point out the invisibility of LGBs. One-fifth of LGB teachers stay closeted within the school environment, and most pupils and LGB teachers do not receive LGB-relevant information and training at school.⁸ Although two-thirds of Flemish pupils consider that homosexuality can be discussed at school, they still would not come out if they were homo- or bisexual. Girls appear more tolerant of homo- and bisexuality than boys. The type of schooling also plays a significant role concerning attitudes: art- and theoretical-oriented school environments are more tolerant than technical and professional-oriented schools.⁹ Thus, the mental well-being of LGB youth is precarious,¹⁰ and more efforts are required to make them feel secure and accepted.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, several initiatives have been taken by the Flemish community since 1995 to supply helpful information and make educational material available to parents, teachers, and training experts. These efforts encompass the development and distribution of educational brochures, awareness-raising methodologies, and guidelines for LGB volunteers who visit schools.

Methodologies are also aimed at tackling LGB issues with challenging groups (like youngsters with a Muslim background) and within associations for adult education. Finally, lists of LGB-oriented literature and video material are made available.

Fewer initiatives have been taken in French-speaking Belgium, where homophobia at school is a new political issue. In 2003, a survey on health promotion and suicide prevention for LGB youngsters at school, financed by the health minister of the French Community, was published.¹¹ In 2006, the education minister of the French Community published an educational guidebook on homophobia at school, which has been sent to every primary and high school in French-speaking Belgium.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Belgium is a modern and open economy, in which services represent more than 65 percent of economic activities. In 2000, the country's gross domestic product (GDP) was approximately 250 billion euros (US$349 billion, almost 3% of the EU total GDP), and productivity is higher than the European average. Per capita income was 62,560 euros (US$87,280, 20% above the EU average). However, public finances are still characterized by a high public debt/GDP ratio (which is now decreasing), and the unemployment rate remains elevated (about 8.6% of the active population in 2000). Belgium is a modern welfare state. The national social security system was established in 1944, and includes retirement pensions and obligatory health insurance.¹²

Diversity at work is becoming an issue in both public and private companies, and is being expanded so that it includes gays and lesbians. In April 2005, the SERV (the socioeconomic board of Flanders) published a note on LGBs and the labor market. It stressed the lack of quantitative data and the invisibility of LGBs, making it impossible to evaluate their participation in the labor market.¹³ Although several reports reveal some LGB-specific problems within the work environment (e.g., discrimination, fear of coming out, etc.), little is known about the representation and experiences of LGBs within different sectors and employment segments in Belgium.

In recent years, some reports have provided insight into the barriers experienced by LGBs at work. In 2004, almost 3,000 Flemish LGBs were surveyed about a diverse range of topics (sexual identity, mental well being, experiences of discrimination, etc.), and compared with a representative sample of the Flemish population. On average, LGBs appear to work more hours per week and they more often fulfill a management role. However, even though they have a higher educational level, homo- and bisexual men earn less than heterosexual men. No income difference has been found between lesbian/bisexual and heterosexual women. The same survey results point out that approximately three percent of the respondents were fired, missed a promotion, or did not get a job because of their sexual orientation. Another seven percent think this has been the case, but are not sure. One-fifth of the respondents experienced negative reactions from colleagues or superiors because of their sexual orientation.¹⁴ Finally, compared to Flemish workers in general, LGBs feel less committed to their colleagues.¹⁵

Another recent survey shows that the attitudes towards LGBs within the federal civil service are quite negative.¹⁶ One-third of roughly 800 surveyed civil servants report that it is rather difficult to come out at work (compared with only 1 out of 10 who think it is not). Forty-six percent state that mocking LGBs is common, and more than one-third have heard their colleagues talking about LGBs in negative terms (e.g., using words such as faggot, sissy, etc.). Ultimately, 31 percent think that talking openly about being LGB at work can damage one's career. These elements might explain why two-thirds of the LGBs surveyed (9% of the total sample) do not come out at work.

This latter study was financed by the Federal Minister of Equal Opportunities. Until now, no initiative has been taken by public authorities to improve the situation of LGBs at work, even though there is a growing awareness that something should be done. A new study concerning discrimination against LGBs in the labor market has been ordered by the Federal Center of Equal Opportunities and Opposition to Racism. This focuses on the specific situation of LGB workers with a low level of education. The results should lead to an adjusted policy within the work environment.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Social and government programs that aim to eradicate homophobia and support LGBT people have been implemented in Belgium for more than a decade. A federal minister is responsible for equal opportunity policies, including sexual preferences and gender identity. Furthermore, two specialized bodies, the Center for Equal Opportunities and Opposition to Racism and the Institute for Equality of Women and Men, are in charge of promoting equal opportunities and combating discrimination.

The Flemish government has developed ambitious policies on LGBT matters. Since 1995, there has been a minister for equal opportunities, with a whole administration devoted to these policies. Inspired by the model of gender mainstreaming, sexual orientation is being mainstreamed into all Flemish policies, and an academic study center, the Policy Research Centre on Equal Opportunities, which includes researchers on LGBT issues, has been set up at the universities of Antwerp and Hasselt. This investigates topics related to discrimination and equal opportunities, and gives advice to the minister. There have been fewer initiatives in French-speaking Belgium, even though a dramatic change has been observed in recent years. The minister-president of the French Community is also responsible for equal opportunities, and has taken some measures to combat homophobia at school. The Walloon minister of equal opportunities is explicitly in charge of LGBT issues, and has supported the creation of new LGBT organizations. Up until now, in the region of Brussels Capital, equal opportunity policies have been restricted to gender equality. City councils are increasingly involved in such policies, even in small towns or villages.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

No systematic survey of LGBT sexuality has been conducted in Belgium. However, research on HIV/AIDS has revealed some features of Dutch¹⁷ and French-speaking¹⁸ gay male sexuality (no research has been done on lesbian sexuality).

Research on the knowledge and behavior concerning HIV/AIDS of men who have sex with men (MSM) in French-speaking Belgium shows that a huge majority of respondents (88%) consider themselves homosexuals, seven percent as bisexuals, and five percent do not define themselves. Most of the Belgian MSM are sexually active (96–98%),¹⁹ and most have declared that they have sexual intercourse more than once a month. Only four percent of them have had no sex during the last 12 months. Seven percent have had sexual intercourse with a female partner during the last year. Nineteen percent of the respondents declare 1 male sexual partner in the last year, 57 percent 6 partners or more, and 23 percent more than 20 partners. Most of the French-speaking respondents meet their partners on the Internet, which is followed by meetings at saunas and bars/discos. Seventy-five percent have had a stable relationship with a man in the last 12 months, and half of the respondents were in a stable relationship with a man at the time of the survey. Anal penetration is more common with a stable partner than with casual ones. From the Flemish research, we learn that 42 percent of MSM have never had anal sex, 41 percent have had anal sex with one partner, and 17 percent with several partners. Some data are available on the risky behavior of Flemish MSM. Seventy-five percent of them have had sex while taking some drug (e.g., XTC, cocaine, poppers) in the last three months, and 16 percent have done so a few times. Half of the Flemish MSM with several sex partners (17% of the total sample) do not always use a condom. The same number do not know the serostatus of their sex partners.

Two recent sexual scandals are telling when it comes to sexual morality and the frontiers of legitimate sexual behaviors in Belgium. In 1984, the owners of the main Belgian saunas, Macho I and II, were arrested and charged with incitement to debauchery. They spent several weeks in jail and faced a three-year trial. They were discharged in 1987 because of a lack of evidence. This affair has publicized what is legally considered as debauchery. (Homo)sexual intercourse is only allowed if they involve no more than two consenting adults who share an affective or love bond. Therefore, debauchery includes sexual acts with minors, and those considered promiscuous and/or perverse.²⁰ Even though it has not been used to penalize homosexual encounters for years, this definition has never been challenged until now.²¹

In 1996, another scandal highlighted some of the frontiers of contemporary Belgian sexual morality. In the context of the Dutroux case, an instance of pedophilia that shook Belgian society, two closeted gay ministers were accused of having sexual intercourse with minors. They were finally discharged, leading to a clear dissociation between pedophilia and homosexuality in public discourse. Nonetheless, by the same token, this affair has contributed to making pedophilia the main sexual taboo in contemporary Belgium.

FAMILY

In recent years, family has become a crucial issue for the Belgian LGBT movement, which mirrors a new social reality. A large quantitative Flemish research project²² shows that 42 percent of the respondents would like to have a child (36% of the men and 55% of the women). Twelve percent of those who do not want to have a child explain that their choice is due to the lack of a suitable partner, and 11 percent of the sample is already raising a child. More than 80 percent of these children come from a former heterosexual relationship, 16 percent were conceived by in vitro fertilization, 8 percent were adopted, and 3 percent have other origins, such as coparenting or surrogacy.

Most of the children raised by LGBTs in Belgium come from former heterosexual relationships. However, an increasing number of children are being born within an LGBT family.²³ Most of them are raised by a lesbian couple, with one of the partners having been inseminated by an anonymous donor. Indeed, this technique is not restricted to married heterosexual couples, and the Vrije Universiteit Brussel (VUB), the Flemish Free University of Brussels, has developed pioneering and internationally renowned research on assisted reproductive technologies. It has been inseminating lesbians since the early 1980s. All of these medical innovations have been accompanied by a psychological follow-up of these children, which has demonstrated the absence of difference in the psychological development of children raised by same-sex and different-sex partners.²⁴

Eight percent of the children raised by LGB parents in Belgium have been adopted. Until 2006, same-sex couples were not allowed to adopt a child jointly. However, a single person could, and some gay men (chiefly) used this legal opportunity to become fathers. It was more common in Flanders, where sexual orientation was not an impediment to adopt, than in French-speaking Belgium, where LGBs were obliged to hide their sexual preference during the adoption process. However, there was no legal bond between the child and the partner of the adoptive parent until 2006. With the new adoption law, same-sex couples are now allowed to adopt as a couple, and an LGB can also adopt his or her partner's child.

Three percent of these children were born in other contexts, such as coparenting or surrogacy. Coparenting projects arise from the decision of nonconjugal couples to conceive together. They may involve more than two persons, as partners may be part of the initial project and also bring up the child. Therefore, coparenting raises the issue of the legal recognition of parenting (which is called parenté sociale). Indeed, the two biological parents are the only ones who enjoy rights and obligations towards the offspring, and the introduction of a legal status for non-biological parents is being discussed in parliament.²⁵ Surrogacy is characterized by a legal vacuum. As it is not explicitly banned, some gay couples appeal to a surrogate mother. Nonetheless, this reproductive technique does not grant full parental rights over the child.

The paternity or maternity of transgender persons is another burning issue. Some Belgian hospitals have developed techniques that allow transgendered individuals to have children after their sex reassignment operation.²⁶ However, the new law on transsexuality prevents them from procreating in their former sex, and this might lead to legal controversies in the near future.

Finally, LGBT families cannot be restricted to legal and institutional debates about same-sex partnership and the possibility for same-sex partners to raise children. Families of choice, or chosen families,²⁷ must also be taken into account. These families reflect the risk for LGBs of having disturbed or broken family relationships because of their sexuality, and are characterized by the significance of friendship ties (friends as family). Flemish research shows that LGBs feel less committed to their family members than average Flemish people. Almost half (48%) of the supportive network of Flemish people (without a partner) is composed of family members, compared to only 17 percent of LGBs (without a partner). Furthermore, the latter group has a support network, which is composed of friends for 64 percent. For the average Flemish (without a partner), only 39 percent of his or her network is composed of friendship relations. Hence, these data prove the importance of friendship networks for LGBs. Nonetheless, these networks do not offer LGBs an equal amount of support when comparing them with the average Flemish: 8 percent of LGBs have no confidants, compared to only 2 percent of Flemish people.²⁸

COMMUNITY

The first reliable traces of a gay life in Belgium date back to Antwerp in 1781. At the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th, Brussels, Antwerp, and Liège functioned as venues for Belgians, Dutch, and Germans.²⁹ Nonetheless, as in many Western countries, a real gay life only emerged after World War II. Nowadays, the Belgian commercial scene is mainly concentrated in Brussels and Antwerp, even though there are some bars, saunas, and discos in Liège, Ghent, Ostend, and Charleroi.

The first Belgian gay and lesbian organization was founded by a woman, Suzan Daniel, in Brussels in 1953. Created after the third Conference of the International Committee for Sexual Equality (ICSE), it was called Centre Culturel Belge—Cultuur Centrum België (CCB) and included both men and women, Flemish and Francophones. Nevertheless, sexual and cultural divisions quickly emerged. A couple of men founded the Centre de Culture et Loisirs—Cultuur- en Ontspanning-sentrum (CCL—COC) in 1954, which became Infor Homo a few years later. Like many other Belgian organizations, this group rapidly split up because of linguistic conflicts, and evolved into a French-speaking association.

In the 1960s and '70s, the Flemish gay and lesbian movement gained its autonomy. In 1968, the first Belgian community services center was launched in Antwerp (the Gesprekscentrum, later Gespreks- en Onthaalcentrum). The first student groups emerged during the same period in Leuven and Ghent. In 1972, the first LGBT coordination, Infoma (Informatie—(Homofilie)—Maatschappij), was set up. Sjaloom, another federation gathered around Christian groups, became the first group to get public funding in 1976. A leftist group, the Rooie Vlinder, was also created in 1976. It later became the Roze Aktie Front. In 1977, Infoma and Sjaloom were obliged to join in a new Flemish federation, the FWH (Federatie Werkgroepen Homofilie/Homoseksualiteit). The FWH, which competed with the Homoliga between 1990 and 2006, quickly became a relevant actor in Flemish civil society. In 2002, it changed its name into Holebifederatie. In 2009, it became Çavaria. Currently, it employs 15 people, has a budget of $1,100,000, and is responsible for more than 100 groups. It was joined by transgendered people in 2005. Moreover, the years 1990 and 2000 were characterized by a tremendous explosion and diversification of LGB groups, which came out in almost every Flemish town. Some are now focused on women, youngsters, the elderly, or migrants. The youth LGBT federation, Wel Jong Niet Hetero, has more than 15 groups and community services centers in Antwerp, Ghent, Hasselt, and Brussels.

In French-speaking Belgium, the CCL, later called Infor Homo, became the main organization of the 1960s and '70s. A more radical group strongly influenced by the French MHAR (Movement Homosexuel d'Action Révolutionnaire) and connected to Flemish groups, the MHAR, appeared in the '70s, but rapidly vanished. At the end of the '70s, a new group called Antenne Rose emerged in Brussels. This became Tels Quels a few years later, and grew into the most important French-speaking association of the '80s and '90s. As in Flanders, the second half of the '90s and first years of the new millennium were characterized by a diversification of the associative landscape. In 1999, a new federation, the Fédération des Associations Gayes et Lesbiennes (FAGL), was founded. Community service centers developed in Brussels, Liège, and Namur. In 2005, the first French-speaking trans group, Trans-Action, was set up, and Arc-en-Ciel Wallonie, the first Walloon LGBT Federation, was constituted in 2007.

The first Belgian lesbian and gay marches, called Roze Zaterdag (Pink Saturdays), were organized in Flanders by the Rooie Vlinders from 1979 until 1982. After a break of eight years, the Roze Aktie Front revived this tradition in 1990, and LGBT marches occurred every two years in a different Flemish town. Since 1996, Flemish and French-speaking LGBT federations have jointly organized the Belgian lesbian and gay pride parade, which takes place in Brussels every year.

HEALTH

The health of LGBs has mainly been investigated in terms of HIV/AIDS and safe sex-related behavior, as research shows that gay and bisexual men are primarily affected by HIV/AIDS.³⁰ On the other hand, investigation has focused on the stigmatized status of LGBs.³¹ Indeed, the stigma of belonging to a sexual minority goes hand in hand with internal stressors (e.g., internalized homophobia, anxiety, feelings of depression) and external stressors (e.g., experiences of discrimination, bullying). Hence, LGBs who experience a heteronormative or stigmatizing environment suffer from stigma consciousness and internalized homonegativity.³² Young homosexuals are also more susceptible to depression and suicidal ideation than young heterosexuals.

HIV/AIDS

The first AIDS case was registered in Belgium in 1982. The gay community was the first to be struck by aids, before its spread amongst heterosexuals, African migrants, and drug addicts. Nonetheless, the epidemic has not been as serious as in some other Western countries. From 1982 to December 31, 2005, 19,070 people were diagnosed HIV positive. Among men who have sex with men, an important increase in the number of contaminations has been reported for the period 1997–2005. In 2002, 23.1 percent of the HIV cases were due to homosexual contact. In 2005, this proportion had risen to 32.9 percent.³³

These recent statistics show a worrying evolution. As in most western European countries, the incidence of HIV and the number of unsafe sex contacts between gay or bisexual men are increasing.³⁴ Some even speak of a second major health crisis.³⁵ In 2005, 85 percent of the new HIV positive diagnoses were men, and 75 percent of them were probably infected through homosexual contact.³⁶ Recently, a new research project has been launched at Ghent University to map the important determinants of risky sex behavior.

Mental Health

In 1999, the results of the first large-scale quantitative and qualitative research project concerning LGBs in Flanders revealed that almost one-fifth of the roughly 1,500 surveyed LGBs had consulted a physician or psychotherapist for a problem related to their sexual orientation at least once in their lifetime. Another groundbreaking study highlighted young LGBs' vulnerable position. LGB youngsters (from 15 to 27 years) have twice the risk of suicidal ideation, and four times the risk for suicide attempts compared to heterosexual youngsters. Young lesbian and bisexual girls seem even more fragile, as they have a six-fold increased risk of suicide attempts.³⁷ These results and others have opened the eyes of LGB associations and policy actors in Flanders.

A second large-scale quantitative project was ordered by the Flemish Minister of Equal Opportunities in 2003 to explore the impediments that LGBs encounter in their lives. It revealed that one-fifth of the 2,931 respondents feel quite powerless in solving their personal problems, and that more than one-tenth, especially young or less educated respondents, think they have so many problems that they are unable to solve them. Furthermore, twice as many LGB youngsters report severely depressive symptoms compared to heterosexual youngsters, and lesbian and bisexual women score higher than homo- and bisexual men in every age group. However, 77 percent of LGBs perceive their health as good to excellent, a result that does not differ from that of the average Flemish population.³⁸ Finally, few objective physical health measures are available. Only one Flemish study comparing homo- and bisexuals with heterosexuals indicates that being LGB more than doubles the odds of having a chronic disease.³⁹

The health situation of other minorities within the LGBT group remains unclear. Elderly LGBs, for example, are an almost completely invisible group with their own specific health needs.⁴⁰ However, the perspective of a future in which an increasing part of the population will be above 60 raises the question of LGBT-friendly health and care facilities. On the other hand, transgendered people constitute an overmedicalized population, as they have mainly been studied from a medical and pathological perspective.⁴¹ At the same time, some empowering initiatives have emerged within medical studies. For instance, the academic hospital of Ghent has had a multidisciplinary genderteam since 1985, which helps transsexuals to cope with the process of sex reassignment.

POLITICS AND LAW

Little is known about the legal history of homosexuality in Belgium. Following the research conducted in other European countries, the repression of homosexuality during the ancien régime likely occurred within a broader prohibition of counter-natural, nonmarital, and nonreproductive sexual acts. However, some cases have been documented. The first death and execution on the grounds of sodomy in Europe took place in Ghent in 1292. In 1654, the renowned sculptor Hieronymus Duquesnoy was garroted in the same town, also because of sodomy. In 1618, two women were charged of lesbianism in Bruges and several trials against tribadism occurred in the 18th century.⁴²

After the victories of Jemappes (1792) and Fleurus (1794), the French annexed the Belgian territories in 1795. During the French period (1795–1815) and following the 1791 Code penal révolutionnaire, the Code des délits et peines of the 3ème brumaire an IV, and the 1810 Code imperial, the crime of sodomy was abolished. This decision has never been challenged, neither during the Dutch period (1815–1830), nor under the Belgian State (founded in 1830). Moreover, male homosexuals have never been formally banned from the military. However, the absence of explicit criminalization does not imply the disappearance of police molestation and legal prosecution, which occurred under the charges of debauchery, prostitution and procuring, outrage to public decency, or corruption of minors. In 1965, clause 372bis was added to the legal arsenal against homosexuality. Inspired by a French law introduced by the Vichy regime, it increased the legal age of consent for homosexual contact (18 years instead of 16) and attempted to prevent the seduction of boys by homosexual men. This was suppressed in 1985.

The suppression of clause 372bis marked the beginning of a new period in the legal history of homosexuality, characterized by the advocacy and the gaining of new rights. During the second half of the 1980s and the '90s, LGBT associations asked for the removal of legal discrimination against homosexuality, legal protection of sexual orientation, and the recognition of same-sex couples and LGB families. After more than 10 years of political and social debate, most of these requests have been turned into law.

In 1998, the first kind of legal recognition, the Contrat de Cohabitation légale, was offered to same-sex couples. It was not specifically designed for same-sex unions, but was accessible to every cohabiting couple regardless of the sexual orientation of its members and the nature of their ties. Hence, it could also be invoked by gay and lesbian couples. This recognizes fewer rights than marriage or civil partnership laws (it mainly concerns property law), and incorporates few obligations (excluding, among others, marital fidelity and consummation). However, it was improved in 2006.

In 2003, an antidiscrimination law, which explicitly mentions sexual orientation as a potential ground to be discriminated on, was passed by the Belgian parliament. This attempts to prevent any form of direct and indirect discrimination in the access to employment and working conditions, the provision of goods and services, and the participation in every economic, social, cultural, and political public activity. The Federal Center for Equal Opportunities and Opposition to Racism is in charge of watching over the application of the law, helping victims of discrimination, engaging legal proceedings on their behalf (like some habilitated LGBT organizations), and advising the Federal Minister of Equal Opportunities on possible improvements. The Federal Institute for the Equality of Women and Men deals with discrimination based on gender identity. In 2007, the 2003 antidiscrimination law was reformed because of a judgment of the constitutional court, and split into three different laws (one dealing with ethnicity, one with gender and transgender, and one with other grounds of discrimination, including sexual orientation).

In 2003, civil marriage was opened up to same-sex couples. Nonetheless, this law did not offer exactly the same rights as are available to different-sex couples. Gay and lesbian unions were denied filiation and adoption rights, and only Belgian or Dutch citizens could marry in Belgium. Since 2003, several legal reforms have been undertaken, and same-sex marriage is now almost identical to different-sex marriage. In 2004, the principle of residence was applied, allowing marriages between a Belgian and a foreigner, as well as the marriage of two foreigners who are Belgian residents. Since 2006, same-sex couples, regardless of their marital status, are also entitled to adopt a child jointly or to adopt their partner's child. Even though the presumption of paternity does not apply to same-sex unions, they have access to filiation law and may thus be recognized as the legal parents of their child.

In 2007, the Belgian parliament passed a law on transsexuality. This allows transsexuals to modify their first name and their picture on their identity card under the condition of hormonal therapy. To change their legal sex, a sex reassignment operation is required. Even if this law improves transsexuals' situation, it attempts to prevent any blurring between sex and gender. It also imposes an implicit obligation of sterilization. Indeed, this law subordinates the change of one's legal sex to the incapability to reproduce in one's biological sex.

These legal reforms have been supported by socialists (Parti Socialiste [PS] and Socialistische Partij Anders [SPA]) and Greens (Ecolo and Agalev/Groen) from both sides of the country, as well as by most Flemish Liberals (Vlaamse Liberalen en Democraten [VLD]) and some Flemish and French-speaking nationalists. French-speaking Liberals (Mouvement Réformateur [MR]), who are composed of both a historic secular and freemason branch and a more recent strong Christian group, are highly divided on LGBT issues. Christian Democrats (Christen-Democratisch en Vlaams [CD&V] and Centre Démocrate Humaniste [CDH]) have historically opposed such rights. However, since 2000, a dramatic shift has occurred in Flanders, where the CD&V, the Flemish Christian Democratic Party, has become more LGBT-friendly. Most of its MPs (members of parliament) voted in favor of same-sex marriage, and some of them wanted to back the opening-up of adoption to same-sex couples. Far-right parties (the French-speaking Front National [FN] and the well-organized Flemish Vlaams Belang) firmly oppose LGBT rights. Even though they are not yet numerous, some prominent politicians are openly gay or lesbian. Among them, the most renowned is Elio Di Rupo, the current president of the French-speaking Socialist Party (PS) and a former federal minister and minister-president of Wallonia.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

Belgium is a secular state that recognizes and supports the following denominations/faiths: Catholicism, Anglicanism, Protestantism, the Orthodox Churches, Judaism, Islam, Buddhism and the organized laïcité (i.e., a very secularized type of religion).

Although Belgium is a widely secularized country, Catholicism remains the main religion (about 75% of the population). Indeed, most Belgians consider themselves Roman Catholic, and the country has still a wide network of Catholic institutions (e.g., education, the health care sector, etc.). However, only a minority practices its religious beliefs, and religion does not seem to play an important part in the day to day attitudes of Belgians. Confirming this trend, research in different Flemish schools shows that there is no difference in attitudes towards homosexuality between pupils in a Catholic and a non-Catholic school.⁴³

Historically, the Catholic Church has always considered homosexuality to oppose its doctrine. In Belgium, too, there has been some commotion about the declarations of some Catholic officials concerning homosexuality. Nonetheless, there seems to be a discrepancy between the more gentle attitudes of the Belgian Catholic Church, which has been comparatively silent on same-sex marriage and adoption, and those of the Vatican hierarchy. The public funding of ministers of religion is probably part of the explanation for this.

Within the Belgian Catholic Church, some homosexual groups have been active for decades, and are among the oldest gay and lesbian associations in the country. Some of the founders of the Flemish gay and lesbian movement were priests, or did not hide being influenced by their Catholic faith. Today, there still is an organized group of LGB priests called holebipastores in Flanders. In the French-speaking part, a Christian gay and lesbian group, La Communauté du Christ Libérateur, was founded in 1974 by a Protestant man, and defends an ecumenical approach.

The organized laïcité, which originates from the historical struggles of the secular freemason bourgeoisie and the socialist movement against the Catholic Church, has historically backed LGBT claims. These were regarded as steps towards a more secular society, comparable with issues such as divorce, abortion, or euthanasia (which are all allowed in Belgium).

As in other European countries confronted with immigration by people with a Muslim belief, the question of the compatibility between the Islamic faith and LGBT rights has become a burning issue. Research on the attitudes of 16-year-old Belgian pupils has shown that homonegative attitudes (concerning equal rights for LGBs) are the most widespread amongst boys and pupils with a Muslim background. The latter feel very threatened by homosexuality, and often use religious arguments to motivate their rejection of it.⁴⁴

Combined with increasing Islamophobia, such information sustains the idea that Islam is incompatible with sexual equality, and that the Muslim minorities in western Europe threaten LGBT rights. At least until now, the climate between Muslim and sexual minorities has not polarized. On the contrary, at least in Flanders, action has been undertaken to stimulate the debate between both minorities, and to consult the Muslim community about this issue. The documentary My Sister Zahra, about the coming out of LGBs from an ethnic minority, was produced and disseminated successfully by Saddy Choua, someone from within the Muslim community. Other initiatives are promoted by the Flemish equal opportunities policy and executed by LGBT organizations. The Mazumgumzo project aims to make homosexuality debatable within different ethnic communities. The Wadi project is aimed to give educational training related to the specific needs of LGBs from an ethnic minority for social workers and other professionals within the health sector. At the same time, the specific psychotherapeutic needs of LGBs from ethnic minorities are being documented.

VIOLENCE

Homophobic violent acts have rarely been studied in Belgium. The annual report of the Center for Equal Opportunities and Opposition to Racism shows that 7 percent of all the complaints registered in 2006 concerned sexual orientation. Most of them (111 in total) were related to social problems (e.g., fights with neighbors), the denial of access to goods and services, representations of homosexuality in the media, and discrimination in the labor market. Seven complaints also referred to hate crimes.⁴⁵

The first research on violence against LGBs was recently published, and focuses on Brussels. A limited sample of 377 respondents (predominantly male, young, and highly educated) divulges that verbal homophobic aggression is the most commonly experienced crime act (60% of the respondents have experienced this once or several times in their lives). Furthermore, 19 percent have been threatened, 10 percent have been physically attacked, nine percent have been robbed or have had their belongings damaged, and three percent have been raped or assaulted. The offenders were often young (between 18 and 30 years), male, acted in a group (with three or more other offenders) and were unknown to the victim. Ninety percent of the victims have identified the crimes as homophobic because of the language used by the offenders. Few victims have reported these acts to the police because of a lack of confidence in police and justice, the fear of coming out, and/or bad experiences with the police in the past. The consequences of these aggressions (physical and verbal) can be severe: many felt shocked, reported low levels of perceived personal safety, and started to avoid certain places and intimate behavior in public spaces.⁴⁶ Several initiatives have been taken to tackle this problem. A few years ago, the Ministry of Justice started to register homophobic violence, and training is provided for police officers and magistrates.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

In recent years, Belgium has almost achieved complete legal equality for gays, lesbians, and bisexuals. However, LGBs are still discriminated against, and social equality is not yet a reality. Hence, along with an increasing interest in solidarity with LGBs worldwide, the attainment of social equality has become the main target of LGBT organizations and public authorities. This new aim implies a thorough transformation of their strategies, modes of action, and time expectations, as they are confronted with new interlocutors; changing minds requires more time than changing laws.

Diversity within LGBT groups constitutes another emerging issue, as the motto of the 2008 Belgian Lesbian and Gay Pride officially claims (Celebrate Diversity. United Minorities are the Majority). This involves paying more attention to gender, race, disability, faith, or age. It also means considering the political and social significance of sexual diversity—that is, the wide variety of sexual desires, behaviors, and fantasies—a topic that has been left aside over recent years because of the quest for civil rights. Finally, it entails giving more space to transgender issues, as they are barely visible in Belgian society and LGBT organizations' statements.

BULGARIA

OVERVIEW

Bulgaria is situated on the Balkan Peninsula of southeastern Europe. Its territory of 42,822 square miles is bordered by Romania to the north, Serbia and Macedonia to the west, Greece and Turkey to the south, and the Black Sea to the east.

Bulgaria is one of the oldest states in Europe. It was formed when migrating central Asian Turkic tribes merged with Slavic inhabitants of the Balkans in the 7th century. Historians often describe Bulgaria as a country developing on the periphery of strong empires. In the early centuries of its existence, the Bulgarian state managed to assert its place in the Balkans in spite of constant fighting with the Byzantine Empire. In the 14th century, the country was invaded by the Ottoman Empire and remained under its rule until the end of 19th century. Christianity was introduced to Bulgaria in the 8th century, and historians claim that the preservation of the Christian faith helped Bulgaria to preserve its national identity during the five centuries of Ottoman domination. Today, the largest percentage of the population is Eastern Orthodox Christian (estimated about 82.6%) followed by Muslim (12.2%), other Christian (1.2%), and other religious minorities (about 4%). The country's main ethnic groups are Bulgarians (about 83%), Turks (about 10%), and Roma (about 5%). The remaining estimated 4 percent of the population includes Macedonians, Armenians, Tatars, and other minorities.¹

At the beginning of 20th century, Bulgaria began developing as a capitalist country, but its economic development was interrupted by the World War I and II. In both wars, Bulgaria was an ally of Germany. The lost wars caused national catastrophes, which steered the country into the sphere of Soviet influence after a socialist revolution in 1944. From September 1944 to November 1989, Bulgaria functioned as a socialist country, a close ally of the Soviet Union, and a member of the Eastern Bloc. In 1989, there was a political turnover, which led towards gradual democratization, the reintroduction of a multiparty political system, and embracing the goals of a free market economy.

The transition from socialism to capitalism was not an easy one for Bulgaria. There was a prolonged period of economic stagnation that led to hyperinflation in the winter of 1996, and the overturning of the pro-socialist government. In July 1997, the country introduced a currency board, which helped to control the inflation. The reforms after 1997 gradually led to economic stabilization, and a relatively high rate of economic growth (over 5% since 2000; 6.1% for 2006). The country joined NATO in 2004 and the European Union (EU) in January 2007. The gross domestic product (GDP) per capita was $10,700 in 2006.² As of 2007, Bulgaria occupied the last position among the EU member states in regard to population income. Today, the main obstacles to Bulgaria's progress are corruption in the public administration, a weak judiciary, and organized crime. Low productivity of labor is often cited as the main economic reason for slow improvement of the standard of living.

Economic and political trends in Bulgaria after 1989 led to a growing gap between the new rich and the poor, as well as an increase in the number of socially marginalized people such as the elderly, the disabled, and the Roma, who were economically segregated for physical or cultural reasons.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

LGBT people are among the least tolerated groups according to the 2007 survey, "Attitude towards Minority Groups and Discriminative Outlook in Bulgarian Society," ordered by the national Commission for Protection from Discrimination, and conducted by Skala Research Agency.³ The survey involved 1,200 people from 100 different locations in Bulgaria. According to the report, over 50 percent of the respondents would not like to work in the same room with a homosexual person, and 78 percent would not enroll their children at a school where there is a homosexual teacher. Over 70 percent responded that they would never become friends with a homosexual person. At the same time, 53.3 percent of the respondents said that they had never had contact with a homosexual person, which indicates the high level of invisibility of the LGBT population in Bulgaria. The least tolerated group within the LGBT population is the group known as transvestites, the term used in Bulgaria to identify men who dress as women, regardless of sexual orientation or gender identity. Fifty-seven percent of all respondents expressed a radically negative attitude towards this group; 53.8 percent of the respondents expressed a total lack of tolerance toward gay men, while 52.8 percent expressed lack of tolerance toward lesbians.

LGBT people in Bulgaria have no restrictions on organizing movements, holding demonstrations, or establishing formal or informal organizations. The first nonprofit nongovernmental organization that openly identified as a "gay rights organization" in its by-laws and founding documents was Bulgarian Gay Organization Gemini (BGO Gemini), legally registered in 1992. In the past few years, several other organizations that self-identify as LGBT support organizations have been formed: the Queer Bulgaria Foundation, Bilitis Lesbian and Bi-Women Resource Center, and Gay Sports Club Tangra in 2004, and LGBT Idea in 2006. There are also several informal hobby-based clubs for gay men. Most of these organizations and informal groups operate in Sofia, although some of them actively liaise with people from outside the capital.

LGBT issues entered public discourse and the mass media in the second half of the 1990s, when the first generation of gay and lesbian activists came of age. The majority of the activists were people with higher education who had lived or studied in the West, and maintained close contacts with activists from the western European LGBT movement (including the Dutch organization Cultuur en Ontspannings-Centrum [Centre for Culture and Leisure, COC] and the International Lesbian and Gay Association [ILGA]-Europe). They tried to promote LGBT rights in a country in which the double standard between public and private life was widely accepted from the time of socialism. The first media appearances of gay and lesbian activists took place in 1997–1998. They were associated with the work of the first gay organization in the country, BGO Gemini. In the first five years of its existence, this dealt mainly with safe sex among gay men. Towards the end of the 1990s, BGO Gemini developed a wider human rights agenda under the guidance of the Dutch peer organization, the COC.

EDUCATION

Bulgarian school curricula are centrally approved by the Ministry of Education. Primary and secondary education at public schools is fully subsidized by the state. Private schools exist only in the largest urban centers. They have greater freedom in introducing elective subjects and after-school activities, but first of all they need to cover all subjects in the compulsory curricula approved by the Ministry of Education. LGBT people and concerns are not discussed within the compulsory curriculum. Nongovernmental organization (NGO)-piloted programs, mainly those related to sexual health, sometimes touch upon the topic of sexual identities. The problem of such programs is that they last as long as the external funding lasts, and usually do not lead to significant changes in the content of the obligatory subjects.

A recent study conducted by BGO Gemini hints at the basis for homo-, bi-, and transphobia in the Bulgarian schools. It turns out that the diversity of sexual identities is not discussed within the compulsory secondary curriculum. LGBT people and concerns are not mentioned in several subjects dealing directly or indirectly with human sexuality, including psychology, ethics, world and personality, and philosophy. Homosexuality and bisexuality are also never mentioned when students learn about great historical personalities who were known to have same-sex relationships. BGO Gemini evaluated textbooks for 9th to 12th grade students in the subjects of literature, history, ethics, philosophy, world and personality, psychology, and logic. None of these textbooks discuss LGBT people or concerns. The specific chapter “Me and My Sexuality” in the psychology textbook for 9th grade students does not refer to LGBT identities at all; it discusses only heterosexuality. The textbook for the subject world and personality for 12th grade students briefly mentions homosexuality in one of its chapters, providing a neutral comment to the effect that some people develop love relationships with same-sex partners. When differences in society are discussed within any of these subjects, the only differences mentioned are religious and ethnic differences.⁴

Research on discrimination against LGBT students in secondary schools is currently being carried out by BGO Gemini within the scope of the above-mentioned project, but the final report is not yet available. Preliminary findings indicate that students have no one to talk to at school about their sexual orientation. Students do not trust the school psychologists and do not want to reveal their sexual orientation to them. LGBT youth is largely invisible at school except for transvestites, who are often ridiculed by their classmates.

Psychology is a compulsory subject in secondary education, but the curriculum does not include discussion of LGBT people or their concerns. The curricula for psychology courses at universities, on the other hand, include a number of essentialist and constructivist theories of homosexuality, bisexuality, and transsexuality.

Reliable data about the treatment of LGBT students at schools in Bulgaria has not yet been collected. An indication of the lack of special support is the absence of LGBT support groups or LGBT centers at Bulgarian schools.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

Macroeconomic stability and growth have characterized the Bulgarian economy since 1997, when the currency board was introduced. The Bulgarian lev is currently fixed to the euro. The GDP (purchasing power parity) was estimated at $79.05 billion in 2006.⁵ Raising the productivity of labor, the main reason for low income levels, is still considered a challenge. The public sector is relatively large in size and scope compared to the best performers among the EU member states. The regulatory environment for the economy is often characterized by analysts as one that relies too much on controls rather than on incentives.

The main law that protects the rights of LGBT people at the workplace is the antidiscrimination law of 2004, which bans discrimination at work on the basis of gender and sexual orientation (among other grounds). The law obliges employers to follow the principles of equal opportunity employment and to have written policies for a tolerant workplace, but no state monitoring of the implementation of this regulation has taken place so far.

In 2006, BGO Gemini implemented a project funded by the Democracy Commission of the U.S. Embassy in Sofia that analyzed employment practices with regards to tolerance in the workplace. Thirty companies and five nonprofit organizations from around the country participated in the project; fifteen of them agreed to be mentioned in the final report. This project had a twofold effect: it helped interested employers to create a tolerant workplace, and it gathered statistics on the current level of intolerance towards LGBT in the job market. The findings demonstrated that, up to this point, the antidiscrimination law has not exercised a considerable influence on employment practices. A survey of 951 employers and employees from around the country indicated that 79 percent of the homosexual employees are hiding their sexual orientation in the workplace. Sixty-seven percent of the homosexual respondents shared that they have occasionally felt subjected to psychological harassment at the workplace, and 34 percent of them have felt systematically harassed. Twenty-nine percent of the interviewed employers said that they would never employ an openly gay person, or one who is suspected by them to be gay.⁶ One explanation for the lack of effect of the antidiscrimination law on employment practices could be sought in the low fines that employers have to pay if they are convicted of discrimination—the maximum amount of the fine is 2,000 lev (1,022 euros, or US$1,430).

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

There are a few well-known sexologists with private practices based in Sofia who offer support to LGBT clients. Reparative therapy for LGBT people is not practiced in Bulgaria.

FAMILY

There was a visible backlash of conservatism in Bulgaria after the arrival of democracy in 1990. Socialism could not destroy the traditional patriarchal values within the family, although it promoted equality between men and women. The woman of the socialist family was often overburdened with the roles and responsibilities of worker, mother, and housewife. The procreative nuclear family became a norm during socialism, and remaining single or living as a married couple without children was considered immoral or highly undesirable. Most LGBT people survived this period through marriages of convenience and leading a double life.

After 1990, increased hostility towards minorities, resulting from the growing poverty and insecurity, led to the reemergence and official promotion of conservative values. The double standard between public and private life maintained during socialism remained the main way of hiding personal preferences regarding love and the family. Although the number of unmarried couples and single parents raising children is growing, the nuclear family continues to be the norm.

Today, LGBT people are freer to choose a life with their partner, and are not forced into heterosexual marriages of convenience as frequently as in the socialist past. Nevertheless, most of them prefer to keep their private life a secret. The few visible nonheterosexual couples are pop stars and some leaders of LGBT groups. Sometimes, pop icons who are open about their homosexuality deliver messages to the general public that reinforce stereotypes about gay men. For example, the pop-folk singer Azis, one of the brightest stars of Bulgarian popular music in the early 2000s, appeared on a widely watched TV talk show and disclosed that he is “a woman inside,” and his partner is heterosexual. This reinforces the popular stereotype that the gay couple mimics the heterosexual couple and one of the partners plays the role of the husband, and the other one the role of the wife. The one who plays the role of the husband is not perceived to be 100 percent gay. This also reinforces the stereotype that gayness in a man implies femininity.

The availability of private clinics for artificial insemination in the last few years has allowed lesbian women who can afford to pay to get pregnant and give birth. Lesbian couples raising their children together were not a rarity in the recent past, but their children were usually conceived during previous heterosexual marriages. Today, lesbians have more freedom to choose whether to conceive through vaginal intercourse or in an artificial insemination clinic. There is still family pressure on women to have a heterosexual marriage, especially in provincial areas. Lesbians who wish to lead lives without men need to migrate away from their relatives, preferably to one of the largest urban centers, where they will be able to live anonymously with their partners. To a large extent, this holds true for young gay men as well. Most gay men in Bulgaria feel much more comfortable sharing their sexual orientation with anyone other than their parents.

Gay couples involving at least one partner over 35 years old are now looking for informal partnerships with single women or with lesbian couples in order to raise children together, as adopting children is more difficult for single men than for single women as a rule. Although the adoption law does not enumerate restrictions on the gender of the parent, single men in Bulgaria have never successfully adopted children according to the official statistics. The reasons for that are purely moral and not legal. The members of the committees that approve adoption tend to share the patriarchal view that men are worse caregivers than women, and do not believe that a man is able to raise a child on his own. At the same time, there have not been many cases of single men applying to adopt children recorded, which means that the unwritten rules of adoption have largely been left unchallenged.

Second-parent adoption is not yet possible for children raised by lesbian or gay couples, because of the absence of state-recognized domestic partnership and gay marriage laws.

COMMUNITY

The only organized LGBT communities in Bulgaria are the hobby-based groups such as gay sports clubs. Internet-based communities are quite active, but they function mainly as an informal dating service. Leading activists from the existing LGBT rights organizations confess that there is very low interest in any form of political action among LGBT Bulgarians. Equality marches in the capital organized in the years 2005–2007 by BGO Gemini on May 17 (the International Day against Homophobia) have never had more than 20 people in attendance. These were usually the leading activists and the staff of the existing LGBT organizations coming together for the march. Police protection was provided, and there were no hostilities. Most of the people walking by either did not notice, or did not pay much attention to the march.

The first Gay Pride Parade was organized in 2008 by the Bulgarian Gay Organization Gemini and attracted 65 participants and many hate groups. The police arrested 60 people who tried to attack the pride rally. The event received strong media coverage and inspired heated debates about the need for a “public display of homosexuality.” Despite the strong opposition to the first gay pride event in 2008, a group of activists came together to organize the second pride parade in 2009. This time the event attracted over 350 people and there were no attacks due to very well-organized security measures. The street parade was protected by over 100 police officers and 70 private security guards. The gay pride event in 2009 marks a new enhanced level of self-organizing of the LGBT communities in Bulgaria. Activists of BGO Gemini and the Bilitis Resource Center for Lesbians and Bisexual Women came together with other active people who were not related to any LGBT organizations. For the first time community interests were well conceptualized and interorganizational tensions were overcome in the name of a common cause. The support from international embassies, including the Dutch, United Kingdom, French, and American, as well as from ILGA-Europe and the Intergroup on LGBT Rights at the European Parliament, helped to increase the political importance of the event. The increased number of participants in 2009 compared to the previous year can be contributed to the better organization and popularization of the event, as well as to its greater commercialization. For the first time the Pride Parade was transformed from a purely political march to an open-air festivity celebrating the visibility and equal rights of LGBT people in Bulgaria.

LGBT night life is quite vigorous in the large urban centers, especially Sofia and Varna, but it is hard to define it as a community life. People go to clubs for pleasure, and are usually not interested in taking part in organized activities with a political purpose. In the last few years, there has been a visible trend of gay night clubs becoming more and more mixed, welcoming all kinds of chic personalities, including heterosexual clients. The same could not be said for the lesbian night clubs. Lesbian clubs demonstrate restrictive entry rules, and are not so open to newcomers unless the latter are introduced by a regular client.

Bisexual people do not form an easily identifiable group. They can travel in gay/lesbian and in straight circles. It is commonly believed that bisexuals are still experimenting with their sexuality, and will sooner or later assume a gay or straight identity. As of 2007, no special programs have been developed by the Bulgarian LGBT organizations oriented exclusively toward bisexuals, and neither have Bulgarian bisexuals organized themselves into an independent organization.

The most visible group among LGBT people is the group of male transvestites. The distinction between a cross-dresser, drag queen, and transgendered person is not usually made in Bulgaria, and all of them are referred to with the common term transvestite. Transvestites are the preferred entertainers at night clubs. Some of them are quite famous as pop divas, singers and dancers, or evening talk show hosts. Another visible group of transvestites exists among the street prostitutes in Sofia. They are active at night in one specific downtown area, and sometimes trouble the residents with their behavior.

At the moment, there is no community center operating during the day except for the office of BGO Gemini in Sofia. The staff was hired and equipped using the first large grant provided by the Dutch government program MATRA in 2001.⁷ Initially, BGO Gemini was meant to be a safe house for LGBT people, providing space for discussions, movie screenings, and readings. The number of people using this safe house, however, has gradually decreased over the last few years as BGO Gemini transformed from a community-based organization into a professional advocacy group. Today, there are rarely any people aside from professional staff and the board of BGO Gemini visiting this office. The irony of greater professionalization of community-based organizations is that they often lose the intimate contact with the community that created them. BGO Gemini has not escaped this fate. Today, it is the most visible LGBT rights advocacy organization in Bulgaria, with the greatest number of externally funded projects per year, but the number of people within the LGBT groups who actively and visibly support what Gemini is doing is small. The activities of the organization rely primarily on the involvement of the paid staff and occasional volunteers recruited primarily among university students who need to complete an internship at an NGO. At the same time, the nature of projects implemented by the organization has changed over time from ones that are predominantly oriented towards the LGBT people to others that address the society at large and aim to decrease homo-, bi-, and transphobia.

The support organization Bilitis for lesbian and bi women emerged in 2004. It operates on a small scale, predominantly in Sofia. Its work includes the organizing of lesbian leadership camps, lesbian amateur sports, and lesbian and bisexual women's support groups. Occasionally, it supports events that benefit the larger LGBT community, such as the annual gay and lesbian cultural fest organized by the Sofia-based Center for Culture and Debate, the Red House. This was launched for the first time in 2005, and was once again staged in 2006, but with a decreasing audience. In 2007, it was reduced to the screening of a few LGBT-movies over two successive evenings.

Two other LGBT groups were started by former leaders of BGO Gemini after they had left the organization. The Queer Bulgaria Foundation, legally registered in 2004, started as an alternative to BGO Gemini, which many LGBT people criticized for being ineffective in addressing their concerns. However, the organization did not manage to become sustainable. It gradually decreased its activity and closed its office at the end of 2007 after implementing a few donor-driven projects.

LGBT Idea was legally registered in 2006. It operates a virtual cultural center, an online LGBT radio and maintains a detailed online bibliography of all existing publications in the Bulgarian language (articles and books) discussing LGBT people and concerns.

The reasons why LGBT people do not actively respond to the politically oriented initiatives proposed by formal LGBT organizations have often been debated in the circles of activists. The explanation is sought in the overall characteristics of Bulgarian civil society, which is described by social analysts as "a civil society without citizens."⁸ Low civic participation in important political processes is a common trend in countries with weak democracies. Civic action is not a major determinant of change in Bulgaria. Advocacy and consultative processes are carried out formally, with the help of small professional groups of experts (usually closely related to the government), and not in broad consultation with the citizens. LGBT Bulgarians are no more or less politically active than the average Bulgarian citizen. This lack of tradition of a mass-scale organized LGBT movement for equal rights seems impossible to comprehend at this stage of political development in the country.

HEALTH

Universal health care in Bulgaria exists only on paper today. The health care reform carried out after 1990 resulted in the deterioration of medical care for the vast majority of the population, especially for low-income groups.

The first empirical survey concerning the health status of LGBT people in Bulgaria was conducted by Queer Bulgaria in 2005, under the project called Improving Access to Health Care of LGBT People in Bulgaria, funded by the Open Society Institute New York.⁹ The survey included 280 people who identify as lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender from six major Bulgarian cities. The survey was based on in-depth structured interviews, which included not only questions regarding the health status of the people, but also general questions related to their self-identification, acceptance of their sexual identity from parents, colleagues, and friends, and their attitude to gay partnership. A limitation of the survey was that it reached out mainly to people between 19 and 40 years old with secondary or higher education, most of whom were employed. The study did not include the most socially disadvantaged groups. The survey also did not reach out to LGBT people living in small towns or villages. Out of the 280 people who were interviewed, 216 identified as men (gay or bisexual/MSM [men who have sex with men]), 57 as women (lesbian or bisexual) and 7 as transgender (gay, lesbian, or bisexual).

The survey indicated that there are no significant differences between the data gathered from LGBT people and that of heterosexuals in regard to physical activity, smoking, drinking, and general health care. The only difference was in the amount of drug use: the percentage of LGBT people using drugs turned out to be higher than the national average for people within the same age group, although most of the LGBT respondents indicated that their drug usage was a one-time trial usage.

Seventy-six percent of the interviewed women and 44 percent of the interviewed men in the Queer Bulgaria survey of LGBT health status indicated that they have a permanent sexual partner, while 20 percent of the women and 10 percent of the men shared that they have more than one permanent sexual partner. At the same time, 56 percent of the women and 76 percent of the men shared that they have casual sexual encounters. Only 5 percent of the women and 15 percent of the interviewed men disclosed that they have had or currently have a sexually transmitted disease (STD). Forty-six percent of the men and 22 percent of the women have always used STD protection such as condoms or medical gloves during all sexual intercourse, while 15 percent of the men and 2 percent of the women have used protection only with casual partners. For women, these percentages are similar to the national average for using protection during sexual intercourse, while for men—they are higher. None of those surveyed revealed that they are HIV positive.

The survey indicated that the majority of LGBT people are likely to avoid going to the doctor if they fear that they must disclose their sexual orientation. Only 11 percent of the women and 21 percent of the men believed that the medical workers have adequate understanding of the needs of LGBT patients.

Among all other sexual minorities, the needs of intersexual people are most overlooked. The dominant medical paradigm is still one that tries to convert the intersexual person into a man or a woman. The most common form of intersexuality, the androgen insensitivity syndrome among men, is treated by sex change operations, in which the doctors extract the gonads, which are usually hidden in the body, and modify the genitals to take the shape of female genitals. The patient is not given a choice of gender. No representative research of the situation of intersexual persons in Bulgaria has been carried out so far. Single cases can be detected on the Internet, when someone publishes a notice that he or she is looking for contacts with others like him or her.

Sex change operations and gender change at will are implemented in Bulgaria after a court decision to change the individual's personal identification, which is grounded on a supportive statement issued by a commission of psychiatrists and sexologists.

In Bulgaria, AIDS has never been considered a problem initiated by the gay minority. Official statistics of the Ministry of Health since 1986 consistently show that only a small percent of the total number of HIV-infected people in the country have had same-sex contacts.

According to information collected by the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS)-Bulgaria,¹⁰ 803 people infected with HIV lived in the country between 1986 and 2007. These people are officially registered as HIV positive with the Ministry of Health. A leading method of transmission of HIV infection in Bulgaria is sexual intercourse (83%), followed by intravenous use of drugs (13%), and blood transfusion (3%). About 1 percent of HIV-positive people in Bulgaria are born with the disease. The majority of HIV-positive people acquire the disease through heterosexual intercourse, but in the last two years the number of infected men who had acquired HIV through same-sex contact has increased. The number of HIV-positive intravenous drug users has increased tremendously over the last two years as well. The last cases of infection through blood transfusion were detected in 1996. Most of the HIV-positive people live in the four largest Bulgarian cities: Sofia, Varna, Plovdiv, and Burgas. The total number of infected men is 3.5 times greater than the number of infected women.

A national-level HIV/AIDS prevention program has been implemented by the Ministry of Health, funded by the Global Fund for AIDS, and contracted out to NGOs from around the country. The target groups of the program are intravenous drug users, prostitutes, the Roma community, and youth of all backgrounds. Preventive measures for different target groups have been developed. Safe sex programs targeting young people focus on condom usage, and are implemented by youth organizations from around the country. Special safe sex programs for the LGBT groups have been implemented by BGO Gemini in the late 1990s, and in 2007 by the Queer Bulgaria Foundation. A recent project implemented by the Queer Bulgaria Foundation involved AIDS testing by a mobile medical unit at Sofia-based night clubs frequented by relatively affluent gay men. The main criticism of the safe sex and AIDS prevention programs implemented by LGBT organizations is that they do not usually reach out to the people who are really in need of safe sex education, free condoms, or free AIDS testing, such as Roma prostitutes and other low-income people. On the other hand, a number of non-LGBT organizations carry out safe sex and AIDS prevention programs in Roma communities, communities of intravenous drug users, and among young prostitutes. In theory, these programs should reach out to the LGBT members of those groups as well.

POLITICS AND LAW

The overall democratization of the Bulgarian legal and political system after 1990 led to increased freedom of speech and association. Today the Bulgarian laws are compliant with the universal standards for human rights and EU directives.

Until 2002, there was a discriminatory article in the Bulgarian penal code (article 157, paragraph 4) that envisioned sanctions and public censure for people displaying their homosexuality in public or in a scandalous way. Although that was a dead provision that had not been used for starting legal actions in the last few years, the mere existence of such an article in the penal code signaled a discriminatory treatment of homosexuality by the judiciary. The revision of the penal code conducted under the pressure from the European Commission as part of the EU-accession process of Bulgaria led to the abolition of this article.

Two years later, in January 2004, Bulgaria adopted a new antidiscrimination law, which is considered to be one of the best in Europe. Sexual orientation is mentioned among other grounds on which discrimination is prohibited, including race, sex, religion, disability, and age. The law bans discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation in the fields of employment, health care, and education, recruitment to the military, housing, accommodation, and a range of services available to the public. It also provides protection against harassment and victimization. Sexual orientation is explicitly defined in the text of this law as heterosexual, bisexual, or homosexual orientation.

The antidiscrimination law consolidated into one legal text protection against discrimination, victimization, and harassment, which until then was scattered and ineffective. In 2006, the Antidiscrimination Commission was formed as an independent public body guaranteeing maximum enforceability of the new law. This commission is reviewing complaints separately from the courts. It consists of experienced individuals dedicated to human rights.

Since January 2004, four legal cases have been initiated by individuals who have experienced discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. All of the cases were won by the claimants. One of the cases became emblematic for the effectiveness of the new law, because it attacked a case of discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation in Sofia University Saint Kliment Ohridsky, one of the most respected public institutions in the country. The case was started by several gay men, supported by the Queer Bulgaria Foundation, who had been banned from using the university's sauna on the grounds that they were gay. The court compelled Sofia University to pay a fine to the gay claimants and to allow them to use the sauna on equal grounds with all other clients. The case was widely covered in the mass media.

In 2007, some changes to the penal code led to its complete modernization and the abandonment of language that was discriminatory to homosexuals. Texts that envisioned different penalties for the same crimes if committed by heterosexual and homosexual people were abolished (article 157). Sex crimes were no longer differentiated on the basis of the sexual orientation of the perpetrator. A definition of pedophilia was introduced, preventing the comparison of pedophilia with homosexuality. The only recommendation that could be made to the Bulgarian penal code at this stage would be to introduce a general definition of hate crimes instead of listing a few types of hate crimes.

There is still no registered domestic partnership or gay marriage law in Bulgaria. The Bulgarian family code has not been significantly revised since 1985. In 2007, a draft law for registered domestic partnership for only heterosexual couples was submitted, but it did not reach the voting stage in parliament. The introduction of a same sex partnership law will be possible either after a revision of the constitution, which states that marriage is a union between a man and a woman, or after a revision of the family code, which might be modernized to introduce partnership as a new legal form of union between two people (without referring to their gender). Promoters of revision of the family code insist that the gender of the partners should not be mentioned in an amendment referring to registered partnership. Thus, the interests of both heterosexual and homosexual couples will be met.

RELIGION AND SPIRITUALITY

The dominant Orthodox Church displays a lack of acceptance of homosexuality whenever it is called upon to comment on this topic in the mass media. Members of parliament have made use of religious arguments in a recent discussion of proposed changes in the family code that envisioned the introduction of registered partnership law, though only for heterosexual couples. The action of LGBT activists to promote the inclusion of homosexual couples in the new partnership law was confronted by an appeal to traditional Christian values, and not by purely secular judicial arguments. This, however, does not mean that religion plays a major role in forming social attitudes toward LGBT people. Rather, it is an example of the populist use of religious notions by politicians in a secular context to stay on the safe side when discussing a potentially controversial subject.

Some organizations with religious affiliations, such as the online bookstore and publishing house for Christian literature, Memra, recently began to tackle the topic of sexual orientation. As a result of their work, Bulgaria saw the first book on reparative therapy translated from English, A Parent's Guide to Preventing Homosexuality, authored by Joseph Nicolosi. Prompted by LGBT activists, the Association of Bulgarian Psychologists provided a critical view of the book and demonstrated that reparative therapy does not have supporters among the leading Bulgarian psychologists.

VIOLENCE

Military

Since January 2007, Bulgaria has had a professional army. Prior to this date, military service was obligatory for men over 18 years old. Before the introduction of the antidiscrimination law in 2004, the Bulgarian military openly discriminated against gay men by treating homosexuality as a psychological disorder. The military recruiting commissions used to ask the sexual orientation of the young men, and those who confessed that they were gay were considered ineligible for military service. In practice, many gay men took advantage of this fact to avoid compulsory military service, because it was widely known that the army could not guarantee protection for gay soldiers. However, a confession was sometimes not enough. The person was asked to prove that he was gay, and usually sent for a series of psychological tests. Eyewitnesses report that the appearance of the person was usually the decisive factor in determining whether he was telling the truth about his sexual orientation in front of the military commission. Many straight-looking gay men have passed their military service without any complications, while non-straight-looking men have had problems in the army regardless of their sexual orientation.

A letter from BGO Gemini certifying that the man is a member of the organization and self-identifies as gay could also serve as a tool for releasing someone from the army by the military doctors. Although BGO Gemini is against the medicalization of homosexuality, it used to provide this form of support to young gay men who wanted to avoid entering the army due to fear of harassment.

OUTLOOK FOR THE 21ST CENTURY

The legal situation of LGBT people in Bulgaria is expected to gradually improve in line with European Union directives. Registered domestic partnership law and same-sex marriage law may come to pass in the 2010s. At the same time, the social attitude towards gay people will not be expected to change for the better in conjunction with the new laws. Recent surveys show a very high level of intolerance among heterosexual Bulgarians towards LGBT groups. The relatively rare reports of LGBT-related violence can be explained by incomplete statistics on hate crimes, and by the low visibility of the groups in question. If the visibility of the average gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transsexual person increases in public places beyond the night clubs and the pop-star environment, violence against such people may also rise, as it has in countries with stronger LGBT movements.

“I have nothing against gay people as long as they do not demonstrate their gayness in front of everybody” is a common saying in Bulgaria these days, which describes the most widespread attitude. Based on this, it could be expected that the LGBT population will remain invisible during the next few years, with occasional appearances of LGBT personalities, mainly in the spheres of art and pop culture.

CROATIA

Sanja Juras and Kristijan Grđan

OVERVIEW

The Republic of Croatia is located in eastern Europe. It is bordered by the Adriatic Sea to the west, Slovenia and Hungary in the north, Serbia to the east, and Bosnia and Herzegovina to the south. The mainland covers 21,851 square miles, and the surface area of its territorial waters totals 11,995 square miles. According to national statistical data there are 4,437,460 inhabitants in the Republic of Croatia.¹ In the Republic of Croatia, 88 percent of citizens belong to Catholic religion. The Muslim religion is represented at 1.27 percent, and Greek-Catholic at 0.9 percent.² The national revenues for 2006 amounted in US$17,972,425,660.³ According to Ministry of Defence data, the armed forces are composed of 32,886 regular soldiers and 32,360 reservists.

The first appearance of colonists at the geographical territory of Croatia dates from the 7th century. Under the Byzantine Empire, the colonists served in forces against the Avars; that in the first decades of the 7th century, Croats united to combat the Avars has been established. The first known Croatian duke was Duke Višeslav at the beginning of the 9th century. Croatia was divided into two parts—Pannonia and coastal Croatia. At the beginning of the 10th century, the Croatian Empire was established by Duke Tomislav of the Trpimirović Dynasty. Duke Tomislav unified Pannonia and coastal Croatia. In the year 925, Duke Tomislav became the first king of the Croatian Empire and was confirmed by Pope Ivan X. The history of the Croatian Empire involved a number of conflicts, leading to the separation of the Dalmatian parts of the territory. In the 10th century, the feudal regime was established. At the end of the 11th century, the Hungarian king Koloman conquered the Croatian Empire and, at the beginning of the 12th century, he made an agreement with 12 elders of the Croatian tribes, who confirmed him as a king of Croatia and Dalmatia. Although Croatia lost its independence and became part of the Hungarian Empire, it still maintained some of its attributes. Croatian remained part of the Hungarian Empire until the 18th century.

From the beginning of the 19th to the beginning of the 20th century, Croatia attempted to establish its independence; however, after 1848, it joined the Habsburg Monarchy. Just before the end of World War I in 1918, the Croatian parliament ended its relationship with the Habsburg Monarchy. The National Council of the State decided to join Serbia and Montenegro. Therefore, the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenians was established. In 1929, King Aleksandar proclaimed a dictatorship and established the Kingdom of Yugoslavia. King Aleksandar died in 1934, and Croatia was granted some autonomy in 1939.

After obtaining support from Germany, Italy, and Japan, the Croatian Party of Radical Rightists took power and established the Independent Republic of Croatia in 1941, led by Ante Pavelić. His regime implemented the Nuremberg Laws, established eight concentration camps, and started a campaign to eliminate Serbs, Jews, and Roma.

After the end of World War I, Croatia joined the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in 1945, led by Josip Broz Tito, who had established the Communist Yugoslav party in 1941. After Tito died in 1980, political, ethnic, and economic problems appeared.

In 1990, Croatia's first democratic elections were held and the Croatian Democrat Party, led by its president Franjo Tuđman, took power. The first session of the Croatian parliament was held on May 30, 1990, when the Croatian constitution passed. In 1991, after Croatia declared independence from Yugoslavia, the Great Serbian Forces (extremists that were located in Croatia), Yugoslavian National Army, Serbia, and Montenegro formed an alliance to wage war against Croatia.

Some parts of Croatia were occupied by the Yugoslavian National Army, and had to be reintegrated under Croatian authority by military force. The conflicts in the territory of the Republic of Croatia had tremendous impact on the Croatian, Serbian, and Bosnian peoples. As the war progressed, numerous Croatian cities, including Dubrovnik, Zagreb, Karlovac, and Vukovar were bombarded by Serbian military forces. Some sources show that about 550,000 Croats were internally displaced, 150,000 became refugees, 13,233 persons were killed, and 1,149 persons are still missing.

Ethnic cleansing had taken place on both sides. Genocide and other crimes against humanity marked recent Croatian history and influenced political disturbances in regard to the Croatian position in the war. While some considered war to be necessary for Croatian independence and believe that Croatia committed no crimes against humanity, others think that Croatia did commit war crimes and that they should be properly redressed. Such a political situation brought Croatia into conflict with international standards and procedures while considering full collaboration with the International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia. This all had an impact on the international position of the Republic of Croatia, especially in relation to the European Union (EU).

Although Croatia seemed to be developing into a modern democracy, its first president, Franjo Tuđman, ruled by authority. He was head of the Croatian Democratic Party and had very conservative attitudes. His government promoted Catholic fundamentalism, which made Croatia one of the countries with the strongest international contracts with the Holy See. After President Tuđman died in 1999, parliamentary elections brought in a more leftist-to-centre oriented government in 2001; at that point Croatia started actual democratic reform. This strongly influenced freedom of the press and the separation of the media from governing structures.

In its recent history, Croatia has established good relations with the international community and started the process of obtaining membership in the European Union. Many reforms have been undertaken to change the state administration, strengthen the efficiency of the judiciary, combat corruption, and develop the state economy. The majority of these reforms only exist on paper—while the fundamental legal documents have been drafted and provisions of the Acquis Communautaire for EU accession were followed, there are no efficient mechanisms to enforce the legal provisions. Despite these difficulties, Croatia is currently regarded as a potential member of the European Union.

OVERVIEW OF LGBT ISSUES

Homosexual relations between adults in Croatia were decriminalized in 1977. However, the Croatian penal system has still implemented the criminal offence of unnatural fornication, where the age of consent is not equal for heterosexual and homosexual relations. Therefore, the age of consent for heterosexual relations was 14 years, whereas for homosexual relations it was 18 years. Such practices were changed in 1998, when changes in the criminal code came into force.

The first positive legal changes toward the protection of LGBT people from discrimination came in 2003 when Gender Equality Act⁴ passed in the Croatian parliament. The Gender Equality Act prohibits discrimination on the grounds of sex, sexual orientation, and family or marital status. In the same year, the Same-Sex Civil Unions Act came in force—it recognizes same-sex union as a legal category, although the scope of rights assigned to same-sex partners is very narrow. From 2003 to the present, nondiscrimination provisions on the ground of sexual orientation were implemented in a number of legal documents—the Labour Act, Media Act, Civil Servants Act, Croatian Radio-Television Act, Electronic Media Act, and so on. In 2007, the Volunteers' Act, prohibiting discrimination on the grounds of gender identity and gender expression, came into force.

The issue of so-called gay marriages appeared mostly after 2002, especially during the procedure of adopting the Same-Sex Civil Unions Act. The passing of that legal document was opposed by the conservative political parties and the Catholic Church. Since this legal document recognized only 2 percent of the rights assigned to married and cohabitating opposite-sex partners, the civil society organizations Iskorak and Kontra initiated parliamentary discussion on a registered partnership act in 2006. However, this legal proposition induced a strong reaction by the leading conservative party, and did not pass in the parliament. The Same-Sex Civil Unions Act remained in force while civil society organizations that provide direct legal help to LGBT people count number of cases where same-sex partners were not treated equally as married couples in rights to inheritance, pension and health insurance, tax benefits, decision making in urgent medical situations, and so on.

In Croatia, there are no restrictions for gay and lesbian people in uniformed services (armed forces, police, and security). Current ordinances on health capability, according to the 10th revised edition of the International Classification of Diseases (ICD) of the World Health Organization (WHO), do not mention homosexuality as a mental disorder. Therefore, homosexuality does not represent a contraindication to working in uniformed services.

However, some Croatian psychiatrists do not follow principles set by the WHO. In 2003, the eminent Croatian psychiatrist, Vladimir Gruden said that homosexuality is a medical disorder; for this statement, he was reprimanded by the Croatian Medical Chamber. Scientific discussions as to whether homosexuality is a psychiatric disorder or not appear quite often in the Croatian academic community. While some accept modern scientific standards, others argue that removing homosexuality from the ICD was the result of political pressure by the homosexual lobby, and that this has no scientific value.

One of the most prominent issues in Croatia has been the debate on sex education. From 1997, Teen STAR, a comprehensive sex education program, has been implemented in public elementary and high schools. The program was negatively assessed by the Office of the Ombudswoman for Children and the Office of the Ombudswoman for Gender Equality because it was determined that the program is discriminatory on the grounds of sex, sexual orientation, and family status. The Ministry of Science, Education, and Sport never implemented comprehensive sex education in public schools, but rather shifted its responsibility to civil society organizations, mainly grounded on Christian principles of morality.

EDUCATION

The Croatian education system does not fulfill the basic conditions for educating children to respect human rights. School textbooks contain gender stereotypes and do not address the rights of sexual or any other minorities.

The Schoolbooks Rules were adopted on January 17, 2007. Under provision 2.4—“Ethical Demands,” it is stated that a schoolbook shall contain the richness of diversity of Croatian society, shall enable gaining knowledge on the equality of individuals and social groups, and promote the right to diversity.⁵

Also listed are demands in regard to national, ethnic, and religious minorities, as well as gender equality, but sexual minorities are not specially mentioned and there are no demands listed in regard to that subject. Having in mind that the previous Schoolbooks Rules from the year 2003 contained an antidiscrimination provision that explicitly referred to sexual orientation, this is certainly a step backwards.

Although the National Policy for Gender Equality 2006–2010 (NN, nr. 114/06) elaborates upon gender-sensitive education, but does not address sexual and gender minorities. Furthermore, the policy mentions a need for expanding health education to include human sexuality, with an emphasis on sexually transmitted diseases.

In 2003, the Ministry of Science, Education, and Sport prescribed the program of episcopal subjects, in which it was stated that homosexuality is a wrong aspect of sexuality; it was included in the same category as prostitution, incest, and pedophilia.⁶ After the intervention of the Team for Legal Changes, the gender equality ombudswoman advised the ministry to reevaluate such a program. The ministry followed the ombudswoman’s recommendation, in a way; it changed the description from wrong to sinful.

There is no sexual education in Croatian public schools as a separate subject. Some aspects of sexuality are discussed in different subjects, mainly biology and catechism. In the subject of biology, human sexuality is explained in relation to the anatomy and physiology of the human organism. Further insight into human sexuality from a biological perspective is given in eighth grade through the themes of the structure and function of reproductive organs, conception and prenatal child development, and responsible sexual behavior, according to the teaching plan and program for elementary school of the Ministry of Science, Education, and Sport. The same program includes elements of sexual education for seventh and eighth grades in catechism through the themes of the dignity of the human body and matrimonial purity, friendship and love, and marriage and celibacy.⁷

A few programs directed toward human sexuality were provided in public schools by nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) with the support of the Ministry of Science, Education, and Sport. The most important is the program Teen STAR, introduced into elementary and high schools on the recommendation of the Croatian Episcopal Conference. In mid-2004, the civil society organizations Iskorak and Kontra evaluated the Teen STAR program and concluded that it is discriminatory toward LGBT people, women, and single-parent families.⁸ Such a conclusion was also made by the ombudswoman for children, who found the program to be contrary to the Convention on the Rights of the Child. The same conclusion was made by the gender equality ombudswoman. Meanwhile, Teen STAR is still implemented in Croatian schools.

On September 15, 2006, the Ministry of Science, Education, and Sport introduced the Decision on the Educational Plan and Program for Primary Schools, which also regulates the content of the optional subject Catholic religious teaching.⁹ In this program, there is no explicit discriminatory content as there is in the Catholic religious teaching syllabus from 2003. However, the new program emphasizes heterosexuality, making its implementation questionable from the perspective of discrimination against sexual minorities.

The Ministry of Science, Education, and Sport shifted responsibility for creating the program of health education, including a module on human sexuality, to Civil Society Organizations (CSOs). On November 2, 2007, it signed a contract to purchase the proposal of an experimental program of health education from the CSO Citizens Initiative for Democratic Changes (GROZD). The program mentioned was judged by the Office of the Ombudswoman for Gender Equality and the Office of the Ombudswoman for Children to be discriminatory in regards to sexual identity, sexual orientation, and marital status, and therefore contrary to the Constitution of the Republic of Croatia and the Convention on the Rights of the Child. In spite of this, the program will be implemented in both primary and secondary schools. After negotiations with the ministry on November 26, the contract was also signed by the Forum for the Freedom of Education. This program is heteronormative, but it does not contain negative references to sexual minorities or masturbation, and therefore was evaluated as liberal. It will be implemented only in secondary schools, and parents can choose whether or not their child will attend the more liberal program. The program is being implemented in Croatian schools in the 2008–2009 school years.

About 35 percent of children in Croatian schools face some kind of bullying.¹⁰ There is only anecdotal evidence on homophobic bullying in public schools. In such cases, young students have reported abuse from their peers. There are many measures aimed at the prevention of bullying among students; however, no special measures have been undertaken to address homophobic bullying.

EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMICS

In 2007, the Croatian Institute for Employment recorded more than 250,000 unemployed persons. Generally, the problems of LGBT people do not arise from lack of employment opportunities, but rather from discrimination when it is discovered that the employee or person seeking employment is homosexual.

In 2003, provisions of the Labor Act had been changed in order to ensure protection from discrimination related to sexual orientation in the workplace. Discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in the workplace was prohibited, and any mistreatment of an employee for that reason was also considered discrimination. The victim of discrimination in the workplace could request compensation for damages through a civil lawsuit. Such discrimination could also be criminally prosecuted.

Generally, victims lack the knowledge about legal mechanisms that could be used to protect their labor rights, and rarely engage in criminal prosecution or civil lawsuits against their employer.

In relation to legal regulations, there are no prohibitions for homosexuals to serve in the police or the army. The only exception is for posts within the organizational structure of the Catholic Church, where it is not illegal to discriminate against someone on the basis of sexual orientation. The person who is discriminated against on the basis of sexual orientation, or on some other grounds, where the Catholic Church is an employer, could not seek legal protection since Croatia has bilateral agreements with the Holy See that allows the Catholic Church to operate independently from national antidiscrimination legislation.

SOCIAL/GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

There is no government program in Croatia specifically aimed at the protection of the rights of sexual and gender minorities. Some measures regarding the rights of sexual minorities have been implemented in the National Politic for Promotion of Gender Equality 2006–2010 (NN, nr. 114/06) and in the National Program for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights 2008–2011.

The National Politic for Promotion of Gender Equality contains only two measures aimed at combating discrimination based on sexual orientation. The first measure prescribes conducting research into judicial practice and police conduct in regards to criminal offenses motivated by the sexual orientation of the injured party. The second measure prescribes that representatives of organizations for the rights of sexual and gender minorities will be included in working bodies for adopting laws, programs, and strategies connected to the rights of sexual minorities. Both measures were adopted by the government as a result of advocacy by Kontra, Iskorak, and the Women's Network of Croatia.

The two adopted measures were not implemented in 2007. Nothing in regard to the first measure was made public by implementing institutions, although the deadline for its implementation was 2007. That the second measure would never be implemented became clear during the creation of the proposal of the National Program for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights, and also during the creation of the proposal for the Anti-discrimination Act, when representatives of organizations for the rights of sexual minorities were not included in working groups, as prescribed in the measure.¹¹

The National Program for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights 2008–2011 contains three measures aimed at the “improvement of legislation” and “increasing tolerance towards sexual and gender minorities.”¹² The prescribed measures are not in concordance with the aims. The only effect that can be achieved by the prescribed measures in regard to the first aim is the determination of the existing condition by analysis of the legislation, but without any actions for its improvement. From the government’s previous work, it is easy to conclude that the measures aimed at increasing tolerance will result in a few politically harmless events, focused at maintaining the existing conditions in legislation, with little media coverage. Therefore, the aim will not be achieved. Out of three measures, the Governmental Office for Human Rights took the role of the implementing body for only one measure, and that also happened after a critique from Iskorak and Kontra: “98th Aim: To raise tolerance towards sexual and gender minorities, Implementing bodies: The Governmental Office on Gender Equality and the Governmental Office for Human Rights.”¹³

One of the main critiques of Croatia by the European Commission was its failure to adopt a national strategic and action plan for combating discrimination. The European Commission, in its progress report on Croatia, notes homophobic incidents and lack of decisiveness of the state in combating the problem of discrimination.

SEXUALITY/SEXUAL PRACTICES

The majority of resources in relation to sexuality refer to young people and women. No research has been conducted to clarify the attitudes of general population in Croatia towards sexuality.

Between 2001 and 2003, the Centre for Education, Counselling, and Research conducted a two-year study on adolescent sexuality. The results showed that young men and women have similar expectations of sexual relationships. Of the respondents, 39.4 percent had had previous sexual experience—50.7 percent of them were young men and 27 percent of them were young women. The young women entered sexual relationships later than young men. While young women have their first sexual experience in a long-term relationship, young men have such an experience in a one-night-stand relationship, usually having consumed alcohol and drugs immediately before. However, more young men than young women responded that they used a condom when they first had sexual intercourse. Forty-eight percent of male respondents and 36 percent of female respondents declared that they always use condoms during sexual intercourse.¹⁴

In 2005 the Women’s Room, a CSO working for the sexual rights of women, conducted a study to determine the status these rights in Croatia (N = 1,491). The results showed that more than 50 percent of women have never participated in any education on sexuality, while the majority of them are actually informed on their sexual rights. More than 60 percent of women had three or fewer sexual partners, and 49 percent of women are generally satisfied with their sexual life. More than 30 percent of women had had sexual experiences involving one night stands. Eighty-four percent of respondents identified as heterosexual and

7 percent had had same-sex experience. In terms of contraception, 66 percent of women did not use any kind of protection the first time they had sexual intercourse. In everyday life, about 45 percent of respondents between the ages of 18 and 50 use contraception—52 percent use condoms and 18 percent use the pill or other hormonal therapies. More than 60 percent of respondents have children, and 31 percent of them have two children. Seventy-seven percent of women planned to become pregnant. In terms of sexual violence, women mostly recognized unwanted physical contact (94%) and forced sexual intercourse (91%). They tended to believe that, in a rape situation, a woman has to engage in strong physical resistance against the sexual perpetrator (36%), that she will have severe physical injuries (32%), and that perpetrator will be an unknown maniac (32%). In 40 percent of women who had experienced sexual violence, however, the perpetrator of sexual violence was partner, in 12 percent it was a family member, in 34 percent a superior at workplace, and in 67 percent an unknown person.¹⁵

In 2007 the faculties of law and humanities and social sciences, University of Zagreb, published the results of a study aimed to assess negative attitudes towards homosexuality in 31 European countries; the Republic of Croatia was among these. The results showed that, in Croatia, 52.8 percent of respondents would not like to have homosexual neighbor.¹⁶

In 2008, the Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, University of Zagreb, finished a study aimed at exploring a theoretical model relating to the effects of sexually explicit materials (SEM). A survey was conducted that included 650 young Croatian men, aged 15 to 25. The study suggested that “there may be important links between early SEM exposure, sexual socialization and sexual satisfaction—particularly among men with specific SEM preferences.” It concluded that “the importance of comprehensive sex education that would address the issue of contemporary pornography should not be disregarded. Inclusion of contents designed to improve media literacy among young people and help them to critically evaluate pornographic images, as well as fantasies and fears they produce, could be invaluable to advancing young people’s sexual well being. Neither moral accusations, nor uncritical glorification of contemporary pornography can do the job.”¹⁷

In the context of National Response to HIV/AIDS, a special prevention program for students in elementary and high-schools, MEMOIDS, has been implemented. The program was created with the support of the Global Fund for HIV/AIDS, Tuberculosis, and Malaria.¹⁸ At the beginning of 2004, the Croatian Episcopal Conference issued a statement against the program, arguing that it does not follow principles of Christian ethics.

FAMILY

There is no definition of family in Croatian legislation. The Family Act does not contain such a definition. According to article 1 of the act, it regulates marriage, relations between parents and children, adoption, guardianship, effects of the extramarital union between a man and a woman, and procedures of relevant institutions in regards to family relations and guardianship.

Provisions in other acts refer to certain members of the family in terms of prescribing rights and obligations (for example, the Inheritance Act, Asylum Act, Protection of Rights of Patients Act, etc.). Such provisions include married partners in all cases, include unmarried opposite-sex partner almost half of the time, and do not include same-sex partners at all.

The legal provisions follow a traditional perspective regarding family, which is usually recognized as the union of a man and a woman and their children. In 2005, there were 22,138 registered marriages and 4,883 divorces in total.¹⁹ There is evidence of a high prevalence of domestic violence. In the period from 2001 to 2006, 1,807 persons were convicted for domestic violence as a criminal offence, and 719 persons for domestic violence as a misdemeanor.²⁰

The Same-Sex Civil Unions Act provides same-sex partners with only two rights: the right to joint ownership of property and the right to financial support. In order to obtain those rights, partners have to prove the existence of their union within three years according to court procedure. There is only one case noted by CSOs Iskorak and Kontra in relation to implementation of the Same-Sex Civil Unions Act since it came into force in 2003. This was a case in which the partners wanted to move to another country and needed written evidence of the existence of their union for visa requirements. For that purpose, they used a contract for the regulation of property rights from the Same-Sex Civil Unions Act. The contract referred to a television and a watch.

According to the Family Act, married heterosexual partners can adopt a child together. A heterosexual partner can also adopt the child of their partner from a previous marriage, provided there is consent from the former partner. A single person can adopt a child only if it is of a special benefit for the child. The adoption procedure in Croatia is long and complicated, and there are few cases where a single person is able to adopt a child. It is not prescribed under the Family Act that same-sex partners can adopt a child. The ombudswoman for children in 2006 made homophobic statements advocating that same-sex couples be denied the right to adopt children.²¹

COMMUNITY

In the late 1970s and early 1980s, the first positive media articles on homosexuality appeared in Croatia. Those articles were written by women involved in the feminist movement. Articles on homosexuality were published in periodicals and student magazines. In Croatia, the lesbian movement emerged directly from the feminist movement. In feminist groups, lesbians first found safe places to gather and discuss specific issues. In 1989, the first lesbian group, Lila Initiative, was founded in Croatia and started with its work as a part of Trešnjevka Women's Group. The daily newspaper Vjesnik and two student magazines reported on their work. Their articles were written in an affirmative manner, and for the first time, the rights of lesbians were mentioned, as well as the positions of political parties on homosexuality.

Due to the first democratic elections and the war that lasted from 1990–1995, the 1990s involved great social change for Croatia; it was also a period of strong nationalism and great Catholic influence on state politics. The beginning of the war caused the termination of lesbian activism in 1990. Lila Initiative lost its work facilities. Public discussion was focused exclusively on the war and the political situation in the country.

A breakthrough came in 1992, when the first lesbian and gay group, LIGMA (Lesbian and Gay Men Action), was founded. Members of LIGMA appeared in the media, organized public panels, and published a brochure in the magazine for the Antiwar Campaign of Croatia (AWCC). Nevertheless, in 1993, LIGMA ceased its activities and its publicly known members moved abroad. Until the end of 1990s, the subject of homosexuality was covered in the media in a sensationalistic manner, as something exotic and highly stereotyped.

In 1997, the lesbian group Kontra was founded. This group started the first lesbian emergency information hotline. Since there were no members willing to speak publicly, only the establishment of Kontra and a small number of its events were covered by the media.

In May 2002, Kontra, together with the newly founded group Iskorak started advocating for redrafting the Family Act to alter the definitions of marriage and cohabitation to include same-sex partners. For the first time in many years, representatives of CSOs for the rights of sexual and gender minorities came out in public and advocated for changes in legislation. Public discussion on sexual and gender minorities entered a political context. LORI (Lesbian Organization Rijeka, founded in 2001) also conducted the national awareness campaign Love is Love in 2002.
