PREFACE

THE "KING'S ENGLISH" DICTIONARY has been prepared for the convenience of the general reader of current literature—newspaper, magazine, or book. In these there occur words whose pronunciation, meaning, and derivation are not familiar; English phrases whose import and origin are not obvious; current foreign expressions that are not easily understood; allusions to places, persons, and classical passages in literature which are not comprehended, and are difficult to trace. The "KING'S ENGLISH" DICTIONARY aims at supplying the help necessary in all such cases, and gives in handy form much information that otherwise would have to be sought for in many books, some of which are not easily accessible. The main portion of the book consists of what is common to all good dictionaries—the pronunciation, derivation, and meaning of the general vocabulary of the English language, and a careful explanation of all phrases requiring elucidation. Recent words due to war, science, travel, and literature have been included. The second part of the book is a long list of names occurring in history, geography, poetry, and mythology. The pronunciation of these is given, along with a concise account. This list, it is believed, will be acceptable and useful. There are also various appendices, including a Scots glossary, common abbreviations, foreign phrases, and forms of address. The clear, bold type, the simple scheme of pronunciation, and the numerous illustrations, while they increase the attractiveness of the volume, tend to lessen the trouble of consulting a work of reference. Finally, the geographical supplement, unique in a work of this character, provides the reader with a complete up-to-date atlas of the World; it also includes a reference list of the various countries of the world, with useful statistics compiled from the latest official returns.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A., LL.D., D.LITT.

Emeritus Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature in the University of Edinburgh

Small as is the space here available, a little of it will not be lost in defining the particular point from which this view is taken, for such points have changed frequently in the last hundred years. If we were to go still farther back we should find one from which even Chaucer was scarcely visible, or patronisingly dismissed as not worth seeing; where even Spenser had to be modernised and was thought not much more than a moralist in verse. Then writers back to and including Chaucer were admitted on a kind of sufferance, warming gradually into less grudging and even eager reception: but except in the cases of Gray, Warton, and a few others, still keeping Trans-Chauceriana as a land, if not exactly forbidden, at any rate not worth attempting. Even the great Romantic revival, as it is called, of the extreme end of the eighteenth century and the first quarter of the nineteenth, did not go much beyond this. But soon Old or Early (more usually called Anglo-Saxon) and Middle English, which had never since the sixteenth century lacked a few devotees, began to attract more general, and for a time in some cases rather disproportionate attention. This corrected itself, and, for a time again, the whole range of English literature at last received its due consideration. It would sometimes appear that yet another change is now setting in; and that, whether for the benefit of strictly contemporary writing or not, the oldest division or divisions of the subject may be relegated to the background, or to that purely specialist position which is rather more unfavourable than the background itself. Here the endeavour to begin at the beginning and continue till nearly the end will still be made. If the twentieth century seems not to have what some people would consider its due, the reason is an old and a well-proved one. There is hardly on record a single instance of such treatment of contemporary literature with earlier not proving unsatisfactory. To adjust the focus has constantly been found impossible.

THE BEGINNINGS

The earliest division of English literature is not bulky; and though some of it was certainly destroyed during the subsequent centuries when French and Latin were the literary languages of our country—though even towards its own end-period it seems to have undergone a sort of atrophy—it is doubtful whether it ever was much larger. Further, a large proportion of it is translation in origin on one system of division, and religious in subject on another. Some of the language is altogether obsolete, and nearly all has undergone more or less change. The poetry of which the most interesting part of it (with perhaps one exception) consists, is constructed in a fashion different from that prevailing later: the system of versification being accentual-alliterative without anything that we call rhyme (though the delusive term, "head-rhyme," is sometimes used for alliteration itself) appearing till very late. Possibly and indeed probably, the very earliest pieces, including the one tolerably complete epic poem, Beowulf, were brought into England by the Angle and Saxon invaders, not composed there after their settlement.

Nevertheless, "Anglo-Saxon"—as the old and perhaps still the best name for it goes—is more than well worth study, and exhibits features which are still discernible in the latest English literature itself, while it has, both in general and in some particulars, the prouder distinction of being far older than any similar division of any other modern European language. It has also that of exhibiting, in its comparatively small bulk, a remarkable diversity of literary forms. The famous Anglo-Saxon Chronicle stands alone as a contemporary history in the vernacular at almost the beginning of a literature. It may deal with "battles of kites and crows," it may contain few—it does contain some—of those references to the "condition of the people" which it has become a modern fashion to demand. But its existence—in face of the overpowering predominance of Latin at the time and later for such purposes—may be without absurdity taken as proof of the antiquity of that resolve which Ascham formulated some three-quarters of a millennium afterwards to deal "with English matters in the English tongue for English men."

The rest of the matter that we have from this period—though not much of it may have such individual claim as the Chronicle, and much of it certainly is translated—has, as literature, qualities of variety in subject and yet resemblance in tone which are by no means universal in early literatures. That tone is almost invariably grave, even in the so-called "Riddles," but the variety in so small a bulk is very considerable, and the freedom of treatment where so much is translated, is very remarkable. In Scripturally based poems—the most famous and probably the oldest of which are those of Genesis and Exodus—quite possibly executed by the herdsman Cædmon of Whitby; in several Saints' Lives—a class to which no small part of the Origins of Romance in all countries has sometimes been assigned—in a few curious poems of miscellaneous character, the finest of which is on a ruined city, possibly Bath; in prose or half-prose Homilies, or sermons with—as was the habit throughout the Dark and Middle Ages—anecdotes and stories scattered pretty thickly in them; in one very interesting novelette (as it may almost be called), that of Apollonius of Tyre, no doubt adapted from Greek or Latin and long after revived by Gower and in Pericles; in not a few "Leechdoms" (medical treatises), and a few other things, we can discern without undue fancifulness a really strong literary nisus or effort, as yet furnished with an imperfect language, and very limited and rudimentary notions of Rhetoric and Poetic. Narrative power is already considerable; poetic spirit evident if as yet not well fitted out with expression; altogether no lack of quality. But it is equally evident that in almost all respects the literature is more or less inorganic; means, "plant," patterns, training—all manner of similar things are wanting to it, and seem unlikely ever to have been supplied purely out of its own resources. The atrophy already spoken of might really have come about but for one thing, that the hidden and incontestable power prevented any such fate.

“ MIDDLE ” ENGLISH

The exact way in which it was saved from that atrophy and nourished and disciplined into new and magnificent life is difficult, if not impossible, for any one who goes by the weight of evidence to pronounce upon. For a long time—indeed for some hundred and fifty years after the Conquest—there is hardly any evidence at all; and for another hundred there is very little. People have filled the gap with all sorts of suppositions and assumptions. Some would have it that “ the rhythm of the foreigner ” broke in and destroyed our native prosody: while French and Latin similarly invaded and settled in, if they did not destroy, our language. Some suppose a continuous but lost series of alliterative poems from the eleventh to the thirteenth century. Some—and a good many—admit at least a deliberate imitation of French—in at any rate “ Anglo-Norman ” vocabulary, grammar and prosody. The sanest view according to others (with whom the present writer agrees) and that which takes closest account of the actual existing documents with the least of theory or guess-work to help them out—is that a slow but sure blend in literature as in nationality took place between “ Saxon ” and “ Norman ” characteristics, and produced, by the fourteenth century at latest, something which no one but a very lazy, a very stupid, or a quite uneducated person can fail to recognise as “ English ” in the work of Chaucer. The process in vocabulary was very slow; we find at the beginning of the thirteenth long compositions in which no more than a hundred or two words appear that might not have appeared centuries earlier. But in prose form to some extent, and in poetic form to a much greater, the new fashions are much more obvious; though even here there is a curious appearance of half unconsciousness, as if the writers were “ growing ” and not consciously training themselves—as if, indeed, they did not exactly know what they were doing, and were slipping their old skin and donning the new more than half unconsciously.

It should be, however, though it by no means always has been, clearly understood that while language and literature were during this time rather in training than in actual practice, much excellent literary work was produced by Englishmen in other languages. This was certain to be followed up in English itself when the time came. The decadence of Anglo-Saxon, for instance, caused the Chronicle to be succeeded by quite a school of English Historians in the learned tongue: and while the earlier vehicle had never been suited for philosophical writing, some of the very greatest of the Schoolmen were of English birth, and Oxford could hold up its head with any Continental University. Even of the Romances which constituted the bulk of mediæval belles lettres—though they were quickly and largely translated into the successive forms of English, and though the European storehouse and mart of them was certainly French—it is certain that some and even many were written, in as well as out of England, by Englishmen. Indeed, it is, despite much argument, a still unsettled point whether the most important and so to speak, constitutive parts of the great Arthurian legend—the chief single literary achievement of the earlier Middle Ages before Dante—are not of pure English origin : neither Welsh, nor Breton, nor French.

In such a state of things, according to the well-known saying slightly altered, the hour comes when the man makes his appearance, or the men make their hours. In this case the hour was the latter part of the fourteenth century : and the men were Chaucer, Gower and Langland—the two latter being, no doubt, of inferior importance to the former, but never to be left out of consideration. Langland is the last great one, and perhaps the only one really great, of those who, while admitting much imported language, cling to the old poetic form. Gower (who was trilingual), is the latest and (for great is hardly the word for him), most considerable of those who may be said to have been uncertain about the sufficiency of their native language. Between them Chaucer shows, and shows triumphantly, now that native language has come to its own.

CHAUCER AND THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

The fashion and the extent to which Chaucer thus displayed the stage of perfectionment which England had then reached, excuse, if they do not fully justify, the old idea that, in some way or other, he was absolutely “the first warbler,” “the well [head] of English,” and the like. He was neither ; but he changed twitters into almost a full compass of notes, and dribbles into a flood. Hardly in any other literature is there an instance of a single writer in early times maintaining influence for a whole century, reviving it a little before the beginning and undoubtedly influencing that beginning of such a thing as the great Elizabethan development ; meanwhile actually determining what was almost the rise of a special extra-territorial (in this case Scottish) division of poetry, moulding it into forms not entirely in accordance with nationality in the more limited sense ; and maintaining that influence, even when it had for the time died off in its native country.

That in the fifteenth century English verse, despite or in consequence of this Chaucerian influence, became of less importance involves no blame to him. Periods of imitation of a single poet are, it is hardly rash to say, always periods of a kind of decadence ; and here there was the special difficulty for poets that language and, apparently, pronunciation were undergoing considerable changes, while the versifiers were endeavouring to keep the same metres, and to force rhythm to suit them. In the puzzling but invaluable division of the ballad, verse itself more than holds its ground. On the other hand, the advance of prose—which also Chaucer had written, if not with the supremacy of his verse, with considerable skill—made steady progress ; History came back to English ; the last great and decidedly the greatest of mediæval romances was given by Malory ; rhetorical devices inspired by the classical Renaissance began to be tried ; and what may be conveniently, if not very exactly called "miscellaneous writing" deserted verse for prose with fortunate immediate results and more fortunate promise.

"ELIZABETHAN" LITERATURE.

The fruit of all this long endeavour was, in perfection, still delayed for the greater part of yet another century; though the first three-quarters of the sixteenth contain, to any careful observer, more than the promise of it. Still it is difficult to remember any exact parallel to the rush and burst in quantity, the variety and splendour in quality, of the literature which, a little after the twentieth year of Elizabeth, appeared with Spenser in poetry, Lyly and Hooker in prose, the "University Wits" in drama, as its leaders; with Shakespeare himself to follow shortly; and with such a crowd of noteworthy, though minor individual authors that one might fill this entire page with the mere names of them—pressing into the service none that were not really noteworthy in this or that degree and kind.

Attempts have been made—quite properly if made in the right spirit and attended to in the right manner—to put down a large part of this astonishing literary development to mere translation. But, in order to secure that right attention, it is all important to distinguish between translation and imitation, which are mere translation and imitation, and translation and imitation that are not. Periods of the first are generally the weakest periods of literature: the others are often, if not always, the strongest. Spenser has frequently almost translated and quite paraphrased Ariosto; Shakespeare, Amyot through North; others others. And yet Spenser is, to say the least, as good a poet as the Italian, and Shakespeare is perhaps rather a greater writer than North or Amyot or their original Plutarch. The fact is that, in vigorous but comparatively unsophisticated periods of literature, even the greatest writers seem to feel themselves in a sort of pupillary state, while the lesser naturally do so.

But be they greater or be they lesser, the writers of such a period somehow cannot escape some touch of greatness which, in other periods, may seem to be totally lacking. There is, perhaps, no division of Elizabethan literature (using the term in the not strictly accurate, but useful sense of "From Spenser to Milton, from Hooker to Browne, and from Marlowe to Shirley,") where this greatness oftener, or less often, in fuller or scantier quantity and quality, is not to be found: though of course it is also perfectly true, that only very rarely do you find that faultlessness, that peculiar state of "correctness," which may be found elsewhere. There is rubbish of various kinds in the Elizabethan drama—a great deal of it, in fact, some being even in Shakespeare. There is dullness and flatness as well as false rhetoric in Elizabethan prose; and even in Elizabethan poetry there is bombast, conceit, verbiage, etc., etc. But somehow or other there is almost everywhere in them all the throb and pulse of life; and occasionally, very often indeed, that life puts on forms of such amazing grandeur, of such exquisite beauty, as no other literature at any other time has excelled. We mark stages in it—not altogether inaccurately, and with decided convenience ticketing them with the names of the three sovereigns who occupied the throne in succession during the period. But we must remember that if Shakespeare had lived to fourscore, he would have seen the closing of the theatres: and that Browne, who was born shortly after the death of Elizabeth, very nearly lived to see that of Charles the Second. The whole range of achievement from the Faerie Queene to Paradise Regained, and from Euphues to Christian Morals, is thus knit together: and not only fit to be taken as a whole, but absolutely demanding to be so. Just before it begins, English Literature is something with a thousand years of history, an immense course of training and cultivation, much interesting and some complete performance, but still, as was said above, in a sort of pupillage. When it closes, except for a prose-of-all-work (there are even beginnings of that), and an active, instructed criticism, it is a literature complete and fit to match any in the world.

It is almost, if not quite, invariably found that immediately succeeding ages "sin their mercies" (in a good old phrase) as regards the age of literature, and perhaps of other things, immediately preceding them: and this was notoriously the case with regard to the period which we are considering. Even Dryden, though he did magnificent justice to Shakespeare's merits, was, not exactly too severe, but not quite severe in the right way on his defects. Now, Dryden was really a great critic; while at the other end of the scale Pepys, who was not a critic at all, talks simple nonsense about Shakespeare. Nor was the whole eighteenth century in any right focus about the earlier seventeenth: while though its wrongs have been made up to it since, it is necessarily from a distance; and seldom has been done with a Pisgah sight as it were—extensive and yet close—of the whole. Let us venture something of the kind, mounting the hill as we best can about 1550, and again a hundred years later, and comparing the state, at these respective times, of the different departments of literature.

In the highest and oldest of all—Poetry proper—we have at the beginning a very extensive retrospect, with, if hardly a proportional, still a considerable amount of interesting work scattered about it, but with hardly more than one great name—that of Chaucer—in its catalogue or chronicle. Recently there have been as it were throes—as if something better or at any rate different, were coming: but nothing distinctly great. When the centenary comes, there are to the credit of the English literary landscape two certainly—Shakespeare and Milton, while some would add a third in Spenser—of the undoubtedly great poets of the world; not a few of high second rank; and such a crowd of minors, no one of whom is entirely destitute of real poetic genius now and then, as no other literature can show for anything like the time, if indeed at all its times put together.

For the state of things in Prose, if not quite so brilliant a positive account can be given, the relative statement is only less in one respect. Poetry can show proficiency in all its kinds. Prose is as yet rather defective (as above hinted), in its character of "maid-of-all-work." In the greater prose—the prose that draws near to poetry—we have once more, ne-plus-ultras, while at the beginning—except in dying styles like Malory's—we have nothing of the kind. The highest flights of Taylor, Milton, and Browne have never been excelled; and, as in the case of poetry, it is astonishing how often, in writers not absolutely or constantly of the first class, you find first-class passages—passages for which elsewhere you may look in vain. But this prose is not yet, as the poetry practically is, armed at all points. It is not good for the more abstruse subjects unless they are of a mystical kind, for it is not clear enough. Nor is it good for the most opposite purposes possible—those of ordinary conversation, light narrative, business statement, etc., not merely because it is not clear enough, but because it is neither light nor flexible enough.

It is, however, in the Third Division, Drama, that the most startling, if not the greatest, advance is perceptible. No one who really knows it would speak with contempt of the mediæval drama, or even of its queer nondescript successors in the latest fifteenth and early sixteenth century. But, independently of the absence of any great individual talent, both suffer from a not uncommon curse of theatrical literature—the persistence of mould and type—to an extravagant degree. They are “mystery,” “morality,” “interlude,” first of all—individual compositions in many cases last of all, and in very few cases definitely and prominently so. By the time of the closing of the theatres, though, of course, the great divisions of Tragedy and Comedy held as they always must hold, the mere class character had to a very large extent, if not entirely, ceased. People copied; but even those who did so had sometimes, nay often, made of their copies some of the most independent and original things in the world.

“RESTORATION” LITERATURE.

In, or to such a state of things, however, there is always an exception, or more than one, to be admitted: a drawback of some sort to be allowed. The volume, the variety, and the superbness at its best of Elizabethan literature cannot be denied. But that, except when it is at its very best, and sometimes even then, it may seem to call for correction, castigation, criticism, cannot be denied likewise. It was, in fact, a sort of “spate” and the water was turbid. The period immediately succeeding is one which, until quite recently, has had rather hard measure: though not quite without deserving it. Putting aside those survivors of the larger Elizabethan age, whom we have glanced at above, there is in what we call Restoration literature (though it includes the reign of William and Mary), only one distinctly great name, that of Dryden, who fills the whole forty years, distinguishes himself in all three broad departments of literature, and gives us our first great name, in that very subdivision of prose criticism, which has been most lacking before him. But even he, though there is a great deal in him of that older age itself, and though he has left a criticism on its greatest name—Shakespeare—unsurpassed to the present day, is open, in common with all his contemporaries, except at odd moments, to somewhat damaging strictures in poetry proper, and in drama. In the former, he too often lets Rhetoric get the better of pure Poetic, as do all his contemporaries ; though both he and they have left charming lyrics to which too little justice has even yet been done. In drama, as they nearly all do, he tends to rant in tragedy (the curious, very un-English and short-lived rhymed tragedy is a feature of this time), and to that very easy but rarely artistic appeal of indecency in comedy. Comedy, however, even with this blot on it, is one of the chief growths of the time. It ceases to be romantic, as it had been earlier : but it becomes—in the curious blend of realism and art, officially called the Comedy of Manners—a very perfect thing in its own way. Congreve's work in particular may not be of the best or even of a very good kind. But in its kind, it is unsurpassed.

Indeed the work that this "Restoration" period did in clarifying and correcting English, thus providing some compensation for the deficiency of original genius, which was to prevail for some time, cannot in reason be overestimated. In particular, it would be difficult to find anywhere such a remarkable prop and stay in all kinds of literature as Dryden. Poetry at the time, as has been said, may have been handing over her sceptre to Rhetoric : but he kept them for a space as joint Queens of Brentford ; even in Tragedy, besides his ranting, but not contemptible "heroics," he actually dared to follow Shakespeare in All for Love, and did not fail utterly ; while in Comedy a great deal more credit to him is due than is usually given for scenes if not whole plays, which served as patterns to Congreve himself and others of Dryden's younger contemporaries.

But it is in prose that, from the point of view of literary history, if not of pure æsthetics, Dryden and Dryden's contemporaries deserve most attention. They made the "middle style," as Johnson calls it, of English : and, after all, it is in this "middle" that Prose, more than almost anything else, obeys and profits by the axiom as to "going safely" and usefully. The highest prose is delightful, but is, after all, a kind of luxury and superfluity—for we have poetry to do the work, and do it better. Of the lowest we need not speak. But if, as surely is the fact, the most really valuable state of a thing is that in which it does what nothing else can do, and does that consummately—then such prose as that which Dryden almost began (though others from Johnson to Cowley had aimed at it), and which in his lifetime Addison and others, but above all Swift, brought to a relative state of perfection—is of value in the highest degree. This prose has seen, of course, enormous importations and inventions of language since : and in some way, what is called, in a minor style. But it is still in the main definitely modern as Elizabethan prose is not : and its lines are traceable even in the most ornate specimens of the most modern prose itself.

THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

This rather curious but very useful process of lowering but at the same time extending and adapting Prose continued to be the chief literary business of all but the entire eighteenth century. In Poetry it chiefly followed Dryden, and his pupil, Pope ; with, after the example of the latter, a still further discard of the more ambitious flights which the former had still attempted, and not seldom achieved. In Pope himself, hardly anything of poetry proper remains, but what is given by the metre : though that is as nearly as possible perfect of its own peculiar kind. The great performances of eighteenth century verse are in didactics, and satire—themselves the nearest prose of all such departments. Even when Gray and Collins make efforts in lyric, a certain stiffness hangs about them ; they are full of rhetorical figures ; and it is not till Blake—as a very young man, and one who was to live well into the following century—began, that the old freedom and soar reappeared. Nor in Drama, though this continued to be very popular, were any heights reached till the late days of Sheridan in comedy ; while not one single tragedy of a first, a good second, or a respectable third class appeared from the very first year of the century to the very last. It was during this time also that there grew up, partly as a consequence of the continued acting of older plays (for the acting of the time was as good as its playwriting was bad), a sort of mongrel stage dialect or lingo—which lasted well into the times of men now living, and which was surely the most detestable jargon ever used by man.

But, to return to Prose, the state of things there was very different. As a matter of mere liking—of personal taste and enjoyment—one may prefer perhaps sixteenth, certainly seventeenth or nineteenth century prose to eighteenth : as a matter of critical estimation it cannot, as the phrase goes, be “put out of its place,” and that a high one.

For once, too, the history of a literary department is not, as so often, one of waxing and waning. That of eighteenth century prose is one of slightly varied forms of goodness ending in something like an establishment. The inevitable fault or disease of the “plain style”—meanness and vulgarity—attacked it more than once, but was always worsted. Just about the junction of the centuries, one of these attacks took place as a sort of sequence to a deliberate attempt (to which voice had been given by Sprat in his History of the Royal Society), to make the language more suitable for scientific and business purposes by adopting the vocabulary of unliterary folk. But Addison, by example, and Swift, by example and precept, showed that perfect clearness, force, in Swift's case, and in Addison's what was called elegance—almost everything in short except magnificence—could be secured by the plain style, with a gain for average use to compensate after a fashion for the loss of that magnificence in uses that were not average. Towards the middle of the century or a little later, when some decadence seemed to threaten, there came the rhetorical but stately prose of Johnson to guard against this, with that of Gibbon somewhat later : and the result of it all was the formation towards the extreme end of the century, and in the early years of the nineteenth, of a standard prose style which is hardly obsolete yet, though, of course, many varieties—especially in the way of return to the ornate—have been added to this, and though it has itself undergone certain changes partly resulting from the enormous reinforcement of the vocabulary.

It was to the establishment of this style of all work that two great developments, destined to be the most popular of all, owed in very great degree the possibility of their existence, and in a still greater its continuance and development. These were the newspaper and the novel.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

The rise of these; the contribution to the newspaper itself, and to independent uses of the Addisonian Essay, the popularity of which had continued for more than two generations; and the establishment of a standard prose style, enabled the new birth or burst of original genius, when it came, to start with immense advantages over the first such birth or burst, its predecessor in Elizabethan times. (There is no "standard" of poetry; the wind bloweth as it listeth, or not at all there.) Whether the total result of the age which followed—best dated perhaps, as we date, or the earlier one from The Faerie Queen to Samson Agonistes, from Lyrical Ballads to Asolando—was equal, better, or worse when compared with that earlier one, is a question itself much better left to the twenty-first or perhaps second century to answer. Here we have no questions of merit to decide: only panoramas of facts to give. And the huge expansion of quantity—the multiplied variety and excellence in quality, of these ninety years or so is a fact, or a collection of facts, absolutely undeniable. Except in theology and drama (perhaps the most opposed of all the branches of literature), wherever we turn there is fresh and great growth. There were good preachers, but for first-class standard work of this kind, combining religion, intellect, and style, we may look about long enough. With the exception of one magnificent tragedy, Shelley's Cenci, all the serious drama is but second-rate stuff, and most of it tenth-rate: while the comedy is hardly better, till we come to the delightful but rather nondescript work of the late Sir William Gilbert at the very end of the period. Philosophy, though not quite in such a poor way, does not, from the purely literary point of view, "bulk" as they say, "very largely"—Mill on one side and Mansel on the other being its chief literary representatives. But elsewhere there is hardly a direction in which one can look without finding abundance combined with excellence.

As to the oldest and highest of all literary departments, poetry—there can be, in serious and catholic judgment, no diversity of general estimate, though there may be wide variation in detail and in particulars to note. The processes which went on in the eighteenth century could provide, as has been said, no standard of poetry: but they assisted, only less than in prose, the formation of a common basis of language on which, by the combined aid of recovery of old treasures and new inventions of genius, a great poetic diction could be rebuilt. And the new genius itself was indubitable. Wordsworth—a doubtful critic, but a great poet on his day; Coleridge, on his day (which unfortunately came but too seldom, a greater poet than Wordsworth, and one of the most marvellously influential critics of the world; Scott and Byron, the revivers of verse-romance and the first writers to carry English literature all over Europe as a model and an influence; Shelley, the "poet of poets" in both senses of that ambiguous term—in the first division of the period; Tennyson, Browning, Swinburne, William Morris, Rossetti, who overlapped them, and each other, in successive stages of the second—were only the most important names to which, as once before only, not a few high seconds and a crowd of real though minor poets could be added. But the important thing—for such a “view” as this—is not so much the presence of poets, great as individuals, as the diffusion and recognition of the true spirit of poetry itself which, since the death of Dryden, had been very rarely and scantily present—since the death of Milton, never apparent in fullest strength. From the days of Wordsworth the much talked of “Return to Nature” in subject had been unmistakable; from the days of Coleridge (though he himself did not fully understand his own emancipation), the fetters and limitations which had been imposed on the form of poetry, with some healthy but more unhealthy results, were loosened and thrown away. The second and third generation took up the re-lighted torch, and the blaze of poetry continued for at least some ninety years—without prejudice to successors.

The next literary product of the nineteenth century upon which the attention of posterity is pretty certain to be concentrated—a product which is almost more its own than its poetry, because it owes less to predecessors, old or recent—is its work in the novel. The eighteenth had produced in Fielding one absolutely supreme novelist; in Richardson and Sterne two of the greatest talent and of influence at home and abroad; in Smollett our best practitioner, up to the time, of the novel of what is called “picaresque” adventure; in Horace Walpole and Mrs. Radcliffe, cultivators, with some originality, of a special variety, the “Terror-Novel,” which has never quite lost its hold; and in Miss Burney a considerable advancer of the domestic novel—which has eaten up most other kinds except that of adventure. But its minor fiction, with a few exceptions, though plentiful enough, had not been very good. By or soon after the beginning of the nineteenth, Scott, taking a variety of the adventure novel or romance, which had been tried at unsuccessfully for a long time—the historical—brought it to a state of something like perfection which promptly served as pattern to all Europe: while Miss Austen, with a less popular but more delicate genius, brought the domestic variety nearer perfection still. Her example waited longer than his for imitation with any success: but not so very long. Scott’s was imitated at once: and both Romance and Novel (as the styles of the two have come, not perhaps quite accurately, to be distinguished), subdivided into numerous classes or, better still, freed from any necessity of classification at all—flourished as they never had before in England or anywhere else, though France, starting a little later, ran them hard in their own days. The greatest names, those of Dickens and Thackeray, head a list of others from really great to not so very small, which in a paper like this it would be idle to attempt to draw up; because it would be somewhat ungracious to begin with any one, and almost more so to stop with any other.

It has been said that the Addisonian Essay had been a main feature of eighteenth century literature; and it continued to be so throughout the nineteenth, with a double portion of the freedom from conventional form which marked the younger century. Its freedom and its fertility were greatly helped by the enormous multiplication of periodical literature which has been glanced at.

Periodicals—from the most ponderous “Review,” to the lightest “newspaper,” needed “articles”: and every “article” is an essay of a kind. The century, moreover, became one of criticism, as no previous century had been, and every criticism is an essay or a fragment of one. Indeed, there is nothing that cannot be treated essay-fashion: though we have mostly given up attaching the title to extensive and serious works like Locke's. A library exclusively confined to Essays would contain a very large proportion of the very best literary work of these ninety years: and except Tennyson, hardly one of the greatest names would fail to appear in the catalogue. The sciences by their extreme specialisation, and the growth of technical language, have almost inevitably contributed less to pure literature than their former proportion: but they have not lacked excellent writers. And as for History, which has in times past provided some of the greatest literature of the world, it has certainly not failed to put in its share, though the much greater attention to the historical “document” now required of the historian, has tended to increase the bulk of his work, and diminish that of his subject with not altogether happy results; and though a school of historical purists or Nazarites has arisen which would discourage literary aims almost or altogether. Biography, travel, other varieties of miscellaneous literature were freely practised, and sometimes introduced in this period.

It may be disappointing to some readers—and it certainly goes against some current theories and demands—to leave the view in something of a mist, for the last thirty years, or, according to convention, the present generation's time. But a few may be contented to take it on trust from one who has had perhaps rather more acquaintance with literary history than most people that, as was said at the beginning, the continuance, on apparently level terms, of such views to contemporary literature has never been satisfactory and for good reasons never can be. Towards the time already indicated—the beginning of the last decade of the nineteenth century—the elder lights were being gradually extinguished, and though some remained and were even reinforced in their own semblance, a taste for different sorts of illumination set in. As always in such cases a cry of “Convention” was raised and various anticonventions were tried. “Free verse” in poetry; “Free prose,” in a different sense of “free,” in novel, became or strove to become the order of the day. Paradox, the usual resource of talent which is not sure of itself, flourished, or raged, as the reader may choose the word: and that natural daughter of Paradox, the putting forth of opinions intended to shock the feeble-minded, became more frequent in our streets than ever before. But how the state of things went on; what effect has been produced on it, by the great shock of the War of 1914-1918, and so forth, must be left to others to see and say. Not all those fit to take the vanguard are buried by the holly-bush yet; and all history teaches that even when this seems to be the case, it only means that new warriors will soon be earth-born. As the body of this book will show, they will have a richer and more varied armory of word-weapons to use than any of their predecessors and it will only rest with them to choose the best and keenest and use them with such skill as they may.

THE CORRECT USE OF ENGLISH IN SPEAKING AND WRITING

BY ALLEN MAWER, M.A.

Baines Professor of English Language in the University of Liverpool

SPELLING.—Few languages have a more difficult system (or lack of system) of spelling than English. Our language started with an imperfect alphabet, and its unphonetic character has been greatly intensified, firstly by our frequent contact with other nations and their languages, either through war, conquest and trade or through books; secondly, by the more or less definite fixing of our spelling at the end of the fifteenth century, while our pronunciation is, has been, and always will be changing; thirdly, by sporadic attempts to reform our spelling.

As an illustration of the first we may note how ch has three values in chief, champagne and Christ, the first word reaching us through the Norman Conquest, the second through modern French trade and society, the third through the Greek Testament. Of the second we cannot have a better illustration than the traditional rhymes allowed to poets. They may rhyme war and star, love and prove, wand and hand, ward and hard. These pairs of words were once both spelled and pronounced alike, then for various reasons the vowel in one of each of the pairs changed its pronunciation, but the spelling gives no record of it, and we are content to allow pure eye-rhymes. The third disturbing cause was active chiefly in the sixteenth century. Then it was that spellings such as victuals, doubt, fault replaced earlier vitails, doute, faute, because scholars wished to suggest their ultimate Latin sources. Usually they left no mark on the actual pronunciation of the word, but in fault we have now come to pronounce the l, though Pope still rhymes fault and ought.

Ambiguous and arbitrary though our spelling is, educated opinion allows but little latitude in its use: inflexion and inflection are permitted, practice is now almost universal, but practise (verb) is occasionally met with, and practised (adj.) is universal, development and judgment may pass muster with or without an e, we may dramatise or dramatize a novel, grey and gray are alike admissible though some would try to differentiate them in use; one may smell attar or otto of roses, and a love of false simplicity is forcing rime upon us, side by side with rhyme, but even if one drew up a complete list of words with such alternative forms, it would give but cold comfort to those who find difficulty in using a fixed orthography.

PRONUNCIATION.—The question which at once suggests itself under this head is “What is the standard by which pronunciation is determined in present-day English?” or, to put it in another way, “What is the best English?” Many answers have been given to these questions but for the most part they resolve themselves into that given by Jespersen that the best English is spoken by those “ whose dialect cannot be determined by their speech,” whose language is free from words, idioms, and pronunciations which smack of the local or provincial. This is a somewhat bloodless ideal, but it is the one which, under the conditions of modern life, is gradually establishing itself not only in England but in France, Germany, Italy, and all other civilised countries. The speaker who uses the North Country pass, glass with a short vowel, or sounds his r's with a slight Northumbrian burr by bringing his uvula into play, or in the West Country fashion by slightly curling back the tip of his tongue, or who by the merest fraction of a second lengthens too much the initial vowel in the diphthong i of fine, thereby arousing a suspicion of Cockney influence, is not a speaker of STANDARD ENGLISH. There are but few who attain the ideal completely, at least to the ear of the trained phonetician, and among educated people, whether they live in London or the provinces, one must recognise the existence of slight dialectal variations, such as have led Professor Wyld and others to use the term RECEIVED STANDARD for the absolute ideal and MODIFIED STANDARD for that with which we have for the most part to rest content.

So far we have only dealt with differences of pronunciation which are definitely dialectal and local in their origin, but there are other and important causes of variation which call for comment.

The spoken word never stands entirely still. It is subject to a constant, though at times exceedingly slow, tendency towards change, and this often leads to DIFFERENCES OF PRONUNCIATION BETWEEN ONE GENERATION AND THE NEXT or, still more definitely, between the speech of ourselves and our grandparents. Two different pronunciations may thus overlap in actual point of time. Speakers who are now in the forties and who would themselves always pronounce leisure, herb and hospital as lezhur, herb and hospital, and shilling with a final ing, can remember grandparents who spoke the Standard English of their day and yet said leezhur, erb, orspital and shillin. This is happening in our own generation in the sound values of the italicised symbols in such words as launch, soldier, often, suit. Some people pronounce them with the older pronunciation still preserved in haunt, idiot (no example), blue, others with the new pronunciation now fully established in aunt, Italian, toss, due.

But the pronunciation of words is affected by questions not only of time and age, but also by those of the significance and general manner of speech. Certain words when used in speech normally bear no stress at all, and thus suffer a reduction in the fulness of their articulation, but when used in positions of greater emphasis and importance they keep their full phonetic value. To is not pronounced the same in “ to-morrow ” and “ to and fro,” or the in “ that’s the thing ” (contemptuous), and “ that’s the thing ” (meaning the one and only thing to the exclusion of all others), or have in “ You ought to have done it,” and “ Have you done it ? ” In this way a large number of words, more especially the small change of speech in the shape of the articles, pronouns, auxiliaries, conjunctions, prepositions, have in speech at least TWO VALUES, A STRESSED AND AN UNSTRESSED ONE, and nothing is more destructive of good speech than the false distinctness cultivated by some elocutionists whereby all these words are at all times pronounced with their full stressed vowels, thus allowing no possibility of giving expression to the finer shades of speech-value.

More difficult is the case of those words which tend to have a different pronunciation in good COLLOQUIAL SPEECH from that which seems fitting for more public occasions such as reading aloud, teaching, preaching, and lecturing. Principle may be pronounced as [prinsepl] or as [prinsipl], horseshoe as [hors-shoo] or as [horshoo], sit down as [sit doun] or as [sid(d)oun], November as [nōvember] or as [november]. always as [alwāz] or as [alwez]. Here the first thing to note is that all of us, even the most careful, use the more colloquial pronunciations to a far greater extent than we as a rule suspect. We are the worst possible witnesses in the case, and no man can safely be asked how he pronounces a word. The only safe way of finding out is for his friends with well-trained ears to listen and catch him unawares. We must beware, therefore, of setting up a Pharisaic standard of propriety on the basis of our own imagined practice, but, on the other hand, the more we realise these tendencies in our own speech the more carefully shall we be on our guard against colloquial English becoming slovenly English, and give each letter and syllable its distinct value, which, as we have seen above, by no means always implies its full value. The better our standard of colloquial speech the less danger there will be that, in the reaction from it, we rush to a pedantic extreme, and use a stilted type of English which cannot possibly respond to the emotional demands we have to make upon it.

So far we have been dealing with differences of pronunciation into which questions of right and wrong hardly enter; both pronunciations are at least admissible, though not perhaps on all occasions. There are others where right and wrong are more or less sharply divided, and first we may deal with those alternative and FAULTY PRONUNCIATIONS which have arisen THROUGH THE TYRANNY OF THE PRINTED WORD. With the spread of education and the universal circulation of books, we have come, in the first place, to exalt the written at the expense of the spoken word and to think, quite wrongly, that it has in itself some inherent authority which exalts it above what is in truth its more living self. Secondly, after the first few years of childhood we now learn new words by reading them much more often than by hearing them, and may, if cut off from intercourse with educated speakers, come to very strange conclusions about the pronunciation of words. Such blunders are not as rare as one might expect, even among people fairly conversant with books. One may hear from time to time such strange pronunciations of comely, ribald, heinous, and Colchester as [kōmli], [rībald], [hēnos], and [kōlchestər] in place of the normal ones given in this Dictionary.

Both factors lead to the same result, viz., that we are tending to give up many pronunciations which have developed by the natural process of oral transmission from one generation to another and to substitute ones suggested by the spelling. Thus the old pronunciations of waistcoat, forehead, often, extraordinary, ate, conduit, cognisance = (badge), acknowledge, as [weskut], [fored], [ofn], [extrordinari], [et], [kundit], [konizans], [aknoli] are fast giving way to [wāskot], [forched], [oftn], [extra-ordinary], [ât], [kondit], and, at least in clerical circles [aknōlij].

Further and even more striking examples are furnished by a study of what is going on in our place-names. We are giving up the old pronunciations of Tynemouth, Daventry, Shrewsbury, Cirencester, Pontefract, Darlington, Derby as Tinmouth, Daintree, Shrowsbury, Cissiter, Pomfret, Darnton, Darby in favour of pronunciations based upon the spelling. It certainly looks as if it will not be long before we are saying Nor-wich, Aln-wick, Streat-ham, South-wark. Such pronunciations, whether in ordinary words or in place-names, are due to an essentially illiterate exaltation of symbol over sound, spelling over pronunciation.

The safe rule, so far as one can ever speak of a rule in English, is that when one has a choice of two pronunciations of this kind, one should reject the pronunciation which is nearest that suggested by the spelling.

We have dealt with two forms of pedantry in pronunciation, both alike ultimately due to worship of the letter, but there are others which are equally unfortunate. Our language contains a large number of MODERN FRENCH WORDS ADOPTED INTO OUR speech from the seventeenth century onward. Such words were fully naturalised, and congee, dishabille, nonchalance, nuance, provenance, levee, naivety, parvenu, valet were pronounced and sometimes spelled in a more or less definitely English fashion as [conji], [dishabili], [non'shalans], [prov'enans], [levi], [naiviti], [parvenū], [valit]. Now we are all supposed to be French scholars and we are so anxious not to be thought ignorant of French pronunciation that we are coming more and more to substitute the actual Modern French word, or, if we are not quite sure of our French accent, we perhaps try to avoid such words altogether. A similar thing is happening in the case of certain French names of places which once had a genuine English pronunciation. We are afraid of being thought ignorant if we follow our forefathers and speak of Calais, Rheims, Orleans, Lyons, Boulogne as [kalis], [rēmz], [orlēnz], [liōnz], [buloin], and the day is not perhaps very far distant when we shall want to speak of Paris, Brussels, and Marseilles, as though the English never heard of them till the twentieth century.

Somewhat similar is the case of a large number of WORDS OF LATIN ORIGIN. The pronunciation of these words in English is determined by the old-fashioned pronunciation of Latin which prevailed in England in the days of the Renaissance (still to be heard in the Westminster Play), and which has a long and honourable history behind it. That pronunciation does not follow the strict rules of Latin quantity though it has quite definite rules of its own. Nowadays we are taught to pronounce Latin in entirely different fashion, and there is often a clashing of new and old. This is how in the pronunciation of plenary, sterile, Deuteronomy, hypochondria, ephemeral, dynasts, and dynasty we often hear [plēnari], [steril], [dūteronom'í], [hīpokondrīa], [efēmeral], [dīnasts], and [dīnasti] in place of [plenari], [steril], [dūtero'numi], [hīpokondrīa], (cf. hipped = discontented), [efcmeral], [dīnasts], [dīnasti]. When two such pronunciations exist it is very difficult on first principles to determine which is the better, but if we know enough Latin or Greek to realise which pronunciation is nearer the classical original, we may as a general rule reject that alternative.

Of different origin is the two-fold pronunciation recorded in this dictionary for such words as consistory, laboratory, illustrate, contemplate, ally, respiratory. None of these words had the accent on the initial syllable when they were first borrowed by us, but there is a general TENDENCY IN ENGLISH SPEECH TO THROW BACK THE ACCENT as far as possible in every word, and hence alternative pronunciations with such have now arisen. Recondite and incondite illustrate this process rather happily. The first is in fairly common use and now is pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, the second is more definitely a scholar's word and has not yet thrown the accent back.

WORDS.—As we turn the pages of this dictionary one of our first impressions must be that of the wealth of words to be found there which writers on formal rhetoric have labelled as "SYNONYMS," or, in the strict sense of the term, "words which are the equivalents of each other." If, however, we proceed to examine these synonyms a little more closely, we shall find that there is good reason for the alternative definition by which those writers have tried to save the position by adding the qualifying alternative "or which have very nearly the same signification." In reality there are no synonyms in our language or any other, if we thereby imply that any one word may be substituted for another on all possible occasions. Even if two words cover one another completely so far as meaning is concerned, they never do so in actual usage. It is very difficult to distinguish commence and begin in meaning, but in Oxford usage you cannot "begin" Bachelor of Arts, you can only "commence." It would be difficult to define short and brief in any way which would differentiate them, and yet what a world of difference between "Out, out, brief candle!" and "Out, out, short candle!" To this extent at least the theory of the mot juste is a true one.

It is these subtle differences of meaning, usage, and association which make certain words so extraordinarily sensitive a test of social savoir faire. A man's use of the words man, woman, lady, gentleman, clergyman, fellow, will stamp him even more effectively than his pronunciation of them. Further, if the use of words is a matter of such delicate poise, we must BEWARE OF ANY DEFINITE AND PRE-DETERMINED BIAS IN OUR SELECTION BETWEEN ALTERNATIVE FORMS OF EXPRESSION. We shall not always make a point of choosing the more formal and stiff alternative and use sufficient, prior to, commence to the exclusion of enough, before, begin; we shall not allow a perverted sense of modesty or politeness make us always decide in favour of accoucheuse, serviette, perspire as against midwife, napkin, sweat, or call (in army language) a washing-bench an ablution-bench. If we are writing an essay we shall not always wend our way and never make it, or take our meals at a hostelry in definite preference to an inn. In other words, we shall try to find the word which, by meaning, association, usage, sound, fits the immediate context and not allow ourselves to fall into the jargon of any particular social dialect.

Words will not stand still in their meaning any more than they will in their pronunciation, but we must be on our guard against violent and unjustifiable divergences from the true and natural path of semantic development. Largely because of our love of the fine term as against the plain one, we have come to use many words of Latin origin in a loose and entirely illogical fashion and many such words need to be carefully watched. News of an event may transpire, but the event can only happen; you may aggravate your offence, you cannot aggravate your master; it is possible that a thing may be unique, it certainly cannot be somewhat unique; there is such a thing as mutual friendship, but no such person as a mutual friend; one thing can replace another but cannot be substituted by it; one thing may resemble another but it cannot be resembled to it.

In reaction against these dangers we may rush to the opposite extreme and fall into THE SNARE OF EVERYDAY COLLOQUIALISMS AND VULGARISMS. Colloquialisms are not in themselves bad. Swank is a word which has won a definite place in our everyday speech and supplies a real need, but that does not necessarily make it a good word in writing. Similarly with up to in such phrases as the familiar "It's up to us," or with the American use of sense and glimpse as verbs. Now, and for a good many years to come, these expressions will strike a jarring note in a piece of serious prose and they cannot, as some people seem to imagine, be given an air of respectability by surrounding them with a halo of inverted commas.

Here, as in pronunciation, our great aim should be to find the happy mean between pedantic stiffness and colloquial vulgarity, to realise the need for the golden mean. It is not a problem of our own day and generation alone; it has always been with us and no one has put the need for choice and circumspection better than Johnson when he gave praise to the English style of Addison as one that was "familiar but not coarse, elegant but not ostentatious."

BOOKS RECOMMENDED FOR FURTHER STUDY

Spelling and Pronunciation

Bradley's Spoken and Written English and Nicklin's The Sounds of Standard English (Oxford Press) are stimulating and suggestive. Fuller and more systematic treatment of many of these problems from a definitely historical point of view will be found in Wyld's History of Colloquial English (Fisher Unwin). Some of the conclusions of the latter are presented in concise and more popular form in the same author's Studies in English Rhymes from Surrey to Pope (Murray). For a study of the pronunciation of English from a strictly phonetic point of view, one may recommend Sweet's The Sounds of English (Oxford Press) or Daniel Jones's The Pronunciation of English, which include transcriptions in phonetic spelling. Suggestions for the reform of English spelling will be found in the publications of the Simplified Spelling Society, while Craigie in his Pronunciation of English and First English Book (Oxford Press) has suggested a simple system of diacritics whereby the correct pronunciation of English with an unreformed system of spelling is rendered very easy of attainment.

Words

For a study of the growth of the English vocabulary the best books are Bradley's Making of English (Macmillan) and Jespersen's Growth and Structure of the English Language (Teubner). For a popular study of the curious semantic developments of many of our words, the best book is Greenough and Kittredge, Words and their ways in English Speech (Macmillan).

The best book on the right and wrong use of words, idioms, and phrases in English is The King's English (Oxford Press).

On all these points alike much skilful and for the most part thoroughly sound information and guidance will be found in the tracts issued from time to time by the Society for Pure English, and published by the Oxford Press.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY AND TELEPHONY

BY G. W. O. HOWE, D.Sc., M.I.E.E.

James Watt Professor of Electrical Engineering in the University of Glasgow

THE term "wireless" is now generally applied to the transmission of energy, signals, or speech, by means of electromagnetic waves radiated through the intervening medium without any connecting wires. It is also called radio-telegraphy and telephony.

The theory of these waves was first propounded by Clerk-Maxwell in 1864, but they were first produced experimentally in 1888 by Hertz, and are sometimes referred to as Hertzian waves. Marconi was the first to apply them to the transmission of signals; he commenced his experiments in Italy in 1895, and came to England with his apparatus in the following year.

If a steady electric current flows along a wire a magnetic field is produced in the space around it, but if the current is very suddenly started, stopped, or reversed, a pulse of electric and magnetic force travels outward like a ripple on a pond into which a stone has been thrown, the velocity of propagation being the same as that of light, viz., 186,000 miles per second. If the current in the wire is a high-frequency alternating current, that is, a current that reverses its direction many thousand times a second, there will be a continuous emission of waves.

In Hertz's experiments the wire was only two or three feet long and placed horizontally, but Marconi supported the wire vertically from a mast. Other things being equal, the strength of the radiated field and of the current produced in a distant receiving station is proportional to the length of the vertical wire. In order that large currents may flow up and down the wire, even at the top, it is necessary to have a large capacity or electrical reservoir at the top; this is obtained by a number of wires, usually spread out horizontally, supported on two or more masts. With such a large upper capacity the current has nearly the same magnitude at all points of the vertical wire. The whole system of wires is called an aerial or antenna, and the current as measured at the bottom is called the "aerial current." The lower end of the aerial is either connected directly to a network of wires buried in the earth, or to a network supported by insulators on short masts; this latter network, extending over the earth's surface under the aerial, may be insulated at its extremities, in which case it is called a counterpoise, lower capacity, or insulated earth screen, or it may be connected at numerous points to plates, pins, or wires buried in the earth. On ships the lower end of the aerial is connected to the skin of the ship.

The masts or towers which support the aerial may be of solid wood, steel tube, wooden or steel lattice; they are usually supported by guys or stay wires, but are sometimes self-supporting like the Eiffel Tower. Sometimes steel masts are insulated from the ground by inserting insulating material between the foundation and the base of the mast.

There are many ways of producing the high-frequency current in the transmitting aerial. In the early days Marconi employed the Hertz method; a spark-gap was inserted between the foot of the aerial and the earth, the high tension terminals of an induction coil being connected, one to the aerial and the other to the earth side of the spark-gap. On depressing the Morse key which closed the primary circuit of the coil, a succession of sparks passed across the gap. Before each individual spark can occur, however, the aerial must be charged to a high voltage, the voltage and the charge on the aerial increasing until the gap breaks down, when the spark forms a conducting bridge and allows the charge to flow to earth; but like a pendulum which is suddenly released, the current rushes up and down the aerial with decreasing amplitude until the spark is extinguished. At each spark, therefore, a train of waves is radiated into space. For ship work the standard frequency is 500,000 cycles or complete oscillations per second, which corresponds to a wave-length in space of 600 metres; if therefore ten oscillations occur before the oscillation is damped out, the train of waves lasts $1/50000$ of a second.

Various improvements were soon introduced. The oscillation was set up in a separate circuit consisting of a condenser, a spark-gap, and an inductive coil, which latter was placed close to a coil connected between the aerial and the earth. The oscillatory current in the first circuit induces an oscillatory circuit in the aerial, both being tuned to have the same natural frequency of oscillation. As the power of the sets was increased, the induction coil with a direct-current supply was replaced by a transformer supplied from an alternator or rotary converter, and instead of the spark occurring between two stationary metal balls, it was made to occur between fixed electrodes and projecting pins on a rapidly rotating wheel. Many other special types of spark-gaps have been used, but for large stations this method of setting up the high-frequency current is now obsolete and has been replaced by one of three different methods: (a) the arc; (b) the high-frequency alternator; and (c) the thermionic valve.

Duddell discovered that an ordinary electric arc supplied with continuous current was able to produce an alternating current of telephonic frequency in a condenser and inductive coil connected in series across its terminals. Poulsen found that by modifying the construction of the arc and burning it in a closed chamber containing spirit vapour or coal gas, it could be made to produce alternating currents of the very high frequencies required for wireless telegraphy. Such arcs have been constructed for powers of several thousand kilowatts, and are employed in a large number of important stations.

In electric light and power stations alternating current is generated by means of alternators, but the frequency is only 15 to 60 cycles per second. Great difficulties are experienced in designing such machines for very high frequencies, but in the large stations recently erected for transoceanic communication the wave-length employed has been increased to 15 to 25 kilometres, corresponding to frequencies of 20,000 to 12,000 cycles per second. It is possible to build satisfactory alternators for this frequency. A transmitting station equipped with such high-frequency alternators resembles very much an ordinary electric power station; the output of the station is, however, supplied through transformers to the aerial from which it is partly radiated into space and partly dissipated in unavoidable losses.

In some cases, notably at the large German station at Nauen, the alternators deliver the current at a quarter of the desired frequency, and special transformers, the iron of which is magnetised by means of continuous current, are employed to double the frequency. By passing the current successively through two of these frequency doublers the required quadruple frequency is obtained. This method has the advantage of requiring alternators for a frequency of 5000 cycles per second instead of 20,000, which greatly simplifies the construction and operation.

The most recent development in the production of high-frequency power consists in the use of thermionic valves for the purpose. By suitable circuit arrangements, a thermionic valve supplied with continuous currents can, like the arc, generate a high-frequency alternating current. At the large station at Carnarvon, fifty-six valves operate in parallel and supply several hundred kilowatts of high-frequency power to the aerial.

In whatever way the power is generated the aerial current must be capable of rapid control by means of a Morse key (in telegraphy) or microphone (in telephony). In most cases the key is arranged to operate on some link in the chain, either opening a circuit or altering an inductance, or inserting a resistance, in such a way as to cause the aerial current to change from zero or a very small value to its maximum value. In the case of an arc generator it is usually considered preferable to interfere as little as possible with the steady burning of the arc and the common method of signalling in large arc stations is to cause the depression of the key to short-circuit some of the aerial tuning inductance, thus altering merely the frequency of the waves sent out. In this case the receiving station is tuned to receive the wave sent out when the key is depressed (marking wave) and not that sent out when the key is not depressed (spacing wave).

For high speed working the message is punched on paper strip, which is then passed through an automatic transmitter; this is really a key operated by springs, weights, or electric motor, its up and down movements being controlled, however, by the presence or absence of holes in the paper tape passing through. The press of traffic and the economic necessity of increasing the revenue is leading to the gradual introduction of high-speed automatic transmission in all large commercial stations. For radio-telephony the transmitters employed are almost exclusively of the thermionic valve type. The speech or music causes variations in the resistance of a microphone which is connected in series with a cell and the primary winding of a small transformer, the secondary winding of which is connected to the grid of a thermionic valve. The current passing through this valve must therefore follow the fluctuations of the microphone current. There are many ways of causing this so-called modulating valve to act upon the output of the main oscillating power valve, but the result is in every case to subject the amplitude of the high-frequency current in the aerial to variations in accordance with the variations of microphone resistance produced by the voice.

At the receiving station the passing electromagnetic waves induce high-frequency electromotive forces in the receiving aerial. The receiving aerial may consist of a vertical wire with or without a system of elevated wires, or of a long horizontal wire a few feet above the ground, or of a coil of several turns wound on a vertical frame a few feet square, the plane of the coil or the direction of the long horizontal wire must be along the line joining the two stations. Inductive coils and condensers are connected between the aerial and earth, or in the circuit of the frame coil until its natural frequency is tuned exactly to that of the received wave. The current produced by the received wave will then be greatly increased owing to resonance, and the response to the desired signal will be much greater than that to any other signal of a different wave-length.

This selective action can be still further increased by causing the aerial to act not directly upon the detecting device, but through the intermediate action of a separate oscillatory circuit which is also tuned very accurately to the desired frequency. Such tuned circuits act as sieves, filtering out undesired signals which would otherwise interfere with the reception of the desired signals. Such separation is impossible if both signals have the same frequency or even if their frequencies are not sufficiently different.

Every time the operator at the transmitting station depresses his key, a succession of waves passes the receiving station and sets up a high-frequency current in the aerial and other circuits coupled to it. The presence of these currents must be made audible or visible to the receiving operator. In telephony the waves are passing continuously, but with a rapidly fluctuating amplitude controlled by the speech.

Hertz detected the presence of the received waves by their ability to make a spark jump across a minute gap in a ring of copper wire. Marconi employed a coherer—a glass tube containing metal filings; the resistance through such a tube is normally very high, and a battery is unable to operate a bell or magnetic inker through it, but the application of a high-frequency voltage set up by the received waves greatly lowers the resistance and causes the inker to mark the paper strip. With this device all the early experiments of Marconi were carried out. It was soon found, however, that the advantages of aural reception by means of a telephone receiver far outweighed the advantage of the tape record given by the coherer.

A great step in advance was the introduction of the magnetic detector, in the form developed by Marconi and used on ships for many years. In this, an endless band, consisting of a large number of fine insulated iron wires twisted together, was maintained by clockwork in continual rotation around two pulleys about a foot apart. The straight portion passed through a glass tube on which two coils were wound one over the other. One was connected between the aerial and earth or in a coupled, tuned circuit, whilst the other was connected to a telephone receiver. Two permanent magnets were fixed with their poles near the iron wire where it passed through the coils.

So long as no signals were being received the passing of the iron wire caused only a light breathing sound in the telephones, but on the reception of a wave, the high-frequency current passing round the coil caused a molecular change in the iron wire and a sudden slip of the magnetic field between the magnets and the wire; this caused a click in the telephone receiver. It must be remembered that these magnetic detectors were used exclusively for the receipt of signals from spark-gap transmitters, and that, even during the holding down of the transmitting key for the short time necessary to send a dot, a number of sparks occurred, each of which sent out a train of waves and caused a click in the telephone receiver. These clicks, following one another at the rate of say 300 per second would give a musical note of this pitch in the telephone receiver. A point of considerable importance in the operation of a spark transmitter is to ensure that the sparks occur regularly and at such a frequency that they give a high-pitched musical tone in the telephone receiver, easily distinguishable from non-musical sounds such as those caused by atmospheric interference.

The two types of detectors most commonly employed to-day are the crystal and the three-electrode valve; these both depend for their action on rectification, that is, they offer a greater conductivity to current in one direction than to current in the opposite direction. If a piece of zincite and a piece of copper pyrites are brought into light contact, it is found that the resistance is greater in one direction than the other, so that if a high-frequency alternating voltage is applied to a circuit containing such a contact, it produces a greater current in one direction than in the other. If the circuit contain also a telephone receiver, the diaphragm, although not affected by the high-frequency alternating current, will be acted upon by the excess of the impulses in one direction over those in the other, and will thus be moved at every spark at the transmitting station. There are a great number of combinations of crystals and of crystals and metals or other substances which exhibit this phenomenon, e.g., carborundum and steel; graphite and galena; silicon and brass. In many cases the sensitivity is improved if a small steady voltage is applied to the contact, upon which the alternating signal voltage is superimposed.

Professor Fleming first suggested the application of the two-electrode thermionic valve as a rectifier for wireless reception. In a vacuum bulb, an incandescent filament and a cold metal plate or cylinder allow current to pass from plate to filament, but not in the reverse direction. Professor Fleming's patent was taken out in 1904, but the greatest stride was made in 1907, when Lee de Forest invented the three-electrode valve, which only differs from the two-electrode valve by the insertion of a metallic grid of fine wires between the filament and the cold plate. A battery is connected between the filament and the cold plate and maintains a steady current through the valve; the telephone receiver is also in this circuit. The high-frequency voltage produced by the received signal is applied between the filament and the grid, and the adjustments are so made that when the voltage is in one direction it causes a large increase in the plate current, whereas when it is in the other direction it causes a much smaller decrease. Whenever a signal is received there is thus an increase in the average current flowing through the telephone receiver. There are other ways in which the valve may be used as a detector into which we cannot here enter.

The three-electrode valve is also largely used as an amplifier; for this purpose the adjustments are so made that variations of the voltage applied to the grid, whether up or down, produce proportional variations in the plate current. An alternating voltage applied to the grid will then produce a symmetrical alternating current in the plate circuit. In this case the plate circuit will not contain a telephone receiver, but some device whereby the amplified voltage will act upon the grid of the next valve and give a greatly increased effect. The received high-frequency currents can thus be amplified before passing to the detecting valve or crystal detector. In a similar way the currents of telephonic frequency produced by the detector can be amplified before passing to the telephone receiver. In the first case, the device is called a high-frequency amplifier, and in the second a low-frequency or note amplifier.

By causing a fraction of the high-frequency amplified power in the plate circuit to be supplied back by a transformer or other means to the grid circuit of the same valve, the tendency of an oscillation, once started, to die away can be reduced, thus greatly increasing the sensitiveness of the device and making very weak signals plainly audible. If this so-called retro-action or back-coupling is increased beyond a certain point, the valve becomes a self-excited generator of oscillations to which reference has already been made.

We have not yet explained how transmitting stations other than spark stations give an audible signal at the receiving station. The received current in this case is not intermittent, but an alternating current of constant amplitude, so long as the sending operator holds his key down. If, now, at the receiving station an oscillating valve set is placed near the receiving apparatus, the high-frequency voltage induced in the receiving apparatus will be due to this alone when no signals are being received, but due to both superimposed when signals are being received. If the oscillating valve set is adjusted to oscillate at a frequency very near that of the transmitting station, they will first be in step and give a strong resultant, then out of step, giving a weak or no resultant. Hence a note will be heard in the telephone receiver only when a signal is being received, and the pitch of the note heard will depend on the difference between the frequencies of the transmitting station and the valve oscillator at the receiving station. This method of reception is called the Heterodyne method and is due to Fessenden. It is the common method adopted in all long-distance communication.

Wireless telegraphy has an important application in the navigation of ships and aircraft. By suitable devices it is possible to tell from what direction a signal is coming; a ship equipped with such direction-finding apparatus can thus locate its bearing with reference to any coast station which it can pick up, and from two or more such observations on different stations it can fix its exact position. The principle of the method is based on the fact that if the waves are received on a vertical coil instead of a vertical wire and the coil be rotated about a vertical axis, no signal is received when the coil is broadside on to the transmitting station, since the concentric ripples of the magnetic field cannot then pass through the coil. In another system the coast station is fitted with such a device, and the ship asks the coast station to observe its bearing and notify it.

In the early days of wireless telegraphy there was considerable doubt as to whether the electromagnetic waves would bend sufficiently around the curvature of the earth to make long-distance communication possible. It was found, however, that the signals received at distant stations were very much stronger than one would have expected from mathematical calculation. It was also found that, especially with short waves, the signals were much stronger by night than by day, although there is no change in the conditions of the earth or lower atmosphere to account for such a variation. These two facts have led to the assumption, first suggested by Oliver Heaviside, that in the upper atmosphere the rarefied gas is always ionised, i.e., maintained in a conducting state. This so-called Heaviside Layer acts to some extent as a reflector, and the waves, instead of passing off into space, are caused to follow the curvature of the earth, and thus make possible radio-communication with the antipodes. The difference between the strength of the signals by day and by night is supposed to be due to the sun causing a partial ionisation of the rarified atmosphere below the Heaviside Layer; the medium through which the waves have to pass is thus made slightly conducting, which leads to considerable absorption. It must be admitted, however, that little is known with any certainty about the actual conditions in the upper atmosphere and the part which it plays in radio-telegraphy.

The successful reception of signals does not depend only on their absolute strength, but also on their relative strength as compared with that of the so-called "atmospherics" or electromagnetic disturbances of natural origin which vary with the locality, time of day and season. The elimination of the effect of atmospherics is one of the most pressing problems in long-distance radio-communication.

Note on the Scheme of Pronunciation.

With the exception of g, the consonants employed in the phonetic spelling retain their name sounds, and the vowels, unless marked, retain their short sounds; h represents the guttural h heard in "loch." The digraph aw represents the sound of a heard in "fall;" ou the sound of ow heard in "now;" oo, unmarked, the sound heard in "book;" öo the sound heard in "moon." The surd sound of th is indicated by common letters, as in "thin;" the sonant sound by small capitals, as in "then." The following is the key to the long and peculiar vowel sounds:—

Fäte, fär, ädo; më, hęr; mîne; nôte; tüne; móon.

THE "KING'S ENGLISH" DICTIONARY

A, a, the first letter of the alphabet in the Aryan languages. In English it has eight sounds, heard in blade, fare, any, man, star, all, what, China.

a (ā, a) a. the indefinite article, signifying one or any, placed before nouns of the singular number denoting an individual object, before collective nouns, and also before plural nouns when the adjective few or the phrase great many is interposed. It is a contraction of an (an unaccented form of A.S. ān, one), and is substituted for it before all words beginning with a consonant sound; an is often retained before unaccented syllables beginning with h aspirate, u, and eu sounded as yu.

A, the name of the sixth note of the diatonic scale of C major; la in tonic sol-fa notation. In logic the universal affirmative proposition. In Lloyd's register A1 denotes a ship of the first class; hence, first-rate, excellent. As an abbreviation, a has various meanings, for which see list of abbreviations. As a prefix, a has different significations, for which see lists of prefixes.

A sharp (A ♯), the name of a musical tone intermediate between A and B. A flat (A ♭), the name of a tone intermediate between A and G.

aardvark (ārd-vārk) n. [D.] the ground-hog or earth-pig of South Africa.

aardwolf (ārd-woolf) n. [D.] the earth-wolf of South Africa.

Aaronic, Aaronical (ā-rūn-ik, -i-kal) a. pertaining to Aaron or to his priestly office.

Aaronite (ā-rūn-it) n. a descendant of Aaron, who served as a priest in the sanctuary.

Aaron's-beard (ā-rūnz-bērd) n. the name of several plants; large-flowered St. John's wort, etc.

Aaron's-rod (ā-rūnz-rod) n. a rod with a serpent twisted round it [Arch.]; name of several plants, the golden rod, etc.

Ab (ab) n. [H.] the eleventh month of the Jewish civil year, and the fifth of the ecclesiastical year.

abacist (ab-ā-sist) n. [abacus] one that uses an abacus in calculating; a calculator.

aback (a-bak) adv. [A.S. on baec] backwards; by surprise; against the masts—said of the sails when pressed by the wind.

abacot (ab-ā-kot) n. [a corrupt form of bycocket, O.F. bicoquet] a kind of hat worn during the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries; the brim was turned up and ended in a point or points before or behind.

abaction (ab-ak-shun) n. [L. ab and agere, pp. actus, drive] the stealing of a number of cattle at one time.

abactor (ab-ak-tur) n. one that steals a number of cattle at one time.

abacus (ab-ā-kus) n. [G. abax, abakos, reckoning table or board] the upper plate upon the capital of a column, supporting the architrave [Arch.]; an instrument for effecting arithmetical calculations, with sliding balls or counters; any rectangular slab or piece. Abacus harmonicus, the structure and arrangement of the keys or pedals of a musical instrument. Abacus major, a trough in which gold is washed.

Abacus.

Abaddon (a-bad-nū) n. [H. ābad, be lost] the destroyer or angel of the bottomless pit; Apollyon; hell; the bottomless pit.

abaft (a-baft) adv. and prep. [on by aft] at or towards the stern [Naut.]

abalienate (ab-ā-lyen-āt) v.t. [L. ab and alienus, foreign] to transfer the title of property from one to another [Law].

abalienation (ab-ā-lyen-ā-shun) n. the act of abalienating.

abandon (a-ban-dun) v.t. [F. fr. L. ad, and Low L. bandum, proclamation, interdiction] to give up wholly and finally, or with a view never to resume;—n. (a-ban-dong) freedom from restraint or conventionality; heartiness; dash.

abandoned (a-ban-dund) a. given up entirely, as to a vice.

abandonee (a-ban-du-nē) n. one to whom a thing is abandoned [Law].

abandoner (a-ban-dun-er) n. one that gives up wholly and finally.

abandonment (a-ban-dun-ment) n. act of abandoning; entire desertion or relinquishment.

abase (a-bās) v.t. [L. ad and Low L. bassare, lower] to bring low, as to the ground; to east down.

abatement (a-bās-ment) n. the act of abasing, or bringing very low.

abash (a-bash) v.t. [O.F. *es=*L. ex and bahir, express astonishment] to destroy the self-possession of, as by suddenly exciting a consciousness of guilt, inferiority, or the like; to strike with sudden shame or fear.

abashment (a-bash-ment) n. confusion from shame, fear, or the like.

abatable (a-bā-ta-bl) a. capable of being abated, as an abatable writ, etc.

abate (a-bāt) v.t. [L. ab and batere, for batuere, strike] to beat down; to deduct; to diminish; to lessen; to destroy;—v.i. to decrease; to become less in strength or violence.

abatement (a-bāt-ment) n. the act of abating, or the state of being abated; decrease; [Law] a remitting, as of a tax; failure, as of a writ; removal, as of a nuisance; entry of a stranger into a freehold after the death of the last possessor, before the heir or devisee.

abater (a-bā-ter) n. one that, or that which, abates; [Law] one that, without right, enters into a freehold on the death of the last possessor, before the heir or devisee; one that reduces or removes a nuisance.

abatis, abattis (ab-ā-tis, a-ba-tē) n. [F.] a row of sharpened branches of trees turned outward for defence [Fort.].

abatised, abattised (ab-ā-tist) a. having an abatis.

abat-jour (a-bā-jōör) n. [F. abatre, throw down, and jour, day] a skylight.

abattoir (a-bat-wor) n. [F.] a public slaughter-house.

abat-voix (ab-āv-wo) n. [F.] a sounding-board over a pulpit.

abb (ab) n. [A.S. āb, for āwēb, wool, fr. ā and wefan, weave] among weavers, yarn for the warp. Abd-wool, wool for the abb.

abba (ab-ā) n. a Syriac word meaning father, used to denote a religious superior.

abbacy (ab-ā-si) n. [Low L. abbatia, abbey] the condition or privileges of an abbot.

abbatial (a-bā-shal) a. pertaining to an abbot or to an abbey.

abbé (ab-ā) n. [L. abbas, abbot] a cleric in minor orders; an ecclesiastic without charge.

abdess (ab-es) n. [L. abbatissa] the governess of a nunnery.

abbey (ab-ī) n. [Low L. abbatia, abbey] a residence of monks or nuns; the dwelling of an abbot or abbess; a church now or formerly attached to a monastery, as Westminster Abbey. Abbey-land, land now or formerly belonging to an abbey. Abbey-lubber, a lazy monk or abbey pensioner.

abbot (ab-ut) n. [L. abbas, abbot, fr. Syr. abba, father] the head of a community of monks; the superior or governor of an abbey. Abbot of misrule, abbot of unreason, the leader in the popular Christmas revels before the Reformation. A mitred abbot uses the insignia and discharges certain functions of a bishop. Regular abbot, one duly elected and confirmed, and discharging all the functions of an abbot. Secular abbot, a person not a monk, who draws part of the revenues of an abbey.

abbotship (ab-ut-ship) n. the state or office of an abbot.

abbreviate (a-brē-vi-āt) v.t. [L. ad and brevis, short] to bring within less space; to reduce by contraction or omission.

abbreviation (a-brē-vi-ā-shun) n. act of abbreviating; state of being abbreviated; a shortened or contracted form; a reduction of fractions to the lowest terms.

abbreviator (a-brē-vi-ā-tur) n. one that abbreviates or abridges.

abbreviatory (a-brē-vi-ā-tur-ī) a. abbreviating, or tending to abbreviate.

a, b, c, n. the first three letters of the alphabet, used for the whole alphabet; a primer; first principles.

abdal (ab-dal) n. [A. abd, servant, and Allah, God] a derwish.

abdalavi (ab-da-lā-ve) n. [A.] the native name of the hairy melon of Egypt.

Abderian (ab-dē-ri-ān) a. pertaining to Abdera or its inhabitants; given to laughter.

Abderite (ab-dē-rit) n. an inhabitant of Abdera, in Thrace; a stupid person, the inhabitants of Abdera having been proverbial for stupidity. The Abderite, Democritus, the laughing philosopher.

abdest (ab-dest) n. [Per. ab, water, and dast, hand] purification before prayer in the Mohammedan ritual.

abdicant (ab-di-kant) a. abdicating; renouncing; —n. one that abdicates.

abdicate (ab-di-kāt) v.t. [L. ab and dicare, proclaim] to give up right or claim to; to withdraw from power or trust; [Law] to disinherit.

abdication (ab-di-kā-shun) n. abandonment of a public office, a right, or a trust.

abdicated (ab-di-kā-tiv, ab-dik-a-tiv) a. causing, or implying abdication.

abdicator (ab-di-kā-tur) n. one that resigns or abdicates.

abditory (ab-di-tur-i) n. [L. abdere, put away] a hidden repository.

abdomen (ab-dō-men, ab-dō-men), n. [L.] the belly, or that part of the body which lies between the thorax and the bottom of the pelvis.

abdominal (ab-dom-i-nal) a. pertaining to the abdomen; —n. a kind of fish, like salmon, etc., with ventral fins behind the pectoral. Abdominal legs, the false legs of the abdomen of insects.

Abdominal ring, an oblong ring in each groin.

Abdominal scutella, the short, wide, imbricated scales that lie along the belly of a serpent.

abdominoscopy (ab-dom-i-nos-kō-pi) n. [L. abdomen, and G. skopem, view] the examination of the abdomen.

abdominous (ab-dom-i-nus) a. having a big belly; pury.

abduce (ab-dūs) v.t. [L. ab and ducere, lead] to draw to a different part [Anat.].

abducent (ab-dū-sent) a. drawing away [Anat.]. Abducent nerves, the sixth pair of cranial nerves.

abduct (ab-duk-t) v.t. [L. abducere, lead away] to take away by stealth or by unlawful force.

Abdominal.

abduction (ab-duk-shun) n. the act of carrying away, esp. of carrying away a person, by fraud, stealth, or force.

abductor (ab-duk-tur) n. a person guilty of abduction; [Anat.] a muscle that serves to draw back any part of the body.

abeam (ā-bēm) adv. on the beam; at right angles with the ship's keel [Naut.].

abecedarian (ā-bē-sē-dā-ri-ān) a. alphabetical; —n. one that teaches or learns the letters of the alphabet.

abed (ā-bed) adv. [E. a and bed] in bed; on bed; to bed.

abele, abeltree (ā-bēl, ā-bel-trē) n. [L. albus, white] the white poplar.

Abelian, Abelite, Abelian (ā-bel-i-ān, ā-bel-it, ā-bel-i-ān) n. one of a religious sect in the early African church; they married, but lived like Abel, in continence.

abelmosk (ā-bel-mosk) n. [A.] the musk-mallow, or Syrian mallow.

aberdevine (ā-ber-de-vin) n. [Ety. unknown] the siskin, a bird of the finch family.

aberrance (ab-er-āns) n. [L. ab and errare, wander] deviation from rectitude.

aberration (ab-er-ā-shun) n. act of wandering; deviation, especially from truth or moral rectitude, or from the natural state; alienation of mind; [Astr.] a small apparent change of position in a heavenly body, due to the motion of the earth. The apparent displacement due to the earth's annual motion, is always 20'5" and is called the constant of aberration; that due to the earth's daily motion is 0'3". A deviation of reflected or refracted rays of light by which they fail to come to one point [Opt.].

abet (ā-bet) v.t. [L. ad and Icel. beta, make to bite] to encourage by aid or countenance; to encourage or assist in a criminal act.

abetment (ā-bet-ment) n. the act of abetting; that which serves to abet.

abettor, abetter (ā-bet-tur, -er) n. one that abets, aids, or encourages.

abevacuation (ā-be-vak-ū-ā-shun) n. a morbid evacuation [Med.].

abeyance (ā-bū-āns) n. [F. abéance fr. L. ad and badare, gape] a state of suspension or temporary extinction with the expectation of a revival; [Law] a state of expectancy or waiting.

abhal (āb-hal) n. the East Indian name for the berries of the common juniper.

abhor (āb-hor) v.t. [L. ab and horrere, bristle, shiver] to regard with horror or detestation; to dislike or hate extremely.

abhorrence (āb-hor-ens) n. detestation; great hatred; that which excites repugnance.
