expressing his desires fully against others' desires? This constant struggle, strain, conflict in which human beings live, does that contribute to health? Don't say, no. Then that means those are the factors of ill health. Psychosomatic diseases. You understand all this? So can there be intellectual health, and emotions which are healthy, not romantic sentimentality and all that, that conduces to ill health. I don't know if you are following all this. So we must enquire very deeply what is really to be healthy?

This enquiry is not just when you are reaching death, on the deathbed, but one must enquire right from when you are very young, or middle aged, or now as the speaker is. What is health? And health implies energy, tremendous energy. And we dissipate that energy through conflict, through strain, through all kinds of tobacco, drinking, you know all the business of it. And without becoming 'food fad' - 'food fads', you know what that means? Crazy about food, only concerned with what one eats and nothing else. Without becoming food fads, to find out if the brain can live without a single conflict. That means without any kind of emotional strain or intellectual strain - you understand all this? Are you doing it as we are talking, or you are just listening, agreeing and perhaps at the end of the day you will try to think about it - you understand my question? Are we doing this together? Seeing how ill health is brought about, heart trouble and all the rest of it. Suppose I am, one is highly intellectual - very few people are - but suppose one is highly intellectual, only using that part of the brain which is called the intellect, which is only concerned with discovering new ideas, new expressions, new way of putting it, new concepts, and disregarding the whole of one's existence, biological and other ways of living, completely caught in that - right? Then that affects the health naturally. And if one is highly emotional, romantic, sentimental, as most people are, that also brings various forms of conflicts which affects ill health. Health means energy - right? Not through drugs, not through alcohol but - oh, need I explain all this silly stuff? - but when there is no conflict whatsoever then there is tremendous health. And we said there is freedom, we talked about health and energy.

There is intellectual energy - right? The intellectual energy is when they have put a robot on the moon, it requires tremendous intellectual energy - you understand? To invent all the horrible things of war requires great intellectual capacity and energy - right? There is emotional energy by itself, perhaps slightly modified by the intellect, but when we are sentimental, emotional, a kind of ugly vulgar sentimentality, that too deprives energy - right? Are we together in this? I don't know if you are or we are not. I hope I am not talking to myself.

So what is energy which is not dissipated at all? - dissipated, wasted. Because this is important to understand, the quality of energy which is highly intelligent, highly capable of reasoning, highly capable of analysing, looking, observing, self-critically aware and therefore constantly removing any impediment in the movement. That requires a great deal of energy. People who are purely - not purely, one can't use that - semi-physical energy, you know you have plenty of them in the world - their energy is limited naturally, their energy controls all thought - you understand? Are you understanding what I am saying? I may be stupid but I have got tremendous energy. What I think is right and that drives me.

And you see such people all over the world with extraordinary amount of energy. And those people who are very, very clever, their energy goes into calculation, all the rest of it. Now is there an energy which is not contaminated, polluted by or through conflict? You understand all this? Right? Are we together in this? A little bit? Then we must enquire: why we human beings for the last forty, fifty thousand years of our evolution, which the biologists and the archeologists are saying that we have lived on this earth, as human beings walking on two legs, why from that time on until now we are in perpetual conflict - right? Why? Is it agreement and disagreement? Look at it. I agree to something and you disagree with that. There is the beginning of conflict. I believe in a certain - the speaker - or one believes in ideals, the other doesn't, immediately a conflict. One likes, the other doesn't like. One protects the few, and the few are against everybody else. In our relationship with each other there is conflict - man, woman, conflict. And there is conflict between the guru and the disciple. Don't you notice all this? The disciple wants to become like the guru. How silly that is. But the guru himself is probably rather silly. So there is this perpetual struggle, conflict. One holds on to something, identifies oneself with that something, and one resists at any price. And between man and woman there is not only sexual conflict, but also each human being, the woman and the man, or the man and the girl and so on and so on, each wants to express things in his own way. He is ambitious and she is ambitious. And therefore there is conflict - right? Why do we live this way? That is an immense waste of energy - right? But why we human beings after this long duration of experience, knowledge, wars, suffering, the eternal anxiety and so on, why do we live this way? Why do we, who are so clever, who have so much knowledge, so learned, why do we carry on this way? Please ask this question. Don't wait to find out. Ask it, demand it, put your passion behind to find out. Is it our brain which evolved through conflict - right? Conflict with nature, conflict in the air, conflict in everything. So our brain has become accustomed to it. Having become accustomed it says that is the way to live, that is the way to progress. If there was no competition there would be no progress. And so the brain which has become accustomed, used to live in a certain environment, says that is the way to live. Are you in that position? You, sitting there, say, "Well I am used to this". And because you are used to it you rationalize it, you say, "Yes, in nature everything struggles. The little tree, the little plant is struggling towards the light. The tiger kills the deer." - right? "So it is part of our nature." - to be violent, to be in conflict, to be at war with each other and therefore war with much greater significance - right? We have lived that way.

There have been wars for, historically, five thousand years, practically every year there has been a war, and we are living in a state of war - right? And you say that is natural, we have done it for fifty thousand years, why not? The profit - the politicians profit by this - right?

So, we are asking each other: is it possible to live without a single conflict? From that we have to enquire why we human beings have problems. Problem means conflict - right? Why have we problems? Why does the brain accept problems. Is the brain itself - you understand? I am going to ask something, please listen. I am just discovering it - is the brain itself in a condition of problems? Vous avez compris? Is the brain itself (Noise of aeroplane) - we won't compete with the aeroplane! Is the brain itself caught in problems? Is the brain itself, with all the activity that is going on, that brain itself is a problem? You understand? Gosh, I wish this noise would stop. Our brain is conditioned from childhood. You go to a school and you have problems of solving mathematics, how to write. Poor little child goes to a school and writing becomes a problem. (Noise of aeroplane) This is a small country and they have all this noise. (Laughter). We are asking whether the brain itself is the problem? The questioner is part of the brain - you understand? The questioner who says, "Is the brain the problem?", and the questioner is also part of the brain, naturally. But the questioner is asking the brain: why are you in conflict? And it says, "I have been trained from childhood to solve problems. I have been to schools as a child, they have taught me how to write which has become a problem to me. And how to read, however pleasant that reading may be, that has also become a problem because I don't know first what 'A' means, how it looks. So I go through school, college, university, if I am lucky, and that whole movement of acquiring knowledge, in any discipline has conditioned my brain." So the brain is the problem-solving machinery. You have understood? The word problem, means something thrown at you. Problem means a challenge to you. From childhood something is thrown at the poor child - right? He must learn ABC, he must know mathematics and so on. So the brain itself has become a machinery which creates problems, and tries to solve problems. You understand this? Come on sir, move - eh?

So what is one to do? Right? If the brain, that which is inside the skull, is the machinery which creates problems - it is - mathematical problems, technical problems, problems between man and woman, problems with politics, problems with pollution - right? All the depository of all the toxic material - you follow? The whole process is all becoming a problem. And the problems have arisen because of the brain. Right? Just a minute, we are moving further. So the brain is responsible for problems and the resolution of those problems. Right? Are we clear on this matter? Somewhat? Need I go more into it? Eh? Do you want me to go more into it? Why? It is so simple, isn't it?

Religiously, look at it, you are trained as a Christian, to have faith. Saviour and faith. And those who are the Buddhists say that is all nonsense. That is the invention of the Western priests - which is probably true. Basically there is no such thing as Saviour, Buddhists, or having faith; they say doubt, question, enquire, never accept. So there are two - and the Christian says that is all rubbish, the pope says faith is important. And my family, my education has been Catholic so I am programmed, as the Arab is programmed, as a computer - right? And so on. So our brain is a form of computer programmed. And when a brain is programmed, as we are, linguistically, religiously, with many, many problems, the brain says I am tired, I can't think, you tell me all about it. That is what is happening here. So your brain becomes gradually withering, gradually atrophied, which is with problems. Krishnamurti says something and that has become a problem.

So can the brain be free of problems? You understand? That is, there are problems in life, you can't help it, it is so. But to meet the problem with a brain that has no problems - do you understand?

That is my statement, do you understand? You put in front of the speaker a problem. If his brain is also full of problems he will solve your problem and create more problems out of it. Right? Haven't you noticed this? That is what the politicians are doing. The economic problems are solved by experts and other experts come along and say sorry it is all wrong - right? And so on and on and on.

So to find out whether you can have a brain that is not a mechanical brain, that is not a machinery that is solving problems, which means to have no problem. And that is possible - I will show it to you in a minute, if you go into it carefully - that is possible only when you understand time.

As we said, time is the past, present and the future. All that time, all the past, the present and the future is held in the now - right? You understand? Problem means a future. You get it? Come on sirs. You understand? Any problem implies the resolution of it, which is in the future. Right? That is why it is very important to understand all time is now. Sirs, see the beauty of it. So you put a problem, there is a problem - there are several problems, I know, I am aware of, in all the places I go to, in various schools I go to, various politicians one meets, the scientists one meets, they are all asking, demanding, questioning, and if your brain is also full of problems, anxieties, uncertainty, then your answer will be as muddled as theirs - right? So we are asking: whether the brain can be free of problems? And to understand the nature of that freedom you have to enquire into time - right? That is, as there is no - the now has no future, the now is in the future - right? I wonder if you understand this? So any problem arises and the solution means time - right? Therefore if you understand very clearly - I am going to go into it very slowly. I am also learning as I go along. It is fascinating, this. Let me take a breather.

There are problems, life has problems because human beings are so obstinate, so arrogant, full of their own importance. I have done this, I am going to stick to it. And they create problems, and the speaker has to meet them - right? If he is also full of problems he will make a mess of it - right? So to be free of problems implies the enquiry into time - right? Because the problem and its solution implies inherently in it, time - right? I have a problem, I must think over it, I will discuss it, I will go into it, I read books about it, or consult my guru - you follow? All that goes on. So the problem and its solution, inherent in itself, is time - clear?

Then we have said previously, time is contained in the now. See the relationship between the problem and the time, do you see it? Therefore any problem I meet has no time. It must be solved instantly. You have understood this? That implies - may I go on? I hope you are as excited as the speaker is, because he is discovering something new each time. That implies perception of the problem - perception not according to your prejudice, according to your judgement, according to your opinion and so on, but perceiving with your brain, with your heart, with your whole being. Seeing, in which there is no distortion. There is distortion the moment there is motive. So to put away motive, direction and absolutely perceive as it is, and not allowing a second to hinder the solution. You understand? I wonder if you understand this?

Look sir, there are problems between man and woman - there are other problems, I am just taking that one problem. Man and woman. They quarrel. This is one of those unfortunate things that happen in relationship. They quarrel about god knows what, every petty little thing on earth. They quarrel. And they never solve the quarrel. You understand? They keep on until it becomes unbearable and one of them says, "I'll buzz off". And thereby they think they have solved the problem. Then they get married to another man or woman and start the whole game again. You must all be familiar with this, aren't you? That is why you are all in agreement with this I see. So this goes on.

Now if the man or the woman understood the nature of time, the truth of it - you understand? - that is, to see the quarrelling going on, the conflict going on, and see, perceive, and you perceive it instantly the cause, and instantly remove the cause because you are not allowing time at all to interfere with the solution of the problem. You understand this? Come on sir. Is this somewhat clear? That is, when time becomes the most important thing in life, the understanding of it, not mere verbal description of it, the agreement with it, but you yourself see the truth of it profoundly, then there is no problem at all for the brain. You may have a problem. But the brain that meets the problem is all important. How you approach the problem. If you approach the problem already having a solution to the problem, then it is not soluble - right? You solve it according to your old pattern. But if you approach it without any bias, without any sense of anxiety, and you can only do that if you understand the depth and the strength and the vitality of time. Is that right, clear?

So can your brain, which is no longer a slave to linguistic control, linguistic images, and has understood the nature of freedom, real freedom in which there is no sense of moving away from something. If you move away from, let's say, if you move away from anxiety, the movement is time. And therefore that movement may appear secure, security but that movement has inherently in itself uncertainty. Right? You are getting it? Is this too intellectual? No. It is just common sense.

So enquiring into freedom, enquiring into what is health, because if you are not healthy you cannot have freedom, because that will impede you. I may be paralysed but still I can be healthy - you understand? I may have only one eye to see clearly but that doesn't prevent me my health. Health is destroyed by this constant conflict, achievement, success, ambition, uncertainty, confusion, all the pain of life. And energy, energy never dissipated. You understand sirs? By chattering, arguing, holding on to what you have done and say, "This is right, I am going to stick to it." You understand? Energy implies constant movement, constant discovering something new, not technologically, psychologically. So that your brain becomes extraordinarily active and not dissipate that energy. When you have that energy then you can look at problems - you understand? And understand time. They are all dove-tailed, they all fit together, they are not separate. It is one long steady movement.

And also we ought to talk over together why human beings are hurt, psychologically wounded, why human beings in their relationship quarrel and so on. I don't think this morning there is time for it - it is now twenty to twelve. So may we stop this morning and continue on Thursday morning? Would that be all right?

Thank goodness it is a little bit cooler!

May we continue with what we were talking about the day before yesterday? We were talking about freedom and - I have forgotten! We were talking about freedom and energy and time, I think.

We ought to consider this morning together what is the capacity of the brain? The brain that is inside the skull. And that brain is very carefully protected, various layers of bone, air, more bone and then water, so it is very carefully protected. The speaker is not a specialist on brains - thank God! But one has observed how the brain operates for oneself. The brain has extraordinary capacity, as is shown how it has developed in the technological world. They are doing incredible things in the field of technology - computers, and all the incredible, unbelievable technological things that are taking place throughout the world. And inwardly, I do not mean in the sense of veins, bones, arteries, liver and heart and all that, inwardly, psychologically, we are very, very limited. That is a fact. And after forty five thousand years or more we are still rather primitive psychologically, inwardly. And our brains, which have incredible capacity, psychologically are very limited, and therefore we are misusing the technological world and all the inventions that human beings are bringing about to do immense harm and also great good, but psychologically we have neglected the capacity of the brain inwardly. Why? Please, as we said the other day, and one must repeat it again, we are observing together, seeing objectively, not merely subjectively prejudiced, opinionated, holding on to certain dogmas, beliefs, and conclusions but together observing very closely why the psychological world, which is the whole field of thought, emotions, sensations, fears, pleasures, joys, and incalculable suffering that man has gone through, why inwardly we are so limited, concerned with our own self, with our own advancement, with our own so-called progress, with our own ambitions and so on, do we together see the limitation of that?

Please I am asking this question, let's consider it together. The area of psychology, psyche, is in the field of thought and all the projections that thought has put forward, images, imagination, symbols, mythology, and the various hurts human beings have received from childhood, fears which man has borne for forty five thousand years and the pleasures in relationship, both sexual and other ways of pleasure, and the pain of relationship. And also the - not only personal suffering but suffering of humanity. And man has also thought, or wanted, or desired, or hoped there was something more than the mere physical activity, something greater, something that is holy, sacred. Man has sought all these things since time began. And we are still groping, we are still seeking how to escape, or how to understand, or how to resolve the cage, the prison in which the brain is psychologically caught. We are understanding each other? Why have we not paid attention to it? Why have we not broken the limitation and found out the extraordinary capacity inwardly of the brain? Why? Is it that we have always sought security? Both externally and inwardly, because security is necessary, otherwise the brain can't function at its excellence - right?

So physically, externally, we have found some kind of security - security in the family, security in the community, security in the greater community and in nationality - step by - there have been physical, psychological security we have sought, which is an obvious fact because if we haven't had our breakfast, had no food and no clothes, we can't possibly think very, very clearly, act impersonally. So security physically is necessary and that is being denied by nationalities, nationalism, because that produces one of the causes of war - French, Russian, English, Swiss, if you will allow me, Belgian, America, India, and all that business. It is really a form of tribalism, which we all know. And psychologically, inwardly, we sought security in relationship - right? Please we are thinking together. You are not just listening to the speaker and just accepting some ideas or rejecting, but carefully observing the function of the brain, the complex thought, observing the whole process of living, both externally and inwardly.

We have sought security inwardly. We have - thought has created God - would you be shocked by that? Thought has created it. Thought has put all together the various rituals, the various dogmas, beliefs, faith, rituals - this is the common factor of all religions. And thought, not finding psychological security, projected the concept of god from the ancient days, from Jupiter, Zeus and the Asiatics had their own peculiar ancient deities. Is there such security psychologically at all? You understand my question? One follows another, specially in the so-called - the speaker doesn't like that word 'spiritual' - in the so-called spiritual world one seeks security - following the guru, following the various traditional concepts, Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist, Muslim, and also gurus, and security in knowledge - right? In skill, in various forms of activity, consoling, disturbing, destructive but trying to find through all these means security. And the brain needs extraordinary security - right? Otherwise it can't function clearly.

So one questions whether there is, apart from physical security which is slowly being denied and destroyed, is there psychological security at all? Right? Please let us investigate that very carefully because most of us want in our relationship some kind of stability, some kind of safety, a sense of being at home - not in the house, but inwardly of being at home, with somebody - man, woman, or with some symbol, with some concept. Or, as the Christians would have it, in faith. I don't know why, what that means, but they find security in faith. And in the Asiatic world, specially in India, doubt has been one of the major tenets of their religion. That one must question the very highest authority, one must doubt. So in that doubting, questioning, probing, one asks, if one has done it very, very deeply, is there security at all? You understand my question? One must have physical security - that is understood, don't let's... and that is being destroyed through nationalism, through wars, through division. There is the peculiar thing going on called United Nations. It is a contradictory in terms, nations cannot be united, they are always separative, divisive - right? They can never be united and therefore they are always at war, getting more armaments and so on and so on, I don't have to go into all that. We all know that. And nobody seems to say, "Let's stop all this." The religions encourage it, this division - Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist and all that nonsense, to me. And this division, the divisive process which is going on throughout the world is bringing about great conflict. And inwardly too we are divisive. We are, as human beings, broken up - right? - fragmented, never whole, holistic. And if one begins to enquire more deeply, is there any security at all? One tries to find security in relationship - let's look at that world relationship.

What is relationship? To be related to, to have - to be in contact with, to have a communication with another so complete that there is no divisive process going on - you understand? What is this relationship which brings, as it is observed with almost everyone all throughout the world, it is a constant conflict. Would I be right in saying that to the married people and the unmarried people? I am glad - the speaker is glad we all agree about that at least!

And why is there this division? The brain is seeking security and yet that very brain is creating division - you follow? Is it thought? Is thought creating the division in relationship?

Then we have to enquire very deeply into what is thought. Some of you may have heard the speaker explaining the movement of thought, the origin of thought, but if they would kindly put aside what they have heard the speaker say perhaps a thousand times before and start anew. What is the origin of thought? Thought has created the most marvellous world technologically - right? The incredible things thought has done - in the world of medicine, surgery, in homeopathy - all right? - in producing instruments of war, and so on, the computer. We will talk about the computer a little later. Great fun, that!

And thought has also created a division between you and me, my wife and me - follow? - this whole process of division is going on throughout life. Is thought the cause of it? Please look at it carefully. Let's find out. If thought is the cause of this divisive process then we will have to ask a question which is much more serious: whether thought can ever function in one area completely, in the physical world, in the daily world, but completely end in the psychological world? Vous avez compris? You understand what I am saying? We are going to find out. Let's go slowly.

Thought is functioning when I learn a language, when I learn - when one learns various skills, when one skis - right? - constructing various ships - thought is very active there. And thought also is psychologically very active - right? And we are asking: is thought - please listen, pay attention to this, if you will, if you are not too tired - is thought the origin of this divisive process? Christian god, the Hindu god, the Muslim god and so on and so on and so on. God must be one god - right? - to be at all god. But thought has divided the poor chap!

So let's enquire very carefully: What is thought? Why thought plays such an extraordinary part in our life? And what is thinking? - which is the same as thought. What is thinking? If there is no memory you wouldn't - one would not be able to think - clear? That would be a state of amnesia. So if memory is necessary for thought-(noise of aeroplanes) - it is a small country! (Laughter) - thought is the response of memory and memory is the outcome of accumulated knowledge - right? Knowledge is gathered through experience - right? That knowledge in the scientific world is gathered bit by bit or through jumps - right? Constantly accumulated. Technology is based on experience. And is experience - please go into it carefully together - is experience limited? Right? Can there be ever complete experience? What does that word experience mean? I am just thinking it out aloud. To experience: if you are driving a car, if one is driving a car and there is an accident, that is an experience. From that experience you have learnt, one has learnt to be more watchful, much more to observe all the roads, 300 yards ahead and so on. Now we are asking: is experience limited? And who is the experiencer who is experiencing? Right? Lord! (Noise of aeroplanes).

This is rather important to ask this question. We all want to experience, when you are young sexual experience, as you get older religious experiences, and ultimately the experience of illumination, or whatever you like to call it. Now who is the experiencer who is experiencing? Right? You follow the question? One works, practises, certain forms of meditation, so-called meditation, which are not meditation but we will go into that later on, practises it, day after day, day after day. And he is experiencing in that process certain imaginative states, or some illusions. And there is an experiencer who is experiencing. Now who is the experiencer? Is the experiencer different from the experience he is going to have? You have understood my question? I want to - if one wants - I will keep to myself - if I want to experience god or that state of holiness - please I am not belittling it, I am not being cynical - that god, that illumination, that concept of illumination, thought has projected it - right? And I want to experience that which thought has put forward. See what is happening. I project something, and then experience that something. Right? Is this clear? That is, I project some imaginary deity and I work, practise to achieve or experience that state of deity which thought has invented. So I must be very clear who is the experiencer? Right? Surely the experiencer is all the accumulated memories - right?

Accumulated knowledge and when he experiences something either he must recognize it or it is no experience. If he recognizes he already knows - you understand all this? So thus experience becomes very, very limited - right? In the scientific world knowledge is added bit by bit, bit by bit - right? Or during the last hundred years it has jumped. But it is still limited. Therefore there can never be complete experience because the experience is always limited. Clear? Do we understand? Not verbal explanation but the fact, the truth of it. That is, the experiencer is the past, and that experiencer when he has experience of any kind must recognize it as something which he is experiencing, which means he already knows that which has happened before - right? So experience is always limited, whether the experience of God, or the experience of particular Christian deity or symbol or person, or in the Asiatic world with their deities. Any kind of experience, scientific, psychological, must always be limited. That is clear. Therefore knowledge is always limited, whether now or in the future - right? If you observe it, it is so clear. So thought and memory are limited. So thought being limited must be divisive. Anything that is limited must be separative - right?

If I am thinking about myself, my progress, my ambition, my achievement, how marvellous I am, or how stupid I am, and so on, thinking about myself is a very small affair. But that small affair can be extended and say, "I am thinking about universal" - it is still limited - right? So thought, whatever it does in any field, both in the technological world or in the psychological world, must be limited, therefore its action will always be limited - right? It becomes rather...

So what is the relationship of thought to time? Right? Are you asking this question? I am asking it. We said time is the past, the future and the present - contained in the now - right? Is that clear? Thought and time is the past, past memories, past knowledge, past experiences, stored up in the brain as memory, and the future is projected from that memory and that future is now - right? Is that clear? No, I am afraid not.

We are the result of the past - right? Obviously. Both biologically, through long period of evolution and psychologically all the accumulated memories we have - right? So the past are the memories - right? And the future is projected from the past memory. So the future is already the past because it is part of the past. The future is part of the past. Right? Clear? No?

Look sir, make it much more simple. I am all my memories - right? I am all my memories, I am memory. Even if I say I am god, inwardly there is something, it is still memory. So my whole being is memory. I know you will refute it, or not agree with it, but see the fact: if you have no memory you are not. Right? So you are a whole bundle of memories. And that memory - those memories project the future. "I must be", "I must not be," "I mustn't be violent". So it is a movement of the past towards the future. But that future is the present. I can't go on with this - right?

So the present, the now, contains all time. Now what is the relationship of thought to time? You understand? It is necessary to use our brains, not just go to sleep and somebody tell you all about it. We are both of us acting, exercising the capacity of our brain. And we are asking a question, we have explained very carefully to each other, what time is; the whole movement of time is in the now. And we have also explained the nature of thought. What is the relationship of thought to time? Are they not both the same? So thought is time. Which is, I need time to have knowledge, experience. So time and thought are together, they are not separate movements - right? Do we see this as a fact? - not as an idea explained by some person. Do we see it as a fact? Not make an abstraction of what you have - from the fact into an idea and pursue the idea. Vous avez compris? Because it is important to understand this. Is time separate from thought? Or thought is time? Of course it is. So see what happens. If thought is time, and thought is now - if thought is time and we said thought is time - right? - then what is relationship? You understand? What is one's relationship with another? We will approach it differently. We live, life is relationship. Without relationship there is no life.

Relationship to the earth, to the water, to everything, to nature, to all the things of the earth, we are related to it. And we are related much more intimately with a woman or a man. And in that relationship there is conflict - right? The man pursues his ambition, he pursues his fulfilment, sexually and in other ways, and the woman does the same - right? They perhaps meet sexually but all the time separate. What has brought about this separation? We are saying thought - right? That's clear. So please follow this carefully - we said thought is time and this division between man and woman and so on is brought about by thought, not love.

So one has to go into the question - there is so much - into the question: what is love? Is love time? Go into it. Find out sirs, don't... Is love time? Is love thought? When you say to someone, "I love you" - and I hope you mean it - is that love the expression, or the outcome of your self-fulfilment, whether it is sexual or otherwise - right? So why is there then this division? I won't go further into the question of love - if you want I'll go into it now. Good Lord it is already twenty past eleven. All right sirs, let's go into it.

Is love thought, the movement of thought? You understand? Which means: is love the product of time? Please carefully watch it in yourself. Or is love pleasure? Pleasure has become extraordinarily important in life - the whole industry of entertainment, sports, religious entertainment - right? - churches, you know, you go there to be entertained, to have new kind of sensations. So is love thought, time, pleasure, and is love desire? Has love a place - no, has thought a place in love? Go on. If thought has a place in love, then that love is limited. And that which is limited must create conflict - right? This is logical, sanity.

So is it possible to have that perfume, that extraordinary thing called love, which is a great flame in one's life, without all this travail, without all this division? You understand? That means one has to understand very, very deeply, or perceive instantly the nature of thought, time, pleasure and desire. Right? They are all interrelated, they are not separate things. Thought, time, pleasure, desire are one, they are inter-related - right?

So to capture that perfume and to - for it to abide all one's life without any division one must understand desire. Right? Desire for most of us is extraordinarily important. Desire for God, desire for a new house, desire for somebody with whom you can get on better, desire for more wealth, desire for greater peace - you know, desire, that which is burning in all of us, furiously. Desire is being very prominent in our lives. Like thought. And various religions have said, "Suppress desire". When you enter a monastery - have you ever been in a monastery, any of you? I was in one - the speaker was in one, it doesn't matter. There, in the monasteries, and in the monks who are wandering the earth without any organization, they have desire. And desire being a dangerous thing, they said, "Don't look at a woman, only be committed to God" - or whatever it is you are committed to. And man has always tried to suppress, control, shape desire. You desire when one is young for some silly little thing, then as you grow older you desire for position, power, money, status. As you also grow much older then you desire for some peace, then you desire for immortality - if there is such a thing - then you desire to escape from the fear, the darkness of death. From the beginning of life until the end of life one is tortured by desire, with its pleasures too - right? And as we said, is love desire? Is love pleasure? Pleasure is in the fulfilment of one's desire. I desire a car. When I get it I am happy, I am satisfied. Not quite because I want a bigger car! And so on. Desire in its fulfilment brings satisfaction, from that satisfaction gratification, there is a great sense of pleasure - right? And we have done everything conceivable either to express fully our desires, which is called freedom, or go to the other extreme, suppress desires. This has been the constant movement of man. Both in the so-called spiritual world and in the world - in the exterior world. The expansion and the contraction of desire. And now we are trying to find out what is the origin, the beginning of desire. We are not saying we must suppress or fulfil. We are trying - not trying - we are observing the whole movement of desire from the very beginning to the very... right? What is desire? (Noise of train).

I hear that train going by and I want to listen to what you are saying. I desire for that train to move quickly, not make all that row - right? That is, the hearing of the noise, the sensation from that noise, then from that sensation the desire saying, "Please I wish that train wouldn't go by so often". (Noise of train) There it is! (Laughter) The hearing is a sensation, pleasant or unpleasant. And if it is pleasant I want to hold it, if it is unpleasant I want to push it away. But it is still sensation. Right? And that sensation is necessary, otherwise I am deaf, dumb. So there is sensation, then thought comes in and says, "I wish the train wouldn't pass so often" - you understand? Sensation, which is normal, healthy, natural. Then thought makes the image and says, "I wish it didn't happen" - or wants it to happen. So when thought shapes or controls or gives an intention to sensation, then at that moment desire is born. Is that clear? Are we clear on this matter? That is, sir, if you are a man, you see a woman, that you know very well, or if you see somebody in great power, position, status, you see him. And the sensation is there, seeing is a sensation. Then thought comes and says, "I wish I had that power, that position." - right? When thought gives shapes through the image to the sensation, then at that moment desire is born - clear?

Now sensation, as we said, is normal, healthy, natural, unless one is paralysed, deaf, dumb and no reaction at all. Now that is normal. Then thought comes instantly, gives a shape to that sensation, at that moment desire. Now can - please watch this - can sensation and thought - can thought be slow and not capture the sensation? You understand my question? You understand? No.

God! The speaker is working and you are not.

Sir, I go to a museum, which I have done rarely because the museum of the woods is much more beautiful, the mountains, than any museum in the world. You go to a museum and see a picture, a marvellous picture, and you see the beauty of it, then thought says, "By Jove, I wish I had it. I'd like it in my room where there is some space. I'd like to hang it there and look at it every day." The seeing of that picture is normal but when thought enters into it desire is born to possess it. Now can the sensation and thought be kept apart for a while? You understand my question? There you need tremendous alertness - right? Keep these apart. Which means alertness has its own great discipline. Not the discipline of conformity, of obedience, of following, practising, but that seeing sensation is necessary, is normal, and desire is the movement of thought. To keep these two apart. If you do it you will see how extraordinarily quick thought is. The instant you see thought is there. So to be so tremendously alert so thought and sensation are kept apart, then there is neither suppression nor fulfilment, there is only that alertness. And that alertness, that watchfulness, the intensity of it, is its own discipline. You understand? The word discipline means - it comes from the word disciple. The disciple is one who learns. Learns, not learns what the master is saying but is learning. I wonder if you understand that?

We consider learning - do you want to go into all this? I'll go on, it's up to you. Learning is an extraordinary faculty. Not the accumulation of knowledge only - you understand? You go to school, college, university, if you are... or in a factory, there you are accumulating knowledge. And also you are accumulating knowledge about yourself. When you say, "I am memory", you have learnt that and you repeat that. Right? But learning is something totally different. There is never a moment where you are stuck, so always moving. That makes the brain extraordinarily active. Knowledge may be the most destructive thing in relationship. You are getting this? Because where there is knowledge - 'I know my wife' - what a terrible thing to say. When you say that, which means you have come to a conclusion, you have built an image about her, and she has built an image about you, naturally, and when you say, "I know my wife", that knowledge becomes the dividing factor between you and your wife. So that evokes a very fundamental question.

The brain has the function to record everything - right? To record. You are sitting there, the speaker is sitting up here, only for convenience, not for authority. The platform doesn't give him authority. I must tell you a story, rather amusing. We were in India, in Bombay. Some disciples of a guru came to see us and said, "You must meet him, he is an extraordinary man. He has achieved. He wants you to come to him. We urge you to come to him." I said, "I am so sorry, I don't go out chasing gurus" - I was more polite. And after three or four days they persuaded the guru to come. And we happened to be sitting on a mattress about two inches thick, not fifty centimetres, or less than that, and when he came in we got up naturally, and offered him the mattress. He sat down there, took a position cross legged and became the authority because of that little height! You understand? That's life. (Laughter)

So, as we were saying, knowledge in relationship is really a most dangerous factor which destroys relationship. You build an image about her and she builds an image about you. And when you have that image, and she has that image, she knows - "I know my husband" - and you repeat too, "I know my wife." So can one - please follow this - can one live without creating a single image in relationship? To find that out, whether it is possible or not, one must enquire much more deeply into this whole process of recording. You understand? The brain is recording. The brain now, if you are listening, is recording what is being said. And in relationship the recording process goes on. She tells me, "You are a fool" one day. Right? And that is recorded. And that has left an imprint on - that has hurt me. Or one day, she says, "You have been marvellous, old chap" - you know, "Darling you have been extraordinarily nice to me yesterday." That is recorded. Right? So our brain both outwardly and inwardly is recording. The question then is: is it possible to record physically certain things, you understand, but not to record a thing psychologically? That is, when one's wife says you are a beastly man, not to record it. And when she says you have been awfully kind to me yesterday, or you have given me such pleasure, not to record. You follow? So that the brain is recording when necessary, physically, in daily life, and inwardly, psychologically, never to record. Yes sir! That recording is knowledge. That recording is the image that separates you and me, and they and we, she and me, or me and him. You understand? Now can that recording never take place in relationship?

Sir, it is time to stop. But what is the point of listening to all this? What do you learn from all this? Do you hear and go away and repeat the old pattern? Then what is the value of listening? Either you listen with intensity, with passion to find out, to live a different kind of life. You may have done wrong things before, you may have done some harm to another, the remorse, the guilt, and all the rest of it is gone, not live with it. And so to find out passionately, you know, as you want money, as you want sex, as you are hungry, you are tremendously active, to find out for yourself whether this recording can end, so that there is no conflict between you and me, between a wife and yourself. It is this recording that is divisive. The recording is the me, is the self. And meditation is the ending of that recording, total ending. Not sitting cross legged, closed eyes and doing some kind of tricks. That is all nonsense. This requires enormous energy, passion, which brings its own tremendous discipline, which means learning.

It is a quarter to twelve. May I stop please.

May we continue where we left off on Thursday? I am afraid they are all standing there - apparently there is no room. Do we extend the tent? It can't be done this morning, it will have to be next year.

We were talking about freedom. I won't go into all that again this morning because we have only two more talks. So we have to go into several other things like order, what is the nature of order, disorder, and what it means to change. And we should also consider this morning what is fear, and whether it is possible for human beings who have lived on this earth for more than fifty five thousand years, why human beings have never been free from fear. And also we ought to talk over together the whole question of suffering, the pain of sorrow, anxiety, loneliness and all the innumerable travail that human beings are heir to. And we also should talk over the next two days: what is love? What is compassion and the nature of intelligence? And also we should talk over together what is death, what is religion and the nature of meditation. We have got a lot of ground to cover. Is that all right?

So we will begin this morning: what is the nature of order? And if one may again remind you, we are not doing any kind of propaganda, propagate any theory, any concept, a new philosophy, a new concept of life, or substitute for all this, faith and so on. And also this is not personality cult. And also if we may remind you, doubt is necessary. Doubt your own experiences, doubt, question, your own thinking, your opinions, your judgements, your evaluations, whether we can look at the world and at ourselves totally impersonally, objectively so that we see things as they are, not as we would like them to be. And the speaker is not an authority, because we are going to discuss, or talk over together this problem of order and authority, or disorder - they go together. What is the nature of order? We live in disorder, both externally, outwardly, with all the things that are going on in the world, all the demonstrations for peace and at the same time cultivating, preparing, inventing new means of destruction of humanity. There are political divisions, religious divisions, economic divisions and so on. So outwardly through this division there have been thousands of wars, and religions have added to this division. And inwardly, psychologically, in the area of the psyche, we are also in conflict. And so we should talk over together why, after all these thousands of years, why we accept and live in disorder.

It is an important question to ask whether one can live in perfect order? And to understand that deeply, not superficially adjusting, arranging, reorganizing, but much more deeply, what is the cause of conflict, division, why human beings, who are supposed to have evolved through thousands and thousands of years, whose brain, that which is within the skull, why there at the very centre there is such disorder. Disorder exists where there is contradiction - right? We are talking over together. Where there is division, where there is the process of duality, opposing elements, opposing desires, contradictory thoughts. This division in which we live, you and I, we and they, this division is the basic cause of disorder. Right? Do we see this? Not merely verbally or intellectually but actually see in ourselves the opposing contradictory pursuits. Where there is love there is also apparently antagonism, hatred, jealousy. Where one wants to live peacefully there is also in us the opposite of that, violence. Man has lived - human beings have lived on this earth with constant violence. We are as human beings violent, aggressive people. And apparently we have never solved the problem of violence. And probably we are not even aware that we are violent. If we are, as most of us should be, then we pursue a thing that is the opposite of violence, which is called non-violence. That is a fact. And violence has no opposite. It is violence. Even though thought say we must pursue non-violence, live peacefully. So in us there is the dualistic process going on. Agree? Do we see this together? I am violent - will you go into the nature of violence? And at the same time I have an ideal and I pursue that ideal, which is I must not be violent. Or I rationalize my violence, say it is necessary in a world as it is now, socially, morally, religiously and so on, we must be violent, we must be aggressive, we must be ambitious, otherwise we will be destroyed. That is one aspect of the violence. And also we say at the same time, if you are at all slightly aware of what is happening, we say there must also at the same time, or perhaps a little later, be a pursuit of that which is not violent. So there is this dualistic process in us going on all the time - right? We see that? Right? Would you agree to this? Not agree but see the fact of it.

I am glad there are some children here. It is so nice to see children, isn't it? It is beautiful to see children. And unfortunately through education, through the corruptive moral society they are dragged into it, willy nilly through their education, through their social economic environment, they are destroyed. Probably the parents know all this. And they are also in despair, the parents, seeing their own children who were so nice and gentle at the beginning of life, become gradually violent, conforming to the group, and all the misery of life begins. That is another matter. That is, is it possible to educate children without all the pressures and the ugliness of life on them? The society is too strong, they are sucked into it, because we think society is something different from us. You understand? When you see all this you want to cry. Society is what we have made of it, each one of us, society is not different from us because we have created it. It hasn't come into being miraculously, some strange chance has brought this society about, but that is not a fact. The fact is each one of us who are so confused, uncertain, each one seeking his own security, his own fulfilment, his own ambitions, his own urge to gratify his particular pleasure, desire, we have created this society, we are of it. And we don't seem to realize that unless we, each one of us, radically, deeply change, which we will talk about presently, the society will go on as it is, murderous, divided, creating wars. I am sure you have seen the pictures on television of all the terrible things that wars have brought about. But apparently we are rather indifferent to all that, because inwardly we carry on as we are - confused, contradictory, fragmented, and so we are always contributing to the horror of things that are going on in the world.

We were talking about order. And we said the cause of disorder, which is what is fact, not order, so we must deal with fact, the fact is that we live, each one of us, in disorder, what is the cause of this disorder? Is it division in ourselves? Contradiction in ourselves? Concern with ourselves, we are so self-centred? Our own self-centredness is essentially bringing about disorder. When each one is thinking about himself and from that self-centred activity life becomes very narrow, small, and that very limited state of brain will inevitably cause division. Right? That is the basic cause of disorder.

And we talked about the other day, and for several days, about the nature of time. Please don't get impatient. We must talk about it again. We said time is the past, time is the future, and that future is now. The future is what you are now. Right? If I am violent now, the future is, tomorrow, or a thousand tomorrows. And if I do not radically change now the future is now - right? Have you understood this thing? Please don't let me talk to myself. We must share this together, it is not my truth and your truth, truth has no person, no path. And this is a fact, this is the truth that all time, the past, the future and the present are contained in the now. It is logical, rational, it is intellectually irrefutable. But you may not like it. And most of us live in like and dislike, we don't want to face something actually, we would rather slur over things. As we are - I hope we are serious people, at least for this morning, which is a tragedy, at least for this morning let us look at this thing together: that time, the past, the present and the future, are in the now.

Suppose one is self-centred, which becomes very, very limited. That self-centredness may identify itself with something greater but it will still be self-centredness - right? You understand? Right sir, come with me, will you? Do we agree to that? If I identify myself with my country, with my nation, with my religion, with my superstitions and so on, that very identification is the continuation of self-centredness - right? I have only used a different set of words, but essentially this identifying process is self-centredness. Bien? Are we together in this? Right? It is a strange business this, isn't it? Please the speaker is not trying to convince you of anything. On the contrary, doubt, question, discuss, don't accept. But examine with a critical, sharp brain. Which is, one lives in disorder. That is a fact, you can't deny it. You may cover it up, you may run away from it, but we human beings live in disorder - hating, loving, anxious, wanting security, knowing there is insecurity because we live constantly with the threat of war, and also the threat of death. So we live in disorder. Will time solve that disorder? You understand? We have lived on this earth, archeologists and biologists, they say we have lived on this earth for forty five thousand years as human beings walking on two legs, during those long periods of evolution we are now what we are, in conflict, in disorder. Time has not solved that problem - right? This long duration has not solved that problem. So we have to - we may have misunderstood time. That is, we hope another forty thousand years, acquiring great deal of knowledge, ascending through knowledge, we will eventually come out without any conflict, without any disorder. Right? You understand this? So we may have misunderstood the meaning of time, because we rely on time. I have been this, or I am this, give me time to change. And we have had forty thousand or fifty thousand years of time and we are very primitive still. That kind of thinking in time may be wrong - you understand? There may be a new way of looking at it, a new approach to this whole problem. Which is, time is not a duration, a movement from this to that - right? You need time to go from here to your house and so on, but psychologically, inwardly - if you don't like psychology, inwardly, if you don't like that, inside the skin - we have accepted time as a duration in which we will eventually emerge as human beings who are extraordinarily sane, rational, healthy, no conflict. And time has not shown that. You have had forty thousand years and if you wait another forty thousand years you will be exactly the same. This is logical.

So let's look at the whole meaning of time. Time is the past, the whole content of our consciousness and if you don't like the word consciousness, the whole world of reactions, which is the past. The past with all its memories, inherited, acquired, racial, environmental memories which we have gathered for thousands of years. And that time, that past, is now. You are the past - right? Agree? Oh! Right? You are the past, you are all the accumulated memory of the past, you are memory. That memory needs time to accumulate. And the future, tomorrow, and a thousand tomorrows, is what you are now - clear? Obviously. So the future is now. And is it possible - please understand this - we live in conflict and not allow the old time to interfere but this new sense of all time now. You understand what I am talking about? Do you understand this? I live in disorder - suppose I live in disorder, which I have become aware of. And I say to myself I will gradually work at it, think about it, go into it, which means all time, which is tomorrow - right? I will work at it, go into it, I will explore it, find out the cause of it - right? All that takes time - right? At least please agree to that, see that fact. And I see that is a false way of approaching time so I put that aside completely. Which means I am breaking - the fact is breaking the conditioning of the brain, which has accepted the old pattern of time. You see? You understand this?

I can't go on about it if you don't understand it, it is your business. I can't keep on repeating this, it rather becomes futile if you don't see it after many explanations. So as I have put aside the old way of thinking in terms of time, I now look at time as it is. All time is now. Either I change completely now, which is to uncondition the brain, which has been accustomed to the old time, and I break that because I see the fact and the falseness of it. And in that very perception I have brought - there has been a radical change, which is, I must in the very perception act instantly. You understand this? I act without time, which is the thinking process doesn't take place. Vous avez compris? Oh gosh!

I will go into it. It is very fascinating this, if you go into it. Time - thought is time - right? Agree? Do you see that fact, that thought is time? Because thought is the accumulated response of memory. That memory has been accumulating through time, that memory is the outcome of knowledge. To accumulate knowledge you need time - right? You need time to accumulate knowledge. You are not paying attention sir. I don't want to waste your time or my time. So please kindly pay attention, if you want to.

We said time is necessary to accumulate memory. Time is necessary to accumulate knowledge and knowledge comes from the accumulation of experience - right? Experience is limited, so knowledge is limited, and memory is limited, so thought is limited. Now I said thought is time. And if we exercise time, which is thought, to change what I am now it will be futile - you understand? But if I see - if there is perception, not I see, if there is a perception of the fact that all time is contained in the now, then what takes place? You understand the proposition? I am violent, I live in disorder and I perceive that disorder. And I also see the fact, the truth, that all time is now, so my perception must be so acute, so clear, and that clarity is not the product of time. So we must discuss what is perception. What is it to see clearly? - not only ourselves as we are, but also to see what is happening clearly in the world. What is happening clearly in the world is this extension of division - nations, religions, sects, gurus, and so on, the whole lot of them, politically, religiously, though they talk about peace, unity, they want them all to join their unity - you understand? I won't go into all that.

So outwardly there is this immense disorder, and the ultimate expression of that disorder is war, killing each other. And we also live in disorder. And that disorder is brought about through time, we have lived with it for centuries, so time in the old sense is not going to solve it. So what is perception? Can you see something very clearly if you have prejudice? Obviously not. Right? If you are personal - I get hurt, please don't tell me anything. My opinions are so strong, I have thought this out and I stick to what I have thought out. All these factors, which are personal, not objective, clear, they prevent perception. Right? It is like putting on coloured glasses. Your lenses, photographic lenses, they take the picture in and print it on the film, but if the film retains the pictures it cannot see any more - right? It cannot take any more pictures. Have you understood this? It is a simple fact. So what we do is retain it, which is you can't see any more. But if you retain, look at it and put it back, finish with it. That means you have to have a very clear, strong active brain, so that there is no personal prejudice, no attachment to a thing. When there is such perception, that perception is not a factor of time, and therefore when there is disorder you see it instantly, the cause, and all the rest of it is division, there is the ending of it immediately, which does not mean that it will continue again and pop up the next day. When once you see a danger, a poisonous snake, you don't play with it. That is the end of it. But we don't see the danger because we are so prejudiced, we are so narrow minded, our own concern.

So disorder can only end not tomorrow, now. As you are sitting there, observe your own disorder, see whether you can see that disorder, perceive it clearly, with all the ramifications of that disorder. When you perceive it completely there is the end of it. And that perception is not possible if you are prejudiced, if you are personal.

And we ought also to talk over together the question of fear. I am sure this will interest you. What we have said may be what you may consider, all that has been said, really very intellectual. I know you will say this. It is not intellectual. Intellect is necessary, as emotions are necessary, but when one predominates the other then the trouble begins.

So we ought to talk over together fear. Together - you understand? Explore together what is the cause, what is the nature, whether it can end completely. Or must we carry on for the rest of the human existence living in fear? If one is aware at all, conscious, we have many, many fears. Fear of darkness, fear of living, fear of public opinion, fear what my neighbour might say, fear of my wife or husband or the girl or the man, fear of insecurity, fear when you have security economically fear that you might lose it, fear - we have got so many fears. Why haven't we solved these fears? You have solved the problem of war - that is to continue war, and you have applied your brain to prepare for war. All the vast generals on both sides, or a thousand sides, they are all preparing for war, plans, submarines, airplanes, - all the rest of it. They have exercised their brain to produce all that. And why hasn't that same brain applied, apply to this enormous sense of fear man has from the beginning of days - why? Which means why have you and the speaker not gone into this question seriously, as you do go very seriously when you are hungry, when you are ambitious, when you want more money, you work at it. Why have we not gone into this question of fear? The psychologists, the therapists, have explained the causes of it, in different ways. If we could put aside all that they have said, because after all it is all what they have said, it may be merely verbal. They might be as scared as you - probably they are! I met several of them, I know they are scared like you, about something or other. And why have we not solved this question? And is it possible to end the fear? We are going to go into that. Apply not only your feelings, your emotions and your brain to work at this, not escape from it, not try to rationalize it but to see why we are incapable, or allowed ourselves to become incapable.

What is fear? And you know when there is fear, the nature of it, how it throbs, how your physical organism shrinks, how your brain becomes addled, almost paralysed. Don't you know all this? Am I describing something abnormal? It is a fact. It affects your sleep, it affects your daily life, it brings suspicion, anxiety, depression and you cling to something and hope that won't change, and that won't bring fear. Either we deal with the root of fear, or we trim the branches of fear - right? Right sir? Which do you want to do? Trim the branches of fear - please one is asking this seriously, don't neglect what the speaker is asking. Do you want to deal with the branches of fear? There are a thousand fears. Like a lovely tree - a tree, which is the most beautiful thing, one of the most beautiful things on earth, it has got many branches, many leaves; likewise fears, which is so ugly, it has also got many branches, many leaves, many expressions. Do you want to deal with that, the expressions, the surface, outside? Or do we go together into the root of it? Personally, the speaker doesn't want to trim the branches, which is so futile. So let's together find out what is the cause of fear. We know all the expressions of fear. So if we can find the root of it the expressions can wither away. So what is the cause, or causation of fear.

If one asks you that question: what is the cause? - would you answer it? The cause? Or do you expect someone to explain the cause of it? The explanation is not the fact - right? You may paint a marvellous picture of the mountain, hung in all the museums of the world, but that picture is not the mountain. The word, fear, is not fear - right? But the word 'fear', may evoke fear. So we are not dealing with the description, with the word, but the depth and the strength of fear. And we are trying to find together, not I explain, you accept but together find out for ourselves so it is you discover it, therefore it is your truth not somebody else's truth. You can't live with someone else's truth, you can only live with truth. So what is the cause of it? The cause of it - I will go into it. Is it thought? Is it time? Is it thought? Let's look at it. I am living - one is living now. And thought says, "I might die tomorrow", or "I might lose my job", "I have my money in the Bank, but the Bank may fail", "I am all right with my wife but she may turn to somebody tomorrow", "I have printed a book and I hope it will be a great success', which means fear. "I want to be known" - which is the most childish thing in the world - 'I want to be known and somebody is known already much more than I am'. So there is this thinking, that is, thinking I might lose, I might gain, I might be lonely. So thinking is one of the factors of fear - right? I am all right with my friends, with my wife and my children but I also know, I have experienced this sense of desperate loneliness. Don't you know it? A sense of deep frightening loneliness. And I am frightened. Have you ever examined what loneliness is? Why it has its cause? Don't you know - don't you have this feeling of loneliness? Am I talking something, saying something abnormal? Eh? You must all be saints. Sir, what is this loneliness which causes - you understand sir? - which causes attachment, holding on to something however illusory, however false, however meaningless. I hold on to my wife. I hold on to my club, to my god, to my ritual, to my friends because if I let go I am utterly lonely. Have you ever gone into that question: why human beings are so frightened of loneliness? They may live with a group, they may follow some guru and all the rest of that nonsense but strip them of all their decoration and they are what they are, lonely. Why? Why are they, what is loneliness? Not to have any relationship with anything, with nature, with another, with the friend or woman or the man with whom I have lived, all that somehow has withdrawn, I am left utterly empty, lonely - why? What is this feeling of utter despair? I will explain but the explanation is not the fact. The word is not the thing. If that becomes very clear that the word is not the thing, you Mr. Smith is not Mr. Smith, the word is not you, when you say, 'My wife', or 'My husband', that is - you understand? I am glad you understand that at least.

So explanation is not the reality, the truth. So look at it, let's look at it without the word, without the word 'loneliness'. Can you do it? To look at that feeling without using the word 'lonely', or 'despair'. Loneliness comes when all our days are spent in self-centredness. The very activity of self-centredness is producing loneliness - right? Because it is narrowing my whole, or the vast extraordinary existence of life into a small little me. And when one realizes that there is that feeling, "My god, how lonely I am". And to face it, to be with it completely, not move away from it, then there is a radical change.

So we must come back to this question of fear. We said thought is one of the causes of fear, obviously. I am thinking about death because I am an old man, or young, or you see some hearse going by with all the flowers, horses, cars. What a civilized country this is, with all the noise of death. And I see thought is one of the causes of death - one of the causes of fear - right? Do you see this? An obvious fact, right? Right sirs? And also time is a factor of fear - right? I am afraid what might happen. I am afraid of something I have done which others are using as a blackmail, you follow? I am afraid of that. So time and thought are the root of fear. Time and thought. There is no division between thought and time, thought is time - right?

Now the problem is - I am sorry, I won't use the word problem. The question is: thought is necessary, time is necessary - right? To go from here to there time is necessary. And thought is necessary to drive a car, to take a bus, take the train. Thought is necessary, time is necessary at that level. Right? Now I am saying as thought and time are the root of fear, is thought and time necessary? Vous avez compris? There it is necessary. But psychologically is thought and time necessary? Right? Is it? As long as time and thought, if you think are necessary, in the psychological world, in the world of the self, in the world of psyche, in the world of inside the skin, then you will be perpetually in fear - right? If you perceive that, if there is perception that thought is the root of fear and time, perception, not acceptance, then thought and time are necessary at the physical level, inwardly it is not necessary, therefore you are watching them. You are watching, the brain is actively watching itself every minutes to see that thought and time do not enter into its realm. This requires - you understand? - this requires great attention, awareness, so that the brain, which has accumulated fear for centuries, or for one day, that brain sees where it is necessary, where it is not necessary, therefore it is watching like a hawk so that thought and time doesn't enter into the whole process of living. You understand? This is real discipline, this is learning. As we explained the other day, discipline means, the root meaning of that word is disciple, the disciple is one who learns, who is learning all the time, he never says, "I have learnt" and stays. The brain is watching itself all the time so that it is active, so there is no time for it to move or to change. You have understood something? It is now quarter to twelve, we must stop.

You see sirs, and ladies, our difficulty is, we listen to a lot of things, we know a great deal, we have searched, asked, read, we have sought the advice of others, we have wandered the earth to find out, to find out what it is all about, but we never ask of ourselves, we never demand of ourselves serious, deep questions. We always ask superficial questions. And so we make our life very superficial. But if you asked questions, questions that demand answers from yourself so that you exercise your brain, your feelings, your whole attention is given to that question, then you begin to discover for yourself without being told by anybody, including the speaker. And so when there is freedom from fear you don't want gods, you don't want anything from anybody in the world, then you are really a free man.

May we continue where we left off on Sunday?

We have been talking about various issues and problems of life, like fear, relationship and the conflicts that one has in our daily life. Why is it, if one asks oneself, that we have always problems - problems of relationship, economic problems, social problems, individual problems? We seem to be living with so many, many problems and we never are able to solve any of them. In the solution of one we seem to bring about many other problems. Until we die we seem to be living with so many issues, so many unresolved crises and so on. If one is at all aware, at all concerned with our daily life, can one ask why we have these problems? Why we live with so many issues, so many demands, so many unresolved problems all our life? Is it our brains are conditioned to problems? From childhood, through school, college, university, if one is going through that process, every level of education has conditioned the brain to problems: mathematical problems, problems of skill, problems of various disciplines that one goes through. Is it that our brains are conditioned from the very beginning of our life? We have problems, and the brain has been conditioned to resolving problems - right? So our brain is conditioned to problems - right? We are talking over together, the speaker is not instructing. The speaker is not informing, so this is not a lecture but rather we are together taking a journey, taking a journey, not only as we have done in the outward world, but also deeply inwardly, psychologically. And to take that journey we must both go together. So you are also taking that journey, not just the speaker. So we are together going into these questions. So the speaker is not an authority but rather as two friends talking over their many, many problems of their life. And that is what we are doing together.

We are asking why we have never resolved any of our problems? Is it because our brain itself is conditioned to the resolution of problems, And therefore the brain itself is not free of problems? It is only a brain that is free that can solve problems. But if the brain itself is conditioned and therefore it itself has become a problem, therefore whatever problems arise it never solves them. And we are asking why? Why is the brain - or if you do not like the word brain, why is it our consciousness, which we shall talk about presently, why is our consciousness so entangled, so many issues, and when our consciousness, which is what we are, is such a complex entity, then that very complexity cannot solve anything. Right? It is a simple fact.

And we are asking can that consciousness, can that psyche, be ever free? Because life has problems. Life is constantly throwing up problems and if the brain, consciousness, our whole nature, is not free then we shall never be able to resolve any problems - clear? Are we listening to each other? Do you, if I may ask as a friend asking you, do you ever listen completely, wholly, as you now are sitting there, or walking in a wood together, do you ever listen wholly, or only partially? If one is listening partially, in a state of distraction, then you do not give your whole attention to listening. Do you ever listen completely to your wife or husband? Or you already know what she is going to say, or he is going to say? Because we have lived with her, or him, and so on and so you have got used to her voice, or his voice, his usage of words, his repetitive responses, so you almost know what he is going to say before he begins to speak. Are we like that? Will you listen to the speaker? Not that you have heard of him before, but for the first time you are listening to him - have you ever tried it? To listen to a bird warbling in the night, or in the early morning? Have you ever listened to the whisper of leaves? Have you listened or looked at the clouds floating in a blue sky?

So listening is an art. It is a great art. When you listen so attentively, fully, there is no barrier because you are then giving your whole attention to what you are listening to? It is only when there is inattention, when there is only a partial listening, then communication between you and another ceases.

So can we learn together the art of listening? The art of listening. The art of not only hearing with the outer ear but also listening to the inward ear. Not only to yourself, to hear your own reactions, your own responses, but also listen to what another is saying, so that your own reactions and what you are hearing coincide, there is no division. That's a great art to learn. When you listen to classical music, Beethoven, or Mozart, or Bach and so on, when you so completely listen, not remembering that you have heard it before, and going back to all the romantic pleasures that you have had when you listened, but actually listening now. That, as we said, is an art, like seeing is an art; seeing the clouds, the train going by, the beauty of a great cloud. When there is that total perception of beauty there is no self intervening, the self, the consciousness with all its problems. So where there is the art of listening and the art of seeing, this beauty, or the sound of a train rattling by, listening so completely, then there is no self at all. You are just listening, seeing. This is not something romantic, but if you do it actually then you will see how simple it all is.

So we are asking - (Noise of airplane) - listen to that sound! The thunder of that aeroplane. When you are really listening, then you are not, are you?

So let's go back. We have to investigate (noise of plane) - when you are listening to that aeroplane completely there is no resistance to that sound: when there is resistance, or defensive process, then the self comes into being - right? (Noise, laughter)

We were talking about problems and whether the brain can be free from problems itself so that it will solve problems. To understand that we must go into the question of consciousness. Consciousness, you may not like to use that word consciousness. There are some psychologists objecting to that word. If you object to that word there are all the reactions, biological, emotional, intellectual reactions. These reactions are registered in the brain, recorded in the brain, so the reactions, biological, which is physical, emotional, intellectual, all those reactions are contained in the brain, recorded in the brain. If you have pain, it is recorded. The records, the memories, are part of the consciousness. And that consciousness is your beliefs, your reactions, your faith, your fears, anxieties, suspicions, depressions, loneliness, pain, pleasure, sorrow, and all the imaginative romantic concepts of god, universe, all that is what you are. Right? All that is your consciousness. So our consciousness is perpetually in conflict with its own reactions - right? Are you following this? Obviously. Need I go into all that?

One desire opposing other desires. One opinion against another opinion, one conclusion changing later to another conclusion. One puts aside one belief and takes on another belief - right? One pleasure and the boredom with that pleasure, and demanding another pleasure. So our brain is constantly in a turmoil - right? That is a fact. Nobody can deny that. So our consciousness, what we are, each one, is the whole content of our consciousness - right? What you have learnt, whether it be skills, what one has accumulated scientifically, what one has accumulated as knowledge, as experience, all that is you. Your soul, if you believe in souls, or if you are an Asiatic you believe in some other form of belief, and so on - right? Are we clear on this matter?

So what is this consciousness which is so specialized as yours - right? Do you understand my question? You say, "It is my consciousness, not yours. I suffer and that suffering is me, mine. Pleasure, it is my pleasure, my dogma, and that dogma may be shared by millions, or thousands, but it is still mine." - Right? Now we are going to question whether it is yours at all. We are educated both biologically, socially, religiously, to think that we are totally separate from another - right? You are a man, another is a woman, child and an old man just one foot in the grave, there is that difference. But in consciousness, are we different? You understand my question? Please give your consideration to this. Don't just listen. I am questioning therefore you are going to wait for an answer but together we are sharing this question. We have so far accepted that our consciousness, our intelligence, our feelings, our concepts are all mine, are me. And the speaker and you are questioning that fact. That means you are enquiring into it with scepticism, with doubt.

When you go all round the world, various parts of tiny hamlets, fairly large villages, and great towns of the world, you there find all human beings suffer, they all laugh, they all shed tears, like you, they all have their troubles, and they all have their own feelings, like you. They may not be sophisticated, not learned, not know what the world is, but they all have fears, anxieties, depressions, this sense of deep loneliness, sorrow, and hoping there is something beyond all this misery, and having their own gods, like you have your own gods. So this consciousness - please don't accept what the speaker is saying, question it, doubt it, but move - so this consciousness, as we think it is ours, is shared by all human beings - right? Shared by everybody on earth.

So this consciousness is common to all of us. Clear? The sequence of that, that all our consciousness, the feelings, the responses, however subtle, however gross, however crude, is shared by every human being on this earth. So it is not my consciousness, it is not your consciousness - right? This is where you are going to not accept. Therefore we are not individuals. Do you accept that? Do you see that? See it logically first. Logic is necessary. Reason is necessary. Logic, step by step, investigating reasonably step by step, as we have done. And when you realize that, the fact, not supposition, or romantic ideal, but the fact that we all share this, we all stand on the same ground. We all have the same movement of pain, sorrow, pleasure, depression, anxiety. When you see the truth of it and feel the reality of it, then you are all humanity. You are all humanity, you are not separate and say, "I am a Swiss, I have my own peculiar upbringing" - of course you have peculiar upbringing, you are surrounded by these marvellous mountains, prosperous, well fed, educated - quotes - perhaps a boy living in a small village far away in a foreign country, he may not be educated, he may be just living, struggling, having one meal a day, but he thinks like you, thinks. Thinking is common to all of us. Expression of that thinking may be different. If you are a poet, you might write a poem. If you are a painter you might do this and that. But thinking is common to all of us.

So if you see the truth of it, the depth of it, the feeling of it, the subtlety of it, then you realize you are humanity and therefore you have tremendous responsibility, you cannot kill another because then you are killing yourself.

So in understanding this consciousness, which is, as we said, the whole past memories, the experiences with their knowledge stored in the brain as memory, this memory, not the expression of that memory, is common. You remember the way to your house, so does the man in that little village thousands of miles away remember from his field to his cottage. So we are asking: as long as that consciousness, which is stored in the brain as reactions and so on, as long as that brain is in a state of turmoil, a state of problems, it can never solve any problem. It is only a free brain not hindered, not limited, only such a brain can solve problems.

So we are asking ourselves whether that brain, that consciousness, with all its content - right? - the content makes consciousness. If there was no content consciousness may not be as we know it now. Clear? Am I - is the speaker putting lots of things in one talk? If I am, I am sorry. That is the way it is. Because we are going to, if we have time, go into sorrow, passion, which is different from lust and what is sorrow. And also, if we have time this morning, we must investigate into the whole immense question of death. Because we have only one more talk, next Thursday.

So we are asking whether this consciousness, with its content, can ever be free, not consciousness but the brain which holds this consciousness - right? This brain which retains all the memories, the past, the present and the future, which holds - can that brain, can that consciousness be thoroughly empty? You understand my question? Please ask that question of yourself. (Noise of train, whistling). That train has never whistled before, probably it is encouraging us! And when we are asking this question: whether the content of the brain, not the knowledge and the skill of daily life but all the psychological retentions, the recording, can totally be free? This is a really very, very serious question, because we have lived with this consciousness for forty or fifty thousand years. And we have invented all kinds of gods, all kinds of saviours, all kinds of religious books, from the ancient Egyptians to the present day. And so we have not only to consider whether it is possible for the brain to retain knowledge in the area that is necessary and not hold it in any other area, which is the psychological, that state of the psyche which remembers, which contains all the past and the present - right?

So to go into that we must also consider time, time as forty five thousand years until now, that immense duration of time. And also during that long period of time there have been many gods, many scriptures, many expressions of cruelty, wars, despair, tears, laughter, anxiety, insecurity. And that is what we are. That is, the past is contained in the present. That is clear. The past is in the present. And the future is in the present. Because we have had forty five thousand years, we will have another forty five thousand years unless we fundamentally change now - right? This is logical.

So is it possible for this consciousness to cease entirely, with all its troubles, turmoils, and all the rest of it? Otherwise if there is no cessation of all that you will be tomorrow, or a thousand tomorrows, exactly, modified, what you are now. Clear? Right? So that is death. We will go into it much more.

We ought to go into the question now of what is love, what is compassion, and what is sorrow with its pain. Mankind, from the beginning of time, has shed tears. They have killed each other, perhaps a few at a time, with an arrow or with a club, with a sword and thousands and millions of people have suffered, shed tears, they have lost their sons, their husbands, their lovers and all the rest of that. Man has been like this from the beginning and during forty, fifty thousand years we are still going on, the same as before, only now we have marvellous means of destroying millions of people at one blow. We have progressed immensely - right? And this is called progress. So during all those forty five thousand years mankind has shed tears, sorrow, they have lost their sons, their husbands, their wives, destroyed great cities and built new cities on the old site and so on. So mankind, human beings, have suffered immensely and we are still suffering immensely. This is not romanticism, this is not emotionalism, this is a fact. And we are not stopping at all, we are going on along the same road, the same movement. And we are crying. And so mankind has suffered immensely as we are suffering now. There is no single human being on this earth who has not suffered, either physically, biologically or emotionally or intellectually. (Noise of airplanes) - they seem to love us, don't they!

And we have never asked or enquired if there is an end to sorrow. And instead of asking, demanding that question, we have said someone else will suffer for us, as the Christians do, and the Asiatics, including primarily the Indians, they said it is part of Karma - you know the Sanskrit word, which means Karma, the root meaning of that word is to act. What you sow you reap, whether in this life or the next life. That is their idea. What you sow, what you are now, you will be next life, perhaps slightly modified, next life. So we have taken comfort in theories, in speculations, in faith, in the next life and so on and so on, but we have never faced the thing, we have never stayed with the thing. One has never said "I suffer, I will live with it and find out why I suffer." - not escape from it, not run away, not seeking any form of comfort. That means suffering is like a jewel, a great jewel. You know if you have a great jewel in your hand, you look at it, you marvel at it, you see the beauty of it, how it is set, in platinum, gold, silver, with such delicacy, such refinement, with such beauty, you hold it and look, never want to run away from it. In the same way if one can hold that thing, sorrow. Not get morbid, not run away from it, just to hold it and look at it, not as an observer looking at it. Some years ago a friend had a most extraordinary jewel. It was one of the most beautiful jewels and he said, "Hold it for a minute." I held it, the speaker held it and looked at it. It was really the most extraordinary thing, very ancient, very rich and valuable, priceless. And it was something outside of you. That jewel is not part of you, it is there, like that watch, like that microphone, like that camera. But sorrow is you, you are not separate from sorrow - right? You are sorrow. But we say, "How am I to be free of it?" Therefore the moment you say, "How am I to be free of it?", you separate yourself from the fact that you are sorrow. You understand this?

When you get angry, or greedy, you are greedy, aren't you? You are not separate from greed, you are greed. But to say, "I must get rid of greed." Or, "I must hold greed", or "It's..." and so on. You understand? The moment you separate yourself from the feeling, from the pain, from anxiety, then that separation causes conflict - right? So sorrow is you - your self pity, your sense of loss, your sense of loneliness, your sense of failure, your sense of remorse, regret, guilt and all the rest of it. The sense of great loss of someone whom you have so-called loved. And when we separate that sorrow from you, thinking you are different from sorrow, then you want to escape from it, seek comfort from it, but when you are that, because you are that, then you hold it, without any movement away from it, hold it without any thought interfering with it. You are just watching. Then you will see, if you give your whole attention to it, that sorrow ends, never to return again.

With the ending of sorrow there is passion, there is energy, incalculable energy, which is passion. Lust is a passing thing, to be repeated. But passion can never be repeated, it is there because there was the ending of sorrow. And most of us have not this passion because most of us are caught in pleasure.

So with the ending of sorrow there is love. If you are suffering, not only physically but inwardly more, how can you love another? You can have pity, you can have sympathy, you can be kind, generous, but that is not love, but love includes all that. Because we have said we must go into this question of what is love.

It is not only the ending of sorrow but also the ending of jealousy, the ending of ambition - listen to it, please listen - ending of ambition. How can you love another, or have love in your heart, if you are becoming ambitious, if you are ambitious to achieve, to fulfil, whether in the physical world or in the psychological world. When you are ambitious to become enlightened - such a silly statement. When you meditate, as some of you - probably many people who talk about meditation, they are ambitious because they want to get somewhere. And therefore those people have no love at all because they are still thinking about their own gain.

So is it possible to have this extraordinary perfume where there is no jealousy, no comparison, no state of antagonism and so on? Where there is love, that love, there is compassion. That is, compassion can only be when there is freedom from sorrow. Can you become passionate when you belong to a country, to a religion, to a group, to a sect, when you are a leader, when you are a guru? You understand all this? And where there is that compassion there is intelligence.

We ought to really go into this question of intelligence. Intelligence is different from interest. Intelligence is different entirely from the activity of thought which has become very clever. One can be extraordinarily clever in manipulating people and call it love - right? You understand this? Have you ever enquired into what is intelligence? You need a great deal of intelligence to put together a motor - right? You need a great deal of intelligence involving perhaps three hundred thousand people to go up to the moon. You need astonishing clever intelligence to create neutron bombs, to build a submarine, to build aeroplanes, but that intelligence is limited - right? It can be mechanical, that is, born of memory, knowledge, experience and thought has its own activity which it calls intelligence - right? But that intelligence is limited because thought is limited. We went into the question of thought. That is, thought is based on memory, memory is the accumulation of knowledge and knowledge is the outcome of experience. And we have had thousands and thousands, perhaps millions of experiences, human beings, but there are more experiences to be had. Therefore every experience stored becomes knowledge and therefore that knowledge is limited. It is clear. And that limited knowledge is retained in the brain as memory and the response of memory is thought. Therefore thought is ever limited. You can imagine a limitless state but it is still limited. You can imagine god to be all powerful, all mercy, all this and all that, but it is still limited. So intelligence is something entirely different. It comes where there is love and compassion. That intelligence is rational, sane, healthy, not limited. And is it possible for us human beings, living on this earth, doing our daily tiresome, boring, or fascinating jobs, to be compassionate, have this extraordinary perfume of love? And where that is there is supreme intelligence.

It is time to stop. So we will have to discuss the question of death and the immense significance of death, and the strength of death, which is as strong as love. And also we will also have to talk over together, on Thursday morning, the day after tomorrow morning, what is religion, and what is meditation. The speaker puts death, religion and meditation at the end of the talks, because in the last five talks, and including this talk, we have laid the foundation.

And without that foundation well established, strongly built, which means having no fear, having no illusions, having this relationship with another without conflict, the ending of sorrow, that is the foundation, then only we can go into the question of what is meditation, not how to meditate but the actuality of meditation, the actuality of a religious life, and the great significance of death.

May I get up please?

May we continue with what we were talking about the day before yesterday? This is the last talk.

We have been talking about the whole problem of existence, the various aspects of our daily life. We talked about relationship, we talked about fear, pleasure and the endless suffering of man, and whether there is any possibility of being totally free of fear. We went into that very carefully. And also we talked about knowledge, how important it is to have knowledge which is gathered through experience, stored, as knowledge, and memory in the brain, out of which comes thought, which naturally then is limited. We went into all that during the last five talks. And as this is the last talk we ought to talk over together why the brain is always occupied.

We were asking why our brain, which has evolved through a long period of time, forty five to fifty thousand years, during all that long duration of time the brain has apparently been occupied, never quiet, endless series of occupation, associations, one thought leading to another thought, this endless chain. We have accepted it as natural, as part of our daily life. We are going together to question this. As we said, one hopes you will not mind the thing being repeated, we are not doing any kind of propaganda, propagate any kind of belief, faith, or some philosophy. But rather you and the speaker are going together into the investigation of our daily life. (Noise of planes) - I am afraid we will have to wait for a little while. Let the aeroplanes have their fun!

We have talked about a great many things. We are together going into very complex problems this morning: why human beings have not been able to live at peace within themselves and so peace with the world. Why our daily life is in such confusion, conflict and misery and sometimes joy, why is it, after all these thousands of years, man has not found the tranquillity, a sense of quietness, peace? All this requires a great deal of intelligence, to live at peace with one another and also within oneself, and so with the neighbour, or with one's own intimate relationships. We have not been able to find out why we have not lived at peace. We have talked about it, why human beings are always in conflict, whether that conflict can end, not only outwardly, wars, divisions of nationalities, divisions of religion, divisions, linguistic differences, semantic differences and the various qualities of the brain which breaks up everything into categories and so on. Is it possible, living in this modern world, with all the complexity of it, having to earn a livelihood from nine o'clock until five o'clock, spending one's whole life in an office, in a laboratory or in a factory, or ploughing the fields, and at the end of it all there is death. (Noise of planes) I am afraid we will have to wait. That one ends, the other begins!

We are going to enquire into all this together, as we has done, one hopes, during the last five talks. We are going to enquire together why human beings not only are not capable of living at peace with themselves and with the world, but also why human beings from childhood get hurt, psychologically wounded. This question is very important because that affects our whole life from childhood, through school, through college, university, or at home with other boys and girls that the whole process of living engenders, brings about various forms of psychological hurts which act as a shock to the brain, and so we become neurotic. And whether it is possible to live without a single hurt. When one is hurt it not only emphasizes the whole self-centred activity but also it breeds fear. When one is hurt one builds a wall, a structure, a barrier between yourself and another. And so gradually one withdraws, one becomes isolated with all its problems of identification and so on. I wonder - one wonders if one is aware of the hurts we have. And if one is, apparently we never end it, there is no ending of hurts completely. What is it that is being hurt? Please, as we said, we are together investigating this problem. Together. The speaker may point out or verbalize or act as a mirror in which one sees oneself, and so the speaker is not a guru, you are not his followers. There is no personality cult - which are all horrible things. So together we are looking at this question. It is your question. It is not a question the speaker is imposing on you. Every human being gets hurt psychologically, wounded. And one carries it throughout life. One never sees the danger, the disastrous results. And is it possible to end all hurts, and never to be hurt again? What is it that is hurt? When you say, "I am hurt" - what is that 'I', what is that quality of the entity that gets hurt? Right? We are together? Are we understanding each other?

Suppose I am hurt, why am I hurt? What is the entity, the structure, that gets hurt? And we call it, "I am hurt". What is that "I"? Is it not the various incidents, experiences, the memories, that have created an image about oneself? Please look at it carefully and not reject what one is saying, though one must have doubt, have scepticism, questioning, not accepting anything that the speaker is saying, one must have the quality of doubt. Therefore we are asking: what is it that is hurt? Is it the image that you have about yourself? That image has been put together by various impressions, pressures, it is like a computer programmed. And that image gets hurt - right? And so we say, "I am hurt".

Can one - this is the question - can one live a life, daily life, not some romantic, ideological, sentimental life but actually in our daily life live without a single image about ourselves? It is only when there is that image, then that image, that picture that has been put together by thought and that gets hurt. When someone says, flatters or insults or praises and so on, why does the brain record? You understand my question? Is it too difficult? No, no it is very simple. Is it possible not to record? Psychologically, of course you must have a recording process going on when you are driving a car, or so many physical things that one does, there you must have a machine that is constantly recording. And in the psyche, the whole nature of the 'me', need there be any recording in that world? You understand? So is it possible not to record? We are going to find that out, if you are interested. Even if you are not interested, it doesn't matter. Because we have never asked of ourselves, or demanded, whether there is a possibility of being totally free, not only from a particular aspect of life - from our sorrow, from our anxiety, from our loneliness and so on, that is only very superficial - freedom to go where you like, to choose any particular job you want but to be entirely free, totally. It is only when the brain is not recording, except in the physical world. In the psychological world, in the world of inside the skin, not to record; that requires tremendous attention, awareness - which we are going to talk about presently.

And we ought to talk over together a very complex problem which mankind has faced for thousands upon thousands of years. Though it is a beautiful morning full of light and splendour, the beauty of the hills and the dark shadows of the valley, we ought to talk over this question, which is not morbid, which is death. Right? This is part of our life, as anxiety, loneliness, fear and all the toil and turmoil and conflict of life, death is also part of our life. Whether one is very young, enjoying life, or middle aged or old aged, this is a problem which each human being has to face. We are all going to die, that is certain, that is one thing that is absolute. So we are going to enquire together into the complexity of what it means to die. You don't mind discussing this? All right? If you don't like it, lump it! (Laughter).

Why is it that human beings are so frightened of death? Why is it that human beings have put death as far away as possible from their life? Why is it that death seems to appear such a terrible thing? Books have been written by doctors and others, how to die happily. I saw - one saw a title of that book, it is quite well known in America, "How To Die with Grace", with happiness, relaxed. (Laughter)

So we are going to talk over together this question. Have you ever enquired into what it is to end? What is the significance of ending something? Ending, not a continuity, you understand? We are used to, or have been conditioned to a continuity - right? To continue. What does that mean, to continue? A long duration of continuous memory - right? Continuous attachment to a place, to a person, to an idea. Has one ever experimented completely ending with an ideal? - and not, what will happen if I end? You understand? You have understood? The question of ending is very important to understand. Ending a habit, both biological or psychological habits. If you end then we ask, "What is there more?" Which means you are still thinking in terms of continuity - right? If I end anger, or selfishness, what is there? Right? So our brain is always looking to something else if I end. Bien? And we have never therefore, ended anything completely. Understood?

Can we go on? So if one understands the nature of ending, and the urge, the desire, to continue, when there is the desire to continue, then there is the fear of ending - right? If one understands the ending and therefore no continuity, then there is no fear. You understand all this? Are we thinking together? Actually thinking together, not accepting what the speaker is saying, that is not important. But putting our minds, brains, together. Not your brain and my brain, but the quality of brain that thinks, the quality of brain that says, "I must go and enquire, find out." The quality of brain that doubts, questions, asks, then we are together. Then our brains are meeting each other, therefore communication between each other becomes very easy, simple. Right? Are we doing this? Half and half. And that is where our difficulty lies. Some people here - I am not being disrespectful to them - they have listened to all this for years, probably bored, knowing what he is going to say. They have become accustomed to the words. But have they really... are we together learning? Not memorizing - see the difference? We memorize, we are educated to memorize, so as to be able to use skilfully our knowledge. We memorize lessons - French, Russian, whatever language - we memorize various historical processes, we memorize scientific facts - right? We accumulate knowledge to act skilfully in any field. But learning is a movement that is like a river that is flowing, never static. Knowledge is static because you are adding more and more and more. Learning is like a great river that has got tremendous volume behind it, moving swiftly, rapidly, nothing stands in its way. That is the act of learning. So are we learning together? Or our brains have been programmed like a computer. It is rather interesting to talk about the computers. You don't mind?

They are doing the most extraordinary things in the world of computers. The speaker has discussed with many of them, so called top ones. And those computers can almost do anything that the human thought does. They have been programmed by top mathematicians, biologists, scientists, engineers, taking any particular subject and a professor who is top in his profession giving a programme - right? You know all about this. Our brain has been programmed too. You are programmed after two thousand years to call yourself a Christian, belief - right? The Hindus, perhaps three to five thousand years, have been programmed to believe - you know the whole process. And the Islamic world too, programmed - you understand? And the computer is being programmed, ultra mechanical intelligence, it is called. And it can almost outthink man, more rapidly. They have discovered in America a chip that holds a million memories. And so what is going to happen to man, to your brain? You understand my question? If a mechanical thing can outdo man, except in certain realms - I won't go into all that, you can study it - what is going to happen to man, to you, to your children, to your grandchildren, what is going to happen to them? When the mechanical intelligence can outstrip man, in certain ways, it can build cars through robots, there is going to be certain unemployment and so on and so on and so on. Then what will happen to the human brain that has been active - you understand? Active in doing certain things, carpentry, mathematics, putting machinery together and so on, which computer and a robot can do all that - you are following all this? - what is going to happen to our brains? We asked this question to computer experts. Their reply is, "We don't care. We don't know." And that doesn't matter. What their interest is, is inventing. Getting more and more. The computers do all kinds of things.

Please do listen, seriously listen, it is not a joke, a game we are playing. Either the entertainment industry - sports and so on and so on and so on, including religion, which is all entertainment industry - either the brain is going to be caught in that - if you have noticed how entertainment is growing more and more and more, the children want to be entertained - either the brain is going to be caught in that, everlastingly seeking entertainment, or it is going to turn inwardly, not selfishly, not in the world of self-centredness, that is a very small affair, but going much more deeply. The brain has extraordinary capacity, as is shown in the technological world, and that same brain can watch and go very, very deeply, and that depth is infinite. So you are faced with this.

So let's come back. What is death? As we said, if we understand deeply the meaning of ending and the nature of continuity, which all of us want because we think in continuity there is safety, security - right? Right sirs? Being identified with a country, having roots in a certain place, or attached to some symbol, ideal and so on, which is a series of continuities. Hoping to find in that security, and so we cling to continuity. And that very continuity is bringing about great disaster because it is bringing wars - right? We cling to democracy - whatever that may mean - and also there is the whole group of Russian totalitarian states, we are the managers of human beings, we control them - right? Dictatorship and all the rest of the horrors that are going on. So where is security? Do you understand the question? We have sought security in the family, in the wife, in the husband, in the community and so on and so on, in nation, internation, but there has been no security for man. As civilization grows more and more complex there is going to be less and less security. And continuity gives us the hope that we shall have security. Where does security lie? Is there any security at all?

And when we are seeking security, which is in continuity, then there must be real fear of death, which is the ending - right? The Asiatic world has - specially India which has expanded all over Asia, psychologically and religiously - they have invented the word reincarnation. That is, a series of continuities - right? I shall die this life, but next life. And so next life and after next life - you follow? Until human beings reach that highest principle or highest state. So that is a very comforting idea of continuity. Right? You follow all this? But we never ask for ourselves: what is ending, actually ending? And one is frightened of that too. To end, for example, completely, psychologically, all attachment. Because we are attached to so many things - to people, to ideas, to knowledge, to concepts, to various forms of idealism, to money, to our knowledge and memories, or to our experience. "Oh, I have had a marvellous spiritual experience" - I hold on to that. Right? So we are attached to so many things. And death comes along and says, "My friend you can't be attached to anything" - right? You are going, you are leaving everything behind you - right? Your family, your ideas, your knowledge, all your vanities of knowledge, position, power, all that you are leaving. That is ending. And that is what we are frightened of. That is what we call death. The terrible ending, not knowing what happens afterwards. If you knew what happens afterwards you continue - right? So our brain is so cunning, so subtle that it must know before it does anything. It must know if I end what is there. I can't live in vacuity. I can't live in a state of nothing, nothingness. Right?

So that is why it is very important to understand the nature of continuity and the quality of total ending without the movement of a future. So death says, "Don't be attached to anything, psychologically, first." Then you will find out physically not to be attached. If you said to your wife or your husband, "Darling I am no longer attached to you," probably she would throw a brick at you, or you would run. See the importance, please it sounds funny, and it is rather funny, why we are so attached, we are never letting go. So the question is: can you live freely, that means no attachment, and ending every day every form of holding on, clutching to something. Which means can you live a life everyday living with ending, which is death? You understand my question? Have you ever tried it, actually, not theoretically? Which means you have no roots anywhere, you are not identified with anything - your country, your family, - psychologically we are talking about - so that the brain is constantly empty, not chattering. You understand? Because we are wasting our energy through all these series of conflicts. And where there is fear, that is the epitome of waste. That is the summation of waste. And we need energy, tremendous energy. As you have tremendous energy when you want to earn money, when you want to become famous, when your sexual appetites demand, you have got tremendous energy. But apparently where that tremendous energy is necessary in the psychological world there that energy is wasted by fear, conflict, confusion, you know, all the rest of it.

So we are asking: is it possible to live, a daily live, not some romantic, ideological, Utopian nonsense, but actually in our daily existence, living with death and life together? You don't see the beauty of it. You don't see the nature of its extraordinary quality. But if you go into it deeply one comes upon such depth.

Now we ought to talk over together: what is religion. All civilizations, the birth of a new civilization has been the outcome of religion. Not what the priests have made of religion, not the religions which are organized with property, with money, with authority, hierarchical authority, with temples, mosques, churches, that is not religion. That is all great activity of thought - right? Please examine it, don't reject it. All the rituals have been put together by thought - right? All the dress, fancy dress, it is all put together by thought. All the cathedrals have been put together by thought. And the symbols, the original sin, the saviour, all that is the result of people who have thought it all out. They may say it is direct revelation. All revelation is translated by thought. So religions, as they are now, are the activity, directed in one direction, with one purpose. Not only to help man, not only to control man, which means woman and so on, not only to civilize man but also in their attempt to do all that they have also created wars - right? Religious wars of a hundred years and so on. All religions are at war with each other - right? Have you noticed all this? You must have. You are all so-called civilized people, you have read all this, they are at war. A whole group of the Western world believing in one thing, dogma, rituals and the whole of Asia with their Buddhism and Hinduism, and Islamic world. All that is not religion, obviously. Because it is based on thought, thought is memory, memory is knowledge, knowledge is the outcome of experience. And therefore thought is always limited, as knowledge will always be limited.

So then what is religion? Right? Is there that religious quality of the brain that doesn't belong to any guru, to any sect, to any recognized, orthodox, well-established religions, so that all that is put aside completely? Which means that there is no fear to find out, there is no sense of the background which holds you back. So what is the religious mind, brain? You understand? What is the quality of a brain that has evolved through millenia upon millenia, please listen to all this, if you are interested, because it is your life, a brain that has evolved through time, and through the long ages there have been so many religions. Always the priests at the top because at one time the priests were the only people that were able to write and read, they were the councilors, they were the wise men, and they gradually assumed authority - you know, the good game! And so what is that brain that has the quality of that religious - we are going to define the word 'religion' presently - that brain that has this quality? We are going to find out together.

The word 'religion' etymologically is not definite. We say this because we looked at various dictionaries, the origin of the word.

There they say there is no conclusion of the etymological meaning of that word. They say it is a form of binding, binding to your concept of the highest, binding yourself to that. Even that they are doubtful. So the etymological meaning, the origin of that word, is not established, so we can play with that word. So we are going to find out together what is religion. Because we have reached a certain stage of evolution: technologically we are tremendously advancing, there is no limit that. And psychologically we have just scratched the surface. And if the brain, which has got such infinite capacity, if that brain is caught in programmes - you understand? - like a computer is caught in programmes, as a British, a Hindu, and all the rest of the silly nonsense, they cannot possibly then enquire into the most extraordinary thing in life.

And this is where meditation comes in. You understand? Not how to meditate. The very word 'how' means a system, a practice, tell me what to do, I'll practise it day after day, day after day, sit in a certain position, breathe in a certain way - you know all the tricks. Don't you know all that? I am sure some of you have played with all that. The gurus from that unfortunate country called India come over here and tell you all about meditation and you lap it up, because you are so gullible, which means you have no doubt, question.

So we are going to find out together what is meditation. Which is in relation to what is religion and in relation to the whole of existence, our daily existence. You understand? Daily existence which is a turmoil, etc. and so on, and death, freedom, and the brain that has got such extraordinary capacity, infinite capacity. And when we ask what is meditation, it is not asking for a system, for a method, because if you practise a system, that becomes mechanical, you are caught in that system, in that method. See the logic of it. For God's sake see the truth of it, so that you are never caught in a system. Because the brain is demanding not only security - you understand? - it must have security, both physical and psychological, complete security otherwise it can't function clearly, objectively, passionately - right? So what is meditation?

The word 'meditation' means to ponder over, to think things over. That is the dictionary meaning. And also it means measure, both in Sanskrit and etymologically, to measure. Right? That is what the meaning of that word is. The technological world can only exist when there is measurement - right? Centimetres, metres, inches, foot and so on, which is measurement. If that measurement is not possible, if there is no measurement, technology cannot move. That is fairly clear. Psychologically, inwardly, we also have measurement - I am this, I will be that. That is to measure. Which means also to compare to what is to what should be. Can one live - please put your minds to this to find out - can one live without measurement? Right? Ask that question, without comparing yourself with anything. Comparison implies future - right? And we went into the question of time. Time is the past - I will repeat it again. Time is the past, and that past is now, you are there. All you are now is the past. And the future is what you are now. Clear? If you are jealous today, you will be jealous tomorrow. That is a fact. Or a thousand tomorrows. Or many years. Unless you change now you will be jealous tomorrow - right? So time is contained in the now - the past, the future and the present. This is important really to understand the depth of it, not merely the words of it. To understand the nature of time. And measurement means time. Comparison means time. So if you are always comparing yourself with something or other you are projecting what should be - right? And that what should be is from the present. therefore the future is now. I have talked about it enough. One has gone into this very deeply at other talks.

So when the brain has no comparison, it doesn't compare at all - just listen to it - when there is no comparison it is what is now - right? You understand? It is what it is now. And to remain with what is now and not have a single movement in any direction - you understand?

So meditation is to understand the depth of time, and as we have laid the foundation from the very beginning of our talks, which is to deal with daily life, where there must be total order. Not disorder, we talked about it the other day. That is, you have to bring about order in your house, not only in the physical house, but the house in which you live inwardly, complete order, which means no fear. It is fear that creates disorder, attachment creates disorder. I have built something, I am attached to that. I have invented something, it is mine. So the brain, having established order, a sense of total freedom from self centred activity, it is much more difficult to have, it has to be gone into it, which we did, all along. The talks are to point out our self centred activity and therefore that activity is limited and very small.

So meditation, when there is order, it becomes extraordinarily quiet. And to observe, to perceive something totally, it is not possible when there is confusion. So the brain can perceive something totally when it is absolutely quiet. Are we doing this?

Our brain is never quiet, as we said at the beginning of the talk, it is always chattering, it is always occupied with something or other. And so the brain becomes mechanical, limited, creates friction with itself, and so there is never the quality of absolute tranquillity and silence. When you look at those mountains and those clouds, your brain must be quiet to appreciate the beauty of it, but if you are chattering all the time, talking, talking, talking, never looking, then you do not see the full depth of the beauty of a mountain, or the cloud with an evening light on it. So logically and sanely the brain needs absolute quietness.

Then what is creation and what is invention? You understand? Religion is this creation, not invention. Invention is the accumulated thought in which there is a gap and then something new is discovered, but it is still within the realm of thought - right? I do not know if you have - the speaker has discussed this matter with scientists and specialists and so on. What is creation? Not only creation of a baby from the cells and all the rest of it, but much more beyond all that. What is creation? Not who created - you understand? If you say it is god, then it is finished - your god and my god and the Muslim god and the Hindu god and your own particular pet god. That is an easy way of explanation and most people are satisfied with it. But if you shake away all that, slough it off, then what is creation? Is it born of knowledge? If it is born of knowledge it is not creation because knowledge is limited - right? Because we are adding more and more and more knowledge. Where there is more there is limitation. Right? Which will be measurement - the more, the better, is a measurement. So where there is knowledge there is invention. And creation is not related to knowledge. Therefore all the paintings of the world that they think are great creations are the activity of thought directed in different directions - great artist, great poet, marvellous music, it is all the activity of thought and so on - I don't have to go into all that.

So creation, that is religion. You understand? A mind - a brain that has knowledge where it is necessary, in the physical world, writing, talking, driving and so on, and knowledge has no place in the psychological world, because knowledge is limited and therefore creating division, conflict and all the rest of it. When you say, "I know my wife", you have already destroyed your wife. You understand that? Aren't you shocked by this? Because then your relationship with another is based on knowledge, which is thought, and thought is not love. All your desires, appetites, sensations are thought and therefore it is not love. Where there is love there is compassion. Compassion cannot come into being when there is no total freedom. If I am attached to my culture, to my tradition, to my religion as a Hindu, it is just a - and talk about compassion, it is childish. Where there is compassion there is intelligence. That's it. And that intelligence is supreme, it is not yours, or the speaker's, or somebody else's, it is intelligence. And in that intelligence there is absolute security. And nowhere else. And so religion, meditation is free of knowledge, and therefore the religious brain is creating, is in a state of creation. Do you understand all this? Even logically, intellectually, see this. If you really understand it, it is something that will totally revolutionize your daily life. We will be the beginning of a new religion, which is nothing to do with present religions. That is creation. Sorry. The talk is over. May I get up? (Clapping) Please clap for your self. (Laughter)

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 22ND JULY 1984

There have been a lot of questions, about probably two hundred or more. Out of those some of these questions were chosen. I have not looked at them before. I wonder what we are really interested in, each one of us. Probably health, probably, if you are rather old, getting one foot in the grave, fear of death, and also while we are very young, sex. And if you have no jobs, no vocation, which is becoming more and more imitation, what are we really interested in, profoundly, for which you are willing to give a great deal of one's energy, vitality and serious intention? How far would we go in carrying out, or pursuing something very, very serious in life? Are we all becoming very, very superficial? Never asking any serious demanding questions: what is it all about, the whole world? Why we behave as we do? Why isn't there peace in the world? I am sure we have asked all these questions of ourselves, probably. And we find no answers for them, or if we do, according to some tenet, some philosophy, some kind of acceptance of a system. Apart from all this, what is one really interested in? If we ask ourselves that question, do you ever find an absolute answer? Or is it all relative? If one is unhappy, one wants to be happy. Insecurity physically, biologically, then one seeks a form of security and fighting class differences. You know all that thing that is going on in the world. What is our answer to all this, these very demanding problems?

Do you ever stick to one thing and pursue it to the very end? We talked about the other day, health, which is naturally very important. How can a body be healthy if one has abused from one's youth, alcohol, tobacco, drugs - you know the whole medical process of health, keeping the body healthy. Or you do some kind of exercise, jogging along for ten miles, or five miles, or you do some kind of yoga - may I use that word? And become rather fanatical about yoga. At one time, in India, yoga was taught only to the very, very, few. It was not a moneymaking concern. Now it has become a big business. I hope you don't mind my telling you all this. And one is concerned about one's health. I think health comes when the self is not, when the ego is not tremendously active. It is like beauty, when the self is not the beauty is. When the ego with its self-centred activity is not, there is great good health.

And also we have many, many psychological problems, apart from physical problems - we have no houses to live in, only live in a flat in a town or big cities, in drawers, as it were. And that too has a great strain on the body, and so on. How do all these economic problems, which are really devastating the world, each country concerned with its own economic problem, its own security, armaments and all the rest of it, how can each country separate itself from the rest of mankind, and the population is increasing by the million. In India every year there are fifteen million people born. That is the population of Holland and Australia - fifteen million people - unemployed, poverty - you understand all this? Surely all these problems - class warfare, ideological warfare, can only end when we all become really civilized. That is, when we are not attached to any particular part of the country, when we are not nationally, religiously divided, but treat the whole world as our world, and then there will be no barriers. I am sure, we have talked to some of the scientists, the whole of humanity can be fed properly, housed, clothed and all the rest of it if we can abolish war, all the terrible instruments of war. But we are not civilized, I am afraid. We are too barbarous, and so none of the problems, physical problems, are being ever solved.

And the question arises: if there are half a dozen people in the world who have really transcended, gone beyond the self, which is the highest form of civilization, culture, what effect will they have on the rest of humanity - right? This is a question that has been asked over and over again. You, perhaps, change radically, fundamentally, utterly free from all the idiocy of mankind, what effect will it have on the rest of the world, on the mass as it is called? Will it have any effect? Don't you ask all these questions?

Would it be a right question to ask: what effect will it have? Are we changing because of the effect? Or we are changing deeply, profoundly, because per se, for itself, for its own beauty, for its own strength and love and compassion, and all that. And if we do, perhaps half a dozen or a dozen people in the world, surely it will affect the whole of consciousness of mankind. As Napoleon affected the whole of the world, and so on, and the religious teachers, the real religious teachers - not the phoney ones - have affected the consciousness of mankind. We should bear all this when we say to ourselves, "If I do change, how will it affect my neighbour, the mass of people?" I think that is a wrong approach to the question. One loves, not because of something, not because one is going to affect the world or your neighbour, but that very quality of the perfume, the depth of it, and the beauty of it, will have its own result without each one wanting a result.

So we had better tackle these questions. There are seven of them this morning. I don't know if we can answer all of them. Why do we put questions? We should. But to whom are you putting these questions? I know - I mean the speaker knows because he has received a lot of letters from all over the world, they want to talk to somebody. They can't talk to their wives or to their husbands, or to somebody with whom they are familiar, but they want to talk to somebody about their problems, their jobs, their quarrels and all those things that make life so utterly miserable. And so one writes letters, long letters. Not that you shouldn't write letters to the speaker but as it is not possible to talk over together each one of us separately, can we not look for another to help us but have that strength, that quality which resolves our own problems? I know it is nice to talk to somebody, to tell of our pain, our depressions, our anxieties, our ambitions, and in that talk, in that conversation, it might help one. And when we ask questions, how do we approach a question, not only the questions which we ask for ourselves, but also if you ask these questions, how do you approach a question? How do you approach a problem? The word 'approach' means coming very near, coming as close as possible to a question, or to the problem. In what manner do we approach - you understand the English meaning of that word, to come very, very, very close. I approach you. How do we approach these questions? Not only the questions that have been put to the speaker, but also to any problems, any questions that we have, how do we come near it? Are we first concerned with the solution of the problem? You understand my questions? Suppose I have a problem. My concern then is to find a solution to the problem - right? But the solution may lie in the question itself. You understand? We will go into it.

Shouldn't we approach the problem tentatively, hesitantly, and if you have a motive then the motive directs the problem. Clear? Right? Is this clear? We are discussing this together, the question how to approach the question. Could we approach it without a motive first? Because if you have a motive it has already set a direction to the question - right? You understand? It is clear, isn't it? If we have any kind of direction, which is the solution, then we have already limited it - right? So could we approach a problem without a motive, without seeking a solution for it? Or wanting the problem to be solved according to our pleasure and pain? Could we approach the problem without any reaction? Which is going to be very difficult because when we have a problem we react to it instantly - right? So could we have a gap, a sense of not having any motive, any direction, like or dislike, then you can look at the problem - right? - not project your wishes, your desires - right? Then you can look at the problem, study the problem, go into the problem, and in the understanding of the problem the solution is there, not outside the problem - right? I talked - we talked to some of the politicians about this - I know they are the last people, but we talked to them. They said all this takes too long. We have to resolve our problems immediately because they are starving, there are people who are terrorists and so on. They never go to the cause of things - you understand? They want quick - all of us do, not the politicians only, all of us want a quick immediate, convenient answer. If one has a headache, as most people apparently do, we never find out why it arises, what is the cause of it, but what we do is take a pill quickly, but the cause is there. So to investigate the cause, go into it very, very deeply, requires a brain that is not reacting all the time, defending, attacking, aggressive - you follow? It must have the quality of pliability, quickness, but the quickness comes when there is patience. Patience is not time. Patience is the quality of a brain that is looking, watching. I wonder if you see all this? Right?

So here are some questions: some friends have chosen these questions. They have shown me all the questions but they chose these - I haven't seen it, nor have you seen it - right? So let both of us approach it without motive, without any kind of reaction, like or dislike, but just listen to the question first, so that your answer - or rather the solution will be real not just fancy, imaginative, illusory - right? So you and the speaker are going to approach this question hesitantly, without any motive, without any reaction - right?

1st QUESTION: How do we tell the difference between observing ourselves in the sense you mean, and merely thinking about ourselves?

Have you got the answer? Thinking about ourselves and observing about ourselves. They are two different things according to this question. Thinking about oneself, which we all do - I am making progress, I am better than yesterday, I have my problems, which is thinking. I wish I had better food, better clothing, better housing, or I wish I had more sex - you follow? - money, thinking about oneself all the time - which most of us do, even the austere monk, he does think about himself - right? Only is the name of God - right? And the questioner says, what is the difference between that, thinking about yourself, and observing yourself - right? Right, that is the question.

Now we know what it means to think about ourselves - right? It is really going round and round in circles. Either expanding the self, the ego, or contracting the ego - right? I am the world, I am God, I must be more kindly, I must love. I must be more intelligent, I must meditate in order to achieve - whatever they want to achieve. So we are all caught in that. And observing oneself is something entirely different - right?

Then let's find out what does it mean to observe. You understand the question? We are together in this? Come on sirs!

First of all, do we observe anything without the word? Do we observe the mountain and not call it mountain? Do we observe the evening light on the cloud, with its most extraordinary colour, beauty and something immense, can we look at those clouds and the mountains without using a single word? Can we do that? You understand my question? Don't look so paralysed. That is, can we look at anything objectively, the trees, nature, the waters, the sky and the evening star and the silence of a morning, this extraordinary world we live in, natural world, can we look at anything without a single word? And to find that out we have to find, go into the question why the brain is caught in a network of words? You understand my question? Are we together in this?

We are asking: can we look at anything, including my wife, my husband, my daughter, the politicians, the various gurus and the priests and all the circus that goes on in the name of religion, can we look at all that without reaction first? Then find out if we can look at all that without the network of words interfering with our observation. Can we do that? Have you ever tried that? When one looks at one's wife or husband, can you look at her or him, without all the images, all the things that you have accumulated about her or him, just to look? Can you? You are exceptionally silent when I talk about the husband and the wife and the girl and the boy. So one has to find out why the brain is so caught up in words. When you say he is a communist or a totalitarian you have wiped it out, you have put him in a category, in a cage, and that is the end of it. Or he is British. Or he is French, or he is an Indian, or he is this or that. See what is happening to our brain. Linguistically the brain has been caught with words, not the significance and the depth of the word, but just the word. This requires careful watching.

Watching is to observe. There was a balloon going up this morning - you must have all seen it - and you watched it, going up and up and up very, very slowly. The gondola hanging and you saw the whole thing. Then you would say, "By Jove, I wish I were up there", or you say to yourself, "How dangerous." And so on. We never look at anything without words, without reactions. Look.

Now you are all sitting there and you are unfortunately seeing the speaker. And you have already put him into a category. You already have an image about him. You already say he is this, he is that, or he is some kind of idiot or whatever you like to say about him. So you never (noise of train) - he has forgotten to whistle! (Laughter) - so you never look at him as though for the first time. You understand? Have you ever done this kind of thing? Not just for a minute or for an hour or a day, but the freshness of a mind, brain - you understand? - which is not caught in words, reactions, look at everything as though for the first time you are looking at the world. That observation is to watch oneself, never allowing a single thought to escape, without watching it, being aware of it, giving your whole attention to that one thought. And then another thought, keep at it. So that your brain is tremendously attentive. You understand? So that watching is not egocentric movement. Whereas thinking about yourself is egotistic, self-centred activity. It is clear, isn't it?

Now, just a minute. How do we move from this to that? Right? You are asking naturally, you must ask that question. Or am I asking the question and you are accepting it? You understand? Suppose one is self-centred, I am self-centred, egocentric, all my outlook is personal - I am not loved, I must love, you know, all that kind of turmoil, silliness that goes on. I am that, one is that. Then how am I, how is it to move to the other? Right? You are asking that question, aren't you? Is that a right question? Moving from here to there. That is a wrong question obviously. Because if you move from here to there that is the same as this. Vous avez compris? Move! You understand this? If I say I am selfish, now I must not be selfish, I must observe. The "'must' is still in the same category, or the same movement, as thinking about oneself. Right? Are we together in all this? Some of us are I hope at least.

So the question then is answered, not the answer is outside the question, but the answer is in the question. Right? That is observing the question itself, what it reveals. It reveals a tremendous lot. Because you see observing, if I can put it differently, observing, perceiving has not time. The other is caught in time: thinking about myself, I will fulfil one day, I have no roots now but I am going to establish roots some time, I have no identity - you follow? All those are time binding qualities. Time binding quality is essentially the self. I don't know if you want to go into all that. I am finding all this as I talk - right? Whereas watching, if you watch that bird, there is no time in that at all, just watching - right? So the word and thought create time. I won't go into all that. Got it?

2nd QUESTION: In relationship with another memory is there. What is the action of not letting memory intrude? Is it to see its presence as it arises and drop it instantly? Or should one be in a state where memory does not raise its head unless it is necessary. (I will read the question again more slowly)

In relationship with another - please we are listening to the question, not reacting to your relationship. Your wife is sitting next to you, don't react. It is very difficult. (Laughter) It is a rummy world, isn't it? In relationship with another memory is there. What is the action of not letting memory intrude? Is it to see its presence as it arises and drop it instantly? Or should one be in a state where memory does not raise its head unless necessary? Right? Have you got the question?

What is the question? The question is in our relationship with each other, intimate or not, memory is there - right? It is always there because one is living with that person, cooking, sex, washing up (Laughter) the speaker has done a lot of washing up. Wherever he goes he washes up! Except in India, there they won't allow it.

Now the actual state in our relationship with another is the activity of memory. There is no refutation of that. That is so. Right? Do you all agree to that - no? You are not sure. Is not our relationship based on recognition, words, my wife, my husband, what she said this morning, he was moody, you only looked at the newspaper, never looked at me, his concern about his job and so on. That is the memory in operation. Nobody can deny that. What is the action, the questioner asks, of not letting memory intrude.

Memory is there - right? It is not a question of memory intruding - right? The question is put wrongly. That is, there is another conclusion that memory should not intrude in relationship - you follow? You have already come to that conclusion by listening to the speaker and saying, "Yes, quite right, memory should not intrude". Then you say to me, ask the question, "How is it possible?" You have put a wrong question, then you answer it wrongly. Right? Let's get that clear.

We live with memories, not only with regard to our intimate relationship with another but also the long series of memories which we have accumulated through time. The racial memory, the linguistic memory, social memory, legislative memory, the memory of having read books, this whole accumulation of memories from childhood, and the racial memories which has been impressed upon us and so on. So we have memories. We are memories - right? Be clear - let's be clear on this point. We are past and present memories, and also the future memories unless there is something, a catharsis or a crisis and so on arises. So memories of the past, the present and the future is what we are. Traditionally, religiously, socially and so on, class, economics - I won't go into all that, repeat it over and over again - so we are memories. And she adds to that memory, or he adds to that memory, so we are all the time accumulating memories, not that memories intrude. Right? When you say that memories should not intrude, it is another form of memory. Have we understood? Because you have heard the speaker say in relationship knowledge is a danger, knowledge is an impediment, that you have accepted, or you see that, and you say, "Now how am I to prevent that memory intruding?" - but you are a bundle of memories. You don't want that particular memory with your wife or husband, to intrude. There you want a good relationship but elsewhere it doesn't matter - right?

The questioner asks: is it to see it's present, that is the memory arising, and as it arises drop it instantly in relationship? You understand? Have you understood? Come on sirs. Somebody say yes, or no whether you understand it or not. Or should one be in a state where memory does not raise its head unless necessary? It is a very complicated question - right? And requires not a complicated brain but a very simple brain can observe this. I am going to show it to you in a minute.

I am and you are memories, a bundle of memories. Even if you say there is in me, god, light, a sense of spirituality, it is still memory. So I am, the whole structure of the ego, me and all my knowledge is memory. Now I see in my relationship with my wife, or husband, or children or neighbour, these memories are always included. The memory of my wife who said something nasty, or bullied me, or said something pleasant or exciting, it is still I have gathered that memory. Right? So the question is - are you following all this? - the question is why does the brain retain all these memories - right? Would you ask that question? Right sir? Why does the brain retain something pleasant she has told me, and something unpleasant which she said yesterday that also is recorded, both pleasant and unpleasant are recorded, which becomes memory - right? Why does the brain record? That is the question. You understand?

There has been a war, forty years ago, nearly forty years ago, and they write books about it, they are talking about it, they show on the television various exciting scenes about war, the various material for destruction. You know, kept up, keep this going all the time - why? You understand? We will go into it.

So we are asking a much more serious, fundamental question: why does the brain record everything? Why should it record the unpleasant and the pleasant, it is in a state of constant recording? Right? We are agreed to this? This is a fact, not the speaker's invention. Now the question is: it is necessary to record how to drive a car, right? - how to write a letter, to be skilful in using instruments, to have knowledge in dismantling a car and putting it together, which the speaker has done, so it is necessary there. Right? Now why does it record psychologically, inwardly? You have got the question? We are asking this question? Is it necessary to record the pleasant, the unpleasant, the flattery, the insult, the sense of - you know, all the rest of it - is it necessary? Or the psychological recording gives strength, builds up the ego, the me, the personality - you understand? See that. Recording is necessary, otherwise we couldn't do anything in the physical world. If you are a businessman you have to know quite a lot, if you are a banker you have to know a great deal, if you are a surgeon or a doctor, eye specialist, you follow?, or a builder of computers, you must know a great deal. There it is absolutely necessary - right?

Now we are asking inwardly, inside the skin as it were, which is the psyche, the psychological area, why should there be any recording there? Is it an extension of the outer physical necessities into the psychological necessities, is it an extension of that? Is it an extension of that? You understand? Is it a continuity of the outer knowledge, which is necessary, and we say psychologically also it is necessary? We never question it. You understand what I am saying. Are we somewhat together in this? Surely you are not paralysed are you? So, please I am not hypnotizing.

So we are questioning the whole recording process. When I see that what she has said this morning is not important, it is not necessary, she will say something different tomorrow. I will say something to her, something entirely different - right? We both play this game. And what does it matter? Is it necessary? Which means I am building an image about her and she is building an image about me, a picture about me. The picture, the image, the symbol, becomes very strong - right? You know all this, don't you? It becomes tremendously strong. Therefore I say, "She is like that" and she says I am like that and we keep apart, except perhaps in bed. And the division grows wider and wider and wider, and I break or she breaks, and I pursue another woman and start the same old game again there, and she does exactly the same. Right? Do you agree to all this, the much married people?

So this is going on. And we are saying in examining the question, the inevitable question arises: is it possible not to record psychologically? What does it mean? Can this happen? - this mechanical process? It is a mechanical process. The brain has become accustomed to it, it is part of its tradition, it is part of its continuation of sustaining itself as the self - right? So we are asking: is it possible? Record there, where it is absolutely necessary, not to record at all psychologically? Don't you see the beauty of this, for God's sake? Which means first of all see the danger of recording psychologically. I am a Hindu, you are a Christian - right? You are a Buddhist or Tibetan, or belonging to some potty little guru, he may have a lot of money, power, position, but it is still a very potty little affair. So you see all this. So we are asking is it possible not to record inwardly? What is your answer? I have put you a question. You have put me several questions, but I am putting you a question. Is it possible not to record psychologically? Which means not to get hurt, or flattered, it is the same thing. You may say it is possible, or you might say it is not possible. If you say either of those things you are blocking yourself - right? If you say "I can't walk up that mountain", you stop walking. But if you say, "Well I will walk, see what happens", then a totally different action takes place.

So what is your answer? The questioner's answer is this.

Are you aware of anything? Aware of the shape of this tent, how many sections there are in this tent, the printed word of the owner of the tent there, are you aware of all this? The proportions of it, the length of it, not measuring, the length of it, and are you aware of the people sitting around you, the various colours, the faces, different faces, young, old, white haired, black haired, and so on, are you aware of all this? Or you have never looked? If you are not aware then you may not be aware of your own reactions. You may not be aware of your own responses. You may not be aware of your body, because you are terribly intellectual, all living up there. Or you are very romantic. Are you aware of all this? Sentimental, attached and so on. If you are aware, aware, not say, "Well I am aware but I don't like that shirt, it is too blue" - (Laughter) So I was told this morning! (Laughter) So are we aware in that sense, without choosing, a choiceless awareness? Then if you are so choicelessly aware, then you are attentive - you understand?

Choiceless awareness means attention, not cultivated, say, "I must attend". But becoming aware of the trees, the birds, the balloons going up the mountains, the light on the clouds, the evening, the moonlight and so on, watching, watching. Aware of all this and your reaction to all this, and by not responding, not choosing, I like this, I don't like that, it is mine, it is yours - you follow? Just to be aware. From this choiceless awareness there is attention, attending with your eyes, with your ears, with your nerves, with all your being. Then when she says something to me I am fully attentive - right? She says "You are a brute", because I am attentive there is no reaction. You understand? It is only when there is inattention there is reaction. Get it.

Gosh, it takes a long time to tell all this. Have you got it? When there is complete attention there is no recording. But I must completely attend there, in driving a car I must be tremendously attentive. Attention is there and here, attention. But the moment that I am inattentive to what she is saying it is recorded, naturally. You have got it? Will you do it? That is the fun, not just listen to a lot of words, but if one actually puts, you know, not into action, see the truth of it. Then there is no recording. But if you record, if you inattentively record, then you can deal with it instantly. But if you are constantly inattentive, as we are, in our relationship with another, because that is our habit, I have known her for forty years, for God's sake, or ten days. You understand? So the quality of attention, and the quality of inattention, not attending, are two different things. Where there is inattention there is choice, unawareness, lack of attention, then the recording process goes on, the old habit is established. But when there is attention the old habit is broken. Got it?

3rd QUESTION: I understand that inner silence cannot be practised or sought after, but what is the ground on which it may come about? Clear, the question is clear.

The questioner understands that silence cannot be achieved, cannot be practised through meditation - right? Cannot be controlled. I don't know why you accept it but apparently you accept it. But what is the ground in which it may come about?

When you observe something, clouds, the mountain, the river, or the tree, or your wife or your neighbour, this low, uneducated person, can you observe all the phenomenon of life silently? Not say, "Yes, I think so". That is to look, to observe, without the reaction of opinions, because we are full of opinions about everything - right? Why do we have opinions? Go on sirs, tell me why human beings have such deep rooted opinions, or very, very, superficial opinions - I believe - why? My guru is right, better than yours. I am ready to fight. So these opinions, conclusions, concepts, ideals, divide human beings. This is obvious. There is the totalitarian idealisms, and the democratic idealisms - right? They are dividing people, ideals divide people. And the questioner asks: I understand that inner silence cannot be practised. When he uses the word "I understand" what does he mean by understanding? You understand? I am asking you the question: what do you mean by understanding? I understand how this tent is put together, how it is going to be dismantled. I understand the distance between here and Geneva. I understand what someone has said. Right? I understand the internal combustion machine, and so on. Is that understanding intellectual, verbal - right? Is it just understanding because you have said something, I understand the meaning of the words. Or when does real understanding take place? Which is, I see something instantly and that very perception of the truth changes my whole existence. Which is it? Because it is important to understand, important to grasp the significance of the word 'understand'. I understand intellectually something, or I have grasped it emotionally, sentimentally, romantically, imaginatively, and all that. Or I really not only see the depth and the significance of words but also in communication with each other I see the truth of what you are saying. See the truth of it, not conclusion, or the idea of what you are saying, the truth of it, the perfume, the depth, the taste of it. Then that understanding is a revolution. But you say casually, "Oh yes I understand what K is talking about" - which is nonsense. The speaker says I understand inner silence cannot be practised, or sought after. But don't you all seek some kind of inward quietness, some kind of peace sometimes? You are all seeking. Don't say we are not seeking. We are seeking food, comfort, escape from this terrible turmoil one lives in. But to casually say "I understand inner silence cannot be practised or sought after," if you will forgive me, forgive the speaker for saying you really don't understand what you have said. But what is the ground in which it may come about? That is the real question - right?

What is necessary for the state of the brain to be utterly silent? Why do you want to be silent? When you observe, perceive something, if you have no reaction to it, response to it - right? - just observe, that observation itself is silence - right? You understand? Naturally. I am watching you and you are watching me. If I, if the speaker has reactions in watching he is not really responding - right? He is not watching your reactions, your feelings, all the rest of it. And if you are watching the speaker and you have reactions you are not watching him, you are watching your reactions.

Simple.

So the ground in which silence can come about is not through practice, not through determination, not through will or desire, but it comes naturally when there is freedom, freedom from conflict. So you have to understand conflict. Not say, "I must have silence", which is nonsense. So the ground on which natural, clear, beautiful, the immense depth of silence, comes when there is complete freedom. So one should ask not the quality of silence, how it comes about, but can one be free? Free from conflict, free from being hurt, free from fear, anxiety, loneliness - you know, sorrow and all that. Then the house of silence is immense.

It is twelve o'clock. Is that enough for this morning. Or do you want one more question? Am I working, or are you working too? Are we together working, or you are merely listening to a lot of words? If you are really actively co-operating, actively sharing, going to the very end of it, you would be exhausted. But if you are casually, it is like that river making noise, you get used to it. Anyhow although it is twelve, we will do the last one.

What are the demands of society? What are the demands of society? Tell me please. That you go to the office from nine to five, that you go to the factory from nine to five, that you go to the night club after all the boredom of office, there excitement, having a fortnight, or three week's holiday in sunny Spain or Italy? What are the demands of society? That you must earn a livelihood, that you must live in that particular part of the country for the rest of your life, practise there as a lawyer, or as a doctor, or a surgeon, or in the factory as a union leader, and so on and so on? Right?

Therefore one must also ask the question: what is the society that demands so much? What is the society, what is society? Who created the bally thing? Who is responsible for all this? The church, the temple, the mosque - you follow? All the circus that goes on inside it. Who is responsible for all this? Is the society different from you? Or you have created the society, each one of us, through our ambition, through our greed, through our envy, through our violence, through our corruption, through our fear, wanting our security in the community, in the nation, you follow? We have created this society and then blame the society for what it demands. Therefore you ask: can I live in absolute freedom, can I reconcile, that is better, with society and myself seeking freedom? It is such an absurd question. You understand? Sorry, whoever put that question. I am not being rude. Because you are society. If we really see that, not as an idea, or as a concept, or something you must accept. But you, each one of us on this earth for the last forty thousand years, or more, we have created this society in which we live. The stupidity of religions - right? The stupidity of each nation, arming themselves. For God's sake, we have created it because I insist I am an American, or French or Russian. We insist that I am a Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist, and so on, Muslim. It gives us security by calling it, and the search for security is being destroyed by our division. It is so clear, I don't know.

So there is no reconciliation between society and its demands and your demand for freedom. The demand is from your own violence, from your own ugly, limited, selfishness. It is one of the most complex things to find out for oneself where selfishness is, where the ego very, very subtly hides itself. It can hide politically, doing good for the country. It can hide in the religious world most beautifully. "I believe in God, I serve God". Or social help, not that I am against social help, don't jump to that conclusion, it can hide there. It can hide in marriage, in love - right? It requires a very attentive, not analytical, but observing brain to see where the subtleties of the self are hidden - selfishness. Then when there is not, society doesn't exist, you don't have to reconcile to it. It is only the inattentive, the thoughtless, the unaware, that says, "How am I to respond to society when I am working for freedom?" You understand?

If one may point out, we need to be re-educated, not through college, school and university, which also conditions our brain, or when we work in the factory and so on, but educate ourselves by being aware, seeing how we are caught in words and so on. Can we do this? If we cannot do it, we are going to have wars perpetually, we will be weeping perpetually, always in conflict, misery and all the rest of it. The speaker is not optimistic or pessimistic, these are facts. When one lives with facts as they are, as you observe them, not data given by the computers or the poets but watching your own activity, your own egotistic pursuits and so on. Out of that grows marvellous freedom with all this great beauty and strength.

Sorry to have talked so long. May I get up please?

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 24TH JULY 1984

Again there have been probably a hundred and fifty questions, or more. You can't answer them all. Probably it would take a couple of months and I am sure you wouldn't like to sit here for another month.

I wonder - one wonders if there is a final question at all, one question that will answer all questions. We haven't thought about it, I have just thought about it, just now. Is there a question, or an enquiry, not an experience, because experiences are always limited, and experiences are conditioned by one's own desires, intentions and limitations. So one cannot possibly rely on experiences, they are the most doubtful things in the world, even this so-called spiritual experience. I am sure most of you want that kind of experience that will sustain one, give one energy and so on. But every experience, however deep, however wide or intricate, such experiences are limited because there is always an experiencer who is experiencing - right? And the experiencer is the past, past memories, his background, and according to that background the experiencer recognizes the experience and lives with it, hoping he will have a greater experience. But the greater experience, or the wider, deeper, is still always limited because there is the experiencer.

Now the question arises, which I am putting to you, whether there is anything to experience at all? Except biological, sexual experiences, and so on, apart from those physical reactions and so on, is there any experience at all? Why do we want experiences?

Please, as we said, we are enquiring into this together, not the speaker is saying something and you either reject or accept, or pass it by. But if we could examine this very interesting question: is there, apart from the ordinary biological experiences and so on, is there any necessity of experience at all? Experiences apparently keep one awake. Experiences, or problems are something thrown at you, especially the meaning of that word 'problem' is something projected at you. That is a problem, the meaning, the root meaning of that word. And experience also means to go through, not hold on to what you have gone through.

So does the brain need problems to keep it awake, challenges, crises, shocks, does it need these things to keep it awake? Because we live such a superficial life, and we are satisfied by it, most of us at least. And by all the education and so on we become rather mechanical and lazy, indolent. And to keep us awake we feel problems, pressures and so on are needed to keep the brain alert - right? Can the brain be alert, extremely watchful, without any drugs, problems, challenges, shocks? Have we ever enquired into this at all? Or we are so eager to have something more, something better, measuring always, which makes the mind still more dull. It is a dull mind asking for more - right? We are not being cynical please, but if we could enquire into something and find out whether the brain, which has been conditioned for millenia upon millenia, conditioned through various accidents, incidents, pressures, propaganda, programmed, can that brain be naturally, without any effort, fully awake? To find that out one must reject totally all experiences, except the experiences, physical experiences, psychological experiences must be totally rejected. And so not depend, not depend on pressures, impressions, stimulations. You are being now, by the speaker, stimulated, unfortunately. He will act as a drug, like coffee, tea or stronger drugs, alcohol and so on. If one depends on these things as a stimulant to keep the brain alert, then you are merely sustaining the mechanical process. And the brain has become for most of us mechanical, repetitive.

So to live a life without a single challenge, which doesn't mean it goes to sleep, without a single demand, both outwardly or inwardly so that the brain is extraordinarily active. Action is not movement. I wonder if you see this? May I go into it a little bit? Interested in it?

Action is not movement. Movement implies time - right? To go from here to there and so on. Any kind of movement is in the realm of time and thought - right? All movement, both physical and psychological, all thought is contained in the field of time. Right? And action is not of time. Action is not having done and the remembrance of the things that have been done, or experience or problems solved, which is all the background which is time, or the future is also time. Therefore action is instant, the very living of it immediate, instant. Are we conveying something?

So we are talking over together the question of a brain that has been so spoilt, so shocked, so wounded. Any shock is a wound, or any hurt. To have such a brain which is not capable of being hurt, psychologically, you may receive a shock when you fall down the staircase, that is a different matter, I hope you won't fall down the staircase. But the shock that one receives over bad news, or suddenly the doctor says, "Old chap you have got cancer". Or the shock of someone leaving you. All those kinds of shocks, wounding naturally the brain so that it is constantly in a strain. But to have a mind which is untouchable by circumstances - you understand? Such a brain is something extraordinary. That's part of meditation, not all the silly stuff that is going on.

So we have asked: is there a question which would answer all questions, only one question. We have answered it. Right?

1st QUESTION: Your statement that art is merely the product of thought and therefore not creation has troubled many artists, poets, musicians, including us who are here, and who think that they are creators. Cannot creation include the activity of thought? Right? The question is clear.

The speaker has said that thought, with all the nature of thought, can never be creative. And thought which is the expression also of an artist, poet, musicians and all of us included, thought is always limited. Right? So first we must enquire into what is thought, why it is limited, whether it is expressed by the greatest poet in the world, or the greatest artist, or the artist who is just beginning. I hope the artist is always beginning, not achieving. I think it was Goya, or Valesquez, I have forgotten who, one of those, said, "I am always learning" - Goya? Bene! He was ninety two when he said that, and still learning.

So we have to enquire into several things: first of all what is creation? Creation, how the world has come into being, that is part of creation. And we ought also to enquire into thought, and the art of living, which is far the greatest art, the supreme art, and the art of painting, the art of music, the art of speech. And why do we give such extraordinary importance to artists? The other day a picture was sold for ten million dollars - it was probably a very good investment! So we have to enquire into all this, not just condemn, or say why do you say that?

So first let's enquire what is the art of living? Why do you say that is the greatest art, greater than any other art in the world, from the marvellous carpenter who puts a cabinet together, and the great artists, Leonardo de Vinci and so on, great classical artists, and the great poets; and those of us who are not so-called artists, but we may have the sensitivity to look at the mountains, sensitivity to someone suffering, sensitivity to nature, to look at a tree. There is a marvellous tree on the road, single, whole, one great trunk, with many, many branches, full of foliage, fluttering in the wind. When you look at that beauty, or the beauty of a cloud, with sunlight on it, we have to also enquire then what is beauty - right?

So this question implies a great many things, not just one thing. What is beauty, apart from the physical form, clean cut face, healthy, full of sparkling eyes and smile and sense of dignity? There is the beauty of a mountain, of a tree, or the running waters. When does one see such great beauty? You may go to all the museums of the world, and the speaker has visited many, many museums and everybody says "What a marvellous picture that is, how beautifully proportioned, the colours, the shape, the grouping," and all the rest of it. So we use the word 'beauty' in so many ways. Beauty salon! And so on. What is, if you really enquire into it, what is beauty? Does beauty lie in the eye, in the heart, or in the mind? Or there is beauty when the self, the ego is not? You understand? The ego with all its problems, with all its travails, all its confusion, uncertainty, misery, happiness, you know, that is the self. And when that self, says, "How beautiful it is" it has very little meaning. Perhaps you have heard of the Grand Canyon in Arizona, the most extraordinary Canyon it is, miles of it, a river cutting through it. It is really a most extraordinary sight. And somebody has said in a book, in the hotel book, "I have seen this glorious sight and I am glad I am going to have tea."

So is it possible to look at something, the tree, the mountain, the valley, your wife or your husband, or something without the self, without you coming between that and your perception? You understand? Is it possible to appreciate that sense of great beauty? And that beauty cannot possibly exist when the self is there. You may be a great artist, in the modern sense of that word too, and be tremendously egocentric, tremendously ambitious, grabbing money - right? And painting the extraordinary picture. And we call that a great artist.

So we have to ask what is the art of living? - which is the greatest art on earth because we have never - the great poets, the great sculptures, Michelangelo, and all the rest of them, have they understood - I am not belittling them, or being disrespectful to them, or to you who are here as artists, poets, musicians. Can one discover first the art of living and then everything you do is art. And what is the art of living?

I believe the word 'art' means giving the right proportions to life, giving, placing all the things in life in their order, not exaggerating any one thing. And to find out the art of living requires tremendous, not only intellectual capacity but also great sensitivity. The art of living can only come when there is total freedom, freedom from all our petty little worries, all our intentions, all our problems, fears and when there is this extraordinary sense of wholeness. That is, when you are nothing. Nothingness is wholeness. I wonder if you understand all this. Because we are always wanting to be something. If you are a clerk you want to become the manager, or if you are a scientist you want to explore more and more and more, and fame, publicity, you know all the rest of it, research. Research into biology, not research into your own mind, your own being. That doesn't count in the world. That is of no importance. But to be a scientist exploring into the atom is given tremendous importance.

So can we find out for ourselves the art of living? To go into that we must find out the nature of thought. Thought is born of knowledge - right? - as memory. Thought is memory, knowledge, experience. If there is no experience, no knowledge, no memory, there is no thinking. You may have a feeling but it is not active thinking. And our thinking in any direction, horizontal or vertical, linear or whole, is still limited because knowledge is always limited whether now or in the future. Is that clear? That is so, it is not what the speaker is saying, asserting, it is a fact because all our experiences are limited. When it is limited there is a demand for the more, more knowledge. And we see that knowledge, though some of the biologists and scientists say through knowledge man ascends - you must have heard them. Man ascends through knowledge, probably physically - you understand? They are building greater houses, better houses, better heating, better roads, better communication, better ways of killing man and so on and so on. So thought being limited has created this world, this society in which we live. Obviously. Thought has created all the rituals and all the religious organizations. Thought has created the gods out of fear, out of the desire for comfort, security. Thought is a material process because - you understand - it is contained in the brain. The brain - the speaker is not an expert on brains, but he has watched how one's own brain works, its reactions, its rhythm, and so on, I won't go into all that. So thought whatever it does is limited. And being limited it can invent, invent new ways of building a cycle, better ways, invent new combustion, internal combustion machinery and so on - you know, the jet and so on. It can invent everything but invention is not creation - right? One may write a beautiful poem, and feel that is my creation but it is still within the area of thought - right? Bound to be. If one writes a poem however magnificent, however beautiful, however the depth and the rhythm of the words and all that, it is still, the feeling may be different, but the expression of it, is still within the field of thought.

And so whatever thought does is limited. And inventions are limited. One invents something and somebody comes along and invents the same thing much better and so on and so on and so on. So what is creation? This has been a question that has been asked by the ancient Hindus, the later Greeks, and we say "God has created all this" - that is a very convenient way out of things. But if one asks for oneself, putting all these assertions aside, what is creation? Can it be born out of knowledge, and therefore creation is limited? Or creation is something beyond all knowledge, it has nothing whatsoever to do with knowledge. You understand? If you go into this very seriously to find out, not I find out and tell you, but find out for oneself, as it has nothing whatsoever to do with thought, with memory, with knowledge, with experience. We will put all that, use one word to convey all that, knowledge. As we said knowledge is always limited, now or in the future. And creation must be something limitless. Not I create a poem, that is a misuse of that word, if one may point out. We are not belittling the artist, or the painter, or the etc. but we are enquiring very, very deeply into this question to find out that which is not created by thought, the immensity of the universe. One can look at the universe through a telescope, see the various gases and so on, but the enormity of creation, the thing that is not measurable by words, we measure everything by words, to be free of knowledge - you understand? - and yet have knowledge in its place. To find that out. whether the brain can ever be free from knowledge and the word, but yet keep knowledge in its place - you understand? Driving, talking, writing a letter, various forms of skills and disciplines, there knowledge is absolutely necessary, otherwise you and I, the speaker wouldn't be sitting here. But the sense of immensity, the sense of that creation which is not measurable by thought, and therefore creation is something that has no relationship with knowledge.

2nd QUESTION: I would like to cry out for help but how can one be helped, in quotes, to freedom.

Sir, there are moments and days, periods, when we want to be helped. We want to be helped when we go to a doctor, we want to be helped when we have a disease, when we have been troubled by asking, by talking over with somebody. We are always in the world whether here or in Asia, or different parts of the world, we are always wanting to be helped - right? And there are those who give you help, the priest, the vicar in the local village, the pope, those gurus who say, "I'll help you". There are all those people in the world who are trying to help others because people are wanting help. This is apparently a natural response to all their travail and to their misery, unhappiness. Probably most of you, if one may most respectfully point out, you are all perhaps wanting to be helped - perhaps. Some may not. And why do you want to be helped? Who is to help one? This is really quite a serious problem. We have been helped by leaders - quotes leaders - helped by priests, by psychologists, by therapists, by various literature - right? The craving, the human craving, this crying to be helped. Why? This has been going on, not only during our life time, this has been going on from the beginning of man, wanting to be helped. Or wanting, not only from another, helped by another, but also praying to God, to some symbol, to something, crying out to be helped. And this we have been doing for thousands and thousands of years - political leaders, social leaders and so on, gurus with their absurdity. All this has been going on. And we have not been helped - right? To be helped means to become strong, not depend on anybody, to see things objectively, very clearly, not personally. And because we are rather indolent we are so easily satisfied. For most of us are discontent. Discontentment is like a flame, we want to smother it. We don't keep that flame alive, because it is too troublesome, it might bring about destruction - not destruction, revolutionary physical destruction, but the destruction of one's own pettiness, one's own uncertainties and so on. So we want to be helped. And there are people who are helping us, therefore they are keeping us permanently in a state of not being able to help ourselves - right? Is it possible not to look to another? Not to look to books, to nothing because what you are is the result of being helped? If you say to yourself, "I am going to understand myself, I am going to watch myself, see exactly what I am." - not get depressed seeing what you are, or elated, but just to observe. And this observation is very simple, if you really want it. You are not seeking help from anybody, therefore you have to rely entirely on yourself, which means tremendous responsibility. And we don't want to be responsible. This is one of the things that is happening in the world, you are becoming less and less responsible because we say the politicians will see to it, the economists will see to it, if we are troubled the psychologists, the therapists and all the rest of it.

But to have the ever flowing living, the depth and the understanding of this movement called the self, which can be perceived very clearly in the mirror of relationship - right? You are following? You can see yourself very clearly with your wife and in that relationship. Everyday action, every thought, every feeling, not letting one thought escape, watch it, then you have immense strength, then you don't rely on anybody because you are totally responsible for yourself, for your actions. And that demands a great deal of energy, not wasting energy, chattering, chattering, chattering. You follow? All that. And very few will do all this, unfortunately, because we are all rather slack. Forgive the speaker if he uses that word 'slack'.

And so the responsibility is on others, not for oneself. And if you ask for help you are making yourself more and more feeble. If you have a headache - and I am afraid most people have some kind of neuralgia and so on - you take immediately a pill. But one doesn't go into why it comes, what is the nature of it, why - find out, work for it. You understand? See that it doesn't happen. You may be eating wrongly, etc. etc. We never go to the cause of things. Where there is a cause there is an end to it. You understand me? One drinks a tremendous lot, and next morning you have a hang-over, headache, and to overcome that headache you take a pill, and the next day you carry on - you follow? This is the way we live. A highly sophisticated world we live in and therefore to ask for help is to make oneself more feeble, more irresponsible, more dependent. Whereas if you are totally responsible for yourself, for everything that you do, or that you have promised to do, never find an excuse, you understand? So that you stand on your own feet and dignity and responsibility.

3rd QUESTION: How can we educate our children to be intelligent and both free and responsible human beings in today's world?

Do you want to go into all this? Apparently this is a question that is asked by every parent in the world. Children, and how can we help them to be intelligent and free and responsible human beings in today's world? Are the parents intelligent and free? Are the teachers intelligent and free and responsible? Is the society, the educational system helping them to be free and responsible and intelligent? So we have to enquire, if you will, why are we being educated in mathematics, and biology, science, chemistry, history, all the things that one has to learn? And go through university, college, with a degree and get a good job - at least one hopes so, not in this world where there is an immense increase of population, unemployment. So if one had a son or a daughter - if the speaker had a son and a daughter, what is going to happen to them? School, where they have to learn how to write and read and mug up all the subjects, which then becomes a tremendous problem - you understand? You must go through mathematics - one doesn't like it but you must, if you want to be a good engineer. And so that becomes a problem. And the society says, "Become an engineer and we will pay you more" - you understand?

So we have to find out what do we mean by the word 'education'. And is it merely to learn the technique of living, acquiring a skill in a particular discipline? You understand? To become a doctor you have to work, study for ten or fifteen years. To become an excellent surgeon - you follow? - it takes time. And so on and so on. Is this what we are educating our children for? - though it is necessary, you understand? And education also, does it not mean educating the human being - you understand? - not acquiring mere techniques, a skill, but educating a human being to live with great art? That means not only technological knowledge - right? - but also the immense limitless field of the psyche, going beyond it, that is a holistic education - you understand?

So all this implies the educator needs education. The parents need education, not just the children. And if the parents love their children - love, not hold them as toys and you know, all that kind of stuff, if they really loved them would they allow their children to be killed, or to kill? You understand sirs? Governments demand - perhaps not in America or in England, but in this country, in France, in Europe, you have to go into the army for two years, how to carry a gun, how to shoot, how to kill another human being. And this, the mothers, the fathers, accept it, and they say, "We can't do anything, the governments demand this" - please, I am not advocating that you revolt against the government, it's up to you.

So education means a holistic approach to life, cultivating the brain technologically - you understand? - and also cultivating the brain to be free of its own petty little self. That requires teachers who understand this, who are committed, who are responsible. And the parents, they must love their children. Now what happens they cuddle them, they hold them on their lap, they kiss them till they are two, five and after that they throw them to the winds - right? And this is called education. How can there be intelligence when your brain is being conditioned - you understand? Conditioned by knowledge on one side, conditioned by your own fears, anxieties, loneliness, despair, all the rest of the ugliness of human beings. And then on top of that there are the temples, churches, mosques. So religion is something entirely different, away, which has nothing to do with your life, and committed entirely to earning a livelihood - you understand? This is becoming more and more serious, this dichotomy, this separation. And education is something where there must be respect, love, affection in all this.

So will the parents, the teachers, and the students agree to all this? You are responsible for this. You are responsible, if you are a parent, what your children are going to be. One heard a parent saying, "Must I sacrifice my life - which is drinking, taking drugs, sleeping with women and so on - for my stupid little children?" You understand what I am saying? And so the world goes on this way and it has been going on for millenia, because we as parents, as human beings, do not want to live a holistic, a complete life. We are fragmented, therefore we accept that fragmentation. In that fragmentation there is no intelligence, there is no compassion,

The last question.

4th QUESTION: What is your relationship to us? (Laughter)

Will you answer that question? What is your relationship with the speaker? If you have put that question, and the speaker is putting you that question: what is your relationship with the speaker, not what is my relationship with you - you understand? I am reversing the question. I will answer the question after: what is the speaker's relationship with you - it will be answered a little later, but you have to ask first what is your relationship with the speaker? That means, why are you here? What is your intention? What is it you want? Are you here to be stimulated? To identify with a large group? To find out the truth of what the speaker is saying? Or just accept it, casually for an hour or so, and then go on in your ways as before? Or you are attracted, physically to the speaker? And the speaker has been saying this is not a personality cult at all, the person doesn't matter. What matters is what he is saying: doubt, question, ask.

To put the question differently: what is the relationship between light and darkness? What is the relationship between conflict and no conflict? What is the relationship between peace and war? You understand this question? That means, what is the relationship between the good and the bad? Is the good the outcome of the bad? Please we are working together. Is the good the outcome of the bad? Or is the good totally divorced from the bad? If the bad is related to the good then it is not good - right? If it is related, if good has its roots in the bad then it's partially good, therefore it is not good - right? So one has to discover for oneself the good is totally free from the bad, totally divorced, nothing to do with each other. Violence and to be free of violence. Human beings are violent, unfortunately. One can biologically trace it to the origin of violence, derived from the animals and so on - we won't go into all that. That is, human beings are violent and they have thought out not to be violent - right? So they are violent, they have created the opposite which they call non-violence, so the non-violence is related to violence, therefore it is not free from violence - you understand? Are we working together? So the good is totally unrelated to the bad. Love and hate, if one knows hates, antagonism, like, dislike, jealousy - right? - and then says, "I love" - right? - then that love is still related to hate - right? - still related to like and dislike, and antagonism and all the rest of it.

So we are asking ourselves what is our relationship with each other. What is the relationship of a man who is free and the man who lives in a prison? You understand? We live in prison - not actual prisons with guards and you know, all that, but we have our own prisons, we make our own prisons and we live in them - right? And someone who is outside that - what is the man who lives in the prison to the man who is outside it? You understand my question? Has he any relationship to you, to the man in prison? Or the man in prison - you understand what the speaker means by prison, our fears, our anxieties, our thought, our loneliness, all the things that human beings have, that is our prison, our gods, our faith, our dogmatic or superficial opinions and so on, that is our prison. And the man is not in that prison, what is the relationship with the man in that prison and the man who is outside the prison? Has the man in the prison any relationship with the man outside it? Naturally not. But the man outside it has a relationship with the man in prison. Have you understood?

I am in prison, suppose. And you are outside the prison. I have no relationship to you. I would like to have a relationship but I am still encaged. But you have a relationship to me - right? Because you are intelligent and all the rest of it. You love, compassion, you are intelligent, you are utterly responsible out there.

So, you understand? First we create god by thought, omnipotent, all merciful, all powerful, all seeing, all bla bla bla. And we say there is that and I will pray to be part of it. You understand? The same business. I am in prison, there you are free. And I pray to you. See the tricks I am playing. I am praying to something I have created - I have put together, not created, sorry. Put together by thought, the image, the structure, the symbol, the saviour, the guru, all the rest of it. You understand? And so on. We always want relationship with something totally outside of us - right? Something immense. And the immensity has relation to us but we have no relationship to that. If we recognize that, see the truth of it, then we will break the prison at any cost. If we see that, our brain becomes subtle, quick, we are really caught in a prison. And a man in prison is suffocating, crying, hoping, trying to get at that to be free. And he prays to that, being in prison. What value has it? You understand? It is like those people, monks and nuns the world over, praying for peace - right? And the other side, the world is preparing, gathering armaments. Yes sir, you understand the absurdity of all this?

So there is a relationship with another only when both of us are free - right? But one is in prison and the other is not, then we are in trouble. Then we waste our energy trying to be related to that. Either one is free or one is not. And to recognize the depth of that freedom, the beauty of it, to see the immensity of that freedom there must be no self, no ego hiding in different spaces, different parts of the recesses of one's brain. Right?

We have finished for this morning. May we get up please?

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 26TH JULY 1984

This is the last meeting here. We have been handed over many, many questions and some of them we are going to answer this morning. But before we go into that how can one live in this world, in the modern world, which is becoming more and more complex and dangerous, how can one live totally honestly? What is honesty? Not honesty as some preconception, to some ideological concept, or to some fanciful imaginative, romantic, sentimental perception, but rather not to have any illusions. No illusions whatsoever. The word 'illusion' - we looked it up carefully in the dictionary - comes from the word, root word ludere, to play. We play with illusions, which have nothing whatsoever to do with our daily life. Perhaps the more imaginative one is, the more romantic and so on, and cannot possibly face this modern world, which is fairly corrupt, and if one can use the word, immoral, where money and power play an immense part, how can one live now, every day, with total honesty?

One wonders if each one of us has asked this question: to live totally an honest true life. To go into that a little bit - there are many questions before you can - what is integrity? Integrity is related to honesty. Integrity is the quality of a brain or one's existence which is whole, holistic, not fragmented. Our lives are fragmented. (There are two young people in front of me, rather serious.) Integrity, not something that one has conceived to be true, conceived, thought out to be true and live according to that. That is a form of a way of living which is fragmented because thought has invented a concept, an ideal, something according to which one lives, which then brings about fragmentation. One conceives something to be true, logical, sane, conceives the idea, and tries to live up to that - right? That naturally brings fragmentation, a break. You have conceived something to be true, imagined, experienced, and one tries to live according to that, which has nothing to do with actual fact. And so there is always this fragment, fragmentation going on in our lives. And that partly brings about dishonesty. The idealist is really quite a dishonest man. Forgive me for saying this. Because he is living according to a preconceived way of life. "I must live according to that pattern" - which is nothing to do with daily life and so there is conflict. That breeds hypocrisy. So is it possible to live in this world with total honesty, integrity, a sense of doing the right inwardly, not externally but first inwardly, to see that one's behaviour, one's conduct, one's way of thinking is completely free of illusions, not dependent on some fanciful concept or on persons and so on. That requires tremendous integrity. So that one never says anything that is not true to yourself. What is true to oneself is rather difficult too because one may say, "It is my opinion and that is true." And if one lives according to one's opinions and therefore come into conflict with other people who have also strong opinions, there is a battle going on - right? These are all daily facts. And is it possible to have such clarity, to see things exactly as they are, not according to one's wishes and desires and all the rest of that business, but to have such a clear, logical sane, brain, that is not persuaded by personal desires, motives and dependence?

And it demands we should also go into very briefly, which we talked about the other day, time. May we go into it a little bit? We are friends now after ten days, no, three weeks, we are friends now so we can talk together quite easily, casually and with great sense of humour and a sense of friendship, so that we can both of us look at things together. As we were saying the other day time is the past, all the memories that one has accumulated, all the experiences and so on, which is the background. That background is operating now, as you sit there. We are sitting there here, and when you listen to the words you translate those words into a certain meaning, and that meaning depends on your past knowledge and so on. So the present contains the past. There is no question about that. That is sane. And also the future, the tomorrow, is contained in the now. Which is the future is part of the past - right? Together? Are we together? The past, modified in the present, proceeds tomorrow, which is the future. So tomorrow is now. I am - one is angry for whatever reasons, if that anger is not understood, put an end to, I will be angry tomorrow again. Or perhaps not tomorrow, next week. So the future contains in the now - right? Is this clear? So the now contains all time. Right? Are we together in this a little bit? The future, the past and the present is now. And the now is both time and thought - right? Thought, which is memory stored up as knowledge and so on, which is the past, knowledge is always the past, and that past passes through the present, incidents, pressures, modifies itself and goes on. So the past is the future and the future is now - right? And can one understand this whole process, this movement? It is a movement, isn't it? From the past, through the present to the future is a constant movement, a cycle. And that cycle is our life. And can one remain - please we were thinking about it early this morning, looking at it - can one remain in the now, which is all time, without any movement? You understand? Movement is time - right? To go from here, there, or to learn a language, it requires time. Any movement in any direction, horizontal, vertical and so on, or symmetrical, is time, any movement. And to have this sense of living totally in the now, without any movement, either of thought or of action - you understand all this? To see that time, thought is contained in the now, and that any movement away from it is caught again in time and thought. I don't know if you follow all this.

So integrity, honesty, and a sense of wholeness is a quality of brain in which there is no movement except the brain has its own rhythm. This is all Greek probably. This is very serious this because we are always acting, going round and round and round in circles. We never break the circle. And this constantly going round and round not only makes the brain quite dull but also it breeds a mechanical way of life. And a mechanical way of life is not honest, it is repetitive. So to find out what is the deep abiding, unshakable honesty, which is integrity, a wholeness, is to discover a state of brain in which there is no movement at all. This, of course, is part of meditation, which we have talked about, which we won't go into this morning.

And that non-movement has its own action in life, because to us action is doing something, achieving something, fulfilling something, in something, which is a movement from the centre to the periphery. I don't know if you follow all this. And that is what we are used to. And where there is no movement there is a wholeness, and from that wholeness there is action which can never bring about conflict. Right? I don't know if you understand all this. I wish you would. Not that I am helping you, which would be terrible but if we could work together, see this thing, it will radically bring about fundamental change. For the brain has become so conditioned, so small, it has lost its infinite capacity because the brain has infinite capacity. Look what the technological world are doing, what extraordinary capacity has gone into it - computers, submarines, aeroplanes, you know, extraordinary things they are doing. And as the brain has that tremendous capacity in one direction, the brain is not exercising itself in another direction, which is inwardly. You understand? And when both externally and inwardly, both of them operating together there is something tremendous.

1st QUESTION: How can one come to this tent without a motive, a desire to come here, to listen to you, I must have a motive to come here. How does one live without motives?

Why do you want to be without motives? Who told us that we mustn't have motives? If you have heard the speaker say motives are very destructive, then you are merely repeating what he has said. But if we could together find out what is motive, what is the significance of motives, why we have motives, not say we mustn't have it. But if you discover its meaning then we can have them or not have them. But if you say that the speaker has said one mustn't have motives and therefore how am I to live without motives, that is a wrong question altogether.

So let's find out together what is a motive, why we have motives. Why? We are not saying we must not have them: we are saying why do we have them? The meaning of that word 'motive' means motion, to move. That is to make us move. One comes to this tent with a motive, obviously. That is, the motive is to listen to somebody. And so you come. But you have never questioned what is your motive, why you have that motive, why you have that desire. And if you are not clear about desire and motive, then you have to enquire what is my intention in coming here. Either to be helped - we all want to be helped, it is all our pain, anxiety, misery, all the terrible things we live with. And unless we go into it rather deeply, together, I am not - together, then you will have all the time motives. A motive is a direction - right? I have a motive to come here, my motive is to - for various reasons. Which is what? I have already set - the brain has set a direction - right? To understand this man, or to say, "Oh, he is a stupid man, he doesn't know what he is talking about." To criticize, to accept, to obey, to contradict, all that is occupying your mind - the brain, therefore you are not listening - right? Listening is an art, as we talked about it the other day. To listen to somebody with all your being, not to interpret what he says. But if you listen, that is the greatest miracle. Whereas if you have a motive you can't listen - right? Simple as that.

And if one has a desire, which is part of the motive, why are we slave to desire? You see we don't enquire. We accept I have a desire to come here. We don't say, "Why have I desire? What is desire?" - you understand? Drive, push, enquire, doubt. What is desire? We talked about it the other day. We will go into it briefly.

Desire is born out of sensation - right? I want to come to this tent because I will meet my friends, I haven't seen them for a year. It is a good opportunity for me to meet them, and I would also listen to K and also mountains, scenery, I will have a good time. And the talks will be thrown in! (Laughter) That is part of our desire. Desire is, is it not - no, I won't tell you. What is desire? Not that we are saying that we shouldn't have desire, or suppress desire, or encourage desire, desire to fulfil, desire to become something, outwardly and inwardly. So desire, what is desire? To go into that one must ask: what is sensation? Right? How does sensation arise? - right? Through seeing something, a beautiful chalet, nice bathrooms and all the rest of it, and a lovely view, the view, the chalet brings - seeing it brings a sensation. That's natural. And also then thought says, "I wish I owned that chalet" - right? Which is what? Thought giving shape to sensation. Thought giving an image of yourself in that house. Clear? Right? At that moment when thought brings the image about you in that house, at that second desire is born. Right? Clear? Are we - right? So desire is given shape - no, sensation - thought gives sensation to desire. Thought creating the image, you in the car, you owning that picture, or seeing a beautiful man, woman and so on, then thought creates the image out of that sensation, at that second desire moves, is born. This is quite simple if you see this. It doesn't require tremendous brains.

And then the question is: can sensation and thought with its image of sensation be kept apart for a while? You understand? Not immediately take shape. You have understood?

There is a chalet the other day I saw - one saw, at Gstaad, very nice, beautiful, oval, modernized inside and everything as it should be. You looked at it. You live in a flat in one of the big cities and you say, "My God, I wish I had that chalet" - I am not wishing personally, but one wishes. And desire then works to achieve that chalet, buy that chalet, or becomes envious - you know all the process that goes on - right? Now the seeing that chalet is a sensation - right? Seeing the good taps, the bath tubs, the showers, the dining room, you know the whole modern kitchen, and you don't have to wash dishes, you put it - you know, all that goes on. Then thought comes and says, "I wish I could live there". "Or rent it out, I can get a lot more money, specially in the winter!" (Laughter) All that is instantaneous - you understand? There is no interval between sensation and thought giving shape to that sensation - right? Now is it possible to keep them apart for a while? You understand? That requires great attention to see sensation and thought immediately taking, giving a shape to it. And to watch thought, the quickness of thought, and to slow down that thought. You understand? So that the slowing down and the sensation, if one watches it carefully, desire has its place - right? Well, I have gone into it.

Now we have motives. Motives to get rich, motives to be happy, motives to fulfil, desire to have one's roots, to identify oneself with something. This is the everyday business of one's life. And the motive is always changing. Therefore motive gives shape to our life - right? Desire. Desire, motive and so on. So the past - see this - so the past is giving shape to our life - right? The motive is the past. You understand? So the past, which is the motive, which is giving a direction, is giving the mould of our life. Right? Therefore we are the past. Clear? Of course. The past is memory - right? Which is tradition, all the rest of it. So we are the past. We are memories. A whole series of memories, a bundle of memories, and that is the self, the ego, conscious and the other thing is unconscious. There is no unconscious, there is only total consciousness, not breaking it up, as unconscious and conscious. I won't go into that.

So to break this cycle is to understand time. You understand? - which we went into. But as we have motives, which has almost become normal in our life, how can one live without a motive? And we have accepted motives. We never question our motives, or invent new motives, or justify one's own motives. You understand? But we never say go into this whole question of desire, motive and fulfilment - right? So that brings us to the point, can one listen so completely to another, not interpret what the other fellow is saying, or the woman, but to listen so completely, not only hearing with the ear, but also hearing with the inner ear, as it were so that you are giving total attention. Where there is attention you don't have to have motive - right?

2nd QUESTION: To begin with most of us must consciously be attentive, but does this attention become a constant spontaneous state of action?

There is a desire there, motive. You understand? You see this? How can I maintain this attention constantly? Continuously. That means you have already a motive - right? So let's enquire: what is attention?

And also what is not being attentive, inattention - right? Inattention and attention. What is attention? What is the relationship of attention to awareness? Right? You understand? We are aware of the tent, of the people and so on. In that awareness, which is to see the whole thing, as you enter in the tent you see.

And in that attention, in that awareness there is choice. Are there my friends there, I don't know those people there. I wave to the friends and I don't to the others. And in that awareness I say, "That is a nice shirt, and that is a rather ugly one. He has got a rather nice face, and she looks quite nice and intelligent. I am surprised she is here" (Laughter) It is quite funny. (Laughter) So in that awareness there is choice - right? There is choice. They are there and here. So that choice prevents total awareness. Can one be aware without choice? You understand? You do it now as we are talking. Please don't look at me but watch yourself and see if you can be aware without any choice. You have to choose between good material and bad material - right? You have to choose between a good car and a bad car, second hand car and so on and so on. We won't go into that. You have to choose. But in awareness can one be free of choice altogether? Just to be aware and not say, "I don't like this shirt, I do like that shirt, he is nice to me" - you follow? All that activity going on. To be so completely aware without choice is attention - right? Is that clear? Are we together in this? We are together in this only if you do it. If you are completely aware that you choose, that you have like and dislike, that you have motive, and see how these motives, like and dislike, my friend and not my friend, you know all that thing that goes on, then you are not aware fully. You are aware fully when you have no choice naturally - right? That state of awareness is attention - right? That state of attention has no me in the middle of it. Clear? Choice always has a centre from which you choose - right? That is the ego, the me, the self, and all that. Whereas if you observe and be aware without choice, that awareness expands to total attention. In that attention there is no self, there is no me, I like, don't like - you follow? All that business.

So, now what is inattention? Is inattention distraction? You understand? We are distracted by the noise, by the train, by, you know various forms of distractions. Why do we call it distractions? You are following all this? Are we together in this? Why do we call it distraction? Because I don't want to be distracted from this, from what I am doing - right? Where the doing is attention? And if I become, if there is attention where there is inattention, the inattention is attention. Oh lordy! Why do we call it inattention? I don't think there is such a thing as inattention, or distraction. There is only complete attention or not attention. That's all. Right? I would not, personally we wouldn't say there is any distraction. There is a train going by, I am aware of it. And there is no choice, I want to listen to that man - you understand? I am just listening to that sound. So there is only attention, and why shouldn't there be inattention, what is wrong? We are working all day and we sleep at night - right? Would you call sleeping inattention? You understand? One goes for a walk, looks at all the trees, the mountains, the perfume on a sunny day of the pines, and the running river, the sound of it, that is all attention, if you are attentive. And why should there be no attention, you take a relax - you follow? We want to be something all the time. We want to have a continuity of something, which we think is right. And therefore that which has continuity is not right. Right? I wonder if you understand this? Are we together in this? We want a continuity, don't we? Continuity of happiness, continuity of relationship, continuity of so many, many things, which is what?

Continuity of memory - right? And if there is no continuity we feel lost, we feel empty. Why shouldn't we be empty for a while? Why shouldn't we be nothing? Even for a few minutes. But to us that is frightening because we know continuity - right? So attention has no continuity. There is only attention. One doesn't say, "I must be continuously attentive" - then it is a mechanical process. Attention is something living, not a conclusion that I must be attentive. That becomes too childish - right?

3rd QUESTION: Could you tell us something more about this vast intelligence of which you speak? Is it an untapped capacity within the brain, or is it some disembodied force to which we may become open?

Lovely question, isn't it?

There is ordinary intelligence, isn't there? You wouldn't be sitting here if you hadn't intelligence, would you? You took a train, you walked, you went by a car, you went by a bus and so on, which is the exercise of intelligence to come here because you wanted to come. Or it is intelligence to write a good letter. It is intelligence to put the computer together. It is intelligence that has put man on the moon. And it is not intelligence that puts a flag up there!

(Laughter) Right? And it is intelligence that has made the computers, missiles, the atom bombs, the neutron bomb, the hydrogen bomb and all the things they are investigating about cancer - you follow? Liver trouble and so on and so on and so on. That all requires intelligence. And that intelligence is the outcome of thought - right? Right? But that intelligence is limited because it is the outcome of very careful, logical, experimental, systematic working it out, which is thought - right? And thought is limited therefore all measurement, which is technology, is limited; they are adding more and more and more every year - right? Where there is the 'more' it is limited - right? Are we together? Or the better is limited. I am better than yesterday. It is very limited.

Now, is there an intelligence which is not limited? I am asking you, I am - we are not telling each other. We recognise the common intelligence - earn money, do business, go to the factory, get up in the mornings, you know, all the rest of it. That requires certain intelligence, which is limited - right? Because it is the outcome of thought. And thought born of knowledge, and as knowledge is limited always in the future or now, so thought is always limited. And the intelligence of thought is limited. That is simple. And is there intelligence which is not limited? Right? Now who is going to find out? How will you find out? How - not how - how do you enquire? You understand? How do you probe into this, knowing that thought has created intelligence which is limited? The artist, the poet, the great sculptures, the great literary people, painters and so on, all their things are limited naturally - though the artists may not accept that. Scientists have accepted it because they are adding more and more and more every year, getting more and more knowledge about biology, about everything. So is there an intelligence which is not additive? You understand the word adding, adding, adding to it? How can one probe into this?

To go into it together - I am not telling you what to do, please. I am not your guru. I am not your leader. I am not your helper. That's not cruelty because we have been helped by so many people for thousands of years and this help has made us weak. This help from seeking from so many directions is making us feeble. We cannot stand on our own feet, observe and be responsible - right? If you are seeking help how can you be responsible? Or if you are dependent, how can you be responsible?

So how do we - is it possible to probe into this? Into that intelligence which is not limited? That intelligence we don't know - right? It is not the speaker has talked about it, he may know it, or he may not know it, that is irrelevant. But how shall we come upon it? To enquire into it, I must enquire into my whole existence - right? That means my existence, daily existence not some illusory existence on another plane, on another dimension and so on, super ego, super consciousness, all that ideological nonsense.

So I must probe into my life. Obviously the first thing is where there is conflict there is no intelligence. Right? If I am in conflict all the time with people, with ideas, with theories, opinions - right? - so is there an end to conflict? Which means is there an end to conflict and other problems so that the brain is free? Right? Are we together in this, at least verbally? You can see the logic of it, the sanity of this. The brain is conditioned and conditioned to conflict - I am taking that one issue. The brain is in conflict. Where there is conflict it is impossible to see things clearly. Right? I see things very clearly that thought is limited and whatever it does is limited, technologically, or spiritually, so-called spiritually, is limited. And one sees also conflict being the way of life, struggle, being somebody, achieving something and so on and so on and so on, is conflict. And conflict distorts perception - right? If I am quarrelling with my wife, or my husband, or with the neighbour, I cannot see things as they are. I won't go into it more.

So there must be, if I see the truth of it, that very truth frees the brain from conflict. That is intelligence. Right? Seeing the truth of something and let that truth act - right? I see very clearly as long as there is conflict in the brain it is not possible to see things clearly. That very perception ends conflict - right? Because it is so. It is so - a snake is dangerous. A wild animal is dangerous. It is so. There is no two ways about it. Right?

So where is conflict, where is the root of conflict? What makes the brain live in endless conflict? Is there a remedy for it? Not drugs, not alcohol, not some kind of fanciful imagination. Is there a perception that frees the brain from conflict and therefore that brain is now moving or living in quite a different state - right? And what is that state? You are following? We are not analysing, we are just observing.

Very briefly, we have got so little time, very briefly: the analyser is the analysed. Now there is the analyser separate from the thing he is analysing. I am analysing myself, suppose. I have separated myself from the thing which I am observing - right? I am angry or jealous or neurotic, probably neurotic more. I am neurotic and then I say, why am I neurotic as though it was something outside of me - right? I am neurotic because the brain is neurotic - right? My whole being is neurotic, it is not I am different from neurosis. So the observer, the analyser is the analysed - clear? Like the experiencer is the experience. Of course. It is rather difficult. Need I go into this? The thinker is the thought - right? That's clear. The thinker who says "I am separate from thought" and therefore he controls thought, shapes - right? But the thinker is thought itself. So the thinker is the thought. The analyser is the analysed.

Now move the next step, which is: the experiencer is not different from the experience. He thinks he is different and therefore he says "I must experience". To experience you must recognise it - right? Otherwise it is not an experience. But to recognise it is to already know it. I wonder if - so the experiencer is the experience. The thinker is the thought. The analyser is the analysed. Right? Probably the analysts and therapists and so on won't agree with this. But it doesn't matter. Probably, I say, they may.

So there has been - if there is no conflict it means there is only the fact - right? Right? There is only the ending of conflict. It is a fact. Or not a fact. Then what takes place in relationship? You understand? That is when there is no conflict inside my brain, inside the brain, it is not my brain, it is the brain of all of us - that we won't go into for the moment. This brain is now without conflict - right? Because I have watched it, worked, looked at it and therefore in my relationship there is no conflict - with the woman, the man - right? Then when there is no conflict in relationship then what is it? Is it not love? Right? When there is no conflict - you understand? You are all so dazed about all this. When there is no conflict between you and me, you understand, there is no difference between you and me. You may be a woman and I am a man and so on. You may be tall, short, black, white, purple, or whatever it is, but when there is no conflict there is total relationship with you and me. That is love. Right? Love is not jealousy. Love is not desire. Love is not pleasure. Pleasure means conflict. Desire means conflict. I want to do something, you might want, my wife wants to do something else. Where there is love she can do what she wants but there is love. You understand? The whole transformation has taken place. Where there is love there is compassion. And where there is love and compassion that is intelligence. That intelligence gives - in that intelligence there is absolute security, not relative security. You understand? That is intelligence. But one has to be tremendously watchful, which we have been now. And that intelligence is limitless, it is not yours, or mine, it is intelligence. Love is not my love and your love, it is love. Yes sirs. That love may be for one or the many, it is still love. Where there is love there is no hate, there is no enemy. Sir, don't you know all this?

So that is intelligence. You can't talk endlessly about it unless you do it. One can talk about it, as I have been doing. If you go into it much deeper - I don't know if there is time.

You know, have you ever thought, looked at a drum? A drum is tuned to its highest excellence, the right tone. And when you strike on it, it gives the right note. Right? It is tuned. So the brain when it is tuned it gives the right note, the right response. I wonder if you capture all this. And it is not tuned, like the drum is not, when it is in conflict, it is slack. So to have the brain tuned. Not you tune the brain, because you are part of the brain. I won't go into all that. So is it possible, like the drum which is tuned to its highest excellence, to have the brain so tuned that it gives the right note all the time. Yes sirs.

4th QUESTION: Why do the teachings you put forth have so little effect on us? (Laughter) Why do the so-called teachings - I am adding the word 'so-called' - have so little effect on us?

Are you asking the question of the speaker? Or are you asking the question of yourself? Many people have asked this question of the speaker. And the speaker says to you: have you asked that question of yourself? Why a truth has so little effect on you, on us, why? One can give a dozen reasons - right? Laziness, indifference, weariness, boredom, holding onto one's habit, being conditioned, and saying it is awfully difficult to get rid of conditioning, what am I to do about it, tell me about it, and so on and so on and so on. So you are never asking this question of yourself: why some of you who have listened to the speaker for years and years and years, why have you not changed? The speaker is asking you the question. You are not asking the speaker. I am reversing - the speaker is reversing the table on to you. He is challenging you if you will kindly - that challenge is respectful, not impudent. So he says: why have you not, having heard, heard, heard, read, video and all the bla, why have you not changed? Will more suffering help you to change? Because we have suffered for a million years, a thousand years, one day of suffering is enough. So will suffering help you, more suffering, help you? Obviously not - right? More pressure? Obviously not, you have had tremendous pressures, environmental, monetary, every kind of pressures, impressions, and more threats, will it change you? Hell and heaven - threats. That has not changed us. More leaders, better leaders, wiser leaders, better gurus than the old guru! What will make us change? Nothing, except your own perception - right? Nothing from the outside can ever change us. The communists tried this. The totalitarians have said this, let us organize the outside so marvellously etc. you know, all the rest of it if you have followed the communist theories and so on, hoping by external arrangements the psyche will change. Right? That is one of their deep tenets.

And it has not happened. On the contrary.

So what will make each one of us change? Not superficially, adjusting to some words and some ideas, that is no change at all, but something profoundly, radically change. If you do not rely on the outer then you have to rely entirely on yourself. And because we cannot rely on ourselves we seek help, we seek all the gurus, read books and all the rest of it because we have never been able to look at ourselves, work this out for ourselves. Which doesn't mean we become more and more selfish. On the contrary this demands great responsibility - you understand? That you are totally responsible for yourself whatever you do. It is no good blaming environment, heritage, my mother and father were like this therefore I am like that. Society is ugly so I am caught in society - you follow? This demands that you work. Either you work hard, you work very hard to earn money - right? Spend years and years, day after day, night after night, year in and year out, to get money - realize how you all work, all the human beings work. And we don't work an infinitesimal of that energy inwardly. And we have become feeble, irresponsible. So we don't change because we don't want to - simply. If you want to do something you do it.

Sirs, we have answered most of the questions. It is nearly twelve o'clock. Really there is no question at all. There are no questions at all, and therefore no answers. You are the problem. You are the trap. One is caught in this prison and you have to work like - I was going to say hell - you have to work, observe and all the rest of it must come from your heart and your mind, then you are a total human being, free. Where there is freedom there is no fear. Or rather where there is fear there is no freedom. And when there is freedom you don't need any god - right? Right sirs.

SAN FRANCISCO NEW DIMENSIONS RADIO INTERVIEW WITH MICHAEL TOMS 5TH MARCH, 1984

MT: Krishnaji, welcome. It's good to be with you again. The last time we were together we talked about many things, but principally it evolved around you talking about your understanding and experience of meditation. And I was thinking, I was reflecting on our getting together and having a conversation, a dialogue, that many people, many of us, see ourselves in a world of conflict and chaos, and one of the things you said in the last conversation we had, and I quote, was, 'Love means freedom from all conflict.' And I thought that would be a good beginning point for us today. How do we, or what is the first step towards eliminating conflict? As you've suggested the conflict externally is the one that emanates from ourselves, but achieving that state of love you talk about and moving beyond conflict, where does that begin?

K: I think one has to go into it, not where it begins, but rather what is conflict, not only externally but also inwardly. Psychologically it is far more important to understand the nature of conflict, rather than the outward conflict. After all the outward conflict is the result of the society which human beings have created, with all the immorality, with all the corruption, and the monstrous things that are happening in society - human beings have created it. It is not the result of some divine structure. So unless we understand ourselves very deeply, and understand the nature and the structure of conflict, merely trying to organize a state where there is no conflict, or minimize conflict, seems rather vague and not going into it very deeply.

What is conflict in human beings? Why does it exist? It has existed for thousands of years; whether it is in the Far East, or in Europe, or here, conflict has been one of the major problems: violence, the pursuit of violence, and the pursuit of ideals and so on. What is conflict. If we could discuss that, and understand why human beings have not resolved this problem after forty thousand years of evolution. It is really quite a... if you go into it very deeply whether it is possible to end psychological conflict altogether. It isn't a theory. To me theories and ideals and suppositions have no meaning whatsoever. I think one has to look at things as they are, not translate 'what is' into terms of 'what should be'. We have to face things as they are and see if human beings, fairly intelligent, so-called educated, can end this conflict.

So let's begin to have a dialogue. What is conflict? Conflict implies contradiction: 'what is' and 'what should be'. There is a duality, opposing elements in it: desiring one thing and then contradicting it by another desire. It is really a very complex problem, it can't just be, 'Tell me a system how to end conflict' because that is too childish. Every system intrinsically has its own degeneration: every system, whether it is political, religious, or psychological, or even scientific systems; it is called entropy. So if we could talk over together, not how to end conflict, but rather understand the whole nature of it.

MT: Well, in order to have contradiction one has to have a sense of an idea, a concept, a sense of self is a word to be contradicted in the first place.

K: No. Why should we have an idea? Suppose one is violent, as human beings are violent, it is shown through five or six thousand years of war, practically every year, not only externally. Let us take an example, let us look at it that way. One is greedy. Why should you have the opposite of it? The idea of non-greed. Why should we have the concept, or the idea, or a projection of not being greedy, why? The fact is we are greedy, let's deal with that, not with non-greed. I don't know if I am conveying?

MT: Yes.

K: Why are we greedy? I mean greed has been one of the major drives of human activity. Right?

MT: Yes.

K: So what is greed? If we could go into all this kind of thing, and not say, tell me quickly how to end conflict. That has no meaning. So could we take an example as greed or violence, and see it in oneself, because we have created this society, it isn't a selfish activity, it isn't a self-centred process of self-concern. Human beings right through the world are violent, or greedy, or any other characteristic. Now what is far important than 'what should be'? A human being is violent. That has been inherited through the animals right up to the present day existence, violence has been one of the characteristics or ethos of human beings; not only in their personal relationships but generally outwardly too.

So let's take violence: what is violence? Why are we violent? Don't say, society has made me violent, or the environment has made me violent. Because the society is created by each one of us. The environment is structured by all of us, not nature, naturally, but the society in which we live, social interrelationship, social activity and all that, what we call society. We have created it. We go about altering the organization of society. The more you organize it the worst it seems to get. Whereas if we say we are responsible for it completely, each one of us whether we live in Asia or in Europe, or here, each human being living on this earth, which is beautiful, extraordinarily alive, nature, because we have created this society we try to change the organization of society. We never say, I will change, I am violent, I am responsible for violence. The world now, as we all know, is aflame, terrible things are happening, of which most of us are not even aware. And that world is us, we are the world. We are not separate from the world, we are not separate from society. So our consciousness - if we can use that word and go into the nature of consciousness a little later - our consciousness is part of violence, violence is part of that consciousness.

So what is violence? Not only getting angry and hitting each other, killing each other but also inwardly, psychologically, what is violence? Aggression obviously, competition, which is encouraged by the world tremendously, especially in this country: if you compete you become successful. And violence is also essentially, 'I am', 'I must be'. I am - if you want to go into it very deeply - I am ignorant but I will be knowledgeable; there is this constant struggle of conformity, imitation, which are all various forms of violence - aggression, the urge to succeed, to compete, the conformity, imitation, all those are various forms of violence. You may not agree with this, but if you go into it, these are really aspects of violence.

So what is the root of violence? These are the various aspects, like a prism. So why are human beings, whether highly sophisticated or the man who has never read a book, doesn't even know how to write, he is also violent - the extreme rich and the extreme poor, the black, you know the whole division, classical division, aristocratic division. Is division one of the factors of conflict, me and you? I don't know if you see.

MT: The feeling of being separate from another.

K: Separate. The American and the Russian, ideologically divided; one as a system of tyranny, the other a so-called democratic society. Ideals. So ideals are in conflict. I believe in one thing and you believe in another. I am a Jew, you are a Arab. You understand? So is this division basically one of the causes, or the major cause, of conflict, not only outside but inside? One is a Catholic, after two thousand years of propaganda - forgive me if I can put it that way - you have divided yourself saying, I am a Catholic, I am a Protestant, I am a Hindu, I am a Muslim, and all the rest of that terrible division that exists, geographically, nationally, racially and specially religiously. So can man be free of all this? Not speculatively free but actually free from all religious divisions. After all the Hindus, three thousand to five thousand years, have lived with certain traditions, cultivated, propaganda, brainwashed; so have the Muslims, so have the Christians. You understand, the problem is enormous. As the problem is enormous we never approach it simply.

MT: We see it as very complex.

K: We see it's complex, but we say, see the simplicity of it that as long as there is division there must be conflict. That's a law. Not invented by the speaker, by me, it is a law where there is the Arab, Jew, Christian, Muslim, Hindu, or various sects and beliefs, multiplication of sects, multiplication of gurus, and all the absurdities of all that. So could we see the logic of it, the sanity of it and set aside all this? Not be a Hindu, not outwardly, I don't mean outwardly, inwardly; not be a Catholic. Because this division, which is based on belief...

MT: It is extremely difficult for most people to give up beliefs.

K: Of course. Because certain forms of belief give them security, they feel safe, they feel protected by long centuries of certain beliefs, certain dogmas.

MT: Some people think that is a natural inclination to feel safe and secure, that is something that is built into human nature.

K: One must be secure but not in illusions. If we accept security to be in illusions, like nationalism is an illusion, and so on, that very acceptance of certain ideological or conceptual beliefs is dividing the people.

MT: You are saying that something like nationalism is an illusion because it is a belief system? That's why it is illusory?

K: We are human beings first, not Americans, Russians, or Hindus, we are human beings. And if we are human beings why introduce all this? First let's understand ourselves, knowing that we are responsible for the society which we have created, for the wars. Wars exist because of nationalism, economic divisions - my country first, my religion first. You can see all this, every magazine is that, every politician and so on. And that's why one feels the world is getting more and more dangerous to live in, the threatening of war - all based on this narrow concept of human existence.

MT: The idea of nationalism.

K: Nationalism. Not only that, the idea, I am a Christian, I am a Catholic, Protestant, the innumerable divisions in Christianity and Hinduism and so on. The world if Islam is broken up. They all believe in god: your god and my god. But god, if I may be - I am not an atheist, I am a very religious person, but god is the invention of thought, born of fear, born of uncertainty, born of terrible loneliness, separation. Therefore I project an idea of god. Look at it, sir, sanely and logically. The Hindu god, the Muslim god, the Christian god, and they all talk about peace and they are all fighting each other. Peace requires - to understand peace requires a great deal of intelligence, which is not based on some kind of belief.

So let's come back to the point: as long as there is division in myself, fragmentation, broken up, that very fragmentation is one of the major causes of conflict: I want this, and a little later I don't want it. So if you want to go into it very deeply, isn't desire one of the causes of conflict?

MT: Desire for achieving something.

K: Desire in itself, per se. Isn't it one of the major causes of conflict? I desire to be powerful - power. We all want power from the president down to the prime minister, to each one of us, we all want power - power in our little yard. And the desire for power is one of the causes for conflict. Another cause is, I seek power, I want power more than anything else, which means money, position, security, popularity, the whole superstitious nonsense that is going on in the world. Sorry if I put it emphatically. So as conflict is a very complex problem one has to approach it very simply, and freely.

So as long as there is division, nationally, religiously, economically, socially, there must be conflict, outside as well as psychologically. And to end that conflict one has to go into this whole content of our consciousness. Some scientists and psychologists perhaps don't accept consciousness, but consciousness is our reactions, both biological and psychological reactions. And also our fears, our anxieties, our depression, our beliefs and so on, the whole of human nature, what humans are. That's our consciousness: I am a Catholic, a Protestant and so on. Right, sir?

MT: Aren't those belief systems that are the content of consciousness?

K: Belief is, of course.

MT: Krishnaji, you have been speaking about consciousness.

K: Yes, sir. You see the crisis is in our consciousness, not in the world.

MT: It is internal as opposed to being external.

K: Consciousness. The crisis we think is economic, political or so on, but the crisis is in our consciousness, because we have lived for fifty thousand years on this earth, and we've hardly changed at all, psychologically. Technologically we have tremendously advanced, frighteningly advanced - atom bombs and all the rest of it. And also technologically has given man a great deal of health and so on, communication - this is it, radio, television and so on. Inwardly we are almost the same as we've always been: frightened, lonely, depressed, violent, greedy, you know the whole of human nature. There we are almost static. And if we remain as we are we will be - for the next forty thousand years - exactly what we are. I don't know if you want to go into it, but we have to go into the question of time.

Time is part of our consciousness. I have been, I will be - the past, the present and the future. So if we do not psychologically have tremendous revolution inwardly we will be tomorrow exactly what we are. It is so. There is no question of disputing that point. So can we change now? Not wait for tomorrow, and the gradual process. The gradual process has led us to this. I mean Darwin and all the species, but we have not basically brought about a deep fundamental change in ourselves, in our consciousness. And that change, we think, will come through evolution: give me time, I will become. Man has had forty thousand years and more of time, and we are still barbarians. I am using the word barbarian in the right sense of that word.

So is it possible for a human being to realize all this, that time is an enemy of man, psychologically. I need time to learn a language, to understand the computer, to go to the Moon, I need a great deal of time; but psychologically, inwardly, if we think in terms of time we will be caught in the same process as we have been for forty thousand years. This is logical. But we don't want to be logical, we want to be romantic and all the rest of the business. So is it possible to have a complete change in the content of our consciousness? You understand? The content is our beliefs, our ideals, our fears, our nationalities, you know, the whole structure and the nature of the human psyche, is our consciousness. And if there is no basic revolution there, psychologically, we shall be in another ten thousand years exactly what we are.

So we are asking a very serious question, which we have discussed with many scientists, with so-called brain specialists and so on: can there be a radical change in the very psyche, which is made up of consciousness, so that the brain cells themselves are different? I don't know if you want to go into all that.

MT: Is consciousness limited to the brain?

K: Yes, of course. It is part of the brain. The brain is the centre of our reactions, both biological, physiological and psychological. And that brain has been conditioned for forty thousand years to be violent; for two thousand years to be a Christian, or two thousand years to be a Catholic, and so on. I hope I am not disturbing you people who are so attached to their particular forms of beliefs.

MT: You may be. That's all right.

K: That's all right. I don't mind. You can throw me out whenever you want. But these are obviously logical, sane facts. And most of us are unwilling to face facts, and change the facts. To change the fact is to remain with it, give your whole attention to the fact. But you cannot give your whole attention if the fact is looked at with an ideal. Fact is fact. The non-fact is the ideal. So could we give complete attention to what we are? What we are is what is happening every moment: anger, pleasure, sexual demands, various aspects of violence and so on, the whole content of our consciousness as it arises. Which is, the 'me', the self, is consciousness. I don't know if I am making it clear.

MT: Yes.

K: My consciousness is knowledge: I am frightened, that is knowledge. I am greedy; I am a Christian, I am a Hindu, Islam and so on, that is based on knowledge. So the self, the 'me', the persona, is knowledge.

MT: We also have this sense of wanting to accumulate more of that knowledge.

K: Yes. Not only that, it gives one power, position, status and so on, but also it's very satisfying to have power, power over somebody. The whole tyrannical, political world, the totalitarian states are tremendously powerful. Look at Poland and all the rest of it. The few are in power, and it's like the good old system of tyranny.

So we are asking a very serious question, whether the human brain, which has been conditioned for forty thousand years in this state, can radically transform, change itself - not transform, because transform means changing from one form to another form. But radically change to something totally new. Sir, I don't know if you want to go into all this, it involves the question of death.

MT: Please.

K: I don't know if you want to go into all that. You wanted to discuss something about meditation.

MT: Well we did that last time. I think you should continue.

K: All right. I think death is an extraordinarily important factor in life, because we are all going to die, whether we are Christians or Hindus, we are all going to die. Some believe in reincarnation, life after death, you know, and that belief has no actual effect in daily life, it is just a belief, a comforting belief. But the actual living of that, because if I die and I may be born next life, which means what I do now matters next life: correct behaviour, morality, no corruption and so on, because whatever I am now I will be next life. But that belief has no value. It is like playing a game.

MT: It hasn't made much of a difference.

K: None at all. So death is an extraordinarily important thing in life. But we have separated living from death. We are frightened even to talk about it. There are lots of books being written now, how to die happily. It sounds silly.

MT: Well I think most of us are terror stricken about the idea of death.

K: Frightened.

MT: So if you can die happily, it seems to be something you would gravitate to naturally.

K: It sounds rather absurd, to die happily. Nobody wants to die.

MT: True enough.

K: Nobody wants to because living is very important to them. Is living so important? What is living? What is it we call living? Going to the office every day for the next fifty years? Having conflict day after day, struggle, pain, sorrow, pleasure?

MT: Well, I think most people would say that living is trying to be happy, pursuing some form of pleasure.

K: Yes. Is there? Some form of pleasure, which endures for a couple of weeks and then you change to some other pleasure. So the pleasure is a very insubstantial thing. So this process of living, what we call living, is a conflict from the moment you are born until you die, struggle. Right? With an occasional flare of joy and flare of something else, but this battle goes on all the time. This thing we call living. We are not saying death is preferable. That's absurd. But why have we separated the two? Death means the ending.

MT: Ending of what?

K: Ending: biologically ending, physically, ending to all my attachments, to this house, to my wife, to my children, to my books, to my bank account. I am attached. And death comes along, by accident, disease, or old age and says, 'Sorry, old boy, that's the end of it. You can't take it with you.'

MT: Yes.

K: So this is really a very important question to ask. Instead of separating living and dying, giving it a long duration of time, because where there is fear of death there is no love, there is no passion, except lust. Freedom and passion go together. So, ending. What is it to end?

MT: That sense of self, the me.

K: To end, sir. To end something.

MT: Finished, it's over.

K: No. Go into the question of ending. Of course finishing something, but the nature of ending something, ending. Do we ever end anything? That is, if we end something, in that very ending there is something else coming. I have got cancer, if I end it I will be very happy. There is always a reward, or a punishment. I don't know if you see. So our life is based on reward and punishment. And we have never enquired what it means to end. End. Not, if I end what is there? If you say there is something there, you have already projected something, therefore you have never ended. This is really a very interesting question, the ending. So death is a form of ending. And because we are frightened of it we invent life after death, and proofs and you know all the rest of it. Which is all rather speculative, doubtful. But if we could live with death, which doesn't mean suicide, live with death - morning, evening, day in, day out, live with it. So there is no attachment. I am no longer a Hindu, a Christian, ending everything. It's not a question of determination. Why separate living, death and be frightened of it, terrified? And the expense of all that: the funerals, specially in this country, profit - you follow, the whole commercialism around death.

MT: What is the link between our fear of death and our conflict?

K: Sir, to end conflict: not, if I end conflict what is there? Not to ask that question, to end it. Because this is very important. Could we look at it differently? We are wasting our energy tremendously, conflict is a wastage of energy. Like an internal combustion machine, if you put gravel into it, it wears itself out. So we are wearing ourselves out psychologically; constant conflict, struggle, never a period of quietness. And to have quiet you meditate. And then a struggle: which is the best meditation, how am I to practise, I must practise. That's also conflict.

MT: Another system, another belief, an idea.

K: Never a day in which you are absolutely quiet, not occupied with something or other. So the ending totally is the cessation of wasting of energy. If I have no conflict I have got tremendous energy. If I am not frightened, fear, there is great energy. So we are wasting our energy. And to live a life without wasting energy - you understand, sir - that is something extraordinary. Which means as long as we are wasting energy our life becomes very small, selfish, narrow, broken up. If there is no wastage of energy, no conflict, which is very, very... - we went into it - then there is an art of living, which you don't learn in schools, or colleges, or from the specialists. You yourself have to become aware of it, attentive.

And that very attention is like a flame which burns out the wastage of energy.

Is that enough, sir?

MT: Well, I am sure there is a lot more.

K: Lots more.

MT: But you've covered it pretty well. Thank you for being with us.

SAN FRANCISCO 1ST PUBLIC TALK 5TH MAY 1984

If I may I would like to point out, this is a serious talk, today and tomorrow. It is not an entertainment, either intellectually or emotionally, sentimentally. Nor are we doing any kind of propaganda to convince you of anything, nor to bring about a new ideology or a philosophy, an exotic nonsense. So please this is a dialogue between you and the speaker. As there are so many people, a dialogue is only possible between two people, a conversation is much more applicable between you and the speaker, in which you are taking part in what he is saying, and not merely listening verbally, or intellectually, not only to the content of the word but also the deeper significance of the word.

All this requires a great deal of attention and energy. And most of us waste our life. We waste our life in so many ways. And to grasp the whole significance of life and death and to find out, or to come upon that which is beyond time, one needs a great deal of passion, a great sense of freedom, and that requires daily action. And we are going to go into all these matters.

First of all we should talk over together - I mean together, not that you listen to what the speaker is saying, agreeing, or disagreeing, or accepting certain ideas and rejecting others, but we are dealing with the whole existence of life, the whole problem of humanity; not only the particular problem of each one of us but the entire human existence. It may sound rather grandiose but it is not. Because each one of us, as we live, with our greeds, anxieties, pain, pleasure, passing love, hatreds, antagonisms, and the eternal conflict in which all human beings seem to live, from the most ancient of times to the present, all this requires that we think together. Not accepting what the speaker is saying but thinking together, which is very rare. Because if we can think together, not according to your particular way, or tendency, or according to one's conditioning, but think about these various matters that we are going to discuss, if we could somehow manage to put away our personal opinions for a while, if you can, and also our various inclinations and sentiments of belief, and all that business, if we could observe together, think together, then it is possible, one feels, that one can understand at great depth the world of freedom.

If one has a concept what freedom is - from the ancient of times, the Greeks and Egyptians, the Chinese and the Hindus have talked a great deal about freedom: freedom from all bondage, freedom from one's own self created prison, freedom from the various impressions, impositions of society, of all the religious structures, to be so completely free, not committed to any particular ideology, not pursuing one's own particular pleasure with all its complications and pain, to understand the real depth of freedom. Because we are in prison, both self made and the society in which we live, this society is made by human beings. The present American culture, the way of life, the American way of life, and so on, is made by the human beings that live on this side of the world. We are responsible, each one of us, whether we live in this country, affluent, fairly, economically uncertain, tremendous unemployment, and so on, all the political ugliness that is going on, we have created, each one of us, this society. Of that there is not doubt. One can question, but if one is fairly inquisitive, fairly playing a straight game to observe, then one can see that each one of us is responsible for this society in which we live, with all its corruption, immorality, injustice, poverty, the various forms of political tyranny and so on. This society not only in this country, but in Europe, India and China, we have created this. And mere reformation, or reorganization of society has no meaning. We think it is progress when organization is reorganized. I do not know if you have observed all this, impartially, objectively, with a great deal of scepticism, doubt.

Apparently not only in this country but all over the world human beings are becoming rather gullible. It has been encouraged by religions, specially by Christianity because if you doubt, question the whole structure of so-called religious existence, the whole thing collapses. And in the Asiatic world, specially the Buddhist and the ancient Hindus, insisted that you must question, not accept, not obey. You must doubt, not only every kind of experience that you yourself have, the memories of that experience; question, doubt, enquire its significance. But apparently any form of doubt, enquiry into our very nature, into all the political, religious organizations - it is only through enquiry, not merely the enquiry of professionals, the experts, the specialists, but each one of us enquiring, questioning, asking, it becomes then very important for the brain because through doubt, questioning, the conditioning of the brain begins to break up.

One hopes that each of us is following this conversation. The speaker is unfortunately sitting on a platform; it is merely for convenience. He is not a professional, he is not an expert, he is not a specialist on religion or any kind of philosophy. We are enquiring together into the whole problem of existence. So we are on the same level, with the same intensity, at the same time. We are taking a journey together. Perhaps one may walk very fast, or very slowly, but whether we walk slowly or very fast we are walking together. If one goes fast, one must not go so fast for the ones who are slow.

So we are enquiring together, questioning what is freedom? In the world, and specially in the modern world, which is the American world, which is spreading all over the world except in the totalitarian states, though there too there are dissidents, disagreements, and so on, in this world we are slaves to experts, specially in this country - sex specialists, specialists of behaviour, specialists of make-up - right - specialists how you dress, how you walk, how you bear your children, and all the rest of it. And these specialists are becoming more and more powerful right through the world. And through that way is there freedom? Please consider what the speaker is saying seriously. We need specialists of certain kinds, but to be told all your life that you must think this way, do that, you know, all the rest of it, that surely conditions the brain. As in the East and in Europe, tradition has conditioned the brain, whether that tradition be ten days or ten thousand years, that tradition has conditioned the brain. The tradition of the specialist, the tradition of politicians and the scientist - is that freedom, though each one of us thinks we are free to do what we want to do? As is happening in the world, each one thinks that he is free to express, to fulfil, to assert, compete and so on. He calls all that freedom. And that freedom, if one observes very carefully and objectively, has brought about great chaos in the world, great misery, each one out for himself. And certain psychologists encourage that - fulfil yourself, do what you want to do and so on. And this is called freedom. But is it freedom? The word 'freedom' etymologically also means love. When each one is competing, each one is seeking success, and so on, is there love in all that?

So one must enquire very deeply together, what is real freedom. Freedom from something is not freedom. Freedom means the ending, the ending which has no continuity. And this sense of freedom can alone bring that passion which is the ending of sorrow - which we will go into presently. And when there is passion there is action. We also ought to enquire: what is action? What is the relationship of action to time - I hope you don't mind my going into all this, do you? Do you mind?

A: No.

K: Perhaps some of you, if I may most respectfully say, have thought about these matters, or you may not have, all this may be new, or you have read some of things that the speaker has said, unfortunately, and you then repeat. Perhaps some of you have read, and you say, "I know exactly what he is going to say next"! Which means you are not actually listening. You are carrying your memory of what you have read and interpreting what is being said according to the knowledge that you have accumulated, so you actually then are not listening. I am saying this most respectfully.

So freedom: what is the relationship of freedom to action? And what is action is relationship to passion? And we are wasting our life, because we have only one life, some of you may believe in reincarnation, next life, after death, those are very pleasant comforting concepts, beliefs, but death is not something that gives a continuity - which we will go into when we talk about all that.

So most of us waste our life. We mean by wasting life, though we have to earn our livelihood, a vocation which is now becoming more and more imitative, a vocation that demands all our energy from morning until night, from nine o'clock until five o'clock, and then some form of entertainment, either religious, sexual, or listening to the 'tube', or reading some kind of book, intellectual, or romantic, or thrillers. This is our life. At the end of time we die. And we have never enquired how to live, what is the art of living. And when we begin to enquire into it, the art, not the repetitive processes of life because art demands a great deal of observation, a great deal of attention, awareness, not only of external things but the whole enormous field of the inward psychological, psychic process - that's far more vast than the external world. And that psychological world controls, shapes the outer world, as is shown in the totalitarian states. They hope by changing the environment, controlling the environment, forcing people to think along a certain way human beings will be different. That is one of their tenets. And it has failed because the psyche is far greater, has greater vitality, greater energy than all the outward structure. And we are going to enquire into that area.

To enquire and observe into the whole psychological world of each one of us you require passion, not just intellectual entertainment, intellectual dissection, analysis. You need passion and energy. And that energy now is being wasted through conflict, because each one of us, whether we are rich or poor, ignorant, or the great scientists, the ordinary person that lives a monotonous daily life, and the man in the jungle, in the small village, uneducated, he has constant conflict. All human beings have great conflict, struggle, pain. And to enquire into that conflict, whether it is possible to end that conflict inwardly, psychologically, to go into it demands not only energy but real passion to find out. Passion to find out whether conflict, human conflict, can ever end. Or must it everlastingly go on?

I do not know if you have enquired, or observed, that we are supposed to have lived on this earth, according to the archeologists, and biologists and so on, forty to fifty thousand years - from the most ancient civilizations to the present time. They have all lived in conflict, not only with nature but conflict externally through wars, conflict also inwardly. This duration of forty thousand or fifty thousand years of human evolution has brought us where we are, still in conflict. I wonder if we realize that, not theoretically, not intellectually, or some fanciful hope, but actually realize how deeply we are in conflict with each other; and not only with each other but in ourselves. And we have accepted this conflict as the way of life, not only externally as war, destroying millions and millions of people, though they talk about pacem in terris, which means peace on earth, all religions, except perhaps Buddhism and Hinduism, have killed more people for religions, nationalities, and all that. The glorification of tribalism has been the external world of conflict - competition, aggression, each one seeking his own success, his own fulfilment. Externally we are in conflict, and also inwardly. That's a fact, it is not a theory. If one sees oneself as you see yourself in a mirror, you see you are all in conflict, with your wife, with your husband, with your neighbour, with god, with all the things that human beings have created outwardly and inwardly.

And we have never enquired whether we can possibly be free from conflict. We are enquiring now together. Inevitably you will ask the speaker, "Are you free from conflict" - naturally. If he was not he wouldn't talk about it. That would be hypocrisy. And the speaker practically all his life has abhorred any kind of dishonest, hypocritical thinking, or way of life. But to enquire into it together requires that you share, involve yourself, commit yourself, to find out whether conflict can end, living in this world, not go off to some kind of monastery, or escape into some kind of ashrama, and all that silly nonsense. Why are we in conflict? What's the cause, the very nature and the structure of conflict? Please, most of us wait for an answer, for somebody to tell you. That's the function of the specialist. But there are no specialists here. We are asking each other, what is the cause of it. What's the cause of wars, outwardly? Economic wars, social wars, and the destruction of human beings, what is the cause of it? Is it not nationalities, each nation thinking it is separate from the rest of the world? Not only national, which is a glorification of tribalism, but also externally the ideologies of the communists, of the totalitarian states and the democratic world, different ideologies, different beliefs, dialectical materialism on one side, and on the other belief in god, democratic and so on. They are still ideals. So ideals are at war, beliefs are at war. If you believe in certain forms of dogmatism of Christianity, or the superstitions and dogmatism of Hinduism or Buddhism, these very beliefs, these very faiths divide human beings. You are Catholic, Protestant, and the thousands of divisions of Protestantism, as they are in the Hinduism, and the Buddhists - the North Buddhists and the South Buddhists.

So the major cause of external conflict is division. Obviously. I hope - one hopes we are following each other. Where there is division there must be conflict. And in ourselves we are broken up, fragmented. Each one of us thinks he is separate from another - don't we? Religions throughout the world have encouraged that you are separate, you have a separate soul, separate individuality. Please follow this, don't reject it. We are not asking you to accept anything, we are enquiring.

In the Asiatic world, as well as in India, they believe in this separate individuality, separate atman and so on; as you do here in the Christian world, your soul is separate, to be saved and so on. So from childhood this sense of division, this fragmentation within ourselves, is the basic cause of conflict, each one seeking his own salvation religiously - whatever that may mean. Each one wanting to express himself, fulfil himself, pursuing his own ideals, his own ambitions, and your wife and your husband do exactly the same thing, each one pursuing his own pleasure, his own desire.

So we can see that conflict must exist as long as there is division. Can this division end? Can this division which has brought about such misery, confusion, ugliness, and brutality in the world, can this division end in each one of us? You may intellectually ask this question, and speculate about it. Perhaps some of you will say, "No, it is not possible. It is the way of life; in nature there is conflict, everything is struggling to reach the light, bigger animals killing the little ones and so on. So we are part of that nature so we must live in conflict. This is the way of life." We have accepted this, not only as a tradition, but we have been encouraged, instructed, educated, to carry on with conflict.

So we are enquiring together whether this division in ourselves can end. That is, the opposing desires, wanting, not wanting, pursuing, you know all the rest of opposing energies which bring such extraordinary conflict and misery, can all that end? It cannot possibly end through volition, that is by will. I hope we are following all this, are we together, somewhat at least? I'll go on if you will permit it, though perhaps some of you are too tired at the end of a long week. So we will go on into this.

Can this division end? We were saying, that through any form of volition, desire, motivation, wanting to end this conflict, that very desire to end conflict breeds further conflict. Doesn't it? I want to end conflict. Why? Because I hope to live a very peaceful life, and yet I have to live in this world - in the world of business, science and relationship with each other, and so on, the modern world. Can I exist in this modern world without conflict? All the business world is based on conflict, competition, one firm, business firm against another. This endless conflict that is going on outwardly. And inwardly first, can this end, not externally? We are always talking about, can I live in this world externally without conflict, but we will find the right answer, right action, when we enquire into the conflict that each one of us has. Can this division, opposing desires, opposing demands, individual urges, can all that division end?

It can only end if one is capable - I won't use the word 'capable', sorry - if one can observe - observe conflict, not try to end it, not try to transform it into another form of conflict, but to observe it. Which means, to be aware, to give our attention completely to what is conflict and how it arises, which is the dualistic opposing drives of energy, just to observe it.

Have we ever observed anything completely? When you look out of that window and you see the sea, turbulent one morning, and utterly quiet in the evening, have you ever observed without any words, without saying, how beautiful, how noisy, how disturbing it all it? Have you ever observed with all your senses, with all you being, that extraordinary water, the sea? To observe it without any reaction, just to watch. If you have ever done it, in the same way to observe without any reaction, without any motive, because the moment you have a motive that motive gives a direction. And in that direction there is conflict, but just to observe the whole phenomenon of conflict, its cause, not only division, imitation, conformity, all that. Just to be aware of the total nature and the structure of conflict. When you give complete attention then you will see for yourself whether that conflict ends or not. But that requires, as we said, a great deal of energy, and that energy can only come when there is passion behind it, when you really want to find out. You give a great deal of time and energy to making money, years, as you give a great deal of energy to be entertained. But you never give energy deeply and profoundly, completely attentive, to find out whether conflict can ever end.

So observation, not volition, not any action of will, or resolution, but to observe with all your being what is the nature and the structure of conflict. Then one of the conditionings of the brain comes to an end. Because all human beings throughout the world are conditioned - as Catholics, Protestants, Hindus, Buddhists, Muslims, Mohammedans, all the varieties of human invention.

To enquire into our conditioning: we are conditioned, you are Americans - American way of life. If you are Catholic you have been conditioned for two thousand years; if you are Protestant from the period of Henry VIII who wanted to get rid of Catholicism, the pope, in order to marry somebody or other. There are various forms of conditioning by the religious, social, cultural condition of India, Japan and all the rest of the world. We are conditioned. And that conditioning is our consciousness.

I hope this is not too many things in one talk. But as we have only one other talk we must put everything we can in two talks. I hope you don't mind - if you can tolerate it, and if you can take the journey with the speaker.

As we were saying, we are conditioned by the newspapers, all the various forms of media, you know, magazines and so on. You have been conditioned. And this conditioning is our consciousness, not only biological reactions, sensory reactions, sexual reactions and so on, that is part of our conditioning; and also various forms of beliefs, faiths and dogmas, by ideologies, by the various religious rituals; the linguistic, if that is possible, conditioning, which the speaker questions very urgently, whether linguistic language conditions the brain - we have discussed this matter with certain linguistic experts and so on. I question it - one questions that. I won't go into it because it is too complicated for the moment.

So we are conditioned. Our consciousness is all the knowledge we have acquired, the experience, the faith, the belief, the dogmas, the rituals, and also fear, pleasure, sorrow, pain. Our conditioning is essentially knowledge. We have acquired knowledge through forty thousand years, or more. And we are adding to that knowledge day after day, more and more. The scientists are adding knowledge day after day, month after month, to what they already know. And this knowledge is acquired through experience, testing out, experimenting, trying out, if it doesn't succeed they put it aside and begin again. This constant expansion of knowledge, both in ourselves and externally. And knowledge because it is based on experience is limited. There can be no complete knowledge about anything, including god. Knowledge is always, present and in the future, always limited; it can be expanded, added to, but it still has its own limitation.

So thought, which is born of knowledge, stored in the brain as memory, that thought is limited. There is no complete thought. Please, question this, doubt it, ask, find out. Because this is very important because our consciousness is the essence of thought, essence of knowledge. Therefore our consciousness which is the whole capacity of the brain and so on, is always limited, therefore conditioned. Thought can imagine, speculate the immeasurable, this space, endless and so on, but whatever thought does it is still limited. Do we see this fact? Because it is very important, if one may point out, to understand this, not merely intellectually but see actually whatever we are thinking, and any action of thought is always limited, whether it is political, economic, or religious. Thought has invented god - sorry, I hope you will not be shocked by all this. Just a minute, sirs.

If you have no fear, completely no fear both of external incidents, accidents, and also inwardly, absolutely no fear of death, of tomorrow, of time, then what is the necessity for god? Then there is that state which is eternal - which we won't go into now.

So it is important, essential, that we understand the nature of thought. Thought has created the most astonishingly beautiful things - great paintings, great poems; thought has created all the world of technology, from the neutron bombs to instant communication, all the instruments of war, the submarine, you know all the rest of it, the computer and so on. Thought has done all this. The most beautiful architecture of cathedrals of Europe, and all the things that are in the cathedrals and in the churches are put together by thought. So thought is, whatever it has created externally or inwardly, is limited, and therefore fragmented.

Thought is a material process, therefore there is nothing sacred that thought has created. And everything that thought has created we call religion. You might say it is a divine revelation straight from heaven, but that very idea 'straight from heaven', or 'revelation' is still the activity of thought. Super consciousness and so on, all those inventions of the gurus that have come to this country, unfortunately. You have your own gurus, the priests, don't add more. You have enough of them.

So we have to understand really the nature of thought. Thought is born of knowledge, stored in the brain as memory. So thought is a material process. And knowledge is necessary at a certain level of existence - I need knowledge to write a letter, to go from here to there, knowledge is necessary to drive a car, to do anything physically. Knowledge has a certain place. But we are asking: has knowledge any place in the psychological world? Which is, has knowledge any place between you and your wife, your husband? Please enquire into it. Knowledge being the memories that you have accumulated in that relationship, between man and woman, both sexual memories, pleasure, pain, antagonism, and all the rest of it, and also the images, the knowledge, the pictures about each other.

So we are asking a very fundamental question: whether knowledge in relationship is not one of the factors of conflict? You certainly have, haven't you sirs, if I may ask, an image about your wife - and the wife about the husband, or the girl about the boy and so on. Each one creates not only his own image but also the image of another. You certainly have created one about the speaker, I am quite sure, otherwise you wouldn't be here. And that image is preventing you from actually understanding each other.

So when one is living most intimately with another, and through that relationship you accumulate day after day, night and day, day in and day out, memories of each other. And these memories, which are images, prevent actual relationship with each other. This is a fact. These memories are the dividing factor, and therefore conflict between man and woman. So can the recording processes of the brain in relationship stop? You understand the question? If one is married - suppose I am married, I am not, suppose I am married. Don't ask me, "Why are you not married?"! That would be an easy way out. Suppose I am married: attraction, sex, and all the rest of it. And day after day, month after month, for years, I have put together a great deal of knowledge about her. And she has done exactly the same thing about me. And these images, this knowledge that one has of each other, is bringing a division and therefore conflict. Can this conflict end in relationship? Now that is most important, essential. Because relationship is one of the most wonderful things if you can have it without a single shadow of conflict. Because one cannot live on this marvellous earth without relationship.

Loneliness is a form of total separation, total division. And being frightened of that thing called loneliness, with all its depression, with all its ugliness of loneliness, we try to establish a relationship with another, whether that establishment is consciously or unconsciously. And therefore we become attached to the picture, to the memory of the woman or the man, or the various forms of relationship, homosexuals and all the rest of that business. It is a crazy world, isn't it! It is becoming more and more insane, and we are all adding to it. And to be free, this is freedom, to be actually free from the image-building process, that is real freedom - not to do what you like, which becomes too childish, too utterly immature, but the freedom that comes totally when in relationship there is no accumulation of memories. Is that possible? Or is it a vain hope, or something to be desired in heaven, which is absurd, of course.

Let's enquire into it: you see the speaker has gone into it very deeply for himself, but to go into it you must enquire why the brain records. The brain is recording, that's its function, part of it, recording how to learn French, or Russian, or whatever language, recording the various forms of business activities, recording, you know, the whole machinery of the brain is recording. So why should it record in relationship? Why should my brain record the insult or the encouragement, or the flattery of my wife? Why should it record? Have you ever enquired into it? Probably not. Probably it is too boring to enquire into all this. Most of us are satisfied with the way we live - accepting, carrying on until we get old and die. To carry on that way is a wastage of energy. There is no art in that. There is no beauty in that. Just to carry on, day after day, following the same routine, the same misery, the same confusion, insecurity and so on. And at the end of it all it is so meaningless, die. But if you begin to enquire why the brain must record, it is necessary to record at a certain level, physically: how to drive a car, how to be a good carpenter, or some kind of ugly politician and all that business. But in relationship with each other why should there be recording at all? Does that recording give us security in our relationship? Is there security in relationship? I believe there are more divorces in this country than marriages. I - we heard the other day a girl saying, just about to marry the next day, "There is always divorce".

So you understand, relationship is a very, very serious matter. But the quality of that relationship is destroyed when the brain is recording all the petty little incidents, nagging, pleasure, you know what goes on between ordinary relationships. Each one seeking his own ambition, his own fulfilment, his own pleasure. That utterly destroys relationship.

And so is love a matter of thought? Is love desire? Is love pleasure? Is love memory? Please do enquire into all this - not only enquire intellectually but actually in the very enquiry is action. When you act, and that action demands passion, not just intellectual concept or desire. Love is not lust, love is not within the orbit of thought. But when the brain merely is a recording machinery in our relationship you destroy everything that is love.

You may say, it is very easy for you to talk that way because you are not married. Many people have told me this - which is nonsense. The speaker lives with a great many people, both in India, Europe and America, a great many, constantly. When thought has really been understood, its nature, its structure, its activity, its limitation, understood, which is, observed, acted upon, that very observation is its action. Then there is a totally different quality of relationship. Because love is outside the brain, not within the confines of thought.

So our conditioning is the movement of thought, like fear. We have lived with fear for centuries, millions of years, thousands of years, and we are still afraid, outwardly and inwardly. Outwardly we want security, physical security. One must have physical security. But that outward security becomes insecurity when one is seeking psychological security. I hope you follow all this. We want psychological security first. Psychologically to be safe, we want in our relationship to be completely secure - it is my permanent wife! Or if that permanency doesn't exist with that woman, I will try and find it with another woman. You may laugh at this, but this is what is happening in the world. Probably this is what has happened to you. And perhaps that is why you laugh it off very quickly.

So one has to enquire very, very deeply whether there is any security, permanency in life, inwardly. Or the search for inward security, which is ultimately god and so on, is that security an illusion, and therefore there is no security, psychologically, but only that supreme intelligence - not of books, not of knowledge. That supreme intelligence comes, exists only where there is love and compassion. That intelligence then acts. You may say, "All this is so far fetched, so complicated", but it isn't. Life - living is a very complex process, isn't it? You must know all that much more than the speaker does. It is a very, very complicated process: getting to the office, to the factory, writing - you follow - the whole way of living is a very, very complex process. And that which is complex must be approached with great simplicity. To be psychologically simple, not stupidly simple, but to see the quality of simplicity. I do not know if you have gone into all this. The word 'innocence' means, etymologically, not to hurt, and not to be hurt. But we are hurt from childhood by the parents, by the fellow students, through university and so on, we are perpetually being hurt, wounded psychologically, aren't you? And that hurt we carry through life, with all its agony. When one is hurt there is always the fear of 'not being hurt', so one builds a wall round oneself and resists, and all the rest of it. But never to be hurt is simplicity.

Now with that simplicity to approach the very, very complex problem of life, which is the art of living. And all this requires a great deal of energy, passion, and a great sense of freedom to observe.

Right, sirs, that is enough for today. We will continue tomorrow morning with the other facts of life.

SAN FRANCISCO 2ND PUBLIC TALK 6TH MAY 1984

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday morning? We were having a conversation between us, a conversation about the great problems of life, a conversation about the society in which we live, and all the travail of human life - the pain, the fears, the anxieties, the pleasures and the sorrows, and the innumerable hurts, psychological wounds that we receive from childhood until we die. And we were also talking about together, as two friends walking along a road, where there is no traffic, along a lane perhaps in the woods, and generally as friends do, talk about their own lives. And during the conversation between these two friends, they talked about freedom, how little freedom man has, though he thinks he has, how actually freedom is denied to man throughout the world, how he is conditioned by various cultures, doctrines, faiths, beliefs, and all the impressions that one receives from various media, and so on.

One is saying to the other, there is no actual freedom. Unless there is real deep psychological freedom man is going to destroy himself. And freedom means also love. The etymological meaning, amongst other meanings is to have great love, love. And also with that love goes passion. Not enthusiasm, not lust, not total expression of one's own desires, but that quality of passion that comes when one really understands the deep significance of living, and with the ending of sorrow. And out of this passion and freedom comes action. And the other man says to his friends, life is really very complex and we must surely approach it simply so that we really penetrate, not merely intellectually or emotionally, sentimentally, but penetrate very deeply, if it is possible, into the whole psychological world which very, very few people have gone into, or investigated or are concerned, or even moderately committed.

Unless one is really seriously concerned, human beings will always be in conflict with each other. We talked about it together yesterday morning, the ending of conflict. We said also that conflict cannot end through any kind of determination, any activity of thought or desire, but to observe what is the nature and the structure of conflict. The essence of conflict is, we said yesterday, these two friends were talking together, we said yesterday, wherever there is division, whether it is nationalistic, racial, class, or the division between man and woman - psychological division, though physiological division does exist, but the psychological division is the basic factor of conflict. Whether that division can be totally, not bridged over, but ended. And we also said together, that it can end completely if one observes the actual conflict one is in. Not direct that observation, not react to what one is observing, but actually observe without any psychological responses. And the other says, it is very, very difficult to do that because all our conditioning both linguistically and generally is to immediately respond, react, verbally, emotionally or with some ideological concepts. So it becomes very difficult to observe the actual fact of conflict. It is like giving your whole attention to what is conflict and trying to penetrate it and end it.

Attention is like a flame which burns away the actual fact, not the theoretical fact but the actuality of the fact. We talked over together yesterday morning about this.

And also we are saying to each other, that one has to be very serious in life, and very few people are. They want to be entertained, they want to be cajoled, directed, influenced, told what to do and so on. It is very difficult to penetrate without all these pressures, to understand oneself. The understanding of oneself is important, not according to some psychologists or philosophers, or the latest psychiatrist, but rather putting all the experts and authorities, from the ancient days to the present time - whether it is Zen, Buddhist, Hindu or Christian - putting away all those various forms of authorities to look at ourselves, pay attention to every thought, not let one thought go by without understanding why it is there.

All this requires a sense of deep psychological discipline. The word discipline, etymologically, comes from the word disciple. The disciple is one who is willing to learn, not conform, not obey, not adjust himself to what is being said, not to accept, but to learn. And learning is not merely memorizing, storing in the brain what you have heard and hold it as memory. Memory is very limited; you can expand memory, add to it through more knowledge and so on, which we talked about yesterday. But to learn is like a flow of a river that is constantly moving, running at great speed. And to observe, that very observation is discipline.

So we are going together, this morning, being serious, not desiring to be entertained religiously, or emotionally, or intellectually, we are together, if you will, walking down that lane, discussing, talking over together amicably, with a sense of affection, to explore, to look at the many problems that we have psychologically, because if we understand psychologically first then we can shape the outer. But unfortunately more and more the outer is becoming so extraordinarily important because of organizations, institutions of thousands of kinds, hoping thereby to radically change the human nature. So we should really for the moment put aside the outer institutions, impressions, foundations, and what the experts have said, and look very closely, because one must start very near, which is ourselves, to go very far.

And you and the speaker are going together on this very complex journey. And that demands that we hear each other, listen to each other. Not only listen to the words but also the content of the words, the meaning of the words, and because they are friends, they have known each other for many years, go beyond the words, understand non-verbally also. And this requires a great deal of attentive hearing, not just pushing aside those things which are not pleasant and only looking at those things which are pleasant.

So having said all this let us look together at our fears. We have had fear of living and dying for many, many millenia, from the ancient man to the present time. Fear has been one of our great problems. And we have never apparently given attention to the nature of fear, what's the cause of it. Why it arises, the background, the root of it. And the other friend says, are you saying, don't be concerned with the various forms of fear - fear of darkness, fear of public opinion, fear of what another might say, fear of one's own wife and husband and so on, fear of losing, fear of gaining, fear of tomorrow and of yesterday. We are not concerned with that kind of fear. It's like cutting off the branches of a tree but never understanding the root of that marvellous tree. So please, we are not concerned for the moment with the various aspects of fear. But only with what is the root of it.

Most of us perhaps one says, to the other, have never given thought to all this, never even concerned whether fear can ever end, or man must everlastingly, until the day of his dying, carry, live with fear. Whatever other people have said, heaven and hell, do the right thing and you will go heaven, do the wrong thing, hell, believe in this, if you don't you are a heretic and there is fear in all that. Religions have also been responsible for fear, and sustaining that fear, nourishing it. There is a temple in South India, very well known throughout that part of the country, there every third day the priests, the authorities of the temple, gather one million dollars every third day. And that's call religion. And that sustains fear because you pray, you make vows, you take vows hoping some good thing will happen to you. And so fear is bred, nourished, as all religions do. And we have never asked, questioned, enquired, if fear can ever end. And we are going this morning to ask that very question. Not only the external fear but also deeper, inward fears, in the very deep recesses of one's own brain. I hope - one hopes that you are also willing to go into this matter deeply. Not merely listen and agree, or disagree, which will have no effect at all, whether you agree or disagree. But the fact is that one is afraid. And whether that fear can ever end. That's really one of the great problems of life. Because if fear ends completely there is great, tremendous energy, which is wasted through all the travails of fear. And also there will be no need of churches, temples and mosques and gods. It is out of fear we have created heaven and hell. We have created all the mischief of religions.

The speaker is not an atheist, he is a religious man but does not belong to any religion, because of their network of superstitions, beliefs, dogmas and rituals. So together we are going to look into this matter of ending fear.

What is the cause of it? Where there is a cause there is an end to that cause. If one has a particular disease and knows the cause of that disease then that disease can be cured, healed. So if we can together find out the cause of it, the root, not the branches of fear, but the very root of it, that requires persistent, intense, investigation, committed to discover for oneself if fear can completely end, psychologically first. Fear of not having security psychologically, and all the rest of it. So what is the causation of fear? Is it not time? And it is important to understand, not only fear, but time as the factor, or the root of fear. Time as yesterday, time as today, time as tomorrow - sun rising, sun setting, light and darkness, time. Not only by the watch, chronological time but also time which thought has invented psychologically. That is, that you will be tomorrow different from what you are today. If you are violent today, pursue - the very idea of pursuit implies time - pursue the state in which violence doesn't exist.

So in our life time is very important - from here to there, from point to point, externally from being ignorant to becoming knowledgeable, from being a little man to a well known man, and all the rest of that business, outwardly. But also psychologically there is this time, which is the becoming: I am this, imperfect, violent, with all the travail of life, and one day I will be free of it all, that is tomorrow, or ten years later, when I will understand more. So time both outwardly and inwardly is a factor of our life.

Is that the major cause of fear, time?

Please, we are together investigating into this matter, not accepting, questioning, doubting what the speaker is saying. One is afraid of tomorrow, you may lose the job, there is so much unemployment, outwardly. Inwardly one seeks security, some ground on which one can stand firmly, to be certain where there is confusion. And most of us are confused, uncertain, psychologically. And through this confusion we try to establish either a concept which will give us security, or in our relationship with each other all that process is becoming. Becoming, the very word becoming, implies time. Is time, we are asking, one of the major factors of fear? Obviously it is. I am - one is afraid of dying - perhaps when one is ninety or a hundred, or something might happen to you: you might not succeed, you might be a failure and so on.

So time essentially, deeply, is one of the factors of fear. And time is also, if you go into it rather deeply, if you will, what is time? Not by the watch or the time of becoming, what exactly is time? The present, the now as you are sitting there, you are here, the present, in this hall, listening, in the now. What is that now? Doesn't the now, the present, contain the past, all the memories and so on, and also the future? I hope we are following each other. So the now contains all time - the past, the future and the present. And the now, if there is no fundamental psychological change or mutation, the future is what we are now. Surely that is clear. The word mutation biologically is a rather difficult word, but we will use it for convenience. Which is really deep psychological change, radical psychological revolution.

Time we are used to as evolution. We have evolved from the past, forty, fifty or more years, thousand years, and we have arrived at this stage through a long distance of time. And we have changed very, very little psychologically. We are very primitive, barbarous. We are using the word barbarous in its original sense. And time has not changed man. Biologically time has changed man from the ape until now. But time, which is evolution, has not brought in the psyche a total complete change, an ending of all the pain, the anxiety, fears and sorrows and all that, time has not changed it.

[Noise of baby crying] I am sorry! One agrees with that baby! It is rather bored.

Please, this is very important to understand, not just brush it off as some philosophical concept and push it aside because the now contains all time. The now is all your memories that you have accumulated during the past fifty, eighty, ninety years. The now is also the future because you are going to continue with your memories, with your images, with your selfishness, with all that human beings have gathered.

So time becomes the enemy of man if there is no radical change now - that is if you rely on time. And is not also time thought? Is not the root of fear also thought? I am this, I must be that. Or I might fail. We talked yesterday together about the beginning of thought, how it arises through memory. Memory is the accumulated knowledge, knowledge is expansive and so on. And there can be no knowledge unless there is experience. So knowledge, experience - knowledge is limited, as experiences are, whether you have experience of god, or this or that, and the knowledge is limited so thought is limited. And thought, as we said, is a material process, and so thought of losing something, gaining something, the thought of becoming something, so thought is a movement like time. So thought, time is the root of fear. That's a fact, an irrevocable fact, an actuality. One really sees that. And one asks, is it possible to end all fear? Which is, uproot the nature of time, and so end time - please listen to it - and also the end of thought? Because those two factors are one factor, which is time/ thought is the root of fear. If my friend, asks, can thought/time end, that seems rather absurd. I have to go to the office tomorrow, being Monday, I have to think, I have to write a letter, and to do anything I have to think. How can thinking stop? Or time stop? Which are both the same. One says, to the friend, you are putting a wrong question. Time and thought are necessary at a certain level. At the physical level time and thought are necessary. We have to go back from where we started. We have to accumulate knowledge in order to do anything skilfully. The accumulation of knowledge requires time, to learn a language requires time.

So time/thought are necessary at the physical level. But in the psychological area is time and thought necessary at all? Is there, to put it differently, a psychological becoming at all? We have said there is. That is, we have evolved from the ape to now, biologically we have evolved. So there must be psychological evolution. I am this, I will be that. We are questioning that very thing: is there psychological becoming at all? Which implies time. And time is the now in which the past, the present and the future are held, contained. Unless there is a radical change in the whole psychological content, which is the content of consciousness, you will be the same tomorrow. That again is a fact.

So knowing, observing all this, very closely, attentively, with all your passion and energy, that very attention puts an end to that becoming. Then there is an ending.

It is very important, if we have time, to understand the nature of ending. I do not know if you have ever asked yourself what is ending, coming to an end. Not a continuity after ending, because we are so concerned with continuity. That is the form of tradition, various forms of political structure, organizations and so on. It is really a very complex problem this, I don't know if we should go into it now, but you should, if one may, suggest, ask yourself, what is ending.

So if one is aware, attentive to this whole process of time/ thought, which is the root of fear, observe it, don't run away from it, live with it, hold this thing in your hand, as it were. It's like a precious jewel which you hold, and you are looking at it, observing it, which means giving your attention. As you observe with this attentive passion that very attention puts an end psychologically to this becoming, which is of time and thought.

We also, if we have time, should talk about suffering. Not about pleasure, that's fairly simple. And every man throughout the world is pursuing pleasure. Pleasure of possession, pleasure of power, pleasure of status, pleasure of ownership, pleasure of sex, pleasure of being somebody in this stupid world, this world which is becoming more and more insane because we have created this insanity, with pleasure. And man has pursued that endlessly - endless pleasure, seeking god, illumination, enlightenment. That's the ultimate pleasure. There you completely hope you will be satisfied, gratified. Enlightenment is not of time. It isn't a process, it isn't something you achieve through meditation. Enlightenment is the ending of time, which we will go into if we have time when we talk about meditation.

So we must concern ourselves with sorrow and death. Sorry to talk about death on a lovely morning in a beautiful hall, where the sea is shining and you can see the hills in the far distance, miles away, and the beauty of the earth. To talk about death seems rather morbid, but it is not. And so suffering is one of the factors, like pleasure and fear. And man has never ended sorrow. The sorrow of the whole of mankind. Not one's own particular sorrow but the sorrow of man, of human beings. Wherever you go on this earth, from the most primitive little village to the highly sophisticated cities, there is always behind the door, behind the curtains, this sorrow. Sorrow which has been brought about by slaughter of man through wars, the maimed, the tears, the appalling brutality of wars, of killing other human beings. People have demonstrated against a particular kind of war, demonstrated against the nuclear bombs, but human beings and religions have never said, no more, don't kill others. We all talk about peace, churches and the religions talk about loving your neighbour, which all becomes such nonsense. When religions support war, in these wars for the last five to six thousand years of historical wars man has suffered, ached, tears and we are still carrying on with the same sorrow and brutality. Is there an end to sorrow? Or man must everlastingly carry on with sorrow because where there is sorrow there can be no love. Where there is sorrow there can be no compassion with its extraordinary intelligence. Where there is sorrow you cannot understand the nature of death. With the ending of sorrow there is passion. Passion isn't something to be cultivated. Passion isn't something that arises from fear, from pleasure. Only when sorrow ends there is that passion, with its extraordinary action in daily life.

So one can see what is the cause of sorrow. There are many causes, but only one cause, which is the 'me', the 'I', the persona, my consciousness. In that consciousness where there is a shock, where there is a great crisis which cannot be solved, in that consciousness there is felt the utter emptiness of life as lived by human beings, as now, the shallowness, the superficiality of all this. Those are the various causes of sorrow - the sorrow of losing one's son, the husband, the wife, the friend. Suddenly feeling the utter loneliness, the despair, the sense of utter insecurity. We all know this. And there is no ending of it. We have never said, can it all end? And one friend says to the other, don't run away seeking comfort from sorrow, don't analyse it, because the analyser is the analysed, the analyser himself is sorrow, and so he cannot understand sorrow. But hold that sorrow as you hold something precious in your hand and look at it. Give attention to it. Give all you being to live with sorrow and find out. Then you will see out of that observation closely, attentively, with a sense of freedom, there is the ending of complete sorrow. It is only then out of that there is love and compassion with its great intelligence.

We also ought to talk over death. Sorry! Again human beings throughout the world have never understood, or gone into the question of death. The Christians believed in a certain resurrection, and the Asiatic and India has spread over all Asia, at one time. And there they believe in reincarnation. I am this, my life has been painful, sorrowful, I have done things wrong, wicked and all the rest of it. Give me another chance next life. When I die I will be reborn. But that belief which is very comforting becomes utterly meaningless if next life is what you are now, with certain modifications, what matters is what you are now. And those who believe in those theories, which is supported by various so-called experiences, they never give importance to the life which is now. If they really believed in reincarnation they would be totally concerned how they lived now, how they behaved, what is their morality, how they act, and all that. But they don't do that. It is a very comforting theory, and they play with it, like all illusions.

So we are concerned with death. What is death? Old age, disease, accident, and the ending, both biologically, organically, the physical ending, and the ending of all the things which we are attached to - ending our memories, our status, our power, money and so on - the ending. And that ending is also the ending of me, the self, the things that one has accumulated, the precious memories, the experience which one has enjoyed and has given power. All those come to an end. Obviously, you cannot carry your money, however rich you are. So what is death? Is that ending? And no future? Please, give your attention to this, if you will, because we are all going to die, every one of us. That is inevitable, that is a fact. And we cling to our life, to our memories, living is the complications and the various forms of memories. Living is also going to the office day after day for the next fifty years. Living is also have a relationship with others, intimate or otherwise, in which there is constant struggle, battle. Living is also achieving, becoming known and famous and all that rubbish. All this is considered living. The travail, the pain, the loneliness, the depression, the uncertainty, the wars, hatreds, wounds. This is called living. Which again is a fact.

So we cling to the known. That's all we cling to, the known, clinging to all the knowledge that we have. And death is the unknown. So we are frightened, not only frightened of living but also frightened of dying. Aren't you frightened of living? That is, frightened you might lose your job, and so on and so on, fear - which we have gone into previously. So the living is the known and dying is the unknown, what happens after, or the ending of the known. The known is what we are attached to - attached to your wife, to your husband, to your memories, to your books, to your knowledge, attached to the known. You are attached to your books, your desk, your old antique furniture - aren't you? What you are attached to, you are. Right? If you are attached to that marvellous old furniture of 15th century, you are that desk - the memory of ownership. So attachment is a fact. And death comes along and cuts it, wipes it away. And the question then is, can we live - please listen to this, if you will kindly, we are not advocating suicide, which is absurd, but to end attachment, which is the end of death. That is to live together, living and dying - day in and day out, night after night, night and day, living with death, which is the ending of attachment. That requires tremendous attention, and great inward quality of discipline. Probably you have never asked this question: living with death. There are the philosophers both in the East and the West, who said, you know you are going to die, live with that knowledge. But we are saying quite the opposite. Because we are a bundle of memories and we are attached to those memories.

Attachment. Can you voluntarily, easily, happily, without any causation end something which you hold most dear? Attachment. Because attachment breeds fear, uncertainty. Attachment breeds jealousy, antagonism, hatred.

So to live with ending and living together. If you have done it, it is the most extraordinary thing. That is real freedom.

Now we will talk about religion and meditation. The speaker puts religion and meditation at the end of the talks because to find out what is most sacred in life, and what is meditation, to find that out there must be no fear. There cannot possibly be any selfish motive of achievement, of gaining, of becoming. So he puts meditation and religion at the end of it, at the end of the talks.

So let us enquire together - we have a little time still - what is religion? Why man throughout the ages from the most ancient of days, to the present time, why is he wanting, searching, longing to find out if there is something more than this physical existence, beyond all the misery, confusion, uncertainty, depression and sorrow, is there something beyond and above all this? That has been his eternal search. And from the ancient days the man, the clever man says - in those days only the few wrote and studied, they became the priests - they said, we will tell you, we will lead you, we will help you to find that. And so they invented rituals, dogmas, faith, their peculiar dresses, their tremendous power over man. I do not know if you are aware of it. Tremendous power. And their thoughts have invented all the business of religious structure, with their wealth, with their property, with all their emotional, sentimental, romantic superstitions right through the world, whether they be Christians or Hindus or Buddhists, or the Tibetans, or the Islamic world. This is what is called religion - faith, obey, follow, believe. And in ancient India they said to find that which is truth, which is not invented by thought there must be scepticism, there must be doubt, there must be enquiry, not belief. Belief is an impediment, faith is an impediment. We are saying this.

So all the things that thought has put together, which is called religion, is a material process, there is nothing whatsoever sacred about it. So there must be freedom from the organized, structured believing world of religion to find out, or come upon that state which is timeless. That means also: what is meditation? Not how to meditate. The gurus from various sects and religions and priests, have laid down certain systems of meditation, practices. One wonders if you have noticed every system, political, religious, economic, every kind of system has inherently the seed of decay, every system. This seed of decay is re-organized - politically, religiously, adjusting itself, but the seed is always there in any system, in any practice.

So what is meditation? If you put aside all the nonsense that is going on in this word brought by Asiatics or others, if you put aside all that, doubt all that, question, tear it to pieces to find out, then you ask: what is meditation? Is it necessary? Conscious meditation, a deliberate process of it, sitting cross legged, repeating various mantras, going into contemplation, giving certain time to it, it is a deliberate activity of thought. Thought says, if I meditate I will be happy, or I will become calm to do more mischief! Deliberate action of meditation [noise of baby crying] - I am sorry for the people who have to leave with the child. Any form of deliberate meditative practice is like any other form of desire.

Desire is a very complex problem, which we do not have time to go into. Briefly desire, the origin of desire, the beginning of desire, is when sensation, physical sensation, which is reaction, that sensation is shaped by thought. Then at that second desire begins. You understand this? Probably you don't, it needs explanation - I hope we have time. Can you give more time, you don't mind if we sit a little longer?

You see we have to understand desire. We are driven by desire - desire for so many things. It is one of our most powerful urges. What is desire? Desire - I can't go into it very deeply because we have to talk about other things - sensation is normal, you feel, touch, taste, after that there is sensation. You see something beautiful in the window and you go inside, look at it more closely. That is sensation. Then thought comes along and says, if I had that picture, that painting on my wall, how marvellous it would be. So when thought takes possession of sensation through creating an image then desire is born. Leave it at that because it is complex.

So when you meditate consciously, it is another form of desire to achieve some end. The end is silence, quietness. And the end is to have more energy, tremendous energy. The Zen practices, which is to have such tremendous attention out of which is born energy, and you practise, practise, practise, pay attention for years, and you have that - which is another form of desire. And also you want a quiet mind, a quiet brain so that you can be more peaceful, quiet, still. This is another form of desire. And they have said that if you are very still and very quiet you might find something. So you practise, twenty minutes or thirty minutes a day, in the morning, afternoon, evening. It's like taking a drug, a drink, or having a siesta when you are quiet. All that is not meditation. Obviously it is the activity of thought.

So is there - please ask this question of yourself - is there meditation which is not conscious, which is not deliberate? Then only when it is not deliberate, when it is part of your daily life - attentive, attention to everything that you are doing in daily life, attention to every thought, not letting one thought escape, without understanding it, going into it, so that the brain becomes extraordinarily active, not mechanical as it is now, extraordinarily alive, full of energy. And where there is the highest form of energy there is silence. That energy is not yours or mine, it is this tremendous energy, which is nameless, which is timeless. And in that energy - or that very energy is the supreme thing that man has sought, which is the most sacred. And when that sacredness is, then we behave righteously in our daily life. This is meditation.

BOMBAY 1ST PUBLIC TALK 2ND FEBRUARY 1985

This is a dialogue between us, a conversation between two friends. So this is not a lecture to instruct, inform or guide. We are going to talk over together many things, certainly not to convince you of anything; not a propaganda; not to inform you of new ideas or new concepts, conclusions or ideals. We are going, together, to look at this whole world as it is; not only this part of the world but also what is happening in the rest of the world. Together. And the speaker means together. You and he are going to observe, without any bias, without any prejudice, what is happening globally. So please, this is a serious talk, not intellectual, verbal or emotional or devotional. But one must exercise our brains. We must have scepticism, doubt, question and not accept anything that anybody says; including all your gurus, sacred books and all the rest of it. Because we are coming to a crisis in the world. The crisis is not merely economic or war, but rather psychological. Because we have lived on this earth for over 50,000 years or a million years. During this long period of time we've passed through every kind of catastrophe, every kind of war. Civilizations have disappeared, cultures, shaping the behaviour of human beings. There have been a great many leaders: political, religious, and all the tricks they have played on human beings. And during this enormous evolution of human brain, we are what we have been - rather primitive, barbarous, cruel, and preparing always for war. Every nation now is storing up armaments. Probably you know all this. And we human beings are caught in this - in the wheel of time. And we have not changed very much. We are still barbarians, believing all kinds of superstitions, all kinds of beliefs, following various leaders; political, religious and your own local gurus. And at the end of it all, where are we? You may have money - especially in this town - money and power are the most important things.

Please, as we said, we are talking over together. It's not the speaker explaining all this. It's so obvious. But together, you and I - and the speaker, examine, very carefully, diligently, examine what we have become and what we are. And one asks, will time change us? Will time, that is, another million years or 50,000 years, will time change the human mind, human brain? Or time is not important at all? So we are going to talk about all these things. We are going to talk about: human beings are wounded psychologically. Human beings throughout the world are caught in great sorrow, pain, suffering, loneliness, despair. And the brain has created the most extraordinary things - both ideologically, technologically, religiously. Built the most extraordinary beautiful monuments. The brain, which is our brain - yours and the speaker's brain - is extraordinarily capable. Right? And that capacity is very limited. Because technologically we are advancing at an extraordinary speed, and psychologically, inwardly - if I may use the word, and I hope, one hopes you won't mind that word which I personally dislike, the word spiritual. I see a lot of you are here with necklaces and all kinds of dresses. And inwardly, psychologically, we are very primitive. We are barbarians; cruel, thoughtless, careless, indifferent to what is happening, and indifferent to all the corruption, not only environmentally but the corruption that goes on in the name of religion, in the name of politics and business and so on.

Corruption is not passing money under the table or smuggling goods into this country. Corruption begins where there is self-interest. Right? Where there is self interest, that is the origin of corruption. Are we thinking together or are you merely listening to the speaker? Are you going together as two friends, taking a long journey? Journey into the global world; journey into ourselves; into what we are, what we have become, why we have become what we are. And this requires, to take this journey together, not the speaker takes it and points it out to you, the map, the road and the way; but rather, together. And I - the speaker means together, because he is not a guru. One should not follow anybody in the world of thought, in the world of the psyche. We have depended so much on others to help us. There it is. And we are not helping you. Let us be very clear on that point. The speaker is not helping you because you've had helpers galore. And you have not been able to stand alone, think out things for ourselves, look at the world and our relationship to the world, whether we're individuals at all or part of great humanity. We have not exercised our brain, which is so extraordinarily capable. And we have expended our energy, our capacities, our intellectual understanding in one direction only; that is, the technological world. But we've never understood human behaviour; why we are as we are after this long period of evolution.

And as the speaker said just now, he is not helping. We are together looking, understanding. Because help implies - psyche, we are talking of the psyche - of course you need help to go to a doctor or a surgeon; you depend on governments, however rotten they are;

you depend on your postman and the milkman and so on; but to ask help through prayer, through meditation, seems so utterly futile. You have had such help. You've had thousands of gurus and thousands of books; so-called religious and non-religious, psychological and so on. And in spite of them all we are helpless. You may earn a lot of money, big houses, cars and so on. But psychologically, inwardly, subjectively - which we are going to talk about, most of the time - we are almost helpless; because we've depended on other people to tell us what to do, what to think. So please, the speaker is saying this most respectfully, seriously, earnestly: he is not trying to help you. On the contrary we are together, and the speaker means together, you and he, not only observing impartially what is going on in the world but also why, after all this long period of time, we still remain cruel, brutal, indifferent, callous, frightened, seeking security, hoping our roots will not be disturbed. And together - you and the speaker - using, exercising their brain, investigate all this. As we said, not only our relationship with the world which is becoming more and more complex, our relationship to various nations, our relationship to each other, however intimate it might be, our relationship to an ideal, our relationship to so-called god, our relationship to a guru - if you have one; I hope you haven't. And enquire seriously, deeply into the quality of the brain that comprehends or has an insight, grasp of the whole outward and psychological world in which we live. If this is clear: that we are not trying to point out a way, method, a system or in any way trying to help you. On the contrary, we are independent human beings. This is not a cruel statement or indifferent statement. It's like two friends talking over together, both of them trying to understand not only the world, that is, the environment, and all the complications of the economic world, the separate religions, separate nationalities. But also together as two friends talking over their problems. If we can start from there - two friends. Friendship means that they are not trying to persuade each other, not trying to coerce or trying to impress each other. They are friends and therefore there is a certain quality of affection, understanding, exchange. We are in that position.

So we first begin: what is our brain? The speaker is not a brain specialist, but he has talked with the brain specialists. And the brain, which is inside the skull, is a most extraordinary instrument. It has acquired tremendous knowledge about almost everything. It has invented the most incredible things, like the computer, like quick communication, instruments of war. And it is free there to investigate, to invent, to search out, research; it is entirely free. And it starts with knowledge, accumulating more and more knowledge; if a certain theory doesn't work, they drop it, and go on adding more and more and more knowledge. And it is not equally free to enquire into oneself. It is conditioned, shaped, programmed. Right? It is programmed to be a Hindu, to be a Muslim, to be a Christian, Buddhist and so on. Like a computer, the human brain is programmed: that you must have war, that you belong to a certain group, your roots are in this part of the world and so on. This is correct. This is not exaggeration. All of us are programmed by tradition, by constant repetition of newspapers, magazines, gurus and thousands of years of pressure, impressions. Our brain, free in one direction, in the world of technology, but that very brain, which is so extraordinarily capable, is limited by its own self-

Are we together or am I talking Greek? Would you kindly find out for yourself if you are really like two friends, understanding each other? Or is only one man talking and the other fellow doesn't talk at all? Or is there an observation of one's reactions to all that is being said: one's response to this truth that you're programmed; to be a Jew, to be Muslim, to be a Hindu, to be a Buddhist? So our brain being programmed, being conditioned in one direction which is amazingly free, psychologically it is a cripple. And is it possible for the human brain to be entirely free, so that it has tremendous energy; not to do more mischief, not to have more money, power and all that rot - though you must have money - but to be free to enter, enquire, find out a way of life in which there is no fear, no loneliness, no sorrow and enquire into the nature of death and meditation and truth? Is it possible for the human brain, which has been conditioned for thousands of years, to be entirely free? Or must human being everlastingly be slaves, never knowing what freedom is? Not abstract freedom but freedom from conflict; because we live in conflict from childhood till we die. That's one fact for all human beings: this constant struggle, both religiously seeking security and therefore never finding insecurity, or being insecure, wanting security. So we are going together, to find out for ourselves - for ourselves, not depend on others to tell you how to live without conflict, whether it is possible for human beings living in the modern world, with all the complexities of this society, to live without a shadow of conflict. Because conflict distorts the brain, spirit, lessens its capacity, its energy. It soon wears itself out. You can observe it in yourself as you grow older; this perpetual conflict. And why do we have conflict? Please ask yourself, don't just listen. Find out for yourself why we live in conflict; not only with our wives and husbands but with our gurus. Because you want to be like them and therefore that's a conflict. Why this conflict, which becomes more and more intense, which is war, why human beings - you - live in conflict.

What is conflict? Oh please don't wait for me to answer it. That's no fun at all, but if you ask yourself that question and give your mind to find out, what is the nature of conflict? Conflict exists surely when there is duality. Right? There is me and you. Right? When there is my wife separate from me. When there is this division between the meditator and meditation. Are you following all this? I hope all this interests you, does it? So as long as there is division between nationalities, between religions, between people, between the ideal and the fact, between 'what is' and 'what should be' there must be conflict. That's a law. Wherever there is separation, the sense of division as the Arab and the Jew, the Hindu and the Muslim, you know all the division that goes on, not only in the world but also between families; between the son and the father. You know all this don't you? So wherever there is division, there must be conflict. That's a fact. That division is the 'more'. You understand? One does not know, but, give me a few years I will know. I hope you understand all this? Nous sommes d'accord? Who has created this division between 'what is' and 'what should be', between the Arab and the Jew, between the Hindu and the Muslim, between the guru and the disciple? There is this division between so-called god, if there is such an entity, and yourself. Wanting peace and being in conflict. Right? This is the actual reality of our daily life. And the speaker is asking, as you must be asking too, who has created this division; not only externally but inwardly. Please ask yourselves this question. Who is responsible for all this mess? For all this endless struggle, endless pain, loneliness, despair, a sense of sorrow from which man seems to have never escaped. Who is responsible for all this? Who is responsible for the society in which we live - the society, our modern society with all its complexities? There is this immense poverty in this country. Immense. And there are all the social workers. You understand all this? Or we have never thought about it at all, or we are so occupied with our own meditations, with our own gods, with our own problems, that we have never looked at all this, never asked?

There are several things involved in all this. Man has always sought - those who are fairly intelligent, fairly aware, sensitive - can there be egalitarian society ever? You understand? No class difference, equal opportunity; so that there is no division between the worker and the manager, the carpenter and the politician. There are differences technologically but as human beings. And one of the problems too is, is there justice in the world? We are asking, is there justice in the world? And there have been revolutions - French, recent communist revolution, Bolshevik revolution, trying to establish a society where there is equality, where there is justice, where there is goodness. And they have not succeeded at all. On the contrary they have gone back to the old pattern in a different setting. So we have to enquire not only why human beings live in perpetual conflict and sorrow and the search for security, but also we should enquire together into the nature of justice. If there is any justice at all in the world. Is there? You're clever, I'm not, another is not. You've got all the privileges and another has none whatsoever. You live in palatial houses and another lives in a hut, hardly having one meal a day. And if you are rich you can hire lawyers. And you know that business very well. And so, is there justice at all? And isn't it important to find out for oneself and therefore help humanity? I am sorry, I don't mean 'help', I withdraw that word. And so, when you understand the nature of justice, is there any justice at all? To find that out one must enquire very, very deeply into the nature of sorrow, whether there can be no self-interest at all. And also should enquire, as we shall during these talks, during these conversations rather, what is freedom and what is goodness?

So, who has created this extraordinary complex society? The division among religions, the division of nations, divisions between the intimate and those who are not intimate and so on? Right? Who has created all this? If the speaker can go into it - not as an informer, not as an instructor, not someone who is telling you, "it is so, therefore accept it" - but you and the speaker are exercising their brains, their intelligence, their capacity to find out. The question is, who has created all this? One can understand the society is created by every human being. The society in which we live is created by every human being through their greed, through their envy, through their aggression, through their search for security. We have created this society in which we live and then we become slaves to that society. Right? Are you following all this? Not following - do you understand all this? No? What am I to do if you don't understand this very simple fact that we human being have created our culture, our society, our religions, our gods, all that? We human beings, out of fear, out of our loneliness, in our search for security, never understanding what is insecurity but always wanting security. They have never gone into the question of what is religion, whether it is possible to break away from tradition and find out. So to come back, who has created this division? Because where there is division there is conflict. That is an absolute certainty. So, is it not thought? Think it out sir. Put your brains into it. Is it not thought that has divided the world as the Christians, the Buddhists, the Jews and the Arabs, the Hindu, Muslim? Is it not thought? Then, one asks, what is thought?

Thought is the action by which we live. Thought is our central factor of action. Right? Thought, by which we live to make money. Thought, to separate me and you; my husband and my wife; the ideal and 'what is'. Is it not thought? Then, what is thought? What is thinking? Is not thinking the activity of memory? Please sirs, don't accept a thing the speaker is saying. One must have this quality of doubt. Doubt your own experiences, your own ideas, why you put on these garlands, why you do certain things. Doubt. Question. And not just merely accept. So please do not, under any circumstances, accept what the speaker is saying. He is saying as a friend - to whom you can listen or not listen as you please - he is saying, thought has created this division. Thought has been responsible for wars. Thought has been responsible between all the gods man has invented. Thought has been responsible to put man on the moon, to create a computer. Thought has been responsible for all the extraordinary things that they are doing in the technological world, which we won't go into now. And thought is responsible for this division between 'what is' and 'what should be'. And thought is responsible for that conflict between 'what is' and 'what should be'. 'What should be' is the ideal, something to be achieved, something to be gained; away from 'what is'. For example, human beings are violent. That's an obvious fact. And during the long period of time, man is not free of violence. But he has invented non-violence. Right? He has invented it and he is pursuing that; he acknowledges he's violent - if he is at all honest. He is violent and he is in the pursuit of a so-called ideal called non-violence. And therefore in that pursuit, in that achieving non-violence, he is sowing the seeds of violence all the time, naturally. This is a fact. This country has talked a great deal about non-violence. This is rather shameful, because we are all violent people. Violence is not merely physical. Violence is a form of imitation, conformity, away from 'what is'. So violence can only end completely in the human mind, human heart, when there is no opposite. The opposite is the non-violence which is not real, which is another escape from violence. If you don't escape, then there is only violence. Right? And we have not been able to face that fact. And we are always running away from this fact: finding excuses, finding economic reasons, finding, oh, innumerable methods to overcome violence, but still violence. The very overcoming is a part of violence. So to face violence, you must give attention to it, not run away from it. Right? See what it is. See the violence between man and woman, both sexually, in different ways. Is there not violence when you are seeking more and more and more? Becoming more and more. So, to look at violence and remain with it, not run away from it, not try to suppress it or transcend it - all that implies conflict. But to live with it, look at it, in fact, treasure it. Not translate it according to your want and dislike or like. Just to look and observe with great attention. We won't go into for the moment, what is attention. Let's leave that. It's very simple, though it sounds complex. When one gives attention to something completely, it's like turning on a bright light. And then you see all the qualities, the subtleties, the implications, the whole world of violence. When you see something very clearly, then it's gone. Because we refuse to see things clearly. So we are asking, who has created this complex conflict of human beings with each other, with the environment, with gods, everything? We are saying thought has done that.

Have you ever considered why you think you are an individual? Are you an individual? Or you've been programmed to think you are an individual? Right? Your consciousness is like every other human being's consciousness: you suffer, you're lonely, you're afraid, you're seeking pleasure, avoiding pain. It is so with every human being on earth. That's a fact, psychological fact. You may be tall, you may be dark, you may be light. Those are all external frills of climate, food and so on. And culture too is external. But psychologically, subjectively, our consciousness is similar to, common, one with all other human beings. You mightn't like it. But that's a fact. So, psychologically you are not separate from the rest of humanity. You are humanity. Don't say, "yes". Then it has no meaning, you merely accept it as an idea. But it is such a tremendous fact that you are the rest of mankind, not somebody separate. You may have a better brain, more wealth, cunning, better looking, but put aside all that - those are surface things, they're all frills. But inwardly every human being on this earth is one in sorrow with you. Do you know when you realize that what it means? No, you wouldn't. You'd make it into an idea or an ideal and pursue it. It requires - it implies when you say you're the rest of humanity, it means you have tremendous responsibility. It implies great affection, love, compassion, not some silly idea that you're 'One'. So, we're saying, as two friends talking things over, that thought has been responsible. Thought has created the most extraordinary things - outwardly, in the world of action, in the world of daily life, thought has brought about great convenience, sanity and also insanity, and also the means of war and so on. So, we must enquire together, what is thinking? And why has thinking become so extraordinarily important.

Thinking cannot exist without memory. Right? If there is no memory, there is no thought. Our brain - which is one with all the rest of humanity, not separate little brains, which is such rot - our brains are conditioned by knowledge, by memory. And knowledge, memory are based on experience - both in the scientific world and the subjective world. Right? Our experiences however subtle, however so-called spiritual and all that business, both scientific and personal experience are always limited. And so our knowledge, which is the outcome of experience, is also limited. We are adding, scientifically, in this world of science, more and more and more. Right? Where there is addition, that which is being added to is limited. Right? I'm sorry if you are bored. Are you. You're yawning. Good God, what kind of people are you? Sir, please we are saying something very serious. If you're bored go to sleep. Go to sleep here. If you're tired lean on somebody and go to sleep. But this requires a great deal of energy, thought, enquiry, doubt. So we're saying that experience being limited and therefore knowledge is always limited, either now or in the past or in the future. And knowledge means memory, either the memory which is held in the computer or the memory held inside our brain. So our brain is memory. And that memory directs thought. This is a fact. So, thought is always limited. Right? Please? This is logical, rational, nothing invented. This is so. Experience is limited, therefore knowledge is limited. And knowledge is part of memory, and memory is the activity of thought. Thought cannot exist without memory. Don't yawn sir. If you are tired, go to sleep. Yes sir. I wonder if it's worth talking at all, having a conversation with you when you're not really serious. Well, it's up to you. You know, you can take the horse to the pool but the horse has to drink.

So thought, being limited, has created the world and divided the world, because it is limited it has broken up the world. Right? Like the Arab and Jew, the Hindu, Muslim, the Christian, the Buddhist, the Hindu and so on, the Sikh, it is the activity of thought, which is in itself always limited, and must create division and therefore conflict. Right? Right? Then you will say, "Is there any other activity which is not divisive, which is not fragmentary, which doesn't break up?" Right? Are you asking that question or am I putting that question to you? Is there a holistic activity that can never break up as a Hindu, me, you? It's the division which creates conflict. Right? Now, how are you going to find out? How are you going to find out for yourself, seeing that thought is divisive, thought creates conflict, thought has created the society and you apart from the society, which you have created, and so on and on and on? That's the only instrument we've had so far. You may say there is another instrument which is intuition, which can be desire, that can be modified, explained, irrational too. I can believe I have an intuition or one has an intuition that one is a - what? Napoleon? Or a guru? You can invent anything, live in any illusion.

So, we're asking very seriously if one has understood the nature of thought? Is there any other action or a way of living which is never fragmentary, never broken up as the world and me, and me and the world. You understand? Is there such a state of brain or a state of non-brain which is so completely holistic, whole? Right? We're going to find out, if you are serious, if you are free to be, if you throw away everything that you've accumulated - not physical things, but please don't throw away your bank account. You won't anyhow! But psychologically put away everything that you have collected. That's going to be very difficult. That means there must be freedom. Freedom, you know the word 'freedom' etymologically also means 'love'. When there is freedom at such enormous depths and boundless, there is also love. And to find that out or to come upon that holistic way of living in which there is no self-interest - self-interest is divisive. Right? I wonder if you understand all this? As we said at the beginning, self-interest is the origin, the beginning of corruption; whether that self-interest be in the name of god, in the name of meditation or prayer, seeking power. Where there is self-interest, there is corruption, there is something dreadful that is going on. So to find that out or to come up on it, there must be freedom from the friction, the conflict in relationship. Right?

We live by relationship. You may live in the Himalayas or in a monastery or live by yourself in a little hut or in a palace; you cannot live without relationship. Relationship implies, 'to be related to', 'to be in contact with', not physically only, not sexually only, but to be completely in contact with another. You understand all this? But we are never completely related to another. Even in the most intimate relationship - man and woman - each is pursuing his own particular ambition, his own particular fulfilment - right? - his own way of living opposed to the other and so on. In this relationship there is always conflict, like two parallel lines never meeting. Face the fact. And, what creates conflict between two human beings? In your relationship with your wife, with your husband, with your children - which is the most intimate relationship - what is it that creates conflict? Ask yourselves sir? What creates conflict between you and your guru? Is it not that you have an image about your wife and she has an image about you? Right? That image has been built very, very carefully during a short period or a very long period. So the image, the picture, the concept as your wife and your husband, guru and non-guru, all that business, this constant recording. You are following all this? Constant recording of the brain in relationship with another, this recording is the picture of your wife or your husband or the politician or your guru. It's the picture that you have created about him, as you are creating a picture about the speaker. And therefore that picture divides, therefore, there is no relationship between you and the speaker. It's very simple. And especially so when you're living in the same house, and all the turmoil. And to escape from all that you become a monk or whatever it is. But you have your own problems there too. You have your own conflicts, your own desires, your own pursuits, which becomes again conflict. Right? So can one live - please listen to this, give your attention little bit at least - can you live without a single image between you and another? No image at all. Have you ever tried it? If you do - not try it - see the logic of it, the sanity of it, that as long as there is a picture-making machine going on, which is recording the insult, the flattery, saying, "what a marvellous person you are" and so on, all that is creating the image about another. and that image is the divisive factor. Right? That image is created by thought. "She hurt me", "she wasn't kind this morning", and so on and on. So is it possible to live without a single image? Not only the image made out of stone but also the image of your wife, of your guru, of nobody. Then you will find out what true relationship is. Because then there is no conflict at all in relationship. That is absolutely necessary for the brain to understand the limitation of thought and enquire into a holistic way of living that is completely non-fragmentary, not broken up.

Another factor in our life is, from our childhood we are being hurt psychologically. We are being wounded. From childhood we are trained to have problems. Right? Do you understand all this? We've talked for nearly for an hour. Shall I go on? Do you want me to go with this. Sir, the speaker is capable of talking of serious matters, as we did with a panditji, for hours. Because there was... But, if you are really serious and you've not talked about these things, you must be tired. Your brain must say, "well, that's enough. I'll take it up next day". But let's finish this. From childhood, when we are sent to school, there we have to learn how to write, how to read and all the rest of it. How to write becomes a problem to the child. Please follow this carefully. You will see in a minute. It becomes a problem. Mathematics becomes a problem. History becomes a problem. Chemistry. So he is educated from childhood to live with problems. Right? The problem of god, problem of a dozen things. So our brains are conditioned, trained, educated to live with problems. From childhood we have done this. So what happens when a brain is educated in problems? Please enquire. It can never solve problems. It can create more problems. You understand?

Audience: (Inaudible.)

K: Please sir, I'm sure there's going to be question and answer meeting on Tuesday morning. I don't know where but there's going to be. Then you can bombard me with all your questions. This is very important to understand. Because we're asking whether the brain can live a daily life in the modern world without a single problem. It's only then it can solve problems. Not a brain trained to have problems, to live with problems, then, when it solves one problem, in the very solution of that problem, it creates more problems - as they are doing politically. Right? I mean for you for example, if you meditate - I don't know why you meditate, if you do - it becomes a problem: how to keep your mind quiet, control it, practice, discipline, you know all the rest of that rubbish. That's not meditation.

So please listen. From childhood we are trained, educated to live with problems. And therefore being centred in problems, it can never solve any problem completely. It's only the free brain that is not conditioned to problems, that can solve problems. Vous avez compris? You understand this or not? Sir, it's one of our constant burdens to have all the time, problems, and therefore our brain is never quiet, free to observe, to look. So we're asking, is it possible not to have a single problem but to face problems? Because you're going to have plenty of problems. But to understand those problems and to totally resolve them, the brain must be free. Right? See the logic of it, because logic is necessary, reason is necessary. And then only you can go beyond reason, beyond logic. But if you are not logical, step by step by step, then you may deceive yourself all along and end up in some kind of illusion. So to find out a way of living that can face problems, resolve them and not be caught in problems. Yes sir, this requires a great deal of observation, attention, awareness to see that never a second you deceive yourself. Because there must be order, and order begins only when there is no problem, when there is freedom; not to do what you like - that's not freedom at all. Or to choose between this guru and that guru or between this book and that book - that's merely another form of confusion. No? Where there is choice there is no freedom. And choice only exists when the brain is confused. When the brain is clear, then there is no choice, only direct perception and right action.

May we go on with what we were talking about yesterday evening? I suppose you are here for me to talk, aren't you? So we have a talk. It's really not a talk at all but a conversation between us, a conversation between two friends: friends who are peculiar in themselves, friends who have known each other for a very long time; friends who are not trying to impress each other, who are not trying to convince each other about anything - they are just friends who have played golf together; who have taken walks and looked at the sky and the beautiful evening and the pleasant trees and the green lawns and the beautiful mountains. And they are talking over their intimate problems, problems which they have not been able to solve, issues that are confusing. Living in a modern world, with all the difficulties and turmoil and the vulgarity of it all, they are concerned what human beings are going to become, why they have taken a million years to be what they are now: unreasonable, superstitious, believing in anything, gullible and caught in organizations.

So these two friends, which are you and the speaker, are going to talk over things together. That is, you don't listen to the speaker, you are entering into his spirit, into his enquiry. So, you and the speaker have to exercise your brains as much as possible, not accept anything he says. Be sceptical, reasonable, question, enquire and if you will, together we will take a long journey, not only outwardly but inwardly, into the whole psychical world, the world of thought, the world of sorrow, the world of fear and all the travail of human kind. And so this is not a lecture to inform, to convince, to instruct. But rather, two together have a dialogue, a sense of conversation, never holding on to one's own particular form of belief or convictions, but exchanging, changing as they go along, not hold on or clutch to one's own experiences, superstitions and so on. So, you are that person, you are that friend with whom the speaker is talking, is having a conversation. So, there is no question of doing any kind of propaganda, nor trying to convince you of anything at all, but on the contrary, asking you to doubt, question, enquire - reasonably, logically, sanely, if that is possible. And as friends, they listen to each other.

Listening is an art which very few of us are capable of. We never actually listen. The word has a sound and we don't listen to the sound, we are always interpreting it, trying to translate the word into our own particular language or particular tradition, but we never listen acutely, without any distortion. So, the speaker suggests, perhaps respectfully, that you so listen. Not interpret what he says or translate what he says into your own particular terminology or according to your own knowledge, but listen. When you are telling a story, a rather exciting story to a little boy, he's listening with a tremendous sense of excitement, curiosity, full of energy. He wants to know what is going to happen. Who is the villain? Who is the heroine? And he will be waiting excitedly to the very end. And as we grown up people have lost all that capacity of curiosity, the sense of energy to find out, the energy that is required to see very clearly things as they are, without any distortion. And we never listen to each other. You never listen to your wife, do you? You know her much too well, or she you. There is not a sense of deep appreciation, friendship, amity, so that you listen to each other, whether you like or not, but you do listen. And if you listen so completely, that very listening, that very act of listening is a great miracle, because that listening, like seeing, observing, is very important.

We never observe. We observe things that are convenient, friendly. We observe if there is a reward or a punishment. I do not know if you have not noticed that our whole upbringing, education and our daily life, is based on, extraordinarily, one principle - reward and punishment. You meditate in order to be rewarded. You progress in order to be rewarded and so on. So here there is no reward or punishment, we are talking over things together. It's very important to understand this. When one is seeking a reward, both physically and psychologically, in that search for a reward there is also the punishment - if that reward is not satisfying. So, please, can we listen to each other, per se, for itself, not for something else. To listen, as you would listen to marvellous music or the song of a bird, with your heart, with your mind, with all the energy that one has. Then one can go very far. So we are going to talk over together where we left off yesterday evening.

Most human beings, all of us, seek security, and it takes many, many forms. Security is very important. If you are not secure, both physically and psychologically, your brain cannot function adequately, fully, energetically. We must have security. But physical security is denied to millions and millions of people. They have hardly one meal a day. And we, so-called educated, well-to-do people, who have taken various forms of beliefs and so on, are all the time seeking, either consciously or not knowing, a kind of security which would give us complete satisfaction. But we never enquire what is insecurity. You understand? We want security, and it's necessary both biologically and psychologically: there must be security. And in the search for security we never enquire into what is insecurity. You understand? If we can find out together what is insecurity, why we are insecure, then in the unfolding of it, in the causation of it, security naturally comes about.

Are we together in our conversation? We never enquire why we are insecure. We are always wanting security, the more, the better. So what is insecurity? Why are we insecure in our relationship to each other? In the external world there is tremendous disturbance, turmoil and agony going on in the world. And each one wants his own place, each one wants his own security; he wants to escape from this terrible state of insecurity. So, can we together enquire why we are insecure? Right? Can we do that? Can we do it? Can we go along that line? Not what is security, because your security may be in illusion, in some fantastic, romantic concept. Your security may be in some image, in tradition, or security in a family, in a name. And there is always uncertainty in trying to find security. Right? Can we go along? So why are human beings, you and people like us - we are laymen, not specialists - why are we insecure? What does that word mean? In our relationship to our wife or husband, there is a sense of not complete security, not a complete sense of 'everything is all right'. There is always this background, this sense of a feeling that everything isn't quite right. Everything is so confused, uncertain. So if we could enquire why the human brain is all the time seeking security and it must have security, otherwise it can't function properly. Right? Have you noticed that? You agree too easily. You nod your heads as though it was something. Please keep your heads still and enquire with me to find out why human beings are insecure. Insecure about what? About not having a job in a country that is overpopulated, like this country, 15 million people are born every year - over populated? And education is rotten in this country. If there is one job, there are probably 10,000 people. And capacity, technological capacity and so on, in all that there is a certain state of enquiry, not only research, but one feels in achieving that, there is certain security. Right? And in a relationship there is always this sense of insecurity. Right? Don't you know all this or am I inventing all this? So what is insecurity? If we were not insecure, we wouldn't talk about gods, we wouldn't talk about security. Because we are insecure we seek the opposite.

Have you ever listened to sound? That crow. Sound. The universe is filled with sound. The earth is full of sound. And we seek silence. Meditation is to find some kind of peace or some kind of silence. But if you understand sound, in that hearing the sound, there is silence. Silence is not separate from sound. You won't understand this because you have never listened to sound. Have you ever sat under a tree when the air is very still, quiet, not a leaf dancing when it is absolutely quiet? Have you ever sat under a tree like that and listened to the sound of the tree? If there was no silence, there would be no sound. You don't understand all this. So, the sound of insecurity, the sound, makes us seek security, because we have never listened to the sound of insecurity. You understand? If you listen to the implications of insecurity, which makes us invent gods, rituals and all that stupid nonsense, if you listen to the whole movement of insecurity, then out of that insecurity there comes naturally security. But if you pursue security as something separate from insecurity, then you are in a conflict. Right? I wonder if you understand it? Please do understand this a little bit. You know, of an evening when the stars are clear - not in Bombay - when the stars are clear and there is only one star in the sky and there is absolute silence. But you listen; if you listen to that silence, in that silence there is the sound. And, there is no separation between sound and silence, they both go together. In the same way, if you understand insecurity, the causation of it: the cause of insecurity is our own limited, broken psychological state. And when there is a way of living that is holistic, then there is no such a thing as security or insecurity.

So we are going to talk over together, if you will, what is a holistic way of life? The word 'whole', which means complete, the word 'whole' means in which there is no fragmentation, there is no broken up, there are no fragments; fragments as a businessman, as an artist, as a poet, as a religious cuckoo or a businessman and so on, which in our life we have divided. You belong to a special group, with your garlands and strange dress and the other wears some other kind of costume. We are constantly categorizing, putting them into some drawer, so that they are this; they are communists, socialists, capitalists and so on. Now our life, if you observe closely, our life is broken up. Right? Our life is fragmented. And if we understand the nature why we human beings who have lived on this marvellous earth for thousands and millions of years or 1 million year or 50,000 years, why we are so fragmented, so broken up.

One of the main causes of this breaking up into pieces is, as we said yesterday, that the brain is slave to thought - thought being limited, as we went into it yesterday. Wherever there is limitation, there must be fragmentation. When I am concerned with myself - with my progress, with my fulfilment, with my happiness, with my problems - I've broken the whole structure of humanity into me. You understand this? So, one of the factors why human beings are fragmented is thought. Please give your attention to this.

And also one of the factors is time. Have you never considered what is time? According to the scientists, who are concerned with time, it is a series of movements. So movement is time. Right? You understand? Time is not only by the watch, chronologically - time as the sun rising, sun setting, time when there is dawn and the snow on the mountains and the deep valleys, that is also time: the darkness of a night and the brightness of a morning. And also there is psychological time, inward time. I am this: I will become that. I don't know mathematics, but one day I will learn all about it. That requires time. To learn a new language requires a great deal of time: three months, six months or two months. That is also time. There is time to learn, to memorize, to have a skill, and there is also time as the self-centred entity saying, "I will become something else". Right? So the becoming psychologically implies time also. So we are enquiring into what is time? Not only the time to learn a skill but also the time which we have developed as a process of achievement: I don't know how to meditate. I'll sit cross-legged, and one day I will learn how to control my thought. One day I will achieve what meditation is supposed to be. So I practise, practise, practise. Then you become a mechanical monkey.

Because whatever you practise, you become mechanical. We won't go into meditation now because that's a very complex question, which we will talk about later. So, time is the past, the present and the future. Right? Time, that is, the past: all my memories, all the memories, experiences, knowledge, all that man, human beings have achieved which remains in the brain as memory, which is the past. Right? That's simple. That past is operating now in the present. Right? Clear? The past - all the memories, all the knowledge, all the experiences, the tendencies and so on - the background, and that background is operating now. So you are the past. And the future is what you are now, perhaps modified, but the future is the past modified. Right? See this please, understand this. And so, the past modified in the present is the future.

Your tradition as a cultural country for the last three to five thousand years: this vast accumulation of knowledge, culture, all the things human beings have been struggling, enquiring, having a dialogue - all that is smashed in the present, because the economic conditions demand. And the past is broken up, modified and is going to be the future. Right? This is a fact. So, the past modifying itself in the present is the future. Right? So, in the present, if there is no radical change, tomorrow you will be the same as you are today. So the future is now. I wonder if you understand this? You understand this? The future - not the future of acquiring knowledge, but the psychological future - that the psyche, the me, the self, is the past memory, and that memory modifies itself now and goes on. So the future and the past are in the present. So, all time - the past, present - is contained in the now. Right sir? It's not complicated, please. It's logical. So, if the human brain doesn't change now, instantly, the future will be what you are, what you have been. Right? So, is it possible to radically, fundamentally, change now, not in the future? So we are asking, one of the factors of insecurity is time and thought, yes? Are we together in this a little bit? Are we moving together slightly? One step at a time. It is very simple, this. Don't complicate it. We are the past. There is no question about it. And that past gets modified in reaction, in challenges, in various ways. And that becomes the future. Look, you have had a civilization in this country for three to five thousand years. That is the past. And modern circumstances demand that you break away from the past. And you have no culture any more now. You might talk about past culture, enjoy the past fame, and past long years, centuries, but all that past is blown up, scattered by the present demands, by the present challenge. And that challenge, that demand is changing into an economic entity. So the past being challenged by the now becomes the future. So all past and future is in the now. So all time is in the now. I wish you would understand this. So we are saying that thought and time are the major cause of fragmented human beings.

And also we want roots, identification: identification with a group, identification with a family, identification with some guru, and that is why you put on these strange garments. I know you won't go away from that, but that's your job. So, we want to be identified with a group, with a family, with a nation and so on. And war, the threat of war is a major factor in our life, because war may destroy our roots psychologically, therefore we are willing to kill others. And also we want to be identified. You understand? Identified with a name, identified with a family and so on. So, these are the major factors of our fragmented lives. Now do you listen to the truth of it or do you listen merely to a description of what is being said and carry the description, not the truth of it? You understand? The idea of it and not the fact of it. Vous avez compris? I mean, you have understood? Say for instance, the speaker says, "all time is now". If you understand, that is the most marvellous truth. And do you listen to it as a series of words and therefore a sound or a word or an idea, an abstraction of the truth as an idea, or do you capture the truth of it, not make an abstraction of the truth? Sir, you understand sir? What are you doing? Live with the fact, or make an abstraction of the fact into an idea and then pursue the idea, not the fact? This is what the intellect does. Intellect is necessary. Probably we have very little intellect anyhow because we have given ourselves over to somebody. Intellect implies, demands, reason, logic and seeing things very, very clearly, to discern. And also the capacity of the intellect is to gather information and act upon that information. And when you hear a statement like this, that "all time is now" and a statement like, "you are the entire humanity, because your consciousness is one with all the others", how do you listen to those statements? Do you make an abstraction of it as an idea? Or do you listen to the truth, to the fact of it; the depth of it, the sense of immensity involved in that? Ideas are not immense. But a fact has got tremendous possibility.

So a holistic life is not possible when the cause is thought, time and the desire for identification and for roots. They prevent a way of living that is whole, complete. Now you hear this statement, then your question will be, "how shall I stop thinking?" A natural question isn't it? Right sir? "How shall I?" I know time is necessary to learn a skill, language and so on, a technological subject. Time is necessary for research. But I've just begun to realize that the becoming from 'what is' to 'what should be' involves time and it may be totally wrong. It may not be true. So you begin to question, or do you say, "yes, I don't understand what you are talking about but I will go along with it"? Which is actually what is taking place.

I wish we would be very honest to ourselves. Honesty is one of the most important things, like humility. A vain man cultivating humility - you understand? - a vain man putting together humility, that humility is part of vanity. But humility has nothing to do with vanity, with pride. It is a state of mind - brain that says, "I don't know but let me enquire" Never saying, "I know". Do you understand all this? So, now, you have listened to the fact that all time is now. Fact. You may not agree or you may agree. That is one of our dreadful things, agreeing and disagreeing. Why should we agree or disagree? If a fact is that the sun rises in the east, that's a fact. You don't agree or disagree. The sun has set. It is a fact. So can we put aside from our language, from our conditioning, agreeing and disagreeing, so that we can both look at facts? So there is no division between those who agree and those who don't agree. You understand? There is only seeing things as they are. You can say "I don't see", then that's a different matter. Then we can go into why you don't see and so on. But when we enter into the area of agreement and disagreement, then we become more and more confused.

So, the speaker has said our lives are fragmented. That's a fact. Our ways of thinking are fragmented. You are a businessman, earn lots and lots of money and then you go and build a temple - right? - or give it to charity. See the contradiction. And we are never honest to ourselves - deeply honest. Not honest in order to be something else or to understand something else; to be unquestionably clear, absolute sense of honesty, which means no illusions. If you tell a lie, you tell a lie and you know it and say, "I've told a lie". Not cover it up. When you are angry, you are angry. You say you're angry. Don't find causes and explanations for it or how to get rid of it. So, this is absolutely necessary if you are going to enquire into much deeper things as we are doing now. Not make a fact into an idea but remain with the fact. That requires very clear perception.

Now, having said all this we say, "Yes, I logically, intellectually understand this". That's what you would say. And, 'How am I to relate what I have logically, intellectually understood to what I have heard? What is the truth?' You understand? So you've already created a division between the intellectual understanding and action. Right? Do you see this? So, listen, just listen. Don't do anything about it. Don't say, "How am I to get something? How am I to put an end to thought and time?" - which you can't, which would be absurd because you are the result of time and thought. So you go round and round in circles. But if you listen, not react, not say, 'how?', but actually, as you listen to some lovely music, a call, to the sound of a bird, listen, "that time is all in the now". And thought is a movement, so thought and time are together always. They are not two separate movements; one constant movement. That's a fact. Listen to it.

Then identification: you want to be identified because in identification as a Hindu, or a Muslim, Christian, or whatever it is, you feel secure. That's a fact. And that's one of the causes of fragmentation of our lives, like time, thought, identification; and also wanting security and therefore taking roots in a particular country, or in a particular family, community, a group. These are - listen to it, don't do anything - these are the factors of our fragmentation. Now, if you listen to it very carefully, that very listening creates its own energy. Right? Do you understand sir? If I listen to the fact of what has been said, and there is no reaction because I'm just listening to it, then that implies gathering all your energy to listen. And that means giving your tremendous attention to listening. And that very listening breaks down the factors of, or the causation of, fragmentation. If you do something then you're acting upon the fact. But if there is merely an observation, without distortion, without prejudice, that observation, that perception which is great attention, then that very attention burns away the sense of time, thought and all the rest of it.

Is it time to stop? It's just an hour, no, not yet, it's five minutes past seven. So I'll stop at quarter past seven.

And also one of the factors of our lives, which we live in fragmentation, is fear. Right? That's a common human factor. Human beings from the moment of time, a million years or 15,000 years ago, they have been frightened. And they've never solved the problem. If you were not frightened at all there would be no gods, no rituals, no prayers. It's our fear that has created all the gods, all the deities, all the gurus and their absurdities. So, can we go into this question, why human beings live in fear and whether it is possible to be entirely free of it, not occasionally, not sporadically but to be aware of the objects of fear and also to be aware of the inward causes of fear. You understand my question? You may say,

"I'm not afraid". But all your background indicates that the background is structured on fear - because you all believe in god, don't you? Thank god there is one at least that doesn't! Or many who may not believe in god. God is invented by human beings because they are afraid: all the rituals, all the fancy clothes priests put on, at the background there is fear.

What is fear? Not what causes fear, which we'll go into presently, but what is fear? Aren't you afraid? If you are really honest, for a change, won't you say, "I'm afraid"? No? Afraid of death? Afraid of losing your job? Afraid of your wife or husband? Afraid of public opinion? Afraid of not being recognized by your guru as a great disciple? Afraid of the dark? Afraid of so many things. We are not talking about the cause, the objects of fear - I'm afraid 'of' something. We're enquiring into fear itself, per se, for itself. I may be frightened - one may be frightened of public opinion. It's about fear. I may - the speaker may be frightened because next year he may not have this large audience and all the absurdities of all that. So, we are asking, what is the cause and what is fear without the cause? Is there such thing as fear without the cause? Or, the word 'fear', the sound of fear, evokes in us fear? You understand? Say for example, communism. 'Communism', if you hear that word you react to it, if you're a capitalist - even if you are a socialist you react to it. And, when you hear the word 'fear', you react to it. Don't you? Of course. Now, is the word creating the fear, or the word is different from the fear? This is not complicated, this is simple. You understand? The word is not the thing. Right? The word 'lamp' or the word 'microphone' is not the actual microphone. The word is not the thing. Right? So I'm asking - we're asking, the word 'fear' is different from the fact, or the word creates the fact? Vouz avez compris? You understand?

So one must be clear about this. If there was no word as the word 'fear', would there be fear? No, careful! Go into it, sir; go slowly into it. You see, sir, the word 'love' is not that flame. Right? And similarly the word 'fear' may not be actual - the sense of being gripped, living in a sense of nervousness. Do you understand? The fear. You know what fear does to people. They live in darkness. They are all the time frightened, frightened, frightened. And their lives become so shattered and so on. So we are saying, the word is not the fact; the word is not the thing. That must be quite clear. The microphone is not the actual thing in front of the speaker. So, what is the cause or causations of fear?

Now just a minute. I've asked you this question. The speaker has asked you this question: what are the causes of fear and so on? He's put to you this question. How do you listen to that question? Because that question itself has a vitality of it's own, energy of it's own. Right? Because it's a very serious question. It's not merely an intellectual question. Intellect enters into it. But the question itself - what is the cause of fear? - if you remain with the question and not try to find an answer, the question itself will begin to unfold. You understand? Do you understand? No? Sir, suppose I tell you, in all seriousness, "I love you". Don't become romantic. Suppose I say that to you with my heart. How do you listen to it? Do you listen to it, or all your reactions come into it, because perhaps you have never loved at all? You may be married, have sex, children and you perhaps don't know what love is. Probably you don't. It may be a fact. If you loved there would be no gurus, no images, no division.

We'll go into that another time.

So, what is the causation of fear? Listen to it, if I may most respectfully suggest; listen to it. Put that question to yourself and don't try to find an answer. Because if you try to find an answer, which is, "let me find out the cause and then I'll kill it out", that means then you are different from fear. Right? You follow this? Are you different from fear? Or you are fear. When you are greedy, is the greed different from you? When you're angry, is anger different from you? You are anger, you are greed. So you are fear. Of course. If you once admit - not admit - see the fact that anger is you, greed is you, fear is you consequently. But not you have separated yourself from fear and say, "I must do something about it". And you have done something about it for 50,000 years: you have invented gods, puja and all the rest of the nonsense.

So listen to the question and don't react. Don't say, "how?" The word 'how' must completely disappear from our minds, brains, for then you're asking for help, then you are dependent on someone, then you lose all your vitality, independence and sense of stability. So will you put this question to yourself and not expect an answer? Put the question, let the question itself - you have planted a seed in the earth and if the seed is alive, then it will go through concrete. Haven't you seen a blade of grass in the pavement? What extraordinary vitality that blade of grass has, to break through heavy cement. In the same way, if you ask, if you put this question to yourself and hold it, then you will see the cause of it. The cause is very simple. I can explain, that's not the point for the moment. What is important is to put the question and let the question - because you are serious you want to find out how to breathe, how to live properly, so you've put the question - let that question itself answer; like the seed in the earth. Then you will see that the seed flowers and withers. You understand this? But, if you pull all the time to see if it is growing - you've planted it, some seed in the earth, as we've planted in our heart and mind the sense of what is fear, but if you keep on pulling at it and asking it, then you are losing energy. But you leave the question alone and live with it, then you will see that there is a cause for fear - not the word, not the explanation, but the actual truth of it. The causation of fear is thought and time. Isn't it? I have a job; I might lose it tomorrow. I have lived with pain and it's gone now, and I'm afraid it might come back. Right? You don't know all this?

So, time is the future and the past, as I explained, now. And also thought, thought and time are the two factors of fear. You can't do anything about it. Don't say, "How am I to stop thinking?" That'd be too silly a question. Because you've got to think to go from here to your house, to drive a car, to speak a language. But time may not be necessary at all psychologically, inwardly. I won't go into that now; it's too complicated. So, we are saying fear exists because of the two major factors of time and thought, in which is involved reward and punishment. Now, I've heard this statement made by you. And I have listened to it so immensely because it's a tremendous problem which man has not solved at all and therefore he is creating havoc in the world. I've listened to you, listened to the statement. And you have also told me, don't do anything about it, just put the question and live with it, as a woman wears the seed in her womb, so you put this question. Let that question flower. In the flowering of that question there is also the withering away of that question. It's not the flowering and then the ending, the very flowering is the ending. Are you understanding what I'm saying?

Sir, learn the art of listening to your wife, to your husband; listen to the man in the street - his hunger, his poverty, the desperation and the lack of love. Listen to it. When you listen, at that moment you have no problems, you have no turmoil; you are just listening, and therefore there is no time in the act of listening.

That's enough for this evening I think, don't you?

BOMBAY 1ST QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 5TH FEBRUARY 1985

Krishnamurti: Several questions have been put. I haven't looked at them. I think it is important to put questions, to really enquire into the nature of the questions, and why we put questions, and to whom do we put the question. Do we put the question to find an answer from somebody, or do we put questions to ourselves? If we put questions to ourselves, from what depth, or superficially, do we put the questions to ourselves? And where do we find the answer to our questions, to our problems, to our various complex way of life? Is it something outside of us or is it something that we have to delve very deeply to find out?

I don't - we don't know what these questions are. We will go into them presently. Is the question important, and does the answer to the question lie in the question itself? I hope we are meeting this question. Is the answer outside the question or the answer is in the question itself? Are you understanding my question? And how do we approach a question? With a desire to find an answer, with a motive, or put a question without a motive. Is that possible? I don't know if we are meeting each other, are we? Or is it too early in the morning? I hope you had a nice sleep.

We're asking whether the answer is outside the question or in the question itself. If it is outside for somebody to answer, then the question is not significant. But if the question is serious, and therefore the question itself has the answer. Right? We're going to find that out, because we're going to investigate the question, not the answer. Can we go along with this?

Suppose one has a problem. We are always wanting to find out the solution of the problem, the resolution of it. But if we begin to understand the nature of the problem, what are the implications of the problem, how the problem arose and investigate the problem, in that very process of investigation of the problem, the solution is in the problem. We're going to do that, may we? We're not going to answer the question. Probably the answer will come out when we look at the question closely.

1st QUESTION: In spite of all my love, care and attention, I don't know where I lack in bringing up my daughter. Good Lord! Can you throw some light on the best way of educating the child?

K: Right? Are you all parents? Probably you are not. If you are not parents you might want to be. We ought to enquire together into what we mean by educating a child. What do we mean by education? We are all very well educated - apparently. And what is the nature of a mother or a father in bringing up the child? That's really the question. You may love the child or you may not. You may want the child, as he grows up, to become an engineer or a scientist, a physicist or to have some kind of career like your own. And generally that's the ambition of parents. Right? Do we see this? And the parents generally want their children to follow their own particular pattern, or establish a pattern of life that is suitable for their livelihood and so on and so on. So we ought to talk over together the question: what is education? Why has education become so incredibly difficult? Why, as they grow up and if they are fortunate enough to go to college and university and get a degree, then search for a job, get married, have children, and the whole circus begins. Right? The whole problem begins.

So the question is, what do we mean by education? Is it a holistic education or only career-minded education? You understand my question sir? For the child, and all the problems of bringing up a child, if one has affection, tenderness, care - we always want to use the child either as a kind of doll - you understand what I am saying? Don't you know what a doll is? Don't we use our children to satisfy ourselves? No? Gosh, you are rather silent this morning. I'm asking, do we educate a child to face the whole problem of life, the whole complex, divisive way of life, or do we educate them to have a good memory, remember a lot of knowledge that they have accumulated during the fifteen, twenty or thirty years of education and then exercise those memories to acquire a skill and a job? And we neglect totally the other side of life, the psychological side of life. And we are asking, is education lopsided or holistic? You understand my question. Right?

What is holistic education? And what is partial education, limited education? The limited education is what is being done now - memorizing, memorizing, memorizing, not learning. There is a difference between learning and memorizing. Memorizing is fairly, comparatively easy: go to a school, learn all about history, geography, physics, science and so on; and you memorize, book after book, what the educator says. So it's stored up in the brain as knowledge, acquired through books and so on. That's what modern education is. And all through life that is in operation. We are asking, why do we neglect the whole area of the psychological field which is immensely important? Right? Is our education merely concerned with earning money, a job, livelihood and so on or is it concerned with helping a human being to live a way of life in which there is no division as the world and the psychological field? You understand? Is this possible? Is there any school or any university in the world where they are doing this? That is, to cultivate the brain as a whole, not a part of it. Are we meeting somewhere together? We are asking, is it possible for the cultivation of the whole brain, not part of it?

To understand this we have to investigate the whole structure of our consciousness, if you are willing to go into all that. The speaker - he is not saying this out of vanity or some kind of freakishness - has never read any philosophical book, nor read the Gita, the Upanishads and all that business. Why should you? Why should you be burdened with all the knowledge of what previous writers, previous thinkers, previous people who have experienced so-called religious experiences and so on, why should you read all that? Because we are asking, aren't you the story of mankind? You understand my question? Aren't you the history of mankind? Aren't you as a human being the book of mankind. If you know how to read that book, then you don't have to read any other book, except perhaps learn technological knowledge to earn a livelihood. Are we thinking together a little bit?

How do we approach this question: whether it's possible to cultivate the entire brain and not one part of it alone? That's the real question of education. Is it possible for the brain, which has lived over three million and a half years, according to the latest scientific statements, that brain which has accumulated tremendous knowledge, that brain which began with the animal and all the fears and the anxieties of an animal is still within our consciousness. Right? No, don't agree - please don't agree to anything I'm saying. Just listen to it. Our consciousness, our brain, contains all the animalistic reactions, fears, all that. That's part of our hereditary, because we have come from the ape and so on. And that is part of our consciousness. Right? Just listen to it. You may not agree, but find out. Now, we have been trained, educated to function only with part of the brain. That is, acquiring a great deal of memory, knowledge about particular subjects and with it's discipline to earn a livelihood. Right? To become an engineer, to become a specialized scientist, a physicist or psychologist. Right? We are trained that way, educated that way. And therefore we are only using part of the brain. Obviously. And the other part, the psychical part, is uneducated, is left alone. So our education is lopsided. Right? May we go on?

The poor mother has asked this question, it becomes rather complex. So is it possible, not only to cultivate knowledge, memory and also at the same time or at a different period cultivate, understand the whole psychological content of a human being? You understand? Both of them running together. Clear? Is this possible? The speaker thinks that is the only right kind of education. Not just the one kind of education, but to understand the other side - which is the psychological world - you are mankind, you are the history of man; you are the story of mankind. Obviously. Because you have suffered, you have gone through all kinds of trouble like every other human being, you are one with the rest of the world. So can you read the book of mankind, which is you? You understand my question? Can you, as a human being, not only educated in one direction but also as a human being you are the entire history of mankind; not the history of kings and queens and dates, but the experience, the sorrow, the pain, all that tremendously complex psychological world - can you read that book as you read an ordinary book? And we are not capable of doing that because we have depended on others to read that book for us. I don't know if you follow all this. Right sir? One depended on a guru, on a priest or a psychologist - unless you are a neurotic, but perhaps most of us are slightly neurotic. Can we read that book without distortion? Because if you are a good scientist or learning the beginnings of science, you have to be very precise, very clear, follow every discipline involved in that particular subject. So similarly, one has to read this book without any kind of distortion. Right? Is that possible? Is it possible for each one of us - not depending on any other to help us to read that book - is that possible, to read without any distortion? You understand my question?

As you see your face in the mirror when you comb your hair or shave, is there a mirror in which everything is reflected very clearly, distinctly, so that the book reflects in the mirror? You understand? You understand what I'm asking? Oh my lord, don't go to sleep, please. Suppose I don't know how to read that book, because my brain is slightly distorted, my prejudice, my nationality and so on. It is distorted. Therefore I can hardly read that book clearly. So can I be free of the prejudices I've accumulated? The book may be full of prejudices - probably it is - full of theories, suppositions. So I must be able to read it without all that, otherwise I can't read it. Right? So is it possible for me to be free of my prejudices, opinions, the conclusions which I recently have gathered - because the book may be full of tradition. You understand? Therefore I must be free of tradition to read tradition. Vous avez compris? You have understood this? Yes? It's rather interesting if you go into it.

I am answering the poor lady. She loves her child. She wants to bring up her daughter carefully, well educated and during the educational period she acquires all the nonsense of society. Right? She acquires all kinds - you know what is happening in the world, I don't have to go into all that. And she wants to know what to do. We'll first of all finish that 'what to do'.

Do we really love a child? Do you really love your daughter, your son? What does that love mean? If you loved your daughter or your son really deeply, then would you allow that child to grow up and be caught in this tremendous conflicting and insane world? Would you allow your son to join the army if you really loved him? Go and kill another, get maimed? We were taken into a hospital in America by a very well known doctor. It was a hospital very, very few people see, not allowed in. And there were people without arms and legs, without eyes, shattered faces, lopsided, wounded - appalling sight. That's the result of war. And their mothers have said, 'We loved our children', and they end up there, in that hospital. I wonder if you realize all this. Some have gone insane, put in straight jackets. So what do we mean by love? Do you want them, your children whom you love, to enter this insane world? It's a tremendous problem. But you have to enter into that world. You have to have an occupation. You have to earn a livelihood. You can't just withdraw from the world, because you are the world. So, the mother asks, 'what shall I do?' - knowing that society is so corrupt, so extraordinarily unbalanced. Every one is out for himself, self-interest. And the mother, what is she to do? Or the parent? So does love stop after a certain age? You've sent your child to a school, to a college and perhaps to a university - if you are lucky, if you have enough money - and let him go. We then get him married, and settled down. Right? That's what most parents are concerned about. And this is called love. We are questioning whether that is love at all. I'm not saying anything derogatory or impolite or disrespectful, but we question whether that is love. If you really, deeply loved, it would mean something totally different. There can be no love if there is self-interest. Right? This is a fact. If I am concerned about myself all the time, which we are, how can there be love? You may talk about it, romanticize about it, go to a cinema and see all that nonsense - about love and sex and you know all that business. So one has to go into this question of what is love, what is our relationship to the child, what's our relationship to the world and so on. That's one side of it.

And we are talking about whether you can read the story of mankind, the book that you are - if I can use that word - can you read that book? Not just at the beginning of the book, first chapter or a few lines of it but go through to the very end of it. It is possible only in the mirror of relationship. Right? Because in that mirror of relationship you see what you are, your reactions and responses, not only biological responses but also all the responses of ambition, greed, envy, flattery, insult. You follow? The whole content of your consciousness is revealed if you are very watchful, watching very closely, without any distortion. Then it is a movement, a holistic movement, learning a subject, that subject having its own discipline, like mathematics and so on, and also, as one is related always in life with everything - I am related to you, I am related to another - so, in that mirror, watching carefully without distortion, that requires tremendous interest and energy. Can this both be done? You understand my question? That is real education. Then you don't have to read a single book about the psyche. You can read lots of books about other things 2nd QUESTION: Why is it that we are not able to sustain attention for more than a couple of minutes?

K: Ask yourself your that question.

First of all, why do you want to sustain something all the time? You want to sustain pleasure all the time. Right? You want gratification. You want certain conclusions to be continuous. You want certain relationships to be lasting, sustained, nourished. Why this desire to have a continuity? You understand my question? You want to sustain attention. Why? Because somebody has told you attention is very important? Or you have discovered for yourself the nature of attention? Therefore you have to enquire what is inattention. You understand? What is important, is not attention but what is inattention, not attending. Right? We have divided the two. You follow? Not having complete attention and also lacking that, which is inattention, not attending. Now which is important? Important in the sense, on which should we look? Is not inattention more important than attention? Would you agree? Because if I understand what is inattention, then there is attention. Right? So what is not-attending?

We are talking over together now, are you attending all the time or only part of the time? Please, just look at it, answer, look at it for yourself, go into it for yourself. Are you really paying attention to what is being said now, or only for a few seconds or a few minutes and then go off to something else? Is there a sustained attention? Of course not. So it's important to understand why there is inattention.

Is there such a thing as inattention? You understand my question? Are you interested in all this? Inattention is distraction. Right? That's what you call distraction. Is there a distraction at all? I want to think about something and then that very thought goes off to something else, and going off I call distraction. Right? Is not thought itself a distraction? I wonder if you see that. I want to concentrate on this subject and I can do that only for a few minutes, and then thought goes off to something else, and the thinking about something else, instead of what I am supposed to be thinking about, is called distraction. But if I don't call it distraction but follow that. You understand? I'm concentrating on reading a chapter and I watch, I see that thought is also going off to something else. Then I say, that is a distraction. But I won't call it a distraction. To me that doesn't exist at all, personally. To me there is no distraction. Because I follow what you call distraction. I don't say, 'I must read this chapter or these few lines', but whatever direction thought moves, watch it, so that there is no sense of distraction, which means no division. I wonder if you see this. So that there is a watching, attention and non-attention. Then non-attention is attention.

See how we are distracted by words. The word 'distraction' is a very destructive process because you want to concentrate on something and therefore the other, moving away from that, is called distraction. Thought is always moving. It's never static. It's always in action - whether you are asleep, whether you are awake or day-dreaming or doing something or other - it's in action, it's in movement. And thought is a material process. I wonder if you have understood this. Because thought is based on memory, experience, knowledge and that's stored in the brain and the brain contains millions and millions of cells and those cells hold memories. This is a scientific fact. And they are always in movement. So one begins to discover the brain has its own rhythm, not the rhythm of thought. I wonder if you follow.

Now we're asking, is it possible to watch? To watch, to be absolutely watching all the time? That's really another form of asking, can I sustain attention? Is attention brought about through effort? And if you make an effort, is that attention? That is, practice attention. Lovely idea. Practice, day after day, watching your body, the movements, you follow, all the game you play with, and at the end you say, 'Yes, I've learnt attention'. Is attention a form of acquiring memory about attention? You understand my question? Is attention gathered through practice, through various forms of psychological training or there is attention only, not inattention? If you understand inattention, there is attention. And it's never sustained. Because why should you attend all the time? Then you can look at the stars. And also that requires attention. So, there is no distraction.

Q: Excuse me Krishnaji, may I ask one short question...

K: Come over here.

Q:... with regard to...

K: What sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I would like to understand your question, sir. It's not quite clear.

Q: He wants to put a subsidiary question. He wants to ask you a question.

K: All right, go ahead, sir.

Q: You said that when we see or behave with somebody we can know what we are. But suppose if we are alone. When we are alone and just thinking, then is it not possible to know who we are?

K: Ah, when you are not related to anybody, is it possible to know yourself? Is that the question sir? You've asked the question sir, may I go into it? Are you alone at all?

Q: Yes.

K: No sir, just a minute. Do you know what that word 'alone' means? The etymological meaning of that word 'alone' means 'all one'. (Laughter) Just a minute sir, just a minute; I was only joking. I'm only playing with that word sir. Forgive me. (Laughter) Are we alone? Or you're always related to something? It may not be your wife or husband, you may be single, but you are related. You are related to nature, of which you are a part. You are related to the world. You are related to your mother, to your father, to your - and so on. There's no such entity as being single. Biologically you may be single, physically unrelated, but psychologically you are related to the whole of mankind. And then we say to ourselves, we are lonely - I mean single - and with all the problems of being single. Then I try to have a relationship with another and yet remain single. You understand? I may get married, have children, go to the office and all the rest of it, but I remain single because I am pursuing my ambition, and all the rest of it. So there is no person in the world, including the most lonely hermit, he's related, related to the past. Right? The tradition, to all the knowledge he has acquired and so on and so on.

3rd QUESTION: Does suffering and enjoyment have any bearing on the previous life and deeds of present life?

K: You are talking about reincarnation aren't you? and also that implies the word karma - cause and effect. Karma, I've been told, the root meaning of that word is action. May we go into this question? Seriously you want to go into it? Not that the others have not been serious.

What is action? Action means to be acting. Right? Not, I have acted or will act. Action means now. Right? Action implies, for most people, a past remembrance, a motive or a future intention or future ideal and so on. Either the past is directing, shaping the action, or the future shaping the action. Right? So that's not action. I wonder if you see this. Right? Action means the doing, the active present. But the active present is denied when you have a motive, a cause for action and a future action. So you are really, when you depend on the future or on the past, you are not acting. I wonder if you see this. For most of us acting is based on memory, on a motive. Let's be quite clear and honest about it. I flatter you because I want something out of you, I love you because you have given me something and so on. You play this game.

Now, the questioner asks, have I lived on this earth before and because I haven't done things properly the last life, therefore I am suffering now, and if I understand what is right action now, next life I have a better chance, a better house, a better wife, better refrigerator. (Laughter) Now, this is really a very serious question.

I don't know if we should go into this.

What is the 'self', what is the 'I' that says, 'I must continue'? That there is a continuity from the past through the present to the future. That's one thing. Then the other is the cause - cause-effect which is part of karma. I have sown a certain seed, good or bad, and that flowers, smells bad or good, and the effect is that. Now, is cause permanent and the effect also permanent? Or the effect becomes the cause? Right? And that has another effect, which then becomes the cause. So causation is a movement. Right? I wonder if you understand. It's rather interesting if you go into it very carefully. The cause is, I suffer from disease, one of the causes. Suppose I've a bad stomach, because I've eaten the wrong food, drank too much and so on. So, if I don't eat properly, the effect is pain. Then I say, that pain must be controlled. I take a pill. But the cause still goes on, because I'm eating the wrong food. So, there is the continuity of cause and a superficial effect. Right? But if I see the cause as eating wrong food, I change it, the effect is health. Health is not a result. It is living properly. I don't know whether you follow all this. Logically it is all this. So, the cause is never permanent or the effect. The effect becomes the cause and so it's a chain, it's a movement. And the question really is, if you're interested, can this movement stop? You understand? This movement, which is, cause-effect, effect becoming the cause and so on, and this movement is of time. Naturally. Right? So I'm asking, need there be any causation for action? Right? You all look so sleepy.

Is there an action, per se, for itself, not for something? To understand that I have to go into the question of reward and punishment. The human being lives on this principle - reward and punishment - like all animals do. Right? If you've had a dog, you reward him when he does something properly. When you say, 'Come to heel' and you gradually train him through reward and punishment, giving him a biscuit when he comes to you, and you don't give him a biscuit when he doesn't. So he learns to depend on reward and punishment. And then gradually you say, 'Come to heel' - he does. You follow? And on the same principle we work. I haven't done things properly this life or past life. I'm paying for it now but the next life I'll be rewarded if I behave properly. Right? So its reward and punishment. Same principle. Now, can you act, live without a motive, without this principle of reward and punishment? Go into it sirs. See what the implications of it are. Not reincarnation, we'll go into that later. That's a very trivial matter. At least for the speaker - it's nonsense - I won't go into it now. Because one has to go into this question, what is continuity, what is ending and what is it that continues. You understand? These three things are implied, which takes some time to go into. We will go into them in the next two talks.

So I'm - we're asking, is there action without cause? Go into it sirs, see for yourselves how extraordinarily interesting it is, not just whether you believe in re-incarnation - that's rather silly, but to find out an action which has no cause, which has no motive, which has no self-interest. If there is self-interest, it's limited. If there is a motive, it is still further limitation. So action is never complete and therefore breeds problems, like you are doing politically.

So I'm asking, is there an action per se, for itself? There is, which is love. Love has no motive. Love has no reward or punishment. It's love. When there is that quality of love there is right action. Right action is not born out of clever thought. Right action takes place when there is the sense of holistic love - I can love my wife and love mankind, because it's love. It's not love to one and denied to the others. I wonder if you understand this.

That's real compassion. And when there is that compassion, there is intelligence. And that intelligence has no opposite to it.

4th QUESTION: Is it possible to be aware with all your senses - eyes, ears, brain, nerves, etc., and so on, simultaneously?

K: Anything is possible. But how do we, as human beings, function? With all our senses or only with partial senses? You understand my question? Senses are very important - aren't they? Otherwise you couldn't live, touch, feel, taste, see, watch and so on and so on, hear, with all the senses fully awakened. But our senses are not. They are only partially awake. Right? Because it has been one of the doctrines of religions all over the world, to control your senses. Right? To control your senses so as to have energy for god. Right? Sexual senses, the sense of hearing - don't hear anything which it doesn't say in the book. Right? Don't listen to anything, because it may arouse suspicion, doubt, questions - don't listen. And another interesting thing, have you noticed: those people who live by the book - Muslims and the Christians - are very bigoted, narrow. I hope you do not mind my saying this? And those who have lots of books like Hindus, they play around. They are not so bigoted; they are tolerant; they absorb. And they consider that absorption great capacity, which it is not, it is just indifference. So, is it possible to be aware simultaneously, of all the senses in full action - aware?

Have you noticed a sunset with all your senses? Have you noticed the movement of the sea, the blue light and the movement of a wave, with all your senses? You haven't. Have you watched your wife with all your senses? No. Now, when you watch with all your senses, what takes place? You can't answer that question, because you have never done it. So we must not say what happens when all the senses are awake, functioning fully, but why is it that we are always partially responding, except perhaps sexually - partially responding - why? You understand? Partial responses of the senses. Why? Is it that we have given importance to one or two senses? Right? I'm asking you. Or we haven't even thought about all this? So if you begin to be aware of your senses, not choosing one sense better than the other sense but aware without choice, the whole movement of senses, not one part of it, but to watch our reaction to every sense, the taste, the hearing, the seeing, the smelling, the feeling, all that.

We live by that. We live by sensation. Right? And thought takes over the sensations. Haven't you noticed it? I don't want to go into all this, but it doesn't matter, let's go into it. You see something beautiful in the shop, a nice shirt, or a nice sari, or whatever you see in the shop. There is perception, seeing, going inside the shop, touching it, which is sensation - right - seeing, contact, sensation. Then thought comes along and says, 'how nice to have that shirt on me, it looks nice'. Right? So thought creates the image of you in that shirt or in that sari. Right? Then desire is born. I wonder if you are following the whole sequence of this? We are always fighting desire. The religions all over the world say, suppress desire, don't fight it, suppress it, get rid of it. You can't. Desire for god is the same as desire for a shirt, sorry! Because both are based on desire.

So, seeing, contact, sensation. And not to allow thought - careful, I'm not saying you can't allow it. See the truth, the moment thought comes and builds an image, then desire is born, which is a fact, simple, observable, a daily fact. Now, sensations are normal, healthy, otherwise you would be dead. And to watch very carefully thought not building an image. You understand? And not letting thought create an image out of the sensation. I wonder if you understand this? I see that shirt in the shop. Then I go inside and touch the material and say, 'What beautiful material, hand made'. And then thought comes along and says, 'How nice it would be if I had it. I'll put it on. Nice blue'. Right? And when thought creates the image, then desire is born. Sensation has no desire. Of course. Sensation. I wonder if you see this? It's really important. Then to be aware of thought making a shape out of sensation, giving it an image, then the conflict of desire. Now, is there an observation, which requires great, clear, correct, without any distortion, without any compulsion, to see thought. You follow? Not allow thought to react immediately, so that there is a gap. You understand? You follow? Do it, do it and see what happens.

Q: May I ask a question sir?

K: Yes sir.

Q: A question further to what you have said that. Why every sensation or ever reaction of the brain is always in terms of a thought?

K: What is it? I haven't understood the question. Why everything turns to thought?

Q: Why every sensation turns into thought.

K: I know, that's what we are saying. Every sensation, why is thought interfering with every sensation. Right?

Q: Yes, that's the question.

K: Why do you think it does? You answer that question. Don't ask me. I'll tell you later. Don't ask another any question; find out. You are so lazy; that's what it is. We live by thought. Right? That's the only instrument you have now. And thought has created the most amazing things in the world. Thought has brought about tremendous chaos in the world; which is war, separated nations, separated economy. Thought has created religions and separated the religions. Right? So thought has done immense harm in one direction and great good in the other direction, like having better sanitation, communication, marvellous surgery. Have you seen the news - they have invented an artificial heart and implants and so on. They are doing incredible things. So thought is the way of our life. And that thought is very limited, therefore it is creating chaos in the world.

We never ask is there another instrument? Is there another perception which is not thought? Right sir? Now that requires a great deal of going into, not just verbally, but doing it. There is that instrument which is insight, in which there is no memory, no time, no future, it's instant perception. And that perception is action, not separated. I won't go into it now because that takes too long.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I've got a question here.

Q: Can we come out of this world of thought by any effort.

K: What?

Q: Can we come out of this world of thought through any effort?

K: Can you come out of the world thought with effort? Right? Who is the maker of the effort? Does not the maker of the effort, thought also say, 'If I get out of this I'll have a better reward'. You see we put these questions without thinking it out for ourselves. And the speaker is not going to help you. Doesn't want to help you. But we can talk over together. We can have a dialogue together so that both of us see the same thing clearly.

5th QUESTION: I don't follow doctrines and commandments of divine souls. So I feel fear that they may do something wrong to me. I always feel uneasy and live in a fearing condition. Please guide and advise me.

Divine souls doing something wrong to you? Sir, we've got the most extraordinary ideas. Perhaps they are pathological and neurotic - that somebody evil, evil souls, are controlling us, shaping us, telling us what to do. And there are good souls, divine souls, saying, 'Don't do that'. Advising the opposite of the evil birds. Why are we so frightened of curses, of some people doing us harm psychologically, black magic? You know all that dark side of this country. You know it very well - the dark side of this country. Not that the other countries don't have dark sides, but it's not so pronounced. Why are we always caught in this, somebody doing me harm? Aren't you doing harm to others? Aren't you doing harm to those poor people who have one meal a day?

Sir, really the question is, there is good and bad, right? Let's keep to that simple thing. The good and the bad. The noble and the ignoble and so on. Is good related to the bad? Now, careful, don't say, find out. Is the good related to the bad? If it's related then it's not good. Right? So, is the good conjured up by thought? Careful.

So sirs, society says, this is good. The commandment says, 'Don't do this', 'Don't do this', 'Don't do this'. And religions all over the world lay down a moral way of living; don't kill, don't steal, don't do this, all religions have done it. And we do quite the opposite of all that. 'Don't kill', we kill. Right? 'Don't cheat', we cheat. 'Don't have double standards' and so on. We all do the opposite. So why do you bother about commandments, whether they are divine or not divine, whether they are straight from the horse's mouth - you know that phrase? All right, I won't use that phrase. Straight from some saint or some god or other. Why do we accept these commandments? It seems so absurd - which means, trying to live something which is not natural. So, why don't we change what is natural? Not follow commandments. I'm greedy. All right, I'm greedy. And I'm also envious and all the rest of it. I'm envious, which is part of greed. I like to be envious, what is wrong with it. But the commandment says, don't be envious, don't look at another man's wife and so on and all the rest of it. Why am I greedy? That's my problem, not somebody else's problem. So, why am I greedy? Because my whole education is to have more, more, more: more money, more this, more that. Right? Isn't that so? The more, the better, which means comparison, which means measurement. Right? Measurement. I compare myself with you. You are bright, intelligent, beautiful, etc., I am not. So in comparison with you I become dull. If I don't compare with you, am I dull? I am what I am. I can move from there. But if I am always comparing myself with you, I become exhausted, fighting you, jealous of you. Right? So, I won't compare at all. Have you ever done it? Never compare yourself with anything.

You know, if you have been to museums, on one side there is Michelangelo and on the other side some other, and so on. Can you look at that picture without comparing it with another picture? Can you see that old, ancient picture, looking at it without any side distractions, which is comparison? Just look at it. Can you look at your wife and yourself without comparing. Have you ever tried to do this, to live a life without any comparison? That's real freedom, the beginning of freedom, when there is no measurement of your becoming something, except in the business world perhaps - but even then. But inwardly, psychologically, there is no measurement. Which means, that you don't get better and better in violence. You understand? Which is called non-violence. I wonder if you see the joke of this. Better and better in violence - which is what you are all doing. So if the brain, which has been conditioned to measurement, to comparison, can put that completely aside then there is that quality of freedom. And it's only when there is that depth of freedom or just freedom, there is also love in it. It isn't just you are free - that's nonsense. When you are aware that you are free you are no longer free. When you say, 'I know', you no longer know. You understand all this? We'd better stop.

Before we answer these questions or explore these questions, how do we approach a question, a crisis, a challenge, something that we have to investigate? How do we approach it? I think the approach matters perhaps much more than the question itself, because if we approach it negligently, casually then the question itself has very little meaning. But if we approach it without any bias, without any desire for the comforting solution or a sense of conquering a question, being top of the crisis, then I think we'd make the question rather trivial and not so serious. So the approach matters enormously. So we ought to really talk over together how we approach, what is our motive, how do we regard, receive any challenge, any question. Right? Let's go into it.

Suppose I have a problem. First I question what is a problem? A problem, the etymological meaning of that word, is 'something thrown at you'; that is the actual meaning of that word, problem - something thrown or something that challenges you. How do we look at that problem? What is our immediate response to that problem? Either it is shrinking away from the problem or trying to conquer the problem. I hope we are all together in this, are we a little bit, though it's rather early in the morning. Or we try to find an answer to a problem that would be circumstantially pleasant, gratifying, or we look at the problem as though it were something new, fresh.

Is any problem old? Is this all right? Can I go on like this? Are we together a little bit in this? Is any problem, crisis, question, is it something new, or is it a problem that has been repeated over and over again? All right? If it is a repetitive problem, why has it become repetitive? Is our brain repetitive and so on? Right? Are we together a little bit in all this. It's up to you.

1st QUESTION: You often tell us to exercise our brain. And also you suggest to merely listen without acting upon what we listen to. These two statements appear contradictory. Kindly, explain.

You often tell us to exercise our brain. We are exercising our brain most of the time, when you are earning money, you are exercising it all the time. But when we listen to somebody who is saying something totally different from what you think, what you are used to, we hardly listen to a statement made by another which may not be the usual statement. So when the speaker suggested, use your brain, use the entire brain, not just part of it - you understand - and also to listen. He has suggested that we should listen. And he explained what it means to listen. There is not only the hearing with the ear, but also there is a hearing behind the ear. You understand what I mean? You listen to a word. As we said listening is an art. Art also means to put everything in its right place. And to listen requires attention, requires a sense of care, a sense of receiving or listening to something that may have a meaning or may not have a meaning. It may be a false statement and to see, to hear, in that false statement the truth of that false statement. You are following all this? Hearing implies a great deal of sensitivity, not just hearing, translating according to your own pleasure or displeasure or according to what you already know. But to listen as though you were listening for the first time to something that is being said. That is the art. Like any other art it requires a great deal of capacity to listen. Right? To listen to your wife, to your husband, to a friend, to listen to your children or to a bird and so on and so on, so that one becomes extraordinarily sensitive. That is the art of listening. And he says, the question is contradictory. That is, the hearing and the activity of the brain - isn't it? Is hearing something different from the activity of the brain? Are you interested in this question or shall we skip it?

Have you noticed how our brain works? Our brain, not according to scientists, biologists and so on, but have you ever observed your own brain working? Have you? Why it thinks certain things? Why there is always the repetition of a problem? Why is it prejudiced? Why it holds on to a belief, to an idea and so on? Have you ever watched it in operation? Not you watching it, but as it arises, looking at it. I wonder if you follow all this? Have you ever tried all this? No, you haven't. So let us now, if I may most respectfully suggest, when you are listening to the speaker, are you listening as though for the first time? He uses English words and apparently you and the speaker understand English. Now when you listen to a word, the word has a sound. Right? And the sound is transmitted to the brain. And the brain then translates the meaning of that word and the significance of that word and the comprehension of that word. Right sir? So, are you listening now as though for the first time? Or you have already heard the speaker talk about many of these things, you've probably read or heard the tapes and so on. Can you put all that aside and listen as though for the first time to what is being said? Or look at the sunrise or the sunset for the first time when you look at the sea, so that the brain doesn't get used to things. You understand what I'm saying sirs? The brain doesn't get accustomed to the sunset, to the sunrise, to your wife, to your husband and all the rest of it - so that everything is new, fresh. That is the art of listening, the art of seeing something as though you are looking at it for the first time. Which means, memory is withheld. This is a discipline, not the discipline of obedience, but the discipline to learn how to look, how to listen.

The word 'discipline' means etymologically a 'disciple who is learning' - not from his master or from his guru or from the one who knows - but one who is learning. That means, as though he did not know anything before but he is now learning. That is the meaning of that word 'discipline', coming from the word disciple. Now if we are learning all the time, then you become the guru and the disciple at the same time. You follow all this? Are you if I may ask, learning from the speaker?

Q: Yes.

K: Are you really learning? Don't bother who said it sir. If you are learning, what does that word mean, learning? Memorizing? Or there is no additive process? You understand what I'm saying? No adding to what you already have accumulated but rather you are not accumulating, but learning, moving. Probably you haven't done any of these things, it's all new. So, learning, hearing and seeing is a great art. To see everything as it is, not only outwardly but specially inwardly - to see things exactly as they are. That's real honesty. In that there is no deception. Because we are so apt to deceive ourselves willingly or unwillingly.

Q: Sir, may I request you to permit spoken questions and a dialogue together, an intimate dialogue. Rather than reading the written question.

K: What sir? I am afraid I haven't heard it properly.

Q: He wants a dialogue. He's asking for a direct dialogue.

K: You want a dialogue?

Q: Yes,

K: Do you know what that word means?

Q: We'll learn from you.

K: It is a conversation between two people. And to have a really good dialogue with another we must be equally interested or committed to that which we are discussing, having a talk over together, a conversation. That means, you and the other must be on the same level, have the same interest, same passion. Otherwise you cannot have a dialogue. It's good to have a dialogue. I wish we could. But with an audience, with so many people it's not possible to have a good dialogue. It's a marvellous thing if you can do it. I'm not preventing you sir from asking questions. But to have a good, deep dialogue requires that you and the speaker move in the same direction, with the same meaning, with the same immediacy of understanding.

Q: Sir, I want to have a clarification of what you said just now. You said, true or false statements. What is truth and false?

K: Truth? What is a true statement or a false statement? How are you going to find out? From another? What is a false statement? False - and what do you mean by false? Say for example, many people accept - it's a very ordinary example - many people accept that nationalism is a marvellous fact. We must be nationalistic. Is that a false statement or a true statement? How do you look at it? How do you find out? Say for instance, most of you in the world believe in god. Don't you? All right. You believe in god. Is it a false statement or a true statement? How do you find out? You can believe in anything you like, in any illusion, in any fanciful, romantic, sentimental concept. And belief may not necessarily be true. No belief is. So, how do you find out these things? How do you find out if there is god? To find out you must have a free mind, not a believing mind. You must have a mind that is capable of investigating, looking, doubting, questioning - not be afraid. So fear can create that which is false as true and that which is true as false. Right? This is happening in the world. So sirs, to find out what is true, what is truth, there must be a great sensitivity, a sense of freedom - not just the idea of freedom but actual freedom, freedom from fear and so on. Most of us have many illusions and those illusions have become truth, real. And to be free of illusion is one of the most necessary and arduous work - to be totally free of all illusions, then only you can find out what is true and what is false.

2nd QUESTION: Since you say that there is no such thing as god and you also condemn idol worship, then the question of how we are born and how nature came into existence comes into the picture. Kindly explain.

I don't have to have explain. Scientists say we came from water, from the cells, from the animal, the ape, and all that is part of nature. It has taken three and a half million years or more or less to become a human being - which is what we are now. Either that's so, or you believe god has made us. Right? You follow this question? Either you believe in the scientific theory or the scientific facts, or you believe that god has made us. Right? Or that there is god in us - whatever game you like to play. The scientists have proved as a fact, that we've come as a tiny cell multiplying itself from the water and gradually becoming earth-bourn, and from the ape we have become what we are. That is, we are part of nature, the whole world is part of us. And if you believe that some creator has made you, that creator must be rather silly, rather blind, idiotic man or woman - because look at us, what we are. (Laughter) Now you laugh, but all the temples, the mosques and the churches are filled with this. We are not made in the image of god but we have made god our image. You understand the difference?

Sirs, to find out, to discover or to come upon that which is not the word, not memory, not tradition, which is not of time and so on, we must understand what we are first. Why we have become like this, barbarious, violent, greedy, envious, money-minded, hating each other, you know all the things that are going on in the world. That's far more important to find that out first rather than to say, who made us? We are what we are now - blind, rather stupid, gullible, frightened, lonely, depressed, sorrowful - all that is what we are. And to understand this whole structure of the human psyche is far more important than merely talk about god, or do some repetitive ritual or go to a temple and worship a piece of stone.

Sir, the speaker doesn't condemn anything. Forgive me pointing this out. He just shows what we human beings are doing. He's acting as a mirror for you to look into. That mirror is not the authority. It has no authority. It's just a mirror. And that mirror, when you see it clearly, understand what you see in that mirror, then throw away the mirror, break it up - don't make another idol of it or another personal worship, as most Indians are apt to do.

So first, what is important is to find out how we live. Why we are so narrow, limited, so self-centred, full of self-interest. It may sound absurd, repetitive but that is the most important factor. That shapes all our lives.

3rd QUESTION: What is the mind? Is it ever possible for it to look at itself without the perceiver? It doesn't seem to be so simple as looking at a flower without the centre.

All right? Have you understood the question? Yes? Would you kindly tell me?

Q: Yes.

K: What is the mind and what is the brain? Is the brain the mind, or the mind is the brain? That's one question. The other is, is it possible for the brain, for thought to see itself in action, in movement? That is the second question. And is it possible ever to observe, to look, to see, without the perceiver? Right? Those are the three questions involved in this. Are you interested in this?

Q: Yes.

K: Sirs, don't please me. I can get up and go; it wouldn't matter. I hope you are interested in it. Or you're concerned about it - not interested - concerned. Is the mind different from the brain? This is a very important question, because we have discussed this matter with several scientists and all the rest of it. The brain is the centre for all our nervous responses - the centre of all action and reaction. Response and not responding. It is the centre of fear, of jealousy, hate, violence, sorrow, loneliness, anxiety, depression, sorrow and so on. It is the centre of all movement, of time and thought. Right sirs? And that brain is conditioned by thought, by fear, by suffering and also it is conditioned by knowledge. Right? Are you following all this?

Q: Yes, yes.

K: So the brain which has lived on this earth for over three and a half or four million years - not as man but as an animal, and so on - only within the last million or fifty thousand years it has become a human being, the brain which is contained in the human being now. This is what the scientists say, that this brain has existed eight thousand BC, and perhaps even longer. So this brain is conditioned. Right? That's a fact - conditioned by thought, by time. And it can only act in a limited way, partially. Right? If you are specialized as an engineer, for the rest of your life it's functioning in a particular direction. If you are interested in money it is working in that direction. Right? If you are a scholar, a Pandit, then you'll gather information and your brain is stuck in that knowledge.

So the brain is conditioned by experience, by knowledge, by memory, which is thought and time. This is an obvious fact. Is the mind within the brain? You understand my question?

Q: Yes sir.

K: Is the mind within the brain or outside the brain? I won't go into it - it would take too long - we cannot have a dialogue about this sir. I wish we could.

You see sir, is love within the brain? Answer this question. Is love compassion, not sympathy or empathy or tenderness and all that? Love may have all that. But the brain is limited, conditioned. And if love is within the brain, love is then conditioned, limited. Right? And is love limited? Is compassion, with its infinite intelligence, is it within the brain? Or outside it?

Q: Yes.

K: No sir, don't say 'yes'. Please, this is a very serious question. You have to go into it - one has to go into it very, very deeply. The brain can only find out if it is aware of its own limitation, and realizing, being attentive to that limitation, then it becomes utterly free and therefore quiet. Then the mind has a possibility of contacting with the brain and not the brain with the mind. I don't know if you understand all this? Are you following a little bit of all this?

Q: Yes sir.

K: Really? (Laughter) Do you know what it means sir, to understand your own way of daily living, and see the truth and the false in your daily living, and see how that daily operation, daily existence is conditioned, narrow, limited, based on self-interest? And whether it is possible to be free of that self-interest. And then see what happens - not imagine what might happen. All that requires, either you take many years or capture it in one instant. This is a very serious matter because the mind is an extraordinary thing if you go into it, if it exists at all, that is, if love exists at all. Love is not conditioned. I can love my wife or my father, mother or my son and yet that perfume can be always there, it's not personal.

4th QUESTION: For the understanding of human problems such as fear, loneliness and sorrow, your statement, 'the observer is the observed', seems to be all important. However, the logic of that statement doesn't seem to go beyond the intellectual level. Why is it that certain facts remain mere concepts?

What do we mean by understanding, the word 'understanding'?

When you say, 'I understand', what do you mean by that? Do you understand the meaning of the words, or do you mean understanding the implication of the words, which is the sound of the words, or you understand it so-called intellectually? That is, you have understood the meaning of the words and the meaning remains as a concept in the brain. Right? So understanding, does it mean merely a verbal comprehension or an understanding? Which is, you have investigated, observed, searched, questioned, doubted and you come to a point, say, 'Yes, I've got it'. Which is it when you use the word 'understand'? And that's our difficulty. You hear a statement, as we have made it just now, and you make from that statement an abstraction - the juice of that statement - and then make it into an idea. And the idea becomes all important, not the fact. Right? Are we together in this, a little bit? Aren't you doing that now? Aren't you, when the speaker says, 'What do you mean by understanding', is it merely words grasping the meaning intellectually, the significance, the verbal connotations and so on? You grasp it intellectually - which is only a very small part of understanding. Intellect has a part, but when that part becomes all important, then you neglect every other part. So, when you understand something, that understanding is action - not just understanding. Say for example, I understand the nature of violence, not only physical violence but the whole complex nature of violence. I not only understand it, I see the consequences of all violence, and the implications, the different forms of violence. I look at the whole of it, not just a part of it; how we escape into this fanciful idea of non-violence. I include all that and look at it. Then, when the looking takes place, you are giving attention to it and therefore going beyond it. Right?

Now, 'For the understanding of all human existence, problems, such as fear, loneliness and sorrow, your statement 'the observer is the observed' seems to be all important.' Let's go into that, shall we? The observer and the observed. Have you ever looked at the moon, the full moon or the new moon? The beauty of a new moon, the slender sliver of light in the western sky or the full moon of the other night? Have you looked at it? When you look at it, who is looking at it? Please, follow this if you don't mind, a little bit. Don't be bored, just follow it. I look at that new moon. Do I look at it as though for the first time, or I look at it saying, 'That's the new moon, it's going to be a full moon in a fortnight's time'? So, I immediately put what I see into words. Right sir? Can I look at that new moon without the word? Right? Because the word is not the moon. The word 'moon' is not the actual moon in the sky. But we, when we look at something, our immediate reaction is to put it into words. This is obvious sir. When I look at my wife, I say, 'she's my wife'. We never look at her as though for the first time, without the word, without the memory, without all the implications of a wife or a husband. So can you - to make it very simple - can you look at a tree or a flower without the word? Have you ever tried it? Have you ever done it without the word? Then you will see how the word distorts the fact. Right? When you say, 'she is my wife' or 'he is my husband' or 'girlfriend' and so on, that very verbalization of a human being - who is living - you have put that human being into a word. Therefore that word is limited. You understand all this? Are we understanding a little bit of all this?

So can you look at something without the word? Can you look, as you are sitting there, looking at this figure, can you look at this figure without the word, without the image, without the reputation, without all that nonsense? Can you look at him? Is not the word the observer? Do you understand it? Is not the word and the image, the memory, is not all that the observer? Is not the background of being a Hindu with all the superstitions, with all the beliefs, with all the implications, or if you are a Muslim with all that background. It is the memory that gives the observer as though it was different from the thing observed. Right? Are you following this a little bit? Are we wasting time? So can you look, observe, without the background, without the past memories impinging upon the thing being observed? When you do that there is only that thing which is being observed. There is no observer observing, seeing the thing observed. Have you understood this? Sir, when there is a difference between the observer or the one who witnesses, between the observer and the observed, when there is a division between the two - as we said before - wherever there is division, there must be conflict. Right? And to understand why human beings live in conflict from the moment they are born till they die, is to find out why this division exists between the observer and the observed and so on, or is there only the thing observed.

Sir, what we are saying is, wherever there is a division there must be conflict. That's a law. An eternal law. Where there is separation, a division, a breaking up into two parts there must be conflict. And that conflict becomes ultimately war, killing people. As is being shown now in the world, in America, in Russia, in Lebanon, the Muslims, the Islamic world and the non-Islam world, they are in conflict. So to understand and so be free of conflict, really be free of it, is to understand why the observer becomes so dominant, separate from him, or her, the thing being observed. Right, sir? When I observe, if I am married or have a girl friend, there is a division between us, an actual not only physical division but traditional division, the authority of the parent, the authority of someone, so there is division always in our relationships and therefore there is always conflict between human beings. There are very few human beings in the world who have a relationship in which conflict doesn't exist. And that conflict exists because we have separated the observer from the observed. I am different from my anger. Right? I am different from my envy, I am different from my sorrow, therefore being different, there is conflict. That is, 'I must get rid of sorrow'. 'Tell me how to overcome sorrow'. 'Tell me what to do with my fear'. So there is conflict, conflict all the time. But you are sorrow. You are not different from sorrow, are you? You are not different from anger, are you? You are not different from your sexual desires, are you? You are not different from the loneliness you feel - you are lonely. But we say, 'Yes, I'm lonely but I must escape from that'. So I go to the temple or be entertained and so on. You are not different from the quality of which you are; the quality is you. I am anger. I am sorrow. I am lonely, depressed. Now, before, when I separated, I acted upon my sorrow. You understand? If I am lonely I then escape from loneliness, try to overcome it or analyze it and try to fill the loneliness with all kinds of amusements or religious activity. But if I am lonely, I can't do anything about it. Right? You understand this fact? No? Right? Please tell me. If I am lonely and I am lonely - not, I am lonely as something different from me - I am that. Before I acted upon it, now I can't act upon it because I am that.

So what happens when the observer is the observed? You understand? When the anger is me, then what takes place? Have you enquired into this or you just say, 'Yes, I am the observer and the observed'? Meaningless. But to find out or experience, go into it and find out if anger is always different from you. That has been the tradition; that has been the conditioning, saying, 'I am different from my anger', therefore you acted upon it. But if when you realize you are anger, then what do you do, what happens?

First, all conflict ceases. Right? Are you following this a little bit? All conflict ceases when you realize you are that. I am brown - finished. It's a fact. Light brown or dark brown or purple or whatever colour it is. So you eliminate altogether this divisive process which brings conflict in yourself.

And why is it, the questioner asks, that we make an abstraction of a fact? The fact is I am anger. I am jealous, I am lonely. Why do we make that into an idea, an abstraction of it? Is it easier to make an abstraction rather than to face the fact? Because I can play with the idea. I say, 'Yes, this is a good idea', 'This is a bad idea', 'Convince me about it', 'Not convince me'. You follow? I can go on. But when there is no abstraction but the fact, then I have to deal with it. And then I separate myself and then say, 'I am going to do something about it'. But when one realizes there is no separation - you are that, you are 'what is: you are a Hindu, you are a Muslim, you are a Christian; you are a business man, you are ugly, you are brutal; you are all that - then you have eliminated altogether the sense of division in you and therefore no conflict. Do you know what the brain is like when there is no conflict? When the brain is in perpetual conflict, as most people's brains are, what happens to that brain? It's wounded, right? It's wounded, hurt.

Q: May I ask you one question?

K: Sir, I am in the middle of a... Sit down, come up here sir. Sir, poor chap, he's come all that way, let him ask a question - a little later sir, let me finish.

Probably you have lived so long with conflict, with pain and sorrow, fear, and this conflict, you've said, 'It's part of my life. I'll accept conflict', and you've gone on that way. But you've never enquired what conflict does to the brain, to a human being, to the psyche. You know it's being perpetually beaten. If one is constantly beaten, physically, do you know what happens? Constantly bombarded with conflict, what happens to the brain? It shrinks. It becomes very small, limited, ugly. That's what is happening to all of us. So the fairly intelligent man asks, 'Why should I live in conflict for the rest of my life'? So he begins to enquire what is conflict. Conflict must exist where there is division - inside as well as outside. And this division basically, deeply, fundamentally is the 'me', the observer, and the thing observed. Two separate activities going on, which is not true, because you are anger, you are violence. So if you come to that point and realize that the observer is the observed, then there is a totally different activity going on.

Now sir, what did you want to say?

Q: You are telling me, I am the anger because the anger is a condition of my mind. And sorrow is also a condition of my mind. Happiness and unhappiness, anger, these are all conditions of my mind. Because I know my mind. Because I am not my mind. My mind is different from me because it is my mind.

K: I understand sir.

Q: Mind is entirely different from me.

K: Yes.

Q: So I know the conditions of my mind. Because this is in some sense in happy conditions, it is sometimes unhappy conditions, it is sometimes sorrow conditions. Because when I get one thought previously in the world of memory...

K: Yes sir.

Q:.. I may recollect.

K: Yes sir, yes sir.

Q: Immediately my mind goes on recollecting that memory.

K: Yes sir, yes sir. Why? I understand it very well. Do you want to come here and give us a talk?

Q: Sir, what I mean is, if I know my anger, it will not be anger. When I won't identify...

K: Yes sir, yes sir. Come over. Bring him up on to the platform. Now give them a lecture, sir. (Laughter).

Q: No, no, sir. Excuse me sir.

K: Say it.

Q: No, no sir. Sir when I know my anger, it is not an anger. Why? Because I am knowing my anger. When I identify myself with anger, immediately the action will come out. Is it correct or not? Please understand me, I am not discouraging anybody.

K: Try to understand sir, we were...

Q: Mr Krishnamurti, don't misunderstand.

K: Sir, sit here quietly.

Q: No, no, because I just...

K: Sir, sit here quietly, Sit down sir. Now that you are here, sit down. It's time to stop.

Sir, you've heard what K has been talking about this morning. You've heard various responses, various answers to questions and we go away rather confused, not clear. But if we listen to each other - I've listened to this gentleman, really listened, and there is no conflict between the speaker and himself, because he's listened, he know what he has to say. If we could just for one day or one hour, see what conflict is, why we human beings are caught in conflict, with all the pain and the anxiety, loneliness, all that - then perhaps we may be able to live a life with a brain that has never been harmed, never had any wound, any shock, so that it's a free brain. And it's only then that perhaps the mind - which is love - can contact the brain. That's all.

3RD PUBLIC TALK BOMBAY 9TH FEBRUARY 1985

May we continue with what we were talking about last Sunday?

We were talking about a holistic life, a way of living that's not fragmented, that's not broken up as our lives are, but to find out for ourselves a way of living that is holistic, that is whole, not fragmented, not broken up, not splintered. And we went into that question fairly deeply. We saw what were the causes of this fragmentation of the human brain. And also we talked about various factors in our social, moral and religious lives, that we have broken it up, as Hindus, Muslims, Christians, Buddhists and so on. Religions have been greatly responsible for this catastrophe of human existence. And we talked also about time, time being not only the past, all the memories, the accumulated experiences and so on, modified by the present, and continuing into the future. That's our life. And we have existed on this earth according to the biologists and archaeologists and so on for over three and a half million years, and during that long interval of so-called evolution we have accumulated an enormous amount of memory.

And we also talked about the limitation of memory, and therefore the limitation of thought. And that limitation of thought has broken up the world geographically, nationally, religiously, as the Hindus, the Muslims, the Christians and so on.

As we said the other day, this is not a lecture - lecture indicates to inform and to instruct, we are not doing that. You are not listening, if I may most respectfully point out, to a series of ideas, conclusions. But rather we are both together, you and the speaker, are taking a journey as two friends, talking over not only family problems but the world problems and so on. So this is as much your responsibility to listen to carefully as that of the speaker to say things clearly so that both of us understand what we are talking about.

And we are going to talk over many things, not only this evening but tomorrow evening, we are going to talk over together order and disorder, pleasure, love, sorrow and if we have time, death. These are all rather complicated questions which we all have to face in our daily life, whether you are rich or poor, or officials, a series of government officials, you have to face this problem of existence in which our lives are in a state of disorder, which is fairly obvious. Our lives, our daily lives, are in disorder, which means contradiction, saying one thing, doing another, believe in something and actually moving in a totally different direction from what we believe. And this contradiction creates disorder. I wonder if one is at all aware of these problems. Apparently there is going to be more and more disorder in the world on account of not only bad governments, economic conditions, social disorder and always the threat of war, which is becoming more and more imminent, more and more pressing. And all the governments are buying armaments all over the world, even the tiniest nations are buying armaments.

So there is, as you observe throughout the world, a great disorder. And our lives also, our daily lives are in disorder. And we are always pursuing order, not only governments, law, and so on, we want order because without order human beings will inevitably destroy themselves. I hope - one hopes that we are sharing the questions together. That you are also thinking about this question together, thinking together, observing together, listening together, having a dialogue in which you are participating. So it is not a matter of gathering some few ideas and conclusions, but together find out why we live in disorder, and can there be total order in our lives, and therefore total order is society. Society is brought about by us, is put together by us. Our greed, our ambitions, our envy, this individual concept of freedom, which we shall go into presently, this has brought about a great deal of disorder, a sense of individuality. Please listen, together let us listen to what is being said, actually listen. Not interpret, or resist, or defend, because we are not attacking anybody, we are merely observing what is going on in the world, together.

So in our lives, as we live it now, after all these millions of years, we still are in disorder. And man has always sought order because without order one cannot possibly function freely, holistically. Right? So to find out what is order, not a blue print, not something that you put into a frame and follow it. Order is something that is active, living, not conforming to a pattern, either the pattern being idealistic, historical dialectical conclusions, or religious sanctions. All religions throughout the world have laid down certain laws, certain sanctions, commandments, but human beings have not followed them at all. So we can put aside all those ideological conclusions. And also put aside your religious beliefs which have nothing to do with daily existence. You may conform, follow certain laws laid down by religion but that brings about also great bigotry, and so on.

So what is order? And is it possible to find out what is order when our brain is confused, disorderly? So we must first find out what is disorder, not order because when there is no disorder naturally there will be order. Right? So we must enquire together, together please, what is disorder? Why we live in disorder? One of the causes of this disorder, perhaps the major cause, is conflict, which we talked about in the last three talks, we won't go into it much more deeply this evening. Where there is conflict there must be disorder, not only between man and woman, but between nations, between the religious beliefs, faiths, conformity, there must be disorder. And one of the major causes of disorder is this concept, this illusion that we are all individuals.

As we said in the previous talks, we must question, doubt, doubt what the speaker is saying, question what he says, not accept anything from anybody, but question, investigate, not resist. If you merely resist what is being said, which may be true or false, then our conversation comes to an end. If two people are talking over together their problems, if one is resisting then conversation ends. But if both of them, not persuading each other, not informing each other, not trying to influence the other, but together amicably, because they are friends, go into this question whether we live in this illusion that we are all separate individuals. The communist theory - most of you perhaps know it already - is that we are the result of a whole series of the environment, so change the environment then human beings change. Which is absurd altogether, because they have shown it - the Russian totalitarianism has pointed out very clearly the dominance of the few making them believe, controlling their thinking and so on and so on, has not brought about the end of individuality. On the contrary.

So we are going together to find out, because as we said that is one of the major causes of disorder in our life, each one thinking he is free, each one thinking his own fulfillment, his own desires, his own ambition, his own private pleasures. We are going to find out together if that is a fact, or a long established respectable illusion. May we go into this together? Together. Not accepting, nor denying. It's foolish to say, "I agree with you" or "disagree with you". Because you don't agree or disagree about the sun rising and the sun setting, it is a fact. You never say, "I agree with you, the sun rises in the East". So perhaps you could put aside the sense of agreement and disagreement. But together carefully without any bias or resistance, enquire whether there is actual individuality, or there is something entirely different. All right? Pull up your socks and let's talk over together.

Our consciousness has been the result of a million years, or more. Our consciousness contains all the animalistic, primitive essence. Because we come from the animal, from nature, so deep down in our consciousness one will find that there is still deeply the responses and the fears and the desire for security of the animals. That is part of our consciousness. Right? And also our consciousness contains all the innumerable beliefs, faiths, reactions and actions. Our consciousness is fear, pleasure, various memories, sorrow, and searching for something, to possess complete security. That is all what we are. You may think you are part of the divine, that is also part of your thinking. So all that consciousness we think is each one, it belongs to each one of us. Right? You all think, religions have maintained that you have separate souls - in Christianity, and Hinduism, and the various other forms of religious activity. Now we are questioning the whole of it. Do you not share the sorrow of the rest of human beings? All human beings throughout the world have various forms of fears, various forms of pleasure, they suffer as you suffer, they pray, they do all kinds of absurd ceremonies, as you do. Seeking stimulation through ceremonies, sensation, as you do. So we share the consciousness of all humanity. So you are the entire humanity. Right? Logically first see it. Logically every human being on this earth, whatever religion, belief, and so on, they suffer, every human being on this earth suffers, deeply or superficially, evading suffering and so on, we will go into that presently.

And this consciousness which we have considered mine, personal consciousness, is not a fact, because as we pointed out, every human being living on this marvellous, beautiful earth, which we are carefully destroying, we all are one because we all go through the same problems, same pain, anxiety and loneliness, depression, tears, laughter, contradictions, conflict between man and woman, husband and wife. Even in Russia this goes on.

So are you individuals in your consciousness? Because that is what you are, your consciousness. Whatever you think, whatever you imagine, whatever your tendencies, aptitudes, talent, gifts, faculty, it is shared by all other human beings, exactly similar to you. This is a logical fact. And logic has a certain place. One must think clearly, logically, reasonably, sanely, but it is based on thought. However logical one may be thought being limited - we have gone into it several times so we won't go into it this evening - that thought becomes reasonable but it is limited. So one must go beyond thought, beyond the necessity of the limitation of reason.

So you are the entire humanity. You understand? You are not an individual. You either listen to that statement, that is, that you are the entire humanity, you are humanity, not an Indian, or all the rubbish of that. And when you listen to a statement of that kind, that you are the entire humanity, do you make an abstraction of it? That is, bring about an idea of the fact. You understand? The fact is one thing, and the idea about the fact is another. Is this clear? The fact, which is that we have thought that we are individuals, our religions, our daily life, our conditioning, has made up believe that we are individuals. Somebody like the speaker comes along and says, look carefully, is that so? First we resist it, and say, what are you talking about. First we push it aside. But if you carefully listen, and as two friends are listening to each other, then you hear this statement that you are the entire humanity - how do you hear that statement, the sound of it? Do you make out of that statement an idea, away from the fact? Right? And pursue the idea? I don't know if you are following all this. Somebody please tell me. Do you understand?

The word is not the thing. Right? Which we went into. The microphone, the word microphone is not the actual think in front of the speaker. So you hear you are - because you are your consciousness, with all its reactions and actions, and that consciousness is shared by all humanity, because every human being goes through desperate loneliness, sorrow, pain, as you do - so you are the entire humanity. Now how do you listen to that statement? Do you reject it? Or do you examine it? Do you investigate that statement, or merely say, well, what nonsense? What are you doing, not tomorrow, now? What's your reaction?

Because this is a very serious thing, that you are the entire humanity. Either you listen to the depth of it, the sound of it, the beauty of it, the immensity of it, with its tremendous responsibility. Or you treat it superficially, verbally, and say, yes, I understand it intellectually. But intellectual comprehension has very little meaning. It must be in one's blood, in one's guts, and out of that comes a total sense of a different quality of a brain that's holistic, not fragmentary. It is the fragment that creates disorder. We, as individuals, have fragmented the human consciousness and therefore we live in disorder.

Sir, when you realize that you are the entire humanity, that is what love is. You will not kill another, you will not harm another, you move away from all aggression, violence, and the brutality of religions.

So our consciousness is shared, is one with all humanity. You don't see the beauty of this, the immensity of it. You will go back to your own pattern, thinking you are all individuals, fighting, striving, competitive, each wanting to fulfil his own beastly little self. Right? So it means nothing to you because you go back to your old way of life. So it is much better not to listen to all this. If you listen to truth and you don't act upon it, it acts as poison. You understand this? That's why our lives are so shoddy and superficial.

And also we must talk over together why man not only lived in disorder for thousand and thousands of years, but also why man is perpetually seeking pleasure: pleasure in possessions, pleasure in achievement, pleasure in power, pleasure having a status, a symbol, not only sexual pleasure, and that pleasure is maintained by constantly thinking about sex, imaginary pictures, making images. Which is, thought gives pleasure, sensation is turned into pleasure. I wonder if you are following all this?

So we must understand what is pleasure, why we seek pleasure. We are not saying it is right or wrong. We are not condemning pleasure, as we are not condemning desire. Desire is part of pleasure. The fulfillment of desire is the nature of pleasure. So we ought to talk over together not only the nature of pleasure but also what is desire. Desire may be the cause of disorder, each one wanting to fulfil, achieve his own particular desire. You understand all this? Are we taking a journey together, or the speaker is going on talking to himself, or walking by himself? This is supposed to be a gathering; a gathering is a gathering of people who are concerned with serious matters, not with entertainment, not with intellectual games, but we are concerned with our lives, our daily monotonous, boring lives, trivial lives, shoddy lives.

So please together we are going to investigate if desire is one of the major causes of disorder, and desire in its fulfillment, in its achievement, in any direction, gives pleasure, gratifies. So we ought together investigate, explore, what is desire. Not condemning it, not escape from it, not try to suppress it, as most religions have said, suppress desire - which is absurd. So let us look at it. What is desire? When you put that question to yourself, what is desire, probably most of us have not thought about it at all. We have accepted it as a way of life, that it is a natural instinct of man or woman, and we say, why bother about it. Except those people who have so-called renounced the world - which they never have - and those who enter into monasteries, organized monasteries and so on, there they try to sublimate the desire with the worship of a person, a symbol and so on. So please bear in mind we are not condemning it. We are trying to find out together what is desire, why man has been for a million years, not only physically, biologically, but also psychologically caught in the trap of desire, in the network of desire. Right? Will you investigate with the speaker, or just listen to the speaker, while he investigates, explores on his own?

You know how easy it is to be caught in explanations, in descriptions, and we are satisfied with commentaries, descriptions, and explanations. But we are not doing that here. We have to explain, we have to describe, we have to point out, put it in the framework of words. But desire is one of the most complex things to understand, not intellectually but profoundly. So we are going to find out, together what is desire? Don't look to me. I'll explain, I will go into it, but you have to go into it too, not just say, yes, I agree, or disagree, that's silly. But to find out the nature of desire, the construction, how desire is put together, what is the origin of desire, the beginning of desire. Every animal on this earth has desire. Every human being is caught in this network of desires; and feels unhappy when his desires are not fulfilled, and when those desires are not fulfilled, whether those desires be ideological, religious, or platonic, or merely physical. What is the origin, the beginning of desire? The speaker will describe, not analyse. There is a difference between analysis and perception. Analysis implies the analyser and the thing to be analysed. Right? Right? The analyser and the thing he is going to analyse, which means the analyser is different from the analysed. Are they different? Suppose I am the analyser and I am envious, and I begin to analyse why I am envious, as though I am different from envy. But envy is me. Right? Envy is not separate from me. Greed, competition, comparison, all that is me. So we are not analysing. But we are looking, hearing, and the process of learning. Learning is not merely accumulating memory. That is necessary. But learning is something entirely different, it is not an accumulative process. You are moving, never recording, fresh. I won't go into that now, that takes us in a different direction altogether.

So together we are observing what is desire, what is the origin of desire, why human beings are caught in it endlessly. If you have a little money, you want more money; if you have a little power, you want more power. Right? And power in any form, whether power over your wife or your children, politically, religiously, it is an abominable thing, it is evil, because that is nothing to do with truth. We will go into that.

So what is the origin of desire? We live by sensation. If there was no sensation, both biologically and psychologically, we would be dead human beings. Right? We live by sensation. That crow, calling, that is acting on the ear drum, nerves, and translating the noise into the cry of a crow. That is a sensation. And sensation is brought about by hearing, or seeing, then contact. Right? Must I explain all these silly things? You see a nice garden, beautifully kept, the green is rich, perfect, there are no weeds in it, that lawn has been kept going for four hundred years. It is a lovely thing to watch, to see. Then the seeing, then if you are sensitive you go and touch the grass. That contact - seeing, contact, then sensation. Right? You are following this? Seeing a lovely garden, a nice car, a nice tree, and a beautiful man or woman - seeing, contact, then sensation. We live by sensation. It is necessary. If you are not sensitive, if you are dull, you are half living - as most of us are. So sensation, then what takes place? Take a very simple example: you see a nice sari, or a shirt in the shop, you see it, you go inside, touch it, and there is the sensation of touching it, you say, "By Jove, what a lovely material that is" - then what takes place? Do you understand? There is seeing, contact, sensation; then what takes place after that? Are you waiting for me to tell you? You see, sirs, please do listen to this. If you see this for yourself, not being told by another, then you will become the teacher and the disciple. Oh, do understand all this. But if you repeat, repeat, repeat what somebody has said, including the speaker, then you remain mediocre, thoughtless, repetitive. So let's go into it.

There is seeing, contact, sensation. You see that nice car, one of the latest cars in Europe, not here. There are no beautiful cars in India, except those imported from abroad. You see a beautiful car, you touch the polish, the shape of it, the texture, then out of that there is sensation. Then thought comes and says, how nice it would be if I got that. How nice it would be if I got into it and drove off. Right? So what has happened? Thought has given shape to sensation. Right? You are following this? Thought has given to sensation the image of you sitting in that car driving off. At that moment when thought creates the image of you sitting in the car, at that second desire is born. All right? Have you understood this? Desire is born when thought gives shape to sensation, gives an image to sensation.

Now the question is: sensation is the way of existence, it is part of existence, to be sensitive. And we have learnt to suppress, or to conquer, or to live with desire with all its problems. Now if one understands this not intellectually but actually, that thought gives shape through the image, at that second the origin of desire is there. Then the question arises: is it possible to see the car, which is sensation, touch it, but not let thought create the image, so keep a gap? You understand? Do you understand this?

You see sir, one must find out also in this question, what is discipline. This country is the most undisciplined country in the world, part of the world. You spit all over the place, you are untidy. Discipline, what is discipline, because it is related to desire? So let's talk about discipline and we will come back to desire afterwards. The word 'discipline' comes from the word disciple. The origin, the etymological meaning of that word is one who is learning, a disciple who is learning from his master. Learning, not conforming, not controlling, not suppressing, following, becoming obedient. On the contrary: learning from observation. That is you are learning what is desire, learning about it, which is not memorizing it.

So most of us are trained, especially if you are in the army or in all that business, trained to discipline according to a pattern, copy, follow, obey. That's what you are all doing. And that's called discipline, hoping that discipline will bring about order. But if one is learning, which is the root meaning of that word, then that very learning becomes its own order. You don't have order imposed by law or anything else.

So where thought gives shape to sensation by giving it an image, at that second desire is born. And to learn, to find out whether it is possible to allow sensation to flower and not let thought interfere with it, to keep the division - I won't use the word 'division' - to keep them apart. Will you do it? You can't, you have never done all this. Then you will find out that desire has its right place. And when you understand the nature of desire there is no conflict about it.

We ought also to talk over together what is love and sorrow and death. Shall we go on? Do you want the speaker to go on? Are you sure? Of course you love to hear somebody talk! Sirs, please this is much too serious all this. It affects your daily life, it is not something you intellectually play with. It concerns your life, not somebody else's life. The way you live. After all these million years, look what our lives are, how empty, shallow, how violent, brutal, inconsiderate, thoughtless, and all the rest of it. Look at it. And all this has created such havoc in the world. We all want to have high positions, achieve something, become something. And looking at all this, there is great sorrow, isn't there? Doesn't every human being in the world whether highly placed, or just an ignorant villager, doesn't he goes through great sorrow. He may recognize the nature and the beauty and the strength of sorrow, but he goes through pain, like you do, and mankind has gone through sorrow for a million years. They haven't solved the problem. They want to escape from it. They want it organized.

And what is the relationship of sorrow to love and death? Can there be an end to sorrow? This has been one of the questions mankind has asked for a million years. Is there an end to all the pain, the anxieties, to the grief of sorrow? Sorrow is not only your own particular sorrow, there is the sorrow of mankind. Historically speaking there have been five thousand years of war, every year there has been somebody killing somebody else, for their tribe, for their religion, for their nation, for their community, for their individual protection and so on and so on. Have you ever realized this, what the wars have done? You are fighting the Muslim, the Pakistan and the Hindu. Have you ever gone into the question of wars that have created havoc, how many millions have cried? How many millions are being wounded, without arms, without legs, without eyes, even without a face. You people don't know anything about all this.

So is there an end to sorrow and all the pain therein? And what is sorrow? Don't you know sorrow? Don't you? Are you ashamed to acknowledge it? When your son and daughter, and somebody whom you think you love, are taken away, don't you shed tears? Don't you feel terribly lonely? You have lost a companion for ever. We are not discussing about death. But this immense thing that man goes through and never having a solution, an answer to that. Without ending sorrow there is no love. Sorrow is part of our self-interest, it is part of our egotistic self-centred activity; self-interest. I cry for another, for my son, brother, mother. Why? Because I have lost something that I am attached to, lost something which gave me companionship, comfort and all the rest of it. And with the ending of that person I realize how utterly empty my life is, or how lonely my life is. And then I cry. And there are many, many thousands of people ready to comfort me. And I slip very easily into that network, into that trap of comfort. Whether it is the comfort of god, which is an image, put together by thought, or the comfort of some illusory concept, idea, but it gives me comfort, and that's all I care. But I never question the very urge and desire for comfort, whether there is any comfort at all. One needs to have a comfortable bed, that's all right, a nice comfortable chair. But the urge, the desire for comfort, we never question if there is any comfort at all, psychologically, inwardly. Or is it an illusion which has become our truth? You understand? An illusion can become our truth? I wonder if you understand this? The illusion that there is god, that god has been created by thought, by fear. If you have no fear there is no god. But god has been invented by man through fear, through loneliness, through despair, wanting this everlasting comfort. So we never question if there is comfort at all. Which is, deep abiding satisfaction. Because we all want to be satisfied, not only with the food that we eat, satisfied sexually, satisfied by achieving some position of authority and therefore having comfort in that position, in that state. Don't you know all this?

So we must ask if there is any comfort at all? If there is anything that will be gratifying, satisfying from the moment we are born until we die. Don't listen to me, find out. Give your energy, your thought, your blood, your heart, to find out. And if there is no illusion, is there any comfort? If there is no fear, do you want comfort? Comfort is another form of pleasure. Yes, sir, this is a very complex problem of our life. While we are so shallow, empty, filled by other people's knowledge, by books, we are not independent, free human beings to find out why we are slaves. This is not a rhetorical question, it is a question each one of us must ask. And in the very asking and the doubting there comes freedom. And without freedom there is no sense of truth.

So we will continue tomorrow afternoon with the question of death, and perhaps go into this question of sorrow, what is a religious life, what is religion, and is there something that is totally sacred, holy, nothing invented by thought. We will go into it tomorrow, not that the speaker is inviting you to come tomorrow. He doesn't care two pins if you come, or don't come. It's your life.

BOMBAY 4TH PUBLIC TALK 10TH FEBRUARY 1985

We have a lot of ground to cover this evening so we won't go back and repeat what we have said during the last three talks.

Yesterday evening we were talking about sorrow and the ending of sorrow. With the ending of sorrow there is passion. And very few of us really understand or go deeply into the question of sorrow. Is it possible to end all sorrow? This has been a question that has been asked by all human beings, perhaps not very consciously, but deeply they want to find out, as we all do, if there is an end to human suffering, human pain, and the ending of sorrow. Because without the ending of sorrow there is no love. And to go into this question very seriously: when there is sorrow it is a great shock to the nervous system, like a blow to the whole physiological as well as psychological being. And we generally try to escape from it, taking drugs, drinks and every form of religious escapism. Or become merely cynical, or accept the things as they are inevitably.

And to go into this question very deeply, seriously, is it possible not to escape from it at all? Perhaps my son dies, and there is immense sorrow, shock. And I discover that I am really a very lonely human being. And I cannot face it, I cannot tolerate it, so I escape from it. And there are many escapes - religious, mundane or philosophical. This escape is a wastage of energy.

As we said, we are talking over things together, you and the speaker are looking into this matter of sorrow and we are together taking a journey, not the speaker alone. If we do not escape in any form from the ache, the pain of loneliness, the grief, the shock, but remain completely with the event, with this thing called suffering, is that possible? If we hold any problem, hold it, not try to solve it, try to look at it. Before you there is a precious jewel, exquisitely hand cut and so on, a beautiful thing, one keeps looking at it, one doesn't want to escape from it. The very beauty of it is so attractive, so pleasurable, we keep looking at it. In the same way if we could hold completely without any movement of thought or escape, hold it, then that very action of not moving away from the fact brings about a total release from that which has caused pain. We will go into this a little later.

And also we should consider what is beauty. This is very important. Not the beauty of a person only, or go to a museum and see the marvellous paintings and statues and man's most ancient endeavour to express his own feelings in stone or in paint, or in a poem; but also if we ask ourselves: what is beauty? Beauty may be truth. Beauty may be love. And without understanding the nature and depth of that extraordinary word beauty, it is inevitable that we shall never be able to come upon that which is sacred. So we must go into the question of what is beauty.

We are not talking about the beauty of a person, the face, a beautiful sari, a lovely tree, and the ancient paintings. When you see something greatly beautiful like a mountain full of snow against the blue sky, what actually takes place? When you see something extraordinarily alive, beautiful, great majesty, for a moment, for a second, the very majesty of that mountain, the immensity of it, drives away, puts all the self concern, all the problems, at that second there is no 'me' watching it. The very greatness of that mountain has driven away for a second all my self concern. Surely one must have noticed this. Then you say, how extraordinarily beautiful it is. There the majesty of that mountain with that snow, and the beautiful line against the blue sky, that very majesty puts aside for a second the 'me'. Have you noticed a child with a toy? He has been naughty all day long, which is right, and you give him a toy and for the next hour until he breaks it up he is extraordinarily quiet. Which is, the toy has absorbed his naughtiness. The toy has taken him over. Similarly when you see something extraordinarily beautiful, that very beauty absorbs us.

That is, there is beauty when there is no self. You understand this? When there is no self-interest, all the travail of the self, without being absorbed, or shaken by something extraordinarily beautiful like a mountain or a valley in a deep shadow, without being taken over by the mountain, is it possible to understand the beauty without the self? Because where there is self there is no beauty, where there is self-interest there is no love. And love and beauty go together. They are not separate.

And as we said, we have to cover a great deal of ground this evening. So we ought to talk over together, what is death. That's the one certain thing which we all have to face, whether you are rich or poor, ignorant or very full of erudition, that is the certainty of every human being, they are all going to die. And we have never been able to understand the nature of death. We are always frightened of dying, aren't you? And we hope for continuity after death. So we are going to together find out for ourselves what is dying, because we are going to face it, whether you are young or old there is one certain thing in life.

And to understand death we must also enquire what is living. What is our life? Are we wasting our life? By that word 'wasting' dissipating our energies in various forms, dissipating by specialized professions. Are we wasting our whole existence, one life? Are we wasting it? People who are rich say, yes, we have accumulated a lot of money, it has been a great pleasure; or if you have a certain talent. A talent is a danger to a religious life - talent being that which is a gift, a faculty, an aptitude, an aptitude in a particular direction, which is specialization. Specialization is a fragmentary process.

So one must ask oneself whether one is wasting one's life. You may be rich, you may have all kinds of faculties, you may be a specialist, a great scientist, or a businessman, at the end of life has all that been a wastage, all this travail, all this sorrow, all the tremendous anxiety, insecurity, the foolish illusions that man has collected, his gods, all the saints and so on, has all that been a waste? You may have power, position, at the end of it, what? Please, this a serious question that one must ask oneself. Another cannot answer this question, except yourself.

So we have separated living from dying. This dying is at the end of one's life, put it as far away as possible, a long interval of time. But at the end of a long journey we die. And what is it that we call living? Earning money, going to the office from nine to five, overworked, either in a laboratory, or an office, or in a factory, and there is endless conflict, fear, anxiety, loneliness, despair, depression, this whole way of existence which we call life, living? Is that living? This enormous travail of man, his endless conflict. And to that we hold. This living is called pain, sorrow, anxiety, conflict, every form of deception, corruption. Where there is self-interest there must be corruption. And this is what we call living. And we know that. We are very familiar with all that, that is our daily existence. Nobody can cheat us from that.

And we are afraid of dying. Which is, letting go all the things we have known, all the things that we have experienced, gathered, the lovely furniture that we have had, and the beautiful collection of your pictures, paintings, and death comes and says you can't have any of those any more. And we cling to the known, afraid of the unknown. We can invent reincarnation, that we should evolve next life. And we never enquire into what is it that is born next life. What is born next life is a bundle of memories. Because we live by memories, we live by the knowledge acquired or inherited, and that knowledge is what we are. The self is the knowledge of the past experiences, thoughts and so on. The self is that. The self may invent there is something divine in one but it is still the activity of thought, and thought is always limited, as we talked about it the other day.

So this is our living, this is what we call life - pleasure and pain, reward and punishment, this is our life. And death means the ending of all that, the ending of all the things that we have accumulated, enjoyed. And we are attached to all this. One is attached to one's family, to all the accumulated money, to knowledge, to the beliefs that one has lived with, to the ideals, we are attached to all that. And death says, "That is the end of it, old boy." Now the question is: why has the brain separated living - living which is consciousness and so on - and death, why has this division taken place? Does this division exist when there is attachment? Please, as we said, we are talking over things together. We are sharing the thing which man has lived with for a million years, the living and the dying. And so we have to examine the thing together, not resist, not say, yes, "I believe in reincarnation, I live by that, to me that is important" - then the conversation between us comes to an end. But if we really go into the question of what is living, what is wasting one's life, and what is dying.

One is attached to so many things, to your guru, to the accumulated knowledge, to the memory of one's son, daughter and so on. That memory is you. Your whole brain is filled with memory, not only memories of recent events but also the memory of the deep abiding memory of that which has been the animal, the ape, we are part of that, that memory. And we are attached to this whole consciousness. Right? That's a fact. And death comes and says, 'That is the end of your attachment.' And we are frightened of that. Frightened of being completely free from all that. And death is that, cutting off everything that you have got. We can invent, you can say, yes, I'll continue next life. Therefore what is it that continues? You understand my question? What is it that in us there is this desire to continue? Is there continuity at all, except of your bank account, going to the office every day, a routine of worship, and the continuity of your beliefs. But they are all brought together by thought. And thought has been limited, and so creating conflict. We went into all that, we are not going to go into it now.

And the self, the 'me', the ego, the persona, is a bundle of complicated ancient and modern memories. Which you can see for yourself, you don't have to study books and philosophies and all that. You can see it for yourself very clearly, that you are a bundle of memories. And death puts an end to all that memory, and therefore one is frightened.

Now the question is: can one live in the modern world with death? Not suicide, we are not talking about that, but end as you live all attachment, which is death. Right? I am attached to the house I am living in, I bought it, I have paid a great deal of money for it, and I am attached to all the furniture, the picture, the family, the memories, all that. And death comes and wipes all that out. And can I live everyday of my life with death, ending everything everyday? Ending all the attachments, that's what it means to die. But we have separated living from dying, therefore we are perpetually frightened. But when you bring life and death together, the living and dying, then you will find out there is a state of the brain in which all knowledge as memory ends. But you need knowledge to write a letter, to come here, to speak English, to keep accounts, to go to your home. You need knowledge. But to keep knowledge as something not entirely occupied in the mind. We were talking the other day with a computer expert. The computer can be programmed, and it stores that memory. And also the computer can put aside all that memory in a paper, or in a list, and keep itself empty so that it can be reprogrammed or instructed further.

So can the brain use knowledge when necessary but be free of all knowledge? That is, our brain is recording all the time. You are recording what is being said now. And that record becomes a memory. And that memory, that recording is necessary in a certain area, that area is physical activity. It's obvious. And can the brain be free so that it can function totally in a different dimension? That is, every day when you go to bed, wipe out everything that you have collected, die at the end of the day. Do you understand all this? You hear a statement of this kind, that is, living is dying, they are not two separate things at all - you hear that statement, not only with hearing of the ear, but also you hear it, if you are listening carefully, you hear the truth of it, the actuality of it. And for the moment you see the clarity of this, and later on you slip back, you are attached, you begin to be - you know, all the rest of it. So is it possible for each one of us at the end of the day to die to everything that is not necessary? To every memory of hurt, of your beliefs, your faith, your anxieties, your sorrow, end all that everyday? And then you will find you are living with death all the time, death being the ending.

One should really go into also the question of ending. We never end anything completely because we end if there is any profit in it, if there is any reward. To voluntarily end without a future assumption that there is better. And it is possible to live that way in the modern world. That is a holistic way of living in which there is the living and dying all the time taking place.

And then we ought also to talk over together what is love. Is love sensation? Is love desire? Is love pleasure? Is love put together by thought? Do you love your wife, or your husband, your children, love? Is love jealousy? Don't say, no. But you are jealous. Is love fear, anxiety, pain, and all the rest of it? So what is love? And without that quality, that perfume, that flame, you may be very rich, you have all the sense of power, position, importance, all that hierarchical outlook on life, without love you are just an empty shell. So we ought to go into this question of love.

If you loved your children would there be wars? If you loved your children would you allow them to maim themselves through wars, kill others, and so on, hurt others? Can love exist where there is ambition? Please you have to face all this. But we don't because we are caught in a routine, in a repetition of sensation as sex and so on. So love has nothing whatsoever to do with pleasure, with sensation, and so on. Love is not put together by thought, therefore it is not within the structure of the brain. It is something entirely outside the brain, because the brain by its very nature and structure is an instrument of sensation, nervous responses and so on. And love cannot exist where there is mere sensation. Memory is not love.

And also we should talk over together what is a religious life, and what is religion. Again these are very complex questions. Man, human beings, have sought, have enquired, long before, something beyond the physical, beyond the everyday existence of pain, and sorrow, and pleasure, he has always sought something beyond. First in the flowers, the thunder was the voice of god, then he worshiped trees, stones; the primitives still do, the villages far away from these ugly beastly towns, they still worship stones, trees, small images. And man wants to find out if there is something sacred. And the priest comes along and says, "I'll point it out to you, I'll show you", as the guru does. And the rituals, the fancy dress of the western priests, the rituals, the repetitions, their worship of their particular image; and you, you have your own images, or you don't believe in any of that, you say, "I am an atheist, I don't believe in god, I am an humanitarian". But man, you and the speaker, always want to find out something that may be beyond time, beyond all thought.

So we are together going to enquire, exercising our brain, our reason, our logic, what is religion, what is a religious life. Is it possible in this modern world, not become a monk, and organized groups of monks. So let us enquire into it. When we are able to find out for ourselves what is really a truly religious life, and that can only be found out for ourselves when we understand what religions actually are, and put aside all that, not belong to any religion, to any organized religion, to any guru, to any psychological so-called spiritual authority. There is no spiritual authority whatsoever. That's one of the crimes that we have committed: we have invented the mediator between truth and ourselves.

So when you begin to enquire into what is religion, and in the process of that enquiry you are living a religious life, not at the end of it. The very process of looking, watching, discussing, doubting, questioning, having no beliefs, no faith, in that process of investigation you are already living the religious life. We are going to do that now.

We seem to lose all reason, all logic and sanity when it comes to religious matters. So we have to be logical, rational, doubting, questioning, all the things man has put together about god, the saviours, the gurus and their authority, everything completely aside that is not religion, that is merely the assumption of authority by the few. Or you give them authority, you give them authority. Have you ever noticed where there is disorder, socially, politically, in human relationship, out of the disorder, if it is not resolved, comes a dictator, a ruler. You have recently had examples of this: in Italy there was Mussolini, Hitler, that mad man, and so on. Where there is disorder politically, religiously, in our life, we create the authority. You are responsible for the authority. And there are people who are too willing to accept that authority.

So together we are going to look at what is religion. Where there is fear man inevitably seeks something that will protect him, safeguard him, that will hold him in a sense of certainty, complete security because he is basically frightened. And out of that fear we invent gods, out of that fear we invent all the rituals, all the circus that goes on in the name of religion. All the temples in this country, all the churches and the mosques are put together by thought. You may say there is direct revelation, but you never question, doubt that revelation, you accept it. And if one uses logic, reason, sanity, and all the superstitions that one has accumulated, all that is not religion obviously. Can you put all that aside to find out what is the nature of religion, what is the brain that holds the quality of religious living? Can you, as a human being, frightened, not invent, not create illusions, but face fear? Which we talked about the other day: fear can be suppressed completely psychologically, when you hold it, remain with it, not escape from it, when you give your whole attention to it, it is like a light being thrown on fear, a great flashing light. And then that fear disappears completely. And when there is no fear there is no garland, then there is no rituals, everything becomes unnecessary, stupid; that is irreligious, the things that thought have invented become irreligious because thought is merely a material process based on experience, knowledge, memory, which is a material process. And when thought invents the whole rigmarole, the whole structure of organized religions, which have lost completely - they have no meaning at all. Can you put aside all that, voluntarily, not seeking a reward at the end of it? Will you do it?

When you do that then one begins to ask: what is religion? And is there something beyond all time and thought? You may ask that question, but if thought invents something beyond that question then it is still a material process. We have said that thought is a material process because it is sustained, nourished in the brain cells. The speaker is not a scientist, but you can watch it in yourself, watch the activity of your own brain, which is the activity of thought.

So if we can put aside all that voluntarily, easily, without any resistance, then you inevitably ask: is there something beyond all time and space, is there something that has never been seen before by any man, is there something immensely sacred, is there something that the brain has never touched? So we are going to find out, if you have done the first step, which is wipe away all this rubbish called religion. It is because you have used your brain, your logic, your doubt, your questioning.

Then what is meditation? Because that's part of so-called religion. What is meditation? To escape from the noise of the world? To have a silent mind, a quiet mind, a peaceful mind? And you practise systems, methods, to become aware. Systems, methods, a mould to keep your thoughts under control; sit cross legged, repeat some mantra. I have been told the meaning of that word etymologically means, ponder over not becoming. And that's one of the meanings, and absorb, put aside all self-centred activities. That is one of the root meanings of mantra. But we repeat, repeat, repeat, and carry on with our self-interested ways, our egotistical ways. So mantra has lost its meaning.

So what is meditation? Is meditation a conscious effort? You meditate consciously, practise in order to achieve something: to achieve a quiet mind, brain, to achieve a sense of stillness of the brain. What is the difference between that meditator and the man who says, "I want money, so I work for it" - what is the difference between the two? Both are seeking an achievement. Right? One is called spiritual achievement, the other is called mundane achievement; they are both in the line of achievement.

So to the speaker that is not meditation at all. Any conscious deliberate, active desire, with its will, is not meditation. So one has to ask: is there meditation that is not brought about by thought? Is there a meditation of which you are - the speaker was going to say of which you are not aware. You understand all this? Any deliberate process of meditation is not meditation. That is so obvious. You can sit cross legged for the rest of your life, and meditate, breathe and all the rest of that business, and you will not come anywhere near the other thing, because that is a deliberate action to achieve a result. The cause and the effect. But the effect becomes the cause, so it is a cycle in which you are caught.

So is there a meditation that's not put together by desire, by will, by effort? The speaker says there is - you don't have to believe it, on the contrary you must doubt it. You must question it, as the speaker has questioned, doubted, torn it apart. Is there a meditation that is not contrived, organized? To go into that one must understand the brain, which is conditioned, a brain which is limited, and that brain is trying to comprehend the limitless, the immeasurable, the timeless - if there is such a thing as the timeless. And for that sound is important to understand. Sound and silence go together. So if you don't understand sound, the depth of sound, but we have separated sound from silence. Sound is the word, sound is your heart beating, the universe is filled with sound - universe in the sense, the whole earth, all the heavens, the million stars, the whole sky is filled with sound. Obviously. You don't have to listen to scientists about it. And we have made that sound something intolerable. So we want to have a brain that is quiet, peaceful. But when you listen to sound, the very listening is the silence. Silence and sound are not separate.

So meditation is something that is not contrived, organized. Meditation begins at the first step, which is to be free of all your hurts, psychological hurts, to be free of all your accumulated fears, anxieties, loneliness, despair, sorrow. That is the foundation, that is the first step. And the first step is the last step. If you take that first step then it's over. But we are unwilling to take that first step because we don't want to be free. We want to depend, depend on power, other people, depend on environment, depend on our experience, knowledge, we are always depending, depending, and we will never be free of all dependence, all fear. And therefore the ending of sorrow is love. Where there is that love there is compassion. And that compassion has its own integral intelligence. And when that intelligence acts, action always is true. There is no conflict where there is that intelligence.

You have heard all this, you have heard the ending of fear, the ending of sorrow, beauty and love, but the hearing is one thing and action is another. You hear all these things which are true, logical, sane, rational, but you won't act according to that. You will go home and begin all over again, your worries, your conflicts, your miseries.

So one asks, what is the point of it all? What is the point of listening to this speaker and not living it? In the listening and not doing is the wastage of your life. If you listen to something that is true and not act, you are wasting your life. And life is much too precious, it is the only thing that we have. And we have also lost touch with nature, which means we have lost touch with ourselves, which is part of nature. You don't love trees, the birds, the waters and the mountains, you are destroying the earth. And we are destroying each other. And all that is such a waste of life. When one realizes all this, not merely intellectually or verbally, then one lives a religious life. Not put on a loin cloth, or go round begging, or join a monastery, that is not a religious life. A religious life begins when there is no conflict, when there is this sense of love, when you can love another, your wife or your husband, but that love is shared by all human beings, it is not given to one person and therefore restricted.

So there is, if you give your heart and mind, brain, there is something that is beyond all time. And there is a benediction in that, not in temples, not in churches, not in mosques. That benediction is where you are.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST CONVERSATION WITH FOUR STUDENTS 2ND JUNE 1985

K: From childhood until now and what you are going to do in the future. So we will begin with your background: you are French, you are from the Philippines, you are from India, and you from Argentina. Four different nationalities, four different backgrounds, four different conditioning.

So shall we begin: I am going to ask you, if I may, what was your father and mother like? How did they treat you, as a toy when you were a baby and when you were a child, or they might have treated you with a great deal of affection, care? What's your background? Because after all that background does condition your thinking partly, and also it shapes your way of life. You see you gradually fall into a certain pattern.

So we are going to begin to talk over together, if you will, if you don't mind, what was your childhood like and what were your parents like - if you can remember. I personally can't remember a thing about my youth, a little bit, very vaguely, my childhood, my mother and father. I can't see them, what they would look like. But my thing is different. So I would like to ask you. Begin with India, or would you like to begin with you?

What were your parents like?

A: Shall I begin right from the beginning?

K: Yes.

A: As far as I can remember?

K: As far as you can remember, of course, you can't remember when you were born!

A: I'd like to think that I had a happy childhood.

K: Not 'like to think', but actually. Let's understand each other right from the beginning. It is better to deal with facts as they are - right? Not imagined, romanticized, hope, or say "I thought it was like that", but actually, factually, so that we can go from fact to fact - you follow? Not bring any kind of imagination, fantasies and so on. Would that be all right?

A: Of course.

K: Right?

D: It is difficult because I am talking about memories, about the past and I always get mixed up. I mean I am not sure how it really was.

K: You can't remember?

B: Well I think mine is quite a simple case sir, so I might start with myself. Although I live in the Philippines now I was actually born in Hong Kong. And as far as I remember, I remember nothing about what happened when I was in Hong Kong.

K: How old were you?

B: When I was in Hong Kong? I was there for eight years, for the first eight years of my life.

K: So, what was your eight years like, if you can remember it? With your father you were naturally.

B: No, my father was in the Philippines.

K: Then you lived with your mother?

B: Yes, and my brothers and my sister.

K: Your father was in Hong Kong?

B: Yes.

K: Then what was your relationship to your mother, to your other brothers and sisters, and what were you feeling like? How did your mother treat you? Get your background clear - you follow?

B: She wasn't working then. Well at one time she had to do some work but not much. So her main job was to look after us.

K: So what was your relationship to her, and her relationship to you?

B: Well, as a mother to her child. We were very well looked after by her. And as far as I remember I was very happy with her and with my brothers.

K: Was she merely looking after you, or was there a great deal of affection, care, responsibility - you follow? - as a mother. Mothers are always much more important than the fathers - right? Because specially in India they look after you. Mothers are the last people to eat.

A: In my case my father looked after me for a long time.

K: A little bit louder please.

A: In my case my father looked after me for a long time.

K: With you, absent?

A: No, he looked after me.

K: What about your mother?

A: Both.

K: Both.

You are not answering my question quite. If I may repeat it again. Unless you are very clear what your background is, from childhood, as far as you can remember naturally, that background, that conditioning, or that past from the beginning, when you can remember, shapes one's mind gradually, the brain, and then you get caught in a pattern. You are a Brahmin.

A: Yes, I come from a Brahmin family.

K: You were born as a Brahmin family, and they have certain traditions, certain superstitions, a certain kind of way of living. Probably not too orthodox - right? Or were they very orthodox?

A: No, they weren't orthodox at all.

K: There were not. So they were more or less stepping out of tradition.

A: Yes.

K: What was their feeling about you? How did they treat you? What was their feeling about you? And your feeling about them? Did they love you? Or just looking after you? You understand what I mean by loving, caring, hugging, putting you on their lap, looking after you, saw that you slept properly, that you had the right foot, that you weren't too rough, or too gentle, you know, taking care of you greatly. How many sisters and brothers did you have?

A: None.

K: So you were the only child?

A: Yes.

K: So did they spoil you?

A: You ask me a difficult question sir. I don't know.

K: Go on sir, answer my questions. Because I will tell you why it is important. Do you see the importance of it?

B: I am not sure sir.

K: That is, if you are not brought up properly, properly in quotes, we will go into that, what it means to be brought up properly. If you are not brought up properly your life begins to be twisted somewhat - right? You either don't care for the world, you become more and more self-centred, more and more concerned about yourself, your happiness, your way of life - you follow?

More and more self-interest. When you are quite young that self-interest isn't too prominent, too defined but as you grow older it becomes stronger and stronger and then you assert yourself, or are aggressive and all the rest of it - right?

So I am asking you what was your background, not only environmentally but also financially, also your relationship with society, how you related to nature, when you looked at the trees what you felt like, when you saw a deer - probably you never saw a tiger. I have seen them but that was in the wild, that is fun. So what was your relationship to the whole thing, to the whole of life, to the trees, to the grass, to the flowers, and to your parents? You understand what I am saying? Isn't that important to find out for yourself?

A: You were talking about being brought up properly.

K: Properly. I will tell you what I mean by properly. You had the right number of hours to sleep, right food, since you were a Brahmina you probably didn't eat meat, probably, now of course all that has blown. You were kept very clean and your clothes were washed regularly, you had clean clothes, and you slept in the right place - maybe on the floor but it was clean - you follow? Was there, say in India, a traditional background? Or not at all? Or it was becoming very modernized?

A: If one lives in urban India it is quite modernized, westernized.

K: That means what? Did you eat meat?

A: Well at times yes.

K: So you see what I am trying to get at? You understand? In the old days my father and mother, they were very strict, they never ate meat, fish and so on, never smoked. So the whole tradition is changing tremendously. So in other words economy is changing and therefore you are forced to accept what everybody is doing - right? Meat, smoke, alcohol, you know the whole thing.

A: Like everywhere else.

K: Yes. So is your brain also becoming ordinary, like everybody else? Enquire. I am asking you, don't say yes, or no, find out. Let's enquire. Right?

B: Sir from what you said about being brought up properly...

K: Properly, I have explained that.

B: Properly, yes you have explained that.

K: Real affection, real sense of when you are young you must be protected, that you learnt to be gentle, to be quiet, to have a certain modesty - you follow what I mean? The whole of that kind of thing.

B: Well in that case, sir, I didn't have that. And also I was living in a city.

K: In a city, of course.

B: And I think many of us, probably many of the children nowadays are in that environment.

K: That is the environment. But all that has made a tremendous impression you, did it? Or not at all?

B: Yes, some of it.

K: So what is your background? You understand me? What is the conditioning of your thinking, of your feeling, of your emotions? You understand what I am talking about?

B: Yes.

K: What were they like? What are they like now? And in relation to the past? Of course what you are now is what has been - right? Right? So what were you like? And what are you now? You can't be something totally different now from what you have been - right? So trace it out from the beginning, from the time you remember until now. Trace it out, take time, go into it.

B: Well I must say it was quite narrow then, my outlook of life was quite narrow then.

K: Are you judging from now? From now you are saying it was narrow?

B: Well sir I was in a city, probably I didn't have much contact with nature, as you said. It is quite important. And also I was only living with my family. And from what I see of my mother now, I am sorry to say but you know her whole life was to bring us up and she expects us to look after her when she is old.

K: Of course. Probably the whole of the East, Asia, there is no social security, therefore the sons have to look after the mother, therefore they have to have several children and so on.

You talk to me, don't keep quiet.

C: I can remember when I was young I wasn't really thinking about nature, thinking about looking at a tree, or thinking very much. I was just living.

K: Were you living in the country?

C: No I was studying in Paris.

K: I want you to go further back. When were you studying in Paris, at what age?

C: Well I was born in Paris and I stayed until I was seven.

K: In Paris?

C: Yes.

K: That means what happened in Paris to you during those seven years? You see please understand what I am trying to say: trace it out, think it out, look at it as though you were looking at a picture which is yourself, you understand? At a series of movements, series of actions, series of feelings, all that has led you up to now. Right? You mightn't want to talk about it, that I understand. You understand what I am trying to say? Go on.

A: Well I went to an ordinary school in Delhi, where you had say twenty-five, thirty students in a class, and the teacher would write something on the blackboard.

K: But before that I am asking.

A: Well I went a school at the age of two.

K: Good Lord!

A: Indian children are sent to school at the age of two or three.

K: Why? Find out, you see you are not enquiring. At the age of two? That I can hardly believe.

A: Yes, to a nursery school.

K: To nursery school.

A: Nursery school where you just play with other children.

K: I understand. Not school then, it was really a kindergarten.

A: Well you learnt the alphabet and...

K: A creche.

A: Well you learnt your alphabet and numbers then.

K: What, as you grew up, trace it out, I can't repeat this over and over again, trace it out. Trace the whole thing from when you begin to remember until now so that you are very clear for yourself. You might not want to talk about it, I understand that. But if you say, sorry, I won't talk about it, that's all right. But if you want to go into it, either you express it, put it into words to convey to others, or you are tracing it out on your own - you follow - and may not want to talk about it.

A: Sir, I think it is easy to tell you what happened but it is difficult to say what one felt when one was young.

K: Quite right.

A: It is very difficult to say how I felt about my parents.

K: I understand that. Now tell me a little more.

A: I don't know how to proceed. Do you want to know what happened?

K: Yes, what happened, say, for instance, when you were five. You remember when you were five. Then at that age until twelve - right? What were you thinking about? What was your feeling about others? Or about your father and mother?

A: I can remember that I was mainly thinking about going to school and not liking school very much but mainly there were my parents telling me the things I should do and the things I shouldn't do, and the school also.

K: Go on, I am pushing you.

D: I remember I was in a Catholic school run by priests.

K: Where? In Buenos Aires?

D: No, in the north west of Argentina.

K: Tell me where.

D: Well the city is called Tucuman, next to the mountains. And I was in this school run by priests. I remember I was quite influenced by what they said and sometimes I used to feel very scared when they talked, and they said that if I lied I would go to hell. But on the other hand at home my father usually said all that the priests said was rubbish; and then sometimes I paid attention to the priests and sometimes I paid attention to my father.

K: May I ask another question? Was learning, writing, reading, was it a problem?

A: No.

K: No, just a minute. Say for instance, you went to school, you were told to study a book, or whatever it was, to read, to write clearly. Did you make that into a problem?

A: No.

B: Well no. I think it was something that we had to do and we were doing it.

K: You had to do it, was there any feeling of not wanting to do it, or wanting to do it?

B: Well in the beginning there might be that feeling of not wanting to do it.

D: I don't think that could have come up. I don't think that I would have thought that maybe I could not do it, so there wasn't this feeling of not wanting to.

K: You are not quite clear, you are not answering.

D: Well I am saying I don't think there was.

K: You have to learn mathematics, right, all of you? Did you make mathematics as a problem, or you were forced to do it? You understand the difference? Was it a problem to you, was it something you felt my gosh I don't want to do it but you had to do it?

A: Well we didn't have any other choice in a way. When you had to go to school you had to follow those classes.

K: Was it something disturbing? Something you kind of struggled to learn so that it became a problem to you?

A: I would say it depends on the subjects in a way. You are saying mathematics, for me it was a problem. Other subjects were no problems.

K: This may be a little too serious. Have you got problems now? Something which you have to resolve?

D: Yes, I would say, yes I do, sometimes there are some things and I feel, oh that's a problem, what can I do?

K: So why do you call it a problem?

D: Well I think...

K: Just listen to my question first. I may be wrong, don't accept what I am saying, or anything. Is your brain, brain, inside the skull, has it got many problems?

A: By itself, the brain by itself?

K: Problems, mathematics, marriage, sex, what are you going to do tomorrow after you leave here - you follow what is your future? Isn't that all something that disturbs you? Or you merely live day by day?

A: No, very often one has to think what one is going to do in the future.

K: Yes.

A: After I leave Brockwood.

K: Does that create a problem in you? You are frightened, you become anxious, you say, my god, life is so monstrous - you follow what I mean - it is so frightening, so dangerous, what am I going to do? Or you just think I want to do that, I am going to do that? Nothing else.

A: I don't know what to do.

K: Right. We will come to that presently. What I am trying to find out - you are not helping me, you are not tracing out your life. So to put it differently, you don't know your conditioning - right?

A: What do you mean by that?

K: I told you. I mean by that conditioning, the tradition, the school, the various subjects you had to learn, and the background of your father and mother, what they were like, and what they told you to do and not to do, their superstitions, or their belief, or their faith imposed on you - you follow? All that shapes your brain. Right? Because they are older, they are more influential, they know better than you and I do - right? So they say you must do this, you must not do that, and they scold, or beat you up. So all that shapes your brain slowly - right? You understand what I am saying, no? Agree? So that gradually becomes your conditioning. Then your conditioning becomes still more when you have to take a special subject and become a specialist - right? As a carpenter, gardener, or scientist, or a doctor and so on - right? So gradually your brain becomes narrower and narrower - you follow? Are you aware of this?

D: Well I don't...

K: Wait. Listen to this. Are you aware of this taking place in you?

A: Why do you say it becomes narrower?

K: If you don't like that word narrow, it becomes limited.

A: You mean because I have to choose something that I have to do?

K: When you say, I want to do that, that's my life. So gradually you concentrate on that - right? You don't take life as a whole. You understand what I am saying? It doesn't mean that you must know all about playing the piano, or some instrument, that you must know all what the scientists are saying, all the books. I don't mean that. I am trying to point out, if I may, where there is self-interest, whether in specializing or in having some skill, linguistics, learning many languages, they are all good but if there is self-interest it becomes... you understand? You understand what I am saying?

A: But we are not aware of it.

K: First listen to what I have to say. Where there is self-interest, me first, my interests first, what I want to do, I am free to do what I think, I will rebel against my parents - you follow - I will do what I think is right. My prejudice is as good as your prejudice. I hold to my opinions - right? My conclusions. All that is self-interest in different ways. That self-interest has enormous consequences - right? If I am interested only in myself and I marry somebody and she also has self-interest - you understand? It is a mutual self-interest.

A: So would you say there is self-interest in a human being right from a very young age?

K: Probably. My book, my toy.

A: Well before you can say, this is my book?

K: I don't know. No, I have read somewhere some scientists have discovered, they may change tomorrow, they generally do, they said the baby knows who the friends are of the mother. The baby knows with whom the mother is friendly, of whom she kind of resists or is nervous, or frightened or emotional. The baby has a feeling about it. Probably, I don't know, I have read it, it may be wrong.

A: So self-interest could be acquired, or it could be genetic.

K: Find out, first, I am asking you, don't ask me.

A: I am wondering if that is so.

K: Find out. Rather, you know what self-interest is, don't you? That self-interest can express itself in prayer, in worship, and devotion to somebody - right? And also in knowledge - right? In certain capacities, as a painter, as a musician - right? It hides itself in faith, in belief - right? Right? So we know where self-interest is, it is fairly clear. Do you know where it is not? Careful, careful, don't answer yet. Where it is not. We know where it is, right?

D: It seems to be pretty much everywhere in humanity. It seems to be almost in every human being.

K: I know all that, we know that.

A: It seems to be in almost everything I do.

B: Sir, it also seems something natural.

K: Find out. You see I am asking you to enquire into all this, if I may.

A: I don't know what self-interest is not.

K: Find out. Do you see it hides in most subtle ways, and the most cruelest ways? When I use you and you use me, it is the most... right? So we know where it is, where it hides, where it kind of subtly moves along. It may be worshipping nature - you follow? It is extraordinary subtle. Right? I am not talking about all this, I don't want to talk. You are making me talk. You are not answering my questions. I will finish it.

You know where it is. If you have examined closely, if you have observed very carefully what is happening around you, what is happening, you follow? Self-interest seems to be so extraordinarily dominant. And you also know it is very, very subtle, social health, social activities, helping people - you follow? And the gurus with their blah - you follow?

A: Very often we don't notice it.

K: Therefore find out where it is not. We will come to that presently. You haven't told me - not to me - you haven't discovered for yourself what your background is, what your conditioning is, why you think this, why you don't think that - you follow? Go into it.

D: It is difficult to define what one's background is. I mean it feels that is what I have lived, you know.

K: Yes, that is what I am asking you. That is your background.

A: But sir, if you ask what did you feel about it, I cannot say. I can't remember.

K: All right. Then tell me what were the facts, as far as you can remember, as far back.

D: That would be a very long story Krishnaji.

K: Yes, a long story, go on, we have got time. You see that is where you begin to learn about yourself - right? What you are, what you feel, why you feel, what you think, why you think - you follow? You begin to learn your reactions. You begin to learn about your own way of looking at it, prejudices, all that, you begin to learn about yourself, which is very important - right? You really agree? You really see how important it is to know yourself? Do you? Not what other people say - right? To know all the corners of yourself, all the caves, all the undergrounds, all the shadows, you follow, your whole being. You know mathematics, obviously, or history, or geography, or some technological subject, or you have some skill in some musical instrument and so on and so on. But apparently you don't seem to know about yourself, which is far more important than learning how to paint, or how to dance, which is necessary too but you follow what I am saying?

B: Why do you say that sir?

K: What?

B: It is more important than...

K: Obviously sir. I am asking you, tell me. What do you think?

B: Well you see we spend most of our time learning mathematics or...

K: I know. So are you also learning about yourself?

B: Well as far as I remember, not before.

K: Not before. Now to learn about yourself you have to trace what you were ten years ago, what you are now isn't that the result of ten years ago? Enquire into it.

A: Sir, I was brought up to believe in god, not so much by my parents, but by my friends, my cousins, my uncles, my aunts, to believe in god. And...

K: Yes, most people do.

A: Yes.

K: Move from there.

A: And I never really questioned that.

K: When did you begin to question that? Do you question it now?

A: Yes.

K: Now when you question what takes place, how do you question it? Why do they believe in god? What is it that makes them believe? You ought to be asking all these questions.

D: It seems to be an easy way of living, you know if you say there is god and he will send this to us and he has arranged things, so you put the reference in god.

K: Yes, so what do you say?

A: You want something to hang on to.

K: What do you feel?

C: Now?

K: What do you feel? You see the vast majority of mankind believe in god - right? In different ways - right? In the Asiatic world it is the Buddha, the Hindus have many gods and the Christians and the Muslims have only one, and what is your feeling about all this?

C: This feeling we have about it, wouldn't it come from the feeling the parents had about it?

K: So you believe too?

C: No.

K: Why?

C: Well my parents told me you believe if you want, you don't believe if you don't want.

K: Yes, what do you feel about it.

C: Well I personally don't believe in it.

K: You don't care.

C: No, it is not that I don't care but I...

K: You are indifferent.

C: Well I was in a Catholic school for a while so I saw you know how they go to church, how people when they go to church and all what happens when they pray, and their singing, and repeating many things. I didn't really see the point of doing that.

K: So is that part of your background, that you saw all this?

C: Yes.

K: And you say what a circus it is, what a nonsense it is, or how marvellous it is? You follow? What was your... you are not doing it. What do you think about all this, the wars, the terrorism that is going on, one group fighting another group, like in Lebanon - right? You follow? Christians against... what is your reaction to all that?

A: I feel frightened sometimes when I think of it.

K: Frightened of what?

A: Well that one day the world could blow up, maybe.

K: So are you concerned about the world, or about yourself in the world?

A: Myself in the world.

K: That means self-interest.

A: Yes.

K: You see I am trying to push you. You don't investigate. You know in Brussels, that horrible thing that happened, forty two people were killed, what is your reaction? You saw that, you must have seen it on television, or read it in the papers, and what do you feel about it? What do you feel about having to depend on your background - you follow? So you have to enquire into your background. So unless - that is what I am trying to ask - unless you trace it out very carefully, step by step, so that you know what your actions are, what your feelings are, why you think this way, what your prejudice is, you follow, you begin to learn all about yourself.

And then you find that by Jove, I am conditioned as a Argentine, as a Catholic, as a Hindu, or what nonsense all that is. You begin to learn about yourself. Right? Isn't that important? Careful, don't answer. I am asking you a question: isn't it important to know about yourself?

A: Why is it so important?

K: I am asking you. Look, I am asking you: isn't it important, of really great importance that you should know about yourself? I am asking you the question.

D: Well, I don't know.

K: What do you mean you don't know?

D: I am trying to think what the importance of that would be.

K: Why do you give importance to mathematics? Or geography? Or your 'A' and 'O' levels? Learning more and more about history - you follow? You think that is important and you say this is what.

A: Because I have been taught to see that that is important.

K: So I am asking you, do you consider this as important, to know yourself?

D: Well Krishnaji you have been saying that it is important.

K: I am asking you, don't tell me what I said, I know what I said.

D: Well because of what you have said then I sort of think that well maybe it is because you said that.

K: Find out if it is important or not. Forget what I have said.

B: It is true, even though we have heard what he has said, it seems we don't go into ourselves maybe because we don't see the importance of it.

K: You see what has happened to your four, you haven't learnt the art of enquiry - right?

A: Well, what is the art of enquiry?

K: I am showing it to you. The art, learning what you were as a young girl, how you looked at things, what is your feeling to your parents, to your environment, slowly begin from there, find out, what you are now. So that - I am not going to tell you! You tell me. I am asking you a question, an examination. You have considered acquiring knowledge about various subjects as tremendously important - right? Why?

A: Because everybody else around me thinks so.

K: Of course, everybody wants to smoke, everybody wants to drink beer.

A: That is what happens. You tend to do something which everybody else does.

K: Why? Enquire. You see you are not doing it.

A: Well you are just like everybody else. You tend - everyone does the same thing and no one tries to...

K: Then you are becoming - you see again you want to belong to a group.

A: But you are not aware of it.

K: Wait, wait. Find out. Don't say there is no other way. Find out.

A: Yes but I don't want to be alone.

K: So find out why you don't want to be alone. Is it fear?

D: Yes.

K: Is it that you want to belong to a group, feel safe.

A: It feels secure.

K: I mustn't tell you all these things. You tell me.

A: Yes, sir, it does feel safe to be part of a group.

K: So you are frightened, or nervous, or feel the danger of not belonging to something, to a group, to a country, to a tribe.

A: To my family.

K: And to a nation - right? Do you see the consequences of all that?

D: Yes.

K: He should know there was war in Falklands. And they are at war - right? Killing I don't know how many thousands. Which is, a particular group of people wanting that land and another group says no, you can't have it, and they go and kill each other - right? What do you think about it?

D: It seems foolish to think that one would kill because of a piece of land.

K: Yes. Now wait a minute. Why are people attached to this, to a particular group, a particular British, or the Argentine, or the French and Algiers? You understand? The Hindus and the Muslim.

A: Does self-interest come into this?

K: Find out. See. Enquire. Don't ask me. I'll tell you.

D: If the self-interest didn't tell you to belong to this group, you wouldn't have the groups then you wouldn't have the problem.

B: And we also said we want to be safe.

K: I won't tell you, go into it. That's why I have been saying please learn the art of it.

A: We often think enquiring is asking a whole lot of questions.

K: To yourself, not asking others.

A: No, no, to yourself as well.

K: Are you doing it?

A: I want to know is it just asking any question that comes to your mind, or is there such a thing as...

K: Yes about yourself. Not what kind of kite or what kind of bird that is, that comes later. You know probably you have studied a great deal, books, you know what chemistry is, you know what the whole nature of history is - right? Geography and mathematics and science, and all the things you know very well, you have been brought up in it, educated - right? You give tremendous importance to that. And you say, well the other thing doesn't matter - the other thing being what you are, why you are. What's the future of you? Learn.

D: Krishnaji, I think we do think about it and we are somewhat worried sometimes about the future, but it is difficult to find an answer, about the past or the future, I find I seem not to be able to answer this question sir.

K: Because you haven't enquired old boy. Don't ask the question, find the answer for yourself.

B: Sir, somehow there are blocks to going into oneself.

K: Why? Why?

A: Sir I don't want to ask these question at times because I am afraid of finding out something that I don't like.

K: So find out why you are afraid. What is fear? You see?

A: Yes.

K: It is no good standing at the edge of a pool and say, I can't swim, I can't swim. I can't swim. You learn from a professional, or you temporary get in little by little - you follow?

B: Sir, could we find out what the blocks are?

K: Find out!

B: I mean now.

D: Well she mentioned fear, just now.

K: Yes, she mentioned one of them.

D: One of them.

K: She said fear and wanting to be safe - right? Now find out what it means 'wanting to be safe'. Safe from what?

D: Somehow it is not wanting to move because you don't know what is somewhere else.

K: Yes. So is your brain becoming limited through fear? So you say, by Jove, I don't know, so I went even and look at it.

A: Or I have been hurt before and I don't want to be hurt again.

K: So take hurt. Why are you hurt? Who is hurt? You see? Please learn step by step. You didn't know history but you learnt, you spent time, book after book or somebody telling you. So this way go step by step and learn.

B: Is there a teacher, sir?

K: Is your brain active in a certain direction, knowledge, books, examinations, 'A' level, 'O' level and you want a job - you follow - at the end of it, or not. Why don't you spend a little time over the other side?

A: I am not sure I have seen the importance of knowing oneself.

K: Why? Why don't you see the importance of it?

D: In one way one doesn't feel important if there are so many other people too, you know, and they are also doing the same, then you feel, well I can't be that important.

K: From what you have told me you are really following the hurt. All right find out why you are following it.

A: Like we said before, sir, I want to belong to something.

K: Then go into it, learn.

A: Why do I want to belong?

K: Yes. And see the consequences of belonging. The consequences are separation - right? One group against another group - right? One tribe against another tribe. Gradually build up a nation, and this nation against that nation - right? This nation represents one ideology, and this group represents another ideology, so ideologies are fighting. For that you kill millions - right? So follow it up. Is this the way to live after a million, or two million, or fifty thousand years, is this the way to live?

D: Well somehow we have done it so much that it doesn't seem different. It seems that that is what we want, it is done and that is in our nature to do that.

K: All right. If you say it is my nature to be cruel.

D: Well I don't say it is my nature. But you say people are like that, people have wars, you know.

K: All right. Then live violently. You see what I am trying to say. I am saying, find out, not from me or from somebody else, find out for yourself. You haven't said a word.

C: I have listened.

K: That's just it!

B: Sir in learning mathematics we have our teacher - right - to teach us. Now in this area...

K: Then they keep on telling about you.

B: Are they two different things?

K: Of course. There you are being informed about history - right? What kind of wars, what kind of kings, what kind of society

- right? History, what does that mean? What is history, the meaning of that word?

B: The history of human beings.

K: Yes. The history of human beings. You are the history of human beings. You are a human being. It is all about you. Not only you, about the whole. So you are not learning to enquire, that's is what I am saying. Right?

A: It seems so sir. I find it difficult.

K: This is not only one talk, we are going to have a series of discussions, if you are willing. If you are willing we are going to have a series of discussions, every Sunday morning we will go at it. But you must also, if I may suggest, go into it, not just say, "Well I will wait until Sunday morning." Go into it, find out. I give you - not I give you - you are given a whole week to see if you can pass the examination!

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND CONVERSATION WITH FOUR STUDENTS 9TH JUNE 1985

A: Self-interest and how that lead to conflict.

K: And also we began by talking about childhood memories, conditioning. Let's talk about it a little bit.

A: We were wondering if we could discuss further this question of looking at ourselves.

K: Looking at ourselves. Is that it?

B: Yes, well we were talking about our background.

D: Last time we were trying to talk but I think...

C: Well we were not really sure whether we should talk about ourselves or if we should just talk about more general...

K: Talk about yourself, about your family, about your background.

A: We found it quite difficult to talk about all that, to go into specific details of how we were brought up.

K: So you found it difficult?

A: Yes.

K: Shall we start there?

D: It is a difficult point.

B: Is there a different way to do it sir?

K: The last time we met we were talking about, weren't we, about your backgrounds, your upbringing, your childhood, your education. And all this in various forms has conditioned you: newspapers, magazines, television, politics, economics, climate, food. Talking about food are you all very healthy?

D: Fairly healthy.

K: Good strong bodies? Or you are all rather floppy, sloppy, feeble?

A: I don't think...

K: Have you got a good strong body that can play tennis or run - I used to run five miles a day at one time. Can you do all that? Or you are all rather lazy about that kind of thing?

A: No I think we can all do some exercise quite well.

K: But do you do it?

A: Yes, sir.

K: Yes? Good. You have good food here.

A: Yes, very good.

K: Of course! Very good food. And is your brain working properly?

A: Properly?

K: Properly in the sense, acute, sharp, clear, not muddled, confused.

D: I think sometimes we do get confused.

K: Not sometimes. You know if you say sometimes then it is most of the time!

D: Yes, yes.

A: We try to be clear sir, but most of the time one is confused.

K: No, I am asking you is your brain clear, alert, active, not chattering, I don't mean that, active, full of vitality? You are quite young. How old are you?

A: Seventeen.

K: And you?

B: Twenty six.

K: And you?

C: Eighteen.

D: Seventeen.

K: My gosh! You have got a long life ahead of you. And so is your mind, is your brain very alert?

C: What did you mean by alert?

K: I will tell you. Watching the birds, the trees, the grass, the flowers, and the flight of those wood pigeons. Have you watched the flowers?

A: Yes sir.

K: The shape of the trees, the sound when the strong wind is there have you heard the trees? And also have you heard when the trees are very quiet? The other day it was absolutely motionless - right? I don't know if you watched all this. And there is a certain quality of silence, and the sound of a tree. I won't go into all that. But do you have such a brain that is watching, looking, observing, feeling, or is it all casual?

A: More often it tends to be casual.

K: Casual in the sense it doesn't care. You don't mind what you think, what you feel, there is not self awareness, a critical awareness of oneself.

A: Perhaps this relates to what you mentioned the other day about looking at oneself.

K: I am coming to that.

A: Do you think we could go into that?

K: Yes I am going to go into it. But first one has to have, doesn't one, I am asking you, don't listen to me merely, I am asking you shouldn't you have a very good brain, not just being clever, I don't mean that, or having a lot of degrees behind your name. But a brain that is watching, listening, looking, weighing, impersonal - you follow - all that. Or are you all the time thinking about yourself? About your background - Oh, I have been brought up wrongly, my father is a little bit odd and so on. So is there a critical self-awareness?

C: No sir.

D: No I don't think so.

K: No. Not selfishness, I don't mean that. Self-awareness in which you don't choose, say this is good, but to be aware. You understand what I am talking about? Right? If you are not, why aren't you?

A: I tend to get distracted.

K: Distracted?

A: Yes.

K: Now wait a minute. Is there such thing as distraction? Careful, think it out with me. I am asking you why do you call it distraction?

A: Because I am trying to pay attention to a certain thing but then my mind wanders and I start thinking about other things.

K: All right. Just a minute. You are studying a book, some particular subject - right? And as you are looking at it your mind goes off - right? You have sudden thoughts. Why? Why do you call it distraction?

A: Because there is something that I want to do.

K: But if you have other kinds of thoughts that is part of your being, part of your brain, so why do you call it distraction?

C: Because we don't accept those thoughts that come about while we are reading.

K: So don't you pursue that for a while?

C: Because we want to read, you see.

K: I know, just a minute, just a minute. Listen to what I am saying. You want to concentrate on a particular page. As you are concentrating, looking at it you have other thoughts - right? Now why don't you pursue the other thoughts and not call it distraction? You follow what I am trying to say? Don't call it distraction.

A: I tend to see them as unimportant compared to what I have to do.

K: But you want to read that page, you want to learn that subject and other thoughts interfere, why do they interfere? Just go into it slowly.

B: Well maybe it could be our problems that...

K: No, don't make it into a problem. Just look at what I am saying. I want to look at that clock, I am watching it and other thoughts come in. The moment I call it distraction I have separated the whole process of thinking - right? You understand what I am saying?

C: No, not very well.

K: When I am reading that page, I am thinking, observing, looking, seeing how the word is spelt and so on.

A: I am not sure I am even doing that sir when I am looking.

K: No, you may read very quickly, or it may be a very difficult subject, so you have to read carefully - right? As you are reading carefully there is a second or two when this other thought comes in. That interference you call distraction.

A: Yes.

K: Why do you call it distraction? I know what you are going to say but find out why do you use that word? You are attracted by that page, or that particular subject, or you are watching the tree, or bird, other thoughts come in. Why do you call it distraction? It is the whole movement of thought, isn't it?

A: Yes, but I don't see it as that sir.

K: See it now.

A: Yes.

K: It is a whole movement of thinking - right? Thinking about the subject you are reading, memorizing, because unfortunately you are going to pass some examination therefore you must be prepared, and a thought arises. Give a second to investigate that thought and come back so that you begin gradually to learn how to look at yourself. You understand what I am saying?

B: Sir, what do you mean by investigating a thought?

K: Just a minute. I am polishing my shoes, which I generally do, and a thought arises. For a second or two or a little longer I want to find out why it comes - right? Right? I find because that is also worrying or it is this, it is something else, so for a minute or two I say wait, why I am thinking that, is there some interest in this when I am polishing my shoe? Right? You follow? I am interested in polishing my shoe, I am making it as clean and as nice looking as possible. So there is not this terrible word distraction. You are then aware. You are learning a subject, your mind is active and - you follow - you are active.

A: Sir you seem to make a difference between concentration and attention.

K: Oh rather, we will go into that presently, that is a little more complex. Wait a minute, wait a minute. If you could drop that word 'distraction' from your brain, see what happens - you understand? See what happens if you don't say, "By Jove, I am distracted, I must pay attention" then you are creating conflict - you understand?

A: You mean there are two different movements going on?

K: Yes. I must concentrate but also I must... you follow? Can you drop altogether from your vocabulary 'distraction'? Learn - right? You are learning, therefore there is no distraction. I don't know if you follow that - right? You are learning about that page, you are learning about why that thought arises, why it interferes. It means probably you are not interested in that particular subject but there are other interests inside you. So begin. You understand? And you agree, or not?

A: Yes sir.

K: You see it? No, see it, not I am teaching you, learn about it.

B: Sir it seems you are using the word 'learning' in a different sense.

K: Yes, I am learning. I am learning about that page, that subject - right?

B: But that learning, sir, is accumulation of knowledge.

K: Wait. Don't go too far ahead. Go step by step otherwise you will enter... I am learning about the subject. I am also learning why there are these other thoughts that come into being. So the whole movement is to learn - right? I am learning about that subject, that particular page, and also I am learning about why thoughts arise. So it is a whole movement of learning. He asks: what is the difference between learning and accumulating knowledge - right?

B: Yes.

K: Wait a minute. What do you say? Do you see a difference? Careful. Do you see the difference between accumulation, acquiring, acquiring, acquiring - right? - and not acquiring, which is the movement of learning, more and more, learning. There was a very famous painter, I believe, not I believe, Goya, Spanish. He said when he was ninety, or ninety two, "I am still learning". You understand? He never said "I have learnt". Right? So do you see the difference? I am not saying you should, or should not, but do you see the difference between acquiring knowledge, memorising - right - not only to pass exams but to have a certain skill which you can use to write, earn a job, earn a livelihood - right? Do you see the difference between that and learning?

A: No, sir I usually tend to mean the same thing when I say learning, as accumulation of knowledge. I don't see what you mean.

K: What do you say sir?

C: Well there seem to be one learning where you receive many things and you read and you hear, and the other one you experience.

K: All right, I will put it this way: you have accumulated a lot of things in your house, in your room - right? And that accumulation is you. You have collected a lot of memories, a lot of pain, a lot of fears, then you become a slave to what you have accumulated.

A: Which is a slave to myself.

K: Yes, collecting. Whereas there is no freedom. There is freedom when there is learning. I wonder if you can capture this. You tell me what you mean by learning. You tell me. Forget what I have said. But what do you mean by learning? You learn - tell me.

Be simple.

D: Sir, yes. I find that I learn in order to know so I am accumulating memories, so that I can remember something, that is what I do when I say I am learning, you know.

K: You are learning to drive a car.

D: Yes.

K: And the instructor tells you how to hold the wheel, what are the pedals, all the rest of it, he informs you. And then he tells you start slowly and you begin to learn how to drive a car. It may take you three weeks, or a month, or a week and so on - right? In the process what has been happening to your brain? Just look at it carefully before... don't answer. It has taken you three weeks or much longer to learn how to drive a car.

A: I have acquired a skill.

K: You have acquired a skill, which means what?

D: Well you have become used to...

K: Tell me slowly. You keep quiet.

A: I have become familiar with certain things.

K: Go on, tell me more.

A: It has become sort of automatic, a reflex because if you drive a car it is the same things that come out every time that you do it.

K: So what has happened? You have learnt how to drive a car, you have learnt how to shift the gears, how to put on the brake and how to accelerate, and you listen to the engine, how it is working, and also you are watching, the road, keeping to your side and so on. And also you are watching about three hundred yards ahead of you-right? So you are taking the whole thing in. The road, the wetness of the road and so on. In doing all that what has happened to your brain? Answer me. All right, take something: you are all learning mathematics, aren't you?

B: Yes.

D: Yes.

K: Some kind, not too... so when you are learning mathematics, or history, you are accumulating information - right? Right? And you are storing that information, the brain is storing it - right?

A: As memory.

K: As memory. And you use that, to get a job and so on, you use that. When you learn how to write, you are doing the same thing, which is it becomes almost automatic - right? But driving, you can't do quite automatically. See the difference.

B: You also have to watch.

K: You have to be very careful. You are going about fifty, fifty-five, or sixty, or more, you have to be very careful. You can't remove your hands from the steering wheel and talk with gestures, you have to watch. See the difference in the two?

D: And still the watching seems to be somewhat automatic. When you travel in the car you...

K: Yes, it is almost automatic. I don't like to use the word 'automatic'

D: Mechanical.

K: Like mechanics or something - right? And you call that learning. Right? You call learning how to write, about mathematics, chemistry and so on. In that process it has taken you ten years, or fifteen years, or twenty years, during that time you have accumulated a lot of knowledge. And that knowledge almost becomes normal. So the brain then becomes mechanical.

A: You mean we are so used to it.

K: Used to it, you have learnt about your subject. You are an engineer, or chemist, you are learning. And then you move along - right? But always the basis is previous knowledge. You may add to it - right? But still the basis is knowledge. So enquire into knowledge.

A: Knowledge seems to be...

K: Learn, learn from what I am saying. Learn, find out what you mean by knowledge. What is knowledge? Enquire. Learn. Move. Is it like a computer? You know how a computer works. More or less. I don't know either but you programme it - right? So there are people who know how to programme and they need supplies and so on, it tells you. Are you like that?

D: Well that is what it seems sometimes.

K: Just listen first before you answer.

A: Yes sir, because I too acquire certain bits of information, I play around with them and use them in the way that I want to.

K: So are you being programmed?

A: Yes.

K: Don't be shy sir, go on.

B: I am not sure that I am even aware of that process.

K: Are you, find out. I am asking you now, not next day, or later on, but I am asking you now, find out if you are being programmed, as a Filipino, or as Hindu, or as a Christian, or something else, which is you are being told from childhood, you are a Filipino, I am a Hindu, she is a Christian, and she is a Hindu or a Brahmin, and he is from South America, Argentina, so you are being programmed. If you are a Catholic you have been programmed for two thousand years. Right? See the fact. I am not saying it is right or wrong. And she is a Hindu of a certain strata of society called the Brahminas, and she has been programmed to say, "I am a Brahmin", or "I am no longer a Brahmin". Right? It is the same process, isn't it? You have been programmed as a Hindu for the last three to five thousand years. Hindu is from the word Indus, the famous river - I won't go into it.

So you are being programmed - right? It may be necessary - right? I am being programmed when I learn how to dance, how to play football, or cricket - right? I have learnt. You follow?

A: So when I use a certain bit of information that I have about you, would you call that programming as well?

K: If you use that knowledge of what you have learnt about me and that becomes a memory then it becomes a barrier, you then don't look at me afresh.

A: Every time I see you I remember what I have...

K: Of course, all the images you have built about him and so on, or her. And that image prevents you from looking at him afresh - right? You are meeting all this?

A: But still you have to remember certain things.

K: Of course. I can't each time ask you what is your name, it sounds silly.

A: But then you have to make a certain...

K: Find out, learn. Don't say I have to make a certain... go into it and find out. You see you are not doing it.

A: There seems to be...

K: Wait, wait. Are you learning from what I am saying? I am saying, asking you, are you learning from what we have discussed, or are you just passing it by? When we said that you are being programmed - right?

A: I can see that sir.

K: Is that a fact to you? Not - you see the difference between a fact and an idea? Be quick. Don't take time. Look, that clock is a fact, fact, but it is a complicated fact, there is a lot of mechanism, originality, inventing, there it is in front of us. You can touch it, you can feel it, you can almost smell it, you can't quite taste it, but it is a fact. Right? You don't make that into an idea, it is a clock, or a watch. Right? Now I say to you - just listen quietly - that you are being programmed - right? Is that a fact to you, or an idea that you are being programmed? You see the difference?

C: When we look at it, when we look at all the processes that has programmed us we can see that it is a fact.

K: So it is not an idea?

C: No.

K: Wait, wait, I'll show you. When you have a toothache it is a fact. You don't say, pretend, or have an idea that you have a toothache.

C: By the fact...

K: Have you listened?

C: Yes. By the fact do you mean something that exists.

K: Not only exists. Now wait a minute. I am asking you: find out for yourself whether you are being programmed. Right? When you say, "I realize that, that is a fact that I am being programmed", it is not an idea - right? Are you paying attention?

B: Yes.

K: Wait, go slowly. I say to you, just listen carefully, you are the world and the world is you. Is that an idea or a fact? Careful!

Sir, look at it carefully. Is that statement that you are the world and the world is you, is that a fact to you? Or an idea, a Utopia, a feeling how marvellous - you follow?

B: I think it is an idea, sir.

K: Yes. Why? Why do you make it into an idea? I will go further: to you is it an idea or a fact? Your thinking, your anger - careful, careful - your jealousy, your fears, your antagonisms, you follow? Is that a fact or is it an idea? Now you are going to find it awfully difficult. Go into it, learn.

A: It is a fact that this organism exists over here.

K: The organism is a fact.

A: Yes.

K: I have got a thumb, you have got a thumb.

A: Yes.

K: You are short, I am tall, or I am short, you are tall. That's a fact. Right? You didn't create that tree, thank god! Or the tiger. But you created this room, not you, but you created this room - right?
Now enquire, learn, move further. I am asking you to learn about yourself, what you think, what you feel, then go on, learn.

D: Krishnaji, when you say learn about yourself, I mean sometimes I think I do that but that is just memorizing, what I like, what I would like.

K: So, who is the 'I' that does like, and dislikes? You understand? Go on, I am pushing. I like her, I don't like you - right? She is a friend, you are not my friend. And I am angry - right? Is anger different from me?

C: No.

K: No, why do you say no?

D: It is part of me, I could say.

K: All right, part of you. Pleasure is part of you, fear is part of you - right? Pain is part of you and so on. Do you put all the parts together and make it whole? You understand what I am saying?

A: That is me, all those little parts put together.

K: Is you.

B: Yes.

K: Therefore what does that mean? You are all that.

A: Yes

B: Yes.

K: Wait, careful, don't agree so quickly. You are not different from all that. Right? Are you different from anger? No, of course not. So you are anger. Right?

Now I am going to look at myself - we are coming to that - right? I can see myself in the mirror when I shave, or comb my hair. The mirror reflects the face which is me - right? So can I look at myself as clearly as I see my face in the mirror? Have you listened? Listen, listen. Can you do it? Will you do it? Or will you find out how to look at yourself?

A: Is there something which would reflect myself?

K: Find out! You said, you all agreed, or saw for yourselves, anger is you, pleasure is you, being frightened is you. So you are a bundle of all this. Your background, your reactions, "Oh, I've had a terrible childhood" but you have had a happy childhood. All that is you.

A: But why is it that I tend to separate all those?

K: Now find out why.

A: I don't like to think...

K: Listen, listen. Just listen before you answer too quickly. Why do you separate yourself from all that? Is it tradition?

A: Partly.

K: Not partly. Don't use the word partly. See. Is it tradition, is it habit, is it your culture, your religion?

A: It is all that.

K: So what does that all mean?

B: It is another programme, isn't it.

K: No, go on, what does all that mean?

A: All the experiences that I have had.

K: You are just repeating.

A: No, sir.

K: When you say, when I ask you why you separate, and I said to you, why do you separate when you know now, probably you have not thought about it before, that anger is you - right? That is a fact. Why do you separate it? Separate anger as though it was something different from you? I asked: is it tradition, is it habit, is it your particular culture, which means go further, good and bad, the good fighting the bad and the bad fighting the good. Follow? Follow all that up.

A: These are things that we have been told since we were young.

K: Yes, therefore when you separate you are being mechanical, because you have been that that is all right.

B: That is why he said we just repeated all this.

K: Right? So have you understood?

C: I am not very clear about it.

K: You are not clear. Let's make it more clear so that you become clear. You look at that tree in full bloom, green leaves, rich, look at it. Look at it. Turn your face and look. Right? The breezes play with it, it is almost dancing. Right? How do you look at that tree?

C: What do you mean how?

K: What do you see?

C: Well I see the tree.

K: Of course you are not that tree. Right? Now do you look at yourself that way?

C: No.

K: No, naturally. Because you are not that tree. But when you look at yourself, how do you look at yourself, as though you were separate and looking?

A: Yes sir because I like to think I am not afraid, or the fear is not me.

K: So you have separated yourself from your fear, from your anxiety, from your etc. Right? I asked, you why? Why has mankind, including you and me, why have we separated anger from me?

A: Because we have again been programmed to think that anger is bad.

K: That's all. Now can you not be programmed and look?

A: You mean keep away all that we have been conditioned to do?

K: Of course. If I have been told from childhood to say you are separate from fear, therefore fight it, conquer it, be courageous, therefore avoid it - you follow? - and so on. So from childhood I have been conditioned, trained, educated to look at fear as though it was something apart from me. See what the result of that is, the consequences of this separation. Careful, don't answer me. Look at it first. See what it does. Right? I call myself a Hindu, if I do, and you are a Muslim. I have been programmed, you have been programmed to be a Muslim, Allah, and all the Koran - right? And I have been programmed in a different way, as a Jew and an Arab. And we will kill each other. This is the consequence.

A: Of that separation.

K: Of this separation. Right? So when I call myself a Jew and you call yourself an Islam, following the Islam tradition, we are separated from each other. Which means that separation brings conflict between us - right? I believe in Jihad, you know what that word means, holy war, I become a martyr getting killed, it's marvellous. And you have been programmed and don't kill, suppose - right? Or you have been programmed as an Arab and I am Jew so we fight. See now, relate it to when you separate yourself from fear there is a conflict there.

A: But why does that happen?

K: I told you.

A: No, but why do I want to separate myself? It seems quite deliberate that I want to separate myself from all this.

K: Because then you could control it, then you can suppress it - right? Then you can run away from it, or transcend it. It's a conflict.

A: But where does that get me?

K: It has led you nowhere but you like that, it is tradition, you follow it mechanically.

A: Or on the other hand you reject it mechanically.

K: Mechanically. And become lazy, lethargic, don't care - you follow? So have you learnt the consequences, the result of separating yourself from fear?

C: What if we were not aware we were doing it?

K: Just take ordinary fear, when you are aware of fear.

C: Usually we are not.

K: Oh yes you are aware of fear, somebody comes and slaps you, it is natural.

C: Yes, but there are many other feelings that we are not aware of.

K: I'll begin with something that you can get hold of, not aware of everything. That will come very much later - not later, if you learn about it. Go on. So do you actually see the consequences of separation? I a Jew, my tradition goes back to four thousand years - right? I am the chosen people, etc. I worship the nameless and so on. You an Arab, Muslim, Islam, Allah, and we fight. Why? I have been programmed, you have been programmed - right? And we think we are separate. My god is separate from your god. Is that so? It is a fact. I am British - right? And you are Argentine. So I go to Falklands and kill you. Right? And this we have been doing for thousands of years - right? Right?

A: At one level I see the destruction that it has been causing, but at another level I still contribute to it. Why does that go on?

K: We will come to that presently. You are going ahead.

A: No.

K: Yes. First see the consequences of separation in yourself, and actually what is going on in the world. I am British, you are French. Only water of twenty-two miles separates us. I am a British businessman, I manufacture better than hers, and so on. The vanity, you follow?

A: That happens between two friends too.

K: That is what I am saying. Go into it. First see what is happening in the world, then relate what has happened to yourself. Right? Unless you have a criteria for the outer you can't then judge, value, look. Careful. You are not listening. Look, the ideology of the Soviets, which is what they have made of Marx, Lenin, Stalin - right? - and the whole democratic world - right? So ideologies separate. Learn. So they are fighting about ideologies, which is what? An idea society should be this and so you have the Politburo dominating the whole world, Russia.

A: Society should be what I think it should be.

K: That's it, exactly. Or what we all think. It is self-interest. Right? So see the consequences of separation.

B: Sir but what would stop all this going on?

K: Sir, I am not trying to stop what is going on. First I must see what is going on in me because I am contributing to all this, by calling myself a Hindu, you are a Philippine, she is French and he is Argentine, she is a Muslim - you follow?

A: Why do I blame it on another person, I don't seem to see that I am responsible for it too?

K: I don't blame anybody. I say this is what humanity has done to each other - right?

A: No, sir, I am saying when I think I am an Arab and that you are a Jew I put all the blame on you.

K: Of course, for various reasons.

A: I don't see that perhaps I am responsible as well.

K: I want that land which belonged to me about a hundred years ago, or two hundred, or four hundred years ago, and the Israelis say, my dear chap I used to own this land, all this enormous land, long before, four thousands years ago - right? So I am asking you to look at the result of separation in me, I am different from anger therefore I fight anger, control it, suppress it, or transcend it - right? There is separation going on in me. And so I create the world in which I live. Eh? Clear?

A: Yes.

K: The society is created by me.

A: By several me's.

K: By you, my grandfather, my great grandfather, we are all me first, and society we have created it. Unless there is a change here I can't change there. You are not talking, you are just saying yes.

A: You said change.

K: Find out.

B: What do you mean by that?

K: Not what I mean. Don't ever 'what do I mean'.

A: You used that word sir.

K: I am asking you: do you actually in your heart, in your brain, see the fact of what separation does? I get married, all the sex and all that. And I am ambitious, very, or aggressive, I want to get on, make money - right? Have a good job, good car, I want to advance; and my wife also wants to do the same thing in a different direction. Right? So we are already separated - right? So the consequences of that separation, I may enjoy my sex and all that, the comfort of a house but we two are separate, therefore we are at loggerheads with each other - right? You understand?

C: Yes.

K: Don't say yes. Do you actually see this as a fact? Or do you say I quite agree with you, let's get on?

D: Krishnaji, my problem is that I can see it happening outside, I can see it happening to the other people, but somehow I find it hard to see it in myself.

K: Why not? Don't accept anything hard and remain hard, let it remain as though it was a hard thing. See what it does. See what is happening in the world first. Argentine and England. It is very simple.

D: Well I can see that.

K: See what is happening to you when you separate yourself from your fear, from your reactions, from what you do - you follow? It is exactly the same thing.

C: There are two conflicting movements going on.

K: Conflicting movements of which you are.

C: That I am both those movements?

K: Of course.

C: Gosh!

K: Do you see that? I won't move from this, if you don't mind. As long as it is not actual in you, that you, when you separate you are bringing contradictory movements in yourself, and therefore conflict. I don't see why it is so difficult for you to see this.

C: When you say that we do the same thing with our anger, for example, we want to push it away, we want to suppress it, and we do the same with someone from another country. We say, he is English so I want to...

K: Separation, you understand?

C: Yes.

K: Division. I am British and you are French. Right? I have had a tremendous Empire, so I am better than you! I am very proud of my tradition, so are you. We both worship a symbol, Christian, but we are willing to kill each other, economically, and all the rest of it, for various territorial purposes - right? England had a great interest in France at one time. And so on.

A: Why do I think I am better than everybody else?

K: It is part of your vanity. Part of your aggression, part of your tradition. The other day on television, did you see, "German reliability and the British know-how"! You understand? As though the Germans didn't know the know-how, but we British only know the know-how, they are very reliable but we are... - you follow? The sense of separation, the sense of vanity. The Germans know as much of the know-how as you and I do otherwise they couldn't put a car together: or the Americans also say they have the know-how, we are better.

A: But where does that come from?

K: Find out.

A: Is it there in us from the minute we are born?

K: A little bit probably.

A: You mean genetically?

K: My family is better than yours.

A: When I am a baby I don't think that.

K: Not that. But it begins slowly.

A: Over the years.

K: The traditions, they say, you are British, behave like a British. Be proud of your tradition. You had a tremendous empire, now you are reduced but you still remember.

C: But even when you were a child and your parents tell you, because when you are young everyone says how wonderful he is, look he is doing this and that, and then you become proud of it.

K: So are you learning from this discussion, from this dialogue, are you learning, or just memorizing? See the difference? If you say, yes, I have learnt but I don't want to change. It is all right to carry on as I am. I like conflict - right? I like this struggle. Then carry on! That's what the world is doing anyhow. And you may be frightened to stand alone.

A: Yes, yes.

D: Do we know how to stand alone?

K: So, sir, please I am asking you most respectfully, learn from all this. Don't fall back and say it is my old tradition - right? Be aware of all this.

A: So we looked at learning was not, but what is this movement?

K: Why do you ask me?

A: Because I don't know.

K: We have spent an hour and you are still asking what is learning and what is memory.

A: No, I said we spoke of what learning is not, that it is not memory, that it is not accumulation of knowledge.

K: Therefore find out what it is.

A: I don't know.

K: Move. Don't say, I don't know and remain there. I told you, Goya after painting until he was ninety-two, or ninety, he said, "I am still learning". It is a marvellous statement if you go into it.

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD CONVERSATION WITH FOUR STUDENTS 18TH JUNE 1985

K: Last time we met I think we were talking about, as he pointed out, what is our relationship to what is happening in the world - right sir? You know what is happening in the world - terror, terrorism, and those who are terrorized; the purpose of terrorism is to terrorize. And they are hijacking, killing people, innocent people, or any type - it doesn't matter. And there is a war going on in Beirut and there is Bangladesh, you know all about it. And you know what is happening in South America, the Falkland war? And there are people celebrating the Falkland war here and moaning in Argentina - right? And also there is this Star Wars - you have heard about it? Tremendous scheme. So that - I won't go into the details of it - so that the atom bomb and the neutron bomb will be obsolete. Right? Seeing all this, not only intellectually but actually, as a fact, what is your relationship to all that? To national divisions, to economic, to racial, to all that has happened in Brussels and so on, what is your attitude to all this, how do you react to all this?

A: Sir, when one reads about all this in the newspapers, or hears about it, or sees it, one seems to get stuck with the question of how does one respond?

K: I am asking you. How do you respond to all this? What is your reaction, what is your feeling, what is your instinctive or immediate response to it?

D: I think my response, at least sometimes, is thinking I want to keep out of it as much as I can, you know, try to keep away.

K: All right, if you try to keep out of it, can you?

D: I don't know.

A: Do you mean not contribute to the mess?

D: Well I mean I try to make no difference between where people come from.

K: That is fairly simple.

D: Yes. But from there I don't know what else to do.

K: It is recognized and it is fairly easy to do that. But at a deeper level, if there is such a deeper level, what do you feel about all this? The wars, the antagonisms, the economic divisions, super powers and the terrible things that are happening - hi-jacking, people who have nothing to do with anything being bombed, killed in Israel the bombs are thrown on buses, children, women - you follow? How do you...

A: I often think, what is it that makes man do all that?

K: No. You are the man, and also you are the woman.

A: Yes, it is part of me too.

K: What is your relationship to it? You are not answering my question.

B: Well sir I get the sense that there is something not quite right about it and you know I ask myself...

K: What do you mean 'not quite right about it'?

B: Sir I mean not right, this killing, this bombing, the war going on.

K: Yes, proceed, tell me.

B: I don't feel it is right and yet I am not sure if there is something I can do about it because nobody seems to be able to stop it.

K: Do you want to stop it? Do you want to indulge in violence?

B: No, sir.

K: Right? Then you are not a violent human being. Or are you limiting violence to terrorism, killing, limit it there, limit it so that it is something - right? But violence is much deeper than merely, not that it is right to kill another human being, but do you feel violent? If we are really honest.

A: Sir this is where I see your contradiction because I...

K: Contradiction between what?

A: At one level I do not want this violence to continue but in my own life I or any individual seems to continue with this.

K: So do you take the responsibility, you as a human being living on this earth, do you take the responsibility and say, "I won't be violent"? Or do you indulge sometimes in violence, sometimes not - you follow what I am talking about? Which is it?

C: It seems to be the only thing we can do.

K: Will you do it? Not "it seems the only thing we can do", but will you do it? Will you say, "I won't be violent" and go into the question of what is violence, how to be free of it and so on, will you undertake that journey? Or just say, "I don't want a part of all this, I want to keep out". But how can you keep out? When you go back to Argentina, you are going to take an aeroplane and you are going to pay so much and that goes part of it to armaments, part of it and all the rest of it. You can't keep out.

A: But then I get stuck with the question of how do I not keep out?

K: No, first, I will tell you. I am asking not how to keep out, that is a wrong question, you can't keep out.

A: But I am saying that is the immediate reaction that one has.
How do I not do this.

D: Well you can't not do it.

K: No, I am asking you, will you take the responsibility, seriously, passionately, and say, let's go into the question of violence and I will see I will not be violent, and therefore you will not elect a violent leader - right? A politician, that is what has happened the world over. Therefore I am asking you as human beings, will you stop your own violence?

And what is violence? Come a little bit, begin to discuss with me. What do you consider is violence?

B: When you hurt another person.

K: Begin at the lowest level or the highest level. Begin somewhere. You hit me. You rob me. You murder me. You do all kinds of things to me - right? That is only a part of violence, isn't it? Investigate, go into it, go on, explore together, don't keep silent.

A: When I feel angry with you.

K: That's right, when you feel angry. Go on.

A: When I feel hurt.

K: Yes. Not only when you don't want to be hurt, but also when you want to hurt others. Don't say...

A: Yes, that is included.

K: So go on.

C: When you want to protect yourself.

K: Partly.

C: If countries are at war.

D: And jealousy seems to be violence.

B: And competition.

K: You go on talking, tell me - don't ask me. What do you think is violence? And will you undertake the responsibility to see that you, as a human being on this earth, will not be violent? What does it mean? And also what does it mean to be non-violent? Right? You understand? That's what they are talking about: Tolstoy and Gandhi, and India has been preaching non-violence.

A: But that seems to be non-violence in one particular sphere.

K: Go into it. Don't say, 'that seems'. Go into it, find out if you are violent. And then enquire what is violence. You said, anger, so you will not be angry.

D: But Krishnaji, can you say that? I mean it seems even a violent statement because you are trying to contradict something that is there, you know.

K: Find out. I understand that old boy. But I am asking you, will you undertake not to be violent? Therefore enquire what is violence.

A: Sir I find myself reluctant to say that I will not be violent.

K: That is not the point. You just now said, careful, careful, that you living on this earth as a human being, see all this, terrible violence, since human beings lived on this earth, and it is getting worse and worse and worse, more dangerous - right? I asked you what is your reaction, what is your responsibility to that. He said, "I would withdraw". You see, you can't withdraw - right? When you take an aeroplane, or buy a stamp, or anything, food, you are helping the whole system of violence to continue - right? Clear? If that is clear then what is your part in this? Then you must ask: what is violence? Right? Before you say I can, I cannot - right? Now what do you consider violence?

C: Often we are violent when we have a quick reaction that we don't control. We react immediately and we don't see it.

K: Begin simply. Begin at the physical level. The reaction is also part physical - right? Begin. There is a physical violence, isn't there? Hitting somebody, throwing a bomb at somebody, throwing another under the train, or throwing a bomb at forty thousand feet over a town - right? Those are all physical actions - right? Do you want to contribute to that, or you say no, I don't want to do that. I don't want to kill another human being for whatever reason. At present I don't want to kill. I have thought a great deal about it, and I have gone into it, physically I won't kill. I don't know what I will do later, I mean next year, but so far I am very clear. Would you say that?

B: I think we can say that.

K: No, not can, will you do it?

B: Yes, sir, but when it comes to something about anger, it seems it is quite a different matter.

K: Face the different matter. It is no good talking about not being violent - right? Talking about, theorizing, discussing, like they are doing now. Will you as a human being physically not hurt another?

C: Are you saying that each moment we should watch it?

K: I am asking you this. Don't translate it into something else.

A: Yes, sir, I can say that for now.

K: You will not hurt another, physically.

D: Even if you are attacked?

K: Wait, wait. That is a supposition.

D: Yes, I know.

K: If I have been all my life non-violent, I don't know what I will do. If I am attacked I don't know what I am going to do. But my brain has been thinking about this, living it and perhaps it will act like that way, or it may not - right? So leave the future alone. That's a trick to escape from this fact - right?

So physical violence. Are you psychologically violent?

A: When I compete with fifty other students in an examination...

K: Don't begin, be careful. Step by step. Don't jump to something.

A: I am not jumping sir, I am saying when I took an examination in Rishi Valley, I was competing with thousands of other students.

K: So do you say psychological competition is part of violence?

A: Yes, sir.

B: Yes.

D: Yes.

K: She is uncertain. Competition, not examination, but any form of competition. So will you not compete? I am better than him.

C: Does that mean not taking exams?

K: Just a minute, we will come to it. First get the principle of it, the feeling of it. Not to compete - right? Because that is part of violence - right? Would you agree to that? You have said that. So will you eliminate, or look at it and see the nature of competition, the wholeness of it, the entirety of competition?

A: All right, let's begin.

D: Let's look at it now.

K: Begin. Go on. Go on. Competition, from childhood, your mother says you are better than your brother, more beautiful, you have got much better outlook and so on. So will you stop comparing? Comparing is a form of competition, not between two materials, between this cloth and that cloth, between this woolen trouser and your corduroy trousers and so on. Deeper. It is a much deeper problem. Can you live your life without any comparison? Except you compare with two cars, etc. Right?

A: What does it mean to live without comparison?

K: Find out. Don't ask me. That's theoretical.

A: I am just asking the question.

K: Begin.

A: But it seems that's where I get stuck.

K: Don't get stuck. Move.

A: I keep thinking what if I gave up comparison, what if I stopped competing, what if - all that.

K: That means, if I do this I will get that.

D: I just get stuck with the question before: how do I get rid of competition, how do I not compare?

K: Careful, careful! The moment you say if I do this, will I get that? Then you are functioning between reward and punishment.

D: That is the way we have functioned for many years.

K: Therefore pursue it further. Therefore would you say: understand the depth of comparison, you know, the full movement of comparison, and say, sorry I understand it, therefore I won't do it - right? You know very well fire burns therefore you won't touch fire.

A: But we don't see it in the same light.

K: That's the whole point.

D: I don't understand it, I don't understand the whole problem of it.

K: So look at it carefully, don't come to any conclusion. Go on! You have never thought about this, that's the difficulty, or looked at it. Right, let's begin.

We agreed all of you, I think, that comparison is a form of violence. But you have to compare - right? Between two pieces of cloth, between two poems, between two carpets - right? And so on. Better washing machine than the old one. You have to compare. But psychologically will you go on?

A: What does it mean to psychologically compare?

K: It means I am better than you.

A: When I make a judgement about somebody.

K: No, no. I am not talking about judgement. You see how you function?

A: No, I am asking sir.

K: I know. I am asking you a question and then you counter that by another question.

A: No, I am not asking you to answer this question.

K: Don't ask before you have answered my question. Right? I am not being rude. So will you enquire, look, into the whole nature of comparison by beginning psychologically why do you compare? Why do you compare yourself with her, or with him, or with the whole school, or with your brother, why?

C: We have been taught to compare.

K: So you are being educated to compare?

C: Yes.

K: So your reactions, go on, further into it, are mechanical.

Right? Like a computer that has been programmed - right? You know how. A little of it, like me, a little of it. You repeat.

C: Well the comparison comes just by itself.

K: Of course. You repeat. Right? Do you see how your brain becomes mechanical, has become mechanical?

A: Repeating patterns.

K: Stick to one thing at a time. You told me that - you told K rather that comparison is a form of violence. You all agreed. Don't go back on it. And I said it is necessary to compare between that lamp and that lamp - right? That camera and another cheaper camera.

A: Yes it is.

K: That is necessary. But psychologically, inwardly, why do you compare? And he says, and she said, "Oh, it is a reaction, a natural reaction". I said, is it natural, or is it cultivated? Natural being as a baby I grow up, that is natural.

C: It is more something we have been taught to do. Comparison.

K: Between baby and you?

C: No, no, no.

K: You are not listening.

C: To compare, we have been taught at school and everything.

K: Yes, you are educated to compare. We have said that. Which means your brain has been conditioned, educated, trained to compare - right? From that we said a computer, which is programmed will repeat. It may invent its own repeat, you follow, further but it is repetition. Now you are also trained to compare, I am better than you, I am taller than you, I am more clever, I'll get a better job - right? And so on. And much more subtle than that, we are trained, educated, programmed to repeat. Now will you stop that? Will you see the reality of it? That is, how your brain has become mechanical, routine, it is repeating, saying the same thing over and over again: "I can't do it, I must do it, it is too difficult for me, I don't understand, tell me all about it".

D: That is all that my brain seems to do, Krishnaji.

K: Wait, wait. I know.

A: But that is exactly what is happening, sir.

K: I know that. That is why I am repeating it, I am telling you.

B: But can we...

K: Wait sir. Look at it, see how your brain is working.

B: Yes sir. Can I say something?

K: You can say anything you like!

B: Well we said that we were educated to compare. We agree that we are educated to compare.

K: Conditioned.

B: Yes but can we educate ourselves not to compare?

K: Find out, don't ask me.

B: Well you seem to know sir.

K: I may know, I may not know. But find out, question, doubt, ask yourself. Now I have been brought up to compare, suppose I have been brought up, I haven't been, but suppose I have been, compare myself with somebody else much nobler, much more - you follow, all that nonsense. Now why do I compare? Why? You say that is progress - right? That is evolution.

D: Also Krishnaji, you are asking why, there doesn't seem to be a reason. It is just being done constantly.

K: I know, I said that. I have been told from childhood, from babyhood, I am a Catholic, baptized, you know all the rest of it.

And I say, "I am a Catholic".

D: Yes.

K: My parents are, I am also. Go on.

D: That is all that my brain knows.

K: Of course, of course. Of course it works that way. So I said you are mechanically functioning - right? So go on.

A: Sir, I think I also want to compare because when I think I am nicer than somebody else I get a certain pleasure out of it.

K: That's it. So you want a reward from it, which is pleasure - right? See the consequences of it, that is, if I don't get it I get punished, I feel hurt, I feel angry, I get depressed - right? I feel, Oh, gosh I am so small - you know. All the depression, all the anger, jealousy - right? All that goes on. All my life. Right? Do you want to live that way? I am just asking for you to find out. Not say, I don't want to live that way - right?

So you have said comparison is one of the factors of violence - right? Will you go into it in yourself and say it is my responsibility not to compare? Or see the whole movement of comparison and therefore end it? Not end it, it will end it self. You understand? Like a water spouting out of a pipe when there is no volume of water behind it, it stops. You understand?

B: Does that mean, sir, you don't compare?

K: Don't ask me what I do, that's not the point. I can tell you, yes I never have compared myself with anybody, not that I am vain and feel very holy, it doesn't occur to me. Don't accept it because I say it, I may be deceiving myself. I have gone into this very carefully. I say I have never done it. It doesn't mean a thing. It doesn't make me into a hero!

A: Sir, when I say that I see that comparison leads to violence, I doubt to what extent I see it.

K: That's right. Then find out what does it mean to see.

A: Yes.

K: I am asking you a question.

A: Because there seems to be some kind of an intellectual seeing, a bunch of words and we see it. But we get stuck in that and it doesn't seem to carry on further, beyond that.

K: Why not? Is it your brain refuses to look in that direction? Is it laziness? Is it a form of saying, well it doesn't matter, everybody compares - you follow?

A: Sir, I don't think I want to give up all that has happened in these past eighteen years.

K: All right, keep it.

A: That is what is preventing me.

K: All right, keep it and be violent. You want both.

A: That is the contradiction.

K: I know, I know. You want to have the cake and eat it! You understand sir?

C: Yes.

B: Well can you find out what does it mean to see?

K: Go on. See, observe - right? What does it mean? I see actually what is going on in the world - right? Actually see, newspapers, television, magazines, books - right? Lectures, for and against. I see what KGB are doing, I see what the Palestinians are doing under different names, different guises, different motives. She hides against somebody else. I see it very clearly, all that, don't you? Right? Why? Why do you say I see that very clearly?

A: I am not sure that I see it very clearly.

B: It is outside of us, sir.

K: Don't you look at television?

A: I do.

K: Haven't you heard or seen in the newspapers the latest hijacking, TWA, what they are doing? You don't see that? See it in newspapers, they talk about it.

A: Sir, he asked a question earlier. I would just like to go back to it. What does it mean to see?

K: I am asking you.

A: But you were using the word all this time and I was getting confused.

K: You mean to say you don't see what is happening? You don't know what is happening?

A: I do.

K: Therefore you understand. You understand there is a tree there, there are these lamps here. These lamps, those trees, the carpet, the chairs, are as factual as the TWA hi-jacking - right? You see that? You hear it.

A: Yes.

K: That is one form hearing, seeing. You can't doubt it.

A: No.

D: No.

K: You can't doubt if he is sitting there.

A: No, not at all.

K: So do you see it, do you hear it, do you know it as a fact - right? As a fact. Right? Are you clear?

A: Yes sir.

K: Right. Do you know as a fact that comparison is a factor of violence? As a fact, not as an idea. You understand sir?

C: Yes.

K: As a fact those lamps are there, these chairs are there, the carpet, the shape of the room, those are facts. You can't immediately change the roof, you may tomorrow. So do you see equally clearly, objectively, that - what were we talking about?

B: Comparison is part of violence.

K: Yes.

D: Krishnaji, can I say how I see it? I see that comparison...

K: I will tell you why, you are asking me to repeat, repeat, I object to that. My brain says why haven't you moved? You understand? You ask the same question over and over again.

A: Well that is because I am getting stuck.

K: No.

A: Yes, sir.

K: Why do you say, you see, or hear, or observe, or read that there is a hijacking going on, starving people, the dirt, the squalor, the annoying thing, the dignity of it, they may be killed, the aeroplane may be - you follow? That is very factual. Do you see it as a fact in yourself that comparison is part of violence? I am not going to repeat it again. I personally can't keep on repeating, repeating.

D: I can see that the comparison that other people do is violent but it is very difficult to see that I am being violent.

C: But if you compare yourself with someone and you may think that he is better than you and then you will feel angry, or ready to do something to him so that he is not as well as you are, or something like that.

K: Just a minute. What is your difficulty? I am asking - we are asking a very, very simple question, what is your difficulty?

D: I think my difficulty is that...

K: Stop, stop, I am not going to listen to you. Stop first. Listen to the question and see the meaning of the question and then find out, and then answer. But you jump to answer immediately.

A: Sir you asked what is the difficulty.

K: Yes, what is the difficulty? You see the clock there very clearly, that is a fact, thirteen minutes to one. Right? Why don't you see as clearly, as definitely, as accurately, that comparison is part of violence?

A: My difficulty is that I tend to say what if. I say if I stop comparing I should be non-violent. But that is what is happening.

K: Why? Because you want a reward.

A: Yes.

K: So you are then not observing the accuracy. I want it to be at ten minutes past one so that I can have my lunch. Then I am not observing, I am not listening.

A: That is why when I say, I see, I doubt it.

K: How can you doubt?

A: No, no, not the clock.

K: Why do you differentiate between the two?

D: Well Krishnaji you made a difference between them.

K: You see you don't even listen, take the trouble.

D: I was going to say that, for instance, you said you can compare between a material and another material, but not psychologically.

K: I don't say anything. I didn't say don't compare.

D: No but...

K: Don't put me in a position and then attack that position. I am asking you, why don't you see as clearly as you see that clock that comparison runs on? Why don't you see it? You are young, your brain is somewhat young, you have already come to the point, "I don't know, I can't do it, you tell me". That's is an old man's game! People all over the world are saying they want leaders - right? You also want that. And I say please don't put me in that position.

A: No, sir I am not asking you for an answer.

K: You are.

A: No, no.

K: You are stuck.

A: I am stuck.

K: All right, be stuck. I doubt if you are stuck.

A: You doubt it? Why do you doubt it?

K: Because you keep on repeating it.

A: That is being stuck.

K: Therefore I don't know. It may be mere gramophone recording.

D: Well I think that is what she calls being stuck, you know. It is repeating it.

K: You are not stuck when you are hungry are you, you rush there? Go on, find out why you see something very, very clearly, the moment you move, or move away from that physical fact you get driven to feel, "oh, I don't know, I am stuck, I am afraid" - you follow - you play that game. So find out what you are doing. Why you are doing it.

A: Often I don't know if I can trust what I feel.

K: It doesn't matter. Don't trust. Why should you trust?

A: No, that is why there is this feeling of I don't know, the uncertainty.

K: Because you are uncertain of yourself.

A: Yes.

K: Therefore find out why you are uncertain. Yes, you agree, but you stop there.

D: Then why don't we want to see things?

K: Whom of you are asking that question?

D: Myself.

K: Ask it and find out the answer. You see what you have been doing for eighteen or twenty years. Asking somebody to tell you what to do. Right? And the other extreme is, I don't want you tell me, I'll do what I like. Right? Agree? With the hippies it began, and it is going on in different ways. I will do what I want to do, who are you to tell me? The hierarchy I disapprove of - you follow all that?

So, I am asking the same question, you haven't answered it.

A: Sir I find it difficult to answer it.

K: No, you haven't even heard the question. That's what I am doubting. You see that clock, now six minutes to one. I have repeated the same thing for twenty minutes, or less or more. So your brain is refusing to move from a position. You don't say, all right, I am going to find out why I see that very clearly and I can't see this fact. Fact, that comparison is one of the factors of violence. That is a fact. Why don't you see that, hear it, taste it? Feel that - why don't you? Oh, you say, "I'm stuck". You don't say that with your examination - right? When you are being examined for an hour you don't say, "Sorry, I am stuck".

B: Sir I think one of the reasons is that we are frightened of what is going to happen when we have moved.

K: Find out if you are frightened. What might happen is not a fact. So you want a reward, you want to be told, you want to be patted on the back, encouraged, push, push, push. And I say, I am sorry I am not pushing.

A: What I don't see is what I am heading towards, then I feel frightened, that's why.

K: Sorry I am not listening to you. You have repeated this ten different ways.

B: That is what I said too.

K: Reward, I am frightened, I have been brought up that way, I know I am being programmed, yes, and you repeat that in different ways. So I say please go on I am rather bored with this. I am not. You know. So you tell me why you see something physically very, very, very clearly, and psychologically you say "I don't know what you are talking about".

A: Something is blocking me from seeing it.

K: Eh!

A: Yes sir.

B: With me it is the same, we know what blocks her.

K: Wait. Answer her.

C: Is it because you are expecting an answer?

K: She says I am blocked.

D: Once again we find excuses.

K: Who is blocking her?

D: Herself.

A: Myself.

K: Find out who is yourself.

A: I don't know.

K: Don't say you don't know. Repeat, repeat. You are all so very lazy. You know if I want to see what is on the other side of that hill, I walk up there and look. But you sit comfortably and say, tell me all about it.

A: No, sir, I don't think I am saying that.

K: More or less you are saying that. I am blocked from climbing the mountain, I am sorry I am frightened of climbing the mountain, something is blocking me from climbing the mountain.

A: But that is how it is.

K: Of course it is. And you say how it is.

A: I am not saying that I should remain with that.

K: Therefore move.

A: But then I get stuck with the question, how do I move?

K: Get up off the chair and go.

A: But I don't see it as simple as that.

K: It is as simple as that if you look at that clock and why you can't see it equally clearly. It's very simple but you are refusing to see it. If you want me to go deeper into it I will. But careful, I am not programming you! Right? I am not telling you what to do, what to think, how to get up from the chair and walk up the hill. I won't enter into that game. Right? But if you want me to go into it, for you to observe your own brain, expand it, break it down, look, change and do something, don't say I don't know.

Now I will tell you: can you look at that tree without the word? Look at that tree and find out if you can look at it. Just observe it. Not say that's a tree and give it a name, etc. etc. Right? Can you do it?

A: No.

K: Why?

A: Because as soon as I look at that book, the word book comes.

K: Back again. I am asking you something: look at that tree, look at that thing that is outside the window and don't call it a tree, but look at it. Or look at that thing on the shelf and don't call it a book but just look. Do you find that terribly difficult? Eh? No. You don't. Right? But she does.

A: Yes, I do.

K: I know you do.

D: Well Krishnaji to tell us to look at it you are naming it.

K: Naming, you have said something. Naming is not observing. I don't bother to look, she is my wife. Oh I have lived with her, had sex, and blah and she is just my wife. But I have never looked at her as a human being - right? Look at her, what she thinks, what she feels, what she - you follow? Just look. Right? But you don't. And don't say I am stuck! It is a very simple thing to look at that tree without the word. Find out why the word comes out so quickly, and says, tree. That's a tiger. A snake.

C: Because we have a general idea.

K: No, don't answer it yet. Find out. You have already answered it. Why do you name these things so quickly. Right? "My father, my mother was like that", and already you have got images - right? That is all I am preventing - not preventing - that is what is happening. You are not free - I won't go into it - you are not free of image making. That's a book.

A: I want to identify things.

K: No, no. You see you have already gone ahead. You don't begin simply. I know you have a clever brain.

A: No, sir, that doesn't seem to be simple.

K: No, no, listen to me carefully. The Indians are pretty good at this kind of game.

B: Can we let Krishnaji go on for a while?

K: You haven't even learnt a very simple fact. Look at that thing without naming it. You don't even begin with that, you have already become complicated. You don't say, now let me look, take time. Can you look at anything silently? Your father, your mother, your friend, your husband, anything, the terrorists, look silently to find out. You understand? That may change the whole thing. But you are not even willing to do it. Then you will ask me, how am I to be silent. I am blocked.

So go into all this patiently, not take years, I don't mean that. Because you are young, you have a long life ahead of you - right? If you don't begin to learn now when you are young, you will say, I am stuck, at the age of fifty - right? Oh, I can't solve this problem. And I go to a psychiatrist, or to the priest, or get depressed, or hit my husband, get annoyed with him - right? This is going on. So begin from now, as you are young, to look at something without naming it. Then you will begin to learn why you name. Sirs, this is very important to learn this simple fact, very simple fact. Look at your prime ministers, your politicians, and look at them, the rulers of the world, right? You will learn, you will feel, you will understand something so enormously important. Naming may be a factor of self-importance, a factor of security - you understand? Go into it all. Don't be lazy, that's all. Don't ever, ever say, I'm stuck, because nobody is going to help you. I know you want to be helped but nobody is going to do it. They will be fools. The gurus say, come with me, sit with me, you will be all right, you feel happy. Don't enter into all that. Enquire. Put your energy into it.

I am afraid this has to be the last. You are going away, or coming back? You will be next term here, you are sure?

A: Yes.

K: I am just asking.

B: Yes.

C: I am coming back.

K: So we may meet again - right? And don't begin to tell me you are stuck. You have two and a half months, or three months.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 24TH AUGUST 1985

I am sorry it is such bad weather! What do you expect of the speaker? One would, if you don't mind, take counsel together, take consideration together, weigh things together, observe what is going on in the world together, think together, and deeply be involved with what we are talking about with each other. It is not the speaker alone - you are all speakers and learners like the speaker. So we are together deliberating. To elect a pope it took three days. They deliberated before, balancing, weighing, considering and so on: at the end of three days they chose a man who is called his holiness, the father. And together we have nearly ten days.

Deliberation implies not only to consider, to weigh, to think out together, and also go into the problems very deeply, slowly, carefully, knowing one's own prejudices, one's own crankiness about food, clothes and so on, so that you are not only listening to the speaker but also listening to your own reactions and prejudices, determinations and vows and all the idiocies that one has - if you will forgive me. So that together seriously, not separately, not divisively, not you taking one side and the speaker on the other but together observe what is going on in the world. Not only in the world of this particular country but also all over the world, politics, economics, the scientists, the socialists, the liberals and so on, conservatives - I forgot to add them - and all the rest of it. So this is not a weekend camping affair but rather very serious - not church seriousness, churchy seriousness, but rather seriousness that continues not only during these days that we are here together but also afterwards when you go away from here, when we all separate.

And in deliberation there is also a decision, a view to decide and then act. All that is implied in that one nice word. So together, seriously, not merely intellectually, not romantically, sentimentally or fantastically but together look at what is happening to all of us.

One wonders why you are all here and I am here. You have taken a lot of trouble, to set up a camp, bring all your children and dogs - have you got dogs too? And all the young children and boys and girls, you have taken a lot of trouble to come here, expense, the boredom of travel, transport, all the things involved in this. And we also must bear in mind when we are deliberating together there is no outside help. It is a deliberation. The speaker is not trying to help, or trying to impress, convince, cajole, pressure and all that. We can leave that to the politicians, to the newspapers, to television, and the churches all over the world, whether they be temples, mosques, or the churches in the Christian world. So we are together, without any pressure, any persuasion on the part of the speaker, or on your side not taking one particular point of view, and holding on to that. We are both together examining, investigating the extraordinary problems that we are faced with, dangerous, and one does not know what is going to happen in the future, there is immense uncertainty, chaos and the world is becoming more and more sinister - if you have travelled, if you have read, if you have met some of the politicians, the prime ministers and so on.

So we are going first to look at the world, not my world, or your world - the world that is happening in front of us, the things that are going on in the scientific world, in the world of armaments, the race that is going on, the politicians holding on to their particular ideologies, fighting for that. You know, all the rest of it. How do you, if one may ask, approach these problems? Not only one's own particular problem but the problems that challenge, that require a determined action, how do you approach these problems? The scientific world, the biological world, the world of economics, the world of social inequality, social immorality? We know all this, how do we approach it? As a British? As a Frenchman? As a Hindu? Or a Muslim and so on? If we approach it with a particular point of view, or with some trained - biologically conditioned, then our motive is known or unknown and therefore your approach will be limited. This is obvious - right? If I, if the speaker is holding on to his India and all that rubbish, then he will look at all the world with all its complicated problems from a particular, narrow view. And so his approach will be conditioned, his approach will be partial, self interest and so on. So his approach will always be, to all these problems, very small, very limited. That is clear.

So one is asking, we are asking together, how will you approach these problems? - not a particular problem, whether it be yours, or your wife's, husband's and so on, but the problems, a problem. How do you approach a problem? Which is, how do you approach a challenge? Something you have to face, answer and act.

What is a problem? According to the dictionary meaning it is something thrown at you - right? Something that you have to face and answer. Not that time, circumstances, pragmatically respond, casually, or with a certain sense of smugness, or with certain obvious conclusions. How do you come to it? We are deliberating together, there is not the speaker sitting on the platform, which he doesn't like anyhow. It is not a personal thing at all. He has got a name and all the rest of that business. Personality doesn't enter into this at all, you can brush that completely aside. So in what way do we come to face the problem? So we will have to ask what is a problem.

Why have we so many problems? All our life from the beginning to the end, from being born to dying, we are crowded with problems, we are worn out by problems - worry, anxiety, uncertainty, and the perpetual conflict, struggle, pain, anxiety, all the rest of it. So shouldn't we together find out how to deal with problems? That is the first question.

We know each one of us has a problem of some kind or another - health, old age, or some disease, incurable, terminable, or some psychotic problems, or some fantastic illusory cranky problems, which we call religious problems! [Laughter] - and so on. So please let's together find out why from the beginning of our existence, when we are born until we die, there is this constant resolution of problems. Right? Can we go into it together? Not the speaker explains and you accept or reject, but we are debating together, deliberating together, weighing together, together. As we said, what is a problem? A problem is something thrown, it is a challenge, to which you have to come to it, apply your brains, one's activity, not just nervously respond to it, your whole brain is involved in this. Right?

From childhood we have a problem, how to read, when you leave home you feel nostalgic, homesick, and you when you are in a school you have to learn to write, read all the terrible books. And that becomes a problem - right? Right from childhood, when you go to school, college, university and so on. If you are a labourer that becomes a problem. You know the whole of life is a problem. So our brains are conditioned from childhood to the resolution of problems - right? We are in agreement? Are we together in this? Not I am explaining, you are accepting. We are together on the same boat. You may row faster, you may have more strength, more skill, others may be weak, but we are in the same boat. So is that clear? Our brains from childhood are conditioned to problems, we live with problems. That is obviously very clear - right? Sexual problem, the problem of relationship, the problem of power, status, position, authority and dominating, obeying and disobeying, you know, the whole movement of life. So can we listen - or hear - to our own conditioning, conditioning, trained, educated to live with problems? And in the resolution of one problem you create other problems, which the politicians are doing so remarkably well. And we are doing the same. So is it possible - we are deliberating together, please don't listen to the speaker alone - is it possible to be free of problems first, the brain, and then tackle problems - you understand? Yes, is it possible? I don't know and you don't know.

So we are enquiring into that first. We have many issues in life, very, very complicated. The whole personality, the whole activity of the brain, the feelings, the sentiments, the urges, the attachments, we have got so many of them. And we never seem to resolve any of them, but gradually wither away, die. So it becomes very important, doesn't it to you and to all of us, whether the brain, which has been trained to live and take share part, active with problems, can that brain, please think this out together, not me alone, can this brain have no problems at all and therefore tackle problems? You understand? It is only the free brain that can understand problems, resolve problems. Not a brain that is crowded with problems. The scientists are crowded with them. They are first human beings and then scientists. The human beings have problems and the scientists with their theories and all the rest of it have their problems - right? So it is a constant movement or a continuous chain of problems. Right? Now, how can we resolve this? Can you, we together, resolve this question, which is very serious because we are facing a very, very dangerous world. They are playing, the politicians on one side, the ideologists on one side, and the other side with their immense sense of power and so on, both sides, are waiting - right? Right? Mounting armaments, race. And we are caught in the middle of it. All right Sirs?

There is immense poverty, of which this country, or you don't know. Immense poverty, degradation, corruption, and so on. We will talk about gods later and all the religious organized structure called religion with their ceremonials, mediaeval dresses and so on.

So we are asking each other whether our brains can be free to resolve problems. Bien? You have to answer that, don't keep still. What will you do? Whatever you do will be another problem - right? You say I will do this, I won't do that, I will believe this, I won't believe that, this is true, this is false, I pursue what I want. All that creates more problems - right? So it behoves us first to find out whether our brains can be free of problems, to understand and resolve problems. Right? Don't look at me. Perhaps one has not thought, or gone into this question. One would ask, "Give me time to think over it. Let me carefully observe, look and then decide." If you allow time, that is, I will think about it, I will weigh pros and cons, where it is necessary to have problems, where it is not necessary to have problems, and so on. If you take time over it - right? - what happens? You answer. What happens if I take time over some problem which has to be resolved immediately, instantly? If it is not possible to resolve it instantly there will be other problems creeping up - right? Right? So will you instantly solve the problem? Solve the question, the challenge, that your brain which has been trained for so many years to live and move among the problems, so that your brain is never free. Isn't that the first problem? Because we have got to face several complicated issues as we go along. Why we human beings all over the earth, which is extraordinarily beautiful, why we have lived two and half million years on this earth, or more, or less, psychologically, subjectively, we have changed very little, we are still barbarians in the real sense of that word. Why haven't we moved away from the set pattern after all these million years? That is a problem. Why the world is divided into nationalities, into religious activities, why the world has been fighting each other, killing each other, the appalling things that wars have done from the club too, the atom bomb, why we are going on still like that. Why we elect these politicians. Why we are so frightened of the future. We have got many, many problems - right?

So it is important to understand it appears, if you will permit it, that each one of us talking to each other, weighing, considering, what shall we do? What will you do? Of course if you are stuck on diet, or yoga, or some kind of fanciful imaginative cranky thing, then you are lost obviously. You are hooked on something. But you will never solve any of the problems. So what shall we do together, knowing that there is no help outside - right? Knowing you can attend all the camps in the world, all the gurus in the world - the speaker is not a guru - or come here, nobody can help, except physically, otherwise nobody can help us - your husband, your wife, your girl friend and so on, or the police, or the future scientists - you follow? Here we are. So can we put aside altogether the idea of wanting to be helped, wanting to be told, wanting to follow somebody, believe in something. All that becomes irrelevant when you have got to deal with something actual. The actual is what we are, the multiple problems, the tears, the laughters, the agony, the anxiety, jealousy, hate, the psychological hurts, wounds.

So what shall we do together, not separately? Right? We can't live separately. Even the monks organized with their abbeys, monasteries in the Western world, they depend on each other. In the Asiatic world, especially in India, the monk is by himself wandering all over the earth, all over India. And they have their problems. I don't know if you have ever followed a group of monks. Once the speaker was following a group of monks in India, in the Himalayas, and they were chanting, reading their books, never looking at the beautiful stream that went by, heard the song of that stream, the flowers, the extraordinary skyline with snow, mountains twenty five thousand feet, never looked at all the beauty of the earth. They were just concerned with themselves and their little gods! So please answer this question about yourself: whether your brain can be free so that you can understand, dissolve problems. If one sees that it is not - that it is actually conditioned - right? Which one sees it, not be told about it, not read something in a book, or convinced by another, but if one sees directly for oneself that our brain is so conditioned - right? Can we do that? Don't... Sir, we are going to ask questions on Tuesday - or is it Tuesday, yes Tuesday. Because if you all ask questions now - you don't mind Sir?

Can we do it? Can we talk over together, deliberate together, weigh, consider, is our brain, are we aware of it, our brain living with problems? Not as an observer looking through a microscope, either the right way or the wrong way, but to be aware of it, that our brains are so terribly conditioned to live with problems. The speaker hasn't to repeat it over and over again.

Suppose I am not aware of it, I never even thought about it, I never heard such a thing before is possible or not possible. But you have raised a question - right? And my brain being fairly active, not too dull, not hooked to something, my brain then begins to say, can the brain observe its own activity - you follow? You understand what I am saying? Can the brain be aware of its own limitation, conditioning? As you observe yourself in a mirror when you shave, or do up your face - sorry! - can you so observe your brain? Not as an observer looking at something - right? If you observe as an outsider, the outsider is also the observed - right? There is no difference, the outsider, and the insider. Clear? You don't say when you shave your chin that you are looking at your face from the outside, you are there in the mirror. You might have difficult hairs to cut but you are there, your image is you - right? You don't say, "Well I look different there from me", you are what you are. So can the brain become aware of itself, its thoughts, its reactions, its way of living? Because that is the centre of all our activity - right? Do we realize that? It is the centre of all our nervous responses, all our reactions, all our conditionings, our feelings, our pleasures, pains, fears, anxieties, loneliness, despair and the search for love, all the rest of it, it is there. Right? If - when there is no understanding of that what can I do? Anything I do will be meaningless - right? I wonder if you capture all this? Never mind.

So are we aware of the activity of the brain? Why you think such a thing, what your reactions are, why you are so cranky, psychopathic, why you cling to something, why is there this loneliness, the sorrow, the pain, the grief and the anxiety, the uncertainty? Right? We are deliberating together, please. What shall I do if I am not? [Tape turns over] I know I am not. I am not aware of myself, myself being the brain, the thing that is restless, the thing that is always living in shadow valleys, and deep valleys, that is always seeking self interest, whether it is in the name of god, in the name of love, in the name of social reform or seeking power, position, there is always the background of this element. Are we aware of all this? If I am not, what shall I do? Help me! Sorry - I forgot that word! I am not asking your help but let's talk it over.

We have sought help from everybody, from books, from priests, from psychologists, from politicians, from every angle, every corner, we have sought help. And that help has been useless because we are what we are now, we may have changed a little bit here and there but actually we are what we are. In spite of all the help, in spite of all the leaders, the gurus, the ancient prophecies, the ancient books - oh, for God's sake - right? So could we put out altogether from us the idea of seeking help? It doesn't mean you shouldn't be here and I shouldn't be here. You know when you see a beautiful thing, you look at it, take delight in the glory of a something beautiful, but you never say, "Well I will never come back here again." On the contrary. You come back to look at it often. Not that you are going to be helped by looking at the mountain - the beauty of it, the simplicity of an extraordinary sight.

If my brain is not aware of itself, which is an extraordinary problem, where you are aware of your own thoughts. That is, is thought aware of itself thinking? You understand? This is not intellectual. Do you understand my question? I wonder! Can your thought be aware of itself? Right? If it is not then what will you do, or not do, to become completely aware of every movement of thought? Pray? Ask? You can't do any of those things. So can one remain quiet and watch? We mean by watch, to observe without a single movement of the word, the picture, the symbol, which is in essence thought. Can you observe first? Observe without a single activity of the past? Go on Sirs, come with me. Can you observe? Can I observe my pain, physical pain? You understand my question? Can you observe your physical pain, be aware of it? Not say, well I must rush to the doctor, take a pill, take this, just be aware of it. Psychologically be aware of it without any movement. Can you? And in the same way observe the activity of the brain, not with lots of words and denials or assertions, just to observe. Have you ever observed your wife or your husband, or your girl friend, really observed, not with the images you have built about her, or him, then that's - those images are not observation, they are merely projection of the activities which you have gradually built up which becomes the image between you and her and him and so on. So one is not actually observing.

What is the relationship - can I go on? - between observation and love? Is love merely pleasure, merely a desire, a constructed thought? Is there division in that love, as I love you and nobody else? Or I love you but I am jealous of you - right? So is that love? We will go into that when we talk about all these things. But we are now asking when there is perception, and that perception can only take place when there is no motive - right? If I have a motive in that perception, in that observation, then that motive controls, shapes, moulds, the perception. So is there an observation without any motive? Motive generally is deeply hidden self interest.

So we come to another very complicated problem - issue rather, or any other word you like to use - how far, how deep, is the self interest? To what lengths can it be abandoned? Where do I put a stop to it? You understand? Or is it possible to live in this modern world without any self interest - you understand - the whole spectrum of it? How deeply can the brain be free, absolutely free of self interest? Or in what ratio to the activities of life, daily life? Or merely superficially be without self interest? You understand? The whole depth and the shallowness of self interest. It is a very complex problem this. And if self interest, which is the beginning of all corruption - right? Do we see that? It is the beginning of all corruption. It is the beginning of all divisive process, which is corruption. It is the beginning, or the origin of conflict - right? So how far, how deep, or how shallow, can conflict come to an end?

Not making it a problem, then we are lost again. Can conflict ever end between human beings? Though they are very close to each other, or very far from each other, can conflict, struggle, the pain of it, can it ever end? Go on Sirs, please. What do we mean by conflict? Conflict essentially is a distortion. Conflict in any form brings a distorted point of view. Conflict is essentially disorder. Right? Are we together, deliberating this, weighing it, considering it, with a view to act? The word means that. So can conflict end? So the brain is then free and can fly. The brain has immense capacity, immense. And we are restricting it, narrowing it down with self interest and conflict. So can conflict end?

Why is there in us this divisive element? You and I, we and they, we are this and you are that, what is the origin of it? Is it this contrariness of desire? Is it the opposing elements of thought? Is it the ideal and the fact? The 'should not be' and 'what is' - you understand? So is it conflict begins when there is this dualistic process in all of us? Please we are going together on the same path in this, we are together on the same boat. Are we aware of this central fact that in all of us there is this dualistic forces at work, the good and the bad - right? This is an important question. Is the good related to the bad? The speaker is putting a lot of eggs in one basket this morning, a lot of things together, which is part of our life. We have only four talks and two questions and answers, we must cram everything we can into these talks, these deliberations. Are we aware of this central fact? We are always - our morality is balanced between the good and the bad. So one has to ask is the good related to the bad? Is the noble related to the ignoble, and so on? When one is rather cowardly and the desire to be courageous, that courage is it really courage, or partly born out of cowardice? You understand my question? So we are asking together the bad, what is the bad? And what is the good? If the good is related to the bad then it is not good - right? We said - we are together in this? If - when, rather, not if, when that which is beautiful is related to that which is ugly, then the beauty is born out of ugliness - right? Then it is not beautiful. I don't know if you are following. So if the good is born out of that which is not, then that good is partial, it is not whole, so it is not good.

So morality is not the balance of these two. Right? I wonder if you see this? So can one be free of this duality, the dualistic process? This question, the good and the bad in conflict with each other, has been there for forty, fifty thousand years and more. You see those paintings in the ancient caves, both in France and in other parts of the world, the good is always fighting the bad, and the bad is fighting the good. You know all this. And the outcome of that fight, that struggle, is considered the highest morality. Right? The good can never be related to the bad. Love cannot be related to hate, to anger, to jealousy. If it is related then it is not love, it is part of pleasure, desire and so on.

So can we live on this earth, some of us for God's sake, can some of us, or all of us live without a single conflict? You can't answer this question, but let the seed of that question operate. You understand? If the seed is alive, not just the theory of it, then it has its own tremendous vitality, not your thinking about it, not saying, "Well I must understand what the devil he is talking about". But if the seed that the good is totally unrelated to the bad... let, if one may suggest, let that seed grow. You have planted a seed in the earth, the peach tree, or whatever it is, you have planted it, an oak. You don't pull it up every day to see if it is growing, you leave it in the earth and let that question, if it has vitality, energy, then that very question begins to grow, act. You don't have to do anything, the thing itself is moving. Can we do that together? You help to plant a seed and I dig the earth. It is a work together. It is not you plant and I cultivate but together. So the question has tremendous significance in itself, not the answer, not the result, but the question: is it possible to live in this world with all the complications, without a single shadow of conflict? You have planted it in your brain, let it remain there, let it see what happens. So we are asking: have you planted that seed? That means have you, has each one of us listened to the question? Not only with the hearing of the ear but the actual fact of it. The fact that we have lived on this earth for two or three million years, or forty five thousand years, not certainly four thousand years, which the fundamentalists like to think. We have lived on this earth for so long. And we are still living in conflict. And as this is a very serious question, not only with the brutal conflict of war but conflict between ourselves. I must understand what does he mean. He doesn't mean a thing. He means we are together. And is the seed, to live without any conflict, planted deep, in the deep valley of the brain, so that there is soil there, much richer soil than the soil of the earth. And from there it can grow, the answer, the decision, the execution of it.

I think that is enough for this morning, isn't it? May I get up?

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 25TH AUGUST 1985

Lord, there are so many people here, in this bad weather! May we continue where we left off yesterday? I am sorry you are standing out there, Sirs, in the cold. We must do something about this long marquee. A circus tent perhaps! [Laughter] I don't mean that as an insult. Sorry! [Laughter] I am glad we can laugh together.

As we were saying yesterday, this is not a one man's talk. It is not one dog barking, but rather we are deliberating together. That word has a great deal of significance: to weigh, to balance, to consider, take counsels together, in view to act, in view to bring about a decision and action. That word has depth and together this morning, and the following mornings, we are going to have a deliberation together. It is not one speaker, or one personality, but rather that we are altogether looking, observing, seeing things as they are, taking counsel together, thinking over deliberately, actually, not theoretically or having innumerable beliefs, but rather going into all these matters together. The matter is our life, our daily, it may be boring or exciting, emotional or sentimental, romantic, caught up in great deal of imagination, fantasy, or clinging to one or two beliefs. If one does any of these things then deliberation cannot be possible. Because we are going along the same road, the same boat, same path, same sense of together coming so that we can build together. If that is very clear we can go into many things which we have to do this morning, the two Tuesday and Thursday, Saturday and Sunday, there are a lot of things to talk over together.

There is no authority here in these talks, in these dialogues between us. The speaker has unfortunately to sit on a platform and that doesn't give him any authority. It is not a personality cult. It is not something that you will think over together and act later, but together now sitting in this marquee we are going together to explore and in that exploration acting.

We were talking about conflict yesterday. All the terrible things we are involved in, murder, terrorists, and all the wars that are going on between ideological structures and the ideological beliefs, both religious, political, but nobody seems to take into consideration the whole problem of the world. Each country, each spot, and special boundaries of their own country are in battle with other countries, economically, the threat of war and all the terrible things that are taking place in the world. And this morning we ought to consider all these matters.

First of all did we see the marvellous clouds this morning? The extraordinary light and the beauty of them. The sense of glory. The extraordinary blue sky. And we ought to consult together what is love and what is beauty? What is time and thought? And if we have time this morning we will talk about fear.

So we are going to go into the question of what is beauty, love, time and thought and fear. Fear of falling ill, fear of not being really well. We will go into that later. But first we ought to consider together what is the nature of beauty? We are going to talk it over together. Please don't wait for the speaker to explain. This is a question put before each one of us, as all the other questions which we are going to put together. What is beauty? And what is the relationship of that to thought and time and love? A beautiful cloud, a lovely sunset, the early morning when there is only one star in the sky and those trees that are full of all that you can see in that tree, the sound, the whisper, the movement of the leaves and the enormous strength of a trunk. And you see the earth, not from the air, you are too high, but the earth, the enormous sense of power, great valleys, mountains, the blue sky and the outlines, or the lines of the great mountains with their snow caps. When you look at all that, and you look at your wife and your husband, those lovely children that are hopping about on this place, what does beauty mean to each one of us? Does beauty depend on our own particular point of view? To our own sensitivity? Or beauty is the pictures in the museums locked up? Or a poem, specially by Keats, Odes? And you see a sentence in a literary book, so-called popular book, and that one sentence is enough to open all the doors. So for each one of us, what does beauty mean? Is it the face, the body, the sense of tenderness towards another, the sense of generosity, the giving, the great pleasure in seeing some of those marvellous paintings? So are you waiting for the speaker to tell you what is beauty? Or is beauty - is there when the self is not? You understand? When I am not worried about my own problems, my own misery, depression and worry and all the travail of life which is centred in me, which is the me, and that me is not, even for a split second, when the brain is quiet without any sense of limitation, is there then beauty? Or only then is beauty? Are we talking over, having a deliberation together? Or are we agreeing with the speaker? "Yes, that sounds very good. That explanation is what I want. And according to that explanation and description catching a glimpse of something, I will have that memory of that."

Then one asks: is memory and the continuation of memory, the whole movement of memory, does that help in the apprehension of that which is beautiful? Or remembrance has nothing whatever to do with it? We are in accord? Sir don't... Is there beauty in our life? The sense of generosity, the sense of, not forgiveness, there is nothing to forgive, the sense of highly sensitivity? So we are saying belief, comparison, the worry and the problems have nothing to do with beauty. It is that sense of quality, absence of the self, the me, the persona, all my background which is the me, when that is not then there is the other. This may sound impossible, but is it? Are we talking about something extreme? Or it is the common lot of all of us? That we all go through great periods of suffering, agony, despair, depression, every kind of emotional upheaval and there are rare moments in our life when all that has slipped away from us, and we see something that is beyond all description. It does happen to all of us. And that becomes a memory. Then we pursue that memory. We want something more, continuous of that which we have a glimpse of. Then that memory becomes a block, then that memory destroys everything else. Relax, and just take it quietly.

If that is somewhat clear because we are deliberating, taking counsel together, then we ought to talk about a very complex problem of time. Time as hope, time as the whole events and the happenings of our life, as the past. Time as the movement of memory, time according to the longevity of one's life, time as living on this earth and dying. Time by the clock, the sharp second in a quartz watch, the sharpness of that second. Time as psychological becoming, "I am this but I will be that. I am unhappy, one day I will be happy. I will understand one day. I don't know but I will know. There will be peace on earth some time later but not now." So time is a very important factor in our life. Time as memory, time as evolving to something else, surrounded in heaven by angels. May I tell a joke here?

Two people are in heaven with their wings and halo. One man says to the other, "Why do I feel so awful when I am dead?" Understood?

So: time is a factor in our life. It is an important part of our life. And we think in terms of time. Time as what we have been, what we will be, what is and what we will be - right? I have been that, I am this now, but I will be something else in the future. This movement is the movement of memory, knowledge, experience and so on - right? This constant movement between the past, the present and the future. This is very important in our life. Time creates lots and lots of problems. I am looking for - one is looking forward to something, to a holiday in Spain, or the lovely Sicily, and so on. This movement, has it a stop? We are talking, taking counsel together. Has this everlasting movement which seems to last from the beginning of one's life until one dies, has this movement ever a stop? Please we are putting this question for you. Let the question answer the answer, not what you will answer. Do you understand that? The question is very important. The question is: does time, this movement, this cycle in which all of us are caught endlessly, for two and a half million years and more, as we have lived on this earth, can this movement, can it ever end? Or is a human being eternally caught in it? Not scientific fiction, or some theory about time, or some fantastic otherness, but we are asking a very simple and direct question to each other. The question is important because only then something totally new can take place.

So we are asking: can time ever stop? Time as old age, and in old age one becomes slightly gaga. Senility takes place. That is rather an interesting subject that. Who is senile? The young, only the young up to forty, thirty and the rest are all senile? Or the old people only are senile? What does senility mean to all of us? The more they ask this question of ourselves. What is senility? You go to a church, specially when the cardinals are performing, it is a marvellous sight, a beautiful sight, so carefully worked out, so precise, so dignified, marvellous robes and colour. If you have been to one of those cathedrals in Rome where the cardinal is performing there is this repetition. Is repetition the indication of senility? Does it only lie with the old? The same habit, the same way of thinking, the perpetual going to the office and work, and work, and work, in the mines, in the seas and the submarines and aeroplanes. And the same relationship between each other, the repetition, sexually, or getting accustomed to each other, so that there is no sense of feeling that you are entirely alone on this earth. Our brain is caught in repetition. Repetition has its own security, its own safety, protection, but when psychologically you keep on remembering, remembering and acting in the same old pattern and method, and practice, naturally that is a form of senility - no? Don't please agree. It is not a matter of agreement or disagreement. One wishes we could put those two words away from us - agreeing and disagreeing. But seeing what is actually taking place in us. And to observe the habits we have formed over long years, the conclusions that we have, politically, religiously and so on. The conclusions, the end, this is what I have understood, I stick by it and so on. Is that not a form of senility? And is it only the senile movement takes place only with the old?

So we are talking about time. The past going through the present, modifying and continuing. The past is rooted, taken deep roots and gets through the present through challenges, circumstances, pressures and so on, but it is still the past. And the future is the past, modified. So the future is now. Are we together? Yes? Isn't it? If the past, which we are, two and a half million years or more, or less, there is the enormous space between that long past and the present. The present is what we have been and what we are. That is a fact. And that past gets moulded, shaped, pressurized, goes through every kind of travail, anxiety and so on, but that past continues in a different shape, in a different form, in a different variety of ways and that becomes the future. So the future is now. Right? Are we together in this, or do we need further explanation?

So is there - is the whole movement, the past, the present and the future is contained in the now? Because that is what we are. And that is the whole movement of time - right? And we are asking will that movement ever stop? Otherwise we are bound to this everlasting time-binding quality of this movement, the past, the present and the future. And we escape from that question by talking about heaven, hell, the future, away from all this. So in the now, now as you are sitting in the now, all time is contained. The past, modifying itself in the present and the future. In this cycle, which is the now, can that movement stop for a minute, for a second?

Then one asks: what is timelessness, in which time doesn't exist at all? The scientists can give different definitions to time: it is a series of movements from second to second to second, but that is just a theory, just an acceptance of something which is, or may be in our life. But that isn't good enough. If we set aside all theories, all beliefs, the fact is that in our lives, not the time of the sunrise and the sunset, and the new moon and the full moon. The heavens have their own order, their own sense of timelessness. But all that has nothing to do with our actual daily, boring, lonely, despairing life, and joyous occasionally. So is there an end to time?

And then we can ask, only then, what is timelessness? We can talk about it, we can discuss but those discussions, words, theories have no meaning at all. And what is the relationship of time to thought? The speaker is not asking all these questions. You are asking all these questions. What is the relationship, the actual relationship between thought and time, and the relationship of time, thought, to fear? And their relationship to love? This is what we are concerned with - right?

So what is thought, which is so important, which is so deeply in the deepest valleys of our brain? What is thought in our life? Thought, thinking. Please ask this question of yourself. All this has nothing to do with religions, with all that circus that goes on, with the gurus, with spiritual authorities - think of those two words together, spiritual authority! It seems such an abomination, an anathema, to put those two together.

So all our life and action is based on thought. And you say emotions are not thought. Is that so? We are so gullible, aren't we? We accept everything so easily. Somebody like the speaker says something and you say yes, or no, there is not our own thinking, clear, objective, non-personal observation of everything. We are full of knowledge of other people, we don't know our own deep twisting valleys of the mountains of our life. So what is thinking? Are we again waiting for the speaker to explain everything? And then you agree or disagree? All that is only partial, not complete. I will wait for someone else to complete it. You understand? Look at our brains, how it works. We go window shopping spiritually. Collect a bit here in this marquee, then go to another marquee - it sounds funny doesn't it? [Laughter] [Tape turns over] We are always collecting like a magpie, or those pack rats, and we don't know anything about our own capacity, not skills. A capacity that is not based on experience, it has nothing to do with knowledge. We will talk about all that, if there is time.

So what is thinking? You are sitting there and the speaker is on this unfortunate platform and we are both thinking. What does that thinking mean? He says something and the question is put to you and the brain begins to become active, it is being challenged, it is being driven, pushed, pressurized and then it wakes up and says, yes, or no. And so we go on. We never dig into ourselves, which means we depend on so many things, so many books, so many professors, so many gurus, or leaders. So here we are without a leader, without help, without any kind of circumstantial, pragmatic sustenance, you have to find out what is thinking, what is the origin of all thought, not a particular thought which obviously has a cause. And what has cause can always be overcome. If I have a cause for pain one can deal, one can go to a doctor, or anti-doctors, whatever you like, the quacks and the latest anti-medicine and so on. One can get over it because you discover the cause. So what is the cause of thinking? If you understand, one understands the cause then you can put it aside. You understand? If we don't find the cause but merely accept an explanation which is not the actual cause, then we go on skipping along, picking up here and there. So we are together going to find out for ourselves, not the speaker tells you and then you play with it, but for oneself one finds out. The speaker may explain, go into it, as he has done on several occasions. He has been doing this for eighty years. So it is not a game with him, it is not a habit, or senility. [Noise of rain] Ah, it is raining! Or hail. Please come in, come inside Sirs. There it has gone. I don't know if you noticed this morning, early, there wasn't a single cloud in the sky. But we are in Britain! So close to the Atlantic.

If one can discover the cause, the raison d'etre, the root of it, then either it is possible to unroot it and let it die, wither away, or you have not, one has not discovered for oneself. [Noise of rain] Rains are blessed things in certain parts of the world, they pray, they long for rain. Right? Here it is perpetual! So the cause of anything, the cause of a headache, the cause of a cancer, they haven't discovered it yet but they will probably, the cause of senility, the cause of fear, not a particular form of fear but the root of fear. If one can discover the cause, the effect has no meaning, then the cause will die. That is what we are going to find out together: what is the cause of thought, thought being associated with remembrance, with memories, the images that thought has built together, put together. What is the cause of all this? It appears to the speaker - please don't accept it, this is a deliberation. It took three days to elect a pope and we don't have to take three days.

What is the cause of this? Is it experience? Is it the experience that gives knowledge? And the knowledge is stored up in the brain as memory and that memory reacts as thinking? Is all thinking based on that, is it so simple as that? If thinking is based on familiarity, thinking based on memories, of course if we had no memories you wouldn't think - right? Let's be very, very simple. Because the very simplicity is the - it is very subtle, the more simple you are the greater the subtlety - not in clothes, I don't mean that, putting on some kind of silly robe, or having a garland round your neck and all that. That is not simplicity. To have a very clear, sensitive, observing brain, watchful, not frightened. We will go into fear presently. Forgive me!

So is thinking based on experience, knowledge, memory, thought? So thinking is always based on knowledge. The more knowledge you have the more you think. Science is adding every day more and more and more - right? It began with a simple club, then it became the archery, then it became the gun, then the ultimate is the atom bomb. All that is based on accumulated knowledge - right? Step by step, or a sudden jump but still within the field of knowledge. So thinking is essentially, however simple it may sound, based on experience, knowledge. We are asking can that thinking stop? Otherwise we are caught in this? That means can there be a state without a single memory? A single thought?

And the relationship of time to thought and the relationship between man and woman, the relationship of husband, wife, children, girl friend and so on, the relationship, the closeness, the feeling for each other, is that based on thought? Please we are asking this question. The question itself is important, not the answer. So relationship, thought and time. Right? I am married to you, for various reasons, sexual attraction, dependence, companionship and all the rest of it. And as we live for a day with each other, or ten of fifteen, or hundred years, we get used to each other. We have built up the memories, the images about each other. This is obvious, isn't it? And that memory, those images, are the realities, not the woman, or the man, or the children, or... the reality is the image that I have built about her, and she has built an image about me. These images are the realities, functional realities, but not actual relationship. So thought is the basis of our life, business, working the mines, or in a laboratory and so on and so on. All the things that the priests have put together, the rituals, the beliefs, the wafers and all the things that are in the temples and mosques, all put together by thought. And thought therefore being based on knowledge, is everlastingly limited, partial. There is no complete thought, it is impossible. Right?

So if one - if there is not recognition of the fact that thought is completely limited - your worship, your prayer, your belonging to this guru or that guru, for God's sake, all this is so terribly trivial. Don't get angry please with me. So if thought is limited and obviously it is, you may think of the unlimited but it is still limited. You may think of the eternal and all that, it is still put together by thought. And we are saying: can that thought, time, come to an end? Probably you have never asked this question and you are faced with that question, and you can't answer it because you haven't delved into yourselves deeply, examine, looking, observing which is different from analysis, just observing the deep valleys of one's own life and brain.

From that we should go and enquire into what is fear. Is fear related to time and thought? What is fear? Fear of being ill. We have all been ill haven't we at one time or another. The earth is crowded with doctors and pills. We have all been ill. What is the value or significance of illness, of which you are so frightened? Please. What is the significance of being ill? Has it any meaning at all? Or when fear interferes with illness do you learn anything at all? Or can one look at that illness quite objectively, not immediately identify oneself with that pain, that illness? And then battle with it, wanting to be healthy and so on. So fear of being ill, if one allows illness not to the extreme point of illness, then it has a great significance, it indicates a great deal, it opens the door to many things. But when there is fear all the doors are shut tight. And we are now enquiring also what is fear? Fear of losing pleasure, fear of tomorrow, fear of darkness, fear of one's husband or wife, fear of your gurus, of course, otherwise you wouldn't follow them, fear of not having his peculiar enlightenment. Think of a guru having enlightenment! Fear of so many things, neighbour, war, the terrorists, and all the things that the priest have put together for two thousand years in Christianity, and all the things that ancient India has put together, three to five thousand years. There are all kinds of extraordinary traditions in India, I won't go into it now. They are really quite extraordinary, some of them.

So there is the fear of heaven and hell, fear of the most trivial things of our life. So we are going together to look at the cause of fear. As we said, if one can discover for oneself the cause, then you can deal with the cause. Then you can end the cause, if you observe very carefully, the cause, then that very cause comes to an end. You don't have to do anything about it, just to observe the cause as you observe something external, like as you heard the rain on the canvas a few minutes ago, you hear it and if you hear it quietly it tells you something, it has its own music.

So what is the cause of fear? Fear of illness, fear of death, fear of a hundred little things. Fear inhibits freedom. As long as there is any particle of fear about anything there is no freedom. It is not to be sought in some other place, though the pastures may be greener across the field, but the multiplication of this fear is growing more and more and more on us and sitting down here seriously and considering together, taking together what is the causation of fear, then we can go into it if you are serious, concerned, with the ending of fear. First we must deal with the psychological fears, not the external fears, that comes later. If the psychological fears are ended completely then you will deal with physical fears entirely differently, not the other way round. It is so obvious, isn't it? That we want to be fearless outwardly, therefore we divide the countries, beliefs, dogmas and all that childish business. But if we begin to see the root of fear psychologically, inwardly, not as separate person with my fears, but fear as a whole because every human being on this earth goes through fear. Even the gurus, even the priests, even the highest authority in Christendom, they have all fears. All over the world every human being has fear of death, of lacking love and oh, dozens and dozens of fears. And because we have fears we are not ever free, so it behoves us to examine very closely, not analytically because then you separate the analyser and the analysed, then conflict begins. Right? Where there is division there must be conflict. That's a natural, eternal law. Look what is happening with the miners and those who own the mines; the separate countries, like England, France, Germany, Russia, fighting, fighting, fighting; the Arab and the Jew - you know Sirs, this is so obvious. So not to belong to any country. Of course you have to have a passport. The speaker has an Indian passport but he is not an Indian. They have given him a diplomatic passport - but he has put that diplomatic where it belongs.

So fear is common to all of us, like pain, like anxiety, like sorrow, uncertainty, the demand for power, position, prestige, every human being has this seed of fear. We are not talking about a particular fear but when one grasps the whole content of fear, the root of it then you can deal with the particular, that becomes utterly unnecessary. So what is the root of fear? Please don't wait for the speaker to explain. The root of it because it is in us, not in heaven, or in the priests, or in the things put together by thought of man. Is it time? Is it thought? Is it some unknown factor? If it is an unknown factor that man is cursed with this fact which has existed for man for two million years or more or less, and that long evolution has not solved this problem, he has escaped from it, worshipping gods, following somebody, all that business. So can we, this morning, sitting under this marquee, deliberating together, find out the cause and end it? End it now, not the day after tomorrow. If you end it now you are an amazingly free man, or woman, or whatever it is. You are then really free. And that freedom alone can open the door to truth.

So we are asking what is the root of it? Is it thought? Is it time? Don't please accept a thing that the speaker says, and don't follow his words, or his gestures, or his clothes, go into it. It is necessary to have passion to have that tremendous energy to discover anything, not just acceptance and all that, and handing over yourself to somebody. It is nothing to do with all that immature stuff. Because it is a very serious question. So is thought and time responsible? Or is time thought, which is one, not separate, is that the root of it? It is the root of it, isn't it? I am not - if one is afraid of death, that fear of ending, which we will go into another time, if that ending takes place then one is frightened with the known. So is thinking, thinking, the root, which is time, is that the root of it? Of course. It is obvious if one points it out. If we need not think and there was not time, there is no death, no fear.

So the question arises: can thought/time stop? Only then there is the end to fear. But one has to see it for oneself not take it from another. We are not beggars. Nobody is giving or taking. Nobody is stretching his hand out to you to move. You have to have this energy and that energy has its own capacity. So the speaker is saying, with which you don't have to accept or reject, just observe him saying that fear can end psychologically completely, wholly, when there is no thinking and time. That question itself, to find out the cause of fear, and finding it out for oneself hold that cause, stay with it, then the very staying has its own energy. But if you run away then it is like playing a game with yourself. So is it possible to end this fear now, psychologically, so completely so that you are a free man?

And we will talk about other things, like pleasure, sorrow, death and meditation and religion and so on. But if fear doesn't come to an end completely the other things are meaningless. You may sit in meditation, put on special robes, follow some person, all that has no meaning. What has meaning is the ending of fear. And when you discover the cause, like thought and time, remain with it, hold it, stay with it, don't let it escape from your hands. Then the very observation of that is the ending of that psychological fear in which there is no attachment to anything.

I am sorry to have talked so long. May we get up?

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 27TH AUGUST 1985

A lot of questions have been put. We can't possibly answer all of them. These questions have been chosen, not by the speaker, by others. I haven't seen them, and you haven't seen them either. Probably some of you wrote these questions.

If I may most respectfully ask you, I am putting a question to you, why are you here? This is a serious question as you have put to the speaker several other questions. Why each one of us is here in this not too nice a weather, windy, and one hopes that you are comfortably seated, but why? Not that you are not seated comfortably but why are we all here? Is it out of curiosity, nothing better to do? I am asking these questions most respectfully, not in any sense of impudence. Are we here to be stimulated, to be challenged, to have more energy, or release energy, or merely intellectual flirtation - that is a good word! Or romantically, sentimentally, or some kind of help, wanting to be helped by another? If one put all these questions to oneself what would be our answer? You might just as well ask the speaker why he is talking. Is it a habit? Is it he feels happy facing an audience, fulfilling and that he needs an audience? All these questions must not only be put to oneself but also to the speaker. And if we explore into that why we are doing what we are doing, with all this trouble, travail and the anxiety and fear of all life. And if one doesn't find an answer why the speaker is going on the various continents talking for the last sixty, seventy years, is it a habit to him? He has tested it out, kept quiet for a year and more. And also at one time he talked behind a curtain [Laughter] to the audience and he felt rather silly [Laughter] and so he went before the audience. He has tested this out very carefully, whether he depends on another to fulfil, to be, to become, to feel famous, all that nonsense. Why in his return he is asking you, if he may respectfully, why we are all here. Is it old age because we have nothing else better to do? Is it that we really deeply want to understand ourselves. He is only acting as a mirror in which each one of us can see ourselves as we are, not be depressed or elated to discover what we are. Is that mirror clear, sharp, every feature of it is so - without any distortion. And if that mirror is clear and you see oneself exactly as one is then the mirror is not important. You can break the mirror without feeling any lack of luck! And if you can answer that question it is rather serious, why we behave as we do, as each one of us does, why we think in a certain pattern, why we follow somebody, the crazier the better, why we store up all the things that one has said, that others have said, why there is nothing in ourselves that is ourselves. And to discover what we are, ourselves, that deep rooted seed, not only the cultural seed, the traditional, the religious, all the outgrowth of all that but go very, very, very deeply in oneself to find out the origin of all things. Not the cells and all that, not the genes that one has inherited but much beyond all that.

Shall we go into that a little bit? What is the origin, not the biological and evolutionary process, the origin of all things? This demands, or asks, what is creation? What is creation? Who created all this, the marvellous universe, everything living in it and out of it? What is the origin of all that? Do you want to go into all that?

Audience: Yes.

K: Sure? Why? [Laughter] For an amusement? In a form of entertainment, something new? I am afraid it is not anything like that.

Our brains have extraordinary capacity, extraordinary, not ordinary, but beyond all ordinary things. When one observes all the technological world, what they have done and what they are doing, and what they are going to do, tremendous advancement. The brain has this capacity. The computer is going to take over more and more all our activities, more or less, except sex and probably it can't look of the stars of an evening. But it is going to take over all our activities, may bring about a new industry, new way of living, without electricity, it may depend on light. They are having great competition, America and Japan, tremendous competition. And we will all be slaves to that god - the computer. So we are saying the brain has an extraordinary capacity but that brain has been restricted, narrowed down by our education, by our self-interest. I know you will hear all this but you will do nothing about it. That's all right too. And that very brain which has evolved for centuries, millions of years, that brain has become what it is now, old, tired, with a lot of troubles, conflicts and misery. That brain, which is the centre of all our existence, all our being, which is the future and the past, we went into it the other day, and this brain wants to find out what is beyond all this, what is the origin, the source, the beginning. Can it ever find out? You understand my question? Can it ever find out what is the source, the life, the beginning of all creation, of all things, not only ourselves but the tiger, the marvellous trees. Have you ever been very close to a wild tiger? No. We have been very close, almost touching it, wild. And who brought all this about - the exhaustible - inexhaustible nature and the rivers, the mountains, the trees, the lawns, the groves, the orchards and us? How will you find out? Please ask this question of ourselves. How will you, ordinary human beings like us, find out something which science, biology and bio - something or other, and the people who are digging into the earth finding new cities, how will you find out? By following somebody? By making some gurus inexhaustibly rich? How will you go into this? That is my question to you. Who will answer it? Are you waiting for the speaker to answer it? Or invent a new god who says he created it? That invention, that imagination is still part of the brain.

So how will you find out? May I leave you with that question? What will you give to it, give in the sense, your energy, your capacity, your enthusiasm, your passion, your whole time to find out? Or will you treat it like something, "Oh, I am too busy today, I will think about it tomorrow", or it is a question to put to the old not to the young generation, we are too young to think about all that. How much energy will you give to it? Not seeking energy or releasing energy, that is all too childish.

May I go on with these questions?

1st QUESTION: At various times we have had mystical and spiritual experiences. How can we know if they are illusions unless we know reality?

At various times we have had mystical and spiritual experiences. How can we know if they are illusions unless we know reality?

How do you answer such a question? If it was put to you, how do you approach it, what is your reaction to it? How do you come so close to it that the question itself unfolds? You understand? The question itself begins to evolve. If you are merely seeking an answer it is already determined - right? Are we seeing this together? To find an answer if fairly easy, but to delve into the question, to see all the complications of that question, it is like having the map of the world in front of you, seeing all the countries, the capitals, the buildings, the hamlets, the rivers, the ocean, the hills, the mountains, the whole of it. How do you look at this question? Not the answer. Perhaps the response to the question may lie in the question.

So at various times we have had mystical and spiritual experiences. What is an experience? I am just asking each other. What is an experience? And who experiences? Right? I may have had, or are having some kind of mystical experience. Before I use the word mystical or experience, what do I mean by experience? And does experience involve recognition? Right? Does it involve a sense of something happening to me from heaven or from some place, or something or other which I call mystical, which is not the daily experience but something totally outside, which happens to me? And I call that mystical or spiritual. I like, if one may, stick to those two words - spiritual and experience.

Is there an experience without an experiencer? You understand my question? Are we together exploring into the question or are you waiting for the speaker to explore it? So we are walking together, step in step, slowly or fast but we are together step by step - right? We agree to that? If we do - not agree - we are friends talking over these problems. I have had a spiritual experience, suppose, and what do I mean by those two words? Experience, something new, something that I have already had renewed, or something that is happening to the experiencer - you understand? And if the experiencer is experiencing and that experiencing is a form of recognition, that is the remembrance, identification and so on to that which I call experience, then there must be in that feeling that I have already known it, otherwise I couldn't recognise it. That is fairly simple, isn't it? I don't want to labour the point. It is fairly clear. As long as there an experiencer experiencing then it is something that is happening to the experiencer, something separate, something which is not ordinary, which is not a daily boring, habitual experience that one has - right? Are we playing the game together? So as long as the experiencer is there, every kind of experience, call it mundane, or spiritual, or holy, or sacred, or releasing energy, and all that stuff that goes on, mostly nonsense, then what is important in this process - experiencer, experiencing? What is most important is the experiencer - right? He is gathering. So when there is an experiencer it gets more and more subliminally egotistic, more and more "I know a great deal which you don't know. I have had marvellous spiritual experience. I am illumined. Poor chap you are not, come with me. Give me all your money then you will be quite safe." [Laughter] They are playing this game, I assure you. "Surrender yourself. Put on the beads which I give you." - and all that rather silly game that is going on in the world.

And what is spiritual? Religious? Something holy? Something unexpected? Something totally out of the ordinary? Why do we want something totally outside the daily life? Go on, please answer this question. Which means something totally different from our daily life. Then we are bored with our daily life, the habits, the loneliness, the despair, the attachments, you know, power and all the rest of it. We want to avoid all that and invite heaven, which is called spiritual. We can deceive ourselves so enormously - right? We have the capacity to deceive ourselves incredibly - right? What has - Christianity is based on belief and faith. Sorry, I am not trying to hurt anybody, just pointing out. Two thousand years. And you go across the ocean to India and there, three thousand years, five thousand years old. The same process of selling god. Why do we have to believe all this? Because we are frightened? We want to know the unknown and so on. We don't have to go into all that.

So what is illusion? And what is reality? You follow? Are we following this question? The questioner says: how can we know if they are illusions unless we know reality? Then we have to examine what is reality? What is reality? The real, the actual, is you are sitting there, the speaker is up here, unfortunately. And reality is nature, that tree, that animal, that dog, the marvellous earth, the blue sky about us. Reality. Right? Reality, I have feeling for my wife, husband, sister and so on, and so on, the whole movement of recognition. And the actual. Right? We are together in this? The actual, you and the speaker are sitting now, twelve o'clock. That is actual. There is wind. I hope it won't rain. And the actual is the nature, the birds, the rivers, the water and so on. And the questioner says: I can't know what is an illusion unless I know reality - right? What is reality in ourselves? Is there anything real in us? Actual? Or is it all a movement, change? The other day in Switzerland when we closed Saanen Gathering altogether, no more, some people came up and said to us, to the speaker, "We are so sad we have closed it." And the speaker said, "When you are sad it is about time we closed it." [Laughter] You understand? We closed it. So nobody wants a change. Few people want fundamental change.

And the questioner says, "If I knew reality then I know what is illusion." So we should look at illusion, the word. What is illusion? The word itself, in a dictionary, means something you play with - ludere. Something you invent, enjoy yourself, I am god, I am whatever it is, I am Napoleon, or I am such a great man. You play with something that is not actual. One has pain, a despair, a sense of tremendous, unaccountable loneliness. That is actual, precise. And we create an illusion that somebody is going to help us, somebody is going to fulfil our lives, make us feel not lonely. That is all illusions. The actual fact is one is desperately lonely.

So it is fairly simple to see for oneself, if one wants to, what is an illusion, what is reality and why this craze for experience. We have had sexual experience, thousands and thousands of experiences. Everything going from here across the field, you see the birds, the house-martins and so on, that is an experience, but you don't call that spiritual. I see you sitting there, it is a challenge, it is moving. So what is important in all this is why the experiencer invents all this. You understand my question? Why the experiencer has become so important. Is there a period where the experiencer is not? That is the real question, not what is reality, what is illusion, what is experience and all the rest of it, but is there a period, a length of time, a space, where the experiencer, the observer and so on is not? Then you don't want experiences. You understand? There is nothing. You see that is a word. The word nothing - sorry

I am not a dictionary - means not a thing. Not a thing of thought - you understand? Not - nothing means there is the end of time and thought. That is where there is no experiencer at all. That is the real thing, not all this.

May we go on to the next question?

2nd QUESTION: Is illness due to simply to degeneration or abuse of the body, or does it have some other significant?

Sorry, I am reading it badly. Is illness due simply to degeneration, or abuse of the body, or does it have any other significance? You understand?

The questioner is asking: has illness any significance at all? Right? You tell me! We have all been ill at some time or other in our life. Paralysed, accidents which break our body, every kind of illness we have known. Society, modern society is producing more disease than ever - right? You read the papers and so on. Has it any benefit? Does it make us understand deeply why we become ill, what is health, and why we cling to health and not to illness - you understand my questions? Am I talking to myself? Am I? Really I am surprised you are listening. Or you are sharing with it? You are sharing what we are talking about together? We are at the same table eating the same food. You may eat loudly and another may eat gently, but we are sharing the same food, at the same table, at the same time. So the speaker is not talking to himself.

We have all been ill. And we don't put up with it a little bit. Immediately doctor, pills, the whole circus begins. We never stay with it a little, see what is implied, how you meet pain. You understand what I am saying? How do you meet pain? I know how you meet pleasure, that is fairly simple. But pain, not only physical pain but the psychological pain, [Tape turns over] the getting wounded psychologically, hurt, how do you meet it? Psychological hurt is a form of illness - right? I wonder. If I get hurt because you are rude to me, or you say, "You are a silly ass", I get hurt. That is a form of illness. But physically if I get hurt there is a doctor, there is somebody to do something about it. I want to avoid the psychological pain and also I want to avoid, run away from the physical pain, unless of course you have terminal cancer and all the cancerous agony. I hope none of you have it. So we never stay with something and see what it is like. Or put up with it. You understand my question? Are we together, sharing the same food?

Far more important in all this is psychological pain - right? The pain of being wounded, hurt, the feeling of deep agony inside. That's a great illness, to which we don't pay not too much attention. If we paid great attention to that, to the inward pain, in different forms, and nobody can heal it. There is no pill, no guru, no book, no gods, no ritual, nothing will stop that pain. And if you don't run away from it, and if you really deeply stay with it, it has immense significance - right? It has - then you penetrate into something that goes beyond all self, self-interest. The outward then, the outward pain can be dealt with - go to a doctor, put up with it, that becomes secondary. When the speaker was ill some doctors gave to the speaker heavy doses of antibiotics. And after a while he has paralysed for a month, completely paralysed. You understand? Everybody have to carry the body, put it in a bath and all the rest of it, comb his hair, shave and all that, for a month. Don't sympathize please. I am not asking anything from you, I mean it. Neither your money, except to have this marquee and other things, he doesn't want a thing from you, neither your praise nor your criticism, nothing to do with your pocket. So this is not an invitation for sympathy, or, "How could you put up with it?", and all that stuff. I am just saying there it was for a whole month. "That is the end," I said to the person who was with me. All right. But slowly the antibiotic effect went away and he was all right, and he is still living. So if one stays with something, with pain, not too long of course, if it is really very, very painful then you are unconscious and all the rest of it.

So it has, if you will go into it for yourself, it has some significance, and that significance depends on each one. How you face life, how you look upon it, in what manner you receive it, in what way you react to it, how you respond to all the things that you are faced with in daily life, not on Sunday mornings. So if one observes as you observe a lovely tree, or a pigeon on the flight, observe yourself closely, it is an extraordinary thing what it reveals.

3rd QUESTION: What is my responsibility toward the present world crisis?

What is my responsibility toward the present world crisis? Of whom are you asking this question? What is my responsibility, your responsibility? Why do we use the word responsibility? To be responsible. To be responsible to keep your body clean - if you have hot water, or not too cold a water. You are responsible for your children. The professors, the teachers, the educators are responsible for educating the children. Why do we use that word responsible? You understand my question? If you eliminated that word, what is your responsibility in a world crisis, my responsibility and your responsibility, if you cut out that word responsibility because that word implies you and responsibility - you understand? If you cut out that word then would you put that question? It is my duty to kill for my country. It is my duty as being a Russian, or an American, or a British citizen, to fight for my country and god and all the rest of it. If we could put away that word altogether from our brain, then how do you deal with it? Duty, responsibility, I must, all those words. If you put away those words, what happens? It is a very interesting question - right? What takes place when this duality, which is implied in responsibility - right? Are we together a little bit? The word responsibility implies I am responsible for you, for my children, for my wife, for my boss, for my job, etcetera, etcetera. I am responsible to represent God to you. And if I totally forget that word, not forget, put away that word entirely. [Drops the paper with the questions on.] Sorry! [Laughter] As that paper went down similarly banish that word from our whole being. Then what takes place? Go on Sirs. Have you put away that word? No. We never - you see you hear something but you don't act about it. I am not responsible for Brockwood. I don't feel - the speaker doesn't feel that way. I am not responsible to tell you anything. But if that word is not, which means there is no I and responsibility to you, there is only you and I - right? Then what takes place? Come on Sirs.

Has love a responsibility? Go on Sirs, please shout, something about it.

Audience: It is unity.

K: If love has no responsibility then what takes place? If love is not attachment which is implied in responsibility, then what takes place?

[Responses from audience, inaudible]

K: Don't use - please don't say something, if I may most respectfully point out, don't say anything that you have not lived, worked, to find out. If I love you, if the speaker loves you and the word is not, the word responsibility, duty, attachment and so on, then what is our relationship? Go on think it out. You are not waiting for my reply. I - the speaker is not going to reply to that question. It is really a very, very serious question.

So all this implies do we love anything? Love, having something which is not dualistic, "I love you". I have answered the question. I have not answered, the question has evolved.

4th QUESTION: Does asking for guidance necessarily prevent understanding? Cannot seeking help be a means of discovery of ourselves? If not what is the sense of listening to you, K?

Does asking for guidance necessarily prevent understanding? Cannot seeking help be a means of discovery of oneself? If not, what is the sense of listening to you, K? There is no sense.

[Laughter] You are not listening to K. If you are actually truthful, you are not listening to K. You are listening to see whether you agree or disagree. You are listening, in the process of listening you are translating what he says to your convenience, to your conditioning. You are listening not to K but to yourself. K is not talking about something extraordinary. There is something extraordinary far beyond all this but he is not talking about that now. You are listening to yourself - right? As we said earlier you are seeing yourself in the mirror. And you can distort the mirror. Or say, "I don't like the mirror, I don't like what I see" and break the mirror but you are still what you are. So you are listening not to K. You are not trying to understand what K is saying. You are actually listening to yourself. If you are listening to yourself for the first time that is the greatest thing that can happen. But if you are listening to K, X, Y, Z - no sorry not X, Y, Z - if you are listening to K then they are just a lot of words, a lot of reactions and so on. That is so utterly, if one may respectfully point out, utterly meaningless, unnecessary. You have listened to so many things, listened to the preachers, to the books, to poems, you have listened to the voice of your wife and husband and the girl and so on, or you are casually listening. But if you give all your attention to listening, hearing, not only with the ear but hearing much more, much deeper, then you will listen to everything. And you will listen to what K has to say, either you live with it, it is real, true, actual, or it is something verbal, intellectual and therefore very little meaning in our life.

And the questioner says, does seeking, asking for guidance necessarily prevent understanding? Understanding of what? Chemistry? Mathematics? Some philosophical concept? Understanding Gorbachev? What do we mean by understanding? Please I am not, the speaker is not trying to be rude, or he is rude - sorry, he is not trying, he is not rude, just asking. What do we mean by that word understanding first and we can then relate that word to understanding - to bring about understanding through guidance, through seeking guidance. First what do we mean by understanding? To understand. I understand French because I know some French and the speaker understands Italian because he knows that. So there is an intellectual, verbal communication - right? That is one form of understanding. We use common language, you speak English and the speaker speaks English, and the verbal communication, if we mean the same thing and not give to the word different meaning - like Alice says, Alice in Wonderland says, "I give to the word what I want, the meaning I want" - you can do that too but communication becomes rather difficult then. So what do we mean by understanding? A verbal communication? Intellectual comprehension of a concept, of an idea? Or understanding means actually listening to what another is saying, not try to interpret, not try to change it, not try to modify it, actually what he says, not only intellectually, with all your being, with great attention, then it is not merely intellectual, or emotional, or sentimental, all that kind of stuff, but entirely you are there. Then there is not only verbal communication but non-verbal communication.

And the questioner says, asks, does asking guidance prevent, necessarily prevent understanding? Right? Why do I want guidance? About what? You answer me, those of you who follow these gurus and all the rest of it, churches and temples, what do you mean by guidance? Another fellow human being in different robes, with beard or non-beard, specially from Asia, India included, why does one want guidance? Are you being guided now? Be simple Sirs. Are you being guided now? Or are we together investigating, exploring, communicating, saying, "I don't understand what you are saying", and I say, "I'll explain it" and then you explain something to me and I say, "Yes,". We are moving together, there is no guidance. You understand? Are we.? We have had guidance galore, every newspaper, every magazine, every preacher, every priest throughout the world is guiding us, telling us what to do, what not to do, think this, don't think that, surrender yourself, oh, don't listen to him, he is a reactionary - you follow? We are being guided, shaped, moulded, all the time. Consciously or unconsciously. Here we are not guiding anybody, like two friends talking over things together. That is totally different. And guidance prevents understanding, in the deeper sense of that word, because I can't understand myself first. Look at myself, you are guiding me all the time, do this, don't do that. I am not looking at myself, I am listening to what you have said. That means you become the authority, I become your slave, whether psychological slave, or slave to some other factor. These gurus with their ashramas, their places, become concentration camps. They tell you what to do, how to salute, all that tommy rot. I am not condemning, it is so.

So if we don't seek guidance at all, which actually prevents understanding of ourselves, then cannot seeking help be a means, or discovery of ourselves - good God, need we go into all this again? Why can't we be simple? Not in clothes, I don't mean that. Simple. See things as they are. Look, face things actually as they are, instead of all this labyrinth of maze? Why do we have to go through all this? Except the doctor, that is a different matter. Psychologically we are talking about. Why can't we be very, very simple and look at things as they are. Is our brain so incapacitated, so cunning, so desperately devious, that it cannot see things, what is in front of their nose or eyes? If you are very, very simple psychologically, then that very simplicity has immense subtlety, much more subtle than all the cunningness of the brain. But we are never simple. If it is raining, it is raining. I am lonely - not the speaker - one is lonely, that is a fact. Why all the circus round it?

5th QUESTION: Could you please explain what is total vision? Is it an extension of our normal brain function? Or does it imply something totally different?

Could you please explain what is total vision? Is it the extension of our normal brain function? Or does it imply something totally different? To be very simple: do we see anything entirely? Do we see, not trees and nature, all that, do we, each one of us, see your wife, see, actually see, not imagine, all the images, simply see? Do I see partially, because I have so much prejudice, so much fear, so much anxiety and all the rest of it, so I never see somebody entirely - right? To see something wholly, holistically, if I may use that word, completely, wholly, in that seeing there is no contradiction, it is so. Understand? Right? There is no contradiction in seeing what is actually going on. I am angry. I am impatient, exhausted. To see that simply. But the moment I bring in the fact, "Oh, I shouldn't be. I am like this. I am exhausted. I am exasperated." - excuses. Right? Can I see myself wholly as I am? Can I see the whole map? A map is put in front of each one of us, a map of the world, with various colours, with various flags, various prime ministers, various presidents, all the cuckoodom that is going on. There it is in front of me, in front of us. Can I look at that whole map as a whole? And it is not possible to look at that whole map if my attention is on Britain. Or if my attention is on Russia. So my attention then is directed to one point. You follow? So this sense of direction to one point, or self-interest prevents the holistic, the outlook - the seeing of the whole thing. It is simple. Right? But if I am stuck to, or my roots are in this one particular corner of the earth then I can't possibly see the whole thing. If I am always thinking about India - thank God I don't, I never do - if I am always thinking about India, what is happening, why I am an Indian, why am I poor, why am I this, you know all the rest of it, how can I diddle somebody, or believe in some particular god, or something or other, I am there, stuck, I can't see the whole of it. Right? It is as simple as that. So I naturally when I see the truth of it I say, what nonsense.

Not only seeing holistically - we must stop - but also there is much more to seeing than that. Observing without any words, without any interference of thought, just seeing. First of all visually, then inwardly seeing everything as is. And from that seeing we can go much further, then you ask what is insight. Seeing something absolutely to be true and acting at that moment. I won't go into all that now. It is time to stop. But all this requires investigation or observing without analyser into what one is. And from there you can move infinitely, boundlessly. There is no beginning or end there.

May we get up?

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 29TH AUGUST 1985

There are many questions, and there are seven questions here. And they have been selected carefully. I haven't read them. Others have read them and chosen them. I hope you don't mind.

Before we go into these questions may we talk over something together? We are so easily influenced, not only by the box there, in each one's room, by the books, by the newspapers, magazines, by the past traditions. As you heard probably last night Jerusalem existed five thousand years ago and there were parts of India further still. This long tradition, or short tradition of a single day, or a single afternoon on your drive or your walking in the woods, all these influence us, not only the genetic process in each human being, the heredity, the whole existence seems to be a process of influencing each other - the air, the pollution, the beauty of the earth, everything around us, and even you sitting there and the speaker is here, we are influencing each other. We are telling us, each one of us, what to do, what to think, we put pressure on each other through beauty, through a lovely poem, or a personal relationship. It is a constant process, it appears, of being moulded, shaped, put into a form. And we proceed for the rest of our life in that narrow path, narrow way and that seems to be our way of existence. And one wonders if it is at all possible to be totally free of influence, to find the origin, the beginning of all things which must have no cause or an effect, it must...

So is that possible? You understand? We are talking over together. We are not trying to influence you, or you are influencing the speaker. We are two friends talking over together, in the same boat, in the same way, path, not spiritual and all that kind of stuff but ordinary, a path that goes through the woods, dappled light and the beauty of the earth and the trees. And is it ever possible, we are asking each other, to be free of all influence: the past of which we are, and that past has a tremendous influence on us, the long tradition of the so-called religious books, the old poems, the ancient literature from the Iliad to the ancient Hindu? And one asks oneself, as you are asking as I am asking, whether it is possible to really be free of all this and something totally original? Not the repetition, repetition of guru and disciple, the follower and the followed with their peculiar dresses and all that kind business. Is it possible? Please give your attention a little bit to it. What do you think? Is it possible? Or not possible? If it is not possible, or if it is incredibly difficult and therefore we choose the easiest way, follow the old pattern only in different colours, different beads, different leaders, teachers, gurus and so-called enlightened birds! [Laughter] I am sorry. And so on. Is that at all possible? Or are we doomed for ever to remain in this state of being impressed, shaped, moulded, conditioned?

And what would you do if it is at all possible? How would you set about it? In what manner would you approach this question? Perhaps that may be the real question, the most important question. Because we are so gullible, we invent so many reasons for doing that, for following, leading, surrendering oneself to something that is so convincing, satisfying, so handing over all the so-called world responsibility to another. This has been our lot. And knowing all this how would one come to, see what actually is and see what one can do? Not just talk about it, you may be influenced by your wife, husband, girl and so on.

Isn't it necessary to have a great deal of doubt? What do you say? Isn't it necessary to have a certain quality of scepticism, not only about others but about oneself, about one's desires, convictions, belief, faith and definite directive purposes? Can we question all that, doubt all that and see how far that doubt, how far the sense of asking, demanding, enquiring, can go? Could we do this together? Not that the speaker is leading you, or you are leading with your convictions the speaker, but together, I mean together, enquire into this.

The computer, as we said the other day, the computer is going to do all our efficient work, probably better than we do. It will invent new gods, a new system of theology, a new way of living, which is the industrial age is over, nearly, and the computer age will come in. These are all facts. We are not saying something abnormal, non-factual, or imaginary. This is what is going to happen to all of us. They are inventing such colossal interference with the brain.

So we are asking: could we go into this question together? Knowing that we need scepticism, doubt and doubt is very energizing and cleansing. Will you do it? Doubt one's own experiences, one's own attitudes, prejudices, agreements, disagreement, all that? And doubt, like a dog on a leash, some times if it is the right place you must let the dog run, freely, jump, otherwise the dog becomes rather tame and...

So scepticism also has its right place, not a particular place, it has its own quality of rightness. "Oh I won't doubt that because I belong to that, but I will doubt everything else. "We were talking - we used to have a great many friends at one time, Communists. Don't be shocked. And they would go so far and no further, like the Catholics, like the Protestants, like the Hindus, Buddhist monks, so far, beyond that is mystery, or beyond that is impossible. So doubt must be kept on a leash and allowed to run also. Can you do that? Can we do it together? Doubt about your gods, your gurus, your experiences and so on, the whole background of human experience, human endeavour, human conclusions, the whole bundle of it. And begin to enquire into that bundle. And see how far actually, not theoretically, actually in one's life, daily life, how far you can go with this doubt, this enquiry, this passion behind it.

Shall we answer the questions or would you like to go on with what we were talking about?

How far, how deep, is knowledge essential? Not only knowledge of books and what others have said, but knowledge about ourselves. Knowledge is always limited - right? You can see what the scientific knowledge is doing, is achieving. Little, adding, adding more and more and more. What is added to is always limited, naturally. Are we understanding? If I am adding something all the time, as knowledge, what I am gathering slowly, that which is gathered slowly is limited always because there is more, more, more. Right? So knowledge is always limited. And those who invent, "Oh, yes we can go beyond knowledge." They have gone into this question in ancient India and invented the idea - I won't go into it, not worth it. And knowledge is our background. That background is guiding us, shaping us, telling us what to do. Or you have an intuition - a favourite word that! - but that word too is rather dangerous because it may be your wish sublimated, becomes intuition. But it is still your wish, your desire. So what place has knowledge in daily life? I am sorry the speaker is asking all these questions. Probably you won't answer, you will just listen and carry on. But if one actually listens and goes into it, what place has knowledge in life, in daily life? When you write a letter you have to have knowledge. When you speak English you have to have knowledge, or French, or Italian, or whatever it is or Russian. And when you do business, when you telephone, when you do everything physically you have to have knowledge. How to drive a car. And also knowledge in relationship. One recognizes one's wife, one's husband and girl and all the rest of it. It is the recognition, it is part of knowledge. And what place has knowledge in relationship? Can I go on? Or you are amused by all this? What place has knowledge between you and another? Or what place has knowledge? I know my wife. Or my father, mother, husband. When we say "I know", knowing is knowledge - right? What place has that in daily life between my wife and my husband, between the man and the woman? Please what place your knowing her, what place that knowing has in your relationship? Is knowledge the impediment in relationship?

Audience: Yes.

K: Just a minute, don't say yes. It is so easy to say yes and then what? If I say to myself, "I know my wife", what do I mean by knowing her? My previous sexual experience, my irritation about her, and her anger with me, her saying "You have been very good today, nice and kind. Let's go to dinner" - and all the rest of it. All that builds up an image about each other. This is a fact. And when I have built up sufficient image I say, "I know her". She says, "I know my husband, his quirks, his idiocy, his goodness" and all the rest of it. All that is knowledge. And we are asking in relationship what place has that? What place has knowledge? Or, it has no place at all. Is love knowledge? The remembrance of your sex, of your - all the rest of it, the background which you have built up in that particular relationship and that knowledge is divisive. Isn't it? Gosh, you are all asleep. It separates. I with my ambition, greed and all the rest of it, and she has hers. She wants to fulfil and I want to fulfil. So we are - we may meet together in bed but like two rails that never meet. Do we face this? If you are married do you face this? Or if you live with a girl do you face this fact? Or one doesn't want to look at facts.

So please find out for oneself, actually in relationship what knowledge is, what your experiences are, and whether it is a hinderance in relationship, or a factor that helps you live together somewhat comfortably, somewhat happily, but keeping a careful distance from each other - right?

May we go on to our other questions? Good Lord, it is nearly twelve.

1st QUESTION: K says there is no path to truth. Is the faculty to see this outside myself? My consciousness and means of perception are entirely within me. How can I go without any means or tools towards the unknown goal? What will give me the need, the energy to move in this direction?

K says there is no path to truth. Do you accept that? There is no path truth. Is the faculty to see this outside of myself? My consciousness and means of perception are entirely within me.

How can I go without any means or tools towards the unknown goal? What will give me the need, the energy to move in this direction? Good Lord! [Laughter] There are so many things in this question.

First of all, as we said the other day, the answer is not outside the question. The answer is not outside the problem. The answer is in the problem, in the question. Please let's talk that briefly over. We are always try to find an answer, satisfactory, outside the problem, that is convenient, that is happy, that is pleasurable and so on. If we could put aside all this rather escaping from the problem, if you could look at the problem. Look at this question together. K says there is no path to truth. Why do you believe him? Why do you accept it? Why do you repeat it? K says. Who is K to say it? What right? Or is it a reaction? You understand? Because he sees so many paths to truth - as many ? as many ? I won't go into that. As long as there are human beings they have different opinions. So it may not be true. Let's first find that out.

There are the various Christian paths - right? The Catholic, the Protestant and the various divisions of Protestantism, innumerable, many of them. And there is the Buddhist, several paths according to the Buddha, one never really knows what the Buddha actually said, or what the Bible says, one never knows. So. Then there are the Tibetan paths - right? There are the Buddhist paths, the Muslim, with their divisions. So all these paths are spread out before you to truth, whatever that may mean, to God, to illumination, to enlightenment and so on, there are dozens of paths - right? How will you choose? How will you choose which is the right path? Please tell me.

Audience: You have to know yourself.

K: Somebody says you have to know yourself. So why bother about paths? Why bother about truth? Why bother about what K says? Why don't you know about yourself? And how will you know about yourself? What manner? How will you look at yourself as you will look at yourself in a mirror, how would you look at yourself? It is easy to say look at yourself. Socrates and ancient Greeks and still further ancient Israelites, and still further ancient Egyptians and so on and so on, the ancient Hindus, they have all said in a different way, "Know Yourself". And there are these paths in front of us. And we all want to achieve truth, whatever that thing is. And all these paths lead to that. That means truth is fixed - right? Must be, otherwise there would be no path to it. It must be stationary, it must have no movement, it must be dead, then there can be paths to it. [Laughter] No, no don't laugh, this is what we do. So somebody like K comes along and says, look, don't bother about the paths, it may be like you are on a ship with a rudder and you move, find out, learn, move, move, keep on going, find out. Not become stationary and make truth something permanent - right? And we want something permanent. Permanent relationship, I am attached to my husband, wife, I want it permanent. We don't admit any change. Right? And we are changing all the time, both biologically as well as psychologically, but we want to remain with something that is completely satisfactory, permanent, enduring, giving me security. And as I find there is really no security, then I have truth as the permanent entity towards which I am going. And there are all the disciples, gurus and the priests, all help you to go. I don't know where but they help you.

So using one's own capacity to reason, capacity to have logic, see things step by step, and not escape any step. Or, that is much more complicated, see that which is true, accurate. Well that is a different matter.

So the questioner says what are the tools necessary to reach truth, which is pathless? The moment you have tools you have already created the path - right? Do you see this? No? The moment I have a means to do that, to achieve that, the means then becomes the tool and I have already got the truth towards which I am working - right? So the moment you have a tool, a means, a system, then you know what truth is, therefore there is no point in having a tool. I don't know if you see? Do we see this? Or is this too illogical? Or too dastardly reasonable? The means is the end. The means is not different from the end. Right?

So. Another question in this is: my consciousness and means to perception are entirely within me. What do you mean by the word consciousness? You don't mind going into all this? It is fun if you go into all this. Not only the understanding of one's own brain's capacity but also to delve. You dig very deeply to find oil, go through all that trouble, and we won't even spend a second doing this in ourselves, for ourselves. So what do we mean by that word consciousness? Is that consciousness different from you, from the me?

Do you get bored by all this on a lovely morning, instead of being on a golf course, or on a walk or something? Since you are here and we are here, let's go on! What do you mean by consciousness? Books have been written about it by experts. And we are not experts - right? Let's understand this. You and the speaker are not experts. God forbid! Not professionals.

Professional gurus, professional followers with their peculiar dresses and all the rest of it. We are just enquiring together, like two friends. What do you mean by consciousness? All that you are, isn't it? Your consciousness is made up of all its content - right? Anger, jealousy, faith, belief, anxiety, aspiration, all the innumerable experiences that one has had, all the accumulation of all the little things of life, and also suffering, pain, insecurity, confusion, and the desire to escape from all this, and find something enduring. And in it also there is the fear of death, and enquiring what is there beyond. Right? All that, this vast bundle, is our consciousness - no? No? Yes? Go on Sirs, there is no disagreement about this. Don't be nervous. We are our consciousness. And the content of consciousness makes up the whole entirety of consciousness, whether it is higher consciousness, lower consciousness, the desire to expand consciousness, and all the rest of it, it is still within the field of consciousness - right? And that consciousness is me. There is no me without that. So when you say me is different, my consciousness is different, then you have a battle with it, struggle, conflict, all that ensues.

So our question then is: is it possible to first to discover for ourselves the content, to see the content? That is fairly easy. The habits, the way you comb your hair, the habits of speech, of thought. It is fairly simple to observe those. And also to become aware of one's own conditioning as a British, as a Frenchman, as a Russian and etcetera, etcetera. It is also fairly easy to see our various religious inclinations - Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist, following something or other - you follow? - that is fairly easy. But to go beyond that. We don't need an aqualung, you have to go very deeply, but to go very deeply one must understand the superficial thing first, whether it is possible to free from influence which conditions us - right? Is it possible? Find out. Work sir, don't listen. Work at it. Put your tremendous energy into it, you have got tremendous energy, you don't want more. It took you a lot of energy to come here. Use some of that energy, if one may respectfully point out, use some of that energy to go into this. [Tape turns over] When you want something you go after it. That means one has to be not quite indolent, one has to be a little active. And there is nobody to help you, no tool, no instrument, no leader, nothing to help you. You must really become helpless to find the real thing. I don't know if you understand what I am talking about? If you are helpless, actually helpless, that means there is no help whatsoever from anybody, from any book, from any person, from any environment, then you are in that state of real helpless, then something else takes place. Then you begin to see things.

The questioner says, asks: what will give me the need, the energy, to move in the direction of truth. Direction of truth. That means it is already over there [Laughter] I am not laughing. I am not disrespectful or cynical, but it is like that, when we use words like direction it is already there. It is already preconceived, already existing there because of your conviction or somebody told you and so on. Truth is really a pathless land. And that can only exist when fear and all the rest of it is not.

(2nd) Questioner: I am afraid to change. If I change what will happen afterwards? I am paralysed by this. Can you talk about this problem?

Delighted! I am afraid to change. If I change what will happen afterwards? I am paralysed by this. Can you talk about this problem? Why is one afraid of change? What do you mean by that word change? One has lived in this house across the lawn for about nearly twenty years. One becomes attached to that particular room, to the nice furniture up there - right? One becomes attached. That means what you are attached to is what you are. If one is attached to that good old furniture, you are that furniture. So we are afraid to change. I am attached to that room. But fortunately the speaker travels a great deal. That is only an excuse.

So what does that word imply? Change from 'what is' to 'what should be' - right? That is one change. Or change according to my old pattern but remain within the pattern, going across one corner of the field, I say I have moved, have changed, but it is still within the same field, barricaded, barbwired - right? Going north, east, west, south is change. Why do we use that word? Biologically one is told there is constant change in the blood, constant movement, change, one cell dies another cell takes its place, or a series of molecules and so on. There is this constant change going on physically. And we are afraid to change. Could we drop that word change? Change implies time - doesn't it? I am this, I will change to that. Or I have been that and some event will come along, take place, and that event will change me and so on. Change implies a movement in time - right? We went into the question of time the other day. Should the speaker go into it again? Time. It is a very complex thing time, very. I won't go into it, this is not the occasion.

So if we could drop that word change, or revolution, or mutation, which the speaker has used all these words, if we could drop all those words then we are only faced with 'what is' - right? Not 'what it should be'. But only face 'what is'. I am angry. That is 'what is'. I am violent. That is 'what is'. But to become politically or religiously non-violent is a change. To become non-violent when I am violent takes time. In that interval I am sewing the seeds of violence. That is all so simple - right? So I remain with violence, not try to change it. I am angry. That is a fact. There are no excuses for anger. I can find a dozen excuses for hate and anger but those enquiries in why I get angry is another escape from anger - right? Because I have moved away. So the brain remains with 'what is', then see what happens. That is, I am jealous of you. Not me. I am jealous of you because you look so much nicer, cleaner, good taste, you have got good brains and I am envious of you. Out of that envy comes hate. Envy is part of hate. Envy is part of comparison. I would like to be like you but I can't. So I become rather antagonized, I feel violent about you. So I remain with 'what is'. That is, I see I am envious. There it is, I am envious. That envy is not different from me. Right? Envy is me. Right? So I can't do anything about it. I hold it. I stay with it. Right? Will you stay with it? Not escape, not to find out the cause, or the reason, or go beyond it. I am envy. And see what takes place. First there is no conflict obviously, if I am envious I am envious. It is only conflict exists when I don't want to be envious. I wonder if you follow all this? No matter.

So if I stay with it I have got tremendous energy - right? Energy is like light throwing on something - focussed light on something. Which then becomes very clear. And that which is very clear you are not afraid of, paralysed. It is so. You understand? I hope.

So what is important in this question is not to escape, not to make an effort, just to remain with 'what is'. If I am British I remain with that. See what happens. How narrow it becomes. Sorry if you are British, forgive me - or French or Russian, or whatever it is. The thing itself begins to show its whole content.

3rd QUESTION: How does one meet aggression and psychological attack from a close relative from whom one cannot escape? [Laughter]

How does one meet aggression and psychological attack from a close relative from whom one cannot escape? Are we all like that? I can't escape from my guru because, you know, I have committed myself to him or her and I have give up all my money to him. Sir, don't laugh this is taking place now.

Somebody sent an article in French, highly amusing, so laughable, really funny, which says, How To Become a Good Guru! [Laughter] It is very cleverly written and I hope it will be printed in English.

Psychological attack, what does that mean to be attacked psychologically, inwardly? When you are with a close friend or relative, psychologically, inwardly, there is always pressure going on between the two. You know all this I don't have to tell you. Always trying to do something about the other, attacking subtly, physically or through innuendo, or through subtle word, gesture, you are always trying to push the other into a certain pattern - right? This is common to you, isn't it? Now the questioner says, what is one to do? I am living with you in the same house and you are bombarding me, I am bombarding you, not only with words and gesture but even a look, a feeling of irritation and so on. How will you, what will you do not to be wounded, not to be pushed around psychologically? You may depend on that person financially. You may depend on that person for various psychological reasons. And the moment you depend you become a slave - right? The moment you are attached then you are a goner! Don't look, if I may suggest, at somebody else, but let's look at ourselves. If I am attached to you as the audience then I'm lost. Then I depend on you for my satisfaction, comfort, reputation, for my physical well being too. But if I don't depend on you, I have to find out why I don't depend on you. That means not only on you, I don't depend on anything. I want to find out if it's true. I may not show it to my close relative. I want to find out for myself whether it is possible living in the same room, same house, husband, wife, relative and so on, to be totally impregnable, not build a wall around oneself, that is fairly simple. You understand? I can build a wall round myself and say sorry and be polite about it, soft about it, and very affectionate but it is still a wall. That means limitation. So is it possible for me to live vulnerably? Go on, think it out Sirs. And yet not be wounded. Highly sensitive, not be in any way responding according to my attachment. You understand? Go on Sirs, think it out. And if one is dependent on another financially, that becomes rather dangerous. Most of us are in this position. Do you want me to go on with this?

If I am dependent financially on you, God forbid, I am not, but if I am dependent on you, what happens between us? You then have the whip in your hand. Not only financially but go further into it. Is it possible to live with another on whom I am financially dependent and know I am dependent because I can't do anything else - right? I can't start a new career. If I am quite young I could probably do it but if I am sixty, fifty, or even seventy or ninety, then you can't do it, start a new career. So then what shall I do? Go on Sirs. What will you do?

So where do I draw the line of dependency? You understand my question? Psychologically I won't depend. For myself I won't depend on anybody, or on anything, or on any past experience and all the rest of that rubbish. There is no dependence. But if one is dependent financially where do I draw the line so that being rather oldish, you say, "Sorry I have to put up with it." - right? I have to put up with it I can't start a new game. So how far, how deep is that line? You understand my question? Is it just superficial? You understand? Or the line has great depth? Obviously very superficial. Oh, I don't mind. Right? So what is important in this question is if one understands it rightly, freedom. Freedom is absolutely necessary. But I depend on the milkman, on the supermarket, postman and so on, otherwise psychologically I don't depend. I must be very clear on this. So I draw the line very, very superficially without any depth.

Oh Lord!

4th QUESTION: Some people seem to pick parts of what you say that fits their problems or interest and then discard the rest. What do you say to this?

Some people seem to pick parts of what you say that fit their problems or interest and then discard the rest. What do you say to this? I don't have to say anything about it. What do you say? We are dealing, aren't we together, with the whole of life, not just part of life, whole of it, both psychological world, which is immense, not just physical reactions and nervous responses, and memories and all that, that is part of the psychological structure but it is much deeper than all that. If you can go that deeply. So we are dealing not only with the psychological world but the violence that exists in the world. The tremendous violence that is going on, killing for the sake of killing, for the fun of killing, not only with the gun but also destroying people when they obey somebody. Careful please. That means obedience - right? It is a dangerous subject, please listen carefully, not take part of it and say, yes he is against the army. We are dealing with the whole phenomena of life, not parts of it. Which the scientists are doing, which the doctors are doing, which the priests are doing, and the educators are doing. We are concerned with the entirety of human life. And if you like to pick parts of it, it is up to you. And that part will be satisfactory, or say it suits me, that is enough for me. That is also perfectly right. But if we are concerned with the whole of life, not only one's own particular life but also the life of human beings throughout the world, the immense poverty, incalculable poverty of which you don't know, the indignity of it, the corruption of it. And all the religious circus - sorry to use that word - all the religious nonsense that is going on in the world, tremendous big business, enormous work, Rolls Royces, Rolls. You should read this article or memorandum on How To Become a Good Guru. The tremendous work of these people. And if you are concerned with the whole humanity, which is you are also humanity - right? You are humanity, not humanity is there, you are different. You are humanity. Not British, French, Russian. We are human beings first, not professionals after, professionals after, first you are human beings. And we human beings have separated ourselves and that is why there is chaos in the world. It is only war in Lebanon, who cares? There is a war in the Far East, Afghanistan. Awful Russians and so on. But if you feel deeply that you are the entire humanity because you suffer as they suffer, you shed tears, they too do. You are anxious, you laugh, you have pain, and they too have all this, whether they are rich or poor. They are corrupt and so are we in a different way. They are corrupt because they want money, food, and they will do anything to have food and money, anything. So we are the entire humanity. If one realizes that marvellous thing, which is the truth, then you will not kill another, then there is no division between this country and that country, then your whole life is different. If that is what you want. If you want to pick parts of it, go to it. Nobody is putting pressure on you not to pick a part of it to satisfy your little demands, or big demands. But if one actually, deeply, honestly, without all the ideological nonsense, the real fact that we are entire humanity, prayers, non-believers, the Muslims, the Hindus, the Buddhists, the Christians, we are one. We all go through tremendous travail. Therefore this search for individual freedom, individual becoming and so on becomes rather childish - for me anyhow.

5th QUESTION: There are many accounts of people following a particular discipline who come upon the immeasurable. Are they self-deluded? Or have they come to this somehow despite their efforts? Or is there another explanation?

There are many accounts of people following a particular discipline who come upon the immeasurable. Are they self-deluded? Or have they come to this somehow despite their efforts? Or is there another explanation? It is nothing to do with disciplines, with effort. You may disagree, you are perfectly right to disagree, or agree but let us both understand what we are talking about, each of us. You may belong to a particular discipline, Buddhist, Hindu, Tibetan, Christian, certain abbot, certain guru, all the rest of it, follow certain discipline, order, do everything everyday at 2.0 o'clock in the morning, or early morning, pray, do this, discipline. And through that discipline some people say they have understood or realized the immeasurable - right? The questioner says - who become the immeasurable. Are they self-deluded? What do you say? The word discipline, according to the dictionary, means to learn, to learn. The disciple learns, not from a master, learns. That is, he is learning, not conforming, not imitating, not obeying. He is learning. Learning itself has its own discipline - right? I don't know if you understand.

There is this quality of learning, not memorizing and repeating. Right? That is, most of us accumulate knowledge and memory to do certain functions, certain skills and so on. So learning there is implied accumulation and according to that accumulation of knowledge acting. And that knowledge can be increased more and more, or becomes duller and duller, more and more accustomed - right? So most of us are memorizing in order to have a skill. To live in this modern society you must have some kind of skill, in the factory, in the mines, in the business, or at the altar, some kind of effort, some kind of discipline there. And they keep on repeating day after day, day after day, day after day. You see them in the churches and temples and mosques, repeating the same old stuff.

And it is not learning. They may say, yes we are learning, but that is rather meaningless if you repeat, repeat, repeat.

So can discipline, which is conforming, imitating, obeying, towing the line, can that lead to the immeasurable? Immeasurable means that which is not being measured, which cannot be measured - right? It is beyond all measurement, all delineation, the line. It seems, for the speaker, that is not possible, because the brain then is conditioned to a routine, to a certain particular form, and the very essence of that limitless, to comprehend - not comprehend it - to see what it is, requires immense, incalculable freedom.

Therefore what is freedom, not all this? Freedom. There are two kinds of freedom. Freedom from. Freedom per se, for itself. I can be free from fear. There can be freedom from fear - right? That freedom is conditioned because it is free from something. And is there a freedom which is by itself, the thing itself? And it is only that freedom which requires compassion, love, and that freedom is that supreme intelligence which has nothing to do with the intelligence of thought. And to come to that one has to be free from all fears and all the rest of it. If that interests you, put your energy into it. You have to put your life, your house in order, complete order, not neatness, not polishing the furniture. That is part of it. But the house, the inner house, the deep house that has no foundation, no roof, no shelter. You can't invite the immeasurable - it then becomes a plaything. You can't lay down the path for another to follow. It is not to be put into words. We measure everything with words. We call it the immeasurable. It certainly is not. It is something entirely different.

Sorry. I had better stop. May we get up?

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD PUBLIC TALK 31ST AUGUST 1985

Those people have appealed for cooperation and for money and also may the speaker join in that appeal. I repeat to you: to talk over things together.

We have talked about time, thought and fear. And as we said this is not a lecture about a particular subject intended to inform or instruct. This is a conversation between you and the speaker. Together we are going to look at all the things that we consider are important in our life, our daily life, not only our life as a businessman, or a doctor, or a professor, or a scientist, and so on, or if you want to belong to that group, gurus. We are not concerned about others, but rather we are going to have a conversation in which there is no authority, in which there is no specialist. We are all laymen. And together we are going to talk over what we have done in the past two talks and questions and answers, and also we are going to talk over this morning, which is rather rainy and windy, I am sorry, it was a lovely day yesterday, and we are going to talk over together about freedom, self-interest, pleasure, pain, sorrow and love, this morning. And if there is time, we will also talk about death, if that is all right with you.

As we said previously, we are rather a serious group, at least the speaker is. He has been at it for the last seventy years or more. And just attending a couple of talks, or reading some printed words is not going to solve our problems, it is not going to help us. And the speaker is not trying to help you. Please be convinced of that, assured that the speaker is no authority and therefore he is not a person to whom you can turn to be helped. There are others who might help you. And if you want to be helped then, if one may point out most respectfully, you leave your problems to be solved by others, and they will solve them according to their desires, self-interest, their power, their position and all that business. So we are ordinary laymen talking over together. We are going to enquire together, face the facts, not the ideas about the fact but facts. And not ideologies, they are meaningless. Not about theories, speculations, who is illumined, who is not, who is - what? - nearer God than you, but together we are going to go into this question of freedom, what relationship has freedom to time and time to thought and action. Because we live by action, everything we do is action, not a particular action, either in the business world, or in the scientific world, or in the speculative world called philosophy. But rather we are going to look at things as they are.

There is a great deal of anarchy in the world, chaos, disorder and who has brought this about? That is our first question. Who is responsible for all the mess that we have in the world, economically, socially, politically and so on, all leading up to war? There are wars going on, terrible wars now. And do we each one of us realize not intellectually but actually in our daily life, the house in which we live, not only the house built by man outside, but the house inside. Do we realize how disorderly it is, contradictory, how very little freedom we have? That word freedom also implies love, not just freedom to do what you like, when you like, where you like. But we are living on this earth, all of us, and each one is seeking his own freedom, his own expression, his own fulfilment, his own path to enlightenment, whatever that be. His own particular form of religion, superstition, belief, faith and all the things that go with it, with authority, hierarchical authority, politically, religiously and so on. So we have very little freedom. And that word, which is so freely used by every psychopath and every human beings, whether he lives in Russia, where the tyranny is appalling, or in so-called democratic world, every human being inwardly, consciously or unconsciously, needs freedom, like every tree in the world needs freedom to grow, to have that sense of quality of dignity, love.

And what is the relationship of freedom to self-interest? Please we are talking things over together, you are not, if I may point out, listening to a speaker, listening to a man on the platform. He is not important at all. And the speaker really means this, he is not important, the speaker. But perhaps you might give your ear to what he says as two friends talking over things very seriously. We are asking what is the relationship between freedom and self-interest? Where do you draw the line between freedom and self-interest? And what is self-interest? What is its relationship to thought and to time? Please, all these questions are involved in freedom. Bearing in mind that freedom is not fulfilling one's own ambitions, greed, envy and so on. What is the relationship of self-interest with regard to freedom? You know what self-interest is? Self-interest may hide under every stone of our life - right? Are we talking together? Are you quite sure we are talking together? Not somebody higher up but we are all sitting on the same level.

What is self-interest? Can one consciously, deliberately, enquire into that? How deep, how superficial, where it is necessary, where it totally, completely, has no place at all? You understand my question, we are together questioning. Self-interest has brought about a great deal of confusion in the world, a great deal of disorder, confusion, conflict. Whether that self-interest be identified with a country, with a community, with a family, or with God, with the beliefs, the faiths and so on, it is all self-interest, seeking enlightenment - for God's sake, as though you can seek it. Also in that search there is the self-interest, and also there is self-interest when you build a house, have insurance, mortgages. And the self-interest is encouraged commercially. And also by all religions, they talk about liberation but self-interest first. And we have to live in this world, we have to function, have to earn money, have children, be married or not married. And living in this world of the twentieth century how deep, or how superficial, is our self-interest? It is important to enquire into this. Self-interest divides people - right? We and they, you and I, my interest as opposed to your interest, my family interests oppose your family interests, your country, my country in which I have invested a great deal of emotion and physical interest for which I am willing to fight and kill, which is war. And we invest our interest in ideas, faith, beliefs, dogmas, in rituals and so on, this whole cycle. At the root of it there is a great deal of self-interest.

Now can one live in this world daily, clearly, with self-interest where it is necessary - please I am using this word carefully - where it is physically necessary and psychologically, inwardly, it is totally abandoned? Is that possible? You understand? Are we together? Is it possible for each one of us living here in a very, very complex society, competitive, divided by agreement and disagreement, faith opposing another faith, this great division that is going on, not only individually but collectively, and living in this world where do we draw the line between self-interest and no self-interest whatsoever psychologically? Can we do that? You can talk about it endlessly as we like to go to talks and lectures and listen to somebody, but here we have to observe together, you have to not only listen to each other verbally but also deeply, inwardly find out extensively, not just my self-interest, extensively, wholly, where self-interest lies. And inwardly, psychologically, can one live without any kind of muttering of self-interest, of the self, the me, which is the essence of self-interest? Another can't explain, or say this is self-interest, this is not self-interest, that would be terrible. But one can find out for oneself either very carefully enquiring step by step, hesitantly, not coming to any conclusion and find out for oneself. Because there is nobody who is going to help us. I think we must be completely assured of, nobody is going to help us. They may pretend and you may pretend, but the actuality is after these two and half million years, or forty thousand years, we are still seeking help, and we are stuck. We are coming to the end of our tether.

And in the enquiry into self-interest we have to go into the question also: what is freedom and freedom implies love, freedom does not mean irresponsibility, doing exactly what one wants, which has brought about such a mess in the world. And also what relationship is self-interest to thought? We went into the question of time the other day, and also thought, thinking. Shall we go into it briefly, what time and thought - need we? It is no good repeating it over and over again, it gets rather monotonous, for the speaker at least. So he has to vary the words, the special phrasing, the silence between the phrases, all that is implied not to be bored for the speaker. But if you merely listen to words, words, words, and not act then we will be left only with ashes.

Time, as we said, is part of evolution, of the brain, two and a half million years. Time is also sunrise, sunset. Time also is hope - I hope, one hopes. Time also is remembrance. Time is also all the knowledge, experience that one has gathered, which is knowledge, both scientific, personal, collective, racial and so on. Time is tradition. And thought is based on knowledge, which is the outcome of experience, whether that experience be personal, collective, racial or traditional, it is still knowledge. And knowledge is always limited either in the infinite future or infinite past, because knowledge is essentially put together through experience, adding more and more and more to what already has been known. That is what the scientists are doing. That is what we are doing, adding more and more. So knowledge is always limited, always. The past, present and future. And time is a process of this accumulation called knowledge. We needed time to go to the moon, time to think it out, time to cooperate collectively and so on. So time/thought are not separate, they are one single movement. All right? Are we going together? Or it is all just words?

So time is not only the past, the present and the future, the present modifying the past and therefore the future, the future of tomorrow is what I am today. So now, that is the moment that you are sitting there as you are listening, as you are paying perhaps attention, the now contains all time. So if one really deeply, profoundly understands that then change is totally meaningless. You are what you are now. And to remain with that, not say, "Well

I hope to change it, I will become this. I am violent but I will be later non-violent." - you understand what we are talking about? We are together in this? Don't be puzzled, it is very, very simple. It is really terribly simple if you come to look at it. I am violent today. I have been violent for the last two and a half million years, so have you. We have been violent - right? We have tried to cover it over with words, with explanations, with logical conclusions but we are still violent, killing each other, hurting each other both physically and psychologically, competitive, barbarous - right? We are violent people. All that is going on in the world - throwing bombs, the terrorists, all the horrible things that are happening to the animals, to other human beings. Don't you know all this? Right? We know all this. We are violent people. If there is no transformation now, now, at this moment, at this second, tomorrow you will still be violent - right? That is logical, reasonable. Do pay a little attention to this if you don't mind. If I am angry, hating, antagonistic now, I will be the same tomorrow - right? It is obvious. So the now contains the past, the present and the future. So any change implies a movement in time - right? I am this but I will be that. That means time, which means I have really not captured the significance of time. But if I remain with 'what is' completely, without any single movement away from that, that which I observe, hold, stay with, is me. Violence is not separate from me, I am violent. Anger is not separate from me, I am anger. Greed, envy, I am that. But we have separated it therefore there is conflict. This is all very simple, I don't have to... It is clear between us somewhat? Not I am making clear to you. You are making the thing clear for yourself so it is not you understand what is being said, or the speaker explains what he means, or you can say, "I don't understand you". You are not understanding the speaker, you are understanding yourself, you are looking at yourself, if you are not too depressed, if you are not too lazy, if you are not too concerned with superficial things.

So time/thought, self-interest and in all this cycle there is no freedom, obviously. Where there is self-interest there can never be freedom. It is so obvious. So simple if you look at it. And the more simple it is, the more subtle, the more extraordinary depth it has.

We also ought to talk over together the whole acquisitive, pleasurable, gratifying process - all right? You are willing to go into all this? Don't say, "Yep!" It is like digging in the earth to find gold, you don't find gold scratching the earth, superficially scratching, you have to dig, you have to go down very, very deeply. Not up in the air, in the sky but you are the entire humanity, as we said the other day. So you don't have to look for another to help you, or to help you to dig, or to go into yourself, you are that, you are the whole mankind because what you think millions of others think, think, not what they think about, thinking. Thinking is common to all mankind, whether they are scientists, whether they are Buddhists, or Tibetans, or God knows what else. They all think. They all have pleasure, sexually, or pleasure in attachment, in position, pleasure in achieving position, money, glory, fame and all that business. And all human beings whatever race, colour, prejudice, religion, they all go through pleasure, pain, anxiety, uncertainty and sorrow - right? So it is not your particular sorrow only, it is not your own particular pleasure, it is the pleasure of mankind - right? We have always sought pleasure, physically, psychologically, and if we do not find it there we invent something extra-territorial, little green men! Sorry to laugh about it. Pleasure in acquisition, possession, I possess you, you possess me - think it over, look at it. And that pleasure is always clouded over with fear. So pleasure, fear, self-interest, time, thought are all one movement, not separate movements - right?

And also we ought to enquire into what is suffering, why man from time beyond time has suffered? They have done everything on God's earth to escape from suffering, not only physical suffering but much more important psychological suffering. And in spite of all religions, one particular religion worshipping death, suffering, as they do in Christianity, and other religions having other escapes, they have never - man has never, or woman has never solved this problem. They bear with it, they tolerate it, they get crippled by it, they become psychopathic, shed tears and suffering is common to the whole lot of us in different forms. Either it becomes exaggerated, or you just shed tears and keep it to yourself and carry on. And there is always this killing of each other - right? Thousands, millions upon millions have shed tears, the brutality of it all, the insanity of war, building armaments while millions and millions starve - I don't have to go into all that. It is all very clear. One nationality fighting another nationality, another group of human beings like yourself, you may call yourself British, Indian, or other label, but you are human beings first.

So we are asking is there an end to war, end to suffering? Not to war. As long as we are separate, as a family, as a community, or a clique, as a nation, religious and so on, this division is going to create always perpetually conflict. You and me. We and they. This is our game we have been playing. First tribal, limited, and now it is global. So we are asking ourselves is there an end to sorrow? Put this question seriously to yourself. Because without - where there is sorrow there cannot be love. There can be sympathy, pity, tolerance, empathy but generosity, pity, sympathy is not love. Love may contain all that, or have all that but the parts don't make the whole. You can collect all the sympathy, empathy, kindness, generosity, friendship but that is not love.

So is there an end to sorrow? And this requires immense, a great deal of energy to go into it, not just say, "Well I will think about it." Thinking may be the factor of sorrow. My son is dead and I have got his photograph on the mantelpiece or on the piano in a silver frame, I remember. Remembrance is a process of thought. Of course. Thinking how we enjoyed the sunset together, how we walked in the forests, laughing, skipping, and he is gone [Tape turns over] but the remembrance of him goes on. And that remembrance may be the factor of sorrow. I don't want to admit my son is dead, gone. To admit such a fact is to admit utter loneliness. And we don't want to face this fact of being utterly by oneself. And so I look for another. I rely for my happiness, satisfaction, sexually or otherwise, look to another. And I play the same game over and over again. But I have not ended sorrow, not I, the speaker, but we have not ended sorrow. Sorrow is not only self pity, self-interest, but also the loss of that which I have had, the loss, the failure to fulfil, to achieve, to gain something which I have worked for, not only physically but psychologically, inwardly. All this is implied in sorrow and much more. And we are asking of ourselves, nobody is putting this question, or demand this challenge to you but you are asking this of yourself, whether sorrow can end? Not only the sorrow of oneself, where it is there in oneself but also the sorrow of mankind, of which you are. That means no killing of another, no psychologically wounding another. Yes Sirs! As we said, where there is sorrow there can't be love, which is a fact.

So we ought to enquire or look - not enquire, but look what is love? That word has been so used, so spat upon, dirtied and made ugly. "I love my country", "I love my god", "I am devoted, I pray for love." - right? "I am not loved but I want to be loved" - the love poems. Is love sensation? Please ask yourself all these questions. Is love a continuation and remembrance of pleasure? Is love desire? You know what desire is? May I go into it briefly? What is desire, by which you are driven and driven, torn apart, what is that thing called desire? Not to suppress it, not to transmute it or do something with it, but what is the movement of desire, how does it come about? Are you putting these questions to yourself, or do you want the speaker to explain? For God's sake! Let's go into it.

We live by sensation, whether physical sensation or psychological sensation. Sensation is part of response, part of comparison and so on, sensation, I sense, feel, I sense the atmosphere, good or bad. Sensation - right? That sensation comes about through seeing, touching, hearing and then what happens after sensation? Oh come on Sirs! Thought comes in and uses that sensation as an image - right? I see a nice house, or a garden, or a nice picture, or furniture, or a nice woman and there is sensation, the seeing, the observing. The observing, contact, then sensation comes. Unless there is sensation we are paralysed, as most of us are! We are paralysed if we don't have sensation, in our legs, in our hands, all the rest of it. So sensation, then what happens? Thought takes sensation and makes that into an image - right? I see you beautifully dressed, clean, healthy, bright, good, good brain and all the rest of that. I see that, the way you talk, the way you do this and that and so on. Then thought says, I wish I were like him, or her. At that moment desire is born - right? Sensation, then desire - then thought giving shape to that sensation. And if there is an interval between sensation and thought then you can go into it much more, but not now. You understand? Are we somewhat together in this? You see Sirs, our difficulty is we are so complex in our thinking, so want to find out, always looking, looking, looking, finding an answer to problems, solutions and how am I to do this. We are never simple. Not physically, for God's sake, don't reduce it to having some food, or little clothes or food or eating one meal and all that. What is that kind food called? I have forgotten the name of it, you know, from Japan, what is the name of it?

Audience: Macrobiotic.

K: Macrobiotic, that's it. Go crazy on that. [Laughter] As one goes crazy about Yoga and all the rest of it, T'ai Chi, you know. We are not playing. This isn't a fantasy. This is something you are hooked in. This is our life, our everyday lonely, ugly, little life.

So what is love? Can love exist where there is hate and fear? Where there is competition and comparison? Where there is conformity, agreeing or disagreeing? Go into all this Sir. Or is love nothing to do with all this? Is love something in the brain, inside the skull? Or is it something entirely beyond thought and time? And where there is self-interest there cannot be love. Obviously Sirs. You can see all this for yourself. Then what relationship has love to sorrow? And can love be compassion, not only I love you, you love me. Love is not yours or mine, it is love. Right? I may be married, have children, sex and all the rest of it. In all that there may be tenderness, generosity, politeness, kindness, yielding, tolerating, all that is not love. So compassion and love are not separate, they are one. And can one live like that? You understand? Can one have this in one's life, not in abstract moments, or in moments when you are sitting by yourself on the sofa, or walking in the woods, a flash, a scent, a perfume, that seems for a second to transform your whole existence. Can we live our daily life with that perfume? For that compassion has its own intelligence, not the compassion of a man going out to India or to Africa and do some missionary work, or helping the poor desperate poor, that is not love. Where there is love there is absolute freedom, not to do what you like, not to assert yourself, or convert others. All that kind of silly stuff.

So that intelligence is not the intelligence of thought - right? One needs a great deal of intelligence, a tremendous lot of intelligence to go to the moon, or to put a submarine together, to build a computer - right? That is partial intelligence. The scientist, the painter, the poet, the ordinary person who bakes a bread, that is part intelligence, it is not complete intelligence. And that holistic intelligence, the whole quality of that intelligence can only come about with the ending of sorrow, and love, and that acts, not the action which is partial brought about by thought and time.

May we get up? Or shall we sit still? We can't hold hands but we can sit quietly for a few minutes? Shall we?

Audience: Yes.

K: Good. Not meditate. Sit quietly. [Long pause] Will you kindly get up then the speaker will get up.

BROCKWOOD PARK 4TH PUBLIC TALK 1ST SEPTEMBER 1985

The speaker also would like to make an announcement and I hope you will take it seriously. This is not a resort. There is a swimming pool, tennis court and it is becoming too popular, too large. There are people trying to interpret what K is talking about and he has always been saying, please don't interpret, not interrupt. So please bear in mind we are going to make it much more orderly, strict and not make it into another resort for amusement place. Though it has been announced several times that music that goes on, what is called music, Bong(?) is it?, thumping on the drums and so on went on until half past ten last night. So please be courteous, careful of others and also, if one may point out wherever K goes he is a guest, whether he is India, in America or here, so one must behave like a guest. Respecting others, considering others, having some kind of order and not let it become much too big as it is becoming. We are going to do something about all this for next year.

May we go on with other things? We were talking about various problems of life, of our daily, monotonous, rather pleasurable lives that are full of fear, anxiety, antagonism and so on. We went into the question of time/thought. And yesterday - was it yesterday morning?, yes, by Jove, sorry - yesterday morning we talked about the ending of sorrow, what it implies, what is the nature of sorrow and all the pain, the anxiety, the loneliness, the depression, the uncertainty, all that is implied in sorrow. And in certain parts of the world they worship sorrow, pain. And we have never been able to end sorrow, not only the sorrow of one's own life in different ways but also the sorrow of the world as a whole. All the terrible wars that are going on, what is happening in Lebanon and South Africa, and the Communists world, total totalitarianism where you are forced to think along a certain line, preparing on both sides war, the atom bomb ultimately. And that is what is going on. And millions and millions have been slaughtered in the name of God, peace, country, some ideological concept, theories. This has been our lot and we have endured all this for millions of years. And we are, through long evolution we were barbarous once, savages, and when one looks at it, what is happening now, we are still barbarians, we are still inwardly violent, inwardly concerned with ourselves and nobody else, concerned with our own pleasures, problems, and so on. We never seem to realize that we are the world, and the world is us. This is not a theory, this is not something that you think about and come to a conclusion, ideologically, or as an Utopian idea, but it is an actuality in daily life. You are the world and the world is you. One wonders how many of us realize this fact, actually realize as we realize physical pain, as we feel when we are affectionate, tender, quiet. This is an obvious fact that you suffer and the rest of mankind suffers. You are violent, the rest of mankind suffers, violent. When you intend to do something for yourself and you want to fulfil that you are becoming violent like the rest of the world. We went into all this during all these talks, not only during the past seventy years - I am sorry to point this out - but also now. We actually don't feel, realize in our heart and brain that we are the rest of mankind. When one actually realizes this fact, not a theory, not an idea, but the actual daily fact then there is totally a different way of living. You don't belong to any country, no religious group, no spiritual authority, or those who want to interpret what K is talking about. And when you really feel that you are, you are actually the rest of mankind you will never kill another, you will never psychologically consciously, or unconsciously, or deliberately want to hurt another.

Please, this is all very, very serious, this is not just for a Sunday gathering, a sermon, or a lecture. We are together in the same boat. We are together understanding the world and ourselves, and our relationship to the world. Not our responsibility, our relationship to the rest of mankind. You all may be well fed, well clothed, houses, flats, and a nice garden, or live in a slum, but there are millions and millions of people who are starving, deliberately races are being killed, tribes are being killed. And as long as we don't feel all this, merely accept it as an idea, a conclusion, we are going to create a monstrous world, which we are creating it already. And we are that which is happening.

And this morning we ought to talk about other things too, concerned with our life. We talked about compassion, love and that compassion has its own intelligence, love has its own intelligence, not the intelligence of clever thought, calculation, remembrance but when there is compassion, which can only come, or be, when suffering ends. We talked about that a great deal. Unfortunately the speaker has published books about it all and it is not merely remembering what he has said, or what he wants to say, the actuality of that feeling of compassion, and that can only come when there is the end of sorrow and when one actually, in one's being, in one's heart, mind, feels that he is the rest of the world, doesn't belong to any sect, any group, any guru, any church, mosque or temple. One will listen to all this, or read about all this, which K has talked about for so long, and you say, "Yes, marvellous ideas. He has very good reasoning, logical but..." - and you can add many buts to that. We carry on and thereby lies more conflict. Hear one thing, you agree or disagree, or see the truth of it, and wanting to live up to it, and so begin again conflict.

So we went into conflict a great deal during these talks here. And we said as long as conflict exists love cannot be between man and woman, between people, nations, communities, enclave and so on. Our brain which has evolved through long years and time, that brain has extraordinary capacity, each one's brain has extraordinary capacity. We have used it in the world of technology, the world of computers and we have never looked at the psychological world which is far more important, the subjective, the whole psychological process that goes on inwardly. We have never looked at it, we have never gone into it, not according to others, even including K but we have never, or superficially scratched on the surface. And therefore we never put to ourself fundamental questions. And we are now talking over things together, not the speaker is saying something and you just listen and when you leave the tent forget all about it and pick it up ten years later. This is your life and our life and if one wants to treat one's life seriously, or flippantly, or casually, it is up to you.

And we talked a great deal about freedom too, freedom from anxiety, sorrow, pain, and all the travail of life. And also there is another kind of freedom. A freedom which is per se, for itself, not because you want to be free from something, that is only very partial freedom. There is a freedom which is completely whole, not partial.

And this morning we should also talk about death. Right? We have talked about so many other things. Death is not a morbid subject on a dark morning, or a dark night. People have written books about how to die happily, how to accept it naturally, how to let the body go - you know, they have been talking about it, writing about it endlessly. And we are now, you and the speaker together, please together, he is not talking to himself, he is not lecturing, he is not talking about something which you have to understand and therefore have interpreters who will tell you what K talks about. And that is going on in this place too which seems so absurd.

We ought to talk over together this very important, serious, very, very great thing called death. All right, shall we go on? Please bear in mind he is not talking to you. We are talking to each other. He has no authority - and I mean it. He has no sense of superiority, he will tell you all about it. But together we are going into it. If you will. If you don't want to it is all right. That is all right too. Nobody is imposing anything on you, directing you, telling you what to do, or what to think. Right?

What is death? And when we ask that question we ought also to consider what is continuity? And also what is ending, something that comes to finality? The ending, continuity, time and death, or thought - right? All these are involved when we ask that question: what is death? Time, thought, the urge, the demand of continuity and also when we are wanting continuity we also should enquire together into what is ending? And is there a beginning? All these are involved in this question of what is death, not just oxygen, lack of oxygen to the brain and pops of, or kicking the bucket, or whatever you like to call it. It is the whole concern of man, the way he lives and the way he dies.

So we are enquiring together what is death? Why death is associated with sorrow. You are following all this? The speaker is not leading you, he is not persuading you. I am bored with telling you that! So what is death? You must take the whole of it, not just dying. You must take the being born, living fifty, forty or sixty, seventy, ninety, or going a little further on, you have to take the whole of it, not just what is death? That is rather a silly question to say, what is death and then weep about it, or frightened about it, or worship it, as Christians do. The Indians, the former ancient Hindus exploded all over Asia, as Greece exploded over the western world, and they had their theories, including Pythagoras and others of reincarnation which we will talk about presently.

So we have to consider not only what is continuity, what is ending, what is time and thought involved in this process, which means we have to enquire what is living, first, not what is dying - right? We are together in this. I won't repeat that again. So what is living? What do we call living? From the moment we are born through the long period which we call life, living, what takes place there? - not just part of it but the length of it. From childhood we have problems, the children sent to school have a problem immediately, how to read, to write, how to learn mathematics and later on chemistry, biology, that all becomes a problem. They are educated in problems. These are all facts, not the speaker's imagination. So our life from the beginning is a continuous problem, struggle, pain, anxiety, uncertainty, confusion, faith, belief, gods and the perpetual repetition of rituals, what is called religion, the worship of a symbol, and faith, belief, success, failure, sorrow, pain. All that is our living. An actual fact in which is included pleasure, sex and all the rest of it. This is what we call living. Go to the office from nine to five, or factory nine to five, or enter a shop and sell books, clothes, food and so on. This is our daily monotonous so-called disciplined life. Would you and I disagree about that? Or do we see it as a fact? - not as descriptively accepting, but it is the actual fact of our life. Right Sirs? And we have not understood that. We have not gone into it and see if one can live totally differently.

But there is always death. There is a very good Italian proverb but I won't go into it, which says, "Everybody will die, I know. Perhaps I will too!" [Laughter]

So first what is it we have to grasp, understand, go into, resolve? Life, the daily living, or the dying? And besides why are we so terribly concerned about death? The speaker was walking once in the shaded road in India and he heard a chant behind him as he was walking towards the sea. And there was a dead body being carried by two men and his eldest son carrying the fire in front of him, in front of the body. That's all, not all the fuss and hearses and flowers and you know. It was a simple thing and it was really rather beautiful. The son crying and chanting in Sanskrit, walking towards the sea where he was going to be cremated. And the fuss the western world makes about death, Rolls Royces, enormous amount of flowers and so on. So what are we concerned with? Living or dying? Please we are talking to each other. Which is most important for us to grapple with, put our teeth and our whole energy into it?

Talking about energy, there are those people who want to release energy - right? Part of it is acupuncture, part of it is various attempts to increase the energy that we have, and so on. What is energy? It took energy to come here, a great deal of energy, put up a tent, come in a car on a rainy, windy day, get all the things together to come here. That took a lot of energy. You may brush it off and say, "I will go" - but to decided to go, to come, to drive a car, to put up a tent, to sit here and listen. That requires a great deal of energy. And we want more energy. We don't know how to use our own energy. You have got plenty of energy when you want to do something. They have been to the Moon, all the technological energy that is demanded of everyone; it takes energy to talk, to think, to have sex, everything, life is energy but we, through our self-interest, our specialization, through our demand for success, and fears and all that, we have restricted that energy. We have made it so small, so particular, so minuscule. Sorry! And our brains have been narrowed down by specialization, by, you know, all the rest of it. So there is energy. When we understand ourselves that energy explodes, then you have tremendous passion, not just passion for something, the flower of passion which never withers. And that can only come when there is compassion.

So what are we concerned most about, death or living? Living is, as we said, a series, a succession of conflicts, struggles, pains, sorrow, and all the rest of it. This is not a gloomy picture. You can paint it more beautifully in colours, descriptively make it more attractive, but this is a fact. So shouldn't we understand life first, the living, and then come to understand what is death? You understand? Not the other way round. What will you give, not financially, what will you give to find out how, in what manner one can live totally differently? - not pursue some other quacky nonsense, a new painting, new poems, new dances, and all the rest of that immature, childish stuff. And the speaker is not intolerant, he just sees all this going on. So can we realizing what our life is, the actual life of existence on this earth, bring about a mutation, not a change, complete reversal, whatever it is, the thing that one has lived is living, is completely ended and something new can take place?

Therefore we have to enquire together into what is continuity, what is it that continues in our life, living? Memory, is it? Continuity, a series of successions of events, experiences, the me, the persona, the ego, is a bundle of memories. One mightn't like that idea. One wants something more than mere memories, and wanting more, something beyond memories is another formation of memories - right? One is not satisfied with this memory but wants some other memory. So this continuation, which we call living, is a series and successions of events, memories, experience, all that bundle is you. And continuity is that which is known. How scared we are of something ending to all that. One has lived a long life of experience, knowledge, one has travelled all over the place, God knows why but one has, and you talk, judge, evaluate, you know all that. And we never enquire what is continuity and what is ending? Ending voluntarily something that you hold dear - you understand my question? Are we asking each other that question? Suppose one is greatly attached to a person, to a conclusion, that conclusion however historical, dialectical, Marxist, Leninist, bla, bla, all that, one is attached to all that like a limpet. [Tape turns over] Can one voluntarily, easily, let go? That is what death means. You don't argue with death. You don't say, "Please give me another couple of days so that I can do everything orderly", it is there at your door.

So can one understand continuity and give to that continuity an end? You understand my question? To us attachment means a great deal. It is the most satisfying common experience to be attached to the earth, to certain beliefs, certain dogmas, certain rituals, certain habits and so on. One is greatly attached to a house, to furniture, to a habit. Can one become aware of it and end it completely in that awareness? Not the day after tomorrow but now as we are sitting here, becoming aware of all that, the explanations, the reality, not the description but the fact of this constant demand for continuity. Sexual continuity, the continuity of possessions, continuity of family, continuity of one's deep experiences, all that coming to an instant end. That is death. So not wait for death when you are sixty, eighty, ninety, but end it each day, live with death. Don't be... the speaker is saying something tremendously involved in this, not just a lot of words put together. To live with something, a life that is constantly ending everyday, every minute so there is no continuity of the past, or the future. There is only this ending which is death. And to live that way. Go on Sirs. Don't think about it, see the truth of it. Thought is not - can create, put together a lot of things but thought cannot deceive death. So if one realizes the immense significance of living with that ending which is called death in our daily life then there is real transformation, real mutation even in the brain cells, because the brain cells carry all our memories, all the past and all the rest of it. So can we live that way? Not pretend, not

"I must make an effort" - you don't make an effort to die! Unless you jump out of the eighteenth floor and you say, "So far, so good" [Laughter]

And also we should talk about together what is religion, what is the nature of the brain that lives religiously? Religion has become very important in our lives. You may be atheists, you may say, "Well it is all nonsense, some stupid priest preaching about some nonsense." You may shun all that but yet there is this inward demand, inward saying, "After all, what is all this about, this living and dying, this pain, this anxiety, what is it all about? Who created it? God? Nature? The first cell?" and so on. So religion is concerned not with all the rubbish, circus that is going on, whether in Rome, or in England, or in Benares in India, or in the Buddhist countries, it is all put together by thought, and therefore very, very, very limited. So we have to ask what is religion and creation? What is creation? Is there a difference between creation and invention? We were talking the other day with an excellent doctor, really first-class doctor, not a doctor who makes money but good doctor with a good brain. He was saying there is a certain part of the brain that can always be activated. I may be misrepresenting, careful, don't accept entirely what the speaker is saying about that. There is a certain part of the brain, he mentioned some technical word which I didn't know, that as one gets ill that gets a little bit dull, as one gets older that gets still more dull. And whether that inner part of the brain can be revived, made alive - right? Don't accept it. Don't go to sleep. We were talking about it - I won't go into it now because it is too complex. So what is invention and what is creation? Religion is concerned with this. And can the brain, which is conditioned, shaped, moulded by all kinds of things, community, what you read, what you hear, all the priests that been promulgating some ideas, some worship, some gods, all that has conditioned our brain. Can our brain, yours and... our brain, can that brain ever understand what is creation? Or it is based fundamentally on knowledge, which is experience, gathering, learning, memorizing and so on? Can that brain understand that which is not measurable? You understand? Are we somewhat together in this?

We measure - right? We measure, which means compare, judge, evaluate, we are always comparing ourself with something else. Comparing one painter against another painter, one poem against another poem, or Beethoven against Bach and so on, Mozart, let me include Mozart in it. So is invention - is not invention based on knowledge? Please we are talking about it together. If there is no knowledge there is no invention. We must have a background of knowledge to find something new, is that creation? Or is creation something totally out of time and thought? This has been one of the problems, probably the greatest problem of a religious brain, religious quality. We will never use the word meditation any more. I hope you don't mind. That word implies also measurement in Sanskrit as well as in etymological dictionaries. Measurement. Not only measurement of cloth and all the material things, but also measuring ourselves against something. Measurement was invented by the Greeks and probably before them, and that without measurement there is no technological world. And we carry on that same principle in ourselves, we are always measuring how we are today and hope tomorrow will be the same or wish it to be different. It is always comparing, judging, evaluating. And the word, that word which has become so mutilated by the gurus who have brought various forms of meditation - we won't discuss that word any more because it has become a stupid word. Sitting in a certain posture, breathing in a certain way, concentrating, and all that - making tremendous effort to achieve what? Some carrot before the donkey?

So we should be concerned with not how to make the brain still, that is fairly easy. But to be concerned with total attention, not attention to or about something, the quality of attention, which is different from concentration, entirely different. Concentration is effort, focussing on one thing, or several things, which becomes a habit like the pilots in the air. So is it possible to be attentive? And in that there is no hypocrisies, no pretensions. You are attentive. And in attention there is complete silence, when you attend. And in that attention there is no border, it is attending. There is not, "I am attending", there is only attention. Please consider, take counsels together about this.

So what is creation? Not the first cell, nor how we ? and all that. We have said God created all this. On the contrary we have made God our image, out of what we are we have made that poor chap up there! We have given him all the qualities which we lack, mercy, charity, love, omnipresence, intelligence, and all the rest of that business. What is creation? Can the brain, which is the centre of all our nerves, all our activity, all our existence, however small it is, can that brain understand the immensity of creation? Or there is something beyond the brain. Now careful please, don't accept anything the speaker is saying. That is the first thing one has to learn, never accept anything so-called spiritual. That's sheer nonsense. There is no spiritual authority. The authority of a doctor, scientist, that is a different matter, the policeman has authority, especially in Switzerland! Tremendous! We were caught in it once! Is the brain capable of really seeing that which is not measurable? We can talk about it, we can invent it, we can say there is the immeasurable, all that means a lot of words. But we are asking a different question altogether: can the brain, which is made up of time, memory, thought, experience, all the rest of it, can that brain ever understand that which is limitless? You understand my question? It is really... Or there is something else which is the mind, not the brain. Don't invent, then we are lost. We are asking each other: is there something which we will call the mind for the moment, we may change the word, is there a mind which is not the brain? Is there such a thing which alone can see that which is immense? And then that mind can communicate to the brain, but the brain cannot communicate to it? You have understood? We are asking each other. The brain as we know has been made very small, though it has got immense capacity. The computer is something extraordinary. It is going to probably take over our lives, that is probably the new industry. The computer will shape our lives. It is already doing it quietly, slowly, we are unaware of it. We have talked to a great many of these experts, computer experts who are building it. They are not concerned with what happens to the human brain. You understand my question? They are concerned with creating it - not creating, building it - that's a better word. When the computer takes over our lives what happens to our brains? They are better, far quicker, so rapid, in a second they will tell you a thousand memories. So when they take over what is going to happen to our brains? Gradually wither? Or be thoroughly employed in amusement? In entertainment? Please face all this for God's sake, this is happening. All the long sports record on the television, it is getting longer and longer. They spend ten minutes on cricket, and two minutes on what is happening in South Africa. So the entertainment industry is taking over. Please face all this. And religious entertainment, that has taken over too. So we are being entertained all the time. And we treat meeting here as part of that. I assure you it is not. It is terribly serious all this.

So can the brain ever understand the universe? It can say Venus is so much gas, so much etcetera, etcetera, but the description, the quality, the taste of it is not Venus, the beauty of it, the extraordinary quietness of it. And can our brain, to understand all that immensity be quiet? - not everlastingly chattering, chattering, chattering. Can that brain become extraordinarily simple and therefore extraordinarily subtle? And if that brain is capable of that subtleness, that immense sense of great simplicity, of time/thought and all the rest of it, then perhaps that mind which is not the brain can communicate to it. Then the brain cannot communicate to that obviously. And we are doing our very best to communicate with that, doing all kinds of tricks, all forms of controls, sacrifice, taking vows, taking - right? And that thing can never - one can never touch it. And the religious mind, religious brain always has the background of great silence and solitude.

We have finished. Will you kindly get up so that I can get up too?

THE ROLE OF A FLOWER BROCKWOOD PARK A TV INTERVIEW OCTOBER, 1985

Interviewer: For years people have invented and endured all kinds of disciplines, deprivations and discomforts in the hope of achieving enlightenment. Spending a week under canvas in Hampshire hardly ranks with some of the great sacrifices that litter the history of practically every religion. The atmosphere here at Brockwood Park is that of the international camp site. The only ceremonies and rituals performed are self- imposed. The man that more than three thousand people have come to hear has rejected all of the panoply and dogma imposed by organised religion, he has even rejected the role for which he was groomed, Messiah. He is Jiddu Krishnamurti.

Listener: I have come to hear Krishnamurti.

Interviewer: You are first in the queue, how long have you been waiting for?

Listener: Since about ten fifteen last night.

Interviewer: Why was it important to get there quite that early?

Listener: To be close.

Listener: He invites one to have a conversation with him. He is always saying, can we discuss together, this, that and the other, and this is an invitation really to participate. And that you can't do if you are a quarter of a mile down the tent.

Listener: He is very profound, and I think if you can listen to him something in your brain might start happening.

Listener: It probably shouldn't be necessary to come every year, once you've heard it you've heard it, but it's like looking at a mountain or a tree, it's good to come.

Interviewer: Now in his ninety-first year Krishnamurti has been described as one of the greatest philosophers and teachers of all time, a role he can hardly have anticipated fifty-six years ago, when to the profound shock of his devoted followers, he announced he was not the Messiah, and dissolved the organisation of which he was the head.

Krishnamurti never refers to himself as, I, always as K, or the speaker. So what is the role of the man they have come to hear?

Krishnamurti: What is the role of a flower? It just exists. And those who like to go and look at it, smell it and like it, say, what a beautiful flower it is, it exists.

Interviewer: Krishnamurti presents a calm and conventional exterior, with a stunning lack of pomp and ceremony he sits, very upright and very still on a hard straight backed chair, and talks without notes and without preparation for at least an hour. Looking at this slight unassuming figure it is hard to believe his bizarre and extraordinary history. He was born in 1895, the eighth child of a Brahmin family, the highest caste at a time when the system was rigidly observed. He was very close indeed to his mother, who, before he was born, said she had a premonition that he would be in some way remarkable. She died when Krishnamurti was ten years old and the family moved to Adyar, near Madras. It was here living in extreme poverty that he was spotted by Charles Webster Leadbeater, a leading figure in the Theosophical Society. Theosophy was a world movement which embraced all religions. They believed that following on Buddha, Krishna and Christ the world was ready for the next incarnation of the Messiah. Its president, Annie Besant was a flamboyant figure, who fought uncompromisingly for a whole range of social reforms in Britain and India. Krishnamurti must have looked an unlikely candidate, undernourished, with crooked teeth and a vacant expression. But Leadbeater said the child had an aura of unselfishness, he was the chosen one. Mrs Besant adopted him and began grooming him for his future role by bringing him to England.

One of the first people he met was Lady Emily Lutyens, wife of the architect Sir Edwin, a committed theosophist she took him straight to the heart of her family. Her daughter Mary, now aged seventy-seven is Krishnamurti's oldest friend and his biographer. She remembers vividly the moment that Krishnamurti and his younger brother Nitya arrived in London.

Mary Lutyens: These two little boys arrived in England, my mother saw them and took enormous pity on them. They were wearing European clothes for the first time, they were in Norfolk jackets and shoes which pinched them, they looked miserable, shivering with cold, and she mothered them.

Interviewer: How did you feel about him?

Mary Lutyens: I didn't think he had a brain, that he was very simple, very simple minded. It's absolutely staggering to me looking back what he can do now, what's come out of him now. I just can't believe it sometimes. You wouldn't really think that every single thing he says, it may appear to be like Buddhism, it may appear to be like this, that or the other, it may be a certain bit of the Sermon on the Mount, I don't know, but he would know it, he had never read it, so everything he has discovered for himself. And what amazes me is what he has found in himself from that very vacant, certainly very unintelligent young man.

Interviewer: Krishnamurti and Nitya were introduced to a rich and aristocratic Edwardian London. Of the two brothers Nitya was considered the quicker and brighter. His death some years later was to affect Krishnamurti deeply. Over the following years the brothers travelled all over Europe, to America and Australia. Theosophists everywhere eagerly awaited the day when Krishnamurti would assume the role for which he was destined.

Krishnamurti had a fascination for all things mechanical. He taught Mary Lutyens how to drive; the relationship blossomed. Was she in love with him?

Mary Lutyens: Yes, I had been in love with Nitya, tremendously, he was the love of my life and then I suppose I was in love with Krishna after Nitya's death. He wrote wonderful letters and unfortunately I destroyed all his letters to me.

Interviewer: Was there a point at which he ever really believed that he was going to be the new Messiah?

Mary Lutyens: Yes, definitely. He did believe. And there was a wonderful occasion when we had all been in Sydney under Mr Leadbeater and we came back for the Jubilee convention at Adyar, that was its fifty year, I suppose, in 1925, and it was rather expected that the Lord would speak through him for the first time. And I was there and he was speaking at 8.0 o'clock under the banyan tree, it was a wonderful place, and he was talking about when he comes - which he used to talk about in those days, when he comes - and he suddenly changed to saying, 'I come' and it was an absolutely thrilling moment.

Interviewer: Krishnamurti was extremely grateful to all those who had such a trusting faith in him. He tried his best to please them, going to huge Theosophical gatherings, and undergoing, for him, the torture of getting up and speaking in public. Obviously the Theosophists influenced him but it seems only superficially. All the time he was working out his own philosophy, his own view of how to arrive at the truth. The time bomb had begun to tick. In 1929 at a vast gathering of Theosophists at Ommen in Holland it exploded.

Mary Lutyens: I think it was in the morning he spoke up and said, I am now going to dissolve the Order of which I happen to be head. You can go and join another Order if you want to, I don't want followers. If there is one person who understands it can do more good than all these three thousand people here. And it was a big and very rich organisation and he gave it all completely away, all the land, and all the property and the Castle Eerde that had been given, he gave it all back to the owners. And he divested himself of all property. One of the things, the very lovely speech that he gave on that occasion, was to say, Truth was a pathless land, you cannot get to it by any path whatever.

Interviewer: In what became his most famous speech, Krishnamurti said, 'This is no magnificent deed because I do not want followers, and I mean this. The moment you follow someone you cease to follow truth. I am concerning myself with only one essential thing, to set man free. I desire to free him from all cages, from all fears, and not to found religions, new sects, nor to establish new theories, and new philosophies.' The speech was such a shock to many of the followers that they turned away from the man from whom they had expected so much. Others took a different view; today one of those early devotees travels every year from New Zealand to hear him speak, Basil Gossage.

Basil Gossage: To some it was a very traumatic experience, the end of the world. In my own case I thought, well, if K has got the - pardon the phrase - the spiritual guts to do that, to say, I am disbanding the Order, it is not necessary, truth is a pathless land, I thought, well he'll do me. At least he is one hundred per cent honest. That's been born out over fifty-five years.

Interviewer: Krishnamurti has developed and expanded his teaching but he still rejects all organised religion.

Krishnamurti: You see we are now trying to impose morality on people. Right?

Interviewer: Many religions have tried.

Krishnamurti: I know, I know. They have failed. Why?

Interviewer: You tell me, why?

Krishnamurti: Because they are based on some belief which has no value at all, on some dogma, faith, and do this, don't do that - that's what religions have done.

Interviewer: They would say they are all different ways, different paths.

Krishnamurti: Ah, that's all the good old game, different paths. Because I am a Hindu and I say, that's my path, you are a Christian and you say that's your path. It's nonsense. Path to what? They say to god, to truth, as though fixed, god and truth are stationary.

Interviewer: Aren't they?

Krishnamurti: A living thing can't be stationary.

Interviewer: The people who come to the gatherings are a disparate bunch of all nationalities, rich and poor, no one ever counts how many come and though there is a collection no one is charged admission. If they have anything in common it seems to be an intellectual rather than a spiritual approach to life, though Krishnamurti teaches that too much thought is one of man's biggest problems.

Are they expecting you to be their authority, do you think?

Krishnamurti: Partly. And partly also they want somebody to tell them what to do.

Interviewer: They must be very disappointed when they don't.

Krishnamurti: Yes. Not disappointed, they say, well what the devil is he talking about. Or, say, I must understand what he is talking about. You are not understanding somebody, you are understanding yourself.

Listener: I feel I understand intellectually, but actually in my life I think it is rather limited. I mean the actual - it hasn't changed me completely, that's what I mean. When I hear him I think I understand completely what he is saying in terms of the words he uses and so on, but it doesn't have its corresponding effect in my life.

Interviewer: Why is that?

Listener: I don't know, I think the self seems to be so strong, and one resists it so completely.

Listener: He really is nobody. And if we could understand that completely that might change our lives. But we don't.

Interviewer: What do you get out of coming then?

Listener: Pardon?

Interviewer: What do you take away from a week here?

Listener: That's the whole problem, we all want to have something, that's the problem. It's understandable though but that's our problem, we are greedy, we want it. And may be that works too. If you really want it you might get it.

Interviewer: It being what?

Listener: If you don't really want it you won't get it.

Interviewer: It being what?

Listener: I don't know, what do you want?

Listener: It depends how you listen. He is very repetitious if you don't really listen and you are just aware of the words and the superficial meaning; whereas if you really listen, you can say that the bird singing in the garden is repetitious, the blackbird sings the same week after week, but if you really listen it's always new. And the same thing with Krishnamurti, if you really listen it's new.

Krishnamurti: There is an art of listening, when you listen to Beethoven or Mozart and so on, you listen, you don't try to interpret it, unless you are romantic, sentimental and all that, you absorb, you listen, there is some extraordinary movement going on in it, great silence, great depth and all that. So similarly if you can listen, not only with the hearing of the ear, but deeply, not interpret, not translate, just listen.

Interviewer: When they all leave the tent and they say, what he really meant was.

Krishnamurti: Then you are lost.

Listener: I remember when I listened to him for the first time it was nearly impossible because I couldn't accept what he was saying.

Interviewer: Why?

Listener: Because it's very strong, he throws you back to all your things you can't accept. You see you are greedy, you are jealous, you are all that, and you know you are. But when he throws you back at this you say, no, I don't like to see that. Now after some years I got very used to look at this because I wanted to, because it got really very much easier to accept it than running away from it because if I run away from it I got always more fear and fear because the thoughts go round and round. So now I would say I don't know if I understand him, but I understand myself a little bit better.

Krishnamurti: Our brain is very limited. Our brain is so heavily conditioned by the scientists, by propagandists, by religion, by all the historical events, whether it is Lenin or somebody else, our brains are conditioned. And we live in that condition. Right? And that conditioning is creating havoc in the world.

Interviewer: Is there a way out of that?

Krishnamurti: Yes there is. That requires a great deal of enquiry, you cannot just say, well, tell me in two words.

Interviewer: People have tried to say in two words things like, love one another, turn the other cheek, but there are no easy solutions?

Krishnamurti: Of course not. But you see, is there an easy solution for a blade of grass that grows in the cement? There is a path there, and you see grass pushing, pushing, pushing, if it has life it goes through. Right? A blade of grass. As our brains are terribly limited, our life is limited. Right? And can that brain which has evolved through millennia, can that brain radically change?

Interviewer: Do you think that he is very insulated and protected by this life style, that he doesn't really understand the problems that most people face.

Mary Lutyens: I think he does, but I think he feels that they make problems where there needn't be problems, by not actually seeing what their problems are. I think people do make problems that aren't necessary. And I don't see that it makes him any - they expect him to dress, perhaps some people, in sack cloth and ashes, and grow his hair and his beard, but does that really make you a more religious person?

Interviewer: Is it possible that someone could come here to one of the talks, hear what you say, hear in himself, or herself, the truth and then go away and live in this quick result, quick society. Can the two co-exist?

Krishnamurti: Of course. This has been one of the questions that has been troubling people. Can I live in this monstrous society, immoral, corrupt and all the rest of it, with complete honesty by myself? Of course you can. So you have to ask, what is society. Right? Is society different from me? Or I am society? I don't know if you follow this.

Interviewer: Yes.

Krishnamurti: I am society, I have created the awful thing. I am part of it. Society is not different from me. Right? So I don't reform the outer circle, social reform, you know all the political game that is going on. First I put my house in order - my house, deeply, my house in order, and then there will be order out there. If you and I, all of us who are listening, put our house first in order we have created a new society.

Interviewer: It's a message that Krishnamurti believes could radically change the world in which we live, even if only a few of the thousands who listen actually understand. What happens in the tent is intended to be a conversation, but only rarely do the audience actually respond. They sit almost as rigid as the speaker, grappling with his often enigmatic utterances. Few of them probably have any idea of Krishnamurti off stage, of his love of good clothes and pleasant treats.

Mary Lutyens: You should see him when he comes to London.

Interviewer: Why?

Mary Lutyens: How elegant he looks then.

Interviewer: What does he like to do when he comes to London?

Mary Lutyens: He goes to his tailor, and he comes up for the dentist, and we always have lunch at Fortnum and Masons in a very quiet place at the top, the fourth floor, and to get his hair cut. Otherwise he hates London.

Interviewer: A lot of people would be horrified to think that someone that is preaching self-effacement, self-discovery, actually enjoys all those material and worldly things.

Mary Lutyens: He doesn't tell you to give up happiness, or to give up joy. I mean if you enjoy doing something, for goodness sake do it.

Interviewer: Krishnamurti leads a life untroubled by money worries, like the queen, he has distanced himself from it, owing none and handling none. His personal expenses are met by friends and the organisation of all the books and conferences is done by the Krishnamurti Foundation, a registered charity. The conference is held in the grounds of the Krishnamurti School; here in an enormous marquee K plays host.

Krishnamurti: I have forgotten the name of it, you know, from Japan.

Listener: Macrobiotic.

Krishnamurti: Macrobiotic, that's it. Go crazy on that! As one goes crazy about yoga and all rest of it.

Laughter is part of seriousness. Right? If you don't know how to laugh and look at the sun and the trees, the dappled light, you are not quite human being. If you are merely churchy serious on Sunday then it is not serious. Laughter, smiles, that sense of humour, enjoying good jokes, not vulgar, but really good jokes.

Interviewer: The jokes Krishnamurti makes in public go rather sparse, but they along with everything else he says is enshrined for ever on videotape. Modern technology is giving an advantage to Krishnamurti denied to past gurus, philosophers and messiahs. Every interview he does, every speech he makes, is recorded and left unedited. Immediately after his morning speech at Brockwood for twenty three pounds people can buy a copy of the event. So even after his death there need be no interpreters. What impact do you think having the videos will have on the future?

Listener: May be we can avoid that it is going to be spoilt, the original. Like we talked about a little while ago, may be the whole Christianity would have been different if there had been videos in the time of Jesus Christ.

Interviewer: What do you think will happen when he dies?

Basil Gossage: I don't know. There will be interpreters, there will be people who will want to build organisations, but the beauty of it is we have these video tapes. They used to mistranslate the Bible, didn't they, say he said this, he said that, but the video tapes can't lie, they are there for posterity. It will go on with the individual, it must do.

Interviewer: How long are you going to carry on doing it for?

Krishnamurti: I have been asking people around, friends of mine, I say, the moment I am gaga stop me! I don't know. I have got plenty of energy, because you don't carry all the burden of the past - which is very nice.

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC TALK 29TH DECEMBER 1984

We would like to point out that this is not an entertainment, either emotionally, romantically, or ideologically. And this is important to understand, if you will. We are not propagating any ideas, ideals, no system, or philosophical concepts or theories. We are going together to not only investigate but also to observe without analysis, without prejudice, without any kind of previous conclusions, observe very carefully, objectively what human beings throughout the world have become.

Psychologically after - according to the scientists and archeologists and biologists and so on - we have lived on this earth for perhaps a million years and definitely between forty five and fifty thousand year as human beings. During this long interval of time we are, after this so-called evolution - not only biologically but psychologically which is much more important to understand than biologically - it appears that we are as barbarous, as cruel, as vicious, hurting, violent, superstitious as we were fifty thousand years ago. We have perhaps become more sophisticated in our superstitions, in our worship, in our temples, in our churches and mosques and so on, but essentially we are what we have been many thousands of years ago. Religiously we are broken up, we belong to various sects, gurus, believing all kinds of rot. And also we have broken up the earth geographically and nationally. You are all Indians, I believe, or you are all British, Catholics, Americans or Russians. We are tribal worshippers. These are all facts. We are not exaggerating. These are obvious perceptible, objective realities.

And we have had wars for the last fifty thousand years. There you took a club and killed a man, now we have evolved, you can kill millions and millions with one bomb. We have progressed technologically. Technologically we have advanced tremendously, incalculably, and there is no end to technology - the most complicated machines, the computers, and the terrible things of war. But as human beings we are what we are: narrow, bigoted, superstitious, petty, concerned with ourselves. And in all this self-interest is the major factor of all the people in the world.

One hopes that you are listening to all this carefully. Not that one must accept what is being said, one must have a certain quality of doubt, scepticism, question, demand to find out, not remain in our own petty little aggressive believing, and not believing, worshipping our petty little gods whom we have invented. We must look at the world as a whole, holistically, not as Hindus, Buddhists, Tibetans, you know, all that business. Can we do this? Because we have reached a point in our evolution where there must be tremendous change, otherwise we are going to destroy ourselves, not only through wars, through poisonous gases. We have had an example of it recently in this country. We are very deliberately destroying the earth, the earth which is so beautiful, so productive, that is nourishing us.

And also we have lost touch with nature, with the trees, with the flowers, with the vast valleys and the dark rivers. It means nothing to us. We are so willing to cut down any tree for our convenience, especially in this country, desert is spreading because of lack of fuel, over population and so on. These are all obvious, daily facts.

And so we have reached a point as human beings where we must wipe the slate clean and begin again. We mean by 'beginning again', not looking back into history - history after all is the story of ourselves - and that story of past humanity is in us, in each one of us, it is a vast complex book, which is ourselves, each one of us. This book we must read for ourselves, nobody on earth or in heaven can teach you how to read that book, nobody can help you, including the speaker - most emphatically. Because we have all been helped down the ages; various teachers, various gurus, various faiths, complicated sophisticated theories, and we want to be helped, not only by the psychotherapists, which is perhaps natural, but also we want to be helped from the outside, some outside agency, from a book. If you observe yourself very carefully I am sure you want to be helped. Don't you? Don't you want to be helped? If you really faced it, looked at it, you all want to be helped. And that's why perhaps you are here, to solve your problems, to find a new way of living, to find truth through somebody else, how to meditate, what to think. You all want to be helped. That's why temples in India are increasing, vast sums of money are spent because you are seeking help from an outside agency called god, which you have invented, and there are others who are willing to help you: the priest, the analyst, psychologists and the various gurus.

One hopes that you are actually listening to all this, not just putting it out of your mind not to listen to all this. Because when you are helped you become weak. One has the energy, the capacity to read the book, which is the history of mankind, which is yourself. This is very serious what we are saying, so please don't brush it aside. There is nobody that can help you except yourself. You can join any society, any community, form a little clique, a set, accept some theology, hoping for salvation or hoping your problems, daily problems of life, the strife, the struggle with the pain, the anxiety, the sorrow, and all the travail of mankind. We have always looked to others to help us. You have invented the masters, you have invented every kind of theory, ideal, gurus, gods, and none of them have helped you actually. You are still in pain, you still have problems, not only technological problems which are fairly simple to solve, but also psychological problems, the problem that is within the brain, the problem of the psyche, the problems of our relationship with another, the problems of ending fear, sorrow, anxiety, uncertainty. We want to find what happens after death, and the fear of death. And we have worshipped, prayed, believed, had deep faiths, and none of that has helped us. They may cover us, they may help us to escape from ourselves. And we have done that excellently, to escape from ourselves.

We have reached a point when we must not only see these facts as actual, not theoretical, but also totally, completely rely on ourselves, because nobody on earth or in heaven or in hell can save us. That's a fact. You may not like to believe it because we like comfort, both physical as well as the comfort of certainty, the comfort of clarity. But we are confused human beings. Our brains have been programmed to be a Catholic, to be a Protestant, to be a Hindu, to be a communist and so on and so on. One wonders if you actually realize all this, not verbally, not something as though it were out there, but actually in ourselves.

And one wonders whether one is serious at all. The word

'serious' has many meanings: to apply whole heartedly to something, to something that is very serious, earnest, that demands a great deal of attention, that demands a clear, objective, non-personal brain. Whether one is capable of all this. When you want money, when you want power, status, you work, you become a businessman, a lawyer, and if you will, a politician. You work, see how many hours you spend in a factory, or in an office, perhaps for fifty years in an office, and you spend enormous energy. And that very same energy you are unwilling to look at yourself, read the book of yourself. Right? Would you consider all this? I know you will come back tomorrow if you are willing or if you want to, not to be harangued, not to make you clear, nobody on earth can make your brain clear, sharp, awake, not to accept anything, so that you begin to question your own thoughts, your own activities, the way of your relationship with your wife or husband or a friend.

So can we go together - the speaker means together, you and the speaker examine our existence, our daily existence. And that existence is very, very complicated. There is no immediate answer. Oh yes, there is! There is an immediate answer to all our problems. Don't wait for me to explain it. I'll explain, I'll go into it. But one must see for oneself the immense space of time which is called evolution. And evolution has not solved anything except biologically, technologically. It hasn't solved our human problems, psychological issues. (I am sorry there is that noise, which is modern civilization and vulgarity. You can't stop it. They have voted and they are now free to express themselves.)

You see most of us believe in gradation, gradual. Of course we need time to learn a language, to learn a skill, to become an expert in programming a computer. There you need gradual process of accumulation of knowledge. There time, gradation, gradualness, is necessary. But psychologically, inwardly, we carry the same principle. That is, gradually we will achieve brotherhood, which is nonsense. Gradually there will be international naming of all nations. This gradual process is the extension of the technological knowledge, to be achieved gradually. Right? Is this clear? No? Sir, don't you have to learn, don't you have to have time to learn any skill. You need time, many months to learn really a new language. And that same sense of time, gradation, gradualness is carried over to the psychological world: we are this but we will become that. Right? We are violent now, but give us time we will become non-violent. Which is, you accept time as a factor of change. The speaker questions that, doubts that. Because we have had time, we have had forty, fifty, hundred thousand years, you have had a long time, human beings, and they have not changed; they are still self-centred, they are still anxious, uncertain, seeking security, fearing death, fighting each other, killing each other for an idea. If you don't like something which the neighbour does you kill him. The terrorists. All this is the result of long centuries of human existence. Right? This is the result of gradualness, it is called evolution, psychological evolution.

Are we clear on this matter? At least what the speaker is saying. You may not accept this. But as we said, we are together examining it. Examining the whole question of psychological evolution. Right? Are we together in this? Or are you just going off with your own thoughts, occupied with your own problems? Or are we actually listening to the obvious fact that time has not solved any of our human problems - time being evolution, psychological evolution. Perhaps biologically you have reached the point, there is no further progress, or evolution, you can't develop a fourth arm. But you have gods with a dozen arms. So we are saying clearly, definitely, psychological evolution doesn't exist at all. You understand? That's why if you see the truth of that, the actuality of that, that you who have lived on this earth for fifty thousand and more years, we are still as brutal, violent, suspicious, accepting theories, this tremendous self-interest in the name of god, in the name of meditation, and so on. That self-interest was at the beginning of time and now. So time has not changed us. Evolution, psychological evolution has not brought about a radical revolution psychologically. We have had revolutions physically: the communist revolution, the Bolsheviks revolution, the French revolution and so on. Physical revolution has not changed a thing. Look at the communist world, Russia: they have got elitism and so on. I don't have to tell you all that, you know all about it.

So do we actually clearly see this? As I said, time has not changed us, gradualness is not going to change us. That's a fact. So we have to enquire very carefully into the nature of time and thought. What is time? Please question all this, don't accept anything, from your books, from your literature, from your sacred Upanishads and all the rest, don't accept a thing but find out for yourself, because that brings freedom. It is only in freedom, complete freedom psychologically, that there is truth. Freedom, beauty and truth are together, they are not separate. They are interrelated.

And so we are together, please don't go to sleep, we are together, you with your brain, look, listen, to find out if what the speaker is saying is true. Don't accept a thing. Doubt, examine.

First of all our brain is conditioned to the idea of gradualness. That's a fact. And so we are going together to question, doubt, which means put aside everything that you have thought about time: time as a means of psychological achievement, psychological becoming something, you meditate in order to find and so on, psychologically, inwardly, subjectively, inside the skin as it were.

So we are going together to examine carefully what is time. Because we are used to time: time when you are living and time as death. Right? The long interval between life and death, living and death, which is many years, or one day. So what is time? Time by the watch is totally different: time as sun rising and sun setting, the time of the new moon and the full moon, the time that is necessary to climb a hill, time to paint, time to write a poem, time to talk. We are talking not of that time, not the chronological time, but the whole concept, the feeling, the inward sense of 'I have time to evolve, to become, to reach, to achieve'. We are questioning that time, not the time by the watch, chronological time. Right, is that clear? If that is not clear please we cannot go any further. Perhaps some of you will pay a little attention to what is being said. I hope all of you will.

Time is the past: all our memories, all the incidents and experiences, the pain of a thousand yesterdays. That is the memory, all that memory we carry in our brain, that is the past. Right? The present is now. The 'now' is you are sitting there, I am sitting here. But coming to this meeting, to this talk, sitting here, is the result of your past memories. Right? So time, the past modifies itself in the present and goes on into the future. Right? This is our life: past memories, which are carried in the brain, in the very brain cells themselves, and the past slightly adjusts itself to the present, modifying itself, slightly changing itself, and the past goes through the future. Right? This is clear, simple. The past is now, modified slightly, and the future is what we are now. Right? Are we seeing this? The future, tomorrow is the future, tomorrow is what we are now, so tomorrow is now, psychologically. Don't go to sleep, sirs, please. This is a serious matter. Please apply your brain, your energy to find this out.

The past is now. And the now is the future. Right? I am angry today, if I don't change that anger, the root of anger, I will be angry tomorrow. So tomorrow is now. So the future is now. Right? Do you see this? Not as a theory, not as something you hear vaguely, inattentively and perhaps you have come here because of some silly reputation, but this is a very important question, because man, and the scientists too, have thought of time as a series of movements, which is so. But we are talking of the inward sense of being, the inward sense of demanding 'I will change gradually'. That is what we are questioning, doubting.

So we are saying that the past, slightly changed in the present by circumstances, by sociological changes, economic, and so on, slightly modified, and goes on tomorrow. Tomorrow therefore is what we are now. Right? Do please see this. Therefore there is no future for me, or for you, to become something. Right? You are what you are now. After thousands of millennia upon millennia you have become what you are. And we look to time, tomorrow, a thousand tomorrows to find out, or to become something. So now, the present, contains all time. Right? See the fact of it. All the now, that is what you are now, whether you are young, or a student learning a language, learning mathematics, geography, history and all that business, and what you are now, as a human being, inwardly: your anxieties, your fears, your sorrows, your pain, your uncertainty, that is what you are now. And if you don't change now completely, tomorrow will be exactly the same, slightly modified but you will be what you are. Right? If you doubt what the speaker is saying about time, examine it quietly, take time to look, forget all that you have learnt about time, that is, gradualness. The speaker is saying there is no gradualness at all, because you are the past with all the accumulated memories and you are now what you have been, and if there is no fundamental change now you will be exactly tomorrow what you are. You will be afraid, you will have no security, or you want security, gradually you will find it, all that business.

So if there is no tomorrow psychologically then what is change? You understand my question? Let me look at it, I'll put it differently. I don't know why you don't capture it quickly. It is a fact. Why don't you take it to your heart and see the truth of it instantly? Our brains are so dull, so mechanical, so repetitive, so accustomed to our particular pattern of thinking. So we are saying if all time is now, which is immense reality if you understand it fully, then what is change? I am violent today, I have been violent for the last thousand days, thousand years, million years. And I have invented, or the clever people have invented non-violence. That is, something there to be achieved. And my tradition, my conditioning says, work for it, struggle for it, be aware of your violence and so on and so on, you know all the inventions. And then one day you will become non-violent. This has been preached by all your gurus, and your mahatmas, and your gods; and the speaker is saying you have had time psychologically, and you haven't changed, therefore gradualness has no meaning at all. That's an actuality. So how do you end violence immediately, instantly? Right? That is the question. Are we listening? Do you want to find out?

Are we all working together as the speaker is working? Are you working actually with your brain to find out? Or are you merely so used to talks, so used to being told, waiting for somebody to help you to understand the nature of time? I must go on, otherwise it is no good.

We are asking: I have been violent, I am still violent, violence is not merely physical but it is also much more psychological. Imitation, conformity, except in the physical world, in the psychological world conformity, imitation, acceptance, obedience is a form of violence, because you are denying the truth of your own understanding. So can this violence, with which one has lived for millennia, end now completely, because if there is no complete ending of it tomorrow I will still be violent? Clear? Now is that possible? We are asking you that question: is that possible? Psychologically with all the implications of violence, aggression, self-interest, the division of class, division of religions, nationalities, economic divisions and so on, all breeding violence, can all that end completely now? The speaker says, yes, it can end now completely. And you wait to hear, you want to know how. Right? That's one of the most horrible things on earth to ask 'how', psychologically. Because if you ask 'how' then there are a thousand people who will help you or tell you what to do. So please, if I may most respectfully, friendly, point out, don't ever ask 'how'. I can ask a carpenter how to hold a tool, I can ask him about the nature of the wood; if I want to study medicine I have to find out, I can ask others; but inwardly the sense of understanding one's own being, existence, in that understanding there is no 'how'. So please most respectfully don't ask, 'how. If you ask 'how' you will never be free, because freedom is necessary. So we are going to find out, discover for ourselves, not be told, whether it is possible to change, end violence completely now.

What is the nature of attention? Now we are sitting here together, fortunately the rain has stopped, we are sitting here together and listening to somebody speaking. Are you listening actually? Find out, sirs, are you actually listening? That means as a child listens to a good story, he isn't thinking about anything else, he is listening, he is so curious, so excited, wants to know who is the hero, who is the hero and who is the villain. He is full of curiosity, attention. Are you like that? Or you listen casually, pick up something here and there and at the end of it say, 'I don't know what you are talking about. Would you kindly repeat that again'? Or are you, if I may ask most politely, are you listening at all, not interpreting, not comparing, but giving your mind, your heart, all your energy to find out; listening. That is attention. Attention is like a flame. Right? Attention is like turning on a very, very bright light. And you need that attention, that complete attention in which there is no resistance, not saying, 'I will attend', 'I must learn how to attend' - which means gradualness, therefore you are not attending. Do you see all this? I wonder - one wonders if you are taking the same journey together.

So we are saying, violence can end completely with all its implication; how to live in this world without violence, without aggression, without competition, without beating somebody in your success, without hate, anger, all that violence - which is all violence - can end if you give complete attention. Attention is like a flame that burns out violence. And that attention is now, not tomorrow, not the next moment. You will say, 'Yes, I'll take it home and think it over. I understand what you mean verbally but it hasn't entered my being so I will go home and think about it'. Then when you think about it you are not attentive. Right? You think about it. Attention means now: to what you say, how you say it, whether it is double talk, say one thing and do another. So we are saying this violence, which is only one of the various complexities of human existence, that violence can totally end when there is complete attention. Please do it now as you are sitting there. Don't do it tomorrow, there is no tomorrow, psychologically. There is tomorrow because you have got to go to the office, or whatever you are going to do, but psychologically, inwardly, there is no tomorrow. That's a most marvellous thing to discover for yourself.

And where there is total attention there is no self, there is no centre from which you attend, there is only attention. Therefore that attention has no limit, it has no border, because in that attention there is no resistance. Attention is not something to be achieved. You attend.

Can we go on? Are you tired? May I ask, are you tired? Why not? Have you merely listened to the words, to some idea, some concept, or have you worked, worked in the sense watched yourself, see what you are thinking, feeling, your reactions to what is being said, therefore your whole energy is now attentive. And your brain must become tremendously active. So shall we go on? If you keep silent, I will keep silent. What we are going into next is not only what we have dealt with, time, which is so tremendously important - you understand what it means? That all existence is now. All enlightenment is not in the future, it is now. All meditation is now. Do you understand the depth of that? For god's sake.

You know our brains are the most extraordinary things. The speaker has discussed this with scientists and others. Our brain has infinite capacity. Look what it has done in the technological world: it has gone to the Moon, it has invented a bomb that can kill millions of people at one blow, it can destroy the earth; and a great surgeon, see what extraordinary things he has done, new heart, new liver, and so on. And also look at what man has done in communication, the rapidity of a telephone call to New York, or California, in a minute. Extraordinary capacity the brain has. Right? Agree? Do you see the extraordinary capacity? And that capacity which is so immense has been limited by our self-centredness.

Corruption doesn't begin with black marketing, passing money under the table, bribing. That's a mere symptom. Corruption begins when there is self-interest. So, sir, when there is concern with your own achievement, with your own passion, with your own urges of desire and so on, when there is self-interest the root of corruption is there. And corruption as self-interest is limiting the psychological capacity of the brain. You understand, sirs, all this? The mirror in which you see yourself exactly as you are, the mirror that reveals everything about you. A good mirror doesn't distort. And that mirror exists, not outside; that mirror is your relationship with another, with your wife, with your husband, with your boss, with your servants, if you have them, unfortunately. That mirror is the most marvellous thing in which you see yourself. And if you pay attention to that mirror, completely watching every movement of thought, every movement of selfishness, every movement of desire, which we will go into presently, then that mirror not only shows what you are but you can then go beyond, much deeper. For the brain has the capacity to delve infinitely.

Truth is something that is not fixed, therefore there are no paths to truth. Right sirs.

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 1ST JANUARY 1985

Krishnamurti: I wonder what we mean by a new year. Is it a fresh year, a year that is totally afresh, something that has never happened before? When we say something new, though we know that there is nothing new under the sun, when we talk about a happy new year, is it really a new year for us? Or is it the same old pattern repeated over and over again? Same old rituals, same old traditions, same old habits, a continuity of what we have been doing, still are doing, and will be doing this year.

So, is there anything new? Is there anything that is really afresh, something that you have never seen before? This is rather an important question, if you will follow it - to turn all the days of our life into something which you have never seen before. That means a brain that has freed itself from its conditioning, from its characteristics, from its idiosyncrasies and the opinions, and the judgements, and the convictions. Can we put all that aside and really start a new year? It would be marvellous if we could do that. Because our lives are rather shallow, superficial, and have very little meaning. We are born, whether we like it or not we are born, educated - which may be a hindrance too. Can we change the whole direction of our lives? Is that possible? Or are we condemned forever to lead rather narrow, shoddy, meaningless lives. We fill our brains and our lives with something which thought has put together. This is not a sermon. Probably in all the churches of the world, New Year will be - and in all the temples and the rest of it - they will continue in the same old way, the same old rituals, pujas and so on and so on. Can we drop all that and start anew with a clean slate and see what comes out of that, with out hearts and minds?

There are all these questions here. I haven't seen them. Why do you question somebody else? Why do we have problems which we cannot solve for ourselves? Why do we seek help from outside? Not that we should not put questions, we should put questions, we should demand, we should doubt and all the rest of it, but from whom do you expect an answer? There are these several questions here. But I don't know what they are. But can we not solve these questions, these problems, for ourselves?

What is a problem? A problem according to the dictionary meaning, is something thrown at you. The meaning of that word etymologically means something thrown at you, a problem. We never look at a problem anew because our brains are conditioned to the resolution of problems. May I go into it a little bit? From childhood, a child has a problem: how to read, to write, goes to school and there he is educated to resolve problems. You know all this, don't you? Don't look surprised. It is a rather rainy morning. You understand my question? From childhood, they are trained to have problems. They go to school and there are dozens of problems. They must learn how to read, and write, how to do mathematics. And later on geography and history, and the examinations. It all becomes a problem. And so the brain is conditioned to solve problems because it has been trained from childhood to have problems and to find answers to those. Do we understand each other, a little bit at least?

Suppose I have a problem. First of all, I never ask, 'Why do I have problems?' Whether it is problems of relationship, problems of occupation and so on and so on - specially psychological problems. My brain from childhood has been educated, conditioned, cultured, to have problems. Do look at this, please. And then, all life becomes a problem. What to do, how to act, what to think. About death, if there is life after death? Our whole brain is conditioned to not only having problems in itself but also problems put upon it. Right? So it is continuously having problems. So life as a whole, whether science, mathematics, or physics and so on, all becomes a problem because our brain is conditioned to problems.

It is not important to solve problems but to have no problems at all with regard to the psychological world and the brain. You understand? Am I making myself clear? If not I'll go into it very carefully. Only a brain that has no problems can solve problems. That is, only a brain that is free from problems can go into problems and resolve them, but if the brain itself is conditioned to live with problems then it can never solve any problem. Politically - look at the world - what is happening. They are solving one problem, in the very solution of that problem, another problem arises. Because the politician's mind is like ours, conditioned to problems. I wonder if you understand this? It is fairly clear. So the question then is, is it possible for the brain to uncondition itself and to have no problems at all. That is, if a problem arises, solve it, but not with a brain that is already conditioned to problems.

Suppose I have no problems - as a matter of fact, I don't have any. Not that I'm old, but I don't feel like having problems. It's as simple as that. So my brain - I'm not talking about myself, but I am talking about somebody else, I am talking about K, somebody outside sitting here. So it's not a personal worship. As long as I have problems, I can never solve any problem. Do we see that? Then my question is: can I be free of this condition of having problems first and then resolve problems? You follow? So my question is: can my brain uncondition itself so that it is free and being free it can solve problems. Not that in the solution of one problem, another problem arises. It is the end of a problem.

Suppose K hates somebody (I hope not) - hates somebody, that becomes a problem. And my brain being conditioned to problems, asks, 'What can I do about hate? How am I to stop it? Can I control it? Can I suppress it? Can I run away from it? I must be kind. I must be generous.' Which all becomes a problem. You follow? It goes round and round in circles with problems. But K is asking himself whether the brain can be free of all problems, sexual, relationship, problems of god, problems of rituals, problems of nations, war, peace. So that it is completely free of that. Is that possible? Please put that question to yourself. Is it possible to be so completely free of problems, in which there is no offence or defence?

K says it is possible. Don't accept it, because if has no meaning for you if you accept it, it is the assertion of some idiot, and may be utterly wrong. So you have to investigate your own brain so that it is really free of problems. Then the question arises: who is to free the brain from its conditioning? Then we say, it must be an external agency, god or a guru or some angel, or some ideology or an authority. In the very process of asking is it possible to free from its own conditioning, in that very asking of that question we invent a guru, an authority. So I won't ask that question. I wonder if you understand all this. I won't ask that question. I'll say, 'Who is it that is asking that question, whether it is possible for me to be free of my conditioning, who is it that is asking the question and who is it that is going to answer?' I've put aside all authority, all gurus, all books, all gods, all angels, all outside agency because they have no meaning. Then I ask myself, 'Who is it that is putting the question and who is it that is going to receive the answer?' We are working together in this, or are you just being silent?

Now comes the complication. If you are willing to be prepared for complication, we'll go into it. Now most of us put a question and then wait for an answer. And if the answer is not convenient or comfortable or if it makes one rather shy, we put it aside. So you ask a question and you wait for an answer. And the answer is according to your background. Right? That's clear.

Now, put the question and leave it alone. That is; I've put the question whether my brain can be free of all problems so that it can resolve any problem that comes. A problem is a challenge, challenge of death, challenge of grief, fear and so on. I've put a question and if the question is serious, as it is, any reply to it will be according to my conditioning. Right, sir? You are rather uncertain.

My brain has been educated to problems. Right? And if I put that question, is it possible for the brain to be free of all problems, the immediate response is, 'Oh, it is not possible', or 'It is possible'. Then 'how'? So asking the question 'how' is creating another problem. 'I prefer that guru instead of that guru', 'I prefer that book to that book.' So I am caught in that. So what I do is to put the question and it's a very serious question 'Is it possible for the brain to be totally free of all problems?' That's a tremendous question. And I won't seek an answer for it. That very question becomes tremendously important. Do you understand? That very question has its own vitality. I wonder if you understand all this? Are you doing that with me? That is, I have put the question, I don't seek an answer. Careful sir, this requires great attention; not just say, 'I have put the question' and just wait. I have put the question in all seriousness and therefore with all attention, and I leave the question alone. I'm not interfering with it, I am not saying, 'What is the answer?' If the question is serious, and has tremendous vitality, significance, then the question itself begins to answer. Not - I answer or you answer. Is this clear? Are you doing it now?

We are talking of psychological questions, not technological questions like, 'Will I have a job, will I pass my exams?' and all that kind of thing. So the question is important. Not the answer. Because if the question has great urgency, great intensity, passion behind that question, then that very question will flower and answer, or wither away.

But what we do is, 'Can I uncondition my brain? Is that possible? Tell me how.' Then that becomes a problem. Have you understood? Can we go on?

There are several questions here. I don't know what they are. Serious or flippant or meaningless. Who is going to answer those questions? Have you put these questions in order that K should answer or you have put the question and the question must be investigated, not the answer, because in the question lies the answer, not outside the question. I wonder if you understand.

I want to know if god exists. Not I, K, somebody else wants to know if god exists. How will you find out? If you're really honest, if you are really serious, belief, faith has no place, or tradition, 'I believe in god.' 'I believe I should be very tall', is as good as that. I want to find out if god exists. Which means I must have a brain that is capable of putting aside all that has been said before, whether in the Upanishads, the Gita, or some other book, the Koran or the Bible. The brain must be totally free to find out. Like a scientist. If a scientist is investigating a hypothesis, he cannot say, 'I remember these things. I will find the answer.' He must be free to investigate. So, is my brain free? Not if there is god or not. Right? Is your brain free? Or frightened, anxious, lonely? As long as those factors exist, you will never find out. So god is not important at all. But whether there is freedom to find out. Can we go along together in this?

1st Question: I want to get at what you're saying without any stress, strain or effort. How can one do this?

K: First of all, this is a wrong question because you are asking 'how'. In so-called ethical, moral and if one can use the word 'spiritual' questions when you ask the question 'how' then you become immoral. When you ask 'how', what is implied in the 'how'? Please, I am asking you. When you ask 'how', either you are asking for a technological skill, then there is an instructor, there is a professor, there is a mathematician who has gone into it for many years, and so on, you can ask him 'how'. But when you ask 'how' about psychological matters whom are you asking 'how'? That means you are asking somebody outside of you, a guru, a poor chap like K, or somebody like that. You are asking something from somebody else, and the somebody else is like you, full of opinions, full of achievements, success, spiritually he has meditated for fifty years, and he has kept silent for ten years. But he writes.

So if we don't ask 'how' at all, which is really important, then you have to find out for yourself. Right? The man who knows more psychologically is still seeking the more. You understand? I wonder if you get this? Is it too early in the morning? Or is it too late in the evening? You see, you are all wanting 'the more', 'the better', which is, measurement. And can we be free of measurement, which means comparison, which means time and so on. The 'more' involves a great deal, not just achieving more, but the implications of 'the more'. So the brain is caught in measurement - psychologically. You must have measurement technologically otherwise you couldn't do anything.

Psychologically demanding the 'more' implies still 'more'. So there is always the 'more', the 'more'. That means, the whole process of time, evolution, measurement. To be free of all that. Because there is no 'more'. This is too complicated, I won't go into it.

So the questioner asks, he wants to understand K without any stress, strain or effort. A lovely question. What K is saying is not something different from what you are. He is saying, 'Look at yourself, not at the speaker', not what he says. What he is saying is only a description of what is happening in you; a description, an explanation, a verbal picture, a verbal outline. Right? But you don't look at yourself, you say 'How can I listen to you?' And I say 'Do not bother to listen to K. It's not worth it.' But listen to yourself very carefully. And to listen to yourself don't have any prejudices about what is going to come out, don't say this is bad, this is good, this is no good, this is a lovely thought, I must keep it. Just watch yourself. And you say, 'I have no time. I have to go to the office. I come back, there is the wife, the children. I have no time to look at myself', which is nonsense. You have got plenty of time if you want to look at yourself. When you get into the bus, going from your house to the bus, you have got plenty, or sitting in the bus, or cycling along the road - one has plenty of time if you want to do something serious. But there are thousands of excuses for not being serious. So to listen or to observe yourself, and yourself is not different from the thousand, million other selves. I know we are educated to individuality. We are all separate, little bodies, separate entities, separate souls, separate atmans. Right?

I am questioning whether we are separate at all. You are brown, black, pink or blue or white. I speak one language, you speak another language. And that gives us not only a linguistic, separative feeling. "I'm a Telegu, you're a Tamilian" and all that nonsense that goes on. But are you different from anybody else? You may be tall, you may be short, you may be better employed, have better skill, those are all outward frills. You may put on a blue shirt, I may put on a white shirt. That white shirt and blue shirt make you think you are different. But are we actually different? Think it out, sirs. Are we actually different? We suffer. The American, the Russian, the Chinese, the French suffer. They are anxious as you are, as insecure as you are, seeking security, as they are. Psychologically, inwardly, we are all similar. Right? So, we are humanity. Not, 'I am K'. That is such nonsense. We are humanity. Do you know the implication of saying we are humanity? Either you say it verbally or turn it into an ideological concept, or it is an actual fact. I don't know which it is with you. Is it a concept, is it an ideal to be achieved? But the fact is you are like the rest of humanity: you go through great travail, boredom, loneliness, despair, tremendous self-interest as each one of you has. So do the Russians, so do the Americans, so do the Chinese, French and Germans, and Dutch. Right? So you are the rest of humanity. If it is not verbal or an intellectual concept, if it is not a theory, then it's an actual fact, which it is. And when it's a fact, it has tremendous significance. Then you will not kill another, for your country, for your god, for your... Because then you are killing yourself. I don't know if you follow all the implications of realizing deeply that you are the rest of mankind, you are mankind. It's not an ultimate goal, it's a fact. And can one live with that fact? That means, there's great compassion. When there is compassion, there is intelligence. Then you wipe away all nationalities, all wars. I can't kill you because you're me. I don't know if you understand all this. It has tremendous importance. Not only importance, it's a fact, and one has to live with something that has tremendous, deep significance.

So, can we go on to the next question?

2nd Question: What is myself and what is its relationship to the cosmos?

K: First of all, let's look at what is the self. What are you? Don't be frightened. We are going to strip naked, understand what the self is. The self is the name, the form, the reactions, the responses; these are biological facts, and the professions, the vocation which you would like and can't have, marriage, sex, children, the responsibility of children, the responsibility of going to the office for fifty years and earning a footling little sum and being ambitious, to have more - a better house, car, and all the rest of it. That's only the outward signs. Then inwardly, what are you? Actually what are you? Don't theorize. You can say, 'I am god', or you can say, 'There is a light in me, the atman light'. If you brush aside all that nonsense, then what are you? If you have no identification with your country, with roots in your family, roots in your knowledge (which is the most dangerous root) - if you have roots in a belief, a faith, a continuity, all that is the activity of thought. Right?

So, what are you? Memories? Be honest and deeply ruthless with yourself. Don't play tricks. What are you? You are memories. Be honest with yourself, really deeply ruthlessly honest with yourself, not with somebody else. And you're the past. Right? You are the past. That means you are the story, the history story of mankind. Which is memory. Alright, sir, can we go on? You are the past which is memory. You remember your grandmother, or grandfather, you remember your chemistry, you remember the various authors, musicians, the songs. Right? The brain is memory. So you are memory. I know it sounds terrible. You are the past and the past is all the time updating which is memory. You need memory to drive a car, for you to go from here to your house, or to your office, to recognize your poor unfortunate wife or husband - there you need memory. But why carry this immense memory which has accumulated for a thousand years or one day? As long as this memory is operating, which is the past, the self - and therefore self-interest which is the beginning of all corruption - not passing the money under the table. And in this country, especially, they are talking about eradicating corruption. Lovely, isn't it? All the politicians are going to work at it. And it is there, self-interest, in each one of us.

So the self is put together by thought which is memory. Then the question arises, if there is no memory, which is no knowledge, then what else is there left? So we begin to invent: the self being reborn, higher self, lower self, higher consciousness, lower consciousness, how to join both of them together, how to... - all self-interest, prayers, rituals, going to temples. God, what a country!

Then the question is, 'What is the relationship of the self to the cosmos?' What is cosmos? Not the astro-physicist's cosmos, or the cosmos of some great philosopher or some petty little guru. But what is the meaning of that word? Cosmos means 'order', from the Greek and so on, it is order. Chaos is the opposite. Cosmos and chaos. There is a relationship only when there is complete order in you, because that is supreme order. Universe is in supreme order, which is cosmos: sun rises, sun sets, stars, clouds, the beauty of the sunset. All that is order. And I, who live in disorder with my self-interest, want to find out my relationship to order. We are so.... First, can I put my house in order? Not, 'What is my relationship to the cosmos?' I can never find out if my house is in disorder. But once there is complete order then.... I won't go into it. It will just be theory to you.

Then my question is, 'Can I put my house in order?' Then I have to discover what is order. Order according to politicians, according to law, according to the judge, a clever lawyer, or is order something definite? Please ask these questions. Don't go to sleep. Is order a discipline? Is order a habit? Or when there is no disorder, there is order. I don't have to seek order, but I will try to understand, go into what is disorder. Are we moving together, or am I just talking? What then is disorder? Disorder basically means conflict. As long as there is conflict, psychologically, there must be disorder. Conflict exists apart from Vedantists and all the rest, put all those people aside, conflict exists when there is duality. I want this, and I don't want that. I must be this, I am this.

I am questioning, what is duality? Is there a duality at all? Except man, woman, dark, light, all that. Is there duality at all? Or is there only one thing? I am anger. Duality arises when I must not be angry. So there is only the fact and not its opposite. I wonder if you understand. The fact has no opposite. I can invent an opposite. I am angry - that is a fact. Then arises 'How to end it'. So I invent, 'I must not be'. Can I live with the fact? That is, I am angry. I'll find no excuses, no rationalizations. I am angry. I am not different from anger. I am anger. So, there is no duality. Do you understand this? If you really understand this, conflict ends and you are what you are - not what you should be. And what you are can never be changed by thought, by circumstances. You are that. You may have a different shirt tomorrow, but what is inside the shirt is always the you.

So, disorder exists when there is conflict, when there is the more, when there is the better. Violence and non-violence. Non-violence is not the fact. You can use it as a political stick, but the fact is that you are violent. To remain with the fact, let the fact answer - not you answer. I wonder if that is clear. I have explained that before. All right, you don't understand this. I'll explain it again.

When you begin to answer the fact as though you were separate from the fact then the problem arises. 'I am violent'. That is a fact. Not only physical violence - violence of hate, anger, jealousy, obedience, imitation, conformity, all that is violence, and remain. You are that violence, you can't do anything about it, therefore hold it quietly. Do you understand what I am saying? Don't move away from it. It is so. That means that you are giving entire attention to that and then when there is that complete attention, that violence is gone. You can test this out for yourself. Put your heart into it. So can there be order, not in society, but in yourself first? Because you as a human being have made this society. There is no getting away from that. With your greed, your ambition, aggression, with your self-interest, seeking power, to be at the centre of things. Don't you want to be in the centre of things, next to the Prime Minister? We are all rather childish, aren't we?

So, disorder comes to an end and then there is order. When there is that complete order you will never ask, 'What is my relationship to the cosmos?'

3rd Question: Is not psychological time a fact? While there may be no gradation for the attainment of truth, how do you question the usefulness of self-preparation for establishing a right kind of body, mind, harmony. Surely this must be a gradual process.

K: Are you really asking this question seriously? Sir, this is a very complicated question and the question reveals in itself a much more complex state. First of all, the questioner says, 'Is not psychological time a fact?' Now, question it, doubt it. Why accept it? Is there psychological time as a fact? What do you mean by time? It is now half-past eight. There is tomorrow, sun rises, sun sets, twenty four hours, and tomorrow is another morning. That is not psychological time, surely. That is ordinary chronological time. Twenty four hours a day. Right? Now what is psychological time? Of which you say 'Is it a fact'? What do you mean by psychological time? I will be there tomorrow. I hope to meet you tomorrow. Hope. I want to be beautiful. I'm not, but I want to be. The want implies time. I don't know if you understand this. Hope implies time. I must attain Nirvana, or truth. Time. I must discipline myself. Time. All those are factors involving time and more, and the questioner says, 'Is it not a fact?' An illusion can be a fact. I believe I am Napoleon. I'm convinced I'm Napoleon. And you all think I'm a crazy man. But I live in that illusion. As you do. Not Napoleons, but you have your own illusions, of grandeur, of belonging to a certain state, with a garland, a photo. You belong. So you live in illusion; god, rituals, nationality. They are all illusions. Do you question that? What is an Indian? What is India? A geographical description of a sub-continent. And you have given to that group of people living within the borders of that country tremendous importance: ancient culture 5,000 years old. Gone to smithereens now. And you take pride in all that. So does the Frenchman, the Englishman. And this is called 'factual, psychological time'. And I say there is no psychological time at all, except that thought has invented all this. I have invented, "I'm an Indian". Born in this community, in this particular part of the world. Brahmin, Non-Brahmin fighting each other, and all the rest of it.

So, I'm questioning, K is questioning this whole psychological time as evolution. I am this, I will be that next life. Or I am this, I will be different tomorrow. I've taken a resolution for a new year and I'm going to stick to it. If I can. And so on and so on. So time is a movement, as thought is a movement. So time is thought. They are not two separate processes. Time is thought. And thought and time says, I will be, I must attain Nirvana, attain Moksha, or attain illumination, liberation. And somebody says 'I have attained'. And we are gullible enough to say 'My god, what a marvellous man he is', and then worship him, or kill him. Which is the same thing. When you worship somebody, you have killed him.

So, there is no psychological time at all as evolution. Psychologically, there is no you becoming something else, or better, more. We went into that. Because the self is put together by memory. Self is the process, the centre of all thought. Right? If I had no memory, I wouldn't call myself 'self'. But to go beyond memory, beyond knowledge, is something entirely different. I won't go into that, this is not the occasion for it. And for the attainment of truth the question says, time is necessary. Clever people have invented paths to truth. You have your path, I have my path, you've a devotional path, I've a ritualistic path, paths of various kinds, Christian path, Islamic path, Hindu path, Tibetan path. Which means path leading to a goal. The goal you call truth or the Buddha or some other. A path implies a goal which is fixed. Is truth fixed, stationary, non-dynamic, static, or something tremendously alive? That which is greatly alive has no path. How can you have a path for something which moves, lives, changes, vital, full of something else? Therefore there are no paths to truth. Be clear about it, then you won't be caught in a trap. The goal is the means. The goal is not separate from the means. The communists say, some of the communists, that the means doesn't matter, get to the goal. We want a marvellous state, it doesn't matter if we kill thousands of people, or millions. We must have the goal. You understand all this?

But the goal is the means. They are not separate. And where is the goal? There? Somewhere in the distance, or is there no goal at all? I wish you would ask these questions. The moment you have a goal, a purpose, you are ambitious to achieve. Of course. But the achievement is the basis of self-interest - 'I have achieved'. Like a soldier in the army, he has achieved, he has become a general. And generals are tremendously important. So in the same way, our whole idea is to achieve - 'I have achieved Nirvana'. What a horrible statement to make. You understand? As though Nirvana, or heaven, or something immense, is to be achieved by a petty little mind - by a brain that is conditioned, frightened, anxious, limited, fearful, sorrowful - all the rest of it. How can such a brain achieve anything? It can only end all the fears, all its loneliness, it can only end all that. That's all it can do. It can't achieve something immense. Where there is self-interest, all achievement is disorder.

And the questioner says 'Is not self-preparation for the establishment of a right kind of body, mind, heart - surely this must be a gradual process.' I wonder if you can put away the whole concept of gradation which is really measurement. You can measure good cloth against bad cloth, a good car against a bad car. In this country, there are only bad cars. Sorry! May I tell a joke?

A car manufacturer of this country, a great man and fearfully rich, and all that, he goes to heaven. He goes to the gates of heaven, and the angel that is there says, 'Hey!' He says 'I'm so and so. I've built churches, temples, hospitals, schools.' The angel at the gate says, 'We know all that. All rich people do that. That's their concession to their ego. We know all that'. And the great man says, 'What am I to do now?' Each time they get into my car which I've produced they say, 'Oh, my god!' Have you got the joke? Sorry!

So, body and brain - mind to the speaker is entirely different, I won't go into that now - between the brain and the body, not the mind. Is body different from the brain? It's one instrument, isn't it? An organic whole. But we have separated the body and the brain. Then we try to establish harmony, or conflict. Why do we divide, why do we separate, break up things? As Indians, as Arabs, as the Jews. Why do we do all this? Constant separation, constant division: my family opposed to your family; I'm nearer to the centre and you're not. Why do we do all this? Answer this question to yourself, sir. Why do we break up? Everything we touch, we break up. My wife against... Go right through life. God and good and evil and you follow. There is this process of division going on all the time. We and they.

Who is creating this division? Is it thought? Of course, there is division between woman and man, that is natural. But who is creating this psychological division? The brain and the body. How absurd to divide the two. And why do we divide? That is the fundamental question. Is it thought? Of course it is thought. Apart from man, woman, light and dark, better car and worse car and so on, better material, there there must be choice, there must be measurement, there must be consideration and all the rest of it. But otherwise, why is the brain dividing? Or is the brain itself divided in itself and therefore it divides everything? Are you asking this question?

So who is responsible for this division of mankind? Outwardly, Europeans, Americans, Russians, Super-powers, lesser powers. Who is dividing all this and therefore creating tremendous chaos in the world? War is an ultimate chaos. Chaos in the sense of total disorder. Who is doing all this? Is it thought? Because thought itself is limited, because thought is based on knowledge, memory and knowledge is never complete about anything now or in the future. Knowledge can never be complete about anything. All the scientists are adding more and more and more, their knowledge is more and more, accumulating. Where there is a process of accumulation there is limitation. Knowledge is a process of accumulation and knowledge is limited. And thought is limited. And so thought is breaking up everything because thought in itself is limited: the Hindu, the Brahmin, the non-Brahmin, this political party, that political party. Nobody considers humanity as a whole. There are economic divisions, social divisions, religious divisions: I believe in Jesus, you believe in Allah. I believe in nothing, you believe in everything. And this goes on. And therefore, my ideal opposed to your ideal. And we fight and kill each other.

So thought is responsible for all this division because it wants security. You all want security, physical as well as psychological. And you have invented god, the ultimate security, which is an invention. Thought has done it because you're frightened.

So can thought end? Thought is necessary in a technological world, but thought has no place in the psychological world. That is a tremendous discovery and depth to that. Then there is no division - then you're humanity, and when you're humanity, there is compassion.

MADRAS 2ND QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 3RD JANUARY 1985

I would like to ask, if I may, why you come here. I really would like to ask. What is your, if I may respectfully ask, what is it you are seeking? What is it deeply we want? If each one of us asked that question seriously, and sustained that question, what would be your answer? Not to speak it aloud, but to find out for oneself what is it most profoundly you desire, or crave for, or pursue; or do you want to be helped to find out, not only our own nature, psychological structure of oneself, or do we merely build a scaffold of theories, suppositions, and a verbal structure behind which there is no building at all. You understand my question?

Most of us have fears, one may be mistaken, we build a marvellous scaffolding - you know what a scaffolding is. And behind the scaffolding there is almost nothing, only a verbal structure, imaginative suppositions and all that. And there is no foundation, no strong lasting building behind that scaffold. Is it that we in our daily life imagine we have lost something and pursue that imagination? Or accept some tradition and live with that tradition? Or we are very good at talking, spilling out words, and that acts as a screen to the understanding of oneself, and living with oneself.

So one wonders what it is that human beings throughout the world deeply want, deeply are seeking. Is it money? Is it some kind of power? Is it that one has taken a stand and does not wish that stand to be shaken. You understand all this? If we deeply enquire into ourselves, can we ever say what it is we find, or what it is we desire? Or one doesn't want anything at all in this world, or in the psychological world. One must have money to live by, a little money, clothes, shelter, but apart from that a professional skill, or vocation, apart from that, can we say, 'I really don't want a thing'? Can we actually say to ourselves, one must be terribly honest with oneself to say that, 'I really don't want a thing, neither heaven, nor hell, nor paradise, liberation, nirvana, or anything you like.' Can one actually say that? Or you are too timid, too anxious?

So to go back to our questions. When we were looking at the dark sky and the rain this morning, what was one's response to nature, to all the squalor, the dirt, the utter crude carelessness and indifference? It concerns all of us. What is our reaction to all that? Are we insensitive? Or if we are sensitive what can one do? And what is our relationship to society and so on? If we can put one serious question to ourselves, in comprehending that question you have answered all the questions in the world.

So let's go back to our questions, shall we.

1st Question: You have shown that thought is limited, but what other instrument of enquiry is available to man.

I haven't shown you a thing. That's a wrong supposition. We together enquired into the whole nature of thought, not the speaker has shown something to you and you accept. But rather that together, you and the speaker, went into the whole question of thought, not somebody else's thoughts but one's own thinking. And we live by thinking. Everything we do is thinking, through thought. All our emotions are recognized by thought, as bad, good, indifferent, romantic and so on. And we went into it fairly sufficiently. Perhaps we should go into it again. Because if one understands this very deeply, what is thought? Not only the thought of the so-called great scientists, the great investigators into astrophysics, into archaeology, physics, chemistry and so on. They expend thought enormously, pursue one thought after another, come to a conclusion; and that conclusion is not correct, they throw it out and go on, thinking, thinking, thinking. And the villager round the corner, who doesn't know how to read or write because he has never looked at a book, he also thinks. So thought is common to all mankind. Right? And there is no good thought and bad thought, it is still thought.

We should now together, you and speaker, enquire into it. Not I show it to you and then you accept it, which is quite absurd. But if you and K enquire into it, go into it and if you discover it for yourself as a fact then nobody can dislodge your observation. Right? Nobody can deny the accuracy of your thinking. So can we go on, explore together. I mean together. That means you have to exercise your brain - I am saying this most respectfully - exercise your brain to find out together what is thought. Not thought about something. You understand the difference between thinking and thinking about something. We generally think about something, about my job, about my business, about my wife, about my sex, about so many things. The object of thinking may vary, may be different with each person, but thinking, thought is common to all mankind. That's a fact. Right? Common to all mankind. So we are not talking of the object of thinking, the object: I would like to be happy, I would like to have more money, or I would like to have a better car, I wish I could change my wife for somebody else and so on. Thinking about something. But we are not investigating about something, but rather the whole activity of thought, how it arises, what is its origin, and so on. We are going to go into thinking, not the object of thought. Clear?

All right? What do you think - don't quote me, the speaker, then you are lost - what do you think is thought? Is thought a material process? Do you understand my question? Is thought something outside? In certain tribes thought is always considered something outside, according to the Eskimos thought is considered something apart from the physical, outside, and so on. I won't go into all that. I am not a scholar, I have just observed. I don't read books, I don't go into all that kind of stuff. So thinking can only exist when there is a whole background of memory. Right? If I have no memory at all I can't think. Right? Shall we go along with this?

So I have to enquire why memory, thought plays such an important part in one's life. Memory is based on knowledge. Right? I have had an experience of a car accident and that incident has been recorded, like the tape which is being now recorded, it is recorded by the brain, and that recording is memory of that incident. Right? Don't agree with me, just see for yourself. So the function of the brain is to record, and the recording is knowledge. I have had that injury through an accident of a car, and that is recorded as pain and that remains there recorded. That recording is knowledge. Right? Of course. Next time I drive a car I am going to be awfully careful - if you drive a car. So thought, memory, which is the recording as knowledge, that knowledge is based on that experience of an accident. Right? Experience in that car, which has had an accident, which caused pain, a broken leg - I won't say a broken head for then you are gone! So experience, then the brain records that experience as knowledge, right, then that knowledge is memory and that memory is the movement of thought. Is this clear? Not clear, my description, your own discovery, your own investigation into the whole business of thinking. That thinking may be distorted, or that thinking may live in illusions, or that thinking may run away with some fanciful, imaginative pictures, but it is still thinking. And there is obviously no complete experience of anything. So experience is limited. And therefore knowledge is also limited because the scientists, as you observe, are adding more and more and more to their knowledge. Right? They never say knowledge is complete, now or in the future. So knowledge, if you observe in yourself, knowledge is always limited, whether in the past or in the present or in the future. So knowledge is always limited. Right? Do we see that? That is important because if you don't understand the nature of knowledge and what part it plays in our lives then knowledge becomes - one cannot grasp the quality of knowledge. Are we following each other a little bit, or is it all quickly done?

You understand? Knowledge is based on experience, may be thousands of years of experience, but those experiences of ten years, or a hundred years, or one day, are still limited, and therefore knowledge is limited, memory is limited, and therefore thought is limited. Right? Thought is always limited. Are we clear on this matter, or are is it all vague? And all our activity is limited too because it is based on thought.

And so the questioner asks, if thought is not the instrument of investigation, you understand, to deeper levels of one's own consciousness, of one's understanding the fullness, the wholeness of life, then what is the instrument if thought is not? Do you understand the question? All right? Can I go on? Gosh, you all look so asleep. Thought is necessary, however limited it is. When you go home from here, or take a bus, car, walk, or these nasty little put-puts!, you have to use thought. You have to use thought in your business. You have to use thought when you fly, when you do anything externally, physically, you have to use thought. And if that thought is not employed - or if thought doesn't express itself clearly, then out of that lack of clarity there is confusion. So knowledge is always necessary for external activity. Clear? When one goes to the barber to have one's hair cut you must use thought. When you shave you must use thought.

So is there another instrument which is not limited, as thought is limited? Is there another instrument which can penetrate into the whole structure, nature of the psyche? The psyche being the self, the whole phenomenon of the self. Is there an instrument apart from thought? Right? What would be your answer? If you have pursued what we have said just now about thought, realizing that thought is limited, and therefore when you exercise thought as a means of investigating into yourself it will always be incomplete. Right? It will always be limited. It will not be holistic. If you see that clearly for yourself, for oneself, then what is the instrument? Or there is no instrument at all? Careful, please go carefully into this. Are we at least together in all this?

When you see a tree, that thing that is green outside there, how do you look at it? What's your relationship to that tree? Do you look at it without the word? Or the word is the tree? I wonder if you understand all this. You understand my question? When you look at that extraordinary thing of nature called a tree, which man hasn't created, thank god, and what's your response to it? Is it a verbal response, how beautiful that tree is, and go by? Or can you look at that thing called a tree - the word 'tree' is not the tree. Right? The word which we use to indicate, to communicate with another, that thing which is over there, the word is not the tree. Right? The word 'door', behind here, is not the thing, is it? So could we say the word is not the thing. The word is merely to describe it, but that which is described is not the actual. Don't look so puzzled, please.

So this is important to understand because we are caught in words, we become prisoners to words, a slave to words: I am a Brahmin, or you are not, I am a communist, I am a congressman, and so on - words. So when you look at that green thing standing in the garden, do you look at it without a word? Do you look at it without any interference of thought which is limited? Or you are so occupied with your own thinking, with your own problems, you never really look at that tree? Now carry that same thing: do you look at your wife, or husband, or your girl friend, whatever you like, without the word, without the memory associated with that person? You understand this is very important to understand. I know you, you have been here, I see several people here I met a couple of years ago, or ten years ago, do I look at them - I am asking myself, please ask yourself - do I look at them with all the memory of five years ago? Of course, he is so and so. It would be rather silly if I have to be introduced every time I meet him! But do I carry that memory of meeting that person on the road - it was dirty, noisy, etc., etc., and I carry that memory and when I see him next time that memory operates, therefore I am not looking at him afresh. I wonder if you understand all this.

Are you looking at my face? Enamoured with the face? Or are you really going into this carefully with the speaker? When you look at your wife or husband and so on, you have all the memory: sexual, memory of encouragement, depression, oh, she is a nagging person, and so on and so on, when you look at a person do you carry all this with you? Let's be quite simple and honest. Of course we do. Don't we? So you never look at that person at all because you have got this memory as a screen and through that screen you look at people. So there is an observation which is not controlled by words, shaped by words, twisted by thought, and that is the only - I don't like to use 'instrument' - that is the only observation, to look, to observe without any word. Don't shake your head, this demands extraordinary watchfulness. To look, to observe, without the word, without your opinions, prejudices, all the activity of thought, to look, to observe. Then that observation, when it is not shaped by thought, or driven by thought, then such observation is holistic, whole, not limited as thought is limited. Is this clear? No, no, please don't say, yes, don't agree, you can't agree unless you do it. Most of us like to be talked at, we like to attend meetings. It is one of our diseases. And you just listen, agree, disagree, and go off home. We are not in that area at all. What we are saying is extraordinarily important to understand for yourself. The limitation of thought, the memory as recorded of an incident which becomes knowledge based on experience and all that process is everlastingly limited. All the scientists are adding more and more and more; with the last two hundred years they have advanced immensely, adding.

And where there is an addition, that which is added to is always limited, obviously, it is not complete. And there is an observation, perception, not only seeing with the visual optical eye but also seeing, perceiving, observing without a single movement of thought. And such observation is complete.

Now from that arises another deep important question: what is action - the question is not here, I am putting the question - what is action when there is such complete perception? Do you understand my question? What is action to you? The doing, acting, present participle, sorry, the doing, what does it mean? The doing, acting according to a past reservoir of memory, knowledge, and you act according to that knowledge. Right? I am not saying anything mysterious, sirs. Don't look so glum. Or we act according to a symbol, or according to a preconceived concept, idea, an ideal. Right? Acting according to the past memories, and that action directed by the past, or the future. Right? I must do that, or I act according to my conviction, or I have an ideal, and I act according to that ideal. Right? Right, sirs. Isn't this so? You all look so frightfully serious. Either you are really serious, or you don't understand what I am talking about.

So action is based on the past memories, knowledge, or acting according to the future, what I must do tomorrow, therefore I will do this today. You understand? Is there an action which is not based either on the past, or on the future? Because the word 'act', I have just heard the other day the explanation of the word karma, to do - the doing is now, not tomorrow or yesterday. You understand what I am saying? The doing, the acting. We cannot live without acting. When you get up, that's an act, when you go to your home, that's an act; not sublime act. So action, actual action is now. So I am asking myself, what is the relationship of action to perception, which is holistic? Am I right? Are you putting that question? I don't want to torture you, bully you, force you to anything at all. But these are the ordinary questions, this is the ordinary demand of every human being. So is there an action which is holistic, which is whole, not limited? Because our actions are based on thought. If thought is limited, as it is, action will be limited, therefore it is never, as it is limited, it creates all kinds of trouble.

Look sirs, there is a war going on in the Middle East, in Beirut, in Lebanon, the Jews and the Arabs. Right? They are both semitic people. You understand? But four thousand, or five thousand years of propaganda has made the Jews say, 'I am separate from the Arab'. All right, I won't go so far. Come nearer, much nearer home. Which is you are Hindus and there are the Muslims. The Muslims have been for the last sixteen hundred years, have been conditioned through repetition, through fear, through conformity, conversion and so on to believe they are Muslims, and you have been conditioned, programmed for three to five thousand years as Hindus. Thought has divided this, right, not culture. Culture belongs to all humanity, not just Indian culture. I won't go into all that. So you, as a Hindu, and the Muslim are at war - not actually killing each other but when there is a riot you burst out, you are violent.

2nd Question: Silence is the pivotal point in all your teachings for the transformation of man. To your closest circle you have advocated the need for 'sitting still', and 'staying in silence' for short periods during the day. To bring about this mutation in the brain please teach us the practical steps to achieve this transformation.

God! Who put this question? I had better read that question without laughing at it. Silence is the pivotal point in all your teachings for the transformation of man. To your closest circle you have advocated the need for 'sitting still' and 'staying in silence' for short periods during the day. To bring about this mutation in the brain please teach us the practical steps to this transformation.

The speaker, K, has no closed circles. Right? That's the first thing to establish very clearly. Right? He has no closed circle round him, the disciples. Which is a horror to the speaker, to have disciples, because generally disciples destroy the teacher. (Laughter) You may laugh at it but it is a fact. So there is no closed circle. I would walk out of it tomorrow if there was such a thing. And I really mean it. Because independence is necessary. And it is only through independence there can be co-operation. You understand, co-operation is immensely important in life. We either co-operate for our own profit, for our own self-interest, or we co-operate round a person because we all worship him, then it becomes personal idolatry, which is an abomination. And co-operation, which is to work together, do things together, can never take place unless each one is completely independent. I know this goes contrary to everything. You co-operate with the government, you co-operate with the guru, you co-operate with the policeman, you co-operate with your governor, chief minister, and all the bosses and so on. And they all destroy your independence. It is only when you are really independent I can work with you and you can work with me. That means we must both be free to co-operate.

You are not my boss, I am not your boss. You understand all this?
Oh, lord! It's up to you.

I am afraid the questioner has got things totally wrong. Silence is the pivotal point of all your teachings for the transformation of man. Nonsense! And to your close circle you have advocated the need for sitting still, staying in silence for a short period during the day, so to bring about transformation, you know all the rest of it. You know that becomes transcendental meditation. You have heard about that? Morning twenty minutes, afternoon twenty minutes, in the evening twenty minutes keep silent, watchful. That helps bring about a good siesta! You can go to sleep during those twenty minutes, relax. I am not joking. This is what is going on in the world. The speaker is not advocating anything. He is not doing any kind of propaganda for you, to convince you of anything, and the speaker really means it. Please take it seriously. On the contrary he says doubt, doubt what the speaker is saying, not only other speakers, this speaker, question, be sceptical, be independent.

So he is not advocating silence. I won't go into all this. It is so trivial this question. The speaker has not even understood what the poor man has been saying for sixty years.

Sir, transformation of human psyche, the human selfishness, the human violence, is not through silence. Silence is something totally different from the word silence. Silence may include sound. I won't go into that now. We don't understand sound. The sound of a tree, the sound of a thunder, the sound of a jet racing across the sky at a thousand miles an hour, a minute - or an hour. There is tremendous sound in the world. Sound in ourselves. And we separate the sound from silence. Sound may be, and is, part of silence. I won't go into this now.

To bring about the transformation of the psyche, which is ourselves, our self-interest, our confusion, our pains, sorrow, fear, pleasure and all the things that we go through life: the pain, the uncertainty, the lack of security, the demand for security both physically and psychologically, all this is me, you - your profession, your name, your bank account, if you have one. All that is you, imagining sitting very quiet, closed eyes, all that is you: your worries, your problems, your quarrels, your desires, your sexual demands, your name, genetically and so on, is you. And to bring about a total transformation, that is a total ending of this self which is creating such chaos in the world, that ending is not through silence. That ending has to take place now, not tomorrow. And that ending can only come through careful, attentive observation of yourself, of your desires, your thoughts, your attempts at meditation, concentration, going to a guru, all that is part of the self-interest. And to end that completely, this self-interest, you need a very good clear brain, not a muddled brain. And that means to have a brain that is free from all programmes, to be free from all conditioning, and therefore one has to observe the conditioning. The conditioning that you are a Hindu, Muslim, that you are this and that, all those trivialities which thought has created. That requires a great inward attention. You give a great deal of attention to earn money, to go to your office, to do this or that, tremendous attention. And you give very, very little attention to the other.

Have you ever noticed something very simple: suppose you and I have been going north, taking a certain path, always for the last ten thousand, or a million years, we have been going north. It is a symbol, an example, don't say, we are going north. We are going north, suppose, and somebody comes along and says, 'You have been going along that path for the last hundred thousand years or more, I have been on that path too, but it leads nowhere'. That man says. He says, 'Go east, or south, or west'. And he says it in all seriousness, and you listen to it because you are weary of this path, going north, and you listen very carefully. And you say, 'Quite right, let me see'. When you turn from going north, east or west or south, the brain has broken the pattern of the north. You understand what I am saying? Are we together? It has broken the pattern, therefore the conditioning. The moment it turns going east it has changed radically the brain cells themselves, because you have broken the pattern. I have been a Muslim all my life, and I see how absurd it is, this division. The moment I perceive the absurdity of the truth of it, not the truth I must leave, the truth of this division, not about my thought and so on and so on, the moment I see that there is a mutation in the brain, in the brain cells themselves. We have discussed this matter with so-called brain specialists, they don't quite accept what I am saying because they haven't tried it on themselves. They have tried it on dogs, monkeys and all the rest of it. (Laughter) Don't laugh, sirs, please. All these professionals never try it on themselves. They are like you and me, ambitious, greedy, seeking position, power and all the rest.

So there is a mutation - mutation means total change, completely something different - when there is clear perception.

3rd Question: Can humanity survive without a universal code of morality, which is true for all times and in all climates? Can an earnest man discover this way of life by his own reason and goodwill?

Are you tired? What is universal morality? This is again a supposition. Right? He says, can humanity survive without? Can you survive because you are humanity? You understand my question? You - must I go through all this. Aren't you like the rest of humanity? You may be short, dark, purple, white, pink, whatever pigment, colour of the pigment is, aren't you like the rest of the world? You may have a different profession. You may have dark hair, blonde, you can dye it any colour you like. Aren't you like the rest of mankind? Because you suffer, you go through agonies, worries, live a very, very superficial life, occasionally jolted out of that by sorrow, or fear. And your neighbour, whether it be very, very close, or thousands of miles away goes through the same thing in a different way. He quarrels with his wife, as you do, you run when something serious is being said. And also they do the same. So you are similar, or you are the rest of humanity. You won't believe all this, it doesn't matter. To you this is not a truth because you have been conditioned to individualism. All your religions, your physical condition says that you are separate souls, separate human beings, separate consciousness, that your brain is separate from any other brain. You have been conditioned to all that. And one cannot understand that you as a human being are like every other human being on earth psychologically. They all go through, every human being goes through death, or knows death, or somebody has died in the family, and there is sorrow. This sorrow is common to all mankind. You may suffer from disease and have sorrow, or another have sorrow through death of another's death, or the sorrow of ignorance, or the sorrow of limited knowledge. We all go through this, there is not one single human being on earth who has not had this: pain, lack of fulfilment and its sorrow, the desire to fulfil, the desire to have roots in some place and not finding it, the man who can never go in a nice car, the villager, there is sorrow under every stone and every human being. So you are not different from another human being. So you are not individuals. Yes sirs, sorrow is. It is a hard pill to swallow. You won't like it. And so you are the rest of humanity, you are humanity. If you are immoral, if you are corrupt because you are of self-interest, you are adding to the misery of the rest of mankind. Don't agree with this, that is just theory. But if you set about to see how deeply you can wipe - if the brain can wipe away its self-interest.

Self-interest is one of the most deceiving things because it can hide under everything: in politics, in religion, in prayer, in puja, in rituals, it can hide in a family and so on. It is so cunning, so deceptive. And you can't trace all its hidden ways, nobody can because it is far too subtle. But when there is the importance and the urgency to see the nature of the self, and its interest, when there is perception, of which I was talking about, which is to see things as they are psychologically, inwardly, not run away, not suppress, not transmute it, rationalize it. When you observe the thing without any movement of thought then that glimpse of the truth will wipe away all the self-interest.

Questioner: If sorrow is common for all of us why don't we have love which is also common to all of us?

The gentleman asks if sorrow is common to all of us why don't we have love, which is also common to all of us. We haven't got it. Do you love your wife? I am not asking you personally. Do you love that tree? In India and elsewhere they don't know what love is, sir, don't say it is common. You worship, you are devoted, you go to temples, you pay - there is a temple where they get every third day a million dollars. Think of the brutality of it! And you won't take away the village dirt. So we have no common love. We have no love in our heart. Face it! That's a good question to ask, but it has no meaning. You may be sympathetic, kind, and even, perhaps, generous, which I question too, charitable, give something to another if you have more of it. If you have more money, give it to somebody, a little bit of it; you won't do that either. And you talk about love. Don't use that word, sir, you don't know it. It is the most sacred thing on earth if you have it.

Oh, it's nearly ten to nine. Do we go on?

Q: Yes, go on.

K: Yes, sir, I know. You would like me to go on. It becomes some kind of hypnotic process. Sir, what we are talking about is a very serious matter, very, very serious, not just repeat, repeat, repeat. You can have a gramophone, tape recorders, play that if you want to go to sleep, but if you are really serious about these matters, with your heart, with your mind, with all your being because we are reaching a crisis in the world, of which you are not aware. Every religion has gone, finished, it has no meaning any more. Everything is gone, finished, intellectually, any deep thinking person rejects all that. There is no morality any more, there is corruption all over the world. In this country it is amazing, shocking. And we went into that. Where there is self interest, whether it is in the politician, in the priest, in you or in the governor, anybody, corruption begins there, that's the root of corruption, not just passing bribes and all the rest of that. That's a symptom. And there is the threat of war, not just war between one or two countries, a global war, the whole world may be destroyed by these atoms. You are not aware of all that, the immense issue involved in all this. Some crazy politician can push a button and you are all gone, evaporated - you know what that word means, 'evaporated', nothing left of you, no bone, no skin, nothing. I won't go into all that.

So we are facing an extraordinary situation in the world, and there must be a few people like us, a few of us, I don't say all of you, a few of us who turn their face not towards the north but in some other direction.

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC TALK 4TH JANUARY 1985

Shall we continue where we left off last time we met, that was last Sunday - last Saturday, sorry. Sunday it rained so much, we had to leave. I think we have to go back a little and go over what we said on Saturday. We're thinking together, not the speaker is thinking, and you not thinking, but together we are thinking, exercising our brain to its highest level, to its highest capacity. Also, we would like to point out as we did last Saturday, that we're not doing any kind of propaganda. We're not trying to convince you of anything, on the contrary. We're together going to observe all the activities of thought and the lives that one leads.

As one observes, we live a very superficial life, rather a sham life, because for various reasons, overpopulation, few occupations, it is a constant struggle, and struggle makes us rather superficial, makes us shallow. We build, as we pointed out, a marvellous scaffold of various theories, various traditions, including superstitions and all that, and behind this scaffold we have no building at all. We don't start to build at all, that's a fact. We're going to discuss together only facts; not a theory, not an ideal, not something that we imagine, but actually observe our own lives, if you are willing. And we've built a marvellous scaffold, not only in the universities, colleges, schools and kindergarten schools, but also we've built, gathered together, a great deal of knowledge, almost about everything, Mother Nature, of the earth, the air, all the diseases, transplants, new hearts, artificial hearts, liver and so on. We've acquired, during the last million years or 50,000 years, a great deal of information not only of the world externally, but philosophers and those who have given a little thought to the psyche, like the psychologists and so on - but all those remain a verbal structure. To us, they mean very little in our daily life.

And we are concerned, not with acquiring any more knowledge, but rather together, think together and observe our life. Are we wasting our lives? This is a serious question which each one of us must answer. Are we living a shallow life, a superficial life, without much meaning to our lives. or have we put aside all the trivialities of religion - and they are trivialities - all the nationalistic, limited points of view? And do we think of the rest of the world, the rest of humanity as something separate from us? Do we think that way, do we look at the world that way? Then our lives, when we do look at it that way, narrowly, our lives become very individualistic, narrow, limited and rather shallow - because all of us are concerned with ourselves, with our own progress, with our own success, with our own religious conclusions and achievements. There's a tremendous lot of self-interest in all of us, whether we're highly placed politicians or the cheap gurus who only accumulate a lot of money and all of us pursuing, in the search of truth, or illumination, basically in all these movements there is self-interest. That self-interest may be covered up or that self-interest may be absorbed into something else. And this self-interest whether in the name of God, in the name of illusion, illumination - not illusion - there is a lot of difference. Right? Whether it be our own particular success or so on, there is deep, abiding self-interest in all of us. We may pretend that we are seeking truth, that we want to be illumined, or find how to live properly - but basically, inwardly, there is this turmoil of self-interest.

Please don't agree to anything that the speaker says. What the speaker says has no value unless you yourself understand exactly yourself whether there is this deep self-interest. And this self-interest prevents total attention, which we went into the other day. Perhaps we may go into it later on.

And we have built an extraordinary world outwardly; thought has built the great churches and all the rituals, the ancient temples, and the beautiful mosques are all the result of thought. All the rituals therein are put together by thought. Right? Please don't accept what the speaker is saying. Question yourself, delve into these facts that thought has created not only nationalistic and religious divisions, but also, thought has created the most amazing technological world; they have invented artificial hearts to be implanted in human beings; quick communications and the computers - thought has done all this. But it is in cooperation with others and each one being independent to work together. I don't know if you have gone into the question of cooperation - unless one is totally independent, thinking for oneself, not accepting authority, especially in spiritual matters (if I may use that word 'spiritual') - thought has been responsible for all this. That's a fact.

So, thought has been capable of extraordinary work, great paintings, great statues, and great inventions. And also thought is always seeking security for itself and therefore it has created gods - I know you may not like this, but you have to see these facts. It has created gods of various kinds - Christian Gods, Muslim, Hindu Gods - thousands of them in this country. Together, we ought to consider why thought has become so tremendously important; and why thought has worked, expended incalculably in the technological world, and that thought itself has said, I will understand myself. That is, thought has built, put together, 'myself'. Do you agree to that? Are we going together? Are we thinking together, or am I forcing you to think? Or can we have a dialogue about this? A dialogue means a conversation between two people, amicable, who are friends, who are not merely expressing merely at the verbal level - they're concerned with themselves, with their wives, husbands and the whole human nature - they're talking about it together. You and the speaker are in that position - we're having a dialogue together. This is not a clever statement. It should be like that - that is, we must together, I mean together, think of all these things, not according to your opinion or my opinion, according to your point of view, or according to your prejudice and so on.

To think together is very important. That means both of us are free to enquire, free to question each other, in a friendly way, not as a dialectical business, but together find out what place has thought, and where thought is not necessary. Right? We are going to enquire into that: where thought is necessary, and the more you think, the more energy, vitality there is in that direction - which is the world of technology. And observe the nature of thought which has built the self-interest. Right?

All of us need security, both biological and physical as well as inward security, all of us need it. It is the urgency, the demand of the brain that says, I can only function excellently if the brain is completely secure. Right? Are we together? Where does security lie? Of course you must have security as a house, a flat or a hut, furniture, if you have furniture, a bed, a few clothes or many, many clothes. There we must have security otherwise you and I wouldn't be sitting here. And the brain also says, I must be secure not only outwardly, physically, but also inwardly. Right? That's what you want, don't you? In the search of security, there is also fear involved in not having security - they both go together. That is, I want security - my brain demands that you shall be secure. Either it accepts an illusion and that illusion gives it a sense of security, which most people have - security in tradition, security in old beliefs, security in carrying on day after day the same habits. Security in doing puja or ritual, to make you feel a little more holy.

So, we have to investigate together, have a dialogue, a conversation, to find out if there is security at all. You understand my question? The search for security may be an illusion, inwardly. That is, we find security within a family with a wife or a husband, having a house and so on, or living in a filthy hut along the beach. I won't talk about politics or governments. Is there security? We want security: I worked for so long with regard to something, I'm growing old, and I want in my own way to be sure, certain about death, about my life, about my family. Or I find security in becoming a monk, a sannyasi, or go away and live in the Himalayas and find security in my thinking, in my meditation. Right? Are you following all this?

So, is thought capable of giving human beings security? You understand what I am asking? Thought has put together a series of activities which is called National Security, and thought has divided this security as belonging to America, Russia, China and India and so on. Are you following this? A little bit at least. And in the search for security it has created division and therefore conflict between various nations and so on, and it hasn't realized that in division, in separation, there must be conflict. Right? Am I talking to myself? You understand? Please this is important to understand as a dialogue, a conversation. Where there is division, separation as French, German and all that, there must inevitably be conflict, that's a law. As long you're a Hindu, attached to an idea called India and become patriotic and all that business, there must be the other, the Muslim. He has also got his conditioning, his propaganda, his beliefs. So where there is division, you're going to have a war: between Russia and America, England and all the rest of it. That has been the history of mankind from the beginning of time. Wars have been our heritage. Who creates this division? Is it thought? I am asking you, please. Is it thought that has divided the world into nationalities, into economic divisions, into various forms of culture and religions and so on? Is it thought?

Then we have to ask, what is the beginning of thought? What is the reality, what is the origin of thinking? Please, work together. Thought has done the most extraordinary things, there is no question of that. And also has done the most diabolical things. And thought which is so essential for all of us - because you couldn't, the speaker couldn't use words if he has no vocabulary and accumulated memories of English. So thought is limited. (Don't nod your head in constant agreement sir.) You have to look at this very carefully, understand it for yourself, the speaker can only describe, put it into words, draw a design, but you have to think, find out, doubt, question, ask - not agree at all. You know, this is one of our peculiarities as human beings: we agree and disagree. What is the need to agree or disagree? When you see something to be actual, there is no agreement or disagreement, it is so. But you don't see anything clearly, you're all rather confused and out of this confusion arises agreement and disagreement.

But if you and I see something very clearly, there is no need for agreement. It is so. You understand? Please understand this. This is important. Go into it. You see on this basis agreement and disagreement, there is always division, and therefore conflict. I agree with you, and I don't agree with him. Or I follow this and you don't follow that, or I choose this, you don't choose that - this constant division, agreement and disagreement. You and I would never disagree that this is a microphone; we have been told, it would have been put together by electronic experts and they would call it a microphone - and we say it is a microphone. There is no disagreement. If you would like to call it a giraffe, you can, but nobody will understand, you say, this thing is a giraffe, but they have a picture of is a giraffe, they have seen it in a book and so there is no communication. But there is communication when you and the speaker see the same thing and say, this is a microphone. The perception of that, the seeing of that doesn't demand or ask agreement or disagreement. I wonder if you can go along in that direction. Because the speaker is not trying to convince you of anything, nor trying to make you feel you agree with the speaker. All that the speaker is doing is describing what is actually going on, not only externally, but inwardly. He is your mirror and the mirror has no authority, the mirror is not your guru. Right? I wonder if you see all this. It's a mirror. And when you begin to see things very clearly, then you can throw away the mirror altogether, destroy it.

So, this is not a personal or personality cult. To the speaker, that is an abomination - to make a person into something extraordinary. But rather, thinking together, having a dialogue together, a conversation as deeply as possible, not superficial conversation about the weather, but conversation that touches our hearts and brains. So, we're asking, who has created all this division in the world? The good and the bad. This duality in us, who has brought this about? Is it not thought, and is not thought limited? Thought can imagine that it is limitless. It can project limitless, infinite horizons but thought itself being limited, whatever it projects, whatever it does, it is still limited and therefore breeding conflict. We must go into this carefully. Most of us live with conflict. Conflict between the wife and the husband, conflict with your neighbour, conflict with the Muslim and the Hindu - all our lives, from the beginning till we die, there is this perpetual struggle: to meditate, how to meditate, how to sit properly, you know - the whole business.

Is conflict necessary and can one live without a single conflict - which means having no problem at all. Why do we have problems? Religious problems, social problems, problems in our relationships with others, intimate and so on, we always have problems. Can one live a life without a single problem? Have you ever asked that question? And if you're asking it as you must, how will you find out if it is possible - not take it for granted as possible, or say, it is impossible - but to find out for yourself what a problem is, and whether you can live without a single shadow of it. Would you like to go into that?

Our brain which is a most extraordinary instrument, which has got immense capacity, capable of the most astonishing subtleties, and that brain has become so crowded with problems - why? Please find out, ask ourselves why. The meaning of the word 'problem', etymologically is, something thrown at you. Problem mean a challenge. And the brain from the moment it is born till it dies has problems. It cannot write - and the teacher, the poor parents and others, teach him how to write, and to the child, that becomes a problem. So from childhood to university - if you're unlucky or lucky to go through that machinery - your brain is educated to have problems. Right? Do you agree to this - not agree, sorry! Do you see the fact of that: that every human being is educated to have problems, and having a brain that is educated to having problems, it can never solve any problem, because it is conditioned that way. You can observe it politically, religiously and so on. Can that conditioning, which is, having been trained to have problems, can that brain be free of all problems - religious, economic, social and so on, and problems of relationship Do you understand the question? If I have problems, my brain is conditioned to that, how can I solve any problem? I only attend partially to one and thereby create two or three others, politically, religiously - this is what is happening in the world.

So you are asking yourself whether it is possible to be absolutely free so that you can meet problems freely, not with a brain that is conditioned to problems. Right? Are we meeting each other somewhat? We'll go into it. We are asking why and who has created this division which creates problems. We say, thought, because thought is limited. And we also said, memory is stored in the brain and that memory is thought. Memory is knowledge and that knowledge can never be complete; whether scientific knowledge or knowledge about anything including yourself, it can never be complete, there is always something more to discover, to understand, to find out. So knowledge is the past and knowledge also in the future will always be limited. Is this clear? And knowledge is the result of experience. Right? Experience, which is always limited, knowledge out of that experience is also limited; then memory, stored in the brain, and that memory responds, that memory is thought. It is not a question of agreement or disagreement, it is so. Our brains are full of memory, which is, our brains are recording, like a tape-recorder, it is recording. Right? Are you following all this? And so the brain is becoming gradually or rapidly mechanical. Not in the technological world - it has invented extraordinary things like the computer - I won't go into the computer business. The computer is programmed, programmed by the experts, mathematicians. A top mathematician can programme and it can teach others. Our brains are also programmed: you're a Hindu, I'm a Buddhist, I follow the Tibetan way of meditation and so on.

We are programmed as a computer is programmed: you're an American, you know, all the rest of it. It's not the moment to go into all that. Computers are developing so rapidly, they can do almost anything, and what is going to happen to the human brain when a computer can do a lot of things which the human brain has been doing, what happens to us as human beings? In exercising the brain, the brain becomes active, more and more and more. But if the brain is not active, gradually the machine is going to take over, our brains are either going to within or enter into the world of entertainment. Right? You understand all this? Are you interested in all this?

Either the brain will be involved in great entertainment, because it cannot do much in the technological world. So the brain will gradually wither, either become involved, be amused, entertained, by sport, by religious ceremonies, which is now happily more and more; or there is only another possibility - enter into the psychological world, into the world that is beyond the psyche, beyond the limited self-interest, go into that most profoundly. Now, can thought do all this? You understand? Thought has created the computer, and it will build cars with robots, there will be a great deal of unemployment and so on and so on. So, as thought being always limited, and that's the only instrument apparently we have, and you may say, what about feelings, emotions, sentimentality? Is not that also part of thought? No? I'm very devoted to my guru, or to some idol in a temple: the idol in the temple is created by thought. My guru, if I have one, and fortunately I haven't got any - if I had one, thought has given him a great many attributes, he knows - I don't know, I'll be helped. That's one of the curses of gurus, wanting to help others. Do you listen to all this, without throwing something at me? Because we all want to be helped, and we have been helped not only by surgeons and doctors and so on, we've also been helped by philosophers, by ancient books, the Bible, Koran and the Upanishads, or whatever your particular religious book is, or your guru, or the local pundit, you all want to be helped. I have a problem, I want to be helped, I come to you, you know much better than I do. I obey.

So what happens to me when I'm being helped actually? I become weaker and weaker mentally, morally, I just follow, obey, I become a machine, there is no independence at all. I never question, doubt, be sceptical. If you are sceptical, doubt, question, religions wouldn't exist.

So, we're enquiring now, talking over together, as thought is limited, and whatever it does in the world of technology or in the world of the psyche, I must understand myself, know myself, and then thought begins to investigate and then the very investigation becomes limited because thought is limited. Right? Are you following all this? So, we are asking, if that is the only instrument we have and if we see, actually observe the fact, not agree or disagree, but actually see the fact that whatever thought does must always be limited, and therefore conflict. There is conflict because we have duality: the good and the bad. Would you follow all that a little bit, if it interests you? From ancient days, this has been the conflict, between the good and the bad: the good trying to overcome the bad and the bad trying to overcome the good, the good is expressed in a thousand different ways and the bad in a thousand different ways, called evil and so on. Now is it possible - please listen to this - not to have duality at all? Do you understand my question? To find that out, urgently, not just theoretically, is there a duality at all? We are questioning.

Fear is a fact for all human beings, like violence is a fact, and the opposite of fear is courage, or escape or try to overcome it, so, there is duality. The fact and the non-fact. I wonder if you see that?

The fact is fear and the non-fact is, I should not be afraid, and therefore, suppression, conflict and all that arises; between violence and non-violence, non-violence is not a fact. It is just an invention of thought saying, I must reach non-violence - in the meantime, it is being violent. So, I'm asking myself, and you are asking yourself, is there an opposite at all - except man and woman, dark and light, tall and short, measurement, apart from that, psychologically is there duality at all? There have been all kinds of philosophers saying that you can only reach that level of no duality when you reach heaven, or something or other. There have been lots of books written about that. But we're pushing aside all authority in these matters and enquiring, is there duality at all, or only facts? The fact is, I am afraid. If the brain knows how to deal with that, how to be free of fear, then there is no opposite. Right? Right, sir? If I'm free - if there is no violence in me altogether, because I understand the nature of violence, I've looked at it, I have held it, I have observed it, gone into it, seen what it is; not only physical but also psychological violence - 'I must not be, I must be,' imitation, conformity, anger, jealousy, hate, that's all violence. If I can understand it, deal with it, there is no opposite, I don't need an opposite. All right sirs?

Now, can I deal with that instantly, not postpone it. When I postpone it, I've already gone into conflict. I wonder if you understand this. Anything I postpone, if I say, I'll get over my anger, give me time, let it be gradual, I've already created conflict. I wonder if you understand this? All right? Do we go together in this? So, can I, can my brain deal with the fact of what I am and not what I should be? There is fear. Can I deal with that completely? Not say, I'll gradually get rid of it, tell me how to get rid of fear. Don't ever ask, as we said the other day, 'how' to do any psychologically thing. You can ask a doctor 'how' to do this and that? But psychologically never ask 'how'. There are a thousand people who will tell you what to do. Now can I be free of fear, completely? I'll go into it, but you are going to go into it, not just listen and say, well, an excellent description, I don't know how to do it, I'll think about it. Now we're looking at fear, not the objects of fear, not causes or results of fear. You may be afraid of darkness, one may be afraid of one's wife or husband, you may be afraid of losing your job, or afraid of public opinion, afraid of not being able to face yourself as you are, and say I can do this, and hold on, but you can never do it - various forms of fear. We are not dealing with the various forms, not the objects of fear, but to find out, for ourselves, what is the causation of fear, the cause? Where there is a cause, the effect can be put away. If I understand the cause, the effect has no meaning. If I can find out the cause of my illness, then I'll be healthy. So, if I can find out the cause of fear, not the multiple forms of fear, but the cause of fear. So, let us investigate it together, talk about it. Not agree or disagree.

Is it time, the cause? Is time a factor of fear? I might die tomorrow - tomorrow is time. I might lose my job. I might not love my wife, she'll get angry and so on. That is, time is involved as a cause of fear. Do we see that? Right sir? I am asking you, do you actually perceive for yourself the fact - the fact, not the idea, the idea is different from the fact. Idea is not the fact. You are sitting there, and the speaker is sitting here, that's a fact. But we can make an idea of it. But the idea is not the fact. Like the word door is not the door. So we're only looking at the fact which brings about fear. Right? And we are saying, you and I in our conversation together, not persuading each other, seeing that time is a factor of fear. I have done wrong last year and I hope nobody discovers it because I've got a certain reputation, and if they find that out they will throw me out, so I've got to hide it. And therefore that is the cause of fear which is time. I've done something in the past which might cause trouble for me, therefore I'm afraid of that incident - that means time. Time is a movement, a series of movements.

Are you interested in all this, or have you heard the speaker talking about this endlessly, therefore you are bored with it? I'll go on with it, if you are bored it's up to you.

So, time is a factor and what is time? I know time by the watch; I know time by the sunrise, sunset, the evening star, the beautiful slip of a new moon, and the full moon. Time is the past, time is now, time is tomorrow. This whole movement of the past which is the accumulate of memory through time, through experience, knowledge and so on, all that accumulation is time, and that accumulation as memory, knowledge, goes through the present, modifies itself and goes on to the future. This whole movement of knowledge, experience, memory and thought is movement in time. So time is not only this movement from the beginning to the end, but also time is now, because tomorrow is what I am today. Tomorrow is what I am actually today. If I'm angry, violent today, if there is no radical and mental change, tomorrow I'll be still the same. Right sirs? You all look so puzzled. So that is time. I won't go into the question of change. That demands a great deal of investigation. I don't want to do that now for the moment.

So, fear is time and fear is also thought. I may lose my job, I may lose my wife who is looking at somebody else, I may not reach heaven and so on. Thought is the movement of the past, present and future. So, thought and time together - they're both movements - together are the cause of fear.

Then the question arises, is it possible to stop thought and time? That's the normal question. If fear is the result or the effect of the cause, time and thought, then is it possible to stop thought and time - otherwise, I'll go on with fear. Right, sir? Do we meet this? Are we together a little bit? Let's take the journey quickly. What shall I do? I see the cause, and I also see the effect. The effect is fear. The cause is time and thought. If there is a putting away of thought and time I've no fear. Then one needs no rod, no guru, when there is freedom from thought you are entirely different. So we ask ourselves: is it possible to stop time and thought? That's what meditation does. You hope through meditation to control thought and thereby push it behind, control it - never enquiring who is the controller, which is also thought. I won't go into all that now for the moment. Is it possible to end thought and time? Answer it, sir, work. Our brains are so sluggish, we've become so lazy, indolent, because we've been told so many things and we don't know where we are. So here what we are trying to do in our conversation is to see the facts and live with the facts, not escape from the fact. The fact is, I'm afraid, we're afraid, each one of us in different ways, there is fear and we know the cause. There is the absolute fact, that is, time and thought are the causation of fear. And also we see that by ending the cause, the effect is totally ended.

If I know what my illness is, I can take certain remedies and that's the end of it. Similarly, we know the cause, the effect is fear, what shall we do? Don't wait for me to answer? This is a conversation between us. How do you observe the cause? How do you discover the cause? Not by being told or having it described, put into words, but to find out the fact, not the idea of the fact. Right? Please see this: not the idea, the conclusion about the fact, but the fact is time and thought. Is it possible to totally end all that - knowing the evolution of the brain has taken a million years. Your brain has evolved through time and through that long duration, long voyage of time, it has gathered certain conditionings: that thought will solve fear, thought will do something in order to escape from fear; do puja, escape, every form of escape. And all escapes have stopped because you know the cause, therefore you have to do something with the cause. If that cause is not eradicated, you'll always live with fear, psychologically. Psychologically is far more important than biologically, physically, because the psychological states always overcome the biological states. I won't go into that, there is no time left.

Now do you put the question seriously to yourself, or is it just a passing question? You put the question today and forget about it the next day, and pick it up the day after tomorrow. Or do you put the question seriously, with all your intensity, with your passion? And that means, are you willing to give your complete, passionate attention to the cause, or do we just listen and carry on with our fears? If you put that question, profoundly, seriously, put that question with all your heart and mind and passion to find out, that means giving all your energy, vitality, attention to that. When you give all your energy, which you've wasted in trying to escape from it, or in trying to find a substitute, or rationalizing fear, if you drop all that completely, then there is no escape from fear. No god, no other human being can help you to be free of fear. If you really put it with all your energy, strength, vitality and especially the passion to comprehend something which mankind has lived with for millennia upon millennia, then you are giving that passionate, flaming attention to the cause. When you give such burning attention, the cause is burnt away. But very few people - we're not discouraging - very few people do this - they've so many things to do: family, husband, children, earning money and so on, and that takes a great deal of energy, all that. So you say, 'sorry I haven't got the energy, help me to have that energy', take a drug, instead of asking for help. I'm not advocating drugs. They are horrid.

So, passion is something entirely different from lust; lust is sensation, sexuality. We are not against that, we're pointing out that passion is something entirely different. That passion comes with all its tremendous energy and capacity when sorrow ends. When there is no sorrow in your heart or mind or brain, which is part of self-interest, when there is the ending of that, there is great, immense, inexhaustible passion, which can never be burnt away. And that passion, which is attention, burns away the cause of fear, which is time and thought.

We ought to talk about many other things. It is now quarter to seven. Should we go on? What would you like to talk about? What is your deep interest? What do you demand of yourself apart from earning money, apart from all that business, what is it that each human being wants? You want something, otherwise you wouldn't be here listening to K. Somebody is yawning, tired, go to bed and rest, but we are asking something very serious. When you say, I want something, the 'wanting' is to fulfil the emptiness in oneself: I want to be happy; I want to reach nirvana or moksha or illumination. Wanting means, there is something missing. What are you missing? Is it that the emptiness, the loneliness can never be filled, but we are trying to fill it with puja, with books, with knowledge, with chatter, talking endlessly about politics, you know, the whole thing. Do we realize how extraordinarily shallow we are? And realizing that shallowness I want to have depth? So, we're always wanting, wanting, wanting to be loved, wanting to be encouraged, wanting to find somebody who will be a long lasting companion. This wanting is endless, if you've filled one want, you want another want - that goes on for the rest of one's life. I want to know or one wants to know what happens after death. That is one of the questions asked all the time. We'll go into that tomorrow and the day after tomorrow.

Can you ever stop wanting? You want to find roots for yourself in a country, in a person, in an image or an illusion, you want to establish your roots, and you want to fulfil, become somebody. This goes on all our life. Have you ever asked yourself, that I don't want a thing? I want food, clothes and shelter, that's understood, otherwise I don't want a thing. Have you ever asked yourself that? I think you should, if I may most respectfully suggest, you should ask that question. Because in discovering your wants, you must also discover why you want, and if there is an ending to all craving, to wanting. When you find that out, that you don't ask anything for yourself, then there is that state which is indescribable. I know you are waiting for the description. That description is futile, it is merely words. But to come to that point, and that is not a long journey. It is the shortest journey, the next step - which is not to want psychologically anything.

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC TALK 5TH JANUARY 1985

This is far better, to sit under the trees and talk about serious things with a group of people who are equally interested in things that we are talking about.

May we go on from where we left off the other day - yesterday. There is nearly a full moon. I wonder if one notices all these things: the full moon and the sunset, the richness of a cloud and the beauty of rain coming as a shower, and all the sound, the noise of the world. Probably we don't. We are too occupied with our own problems, or chattering, or too concerned with the things of the world, or too concerned with the other things of the world. And I think we should continue with what we were talking about yesterday evening, if we may. We were talking about conflict, problems and fear. One wonders if one realizes how important it is, how essential, how conflict damages the brain, when all our brains are damaged by conflict, by not understanding the facts of living, by all kinds of superstitions, ideologies and the conflict of duality. So, may we go into that subject.

Is it possible to have a brain - because we live by the brain, the brain is the centre of all our responses and reactions. The speaker is not a specialist with regard to the brain. But one can observe one's own brain and its activity. The brain is the centre of action, reaction, all the movement of thought, feelings, responses of nerves, it is the centre of our consciousness, our fears, our anxieties, our sorrow, our longing for something different from what actually is. This constant occupation, never a moment when the brain is quiet. This conflict in any form does damage to the brain. And the brain is the centre of our consciousness. Right? That is so, it is not a theory, which the speaker is putting forward, it is the centre of all our action, of all our feelings, our imagination, our sentimentality, whether it is romantic and so on. This brain contains, or has within it, consciousness. Our consciousness is what we have made of it. Right?

May one again remind you, that we are talking things over together as two friends walking down a lane with many shadows and dappled light, sitting on a bench and talking about all this. They are friends, therefore they are not arguing, or trying to convince each other of something or other. Friends never do, there is no argument, or acceptance or denial, agreeing or disagreeing. And so we, the speaker and you are together thinking, not just listening. Listening is of great importance, how to listen. Listening not only with the hearing of the ear, but also listening to the meaning, to the significance, to the depth of a word. And when you listen so deeply you are not translating what is being said according to your own terminology, or translating it, or comparing what is being said, to what you already know; you are actually listening so that you capture the significance, the depth of what is being said. Which means you are listening not only to the speaker, but also much more to yourself: watching your own reactions, how you listen, whether you are really listening, or translating what you are listening to according to your own fancy, imagination, or according to your own particular experience and knowledge. All that prevents actually listening.

If you are listening to great music and if you are comparing it to another great musician, you are not actually listening to that particular music. So, similarly if one is actually listening with one's heart - that doesn't mean sentimentality, it doesn't mean some kind of emotional chaos - but actually listening. And as two friends are listening to each other, in that quality of listening they are asking each other: is it possible for a brain which is the centre of our life, not to be wounded, not to have any scratch? And that demands that we enquire into the nature of conflict; why human beings from the beginning of time, a million years more or less, have lived with conflict, as we all live in conflict. There is no doubt about it, it is a fact. And we are asking why do human beings put up with conflict? Not only external conflict as war, as competition with another, as imitation, conformity and all the pressures, political pressure, newspaper pressures, the family pressure and so on, these pressures also damage the brain. That is a fact. Anything that is under pressure must inevitably either escape from the pressure, and that escape becomes a means of conflict; or, we are being programmed all the time: propaganda of newspapers, magazines and so on. All these activities obviously bring about conflict.

Now, can the brain be free of all conflict? This is a very serious question. Conflict breeds antagonism, conflict breeds self-centredness, it is the nature of selfishness. And we human beings are terribly selfish, self-interested and that breeds conflict. When each one of us is concerned with ourselves, our own fulfilment, our own ambitions and so on, that breeds, builds up slowly various forms of contradiction, conflict and ultimately war. All these are obvious facts. And we are asking whether it is possible for the brain to be completely healthy, rational, sane, logical? Because, it's only then that you can function tremendously and fully. Is it possible to live a life in the modern world without conflict? You might say that is impossible; if you are not competitive, if you are not aggressive, if you are not becoming number one. If you are doing that you must inevitably live in conflict and you say to yourself, I can't do that; I have to compete in my business, I have to compete in my examinations and so on. We are nurtured, trained to compete which becomes aggressiveness. You must be aggressive in business, otherwise you don't get any business and so on and so on. Do we understand all this verbally, because we are both speaking English? Do we understand this verbally, which becomes then an idea, a concept, a theory, or do you see the fact of it? Do you understand me? There is a vast difference between fact and idea of the fact. The idea of the fact, and fact itself. Right? The idea is the gramophone, sorry the microphone - but the idea is not the actual instrument in front of the speaker. So there is a fact and the idea of the fact. Do you understand this?

Now, which is it we are caught in, the idea, the concept, the conclusion, the description or the fact itself? Which is, that we live in conflict. And this conflict is brought about basically, fundamentally, by self-interest. And then you will say, if there is no self-interest how can one live in this modern world? That is a very common question, and a rather silly question. Sorry, if I may use that word. Have you ever tried, or lived a life without self-interest? If you have, then you will have quite a different activity in life. Because we haven't done it, we say it is impossible. If you have to climb a mountain, and you have to climb that mountain, you don't begin by saying it is impossible. You go up it, with your capacity, with your energy and drive. And if you want to find out whether it is possible to live in this world without conflict, you have to do it, find out. That is, can you live without self-interest?

And all the politicians in the world are concerned with themselves, and with their power, with their position, which is political self-interest. The world is that. Can we live without self-interest? That self-interest breeds continuously conflict, and so our brains get damaged, wounded. And, as we grow older the brain becomes more and more dull, more and more superstitious, repetitive and is willing to obey any tradition, any system of philosophy or religion and so on. So that is a very serious question. Because there is a possibility of having a brain that is never damaged, then that brain has immense capacity - not in the technological world, it may have also, but much more in the world of the psyche, in the world of non-self. You know, the technological journey is always limited, because there is more and more to be added. Therefore it is always limited. Whereas the journey that one takes psychologically, inwardly is infinite; it has no end, it is really a world totally different. This is not a theory. Don't go back to your books and say, yes, this is what they have said, and you are only putting it in modern words. But if my friend and I are sitting on that bench in the lane - and if that friend says, 'Really I want to find out, this is rather an interesting idea'. Idea first, he doesn't know anything else, but he listens to it, sees the significance of it, the beauty of it, the depth of it and he says, 'I capture what you mean. I don't know if I can ever do it because it demands a great deal of awareness, a great deal of attention, a great deal of watching, watching, watching. But, I am going to see if it is possible.' And as you are that friend sitting on that bench with the speaker, you are saying to yourself - if you are at all serious, not flippant and just curious to attend these silly meetings - you are also, saying, I will see the significance of it, and I'll pursue it. So, if one sees the significance the reality and the beauty of it, then there is immensity beyond the self.

Talking of beauty - may I go into that a little bit? Are you interested in beauty? Are you? What do you mean by beauty? The beauty of a tree, beauty of a painting, a lovely statue, a great poem, the beauty of a sunset, the beauty of a person, a lovely face, with depth behind the face, not just the cinema stars. I don't know why they are called stars! The real stars are immense, they have an extraordinary sense of vastness, a light of their own, undiminished, perpetual. So what is beauty? Does beauty lie in a picture, in a painting, in a museum or if you are rich enough to be a multi millionaire to buy one of the old masters' paintings or one of the paintings of Van Gogh. I won't go into all that. Does beauty lie in a picture? Does beauty lie in that tree, in that moon just rising, with clarity, without a single cloud round it? What is beauty to you? Or you have never even thought about it? Or is it that we have become so insensitive we never look, we are willing to cut down every tree for profit and reduce the land to desert - which is happening. All the squalor in a street. What is beauty? Because if we don't understand or have that quality of beauty - because beauty is truth, without beauty there is no truth - and if there is no beauty in your heart you will never have truth, you will never come upon that marvellous word and the depth of that word. Not the beauty of a dress, or the colours of a marvellous sari or gown. But what is beauty? If you ask it seriously, not what the poets say, not the books that have been written about beauty, or read one of the great poems and feel exalted, and emotionally responding to it, and say what a beautiful thing that is. Is that beauty? Is the word beauty merely a word? May we go into it a little bit?

I wonder. One wonders why in this country that word beauty is lost. Is it sensory responses of seeing a beautiful person and merely getting excited sexually, or because he is important in the world and earns a lot of money, a cinema person. I don't like to call them stars because politically they have become very important. Another country has made a President of an actor, and so you are also encouraging this, in actors who have just a face and a body, with very little behind it. So, to enquire into beauty, if you really want to go into it, one must understand or grasp, not intellectually, why human beings are absorbed by something? Absorbed by your puja. Right? Absorbed in your prayers. Please, pay attention, this is related to beauty. Please, don't throw it out, listen to it. Human beings are always absorbed in something or other: in a nation, in politics, or absorbed in their business. You know what it means to be absorbed: To give all your energy, absorbed by something external; or you have something inward, as an idea, as an ideal and you are absorbed by it. Have you ever asked, why human beings want to be absorbed? Have you ever noticed a child who has been naughty all day long, which they should be, fortunately, give him a toy and he gets completely absorbed in it. You have children, haven't you? No? Have you watched a child who has been naughty and given him an intricate toy and all his naughtiness stops, and the toy absorbs him. Right? So till he breaks it, he is completely absorbed by it, quiet, concentrating, loving it. Right? You have children, haven't you? Haven't you noticed this? And also grown-up people similarly are absorbed by toys: the toy of meditation and the toy of god. And god becomes most extraordinarily intricate; different gods, you do puja, you are absorbed by it. What takes place when you are absorbed that way. Do you understand? When a child is absorbed by a toy, what happens to the child? He becomes quiet. Right? He becomes completely involved with that toy. He is absorbed by a story. And we human beings are also like that. And when you are absorbed what takes place? All your naughtiness stops. Right? When you are doing your puja, ringing a bell and going to the church and all the rest of it, what happens? For the moment, or for ten minutes, or twenty minutes, for an hour or whatever time it takes, the puja or the ritual has absorbed you, you are quiet.

Now when you look at a mountain - if you have looked at a mountain with its vastness, immense majesty, immovable, so enormous, snowcapped against the blue sky - for a second or two, that multi-spectacle drives the self away. Haven't you noticed this? Then what takes place? The grandeur, the immensity and the extraordinary beauty of a great mountain gives you a momentary shock and the self is not, at that moment. Right? Is this right? Haven't you noticed this. And you are so self-bound by that moment. And so you become silent for a moment. That is, the toy, of the mountain has absorbed you. So can you be free of the self without being absorbed by anything? Do you understand my question? Because when the self is not, beauty is. Do you understand all this? Do you know how important this is? Because we have no beauty in our life, we are becoming more and more vulgar, noisy and we haven't even thought about this question. We are all too religious to think about beauty. And it is related to a woman or a man - it might absorb your senses, so therefore be careful. If you understand the nature of beauty then you can live in this world so completely, so holistically because beauty is not that which is ugly. Beauty has no relationship to the ugly. Have you wandered through Madras, as we did last night. Have you seen those buildings, how ugly they are? We live with all this, we live with ugliness, and we get used to ugliness. We have got used to the squalor of the streets, and we don't even bother, it is happening all the time. So we lose the quality of sensitivity; and sensitivity is essential, otherwise you can't feel, you can't look. If you are not sensitive to that moon, to look at it for some time without thought, just to look at it. See the beauty of that light on the river, or a sheet of water. That demands sensitivity.

That brings up the question - are you getting bored by all this? Why not? Have you beauty in your life? You are silent. Talking about sensitivity brings up another question. Do you want to go on like this, or would you like to talk about something else? Would you like to talk about pleasure? I am sure - one is sure that you are seeking pleasure. All human beings are seeking pleasure, not only sexual pleasure, with its repetitive, imaginative pictures and so on and so on, but also the pleasure of power, whether that power be over your wife or your husband or the power of a politician round the corner for whom you have voted. It is your pleasure to have that man - whether he is capable or incapable that doesn't matter - to put him in that place is your pleasure. And it is your pleasure to possess something: possess money, a good house - a good house, you understand, a beautiful house, well proportioned - if you are rich - with a good garden and lovely flowers, that is a great pleasure. And the pleasure of achievement and the fear of failure. And pleasure is based on the principle of reward and punishment. Is that right? Shall we talk about that because that is what we all want? The ultimate pleasure is god. And therefore god is both punishment and reward; and this god is invented by our thought. And as we said yesterday where there is fear, there is god, there are many gods or one god - and if there is no fear at all, psychologically, inwardly, then there is no outside agency, but a door is open to eternity. Shall we talk about all that, some theory, or shall we talk about sorrow or talk about something much closer, though we do have sorrow, each one of us, or have had sorrow, but we will come to that presently, if there is time.

We ought to talk over together as two friends. This is not a lecture, not something to inform you, or to instruct you. But this is a dialogue between you and the speaker. And the speaker would like to raise a question: whether we are only functioning with one or two senses, or whether we are functioning with all our senses? Do you understand my question?

Probably being religious people, which I doubt - at least we think we are religious by going to the temple and all that business, and leading shoddy, conflicting, brutal lives. Religions have said, suppress your senses, because they are a distraction. Don't look at a woman or man and don't look at a beautiful sunset or the stream that is singing by the side of a road. Don't listen to all that. And so we are gradually killing our senses. When you hear noise day after day, day after day, noise from the houses, you get used to it, you get dull to that noise. So gradually we are destroying our senses. Right? And we are asking, when you destroy your senses, the touch, the feel, the quality of a sense, the brain becomes dull too, and is it possible - I am just putting this question to my friend who is sitting on the bench in the shadow of a tree - can all your senses awaken and function together as a whole? Have you ever tried it? Then you will find when all your senses are active, not sexual senses only, but all your senses, the seeing the hearing, the touching, the emotions, the thought, all your senses - because thought is a material process. When all your senses are at their highest excellency, the self is not. It is only when there is partial, dull operation of one or two senses, then the self builds up. I say to my friend, listen to it, find out the truth of it and if you don't listen, don't bother.

We talked about pleasure and all the implications of pleasure, essentially based on reward and punishment. To avoid punishment, not physical punishment, but the sense of being, losing, the sense of not having. The having is a reward and the losing is the pain. So we live our daily life on this principle: reward and punishment. You reward a dog to obey you, and gradually train him to obey you, and he jolly well obeys you, comes to heel. So our life is based on reward and punishment. And in that is involved fear, pain and pleasure. We live that way: I will be good, that is the reward; and being not good is the pain, the punishment. So, if one understands the principle, reward and punishment, and whether one can be free of that principle, then life is entirely different.

Let's talk about something else, shall we? We have talked about beauty, that is an immense thing, not in books, in poems. But if you have that beauty that is without absorption, that is without a sense of ugliness. We ought to talk over together a very complex problem of suffering. Is that all right? Can we go into that? Why have human beings from time immemorial suffered? And have never solved that problem, they have never ended suffering. After thousands and thousands of years we human beings in the modern world suffer; suffer not having a child, suffer of not being able to fulfil, suffer when one is not loved, suffer in our loneliness. Are you all lonely? Are you lonely ever? Are you really? Suffer when we are lonely, suffer when we don't get rich, recognized. Those are all very superficial sufferings: wanting to be a great man and not being capable of being a great man, wanting to manage something, not being able to manage. There are various forms, like fear, of sorrow: the sorrow of death of someone with whom you have lived intimately. This sorrow of death we all know, every human being on this earth, unfortunately, knows the sorrow of death. And in spite of all the comforts of reincarnation, in spite of all the religious activity and their superstitions, sorrow is never ending.

Sorrow is not only your sorrow, your personal sorrow, but there is the sorrow of the world. The sorrow of those people who have been killed in the war, maimed, blinded, no arms and no legs, just the body, torso, and their relatives; how many mothers have cried, sisters, wives, lovers and so on. Don't you know all this? Or are you only concerned with your own sorrow? If we are honest, we say, sorry, I am only concerned with my own sorrow. I recognize the sorrow of others: those people who are dying in Beirut, Nicaragua, and Vietnam. They are so far away, it doesn't touch us.

So there is personal sorrow and the sorrow of the world; it is still sorrow. Your sorrow is like the sorrow of another, your sorrow is mine. It is one's sorrow when one loses one's son, wife, husband. And what a lot of fuss we make about it, weeping, crying, wanting comfort. And there is all the sorrow of thousands, millions of human beings, who are suffering also, like you. And this sorrow, like fear, like pleasure, is common to mankind. It is the sorrow of humanity and that sorrow is never ending. Probably it will never end, because we have made the world so monstrous. This society which we have built, society doesn't exist by itself, we have built it through our fear, through our grief, through our selfishness and our monstrous activity. This society is corrupt beyond words, we have made it, because we are corrupt. And this corruption is self-interest primarily. And so society is not going to help us; religions have not helped mankind, they have not prevented wars. Though you talk endlessly of non-violence, peace in the world - I must have peace of mind, you know all this nonsense.

There is sorrow in the world and can that sorrow end? Perhaps you have never asked that question. We suffer and put up with suffering, take comfort in some religion, or some doctrine, or in some belief. It is a strange fact, isn't it: if one loses one's wife, or son or a relative, we carry that pain all our life. Don't you? I have the photo of my son on the desk, I weep quietly to myself. Or I weep publicly, which is with my friend. We never say, that is the end of it. I never carry the memory of pain. It is not brutal, put away the pain of loss in two or three days, not through years. Which doesn't mean that there is callousness, on the contrary. This everlasting talk about one's own son, or husband having died, you keep that up. It is a form of entertainment, gossip. I am sorry, if I put it brutally.

So, we are asking, whether sorrow can end. Not this sorrow of the world, because there are going to be wars, because human beings are violent; they cry, their own son killed in a war. But your son is quite safe. So society which we have built, which each one of us has contributed to this society, to the political world, to the world of nationalities, with their divisions, that will go on because a vast number of human beings want all that, voting for someone. So you will say, if I end my sorrow, if it is possible, what effect has that on the rest of the world? It's like asking, if I free myself from all the trivialities of life, from all that pain, the anxiety and the loneliness, and sorrow of my life. I want to cry for you. All this is to you, meaningless. You will ask yourself, why? Free myself from sorrow, what will it affect the world? Will the world change, because I have changed? That is a wrong question because when you ask such a question you are finding an excuse not to change. That becomes an easy way out from your own change. And you say, well, it doesn't matter if I change or not because we are all like that. I must live in this world, so, I will listen to you. It sounds good but I will carry on in my own way. So asking a question, if I change will the world change, is a totally wrong question. Then you are looking for reward and punishment. If you radically change, you will find out whether it has an effect on the world or not. Hitler with his madness has changed the world. Napoleon and all the great heroes of war, heroes of murder, have changed the world. So has the Buddha and so on. They were individuals, they were separate. They said, this is what I want to do, and did it, brutally or...

So if you really end sorrow, not verbally but actually be free of sorrow, then there is a passion which consumes you for the rest of your life. So it is important to understand whether it is possible to end sorrow: your sorrow, one's sorrow. Is sorrow of self-pity? Please examine what the speaker is saying. The speaker is telling his friend sitting on the bench and he is talking about sorrow, and the speaker asks him, K asks him, have you ever asked the question whether you can end sorrow, your sorrow? He says, I have never even thought of such a question, because all my life I have lived with sorrow. And when you put that question, whether you can end sorrow, I really don't know. I don't know what to do with it. I have tried ten different ways and I still go on suffering. And K is asking him, have you ever asked the question whether sorrow can ever end. He said, no, I have never asked it. And K says, now ask it. How you ask it is important: whether you are asking it casually, or asking it as an escape, or are you seeking comfort with the ending of sorrow, or are you putting the question free from reward and punishment? Ending sorrow, not saying to yourself, if I end this, I will get that. If I end sorrow, I will have peace, I will have happiness, I will have joy. That is mere exchange, it is not the ending of sorrow. So, K asks the friend, is it self-interest, self-pity? When you suffer, is it self-pity? He says, partly, yes. Is it the loss of someone who has given you comfort, who has given you pleasure sexually, or different forms of pleasure? He says, yes, partly. Is it that you find yourself lonely because you have leant on that person, been with that person for years, got used to her or him, or it - it may be furniture, which you have cherished, polished, an old piece, 13th century furniture and then you get attached to it, and when that is taken away, you get upset. Is it that kind of suffering that you have - you have treated her or him like a piece of furniture, got used to him? You understand? Put all these questions. Don't just go to sleep.

The friend says, yes, all these are part of this. Primarily I am lonely. Aren't you lonely? What is loneliness? I am attached to you as an audience. And the speaker, if he is attached to an audience small or large, when the audience disappears he is going to be lonely, he is going to lose his fame, his notoriety; you are going to lose the image you have built about him. Right? So, similarly when you are attached to something, which is another form of self-interest, attached to a person, an idea, a concept, to a symbol, to a myth, then when that attachment is torn away from you, you become lonely, depressed, anxious, nervous, you break down. So, K is telling his friend, when you know all this which is part of suffering, which is the essence of suffering - suffering is not from you, as though you were suffering and suffering was something different. You are the entity that is suffering, you are suffering. Do you understand the difference? Not that I am suffering, the 'I' is suffering. Do you understand? Like anger, envy, is not different from you, you are envy, you are anger, you are violent, and you may say I am trying to be non-violent. That too is you, you are not different from the qualities, from the expression, but you are that. So suffering is not separate from you. So K says to his friend, the first thing when you suffer don't escape from it, don't seek comfort in any form. I am afraid that is much too difficult, not to seek comfort, some consolation, some way to relieve myself from the ache and the pain. Then you are escaping from the fact, and we have cultivated a thousand escapes, it is part of our life.

So K says to his friend, who is you, he says, don't escape. That is the first thing to realize. If you escape to something, then that something you will also lose, and you will begin again. Do you understand? So don't ever escape. See the fact, the truth of it, the implications of escaping. Then if you don't escape, don't try to find out the cause of suffering - because that again is a process of analysis - right, which is the operation of thought, time: don't do any of that. But, K says to his friend, which is you, remain with sorrow. As you want to remain with pleasure, don't you, so remain with sorrow, don't ever move from sorrow. That is, don't let thought interfere with that thing you call sorrow. Sorrow is a great shock, not only to the physical organism, but also a great shock to the psyche. And to remain with that shock, never trying to transcend it, all that will be the activity of thought. Do you understand? It is like having a marvellous jewel in your hand, the more you look at it, the more the beauty of that jewel is revealed. Similarly if you look at your sorrow, if you hold sorrow, never move away from it, then you will see how immense it is, not just sorrow, the pain, and the anxiety, but in that observation of sorrow, passion comes. Not the passion of lust, and all that, but passion. Do you know what passion is? You don't. Because without passion you cannot create anything, you cannot love with passion. Don't translate it into sexual passion, lust. Passion is important, without passion life becomes shallow, and therefore that which is shallow has no beauty, no love, no passion.

I am sorry if I have kept you.

MADRAS 4TH PUBLIC TALK 6TH JANUARY 1985

I hope there are some friends here!

May we go on from where we left off yesterday? We were talking about conflict yesterday evening, and whether it is possible to live in this world, the modern world - I don't know if the word 'modern' is really applicable, but it doesn't matter we will use that word - to live in this modern world without conflict. We went into that very carefully. And also we talked about beauty. Beauty is not in the picture, or in the tree, or a description of a marvellous poem, or any of the great statues and so on. We said where there is beauty, which is truth, there is no self, there is no self-interest whatsoever. We talked about it considerably. And also we went into the question of what is fear, and whether it is possible to live our daily life without psychological fears at all. One doesn't know what you have thought about it, whether you have worked at it in order to find out for yourself whether it is possible to live without fear, which implies security. Is there security for human beings both externally and psychologically. We talked about that too.

Security may be something most definite, and it may not be found at all psychologically where there is this pursuit of self-interest, and therefore it breeds corruption. We went into that too. Where there is self-interest there must be corruption. Corruption is merely an expression of self-interest, the bribes, black market, you know all that, with which you are quite familiar, I am sure.

And also we talked about what you really want, what is your deep longing, craving. And can that craving, longing, wanting ever be satisfied? So we went into that too a little bit.

So this evening we ought to talk over together - I mean together, this is not to instruct you of anything, or to inform you, but we are as two friends having a dialogue, a conversation, can we together go into certain problems this evening? Which is, death, what it means in life, and love, religion and meditation. We will talk over together these questions. I hope you are prepared for a very serious talk, discussion, not merely agreeing or disagreeing, as we went into that question yesterday. There is no disagreement when you see this microphone in front of you, unless we are blind or half blind and imagine it is something else, which it is not. Then that imagination, or that attitude, or that condition brings about agreement or disagreement. When we are looking together at a fact that which we call a tree is just that, there is no disagreement about it; you might like it, you might not like it, but it is still a tree. So it is important in our lives to face facts and not fiddle about with ideas, beliefs, faith and all that business. But actually deal with what we have, that is our fears, our anxieties, our jealousies, our antagonism, and great deal of pretensions, hypocrisy, worshipping peace and killing another. There is that word in Latin, which the Catholic hierarchy have been repeating for the last two thousand years - pacem in terris, which means, may there be peace on earth. And there has never been any peace on earth because the very church, the very temples, the mosques have created wars. Right? Whether you like it or not it is a fact.

So we are going to talk over together what is death, why human beings have been so frightened of it, why human beings have really never understood deeply what the deep significance of death is. We can only understand it when there is no fear. Right? But most of us - I am sorry about my voice, it will get better as we go along - most of us are afraid of death. And we separate living from death - our daily life from death. One thing is absolutely certain, which is that we are all going to die. Right? Whether you like it or not that is an absolute, irrevocable fact. You and the speaker are going to die one day - I hope not in a few days but many, many years later.

So we ought to talk over together as two friends, not agreeing or disagreeing, but look at it all - the living and the dying. What is living? What is it that we call living? Please, this is a discussion, this is a dialogue between you and the speaker, so work it out. What do you call living? Is living this constant struggle, constant conflict, seeking power, status, position, and not being, perhaps, able to get it, and living a constant battle with oneself. And the living is what we call anxiety, attachment. Right? Living is going to the office, whether it is the highest ministers of this country, or the lowest clerk going to the office every day for sixty years, or fifty years of your life, from 9.0 to 5.0., being insulted, pushed around. Right? Unless you are the top executives. That's what we call also life. The responsibility of earning a livelihood with money to support your wife and children, and educate them - and the education is pretty rotten, as it is in this country, and elsewhere too, because they are merely emphasizing memorizing. Right? And making them into machines. You are programming them to be mathematicians, to be engineers, to be scientists, and so on. They offer a means of livelihood and so you spend eight hours of the day for the rest of your life, and then retire to die. This is a fact. Seeking god, seeking peace, seeking some kind of shelter, some kind of way of living that is not so utterly shallow, empty. And this is what we call living.

Is it a waste of life? I am asking. We are asking each other this question. This way of living, with all the complications of that, always wanting more and more and more. And this is what we call living: trying to meditate, and prepare for meditation, sitting in the right posture, breathing rightly, hoping to control your mind, your thoughts, playing with all that stuff. Right?

And our bodies are being misused as our brains. Have you watched your own bodies? That is, our bodies are an extraordinary instrument, most intricate, anatomically, how through long centuries of millenia upon millenia our bodies have been prepared through evolution. And it is the most astonishing machine. And how we neglect it. And each one of us knows this and we neglect it, we disregard it, we never take proper exercise, yoga. I must be carefully of that word. You can get hooked up, hooked to the word yoga, and all the practices involved in it, and spend days and years being concerned with that, hoping to achieve some kind of... But exercise is necessary for the body. The speaker does it every morning for an hour, yoga and other forms of exercises. And we are accustomed to one kind of food and we stick to that. You understand all this, I don't have to go into it.

So our body, really if you have gone into it, is the most amazing instrument, like the brain. And through long usage it wears itself out. And the organism dies, when we are ninety, fifty, through accident, through misuse, through old age, the body, the organism may last a hundred or a hundred and ten years, but the organism comes to an end. That is what we call death.

Then we ask ourselves: what is it that lives, if I die? Right?
Aren't you all asking that question?

Q: No.

K: You are all asking that question: we know the body goes. And our life may have been wasted. Have you ever asked yourselves whether you are wasting your life? Please ask it now. And find out for yourself whether you are wasting it. Of course you have to earn a livelihood, have a vocation. That is granted. But otherwise are you wasting your life - spending energy on things that don't matter? As we said the other day, our brains contain all memory. Our brain holds our consciousness. Our consciousness makes up the content of our consciousness, makes consciousness. That is the content, which is our anxiety, our fears, our beliefs, our superstitions, our faith, our quarrels, jealousy, hate, fears, sorrow, and the search for truth. All that is part of our consciousness. Right? Is that clear? Your consciousness is what you are. Your consciousness is not separate from you, you are consciousness - your feelings, your emotions, your sentiments and so on. The whole of that consciousness is in permanent confusion, constantly changing but it is limited. That consciousness is what you are. Right? This is a fact. Look at it, you don't have to accept what the speaker is saying. [I am sorry about my voice.]

That consciousness is me. Right? That consciousness is the self-interest. That consciousness is the ego, the personality, the characteristics, the tendencies. That is the whole content of our consciousness. Right? Its reactions and actions, its appreciations, depressions, loneliness and all that. And we say, is that the end at death, my consciousness dies too, or will it continue? That's what you are interested in. Right? No? Aren't you interested in the continuity of yourself? Or you want to end it quickly? Surely we all want to think and long for a continuity, otherwise you would never talk about reincarnation. Reincarnation implies that which you are now, not having all the opportunities, all the things, perhaps next life you will have it - a better house, more refrigerators, better cars, more power; or if you are religiously inclined, a little more saintly, more moral, not so corrupt. But it is the same desire for continuity. Right?

We all want to continue. We never question what it is to continue. You follow my question? We have never asked ourselves, what do I mean by continuity? Everything is changing - our cells, our blood, the cells in the brain are constantly dying, renovating. And what we mean by continuity is all the memories which we have collected, all the beliefs, all the experiences, the pain, the sorrow, the loneliness, the despair, all that we want to continue because we want to continue the 'me'. Right? Is the speaker saying something false or true? Don't become suddenly silent. Everybody longs for this continuity, which is continuity as security.

And if there is death, is that the end of everything? Now what do we mean by ending? Let's talk about it a little bit. Have we ever ended something voluntarily - your anger, your jealousy, your aggression - have you ever said, "I'll end it", not tomorrow, but now completely end it? But our brains are conditioned to the idea of gradation, gradualness, therefore we never end anything. Right? For example, one is attached, attached to an idea, to an experience, to some form of ideal - aren't you? To some form of a concept which thought has created and we cling to that as security. So we are attached to a house, to the family, to a name. And where there is attachment there is anxiety, there is fear, there is jealousy, insurance, mortgage. All the implications of attachment. And death says, that is the end of it. Right? I may be attached to my wife, to my friend, to my family, and death comes along and says, it's over. Now we want to remain attached all the time through the next life. Right? I have lost my brother, or my son, and I hope to meet him the next life. Don't you feel all these things, or am I talking to myself about nothing?

And there is a continuity in our life through attachment. Right? And to voluntarily say, "I will end attachment", have you ever done it? So we are asking, and you are asking too, do we voluntarily ever give up anything, not for a reward, for itself? Oh, you don't see the beauty of ending something completely. So ending has great significance. Right?

Now the question is: why have we put death at the far end of one's life? Because we cling to what is known. Death is unknown. And we would rather live with all the turmoil we have, all the misery, the confusion, and the longings, we would rather have that which we call life, living, and avoid death as far as possible, at the end of everything. We are asking you as a friend, can you live with death while living? You understand my question? That is, when I die, not only the organism is cremated, or buried, or whatever his friends do to him when he dies, and that is the end of everything, though we may want a continuity next life, but that is the actuality, an end. Now death means that, to end. Right? Can you live with death, together, life and death together? Have you ever asked that question? Will you ask it now, as a friend? That to end attachment now, not when you die. Can you end your fear now, not when you are gone?

So is it possible to live - this is a very serious question, please do pay attention to it, I am telling my friend - to live with that, not commit suicide, I am not talking of that, but living with death means ending everything every minute, all that you have accumulated as memory - of course you cannot leave your house because you have got to pay mortgage, insurance, and you have to have a shelter, you can't let that go, or your job, then you will be unemployed and all the misery of it, or you join a community, or become a sannyasi, a monk. They also have their misery.

So can you, can I, live everyday with death? That means ending my experience everyday, only the memories of those experiences, and knowledge, there physically they are necessary, psychologically can I end the memories? That is death. Death is going to tell us at the end of our life, "Boy, you can't carry your memories with you". So to live with death all the time, it's a marvellous thing if you do it. This is not a reward. Because our memories are entirely in the brain, in the very cells of the brain, and memories which are the past are gone, are dead, memories have no meaning really. But yet we are full of memories, which is our knowledge. You understand this, it is very important. Can you end knowledge today - not the knowledge of doing carpentry and technological things - but the memories, the knowledge that you have carried? Can you - I am asking my friend who is sitting beside me, I am asking him, you have to have memories to do certain things in the physical world, psychologically don't carry a single memory. You understand? Not a single hurt, not a word of hate, or the feeling of hate, or seeking power, position. Power is evil, whether it is a political power, or the power you have over your wife, or husband. Any form of power, or near power, being near power is evil, ugly. And can you end all that psychologically? That means to live with death all the time.

Does it mean anything to you? Or we will always be afraid of death?

This brings about another question. Death and love go together. Death is not memory, love is not memory, nor pleasure. It is the ending of desire, the ending of thought, that's love. Therefore death and love go together. Do you understand all this? Have you ever enquired what love is? What is love, to most of us? Do you love a tree, do you love your wife, husband? Is love desire? Please, this is important, go into it, give your heart to find out because you have lost this quality in this country. When you talk about love you become vacant, you don't know what it means. If you loved your children there would be no war.

So we must enquire into what is love - enquire, not intellectually, not analytically - the word 'enquire' we use as watching, listening, observing. What is love? Is it put together by thought? You understand this? When you say, if you ever say, I love my wife, or I love you, what does it mean? Please ask yourself this question. Is it all the remembrance you have gathered about her or him, the sexual pleasures, the desires, the comfort?

So we have to ask ourselves what is desire, which is a very complex thing - I don't know if we will have time to go into it this evening. And also the images, all the pictures we have built about each other, is all that love? Or love is something entirely different from desire, thought, memory? And without the beauty of love, which is truth, any amount of your meditation, reading, or searching and all the rest of it has no meaning.

So love is not jealousy, is it? Love is not hate. So can you put aside jealousy altogether, envy about anybody, anything? Will you do it? Now, not tomorrow. Never be envious, which is to compare yourself with another. Can you end that comparison and that envy? If you cannot there can be no love. If you are ambitious, seeking your own fulfilment, your own success, your own power, ambition, all that, that denies completely love. No? Will you end all that to find out what love is? You understand? Love is beauty - not the face and the painting and the pictures, and all the contents of museums, ancient or modern. Love is beauty, love cannot exist where there is self-interest, the ego, selfishness. You may love god, which I question because god is something born of your mind, brain.

So death is love. Ending is love.

We ought to talk over together, have a conversation, what is religion? I must finish this. Is your consciousness - I will pursue this - is your consciousness different from another's consciousness? Have you ever asked that question? If you have not, please ask it now. Is your consciousness, which is your beliefs, your turmoil, your pleasure, your faith, your anxiety, your uncertainty, that is your consciousness, add more to it - is that different from another, except along the borders, frills? You may have more capacity than another, more skill, and so on, those are all frills, tendencies, characteristics. But if you observe very carefully your own consciousness, which is what you are, your consciousness is like other people's consciousness. They go through what you are going through, insecure, uncertain, confused, agreeing with certain politicians and disagreeing about others, corrupt. This is the consciousness of humanity. Right? You don't have to believe what I am saying, it is so whether you like it or not.

And that consciousness goes on even when our organism dies. You understand this? Because humanity for the last million years, less or more, has carried this burden of sorrow, pain, innumerable desires with their fears and so on. So when I die the common consciousness of mankind goes on, which is your consciousness. Right? Look at it carefully, look at it objectively, not personally. You may be born in India with certain traditions, superstitions, having a thousand gods, or more, and the other, only one god, and the other having a greater culture, greater sophistication, greater this and that, and your consciousness is similar to his. So when I die the consciousness of humanity with all the pain and sorrow goes on. You don't realize the seriousness of this.

And unless there are some who step out of this consciousness - you understand - unless there are some who are totally selfless, totally free of all conditioning, that consciousness will go on. And the few who can step out of it, or many, or all of you, you are contributing to something beyond this consciousness.

We ought to talk over another serious matter which is, what is religion? Why has mankind for over a million years sought something beyond himself? You understand? All new cultures are based on religion. This is an historical fact. And all our cultures in the modern day is nothing but money, noise, violence, brutality, power, whether in the temples, mosques or churches with their hierarchy. Their rituals, that is not religion, is it? Ask that question, sirs. Is that religion, repeating day after day mantras, repeating day after day puja, going to temples, offering an incalculable amount of money. Look at all the churches, how they have been built, the great cathedrals - probably you have not seen some of the most beautiful cathedrals in the world, all in the name of god, in the name of somebody. In the western world it is the saviour, and in the eastern world you know better than I do. And that's what is called religion. The origin, the etymological root of that word has not been established. We looked it up in various dictionaries and it has not been established.

If we can put aside all the attempts made by man to find god, or something beyond god, and the priests who come in between us to interpret god, to show us the light, including the gurus, if we put all that aside, what is religion? You understand? Is religion put together by thought for one's comfort, for one's psychological safety, knowing that thought is limited, as knowledge is limited, thought is born out of memory, memory is knowledge, knowledge comes out of experience, the whole process of thought is always limited? It can imagine the immeasurable, but it is still limited because it can imagine it; it can project eternity, but the projector is limited.

So what is religion? What is it that man, you, and the speaker, say, what is it? Is there something more than mere knowledge? Right? You understand my question? Somebody answer. Do you understand my question? We have knowledge about so many things, how to go to the moon, how to kill a million people with one blow, how to communicate with each other miles apart, thousands of miles apart so rapidly, all the great surgery. That is all born out of knowledge. And is knowledge religion, psychological knowledge? Or the ending of psychological knowledge? You understand? The ending of it, not the perpetuation of it. That means can the brain be free of knowledge, not worldly knowledge. Please, we must be very careful here to understand this. You need knowledge to drive a car, to write a letter, to telephone, to go to your business, you need knowledge; to recognize your wife and to beat her or to quarrel with her you need knowledge - or her quarrelling with you or beating you up, that generally very rarely happens that a woman beats a man up. I wish it would happen!

So I am asking, will the accumulation of knowledge, psychologically, you understand, will that bring about an understanding, or coming to that great state of sacredness? Right? Because man has sought something beyond all this. And the search is apparently through meditation. Right? Can we talk about meditation a little bit? The word 'meditation' means to ponder over, to think over. I will meditate about my problems. And also that word means to measure. Right? I believe in Sanskrit it means that too, ma is to measure. Correct me if I am wrong.

So meditation has now become a thing that you practise, you follow a system, a method, do part of yoga as a part of meditation. Is that meditation? Preparation and meditation. You understand? The preparing oneself through a system, through yoga, through repeating mantras, resting twenty minutes a day in the morning, twenty minutes in the afternoon, twenty minutes in the evening, having a nice siesta, or rest, or whatever it is, and practise that day after day. Is that meditation? Most of us meditate deliberately, consciously. Right? Practise it consciously in order to meditate, or practise, follow, obey, a pattern, and then you will learn what it is to be aware. There are lots of people trying to follow somebody who will teach you how to be aware. It's all such rot.

So what is meditation? It is a very interesting question because conscious meditation, a deliberate process, to sit properly, breathe, you know all that business, consciously, deliberately meditate is no meditation. It is like consciously working to become an executive, consciously trying to become a millionaire, having plenty of money, it's the same. You want a result, you want peace of mind, silence. Right?

Now what is silence? Is it separate from sound? Have you enquired into sound? What is sound? There is sound inside your body all the time, the blood going through the veins. They have put a camera inside the body - you must have seen some of those television pictures, how there is pumping. That is noise, that is sound, when the heart is beating that is sound. You can hear another heart beating, that is sound. Right? And the sound of a tree, not when the breezes are dancing with the leaves, not when there is a great wind sweeping through it, but when the tree is very still without a single leaf moving, there is a sound in there. And we create sound all round us. Right? Next door for the last month, or another month, or whatever period they have, there is a noise going on, that's sound. Sound of a voice, the sound of music. You understand? There is sound. Why do we separate sound from silence? Because that is what you want, a silent peaceful mind, brain. And to achieve that you practise, hoping by controlling thought gradually, or eventually or in a year or two you will have complete control of your thoughts, your feelings. And you never have asked, who is the controller? Right? Will you ask that question? I want to control my thought because thought is all the time chasing everything, restless, moving from one thing to another, and I want to concentrate, I want to fix my energy on that page, or on that ledger - how to make it crooked for the government, or the tax payer. I want to concentrate, and I try to focus my brain on that, then thought comes along and says, look, and it goes off, distraction.

So there is concentration and distraction. Right? Why do you call it distraction? Is there such a thing as distraction? Find out these things. I want to concentrate on that page but my thought goes off to something else, I pull it back and say, "For god's sake concentrate", because it will get you money, it will give you a position, and it will give you a sense of vitality, energy, and that urge is similar to earning money. There is not much difference between concentration, wanting to achieve an end, and the concentration you spend on earning a lot of money, or power, position. If you are a good talker, as you are in this country, you worship a talker. And anything that distracts your thought, you call that distraction. Is there such a thing as distraction at all? Please enquire into it. Distraction implies a moving away from what you should do, or you want to do. You want to concentrate and there is a distraction. Isn't your wanting another form of distraction? Right? Enquire into it. Isn't your whole life a form of distraction? No? Don't look at me as though you are puzzled. Everything becomes a distraction when there is no love, when there is no certainty. Right?

I will go into it if you will follow this a little bit.

To the speaker there is no distraction. To him everything is a distraction. See why. Endless talking about politics, endless reading newspapers and quoting, you follow, isn't that a distraction, chatting, gossiping, isn't that a wastage of energy, isn't that a distraction? So any form of wastage of energy is a distraction. Therefore we have to enquire: is there no wastage of energy at all? You people don't go into all this. Do we waste our energy? In many, many ways, don't we? And when you want to concentrate it is a form of resistance. Right? You build a wall around yourself and you say, "I must look at this carefully" - isn't that a wastage of energy, this battle, wanting to concentrate, wanting to control, wanting to have power. Isn't that a wastage of energy? Holding on to your position next to the most important person. I heard a lovely story the other day. Somebody shook hands with the queen, and the lady next to that person said to the lady who shook hands with the queen, "May I shake your hand?"! You follow, sir?

Listen to all this and find out for yourself why you call anything a distraction. All the conflicts are a distraction, aren't they? All your jealousies are distractions. That is a wastage of energy, being jealous. No? Hating somebody, being envious of somebody. So our life, the living, is a wastage of energy, the way we are living. And if we end that way of living there is no distraction whatever. Then you are living.

So we must go back to the question: what is meditation? It is very easy to mesmerize oneself. Right? To say to oneself, I am achieving, I am getting nearer to enlightenment. The question arises, can there be silence which is part of sound? What we call silence is the ending of sound. Right? The sound being thought, sound being knowledge. Right? You have that silence without any disturbance. Right? And in that silence come upon something extraordinary, tremendous experience of enlightenment, or of great insight into the universe. Right? Isn't that silence related to sound? Or is sound different from silence? Or sound is silence?

Sir, have you listened to sound, not resist it? Not to say, it is ugly sound. An aeroplane passing overhead, thundering, it is a tremendous noise, sound. Lightning. Right? We are noisy, and therefore we are seeking silence. You understand? So we have separated sound, noise from silence, as we have separated death from living. Right? You understand what I am saying? So our brain, our thought rather, is separating all the time. You understand? It is the nature of thought to separate - nationally, religiously, you and I, the most learned, the ignorant - it is the activity of thought which is in itself limited, therefore whatever it does will be limited, will be separative - Jew, Arab, Muslim and Hindu, communist, socialist - you follow? All that implies a constant division. So we have separated silence from sound. Right, do you get it? If you don't separate, which is not seek silence as away from sound, then sound is part of silence. I wonder if you see this. Do you see this?

You see when you seek out silence you are creating disorder. And that disorder you call silence. Order is born out of... it comes into being when disorder ends. Right? To find out disorder first, not seek order, why our lives are in disorder, and to go into it, find out, and so on. When there is that comprehension completely of disorder there is naturally order. Now when you don't separate sound from silence there is order, complete order - like the universe, it is everlastingly in order - sun rises, sun setting, the stars, the beauty of a new moon, the full moon, the whole universe is in order, it is only human beings who are in disorder because they have lost their relationship with nature, they have no beauty. You understand?

So the end of the matter is when there is no self, self-centredness, there is something which is totally orderly and that order is silence and sound, and then there is that thing that man has sought, which is timeless. Unless you do this, all this is verbal nonsense. Unless you put your mind and heart to understand your own life, why you live this way, why you have to go to the office day after day, why you have to quarrel with your wife and husband, the jealousy. All that destroys love, and without love there is no order. And where there is love there is compassion. And where there is compassion there is supreme intelligence. Not the artificial intelligence of a computer, nor the artificial intelligence or powerful intelligence of thought. But when there is that quality of the brain, which has understood the whole business of conditioning and is free, and silence is part of that enormous sound of the universe, and where there is the end of sorrow, there is passion. Compassion is that passion, and it is that intelligence, and then beyond that there is total nothingness.

IN CONVERSATION WITH J. UPADIAH, MADRAS 13TH JANUARY 1985

K: Sir, yesterday we talked about an ordinary man, fairly well educated, not too educated fortunately, no special profession. He starts looking at the world, outside world. It is like a great river flowing. As it enters the sea it is in a turmoil because it has got great volume of water for the last million years. And this turmoil, the conflict, the various deltas, the whole vast river entering into the sea, that is the world. He follows up that river. He is not any kind of religious or... just an ordinary man and follows up that river. And as he follows it up and up and up, up the mountain, he comes to a point where the river begins. He has observed various techniques, various disciplines, science, physics, judgement, the whole human existence is in this vast river. And he comes to the beginning of that river on a great hill, great mountain, it is very small there. And there he is after a million years, and he is alone, self-centred up there. It is like a funnel, wide at the beginning and very small at the end. And he realizes all that river was himself, not in any theological, or theoretical, hypothetical sense, because he has followed that river up and up and up, to the very small few drops of that river and there he discovers he is that river, he is the world. And the world is based - the movement of all that is self-centred, self-interest. And it is the end of that funnel, the narrow small funnel.

From there he begins to work and discovers slowly the enormity of that funnel on the other side. It is immensely wide, much wider than the river and he doesn't know quite how to move from there.

He has read and people have said that there is an enormity beyond this limited self-interest. He doesn't know anything about it, he is rather a sceptical man, very questioning, doubting, and doubting his own experiences, his own thinking, his own way of life, and he has never disciplined himself. This is important for him. He has never disciplined because he has just been following the river from the beginning, from that enormous delta up the river, he has followed it up. And the very following it up is not a discipline. I don't know if I am making myself clear? And he has reached that very small hole, which is self-interest. And he doesn't know how to go beyond that, he is stuck there. And that's where we left off yesterday - right?

And there have been teachers before him, authorities, great many scientists telling him what to do, what he is composed of, the atoms, the cells, how the origin of man began, and from the ape to the present state of brain, this long endlessness of time. He accepts all that, that is obviously natural, but he has come to a point where he discovers there is no authority, no spiritual authority whatsoever because he has left all that, he has climbed to the origin of the river. And there there is no guide, there is no helper. We were talking in somewhat detail the whole question of being helped spiritually, inwardly. And he discovers there is nobody to help him. As he climbed he hoped somebody would help him but he discovers that there is not a single person in heaven or in any book, or in any guru, or in any philosophy, and he is stranded up there, aware of his loneliness, all the rest of it. And he can't stay there. There is a pull wanting to climb more, but there is nothing to climb either. He has come to that point. I wonder if I have made myself clear? Clear?

Q1: Yes. I think so. I think we went a little further yesterday, talking about how the self-interest can go. You said that it has to be a constant watching and doubting.

K: We will come to that. He has understood?

Q1: He says that you have explained the whole thing very clearly but he would like to ask whether each individual who is in this river, in this stream, has to remain utterly helpless. You correct me, utterly helpless, it is the river of hope, of desire, anxiety, and all that. Or whether there is a possibility for him to - not to be completely dragged in that stream, but to create something, a raft, something by which he can be out of it. He is not entirely out of it and yet he can stand apart from it.

Q2: This calls for some energy, some 'purushartha' - that means some special attribute of his own understanding. That means it does not come from outside, it comes from within him. And it is that which helps him to discover that rock and to hold firmly to that rock while people are being dragged against their will in that stream and he watches that, he is a witness to the people being dragged in the stream. But can he find some energy within him which will help him to cling to that rock?

Q1: Or which is that rock.

Q2: Which is that rock.

Q3: Krishnaji you also said one more thing. And that standing up in the stream, on the island in the stream, still is not separate from those who are being swept away.

Q2: But he is not being swept away. That is his point. He can stand on that rock and observe the whole process. He can stop being dragged in that, at the same time he is not out of it. There is a mixed metaphor.

K: What?

Q2: There is a mixed metaphor. He says that this man is like the traffic policeman in a traffic island, and by his hand he is directing that traffic, but himself not part of the movement of the traffic.

K: Sir, I said, subject to correction, he is always moving up the river. There is no island because he is moving. And that very moving gives him the strength.

Q2: But he is not being dragged down. He is moving up.

K: You are missing the whole thing. He has been in all that noise, all the travail, he is moving away, moving, going up.

Q2: Again a mixed metaphor. He says it is not a rock or an island, but it is a small boat.

K: No, I would rather stick to this metaphor if you don't mind because it conveys an awful lot of meaning. And I may be mistaken. As I said yesterday, I doubt this whole movement of going up the river. I have gone up the river and watched all this movement round me, and I realize I am part of that movement, which we said yesterday very carefully. I am not different from that movement. I am that movement. I am that humanity. Not humanity and me, but I am that because I have wandered all over that and I discover that. And as I move up the river, because it is a movement, it is not a static state, as it is a movement up the river, that very movement creates its own discipline. The man who is static needs discipline. I don't know if you are following? But the man who is constantly moving up and up and up, he is following the river and therefore there is no island because he is moving. I won't allow islands to be formed. I may invent islands. I may invent rocks to hold on but the river won't permit me to do that because he sees the implications of all that.

Q2: What I understand is: that as you have described the stream of life, everyone is being dragged down.

K: Because he is not moving.

Q1: He says that there is some seed within man himself. Man seeks some special kind of happiness and it is because of that he - there is the desire for sexual...

K: That is natural.

Q1: Yes. It is natural. But at some point he feels like transcending it, to be without it. There is something in him which takes him out of all that.

K: He may be tired of it. Don't make it something spiritual.

Q4: Krishnaji may I say something? The effort is to rise out of the stream. Every effort, he says, is man's natural effort is to rise outside the flow.

Q2: Within man, he says, there is the urge to rise above these sordid sorrows and worries and everything and every bit of... that happen. That is, he says, sex. Sex, he says, is that the totality of his tissues is making a great effort to move out of that vortex or sorrow, etcetera. Out of the flow, in the flow. But he is never out of it. And he wants to insist that this man by any act that he is doing is not trying to get out of this but he is part of this stream.

K: Sir, he has spent his youth in that, at the mouth of the river, sex, power, you know all the business. And he sees it is a habit, a condition, and he is bored with it. Don't give him some kind of spiritual... He is so exhausted and bored with the whole circus.

Right? This is what is happening Sir. From boredom, from laziness, he says, "By Jove, I must move somewhere." Not something inwardly pushing him. He starts from there.

Q1: You mean boredom takes him right up to the top?

K: No, I don't say that. He moves out of that.

Q4: Out of the stream.

K: Sir, he is not - Sir, have you ever watched the Nile, or the Ganga entering into the sea? The greater the volume of water the greater the delta, the little streams, they are tremendous, he is that. He begins there. You understand? We are all that. We want sex, we want power, we want etcetera, etcetera. And he says to himself, "My God, that is enough." Why impute something that in him that is going to reject all this? I said then he begins - please carefully - I said, he begins to move from there.

Q2: Sir one thing I have not understood - this is my question.

K: I am saying he wants to see where the river begins.

Q2: This is my question.

K: Wait a minute Sir. Wait, let me finish.

Q2: As you have put it, you have described the stream which is dragging the people, everybody along with it and then you say...

K: No. If he wants to remain there, he is there. But he is curious enough to find out the origin of the river. That's all. I followed Sir, the Rhine, up and there it was, I have forgotten five thousand or three thousand in Alps, a few drops, very slow, from the glacier, a few drops, and it became bigger and bigger and bigger, miles it flowed. So if he is following that. The moment he stays there, at the mouth of the river, he likes it there, the vast majority they like it there. They like drugs, they like sex, they like power, position, knowledge, everything, they like it - don't they? What are you talking about?

Q1: I think nobody denies that. All that is said is that there is some energy which makes him follow the river to the...

K: Curiosity. He wants to find out. Why not be simple about it? He is curious, he wants to know. He has been through all that awful business and says, "My God, I am bored with this stuff" - aren't you bored with sex when you have had enough of it? Sorry!

Q5: Krishnaji, there seem to be two different metaphors which are so similar that they are clashing with each other. One is your metaphor of the person finding himself at the foaming mouth of the river, recognizing the river, feeling curious about it, he is not taken up with the...

K: He has been through it.

Q5: Yes. He, is there and having been there sufficiently long and experienced some of the things he becomes is curious and then he asks where from?

K: Move.

Q5: There is another metaphor that the Punditji has brought up, which is a different metaphor. It is the metaphor of the suffering humanity in which the river is not the river of the happening of one person's experience but of seeing the whole world and feeling compassionate about all the people being dragged down. The great misery which is called Buddhism, which talks about the world as a sad place.

K: I know all that.

Q5: One talks about saying that wouldn't it be nice if these poor people instead of being swept by there would be somebody to give them the way, somebody to give them a help and so on.

K: Pat him on the back.

Q5: Or at least a traffic policeman.

K: I don't want all that.

Q5: No what I am saying is that there are two metaphors running at the same time. They both talk about the river but they are talking about two different rivers.

K: I am talking of one river. My river is the river of everybody. Don't introduce sorrow. I have been through sorrow, that is sorrow, that is pain, that is anxiety, that is loneliness, despair, hope, all that.

Q5: Sir, you would not describe your river as the river of sorrow?

K: And also the river of pain, the river of fear, the river of all that.

Q2: It is all part of sorrow.

K: Why reduce everything to sorrow?

Q5: Krishnaji, I am with you. I like the idea of not talking about sorrow but of talking about things as they are.

K: As they are. That is what...

Q5: Not the theory of sorrow.

K: Nothing. Punditji I am not trying to beat you down.

Q2: He wants to know Sir what is the place of the arising of sexual desire.

K: Biologically, procreation.

Q2: Biologically.

K: Biologically all the glands are prepared for that. For God's sake.

Q2: He doesn't agree.

K: Oh, he doesn't agree.

Q2: There is an ecstasy in which there is self forgetfulness.

There is an ecstasy in which there is self forgetfulness, this is joy.

K: That is sex.

Q2: That is what he says is sex, and this, he says, is not a biological but a psychological factor. He says that particular impulse pulls a man out of the common run of...

K: Which? The sex?

Q2: This urge for that ecstasy, self forgetfulness.

K: Wait Sir. For God's sake. I can take a drug and forget all about myself. I can go to a concert, Beethoven, and listen to the Ninth Symphony, or the Fifth Symphony and forget entirely myself. I go to a temple and do puja, I can forget myself. Why?

Q4: I am mankind. I have a lot of things in common with man, but I am an individual also.

K: I question that.

Q4: I have a lot of features in common with mankind. I am humanity and yet that humanity is given a particular form in me.

K: We said all that yesterday. We said yesterday I am humanity. We went in that, consciousness and all that. I am humanity. I am not different from the rest of you, I am the whole of mankind. Right? We discussed that - or didn't we? And I have been through all that, sorrow, pleasure, pain, sex, drugs, - please I haven't been, my thing will come a little later! I have been through all that and I am bored with it. Don't impute some strange inward impulse. I am bored with all that. To me that has no meaning. I have been in it. I have been involved in it, I have cursed, I have obeyed and I disobeyed. I have done all that. Then as I am bored - I am using the word bored specially - I begin to question, is my life just damn boredom? A meaningless boredom. And I begin to move. No, I am beginning to move from the - up the stream. This is very important. I am moving. This is static. I don't know if I am making it clear.

Q2: This is static because it is just a repetition.

K: Repetition, mechanical, habitual and all the rest of it. The moment I move because I am bored with the whole thing, I realize movement has no discipline. This is where we are going to come into contact, conflict with all of you. While there is a movement there is no discipline. I am walking up the hill because...

Q3: You are propounding something. It may be only a semantic thing but you are using it a totally different opposite...

Q4: But it is not irrelevant. (A lot of people talking all at once)

K: Would you kindly let me finish?

Q3: But Sir, if I don't say it now it won't be said. This is the point to say it, the point at which you raise a thing. Afterwards it becomes lost.

K: All right, go on.

Q3: The point is you used to say the river of humanity flows, unless I step out of the stream - listen to me.

K: I know what you are going to say.

Q3: Unless you step out of the stream, unless the mind - I will use the word mind now, is a rock...

K: I know nothing about all this.

Q3: Please listen Sir.

K: You impute all this.

Q3: I don't. I am using your words.

Q4: But he may have used a different metaphor. It is a question of metaphor and vocabulary.

Q3: What is the actual difference in terms of change of consciousness?

Q6: I think, Pupulji, I can solve this question because I have listened to Krishnaji's language and struggled with it for a long time and I now no longer pay any attention to the word meanings, because he means different things at different times. Previously when he talked about movement it was an ordered movement, it was an entire movement, it had a law, it was a slave thing and therefore there was time. Only a thing which is moving according to prescribed law can be used for time. This movement, he says, it comes by itself...

K: That's right.

Q6: ...it comes because it is bored, it has no law. And a movement without law is creativity, is freshness, it is ? , it has no time that can be associated with it.

K: That's right Sir, you have got it. He is my disciple!

[Laughter] Forgive me Sir! You are not my disciple.

Q6: What I am saying is that therefore because of this all those statements are really the same even though the words are different. People have accused me that I am now preoccupied with language but in language there is something called surface meaning and the deep meaning. The deep structure of language and the surface structure. If you said I throw a stone at... I mean a stone broke the window and I broke the window, they sound different, the subject is different, the object is different but in fact they are really the same. So these two are really the same.

Q2: I am concerned with our friend because he is trying to make a distinction between the common run of humanity and this something special that he talks which is not special. I have not understood.

Q6: No, I have not understood but I understand one mistranslation. His samanya and vishesha are not general and particular. They are not. So we have to understand what is the technical context in which he does it, and the only way we will find out is not by listening to the word, this word but by asking him therefore to say something specific about human life.

Q2: What he is trying to say Sir is that you have been pointing out how the self comes into being as part of a process of activity of the brain cells, and this activity of the brain cells leads to thought, and then thought leads to these cells and the stabilizing of the cells. This process we have understood. And this is the process of all the people who are in that current.

He now wants to know that this is the course that we have seen, how come that out of this, without getting out it, some person arises who is able to end thought and he has love and he has insight, and all this, how does this man, he is not different from this, he is also in it, but he is watching therefore he is different and he is part of this, how does this come? This is what he wants.

K: I will come to that point.

Q2: He hasn't come to this yet. He says that when you talk about the differentiation, the special, the vishesha the second variety, it is not by giving up the previous awareness. You have that awareness and you also have something else. [Several people talking together]

K: I don't know what you are all talking about.

Q2: I have not understood Sir. I can't translate because I have not understood Sir.

K: Sir let me finish what I want to say and then you can jump on it. I have got this Sir. I am not at the top and all the rest of it. I have just began. I am bored with all that. I have been through all that. I am not a spiritual, holy, none of that. I began there. And I got bored and I have become very sceptical. This is important. Sceptical, doubtful, question. None of this has any meaning to him so he moves, naturally, it is not a seeking some high altitude. He moves. And in this movement he is becoming aware the difficulties of movement. You understand? I wonder. Difficulties of movement leaving this. So he begins to question why he is finding it difficult. Then he talks about renunciation and he says I don't want any of renunciation, I don't believe in renunciation. So he says I understand now why it has become a habit, sex, drugs, high position, language, and knowledge, it is all here. I am a little part of it because I have also collected a lot of memories. And also I am married, children - you know, all that turmoil. And he says somebody like Punditji or X comes along, you must do this, you must do that, in order to reach that. I say, for God's sake I won't want your advice. You understand? That is the position of an intelligent man now. Right? He questions everything, Buddha, Christ, and all the churches and he says for God's sake I don't want any of it. So he is moving. And he says, am I really moving? Or am I still there, pretending I am moving? Which means have I really understood all that? The biological part, the psychological part, the brain part, the physical reactions, biological, necessity, the glands? He says, am I really moving, or am I pretending I am moving? And in asking that question he becomes terribly honest. I don't know if you follow what I mean? Right? Really deeply honest. No pretence, really no - then begins humility - right? And with that he is moving, learning, watching. He says I am not different from all mankind, I am all that, but I am watching. And he is climbing, moving. I will carry the metaphor if you don't mind. [Tape turns over] And he says there is no discipline for me. I won't accept any enforcement, any effort, any of that. I have had all that there - right? So he keeps on moving, moving, moving, and the movement is learning, not accumulating knowledge. I don't know if you see the difference.

And he comes to a point at the origin of the river and he says, I by Jove all this, this tremendous effort I have made, effort, climbing, physical climbing, not psychological climbing, he says I have been utterly useless because it was there and it is up here. I needn't have moved up here, because I am self-centred there, I am self-centred here. Right? That's all. I have come to that point. Explain that, very simply.

Q2: He says that after listening to this latter part of what you have said he has understood what you are saying, and he has also understood his own limit of comprehension, limit of understanding. He wants to describe that state where he has stopped. What he says is that yesterday we started with how this stream is there in the delta. He says that it does not concern him at all. How he happened to be in that stream or whether the stream is eternal or anything. He is concerned with the fact that the stream is there and he is there.

K: But he is part of that stream.

Q2: But now he says that being in the stream I have the urge to get out of the stream, that is my limit. That is his limit, that is what he says.

K: No, is he bored with the stream?

Q2: He says there is no desire to get out of it but to get transformed.

K: I have no desire.

Q1: He says that I am not concerned with the origin of the stream, I don't feel like to going up to find out.

K: Then remain there.

Q1: But he wants to get out of the stream.

Q6: But Krishnaji it seems to me that there were irreconcilable differences in the starting point, in the cosmologies. The stream that you talked about is the totality of all the happenings that I am.

K: I am that.

Q6: Right. His stream is an external stream. He is immersed in that stream. He sees that stream...

K: I am that stream. I can't...

Q6: So these are two different streams so he is trying to somehow or rather to recognize that he is in the stream but the stream is not himself.

K: That's all.

Q6: Because of that difference...

Q5: I am afraid doctor I don't agree. Because when he started he started with a question which he wanted to ask. The question concerned...

Q6: ...existence.

Q5: If that question concerned existence then I think they are in the same stream.

Q4: The stream is the self.

Q5: The stream is the self, that is what he said. And I personally feel to be fair to him - that the stream that Krishnaji has described and the stream that he refers to as a distance is the same. Self-interest is the core of it, as I understood it. Have I misunderstood him?

K: Careful Sir, careful. Listen to it.

Q5: But I want to know if what I have said reflects what he is saying, or he has something different.

K: Listen to Dr. ? - he may be right. He says that K says you are that stream, you are not different from that stream - right? That's all first.

Q6: Well Punditji's stream is one in which he finds misery and therefore he wants to transform it. Krishnaji says I recognize I am the stream, I am in it, I have been it for sufficiently long, I am bored with it.

Q3: I want to transform, I want to step out. That is also part of this stream.

K: Part of this.

Q3: But you can't say it has no place, it is part of it.

Q5: We are back to that, Krishnaji has led us a step ahead of this. He said that this business of wanting to transform and wanting to change is also like the various other things of pleasure and other things that we have done. So ultimately you come to a point where you feel that there is movement without progress and with this situation you are bored.

Q3: But you see the whole point is this boredom he is talking about, he says, "I am bored" or whatever, "and I want no change."

K: No. Wait. Just a minute. Half a minute.

Q3: If you say I am bored and there is no movement to transform...

K: I don't want to transform. I don't know what it means.

Q3: That is what I said. We don't know these things.

Q1: Perhaps some confusion has arisen because of using the word origin in the metaphor, because you said this is everything, of course it is desire for transformation, it is everything. Then the question is: what is this everything? What is the very substance of this everything? It is a many branched thing, this delta, but is there a single root from which all these branches have come?

K: It is still water, whether it is up there or down here it is still water.

Q1: It is still water.

K: That's all.

Q3: What I am questioning is that this state of your saying that I am bored with all this and there is nothing beyond. I do nothing but stay with it.

K: Wait a minute, wait a minute.

Q3: That is what you said.

K: No wait. Would you let me finish.

Q2: He says... he wanted to say something, he didn't know that you were adding.

K: Sir, I am that. That thing is not different from me, both biologically, psychologically, in every way, atom, cells, all that is me. And I am that. So I am humanity. That has to me tremendous meaning. And I am there and I say is there any change at all possible? I thought change existed in climbing the hill and going to the source but I find I am still there. I have never left it. I thought by going up to the source I would find the whole explanation but that explanation is there, which is my desire, all the rest of it. And there as well as up here it is self-interest - right? And I see self-interest has created terrible mess, obviously. This doesn't need a great deal of insight, you can see everybody is fighting each other, nations and so on. Then out of that observation I say is there any change at all possible? Not transformation. Transformation means changing from one form to another - right Sir? I am not going to use that word although I have used it. So I am concerned with change - right? What does change mean? From this to that. Or is change ending this? I don't know?

Q2: Yes.

K: Changing from this to that implies time and so I go into time and all the rest of it. So I may question: is there any change at all?

Q2: But you would say there is ending?

K: Wait. You are saying it.

Q1: Are you saying there is no such thing as change, or ending, or anything?

K: No, you are going ahead of me. I have reached a point when I say after all this movement and struggle, pain and listening to the master, changing the master, changing the gurus, getting more knowledge - all that has been done. And I come to the point, I see if there is no change man will be destroyed as he goes on. So I ask myself what is change? Right? Change implies time, and man has not changed through time - right? Right? So I question is there change at all? Or there is only ending, which means, ending means dying. Can I die to everything everyday and not pick up after dying the same thing? You have understood Sir? I die today, to everything I have known, which is death. Or I die but carry on the same thing until I die the next day. You follow what I mean? So I question if there is a continuity at all, or simply dying. And then I will see what happens. The man who has been there has come to that point. That's all. I can go on further, explain that. Right?

What does he think?

Q2: What he says is that he goes with you the whole way. And he says that therefore there is no change but there is only ending.

K: You know what that means?

Q2: Yes Sir. He has taken the whole of it. But he says that in that stream itself is the seedling of a beginning because the stream is continuity.

Q5: When everything ends according to this one, everything ends with the stream business.

K: Quite right.

Q5: And the stream contains within it the seed and the sprouting of the seed.

K: No. The stream is my consciousness, the human consciousness. As I am the humanity I am that consciousness. Right? And if I die to that consciousness I am not in it. No, no, I am not in it. It is out. I don't know how to put it.

Q2: Sir, what he says is that there is a continuity to the stream of consciousness independent of my ending it.

K: Sir, that consciousness is sorrow, fear, greed, envy, etcetera, etcetera, which is the essence of self-interest - right? Now after travelling all that down there I come to that point. And I say is it possible for a human being, who is the entire humanity, to step out of it?

Q2: Now you have again changed the metaphor.

K: Same thing. It is the same thing. I am that stream. Humanity I am. Humanity suffers, goes through hell and that stream goes on because as long as human beings have not moved out of it that stream will go on.

Q1: Then there is a stepping out?

K: Wait a minute. Have you understood what I said?

Q1: Yes.

K: As long as humanity, which is me, if I am in that stream that stream will go on. As I am humanity if that person who is humanity steps out of that stream, that stream will go on. But he is no longer he, that person, that something is out of it, therefore he can, not help, he has compassion, he has intelligence, therefore that acts.

Q5: You said, you started by telling us that here is the stream and this stream you watched that you are in the stream. And then somebody says how does it all go and start moving up the narrow funnel point. You said that.

K: No.

Q5: I understand. Now what I say is that if you do that then you also said that this process, there is no getting out or anything, you are just observing and you can get bored. That is the point you came to.

K: Sir.

Q5: Then you said boredom is ending if you understand it.

K: Sir, I belong to that. And I get bored, sceptical, all the rest of it. And I recognize this boredom is part of everybody. Therefore I am everybody. Everybody is conscious and is my consciousness. And that consciousness from the beginning of human existence has been going on. And he questions whether he can ever get out of it. Not get out in the sense step out, or find nirvana. He says can I step out of it? Can one human being step out of it?

Q2: Step out? I can't...

K: Leave it. Leave it. Wait. Abandon it. Not keep on going with that stream. That is all. What is the difficulty in that?

Q3: Sir, at one moment you say there is no individual.

K: Because I am that.

Q3: I am humanity. What steps out?

K: Nothing. [Laughter] No, no, I mean this. I mean this.

Q1: When there is a stepping out...

K: I mean this. Let me explain. I have taken this as something perpetual, which it is, time.

Q5: The moment you use the word consciousness it becomes perpetual.

Q3: No but you see what he has said.

K: Can I use the word insight? A glimpse, seeing the whole thing as a unit, a unitary movement that is going on. And he is walking along the lane after seeing it is a whole unitary movement and suddenly realizes there is nothing. This goes on. Nothing beyond that. Nothing. Nothing in the sense not a thing. Thing is thought, which is a material process. So he says that is the end of thought.

Q1: And in that nothingness...

K: That is nothingness.

Q1: ...there is no duality between the self and...

K: No. He has been through conflict. He has been through hell, he has fought, he has struggled. Does it make any sense Sir?

Q3: Ending and stepping out are the same.

K: Stepping out. I am wrong in using those words - stepping out. That stream is self-interest. That is self-interest is perpetuating all the time, whether it is me or you or... humanity is perpetually caught in that. And that is thought etcetera, etcetera. He says, by Jove, no movement and therefore when there is no movement you are out of it. Not out of it - that is a word. There is no longer - there is something else.

Now K comes along, K and says he has never been in all this.

Q5: He has never been in all this.

K: Jealous, anxiety, pain, sex and all that. That is physical like going to the toilet. You understand Sirs? He never moved, say I am that - Sir, I don't know, that is what I want to get at.

Punditji I think - I am using the word think, forgive me if I use that word. Is it possible, except biologically, never to have the psyche as the centre? You understand my question? The moment you see that you are out, you are finished.

Q2: He wants you to repeat this. Explain it a little. Repeat.

K: Sir, we have the idea of a path, a goal, achievement. A path demands discipline, control, sacrifice. The horror of it. But he - somebody like K comes along and says don't go through all this stuff. Be aware of nature, be aware of all the senses, and the senses create the self, etcetera, etcetera. See it as a tremendous movement and a flash that you are out of it. It is not climbing, climbing, sacrificing, giving up, discipline, practice - oh, that is wrong. I am lazy, I don't want to practise.

Q5: Would I be understanding you if I said - you say that all that we have described is consciousness.

K: Yes, we said that.

Q5: You said that. Now... K: Which is part of self-interest.

Q5: Yes it is the self.

K: Keep to self-interest.

Q5: Then last you said, if I understand...

K: See the futility.

Q5: You were saying now from this you push out time, no time in this. There is no place for time in all the understanding of this. The moment that goes it ends.

K: And I doubt it! You understand? I question it, whether this is in myself. No. Therefore I began by questioning everything. I end up by questioning. No, you are missing something. I began questioning, doubting and asking. Not asking somebody, asking. I end up doubting, questioning, and asking.

Q4: Have I moved at all?

K: Ask. I don't know. I have said by Jove... now I leave that question alive. I don't say, is there an answer. That question itself destroys everything. I wonder.

Q5: No conclusion.

K: No Sir. I have got a quick bat!

Sir, Punditji, you and I have a dialogue. You put a question, I answer it. Then you answer that question. We keep this up. Asking, answering. We come to a point when the question itself is the answer. The question itself is so vital it bursts the...

Q5: I think it would be helpful if you will describe that particular state once again. You had mentioned earlier that K questions this one, K has never experienced this one but he questions even that not question. That not experiencing. Then he said that question continues to remain and the question is the answer. Could you say a little more. Just say again the same thing. It would be helpful.

K: K comes along, some strange man from the dark Himalayas, and says why do you go through all this stuff? The Buddhas, the Christ, the disciplines, the sacrifice, the renunciation, control, don't do all that there is something else. Which is, just see this, the futility of it - right? And when you really see the depth of that futility and you ask why it has come - you understand - and live with that question, don't find an answer, then that question itself opens and withers. Like a flower. If you leave the flower alone, watch it carefully, nurture it, the flower blossoms and withers, at the end of it there is no flower at all. I don't know... Right? Which is nothing.

Q3: May I go into it? This you have talked about, we all know that, we have talked about it. But you said something else and that is, in seeing this whole stream and in questioning and in ending, the stream continues its flow. The question remains.

K: That's it, that's it.

Q3: And it is such a powerful, potent question...

K: I don't put the question casually. It is my blood.

Q3: ...it is such a powerful, potent question...

K: That's it.

Q3: ...that when it remains it has an explosive energy independent of me - it is like letting loose...

K: It is nothing to do with me, it is like a fire that is burning.

Q3: It has enormous...

K: Sir, I am sure you do that in science. You come to a point and you put the question and wait, don't you? Look at it, wait, and you have a sudden flash. Right Sir?

Q5: Yes there is a similar thing in connection with geometry. At one time people asked questions in Euclid's eighth postulate about parallel lines, could it be derived from the other postulates because it looked like a rather artificial technical assumption and many people tried for a very long time. And finally all these efforts came to an end when people discovered that there could be non-Euclidian geometries in which you say through a point which is not on a line you cannot draw any parallel line, or you can draw more than one parallel line. So the question arose: how many geometries are there? Only these three, or are there other geometries? And the question could not be well formulated because what is meant by how many geometries? When if you can construct one other geometry you can ask is it a good geometry or a bad geometry. The question was finally answered by studying something entirely different. In each geometry we will find out what are the transformations which leave the geometry invariant. For example in plain geometry if you contract, expanded a space, contracted a space, replaced, or moved a space, this way or that way, or rotated it, all the relations in geometry remain the same. So this is called the invariance group of geometry. Eventually it was discovered quite by accident that instead of asking what is the geometry, what are the geometries, you simply say geometry is that which is invariant under a group.

K: Which is?

Q5: Unchanged by a group. Initially the group was transforming the geometry because you thought you knew what the geometry was. After some time one said well geometry is that which is left invariant by the group. So the group then became... that of course was a technical question which could be handled. So the question of how many geometries, what are geometries, receded into another question. The question disappeared. Instead you said how many groups are there which will classify geometry? So it sounds somewhat like that. One talked about transformations, one talked about properties, about ending, beginning, and all kinds of things and suddenly the whole question ends. Saying there is nothing which is transformed except the question itself.

K: Shall we continue tomorrow Sir. You are not bored?

[Laughter]

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC TALK 11TH MAY 1985

We're going to talk over many things which concerns mostly our life - our daily, monotonous, rather tiresome, conflicting life. And one hopes that you will be quite assured that we are not doing any kind of propaganda. To propagate any point of view, any particular ideology, any conclusion, or any persuasion. We are going to talk over together as two friends our various problems, not only the problems of the world externally, but also the very complex problem psychologically. We are going to talk over together, not accepting anything the speaker says, but rather questioning, doubting, enquiring together. So this is not a lecture or the speaker preaching.

But rather we should talk over, you and the speaker, not only what is actually happening in the world - it's becoming more and more disorderly; and also the world - that's much more complex; that demands a great deal of sanity, a great deal of search - looking, observing, searching, questioning - the world of the psyche, the so-called subjective world. And if one can be assured that this is not a sensational meeting, where you are going to receive sensations. It's becoming more and more clear that we are dependent on sensation - either intellectual, emotional, imaginary, or sentimental, romantic.

We must be very clear, all of us, if one may remind you, that we are together, you and the speaker, are going to look at the world first. That's the world that human beings have created: the economic, social, environmental, political, and religious. The society that we have made, put together; the disorder, which is becoming quite dangerous, the world of tyranny, absolute tyranny, so-called totalitarian states, and the democratic, the free state. This country, and perhaps one or two other countries, are open societies. You can do what you want to do. Go where you will; change jobs, express your opinions, your judgments, criticize everything about you, if you want to. Or you accept what is, and go along.

So please bear in mind, if you will, that we are going to talk over as two friends - we may be strangers, perhaps - speaker doesn't know all of you, certainly not, but as we are here this morning and the next week, we are going to quietly, hesitantly, tentatively look what we are doing; enquire together, after all these millennia of evolution, thousands upon thousands of years of long duration of time, why we are what we are.

There are various kinds of disorder. War is the greatest disorder. And every little nation is arming itself, supplied by the great powers, and the little powers. And there has been holocaust, in the last war. And there are other kinds of holocaust going on now - Beirut, VietNam, and South America, Russia, and so on. There hasn't been only one holocaust. Those holocausts are taking place now. And we seem to have become totally indifferent to what is happening in the Far East, in the Near East, in the Middle East, in Europe and Russia and here. We are really insensitive, indifferent, silent in the sense, though one may have demonstrations, these demonstrations are taking place all over the world for various causes, not wanting a particular kind of war - neutron bombs and the atom bombs. But nobody, as far as one has been able to make out, nobody wants to end wars.

And, as we said, there is disorder, the ideological disorder: one country, one part of the world having crystallized in a particular ideology. Leninism has become the religion of a certain part of the world, and anybody who is against it becomes a heretic, like the old Middle Ages, when the Catholics burnt people. They were heretics, heathens. That's what's happening in a certain part of the world. And we are indifferent to it. We know it is happening out there, newspapers are full of it, books have been written about it, and murder, one sect against another sect, of the same religion, being armed by the others, killing each other in the name of God, in the name of peace, in the name of their own particular ideology.

These are all facts. The speaker is not saying anything that's not actually taking place. And we are indifferent as long as it is far away. Apparently we become terribly alive, active when it touches us, when it touches each one of us, when it's very near at home, in your back yard. Again that's a fact. And, knowing all this in words, in books, and in newspapers and television, we seem to be unable to do anything whatever about all this. Again that's a fact.

And if we can this morning and the following weeks - next week, rather, we'll go and find out together what each one of us can do. What is our responsibility - not just the words, but the actual feeling of responsibility, as you feel responsible for your wife or children, for your husband or your girl friends, and so on. If you feel responsible. But when one asks oneself, what is one's place in this world, what is the relationship of oneself to the rest of mankind, what is one to do with this appalling, frightening chaos in the world? And most of us are aware, know, not only verbally but actually; we have been through wars, through concentration camps, whether in the recent war or in the past wars or the concentration camps that are going on now, we know what is happening: how deeply we are responsible or how superficially; how indifferent. Or actually taking part in the whole human society, not a particular part of the world; whether America or England, France or India or Japan. We are human beings apart from economic and national frontiers, religious frontiers, we are all human beings: black, white, purple, pink, or whatever colour it be. It's our earth. To be lived on, to enjoy the marvellous beauty of the land, the lovely seas and the hills, and the great valleys and mountains, the groves, the orchards and the meadows.

But apparently we are incapable of living together without any barrier, without any separation as nationalities, which is really a glorified form of tribalism, without any organized religious attachments. We talk a great deal about freedom, the democratic world, though in the other parts of the world though they feel the demand for freedom, the human necessity for freedom, the absolute elite destroy their freedom.

So can we, recognizing all this, not merely verbally, not merely descriptively, not accepting mere explanations, whether it be historical or dialectical or personal, can we look at all this impersonally, if that's possible, without any bias, prejudice and find out together what we can do.

What is disorder? What would you consider to be disorder? And what is order? Is order brought about by ideologies? By one's opinions? Judgments? Various religious conclusions with their experiences? Are not the very ideologies the cause of disorder? Please, we are thinking together. Don't, if one may suggest most earnestly, don't merely listen to what the speaker is saying. If you are merely listening as a long series of words, it's not worth listening. But if you listen not only with the hearing of the ear but listen with your heart, with your mind, with all your being to find out what we can do as human beings.

There's considerable mess in the world, which is called disorder, dangerous mess. And around this mess we organize, and reorganize what has been organized. Right, I hope you are following all this. And this reorganization round the disorder, mess, confusion, conflict, this reorganizing around that is called progress. Right? You are following all this? And we are satisfied with these new organizations. We feel we are vitally progressing. But the mess, the confusion, the conflict, the disorder, the terror that's going on, has been going on for millennia upon millennia; now we know it is happening all over the world, through quick communication and so on.

It is said that to train a Roman legion soldier in Italy, Rome, took 15 to 20 cents, now it takes probably thousands of dollars. You are following all this? And we have progressed tremendously. The man with a club killed another. Then somebody came along and invented archery, and they said, "At last all wars will end. This will kill so many people." Then came along various instruments, material of war, and we have the latest one, the absolute bomb, that can evaporate human beings by the million with one blow. And we have made again a vast progress.

In all this, the wars, the terrors, the appalling things that are going on, we have never tackled cruelty - not the cruelty of a Central Europe or the recent war with all their horror; and the horrors of war that are going on in the world. We have never as human beings been able to be free of cruelty - not only to the animals, to nature, but to each other. The ultimate cruelty is war, naturally. Can we as human beings look at this word first - the word cruelty, then feel the meaning and the depth of that word. Cruelty to one's own self as discipline; we'll go into all that. Cruelty to others, exploiting others, using each other for our own personal ambition or sexual ambition. All these are various forms of cruelty, ideological cruelty, and so on. It's not the cruelty of a particular group of people, but the cruelty that is almost in every human being wanting to hurt somebody else.

Why is it, after all the religious admonitions, long before Christianity, many, many centuries before Christianity, they said, "Don't kill. The other is yourself." And we are still going on. Can this end? That's one of our great problems of life, whether this cruelty, which is inherent - please listen to all this - which is inherent in self-interest. As long as there is self-interest, there must be exploitation of another, cruelty to another, using others, and so on. This self-interest, which hides under every form of expression, it hides behind the name of God, it hides in every priest and every human being. Aren't you self-interested in yourself? Of course. But one never faces it. One doesn't want to look at it. And to pursue it, to find out, all its trickery, all its hypocritical hypocrisy, its pride, its arrogance, its vanity and its humility. It requires great awareness. And it demands great discipline. But we are all rather slack people. We are rather sloppy in our thinking. We are never certain about anything. We have a lot of beliefs, dogmas, faith.

I wonder if you have examined certain religion, as Christianity, and the world of Islam, based on books. If you begin to question them, doubt, the whole thing would collapse, because we never doubt our own thinking, our own experience. We never question.

As we were saying, we never question our thinking, our prejudices, our conclusions, to find out whether they are accurate, or merely opinions. Or we never question our own demand for self-interest. So please, during these talks, and question and answer meetings, there must be doubt. Doubt is essential, a certain form of scepticism without cynicism, because that clears the brain so that one can see clearly. One can see clearly what one is. And so specially be sceptical with what the speaker is saying, specially, because he is not a guru. He doesn't want a thing from you, neither your applause, and so on. Please be assured of that. So you can relax. And be free. Because it's very important if you are really assured, convinced that the speaker is not expecting a thing from you, doesn't want your money - except what you give for the donations. (Laughter) But it's not for the speaker. It is to keep the place clean and the schools and so on. He doesn't want to create any sensation in you, because you want to be entertained. Your novels, your books, your television, everything entertains you. And you like that, the religious entertainment. But here we are trying to fathom, delve into this deep problem of our existence.

So is it possible, we are asking, to bring about order in our life? If there is complete order, both biologically and psychologically, complete order, then there is no conflict. There is conflict and disorder when we pursue an ideology - the ideal, which is projected from our confusion. So your ideals bring about confusion. I don't know if you are aware of all this. This is very clear if you observe what is happening in the so-called totalitarian states. There the ideology is supreme. The ideology, Marx, Lenin, Stalin, and all those people, and their interpreters, they are creating and have done in the past and are doing it now, great disorder in the world. Any ideology, whether it is the Catholic ideology, or the Hindu ideology, or the socialist and so on. They are bound to create disorder because the ideology you believe in, I accept that ideology. Therefore you divide yourself against other ideologies. And hence there is conflict in ideologies. If you once actually deeply see that - not merely verbally, intellectually, but deeply inwardly, in your blood - the truth of that, then you are a free man to look at something else.

But ideologies give us the sense of security. And that's why we cling to beliefs and dogmas, faith, which are put together by priests and so on, I won't go into all that. And we cling to that. There are over 800 Catholics. I don't know how many divisions of Protestantism. And there is in the Islamic world several sects fighting each other, killing each other. But in the Buddhist and Hindu world it exists but not so violently.

So can one knowing the truth of this, the feeling, the depth of the truth, put away all ideologies which divides human beings. This is a very serious question, please don't push it aside, and say, "Well, why shouldn't I have my own particular little ideology, or my own particular ideal? The ideal based on my experience; my knowledge." Then that knowledge, that experience, that particular concept one clings to, must be questioned, doubted, torn apart to find the truth of it.

So then one must ask, what is disorder? Why we live in our private life and also in public life, why there is so much disorder.

The speaker is not asking the question. You are asking the question. Who has brought about this disorder? Don't casually say, "Yes, each one of us is responsible" and then put that aside too. We learn quick answers because we are all very learned people. Learned, quotes. But we never ask of ourselves why our house is in disorder. Which means where there is disorder there must be conflict. And we live with conflict - the ultimate being war with its total irresponsibility, and the disorder. You may have create order in your house, physical house, because most Americans do; but we are talking not only of the external disorder but also inward disorder. Why is there in all of us such conflict, which breeds disorder?

What is this conflict? Why have we human beings lived with disorder? Not only during this century, not only last week and now, but man has lived in disorder for thousands of years. We have inherited it, our brains are conditioned to conflict. Our very way of looking at life, thinking about, accepting, disobeying, belonging to this and not to that sect, particular silly guru - I hope you don't mind my using that word - particular person who says, I've got it, you haven't got it, let me lead you. The vanity of these people; and their followers. So what is this conflict due to, the reason, the root of it?

First let us look very closely and intimately, deeply, the human brain, which has evolved through centuries upon centuries, millennia, two million or three million years, or 15 million years, or 50,000 years, why this brain, the brain of human beings, not my particular brain - there is no 'my particular brain'. A nice idea, I think my brain is mine. But the brain has evolved like the human organism. Your organism is like another organism. Highly evolved, sensitive, intelligent. Each organism has its own intelligence. But we are slowly destroying that intelligence, by drugs, alcohol, smoking, you know the whole business of modern absurd existence.

So what is the cause in our daily life, we are talking first. If there is order in each one of us, now as you are listening; if each one of us has this complete order in ourselves, do you think we would kill another? Do you think we would belong to any nation, any group, any guru? Any book that is sanctified through time? Then there would be no fear, no sorrow, no loneliness, and certainly no gods.

So we're going to find out together if it is possible to have this complete order in ourselves. Are you interested in it? Honestly? Would you spend your time, not your money, that's the last filthy thing you can ask, would you spend your energy to find out? As you spend your energy going to the office or the laboratory or a particular scientific discipline and so on, you give great deal of energy in all these directions - for power, money, and position, recognition, fame, all the notoriety of all that. You spend tremendous energy going to the office day after day, day after day, for 50, 60 years; and trying to cure others when you need curing yourself. Now will you give some of that energy? Sitting there quietly looking, thinking together, will you give that energy? Not all of it, because you have to go to office the day after tomorrow morning, or the factory or some job. Will you give that energy to find out if you can put your house in order, inward house, this whole complex structure of the psyche.

If you will give it - to yourself, not to me, not to the speaker, he won't accept it, then together find out. Together find out, not the speaker tells you, then it becomes absurd, childish, immature. But if you give that energy, that vitality, the drive behind it, to find out, if you can live without a single shadow of conflict, then we can ask, what's the cause of it? Because when you can find the cause the effect doesn't exist. I don't know if you have gone into the question of cause and effect. We'll go into it briefly.

Cause is not separate from the effect. The effect lies in the cause. If there is no cause there is no effect. But we separate the cause and the effect. The acorn of these oaks produce the oak. But the tree, the whole leaf, the beauty of the leaves, the sunlight on the leaves and the branches and the trunk, it lies in the seed. But to us the cause and effect are two different things. We say, if I can get rid of the cause, perhaps I'll be very healthy. But it's like saying the means to the goal matters - or the means doesn't matter for the goal, for the end. Whereas the means is the end. You understand all this? Look at it, what is happening in the world. They are talking about peace, all of them, and building up armaments. The cause is fear, trying to save something or other, you know all the rest of it. As long as there is that fear, that desire to be completely safe for oneself, you are going to have wars. We'll talk about it later.

So what is the cause of this disorder in which we live? As I said, give your brain, thought, your energy to find out. It's not very difficult. Don't call it difficult and then make it difficult. It's very simple. Look what is happening between Palestine, the Arabs, and the Israelis. They are of the same group. They live on this same earth. But one has been trained, educated, programmed to think he is an Arab. Programmed like a computer for the last 1600 years. And the other side, call them the Israelis, for 4,000 years. They are old people, like the Hindus, like the Chinese. So they have divided themselves - the Arab and the Israelis, the Americans and the old Indians of this country, you have very carefully destroyed them. The holocaust.

So there must be conflict as long as there is division. Please, this is a law, it's not my law, it's a law - not the law of the judges and the court but this is the eternal law. As long as you are separate from your wife, and the wife separate from you, with their ambition, with their desire for fulfillment, with their pride, with their separate saying, I must fulfil, I must be this, I must be that. In that relationship there will be conflict, as there is conflict between the disciple and the guru, conflict between god and you - if there is a god. So wherever there is a division between me and you and they and we, we are going to have conflict.

How does this division come about? Is it self-interest on the part of all of us? Please examine, question, doubt, ask. Is it that each one of us is so self-centred, so concerned with himself, so that that very concern divides? You may get married, live with another and so on, but this division goes on. And we accept this division as being natural and therefore accept the conflict, everlasting struggle as part of existence, part of life, it's natural to struggle, to battle with each other. And the raison d'etre for that is, doesn't everything fight in nature? Each tree is fighting for light. The bigger animal eats the lesser animal, and so on. That's the reason we give. So our life then is accepted as being naturally, inevitably to be lived in conflict. But we never ask actually is it possible not to have this separate individualistic self-interest at all.

Are you, if one may ask, are you asking this question of yourself? Are you frightened to ask it? Or do you just listen, spend useless hours sitting under these trees and go away, saying it is not possible; or, oh, yes, it is possible, and just leave it like that. Or, will you question it, seeing what the world is actually about you, first: nationalistic divisions, religious divisions, ideological differences; which we have created. The intellectuals, the terrorists, the imperialists. No empire has been built, whether the modern empire or the ancient empires, without blood. As they used to say, you first take the Bible and then the gun. This has been our way of life. And a man or a woman who is serious, really wants to find out whether conflict can end. If it ends, then only there is peace in the world. Peace demands a great deal of intelligence, not just demonstration of peace. It doesn't lie in any capital of any country. It demands to have real peace within one's heart and mind, about one to understand the nature of conflict and end it.

And to understand that, the structure and the nature of conflict, requires observation, not condemnation, not taking sides about it. But just to observe what one is doing. How we are constantly separating ourselves - the American way of life, and so on and on and on and on. Are you listening to all this. Or you're getting bored with all this. Would you kindly tell the speaker?

Audience: Yes.

K: You can all say, "Yes" and go home. (Laughter) Or be stimulated for the moment by the speaker. That doesn't bring about the end of conflict. One must exercise the immense capacity of the brain, immense, infinite capacity of the brain. But our education limits that capacity. Our education also has helped us technologically; tremendous advancement. From the small computer to the complicated aeroplanes, submarines, warships, quick communication and so on, so on, so on. The more diseases are coming now, the more medicines are being invented. They are making tremendous progress. And the speaker is not saying this in cynicism. These are facts. He abhors cynicism.

So can one observe quietly, without any choice, without any saying - you know, observe what is going on in ourselves? The mirror in which we see our faces. How you comb your hair, how you brush your teeth, how you shave or do your face up, and so on. Can we observe as closely, as definitely, as precisely as possible, without any distortion?

That means, we have to understand the movement of choice. Why do we choose? Please ask yourself, why is there necessity of choice? Of course, there's choice between two cars, between two materials. If you have the money, you choose the better. Between two authors. The choice between the shadow and the light; shadow of the sun, sun which creates the shadow, and the light of the sun. Dark and the daylight. Tall, short. But is there psychological choice at all? You understand my question? Please ask yourself, why do we choose psychologically, inwardly, say I'll do this, I won't do that. This is right, that is wrong. I'm violent, but I must become non-violent. I have pride, but I'll become humble. You understand? This inward choice going on all the time. Is there choice at all when there is clarity? Or is there choice only where there is confusion?

Please listen, that is, not to the speaker but to yourself. You are asking this question, I am not asking you to ask that question. You are asking that question yourself. Why is there this choice of not to be violent? That's a choice; I am violent, but I'll choose to be non-violent. Why is there that choice?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, would you kindly please, if you like to come here and sit here and talk, you're perfectly welcome. Sir, would you mind? You can ask questions on Tuesday and Thursday next week. I am not preventing you from asking questions. Please have the courtesy, the patience, and not get bored, to find out for yourself, not from what the speaker is saying, the speaker is not important, but what is being said together is important. The speaker is not seeking personal worship. There is no personality involved in this. I really mean it. He is not important at all. But what is being said is important.

So we are asking, why is there this choice in us - apart from the choice of things? Could we look at it for a minute? Human beings throughout the world inherited probably from the apes and so on, they are violent people, human beings are, throughout the world. And he says he realizes what is happening through violence, not only in himself collectively, he says, let us be non-violent, let's practice non-violence, let's talk about non-violence, let us use that instrument politically, and so on. This has been one of the things that India has produced, non-violence, not only India but others have talked about it long before. So, we, I, you are violent, if I am violent at all, we are violent. And then we say, I will become non-violent, which is a choice, isn't it?

Now, why do we do this? I am greedy, but I will not be greedy.

Right? I am full of vanity, but I will pretend not to be vain. You can't, where there is vanity, that cannot be changed into humility. Where there is vanity, the ending of it, complete ending of it, not trying, that becoming that, only then there is humility.

So let's look very carefully, if you will kindly have the patience and the energy, not be too bored and not too cold, why we are doing this all the time. Take violence. Because that's what is going on in the world and also in ourselves, the tremendous sense of violence. The bombs, the killing, the knifing, the stealing, murder, rape, every form of violence. What is violence? Physical violence? That's one side of it. Surely violence is much more complicated than that. Violence is, if you examine it closely, go into it in yourself, violence is conformity. I am this, but I will be that. You don't understand this, but you think you understand that. One doesn't understand 'what is' actually, and without understanding that you want to transform that into the other.

Suppose I am violent. Physically I don't like violence, physically, because I see it all about me; suppose, I say, I am not. I don't like what's going on, I won't be violent. I haven't understood the nature of violence, but I want to escape from that, therefore I create the ideal. So after creating something which is not, then there is conflict between 'what is' and what I think should be. This is what we are doing. So I say to myself, before I achieve the other, which is non-violence, I must first understand what is violence. This seems so logical, isn't it? We have become so illogical and we are frightened of being logical, because we are caught in illusions of trying not to be too logical. So I'm going to be very logical first, I can go beyond logic after I've used logic.

I'm violent. And I see everything round me has a different form of violence: from the animals, nature, and so on, the tremendous lightening, the beauty of it, it's a form of violence, the shock of it. And I'm violent. Violence is not only physical, but much more psychological. When I conform to a pattern, when I am being allowed to be programmed - you understand? When you tell me what I should do, for the good of my soul or my psyche or whatever it is, and you become the authority - so when I accept authority there is violence. Right? Psychological authority, of course. There is the authority of the computer. The authority of law. The authority of the policeman who says, keep to the left, or right. If you drive in Europe, you keep to the right, if you drive in England, or here, which is it, left? (Laughter) Yes, left. Left. No, right. (Laughter) Right. I haven't driven lately. (Laughter) Yes, I walk down to the left, walk up to the right. That's quite right.

So, violence must exist where - that is part of it - where out of my confusion, disorder, I create authority. You understand? I am confused. I am disturbed, I want certainty. And you come along, the guru, the priest, the psychologist, the others, and they become the authority. I have created them out of my confusion, my disorder. So I realize as long as there is an authority subjectively, either the experience which I have had, the memory of that experience which becomes the authority - follow all this - or the authority of somebody who says, I know, I'll tell you all about it. The nasty, ugly gurus do all this, coining money. They are some of the most rich people in the world - your evangelists, the churches, the tremendous organizations; they say, have faith, believe, accept. And I am so frightened, I say, yes. I am gullible, I accept it. So I am creating out of my disorder authority. If there is order, there is no authority because I behave properly - not according to a pattern.

So, one of the causes of conflict, disorder, is psychological acceptance of authority. That means, can one live without a single ideal, single authority, so that one lives in great order now, not tomorrow? And psychologically there is disorder in our inward house, because we have separated ourselves from one another. It's one of the most difficult things to do; to say, there is no separation. I am the world. I am the rest of humanity. Because you suffer, the Russians suffer, the Hindus, Chinese, every human being on this earth suffers. I shed tears. And also laughter, of course. Every human being on this earth pursues every form of avoidance, every form of escape from fear, from sorrow. So I am the world. You understand, because I suffer, you suffer. This is not just ideological nonsense, it's the actuality. So as long as I separate from the rest of mankind, which is you, I must have conflict and disorder. We'll go into that a little later, whether we are a separate consciousness or consciousness of mankind.

What time is it, sir?

Q: It's five after one.

K: I'm sorry to have kept you so long. Somebody should tell us. So I'll finish with this. Where there is separation in my thinking, I can separate thought from action. I think one thing, and say another thing, think one thing and act another way. That is separation breeds conflict, hypocrisy.

So one can go into this question of conflict very, very deeply, and when you begin to understand the nature and structure and the way of its subtlety, as you watch it, the very watching without any choice, in that watching you will see that conflict ends. And that requires great attention to every thought, every action, every way of inward feeling. And if one wants to end that conflict, you have to give tremendous attention to it. Not casual attention, not one day or one week later, but keeping that attention moving all the time.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC TALK 12TH MAY 1985

We must talk over together the question of time, thought, and the various forms of fear, and the everlasting pursuit of pleasure, satisfaction, gratification. And also we should talk over together sorrow, whether it is possible to end sorrow. And also love and compassion, death, and the religious mind, or the brain. And also we should go into the question of meditation, and ask ourselves if there is anything beyond all the travail of man; all this confusion, all this loneliness and despair and anxiety, if there is anything sacred, holy. And so we have a great deal of ground to cover, if you are willing.

As we said yesterday, we are not imposing anything on you, not trying to convince you of anything. And the speaker really means it. We're not trying to convert you, do propaganda, or programming, because we are apt to be rather gullible, easily satisfied with new forms of experiences and sensations. So we should together, not that the speaker is the only talker, but together you and the speaker are going to look into all these matters. Not only verbally or analytically, which is comparatively easy, but rather go much deeper than mere rationalization, explanation, and description. If that is clearly understood between us, that the speaker doesn't want anything from you, fortunately - neither your applause please, your applause at the end of the talks, or your encouragement or discouragement. Literally he doesn't want a thing from you. So you can all be quiet, relaxed, and listen.

It has been one of our problems, perhaps for many, many millennia, the question of guilt. It's important to understand this question: why human beings, throughout the world, have this sense of guilt. Having been told from childhood to do something and not being able to do it like most children, happily, but unfortunately they cultivate this sense of guilt. And also in religions, especially in Christianity, the original sin, you must know if you are Christian all about it; and one who saves you from that sin. So you begin to have guilt there too: that we are all guilty, we are all the product of original sin, whatever that may mean. And also we are always falling short of our own ideals. And thereby also one feels guilty. You must know this. Probably most of us do. Either we are aware of it or it's deeply hidden in most people. We are indifferent to all that and if one awakens to it, knows the process of guilt, what is implied in it? And also there are those who love to keep other people feeling guilty. Then you have them under your thumb and you love that kind of power. So there is the guilt of not behaving rightly, according to some tradition or according to your own pattern of thought, and not being able to reach that level one begins to feel guilty; and so on.

And also there is the other question: we are living with something dreadful around us, something very, very ugly. Surely we all must be aware of it. Not only the ugliness, the naughtiness, the brutality of wars, but also this tremendous - if one can call it evil, the speaker doesn't like to use that word - but the constant pressure, influence of certain ideologies, like the totalitarian Communist ideologies, which is completely monstrous and deadly, if you know all about it, and we have to live with that next door. It's our brother across the wall. Not only the Berlin wall, but the wall that exists to push this away or to fight it or face it. And we are living with that.

If you are at all aware of all this, not only monstrosities and the cruelty of war, but the ideology of wars. And how do we meet that, not only as individuals but collectively? And what is the response of each one of us? We are living with something in the world that is becoming more and more ugly, more and more destructive, tyrannical. This is happening the world over, it isn't just in certain spots of the world. It's gradually creeping. And what is our response to all that? Is it indifference? Is it we don't care what happens in the other field? Is it that we don't want to face all this? And if we do face it, what can we do? Not organizationally, because that always ends up in some kind of another kind of mess. What do we, as human beings living on this earth, which is also being gradually destroyed because of overpopulation, more and more big cities, and our indifference to nature, what is our responsibility to all this?

Do we feel at all responsible? Responsible in the sense not only to your wife or husband or to your family but to the rest of mankind, whether you be Protestant, Catholic, Hindu, Buddhist, that's all just names, labels, without much depth.

Will you go into all this matter. Please don't wait, if I may most respectfully point out, for the speaker to tell you what to do. Which would be another form of cultivation of guilt. But rather, in talking things over together, observing, hearing each other very carefully, not merely to the words but behind the words, the deep significance of a word and what it signifies, then we don't have to tell each other what to do.

So there is guilt, and there is the thing with which we are living daily, and what is the relationship of that, of these two, to fear. And in enquiring into this question of fear, that which is brutal, terrible, that is happening in the world, and also our own sense of inadequacy, which is another form of guilt; what is the relationship of all this to fear and what is fear - not the superficial or deep fears but the root of it? Not only the trunk of it but the many, many branches of it, what is the root of it?

So we are going to enquire not only into time; because time is related to fear, as we shall go into it. What is time, by which we live? Today, tomorrow, the past, the future. And also what is thinking? Because we live by thinking. Everything we do, act, is based on thought. So may we go into all that?

It's a nice, not too hot a morning. Pleasant under the trees, and a rather cool breeze, which one hopes you will not mind. And it is rather convenient to go to sleep here. If you are well-covered with blankets and all the rest of it, nice Sunday morning, free of all the office work, and labour and travail and skill. And under the trees in the dappled light it's rather pleasant. "You can go on talking, but it doesn't matter, I'll go to sleep and you go on." (Laughter) If that is what you want, go to sleep.

But if we are serious, earnest, which we must be because that's one of the crises we have come to, it's no longer mere entertainment, no longer mere intellectual game, or seeking sensation from one thing to another, or from another. We've got to face some extraordinary crises in life - life being our consciousness. The crisis is not in economics, political, religious, but the crisis is in our consciousness - why we are what we are after thousands and thousands of years. That's where the crisis is.

And merely to solve the economic crisis or the political crisis or the brutality of ideologies and wars, it's not only there but it's much deeper. So we are going to enquire first, because they're all related, all problems are related to each other, they are not separate. If one can solve one problem completely, then you have solved all other problems because there is no separate problem, whether it be sexual, whether it be the desire to fulfil, and so on. So in the resolution of one is solved the whole thing. If you know how to do it.

So what is time? Time not only be the sunrise and the sunset, the darkness of a night and the glory of a morning. Time as the past; not only the past of one's own life. But the vast historical past, the story of mankind; which is the history of mankind. That's the long centuries, millennia upon millennia past. And the present. And the past modifying itself through the present, becomes the future. Time is a cycle. It's a circle in which we are caught. So we should look at it closely, not merely understand it intellectually but actually go into it, if you will.

We are the past, whether that past be one day or many thousands of years. The past being the knowledge, the memories, the remembrances, concealed or open. And from that past is our action. That past is the tradition. That past is the religions of Christianity, with all its divisions during the last 2,000 years. That's the past. And in India and China the past is three to five thousand years old, with their tradition, with their beliefs, with their superstition, with their nonsense. So the past is what we are. Without the past you are not. So that past, that enormous past, weighty past, goes through and modifies itself through the present.

You can see it economically, the pressures change the present, which is past. And the future, tomorrow or the very end of one's life, and beyond. Not reincarnation, we will go into all that presently. The future.

That future is the modified form of the past. It's so obvious. And that future is in the now. Right? Because the past modifying itself is the future. And that future is now, because if I'm smoking, I'll smoke tomorrow, if I am greedy, tomorrow I'll be greedy still, and so on. So the past is in the present. Please understand this very simple fact. This whole movement from the past through the present modifying itself as the future, and that future is now, because unless I fundamentally change, the future would be what I am now. Right? See the truth of this simple fact. Not that I am persuading you; not that you are being told or pressurized or computerized. This is a simple fact. If I am vicious, cruel, brutal today, as I have been in the past, I'll be that tomorrow. You can't get away from it. If I am quarrelling with my wife or husband and so on, I'll do it tomorrow too. So tomorrow is now. And to break this chain in which we are caught there must be a mutation now. You follow this simple fact. This is the whole cycle of time. Isn't it?

And is it possible to bring about this mutation? What is it that is being not transformed, the word 'transformed' means moving from one form to another form, therefore it is not mutation. What is it that's being radically changed - even that word 'change' implies time, changing from this to that. So we have to stick to that word, to bring about a mutation. That is, radical ending of something, and the beginning of something totally new.

Isn't it that our consciousness, each one's consciousness, which is what we are - there are lots of books written about this stuff, but it's very simple. I don't know why people like things very complex. It's probably very exciting to get talking about things rather complex. But if it is rather simple, what is one's consciousness? Surely what one believes, what one has faith in, what one desires, what one is, one's nationality, one's fears, one's terrors, one's depression, anxiety, loneliness, despair, cruelty, guilt, fear, pleasure, sorrow, the multiplication of desires. All that is our consciousness, isn't it? Let's be simple about it.

You see if you approach a very complex problem, one must come simply to it first. Then it becomes complex; then you can understand it. But if you begin already with complexity, then the thing will become more and more complex, we'll never resolve anything. So our consciousness is all its content. You can put into that content everything you can think of: your knowledge, your superstitions, your fears, and so on. The multiplication of human experiences and trials and attempts, all the rest of it. And can the content, which is what we are, which is not only the past but the future - and that future is now, we went into all that just now, briefly. The whole of that is you; is the persona, is the ego. It's the tremendous self-interest. And we are asking, can that consciousness, which is the result of vast evolution, not only the survival but also the knowledge of surviving, can there be a total mutation in that consciousness? And if we rely on time, as we do, then we'll begin the same old pattern again. I wonder if we understand each other. The speaker recently talked, if I may most humbly point out, it's not out of vanity I'm informing you, he talked to the United Nations. I don't know why he was invited, but he went there. And after the talk one of the high authorities there said, "I have come to the conclusion, conviction rather, that after 40 years working in this organization, I have come to the conclusion that I must not kill". Forty years it took him. (Laughter) No, just see, the significance of it. That it takes the human brain to come to some truth during 40 years. That is, not to kill another human being. And the whole organization is based on not to bring about wars, prevent wars. They haven't done - that's irrelevant. But the whole point is, how the human brain refuses to face fact and act. And we think that during time we'll resolve everything. Time will help you to forget; and so on.

So that's the nature of time: the past modifying itself through the present and continuing as the future. So the future, the past, and the present are one. Unless there is fundamental, radical ending of all that, otherwise you will be what you are tomorrow. We are unfortunately miserable people; unhappy people, which is a fact, and if we don't change now, we'll be tomorrow the same. It's simple reality, truth.

And also, what is the relationship of time - not the chronological time only, what is the relationship of time to thought? And what is the relationship of time, thought, to fear? You follow?

May we go on? You're not too bored with all this? I hope the sun is warming you. But please, keep awake for another 15 minutes or so, will you? Which is not an insult, please, asking this. So we are asking, what's the relationship of time, thought, and fear.

We've more or less gone into the question of time, so let us go into the question of thought. What is thinking? The speaker is using words to communicate what he is supposed to be thinking, and you share the words and translate those words according to your pleasure or displeasure; or you're casually hearing, or probably you don't understand English quite well, or you do understand English very well and give certain significance to those words. Right? Thinking. This is the whole process of thinking. Thought has put man on the moon. Thought has created the instruments of war. Thought has created the destruction of man. Right? Put together the most amazing cathedrals in the world, temples and mosques. If you've seen some of them, they are marvellous beauties. And thought has also created the vast technological world. Thought has also established a relationship between man and woman, which we'll go into presently, afterwards. Thought produces all our actions, so thought is very important. Not to expand or give greater depth to thought, but we are enquiring into the very nature and structure of thought, of thinking. Right? Shall we go into it?

I do not know - one doesn't know - the speaker doesn't know if you have really gone into this question at all. Probably one has never asked; even the professionals don't ask, so why should you? You are not educated to enquire; you are educated to conform, educated to say, "Yes, I've memorized, I've acquired information, knowledge, and I'll get a good job, or no job", or whatever one does. But one has never gone into this question really very deeply, enquiring what is thinking? Why does the brain, which is after all our only instrument we have, neurologically, biologically, emotionally, it is the centre of all our existence. And that thing inside the skull, which we call the brain, that brain has never asked itself, why am I constantly thinking, chattering away like blazes about everything: what I did yesterday, what I will do tomorrow, what I am doing, why this, why that? You know? Dreaming at night and all day long chattering. What extraordinary human beings we are. So we must enquire what is thought? What is thinking? What is the origin of it?

Do you want my explanation? (Laughter) You see, that's what I'm objecting to. (Laughter) Because you are not actually enquiring. You are waiting for somebody to tell you. Therefore he becomes the nasty guru and you become the follower. And the speaker says, don't, please don't do that. Really you'll destroy not only yourself but also the one who leads you. So let's put aside all that nonsense and enquire together. The word 'together' is important, but don't let's go into that for the moment.

So what is thinking? Does thinking rely on memory, the accumulated memories, remembrances? I want to be a great man, because I've seen great many people, great many men having good time, becoming famous, plenty of money, plenty of cars, all the rest of it. So there is this vast collection of memories. Not only personal, but also the remembrance of many things past: historically, collective memories; conscious memories and deep layers of memories; aren't we all memories? Aren't we a bundle of memories? Forgive me for using that word and putting it in a limited manner; aren't we all memories? What are memories based on? Please enquire with me, don't just listen to the poor man. Go into it with the speaker. What are memories based on? Aren't they based on knowledge? The tremendous accumulation of information as knowledge, whether it be vast - not vast, limited knowledge of science adding to itself all the time; and that knowledge which is being added to must always be limited. Right? Because you're adding to it, therefore it's limited. One doesn't know about aerodynamics or the astrophysics, but I will gather, I will get it after experiment after experiment.

So knowledge is based on experience. Right? Right? And experience, or experience and all that, is essentially limited. Isn't it? All experience, it doesn't matter whatever experience it is, it must be limited because there is an experiencer who is experiencing. And the experiencer is the past: his memories, his accumulation, his hopes, his fears, his wanting to be enlightened, his wanting to be godly, his wanting to say, I want to be popular, therefore I'll learn a few phrases and translate in my own way and then become, blah, blah, blah.

So experience must be recognized, otherwise it's no experience at all. And the one who recognizes is the past, it's all so silly, isn't it? So the experiences are always limited. I experience the divine; that tremendous feeling of elation, temporarily, you can fall back. So experiences are always limited. Right? Therefore knowledge is always limited. Always. In the past, or now to which that knowledge is being added to, is limited. So memories are limited. So thought is limited. Right? I wonder if we understand this, actually the truth of it, not just intellectual concept of it, or the idea of it, the truth of it, that thought will always be limited. Thought can imagine the limitless, but it's still limited. Thought has invented gods all over the world, for the last millennia upon millennia, those gods are limited, naturally. So whatever the activity of thought and its action must always be limited. Therefore thought is not holistic. You understand? If we can realize this simple fact that the thought and the thinker are one and therefore they are always limited.

Therefore all the religions of the world, though they say divine revelation direct from the horse's mouth - (Laughter) I'm not being irrelevant or cynical, but that is so, they're all claim direct... And putting on medieval dresses and robes and all the trickery of, that goes on in the name of religion, is invented by thought. And therefore the whole hierarchical and the religious structure is limited. And their belief, their faith, their ritual, all the rest of it, is limited, because it's based on thought.

So the question arises, if you will kindly listen, is there something beyond thought? Or everything is thought? Not nature, of course. The tiger wasn't put together by thought, thank god. Or the swift gazelle. So what is the relationship of time, thought to fear? We are talking about fear. Is there fear without time and thought? Please look at it carefully. Is there a sense of fear that is not rooted in thought and time? I have done something some time ago, and I am frightened of that, guilty. Something that I have done ugly, not straight, not excellent in its quality, and I'm ashamed of it, and I'm frightened of it, I feel guilty about it, I've lived with it. And fear of all that. Therefore the root of fear is time and thought. Fear of what might happen: I've got a good reputation, but tomorrow you mightn't turn up - not that I would care, but I'm just...

(Laughter) So there is always the shadow of fear with us, shadow of this fear between man and woman; what might happen. And the ultimate fear is death. And out of this fear all the gods are invented.

So one asks, is there an end to fear, a total ending. You are asking this question, not the speaker. Which means, is there an end to thought and time? You understand the relation? The logical sequence of all this. It's not only logical, but factual. Is there an ending to all this process, which causes fear? And one knows the results of fear, the consequences of fear, all the cruelty, you know, all the ugliness, the shrinking, the whole world of fear which is dark. And that breeds a great deal of neuroticism and all the rest of it. Is there an ending to all this?

Not only to ask a question of that kind - the very question sounds rather silly - you can't end time. You can't end thought. Because to go to your house from here, you need thinking. To turn on the ignition, you need thinking. On Monday morning, you're probably going to an office or something or other; you need to think. So to say, can thought end, or time end, is not the actual question. But rather to ask, do I really comprehend, understand the truth of time and thought? Because thought has its place, time has its place, time has its place. But why should fear arise from thinking? You understand the question? Why should time be a factor in fear?

So if I understand the whole picture, the whole design, the whole map of time, thought, guilt, or fear, then the very observation of it - you understand - the very eyes, seeing, not only the eyes but your whole being looking at it. That means giving your whole attention to this map of fear, not one spot in the map, not one village, or town or the road, but the whole map of it. Can one observe without any distortion this whole structure of it? Of course one can. That is to give attention to pure observation without any distortion. Then that whole chain is broken.

Shall we go on little while longer? Aren't you tired?

Audience: No.

K: Why not? (Laughter) Are you all so actively thinking, working, applying, or just saying, well, it's a nice day, let's talk about it.

Also, in understanding fear, one should look at desire. We are driven by desire, not only for god, whatever that may mean, not only for success, for power, position, being at the centre of everything - like in Washington, or in Delhi or in London or in Paris or in Moscow, or Peking, shall we include Peking, better. We want so many things in life; not only physical things, good cars, good clothes, having a nice body, a nice face, nice cosmetic, you know, the whole game of it. Commercialism in this country is rampant: buy, buy, buy, buy. And desire to be good; desire not to hurt my closest friend, it doesn't matter if I hurt others, but somebody nearby, and so on. We've got so many desires: to be great, to be this, to be that.

And we have never asked, perhaps, what is desire? Why religions, the monks have suppressed desire. They burn with it, but they suppress it. I was once walking - the speaker was once walking behind a lot of monks in the Himalayas. Have you ever been to the Himalayas? Some marvellous hills, marvellous mountains. It was a place where you see over nearly 400 miles across the horizon, snowcapped, great valleys, great marvellous blue sky; unpolluted, sharp, clear. Four hundred or three hundred and fifty miles from range to range, the highest peaks. So I was walking behind a path - speaker was walking behind a path. And there were monks in front of me. They were chanting, and never looking at any flower, any sky, any tree, and the rivers; they have little streams singing down the hill, dancing waters. And there they were, completely absorbed in what they were supposed to be thinking. Didn't dare to look up and see the beauty of the sky, the trees and the rivers and the flowers. Because that is a distraction. Like all the monks all over the world.

So there is this desire in every human being, and without suppressing or denying or transforming or transmuting into something higher - which becomes another form of desire, can we - sorry to laugh (Laughter) - can we look at desire and find out what is the nature, what is the movement, what is the structure of it? Quite objectively. What is desire? What is the beginning of it, not the ending of it? What is the origin, the source, the movement of it? Shall we go into it? Is that interesting?

We live by sensation. Biologically it's necessary. Otherwise we are paralysed. Sensation plays a tremendous part in our life, not only sexually, but wanting, having more and more and more sensations. Sensation is the result of seeing - will you kindly follow this for a little? Seeing, contact, sensation. Right? Seeing those hills, and saying, how beautiful, getting a sensation from it, and that's sensation. I read a beautiful poem, and sensation. Or see a marvellous painting; that's another sensation. And so on. That's a natural thing, sensation, isn't it? You look at the trees and the leaves and the sky, and say, how beautiful it is.

We're not talking about what is beauty. Perhaps we will at the next meeting if we have time. But we live by sensation, the whole nervous organism is sensation. What is the relationship of sensation to to desire? You understand my question? Because we are enquiring into desire. What is the relationship between sensation and desire? Why they are always instantly related? I wish I could always live under these trees with a nice house. And then desire: I must have a nice house under the trees. So what is the actual fact, the relationship, the communication, between sensation and what is called desire? Right? Is there an interval - please listen - is there an interval between sensation and the movement of desire? A gap? Or they are instant? See something, grab it, if you want. So we are going to find out if there is a division, if there is a separation, if there is an interval. Right?

There is sensation in seeing a beautiful garden, well-kept, a lawn that has been mowed and rolled for the last 500 years. There are such lawns. And you see it and you say, my, how marvellous it is, what depth, what beauty in that grass! And you wish you could have it in your back yard.

So watch it, please just watch it closely. Sensation, no, seeing that grass, rich, heavy, deep-rooted grass; then the sensation; then wanting it in your garden. So that is, desire is born - please listen - the moment, the second thought takes control or gives shape to sensation. Right? And then at that second desire is born. You follow? That is, seeing that lawn protected behind a wall, behind walls; and seeing it, the sensation, and thought saying, "I wish I had that." At that second desire is there. You understand? Right?

Now we are asking, can there be a movement, an interval, between the sensation and thought giving it a shape, an image. You understand? That is, sensation, which is natural, seeing that beautiful grass: that field, that lawn. And then thought comes in and says, "I wish I had it." At that second desire is. Right? That's the truth. So we are asking, can these two be separate for a while? See a shirt in the window, go and touch it and say, "What beautiful material it is," and leave it - we don't leave it there. We say, "I wish I had it." Then desire is born. So if the interval can be kept, you understand? The gap can be kept separate for a while, then you will see the movement of desire, how it comes into being. Then you can stretch that space indefinitely or keep it very narrow. You understand what I'm saying? When you understand this, then discipline is not necessary at all, control or suppress or fight it. You understand all this? Not verbally, in your heart. Then you will do it naturally; when you see something beautiful, it is beautiful, and there it is. You can't have those mountains, nor that beautiful lawn. One can look at it, admire it, and say, "How lovely," and feel it. That requires great alertness, awareness, a sense of deep attention to it. But we rarely give all that, except for money or for pleasure.

This is much more stringent, requires a great deal of austerity. The word 'austerity' comes from the Greek, which means 'dry mouth.' Not how we have translated it, austere, few clothes, and you know, one meal a day, and all that stuff. But austerity is something tremendous, not the trivial stuff. To be so attentive to this movement of sensation and desire, and all things we have talked about. To watch it very carefully; see every thought in you, not let it go by without understanding why it arose, what's its cause - you follow? That is real austerity. Not joining a monastery and all that kind of stuff. Austerity is in our daily life.

So we have talked about all this. On Tuesday and Thursday will be questions. Next Saturday and Sunday we'll talk about other things: pleasure, sorrow, pain, and all the implications of loneliness, death, if we have time; and what is religion, what is a religious mind. Is there something which thought has not touched at all, the limitless, the immense, the nameless? Which is not an invitation for you to come. (Laughter) It's part of our life, not all the buying, buying, buying and selling, going to office every day of one's life, conflict and all that. One must also give one's energy to find this out. Not merely live on faith, symbols and all that. So perhaps we'll see each the other day after tomorrow or next Saturday and Sunday.

OJAI 1ST QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING

14TH MAY 1985

K: I've got my own watch! (Laughter)

Many questions have been put, written down. Out of those some have been chosen. I haven't seen them personally. And one cannot possibly answer all those questions, they're too many. It would take a very long time.

I think we ought to ask ourselves why we ask questions and naturally we must ask questions, but why do we ask questions? From whom does one expect an answer? From the speaker? Or from someone who can explain things away? Or can we have a dialogue about a question? That is, you ask a question and the speaker replies to that question. Then you reply to the speaker's response. And then the speaker responds to that question. So it's like playing tennis, back and forth, until the question itself is suspended between the two of us. That is, you ask a question, then I reply to that question, the speaker. Then you reply or respond to my response, and we keep this going until your response and my response have no further activity. So the question is suspended, as it were.

If you try it, if you have ever done it, probably not, then the question begins to have its own vitality. Right? Its own urgency, its own capacity to answer itself. But when we answer a question, it's always from the background of memory. It may be prejudice, it may be some kind of conclusion, or some faith and so on. So if we could suspend all that, and look at the question itself, let the question evolve, grow, expand, then if you want an answer, it is in the question, not from your background. I wonder if I am making myself clear there. It's rather interesting if you go into it. It's very rarely that one has such a dialogue. Because we're so eager to find an answer we never look at the question, let the question evolve, expand, tell its story. And as you watch the question without any deviation, as it were, then the question itself has an extraordinary meaning. Is this clear?

So we are going to look at these questions that way. We're going to watch, listen to the question. As the speaker has not read these questions, you and the speaker can play this game, back and forth till the ball is suspended in the air. (Laughter) If we could do this, that's really the art of having a dialogue, a conversation, a communication in which the participants don't take part.

Will you do this for fun? Then you will see that the question begins to respond out of the very heart of the question? So let's try. That is, you and the speaker are going to have a dialogue in which you and the speaker are playing a part. They don't take the role of a questioner and a person who answers the question. But together we are going to put aside our backgrounds, if we have any, then the question itself begins to move; begins to have its own activity. Shall we do that?

You know, the speaker, fortunately or unfortunately, has talked all over the world, except behind the Iron Curtain or Bamboo Curtain. And questions are put to him of every kind. And if the speaker merely answers from memory, then it's no fun for him. It'll be like a gramophone repeating. But if one puts aside one's own inclinations and tendencies and one's own acquired knowledge, and looks at the question, and the person who is asking the question, looks at his face, his gestures, why he is asking the question, what is the expression on his face, then you can see either it's a very, very superficial question, just put either to catch you, or to see what your quick response would be and so on. But if we could do this, what we just now said, that is, back and forth, and let the question itself respond, then the answering the question becomes extraordinarily significant. Right? Can we do that.

1st QUESTION: Would you please explore further into the mechanism of guilt and its relation to the ego?

Ego being the person, the psyche, the subjective entity, right? That's what generally one calls the ego, the 'me', and the 'you'. The question is, what relationship has guilt, the mechanism of it, to the whole structure of the self.

Now, I am putting that question to you. And you're going to reply to that to me, to the speaker. And then I'll answer you. And then you'll answer me. So we keep this going 'til we have worn ourselves out, and we have no strength in the arm any more. So the question remains. The question is a challenge. Right? Question is a problem that you have to face and resolve. We never resolve any problem because we're always answering from our background. Right? So let's go into this question. You're playing the game, don't just listen to me, to the speaker.

What is guilt? And what is its relationship to the ego, the whole consciousness of humankind, of man, of woman, and so on? What is guilt? Why does one have this enormous sense of guilt? It may be very, very superficial, or very, very deep, rooted from childhood, and allowed to grow as one gets older. And that feeling of guilt makes one either feel very empty - you know all this.

Empty, a sense of not being able to do anything. And then out of that guilt he builds a wall round himself. And that wall prevents any further communication. Or he is frightened of that guilt: you have told me to do something from childhood, and I can't do it, but I feel I must do it; and if I fail I feel guilty. And the parents play a terrible role in this. Sorry! They encourage this guilt, consciously or unconsciously. So that this guilt becomes part of the ego, part of me.

I think it would be wrong to put the question, what is the relationship between the two. You understand how the question is evolving? It is not two separate things. It is the outcome of feeling guilt, with other factors, that constitute the ego. They are not two separate activities or two separate reactions. So guilt is part of the psyche, part of the ego, part of the me.

Now why does one feel guilt? Apart from people who make you feel guilty, and hold you in that state. Because it's very convenient for them, they like to bully you people, and bring about a sense of guilt, the feeling that you must submit, you must accept, you must obey. Though you revolt against it, you keep it underground and hold on to your guilt. Right? And other factors make up the ego; the 'me'. And guilt makes one feel terribly lonely. Are we talking to each other? A sense of depression and if that guilt is very, very deep and strong, I can't resolve it. Therefore I come to you and say, "Please help me to overcome this guilt." And then you impose, if you are the boss, another reaction of guilt. So it goes on.

I am asking - we are asking, why does this feeling exist at all? It is encouraged, is it not, in religions, orthodox religions. In Christianity there is the original sin and the saviour, and therefore I must feel guilty, and confession, and the whole circus begins. Forgive me if I use that word. It takes different forms. In the Christian world confession, absolution. And in the Asiatic world it has a different form: they go to temples - you know, all kinds of things they do.

But is it necessary to feel that? Can there be an education in which there is nothing of this? I wonder? Right? We are playing together, please. Is there a kind of bringing up a child in which there is not this encouragement or the feeling of guilt?

Guilt becomes a problem. Right? Then we have to understand what is a problem? You are following all this? Are you interested in all this?

Q: Can I say something?

K: Oui, madame.

Q: There is something I don't understand, and I want to ask you. How can I look at guilt if guilt is not happening in the moment, without looking in my background?

K: We're going to go into it in a minute. Let me finish. We are proceeding something, bring it in a little later. Where was I?

Q: Raising children without guilt.

Q: What is a problem?

K: Ah, yes. (Laughter)

Q: What is memory?

K: Guilt becomes a problem, how to resolve it; how to get over it, and all kinds of things begin with it. Then we make it into a problem. Now what is a problem? Human beings apparently have thousands of problems: political, religious, economic, sexual, relationship, you follow? Life, living becomes a problem, and generally associated with guilt, part of it. What is a problem?

The meaning of that word etymologically, if I may use a rather long word, means 'something thrown at you'. Like a challenge is thrown at you. And a problem means something hurled at you, thrown at you, which you have to face. And what happens? There are political problems; and so on. And these political problems are never solved. In the very solution of one problem other problems increase, develop. So first let's go into the question, why human beings have problems at all. You understand what I am asking?

You have problems, haven't you? Why do you have problems? And is it possible - we'll go into the question, answer it a little later - is it possible not to have a single problem - sexual, religious, political, economic, relationship, and so on? So let's find out - you are playing the game with me - let's find out why human beings have problems.

From childhood, when a child goes to the school writing becomes a problem to him. Right? Reading, spelling, then mathematics, geography, history, biology, chemistry, science, archaeology, and so on. So from the very beginning he is trained, or conditioned, to have problems. Right? This is obvious. So his brain is conditioned to have problems. Are you playing the game with me? And all his life from the moment he is born practically 'til he dies, the brain continues to live in problems, because he has been educated, cultivated, and the whole system of comparison, examinations, rewards, punishments, and so on. All that has made the brain not only receive problems but have its own problems, it's conditioned that way, therefore it can never solve any problem.

So is it possible from the very beginning not to give the child or ourselves problems? Which means, can the brain be free from its condition to live with problems? When the brain is free, then it can solve problems, it doesn't matter what they are. I wonder, are we together in this?

Q: Sir, how do you go about...

K: Don't go about. (Laughter)

Q: I'm talking about the organic causes like say, I have cancer, suppose, and I am dying.

K: Wait, sir, you are not dying, you are sitting there. (Laughter) Don't bring in the theories, just look, listen, sir, just listen. You see, we become theoretical immediately. That's not playing the game. You have the ball in front of you, you can't say, well, let's talk about the sun or the moon or death or this or that. Forgive me, sir.

So is it possible to have a brain that has no problems but can answer problems? Because there are problems. Now, is that possible, because as long as you have problems you must have the feeling that you must resolve them and if you can't resolve them, you feel guilty. And so we keep this going. Then others come and help us, and the whole thing beings again in a different form.

And another thing arises out of this question: why do we seek help? Are you trying to seek help from the speaker? Let's be a little honest about it. Are you trying to seek help from him? And he says, sorry, I am not helping you. That's a terrible thing to ask the help of another psychologically, for subjective states. We've asked help for thousands of years: god, the priest, and the cultivation of the priesthood; and then the psychologists, you know, we want leaders. Physically they'll tell you how to live, how to exercise, what to eat; how to comb your hair, and all the rest of that. So why do we ask for help at all? You understand the question?

Listen to the question, which is: go into the mechanism of guilt, its relation to the ego, and we said don't separate the two, because guilt is part of the ego, part of the 'me'. It's not separate. Therefore it's not something related to. It is in, it is there. So we have understood that, back and forth. Then we said, why do we have problems. Problems exist from childhood, from the child who goes to the school. He is educated to have problems. So his whole life becomes a problem: depression, anxiety, and so on, so on, and I go and ask another. Which means I am asking help from another. And the other is myself. He has problems. He gets depressed, he feels lonely, and he wants to be a guru, but poor chap, he can't.

(Laughter) Right? He's burning with his own importance or with his own knowledge, with his own - all the rest of it. So the other is you. I wonder if you realize this. Therefore what's the good of asking him?

So we discover in the investigation or exploring into the question, and the question is beginning to answer all this. You follow? Not the speaker invented it; it's like a map, unfold it, you look at the whole of the map, not a particular part of the map. But when we look at the map, we want to go to a particular town or road, but we don't take the whole thing in. If you take the whole thing in and then come to the point, that's a different way of looking at it. Right? Are we together in this? Right.

Q: There's another kind of guilt that is due to an injury, an injustice to another person.

K: Ah, yes, of course, of course. Of course. Of course. You hit me, and I can't hit you back, but I feel - you know, all the rest of it, include all that. Don't take various parts and put them together. The parts don't make the whole. If you see the whole, you can see the parts. Right? And that's the importance of a question. And if you look at the question, not back and forth, add, add, the question itself covers the whole field. Right? Is this clear so far? Can we go to the next question?

Q: Would the root of guilt then be the difference between division, between what actually is and what you would like to be, the proposed ideal?

K: Are you asking, sir, can we look at the fact and not create out of the fact an ideal, an idea?

Q: Yes.

K: Now, just listen to the question. That is, there is the fact, and the ideal, or the ideal separate from the fact. Right? That's what he's asking. There is war, and the ideal is not to have war, peace. Right? The fact is war. Why do you create the ideal out of it? The idea. So the idea is not the fact. So can we remain with the fact, and not have ideals and all theories about the war? You kill me, during the war; you kill me, that's a fact. You are encouraged, patriotism, all the rest of it, you kill me. But there are those people who say, we have ideas about war; which is, you must not kill, you must be sane, you must be rational, you must be kind, you must be generous, but those are all meaningless. Actually you are killing me. So let's remain with the fact and look at the fact, then you can do something about it. Right? Let's move to the next.

2nd QUESTION: Evolution has brought about certain physical differences in racial groups. Are there also parallel psychological differences born into an infant of a particular race, or are they only acquired conditioning? And if the conditioning is inherited, can it really be changed or left behind?

Have you understood the question? Suppose I was born in China, with yellow skin, slanted eyes; I'm just observing, please, I'm not criticizing. I'm not saying the other is beautiful, the other is not. I'm born in China, with certain peculiar physiological, biological facts. Short, not so pinkish skin, which is fashionable, and slanted eyes and so on. That is a physical fact. The questioner asks: does that physical fact affect the psyche of the Chinese. Right? We are together in this? Are we together? Don't afterwards say, I'm not clear. That is, I'm born in China; I'm a Chinese. And I have certain physical and biological strains: face, limbs, hands, walk, and I can bear a great deal burden, and so on, physical burden. Does that outward biological, physiological fact affect the psyche, the structure of the psyche? Does the racial conditioning affect the psyche? Right? That's the question.

I don't know actually, theoretically, but suppose I am born in India which is, it comes to the same thing, I have a different colour, different - they are much more subtle, much more nervous, much more clever - sorry, excuse me! - much more theoretical, much more analytical. But they don't go beyond that. They are all up here; some of them. And they can argue back and forth, argue the hinds off a donkey. And go on and on and on and on. I have listened. All that capacity, all that intellectual training of three, five thousand years, does that affect the psyche? Does it affect the conditioning? I'm born black in this country, with all the peculiar physical phenomena, and does that outward structure of the organism affect the inner?

And do I inherit the physical, which will affect the psyche? Do you understand? Are we together in this? Is the psyche, the subjective state, is it different from the rest of mankind? You're white, you're tall, you can do certain things, and I born in India with a different biological and physiological conditioning, will that affect the psyche? Don't you suffer? I suffer? Right? Don't you go through various forms of fear? Which I do whether I live in China, here, or black, white, purple, whatever it is. And does the child inherit the biological conditioning? You are following all this?

I hope you listen to the question. Then you can answer the question if you really listen to the question. The questioner says, does the physical conditioning shape the psyche? Does it condition the childhood racially? If you treat me, born in this country as black, you would slightly push me aside, rather condemn me or look down upon me. And I feel inferior, guilty - follow all this - guilty, so you exploit me. This is happening the world over, this is not something only limited to this country. In India there is a great deal of colour prejudice. The more light you are the better you are. They would like to marry a girl or a boy who is light-skinned. You follow? It's the same the world over. It sounds funny, and rather silly, but it's a fact.

And the questioner says, does that racial biological condition affect the child, and that child as it grows up becomes biological exception. You understand? I should think not. This isn't a theory, I've watched this game being played all over the world. That is, those who consider themselves racially superior, because they are light-skinned or whatever it is, then they proceed to condition the other fellows who are not. And then they think it's a racial inheritance, and feel guilty and all the rest of it. But as one observes these things very closely, without studying, going into books and all that, when one travels, even living in this country, one observes all this. And one sees fundamentally we are the same, psychologically. You suffer, I suffer, the black, the white, all that, we suffer, we have agonies, we feel guilty, we feel anxious, insecure, confused, depressed and all the rest of it. Like you. But we don't recognize that because we are so inhuman. We are alike psychologically.

That means - please listen - that means you are the entire humanity. Because you suffer, you go through agonies, suffer; I do, he does, right? The Chinese, the Russians, and so on. So you are the entire humanity. That's a tremendous realization. Not individual American with all the rest of it. This is not a theory. It's not an ideal, something utopian. It's an actual daily fact. Are we playing the game? It's an actual daily fact.

Q: You're saying the conditioning only goes so deep.

K: Yes, conditioning is only skin deep. If you like to put it that way. Biological conditioning. There are all kinds of other forms of conditioning, which is not related to race, which is the conditioning of the psyche. In its desire to be secure, I'm an American. I feel safe.

Q: That's still not....

K: Please, sir, I can't answer every question. Or British or French, you know the whole thing. And the other question is: can this psychological conditioning or inherited conditioning, in the sense, my parents telling me, look, don't look over - I have been told as a boy when I first came to England, "You're an Indian, don't look over the hedge." You understand? Planted already guilt.

Fortunately I never played that kind of game.

So is it possible to leave behind or be free of this psychological conditioning? You understand? Obviously if one gives one's attention to it, not analytically but just observes. As you observe in a mirror your face you observe your reactions, without any distortion. And that can only be done in a relationship with another. Relationship then becomes the mirror in which you see yourself exactly as you are. And if you like to keep that image, keep it! If you don't like it, break it! It isn't something tremendously arduous or difficult. You'd like to make it because in our deeper sense we are feeling guilty, we must do this and we must do that, we all must be noble; you follow? Courageous.

So that question, if we don't come to it without any prejudice, approach it without any conclusion, then the question covers a tremendous lot. You understand? Right? Can we go on to the next question? Have I answered this question, my lady, whoever put it? Right. Not answered it; you have resolved it.

3rd QUESTION: It is said that the income from your books does not go to you personally. May one ask how you live, sir?

Are you really interested in this? I'll answer it. It's very simple. Are you really concerned about this question? As it is put then, let's answer it. Let's go into it. Personally, I've no money. I don't want it. I've been offered castles, estates. I've been asked go into the cinemas, they've offered me a great deal of money. I don't like it. I've no money. So what has happened is, to put it very, very, very simply, when I go to India the Foundation there looks after me. For my clothes, laundry, food, doctor, if I am ill, and the travels there. I travel all over India. And I go to Europe, the European Foundation, that's English Foundation plus France and so on, they support K. And when I come here they do exactly the same thing. It's very simple. Is that answered? Right.

4th QUESTION: Why do you say there is no psychological evolution?

This is really a very serious question. Not as the previous one, but this is a very serious question.

What do we mean by evolution? I'm asking, you can't verbally answer it, because there are too many, but you must answer it.

What do you mean by evolution? The oak tree here, it drops its acorn; out of that grows the tree. Right? That's to evolve, to grow, to multiply. Right? And also we have evolved from the most ancient of times until what we are now. Biologically, organically. Right? This has taken us two or three million years, psychologically, to grow into what we are now. Right? It's obvious. Do we play the game, you are playing the game? It's in your court.

So we have evolved not only biologically but also psychologically, inwardly, subjectively. We can't grow a third arm or a fourth arm. We can't, we have probably biologically reached the limit. But psychologically, subjectively we think we can grow; we can become something: more noble, more courageous, less violent, less brutal, less cruelty, you follow? To us the idea of psychological growth is tremendously important. Otherwise the ego has no meaning.

I don't know if you follow this. I meditate in order to become. I breathe in order to keep the brain quiet. You know. I am becoming all the time. Either in the business world, in the world of technology, in the world of skill, I am always becoming something better. I'm a better carpenter than I was two years ago, better electrician, better chemist, better this and better that. And I apply the same movement to the psyche. I don't know if you are following all this. That is, I am going to become something, psychologically. You're following this? Is that a fact? No, don't, please, this is very important, because if you really understand this, go into it, our whole life changes. You understand what I'm saying?

Is good the enemy of the better? Do you understand my question? Good; with all its meaning, we'll go into it presently. And I will be better, I'll be good or I am good, but I'll be better tomorrow. Better good. So the better is the enemy of the good. I don't if you are following this. I'll go into this.

So is there psychological evolution? Or what I am today I'll be tomorrow. You understand? We have evolved psychologically five to three thousand years, more, much more. Eight thousand years, ten thousand years. If you've gone into it - I won't go into all the ancient movement of mankind. People who have studied this have told me, therefore I'll only repeat something they have told me. Which you can find out. But I am questioning, we are questioning whether there is the psychic growth at all, becoming better. And if it is that we are through time, million years, 50,000 years, we have become better. We are much more evolved. Is that a fact? Answer it.

Q: I think we...

K: Attendez! If you all talk, madame, it's impossible. You'll ask, he'll ask; but just think, look at it, and then we'll communicate, not only verbally but non-verbally. Have I as a human being who have lived on this earth, two or three million years ago or 50,000 years ago, or even 8,000 years ago, have I progressed? Evolved? Have you? Psychologically? Aren't you as you were at the beginning? More or less. Less than more, but more or less. Brutal, violent, aggressive, insecure, wanting to kill for your tribe, for your god, for your country, it has existed the same phenomena from the beginning of time. There you clubbed a man or a woman. Then there was the archery. Then there was the simple gun. Now we have evolved to have neutron bombs. Think, tremendous progress! No sir, don't laugh. Look at it carefully. But behind the archer, behind the gun, the man behind the gun and the man who is up at 50,000 feet dropping a neutron bomb, the man is the same. Right? This is a fact. You may put a flag on the moon and he says, it's my country that's represented up there.

No, look at it, sir, carefully consider all this. I am not asking you to believe what I am saying. Look at it. So one asks, is there psychological growth? Or psychological ending? - not growth, becoming something. You understand what I'm saying?

Q: Yes.

K: If I don't end violence today, that violence has existed a million years ago, in the human being, then if I don't leave that violence behind or drop it or radically bring about a mutation, I'll be violent tomorrow. This is a fact. So, is there a progress, development of the psyche as evolution? For me personally there isn't. For me. Don't accept it. I'm playing, I'm returning the ball to you.

So the question then remains, I am what I am at present. Right?

I have been what I have been. I am what I have been. I am all the memories, racial, religious, educational, travelling, all that is the past which is me. Right? My experience, my desire to be a great man, my desire to be important, my desire to be a guru, my desire to be somebody; I am not, but I'm just saying. All that is the past, which is me. If I don't drop all that, I'll be tomorrow exactly the same thing. From this statement arises the question, is that possible? You understand? Is it possible to let go all that? Not through effort, not through determination, desire, that becomes again another achievement. Can all that be dropped? Sir, it's in your court. Don't wait for me to answer it. It's in your court. You are asking that question. Realizing you are the background. You are all that accumulated racial, religious, economic, scientific, political; all that's your conditioning of the psyche. You've been programmed for two thousand years to be Christians. And the others are trained in their own way.

The other day somebody said they saw statue of the Buddha sitting in - you know, you've seen statues of Buddha. And somebody said, "What's the good of that man sitting like that all day long?" It was put by a Christian. Careful, careful, listen to it. There was somebody else beside me said, "What's the point of that man hanging on that cross all day?" No, no, don't laugh, please look at all this.

According to our prejudice, conditioning we act, think, feel. If I'm a Buddhist, if you said that to me, I would be terribly upset. I'll get angry, violent, because I worship that figure. But if I was a Christian and you said, what's the point of that man hanging on that wall - you follow? It shocks you, must shock you. So, can we look at all this without a single shadow of prejudice. You understand? Single shadow of opinion, conditioning, so that we realize that each person creates the image which he worships.

There was a man we used to know many, many, many years ago. He was walking along the beach, and picked up a branch, a piece of stick that long, and it had the shape of a human form. He brought it home - this is a fact - and put it on the mantelpiece. And one day he put a flower to it. And after several days he began to put a garland round it, worship it, you follow? Human beings create their own images out of their own conditioning.

So, is there psychological evolution at all, or is there only an ending, not becoming? That is, the ending of violence. I'm taking that as an example. Ending violence completely, not tomorrow, now. Understanding the whole implication of violence: aggressiveness, ambition, part of the feeling of guilt and I'm not wanted to be - you follow? This whole concept of growth, psychological growth. Of course the baby grows into an adult and old age and pops off. That's so. That's one irremediable fact, that we're all going to end up in the grave or be incinerated. So one has to look at this question and ask the question of ourselves and find out the truth of it, not just say, yes, I think so or not think so, but carry on day after day.

5th QUESTION: To live peacefully needs great intelligence. Please enlarge on this.

The speaker said at the first talk or previously you need great intelligence to live peacefully. And the question is, go into it, discuss it, have a dialogue about it.

What is intelligence? I'm asking you the question, you must answer it. Not all of you, but answer it to yourself. What is intelligence? The meaning of that word, Latin and so on, means - the dictionary meaning - to read between the lines. To gather information. To acquire knowledge. To accumulate the experience of others and yourself, from which knowledge. And to gather information that gives you more knowledge. That's generally the meaning of that word in the dictionary. That is the common usage.

You need a great deal of intelligence to go to the moon. Right? Extraordinary kind of intelligence. Thousands of people, literally thousands of people co-operating. Every detail had to be perfect. I was told 3,000 or 300,000, I've forgotten the number who had to co-operate step by step, each one doing the perfect thing. And then they built it, all the rest of it, go to the moon. That requires intelligence. And also to build a computer, that requires intelligence. To programme it requires intelligence. To invent communication, rapid communication between here and New York and Delhi and Moscow, that requires a tremendous kind of intelligence. That intelligence - please listen, we are playing the game - that intelligence is based on knowledge, based on experience, based on skill. Right? Which is the extraordinary intelligence of thought. Right Are we clear on this?

The surgeon who operates, of course he must have very skilful hands, must have a great deal of experience, and tremendous control of his body at that moment, giving complete attention. All that is based on experience, knowledge, memory, skill. And that's called intelligence. Right? We are together? Whether the intelligence of an idiot, or the intelligence of a very great mathematician or biologist and the archaeologist and so on, scientists, painters. So that's limited intelligence. Isn't it? Are you sure? Don't agree, please, it's in your court, therefore you are in a game with yourself. If you see it, it's so. Because all that kind of intelligence is based on experience, knowledge, memory, thought. And thought is limited, as we went into it the other day. Because thought is based on memory; memory is the outcome of knowledge; knowledge is the outcome of experience. And experience is always limited. There is no complete experience, because there is always the experiencer saying I'm experiencing. I don't know if you are following all this. And therefore as long as there is the experiencer who is the background of memory, you follow, which makes him recognize the experience - I don't know if you are following all this - that experience is limited, therefore all thinking is limited. And out of that limitation there is a certain kind of intelligence. And that intelligence is applied to kill others, to control others, to deny freedom to others, to send them to the camp, concentration camp, which is happening now; not only the abnormal Germans, it's happening now. We don't make a lot of noise about that. We make a tremendous noise about something that happened 40 years ago.

So. We understand this intelligence with which we operate daily, you couldn't drive a car if you haven't intelligence. And that intelligence is based on learning how to drive a car. Which is, you have practice, your parents or a specialist taught you how to drive a car, it had to become automatic, you follow? Experience, knowledge, memory, thought. That is limited. So we are asking, is there an intelligence which is not limited? You understand? Not in opposition to the limited intelligence? I wonder if you understand.

Do you get this? I understand very clearly the limited intelligence; it's obvious. And we live within that narrow limited intelligence. We invent gods out of that intelligence; we invent all the rituals all the paraphernalia of rituals, the medieval dresses of the priests and the hierarchy of priests, all that is connived at, to impress the people, to hold them together in a particular belief, and so on, so on. All that is a form of limited intelligence. This is in your court. And you ask naturally, if you are alert, aware of all this, is there an intelligence which is not limited? You only ask that question when you see, actually observe in yourself and in others, the activity of limited intelligence. Otherwise you can't ask that question. The limited intelligence, which is to kill each other. It's so obvious, so impractical. So... you understand? I can think of nothing more horrible than to kill animals and all the rest of it and human beings, purposely, deliberately organized killing which is not called murder. It is called whatever you like to call it, give it a noble name. But it's still killing. And that's intelligence, part of intelligence, to invent modern machinery. You understand, sir? The material for wars, that requires a great deal of thought, great deal of experiment. Of centuries of killing each other, they have reached this point. Vaporize human beings by the million.

When one realizes this, not intellectually or verbally, in your heart, not romantically, but fact. Then you can ask the other question: Is there an intelligence which is not limited? Find out, sir. You can't have one foot in this and one foot there. You can have one foot there in that intelligence which is not limited and then you can come to the other. But you can't go from the limited to that. I don't know if you are understanding all this. You can meditate, you can stand on your toes or on your head, do whatever you will, from the limited you can't go to the unlimited. So we are asking, not in opposition to the limited because then if you are asking from the limited to find out the other, you can never find out. So is there an unlimited intelligence?

And to find that out you have to give your life to it, not just one morning sitting here. You have to give your energy, your austerity, your heart, your brain, everything to find that out. And that can exist only when there is love and compassion, nothing else.

6th QUESTION: You have large audiences the world over. What is it that all of us desire?

Will you answer it? What is it, the question is put most respectfully, and humanly, which is humbly, what is it you all want? What is it you're longing for? What is it that makes people go to church, you follow? What is it you all desire?

Can you answer it seriously and honestly? Not one moment I want this, next moment I want that and third moment, third year something else, you know, as is happening in this country. One thing after the other. A new latest guru comes and you all... So what is it, when you sit down quietly as you are doing now, what is it we all want? Is there a common urge, common desire, common longing? Or is it all separate, each person wanting something totally different from another? Probably one has never even put that question to oneself seriously. If you put that question really seriously, what is it? Is it happiness? And is happiness the end of life? Is it security, to be safe? To be completely safe in that freedom which you want. Safe, safety and freedom. Security in a club, in a society, in a group, in a country, in a belief, and be free at the same time.

Please look at it most seriously, for your own sake look at it. To have better relationship with somebody, to live with husband, wife, or whatever it is, completely without conflict? Is it that you want to be completely free of your conditioning? Or not to be afraid of death? When you look at all this, various forms of our desires, our longings, our escapes and our attachments, what is it out of all that we want? Somebody to lean on? I am getting old, I must have somebody I can lean on. And I live with that person happily, but I can't live with others. Please assure me that person and I will get on well together for the rest of our life. You follow? You are following all this? I have complexes or values, conditioning, I want to get rid of them all. If one looks at it all, learned, even if we are, great intellectuals if we are, and romantics if we are, and so on, scientists, politicians, what is it out of our heart we want? Would one answer cover the whole lot? You understand? If I can find the root of something, of all this, then I can let everything go. You understand? Is it freedom? Not to do what one likes, that's too childish, too immature, too limited. Freedom. That word itself contains love. Is that what you want? Or to have no responsibility at all? Like a soldier who is sent to war, he is perfectly happy because he has no responsibility. Is that what you want? No responsibility whatsoever? That's why, is it, that you take drugs? Or to have more excitement, you want more excitement, more sensation. Sir, put all this together and add more to it. There must be a root to all this. You understand? One question that will answer all questions. Is there such thing?

Is it that you want the increase of self-interest? To stabilize, to strengthen, to have deep roots in self-interest? I can answer that, but it's in your court. You must return the ball, you can't just say, "Well, I'll hold the ball for a while." You're playing the game. What is it that will answer all these questions? Would not all these questions be answered when you have absolute unconditional psychological freedom? And freedom means love, not anything else. Love is not desire, pleasure, sensation, attachment. And where there is love, there's compassion and that unlimited intelligence. When it's there, you've answered everything. I don't know if you understand this. Then there'll be no war, no conflict. In relationship there'll be no conflict when there is love; not the image of each other, fighting each other. You understand my question? Is that the answer? Is that the root of all our desires, wants, longings, prayers, worship?

The question is answered, sir.

OJAI 2ND QUESTION & ANSWERS MEETING 16TH MAY 1985

K: I wonder what you would like to talk about.

Q: Jesus.

K: Just a minute, sir, just a minute. I've just begun, sir. I'd like to know, if I may, if one may, what you would like to talk about. There're lots of questions, many questions which can't possibly be answered. Only some can be answered and here they are typed out, which I have not seen. But before we begin to ask these questions I wonder what you would like to talk about? Not all of you at once, because that would be impossible. Yes, wait, sir, just a minute.

Q: What conditions are necessary in order to understand what you're talking about?

K: What conditions are necessary to understand what K is talking about. Is that it?

Q: In order to understand completely.

Q: In order to grasp what you're saying.

K: Oh, yes. In order to grasp what you are talking about, what is necessary? Is that what you want to talk about? You are one, sir, what is it you would all like to talk about?

Q: What shall we teach our children?

Q: Please talk more on what you said on Tuesday - freedom means love. You could talk a great deal about that.

K: What you talked about on Tuesday, about love, could you go into that. Right?

Q: Yes, freedom, you said, means love.

K: Now look, there are so many of us. The first question was:

what is necessary, what kind of brain one must have to understand what you are talking about, to grasp. It's not what the speaker is talking about, but to grasp your own understanding of yourself. Scrap or put aside what K is talking about and let us see what is necessary to understand, to go into oneself. Is that it? Would you like to talk about that?

Audience: Yes.

K: Apart from the questions.

What are the barriers that prevent us from understanding our own selves, not only at the conscious level, at the level of daily activities, but also go much deeper into oneself? Is that what you all want to talk about? If one asks that question of oneself, what prevents me or you from understanding, delving into oneself very, very deeply, what is the thing that's lacking? What do you think? Don't all say at once. What does each one of us say, answer or respond when we put that question to ourselves? I am occupied all day with business, travelling here and there; if I am an artist I am concerned with painting, writing poems, literature; and if I am a politician I am greatly concerned about politics, my place in it and my self-interest, my ambition and then the concern about people afterwards. So what is it that is lacking? Energy, intellectual capacity? We're just going to investigate it together. Intellectual capacity? Or we are too emotional? Or we have got so many romantic illusory concepts, images about others and about ourselves that prevents us from grasping the whole of one's being. Is it I'm too occupied - with my children, my wife, my job, my amusement, my place in society and so on? This perpetual occupation, constant chattering of one's own problems and one's own against or for the environment; or fundamentalists. I don't know if you have noticed this fact, that fundamentalism is spreading extraordinarily in this country. And also it's spreading in Iran and Iraq, Lebanon, and also it's gradually seeping into India. All this is taking a great deal of our time. And therefore is it that we haven't the energy or the urge at the end of the day or the beginning of the day, that we are not sufficiently recollected, deeply concerned. We are concerned about money, sex, position, and so on, so on. That is, we occupy ourselves a great deal with superficial things. Does that deprive us of energy to dig deeply? I'm just asking these questions. Or, I'm really not interested in all this. I like to catch a little bit here and there; go to various gurus and various tricksters; theoreticians and theologians, and the experts in religion. And catch little bit of all this and they make a good table conversation. Is this what we are occupied with most of the day? Or do you set aside - we are not advocating anything, we are just talking about it - or you set aside some time in the morning or afternoon or in the evening and little bit attempt to be serious. Or we take each part of life as a separate part and deal with those parts. I can go on. Or can you look at this whole structure of ourselves as a whole, not as fragmented beings? Is that possible?

That is, you are not, if one may point out, you are not understanding K. You are understanding or using K as a mirror to understand yourself. And the mirror is not important. That's the first thing to realize. The mirror, the person is not important. What he is saying may reflect what you are. May. It may be contrary, but you are beginning to look at yourselves, doubting, questioning, asking.

So, how do you approach this question? Because the approach matters much more than the fact. Are we together in this? The approach, whether it be a scientific problem or an artistic problem or a humanitarian problem, or social, political and so on, or religious, how do you approach it, come near it? Because how you come to it is of great importance. Not what the question is, or the problem is. Because if I approach it with a preconceived ideological image, that image intervenes between the approach and the thing to be approached. Are we in this together? Little bit? So can one approach an issue, a challenge, a problem, however trivial, however deep, without all the connivance, without all the previous conclusions, prejudices, and come to it afresh? Can we do that or is it impossible? Because one has been trained or educated from childhood to be a Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist, and all the rest of it. And one revolts against all that, if one is at all intelligent and active, say, what nonsense all that is. But that makes one's life very shallow, also. So then you try to fill that shallowness with all kinds of amusement, drugs, and entertainment, sex, and all the rest of it. So how does one approach the question?

Please ask this question of yourself. If you are a businessman, you approach it very cautiously, seeing what the reward is, what the punishment is, punishment and reward. If the reward is great you go on. If it is not great you slightly hesitate, you talk about it and gradually learn, avoiding something which is not profitable. In the same way we look at life from the point of reward and punishment. Right? If I do this I can reach heaven, or nirvana or whatever is, enlightenment and so on. So there is always this background of gaining and losing. Right? Can one put aside all that and look at the problem, approach the problem freely?

There was a question asked just now: would you go into the question of what you talked about on Tuesday. It was about love and all the complexity of it. Right? Why to you want me to talk about it? Why is it we can't ourself go into it very cautiously, not assuming anything, be terribly honest and see what it all means? Is that impossible? You see, unfortunately, one of our difficulties is we read so much. We have been told so much: by philosophers, by experts, by specialists, by those who have travelled all over the world and gathered information, met with various saints and crooks and gurus and whole lot of them. And they say, yes, I met all these people, I know. And we are so gullible and so eager. We take on their coloring. Do we do this? All the newspapers, magazines, that's what they're doing to us. Every evening commercials. You follow? Look at all this. And we are being bombarded by all this so that gradually our brains narrow down, because this obvious bombardment. It's like constantly being shocked.

So would you consider whether it is possible to put aside all this and look at it all anew, afresh, as though you were seeing things for the first time. Could we do this? Or it's only given to the few - which is nonsense. Though people pretend, "Yes, I can do it but I'll tell you all about it." That's silly. I wouldn't accept such a thing. Why has our brain become so petty? You understand the word petty, narrow, limited, deeply rooted in self-interest.

Sir, these are questions that can be put. But the answer or the discovery or the root of all this one has to dig oneself or go into it. It's no good talking to each other all day long, or even for an hour. It's good to listen to each other. And how you listen also matters tremendously. Whether you actually listen in the sense that you are listening without any determination, without any direction, bringing your own reaction, just to listen. As a child listens to an excellent, exciting story, he's full of eagerness, curiosity to find out. Could we do that? Not only listen to the words and so on but also listen to all our thoughts, all our feelings and watch the images that we are building constantly.

Can we go back to the questions? As we said, there are several questions here. Eight of them. Can we listen to the question first without any reaction, without saying, yes, I understand already? Just capture the question. It's like planting a seed in the ground in a healthy well enriched soil, planting a seed. If the seed has vitality, energy, the intrinsic value of its own, then you don't have to do anything, you water it occasionally, look after it and it will grow. So the question is the seed. I wonder if you understand? And let the question move. Let the question develop, enlarge, and see whether there is anything in the question at all or it's just a weed. Some weeds are nice looking, and worthwhile, but some weeds are utterly useless, destructive. So we're going to find out - sorry to make all these remarks - we're going to find out the worth of the question. The question may be put superficially or with great intent. And the question is not put by somebody else but the question is being put to each one of us.

(1st) Questioner: What is the difference between that shyness you have talked about and fear?

K: We talked about the other day fear. Fear is identified with the ego, with the 'me', with the whole structure of my psyche, it's part of my psyche, part of me. And fear also breeds guilt, various types of greed. And all this makes one rather nervous, one has temerity, shyness, a sense of withdrawing, and yet wanting to express oneself. So there is a contradiction in oneself. And that contradiction breeds further guilt and we carry on this way.

Now, what is the root of this? You understand my question? The fear, guilt, and being rather timid, and not wanting to hurt others. But yet the very words you say may hurt others. If a Hindu says, it's all, what you're talking about, religious nonsense, you get hurt. And you hurt him. So this goes on. Is it possible to live daily life without fear, first? That is important, not all the branches of it: guilt, timidity, and the feeling of wanting to resist, wanting to hit back. All that is rooted in the sensation of fear.

Would you agree to that? Do we see that? Not because I am describing, not because the speaker is unfolding it. You see it if you watch it quietly, the activities of fear, how it creates barriers, not only in our relationship but also in our attitudes to the whole of humanity, and so on.

So we are asking first, is it possible to live without fear? Not say, I must be courageous. You can be courageous by taking some kind of drug. We know a friend who is producing rum. And he's supplying rum to the army. And he says, well, it's a very profitable business because soldiers going to the front are very, very nervous and this gives them a certain sense of courage, and various other reasons. So if we could really delve deeply into this question; together, not I explain and you accept, that's no meaning.

As we talked about it the other day, time and thought are the two major factors in manufacturing, if I can use that word, fear. We went into the question of time. Shall we go into it again? Yes?

You're rather silent. I'm not forcing you.

Audience: Yes.

K: This is rather a complex question and therefore must be approached very simply. All of us live within the radius or within the diameter, within the time process. All of us live in the time process. That is, I have done something, I will do that again today, change it, modify it, and I will do it again tomorrow, but modified. And if you watch yourself very carefully, all the memories are the result of experience, knowledge, contained within the brain - perhaps not the whole of the brain; the major part of the brain. Please, the speaker is not an expert in brain neurology and all the rest of it, he's just watched it. Watched. And by watching it tells you, you learn a lot. Not only from books, the speaker doesn't read books, fortunately. He reads other kinds, thrillers and so on. Don't bother about that.

So, time, which is evolution in one sense, time as survival, time as something to be gained, something to be achieved, an ideal to be pursued or a theology, a conclusion, an ideology to be held strongly, and see that ideology is carried out. And the same thing applies to the theologians. They have certain theories about god, and work that out. All this takes time. Right? And also time is necessary, to say, I am this today, I was this yesterday also, but I need time to change it. The word 'change' implies time. I don't know if you are following all this. Right? Are you interested in all this? All right. I'll talk for the talking's sake - not for talking's sake, I am interested in it myself tremendously.

In the cycle of time we are caught. Whether it's the greatest scientist or the greatest religious person, so-called religious; or the ordinary laymen like us, we are caught in this. Right? There is not only time according to sunrise and sunset, and the time by the watch. You need time to go to your rendezvous. You need time to learn a language, a skill, and so on, to acquire more knowledge. All this requires time. And man has asked, is there an end to time? He has asked this. You will find it in various literature; Shakespeare - I've been told: "Time must have a stop." And also Eastern philosophers, Eastern saints and Eastern people have thought about it. They have enquired into it. And they have invented various forms of ending the time, various methods. That is - you are interested in all this?

That is, is there an ending to knowledge which is time? I wonder if you capture this? I need time to acquire knowledge. Right? I don't know how to fly, but I will learn. I don't know how to be a good master carpenter, but I'll learn about it, work at it. Which is acquiring knowledge about a skill, whether flying, science, whatever it is. And they asked, is there an end to knowledge? Or must it always go on and on and on and on? The boredom of it! You understand?

So you are asking that question. That is, is time by which we live, we do, act, think, feel - and when one watches it, one gets rather tired of it all, bored. And also in acquiring this skill one becomes lonely. And out of the loneliness you act, you do various kinds of activities. And you become neurotic and psychopathic and all the rest of it. So this goes on. So one asks very carefully, what is the past, which is time? Humanity has lived on this earth, according to the archaeologists, scientists, and so on, for over two to three million years, or recently, 50,000 years. Right? We have evolved. And during that long period of time our brain has gathered infinite information and has battled with each other, killed each other. Right? Gone through various horrors: barbarism, cruelty, extraordinary brutality, holocausts. Not only in the recent holocaust, Germany, but there was Attila, Genghis Khan, Napoleon, Caesar, and that butchering of man is going on now.

So at the end of this long period what are we now? You understand my question? What are you? Are we still barbarians, savages? Highly cultured savages, sophisticated savages, fighting each other, aggressive, brutal, killing. Sir, that's what's going on. Have you ever noticed not one - I mustn't be too emphatic about this - not one priest, the hierarchy of the Catholic church, not any of them have said, stop wars, don't kill any more. Right? Not one of them. If they insisted on it, the church would collapse, because people love to kill each other. No? Yes, sir. They want to hurt each other, they are cruel to each other. So all this has come about, and it's still with us during the long period of evolution which is time. Right? I wonder if you are capturing all this.

And so one asks, is there an end to all this, which is ending of time? And time is also psychologically becoming something, which is far more important. Which means I have certain ideals, certain concepts, theories, visions, and it'll take time to achieve it. Which is, I'll become that. Which is again reward and punishment, the same thing in different words.

So all that which is involved in time, can it end? Sir, ask, put your guts into this, sorry to use that word. Put your whole heart to find out. That is, I have been for centuries this, in the past. And those centuries are now. Right? Centuries, all those experiences, all that is now, is in me, in you. And tomorrow is modified by recent challenges: economic, social, war, and so on; the past is modified and goes on into the future. Right? This is a fact. So one says, the future is now. I wonder if you see this. Right, sirs? Do see this really; not verbally, see the truth of it. The future is now because if I have been that for centuries, millions of years, and if I don't fundamentally bring about a mutation now I'll be the same modified tomorrow. So tomorrow is now. I wonder if you see this.

So what then is the position of a brain, or the state of a brain that doesn't look to tomorrow - "I will change." "I will become that." - because all that is now if there is no total psychological revolution. The Communists are frightened of revolution because they are stuck in their ideology and they won't change. And they will go on that way 'til there is another physical revolution. So we are doing exactly the same thing in a milder form. So the past modifying itself through today continues as tomorrow. This is a fact. So tomorrow is now. And if there is no deep revolution in the psyche, tomorrow will be the same. So is it possible to radically end? I have been greedy, violent, acquisitive, possessive; that's enough. And can all that end now, instantly? Sir, ask this question. Either you treat the whole thing as an idea, or a fact. That is, you hear this and translate what you hear into idea, a concept, a Utopia, something to be achieved. Then you are back in the whole cycle. But can you look at the fact and remain with the fact? That is, sir, how do you observe a fact? Observe, not analyze. How do you observe a fact? There is the oak tree there. How do you look at it? Do, please, look at that oak tree and find out how you observe it. Not only visually, optically, and the nervous responses, all that, but what is the process of observation? Are you interested in all this?

No, don't be eager, sir, don't say "Yes" too quickly.

Q: Yes.

K: It's easy to observe impartially without any prejudice the tree. Yes, you say, it's an oak tree. Or the mountains and the rivers and the valleys and the meadows and the groves. That's fairly simple. But can you observe your wife, your friend, your antagonist without any direction, without any bias? To be aware without choice, right? Can you do it? It becomes so extraordinarily interesting to find out if you can do it. Right? We are still talking about the first question. It's nearly quarter past twelve. Sir, to put it very briefly, we must go on.

Can you watch as you watch in a mirror your face, when you are doing your hair, combing, shaving and so on, can you watch yourself in a mirror so that psychologically you see everything in minute detail, what you are? You understand my question? Is there a psychological mirror as there is a physical mirror? A good mirror doesn't distort. It shows you exactly what you look like, if you are interested in what you look like. So is there a mirror which doesn't distort a thing, psychologically? You see the whole psyche as you move, as you look, you can observe the details of your face, the eyebrows, the eyes, the nose, the shape of the nose, the depth of the nose, the ear, and all that. You know most people do this, especially the ladies. So you keep looking. We are asking, is there such a mirror inwardly? So that you see exactly! Minute details, the latest wrinkles. Can you see that way? There is such a mirror. The mirror is your relationship. Right? The relationship between you and another, between you and your wife, or your husband, your children, relationship. Either that relationship is very, very superficial, merely sensation or sexual - even there you begin to see very clearly, if you see the mirror. Or it's very intimate, very close, very observable in that relationship that relationship is the mirror. It will never distort. But when there is in that relationship sensation and possession, domination, merely sensation and so on, then the mirror distorts. Right? So to observe very carefully the minutest activity in that mirror, and as you observe it the mirror tells you the whole story. And then you can put aside the mirror; because the mirror is not important. Relationship then becomes extraordinarily important.

2nd QUESTION: The whole world of nature is a competition to survive. Is it not innate in humans to struggle for the same reason? And are we not struggling against our basic nature in seeking to change?

Don't change. It's very simple. If you want to remain as you are, carry on, nobody is going to prevent you. Religions have tried to civilize man. But they haven't succeeded. On the contrary. Some religions, like Christianity, have killed more people than anybody on earth. Right? I don't know if you have watched this. They have had two appalling wars, and they have killed millions. Not only Stalin and Mao Tse-Tung, these wars have destroyed. Right? And if we carry on this way, not wanting to change, it's all right. But the question is: nature struggles to achieve light, like in a forest, for example. And it is a struggle. Right? The big, the stronger kills the weaker in nature. The tiger kills the deer, the lion kills some other thing, this goes on, this is part of nature. And the questioner says, if it is part of nature, why should we change at all? Because it's intrinsic. Why do we say it's intrinsic? Why do we say, there it's all right, and therefore it's all right with us too; and so why bother to change. It's part of us, part of nature, part of our existence, intrinsically this is what we are. And if that is so, that it is instinct, that it's innate in us, which one questions very deeply, then I can't change anything. But why should we accept that it's innate in us? Is it my indolence that says, "For God's sake, leave it all alone." Is it my sense of exhaustion? Or we are supposed to be as human beings a little more intelligent, little more reasonable, little more sane, and we are supposed to use our sanity, our intelligence, our experience to live differently? Right? To live differently. Perhaps that difference may be total; and not just remain as a mediocre person - which is now being encouraged for human beings to remain mediocre, through their education and all the rest of it. I won't go into it.

So is it mediocrity that is fighting us, that we hold on to, and say, "We are slowly moving, it's all right." Slowly moving towards the precipice. Or if you begin to question the whole process of our existence, using common sense, logic, reason, awareness - one questions intuition, that's rather doubtful because it may be one's wish fulfillment, calling it instinct or intuition, but one has to use logic in all this, not just say, "Well, it's innate." Let's go to the next question.

3rd QUESTION: Why is it that mankind universally has sought what is called God? Is it only out of fear and a need for security? Or is there some essential religious instinct in all human beings?

What do you think? What is your response to that question? Is it fear? Is it the desire for security. Is it the desire to be ultimately rewarded? Is it desire for comfort? Is it we are so discontented with everything about us, that we want something to reach, to gain? And the religions have said god has made man; put it in different words. Obviously it must be an extraordinarily strange god. And has man made god? You understand? If god has made us, something has gone wrong. (Laughter) No, please, sir, this is very serious, it's laughable when you look at it and tragic. We have killed - no, I won't go - you know all that. So what is it that's making man, human beings create something called that word? If you haven't that word, you create something else.

So the question is not whether there's god or not, but why do human beings live with illusions? Illusions, images, symbols - why? If you look at yourself, you've got lots of images: image about yourself, first; then the image about your wife and your children, if you are a parent; or you have images about the politicians, religious people, you follow? We accumulate images which are illusions. If I create an image about my wife, which we do - am I coming too near, too near the bone? If I create an image about my wife, that image has been built through 50 years or 10 days or 1 day, what takes place in our relationship? The image becomes far more important than the fact. Right? So I impose this image on my wife or husband or whatever it is; on the politician. And this image then becomes a far greater potential than the wife, the actuality. Right, sirs? You people are married, you know all the game of it; the quarrels. You follow? Which means this image intervenes all the time. So this image or images separates us. She is fulfilling her ambition, her position in society: the tremendous women's activity, and the men's activity. So these images and the fulfillment of those images are separating us, the man and the woman. This is all common sense!

And the brain then says, why should I create these images? What is the raison d'etre for this? None at all, if you go into it. The wife is what she is and I, the man, am what I am. And from there you start, you can do something. You can break the image and say, all right, let's face things as they are. You're possessive and I don't want to be possessive. Right? You like being possessed, man or woman, and I, sorry, don't cling to me, for god's sake. And so we begin to quarrel because I have an image about myself. You follow? He says I don't want to be clung to - not by her, but by somebody else! This all goes on. So can we live - that's the real question, not believe in god or not - the real question is this: can one live without a single illusion? That's real freedom, you understand? That means you are facing facts all the time. Not try to change the facts, that takes place when you just watch the fact.

4th QUESTION: What is the primary basic obstacle that prevents observation and insight?

We talked about observation just now. So we won't go into it again, because it becomes tiresome. What is insight? People have talked about it, to have an insight into things. That is, having a perception into not only images, illusions, but in facts. How do you have an insight into things? How do you have an insight - let's take for example, I'm taking that as an example - that all religious organization is merely the activity of convenience, fear. Right? All that, all religious organizations, whether it's Christianity or Hinduism, you understand? Insight, which means what? If I cling to Hinduism I shan't have an insight into Hinduism. Right? So I must be free of my conditioning to have insight. Insight implies not having the continuity of memory, which is the past and all the rest of it, but the ending of it, seeing something new. If I have been programmed as a Catholic, Hindu, whatever it is, Democrat or Republican or Presbyterian, god knows what else, if I have been conditioned and that conditioning is always active, I cannot have an insight. I may have the capacity to invent. Naturally invention is based on knowledge, creation is not. Oh, I won't go into it, that's a totally different subject. Creation is continuous, it's not just creation and the end. We'll talk about it Saturday, Sunday, if we have time.

So to have an insight into things, there must be freedom from memory, that's the conditioning. The brain that is programmed, as we are, cannot have insight. It may have slight, partial insights, which the scientists have; it's partial. Because then the invention brings about other results, harmful, beneficial, and all the rest of it, you follow, all that takes place. But total insight is to be free of conditioning of the brain and that freedom, total freedom gives you a complete holistic insight.

5th QUESTION: What is the responsibility to ourselves and to others?

I don't quite understand the question. We have to look at the question. Responsibility, what do you mean, responsibility? The word responsibility, which means respond, it comes from that word respond. 'Respond' means it's retrospective. Right? Look at it carefully, I don't know, I'm just investigating the word. I have a responsibility towards my wife. That's what we say. We are looking at the word responsibility. I respond to her in a certain way, and I don't respond to others in the same way. Right? I respond according to my background, of what I have learned about her, and she responds with what she has learned about me. In that response which is retrospective, that is looking back, because she's my wife, I've learned about her, that learning is memory. So the word 'responsibility' implies memory, recognition, the recognition is part of memory, you follow; all that. So responsibility towards her and the responsibility in our relation sexually and so on, sensation produces the baby and together we are responsibility for the baby. We are responsible for its education - superficial education, right? School, college, university if you have the money, or halfway. And so up to a certain age we are responsible for them. Afterwards they can go. And in old age they throw me out, send me to Florida or some place, or old age homes. You know what is happening in this country. The tragedy of it all, you don't see it. And in India there is no Social Security, I was told yesterday, it's the most populated country in the world, India is. It's the size, one-third the size of America, of this country, and population is growing every year at the rate of 15 million a year. There are over 800 million people there. There, as there is no Social Security, they must have children, especially men, boys, because when they grow old, as we all do, the son will look after them. That's the idea of having three or four children, not just one child. You understand? Please, understand the tragedy of all this. And as the boy grows older, gets a job, this has been one of their burdens, to look after their parents, educate their brother, sister. You understand, sir? When they can't, I have known several boys and girls who have committed suicide because they can't manage it any more. They feel so responsible for their parents.

So the word 'responsibility' is very complex. You understand? And are we responsible to ourselves? That's the question. What is responsibility to ourselves and to others. Are we responsible to ourselves? What does that mean? Who is ourselves? You understand, sir? Who is ourselves, who is me? Who is I? Am I responsible to myself, which means - you understand the division? I wonder if you see that? There is a person who is responsible to myself. As I am responsible to my wife, there is somebody inside me or outside me who is responsible to me. It sounds rather silly, doesn't it? Or is there such a person who is responsible? God? Brezhnev? The glorified father in... you follow? You see how our brain works. When we say, am I responsible, responsibility to myself, which means I have divided myself into some entity who is responsible to me. Therefore I am responsible to that entity. Which I have separated carefully, which is myself. I don't know if you have gone into it. That is, the thinker is the thought. Without thought there is no thinker. Right? But we have divided the thinker and the thought: I must control that thought. That's a bad thought. And I must think rightly. Which means I am different from thought. So the thinker is the thought, there is no separation. The observer psychologically is the observed. There is no experience without the experiencer. Right? The experiencer is the experience.

So then what is the responsibility to others? Right? What is my responsibility to you? And what is your responsibility to me? Here is an audience, what is your responsibility to me? And what am I responsible to you? Sir, look at it. I'm just looking at it for the first time. And all this comes out because I really want to go into this question of responsibility. I want to see, am I responsible to you? And you are responsible to me? And if I say I'm not responsible to you, then I'm isolating myself. Right? And if you say to me, we are not responsible to you, then you put me aside. I wonder if you see this.

Responsibility implies division, basically. Right? I am responsible to her, and she is responsible to me, I am responsible to you, and you are responsible to me. That means I have separated myself from my wife, and I've separated myself from you, and you have separated from me. And so I don't understand you, and we don't understand you. We said the same thing, which is, I am the Arab, you are the Israeli. Or if you don't like the Israelis, I am the Israeli, you are the Arabs. I am the Muslim and you are the Hindu. If you don't like it, I am the Muslim and you are the Hindu. So we battle with each other. It's my country, I'm going to protect it; it's your country, and we go to war for each other. It's your ideology and I'm going to be responsible to that ideology and you're going to be responsible to the other ideology. Right? This is what is happening in the world, calling it responsibility, specially the elite. You understand? The elite say, we are responsible for the people. Having reached that elitism, the high, and they say, we're responsible. It's all such rot to me, to me personally because we are one human being. You go through all kinds of travail, so does the other human being, psychologically. They have shed tears in India, and they have shed tears in Europe, and you've shed tears here. Right? Tears are common to all of us, like laughter. You have destroyed the whole Red Indian culture here, wiped them out. That's your holocaust. Yes, sir, face it. And this has been going on from the beginning of time. And responsibility implies duty. Duty, I must do this. Duty to my country. Duty to my ideal. Sir, look at all this.

So, is it possible to live without division? Is it possible to live with my wife, if I have a wife, without any sense of division between her and me? Not common ambition. You understand? If it's common ambition, then it's again a division. If it is each one of us is fulfilling ourselves, again a division. I wonder if you see all this.

So is it possible to live without any nationality? The speaker has both a diplomatic and Indian passport. The Government of India gave me that, I don't know why but they gave it to me. And it's a bore having certain forms of paper, crossing the countries. And that doesn't make one an Indian, paper. You understand? So is it possible to live without a single nationality? Without being identified with any country? Because it's our earth, not your earth and my earth. Is it possible to live without any identification with any religion? Think it out, sirs, don't just agree or disagree. Or identified with any group, any organization, any institution - which doesn't mean you are withdrawing from the world, isolating yourself. On the contrary, because then you are the entire humanity. Not just the idea of it, but the feeling of it, the religious feeling of it, that you are the entire humanity. I am my brother's keeper. Not that it means I am going to interfere with the poor chap, tell him what to do.

So sirs, this is the last question and answer meeting. There are several questions left here, I can't go through them now. If one may ask, what have you received from all this? I am asking this most respectfully and humbly, it's not aggressively put, this question.

What does one, after listening to some facts, not ideas and theories and opinions and judgments, what has one captured, received - not help - seen for oneself? Right, sirs, that's all.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 18TH MAY 1985

It's a beautiful morning, isn't it? And I hope you are enjoying yourself. We have this morning's conversation between you and the speaker and also tomorrow morning. We have to go into various subjects or various problems. We're going to talk over together the whole question of pleasure, sorrow, death, and what is it that human beings throughout the world have sought beyond the physical daily troublesome, boring, lonely life, what is there beyond, not only for the individual, but the whole of humanity? What is there that is not touched by thought, that has no name, that may be eternal, that is lasting, enduring?

So we are going to talk over all these matters, including meditation, perhaps yoga too. Everybody seems to be terribly interested in yoga. They want to keep young and beautiful. Shall we begin with that? I thought you would be interested in it. (Laughter) Yoga has now become a business affair like everything else. There are teachers of yoga all over the world, and they are coining money, as usual. And, yoga at one time, I've been told by those who know about this a great deal, it was only taught to the very, very, very few. Yoga doesn't mean merely to keep your body healthy, normal, active, intelligent. But also it meant, the meaning of that word in Sanskrit means 'join together.' Joining the higher and the lower. I don't know who joins it, but that's the tradition. And also there are various forms of yoga. But the highest form is called raja yoga, which is the king of yogas. There that system, or that way of living was concerned not merely with the physical well-being, but also much more strict psychologically. There was no discipline, no system, nothing to be repeated day after day. But to have a brain that is in order, that is all the time active but not chattering, but active, that activity - the speaker is interpreting all this. Probably they wouldn't tell you all this. The speaker has talked to various scholars, pundits, real yoga teachers. There are very few of them now.

So to have a very deep, orderly moral ethical life, not just merely take various postures but to lead a very moral, ethical, disciplined life, that was the real meaning of the highest form of yoga. Thereby you kept the body healthy. Body was not first, of primary importance. What was of primary importance was to have a brain, a mind, a well-being, that is clear, active, not in the sense of movement, but in itself active, alive, full of vitality. But now it has become rather shallow, profitable and becoming mediocre. The speaker was taught - oh, many years ago - something that could not be taught to another. Let's leave it at that, shall we? Is that enough talk about yoga? Or you want me to tell you what I was taught? (Laughter) I'm sorry, I can't tell you. (Laughter) It's not to be taught to the casual. It is something that you do, perhaps every day, as the speaker does for an hour, to have perfect control of your body. So that you are watchful - I won't use the word 'control,' but to watch your body, not make any movement, any gesture, which is not observed. There is no unnecessary movement of the body. But it's not controlled. That's where the difference is. May we drop this subject and go on to something else? I know you are reluctant, because you think, perhaps you may consider yoga to be something to be practiced day after day, to develop your muscles, have a muscular body. It's not that at all. It is something you live all day long. Something you watch, observe, be clear about.

We were talking about the other day, the other Saturday and Sunday, the question of guilt, being psychologically hurt, wounded, and the various forms of relationship. Not only with human beings, with each other, but also our relationship to nature, to all the beauty of the world, to the mountains, to the meadows, to the groves, and the hills and the shadows, the lakes and the rivers. To have a relationship. We talked a little bit about that relationship too. Where there is an image made by thought between you and the mountain, all the fields and the flowers, as one makes an image about one's wife or husband and so on, that image prevents one from having complete relationship with another.

And our relationship with each other now, between you and the speaker, that relationship is very important to understand. He is not persuading you to any point of view. He is not putting any kind of pressure, so that you listen, accept or deny. He has no authority. He is not a guru. He has an abomination of all this idea of leadership psychologically or spiritually, if I can use that word. It's an abhorrence to him. And he really means it. It's not something to be taken lightly, that the speaker pretends. That's why one has to be extremely honest in all this.

And we talked about the activity of time. We went into it fairly clearly. And also the movement of thought. What is thinking. We talked about that too. Do you want the speaker to repeat it again? Please tell me. If it's not clear the speaker has got a great deal of patience about it. Perhaps I won't even use the word 'patience.' So we talked about all that, had a conversation between you and the speaker. Therefore that conversation is carried on mutually. It isn't one-sided conversation. And also we said the world is made up of bullies - the religious bullies, the newspapers, the politician, the guru, the priests, the bullies in the family. And those bullies make us feel guilty, they attack first and then you have to defend. That's the game that has been going on in our relationship with each other and so on. So that brings about this feeling of guilt. We talked a great deal about it.

And also we talked last Sunday about fear. Why human beings who have evolved through these many, many, many millennia, live with this terrible burden called fear. That fear is a sensation. And sensation takes many forms - the sensation of drugs, alcohol and so on, the sensation of sexuality, the sensation of achieving something - climbing the ladders, either mundane ladder or the so-called spiritual ladder.

We talked also what is the relationship between time and thought. Or are they one? And we went into that and also what is the root of fear? And we have many, many fears, which destroy not only the human capacity, distort the brain; distort or curtail or limit both biological and psychological activity. What's the root of it, root of fear? We went into it. We said the root of fear is time and thought.

One can listen to all this casually or seriously, listen to each other's conversation. But the words are not the thing. Fear is not the word. Or the word may create the fear. You understand? The word may create the fear or there is fear by itself. Right? Please understand. The word is the picture, the idea. But the fact of fear is quite different.

So one has to be clear that the word is not inducing, cultivating fear, and then overcoming that fear, which means overcoming the word but not the fact. You are following all this? And we said one has to face this fact. And how one faces this fact is all-important, not the fact, but how you approach it, how you come to it. If one has conclusions, concepts, how to get over fear, how to suppress it, or how to transcend it, or go to somebody who will help you to overcome that fear, then that fear will continue in different forms. It may be one day you are frightened of something, the next day another. And out of this fear we have done terrible things to mankind. We have done terrible things to each other. Out of this fear of not wanting security, or having security, we have destroyed human beings by the million. The last war and the previous war showed it. Where there is fear there is god.

And all the comfort that one derives out of illusion. But when there is psychological security and therefore biologically, not the other way around - it's not physical security first and then the psychological security after. The socialists, the communists, the radicals, so-called radicals, have tried to establish order outside. As the communists are trying to do, the totalitarians. And they're not succeeding. They are only suppressing. But if one starts to understand this whole psychological structure of every human being, of oneself, then one begins to understand the nature of fear. And it can be ended if we understand the nature of time, thought, which we went into.

And we ought to talk over together this morning, as it's such a beautiful morning, what is beauty. Are you interested in this? What is beauty? The speaker is putting you that question, and you must reply. Not all of you, that's impossible, or even one. What would be your reply, if one may ask respectfully, what is your response to that question? What is beauty? Is it in the mountains? In the shadows? In the dappled light under these trees? Is it a sheet of water still in the moonlight? Or the stars of a clear evening? Or the beautiful face - well-proportioned, having that weight and beauty inward? Or does it lie in the museums, the pictures, the statues? There is a marvellous statue in the Louvre in Paris. The statue of the Victory of Samothrace. It's a marvellous statue. And is that beauty? Someone should ask this question. Not the beauty in a magazine, is that beauty? A beautiful woman, carefully made up, etc., etc. Is that beauty?

So one should ask this question of ourselves. Because man, woman, are seeking this thing all the time. That's why museums become important because in ourselves we are so ugly. Not sinful, that's a wrong word to use. We are so broken up, fragmented, we can never see something whole, holistic way of living. And we think beauty is out there, in the pictures, in a lovely poem of Keats, or in marvellously written literature. So what is beauty? Are you waiting for the speaker to explain? Or, have you ever asked of yourself? Or, are you seeking for the experts to tell you? Can we go into it together? Not that the speaker wants to convince you, show you, tell you anything! That's very important to understand. He has not authority. He is not a public figure. He hates all that ugly reputation, success, becoming somebody. Then you can threaten that somebody. You understand? But it's not like that. We are two human beings, talking over together our whole complex problem of existence. So what is beauty? Is beauty love? Is beauty pleasure? Is beauty something that gives you an elan, a sensation?

Ah, you say, how marvellous, how beautiful that picture is. So what is beauty? May we go into it together? Together.

When you see those hills behind there and the blue sky and the line of those mountains against the sky, and see some of the shadows on the sunburned grass and the shady trees, when you look at it, not verbalize it immediately but when you look at it, or see a great mountain full of snow, high peaks, and a sky that has never been polluted - when you see this majesty of a mountain, what takes place? Does the majesty of that mountain, the enormous solidity of it, the greatness of it, what happens at that second you see that mountain or that hill and those shadows or these dappled light under these trees? For a second, the greatness of the mountain drives away all our pettiness, all our worries and problems and all the travail of life, for that second. Then you become silent and look. Right?

Take a boy, - small boy or a girl, they have been running about all day long, shouting and, you know, being a little bit naughty, which is nice. But parents don't like them to be that way. What happens to their naughtiness when you give them a lovely toy, complicated toy? Their whole energy is concentrated in that toy. They are not naughty. Until they break that toy. (Laughter) Then the whole begins again. That is, the toy - please listen to this, together we are talking - that toy absorbs the child. The toy becomes all-important. He loves it, he holds it, he kisses it, you follow? You have seen teddy bears worn out. And all that naughtiness has gone because the toy has absorbed the naughtiness, the toy becomes important. Right? You know this if you are mothers and fathers. And the toy is the television, unfortunately.

So the mountain absorbs us for the second. That's our toy. And we forget ourselves. Right? This is actuality. If you see a marvellous statue; not only Grecian statues, but the ancient Egyptian ones. Their extraordinary sense of earth, fullness, richness, stability, dignity. For a second, for a moment their dignity, their immensity drives our pettiness away.

So we are absorbed by the toys. The grownups too. It's maybe their business, their chicanery in politics. So all these things absorb us. And if there is nothing to absorb you, then you get depressed, try to escape from it, do all kinds of things to run away from what we are.

So is not beauty something that takes place when you are not? You understand? When you with all your problems, with your anxieties, insecurity, whether you are loved or not loved; when you with all these psychological complexities are not, then that state is beauty.

And this is one of the problems of meditation: to cultivate, practise, day after day, to see that you are not. And who is the entity that is practising? You understand? It's the same old toy. Only you call it meditation. So where you or K are not, there is beauty. As we said, beauty is not pleasure, it's not sensation.

So we ought to talk over together pleasure because for us pleasure is an extraordinarily important thing. The pleasure of a sunset; the pleasure of seeing somebody whom you like enjoying himself. So we ought to talk over together the whole concept of pleasure. Because that's what we want, if you are honest. And that's our difficulty, we are never seriously honest to ourselves. But we think to be so terribly honest to oneself may lead to further trouble, not only for yourself but your husband, wife, and all the rest of it. So to understand the nature of fear, guilt, relationship, and all the movement of our daily life one has to look at it very closely, not control it, shape it, and say, this must go that way or that way. But to look at it first, without fear, without being depressed or feeling that you must do something about it.

So we are going together to enquire what is pleasure. To possess a beautiful car! Or have lovely 12th century furniture; to polish it, to look at it, to evaluate. There is a furniture in England, in a particular room, it's about 16th, 15th century. And one has paid a great deal of money for it. And it gives you, watching it, great pleasure. Then you identify yourself with that furniture. Then you become the furniture, because whatever you identify yourself with, you are that. It may be an image, it may be a piece of furniture, it may be a man, woman, or it may be some idea, some conclusion, some ideology. And all the identification with something greater or something which is convenient, satisfying, doesn't give you too much discomfort, that brings us a great deal of pleasure.

And pleasure goes with fear. I don't know if you have watched it. It's the other side of the coin. But we don't want to look at the other side. But we say to ourselves, pleasure is the most important thing, either through drugs, which is now becoming more and more in this country - opium, cocaine, alcohol. You know all that, what is happening in the world, especially in this country, which breeds certain irresponsibility, gives you for the moment certain elan, energy, quietens the brain probably and dulls the brain, and ultimately destroys human beings. You have seen all this on television. If you haven't seen all this, you know of somebody and so on. We start with pleasure, and end up in ruination. And pleasure of possessing something, the woman or the man; pleasure of power - you understand - over somebody, maybe over your, if have domestic help, over that person, or your wife or husband or something or other, we want power. Right? Let's be quite honest about all this. We admire power, we extol power, we idolize power. Right? Whether it is spiritual power of the religious hierarchy, or the power of a politician, power of money. To the speaker power is evil. That's why followers are... who want power through knowledge, through enlightenment, you know all that rot they talk about. Not that there is not enlightenment, but rot, the stupidity, nonsense that they talk about. That gives them power.

Which is, if we may go on with it, our education, televisions, our environment, ambience, all that is making us mediocre. We have read too much of what other people say. The word 'mediocre' means 'going up the hill halfway and never reaching the top.' Not success, success is utter mediocrity. Sorry to talk emphatically about all these matters. If you don't want to listen, it's all right too. You are not entertaining the speaker, or he is entertaining you. These are all terribly serious matters. And we give power to others because we ourselves lack power, position, status, therefore we hand it over to somebody else. And then we worship that, adore it, or idolize it. And we have lived that way for millennia.

So power, identification, having security, money, and feeling that money will give you freedom, which is not freedom at all. You can choose, in freedom you can choose what you want or what you like; is that freedom? I do not know - one does not know if you have gone into this question of freedom, what does freedom mean?

Not in heaven. Do you remember that joke - may I repeat a joke? (Laughter) Two men are in heaven with wings and halo, all that. One says to the other, "If I am dead, why do I feel so awful?" (Laughter) Have you got it? So all forms of pleasure are part of our life. It has become more and more sensational - it is becoming noisy, vulgar, mediocre. And so we go on with our pleasures, and in its wake comes fear. So unless one understands this activity of sensation, fear and pleasure will go on.

What is sensation? If one may go into it now. The actual meaning of that word is, 'the activity of the senses.' Right? Either that activity of the senses is partial, which it always is, or all the senses are fully awakened. You understand? When it is partial, it's limited. Right? You want more and more and more and more. And 'the more' means that the past sensation has not been sufficient. You want some more of it, go to different schools of thought, go from one sect to another. You've seen all this in this country, and elsewhere. So is there a holistic activity for all the senses - you understand my question? You understand? I am asking you a question. Our sensations are limited. And you take drugs and all the rest of it to have higher sensation. It is still limited because you are asking for more. When you ask for 'the more' there is always 'the little', therefore it's partial. Right? Simple. So we are asking, is there a holistic awareness of all the senses, therefore there is never asking for 'the more'.

I wonder if you follow all this? Are we together in this, even partially? And where there is this total, fully aware of all the senses, awareness of it - not you are aware of it, the awareness of the senses in themselves - then there is no centre in which there is an awareness of the wholeness. You understand? When you look at those hills, can you look at it not with only visual eyes, optic nerves operating, but with all the senses, with all your energy, with all your attention? Then there is no 'me' at all. Then when there is no 'me' there is no asking for more, or trying to become better.

Then we ought also to talk over together what is sorrow. You understand? All these are related to each other: guilt, the psychological wounds, which most people have. And what are the consequences of those psychological wounds, the vanity of one's own cultivated intelligence, which gets hurt, and the images that one has built about one's self, that gets hurt, nothing else. We went into all that. And we talked about relationship. We talked about fear, pleasure. They are all interrelated, they are not something to be taken bit by bit or separated and say, "This is my problem", and stick to that. If you say, "I can solve that, I don't mind the rest", but the rest remains there. So can one see this whole movement, not just one movement?

So we want to talk about sorrow. This is an immense subject. It brings tears to one's eyes. Not the words; the word 'sorrow' has been in the minds of men and women from the beginning of time. This feeling of sorrow, and sorrow has never ended. If one travels, especially in the Asiatic world or in Africa, this immense poverty, immense. And you shed tears or do some social reform, or give them food, or give them clothes and all the rest of it. But there is still sorrow there. And there is the sorrow of someone whom you have lost. You have their picture on the mantelpiece, or the piano or hung on the wall; and you remember it, look at it, shed tears, and all the memories connected with that picture. One sustains, nourishes, continues loyally with that picture. That picture is not the person. That picture is not the memories. But we cling to those memories, and that brings us more and more sorrow. And the sorrow of those people who have very little in their life, not only money, few sticks of furniture, but also ignorance, not the ignorance of something great, but the ignorance of their daily life, of their having nothing inside them - not that the rich people have either, they have it in the bank account, but nothing inside. Look at all this.

And there is the immense sorrow of mankind which is war. Thousands, millions have been killed, and if you have seen it in Europe, thousands of crosses all in straight line. How many women, men, parents have cried, not only in this country, every community, every country, every state. Have we realized that historically there have been wars every year? Tribal wars, national wars, ideological wars, religious wars. In the Middle Ages they tortured people, burnt them, they were heretics. You know all this, if you have listened, if you have looked.

And from the beginning of man or woman the sorrow has continued, in different forms: poverty of sorrow, poverty of ignorance, poverty of not being able to fulfil your desires, poverty of achievement - there's more to be achieved.

And all this has brought immense sorrow, not only personal sorrow, but also the sorrow of humanity. In Cambodia, what is happening there. What's happening in Russia. In the totalitarian states. We read about it, we never shed a tear! We are indifferent to all this because we are so consumed by our own sorrow, our own loneliness, our own inadequacy. So we are going to ask ourselves, is there an end to sorrow, ending, not what happens after sorrow?

After the ending. Is there an end to our personal sorrow, with all the implications of it: ugly face - I won't call them ugly, it's a face you don't like? You know the whole business of all this. And one asks, if one is at all serious, involved, committed to find out, is there an end to sorrow? And if there is an end, what is there?

Because we always want a reward. Something - if I end this, I must have that. We never end anything by itself, for itself per se. So can this sorrow end? Which means, can there be sorrow with love?

Let's go into it. I love my son. If I have a son or daughter, I love them. And they become every kind of human being: drugs, you know the whole process of it. And I cry. And I call that sorrow.
What is the relationship of sorrow to love? You understand my question? I am asking you, please find out. We know what sorrow is: great pain, grief, loneliness; sense of isolation. My sorrow is entirely different from yours. In the very feeling of it I've become isolated. We know, not only verbally but in the depth, the feeling, inward feeling in our very being we know what the meaning of that word is. And what is the relationship of sorrow to love? Then we have to ask, what is love? You are asking this question, not the speaker. What is love? When one asks that question, does one come to it positively, in the sense, 'love is this', give it certain definition, verbal definition, or inward definition, and stick to it?
Love of god, love of books, love of trees, love of a dozen things.
So what is love? Have you ever asked this question? If you have, is it sensation - sexual, reading a lovely poem, looking at these marvellous old trees. Is love pleasure?

Please, we must be terribly honest to ourselves, otherwise there's no fun in this. Humour is necessary, to be able to laugh, to find a good joke, to be able to laugh together, not when you are by yourself, but together. And we are asking ourselves, what is love? Is love desire? Is love thought? Is love something that you hold, possess? Is love that which you worship? You understand, worship - the statue, the image, the symbol. Is that love? The symbol, the statue, the picture, is put together by thought. Your prayers you put together by thought. Is that love? Please, go into it for yourself. And when one realizes all that is not love - your pleasures, sensations, having a good cigar, good meal, well-clothed, with good taste. So is pleasure, desire - of course fear is not, obviously, love. Have you ever looked at hate? If you hate, you dispel fear. Yes, sir. If you really hate somebody there's no fear. Right? I hope you don't.

So can we through negation of what is not love, negate completely in oneself, totally put aside entirely all that which is not love? Then that perfume is there. And that perfume can never go once you have put aside completely those things which are not love. Then love, which goes with compassion, has its own intelligence. It's not the intelligence of thought, not the intelligence of the scientific mind, brain. When one has that love, that compassion, there is no grief, no pain, no sorrow. But to come to that - or not you, you can't come to it, sorry - it's there when you negate everything that is not. Not the beauty of an architect, which has put stones together. If you have seen those cathedrals, the temples and the mosques, they're all put together by thought and pleasure, or devotion, worship. Is all that love? If there is love, then you will never kill another. Never! You'll never kill another animal for your food. Of course, please, go on eating meat if you want to, I'm not telling you.

So it's an immense thing to come upon it. Nobody can give it to another. Nothing can give it to you. But if you, in your being you put aside all that which is not, all that which has thought put together: the rituals, all that thing that goes on, the special dresses. When you with all your problems are totally empty, then the other thing is, which is the most positive thing, most practical thing. The most impractical thing in life is to build armaments, to kill people. Isn't it? That's what you are spending your tax money on. So I'm not a politician, so don't listen to all this. But see what we are all doing. And what we are doing is the society which we have created. That society is not different from us. We may reform the society, lots of us are doing it, the socialists, the capitalists, especially the Communists tried to organize outside.

So love has nothing to do with any organization, or with any person. Like the cool breeze from the ocean, this breeze, you can shut it out or live with it. When you live with it, it's totally a different dimension. There is no path to it. There is no path to truth, either yours or mine. No path whatsoever: Christian, Hindu, sectarian. So one has to live it. You can only come to it when you have understood the whole nature, psychological nature and structure of yourself.

We ought to talk over sometime, tomorrow perhaps - it's now twenty to one, yes, it's twenty to one - do you want to talk over together death, or wait 'til tomorrow. This is not an invitation for you to come to tomorrow. Whether you come, don't come, it's totally indifferent to the speaker. That's a very, very complex problem, death. Death is not a sensation. Do you want the speaker, together, to go into all this now?

Audience: Yes.

K: Are you quite sure?

Please - we are asking this because this is a very, very serious matter. All that we have talked about is very, very serious. We have time to go into it. You understand? We went through all this very detailed, we can go into these things during six talks and all the rest of it, any number of talks, any number of conversations. But to talk about death, it's not a morbid subject. It's not something to be avoided. Something at the end of one's life. I think we'd better wait 'til tomorrow. Because, just a minute, sir, just a minute, listen to what the speaker has to say.

If you have lived the thing that we have been talking about - you follow? - you must come to all this delicately, gently, quietly, not out of curiosity. You must come to it hesitantly, delicately, in a sense with great dignity, with inward respect. And like birth it's a tremendous thing. And to talk about death also implies creation - not invention. Scientists are inventing, because invention is born from knowledge. Creation is continuous. It has no beginning and no end, it's not born out of knowledge. And death may be the meaning of creation. Not having next life a better opportunity, a better house, better refrigerator. It may be a sense of tremendous creation, endlessly, without beginning and end. And to talk about it - you understand - after an hour and twenty minutes, after an hour and ten minutes or five minutes, doesn't matter, it requires your attention, care, a sense of delicate approach to it.

So may we, most humbly I am asking you, respectfully, can we go talk it about it tomorrow morning, when we'll have probably more energy?

J. KRISHANMURTI OJAI 4TH PUBLIC TALK 19TH MAY 1985

One hopes that you haven't come out of curiosity. In spite of the articles that have appeared in magazines and newspapers, they're just words. Don't be enticed by those words. If one may suggest. Don't please be impressed by the reputation, by the age, by all that has been written and talked about. Because we are talking over together, not that the speaker is important. The personality has no value at all in this world. But what we are going to talk over together has importance. And as the world is in such a state, we ought to be serious. We ought to be quite earnest about what we think; why we think; what our prejudices are; why we belong to a particular sect or group; why have we certain ideologies; why do we pursue what merely pleases us, what we like and dislike, what appeals to us, what is attractive to us.

If we could this morning at least, for an hour or so, if we could put aside all that, which is quite arduous, because we only function in the particular routine, according to our opinions, judgments, evaluations. Which may be right or wrong, but we never question them. We never question our beliefs, our ideals, our faith, why we have all this. One thinks it's important especially not to be persuaded by the speaker, not to be impressed. This is not a gathering which will stimulate you, excite you, intellectually, emotionally, or ideologically. For the speaker, it's very important to look at all this travail and sorrow of mankind. If we are here together, to be very honest to ourselves, there is no self-deception, no coming to any definite conclusion, but investigating, moving, going further. Then we can talk over things together. Not merely listen to the speaker, collect a few ideas, or agree or disagree, but we could this morning put aside agreement and disagreement altogether from our life, at least even for this morning.

Then we can converse together like two friends, walking along a nice wooded path, talking over their problems, not persuading each other, because they are friends, they have known each other for some time. Either those friends are casual, or real friends. If they are real friends in the deepest sense of that word, then there is no barrier between them. They can talk about their intimate problems. Their crises - not only the economic, social, and religious or political, but the crisis in their consciousness, crisis in their lives. And to talk over these things, they must be free. And freedom is very important. Not the freedom to do what you like, which is what we're all doing. Because each one wants to express himself, fulfil himself, be somebody; you know all that self-interest that's going on in the world - whether in the name of god, in the name of church, in the name of politics, and so on.

So we should enquire this morning, amongst other things, because we're going to discuss, as we have during the last three talks and questions and answer meeting, we have discussed various aspects of our life - the conflict, our daily conflict with each other, and daily conflict in oneself, and the terrible things that are happening in the world. They are really terrible, appalling. If you have been in some of these countries, you come directly into contact with all this. Not read through newspapers and magazines and political speeches. The world is in a really grave crisis. We seem to be indifferent to it. And man has been appallingly cruel to other men. Which is war, concentration camps, which are still going on, holocaust, not only during the last war, but this torturing human beings, confining them to concentration camps, killing them for ideologies by the million - not just six million of a particular group of people. China, Russia has killed millions. We are indifferent to all this.

And as human beings we have evolved millennia upon millennia, we are still what we are, what we have been - slightly sophisticated, slightly good-mannered, slightly better-fed, clothed, all the outside medieval dresses of the priests. But inwardly we are what we have been, rather brutal, cruel, self-interest. We are talking this over together. The speaker is not telling anything new. We'll go into what is new and what is creation a little later. But these are obvious facts. That millions are starving, poverty is on the increase, overpopulated earth. You ought to go and see some of all this. Then you will not merely be concerned with your own personal interests. And man, human beings, have always sought freedom. That's been one of their racial, religious, economic and social searches, that they should be free. And that freedom has been abused in the democratic world. Which is, that we are all separate individuals to do exactly what we want to do. Nobody must hinder, nobody must restrain us. That's what we all want to do. And that's what is happening the world over, except in the totalitarian world they are subjugated by the elite, told what to do, what to think, what to paint; what kind of literature, what kind of music, and so on. We are just pointing out all this, we're not taking sides. If one understands all this, not merely verbally, but understands within one's heart and depth of one's being, then we will act. Observing and acting are the same. They are not two separate activities.

So we talked during the last three talks about conflict, psychological wounds with their consequences, guilt. Probably every human being goes through it, or holds in something that has to be held. We've talked about fear. And yesterday morning we talked about together sorrow and the ending of sorrow, and what is love, compassion - which has nothing whatsoever to do with kindness, with pity, with prayers, devotion. All that has nothing whatever to do with love or compassion which has its own intelligence. We were talking about it together yesterday morning.

And this morning we ought to talk over together, please bear that in mind all the time if you will, that we are talking over together. The speaker is not telling you what to think, but what is thinking, not what to think - the right thought, wrong thought, noble thought, ignoble thought, the ideological thought, dialectical thought: all that is still thinking. Put it any framework, in any cadre, it is still thinking. Whether it be the thinking of the right or the extreme left or the extreme right or the extreme centre it is still thinking.

Thinking has brought about enormous good to man. Thinking has produced great technology. Thinking has produced medicine, surgery. Thinking also has produced terrible wars, brutal, appalling cruelties. So what we are talking about is what is thinking, not how to think, or thinking together. When we understand the nature of thinking, not merely verbally or intellectually, but understand the quality of thinking, the source of thinking, really when we grasp it then we can go much further. But merely to remain in the realm of thinking, clever lawyers, shady lawyers, they all think. Whether it is the hermit, whether it is the monk, whether you are related to your wife and the recognition, all that is the movement of thought. Either we think together and therefore form a clique, or belonging together to some ideological state, thinking together to become Catholic, Protestant, and all the divisions of Christianity. I don't know if you have noticed in this little village there must be dozen churches. Oh, I don't know the number, one has never counted them. But it's still thinking.

And as we went into that question, what is thinking? We won't go into it now. If you are interested in it, you can read or think about it, but it's fairly simple, not complicated. That is, all our thinking is based on memory. All our thinking is based on knowledge. Whatever that knowledge be, whether it is great knowledge, accumulated knowledge, or the knowledge of a human being who is totally ignorant, doesn't know how to read or write, living in a little hamlet, poverty-ridden shack, he's still thinking.

So thinking is based on experience, and experience is always limited, therefore knowledge is always limited, now or in the future or in the past. And our memories are also limited, because they're all based on knowledge and experience. So thinking is always, always in the future or in the present or in the past. It's limited. Where there is limitation there must be conflict. If I - if one is thinking about oneself all the time, as most people do - how they look, how they walk, how they behave, what kind of religion they belong to, what is their faith, what is their - and so on. You know, thinking endlessly about themselves or about their ideas and so on. So thinking has divided mankind - Americans, Russians, Asiatics, Indians, Far East, Near East, Jew, Arab, and so on. So wherever there is limited thought - and thought is always limited - there must be conflict, either physical conflict or intellectual conflict or ideological conflict or conflict between man and woman - which is going on now.

So we must ask at the end of the day, observing all this, what is freedom? Can there be ever complete, unbroken freedom? The word 'freedom' means also not only to act freely, to think freely, but also that word contains originally love. Freedom also means compassion. And we have made that freedom, which is a most extraordinary thing, so absolutely necessary for human beings, into a very, very small affair. That is each one wants to do exactly what he wants, or what he thinks he should have. And that limits the immense freedom implied in that word. Freedom is not from something: from my complex or from my prejudice, all that's rather childish. Forgive me for using that word. Freedom implies the end of total, not only attachment, that's again an attribute of one's ego, the absence of the 'me', the absence totally of self-interest. Let's think, talk it over together.

And we are going to talk over together this morning, as we did the previous day, why do we live in disorder? Because we're going to talk over together death. As we said yesterday morning, we are going to talk about it. It's not a morbid subject. It's not something to be avoided. It's not something that concerns old people. It concerns you from the moment you're born 'til you die. It is the inevitable lot of all of us. That's one certainty. There may be no other certainty, no other finality. But death is facing each one of us. We are going to talk about it presently. But to understand that, the immense significance of it, not the fear of it, or how to get over, how to meet death pleasantly - books are being written about it. Lovely idea, isn't it? How to be happy to die. So we are going to talk about it.

But before we do we ought to find out for ourselves, because it may be related, please quietly listen to it. We are talking over together amicably, not persuading you in any direction nor giving you comfort, nor saying, yes, there is something beyond death. Those games have been played by every religion, by every guru, by every crook. (Laughter) Please don't laugh, this is much too serious - not we shouldn't have humour, it's good to laugh, but laughter may be the means of avoiding facing facts. So one has to be aware of that. Not that we shouldn't have humour, laugh with all your being at a good joke. The speaker has collected a lot of jokes - not vulgar jokes, but good jokes.

So we must first consider, as we have in the past, we must go into it a little more, why is it human beings, whatever race, colour, group and so on, why do they live in disorder? What is the reason, what is the cause, the root of disorder? We are asking each other this question. Don't please wait for me, for the speaker to answer the question, because you are responsible for the question. And you are responsible to find out why we accept disorder. Throughout the world politically, religiously, economically and socially there is such vast disorder in the world. War is the ultimate disorder. So what is the root of disorder? Have we ever questioned it? Or are you merely out of disorder, living in disorder, trying to find order? You understand what I am asking? A disordered brain cannot find order. Right? It seems so normal, sane. If I am confused, uncertain, caught in the boredom of life and boredom of doing things over and over again; whether it be sexual act, whether it be ideological - you see our brains have become so mechanical because we have been computerized by the specialists. Sorry there are some specialists here. We have been computerized, I mean programmed by the religions to believe this and not to believe that.

So - I am asking, we are asking each other - is the cause of disorder in ourselves, in our brain, is the cause, one of the causes - we're going to look at it, not say this is the one cause or there are many causes. We have to find out the real cause of it, not the multiple causes or causations. What is that? Why we live in disorder, which we have to face. If you don't want to face it, don't face it, it doesn't matter. But if we are honest, if you want to find out the causation of disorder, we have to enquire - not be prejudiced, not blame somebody for the disorder, or the society in which we live. The society in which we live, we have made it - grandfathers, great, great, great, great grandfathers. And we are making the society through our greed, through our ambition, through our aggression, through our self-interest and so on, so on. This is the society which we have created - the religious differences, national differences, and so on. Because our brains are fragmented, you understand, it's not whole, active completely. It's broken up inwardly, through desire, through pleasure, through aggression and violence and so on. It's never holistic. Is that one of the causes of disorder? Are you following this? Because our brains have been so conditioned, have been so programmed, which is the right word, like a computer. And so it thinks along a particular line, acts according to its faith, to its experience. You follow? Is that the cause of our disorder? I mean, we are examining it. We are observing, questioning, not analyzing.

May we go into that a little bit? We said not self-analysis or analyzed by the experts. Analysis implies to analyze, break it up. And who is it that is analyzing? You understand my question? I am asking you, who is it that is analyzing not only the political, religious and so on, but self-analysis, self-delusion, and say I must not be deluded, I must be honest. So we are asking, saying, it is not analysis because the analyzer who says I will analyze is the analyzed. There is no difference. Please listen to this. There is no difference between the analyzed and the analyzer. They are the same. See the common sense, the rationality of it. But we have separated the analyzer and the analyzed, or rather the thing to be analyzed. Right? So there is conflict between the analyzer and the thing to be analyzed. But if they are one, as they are, then the whole problem becomes quite different. There is no thinker apart from thinking. Right? The thought makes the thinker. But the thinker says to himself, I am separate from thought, therefore I can control thought. You understand? If you once understand really, conflict has a different meaning altogether. So we are not analyzing. There is only observation, not the entity who observes. Right? There is only observing things as they are. But the moment we say I must look very carefully, am I looking rightly, is this right, is this wrong, you are analyzing, separating the observer from the observed. Of course you're not the tree. I hope not. But when you observe these oaks, observe them without using the word I like, dislike, it's nice, it's not nice, all the rest of it. Therefore there is only observation. And that very clear observation without any bias, prejudices, that very observation is accurate. Go into it. So we are observing, observing our disorder in our daily life - the boredom of it, the tiredness, the mechanical part of it, and so on.

So is disorder caused by this division in oneself? You understand? I must be good, I am violent, but one day I'll be free from violence. I'm greedy but cruel, but one day I'll be... That is the entity who says I am different from the quality, then he has to come into conflict with the quality. But the quality is you. You understand this? If you really understand this in depth, then you eliminate conflict altogether, which is the cause of disorder. I wonder if you understand this? Look, I am not different from my quality, from my greed. But I have said, it has been my conditioning, greed is something outside or inside which I must control. Or I yield to greed. But the actual fact is greed is me. I am not different from greed. Vous avez compris, I mean, you have understood this?

So this division, psychological division in each one of us may be one of the major causes of disorder. Sir, you understand this? I wish you would. It's not an intellectual feat. It's not something that you say, well, I'll cultivate it. Just see it as a fact. That as long as there is division psychologically in me, I am different from my quality, I am different from my word, I am different from my image, I am different from violence, that difference brings about conflict and conflict may be the root of disorder. Right? And when there is no separation, as the actor and the thing acting, but they are the same and one, inseparable, then if that is real, true, honest, accurate, then conflict ceases and a totally different movement takes place.

So one of the causes of disorder is the separation between nationalities, religions, you follow? The Hindus, the Buddhists, the Christians, you know all that division that goes on in this world. And without this when there is the cessation of disorder then order is natural, it's not something cultivated, it's not something that you repeat day after day, day after day. It comes naturally, easily, freely. And bearing this in mind, that conflict is the essence of disorder: between man and woman, between God and man (if there is God), between the good and the bad. Be careful please; there is a division. The good is not rooted in the bad. The good has no roots in the bad. You understand this? Good is not the opposite of the bad. If the good has a relationship with the bad, the good is still limited by the bad. Right? You understand this? Go on sirs, move. The opposite, that is violence and its opposite is non-violence. If the good is born out of the understanding of non-violence then it's not the good. Good has no relationship with the bad. This is the actual fact.

So let's talk about death. Because there is still to talk about, after death, what is religion? What is it that man from time beyond time, what is it man sought apart from physical comfort, physical pain, psychological anxiety and so on, he said there must be something beyond all this ugly brutality and vulgarity. There must be something that is not put together by thought. There must be something that is immense, nameless. Right? We're going to find out. We're going to observe and learn about it, together. So there are many, many things to be covered this morning and one hopes that you will have the patience, the energy, the vitality to attend to all this.

Death is something that is common to all of us. So in talking over together about this subject, which is of extraordinary significance, death is not a sensation. You understand? It's not something to be cried over, something to be remembered, avoided, something that you put on the mantelpiece and worship. It is an immense act. So we are going to talk over together that. Man has always been frightened of death. That's a fact. Why? What does death mean? Not what lies beyond death - we'll go into that presently. It is something extraordinary to die. Not something to be avoided, you're going to, you can't avoid it. One may die when one is very young, through some disease, through some accident, through the parents' fault, over drinking, smoking, you know the whole business of this ugly society. And there is death for old age - through accident, disease, senility and so on. So together we are going to enquire into it. Together. Please bear this in mind all the time. We are going to give your energy to find out the significance, the depth of that extraordinary event.

There's two things implied in it, basically. A continuity, and the ending of a continuity. You understand? We have lived 40, 50, 90, 120, whatever the length of time it be. And during that long interval from birth to death we have acquired so many things. Not only physical things: cars, houses, if you're lucky, a field about half an acre. And you've acquired knowledge, experience. You have collected lots of memories. Right? Lots of experience. You have collected, gathered both outwardly and psychological. You don't want to be deprived of what you have collected. What you have remembered, what you have suffered. So we want and we have a long continuity, racial inheritance, collective limited experiences.

We are gathering like squirrels. Right? And to what we have gathered we are attached, tremendously. And that is a continuity. It may be a ten-day continuity or hundred years' continuity, the continuity of tradition, the continuity of identification with a race, with a group, with a family. You understand? This desire, this urge to continue, not only in myself but the inherited collection. If I die there is my son to continue. He inherits what I have collected physically. And also psychologically.

So there is this long, centuries and centuries upon centuries of collecting and continuity. Right? Death comes along, which is, the organism withers. Either we have used it sanely, rationally, healthily, or misused it through various drugs, you know all that's happening. So, the organism inevitably comes to an end. The ending is death. Right? So we must consider what does it mean to end. You understand? Continuity and the ending. We are together? We are talking over together? This is a conversation between you and the speaker.

So there is this continuity which you cling to, and there is the ending of that continuity. We have understood, I hope, what it means to continue. And so we said, I will die, but the next life there is something, I will live next life. Right? There'll be next life. That's the whole Asiatic, Pythagorean and some western people, ancient people, are saying there must be. And the whole of the East more or less believes in rebirth because they want to continue. They have never asked - some have asked - the ancient people, what is it that continues? Is there a continuity at all? Are you asking all this? No, you are not. I'm asking you. Is there continuity at all? And if there is no continuity what is it all about? Why should I collect any more? So I won't collect. Then they become hermits, the Indian monks, and you know all that. I won't collect, only I'll collect one idea: which is my god, my saviour, my gurus, you follow? One thing I've collected, and so I cling to that.

So we know what it means to have a continuity. So we have to enquire into what does it mean to end? End, voluntarily, not through age old, disease and some kind of awful pain - you follow? All that. What does it mean to end anything? Right? Therefore one asks, is continuity creation or invention? Are you following all this? Can continuity ever be creative? Or where there is continuity as knowledge there is invention. Right? That is, invention is based on knowledge. Right? Scientific invention, mechanical inventions and so on. Because there is previous knowledge. Which is, following the same line of invention - gathering more knowledge, inventing more, that's what is happening technologically.

So is creation not just the baby, creation, is it related to ending? You understand? So we're going to find out. Please, I'm talking, you're not joining in this. Don't get too tired, please. So what is ending? Can I end - please listen - habit? Can I end habit tomorrow? Or today? Enquire into it, voluntarily, not through desire, through a direction because somebody says end it, then you'll get a reward and all that immature stuff. But find out for ourselves what it means to end something, easily, happily, without any effort. That means ending not only certain physical habits but the habits that the brain has cultivated to live safely. You understand? End it. That's what it means to die, doesn't it? Because we are a vast accumulation of memories. We are a bundle of memories. Right? I wonder if you see this. Not, I am spiritual and

God and all that stuff - that's still memory. The Indians have their own explanation. Separate atman - I won't go into all that.

So death means the ending. Right? You may not accept it, you may not like it, but that's a fact. You can't take everything with you. You might like to keep it until the last moment - if you've a bank account, and have everything comfortable, you might like to keep it until the last second. We used to know a man who had collected a lot of money, he was immensely rich. And he was dying. And he kept a lot of it in his cupboard. Literally, I happened to be there. He told his son to open the cupboard, to look at all the diamonds, gold and bank account, notes. And he was looking at it happily, and he was dying. (Laughter) And he never realized he was dying, because the money mattered enormously - not that which is contained in that cupboard. So is there an ending to one's deep memories? To one's attachment? Ah, let's take that up.

Is there an ending to your attachment? What is attachment? Why are we attached to something or other - to property, money, to wife, to husband, to some foolish conclusion, to some ideological concept? Why are we so attached? Enquire into it. Let's talk it over together. And the consequences of attachment.

If I'm attached to you, if the speaker is attached to you as an audience, think what his state of brain must be. He's frightened he may not have an audience. He becomes nervous and almost apoplectic. And he is attached to exploit people, to have a reputation. You understand? So the consequences of attachment, if you observe it very closely, whether it be a wife, husband, a boy or a girl or an idea, or a picture, or to a memory, to an experience, the consequences are that it breeds fear of losing. Right? And out of that fear there is jealousy. You are following all this? How jealous we are. Of those in power - you follow? All the jealousy. From jealousy there is hatred. Of course, jealousy is hatred. And when you are attached there is always this suspicion, secrecy. Haven't you noticed all this? I don't have to tell you. It's so common in the world. And can you, if you are attached to something or some idea, some person, can you end it now? That is death. Which means, can you live with death all the day long? Ah, think of it sir, go into it. You will see the greatness of it, the immensity of it. That is, not commit suicide, we are not talking of that silly stuff, but to live with that, ending all sense of attachment, all sense of fear. Which means having a brain that is acting but never having direction, purpose, all the rest of it. Acting. That is to live with death every second, never collecting, never gathering, never giving anything a continuity. Sirs, you don't know, if you do it you will see what it means. That is real freedom. And from that freedom there is love. Love is not attachment. Love is not pleasure, desire, fulfilment.

And we ought to talk over together what is religion. Shall we go on? Are you tired? Would you like to take a breather? It's a very serious subject, is death and every other human endeavour, every human experience, sorrow, pain, grief. This is also a very important question. What is religion? Not the unbeliever or the believer, but from the days of ancient people, they have said, this isn't good enough, the way we are living is meaningless. We can give meaning to life, which is an intellectual process. But the real depth and the significance of life, what is it all about? And so in that enquiry they said there must be something beyond all this. Right? And the word 'religion,' the word itself - they haven't found a meaning of that word, you understand, the etymological meaning of that word. So we must together find out what is true, actual religion. Not the religion invented by thought? Right? Not the religion organized like Christianity or Hinduism or Buddhism. That's not religion. That's just any other big business. Right? I'm not condemning it, I'm just observing. We are observing it. I really mean it, I'm not condemning it. Speaker has no sense of condemnation in him, he just sees these are facts, which we avoid. And we are now facing it. Christianity is one of the greatest, richest things in the world. There is a temple in South India where every third day it has a million dollars. Right? With those million dollars every third day they have universities, colleges, feed the poor, you follow? Do all the regular social things, but that's not religion. Going to church once a week - (laughs) sorry to laugh about all this. Going once a week, confession, accepting the wafer, the medieval dress and all the singing and dancing or whatever you do in all those places. That's what we consider religion, which has absolutely nothing to do with our life, with our daily unfortunate, miserable, happy, unhappy life. It is something traditional, we have been brought up in it, or we can deny it and say that's all nonsense, and become cynical about it all.

But if we are serious, and one hopes you are, even for this morning, what is it to have a religious brain? To the speaker the brain is different from the mind. Go slowly, I'll explain a little bit. The activity of the brain is not only neurological but also psychological. Right? It is the centre of all sensation. It's the centre of all stimulation - sensation, urges, desires. It's the centre of all thinking. And it's limited. It can invent God, it can invent immense space, but it's still in the area of the brain. You understand?

Whereas the mind is outside the brain. Don't please accept this.

Though we have discussed this matter with certain scientists, some of them accept, some of them say, why this poor old chap is just wooly. (Laughter) It's all right.

So look at it carefully for yourself. The speaker is not an authority, so don't accept in these matters authority, for God's sake look at it for yourself. Your brain is conditioned, programmed, educated to be Oxford, Cambridge, here Harvard and so on, distilled knowledge. You acquire from the professor, from the teacher knowledge, and then you pass it on. And the whole activity is within the skull. And therefore however much it may imagine, it is still within the brain. Therefore it's limited. Love is not within the brain. For god's sake, realize it. Right? Love cannot be in the brain. You can't think about love - the love between you and your wife or husband, whatever it is. It is there as sensation. Therefore that sensation is not love. Death is not a sensation. Right? So to the speaker the brain is something separate from the mind. We'll go into it if we have time. You don't mind if I go on a little longer?

So we can see, if you are sane, rational, observing totally impersonally, without any bias, all the things that man has put together as religion, you understand, is not religion. The incense, the rituals, the worship, the prayer, all the hierarchy, the immense wealth of these people, immense, marvellous paintings, the Vatican, tremendous jewels in certain temples in India. Surely worshipping, kneeling, genuflecting, all that is not religion. Don't be angry. Please just listen, observe.

The fundamentalists, the evangelists, the fundamentalists not only in this country, Iran in the Muslim world. And this fundamentalism is growing slowly like some terrible disease in India too. Because it gives them - you understand - a sense of power, position, unlimited. So all that, the preaching, the sermons; all the beauty of a marvellous Catholic ritual. You have seen the Cardinals officiating in Venice or in Rome it's a marvellous sight. It's like a military thing operating, but beautiful. But that's not beauty as we've talked about the other day. So all that is not religion. Right? Intellect, which is the power to discern, the power to distinguish, to see what is true, what is false; that's the power of the intellect. And the world over the intellectuals have denied all this. Not that the speaker is intellectual, I'm just saying. So all that's not religion. Can the brain, which has been conditioned to all this, be free of it? Not tomorrow, now. There is no tomorrow. We went into that. Time - oh, I won't go into all this, no, it is too long. Time is now. So that ends if all that has no meaning, then one can ask, what is religion? Right?

Then comes the whole question of what is meditation? Because meditation and to find out, find out, not experience. You understand? To see what is truth, not my truth or your truth, or the Christian truth or the Hindu truth. If it is mine and yours, then it's not truth. Right? It's mine. I keep it, and you keep it. How can it be? Like love is not mine, and yours. So, truth has no nationality, no religion, no path to it, no system. So we have to come to it, find out. Not I find out, you find out. It's to see it together. And there is this whole question of meditation, awareness, attention. Right?

Meditation is the Indian word which the gurus have brought over to this country. The meaning of that word is 'to ponder over', the meaning, the dictionary meaning. To ponder over, to think over, to inform about something, to meditate. I meditate about the book I am going to write. Or meditate about the picture one is going to paint. But meditation is something apparently different. There is the meditation of the Zen Buddhists. If you are interested in word 'Zen,' it comes from the Sanskrit word 'Ch'an'. And one of the Buddhist priests went to China in the sixth century and preached Buddhism there. And they couldn't pronounce Ch'an, so it became 'zhia', then the Japanese took it over and it became 'Zen'. I've been told this, it may be wrong. You can take it as you please. So there is the whole movement and appreciation and the books about Zen. Then there is the Buddhist meditation, which is very complicated, I won't go into it. And there is the Hindu meditation. Then some people from Tibet have brought over their meditation. And the gurus invent their own meditation. Right? The word 'guru' in Sanskrit means weight, weight, heavy. And also that word has different meanings. Which is, one who helps to eradicate ignorance. You understand? Not the one who imposes his ignorance on others. (Laughter) I'm glad we can laugh. It means several other things, but that's enough.

So meditation, which is now being practiced the world over, is a deliberate act, a systematic practice, sitting cross-legged, breathing in a certain way, controlling your thought, silencing your reactions, holding, controlling, suppressing, or becoming aware bit by bit of your whole body - I won't go into that - awareness, keeping awake, not going to sleep. There are various systems and methods. Some are pleasant, some are unpleasant. Some when you meditate there is a guru who keeps you awake, either shouting at you or slightly beating you. (Laughter) Oh, yes, this is going on. Or you meditate on a picture, on a symbol, or on a poem, just a phrase. Which all implies direction, control, limited energy, forcing. Right? To the speaker all that is not meditation. To the speaker. Please don't accept it. There is a different kind of meditation altogether. Because those are all the result of conniving, manoeuvring. Right? So gradually if you practice all those things your brain inevitably becomes dull. Right? And you can have X-rays and alpha rays and all that kind of thing, and it shows you can do certain things extraordinarily well, but it's still within a very, very limited area. Right? So the speaker is saying - please don't accept this at all. Because it's no value accepting and saying, ah, you are right, you are wrong, this is absurd. Just observe it - conscious meditation is no meditation. Deliberate meditation is like any other form of achievement, in business. Right? I set out, being poor, to be a rich man. What's the difference between that man who pursues money, power, position, and the other fellow who says, I'll meditate to achieve nirvana or heaven or silence? None at all. Both are achieving what they want. Only one calls it spiritual, other calls it business. And we swallow them both.

So is there a meditation which is not deliberate? If you ask that question, setting aside everything, you'll find out. Which means, a brain, if you are interested to go into this deeply, a brain that is free from all accumulated knowledge. Face it. Because all knowledge is conditioned. Right? Because knowledge is always limited. We went into it the other day, why. Because knowledge is based on experience. And experience is always limited - whether it is the experience God, or whatever it is, God is your invention out of your fear, your anxiety, your desire to be secure, to have comfort, to rely, lean on somebody.

So the brain, which has its own rhythm - the speaker is not a specialist on the brain, but he has watched, not only his own petty little brain, but the brain of humanity - and that brain is everlastingly chattering, praying, asking, demanding help, you follow? Tremendously active. And can that activity calm down, become very quiet, still, without any movement, not induced, not cultivated silence? There is a great deal to be said about silence; not now, because it's nearly one o'clock. Silence between noise. Silence between two wars, peace. You understand? Silence between two notes. Between two words. Between two thoughts. All that is not silence. That's not the still, quiet, peaceful brain that is empty of everything that man has collected. And man has always sought from the beginning that which is nameless. He has given it different names, different aspects - here in Christianity it is one thing, in Hinduism it's another. In Hinduism you can believe or not believe, you are still a Hindu. You understand? You need never go to a temple, be utterly sceptical, doubt everything and yet be a Hindu. Marvellously cultivated brains they have. Now it is all becoming business.

So there is a meditation which is not conscious, deliberate. In that meditation there is utter stillness. It is not the stillness of thought. That stillness is not the product of thought. That's why it is very important to understand thought, thinking and all that. And when the brain is utterly quiet then that which is nameless is. That cannot be described, that cannot be given any quality, that is not the saviour, that is nothing, it is something entirely different.

So there is that something that is beyond time, because all time has stopped. That is the really true religious mind.

RISHI VALLEY 1ST TALK WITH TEACHERS DECEMBER 1985

Krishnamurti: There's a word in the English language called 'deliberate'; I'm sure you know that word. The root meaning of that word is libra - to weigh, you know the Zodiac, Libra, with the scales. It means really, the root meaning of that word is libra, to weight, to balance, to take counsel together. To think together, to find out also what is the right. That word contains a great deal of meaning. Deliberate, a deliberate action, a deliberate thought, a deliberate move which means a considered, careful weighing, taking counsel together, not just one person talking. So, if we are to go into all of this, I'm sure you are aware - I'm not patronising - that the world is in a deliberate going down the hill; degenerating. And also there is a great deal of pollution in the air, (except not here). And also there is great corruption all over the world and as educators, as people who are concerned with all this, this side of life, what is it we are going to do, facing all this? Degeneracy, pollution, and corruption. The word 'corruption' comes from the Latin rompere - to break apart. All right? Am I communicating? To break apart. That exists in the world more and more, through nationalities, trade, so-called culture, and the various linguistic and religious divisions. Right through the world, not only social, business, priestly class and all that, but also religions; everything is breaking apart. Slowly. That is corruption. Degeneracy, you know what is happening to all of us, and also there's pollution and so on.

So facing all this, what are we to do? As educators - listen, I'm not going to talk to myself, we're all going to share in this, in our discussion - so what are we going to do? You spend a great amount of energy, enormous energy, in having to deal with student - little boys and little girls - and what is the end result? What are we all doing? I'm asking myself that, I'm not asking you alone. This is really a very, very, very serious question. Don't please be depressed by it. Or feel down and out. What are we doing, not only in Rishi Valley, that's a very small affair. As human beings, living in this world, with a great deal of fear, insecurity, uncertainty - I'm not exaggerating, please - and as human beings, fairly educated, fairly civilised, considerably knowledgeable, what is it we are going to do, facing all this? Facing your own children and the children of others? What is our action? Not merely as educators, but as fathers, mothers, and the rest of humanity. Am I conveying something, yes? I am asking you, sirs, a very serious question. We're going to discuss this; I'm not going to talk all the time. I've done that in Madras and Bombay and as I've just done in Benares, so this is a conversation together, a deliberation together, we're taking counsel with each other, weighing things, going into things deliberately. So don't - if I may most respectfully suggest - don't leave me to go on talking because I will stop after a little, it's no good sitting in silence. Either we sit in silence or we talk together. I can do both, so will you probably.

So, as human beings, not just teachers, not living in Rishi Valley with all its problems, like hot water and so on, and so on - as human beings we are confronted with this issue. It happens, unfortunately or fortunately, K has talked to a great many scientists; a great many so-called philosophers, psychiatrists, businessmen, politicians, and all the crooked world in which we live - not all of them, I haven't talked to all of them, but some of them. And when you put them this question, a very serious and deliberate issue, they back out of it. You understand, they don't want to think about it, they say they will leave it to philosophers, to educators, we will have nothing to do with it. Are we in that position? That we have nothing to do with the future, what happens? We have nothing to do with 'what is'. If I had a son, what is he going to face? Not a good job - I'm not talking about good jobs and becoming a captain, soldier, minister and all that appalling business, but as human beings with all our problems; sex (am I allowed to use that word?), sex, pleasures, and our own conflict, ambition, you know, what we are. And if I have children, am I going to bring him up or help him to educate to meet the world? Or are we only concerned academically? Good first-class academics. Or we're not only concerned with top academics, first-class academic standards, but also something far greater than that. I don't know if you have ever considered - if I may bring this in - they have just discovered in Jerusalem, in Israel, in digging, a house eight thousand years old. Just see the stone walls. And India also is eight thousand years old, or older. So there is India - of course, China is, they say, forty thousand years old - we don't know; but we all like to exaggerate a little bit here and there. So, eight thousand years old, India, Israel eight thousand years old, and Athens comes much later. Seeing India - I am not anti Brahmin or pro-Brahmin. all right? Am I in safe company here? - one wonders, I've asked this question of the Prime Minister, the Education Minister - they're all peculiar, never mind, sorry - a culture, a Brahmanic culture, which has imprinted India very, very, very strongly, what has happened to that culture, however wrong, however right, however true, however false, what has happened to it? You understand my question? Eight thousand year old culture, very strong, it wasn't just a feeble culture. Its footprint was very definite. The sannyasi, you know the whole business. What has happened to it? Is Western commercialism taking over? Please, do pay a little attention to all this; this is all a very serious question.

So I'm asking myself, and I'm sure you are asking yourself, I hope, what's the future for the students and us? What is the purpose of all this? You understand my question? If I have money, and good fortune to be chosen as one of the students here, seven out of one, what are you going to teach me? Mathematics, geography, physics, science, chemistry? You have to do that, for me to face the modern world which is stinking. You have no idea how serious all this is. You are going to teach me that, right? You are bound to. And my brain is conditioned from the very beginning, from the age of five or four or three, to have problems, right? I wonder if you understand this. Right, sir? My brain, as a small child, or a student - it's a problem to write, it's a problem to read, it's a problem to add two and two. So my brain becomes the centre of problems, right? The brain has been engendered, nourished, right from the beginning, to have problems. This is what you're doing, aren't we? And for the rest of my life, till I die, I have problems. I can never solve them because my brain is conditioned. Right? So, problems after problems. My god. Do you understand, sir, what it means to live this way, to the end of our lives. I won't go into all that. So, what are we, as grown up educators, what are we going to do - facing all this, not just A and B? Don't look at me. Let's talk it over together. Start the ball rolling, sir.

I don't know if I may repeat all you've heard, I was invited to go to Los Alamos - do you know what that is? There's a national laboratory of America. Nine hundred top scientists in New Mexico. I was invited. I don't know why. I was invited. And the first question they asked for me to talk about was, if I remember correctly, 'what place has creation in science?' You understand the questions? What place has creation in science? I said, 'none'. They were rather taken aback. I said, creation is not invention. Invention is based on knowledge. And creation is nothing to do with knowledge. That took a whole hour to discuss. Mind you, they are the top scientists of America. And the next day they asked me to talk about 'what place has meditation in science?'. They're very damned learned people. And they handed me a series of questions - fifteen questions. First question was 'meditation and science' and similar questions - there were fifteen of them. And the last question was 'if you were the director of this place, what would you do, knowing you have to consider the safety of the country, the responsibility placed upon us, the National Laboratory, that we have to protect the people, invent new machinery, new submarines, new mathematics, computers, etc., etc. - they are doing all that - knowing all this, what would you do?'. I'm putting this question to you. What would you all do? Don't look at me, please. I said, K said, 'you can't ask me this question at the last moment, on the twenty-fourth hour. We must start right from the beginning. That is, you know, right from man; the origin of man. I won't go into all that. I just played with it for a while. What is life? You understand, sir? What is life? Not, 'what is the origin of life?'. The tree dies, grows, we have babies, so on. What is life? Not the way of living, you understand my question? Life. Sorry, I won't go into that now. You don't mind? So what's your response to my statement?

Q: It seems that it's difficult to see things clearly.

K: Yes .

Q: To begin with.

K: Now, how do you see things clearly? I want to see very clearly what you see. I want to understand very clearly the words you use, the gestures, the face. How do I look at you? How do I hear you? Have I prejudices against you? "Oh, I've met you; he's so and so"? I've already made a background. And that background prevents me seeing things clearly, seeing you clearly. Can I be free from that background - however useful that background may be - to look at you, to listen to you, to see what you are? Not say, "I have talked to him and he's a nut". I'm not saying you are! Can I do that, sir? Can we do that? Or are we so filled with our background, with our experiences, knowledge, and so on, that we can never see anything clearly? Come on, sir, discuss. Ladies are supposed to be great talkers. Not you! Ladies, au generale.

Q: It seems to be too large an issue to face when one talks of the corruption in the world; the breaking up of everything. How does one face it at all, because ...

K: Are you breaking up everything?

Q: In a sense, if one is part of it, yes.

K: Yes. I'm not being personal, sir. Why? Bangalore, Rishi Valley, Madras, Rajghat, leave us alone. Sorry! Are we doing this? And why? You don't mind my talking like this? Sure? You can kick me afterwards! Why do we do this? I've just come from Rajghat - Benares - public meetings and all the rest of it. And there is Rishi Valley, Bangalore, Madras. Why this - I'm not talking geographically or the distance, but why this constant breaking up? Leave me alone; I'm doing something - experimenting - I'm not criticising, I mean it, I'm not criticising. I'm just looking at all the world; you understand? Why does this happen? Is it security? I wish you would talk. Is it security that each one wants?

Q: A certain amount of fulfillment.

K: Fulfillment, which is part of security. Perhaps I'm using a word which includes a lot. So fulfillment, ambition, wanting to do something, please don't interfere. Is that what is happening in the world? Because Rishi Valley is part of the world; Bangalore is not some distant island. Right, sir? I'm asking that gentleman over there; why are we doing this? Why is the world, all around, why is this happening? Tremendous armaments are being built up; I don't know if you are aware of it. On television last year, I think it was on the fourth channel in England, the manufacturer of armaments was saying 'eighty per cent of our production goes abroad'. Getting up and saying that on television!

Q: Sir, are you implying that when I try to find fulfillment in something I am doing, it is directly related to the arms race?

K: Yes. I want to find out. All those ladies, they talk an awful lot all right, don't they?

Q: We're just shy. It's the first time.

K: You're shy. So am I! You may not think so, but I'm a shy, rather retiring person. So if you don't join me, I have ...

Q: I want to ask, taking up from that question, seeing that a certain amount of fulfillment need not - to my mind - need not lead to separation, unless I feel that my fulfillment is threatened by the others' involvement.

Q: There is conflict.

Q: Yes, but I ...

Q: But she is implying something more radical. Whether it conflicts with someone else, or not? Just the seeking of fulfillment will inevitably lead to conflict. I think it is saying something more radical.

K: I don't understand what you are saying, sir.

Q: I said a bit earlier, why the separation of ...

K: If I'm married, why am I separate from my wife? I think differently, she thinks differently. Her ambition is to become Governor and my ambition is to be something else. Why this? You understand, sir? Why this constant breaking up, which is the beginning of corruption? I don't know if you follow what I mean. The word 'corruption', as I said, comes from the Latin, rompere, which means to break up, never a whole, but always breaking, breaking, breaking. And one of the things Radakaji said was fulfillment. Fulfillment in what? We use that word very easily. Fulfilling in what? Fulfilling my desire? My pleasure? My sense of righteousness? You understand, sir? What do you mean by that word, 'fulfillment'?

Q: Doing things, solving problems, creating situations, institutions that will be recognized by ...

K: That means what?

Q: That work, that are good in themselves, and that would be recognized.

K: Go to the root of it; what does it mean?

Q: Being in a situation there are problems, one sees things as ...

K: No, I want to know what you mean by the word, 'fulfillment'.
Fulfil, right. I want to fulfil what?

Q: Sir, I see myself as having certain talents and I see a problem and I see a solution.

K: No, you have a talent, no, you create a problem.

Q: Sir, no, sir.

K: Wait a moment. I'm a good chemist. PhD from ... where?
Some awful little place, right - or big place. And that gives me a sense of position, power.

Q: Eventually, that's the outcome of achieving.

K: No, wait a moment. My ambition says I must. right?

Q: It can be mixed.

K: Go step by step, step by step. I'm asking you, what does that word mean? Fulfilling what? Money? Power? Status? Those are the three things that count.

Q: Sir, it doesn't have to be so crass. It may be something a little more ...

K: Subtle.

Q: ... subtle.

K: But money's never subtle.

Q: Money may not be subtle, but ...

K: Power.

Q: Admiration, vanity.

K: All included when I have power, money, all that is given to me.

Q: I think the implication is that there is a fulfillment in good work.

K: Good work. All right. Fulfillment.

Q: You can justify your life.

K: No, I am asking you, what do you mean by 'fulfillment'? You don't answer that question.

Q: A feeling of having done something.

K: Yes, yes. Righteous, wrong, but I am asking you what you mean by the word, and you go around it. So please, ladies and ...

Q: A sense of satisfaction at having achieved an objective.

K: Yes, sir. Yes, sir. That's understood. Having, being gratified, because you have achieved that. But what? From that you have something else. And you keep the circle going 'till you die. You are not answering. Fulfillment implies a basic, deep desire to do something. What do you say to that? Deep desire. A longing.

Q: Yes, exactly.

Q: Would it also imply - the very word 'fulfillment' - a sense of lack of completeness in oneself?

K: Yes, sir. That's what I want to get at, you follow? Why do we feel the need for fulfillment? You understand my question? The need, not 'I must fulfil'. That sounds so cheap. The need for fulfillment, which implies an emptiness.

Q: Exactly.

K: That's it. A sense of nothingness inside, ah, I must fulfil. Right, sir? Now, why do I feel so empty inside? I've got all the money, a good wife, or ugly wife, or mischievous wife, or a very talkative wife - I won't look at them! And so on. Is there something beyond this emptiness? You understand? This emptiness in me says I must fulfill. I must do. But I'm asking you, is there something beyond this? That's much more - I won't go into it. Sir, would you please discuss with me, what we have been talking about? You spend your energy, an enormous amount, you've no idea how much energy is spent, each day and that energy is consumed by your students and the students are consumed by society, right?

Q: And by us.

K: Of course, of course, that's understood. And also you, you expend tremendous energy, right sir? What for? What for in relation to the world, not just ... So I'm asking, is it possible - I'm just asking these questions - is it possible to bring about a totally different human being? You understand? Not educationally; more knowledge, more independence, more this and more that. I am not talking of that. Better human beings, not that. Something entirely holistic. You are all so silent.

Q: Why did you say, can you bring this about non-educationally?

K: No, you can't use non-educational; you become then a savage.

Q: Not as a result of a whole process.

K: No, I want to find out. It takes a little time, all right? If I'm going to spend thirty years of my life in the educational field at Rishi Valley, I ask myself is the material good enough - material, do you understand; the student, the parent, grandparent, is it good enough for me to expend that enormous energy on that boy or girl? Or am I demanding something which I am not myself living? You understand? That raises a totally different question - I won't enter into that for the moment. Somebody said to me, 'God, sir, what you say is so true, why are you wasting you life on this? Nobody listens to you'. Look at them. They come here out of curiosity, another nut from the East or West, because K happened to have an Indian name, therefore they say he must be something odd. Here a crazy person becomes a saint. In America they put him into an asylum. That's all the difference. So, I'm asking you - please talk to me.

Q: We don't ask these questions.

K: Ask them now.

Q: The question of this transformation of the student.

K: No, don't. Transformation means - to transfer the same being, not transformation, but total revolution. Not Communist, not Socialist, not Democratic, not Republic, etc., but the human brain which has existed for two million years has evolved in the sense, it has evolved but it is still the savage. Right? Still cruel, brutal, self-centred, all that. We haven't evolved from that. We killed a man with a club, now we'll blow up millions, evaporate them, nothing remains of them, and that's called progress. But we haven't changed very much. That's all. So please, I'm asking you - not to depress you, not to elate you; we have got to face this problem in life. You expend lots of energy in a school, as an educator, immense, an incredible amount of energy and, again, there is this terrible society. He has to be married, or she has to be married, and so begins the whole problem of sex, children and the mother is a slave to the child for five years - you understand, sir. If you have money you have nurses, and all that. So what are you all doing? This is not a depressing question, please. On the contrary.

Q: Sir, I think it is not a wastage of energy when we spend so much time with students, even though the students may not receive anything - suppose - but in this process we are learning something in our lives, so it is not a wastage of energy.

K: I see. What are you learning?

Q: Learning about ourselves.

K: Are you?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: How long will you take?

Q: No, it is learning ...

K: Ah, ah!

Q: It has nothing to do with time, sir.

K: Wait a minute, sir. Oh, yes, it has, forgive me. So, hasn't it to do with time? You say, it has nothing to do with time. Hasn't it to do with time? Learning; I learn one day this and I learn another day that. And keep on adding, right? Right, sir? Would you agree to that? Keep on adding.

Q: No, sir. I do not add.

K: Go ahead, tell me.

Q: Learning is always in the present.

K: What?

Q: Learning as things are happening. You be aware of it.

K: Yes, you are aware of it. This becomes an argument. We're not arguing, sir, we're just investigating. What do you mean by learning? This is a general question, sir. What do you mean by learning? I don't know anything but I'm adding - I'm learning. I don't know two and two make four but I'm learning. Right?

Q: That's what it usually means.

K: No, I'm coming to that. This is what happens - not 'usually'. This is what is happening in the world. I don't know chemistry but I'm learning. Which means, I'm memorising. Right? Would you agree to all that? What's happened to all of you?

Q: There's another learning in human relations, when you see something and then you say, I learned something, probably meaning I won't repeat this mistake again.

K: Which means what? Careful, careful.

Q: You're sensitive.

K: No, sir. When you say, 'it won't happen again', it means what?

Q: Something new has taken place?

K: No, sir. Just look. When you say 'it won't happen again', what does it mean?

Q: That I have learned from it and I am carrying the knowledge to the future in order to apply it.

K: Yes, which means what? Learning, as far as we see now, is a continuation of memory, increasing more and more and more. Memorising. It won't happen again.

Q: You're not telling yourself that it won't happen again. It's a feeling.

K: It's a feeling you tell your wife, your father, your mother, or your child. But it's - when you say 'it won't' it's a determination. I won't go into all that. Words. Sir, please answer my question, would you? What is learning? There they are, 340 boys, girls - you are teaching them to learn. Right? No? Why are you all so silent? What's the matter with you? Aren't you teaching them to learn? What the heck is the matter with you? There's nothing wrong. So you're teaching them to memorise - what you call learning, is memorising.

Q: It can also be a sense of discovery, sir.

K: Yes, sir. It may be discovery. For the moment just look at it. It may also mean a dozen other things. But I don't know how to read and write. You send your daughter to the school and she copies; her hand is held and draws, a b c or whatever you do. Which is, you are guiding her hand, helping her to practise, helping her to memorise, to follow that line exactly, which is becoming a problem to me. As a child, I want to go and play! So, learning has now become a process of slow or rapid memorising. Be simple about it, sir. What are you all objecting to?

Q: Because part of us think that it's a little more sophisticated than just slow repetition.

K: Yes, but the greatest scientist is part of this. Memorising. Unless he's got a great log of memory ...

Q: Yes, and things fall into a new pattern.

K: Oh, God, why do you object to such a simple thing? Right, sir? What do you think?

Q: I was only wondering, sir; to come back to what you said earlier; 'what are we all doing here?'

K: But you don't answer me. If I send my child to you, I want him to be good at academics, otherwise present society will see that he's destroyed, right? So, please give me that first. Right? Then, I say to you, 'make him more ...' you follow? Something much more than becoming a BA, PhD, all that nonsense. He must have all that nonsense, but make him something much more. Can you? That's all my question. Help him to become a holistic human being. Right, sir? Not good ...

Q: I have a problem, sir.

K: No, answer my question first. I'm sorry; I know you have a problem. Hold it a minute, sir. Will you, the people who live here who are responsible for educating my son, I say to you, 'Please, sir, I don't want him to be a glorified clerk', which is a Governor - glorified Governor, or a glorified Prime Minister, or whatever it is, 'I want him to be an extraordinary human being, holistic, be sensitive, be alive, look at the birds'. You follow? Take up something much more than bread and butter. And I say, 'Please, there it is'. Don't experiment on him. He's a human being, like you. Don't say 'you can't do this, you can't do that'. So, how will you bring that about? That's my question.

Q: I think the way you are beginning it, the way you have put the question, 'makes my child an extraordinary being', if you come to me I would say, 'look, I don't know what this extraordinary being is you are referring to'.

K: So what am I going to do?

Q: So let's find out.

K: How long? Don't fool around. How long will you take - another ten years, when the boy becomes cynical, already joined a gang and all the rest of it?

Q: What do you mean by extraordinary human being? I mean you can't put pressure on me 'how long?'.

K: Look, old boy: you must have noticed this. Boys and girls up to that certain age are very clever. Smart, alive, watching. Asking questions.

Q: And also in contradiction.

K: But a child.

Q: You must say that.

K: Yes, but he's a child. At a certain age the whole thing goes.

Why? Why?

Q: The idea of responsibility.

K: Why?

Q: I'm telling you why. I've watched it.

K: Oh, God. I'm asking you, sir.

Q: Is it partly because we have not shown him an alternative?

K: What?

Q: He has never known anything different.

K: No, I'm not asking anything different, darling, I'm saying, asking you - you must have noticed boys and girls reach a certain age, gone. Suddenly becomes dull, suddenly becomes totally unaware of things. He wants to become the Prime Minister, or the Chief Secretary or the Governor, or big business. You follow what I mean? The real thing is gone. Why? You never ask these questions?

Q: Because we have not drawn his attention to the real thing.

K: It's not there, at all.

Q: But when it was there, or if it was there, we have not ...

K: Yes, say if it was there. I've talked - wait a minute - I've talked to those children for the last twenty years, thirty years. A couple of boys get up and very smart, bright. I say come and sit beside me and they sit down, and we talk and all that. I come back next year, the same boys are totally different - or the girls. Why? Is it puberty? Is it glands? You don't seem to enquire into this.

Q: Because they have conformed to something.

K: Yes. Why do they want to conform to something? Last year they didn't.

Q: Because they are getting older and the pressure of the ...

K: Is there a way - just a minute. I have asked several biologists and all the others, professional, top people, is there a way of preventing all this? Or is it inevitable? Or is it the natural course of things? You understand? Find out.

Q: Sir, there are a lot of pressures on children to conform.

K: I know that, sir. At the age of twelve or thirteen they don't even know anything about that.

Q: But they pick it up.

K: What makes them pick it up? What makes them feel all this?

Q: Sir, because they have no alternate feeling of anything and we don't give them that alternative way of feeling.

K: I question all you say. Because you are finding excuses.

Q: No, sir. Otherwise why should it become an almost inevitable course, unless you have an alternative? If they saw an alternative which was as vital at the pressure ...

K: Then give an alternative.

Q: But we must give the alternative.

K: You. Give me an alternative.

Q: Sir, but that's the problem. Do I ...

K: Don't talk about it. Give me an alternative route.

Q: Exactly.

K: Instead of following the same old road.

Q: But how am I going to do it?

K: Don't ask how. That's the worst thing you can ask. Then you ... Can we enquire into this? You're all teachers, you're all dealing with children, you're all bored, strained, annoyed, all the rest of it. Is there another alternative? The present is this. Right? Same old bananas. I'm saying, is there another way of approaching the whole thing?

Q: And sir, may I add to that, can I convey to the child sufficiently vividly that he's drawn naturally into that thing?

K: I'm sure you can. If you have the stuff in you. If your brain is that. You follow?

Are these meetings worth it? Don't smile. Are these meetings worth it?

Q: Yes.

K: What have you contributed to it?

Q: When we ask, 'isn't there an alternative?', we are also asking, 'isn't there an alternative to knowledge?'

K: Oh, yes, there is.

Q: Not in the sense that they shouldn't be skilled and so on.

K: First of all, sir, we have followed this road for two million years and we have so-called evolved along that road. You come along and say, 'don't be so damned stupid - there is another way of doing all this'. Will I listen to you? Will you listen to me?

Q: Not unless I can make it palpable.

K: No.

Q: Yes, sir.

K: There is no profit in this.

Q: But there is no profit, so ...

K: Please, this requires no motive, no profit, no position, no power, totally different from this. Not different, different means opposite. Is there something away from this? Will you listen to a man who says, 'look there is a totally different way'? Will you listen to him?

Q: First I will look at him.

K: Yes, look at me.

Q: I might listen to you, sir.

K: Because you like my face.

Q: I have a small confusion. From what you said earlier, it seems that just as you draw a line where man has gone for two million years and then you come and tell him, 'take this path'. From what you said it looks as if the child, up to a particular age, was alive, is on that path, and it is subsequently that you bring him back into this, it is we bring the child back into this.

K: Or, it's a glandular change. You must take everything, sir, don't just ...

Q: Biological.

K: Biological. And if it is biological, can we? Sir, I ask these questions of Radikaji and all the rest of you. They don't know. Probably they never even asked that question. Please, would you mind, I have to stop.

Do you like this kind of meeting? What? Nobody says anything.

Q: Yes.

K: Why? Why do you like this kind of meeting? I'm talking most of the time.

Q: It's starts an enquiry and introspection.

K: Perhaps this is a

Q: It really helps us - or me - look into matters that interest us. I need it as a catalyst.

K: That's why I'm asking you, sir. Is it worthwhile going on with these meetings?

Q: I would say so.

Q: There's no doubt about that, sir.

K: Ask them. All the men on one side, all the women on the other! God, you still are Indians, aren't you! Tomorrow, or when we next meet, you're all sit mixed up! Right? Not all the men on this side, like a zoo! When shall we meet again? You arrange and tell me. Is that enough for today? Bombardment! I've talked to a great many scientists, a great many blah, blah, blah, I've talked to ministers, Prime Ministers, all that rot, and they kind of say to me, 'Oh, I want to learn a great deal from you'. The next moment they're telling me about the Rig Veda!

RISHI VALLEY 1ST DIALOGUE WITH STUDENTS 5TH DECEMBER 1985

Krishnamurti: What would you like me to talk about?

Student: Why are you superior and we inferior? Why do we feel that way - many of us?

K: Feel superior? My god, I never thought about it. Why do we feel that you are superior to the rest of us? Is that it?

S: Many of us feel that.

K: Many of us feel that way. Why? Why do you think?

S: Maybe because everybody is talking about you.

K: Oh, everybody's talking about me. Too bad! But apart from that, why do you think that way at all?

S: I don't know.

K: You don't know.

S: It just comes into our minds.

K: Just comes into our brains. Why? I've been all over the world, which you haven't been. I have been, before the war, the second world war, all over Europe, Australia, New Zealand, Fiji, South America, all over America, Europe and so on, does that make any difference?

S: No.

K: No. Then what makes you different from somebody else?

S: Maybe, we build up opinions about the other person.

K: Why do you have opinions about other people? You tell me why you have different opinions from others. What is an opinion? You are clever boys, come on! Those two sitting up among the mighty! What is an opinion? Why do we have opinions; about me, about each other, about other people? Why do you have opinions, what do you mean by opinions?

S: An image, an idea.

K: An image, or an idea about other people. Why do you have them? You don't know me. Right? You don't know me, do you? I come here once in a while and there is a lot of fuss about it. Right? But you don't really know me. Why do you have an opinion of me? I may be an awful crook, I may be a charlatan, a humbug, anything you like, but you don't know me. So why do you have an opinion about me? Opinion means, a suggestion first. Also it means that you have a preconceived idea about me. Also you have an image about him. According to that image you translate what he says, what he looks like, and all the rest of it. So, why do you have all this? I'm asking all of you, why do you have opinions?

S: Curiosity.

K: Why do you have curiosity about me? I'll tell you all you want to know about me, everything you want to know about me. Right? So why are you curious about me? How I comb my hair, how I brush my teeth, how long I sleep? Right? Do you want to know all that? No, you don't. Be honest, you don't. So what do you want to know about me? You don't know. So, why do you have an opinion about me? Why do you have an opinion about each other. That means, I have an opinion about you and that opinion prevents me from looking at you. Opinion interferes between me and you. Right? So why do you have that?

S: Then, how do you look at another person?

K: How do you look at another person? Look at me. I look at you, why do you need an opinion? I look at you. You have cut your hair up to here. I have combed my hair. You have seen my photograph probably. So what? Why do you have an opinion? Go on, think it out. Are you really thinking or are you just being silent? Can you look at somebody, listen to somebody without a single opinion, so that you hear what he says? Right? You understand what he says; you begin to grasp the significance, the meaning of what another is saying. Right? But if you have an opinion you can't hear. Right? So will you listen to me when I talk? Actually listen? With your ear and listen to what he has to say without translating what he is going to say to you. That means actually listen to somebody. Actually listen. Will you listen to your teacher?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Don't lie, don't pretend. Do you listen to your teacher?

S: Not all the time.

K: Not all the time. Good! When do you listen to them? Don't look at them. When do you listen to them? You four are talking, let the others talk too. When do you listen to your teacher or to your educator?

S: When it suits you.

K: When it suits you. Perfectly right! When it is comfortable to you, when it is nice for you, when it suits you, you listen to him. Right? That's not listening, is it? You know what to listen means, don't you? That is: you hear a sound and that's conveyed to your brain which then translates into the language you are accustomed to and says this is what he is saying to me. Right? So do you listen to anybody? Carefully, not just casually. But do you actually listen to anybody? To your father, to your uncle, your aunt, your mother, your teacher, your friend, do you actually listen to anybody?

S: We listen to you.

K: You are listening to me, why? Are you really listening to me or pretending, saying, "Yes, let's get on with it". Are you actually listening? Do you listen to the birds?

S: When we have no distractions we do listen.

K: You do it when? As a distraction.

S: No. If there is no distraction you do listen to what is said.

K: Why do you use the word 'distractions'? Tell me, you grown up people up there sitting quietly, why do you use the word 'distraction'? You know what that word means.

S: Something that comes in the way of something else.

K: Old boy, I am asking you, what do you mean by distraction? To be attracted, right? And to be distracted. What are you attracted by? Are you listening to me? Is it fun? Are you forced to listen to me? Nobody asked you to come and listen to me, have they? Are you quite sure? Don't look at them. You see the older ones don't talk at all because they are higher up. And you too when you grow up to be a little higher, you will also stop talking. But you don't stop talking amongst yourselves but you stop talking to me. Right? Why? Are you curious about what I want to say? Do you want me to tell you where I have been? Do you want me to tell you whom I met?

S: No, sir.

K: No. You are not interested, are you? These three birds are talking all the time! I'm glad you're talking. But the others keep quiet. Why? I met your Prime Minister, I met the Vice President. Then had lunch and dinner and we gabbled - you know what the word 'gabbled' means? Talked. And we met several other people.

What is a politician?

S: Somebody who campaigns elections, to win elections and to look after the state or country in some high post. Who leads the country, sir.

K: Leads the country. Are they leading the country?

S: No, sir.

K: Then why do you use those words 'lead the country'?

S: Who helps the country?

K: What do you mean the country?

S: The place we live in.

K: What do you mean the country? Which country?

S: Any country.

K: Any country. So are the politicians leading the country?

S: They are trying to help.

K: Trying to help what? Poverty.

S: Trying to help solve problems.

K: What problems? Tell me what problems are?

S: Sir, to solve grievances of other people.

K: Grievances of other people. Right? Have you got grievances? Against whom? I wish some of them would talk. What are you interested in? Do you want to talk to me or shall I go on talking to myself?

S: Sir, I would like to talk about fear.

K: Fear. That is a tremendous subject, isn't it? Are you afraid of something? Be honest.

S: Sometimes I am.

K: Sometimes you are. What do you mean by fear? Carefully think it out, carefully listen to the meaning of that word, 'fear'. Are you afraid of your mother and father? Sometimes.

S: Sometimes when they get angry.

K: Yes, sometimes. Now what is the feeling that you have when you are frightened? When you have fear. What is the feeling? Go on, sir. Think it out carefully. Don't just say anything. When you have fear what is the feeling of it? What is the taste of it? You have tasted bananas, you have tasted various types of food; what is the taste of fear? Especially for the older people, the older students. They are very frightened because they have got to pass exams and their fathers will tell them what to do. Right? You're also going to be told what to do; pass exams, get a job, you know all that. So what is the feeling of fear?

S: You feel like you want to withdraw into something away from what is frightening you.

K: Yes, you see a cobra. There are several of them here, I believe, I haven't seen them, long and rather poisonous. You are frightened, right? And you withdraw. What is the feeling of it?

S: The pain you are going to get.

K: The pain - yes, let's keep to that word. The pain that you might have if a cobra bites. Now, what is that feeling like? You haven't been bitten, but you imagine what might happen or think what might happen, and you have fear. I am asking you if I may most politely, what is the feeling of that? Perhaps the older generation will join us. What is the feeling of fear? Think it out sir, go on. Don't go to sleep, it's early morning!

S: Sir, maybe your mind is troubled.

K: The brain is troubled. What do you mean by that?

S: Sir, you don't understand what you are doing

K: You don't understand what you're doing. Right? You see a cobra on the road, or along the path and you know it is a poisonous thing, right? And you run away from it, or cry, shout. I'm asking you what is the feeling behind that?

S: Sir, you feel slightly restless.

K: You feel restless, you feel anxious. You get frightened. What is the feeling of that being frightened?

S: You feel insecure.

K: Insecure. What do you mean by that word 'insecure'? Go on. Examine it step by step.

S: Without protection.

K: Without protection. You've not been bitten by the cobra, right? You've already preconceived all this. Right? Do you understand what I am saying? You have imagined you might get hurt, you might go to bed, you might die. You get frightened. I'm asking you. You're not answering my question if you don't mind my saying so, what is the feeling of it? What is behind these words?

S: We feel just as if our muscles tighten up and there's a... I don't know how to describe it.

K: You tell me.

S: Just as if your heart has stopped beating and sometimes for people like me it starts beating faster.

K: I don't understand.

Narayan: He says that the heart beats faster.

K: That's what I want you to tell me. The heart beats faster.

N: He says, the muscles stiffen.

K: Muscles tighten. By Jove, come up here, old boy. You don't mind sitting next to me?

S: No, sir.

K: You do mind?

S: No, sir.

K: Then sit next to me. Two monkeys! Heart beats faster. Your muscles contract. And what else happens? Go on, just tell me. You wanted to discuss about fear. That's what I'm doing. Right?

S: You feel like getting rid of it.

K: You want to kill it. All right, your muscles contract.

S: You feel as though a bell is tingling inside you.

K: What do you mean by that? Have you ever been really frightened?

S: Yes, sir.

K: I doubt it.

S: At the moment you want to do something, you want to run but you can't do it.

K: Yes, old girl. But I am asking you something else, you're not telling me.

S: You start fretting.

K: He said to me, the muscles contract, you know, shrink and your brain becomes for a second numb, it doesn't think, it is frightened.

S: It thinks of the past images.

K: It thinks of past images. Does it, at the moment when you are frightened, when you see the cobra or a second later? By Jove, how dangerous it is, you run away from it, you throw stones at it from a distance and so on. But you're not telling me if you don't mind my repeating it, what is the feeling behind it? You know that feeling when you get hurt, you know that feeling when you burn your finger.

You know that feeling when somebody hits you. I hope nobody does, but if somebody hits you. You know the feeling of it. So what is the feeling of fear? Don't tell me, carefully think it out. The feeling. The feeling when somebody insults you, you know what it means. The feeling when somebody flatters you. Right? So you know the feeling of all that. But I am asking you: what is the feeling, the sensation behind fear?

S: You feel frightened.

K: Yes, old boy, I said that you feel frightened. But what is the feeling behind it?

S: Sir, I think it's a feeling of complete confusion.

K: A feeling of confusion. What does that word 'confusion' mean? You see you don't think it out.

S: You don't know what to do.

K: You don't know what to do. Quite right. Go on.

S: You don't know if you do something, it will be right or wrong. You have not had the experience.

K: Yes. So your muscles contract, your brain is confused, there is a feeling of isolation, you know what that means?

S: Yes.

K: A feeling of being completely isolated from others. You're facing a cobra, facing something dangerous, and you shrink.

S: You feel stunned at that moment.

K: That's it. When you have fear, you feel stunned. Your nerves are all shrunk. Right? You feel you're isolated and so on and so on.

Now, just a minute. You feel all that, then what do you do? She asked that question, she said 'talk about fear', fear of passing examinations or not passing. Right? Fear of failure, fear of your parents, fear of your educators, fear of snakes; fear. Right?

You have dozens of fears. Right? Dozens of them. Agreed? Right? Now what causes fear? What is the cause? You understand when I am using the word 'cause'? Do you understand the word, when I use 'cause'?

S: Yes. What is the motivation.

K: What is the motivation? What is the beginning of fear. What starts fear? What is the cause, what is the root, what is the basis of fear? I have used some words, you understand, 'cause', 'motive', the 'root'. Right?

S: You suppose when you think that this may happen. If I don't pass my examination what will my parents think of me? So you think this might happen and so you feel fear.

K: Yes. That is, what will others think of you if you fail your exam. I hope you will all fail!

S: If you think of the future you then get scared.

K: Wait a minute. Stop there. What do you mean by the future?

S: What's going to happen tomorrow.

K: What might happen. Right? If I fail in my examination, and I hope you all will, and you think of the future, what your parents say, what your teachers say. Right? What do you mean by the future?

S: Sir, what might happen? Somebody might hit you.

K: I understand old boy. What do you mean by future?

S: What is going to happen in the past. (Laughter)

K: The past is over! I'm asking you what is the future. What do you mean by the word? Please do listen - this is important for you. What do you mean by the future?

S: What might happen?

K: What might happen. That is, you might - not you I hope - I might get ill, I might be killed, I might be wounded. That is all in the future, isn't it? You might be. Right?

S: When you get scared you think it will happen.

K: Yes. Now wait a minute, what is the future, I'm asking you. Tomorrow is the future. Isn't it? Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Next second is the future, next hour. So I'm asking you: what do you mean by the future? Careful. Think it out carefully. Don't just say something that comes to you. The future.

S: Future is when you don't know what is going to happen.

K: I said that. That means the future: What might happen, what might not happen; I hope it will happen; I hope it will not; all that is the future. Right? You might grow taller, I might grow shorter - might, might, might. So the word 'might' implies the future, a possibility. Right? It might happen. You might fall down. I might get ill. All that is implied in the future. Right? Agreed to that?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Now what is future? That is tomorrow. Today, it is now five minutes past ten, and in another five minutes it will be ten minutes past ten, future. Think it out. This is important for you. What do you mean by the future.

S: What is going to happen tomorrow.

K: Darling, we said that. We said future is what might, might not happen. Future is tomorrow. Right? Future is the next second. Right? So what does that mean? Future. It is too complicated for you.

S: Future is something unknown to you.

K: Is it unknown to you?

S: At times it might be known to you. If you know what might be happening, if you know you are going to get into the college or something, then you will know what will happen to you.

K: If you pass the exam. Right?

S: When somebody tells you what's going to happen, then you know the future.

K: Yes, old boy. We have been through all that when we said it might happen, it's always in the future. Right? Or it may not happen. It's future. It is too difficult for you. So fear means either now, actual fear now or in the future. Right? Are you afraid now?

S: Not now.

K: Why?

S: Because there is nothing to fear.

K: There is nothing to fear. But when you enter the class, here nobody is telling you what to do, what not to do, what to think, what not to think. Nobody is telling you that. Therefore, you don't care. Or you are really listening to find out. Right? No. You're too young, too small. Fear is one of the most difficult things to understand and to be free of it. Right? People have gone to war, killed each other on account of fear. You understand? I might lose my country, I might lose my property, I might not belong to this group, you understand? So war, killing has been going on for two million years. You understand this? For two million years human beings have killed each other.

S: Why?

K: Because he and I belong to one tribe. You and another belong to another tribe. Right? You want our land or we want your land or we want to steal your property - you follow, this kind of battle, killing, wounding, maiming each other has been going on for two million years.

S: Sir, there is division between us.

K: Division. There is India and Pakistan. That's a division, isn't it? So they are willing to kill each other.

S: Sir, but why?

K: Why? Very simple. I'm a Pakistani. He is a Hindu. I want him to become a Muslim. Right? Or I think my country is bigger, nobler, and so on than his country.

S: What do they gain by that, by making other people Muslim or whatever they are?

K: That's just it. What do we gain from it? You answer me. They are silly people. Right? No, listen carefully. This is happening in England, happening in Germany, in America, Russia. It's happening everywhere. This country is a poor country. Right? You go down the village and you see appalling poverty, and yet they are building tremendous armaments. Right? Why?

S: Sir, because...

K: No, listen carefully. As long as you're an Indian and you feel you're an Indian you're going to kill somebody. Right? So nationalism, racialism, tribalism, as long as that exists you're going to kill somebody or somebody will come and kill you.

S: Sir, if you have no nationality, then what do you identify yourself with?

K: If you have no nationality, how can you identify yourself with something. Right? Why do you want to identify with India, with America, with Russia, why?

S: Sir, I feel secure as being a part of it.

K: No, wait a minute. You feel secure. Right? Do you?

S: But then you still have fears of your country being ruined. If you are a part of something, you are an Indian or something like that you always have a fear of people coming and attacking you or saying that you should be what you just said or a Muslim or something like that.

K: I don't understand.

S: She said that, you feel insecure, if you don't have a nationality or if you can't say you are an Indian or you are an American. When you say that, you still have the fear of being attacked.

K: Yes. So you are willing to kill me as a Muslim? You must be an idiot. Why do you want to kill me? Because I believe in some other god? But why do you want to kill me?

S: Sir, to get a good name.

K: To get a good name, by killing me?

S: It seems that you are more powerful after that.

K: You feel happier for killing me?

S: Because then you feel that you are more powerful.

K: You are all rather a crazy crowd. I was invited, if I may talk about it, I hope you don't mind, I was invited to speak at the United Nations. You know what that is?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Yes? Are you sure?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Are you sure you are sitting here?

S: Yes, sir.

K: I was invited to speak at the United Nations, and I spoke for forty five minutes. One of the chief organizers of that body, after I had spoken he gets up and says 'great privileges' etc - etc., 'to meet you sir' and so on, and he says, "I have worked here in the organization for forty years, very hard." You understand what I'm saying, forty years he has worked very hard to create, to sustain, to keep the United Nations going and he says, "After forty years I have learnt not to kill another human being." Do you understand what I'm saying? Are you as dumb as the United Nations? Do you understand what I'm saying? It took him forty years to learn not to kill another human being. Forty years! Do you understand what I'm saying? Are you going to do the same?

S: No, sir.

K: I'm not sure.

S: At least now I'm not going to do it. Now I don't think I'm going to kill another person. I don't know when I grow up.

K: That's right. You will be equally an idiot, will you?

S: I can't say.

K: You're quite right. It's too difficult for you to understand, what is the root of fear. Much too difficult. There is fear, you always control it or run away from it or suppress it or cry. Right? But perhaps there is another way of dealing with it altogether. Do you want to know? But that requires a great deal of thinking, a great deal of investigating. How long do you spend studying mathematics or biology or science, how many years? Years, don't you? School, college, university. All of you spend about twenty or twenty five years going through all that. Right? And you won't even spend ten minutes or five minutes to find out if you can be free of fear. You spend twenty years on some beastly subject and you won't even spend five minutes to understand the nature of fear. That's correct. Right?

So you have to learn a great deal, you have to understand a great deal. What is the root of fear. I will tell you very briefly. Fear is involved in time; tomorrow, might happen. Right? So you have to investigate what time is. That's too difficult for you. Not only by the clock, but what time is. You plant a seed, it takes time to grow. You have a baby it takes time to become an adolescent. One is unhealthy, then to become healthy takes time. Right? You are learning mathematics or physics, or whatever you are learning and to be able to pass an exam in that subject takes time. It takes time for you to get from here to Madanapalle or to your home. You understand? Time is very important in one's life. Not only to go from here to there but also to grow, physically grow and then inwardly to grow. All that takes time. And it has taken time from the first man till now, two million years, called evolution. Right? So your whole life is bound by time. You understand? All your life is bound by time. You're living now, you might die, there is a long number of years. Right? So our whole life is entangled, is concerned with time. You will pass your exams or you might not. Time. Then we have to enquire what is time. It is too difficult.

S: Time is relative; is it not?

K: I know that, I said that, lady. I did not purposely use that word because relative means something else also, "He is my relative". Now just a minute. Time is relative, but what do you mean by time? Sir, there you are, grown-up people who are going to pass exams, who are going to get your jobs, get married. All that takes time. Right? So is man bound forever to time? No, it is too difficult. What do you say, sir? Do you understand?

S: I did not quite understand.

K: You did not quite understand. Look, you are very small now. You will grow up, to be tall, to be..., so all that takes time. Doesn't it? If you are ill it takes time to get well. It takes time to get up in the morning, to get ready, all the rest of it, to bathe and all that - it takes time. It takes time to learn a subject, to learn a skill, to learn to plant a seed in the garden and see it grow. Everything in life takes time. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: And man is bound by time: to go from here to there. Where do you live?

S: I live in Bombay.

K: Bombay. It took time for you to come from Bombay to Rishi Valley.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Two nights or one night or whatever it was. And also to pass your exams, to get a job and all that takes time. So you are bound by time. Clear?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Clear? That means - I won't go into all that. It's too complex for you to understand. Whatever you do is bound by time, which is the past, which says you don't do that, the past says you don't do that. If you do it you will be punished or you will gain. So the past is controlling you now. Get it?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Understand it very simply first. The past is controlling what you do now. I must not do that, you have had the same experience and the past says: don't do it again or you will get ill. The past is shaping your thinking, which means the past means time. So time is shaping what you do now, and the future depends on what you do now.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Clear? Think it out, old boy. Think it out carefully. The past is teaching you, telling you what to do now and what you do now will shape the future. So the future is being put together now, manufactured.

S: At this moment.

K: At this moment. Get it?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Are you sure? So the past controls the present, and the present is shaping the future. So careful, think it out. So the future is now being manufactured. Get it?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So the future is now being formed, get it?

S: Yes, sir.

K: I wonder if you do.

S: Sir, I do.

K: So what you do now is most important. Not what you will do tomorrow. Get it? What you do now is all important because that is going to make your future. Get it?

S: Yes, sir.

S: Sir, is time limited?

K: Don't bother, old lady. Don't ask abstract questions because I can give you an abstract answer, but it has no meaning. Time is always limited. So is there a way - this is much too difficult - is there a way of being free of time?

S: No, sir.

K: Why do you say no?

S: Sir, when one is living there is no way, but maybe after death.

K: Do you know what death means?

S: No, sir.

K: Then don't use that word. Ask yourself a question. Don't try to answer it. Ask yourself. Which is, your brain inside the skull is put together through two million years, conditioned, shaped, moulded, experience, knowledge, all that is there: now can you now do what is right so that it will be right all the way along? You understand my question?

S: Yes, sir.

K: This is too difficult. Right?

S: Sir, what's the true meaning of concentration and attention?

K: Do you really want to know?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Why? Think it out. Did somebody else tell you to ask that question?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Ah, yes.

S: My father told me that you had once made a comment that you need attention more than concentration.

K: Your father told you. Why? You know what concentration is? Listen: I'm your teacher, your educator, you are looking out of the window, much more interesting than the page. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: I'm the teacher and I say: please look at the page, and you don't want to look at the page but you want to look at the bird out there. Right? So he says, "If you want to learn look at the page". And he gets annoyed if you keep on looking out of the window. So he comes up and shakes you, or pulls your ear, or pulls your hair or beats you up. Nobody beats you up here, I hope. No.

So what happens? You want to look out of the window but somebody says, look at the page. So you're in conflict. Aren't you? You want to look out there and you want to look at the page. So you have a conflict. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So conflict goes not necessarily with concentration. Right? I want to concentrate on the page. I force myself to pay a great deal of notice to the page, a great deal of concentration, that means I don't try to think of anything else but what is on the page. In that process there is a great deal of resistance, conflict, because I want to look out there, but I have to look at this page. You understand? So there is a great deal of conflict, a great deal of effort. I won't go into it. Whereas attention has no effort. Whoever has asked you to ask me that question, tell them that. In attention there is no effort at all. You attend.

We have been together this morning for an hour. Do you want to go on?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Ah, yes? Why? It's more fun! And there is a class waiting for you and you don't want to go to the class but you want to be entertained! Right? Have you ever looked at those flowers?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Have you looked at them? Look at them. Take time and trouble to look at those flowers for a minute. Look at them. Look at the mixture of colours, and the beauty of them, the setting of them, the light on them. Now, what does that mean to you? Don't say, beauty or - what does it mean to you? When you look at all that spread of colour and the variations in that colour, the green against the red, the further dark green and all that, what does it mean to you?

S: What does it mean to you, sir?

K: I will tell you in a minute. I asked you the question first.

S: Sir, I feel it means that; why do we want all these houses and mechanical things when there is so much of nature?

K: It is much easier to look at a mechanical thing. But to look at nature, the hills and the shadows, the rocks, the shape of the rocks, the fields, how they are sown, all in line, or mangoes growing, and the birds and the butterflies and the green earth, the shadow, the streams and so on. Look at it, look at the beauty of it, the greatness of it, the majesty of those rocks. But you are all concentrated on books. Right? On books, passing exams, getting a job, getting married and having a house. That's all you are interested in. Right, sir? But beyond the house there is the horizon. Right? And beyond the house are all those marvellous hills and beauty and greatness.

Sir, is that enough for this morning? Yes? Are you going to have a nice day? Have a nice day.

S: Thank you, sir.

K: Enjoy yourself. Right? Tell the class to go to hell! You know I am inciting you? You know what that means?

S: No, sir.

K: Inciting you to blow up. You can't. Don't blow up with guns and dynamite. Have a good day. Right? Have a happy day. It's a beautiful morning. Enjoy it. All right, sir.

RISHI VALLEY 2ND TALK WITH TEACHERS 7TH DECEMBER 1985

K: May I raise a very complicated question? May I? How would you - if you had a son here or a daughter - want to educate them, or bring about an holistic life?

You've got so many students here - capable, intelligent, at least some of them, and would you bring about, through what means, through what kind of attitude, what kind of verbal explanation, would you go through to educate them in an holistic way of living? That is what I am proposing. I mean by holistic: whole, unbroken, not splintered up, not fragmented, as most of our lives are. So my question is, if I may put it to you: what would you do, in what manner would you educate, how do you bring about a holistic way of living, an outlook that's not fragmented in specializations? How would you help them, or educate them to bring this about? Is this too complicated a question? No answer?

HP: Sir, first we must be holistic ourselves.

K: That's understand, sir. But first of all, you are educators here, including myself, if you will permit me. I happen to be in Rishi Valley, I like the place, the beauty of the place, the hills, the rocks, the flowers, the shadows on the hills. I like the place. And I am one of the educators here; parents send me one of their children and I want to see that their whole life from the very beginning of their days, when they come here, I want to see that they live a life that is whole. Whole means good.

Good, not in the ordinary sense of that word, good. It has a special meaning, not the old traditional word good; a good boy, a good husband - that's all very limited, in the verbal sense. But the word 'good' has much greater significance when you relate goodness to wholeness. I don't know if I am making any sense. Good has that quality of being extraordinarily generous; good has that sense of not wanting to hurt another, consciously - you may do it unconsciously, but the whole attitude towards life, not to hurt, not to do something unkind consciously, you may say something unconsciously. Good, in the sense that it is correct - not only for the moment; correct all the time. I am inventing! Correct in the sense that it does not depend on circumstances - if it is correct now, it will be correct a hundred years later or ten days later. Correctness which is connected with goodness is not related to environment, circumstance, pressures and so on. So from that comes right action. I don't know if you are following what I am talking about.

So, goodness and an holistic way of living go together. And I am one of the teachers here, educators here, this gentleman here sends his son to this school, in what manner am I going to see that the boy grows in goodness and holistic way of living? That's my question. Do we rely on each other? Is it an individual problem or is it a problem of the whole school, the whole body? So it must be a comprehensive - not that gentleman thinks one way and I think one way about goodness - it must be a cohesive action. Now, is that possible? And do you want that? Sir, in the word 'holistic' is implied: not the orthodox, organized and all that stupid nonsense, but that quality of religion which we will go into presently. How am I, living here as an educator, to bring this about? Don't leave me alone, sir.

K: The first thing we have to do is to help the child feel secure in his relationship. It seems to me that unless the child feels secure in his relationship, with me and the place, nothing further can happen.

RH: I have to find out whether that is really what I want to do. If I feel that is really what I want to do, then I must find out what do I mean by that, what is the content of my feelings.

KJ: Would it not be necessary, if you and I are working together in the school, not to say what I mean by that or what you mean, but to find out if there is something that is valid for all of us. Not because we stick to an idea or come together around an idea, but in the investigation we see clearly that this is it.

K: Sir, do we, you and I, for example, understand what it means to be whole, an holistic life? Verbally even, logically, rationally, sanely? Do we understand what it means to live an holistic life? Or is it merely a theory?

RH: Sir, perhaps we merely understand by contrast. We see fragmentation is ourselves.

K: If you see fragmentation or breaking up in yourself, then you have the problem of how to get rid of it, how to be whole. I don't want problems. I don't want a problem which in solving it will bring about an holistic way of life. I don't want a problem about it. Then I have already broken it up.

RH: Despite that, the fact remains that we are fragmented.

K: That's the point. Just a minute. I know I am fragmented; my whole thinking process is fragmented. And also I know I mustn't make a problem of it because that's another fragmentation.

RH: My feeling of fragmentation is itself a problem - I don't make a problem, I see a problem.

K: I understand. I realize I am fragmented, but I don't want to make a problem of it.

RH: But, sir, doesn't it mean that when I see that I am fragmented, that itself is a problem?

K: That's what I want to get at That is, I see I am fragmented: I say one thing and I do another, think one think and contradict what I think, and so on, different types of fragmentation. And I also see very clearly that I mustn't make a problem of it.

RH: Perhaps I don't see that clearly.

K: That's what I want to discuss. If I make a problem of it, I have already further fragmented it.

RH: But there is an in-between stage.

K: Ah! I know all that. Just a minute. Follow what I am saying, if you don't mind. I am aware that I am fragmented, broken up in different ways - not wanting, wanting, ten different things. If I make a problem of it, saying to myself, I must not be fragmented - that very statement is born out of fragmentation. So something born of fragmentation is another form of fragmentation. Am I making myself clear, or am I being dumb? So I mustn't make a problem of it. But my brain is trained to problems. So I must be aware of the whole cycle of it. So what am I to do? Careful!

HP: When you say we should not make a problem of it, do we have a choice?

K: I did not say I should not make a problem of it.

HP: When you see the fragmentation within you, you say that I would not like to make a problem.

K: I see the truth, not, I will not make a problem of it. I see the fact that if I make a problem of it, it is another fragmentation.

That's all. I see it. I don't say, I must get rid of it. I just see the fact that if I say, I must not, then that becomes another problem. That's all. So what am I to do? I wonder if you are catching at what I am trying to get at.

HP: Is there anything to be done in this case?

K: I am going to show you presently. Don't be so eager, if you don't mind my saying so.

HP: The way I see it, there is nothing to be done, just actually watching, observing.

K: Just a minute, sir. Don't come to that conclusion. What am I to do?

HP: Observe.

K: Don't tell me, sir. These are words. Seeing that I am fragmented, aware that whatever I do is another kind of fragmentation, what is left for me? You don't put yourself in that position, you have already come to a conclusion. So your conclusion is another fragmentation. I don't know if you follow all this. When you say, I can observe, that is already a conclusion.

HP: You have to say something.

K: Don't say anything. Whom are we talking to? Are we talking to each other? Or you are only listening to the speaker therefore waiting for him to tell you what to do. You understand? Suppose I have this problem, this question: is there a way of living holistically in which is involved the quality of a religious mind, deep goodness, without any mischief, without any duality? Am I making it complicated?

HP: No, sir.

K: Why not, sir? My whole brain thinks dualistically. It's always in opposition in the sense: I want to do this, and yet I mustn't do it. I should do it, but I don't like to do it, and so on. It always taking opposing positions. That is essentially fragmentation. Right? So what is left for me? I see all this at a glance, or through analysis. And I see it is like that. Then my question is, what am I to do? Don't tell me what you should do or shouldn't do - I don't accept anything from you, I am very sceptical by nature.

HP: You are asking the question; what am I to do? When one is observing there is no question of analyzing.

K: Are you doing it?

HP: Yes.

K: Are you doing it? If you are not doing it and you say; we must try, you are in contradiction, therefore duality, therefore fragmentation, and hence no goodness, and all the rest of it.

JR: As soon as you say or think about an holistic state, a state of goodness, you are already in duality, you are already in contradiction.

K: No, we are not in contradiction. I am only putting it into words. Holistic includes goodness. Right sir? A sense of religious action, a brain that is religious. What we mean by religion and all that we will go into presently. But I am asking you, what will you do, what's your action, what's your attitude when you want to educate your student in this goodness? The school has a certain reputation, a certain eclat - a feeling about it. And there is a certain atmosphere in this valley. And I send you my son, hoping that you will help him to grow in this holistic way of life. I am communicating, it's not contradicting.

JR: It is in the way I posit the question that the contradiction arises.

K: I understand. We are trying to investigate the question, not trying to lay down laws about it. At least I'm not. I really want to find out what way I can help the student. I may not be holistic. You understand? Don't say: first I must be holistic, and then I can teach. Then we are dead. Then you will take an eternity, and the boy will have gone on to BA, MA, or whatever it is. If you say; I must first, then you have stumped yourself, stymied yourself. Sir, I am not going to saying anything. I don't know what to do. I really don't know what to do with the student who comes here, whose parents want him to join the army, or business, or something or other. And I've got the tremendous opposition of society, the father, the mother, the grandfather, wanting the boy to have a job and all that. How am I to bring this about? You don't answer me. I don't know.

KJ: Krishnaji, I am not answering the question: how am I to bring this about? I'm looking at fragmentation.

K: In the boy?

KJ: And in me, and in the world.

K: What does that mean? Follow it sir, don't change it, follow it, that mean? I am fragmented and the boy is fragmented. Right?

Right, sir?

KJ: Right.

K: Then what's the relationship between the boy and myself?

KJ: We are learning together.

K: Don't use phrases quickly. What's my relationship with the student who is fragmented like myself?

RH: I am not different from him.

K: Of course you are different from him - you teach mathematics, he doesn't know any. Don't say you are not different from him.

KJ: There is no relationship at all, if I am fragmented.

K: Please, sir, answer my question. You are fragmented, and your student, I am also fragmented. Right? Then what do you do? What's our relationship? Or, is there any relationship at all? Or, we are on the same level? Right? Ah, that's it, you won't admit that. I am fragmented, she is fragmented - not your sir. I am fragmented, he is fragmented - he is my student, or I am his student, better. I am his student. And what is the relationship between these two fragments? You understand sir, I am asking this question.

KJ: It can only be a fragmented relationship, if you can call it that.

K: Yes, so what is actually my relationship? What is my actual relationship with you who are fragmented, and like me, I am fragmented, what is our actual relationship?

KJ: There doesn't seem to be any.

K: That's all. How can fragments have a relationship?

A: Why not?

K: Are you really asking that question?

A: Yes.

K: You answer it. You ask me a question, and I am too eager to reply to it. So it goes on between you and me. I answer it, and then you counter it. Then I counter it, and so on. If your question is serious, has that question any vitality? Are you listening to what I am saying? He asks me a question, and he expects me to answer it, and I say: I won't answer it, because in the question itself is the answer. So can we look at the question and wait for it to flower? You understand, sir? I ask the question, he won't answer it, because he says, I don't know, or I do know but it has no meaning. Because my question is very, very serious, you understand, sir? Let the question itself flower, not respond to it. I don't know if you follow what I am talking about. So the question itself contains the answer, if you let it flower, if you let it alone, don't kind of immediately respond to it. Because your response is already conditioned, already personal etc., etc. So leave the question. If the question has depth, significance, vitality, then that very the question unfolds. Am I talking nonsense? No, I have done this, so it is not nonsense.

Now, sir - just a minute. Is there truth? Does truth exist? You don't know, if you're honest. So we leave the question, I don't know, let's look at the question. And the question begins to unfold, is there truth, or only the sense of tremendous active, vital, illusion. I won't go into all that. What shall I do with student who has come here for four months, what shall I do, what shall I talk about? I wish you would look at it. Narayan, come on, sir.

N: What did you exactly mean when you said, is there truth, or only tremendous vital illusion. You are making a distinction between the two. Can you further go into that?

K: We are going off to something else. I am trying to say if the question has depth, if the question has a sense of great vitality - because you are asking the question after your own great inward searching, or outward searching, you are putting that question - so let the question itself answer. It will if you leave it alone.

Now I am coming back to my original question, we are going off all the time.

G: As an educator, as a teacher, I have a child come to me. I am fragmented, the child is fragmented, so there is no relationship.

K: Are you sure there is no relationship, or are you just saying it?

G: I think, no, I am sure there is no relationship in the fragmented state, and I find that any response that I give to that child, or to the student, would itself be a fragmented response.

K: Yes. Stop there. Then, what will you do? You understand? Is that a statement - whatever relationship I have it is still fragmented. Is that a reality or a verbal statement?

G: It seems a reality to me.

K: Either, it is real, in the sense that the microphone is real there, that's not an illusion. The word 'microphone' is not that. The word is not that. Right? I don't know if you get the quality of it.

RH: Are you saying that conceptual understanding..

K:.. is not understanding. When I say 'the door', I mean the door, the fact.

RH: Then you are using your words in a very different way.

K: No.

RH: When you say: ask the question and leave it alone...

K: Let us see what happens to the question.

RH: What you are implying is: don't ask conceptual questions.

K: That's right.

RH: That flows from implication of certain statements.

K: Not only reflective questions, but also haven't you noticed how a question has a vitality?

So let's come back. We keep going off. What am I to do, sir?

You tell me.

G: I just want to add one more question. Am I fooling myself that I can give an holistic education?

K: We are going to find out. We are going to find out, you and I, whether it is possible to do it or not? The first statement is: we are both fragmented. et's stick to that, not move away. And I don't know what to do. Right sir? Are you clear? I don't know what to do. What does that mean to you; I don't know? Careful! I don't know. You understand, sir? You don't know what to do. Then, I must investigate. When I say, I don't know, do I really mean I don't know? Or, am I waiting for somebody else to tell me, so I will know? Which is it?

Gop: At the moment the latter.

K: Is there a state of the brain when it says: I really don't know? You understand my question? I really don't know. I am not waiting for him to answer; or memory operating, or expecting someone else to tell me. All these states are waiting for an answer. But no one can answer this, because they are all fragmented. Therefore I am waiting, watching, looking, observing, listening to the question. I don't know what to do. I wonder if you understand what I am talking about? Then I ask myself; what's the state of my brain which says: 'I don't know?'

GN: At that point in time, it's not functioning.

K: 'I don't know'. Or are you waiting for it to know?

N: Waiting for it to know.

K: Therefore, you are waiting to know, you will know.

Therefore your brain is not saying; 'I don't know'. It's all very logical sir.

AM: The brain doesn't say it doesn't know.

K: That's it, that's the first thing - the brain never acknowledges or remains in the state: 'I don't know'. I ask you: 'What is Iswara?' And you promptly answer, because you have read, or you don't believe or you believe; Iswara comes as a symbol to you. But if you ask: what is the element which created this? I won't go into this. It's a tremendously interesting question: What is life? (It's too complicated.) What is the beginning of life? What is the life in the seed that you plant? The life of man - what is the origin of that life, the very cell? It leads off somewhere else.

So I don't know how to deal with that boy or with myself. Any action I take, any movement of thought, is still born out of fragmentation. Right? So I really don't know. So may I proceed?

N: Please, sir.

K: What is love? Is it related to hate? If it is related - love then is still fragmentation. Right? Do you understand what I am saying, sir?

N: Love is not the opposite of hate.

K: What is love? It has nothing to do with pity, sympathy - all the rest of it. What is love? You don't know. Is it that state of not-knowing love? You're being mesmerized. It leads so far, so deep that I don't know if you want to go into all this.

I don't know what to do with that boy or girl; we are both fragmented. I can teach them mathematics, geography, history, biology, chemistry, psychiatry, or anything - but that's nothing. Sorry! This demands much deeper enquiry, very much deeper. So I said, what is it that is completely holistic? Certainly not thought - thought is experience and all the rest of it. It's certainly not sympathy; not generosity; not empathy; not saying: 'you're a nice chap'. So love has - what?

N: Compassion.

K: Love, compassion - that is the only thing that's holistic. I'm just discovering something for myself. I say, love is not thought; love is not pleasure. Don't accept, for God's sake that is the last thing. Love is utterly unrelated to hate, jealousy, anger - all that. Love is really completely unbreakable. It's whole and it has its own intelligence. Compassion, love has its own intelligence. Of course. Am I talking nonsense?

N: I have heard you say this before in different ways.

K: In different ways. I am coming back to that. So not knowing, to know. What does that mean, to know?

N: It is love.

K: Oh, no sir. Just listen, you are not listening. To know: I know my wife. Can you ever say about a person - I know.

RH: To know is to shut off in some way.

K: Yes. If I say; 'I know Radhikaji' - what do I know about her? So, to say, I know, is fragmentation.

RD: Is it Krishnaji? - to say, 'I know'.

K: I'm talking about human beings. I know that is a palm tree. I know that is a tiger. But to say, I know him, is a violation.

RD: The brain is so dull.

K: Your brain, sir, is damned dull. (Laughter)

RD: Yes, sir. It is rooted. It remains rooted in all this knowledge.

K: Yes, sir. I asked a question, which is: can I help the student or talk to him? I know I am fragmented; he is fragmented. And I also know, have a feeling, that love is whole, compassion.

Therefore compassion, love have their own intelligence. I am going to see if that intelligence can operate. I don't know if I am conveying anything.

JR: You say that love has its own intelligence; you say that love is holistic - it's not fragmented. Isn't that just an assumption?

K: No, I am talking about myself. Love is not an assumption - my god.

JR: Maybe it is, because I don't know.

K: Remain there. You don't know. Wait, find out; don't answer. I don't know what the inside of a modern car is. I don't know. I have, as a matter of fact, stripped a car, old cars. I know how it works, I know the gadgets of it, but a modern cars I wouldn't touch because it is too complicated. Right? So I want to learn about it. So I go to a garage man and he says; this, this, this, he teaches me; because I want to know how it works. I take the trouble; I take the pains; I pay him, if I have the money; or work with him till I know every part of that car. That means I want to learn, but I'm not sure you want to learn as I want to learn about a car. You understand, sir? I am not at all sure you want to learn.

RD: But Krishnaji, this very wanting to learn...

K: Don't translate into fragmentation.

RD: No, I'm not. I've done a lot with you on this. I wanted to learn, and wanting to learn itself, as we understand the word 'wanting to learn'. Today, I don't want to learn. Please listen to what I want to say. Today I don't want to learn in the sense of wanting-to-know-more-about it. I don't want to do it.

K: Just a minute, sir. I don't know how those cameras work, and you say, learn about it. I ask him, and I become his apprentice: I watch how he does it, I learn about it. Then I say: I know how to work that camera. But human beings are not like cameras. They are much more complicated, silly asses! Much more psychological, they are like a messy machine, and I want to know how their brain works. Either I become a biologist, or a brain specialist, or I study myself, which is much more exciting than going to a brain specialist. Just a minute, just a minute. So I learn how my brain works - there is nobody to teach me.

RD: There may be.

K: I don't trust them.

RD: But I listen to them.

K: I don't trust anybody.

RD: True, I don't trust anybody.

K: All their knowledge is from books, or from their small little selves. So I say, I am going to investigate this whole way of living, not just parts of it, the whole way of living.

RD: Sir, I had a teacher, I had a teacher, please listen, who, I felt, had an extraordinary understanding about the nature of human beings. I wanted to learn. I began learning with that teacher. The teacher pointed out the nature of the brain, the nature of the self, the nature and I began learning in the same way as I learnt everything else.

K: Oh no. I understand, I understand.

RD: I did. And we began to gather knowledge, what learning really means - as we know it.

K: Learning, as we know it, is merely accumulating memory.

RD: Accumulating memory - but there is an observing in it.

K: Yes. Yes. Yes. Don't let's make it complicated.

RD: One observed; remembered; got what one called 'insight'.

K: Oh.

RD: Yes. I know. I said, what one called 'insight', something new, something one has not known earlier, something which seemed to make the picture better, larger and so on. You come to a point when you see that this process of making the picture is endless. It is nothing to do with the real thing.

K: So what? At the end of it, what?

RD: So, what is this learning?

K: I don't consider that learning.

RD: Yes, that's not learning.

K: So what is learning? Surely, memorizing is not learning.

RD: No. That's not learning.

K: But that's what you are doing. Rajesh, is there another way of learning? Is there something entirely different from the ordinary learning? You understand the question? Is there?

RD: I don't know.

K: Do you want to know? No. Do you want to find out if there is another way of learning - not memorizing, memorizing, memorizing and then remembering, acting skilfully and so on. We know that very well. Now he comes along and tells me: look, don't do that, that's mechanical, all that. He says there is another way of learning. Will I listen to him? Will I take the trouble to say, tell me about it. I am receptive; I am anxious; I am willing to find out. So he begins to tell me. Am I capable of listening to what he is saying? Or my whole brain revolts against this, because it's used to one pattern, and to break that pattern is the real difficulty?

RD: And trying to break that pattern is useless.

K: That makes another problem. I don't want to do that. So first, I ask myself - do I really want to learn? Go on, sir, don't ask me, I am asking you, do you want to learn? Or, is it another chapter to add to your memory, another book?

RD: I see what you are saying.

K: So let's come back. What am I to do or not do? Or the question is much deeper than merely the boy and the girl whom I'm educating. So it might be I have not really understood, verbally even, what it means to live a holistic life - understood intellectually. I don't know if you follow, what I am talking about.

Q: I would say yes.

K: No, are you sure. You've used two words. I am sure intellectually. So, you have separated the intellect from the whole. Therefore you're not - listen, listen ...

Q: Sorry.

K: What, what about?

Q: For not listening. You were saying something and ...

K: Sir, when you say I understand intellectually, it means just bananas.

Q: Sir, I don't say I understand just intellectually.

K: I say you are not listening old boy. When one says I understand it intellectually it means absolutely nothing. Right? When you say intellectual that's another fragment. So, don't use the word I understand intellectually. That's a crime.

Now, what am I, an educator at Rishi Valley, I understand partially what it means, verbally even, a holistic way of living. And knowing that he and I are both fragmented. Right? Are you listening? You're getting bored.

Q: No, not bored.

K: You can't sustain attention?

Q: Sir, how do you say that? I am not bored, not at all.

K: You were not listening yesterday.

Q: I don't know what to say to you.

K: Yes sir. Five minutes we will stop. May I finish this? I am at Rishi Valley, lovely place, beautiful hills and all the beauty of the earth here. I wonder if you know what I mean by beauty. No, I won't go into that any more. I'm here, I am responsible for the parents for that boy or girl, right? They have send them because we have good reputation, we look after them, we do all that, That's not the point. He comes around and tells me: It's all right, but what matters is a holistic way of life. Not intellectual, but the whole psyche, the whole being, the whole entity, which is now fragmented, if that can be whole then you have done the most extraordinary education - he tells me that. And he goes away and I don't know what to do. I understand the verbal meaning of whole, non-fragmented, not broken up, not saying one thing and doing something else, thinking something and doing quite the opposite of that. All that is fragmentation of life. And I don't know what to do. I really mean deeply, profoundly, gravely, seriously, I don't know what to do. Right? Am I deceiving myself when I say I don't know what to do, or waiting for somebody to tell me or some book, something will accidentally come along and give me - unfortunately that word - insight. So I can't wait for that because the boy is growing up and kicking around. So, what shall I do? I know one thing, absolutely for certain - I don't know. Right? I don't know. All my inventions all my thinking have collapsed. I don't know if you feel that way. I don't know. So the brain is open for reception. You understand what I am saying? The brain has been closed - by conclusions, by opinions, by judgements, by values, by my problems - it's a closed thing. When I say I really don't know I have broken something, I have broken the bottle which held the champagne. Out of that I begin to find out, when the bottle is broken. Right Sir? Then I find out what love is, what compassion and what that intelligence is that is born out of compassion. It has nothing to do with intellect.

Right Sir, it is now an hour and 37 minutes we have talked. Is that enough? Have I mesmerised you all?

Sir, we never come to the point when I say I don't know. Right? You ask me about God, I have immediate answers. Or you ask me about chemistry - out comes it, the tap is open. Sociology, any damn thing I am ready to answer. We meet day after tomorrow, don't weht? I hope you can bear it. You see I'm one of those idiots, sir, who hasn't read a damn thing except novels - you understand. It's a fortunate thing.

Q: And who doesn't think also, Sir.

K: No, it's like a drum, it's all tuned up, when you strike on it, it gives the right note. I hope you aren't tired.

RISHI VALLEY 3RD TALK WITH TEACHERS 9TH DECEMBER 1985

K: We were talking the other day about, why do we turn out mice instead of lions? May we talk about that a little? We seem to spend a great deal of energy and capacity on these students. Their parents, obviously, want them to be safe, well-educated, to have a good job, settle down in life, marry, children - the whole business. And we spend enormous energy in educating them to fit in that gap, or that slot, or that space - as an engineer, as a philosopher, as an academician, and scientist and so on. Is that all we can do? Come on, sirs, it's in your lap, in your court.

Like Kabir experimenting; he's organizing some kind of educational structure, or non-structure. He must spend a great deal of energy in thinking it out, with the others, talk to the parents, talk to the students. And yet they remain mice, tame, domestic mice. And we seem to be satisfied with that. There are nearly 350 students here 340 or 350, it doesn't matter; and the same number of students in Rajghat, and about 250 or so in Madras, Bangalore has 150. And out of this lot, about a thousand - I don't have to conclude the sentence.

So what shall we do? Apparently they go abroad, some of them, if they are unlucky enough, and they get swallowed up by the American technology, by the girls, by the marvellous beauty of the land. And they are lost there. Some of them are in the IBM, some invent something new. They seem to flower in the technological world in America, at least some of them do. And, of course, nobody goes to England anymore. Perhaps some of them go to Germany. And they apparently do extraordinarily well in the technological, mechanical world. They have got fairly good memories, fairly good brains, and they slip into that rut.

And here we are, nearly a thousand students in our schools, and we don't seem to be able to produce one 'gazelle', or one 'lion', or even a 'big elephant'. Why is this? I am asking you. Please, you are the educators. Is there something wrong in our approach to all this?

Rajghat and this school, Rishi Valley, have existed for nearly 60 years and more, and when you consider the enormous energy that we've put into it - it's incalculable amount of energy, building, making the land fertile, digging wells - and yesterday, there was a collector here for lunch, and he said he's going to build more dams and all the rest of it. The environment seems to help us enormously - the trees, the land, those enormous rocks and the extraordinary beauty of this land. But somehow all that becomes insignificant, when we, as educators, are incapable of doing something marvellous. I believe both schools, especially Rishi Valley, has got a good reputation. It is fairly well known.

May I tell you a joke. The other day I was coming by air, going somewhere or other. 'From where are you?' somebody asked me. 'Oh', I said. 'somewhere'. And he said, 'Actually, where are you from? Are you a Turk? Are you Persian; are you one of the Muslim world?' I said 'No, no, no'. 'Where are you from'. I said, 'I am from the Valley of the Rishis'. It's rather a good name for this place. He said, 'Where is that.' I said 'You won't find it'.

So what shall we do together? To do, or not do, something extraordinarily alive, vital. Not let the students fall into the same old rut, business or army or this and that. Please, I would like your advice and discussion.

RH: Sir, may I say something. Perhaps I am just paraphrasing you. But, I feel we fail because we deal with the problem you're posing, when we talk to our children, when we try to do something, we constantly make a problem of it.

K: Without making a problem of it, what is amiss? What is not correct? What is it that we should or should not do, to bring about a totally different human being? I don't know if you are interested in this.

RH: But perhaps sir, the question shouldn't be posed in the way you are posing it.

K: Then let us pose it differently. What is it I want my daughter or my son to be when I send them here, knowing that they will get a very good academic knowledge? And the parents are not really concerned about the other. Right?

RH: No, but in some vague way they will have a...

K: Yes some, but it's such a drop in a bucket. You see the fruit of it all. So what shall we do together? Please, I am putting all these questions to all of you. It's not just... What shall we do, come on sir, what shall we do sir? I don't want you to experiment on my children. Right?

KJ: Yes sir.

K: I say what the hell are you doing with my children, experimenting, like animals, pigs?

KJ: Sir, we are not. I think it's a very wrong notion that has gone around that we are experimenting.

K: I don't care. Are you experimenting with them? Are you trying something new on them? Or are you trying to bring a different quality of a human being?

KJ: I would say, we're trying to do the latter, sir.

K: You can't. All right, sir. In what way? Sorry, I'm going to examine you, now that you're close. In what way are you trying to bring about a different quality of a human being? He's one of the - where is the other chap? No, they are all hiding there. There is, yes. These two are supposed to run Bangalore school. ir, you tell me. Your way may be the right way or the wrong way. I don't know. So you tell me. I've sent my daughter and son to you. I want them - please, I'm a fairly educated human being; I've seen different parts of the world, a little too much; I'm fairly knowledgeable and I send you these two children. I've a feeling, or rather a wish, a longing that you would do something different from the usual run of the schools. And I would like them to be academically excellent, because that is part of life, part of earning a beastly livelihood, with all the boredom of it. And also I would like them to be, if I may use the word most delicately, religious, not the usual temple and all that nonsense. So I send them to you. For nine months you have been in charge of them. Proceed. Tell me what you would do. What will you do? Not, we hope. Not, we will try. Not, we'll do our best. Because, that all sounds silly to me. So what will you do, sir? Sirs this is a question to all of you, not just to KG.

JR: Sir, may I respond. Why are we assuming that anything can be done. If these schools have been going for sixty years...

K: Sir, I will tell you.

JR: These schools have been going on for sixty years...

K: I know all that sir.

JR:... and there's nothing extraordinary that has happened yet.

K: Yes.

JR: So why do we assume, is there any evidence that anything can be done?

K: Sir, I'll tell you. We started this school - this and Rajghat. I used to sleep on the floor here. No water, no electricity, the toilet was all this open field. We thought we would educate them differently. We thought. I'm still thinking it can be done. You may say 'You're rather a bit old, in your head. Nothing can be done'. You might say that. I say, sorry, since you have educated man in that direction - right? Commercialism, technology, job, good life - you know all that. Since you have done it, man can do something else too. You understand?

JR: Why do we assume that?

K: Why not? If you have done that, if you have gone that way, why can't you go that way too?

JR: Maybe it can't be taught.

K: Why not? It may be. You assume it may not.

JR: I don't know.

K: Therefore, let's find out if it can be. You may take 50 years, 100 years. I hope not. There must be the other direction too. The Jesuits have done it. Right sir? The Jesuits.

JR: Have they produced extraordinary individuals that you're talking about? The Jesuits, have they produced extraordinary..

K: Oh yes! They have produced what they wanted to produce. The communist cells were based on Jesuit cells. They took a great deal from Loyola. So, you can't say human beings cannot go some other way too.

So what shall we do - you and I and the rest of us - to see if we can bring something tremendous out of these places?

KJ: Krishnaji, obviously it cannot be experimented, in the sense of groping around. It cannot be 'I hope I'll do my best'.

K: Ah! I don't want you to do your best, which would be nothing. To me, to do something, your best, is nothing.

KJ: Right.

K: So, what will you, as a human being, create, build? You have built the pyramids, you have built the sphinx, you have built the Parthenon. You've built the most extraordinary things in life. And why can't we do this?

RH: Sir, one of the prerequisites, it seems to me, should be that one should be very critical - self critical - and not satisfied with what we have done, what we are doing.

K: You mean self-critical?

RH: Critical - what we have done so far.

K: That's what I'm saying. What have you done so far?

Q: Maybe our attention is in the wrong place. If we give attention to the children, yes, it's what we are, that we give to the children.

K: Just a minute, lady, just a minute. The parents want their children to be safe, secure. So, to be secure in this society you must have a degree, and examination, study, all that. Then they also want their children to be married and settle down. They have a job, and marry and settle down. For god's sake, get on with it. Breed like hell and carry on. Is it the parents, or is it ourselves or is it we are caught up in a system, in a whirlpool that cannot but carry us along in its own way? You understand my question? I cannot admit that. To me that is defeatism, to be defeated by a theory. So what shall I do, what shall we do? Please, come on sirs.

RD: Sir the Jesuits and the communists, they rally their energy, all the people, they put all their energy in a common goal. It gives them a tremendous sense of energy. Now we are seeing that, that kind of energy, in the same thing. It is still isolation.

K: Yes.

RD: Our question is, when we see this, we're lost. We don't have...

K: No, Rajesh. Just a minute sir. What are you trying to tell me? If all of us have a certain goal, certain purpose, certain definite delineated shape, idea, or a principle or a pattern, then we can put all our energy into it? Can we? Can we all agree, all of us in this room agree that we need a different kind of brain, a different kind of outlook on life, a different way of living, of feeling and so on? Could we all agree on that?

RD: I think many of us are agreed on that.

K: Ah, No! I'm asking.

RH: Sir, we may agree, but what is the content of that agreement?

K: That's what I'm coming to. I agree we should build the sphinx, and we know we can't do it. So can we all agree profoundly on something together. Not superficially, not say, 'yes, yes and let's get on with it.' Can we have the same vision - I'm using the word vision, not from the world of psychiatry but in the world of the earth. Can we all together have one vision? Or is that impossible? Come on sirs.

RH: Sir it can be possible. But the same vision can be accompanied by fanaticism, zealousness.

K: No.

RH: You don't want all that.

K: No, no.

RD: What is the quality of that vision.

K: I'll tell you in a minute. That's not the point. The question is, can we all come together upon something? Not purpose, goal, god and all that, but the feeling that we are together, first.

RD: About something?

K: No.

RD: You said that.

K: No.

RD: Sir, you said it.

K: No, I didn't say that. Now I'm saying, can we all feel that we are together doing something. Not, 'what'?

RH: That's very different.

K: Ah, that's what I'm saying. Come on sirs. I mean, if you all want to build a house, that's fairly simple. Because we all have a common goal, we all want so many windows, so many bathrooms, so many rooms, so many sitting rooms and all the rest of it - that's fairly simple. Then we say 'good idea, let's all work together'. That is, you're working for a purpose, for a goal, for an end. But we are saying, first what is important is not the building, is not the shape of the house, the windows, bathrooms and so on, but the feeling that we are together. Don't go to sleep please. If we have that feeling we can do anything.

JR: What would bring about this feeling of togetherness, if it's not some kind of a conscious goal?

K: Sir, we can't do anything in the world by ourselves. Right?

Nothing! The Parthenon was not built by one man putting stones. It was a feeling, for Athena, (I don't want to go into that story) and putting it all together, with tremendous intelligence. Right? Can't we do the same thing here?

JR: But isn't there a goal there?

K: No, no, no. The feeling for the goddess. You understand? Goddess of wisdom, Athena. Right? The feeling of it, I'm talking of, not the goddess. That came later.

KJ: Are you talking about being together in the feeling for the religious quality?

K: I'm saying sir, do we have that feeling first?

KJ: Of being together.

K: Of being together. You cannot do anything by yourself in the world. You need my help, you need his help, you need your wife, you need someone. You can't live by yourself, unless you trot off to the Himalayas. And then there too, somebody comes and feeds you. The sense of isolation, which separates, that's all I'm objecting to.

RH: Isn't that inevitable if you rally around a goal?

K: No, no. I'm not talking about a goal, a purpose, an end, a goddess, or this. The feeling: I can't live by myself.

SP: Could we say that we get this feeling for a while, this feeling of togetherness. But when our own idiosyncrasies, our own tendencies come to the fore, and then somehow that feeling gets lost.

K: No sir, you can't lose it, if you have that feeling. I don't think we are talking about the same thing.

KJ: If it is an emotional...

K: Not emotional sir. Even intellectually you can't do anything.

KJ: I agree sir, intellectually one can say that you can't do anything alone.

K: You can't. To have a child, a woman and a man is necessary. It may be a tube or anything, but a man is necessary. So, this idea - 'leave us alone, we will do something by ourselves', is impossible. We are together in this. And I don't think you get that feeling. I don't think you have that feeling. To have that feeling implies that you sit down, if there is any misunderstanding wipe it out the next second. You follow?

RD: Sir can you explore a bit more into this?

K: What? Into what?

RD: Sir into this question of - you made a statement that 'You cannot do this alone'. No one person can do this. It is absolutely clear.

K: Except in parliament, , or a dictator.

RD: One person can only bully the rest.

K: Yes. So we're not talking of that kind.

RD: Or he can influence the rest. We're not talking of that.

K: The feeling that we are not separate, the feeling that you cannot - sir, you're utterly responsible for whatever you do. Right? I walk down that road. I see a branch fallen on it. I pick it up. I'm responsible, and not say, 'Well, the gardener will come and pick it up'. And if there is the feeling of responsibility, then you're together. I don't know if I'm conveying it. Please sir, let's discuss it, don't let me talk.

RD: Sir, there is this tendency to isolate.

K: Don't bring in all that. I know that. What will you do, Rajesh? Don't talk about these things. What are you doing?

RD: When you watch it, sometimes you're not able to end that. It has its own force.

K: What? What?

RD: At times.

K: Not at times. Now.

RD: I see what you are saying.

K: What do you say: can we work together? Or you shirk responsibility and I do all the work? And you come along then and criticize. Suppose this happens. I say 'What the hell do you mean by it'? You and I are involved in this thing. It's not, you are superior, I'm inferior. You take the spade. I've taken the spade, dug a hole. You do the same. Don't tell me 'I'll improve the hole'.

RD: If you feel that, you will keep digging holes, and there's nothing in those holes, you don't want to do it.

K: I will plant a tree in those holes. What are you talking about? I dig a hole for an orange tree, or whatever tree, and I see it's the proper depth, soil, compost, all kinds of stuff in it - and I'll plant it.

RD: Plant it, then?

K: But it's my responsibility for the whole thing. I want Rishi Valley to be the most beautiful place, on earth, so I work. What are you people doing? You don't come and supervise me and tell me what to do.

RD: No sir.

K: I know sir. You dig. You plant, because you care for the whole place.

RD: Sir, you don't know what it means to care for the whole place. You want to find out what it means to care for the whole place.

K: I'll tell you.

RD: You don't want to just fragmentarily plant a tree, and plant this. You can go on.

K: No I'll tell you. Really, you want me to tell you what it means? Sir, there is a particular hill, in Saanen, going up towards a certain other little town called Schonreid. We were driving up that steep slope, and a girl in front of us, on a bicycle, sees a piece of paper on the road. Get's down. Picks up that piece of paper and trundles up the hill. And there is a bin at the corner. She drops it in there. That little girl of fifteen or twelve or whatever she was - yes sir.

RD: You say that that is coming for the whole?

K: Please sir, see.

RD: No, I'm not going to let you make that statement and...

K: Sir, in the sense, she was responsible for that piece of paper, responsible to see the road was kept clean.

RD: Sir, each one of us here must be doing that - several times a day.

K: Eh, Rajesh. Sir, I'm talking about the feeling of responsibility, not for a particular thing, but the feeling of responsibility. If you feel that, you do everything.

RH: And sir, there is no feeling of 'my vision, and your vision'.

K: Ah. That's why I'm asking you all, gentlemen and ladies, what shall we do? Knowing that you cannot build anything by yourself. Impossible. So what will you do? Tell me, please. You know, I'd like you to discuss, talk. Tell me what to do - not verbal statement, not theoretical. Tell me, I've come here as one of you, as a worker - worker, not a theoretician - and I say, Rajesh, please tell me, or Kabir or X, Y, Z - tell me what I am to do - please listen to what I'm saying - not to bring about a larger mouse, but something tremendously different. And if you want me to explain, I'll explain what is the difference. So, how will you manage this, how will you bring this about? And it's your responsibility because you are the educator here, you have lived here, you have worked here, you have shaken hands with the others, saluted, you have drunk the same water, eaten the same bread. Tell me sirs, please, what shall I do?

Look sir, K happened to dissolve the organization, tremendous organization; because he was the head of it, he closed it. And he did the same with other things. Recently, he said, no more talks at Saanen, because he was alone there and he decided. Here, we have to deal with five hundred people. Right? He can't say, 'Let's do this, don't do that'. We are all together here. Living in the same valley, eating the same food, etc., etc. So I can't say, 'Do this, do that'. I couldn't do it, personally. So I'm asking you gentlemen, what shall we do together. For god's sake, wake up Mr Kumaraswamy, what shall we do?

Sir this is a challenge to you. You have to answer it. You can't just neglect it. Look sir, come on sir. You are full of energy, aggressive action, tell me what to do. I'm one of your - hat do you call them? One of your colleagues, you are not my boss. You're not my educator. I'm one of your colleagues. And I say, sir what shall we do? That is, you and I talk it over. You don't lay down and say, do this, I won't. I have come to you on a different footing, on a different understanding: that we are colleagues, we're working together. You start, and tell me what to do - not that I will accept what you tell me, but I will discuss it.

KJ: I don't know where to start answering this question, Krishnaji. One doesn't know where to start answering.

K: I will tell you.

KJ: There is the obvious need for a sense of togetherness. And there are a hundred things that come out of it.

K: You tell me one that's the key to it. That key may open vast vistas, vast rooms or something, but you tell me the key to it. Come on, please, don't go to sleep. Rajesh, tell me the key to it.

RD: What is the point if I can't end it? What is the point of saying it verbally - the key?

K: No, I want you to tell me. Not verbally. If you ask me - you're all waking up? - if you ask me, I would first ask you, before you ask me, why are you talking to me? What's your relationship with me?

KJ: Supposing I say we're working together.

K: Ah! Ah! That's all 'bananas'.

KJ: You're in the school, so...

K: No, I'm not talking that. I'm not talking about schools. I'm talking about, what's your relationship with another human being? You are a human being. You're not a principal, Akbar, no, Kabir - you might be Akbar's reincarnation.

I said first, what's your relationship to me? I have to answer that question. What's your relationship ladies and gentlemen, what's your relationship with me? That stumps you. Kabir, I mean Rajesh, tell me what's your relationship with me, K? You have to be very honest in this. You're going to marry me. Or I'm going to marry you. What's your relationship?

RD: Shall I honestly answer it?

K: Oh! For god's sake.

RD: Sir, but don't pounce on me. Give me time. If you pounce, I can't answer it then.

K: Why I'm asking this question is we are going to establish a relationship first. Right? If we have no relationship we can't work together. Right? So I'm asking you, not personally, if you don't mind, what's your relationship with K? Have you any relationship with K? Don't say, what do you mean by the word 'relationship'.

RD: No, I won't ask.

K: I will tell you.

RD: Yes, but I won't ask you. Unless you wish to still...

K: No, tell me what your relationship is, or have you no relationship with anybody? I'm asking this of all of us.

RD: Sir, that, perhaps, is a very true statement, that one has no relationship.

K: I'm asking you. Don't budge. What's your relationship to K?

RD: K has stirred...

K: Careful, careful, careful!

RD: You're too quick sir. You won't allow me to...

K: So, what is your relationship with Radikaji, what's your relationship with her? Or with Mrs Thomas? Or with Kabir? Or with somebody else? What's your relationship, sir? Don't go on.

RD: My relationship is based on my experience of them. I know, please, you've asked me, I'll tell you.

K: I'm asking what's your relationship? Is it a friend ?

RD: Yes.

K: Is it your boss?

RD: No.

K: Wait!

RD: Go ahead, I'm just...

K: Is it your constant compassion, because you see her every day? You see her, talk to her everyday. Pour out your troubles, or whatever you talk to her about. Is she listening to you? Considering you? Trying to understand you? Or you are trying to understand her? Why she does this, that, that and the other thing? Or, you've kept to yourself? The same thing, what's your relation with him - or her? You see you don't answer these questions. Or you have no relationship at all. Because you have - I'm not saying you have, or haven't - because you have no relationship, you move along. So I'm asking you, sir, unless we establish a real relationship we can't work together - a genuine one, not a kind of ideological, romantic, sexual or otherwise. I am saying, do you, who have lived here for so many years, have any kind of relationship with any of these people?

RD: If you ask me very deeply, I would say no.

K: Good! Therefore you can't work with the others.

RD: Exactly. That is what is going on. Everybody...

K: Ah, don't say what's going on. I know what's going on. I'm not blind.

RD: You're right, sir. We've no relationship, in that sense.

K: So...

RD: In that sense!

K: Of course. Is that so with all of us?

RD: Yes.

K: Don't you answer.

RD: Sorry.

K: Is that so with all of us? I'm asking. Don't answer anything else, because from that stems everything. It's the fountain. If that fountain is not flowing, you can't work together, you can't build together.

RD: Sir, why is one frightened of 'breaking the bottle'? You used the analogy last time, 'to break the bottle'.

K: Yes, break the bottle.

RD: Why is one frightened to break the bottle?

K: Sir, do you want a good relationship with me?

RD: Good relationship?

K: Eh, eh, didn't you hear what I said? Good! Really good relationship with another with whom you can talk, expose, feel all, tell all your troubles, you know, a friend. For god's sake.

RD: That kind of relationship I have with many people.

K: Oh no!

RD: If you say a friend...

K: No, I'm asking you. Do you have a relationship with another, so that you don't have to talk, you can be quiet, but there is an interflow.

RD: There is.

K: A very...

RD: I have.

K: How many?

RD: A person opens up to me, I open up to the person, there is no fear, there is no...

K: Oh! No, no, no, no. m asking you, do you have the feeling of being related? It doesn't matter with whom.

RD: No, no.

K: So how can you work with another who has that feeling - suppose?

RD: No sir. That is what has been happening.

K: So what will you do? Ah! No No! Don't throw up your shoulders.

RD: Cry?

K: Do. Cry.

RD: I've done it, sir.

K: All right, if you have cried, then what, after that, wipe your fears and get on with it. Then what? I'm not bullying you sir. I'm not being personal, I'm just asking, how can we work together, build together, think together, if we have no relationship with each other? Not sexual, not you lean on me, I lean on you, I scratch your back, you scratch mine. I don't mean that kind of relationship.

If you stand alone, you're related. I don't know if you understand. If you're dependent, you're not related. Sir, that's my job to go on like this.

So, you tell me, some of you, what shall we do together to bring about a different quality of a human being for whom we are responsible. The parents have put their children here, paying an awful lot of money. All the bother of it, train journey back and forth, and here you don't eat meat, there they eat meat, there they smoke - you know all that goes on. Here you have them for nine months, what will you do with them? Apart from academics. (How does it feel to be in India? It's a strange country. We'll talk it over later.)

Come on sirs. What's the good of being silent?

Would you work under authority? Don't say, no, sir. Be careful, careful! Don't say 'no'.

RD: I would fight it? I will not...

K: Don't say 'fight', don't answer yet, because you haven't yet gone into it. Would you, if I because the authority here - god forbid - ..

RD: I would leave this place.

K: You wouldn't.

RD: I bet sir, I would.

K: I'll tell you why...

RD: If you were an authority, I would not have lived in this place.

K: He won't even listen, that boy. Do you know what I would do? I would cajole, play with you, I would say, 'Come on old boy', you know.

Now would you work under authority? It's a very serious question, sir. Don't just say 'I won't'. It may be the authority of a committee. It may be the authority of half a dozen people. It may be the authority of some entity called KFI. Is it that there is no feeling that we are together in this? I can't build a house by myself. Impossible, I must have a carpenter. I must have a man who deals with glass work, you know, all that, electricity and so on. So, I want to co-operate, I want to say 'Please, let's do it all together'. Have you that feeling? I'm not asking you. Have you got that feeling?

RH: I'm sorry I interrupted. But sir, may I ask a different round about question? And that is, that we earlier said that there is no such thing as my vision and your vision and that fragmenting. Would you allow that perhaps that there is a vision that is if we worked together and inevitable we should...

K: I don't follow.

RH: Not fragmented vision of different people but if we co-operate, when we co-operate is there a vision that is almost organic?

K: I think there is. I understand that.

RH: And that it is our business to discover it. And in the co-operation perhaps it can be discovered.

K: Radhikaji, you are not answering my question.

RH: What is it, sir?

K: What shall we do together? Not to bring about bigger minds but a line, something outrageous. Not outrageous, you understand?

RH: I don't know what to do if you pose the question that way.

K: Suppose you don't know, how will you then start? I don't know. How will you, not knowing, begin?

RH: It must begin that way because then it is...

K: You understood what I said?

RH: Yes.

K: Not knowing you begin.

RH: Yes.

K: Not experiment. You begin. I wonder if you understand what I am saying. Is it that we all know and therefore we do nothing.

RH: And bully each other.

K: Yes. I am not being clever. It is not being astute or cunning. Somehow I feel we are all striving after something that we inwardly feel is important. You understand? And therefore we never start from saying, "I really don't know. Let us move together."

KJ: Isn't it that in not knowing you do move together, because in knowing...

K: Yes, sir. Yes, sir. So, start with yourself. You start with knowing. I am not being personal, and you botch up the whole thing. I come along, he comes along says, "Sir, I really don't know how to build this house. I don't know anything. Let us talk together." You are not instructing me. I am not instructing you. Let us see what it really means not knowing. What is the content of not knowing? Is there any content to not knowing? Is that a different quality of the brain. You understand? Because we say, "I know about this. I know about that. I am God, of course." We know every damn thing. So, you and I start with not knowing. That is an immense thing. You follow?

KJ: Yes.

K: It is not you are experimenting on me or I am experimenting on you. But I don't know. I am not weak. Are you understanding? I am not weak. On the contrary I am full of this extraordinary idea which is free from knowing. So, we talk it over, not knowing, what is the content of not knowing. And we have to eat food two hours later. You follow, sir. I don't know if you follow. Won't some of you say something? Is it time? It is time, I know. Aren't you tired of your long journey?

RH: Not yet.

K: This is the last...

RH: Teacher's talk here.

RD: It seems the mind is knowing. Knowing is the very nature of things.

K: It is the brain. It is the nature of the brain. Knowing.

RD: So, when you say, " I don't know, let us find out". You will find out in talking over but it will still be knowing.

K: When you say, " I don't know" If you really say it to yourself, what takes place? Don't conjecture up things. What actually takes place when you say, " I really don't know." I really don't know what in the other side of the mountain. Right? I have never taken the trouble to climb. I won't imagine. I won't etcetera. So, I want to find out what it means to look over the mountain. I'll climb the mountain if I can or I can't. But there is something still on the outside of the mountain, beyond the mountain.

RD: How do you know? Why do ask that question?

K: What question am I asking?

RD: When you ask this question...

K: What question?

RD: Whether there is something else..

K: Maybe I said. You didn't listen. There may be something beyond the mountain. Right? To find that out, either I have to climb the mountain to find out or say, " Sorry, I don't know what is beyond it." Right? You understand?

RD: I am not sure I understand.

K: What is the difficulty, old boy? The mountain suddenly drops. Maybe. So to find out I have to climb the mountain. But I can't climb the mountain. Right? I am too old or too young or too inexperienced. I can't. And I don't imagine what is on the other side of the mountain. So, I say, " I don't know what is on the other side of the mountain." Right? It may a sheer precipice or it may be the most beautiful of valleys. Right? I don't know. I won't pretend. I won't imagine. I won't get emotional about it. I don't know. If you go up there and see, don't tell me. Your description won't satisfy me.

Shall we stop? It is time.

RISHI VALLEY 2ND DIALOGUE WITH STUDENTS 12TH DECEMBER 1985

Krishnamurti: Did you have a good sleep?

Students: Yes.

K: Yes? Good. What are we going to do today?

S: Tell us something about yourself, sir.

K: No, I asked you what you are going to do today. School, class? Do we all sit quietly, silently, or do we talk? Tell me.

S: You talk.

K: What sir? You talk - then talk. What would you like to talk about?

S: Talk about yourself sir - tell us something about yourself.

K: About myself? Not very interesting.

S: It doesn't matter sir.

K: I know - it matters to me though. What would you like me to talk about myself? The past - about my past? Are you really interested in it.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Why? You tell me why, and then I'll talk.

S: I'm curious.

K: You're curious, and then what? If you're curious, and I fulfil your curiosity, all right, then what?

S: Then we'll be more curious.

K: More curious, quite right, so where shall we start?

S: From the beginning sir.

K: From the beginning. (Laughter) Look, most of my life I've forgotten, really. Really, I'm serious, and I tell you most of my life is blank to me.

S: Sir, tell us what you remember.

K: Ah - that's good. You're rather persistent, aren't you? I'll tell you what I don't remember, what people have told me. Right? I really don't remember, but what people have told me - either they're exaggerated, you understand, or truthful, or imaginary. I think what they told me about myself, sounds so funny, doesn't it, is more or less accurate, because a lot of people have told me the same thing during the years. Right? Lord, I don't know where to begin. All right sirs.

You know somebody gave me personally 5,000 acres in Holland, you understand? 5,000 acres is an awful lot, and a castle; and we had gatherings there, 6,000 people at one time, lots of people; curiosity, like you, curious to find out what K was talking about, and so on. I was against - K was against, organizations, you understand? You don't understand, that's all right. You know what organizations are? To run a school, like Rishi Valley, you must have organization. You must turn up punctually at 1 o'clock or half-past twelve, when you have your lunch, right? You must go to classes, you must do this, play from 4 o'clock, and so on. The whole of that requires organization. But Lord, how did we get into this? Hey, come on help me, Radhikaji. And I was against so-called religious organizations, right. Do you understand what that means? No. Do you want to know all this?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Really? Yes sir - don't say yes sir because...

S: In many of your books it mentions Krishnamurti teachings, or religious teachings, and K himself says he is not a teacher, right?

How do you account for it? What do you say about it?

K: How does this come about that K's teachings are religious teachings, and K himself says he is not a teacher. Right? How do you account for it? How do you account for it? What do you say about it? I don't have to account to you sir. I was only joking, but I'm asking you how do you account for it? You asked that question, didn't you? Yes sir, what do you say about it? Is there a contradiction? Or, K is not personally as a body, you understand, as an organism, as a physical entity, he is not important. What he says is important. Right? That's all.

Where are we? You're interested in all this?

S: Not specially.

K: Not specially. I thought the older boys were going to sit here.

S: Sir, why is our mind always so cluttered with thought? And why are we all so concerned about ourselves.

K: Why are we so concerned about ourselves and why is our mind so cluttered up with thought? Right? I'm not a brain specialist, you understand? I've talked to a great many scientists, in America, in England, and so on, and I've also talked to a great many biologists and psychiatrists, and so on. Have you ever considered what our brain is? What's your brain - why is it so filled up with thought? Why is it that our brain is never quiet? Right? Why, I'm asking you. What's the other question?

S: Why are we so concerned about ourselves?

K: Why are we so concerned about ourselves? You answer me. Why are you concerned about yourself all the time, most of the time?

S: We want the best for ourself.

K: What do you call best?

S: We want all the privileges.

K: You want to have all the privileges. You want all the privileges - what do you mean by that?

S: We want to have all the comforts.

K: You want to have all the comfort, all the land.

S: The advantages.

K: All the advantages, all the best things of the world. Right? Are we answering your question? No? You understand what that girl asked? She wanted to know why we are concerned about ourselves so much. Have you answered that question?

S: We always think about ourselves.

K: Yes. I know that. Why are you always so concerned about yourself? Everybody is - it's not something unusual. There are very rare people who are not concerned about themselves, very rare. So, why are you concerned about yourself?

S: Everything you do is around you, concerns you.

K: Everything you do is around you, concerns you.

S: Sir, everything you do automatically concerns you.

K: Everything you do ultimately concerns you. Right? What is you, who are you?

S: I am the body.

K: Yes - what are you - the body, blond hair, purple eyes, dark skin, light skin, your name maybe what - Mr Rao or Mrs Rao, or Miss Rao, I don't know, whatever your name, that's what you are, aren't you? Your face, your body; and beyond that, what are you? Are you your BA's, and MA's? You're all going to pass exams, aren't you? Yes? I don't know why, but you are going to pass exams - like a lot of monkeys. And that's what you are: BA, MA, PhD, or a good lawyer, good engineer, scientists, that's what you are, all that is you, isn't it? BA MA PhD, MAD! Right, all that is what you are, aren't you? No, what are you then? You marry somebody, and you're called Mrs, after that, right, or Miss, or whatever you like to call yourself. So what are you? Why are you so concerned about yourself? I know you want all the advantages, all the privileges, all the earth, but who is 'I' that wants all this?

S: Your mind.

K: Your mind, what do you really mean by the mind? Don't just throw out words - what do you mean by the mind?

S: Your soul.

K: Your soul?

S: May be the mind is something that tells you...

K: So what are you trying to say?

S: I want to know what the mind is.

K: You want to know what the mind is. Before you go in to enquire what the mind is, what is the brain, what's your brain like?

S: It helps you to think.

K: What?

S: Your brain helps you to think sir.

K: Your brain helps you to think, right. It's getting rather complex, isn't it? What do you mean by thinking? You are all thinking, aren't you? Naturally. What do you mean by thinking?

S: The way you feel, your ideas.

K: No, I said what do you mean by thinking.

S: To find out.

K: Thinking, not finding out! You understand the difference between the two? I think this morning I'll go for a walk. I think, you understand? Now what do you mean by thinking?

S: It is the power to decide.

K: You're not answering my question, old boy. I'm asking you, if you'll kindly listen, what do you mean by thinking, not about something, not ask you to think about that, what do you mean by thinking? That is too complex. You go to a class, there the educator tells you, now let's study mathematics. Probably you don't like that subject - mind you, you have to study. Now, you are learning from that book, and what the professor, your educator tells you, so you memorize. Right? Am I saying something not right? You memorize, that is, you repeat over and over again till it becomes part of your brain. Right? So, you memorize, don't you? You don't know about physics, but you learn about it, that is, you memorize. You memorize your name. Right? Because you have repeated very, very, very often, my name is Smith, or Mr Rao, or Mr K. So our learning is memorizing. Right? Do you agree to this: our learning in a school, in a college, in a university, is all the time memorizing. I won't go into the whole subject of it, because it is very complex, I won't put you through that.

Now you memorize in order to act skilfully. Right. If you're a lawyer, you memorize all the previous incidents, judgements, and so on, and then you become a lawyer, and so on. A doctor, he must practise ten years, learn, then become an internee, and so on and so on. It may take fifteen years to be a really first-class doctor or surgeon, or a scientist, and so on.

So, what is happening to your brain - tell me, don't go to sleep - what is happening to your brain during those ten years or during those five years?

S: Your brain is getting filled up.

K: Filled. Filled with what?

S: Information sir. With information about what you are doing?

K: Yes, your brain is being filled with a lot of information.

Right?

S: And knowledge.

K: And knowledge. What do you mean by that word knowledge?

S: Information about the topic.

K: Yes, information about a certain topic, a certain subject, and your brain is filled with that. Right? I am a PhD, I know how, etc., etc. Right? Right sir, are you bored? It's all right, be bored, go to sleep. I don't mind, it's a nice morning.

So, your brain contains all that you have learned. Right? Your name, your face, your father, your mother, it's a process not only of recognition, but also accumulation. Right? You understand my English? It is a process of gathering and spending what you have gathered. As you have gathered Sanskrit and you speak that, and so on.

So your brain is full of memories. Right? You know where you live, you know your father's name, your mother's name, you know your brother, so it's filled with information as knowledge. Right? And you use that knowledge skilfully, or not skilfully; you can be a first-class engineer, or a rather dull engineer, and so on, Indian administrative bodies.

S: And so on.

K: Yes, and so on and so on. Right? So you are always living within a circle; circle of what you have learned, what you have acquired as information, which becomes knowledge. So your brain contains all that you have acquired, all that you have learned, all that you have experienced. So that is full of knowledge:

absurdities, imaginations, illusions, and this whole thing is me.

Right? I may think I'm a great man, that's me - I may sit very quietly, and that's me. So, whatever I think and do is out of experience, knowledge. Right? And I can imagine I'm God, or I can imagine I'm a great painter, when I'm not, and all that. Or, I can have fantasies, that I'm the emperor of India. Right? I can have various fantasies, imaginations, ideas, illusions, and so on. I'm all that: fear, pain, suffering, and so on, I am all that accumulation.

Right? Are you clear, don't agree with me, that's the last thing you should do. But find out if what we are saying is true or false,

I can imagine there is God in me. But that may not be true.

Right? So I am this whole bundle of two million years, gathered as me. Right? And I become very important, because I am two million years old - I've learnt so much. That poor chap wandering up there in the garden doesn't know much, but you know a great deal. You respect those people who have a great deal of knowledge, and you despise those people who are there. Right?

So when you ask, why am I thinking about myself all day long, it's because you have been trained that way, you have been conditioned that way; society helps you, to think about yourself, because if you didn't, you might not get a job. So all the people help each other think about themselves. Right? You are a Muslim, and you think about Allah. So you build up all kinds of imaginary, superstitious, illusory stuff, called Maya. Right? And there are people who say, I must get away from all this, get away from myself. Right? I must forget myself, I must abandon myself, I must become something totally different from what I am. But is it the same circle repeated over and over again because I'm thinking about myself. I must meditate for two hours, which is, I'm thinking about myself, and so on and so on.

And your next question was, why is the mind always cluttered with thought. Why is the brain so occupied with thought? I explained just now. I see this thing in front of me, right, and I call it a microphone. Right? But the word microphone is not that. I don't know if you see that. That's very important to see in life - very important! - that the word is not the thing. You understand what I am saying? Or are you all nuts? It's very important to learn that the word is not the thing: the door, the word door, is not the actual thing.

S: Sir, why do you say that.

K: What?

S: That the door is not the door.

K: Now, you didn't listen. The word is different from the door. Is this too difficult? Look, my name is K. Right. But K is different from the actual. This becomes too difficult, does it? Now just a minute. Rishi Valley, the words Rishi Valley, is not the actual. Is this difficult? Why is the girl not bound to you? Why don't you understand it? The word is not the actual. You understand? You, your name is something. Right? That name is not you.

S: What importance does that have?

K: Tremendous importance. The word is never the thing. I can paint a picture of the Himalayas, but the picture is not the actual.

Right? I can describe New York, but New York is not what I describe. I can write about the Gita, or the Bible, or whatever it is, but what I write about is not the actual.

I wish you'd get this deep into your brain, because it'll help you then to deal with things actually. I have pain in my legs - suppose - that pain is not the word pain. Do you see it? I get hurt, a thorn, the pain, the word pain is different from the actual thorn and pain. Once grasp this fact, that the symbol is not the real. Right? Go to a temple, and there is some monstrous figure there, and that figure is the symbol of something else. But you worship that symbol. Go to a church, and there is the cross, that's the symbol of something else, but you worship that cross. Do you understand all this?

S: The symbol cannot describe the thing.

K: Yes, the symbol cannot describe. The symbol is not the actual and so on.

S: The symbol brings to your mind an idea of the real thing.

K: Does it? Is the idea a fact? The idea I'm going to climb the Himalayas, the idea is not the fact. I'm not climbing it.

S: No, but it is a picture of the Himalayas.

K: Ah, but that again is a symbol.

S: Yes, it makes you realize what the Himalayas look like.

K: But you haven't seen the Himalayas. So the seeing is different from the picture. Right? The actual seeing, the Himalaya mountains, their valleys, the blue lights of a morning on there, and the snow, is quite different from the picture, but we worship the picture. I don't know if you're following all this.

So your question is, why do we think about ourselves all the time? And the other question is, why are our brains filled with thought? Now the older people, what do they think of it? There they are, sitting in chairs - I'll wait sir till you are.

S: Our brain is like a box, sir, when we're young the box is empty, so there are hardly any thoughts, when you grow up the box starts getting filled.

K: That's right. You are like an empty bottle, you are saying, and as you grow up that bottle gets filled. Filled with what? With dirty water, clean water?

S: Both.

K: Both, that's right. Filled with dirty water, and clean water. Right? You can't mix clean water with dirty water, because the clean water then becomes dirty. That's what you are doing.

So you asked me to talk about myself. I have. If you could learn, as you learn mathematics, whether your mind can ever be quiet, your brain, ABSOLUTELY QUIET!

S: Then how do you get pure water?

K: You don't. He asked, how do you get pure water? Life doesn't give you pure water, it gives you dirty water, because you have pain, you have sorrow, you have grief, you're ambitious, you want to be something or other. That's all dirty water.

S: But sometimes you get happiness, don't you?

K: Yes, sometimes you get happiness. Now what do you mean by that word happiness?

S: When my wish is fulfilled.

K: Yes, when your wishes are fulfilled. I want to live comfortably, in a big house, with lots of servants; and if you can wish, if those wishes can be fulfilled, you are happy. Is that it? Suppose they are not fulfilled, you are sad, right, you're unhappy, you're depressed. So what is the difference between happiness and depression? It's too difficult for you, don't bother.

You understand sirs, ladies, to me, religious organizations are silly. You understand? Going to church, going to temples, mosques, repeat, repeat, repeat. What happens when you repeat?

S: You don't find anything new, sir.

K: Therefore will you stop repeating?

S: How do you stop that sir?

K: Don't ask me how I stop, will you stop? You stop scratching your head. I mean you start scratching, that becomes a habit. Right. And you can stop it, can't you, by saying, I won't do that. Right? Will you do that? Don't look at somebody else.

S: It's difficult sir.

K: That's right, it's difficult. So you'd rather keep on scratching. Right?

S: Sir, can we talk about the existence of God?

K: Jesus! How do you know if God exists?

S: That's what I want to ask.

K: You want to ask, is there God.

S: If there is, where is he, and why do we believe in him?

K: Where is he, and why do we bother about it?

S: We want to be secure.

K: Yes, sir. First let me answer her question, will you - do you mind. Is there God? Right? What do you think?

S: I think there might be, but I don't believe in God.

K: Why, why don't you believe?

S: Because I have never seen, I have just heard about God.

K: Go on, tell me.

S: It seems to me that God is something like a pillar of support.

K: What, financial support?

S: No, a pillar of support.

K: You are quite right. Yes sir, yes sir, but he said financial support, it was pretty good. That is, you rely, or you seek god when you are depressed, when you are unhappy, when you want something, when you pray. Right? Now, how do you find out if there is god, or not.

S: You don't actually see him.

K: Will you actually see him?

S: No, you find more about, when you see him you know more about him.

K: Do you know the story about two Americans going to heaven? And they wander about in heaven, all over the place, for weeks and months, and there is a sign saying, god. And they go up that path, and one of them says, that is too much of a climb, you go up and tell me all about it. So he goes up there and comes rushing back, my god it is a woman. Right? Now how do you know there is god? Because a hundred people say so?

S: Just because a hundred people say that there is God, doesn't mean anything. For all you know they might have heard from somebody else.

K: Quite right. So how do you know there is God?

S: When you see him.

K: Where do you see him?

S: Then who created the world?

K: He asks, if God didn't create the world - what do you mean by the world? You, the trees, the fishes, the water, the frogs, the elephants, the lions.

S: All matter.

K: All matter. That is, all the rocks, the trees, human beings, the valley, the rivers, everything you think is created by God.

S: If it's not God, who else can it be?

K: If it's not God, he asks, who else could it be.

S: It could be a form of energy or something.

K: What?

S: It could be some form of energy.

K: How do you know?

S: I'm just guessing.

K: Guessing. That's what they're all doing. And so somebody guesses much more, seriously, and said there is, and then you accept it. Suppose you don't accept your tradition, that there is God, then what will you do, how will you find out? That's much more important than believing. Right? Do you agree to that, it's much more important to find out, rather than believing. Right? Now, will you stop believing? Stop it - therefore, you are free from certain conclusions that there is God. Right? Will you do that, or you're frightened?

S: No.

K: No, don't say no, we're all frightened people.

S: Sir, we are frightened that if we don't believe in God, all our mothers and fathers believe in God, then they might say something about it.

K: That's right.

S: Sir, since we are children we are brought up to believe in God. We start believing that if we don't believe in God, God will do something bad to us.

K: I know. But first find out why you want to believe in something. Don't go to sleep! Why do you want to believe in something? Does it give you comfort, does it help you, does it cover up your sorrow, pain, and all that? Why do you believe in all this? What's wrong with you?

S: I think many people, including me, believe because they feel after so many stories which so many people have told them about God, I think this person is God, I think that person is God, they feel that if they believe in God, they might also be helped.

K: But find out if they have really been helped first.

S: I haven't been helped.

K: You're too young, you're too small. Don't bother about God and belief. You see that's one of our peculiarities, that we believe, right away, right? We believe. We never find out! Your belief will prevent you from finding out. You understand what I am saying?

S: Sir, you believe when someone close to you believes it, like your mother.

K: Yes, yes, if your mother believes, she wants you to believe the same thing. Right? And you listen to her but you don't have to believe.

S: Sir, some people are frightened that they might be excommunicated from the religion, and they don't want to do that. To be excommunicated from religion, if they don't believe in God.

K: I know, of course. That's playing games.

S: Sir, does God help anybody?

K: Me? Are you asking me? Has God helped me?

S: No, helped anyone.

K: You'd better ask them. But ask somebody who says God has helped them. Be careful. If he says he has, what will you do?

S: Believe in God.

K: Yes, that's all. Some nut comes along in peculiar clothes, like me, and he says there is God, I know there is God. Right? Will you believe him?

S: No, sir.

K: Why?

S: We don't believe unless we see it. He's got to prove it.

K: There is no proof.

S: You've got to be very convincing, only then can we believe.

K: You know, have you been to some of the magicians, some of the conjurers, have you seen them?

S: Yes sir.

K: They will do something before you know what has happened. No, don't go into all that, you're all too small.

What time is it?

S: Ten fifteen.

K: Ten fifteen. I've got fifteen minutes more? Too bad! What shall we talk about?

S: Is there a way of thinking without the past?

K: Is there a way of thinking without all the memories involved in the past? Right? To answer that question correctly, accurately, impersonally, you have to go into the whole structure, the nature of thought. Right? Have you done it? No. Would you like to do it? Would you like to listen to it? And would you like to follow it up after you have listened to it?

S: If it is true.

K: If it is true. Right? What is the origin, the beginning of thought? How does thought arise? So are you saying that thought has its roots in the past experience? In past experiences, plural. So you are saying are you, that thought has its roots in experience? Right? Are you saying yes?

S: Yes.

K: Be quite sure, don't hesitate. If you had no experience, would you think?

S: Sir, like I told you, our thought in the beginning is like an empty box, and that has been filled up sir, and that is all the past. If there is no past sir, the bottle be forever empty.

K: Quite right sir. You come out here. You don't mind, no. Do you mind coming up and sitting here?

S: No sir.

K: Good. He's saying, the bottle - we've gone back to the bottle, you know what going back to the bottle means? Drinking. Where do you come from?

S: Mandu.

K: Mandu, good. Do you like it here?

S: Yes.

K: Have you told the teachers you like it here?

S: My teacher asked that.

K: It's like an empty bottle that has been filled with a lot of experience. Right? This is what he says. And, from that experience, from that past, all the things that have been filled in the bottle, are memories, are remembrances, and so the bottle is always moving within itself. All right sir, and then what? Tell me, go on! Your brain is like an empty box, empty bottle, and filled from childhood with problems. Right. How to pass, how to read, how to write, and all that stuff, all through life. And so your brain, like a bottle, he says, is filled with all that. And when the bottle begins to move around, talk, the bottle, the contents of the bottle are remembrances, knowledge, which are then put into words - first thought, then words. Right? I wonder, don't agree, you don't learn anything if you merely agree.

S: Sir, pretend the box was empty, how did you get your first thought?

K: How did the first man, two million years ago, how did he begin to think? Have you seen that cartoon by a scientist, probably a biologist? You see the man's picture, a cartoon, a man who hunts game, hunts, eats, and sleeps. Right? Are you listening? Then the next cartoon is a little more advanced, he doesn't hunt, but he gets somebody else to hunt.

S: Because he knows it is dangerous.

K: Yes, yes. And the third picture is he doesn't hunt, but he's learning how to use instruments, and so on. So ultimately, he's become very intellectual, right, like you, very intellectual, very like us, you understand? First he begins by hunting and eating, then by making others hunt and eat, and third he's the picture of us. I don't know if you understand all this, it doesn't matter. So what makes us behave as we do? This is too difficult for you.

Have you ever sat quietly, not moving a muscle, not moving your eyes, have you done it? Would you like to do it? Sit absolutely quiet. Will you do it?

S: Sir, but what's the use of that?

K: What? What's the use of that? Just to control your body, see if you can control your body. There is no use in anything; if you say, why should I eat, what's the use of it, you die. Right? Yes sir. So, will you try and sit very, very quietly, not blink, not move your eyes. Try it old boy, try it for fun, you know, sit quietly, go on.

S: Life is fun sir?

K: Move your leg over - put the other leg over there old boy.

S: Sir, is life fun?

K: It all depends.

S: If it's dirty water it's no fun. If it's clean water, it's fun.

K: Clean water is, if you like to call it fun, but it is all mixed with dirty water. Right? So let's see if you can sit quietly for a minute.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC TALK 7TH JULY 1985

I see some old faces I can recognize. What shall we talk about? If one may, one would like to point out that we are a gathering of serious people who are concerned with a daily life. We are not concerned whatsoever with beliefs, ideologies, suppositions, theoretical conclusions or theological concepts, nor are we trying to find a sect, a group of people who follow somebody. We are not, let's hope, frivolous but rather that we are all together concerned with what is happening in the world and our responsibility to it - all the tragedies, the utter misery, poverty - not in this country, there are no slums, we were told the other day you couldn't have slums in this marvellous climate, though it has been raining day after day, but let's hope during these meetings that we have fairly good weather.

And also one would like to point out, if one may, that you and I, the speaker, are walking, taking a journey together, not in an aeroplane high up at 31,000 feet or 40,000 feet, but walking along a quiet road, a long endless road all over the world where one sees appalling terrorism, killing people for no purpose, just to threaten them, terrorize people, kidnapping people, hijacking, murdering, preparing to murder other people, wars, not only in Afghanistan, Beirut, and South America and all over the world. Perhaps most of you know all this. We don't seem to very much care, we are rather indifferent, it is only when it happens very close to us that we become concerned, worried, fearful. Where it is far away from us, each one of us, we are not so indifferent - or rather more indifferent. This is what is happening in the world - economic division, religious division, political division and all the religious sectarian divisions, and so on. There is a great deal of danger, hazards. One doesn't know what is going to happen in the future, not only in our own life time but also for our grandchildren, children and so on. The whole world is in a great crisis and the crisis is not only out there but also in each one of us. If you are at all aware of all this. And what is our responsibility to all that, on the part of each one of us? One must have asked this question of oneself very often: what is one to do? Where should one begin? Join a political party? Republican, Conservative, Democratic, Communist, following Marx and Stalin and all that group. Where would you all begin? What would each one of us do, facing this terrible society in which we live, each concerned with himself, with his own fulfilment, with his own sorrow, with his own misery, economic struggle, and so on and so on? Each one of us is concerned with himself. And what shall we do? Shall we pray to God? Repeat prayers over and over and over again? Or belonging to some sect, some guru and follow him, escaping from the world? Put on some medieval dress or modern robes of peculiar colour and all the rest of it? Can we withdraw from the world at all, like monks both in India and here?

Seeing all this, observing intimately, not as something in the newspapers, or something you have read about, or told about it, or been informed through journalists, novels, television and all the information industry, what is the role of each one of us, the responsibility?

As we said, this is not an entertainment, we are not trying to entertain you, or trying to tell what you should do, each one of us.

We have had leaders galore, hundreds, political, religious, those who say, "We are illumined, we have attained" - whatever they have attained. We have had thousands of leaders, political, economic, religious, sectarian, and they have been utterly helpless, they have their own theories, their own way and there are thousands of people who are following them, all over the world, quantities of money, really enormous wealth, not only the wealth of the Roman Catholic church but also the wealth of the gurus. It all ends up in money.

So if one may ask: what shall we do together? Or what shall we do, a single human being? Are we at all concerned, or are we seeking some peculiar satisfaction, gratification for ourselves? Or we are committed to a certain symbol, religious or otherwise, and we cling to that, hoping that symbol, that - what lies behind that symbol helps us. This is a very serious question. It is becoming much more serious now, for there is the threat of war, then total uncertainty.

May I, may the speaker inform you of a conversation he had with a Mr.X, may I? A conversation between this Mr.X and the speaker for several days continuously. Mr.X has travelled all over the world, more or less, he told the speaker. He is fairly well read, gone to various Institutions, sometimes he joined them, and with a rush he got out of them. He followed one guru or another and gave them up. And for a few weeks he tried to become a monk, and that too he gave up. And he looked at the various political parties, extreme Left, extreme Right, Centre and the spectrum of political activities. And at last he said, I have come to talk with you. I would like to have a conversation with you, at the same level as I am, not you are pretentious, or your real position. I don't know what you are, I have read something about you. May I go on with this conversation? May I repeat? Does it interest you?

And he said let's talk over things together like two friends, you and I. Like two friends who have lived together in the sense in the world, been through every kind of travail, and he said to the speaker, what is it all about? Why is man born like this? Why has he become after many, many, many millenia what he is now? Through that long period of evolution, long period of time, suffering, anxious, lonely, despairing, disease, death and always the gods somewhere about, among the Olympian mountains, or on the River Nile, or in the ancient city of Benares in India. Let's forget all about those gods and let us talk together as two human beings, living in this world, in this marvellous country, the earth which is so beautiful, which is the mother of all things - right? You are following all this? Mother was worshipped because the earth is the mother. The Greeks had the Athene with several breasts, I think four on each side, representing that she was the mother of the earth - mother as the earth.

And so he gave, this Mr.X, gave something of his inward thoughts, his outward activities. And he said what is all this about? Why are human beings, who have educated themselves, sophisticated, experts in technology, and can argue the hind legs off a donkey - do you understand all these expressions? - who can invent gods and goddesses and everything, why have human beings all over the world, why are they in perpetual conflict? Not only with the environment, not only with their governments whom they have elected, or dominated by a Politburo, or dominated by some dogma invented by ancient priests, but in spite of all this why is each human being everlastingly, from the moment he is born till he dies, why does he live in this conflict? That was the first question he asked, this Mr.X. Why? What is the raison d'etre, or the cause of this conflict, not only outwardly but also most deeply, inwardly, subjectively, inside the skin as it were, why is he in conflict? They have talked endlessly about peace, all the religions have preached, long before Christianity, centuries before Christianity, live at peace, be peaceful, be quiet, be gentle, generous, affectionate, loving. In spite of their propaganda, in spite of human beings programmed from their childhood, encouraged to be aggressive, or to be gentle, or to go, face the world for themselves, alone, fighting - you know all that. Is there an answer to this question, a final, irrefutable answer? That is, can human beings in this world, living their daily life, going to the office, keeping a house, sex, children and all that, and also this search, this longing for something much more than the mere material things of life. Can this question be ever solved? And apparently man has not solved it, though he has lived on this earth for two or three million years and for forty thousand years, or fifty thousand years as a human being. We have gathered tremendous experience. We have gathered a great deal of knowledge. Mr.X was telling the speaker, we have gathered immense information technologically, but inwardly we remain Barbarians trying to kill each other, trying to compete with each other, destroy each other.

So he came all that way, which is a long distance, bus, train, aeroplane, and he said answer this question: is there a cause for this conflict? And if there is a cause then let's discover what the cause is. Not that you are going to lead me, or tell me, but together you, Mr.X and the speaker, together, not that you will tell me and I will accept, or I will go and think about it and come to some kind of my own conclusion, but rather, he said, Mr.X, that together as two human beings, not one is sitting on a platform and the other sitting down below - sorry! - but together as two human beings who have gone through a great deal of life, the loneliness, the desperation, the anxiety, the uncertainty, wanting love and not finding it, or loving and not be satisfied with that, always pushing, pushing, pushing, always wanting to achieve something, whether it is heaven, or illumination, or enlightenment, or become a multimillionaire, which is more or less the same thing. All want to achieve something. They are never content, they never know what peace is, they never sit quietly under a tree looking at the mountains, the rivers, the blade of grass and the beauty of the earth and sunlight, and the glory of an early morning.

So Mr.X said to the speaker let's talk, let us question each other, never accepting what he says, or what you say. I won't accept a thing from you, nor will you accept a thing from me. We are on the same level, you may be very clever, you may have a reputation which is nonsense, you may go around the earth, or a certain part of the earth, all that doesn't count. It has no value. With which the speaker agreed wholeheartedly.

So let us explore this curse which man has borne from the beginning of time: why man, which includes woman please, why man lives this way, why man is in conflict in his own intimate relationship, sexually, in a family, the whole network of conflict - right?

So he came the next day, Mr.X, and we continued. We sat on the veranda on a beautiful day overlooking the valley with the great mountains round us, snow-capped, marvellous valleys, blue and lovely azure skies, and the sun glittering on the leaves, dappled earth, everything seemed so marvellously alive, pulsating, full of energy. There we were, he and the speaker, watching this great beauty and never being with the beauty, always watching it, never feeling the beauty with one's heart and mind, be utterly sensitive to all the glory of the earth. He said we won't talk about beauty, that is your business, you tell me about it. He said we would a little later. First let us take a journey or explore together into this question of conflict. We are asking: must human beings bear with it, get accustomed to it, hold it, never, never be able to put it completely aside, so that his brain then can function as it should, completely untethered, completely free, not programmed, not conditioned.

So now the speaker is putting this question to you. And also we discussed, talked over, debated this point: what is the cause of it? We are taking a journey together, not asking you to tell me, or I to tell you. What is the cause of it? Everywhere there is struggle. You might say there is struggle in nature, the big animal lives on the smaller animal and so on. In a forest the little tree is struggling against the gigantic trees for light. You might say everywhere on earth, in nature, there is conflict, some kind of struggle going on. So why shouldn't we also go on that way because we are part of nature? There out there, there is conflict, what human beings call conflict, it may not be, it may be the most natural way of nature acting: the hawk, the eagle kills the rabbit, bears kill salmon, the tiger kills something swiftly, or the cheetahs, it goes on killing, killing, killing, in nature. And one might say we are also part of this whole nature so it is inevitable that we should be in constant struggle. If one accepts that, that it is natural, inevitable, there is nothing more to be said about it, because you say it is natural, we will go on that way because we are part of the whole earth. But if one begins to question it, Mr.X was telling the speaker, if you begin to question it then where are you? That means, are you willing together to find out because we are supposed to be a little more active, intelligent than the trees, the tigers, the elephants, not the elephants fortunately they don't kill too many things, but they destroy trees, and the cheetah and all the rest of it. We may have come from the ape, probably we have, we must be stray monkeys. And if we do not accept that conflict is the way of life then what is one to do? Where does one start to understand the whole movement of conflict? Where does one - how does one feel one's way into all this? Either, the speaker said to Mr.X, either you analyse very carefully all the factors of conflict, one after the other. Through analysis, self analysis or being analysed by another, or accepting the professional advice of professors, philosophers, psychologists, if one begins to analyse, will that bring about the discovery of the cause? Either the discovery will be intellectual - right? - through analysis, or that analysis may bring you certain intellectual conclusions, or you put all the analytical factors together and see the whole. You understand what.? Is that possible? Or is there a different approach to the question? You understand? I wonder if Mr.X understands what the speaker is saying?

So he asks Mr.X do we - we are still on the same level, same comprehension? That is, the speaker is telling Mr.X analysis implies one who is analyser - right? Therefore there is an analyser and the analysed, the subject and the object - right? Is there such a difference in oneself as the subject and the object? Are we getting together? That is the first question the speaker asks Mr.X. You are the Mr.X. The analyser has been encouraged through education, through conditioning, through being programmed, that he, the analyser is different completely from that which he analyses - right? And a microscope, when you look at something very attentively, that very attention gives greater light to that which is being observed - right? I won't go into this. The speaker says I am going to question the whole attitude towards analysis. I am not accepting - the speaker says I am not accepting what the professionals say about analysis, including those people who come from Vienna, or the latest American psychologists. I am not accepting any of those. The speaker tells Mr.X, but I question it, I question the - not only the activity of analysis but who is the analyser? If you can understand the analyser first then what need there be for analysis? You understand Sir? Am I going too fast? May we go together in this?

I analyse myself. I have been angry, or greedy, or sexual, whatever it is, and in analysing, that is breaking up and looking at it very carefully step by step, who is the observer? Is not the observer, the speaker is telling Mr.X don't accept what he says but together question, doubt, is not the analyser all the accumulated past remembrances? He is conditioned through experience, his knowledge, his way of looking at life, his peculiar tendencies, his prejudices [noise of train - then tape turns over.] - his prejudices, his religious programmed - being programmed religiously, all this is the past, all this is the background of his life, from childhood. He is the observer, he is the analyser. Whether that background includes communal remembrance, racial remembrance racial consciousness and so on and so on, he is the observer. And then the observer breaks it up into the observed and the observer - right? Are you following? So that very division in analysis creates conflict. Right? Are we together? You are the Mr.X, I am the speaker. Are we taking the same journey together? That is, the moment there is a division between the analyser and the analysed there must be inevitably be conflict of some kind, subtle, fatuous, no meaning, but it is a conflict, overcome, conquer, suppress, transcend, all these are efforts in minor or major form - right?

So one discovers that where there is division between the Swiss and the Germans, and the French and the English, wherever there is a division there must be conflict. I and you. We and they. Not that there is not division, the rich are very powerful. But if we created subjectively a division, I belong to this and you belong to that, I am a Catholic, you are a Protestant, I am a Jew and you are an Arab - right?

So wherever between two people [noise of train] - so whenever there is this division between man and woman, between God and earth, between 'what should be' and 'what is' - I wonder if you - I am asking Mr.X if he is following all this, not only verbally, intellectually, which is meaningless, but with his heart, with his being, with his vitality, energy and passion, that wherever there is a division, me and you, I am a woman and you are a man.

So one begins to discover the root of conflict. Is it possible for a human being living in a modern world, going to a job, earning a livelihood, business there, family here, I am aggressive there and with my wife submitting, and all that. So that one's life becomes a contradiction. Can that contradiction end, otherwise we will live in conflict, otherwise one becomes a hypocrite? If one likes to be a hypocrite, that is all right too. But if one wants to live very honestly, which is absolutely necessary, to live with great austere honesty, not to someone, to one's country, to one's ideal, but to say exactly what you mean and what you mean you say. Not what others have said and you repeat, that is not honesty. Or believe in something and do quite the opposite - right? All talk about peace. Every government, every religion, and every preacher, including the speaker, talks about peace. And to live peacefully demands tremendous honesty and intelligence. So is it possible, living in the twentieth century, or now, to live inwardly first, psychologically first, subjectively, not to have in oneself any kind of division? Please do enquire, search, ask with passion. Passion doesn't include fanaticism, passion doesn't demand martyrdom - right? It is not something you are so attached and that very attachment gives you passion - you understand? That is not passion, it is tied to something which gives you the feeling of passion, energy, like a donkey tied to a post, it can wander round and round and round but it is still held there.

So could we, Mr.X and the speaker, not telling each other what they should do, discover for themselves in all honesty, without any sense of deception, without any sense of illusion, whether it is possible, possible, not saying it is possible, whether it is possible to live in this world, wars, you know all the horrors that are going on, without conflict, without division? Don't go to sleep please, it is too early in the morning. If you are asked, you are the Mr.X, if you are asked what would your answer be inwardly? You are a Swiss, a Hindu, an Indian, a Muslim, or follow some clique, or some group, some guru's followers, wouldn't one have to abandon all that completely? You may have a Swiss passport, the speaker has an Indian passport but he is not an Indian - they don't like that in India but we have told them several times not to belong to any cult, to any guru, to anything. You are going to find this terribly difficult. Not at the end of it you stand alone, but there is the comprehension, the inward awareness, insight, into all that thing which is really nonsensical. It may give one momentary satisfaction, belonging to something, belonging to a group, belonging to some sect, but that is all becoming rather weary, wretched and ugly.

So can one not be attached to any of this? - including what the speaker is saying specially? So that one's own brain, and strangely your brain is not the brain of another is also the other, you understand? Your brain is like the brain of every other human being. It has immense capacity, immense, incredible energy. Look what they have done in the technological world. All the scientists in America are now concerned with Star Wars. We won't go into all that. The energy, you understand? The brain has this extraordinary energy, if you concentrate on something, give your attention to something. They have given attention to kill other human beings, so the atom bomb came into being. So our brains are not ours, they have evolved through a long period of time. And in that evolution we have gathered tremendous knowledge, experience, and in all that state there is very little what is called love. You understand? I may love my wife, or my children, or my country. My country has been divided by thought, geographically, it is the world - my world, the world in which one lives is the entire world. So my brain which has evolved through a long period of time, that brain with its consciousness is not mine because my consciousness, Mr.X is saying, I have read something about what you have said, I am not repeating what you have said, but this is what I also feel, see its actuality, that wherever I have been, in every corner of the earth, there are human beings who suffer, pain, anxiety, desperate loneliness [noise of train] - and so our consciousness is shared by all other human beings. Do you realize this? Not up here, not intellectually but actually. If one really feels that then there will be no division. Do you understand? I do not know whether Mr.X - I ask him, do you see this reality, not a concept of it, not an idea of it, not the beautiful conclusion but the actuality of it? The actuality is different from the idea of actuality - right? You are sitting there, that is actual, but I can imagine that you are sitting there which is totally different.

So our brain, which is the centre of our consciousness, with all the nervous responses, sensory responses, centre of all our knowledge, all experience, knowledge, memory, your memory may vary from another, but it is still memory. You may be highly educated, the other may have no education at all, doesn't even know how to read and write, but it is still part of that - right? So your consciousness is shared by every human being on this earth. Therefore you are entire humanity. Do you understand Sirs? You are in actuality, not theoretically or theologically, or in the eyes of God we are all one - probably gods have no eyes! But in actuality wherever you go there is this strange irrevocable fact that we all go through the same mould, same anxiety, hope, fear, death, loneliness that brings such desperation. So we are mankind. And when one realizes that deeply conflict with another ceases because you are like me.

So that is what we talked about, Mr.X and Mr.K. And also we continued about other things for he was there for several days. But we first established a real relationship which is so necessary when there is any kind of debate, any kind of communication. Not only verbal but un - words don't convey profoundly what one wants, what one desires to convey. So at the end of the second day, or the first day, we said, where are we? You, Mr.X and Mr.K, where are we in this? Have we brought about, not change, change implies time - I don't know, we will go into that another time - have we merely gathered - you understand, as we gather harvest. We sow, which is you have come here, which is part of sowing. And you have listened to K and Mr.X what have you gathered? Which means gathering means accumulation - right? You have gathered so much information - please follow this, we will stop presently, don't get sleepy or nervous. You have gathered so much from professionals, from psychologists, from psychiatrists, you understand, gathered, gathered, gathered. And Mr.X, K asks him, have you gathered also? If you have gathered then it becomes any other gathering. I know, I have gathered, or rather learnt how to climb a mountain, now I am an expert at climbing the mountain. I am not but... So the brain is like a magnet, gathering. So K asks Mr. X what have you gathered? Or are you free from gathering? Please this is very... you understand? Please, if you have the patience, listen to this.

So do we ever stop gathering? Gathering bedsheets, pillowcases, that of course, water, gathering a degree in order to have a good job? For practical things in life one has to gather. But to see where gathering is not necessary, that is where the art of living comes. Because then if you are gathering our brain is never free, is never empty to - we won't go into the question of emptiness but that is a different matter - but are we aware that we are gathering, gathering, gathering? As we gather habits, and when you have gathered so much it is very difficult to get rid of it. This gathering conditions the brain. Born in India, belonging to a certain type of people, tradition, religious, or very, very orthodox, and you have gathered all that. And then to be free of all that takes immense enquiry, searching, looking, watching, aware. So is it possible not to gather at all? Please consider this, don't reject it. Find out. You have to gather knowledge to go to your house, how to drive a car, to speak a foreign language, you have to gather words, verbal irregularities and all the rest of it, but inwardly is it necessary to gather at all? Enlightenment is not gathering. On the contrary it is total freedom from all that. Which is after all love, isn't it? I don't love you because I have gathered you. Right? I have sexually been satisfied with you, or you are companionable, or I am lonely and therefore I depend on you. Then that becomes a marketable thing. Then we exploit each other, use each other, sell each other down the river. Surely that is not love, is it? It is the quality of a brain that doesn't gather anything at all. And then what it says will be what it has discovered, not what other people have said. And in that there is tremendous passion, not lust, passion. But it has not fanaticism. I don't suddenly become a strict vegetarian, won't touch salt. Or I am a Muslim, fanatical Shi'ites - you understand. They have all passion of a certain type but they have become fanatical, inclined to martyrdom, and all the rest of that business.

So I am asking, the speaker, K is asking Mr.X. find out if you can live without gathering. You can't be told about it. We can enquire into it together, but the actuality of never gathering, never the accumulated memory operating. This is really very subtle, it requires a great deal of enquiry.

May we stop now? It is an hour and a quarter we have talked. You haven't talked but K has talked. But we have had a communication with each other, because we have established the basis of a communication in which there is no superior and the inferior, one who knows and one who does not know. May we get up? Après vous! After you!

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC TALK 10TH JULY 1985

May we continue with what we were talking about the other day? I think it is important to realize that this is not a personality cult. The person called K is not important at all. But what is important is what he is saying, not what he looks like, his personality, and all the rest of that nonsense. So please, if one may point out carefully and definitely, that the person who is speaking on the platform is in no way important. So this is not a personal cult with all the nonsense that goes with it.

We talked about the other day various forms of conflict, what is the cause of it, why does one throughout the beginning of mankind, two and a half million years ago or so, why man, including of course the woman, why have they lived in conflict and have never solved that problem at all? And throughout the ages, during this long period of evolution, of many, many millenia we are still in conflict with each other, between man and woman, between human beings, between a group of people, between nations, sexes, religions, this has been going on for thousands of years. I am sure one is aware of all this.

Either we are utterly indifferent to what is going on, the terrorism, the brutality, the appalling cruelty, all that hideous things that are taking place in the world - who is responsible for all this? As we said the other day, this is a serious gathering, not just spend a good morning under a tent, or listen to somebody, but this is a serious, active, co-operative, definite gathering.

We were asking too this morning, who is responsible for all this? The responsibility, which implies care, attention, to what is not only - what is taking place outwardly in the world, but also inwardly in all of us, who is responsible for this? Are the politicians responsible? That is, let them do what they want to do, because we have elected them in the so-called Democratic society. In the Totalitarian states they are not elected, they just come to power and dominate the whole. All that is going on in the Communist world. So again who is responsible? The religions? The Islamic world? The Christian world? The Hindu world? Buddhist and so on? Or are we responsible, each one of us? Please do consider this. Is each one of us, living in this world, in this environment, not only in lovely Switzerland but also all over the world, is each one of us, you, sitting there and the speaker here, are we responsible for all this? When you put that question to yourself - I hope we are doing that - are you responsible for creating this appalling world, dangerous world, the brutal world and the terrifying? If you have gone to various countries you see all this, enormous poverty, and those who are terribly rich, high position, born to it and for the rest of their life they have got their riches, castles, mansions and so on. There are millions upon millions of poor people, starving. Who is responsible? If you are responsible because you are, as we are, responsible for creating this society, we have created this society around us, the culture, the religion, the gods, all the rest of that ritualistic repetition and sensation. Because we are angry, greedy, violent, disorderly, hating and only limiting our affection to a very, very, very small few, and we, each one of us, have created this society in which we live. Is that so? Is each one of us responsible? Or you say, "I am sorry I am not." Or you are indifferent to the whole thing as long as we are safe in a particular country, protected by frontiers.

So we come to a very serious question. What is order? And what is disorder? Please we are discussing, or going together over this question. We are deliberating over this question. Not that you will accept, or in any way acquiesce to what the speaker is saying, then that would be utterly futile. But if we could together take a very long journey, not only intellectually, verbally, but much more profoundly. Why the society, which we have created, each one of us, which is creating such terrible disorder, cruelty and all that, are we responsible for all that? And are we different from society, the thing that we have created? Or must there be order first at the house, at our house? Not only in the outer walls of a house, and garden, or the valley, but also the inward world in which we all live, the subjective world, the psychological world. Is there disorder there? You understand my question? I hope the speaker is making it quite clear. As long as we live, each one of us, in disorder - we will go into the question of what is disorder in detail - as long as we live in disorder psychologically, subjectively, inwardly, whatever we do will create disorder. The Totalitarian states have said by changing the society, the environment, forcing them, compelling them, will change humanity, the human brain. They have not succeeded. There is constant dissent, revolt and all the rest of it.

So if you see this, that we have created this disorder and this disorder is the society in which we live then what shall we do? Where do you start? Do you want to change society? The social reform, the do-gooders, the men who want to alter laws, through terrorism, through compulsion, through, all the rest of it? Or do you put your own house inwardly in order? Is the question clear? If it is not clear we will go over it again. That would be rather an empty waste of time.

So how shall I, or you, put our house in order? Because that is the only place I can start, not outward reforms, outward change of laws, form United Nations. There if I may digress a little bit, we were invited to speak there last year and this year. One of their big shots got up after K had spoken and said, "At last after forty years of working in this Institution, very hard, I have come to the conclusion that we must not kill each other." (Laughter) Forty years! And we do the same, hoping something will happen out there, something that will compel us, force us, persuade us, drive us. And we have depended on the outer, outer challenges, outer wars and so on.

So what shall we do? It is no good joining little communities, following some guru. That is total irresponsibility. Giving, surrendering oneself to somebody, who calls himself enlightened, lead you to... whatever he will lead you to, generally money and so on. So how shall we start inwardly and bring about order? Order implies no conflict, doesn't it? No conflict in oneself, completely no conflict. We went into the question the other day, what is the cause of conflict? Volumes have been written about it.

Psychologists, psychiatrists, therapists and so on have explained verbally, millions of words have been spilled over, and yet we remain, all of us, in conflict. Where the mind, the brain is in disorder, which is the essence of conflict, that brain can never be orderly, simple, clear. If that is taken for granted as a law. Law of gravity, the law the sun rises in the East and sets in the West. That where there is subjective or inward conflict there must be disorder. Look into it please carefully. [Noise of train.]

And what is the nature of disorder? Not what is order, because a confused mind can invent order and say, "That is order." A brain that is caught in illusions, as most people are, then it will create its own order out of confusion - right? So what is the nature of disorder? Why do we say there must be order and then be in disorder? You understand? Why do we separate the two? You understand? We say we realize we are in disorder, which is fairly simple, and then we are seeking order out of it - right? That is, the politicians know there is disorder - right? And they are seeking order - right? Is this clear? Of course. Not only the politicians, each one of us, we know our life is in disorder. Go to the office in the morning from nine until five - what a life you lead! Nine to five, or twelve to midnight, or whatever it is, and struggle, fight, ambitious, greedy, aggressive, climbing the ladder, and come home and be very docile - right? Or submit to your wife, or husband, or whatever it is. So there is disorder in this. Then there is disorder and all the time the brain is seeking order, all the time because it cannot live in disorder. It cannot function clearly, beautifully, exquisitely, its highest capacity when there is disorder. Therefore there is a slight search for order - right? In all of us. So we are asking: why is there this division? You understand? Order and then living in disorder. I don't know if you are following all this - right? Don't be puzzled, there is nothing - it is very simple. We live in disorder, that is certain. Why bother about order? Right? Let us see if we can clear up disorder. Then if you clear it up then there is order. There is not this conflict between disorder and order. You understand?

Look: it is fairly simple this. We are violent people, aggressive, not only physically but also psychologically, inwardly. We want to hurt people. We say things brutally about others. Violence is not merely physical action, activity, but also violence is psychological, aggressive, imitative, comparing oneself against another and so on, all that is a form of violence. Right? We are, by nature from the animal and so on, violent. And we don't stay with that, recognizing I am violent, but we invent non-violence - right? We say, "I mustn't be violent" - you understand? Why bother with not being violent? You are violent. Let's see, stay with that, hold with that, not move away from that, then we can examine it together and then see how far we can go to dissipate it. But if you are constantly struggling to become non-violent then you can't solve the problem. Because when you are trying to become non-violent you are all the time sowing the seeds of violence. You understand? Right? I am violent, I hope one day to be without violence, that one day is pretty far away and during that interval I sow, I am still violent, perhaps not so much but still violent. So I say don't let me bother with not being violent, let's understand violence, what is its nature, why it exists, is it possible to be free of it completely? Right? That's much more interesting and vital than pursuing non-violence - right?

So similarly it is important to understand disorder, and forget about order. Because if we understand and move out of that intellectual, verbal understanding, then we can find out to live a life which is completely non-violent. Right? I hope we are clear on this matter.

So what is disorder? Because the brain is not seeking order, it is not concentrated, attentive to discover what is disorder. This is a dialogue between you and the speaker. Don't wait for him to answer that question, then you will just repeat. But if you can discover, find the truth of it, it is yours, then you can act. But if you merely listen to what the speaker is saying then you repeat, you don't know, "I don't understand, it is so difficult" and all the rest of that nonsense. Right? So what is disorder? To say one thing and think another - right? To act in one way and hiding your own thoughts, feelings, in another way. That is only a very simple matter. That requires great honesty, to say things what you mean. Not what others have told you what you mean. Right? Probably all of you have read a great deal so your brains are full of all the other people's knowledge, other people's concepts, prejudices, added to your own. So you repeat. But you never sit down, or walk in the woods, and find out what is disorder. And to find out one has to have tremendous honesty. Face things as they are. If I am afraid, I am afraid, I don't pretend I am not afraid. If I have told a lie, I say I have told a lie, not defend it, cause, you know all the game around it. So if each one can face exactly what one is, not what one should be. Are we together in this? We are walking the same road together, for the time being? So gradually, or instantly, you find out for yourself the causation of disorder. That is, there must be disorder where there is conflict of any kind - right? Either physical, or subjective, or psychological. And conflict exists when there are two opposing factors in life, the good and the bad - right? Is the good something totally separate from the bad? Or is the good partly bad? You understand? Am I making myself clear? No.

What is bad? And what is good? Obviously to kill another is bad, in the name of God, in the name of etc. etc., another human being. And what is good? To be good. Are you waiting for my description? Probably you have never gone into all this. Is - we will go into this rather interesting subject. Is the good separate from the bad? Or does the good have its roots, its beginning of the bad - you understand? I won't ask if you understand. It is silly on my part. There are two elements in human beings, the good and the bad. The bad I say to be angry. The good is not to be angry. But I have known anger - right? And when I say I mustn't be angry, I will be good, the good is born out of my anger. No? When I say, "I must be good" because I have known the bad. Right? If I don't know the bad I am the good. Not the goods! I am the good. You understand this? I wonder if you understand. That is as long as I am violent I don't know what is the other. If I am not violent then the other is. So is the good born out of the bad? And if it is born out of the bad, the good, then it is not good. Right? Are we together in this? It seems rather mystifying, but please it is not. It is very simple. That is why I said please let us think simply, clearly, without prejudice, without taking a bias.

So love is not hate - right? If love is born out of hate then it is not love. Is that clear? If I - I don't, the speaker does not hate anybody, but suppose he does, then he says, "I mustn't hate, I must love", that is not love. It is still part of hate. It is a decision, it is an act of thought. And thought is not love. I won't go into that now, for the moment, we will go into it.

So can we, each one of us, feeling the responsibility that we have created this society in which we live, which is monstrous, immoral, beyond imagination, what we have done, can each one of us living in this world, in this society, be utterly free of disorder? That means to be free of complete end of conflict, end of this feeling of duality in us. Duality, the opposing elements in us. So is it not a matter of being tremendously aware - you understand? Aware of every thought - right? Can we?

So that leads up to a certain point: what is thought? What is thinking? If you are asked: what is thinking, what would be your answer? Thinking. You are thinking now. But I am asking you, the speaker is asking you: what is thinking? And you begin to think. And all our life is thinking and sensation - right? Sensation, it is my clock, the child says, "My book", "That's my swing" - so what is thinking? By thinking mankind has sent a rocket to the moon. But that thinking also put a flag up there, which is so... you follow? Go all the way up to the moon and put a flag. [Laughter] No don't. See what thought is doing. Tremendous invention, concentration, co-operation of thousands of people, training and they go up there and do the most... [Tape turns over] And so thought has created the whole world of technology - right? Astonishing things they are doing, of which we have very little imagination, or we know very little about it. The computer, the extraordinary submarines and so on and so on. All that has been done by thinking - right? And it has built the most extraordinary buildings - right? So when you write a letter you have to think, when you drive a car it is almost automatic but you have to think what... and so on. So thinking has become extraordinarily important for all of us - right? Thinking is part of our programme. We have been programmed. I am a Catholic, you are a Protestant, I am a Muslim, you are a Hindu, you are a Communist, I am a Democrat - you follow? It is part of our conditioning - right? Which is, we are being programmed, newspapers, magazines, the politicians, the priests, the archbishop, the pope, you know the whole thing, we are being programmed. So thinking is what? Why do you think? Why do you think at all? Why don't you just act? You can't. First you design very carefully what you are going to do, is it right, and wrong, is it should be, should not be, and then your own emotions, sensations say it is all right, all wrong, and you go and do it. All this is a process of thinking. Right? Should I marry, should I not? That girl is right, that girl is... [Laughter]... or the other way round. So thinking has done an extraordinary amount of harm, war - right? Hate, jealousy, wanting to hurt others. So what is thinking? The good, so-called good and so-called bad thinking - right? Right thinking and wrong thinking, but it is still thinking. Right? Oriental thinking and Western thinking, but it is still thinking. What is thinking? Don't wait for me. Put yourself that question. What is thinking? Can you think without memory? (Coughs) - sorry. You cannot think without memory. Then what is memory? Go on. Put your brains into it. Remembrance? Long association of ideas, long bundle of memories. Then you ask: what is memory? I remember the house I lived in. I remember my childhood. That is what? The past. Right? The past is memory. You don't know what will happen tomorrow but you can project what might - it might what, what it might do. That is still the action of memory in time. Right?

So what is memory? How does memory come? This is all so simple. [Noise of train] Memory cannot exist without knowledge. Right? If I have no knowledge of my accident in a car which happened yesterday - it didn't - that accident is remembered. But previous to that remembrance there was the accident, which was the knowledge - right? The accident becomes a knowledge, then from that knowledge is memory, yes, memory. If I had no accident there would be no memory of an accident. You can imagine other people's accidents. So knowledge is based on experience - right? So experience is always limited. I can have more experience, more varieties of experience, not only physical, sexual, but also so-called inward, experience of some illusory god and so on and so on. Right? So experience, knowledge, memory, thought. Right? So knowledge - experience being always limited, always, I can't experience, experience the immensity of order of the universe - right? I can't experience it. But I can imagine it. It is marvellous! So experience is limited and therefore knowledge is limited, whether in the future or now because all knowledge is being added, more and more - right? Scientific knowledge is based on that. From before Galileo and so on and so on and so on, there has been added, added, added. So knowledge is always limited whether now or in the future - right? So memory is limited. So thought is limited. Right? This is where the difficulty is. Thought is limited. Thought has invented gods, saviours, rituals, Lenin and Marx and Stalin Limited, their knowledge. So thought, whatever it does, noble or ignoble, religious or non-religious, virtuous or not virtuous, moral or immoral, it is still limited. Whatever thought does. Right? Are we together in this?

So can thought bring about order? Because thought itself being limited maybe the source of disorder. I wonder if you capture this? You understand my question? Very interesting. Go into it. Anything that is limited must create disorder. If I am a Muslim, which is very limited, I must create disorder. If I am an Israeli, it is limited, I must create disorder. Or a Hindu, Buddhist, Christian, and all the rest of it. Right? So is thought the very root of disorder? Go into it. Please be sceptical, don't accept a thing that the speaker says. Find out, investigate, not tomorrow, now sitting there, go into it, find out. Put your passion into it, not your fanaticism. Then you will begin to discover.

So we have lived so far after two and a half million years, or less, or more, as human beings, in a state of violence, disorder, conflict, and all that is brought about by thought - right? All of it. So I begin to enquire, one begins to enquire: is there something else which is as active, as clear, as precise and energetic as thought? You understand? One discovers, say, K discovers that thought is very limited, long ago. Nobody told him but he discovered it, or came upon it. And then he begins to ask is there another instrument like that? Right? Thought is within this brain, within this skull - right? The brain is the holder of all thought, all memories, all experience. It is also all emotion, sensation, nervous responses. It is the vast memory that is held there, racial, non-racial, personal, you follow, all that is there. And the centre of all that is thought. It may say, "No, it is something else", it is still thought. When it says it is seeking super consciousness, it is still thought.

So one asks, K asks is there another instrument, not this, another instrument, or not an instrument, a way, a movement which is not of this kind? Right? Are you asking that question? Right? If you are asking it who is going to tell you? Is thought going to tell you? Be careful please. This demands great subtlety, skill because thought can be very deceptive. It says, "All right I have understood thought is limited" but it is still active. And then it begins to invent. "I know thought is limited but God is limitless, and I am seeking God." Thought is limited but it invents the rituals, the Middle Ages' robes, of the monks and the priests and all the rest of it.

So to find that out, can the brain - this is a very - can the brain use thought, act thoughtfully when it is necessary - right? - and otherwise no thought? You understand? Can the brain when necessary use thought? Or live with thought both when you drive a cars, when you eat, when you write a letter, when you do this and that, it is all the movement of limited thought. That is when necessary thought can act. But otherwise why should it chatter all day long? You understand?

So is there another instrument which is not at all thought? Which is not put together by thought, or conceived by thought, or manufactured subtly by thought? You understand? Find out. That requires the understanding of time. May I go into it? You aren't tired? Well you have paid for it so it is up to you!

You have to understand what is time. Not the time of the rising of the sun and the setting, which is also time. The time of the new moon and the full moon. The time of day from morning until evening, twenty four hours. Time is also all that happened in one's life which are a thousand yesterdays - right? And all that might happen tomorrow. Time is horizontal and vertical - right? The going up and linear. And time which is the past, time now, sitting here, and time also is tomorrow. So this is the cycle in which we are caught. A thousand yesterdays, many days in our life, and before I die there will be some more days. So this whole movement, the cyclical movement is time - right? Are we? Right? Time is necessary to evolve from the little seed to the big tree - right? From the little baby to the grown up man. There is the physical time and also there is psychological time. I am this, but I will be that. To become that I need time - right? You are following all this? So the brain lives in time. The brain has been cultivated, grown, evolved through time, from the most primitive now to the most sophisticated, it took time. So this whole movement of life as we know it is time - right? Right? Is that all?

Then we know what was yesterday. You may remember your childhood, you may remember your life twenty years ago and ten days ago, which is the past - right? Following? Which is the past. That past is the present, slightly changed, slightly modified by present circumstances. Are you following? Or am I talking to myself. Don't go to sleep. Another ten minutes please. Don't go to sleep or get bored. It is your life we are talking about, not my life. It is your life, your daily life. What it actually is, not what it should be. Your daily, monotonous, lonely, desperate, anxious, uncertain life. And that life is part of the movement of time. Time is also that time coming to an end when I die. So we are concerned with time. I will have a better job if I keep at it. If I get more skilful I will have more money. Right? All that is time. And yesterday, many yesterdays, being slightly modified by circumstances, by pressures, is now - right? Do you see that? All that has happened from a thousand yesterdays becomes slightly polished, slightly modified and goes to the future - right? The past modifying it self through the present becomes the future - right? So the future is now. I wonder if you see this. Right? This requires - please just give it a little time. That is I lived in India, with all the cultural superstitious beliefs, dogmas, traditions, immense traditions of three to five thousand years old, immense traditions, you were brought up on that and you lived there in that little small circle of Brahminism - right? And if one wasn't awake you remained there all the rest of your life until you die. But circumstances, economic circumstances, travel, this and that, makes you drop this - right? So the past tradition of three to five thousand years is now changed through modification, which is through economy - right? I have to earn more money. My wife, my children, must have more clothes. But the past is still moving which becomes changed through circumstances - right? And the change goes on into the future. That is clear. So you ask: what is the future? Ask yourself: what is the future? What is your future? Is what you are now is your future, modified, but it is still the future. Right? So there is a continuity from the past, slightly changing, to the future. Right? We have lived on this earth as human beings, homo sapiens, for two and a half million years - right? And we were savage then and we still are savages, but with clean clothes, shaved, clean, polished, but inwardly we hate each other, we kill each other, we are tribalists, and all the rest of it. We haven't changed very much. Right? You understand this? So the future is now. I wonder if... Because what I have been I am still modified, and I will go on like that. So the future is now. Unless I break the cycle the future will be always the now. I wonder if you understand this? It is not very difficult. Please don't make it difficult. It is very simple. I have been greedy for the last thirty years and that greed becomes modified because I can't earn so much, satisfy myself so I am still greedy but it goes on - right? So unless I stop greed now tomorrow will be greedy. I wonder. It is very simple.

So our question then is: can 'what is', the past, change completely end, then you break the cycle. When you break the cycle the cells in the brain themselves change. We have discussed this matter with brain specialists - don't bother with all that. You see Sir, I have lived 80 years - I am 90, the speaker is 90, don't sympathize with me for God's sake, just 90 [laughter] - all that has happened during these 90 years, or 50 years, or 10 years, or even 10 days, is the past - memory, experiences, talking here, there, small audience, big audience, reputation and all that nonsense, all that is in the past. And he feels important sitting on a platform, his reputation, and he must keep up that reputation, otherwise... So he wants this reputation, sitting on the platform, all that business, to continue - right? But he may get old - not may, he is old - and he may lose the audience because his brain might go gaga [laughter] - no listen to it carefully please listen, it is not a matter of laughter, it is funny but just look at it. His brain may go senile and he will be stuck. So what happens? Unless he is free of the audience now, his reputation now - you understand? - end it. And he may go gaga next year, all right, but he has ended it. You understand? The brain has broken the cycle of time. Which means the brain is composed of millions and millions of cells, those very cells mutate. There is a different species of cells because you have moved away from a certain direction to another direction. You follow? That is, you have been going North all your life. Somebody comes along and says, "Look there is nothing in the North, for God's sake don't waste your energy on going North, go South or East." The moment he turns East he has broken the pattern. You understand? The pattern which the brain cells have set, he has broken it and gone East. It is as simple as that, if one does it. But you can play with words endlessly, write books endlessly. But once you see the nature of time, that we have changed through these millions of years very little. We are still killing each other in a more diabolical way - right? The atom can wipe us out in a second, vapourised. We don't exist, nothing exists. But it is the same when a man killed another man two million years ago. We are still doing that. Unless we break the pattern we will do that same thing tomorrow. You follow? This is very simple. They killed with a club two thousand years ago, later on they invented the arrow. The arrow, they thought would stop all wars. Then there came the Roman Legion and all that. Then we have the present day. Terrible means of destruction - right? The same thing as two million years ago, we are still doing, killing. That is the pattern the brain has accepted, has lived with, the brain has created the pattern. And if the brain doesn't realize for itself, not through pressure, compulsion, doesn't realize that time has no value in the movement of change. I wonder if you see - right? Then you have broken the pattern. Then there is a totally different way of living.

May we get up? You can't sit here for ever, it is time for lunch!

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC TALK 14TH JULY 1985

May we continue with our conversation?

We were talking about conflict and the causation of conflict. Conflict is growing more and more in the world, in every form, in every social section and so on. We said the cause of conflict is this constant opposition, not only within ourselves but also within the society in which we live. Society is what we have made of it. I think that is fairly clear and obvious, because in ourselves we are, from the moment we are born until we die, we are in constant struggle, competition, conflict, every form of destructive or positive attitudes, prejudices and opinions. This has been the way of our life. Not only at the present period but also for the last probably two and half million years. And we are still going on with this in the same pattern, the same mould - wars, more destructive than ever, division among nationalities, which is tribalism, religious divisions, family divisions, sectarian fragmentation and so on.

If we may point out this morning again, that we are not here as an intellectual group, or rather romantic. imaginative, sentimental assembly. We are together, you and the speaker, are going to take a journey, not he is leading you, or you are following him, but together, side by side, perhaps holding hands if necessary. We are taking a journey, rather complex, twisting, subtle and perhaps endless, a journey that has no beginning and no end. Or the term has an beginning and an ending, as we understand it, something starts, goes on and then comes to an end. Perhaps it may not be at all like that. It may be a constant movement, not within the cycle of time but rather outside the field of momentum as we know it. We can go into all that presently.

So we are together. Please the speaker must insist on this point. You are not merely the listeners and you accept or reject what he says but rather in co-operation, in responsibility, together in step, not one behind the other, walking along the same path, same sandier, or same lane. So it is your responsibility as well as the speaker not to accept or to deny, or to agree or disagree. We have been brought up, educated in this system of agreeing and disagreeing. We agree with some things, we disagree entirely with other things. So there is always this division, those who agree, do something together, and those who are opposed to what they are doing.

Could we this morning banish from our brains altogether, entirely, out of our blood, out of our brains, the idea of agreeing or disagreeing? Because if you agree with the speaker, and there are some who don't agree, then there is a conflict between the two inevitably. One may tolerate it, one may put up with it, accept it, but there is always this division - clear? So could we, seeing the consequences of agreeing and disagreeing, approving and disapproving, but together observe, together see exactly not only as far as we can what is happening externally, that is fairly simple because we are not told very much what is actually going on, in the political world, in the world of armaments, in the scientific world and all the technological world but inwardly, subjectively, to see exactly what is going on, not saying, "Well, this is bad, this is good. I accept this, I don't accept that.", but just to observe. Not in that observation any prejudice - right? Can we do this? Can we observe ourselves, our conduct, our behaviour, the way we think, our reactions, our faiths, beliefs, conclusions and so on? Could we observe all that as it is, not as it should be, or as it must be, just to look at it? Could we do that? That requires a great deal of attention, the brain must be extraordinarily active to reject any kind of reaction in watching oneself. Because after all what other people have said about us, the professors, the psychologists, the psychiatrists and the gurus and all those people, it is what they say, it is not what you see of yourself. I hope we are following each other. We are speaking English and the words the speaker is using are very simple, simple words which we use daily in our conversation with each other. There is no jargon, no specialized linguistic, semantic jargon. We are talking over together, as two friends using ordinary, daily language. So we are asking: can we see exactly what we are without taking sides about it? Because we are going to go into all that this morning. Not only agreeing and disagreeing, seeing the consequences of each attitude, put away that completely, assessing, disagreeing, evaluating, judging, but just to observe as you observe the sky of an evening full of stars, and those mountains, majestic against the blue sky. You just observe. Can we do the same thing outwardly because there is the criteria, and from there observe ourselves and our relationship to the world, and the world relationship to us? It is a rather complex process - right? Are we together? Or am I marching ahead, and leaving you behind? Could we go together? Keeping in step, if we don't understand each other we say, "I don't understand what you are talking about." Right? Could we start with that?

What are we? Why have we such deep rooted self interest? Not only self interest outwardly, there is a certain necessity of self interest otherwise one has to give up. But inwardly, psychologically, subjectively, why is there such deep, impenetrable self interest, in all of us? That self interest - you know what that word means? To be interested in oneself, one's own profits, one's own failures, one's own fragmentation, one's own prejudices, opinions, the whole existence of one's life. Self interest - why is it we are so committed to that? Is it possible to live in this world without that self interest? First psychologically and then we can see if it is possible externally. Right? Are we together? Or am I talking over beyond that tent, over the fence?

Have you ever noticed that we build a fence round ourselves? A fence of self protection, a fence to ward off any hurts, a barrier between you and the other, between you and your family, between you and so on, there is a barrier between you and the speaker - right? Naturally. You don't know the speaker, the speaker doesn't know you, therefore you are rather politely listening, curious what the devil he is talking about and hoping that you will get something out of it after sitting an hour or so in this hot tent, marquee and expecting something - right? Naturally. Curious, choosing what suits you, what doesn't suit you, listening partially, not entirely because one doesn't want to expose oneself to oneself so naturally one creates either a very, very thin barrier, hardly any, or a definite wall. Why do we do that? Is that not also self interest? And this self interest must inevitably bring about fragmentation, to break up - nationally, you can see the barrier, on one side England and the other side all Europe and beyond it. There is this constant division. And where there is division there must be conflict, that is inevitable. Whether you have very deep intimate relationship with your wife or husband, girl or boy, and so on, where there is division there must be fragmentation, there must be conflict. That is a law - right? Whether you like it or not that is the law. But when one sees that then you break down, the very seeing is the way of breaking down the barrier.

So we must enquire: what does it mean to see - right? What does it mean to observe? I am observing myself - right? I am watching what I am, my reactions, my prejudices, my convictions, my idiosyncrasies, the traditions in which I have been brought up, the reputation, all that rubbish. I am watching. If I do not watch very, very carefully, listen to every sound that is going on in watching, then I set a direction in which I must go. You are following all this? Am I talking to myself?

We were talking in Washington, America, and what I said they clapped, approving, encouraging. Here, you sit all very quietly. One really doesn't know if you are really walking together or actually listening, or casually come in, a Sunday morning sermon. Instead of going to church you turn up here, either for amusement, or just hear what that chap is saying, or, "Well I agree with him but he is not quite right about other things." We never look at the whole thing, the whole problem of life, the whole existence from childhood to death. We never take the whole thing in and observe, learn, not accumulate knowledge, that is fairly simple, but to learn what is happening in ourselves, the demands that we make upon each other, the hurts, the deep loneliness, the depression, the anxiety, the uncertainty, the fears, and all the pleasant things that we have, and also suffering, and ultimately there is the pain of death. We never look at this whole movement as one, but rather we consider it fragmentarily.

Now we are going to look, if we may, together, not only at what is the cause of this fragmentation but also whether the brain, which has been conditioned for millions of years, to war, to conflict, to work, to work, to work all the time, endlessly chattering, divided as tribals, as nationalities and so on, your god and my god, Eastern philosophy opposed to the Western philosophy. You know all that is going on. So if we could this morning put aside altogether, if we can, the whole movement of agreeing and disagreeing, in which there is choice - right? I chose to go that way and you chose to go that way. I chose to believe in God, or no god, and you say, "No sorry I can't accept that, there must be God, because I believe it, I like it." - or "it is my tradition" - and so on. If we once recognise the division, the agreement, the disagreement, reward and punishment and so on, then we can begin to look actually at ourselves, because ourselves is the world. Right? What we are, the world is. If we are violent, suspicious, ungenerous, the world is like that. This is obvious, isn't it? Because we have made this society, this monstrous, ugly, immoral world in which we live, with all the gods, you know, all that business. It has become a great circus, painful circus, or pleasurable circus. So to see exactly what we are without any distortion. What are we? Psychologically, not biologically. Biologically it has been put together through millenia upon millenia. Psychologically from the beginning of man there is violence, hate, jealousy, aggression, trying to become always something more, more, more, and much more than what we are. Is it that one is merely listening to the description? Or see the fact, not the idea of the fact? You understand? There is a difference between fact and the idea of the fact. That is, we have an idea, seeing something and we make out of that an idea, and then pursue the idea. I shouldn't be like this but I must be like that. That is an idea. First I see what I am, not what I should be - right? Then I see exactly what I am. That is a fact. Fact does not need an idea, a concept, an ideology. It is so. I am angry. That is a fact. But if I say "I must not be angry" then it becomes an idea. Are we together in this?

So what is it that you are making out of this? Is it that you are concluding a set of idea? Or seeing the fact as it is? - that we are jealous, aggressive, lonely, fear and all the rest of it? The whole psyche, the persona, the ego, is all that - right? Are you suspicious of this? That is, all this is the past, the memories that we have collected - right? I have been afraid, I know what is fear, and the moment that feeling arises I say, "that is fear". That very saying that it is fear is an idea, not a fact. I don't know if you are following all this? Sir, the word tree is not the actual tree - right? Right? The name K is not the actual K. The word is not the thing - right? So when you observe your brain is caught in a whole network of words, words, words - right? Can you look at yourself without the word? Oh, come on Sirs, play the game with me, will you? The ball is in your court. That is, can we look at your wife, at your husband, at your children, or your girl friend, or whatever it is, without the word? Without the image? That word, that image, is the division. Right? Can you look at the speaker without the word? - the word being all the remembrances about the speaker, the reputation, what you have read or not read, and so on, just to observe. Which means one must grasp, understand how the brain operates - right? Your own brain, not the brain of philosophers, or the spiritual writers, or the priests or somebody or other. Just to observe yourself without the word. Then we can look at certain facts, why human beings get hurt - right? That is very important to find out.

From childhood we are hurt - do and don't do - right? There is always the pressure, always the sense of being rewarded and punished - right? You say something to me which I don't - which I get angry about and that hurts me - right? So have we realized a very simple fact that from childhood we are hurt, and for the rest of our life we carry that hurt. Afraid of being hurt further, or attempting that one must not be hurt, which is another form of resistance - right? So are we aware of these hurts and therefore create a barrier round ourselves, the barrier of fear - right? Can we go into this question, fear? Shall we? Not for my pleasure, for you I am talking about. Can we go into it very, very deeply and see why human beings, which is all of us, why human beings have put up with fear for thousands of years - right? We see the consequences of fear. Fear of not being rewarded, fear of not being - a failure, fear of your own feeling that you must come to a certain point and not being able to, your weakness - right? And all this breeds certain forms of fear. Are you interested in going into this problem? It means going into it completely to the very end. Not just saying, "Sorry that is too difficult". Nothing is too difficult if you want to do it. The word difficult prevents you from further action. But if you can put away that word difficult then we can go into this very, very complex problem, not only verbally, which is fairly - we can explain all the causation, all the effects and the effects becoming the cause and so on. It is a chain.

First why do we put up with it? If you have a car which goes wrong you go to the nearest garage, if you can, and then the machinery is put right and you go on. Is it that we have not - that there is no one we can go to and he will help us to have no fear - you understand the question? Do we want help from somebody to be free of fear? Right? Psychologists, psychotherapists, psychiatrists, or the priest, confession, or the guru who says, "Surrender everything to me, including your money, then you will be perfectly all right." We do this. You may laugh, you may be amused, but we are doing this all the time inwardly.

So, do we want help? Prayer, prayer is a form of help, asking to be free from fear is a form of help. The speaker telling you how to be free of fear is a form of help. But he is not going to tell you how. Because we are walking together, we are giving energy to discover for yourself the causation of fear. If you see something very clearly then you don't have to decide, or chose, or ask for help, you act - right? Do we see clearly the whole structure, the inward nature of fear? Or you have been afraid and the memory of that comes back and says that is fear - you understand what I am saying?

So let's go into this carefully. Not the speaker is going into it and then you agree or disagree, but you yourself are taking the journey with the speaker, not verbally or intellectually, or verbally, but delving, probing, investigating - right? We are finding out - we want to go, no, we want to delve as you dig in the garden, or to find water, you dig deep, you don't stand outside on the earth and say, "I must have water." You dig, or go to a river. So first of all, let's be very clear: do you want help in order to be free of fear? If you want help then you are establishing an authority - right? You are responsible then for establishing an authority, a leader, a priest - right? So one must ask oneself before we go into this question of fear, whether you want help? Of course you go to a doctor, if you can't do certain things for yourself, if you have pain, or a headache, or some kind of disease, you naturally go to a doctor. There he knows much more the organic nature of your organ so he tells you what to do. We are not talking about that kind of help. We are talking about whether you need help, somebody to instruct you, to lead you, and to say, "Do this, do that, day after day and you will be free of fear." That means we want someone to help us - right? The speaker is not helping you. That is one thing certain. Because you have dozens of helpers, from the great religious leaders - God forbid! - and to the lowest, you know the poor psychologist round the corner. So let us be very clear between ourselves that the speaker doesn't want to help you in any way psychologically - right? Would you kindly accept that? Honestly accept it? Don't say yes, it is very difficult. In all your life you have sought help in various directions, some say "Yes, I don't want help." It requires not only perception, seeing what the demand for help has done to humanity. You ask help only when you are confused, when you don't know what to do, when you are uncertain - right? But when you see things clearly, see, observe, perceive, not only externally, but inwardly much more, when you see things very, very clearly you don't want any help, there it is. And from that action. Right? Are we together in this? Let's again repeat, if you don't mind. The speaker is not telling you how. Never ask that question how. Then there is somebody always giving you a rope. The speaker is not helping you in any way. But together we are walking along the same road, perhaps not at the same speed. But set the speed of your own and we will walk together. Clear? We are in accord?

If you are not clear about demanding help you will have to go somewhere else. Probably you will. Or turn to a book, or turn to somebody, not towards the speaker. Sorry to depress you. Or to say sorry I won't stretch out my hand, that is not it. [Tape turns over]. If you are walking together we are holding hands together. There is no stretching your hand and seeking help - right?

Are we working together? Or am I working and getting hot about it?

What is the cause of fear? Go slowly please. Cause. If you can discover the cause then you can do something about it, you can change the cause - right? If a doctor tells me, tells the speaker he has got cancer - which he hasn't - suppose he tells me I have got cancer, he says, "I can remove it easily and you will be all right." I go to him. He has to remove it. The cause comes to an end. So the [noise of train] - so the cause can always be changed, rooted out - clear? If you have got a headache you can find the cause of it, if you are eating wrongly, or you smoking too much, or drinking too much and all the rest of it, either you stop it, your drinking, smoking and all the rest, or you take a pill to stop it. The pill becomes then the effect which stops for the moment the causation - right? So cause and effect can always be changed, immediately, or you take time over it. If you take time over it then during that interval all other factors enter into it. So you never change the effect, continue with the cause - clear? Are we together in this? So what is the cause of fear? Why haven't we gone into it? Why do we tolerate it, knowing the effect of fear, the consequences of fear? If we are not at all afraid psychologically, no fear at all, you would have no gods, you would have no symbols to worship, no personalities to adore - right? Then you are psychologically extraordinarily free - right? And also fear makes one shrink, nervous, apprehensive, wanting to escape from it and therefore the escape becomes more important than the fear. Are you following? So we are going to go over together to find out what is the cause of fear. The cause, the root of it. And if we discover it for ourselves then it is over. If you see the causation, or many causes, then that very perception ends the cause - right? Are you listening to me, to the speaker, to explain the causation? Or you have never even asked such a question? I have borne fear, my father, my grandfather, the whole race in which I am born, the whole community, the whole structure of gods, rituals, is based on fear and the desire to achieve some extraordinary states. Right?

So let us go into this. We are not talking about, together [noise of train] - we are not talking about various forms of fear, fear of darkness, fear of one's husband, wife, fear of society, fear of dying, fear of - you know, we are not talking of the various forms of fear. It is like a tree that has got many, many branches, many flowers, many fruits, the flowers become the fruit, but we are talking about the very root of that tree - right? The root of it. Not your particular form of fear. You can trace your particular form to the root of it. So we are asking: are we concerned with our fears, or with the whole fear? Right? With the whole tree, not just one branch of it. Because unless you take - you understand how the tree lives, the water it requires, the depth of the soil and so on, merely trimming the branches won't do anything - right? So we must go to the very root of fear.

So what is the root of fear? Don't wait for me. I am not your leader. I am not your helper. I am not your guru - thank God! We are together, as two brothers, and I mean it, the speaker means it. It is not just words. As two good friends who have known each other from the beginning of time, walking along the same path, at the same speed, looking at everything that is around you and in you. So together we will go into it. Please, together. Otherwise it becomes just words, at the end of the talk you will say, "Really what am I to do with my fear?"

Fear is very complex. It is a tremendous reaction. If you are aware of it, it is a shock, not only biologically, organically, but also a shock to the brain. The brain has a capacity, as one discovers, not from what the others say, it has capacity to remain in spite of a shock, healthy. Certain - I don't know all about it - but the very shock invites its own protection. Right? You go into it for yourself, you will see. So fear is a shock. Momentarily, or it continues in different forms, different expressions, different ways. So we are going to the very, very, very root of it. To understand the very root of it, we must understand time - right? Time as yesterday, time as today, time as tomorrow. I remember something I have done, of which I am shy, or nervous, or apprehensive, or fearful, I remember all that and it continues to the future. Right? I have been angry, jealous, envious - that is the past. I am still envious, slightly modified, but I am fairly generous about things but envy goes on.

Right? This whole process is time, isn't it - right? You understand? Say yes, for God's sake! No, don't say yes! You understand? That is, what do we consider time?

Let's begin again. What do you consider is time? By the clock, sunrise, sunset, the evening star, the new moon with the full moon comes a fortnight later. What is time to you? Time to learn a skill? Time to learn a language? Time to write a letter? Time to go to your house from here? All that is time as distance. Right? I have to go from here to there. That is a distance covered by time. Right? Right? So time also is inward, psychological. I am this, I must become that. Becoming that is called evolution. Evolution means from the seed to the tree. And also I am ignorant but I will learn. I don't know but I will know. Give me time to be free of violence - right? You are following all this? Give me time. Give me a few days, or a month, or a year, I will be free of it. So we live by time. Not only going to the office every day from nine to five, God forbid, but also time to become something. Look, you understand all this? Right? Time, the movement of time. I have been afraid of you and I remember that fear and that fear is still there, and I will be afraid of you tomorrow. I hope not, but if I don't do something very drastic about it I will be afraid of you tomorrow. So we live by time - right? Be clear on this. Please let's be clear on this. We live by time. Which is, I am living, I will die. I will postpone death as far away as possible but I am living, I am going to do everything to avoid that. Though that is inevitable - right? So we psychologically as well as biologically, we live by time.

Is time a factor of fear? Please enquire. Time, that is, I have told a lie, I don't want you to know, but you are very smart. You look at me and say, "Yes, you have told a lie", "No, no, I have not" - I protect myself instantly, because I am afraid of your finding out that I am a liar. Or partly liar. So I am afraid - right? For something I have done, which I don't like you to know, and I am afraid of that. Which is what? Thought, isn't it - right? I have done something which I remember, and that remembrance says be careful, don't let him discover that you told a lie because you have got a good reputation as an honest man and protect yourself - right? So thinking and time are together. There is no division between thought, thinking and time. Are we clear on this matter? Please be clear on this matter, otherwise you will get rather confused later. The causation of fear is time/thought, the root of it - right?

Audience: I am not quite clear.

K: Wait Sir. You can ask questions when there is the question and answer meeting. I believe some time next week.

So are we clear on this thing that time, that is, the past, with all the things that one has done, and that thought whether pleasant or unpleasant, specially if it is unpleasant, I want to protect it, or change it, or impossible to change therefore I say, "By Jove, I am frightened of it." Right? Which is thinking about it. So time and thought are the root of fear. This is an obvious fact. A very simple verbal fact. But to go behind the word and see the truth of this time/thought, then you will inevitably ask: how is thought to stop? Right? It is a natural question, no? If thought creates fear, which is so obvious, then how am I to stop thinking? You understand my question? Right? Tell me how am I to stop thinking? Because I see the cause is thought, because I remember what I did, I am frightened of it, I don't want you to find out, so it is thinking - right? Then I ask you, "Please help me to stop my thinking." I would be an ass to ask such a question but I am asking it. How am I to stop thinking? Is that possible? Go on Sir, investigate, don't let me go on. Thinking. Because we live by thinking. Everything we do is through thought. To write a letter, to learn a language, to go to your office, to do all the business, the whole process of thinking. We went into that carefully the other day. We won't waste time in going into the cause, the beginning of thinking, how it comes, experience, knowledge, which is always limited, memory and then thought. I am just briefly repeating this.

So is it possible to stop thinking? Is it possible not to chatter all day long? Giving the brain a rest, though it has its own rhythm, the blood going up to it, its own activity. Its own, not the activity imposed by thought - you understand? [Noise of train.] - There seems to be a lot of trains today. May I point out, may the speaker point out, that is a wrong question. Who is it that stops thinking? You understand my question? It is still thought, isn't it? When I say, "If I could only stop thinking then I would have no fear", the very statement that "I wish I could stop it", who is that that wishes to stop thought? It is still thought isn't it because it wants something else? Right?

So, what will you do? You understand my question? Any movement of thought to be other than what it is, is still thinking - right? I am greedy, but I must not be greedy, it is still thinking. Thinking has put together all the paraphernalia, all that business that goes on in churches and all that is put together by thought. Like this marquee or tent is put together carefully by thought. So thought is the very root of our existence, apparently. So we are asking a very serious question, seeing what thought has done, invented the most extraordinary things, computer, the warships, the missiles, the atom bomb, the surgery, medicine, if you like medicine, and also the things it has made man do, go to the moon and so on. Thought is the very root of fear. Right? Do we see that? Not how to end thought. Do we see actually thinking is the root of fear, which is time? Seeing, not the words, "I am seeing", but actually see. When you have pain, severe pain, the pain is not different from you, you act instantly - right? So do you see as clearly as you see the clock, the speaker and your friend sitting beside you, see that thought is the causation of fear? Don't, please don't ask: "How am I to see?" The moment you ask how, someone is willing to help you, then you become their slave. But if you [noise of train] - but if you yourself see thought/time are really the root of fear, take time, take deliberation. It doesn't need decision, just the seeing. A scorpion is poisonous, a snake is poisonous, the very perception of it you act.

So one asks why don't we see? Why don't we see one of the causes of war is nationalities - right? One of the causes. Why don't we see that one may be called a Muslim, and you may be called a Christian, why do we fight over names, over propaganda? Right? Do we see it, or just memorize or think about it? You understand Sirs that you are - your consciousness is the rest of mankind. Mankind, like you and others, mankind goes through every form of difficulty, pain, travail, anxiety, loneliness, depression, sorrow, pleasure, every human being goes through this. Not only the Swiss, not only the you, but every human being, all over the world, whether they be Russian, American, and all the rest of it. So our consciousness, our being, is the entire humanity. Do you understand? This is so. How unwilling we are to accept such a simple fact. Because we are so accustomed to individuality. I, me, first. So if you see that, if you see that your consciousness is shared by all other human beings living in this marvellous earth then your whole way of living changes. But we don't see that. You need argument, you need lots of persuasion, pressure, propaganda, which are all so terribly useless because it is you that you have to see this thing for yourself.

So can we, each of us, who are the rest of mankind, who are mankind, look at a very simple fact. Observe, see that the causation of fear is thought/time? Then the very perception is action. And from that you don't rely on anybody. The guru is like you - you understand? The leader may put on different robes and put on all the jewels and all that, strip him of all that and he is just like you and me. But he has achieved greater power and we also want greater power, money, position, status. So could we look at all this, see it very clearly, and then that very perception ends all this rubbish. Then you are a free person.

May we stop? And may we get up? For the speaker to get up you have to get up.

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC TALK 17TH JULY 1985

You heard all the announcements. May I also announce that I am going to talk? And also that you are going to share in the talk. It is not a solo, but together, and the speaker means together, not that he is leading you or helping you or trying to persuade you, but rather together, and that word is important, together we take a very, very long journey. It is rather a difficult path - rather, I won't use that word, that is a dangerous word - a sentier, lane, a way that will be rather complex because we are going to talk about self interest, austerity, conduct and if it is possible in our daily life to end all sorrow. This is a very important question: why humanity after so many thousands and thousands of years has never been free from sorrow, not only each one's sorrow, the pain, the anxiety, the loneliness involved in that sorrow but also the sorrow of mankind. We are going to talk about that. And also, if we have time, we are going to talk about pleasure, and also death.

It is such a lovely morning, beautiful, clear blue sky, the quiet hills and the deep shadows, and the running waters, the meadow, the grove and the green grass. We ought also - we should talk over together what is beauty on such a lovely morning? Could we talk about what is beauty? Because that is a very important question. Not the beauty of nature or the extraordinary vitality, dynamic energy of a tiger. You have only seen tigers in a zoo but the poor things are kept there for your amusement. If you go to some parts of the world where the speaker has done, he was close to a wild tiger, as close as two feet away. Don't get excited!

And we should also go into this question because without beauty and love there is no truth. And we ought to examine very closely the word beauty. What is beauty? You are asking that question and so is the speaker asking that question. So we are both together looking, not only at the word, the implications of that word, and the immensity, the incalculable depth of beauty. Should we talk about it? We can talk about it, but the talk, the words, the explanations and the descriptions are not beauty. The word beauty is not beauty. It is something totally different. So one must be, if one may point it out, one must be very alert to words. Because our brain works, is active in a movement of words. Words convey what one feels, what one thinks, and accepts the explanations, descriptions because our whole brain structure, most of it, is verbal. So one must go into it very, very carefully not only with regard to beauty but also with regard to austerity, with regard to self interest. We are going to go into all these questions this morning, if we will.

So we are asking ourselves: what is beauty? Is the beauty in a person, in a face? Is beauty in the museums, paintings, classical paintings, modern paintings? Is beauty in all the music - Beethoven, Mozart, Bach and all the rest of them? Is beauty in a poem? In literature? Dancing? And all the noise that is going on in the world called music? Is all that beauty? Or is beauty something entirely different? Right? We are going into it together. Please don't be, if one may respectfully point out, don't accept the words, merely be satisfied with the description and explanations, not agreeing and disagreeing, all that business, let's put out all that, if we can, from our brain and look at it very carefully, stay with it, penetrate into the word.

Because as we said without that quality of beauty, which is sensitivity, which implies not only the beauty of nature - the deserts, the forests, the rivers and the vast mountains with their immense dignity, majesty, but also the feeling, not the romantic imaginations and sentimental states - those are merely sensations. Is beauty, then we are asking, a sensation? Because we live by sensations. Sexual sensation, with which goes pleasure, and also the pain that is involved in the feeling that it is not being fulfilled, and so on. If we could this morning put out all those words from our brain and look at, go into this enormous question, very complicated, subtle, what is the nature of beauty? We are not writing a poem.

When you look at those mountains, those immense rocks jetting into the sky, if you look at it quietly you feel the immensity of it, the enormous majesty of it. And for the moment, for the second, that tremendous dignity of it, the solidity of it, puts away all your thoughts, your problems, for a second - right? And you say, "How marvellous that is". So what has taken place there? The majesty of those mountains for a second, the very immensity of the sky and the blue and the snow clad mountains, drives away all your problems. It makes you totally forget yourself for a second. You are enthralled by it, you are struck by it. Like a child, who has been naughty all day long, or naughty for a while, which he has a right to be, and you give him a complicated toy. And he is absorbed by the toy until he breaks it up. And the toy has absorbed him. You understand? The toy has taken him over and he is quiet, he is enjoying - right? He has forgotten all his family, mother, you know, "Do this, don't do that", and the toy becomes the most exciting thing for him. You understand? The mountain, the river, the meadows and the groves absorb you, you forget yourself - right? So is that beauty? You understand my question? To be absorbed by the mountain, by the river, or the green fields, that means you are like a child being absorbed by something else - right? And for the moment you are quiet, being absorbed, taken over, surrendering yourself to something. Is that beauty? Being taken over? You understand? Surrendering yourself to something great? And that thing forcing you for a second to forget yourself. So then you depend. Depend as the child does on a toy, or depend on a cinema, television, and for the moment you have identified yourself with the actor, or the actress. Surely all that is a form of being taken away from yourself - right? Would you consider that state, being taken over, surrendering, being absorbed, that quiet second, is that beauty? When you go to a church, or a temple, or a mosque, there the chanting, the rituals, the intonation of the voice, everything is so organized, so carefully put together to create a certain sensation, which you call worship, which you call a sense of religiosity. Is that beauty? Or beauty is something entirely different. You understand? Are we understanding this question together?

Is there beauty where there is self conscious endeavour? Or there is beauty only when the self is not? When the me, the observer, is not? So is it possible without being absorbed, taken over, surrendering, to be in that state, without the self, without the ego, the me always thinking about itself? You understand my question? Is that possible at all living in this modern world with all its specializations, with its vulgarity, its immense noise that is going on - not the noise of running waters, of the song of a bird. But is it possible to live in this world without the self, the me, the ego, the persona, the assertion of the individual? In that state when there is really freedom from all this, only then there is beauty. You may say, "Well, that is too difficult, that is not possible. I prefer looking at a painting, or being in a lovely spot where there is a great sense of silence and quietude." And is it possible to have no self interest at all? Right? We are going to go into that.

Is it possible to live in this world without self interest? What does self interest mean? What are the implications of that word? How far can we be without self interest and live here, in the bustle, the noise, the vulgarity, the competition, the personal ambitions and so on and so on? We are going together to find out - right?

Self interest, you know what that word means so I don't have to explain it. Self interest hides in many ways, hides under every stone and every act. Hides in prayer, in worship, in having a good profession, in having great knowledge, in having a special reputation, like the speaker. When there is a guru who says, "I know all about it. I will tell you all about it" - is there not also self interest there? One may be an expert, a specialist, skilful and there is this seed of self interest. It has been with us for a million years. Our brain is conditioned to self interest. And if one is aware of that, which means just to be aware of it, not to say, "I am not self interested, it is wrong, it is right - how can one live without self interest?" You know all the arguments and pros and cons. Just to be aware how far one can go, how far one can investigate into oneself and find out for ourselves, for each one of us, how far in action, daily activity, how far in our behaviour, how deeply can one live without a sense of self interest?

So if we will we will examine all that. Because - not because, sorry. Self interest divides, self interest is the greatest corruption - sorry! The word corruption means to break things apart - rompere, to break. And where there is self interest there is fragmentation - your interest as opposed to my interest, my desire opposed to your desire, my urgency to climb the ladder of success opposed to yours. So where there is self interest, just observe it, you can't do anything about it - you understand? Just to observe, to stay with it and see what is taking place. If you have ever dismantled a car, as the speaker has done, and the car ran afterwards, if you ever have dismantled a car then you know all the parts, you know how it works and you learn all about it, not merely get in the car and drive off. I am talking of the 1925 cars, at that period they were very simple, very direct, very honest, strong, beautiful cars. And when you know something mechanically, then you can feel at ease. You can know how fast to go, how slow, etc. etc. So if one knows, understands, is aware of our own self interest then you begin to learn about it - right? You don't say, "I must be against it", or for it, "How can I live? Who are you to tell me myself?" etc, etc. When you begin to be aware choicelessly, not say, "Well this is my self interest, this is my...", but to be aware choicelessly of your self interest, to stay with it, to study it, to learn about it, to observe all the intricacies of it, then you can find out - one can find out for oneself where it is necessary, where it is completely not necessary - right? It is necessary to live daily - right? To have food, clothes and shelter and all the physical things. But psychologically, inwardly, is it necessary - is there a necessity to have any kind of self interest? You understand my question? That is, to investigate relationship - right? You understand? Because in our relationship with each other there is mutual self interest. You satisfy me and I satisfy you. You use me and I use you. I sell you, you sell me down the river! - right? You understand all this? We - in our relationship, is there self interest? This is important to understand because - sorry I don't use that word, it is silly.

To find out if there is self interest in our relationship. Where there is self interest there must be fragmentation, breaking up - right? I am different from you - self interest. What is relationship? Relationship to the earth, to all the beauty of the world, to nature and to other human beings and to one's wife, husband, girl, boy and so on, what is that bondage, what is that thing that we say, "Yes, I am related"? You understand my question? Please investigate this thing together. Don't please rely on the description that the speaker is indulging in. Let's look at it closely.

What is relationship? And when there is no relationship we feel so lonely, depressed, anxious, you know the whole series of movements hidden in the structure of self interest. What is relationship? When you say, 'My wife', 'My husband', what do you mean by that? When you are related to God, if there is God, what does it mean? So that word is very important to understand. I am related to my wife, to my children, to my family. Let's begin there. That is the core of all society, family. In the Asiatic world family means a great deal, to them it is tremendously important, a family. The son, the nephew, the grandmother, grandfather - you understand? It is the centre on which all society is based. So when one says, 'My wife', my girl, my friend, what does that mean? Most of you probably are married, or a girl friend, or a boy friend - right? What does it mean to be related? What are you related to? When you follow a guru and say, "I am following him", what are you following? You understand? Let's move away for a second from the wife and husband and we will come back to it a little later. You might rather not like to investigate that question, husband and wife, girl and boy, but we can approach it more quietly. When you follow somebody, guru, a prophet, when you follow the speaker, or some other person, politician, and so on what is it you are following, what is it that you are surrendering, giving up? You understand? Is it the image that you have created about the speaker? Or the guru? Or the image that you have in your brain that it is the right thing to do and therefore I will follow it - you understand? Is it the image, the picture, the symbol, that you have built and that - you are following that, not the person? You understand? Not what he is saying? The speaker has been talking for the last seventy years - right? I am sorry for him! And he has established a certain... unfortunately, some reputation, and the books and all that business, so you have created naturally an image, a reputation and you are following that. Not what the teaching says. The teaching says, "Don't follow anybody." But you have the image built, and you are following that which you desire, which satisfies you, which is of tremendous self interest - right?

Now let's come back to the wife and husband and all the rest of it. When you say, 'My wife', what do you mean by that word, what is the content of that word, what is behind the word - you understand? Look at it. Is it all the memories, the sensations, pleasure, pain, anxiety, jealousy, all that is embodied in the wife - right? Or in the husband. The husband is ambitious, wants to achieve a better position, more money, and the wife not only remains at home but she has her own ambitions, her own desires. So there they are. They may get into bed together, but the two are separate all the time - right? Let's be simple with these facts and honest. And so there is always conflict. One may not be aware of it and say, "Oh, no, we have no conflict between us", but scrape that a little bit with a heavy shovel, or with a scalpel and you will find there the root of all this is self interest - right? And the self interest may be in the professionals. Of course there is - doctors, scientists, the philosophers, the priests, the whole thing is - you understand? Which is sensation, desire, fulfilment - right? We are not exaggerating we are simply stating 'what is', not trying to cover it up, not trying to get beyond it or anything, there it is. That is the seed in which we are born, and that seed goes on flowering, growing until we die. Or there is a control of all that. You understand? Controlling the self interest. That very control is another form of self interest. Bien? How cleverly self interest operates. And also it hides behind austerity.

So we have to examine that word, what do we mean by austerity? Right conduct - right? What is austerity? Because the whole world, specially the religious world, has used that word, have laid down certain laws about austerity, specially for the monks and various monasteries of the West, and also as there are no monasteries in India and Asia, except in certain Buddhists and so on, in India they are single. You understand? There are no organized monasteries, fortunately. So what do we mean by that word austere? With which goes great dignity - you understand?

What do we mean by that word austere? We looked up in the dictionary what that word means. May I explain what the dictionary - which is the common usage of a language. It says it comes from Greek, to have a dry mouth. Which means dry, harsh, not just the mouth, harsh. Is that austere? That is, to deny oneself the luxury of a hot bath, you say, "No, I'll have a cold", or to have few clothes, or a particular form of robe, taking a vow to be a celibate, to be poor - you understand? To control oneself tremendously, all one's desires, you know, all the rest of it. Is that austerity? Or austerity is something entirely different? One has those who have fasted, who have sat up straight endlessly, controlling themselves, having a few clothes. Surely all that is not austerity. It is all outward show. Right?

So is there an austerity that is not a sensation? You understand? That is not contrived at, that is not cajoled, that is not saying, "I will be austere in order to..." Is there an austerity that is not visible at all to another? You are understanding all this? Is there an austerity that is - an austerity that has no discipline. The word discipline means to learn [tape turns over] The sense of a wholeness inwardly in which there is no craving, there is no breaking, there is no fragmentation. And with that austerity goes dignity, quietness.

One has to also, if we have time we must, we have to understand the nature of desire. That may be the root of the whole structure of self interest. Desire. Right? Are we together in this? Desire is a great sensation - right? Desire is the senses coming into activity. As we said earlier, sensation is of great importance to us. Sensation of sex, sensation of new experience, sensation of meeting somebody who is well known. I must tell you this lovely story. A friend of ours met the queen of England, shook hands with her and on with all that kind of stuff. After it was all over a person came up to her and said, "May I shake hands with you because you have shaken hands with the queen?"! [Noise of train] It is always we live by sensation, sensation is tremendously important to us. Sensation of being secure - please watch it - sensation of having fulfilled, sensation of great pleasure, gratification and so on. What relationship has sensation to desire? You understand? Is desire something separate from sensation? Go into this please. It is important to understand this thing. I am not explaining it. We are together looking at it. What is the relationship of desire to sensation? When does sensation become desire? Or are they inseparable? You follow? Or do they always go together? Right? Are you working as hard as the speaker is working? Or are you just saying, "Yes, go on with it."? Or you have heard this before and say, "Oh God, he has gone back to that again"?

You know the more you understand the activity of thought, the more you get at really the depth, the root of thought, then you begin to understand so many things. Then you see the whole phenomenon of the world, nature, the truth of nature, and then you ask what is truth. I won't go into all that for the moment.

So we live, our life is based on sensation and desire. And we are asking: what is the actual relationship between the two? When does sensation become desire? Right? You are following this? At what second does desire become dominant? I see a beautiful camera, with all the latest improvements. All that you have to do is to lift the camera and look at it, it is already taken. There is sensation of observation - right? The seeing the beautiful camera, beautifully made, very complex and it has great value, as a pleasure of possession, pleasure of taking photos, and all the rest of it. So there is sensation, seeing that camera there. Then what is that sensation to do with desire? You understand? When does that desire begin to flower into action, and say, "I must have it"? You understand? Right Sirs? Have you observed the movement of sensation, whether it is sexual, whether it is climbing the hills, and the valleys, overlooking all the world from a great height, or when you see a lovely garden, see the beautiful garden and you have a little lawn around your place. And you see this take place and then what takes place that turns the sensation into desire? You are following all this? Please don't go to sleep. It is too lovely a morning. If you stay with this question: what is the relationship of sensation to desire, stay with it, not try and find an answer. But look at it, observe it, see the implications of it. That is to stay with it. Then you will discover that sensation, which is natural and so on, that sensation is transformed into desire when thought creates the image out of that sensation. You understand? Yes? That is, I have a sensation, there is a sensation of seeing that camera, very expensive, beautiful and so on. There is sensation. Then thought comes along and says I wish I had that camera. You holding it, you taking the pictures and so on. Then thought creates the image out of that sensation - right? At that moment desire is born. I don't know, is it clear? Right Sir? Look at it yourself, go into it. You don't need any book, any philosopher, anybody, just to look at it. To look at it patiently, tentatively, go slowly, then you come upon it very quickly. That is when sensation becomes, or sensation is a slave to thought and thought, with its image creates something - you understand? At that moment desire is born. Right? And we live by desire: I must have this. I don't want it. I must become... you follow? This whole movement of desire.

Now what relationship has desire to self interest? We are pursuing the same thread. Or as long as there is desire, which is creating the image out of sensation by thought, as long as there is that desire there must be self interest. Right? Whether I want to reach heaven, or become a bank manager, or rich person, it is the same. Whether you want to achieve heaven [noise of train] - whether one wants to achieve heaven or become a rich man, they are exactly the same. Right? If one desires to be a saint, a noble, and all that business, and the other fellow says, "I have a great skill," it is exactly the same thing - right? One is called religious, the other is called worldly. How the words cripple us - right? You don't look at this.

So we must come to the question - it is now half past eleven - we must come to the question: what is sorrow? Is it sorrow exists as long as there is self interest? Please go into it. If you understand all this you don't have to read a single book. If you really live with this thing the gates of heaven are open - not heaven, you understand, that is just a form of speech. So I am asking a very serious question which has haunted man from the beginning of his existence, a million years or more. What is sorrow, the tears, the laughter, the pain, the anxiety, the loneliness, the despair? And can it ever end? Or man is doomed for ever to live with sorrow? Go on Sirs. Everyone on the earth, everyone, whether they are highly placed or nobody at all, everyone goes through this turmoil of sorrow, the shock of it, the pain of it, the uncertainty of it, the utter loneliness of it. And the sorrow of a poor man who doesn't know how to read or write, when you look at him, when you talk with him, he is like you, he has his own sorrow, and you have your own sorrow. You understand all this? So the sorrow of millions and millions of people who have been slaughtered by the powerful, by the bigoted, tortured by churches, the infidel and the believer - you understand all this? Religions, specially Christianity, have murdered more people than anybody else - sorry! Great wars, hundred years war, thirty years war, of the religious people, church. All this, there is sorrow in the world - right? Sorrow of the man who has nothing, except one meal a day and sleeping on the pavement. You don't know anything about all that. So there is sorrow. What does that word mean? Is it a mere remembrance of something that you have lost and therefore you feel sorrowful - you understand? You had a brother, son or wife, dead, and you have the picture, the photo of it on the piano, mantelpiece, or next to your bed. The remembrance of that incident, the memories of all those days and that - those memories are suddenly cut off - right? - is that sorrow? Is sorrow engendered, cultivated by memory? You understand my question? Do you understand our questions to each other? Does memory of the things remembered, and when that is cut by death, by accident, old age, or whatever it is, you understand, when the memory is not, actually not, but the memory continues, is that sorrow? Is sorrow related to memory? Come on Sirs.

I had a son, or a brother, or an aunt. I like - I will use the word like for the moment. I call that like love. I liked those people very much. I lived with them. I have chatted with them. We played together. All that memory is stored. And my son, my brother, my mother, or somebody, dies, is taken away, gone for ever. And I feel a shock, shed tears, and I feel terribly lonely. And I run off to church, temple, pick up a book, do this or that, to escape. Or say, "Well I will pray and I'll get over it. Jesus will save me." You know all that business. Sorry, I am not belittling the word. Or use the other word - Buddha, or Krishna - you follow? It is the same. It is the same thing with a different name. Or the same symbol, the same content of the symbol - symbols vary but it is the same content.

So is it - is sorrow merely the ending of certain memories, actually, though I have memories but the actuality that created those - that brought together those memories have ended, therefore I feel I am lost. I have lost my son. Is that sorrow? Or, we are not being harsh, just examining it, self pity? Concerned more with my own memories, pain, anxiety, than the ending of somebody - you understand? Is that - is sorrow self interest? Please go into it all. And I cultivate that memory. I am loyal to my son. I am loyal to my former wife, though I marry a new wife, I am very loyal to my..., which is the remembrance of those things that have happened in the past. Is that sorrow? Or there is the sorrow of failure, success, you know the whole momentum of self interest identifying itself with that word and shedding tears. And these tears have been shed by man and woman for a million years - right? And we are still crying. The war in Lebanon, in Afghanistan, the brutality of all that. And the Afghanistans and the Lebanese are crying, shot to pieces because of an idea that we must dominate, we must be different. Right? The idea. Thought is destroying each other. And think of all the people who have cried before you.

So is there an end to sorrow? The word sorrow also implies passion. There is - as long as there is self interest identifying itself with those memories which have gone, which are still there but the actuality is gone, that self interest is part and parcel - is the movement of sorrow - right? Can all that end? Where there is sorrow there cannot be love. So what is love? You understand? Can we go on tomorrow, not tomorrow, sorry, Sunday? Or shall we go on with it now? You know we have entered into very, very serious subjects, all this. It is not just something you play with for a Sunday or Wednesday morning. It is something deeply serious all this. It is not galloping down the road. It is walking in the pathway slowly, watching things, you know watching, watching, watching, staying with things that disturb you, staying with things that please you, staying with things that are abstract, all the imaginations, all the things that the brain has put together, including God. It is the activity of thought. God didn't create us. We created God in our image, which is - I won't go into this, it is so clear and simple.

So to talk about love, which also implies death. Love, death and creation. You understand? You can spend an hour on this because it is very, very serious. We are asking: what is creation? Not invention. Please differentiate between creation, invention, new set of ideas - you understand? That is, new set of ideas. And those new set of ideas are inventions, technologically, psychologically, scientifically and so on. We are not talking about ideas. We are talking about very serious things, that is love, death and creation. This cannot be answered in five minutes. Forgive me. We will deal with it tomorrow, next Sunday. Not that I am inviting you. We will go into this. And also what is religion, what is meditation, if there is something that is beyond all words, and measure and thought. You understand? Not put together by thought. Something that is inexpressible, infinite, timeless. We will go into all that. But you cannot - one cannot come to it - or for it to exist if there is fear, lack of relations, right relations, you follow? Without all that in your brain, free from all that you cannot understand the other. Right? Now may we stop?

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC TALK 21ST JULY 1985

This will be the last talk at Saanen. We will continue at Brockwood, in England.

May we continue what we were talking about last time that we met here? We were saying among other things that this is not a lecture; a lecture is meant to inform, to instruct on a particular subject. This is not a lecture, nor is it an entertainment. Entertainment means amusing yourself, or going to a cinema, or going to a ritual in a church, or in a temple, or a mosque. This is not an entertainment. Nor is it a mere matter of intellectual, theoretical, psychological - what word shall we use? - psychological pursuit. Philosophical pursuit rather. Philosophy means love of truth, not talking about what has already been talked about. And we are not discussing, or concerned with what others have said. We are together, you and the speaker, as two human beings, you, not this large audience but you as a person, and the speaker are having a conversation together, about their life, about their problems, about all the travail of life. Their confusion, their fears, their aspirations, their desires to achieve success, either in the business world or in the so-called religious world, or in the spiritual world, that is success to reach Nirvana, Heaven, or Enlightenment is the same as success in the business world. I hope we understand each other. It is not much difference. A man who is successful in life, making pots of money, then grows, expands, changes and continues in the line of success. There is not much difference between that person or the so-called - the man who is seeking truth, achieving something of a success in that direction.

Both are seeking success. One you call worldly, the other you call non-worldly, spiritual, religious. We are not dealing with either of those two. We are concerned you, as a human being, single, or double, and the speaker are having a conversation together. He means together, you sitting there and unfortunately the speaker sitting up here. So it is between you and the speaker.

You and the speaker have been talking about relationship, between man and woman, boy and girl and so on. We have been also talking about fear, whether it is at all possible ever in life, living in the modern world, to be utterly free psychologically of all fear. We went into that very, very carefully. And also we talked about time, time by which we live, the cycle of time, which is [noise of train] - the cycle of time which is the past being processed in the present and continues in the future. The past being our whole background, racial, communal, religious, experiences, memories, all this is the background of all of us, whether we are born in the distant East or in Europe, or in America. That civilization, that culture is the background of all of us. That background goes through changes, it is processed in the present and continues to the future. Human beings, you and another, are caught in this cycle. That has been going on for millions and millions of years. So the past going through the present, modifying itself, is the future. And that has been our evolution. Though we biologically have changed from a million years ago until now, but psychologically, inwardly, subjectively we are more or less what we were a million years ago - barbarous, cruel, violent, competitive, self-centred, egocentric. That is a fact. So the future is the present. Right? Is this clear to you and to the speaker? The future. That is the past modifying itself which becomes the future, that future is now, unless there is a fundamental, psychological change. Are we together? And that is what we are concerned about. Whether it is possible for human beings, you and another, to bring about psychological mutation, psychological total revolution in oneself, knowing if we are hurt now, wounded psychologically, as most people are, modifying itself in the present but goes on in the future. So the future hurt is now. Is that clear? Nous sommes d'accord?

So is it possible for human beings, for you, to completely bring about a mutation? That mutation changes the brain cells themselves. That is, if one has been going North all one's life, some person comes along and says, "Going North has no importance at all, no value, there is nothing there. Go East, or West, or South." And because you listen, because you are concerned, because you are deliberate, you go East, that very moment when you turn and go East there is a mutation in the brain cells altogether because going North has become the pattern, the mode, and when you go East you break the pattern - right? It is as simple as that. But that requires not only listening, not merely to words, not merely with the hearing of the ear, but also listening without any interpretation, without any comparison, listening directly, then that very listening breaks down that conditioning. Not bring up all your traditions, your background, your interpretation, none of that, but like when a child listens to a good story, he puts all his naughtiness aside and listens.

And also we talked about seeing. Seeing very, very clearly what is, what is happening in the present world, wars in Afghanistan, the most appalling things are going on there. In Lebanon, in South America, the Far East. Man from a million years or two millions ago killed with a club, then he invented an arrow. He thought that would stop all wars. Now you can vapourize millions and millions of people with one bomb. We have progressed tremendously outwardly, technologically. The computer is going to take over probably all our thinking. It will do better, far better than we can in a second. And I do not know if you have gone into this question. But you should. What is going to happen to the human brain when the computer can do almost anything that you can do, except of course sex, it can't look at the stars and say, "What a marvellous evening it is". It cannot possibly appreciate what beauty is. So what is going to happen to the human brain? Will it wither when the laser computer can take all that over from you? It will save a lot of labour. So either we turn to entertainment, the tremendous weight of the entertaining industry, sport. Or another form of it: go to a church, temple, mosque to be entertained, sensation. Or turn in a totally different direction. Because psychologically, inwardly, you can go limitlessly. The brain has an extraordinary capacity, each one's brain. Look what technology has done. But psychologically, subjectively, we remain what we are, year after year, century after century: conflict, struggle, pain, anxiety and all the rest of it. That's what we talked about over the last four talks, three talks - wasn't it three talks?

Audience: Four talks.

Krishnamurti: Right, thank you.

And we also talked about thought. What is the nature of thinking, what is thinking. We went into that very carefully. All thought is memory, based on knowledge, knowledge is always limited, whether now or in the past or in the future. Knowledge is always perpetually, eternally limited because it is based on experience, without experience, which is always limited, so knowledge is limited, memory, thought. That is the process of our thinking. And thought has invented all the rituals in all the religious places. It has invented gods through our fear, and so on. We talked about that at considerable length and in detail.

This morning we ought to talk over together, you and the speaker together, not the whole audience. There is no whole audience, there is only you and the speaker. We ought to talk over together, you and the speaker, about love, death, what is religion, what is meditation, is there anything beyond all the human endeavour, or is man the only measure? Is there something beyond all structure of thought, is there something that is timeless? This is what we have to be concerned with, you and the speaker this morning. All right?

We live by sensation. We talked about that. We want - our whole structure is based on sensation - sexual, imaginative, romantic, fanciful and so on. And also, as we said, self interest is the greatest corruption. And is sensation, that is the stimulation of the senses, is that love? We are investigating this thing, you and the speaker together. We are taking a very long journey. It is a long lane, you and the speaker are walking together. Not that he is ahead and you follow but together, step in step. Perhaps holding hands together, friendly, not dominating either each other, trying to impress each other. So we are, you and the speaker, are walking quietly, exploring, investigating, watching, listening, observing.

So we are asking each other: what is love? That word has been spoilt, spat upon, degraded. So we must be very alert to the abuse of that word. So what is love? Is it mere sensation? I love you and I depend on you, you depend on me. Perhaps I sell you and you sell me. I use you, you use me. If I, if the speaker says "I love you" because you are there, and you feed my vanity because you are a very large audience and I feel happy, pleased, gratified. So is gratification, fulfilment, attachment, is that love? Is love put together by thought? So you and the speaker are investigating together, so don't go to sleep this nice lovely morning.

So is love sensation? Is love gratification? Is love fulfilment? Dependence? And is love desire? Please don't - investigate it together, don't please agree or disagree. We went into that thing - we always approach anything by either we agree or disagree. If we could put aside altogether from our vocabulary, from our brain, saying "I agree" and "I don't agree". "My opinion is this and your opinion is that". Judgements. If we could put aside all that and just face facts as they are, not only in the world, but also in ourselves. Things as they are. That demands great honesty, the urgency of honesty. Can we do that this morning and face things as they are, not imagine romantically, or sentimentally, or it is our tradition, putting aside all that? Then we can begin to question, enquire into what is love.

We said, is it sensation? Desire? As we said previously in these talks, we went into the question very deeply into the whole structure of desire. We haven't time to go into that all over again. To make it very brief, desire is the result of sensation, and that sensation, thought gives a shape, an image - you understand? That is, sensation, then thought gives an image to that sensation, and at that second when thought moulds the sensation, at that second desire is born. We have gone into that. So we are asking: is love desire? Is love thought? Please go into it. It is your life we are concerned, each one of us, our lives, our daily lives, not some spiritual life, not some - following some guru with his inanities, putting on special robes and all the rest of it, whether it is the robes of Middle Ages, that is in the churches, or the robes of recent gurus. It is very important, this question. Is love merely the structure of thought? In our relationship with each other, man, woman, boy and girl and so on, apart from sexual sensations, when one says to another, "I love you", is it dependence? One is fulfilling himself, or herself in another and therefore in that relationship thought comes in, and then the thought creates the image, and that image we call love. Or call that image love. So we are asking: is love - it is unfortunate to use that word - is love put together by thought? Is love antagonism? Can there be love when there is ambition? When we are competing with each other? Is their love when there is self interest? Please don't merely listen to the speaker. Listen to yourself. Listen, find out for yourself. When you discover through what actually is you can go very far. But if you merely depend on another, his words, his books, his reputation, that is meaningless. Throw all that away and one has to look at oneself. One has to have passion. Passion can exist only, as we said the other day, when suffering ends. Passion without fanaticism, which then becomes terrorism. All the fanatical movements in the world have got tremendous passion. Fanaticism breeds passion. That passion is not the passion which comes into being when there is the ending of sorrow. We went into that.

So we are asking: is love all this? Jealousy, which is in hate, anger, desire, pleasure and so on, is it all love? Dare we face all this? Are you, and the speaker, honest enough to discover for ourselves the perfume of that word?

And from that we ought to consider what place has death in our life? Death, talking about it, is not morbid. It is part of our life. It may be from childhood until we actually die, there is always this dreadful fear of dying. Aren't you afraid of death? We have put it as far away as possible. So let us enquire together what is that extraordinary thing that we call death. It must be extraordinary. So without any kind of romantic, comforting, believing in reincarnation, life after death, which is an excellent idea, marvellously comforting. The origin of it probably began with the very, very ancient Hindus. And the Greeks - the Egyptians talked about it, then Pythagoras the Greek talked about it. If there is a continuity of each one of us, that is, live now, the same thing will be a better opportunity next life, if one believes in that sincerely, deeply, as millions do, then what you do now matters. Right? What you are now. What your conduct, what your daily life is. Because if there is a continuity then next life of course you will have a better castle, better refrigerator, better cars, better wife, or husband. Those who ardently believe in it, they don't behave properly, they are not concerned about the future any more than you or another.

So could we also put that comforting idea aside? Not that one Christian world believes that you go straight up to Heaven you are so..., or down below! I would - the speaker would like to tell you a joke about it but he won't! [Laughter] It is really quite a funny joke, but it would take too long, our time is limited.

So what is death? What is living? What is living? Daily life. And what is death? If we don't understand our daily living, what relationship has death to that? You understand? So first we must enquire what is living. What do we mean by living? What do we mean by good life? Is good life having a lot of money, cars, changes of wives, or girls, or going from one guru to another, and caught up in his concentration camp? [Laughter] Please don't laugh, this is actually what is going on. Is good life enjoyment, tremendous pleasure, excitement, a series of sensations, going to the office from morning until night for sixty years? For God's sake, face all this. Working, working, and then dying. This is what we call living. [Child cries] I am sorry you and I can't compete. [Laughter] Sorry! Is this what we call living? - constant conflict, constant problems one after the other? [Noise of train] This life to which we cling, of which we know, we have acquired tremendous information, knowledge, about practically everything, and that knowledge we cling to. But those memories which we have, we are deeply attached. All this is called living - sorrow, pain, anxiety, uncertainty, and endless sorrow and conflict. And death comes through accident, old age, senility. That is a good word. What is senility? Why do you attribute it to old age? Why do you say, "Oh, he is a senile old man"? I may be. Are you senile? Senility is forgetfulness, repeating, going back to the old memories, half alive - right? And so on. [Tape turns over] That is generally called senile. I am asking you - I have asked this question, the speaker has asked this question very often of himself - so we are both in the same camp. Is senility an old age problem? Or senility begins when you are repeating, repeating, repeating. You follow? When you are traditional, go on, go to the churches, temples, mosques, repeat, repeat, repeat. Kneel and the other fellow touches his forehead to the ground, and the Hindus prostrate [noise of train]. So senility can be at any age - right? So ask yourself that question.

So death can happen through old age, through an accident, through terrible pain, disease. And when it comes there is an end to all your continuity - right? To all your memories, to all your attachments, to your bank account, to your fame. You may be the central figure of entertainment, that too comes to an end.

So we ought to consider what is continuity - you understand? And what is ending? May we go into that? What is it that continues? That is, a series of movements which becomes a continuity. And what is it, the meaning of that word ending? You understand? Something that ends. Why are we so frightened of ending something? Whether it be tradition, a habit, a memory, an experience? Can all that end? Not calculated ending, an ending which is not effort, determination? I end something to achieve something else. Death, you can't argue with death - right? There is a marvellous story of ancient India. It is too long again. [Laughter] It is really a marvellous story. I don't know if we have time because we have to talk about religion, meditation, if there is something beyond all this human endeavour. All right, I will repeat that story very, very briefly.

A Brahmana boy - a Brahmana, you understand, a Brahmin of ancient India, he has collected a lot of things, cows and all the rest of it. And he decides to give them away, one by one. And his son comes to him and says, "Why are you giving away all this?" He explains it why when you collect a lot of things you must give them away, begin again. You understand the meaning of it, the significance? You collect and then give away everything that you have collected. I am not asking you to do this. So the boy keeps on asking that question. And the father gets angry with him and says "I will send you to death if you ask me any more questions." And the boy says, "Why are you sending me to death?" So as the Brahmana when he speaks says something he must stick to it, so he sends the boy to death. And the boy arrives at the house of death after talking to all the teachers, philosophers, gurus and all the rest of it, he arrives at the house of death. I am making it very, very brief. And there he waits for three days. Follow the significance of all this, the subtlety of all this. He waits there for three days. And death comes along and apologizes for keeping him waiting because after all he is a Brahmin. He apologizes and says, "I will give you anything you want, riches, women, cows, property, anything you want." And the boy says, "But you will be at the end of it. You will always be at the end of everything." And death then talks about various things which the boy can't understand - right? It is really a marvellous story.

So let's come back to realities. Probably you like a lot of stories to be told. I have got quantities, I am not going to.

So, what is death? Is time involved in it? Time. Is time death? I am asking you, please consider it. Time, not only by the watch, by the sunset and sunrise, but also psychologically, inwardly. As long as there is the self interest of time - right? You are following this? As long as there is the self interest, which is the wheel of time, then there must be death. So is time related to death? Oh, come on Sirs.

If there is no time, is there death? Are we together? Please this requires - this is real meditation, not all the phoney stuff. Time, psychological time, not the time of the big clock, or the clock, the watch on your wrist. [Noise of train] For us time is very important. Time to succeed, time to grow in that success, and bring about a change in that success. Time means continuity. I have been, I am, I will be. There is this constant continuity in us, which is time.

Right? If there is no tomorrow - may I enter into all this? This is a dangerous subject. Please pay your attention if you are interested in it, otherwise yawn, and rest and ease. If there is no tomorrow, would you be afraid of death? If death is now, instant, there is no fear is there? There is no time. You are capturing what I am saying? So is time - is death - as long as thought functions in the field of time - right? - which we are doing all day long - then there is inevitably the ending of saying it might end, therefore I am afraid. So time may be the enemy of death. Or the time is death.

That means, if the speaker is attached to his audience, attached to this, because out of that attachment he derives a great deal of excitement, sensation, importance, self interest, envious of a person who has a larger audience - right? If the speaker is attached, whether to an audience, to a book, to an experience, to a type, to a fame, then he is frightened of death. Attachment means time. I wonder if you understand all this? Attachment means time. So can I, can I, you, be completely free of attachment, which is time - right? I am attached to you. I depend on you. I cry for you. And you do exactly the same to me. We are attached to each other. And death comes and ends that. So can I end that attachment now? Not wait for death, but be free of that attachment completely? Yes Sir.

Face that fact.

So living is dying and therefore living is death. Together. You understand what I am saying? Oh come on Sirs. That is why one has to lay the foundation of understanding oneself not according to philosophers, psychiatrists and so on. To understand oneself, not through books, but to see, watch one's behaviour, one's conduct, the way - the habit, the accumulation that we have collected through millenia upon millenia, know all that inside you. The racial, communal, traditional, personal. And the knowledge, the awareness of that is not of time, it can be instant. And the mirror in which you see this is the relationship between you and another, between you and your wife, to see in that relationship all the past, the present habits, future, everything is there. To know how to look, how to observe, how to hear every word, every movement of thought. That requires great attention, watchfulness.

So death is not in the future. Death is now when there is no time. When there is no me becoming something, when there is no self interest, egotistic activity, which is all the process of time.

So living and dying are together always. And you don't know the beauty of it. There is great energy in it. We live by energy. You take sufficient food, and right diet and so on, and it gives a certain quality of energy. That energy is distorted when you smoke, drink and all the rest of it. The brain has extraordinary energy. And that extraordinary energy is required to find out for oneself, not be directed by another, to discover, or for that thing to happen.

So we are going to enquire into that. That is, what is religion? Please understand, we have talked about fear, we talked about psychological wounds, not to carry for the rest of one's life. We talked and have gone into it together, what is relationship, the significance of relationship. Nothing can exist on earth without relationship, and that relationship is destroyed when each one of us pursues his own ambition, his own greed, his own fulfilment, and so on. We talked about fear. We went into it together, into the question of thought, time, sorrow and the ending of sorrow. And we have talked this morning also about death. Now we are capable, alive to find out what is religion. Because we have got the energy. You understand? Because we have put all that human conflict, self interest aside. If you have done it, which then gives you immense passion and energy, incalculable energy. And what is religion?

Is religion all the things that thought has put together? The rituals, the robes, the gurus, the perpetual repetition, prayers and the whole thing, is that religion? Or is it a big business concern? There is a temple in South India that makes a million dollars every third day. You understand what I am saying? Every third day that temple gathers one million dollars, every third day. And that is called religion. They spend the money, oh, in different ways. And Christianity, look what it has done, tremendous riches. The Vatican, the churches all over the world. Go down the Fifth Avenue of New York, there they are, rich as pomp. Is that religion? Going every Sunday morning to some - to hear some preacher and repeat the ritual, is that religion? Or religion has nothing whatever to do with all that business? Because it can only ask this question when it is free from all that, not caught in the entanglement, in the performance, in the power, position, hierarchy of all that. Then only you can ask the question: what is religion? Is God created by thought, by fear? Or is man the image of God? Or God is the image of man? Right? If one can put all that aside to find out that which is not put together by thought, by sensation, by repetition, by rituals, all that is not religion - at least for the speaker. That is all - it has nothing whatever to do with that which is sacred.

So what is then - how - no - what is truth? Is there such a thing as truth? Is there such a thing, an absolute, irrevocable truth, not dependent on time, environment, tradition, knowledge, what the Buddha said, or what somebody said? The word is not the truth. The symbol is not the truth. The person is not the truth. Therefore there is no personal worship. K is not important at all. So we are seeking what is truth. If there is any. And if there is something that is beyond time. The ending of all time. And they have said that meditation is necessary to come upon this. Right? To have a quiet mind. We are going to go into that. If you will allow me. We have got a very short time. Sorry. By the clock.

What is meditation? The word means ponder over, according to the dictionary. To think over. And also it has a different meaning, which is to measure, both in Sanskrit and in Latin and so on, meditate means not only to ponder, to think but also to be able to measure - right? Which means comparison, of course. There is no measurement without comparison. So can the brain be free of measurement? Not the measurement by the rule, by the yard stick, kilometres, miles, but the brain be free of all measurement, the becoming, not becoming, comparing, not comparing. You understand? Can the brain be free of this system of measurement? I need to measure to get a suit made. I need measurement to go from here to another place, distance is measurement, time is measurement. Oh come on. You understand? So can the brain - not the mind, we will go into quickly what the mind and the brain are - can the brain be free of measurement? That is comparison. No comparison whatsoever. This is real meditation. So that the brain is totally free. Is that possible, living in the modern world, making money, breeding children, sex, all the noise, the vulgarity, the circus that is going on in the name of religion. Can one be free of all that? Not in order to get something. You understand? To be free.

So meditation is not conscious meditation, you understand this? It cannot be conscious meditation, following a system, a guru, collective meditation, group meditation, single meditation, according to Zen, Buddhist, Hindu, you know, it can't be a system because then you practise, practise, practise, and your brain gets more and more dull, more and more mechanical. So is there a meditation which has no direction, which is not conscious, deliberate? Find out.

That requires great energy, attention, passion. Not lust, that is just... Then that very passion, energy, the intensity of it is silence. Not contrived silence. It is the immense silence in which time, space is not. Then there is that which is unnameable, which is holy, eternal.

May we get up?

1ST PUBLIC TALK MADRAS 28TH DECEMBER 1985

I would like to know why you are all here. I really mean it. With what intention, with what purpose, with what kind of imaginary or superstitious concepts that one has? And perhaps, if I may be so bold as to suggest it, you might have come with those ideas, with those formulas. And I am afraid you will be disappointed because - I hope you can hear, all right? I hope you all can hear - one has talked all over the world for a long time, seventy years, that's a long time, and one has naturally built up all kinds of fanciful, superstitious imaginary reputations, and those reputations, those images that one has created are really meaningless because what we are talking about is totally different from a lecture. A lecture is meant to inform, to instruct, to guide and so on. This is not a lecture. Please we must be very clear on that point. This is not a lecture. There is no intention on the part of the speaker to guide you, to help you - forgive me if I use that word - or to inform you about something you would like to be talked about, theoretical, superstitious, imaginary, a fixation, as it were. But we are going to deliberate together. That word has a very deep meaning, deliberate, which means weigh together, take counsel together, nourish each other, not physically, I hope, but psychologically, intellectually and penetrate as deeply as possible into one's own consciousness, into its own function, its own way of thinking, living. This is not a theoretical meeting, talking about various things that should be, or that has not been, but together, you and the speaker are taking counsel together, weighing things together. Please, this is not just a lot of words. The speaker really means what he says, whether you like it or not. He says we are going to take counsel together, weigh things together, not I weigh and then tell you about it, but rather that together you and the speaker take counsel together, weigh together. This is not propaganda because we are together investigating, asking, questioning, doubting.

The idea and the fact are two different things. The fact is one thing. The microphone is not an idea, it is a fact. So the fact is what we are going to discuss, not the idea of the fact. I hope all this is clear. All right? Sir, should I keep quiet as you are keeping quiet? This is a serious meeting, not just an exchange of words.

Something wrong sir? So from the very beginning we must be very clear that this is not a lecture, we are not talking about theories, what has happened to human beings through the long two and a half million years of evolution, but what we are, what we have become, and what is our future - not of mankind, what is the future of all of us? Right? Let's be clear on that point. We are going to deliberate, that is take counsel together. Taking counsel together we nourish each other, both intellectually, non-verbally and psychologically. It is not something intellectual. It is not romantic, not superstitious, imaginary and so on. So we are together, you can't just sit there and say, yes, yes, or no, no. You are partaking, you are sharing, you are weighing, taking counsel together. Right? Is that understood between us?

And we are not doing any kind of propaganda, or inviting you to join a particular sect. And here I must add I am not your guru, you are not my followers. We are not setting up a new cult, a new society, a new ashram, a new kind of concentration camp. If this is very clear between us, that you and the speaker together are going to take part in all the talks - if there are future talks, that depends on the physical condition of the body.

So we have existed on this earth, according to the scientists and archaeologists and so on, for over two million years, and here we are. What are we? Right? You ask yourself. I am not suggesting what you are. We are opening up the deep cave, the deep underlying causes, the reality that lies behind the cause. So we are going to go into that during the talks. I don't know how many there will be, but I can't assure you. They will tell you whether there will be talk tomorrow, or not. Or there will only be a talk, that is today, and Wednesday a Question and Answer meeting, and next Saturday the last meeting.

So together we are going to look at this world, that is ourselves. Right? Are you willing? Or are you frightened, hiding behind all kinds of absurd theories, all the psychological innuendos, all the thing man has put together as they call it religion, the existing society, that is the degeneration that is gradually going on: pollution in all the cities, despoiling the air, and also corruption. This is what we are caught in. So what has gone wrong with us? Or is this a natural course? You understand my question? Do you really want to listen to all this rubbish? You must read about all this in newspapers, if they are honest, magazines, and of course all the gurus in the world have destroyed that thing which they want.

So let us begin, but please bear in mind this is not a lecture. You haven't come to listen to me. You have come to listen to yourself, however complicated that self is, however superficial, however deep. We are going to go into all that. Perhaps not in one talk, but we will see at the end of the talk whether the speaker survives. That's what is behind it: asking you to sit quietly for two or three minutes after the speaker has gone, and the speaker will find out if he can continue tomorrow, or will he collapse at the end of it? It's up to you, because otherwise you, as a listener, may say, yes, yes, it sounds very good, or not at all good. It is not logical, or illogical and so on. Right?

What are we, as human beings, who have lived on this earth for such a long period of time, why are we as we are? You have understood my question? Right? Have you understood my question? Yes, sir?

Q: No.

K: What?

Q: He says he hasn't understood.

K: It is very simple. I am using ordinary English, not professional English. I will say it once more: we are sharing all this together. You are not merely listening to the speaker, we are taking counsel together, we are deliberating. That word is really a very good word, to deliberate, it means take counsel together, weigh things together, not your prejudice, not your opinions, not your conclusions, but the whole process of thinking, what it has made man into and so on. Right? If you don't understand it, I'm sorry I am not going back to it. We are talking ordinary English.

So what has happened to us, to each one of us? That is, we have lived on this earth as human beings for a very, very long time, which is called evolution. And during that evolution of experience, knowledge, thinking, all the things that man has put together, including his superstitions, his gods, his various empires, and when you come down to the actual fact, what has happened to each one of us? Don't you want to know? Or are we frightened to know? Which is it? Gosh, what's the matter? Not a response.

Q: We want to enquire.

K: I don't understand what you are talking about. And you are the rest of the world; what you suffer, what you go through, the daily boredom, the pettiness of one's life: the struggle, the pain, the anxiety, the sorrow, the negligence, the carelessness, indifference. And this is shared by all humanity. Right? Everybody goes through this, your guru - if you have one, I hope you haven't got any - your guru, if he is at all awake, if he is at all sane and rational, he goes through all this. The kings and the ministers go through all this: pain, anxiety, uncertainty, sorrow, death, hoping for something in the future. This is what all human beings, wherever you go, however civilized one is, or not, every human being goes through this. Right? Are you doubting that fact? Do you doubt that, that every human being throughout the world goes through all this? And this makes up our consciousness. Right? Are we understanding each other? Are we working together? Are we investigating together? Or am I guiding you, helping you? I am not. Please be assured of one fact: I don't want to help you, I am not your guide or your helper. Then you will ask, why am I sitting here. You are sitting here probably out of curiosity, out of what you have heard, or read a few lines in a book, or you have been told, go and listen to the chap, you will find out. So please be clear, the speaker is not guiding you, is not helping you. He won't help you. Because you have been helped, all through the ages you have been helped: saviours, gurus, mahatmas, you know the whole list of them, they are all too willing to help you, with their ashrams, with their Foundations, including this! And you have been helped. If you have any trouble you trot off to a guru, or to a temple asking for help, which is called prayer. And you have been helped, you have been guided, politically, religiously, psychiatrically, and at the end of it all you are what you are.

So the speaker says - please take this seriously - he is not guiding you, he is not helping you. On the contrary, together we are walking the same path, together we are sharing, nourishing. I am using the word 'nourishing' both intellectually, psychologically, we can't feed each other, there are too many people.

So bearing that in mind all the time, that you and the speaker together are looking at this whole problem, not just my sorrow, or your sorrow, your anxiety, uncertainty. It is shared by every human being on earth. And your consciousness is the consciousness of mankind. Right? You may not agree, but investigate, even intellectually, logically, not emotionally then you are lost. Logically, sanely, looking at it, not with prejudice, opinions, but look at it: you suffer and so does the man in Russia. You are uncertain, so is the man in China. Right? So your consciousness is shared by all humanity, so you are humanity. Right? You are humanity, not Mr Smith, Mr Rao, or something like that. If that is shown to you, not accepted but shown logically, investigating together, sharing together, then what shall we do? Do you understand my question? Seeing all this, how humanity has been divided into nations, into sects, into religions - my guru is better than your guru - and so on. This division, this separation exists all over the world. That's one of the major causes of war, nationalities.

Right? But you will go on with your nationalism, with your Hinduism, with your tradition in spite of what the speaker is saying. Right? Right, sir? You all agree, I am glad, but we will carry on as before. Right? You are a rummy crowd!

When one actually realizes this fact, that you the entire humanity, not physically, but psychologically, then you invariably must ask the question, what am I to do. Right? Don't wait for me to tell you. We are sharing together. We are taking counsel together. This is not a lecture. I must repeat this because you are used to lectures, somebody pouring forth for your information. So what shall we do, if we see the rational, sane fact, that we are the entire humanity? Of course, you won't see this because to you it is very important to have individuality: I am separate from you. Of course you are separate from me physically, you are a woman, I am a man, or I am taller, you are shorter and all the rest of it. Apart from biological division, consciousness, our consciousness which is the I with all its memories, experiences, with its longing and all the rest of it, that consciousness is shared by every human being. Right? You won't agree to all this. It doesn't matter, I'll go on; if you'd like listen, do, but it doesn't matter if you listen or don't listen. Like the birds, they go on singing, like a storm full of wind, rain and thunder and great beauty of light.

So if one actually, not theoretically or intellectually, realizes, that is, to realize something, like a cobra is poisonous, a rattle snake is poisonous, so don't go near it. It is not mere conclusion, it is your death if you go near it. So physically we are conditioned to a snake. So you are conditioned, shaped, moulded in the idea that you are separate human beings. You have a separate soul, the Christian idea and if you realize that you are humanity, not whether you question it, you are. If you look at it carefully, go into it deliberately, not avoid it, you will see you suffer, the other man suffers, he quarrels with his wife, and children and all the rest of that daily life. So what shall one do? Right? What will you do? What's your action? Not conclusion. You understand, sir? Because a conclusion is not a fact. You may derive from a fact a conclusion, but the conclusion is not the fact.

I am in the midst of a sea of people who don't seem to react to all this. Your whole religions are based on individuality, all your prayers, your worship. It doesn't matter, I'll go on.

So what shall one do? What am I to do, living in this society, the society that is so corrupt, what shall I do? Whatever I do, will it affect the society? You understand? Will it affect my neighbour, will it affect the man, not in the moon, but the man in Russia? So I have to ask, who created this society? Right? Are you at all thinking together, or not? Oh my god, what am I to do if you don't react, if you don't smell something? So we are asking, who created this society which is so immoral, so corrupt, all over the world, which is destroying man, which is degenerating, which is polluting the whole world, what shall I do, or not do, to affect this society? Do you understand my question? So I ask myself, am I different from the society? Right? Who created this society which we live in? Right? Are you asking that question yourself, or are you just listening to me? Are you asking that question? What's your answer, if you are really using your brain, not just nodding your head? What's your answer? Not some gods.

Q: Something...

K: I am talking for a while, if you don't mind, a little later. You don't mind? When there is a question and answer meeting, if there is one, you can put all kinds of questions to me. So who created this society? My father, your father, my grandmother and your grandmother. Right? They all helped to build up this corrupt society in which we live. So we are the creators of this society, the builders of this society, through our ambition, our fears, the desire for security in my relationship, in my job, power, position. Right? We all want that. Am I saying the truth, or something imaginary? So we are the builders of this society. Society is not different from me, from us, because we are ambitious, we are greedy, we are frightened, we want position, power, privileges. Right? We want all this, and god too, occasionally. So god is our creation too. You may not agree, don't agree, let's investigate it, share it. The western world is captured by that particular religion, and they are making havoc out of it. Sorry, I mustn't say that. God and money go together. The least trouble you have, you want somebody to help you, emotionally, or sexually, or psychologically. There are all those temples, mosques and churches and a convenient priest there. I am not being cynical, I am just showing you the facts.

So what shall I do, knowing that I am the rest of humanity, not Mr K? You understand my question? What am I, as a human being, who is the rest of mankind, I don't ask whither mankind, where mankind is going because I am mankind. I wonder if you see the importance of this. I wonder if you see the depth of this, the beauty of it, the immensity of it, the responsibility. I am afraid you don't. Because if you really saw, felt utterly responsible for your brother, utterly responsible for your neighbour, not that you won't interfere with him or hit him on the head, or tell him what to do, you are the neighbour, you are your brother's keeper. I don't know if you see all this.

Then what shall I do? I am not asking your help, I am not asking through prayers for that almighty to guide me - if there is an almighty. I am asking this question, putting this question to myself, as you must, and I hope you do. What shall I do, knowing that I am the rest of mankind? I am mankind. I may be a woman, or a man, short, tall, brown, or whatever colour, colour is not important, what is important is, is what is inside the skull.

So what shall I do? Whatever I do, will it affect the society, which is me. You understand? Society is me. I have separated myself from society, but the fact is society has been put together by man. And man in his desire to have security, permanent security, through property, through convictions, through formulas and so on and so on, he has done everything. Right? He has built churches, he has built mosques, he has built temples, not only in this country, but they are taking them to America unfortunately.

So what shall I do? I am not separate from society, I am not separate from the rest of humanity, so whatever I do has immense meaning and responsibility. Right? Immense. So what is my responsibility? Right? What's your answer? Don't sit there and look at me. My first response to that is, what do we mean by action? Right? I want to do something, not only as a human being, I want to affect society, I want to change society, I want to stop this degeneration that is going on. You know what is going on in the world. I won't go into all that. So what action shall I take?

So before we put that question, or in putting that question, I must enquire what is action. You tell me, what is action? To act. To act according to a formula is no action at all because you repeat, and that repetition is part of our security. And that repetition gives us a certain sense of well being, we are stable, we are firm. So is action based on certain memories, certain knowledge, certain past experiences and so on? What is action? What is it to act? Not, I will act, or I have acted, to act now. You understand my question? No? You are all very well educated, aren't you, BAs, MAs, engineers, PhDs and MAD and so on. You are all well educated, and probably you have never put this question to yourself: what shall I do, realizing I am the entire humanity, and the responsibility of it, the greatness of it? So we are asking, what is action? To act, not in the future, that is not action, not, I have acted, which is the past. So what is action which has no past or the future? Go into it, this is a tremendously important question. If you base your action on the past it is no action, it is a repetition, modified, a little changed but it is still repetition. Right? God, Where are you educated!

So is there an action, please I am asking this question most seriously, is there an action which is not dependent on the past or conforming to a future pattern? You understand? Or - this is a little more difficult - or there is no action at all. We will have to go into it much more slowly. Do you want to listen to all this blah? Or do you want to sit still and meditate? I don't know what you call meditation. That is one of those words that is bandied about all over the place. You go to a little village in California and they talk about meditation. I say, what do you mean by that word? They don't know but they are going to meditate. I won't go into that now.

So action which is not dependent on time. You understand this? No, careful, sir, don't agree with what is being said for heaven's sake. Is there an action without the motive, self-interest, without gaining reward? You understand my question? All this implies time. Right? I will be rewarded for my good work, I will be rewarded if I pray for a refrigerator - why not, that is as good as god, more real than god, more actual than god. So is there an action - this requires your using your brain, not your emotions - which is not based on self-interest, a conclusion towards which you are working? So you have to investigate what is time. You understand? Because we function in time. Am I boring you? Would you kindly tell me if I am boring you.

Q: No, sir.

K: I know, I know. The invariable answer. But am I actually boring you? So you have to look into the nature of time. Right? What is time? Not according to sunrise, sunset, that has its own pattern, a new moon in the tender sky, and the full moon, which I saw the other day rising out of the sea. It was a marvellous sight. Sunrise and the evening star, all that is part of time. And there is time also if you have a small child, a baby to grow up into a man, it requires a lot of time, twenty years, thirty years, ninety years. And that also means time. We live with time; you have to get up in the morning at a certain time, cook and all the rest of it. So we live, function, act within the limits of time. To us time is extraordinarily important. There was a meeting here at five thirty, and you have to make all kinds of arrangements to get here at five thirty. So did the speaker. So we live in time, not the time of the scientists, which is too complicated - I won't go into that. We live by time but also there is physical time and there is psychological time. Right? That is, I am, I will be. I am jealous, uncertain, ambitious, wanting to fulfil, climb the ladder and all the rest of it; to climb the ladder you need time, step by step to get to the top. Right? So there is psychological time and physical time. Is this clear? Don't agree, please. You are not agreeing with me, this is a fact. You are not used to this kind of thinking, that is your trouble. You don't want to share anything with anybody.

So are we bound to time? You understand? I am greedy, but give me a little time, I will be non-greedy; give me a little time to be non-violent. Right? So we use time as a means of reward and punishment. Right? Do you read newspapers? They inform you about everything that is happening according to their editor, and you absorb all that is being said in the newspaper. But here you are not absorbing, you are actually thinking. And if you don't want to think you can go home, much better. But if you want to think, find out, you have not only to use your brain, which is extraordinarily active, if you want money you work like hell to get it. If you want a position, power, good lord, look at them all working their hands off. And if you want to find out if there is an action which is timeless - you understand my question - which is not based on time as past, present and the future. So what is time, apart from physical time? Time includes the past. Right? All the knowledge which the scientists have acquired, step by step, experience by experience, trying without failing, adding more and more and more to what already they know. Right? Do you understand something of what I am saying? Good!

So time is the past, time is the present, time is the future. This is the cycle in which we are caught. I remember my experience, what a lovely time I had, that's memory. Then that day which was so horrible, I remember that. So my brain is full of memories of the past, the present and the future. So the future is what I am now. Right? Right, sirs? Don't agree, sir, please for god's sake don't agree. If you don't see it doesn't matter, but since you have taken all the trouble to come here it's a waste of money and your energy if you don't listen, if you don't capture the real inward story of all this, you are wasting your time, your energy, your money. So time is the past, the present and the future. The scientists would say something else, I have discussed this matter with them, they want all kinds of complicated manoeuvres to bring about their own conclusions.

Now the past is time - all the memories, all the knowledge, all the experience, all the pain, the anxiety, the loneliness, the despair, uncertainty, all that is the past. And that is acting in the present. Right? Modified, changed slightly, but all the past is acting now. What you thought ten years ago, slightly modified, it is still going on. You believe in god, so that belief gives you a certain security, and tomorrow you will still believe in god whether it is illusory or fanciful or nonsensical. So the past modifying itself in the present becomes the future. Right, clear? Very simple. So the future is now. No? Because what you are, you will be tomorrow unless you radically bring about a mutation. You understand what I am saying? You are all asleep. Would you like to go to bed? Probably you have never thought about all this, you have never gone into it, you have never taken the trouble to investigate, you have never given time, a little time during the day to say, my god, what is all this about, what is all this living, what is the meaning of this nonsensical way of living. So if you could give ten minutes now, giving your attention, giving your heart to find out, not mere intellectual, verbal action but give your whole being, your heart to find out, you will find out very quickly for yourself. Then no god, no priest, no country, no power, position and all that, they disappear completely, they are meaningless.

So the future is now. You understand? Because I am this now: I am greedy, envious, I have several enemies - not I, suppose I have - enemies, it is my country, it is my god, my guru is better than your guru, and all the rest of that nonsense. So if you can put all that aside - opinions, judgements, evaluations and face the fact that you are after two million years what you are now: frightened, lonely, depressed, anxious, uncertain, that's what you are now, today. Tomorrow you will be exactly the same, slightly modified, but you will be exactly the same. So the future is now. I don't know if you see this.

So the question then arises: what is change? Do you understand? If I am greedy now, or angry, I have been envious, jealous, I have got a great many hurts, if there is no radical mutation now I will be exactly the same tomorrow. It is logical, sane, therefore I ask myself, what is change? You understand? Is there such a thing as change? You understand all this, at least some of you? We use the word 'transform', which means change forms: I am this but I am going to change into that, which is still the same pattern. Right?

What does the word 'love' mean to you? Have you ever asked that question? Love of god, love of pictures, love of literature, I love my wife, which may be rather doubtful. I love literature and so on. What does that word mean to each one of us? Would you like to wait to answer, take time? Or shall I proceed with it? You understand? Would you like to answer that question, what is love, or would you want me, the speaker, to go into it. It's much easier for the speaker to go into it! It is an important question, very, what is love? How will you find out? How will you find out for yourself the truth of the matter, not all the romantic values, you know all that stuff, I don't have to. So what is it that is love, which is not emotion, which is not sexual response, which is not an imaginative - you know, all that stuff? So what is love to you?

Q: Silence.

K: Silence. Is that love? Silence. When you hit your wife, or push her, or do something to her, are you silent? Anything goes in this country. Right? All the saints, all the gurus, all the latest miracle workers, and all that, you absorb everything. Right? Somebody writes a book, and you say, yes, I agree with that. Somebody comes along and contradicts that and you say, yes. And you have banished from this country Buddha. Or you say, yes, he is one of us. So your brain is capable of absorbing rubbish, agreeing with something that appears to be true. Don't you do all this, actually, if you face the fact? Don't you? Your brain is capable of absorbing anything that goes in the name of religion: pure rubbish; and something most extraordinarily true. And this melange, this mix up, that's your life. Right?

I have to stop. So what is love? I have to stop now. We will have to go into this either Wednesday, or tomorrow, or next Saturday. Right? Is that all right? You don't mind?

Q: Tomorrow.

K: You'd love that? Don't be funny, sir. Why do you want it tomorrow? It is convenient for you, is it?

Q: Tomorrow is Sunday.

K: Tomorrow is Sunday, is that right? And so it is convenient for you. Suppose it is not convenient for me? You are not serious. Anything goes. So sirs, we had better stop and Mr Narayan will announce whether I talk tomorrow or Wednesday. Is that all right sirs?

Q: Yes.

K: Goodbye sirs.

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC TALK 1ST JANUARY 1986

On a week-day to see so many people seems rather absurd, doesn't it? I hope - one hopes that you will all take the trouble to listen to each other.

Last time that we met here, it was on Saturday, we talked about what is love. You may remember it, if you were here. And we are going to enquire together, I mean together, into this whole problem, which is very, very complex. And so, if you don't mind, you have to think, not just agree, not say, 'Yes, it is all right', and then go your own way. So we are going to enquire together into this problem of what is love. Together, not that the speaker is the only talker but together we are going to examine. This is not a lecture, not to instruct, or guide, or help. That would be too stupid because we have had all that kind of help for generations upon generations and we are what we are now. We must start with what we are now, not what we have been in the past, or what we shall be in the future. What we shall be in the future is what you are now. Right? What we are now, our greed, our envy, our jealousy, our great superstitions, our desire to worship somebody, to say 'You are a holy man' and all that tommy rot. So this is not a lecture, not an entertainment, not something you just accept, or deny, but we are talking over like two friends, if you like two enemies across the border. But we are talking together. So you have to exercise your brain, drive it, force it, think it out.

So we are going to go into these questions: what is love? And to enquire very deeply, profoundly into it, we must also enquire first:

what is energy? Energy. Every gesture you make is based on energy. While you are listening to the speaker you are exercising your energy. To come here from a long distance, from Benares, or still further up, you have to use a great deal of energy. Right? To build a house, to plant a tree, to make a gesture, to talk. From childhood, from the baby, the first cry of a baby is based on energy, supplied for the moment by the mother and so on. I won't go into all that.

So we must enquire what is energy? Are you all right, can one go on? I can go on, the speaker can go on indefinitely because he has been at it for sixty years, or seventy years, putting the same thing in different words. So if you will kindly, seriously listen because hearing is a great art, perhaps one of the greatest arts, to listen to what the other person has to say, not to interrupt, not to say, 'Yes, I agree with you and let's talk about something else'. We have to enquire first if you can listen at all. This is not a lecture, or an instruction, and all that stuff, we are together examining, questioning, doubting, never, never accepting what the speaker says, never. Right? Don't say, 'Yes we agree' but then go on accepting. He has no authority. So we will start.

What is energy? This has been one of the questions of the scientists. And they say energy is matter. Right? But previous to that: what is energy? You understand? It may be matter. It may be every kind of thing. But what is energy? Primordial energy? Who brought this energy about? Are you understanding what I am talking about? I am not sure. Because this has been a very, very serious question. So we are together taking a long journey into this; together, you and I walking by the same stream. You are not just following the speaker, you are not just saying, 'Yes, that sounds very good, so does the Upanishads, and the Gita and all that bilge that has been said, so we understand'. It isn't a bit like that. First of all one has to have great doubt. Right? Great scepticism. Right sirs? No, don't agree please, don't agree. You don't doubt anything, you accept everything. So doubt, scepticism of your own experience, of your own thoughts, of your own conclusions, doubt it, question it, not accepting a thing from any book, including my own. I am just a passer-by, he is not important.

And we are going to enquire together, it is very important please, together. You know what that means? Co-operating together to build something, to enquire into something, to see what is clear, what is doubtful, what is not clear. You are doing it. And the speaker has done this but you have to do this. So we are together, walking up a very long stream, you can make that stream a very, very, very strong current that will wipe you away, throw you on to the banks, or you can deal with it. So it requires your energy. Right? It requires your energy.

So we are asking: what is energy? (Sound of crows) That crow calling is part of energy. Right? The trees, the birds, the stars, the moon, the rising of the sun, and setting of the sun, it is all energy. Right? Probably you doubt it but it doesn't matter. And whatever you speak requires energy, the first cry of the baby out of the womb, that cry is part of that energy. Right? To play a violin, to speak, to marry, sex, everything on earth requires energy. Right? So we're enquiring together what is this energy, what is the origin, what is the source, how has it begun, who created this energy? Please, carefully, don't say, 'God' and that will be that. I don't accept god. The speaker has no gods - is that all right? You accept that? You will accept anything, so it doesn't matter, I will go on.

Please don't allow yourselves to accept what the speaker is saying at any moment - in his books, in his talks, in his videos, and all that business. So what is this energy? We cannot possibly exist without this energy. There is no existence on earth without this energy: the trees, tremendous energy to pull up water right to the top, tons of it. That is tremendous energy. To build an aeroplane, hundreds of people are responsible for it. To go to the moon and so on. So whatever we do, or don't do, is energy. Right? The dancer, the violinist, the painter, the house-mother, the army general, everything requires energy. Right? That is a fact whether you accept it or not, it doesn't matter. And we are enquiring: what is that energy? The origin of it, not just energy, or accept what the scientists say, which is, energy is matter and so on. I won't go into all that because the speaker has talked to many of them about this matter. And the religious people say 'God' and that ends it. Or some guru says... and that also ends it. They don't enquire, they don't doubt, they don't question, they don't have scepticism. Right?

So here we are saying, if you can, abandon all that; what the ancient people have said, abandon all that and leave it at the roadside and we will take a journey together. If you can't put all that aside, or leave it on the roadside, you can't follow the speaker, you can't understand the speaker. Right? Don't bother to understand him, it doesn't matter. But unfortunately you hear a lot of words and you say, 'Yes, that sounds reasonable' and so on and so on. We are not dealing with words. Words are not the mountain. The word mountain is not the mountain. The word K is not K. You understand all this? So your name is not you. To recognize that your name is not you. I think this is important to understand. The word is not the actual. Right? Is that clear? The word is not the tree. The word tree is not that. Right? So we have to be very careful now, not to be entangled with words. I wonder if you follow all this. Right? I can go on. My friend has given me a signal, my old friend.

And we are going into something that requires all your energy, all your brain, which is matter, which is the accumulated experience of a million years. And all that evolution means energy. Right? So I am saying - I am asking myself, you are asking for yourself, so I begin to ask myself, is there energy that is not contained, or stimulated, or held within the field of knowledge? You understand my question? Within the field of knowledge. That is, within the field of thought. Please don't agree with it. You agree with everything that is said.

So I ask myself: is there an energy which is not put together, stimulated, arranged by thought? You understand? Thought gives a you great deal of energy, to go to the office every morning at 9.0 o'clock, or 8.30, thought gives you that energy. Right? I must earn more money, I have a better house. Right? Thought, thinking, gives you the energy. I believe it took two or three hundred people, or three thousand people, to build a rocket that went to the moon. Right? So all that requires energy. To shake hands with you, to say, 'How are you?', to recognize old friends sitting across there. I am glad they have found a place, we can see each other. So I ask myself, I know thought, thinking, thinking about the past, thinking about the future, planning for the present, that gives a tremendous energy. Right? Right sirs? Thinking I must build a house, so I go to the office, I agree with him, and so on and so on. And you require a great deal of energy to be educated. Right? From ignorance, as they call it, I am not saying it is ignorance - from not knowing mathematics you gradually learn, and energy, to college, university and then you become some kind of something or other. And you have a job, to that every day of your life you go. Or you retire at an early age and die. So thought, please understand this, it is very important if you will, thought creates this energy, to build an aeroplane, think of what has gone into that. Hundreds of people have worked at it, step by step, by step, constructed it, and they have produced 747s, or whatever it is, it is a most marvellous machine that can never go wrong, or man can make it go wrong. And so on and so on. So thought is an extraordinary instrument of creating energy. Right? May I go on? Right?

If one doesn't see that as an actual fact then you are off the mark. Right? If you don't see it as an actual fact that thought creates tremendous energy; you want to become a rich man and you work like blazes to get to be a rich man. Right? You want to do some kind of crazy propaganda and you work very hard, you join groups, sects, gurus and all the rest of that business. So thought is an extraordinary instrument of engendering thought. Right? Thought engendering energy. Right? Don't agree.

So then we have to enquire into the very, very, very nature of thought. Right? Not say all the excuses. (Don't bother about this. I fell yesterday and I hurt myself, that is all, that is over. You can give your attention to something else.) So thought, which has planned this society, which has divided the world into Asia and Europe, the communist, the socialist, the capitalist, and the democratic republican, all that is created by thought. It is simple. The army, the navy, the airforce, to kill, not only for transportation but also to kill. This is so obvious, isn't it? So thought is very important in our life because without thought we can't do anything. Right? For you to come here from a distance required planning, adjusting, taking a train, aeroplane, taking a bus, etc., etc., all that is part of your thinking. Right? So what is thinking? You work it out, don't listen to me. What is thinking? You can't live without a certain kind of thinking. Right? Planning, going back to your house, going back to do your work and so on, get married, sex and everything is contained in the process of thought. So what is thinking? The speaker has talked about it a lot, so don't go back to his books. Don't say, 'Yes, I have heard that before'. But here you forget all the books, all the things you have read because we must approach this each time anew. So thinking is based on knowledge. Right? If you had no knowledge, how to come here, or take a bus or this or that, you wouldn't be here. So knowledge, memory, thought. Right? Agree? And we have accumulated tremendous knowledge, how to sell each other, how to exploit each other, how to build bridges, how to create gods and temples, we have done all that. The various ashrams, you know all that business, concentration camps of a certain kind. So thought has done all this: created the army, the navy, the aeroplanes. Thought has also, through knowledge, temples and all that business. So without experience there is no knowledge. Right? Be logical sirs. Logic is necessary up to a certain point. But if you start without logic, clarity then you become superstitious, imaginative, coming to conclusions, building temples and all that kind of nonsense.

So without experience there is no knowledge. The scientists are adding everyday something new. Please follow this carefully, if you don't mind. Experience is limited. Right? Because we are adding more and more to it, through knowledge. Experience, knowledge stored in the brain as memory and then that is the beginning of thought. Right? Am I right? Or are you right? What do you say? God, don't you feel anything? So experience is always limited. Right? Because you are adding more and more and more everyday in the scientific world, in your own life you can learn something more. So experience is limited, therefore knowledge is limited, memory is limited and therefore thought is limited. Right? Am I sane or insane? And we live by thought. So we never recognize, though thought can imagine the most extraordinary heaven and hell, the Olympic gods of the Greeks, the Egyptian gods - do you know anything about all that? No, it doesn't matter.

So your thought is always limited and your gods whom thought has created will always be limited. Right? I know you don't like this but I am going ahead. So your gods, your thinking, however wide it may be, however narrow it may be, all this is limited. And from this limitation we try to find the energy. You understand what I am saying? We try to find the origin, the beginning of creation.

So thought has created fear. Right? No? Hasn't it? Aren't you frightened of what may happen two years later - no? Aren't you frightened of losing a job, of not passing exams, of not climbing the ladder - you know what I mean by climbing the ladder? Getting more and more and more successful. And you are frightened of not being able to fulfil. You are frightened of not being able to stand alone, being strong for yourself. You always depend on somebody. All that breeds tremendous fear. Right? Won't you wink at me! So it is one of our daily facts that we are frightened people. Right? Would you agree to that very simple fact that we are frightened people? And fear arises when we want security. Right? You just listen. All right, I will go on. Don't bother. I will go on.

Fear destroys love. You cannot have love - love cannot exist where fear is. Fear is a tremendous energy. And love has no relationship with fear. They are totally divorced. Right? So what is the origin of fear? Right? All this is to understand, to be alive to the nature of love. If you don't understand all this then go and carry on whatever you are doing. Be happy with it, enjoy yourself, making money, positions and all that. But if you want to go into this very carefully you have not only to examine what is thinking, and the machines, the computers are doing that marvellously - you don't know anything about it. I talked to some of the professors in England just before I came to India, before the speaker came to India. There are computers that can think backwards and forwards. You understand what that means? They can think what? One has to get up at six therefore one has to plan to get up at six. Right? And after six what it has to do. And I believe that is called - I have forgotten, it will come back. So the machines, please understand this for god's sake, the machines, which is the computer - you know that joke? One is praying for god, and there is a computer next door, and the computer says, 'Whom are you praying to? God is here.' No sir, you don't know how serious it is. So - architecture, that's the word. I only learnt this recently and it may be wrong, it may be right, a computer can think what has happened and plan what will happen for the future. Which the brain is doing. You understand? You plan to come here, you spend so much money, so much time and then go back, go forward. So the computers can think forwards and backwards, which is call architecture - they may have changed the name by now. I am going to ask one of the specialist here.

So thinking has created fear. Right? Thinking about the future, thinking about the past and not being able to adjust quickly to the environment and so on and so on. So thought and time. Right? No, you don't understand. I will go on. Thought of tomorrow, what might happen, my wife might leave me, or might die. I am a lonely man, then what am I to do? I have several children so I had better marry - remarry someone or other because at least they can look after my children. And so on. That is thinking of the future, based upon the past, right, and so thinking and time are involved in this. Right? Thinking about the future, future being the day after tomorrow, or tomorrow, and thinking about that causes fear. Right? So time, thought, are the factors of fear. And we have examined thought, we have examined time. Time is the past, the present and the future, the rising of the sun and the setting of the sun, planting a seed and it becoming a huge tree. That is time. And also we have got inward time, I am this but I will become a rich millionaire. I am greedy but give me time, I won't be, next life perhaps. And so on and so on. So time and thought are the central factors of fear.

I am looking for a clock.

Audience: Ten past six.

K: Thank you. So I have talked for a hour and a quarter.

Audience: Forty minutes.

K: Is that all, too bad! So, let me finish this. Allow me another twenty minutes, if you don't mind. Do you mind? I won't keep you very long. It won't make any difference if you listen to me or not. You will carry on in exactly the same way as you have been living. You won't change, you won't do a thing because you are caught in a rut, in a groove, in a pattern. And you will go on and death is there. Right?

So we are enquiring into something which you may not understand but it doesn't matter. Time, thought are our principle factors of life. And both time inwardly, I am this but I will be that, or I have been, I shall be, I am, I shall be, all that involves time. And time is thought. They are not two separate things. They are both movements. Then what place has death? You understand sirs? What place in my life has death, suffering, pain, anxiety, loneliness, all those terrible things I have gone through? That is enough.

Sir, I had better take your watch, whoever will give it to me. I might lose it, or you might lose it.

You understand sirs. Please understand this very carefully. Time, thought are central factors of life. And we are saying thought and time are the factors of fear. That is a fact whether you like it or not. So what has suffering to do with time? You are following all this? What has suffering, pain, anxiety, loneliness, despair and all the travail that man goes through, is that all our life? You understand what I am asking you? We are journeying together. You are not just sitting there and listening to a nonsensical speaker. I am asking you. This is your life, right sirs, facts, not imagination. You are born, educated and you fit into BAs, MAs, and all the rest of it, PhDs, in order to get a job, or you become a great Prime Minister, or minister, for god's sake, you understand? This is your life. This is your consciousness, your consciousness is composed of your fears, of your knowledge, of your time, you know consciousness. Your knowledge, everything is in your consciousness. And in that consciousness, of which you are, that consciousness you have always thought is yours, mine. My consciousness. You understand my question?

Don't cross your legs, just sit comfortably as you were. Don't suddenly change.

Your consciousness, if you examine it very carefully, not examine it through judgements, evaluations, what you know, but if you examine it very carefully, your consciousness is made up of its content. Right? Do you understand what I am saying? What you think, your tradition, your education, how many fears, whether you want to exchange your wife for a new wife, or whether you go to a certain temple, all that, loneliness, fear, is what you are. You may think you are divine inside but still you are thinking. When you say, 'Yes, there is god in me', it is still the product of thought. So your consciousness, which is what you are, not physically, but psychologically, inwardly which is your consciousness, is the consciousness of mankind.

This we carefully went into. Don't accept anything he says. Every human being on this earth goes through sorrow, pain, anxiety, uncertainty, insecurity, quarrels, coaxing, wanting this, not wanting. All that is what you are. If you imagine that you are a god incarnate, that is part of thought. Right? Thought, as we pointed out, is limited. So your consciousness, what you are, is the rest of mankind. Every man goes through this. Or every woman. Every human being goes through this. Right? Every human being: your neighbour, your father, your grandfather, and the past generations all over the world. So you are not individuals. This is a blow. Don't accept it. Examine it, don't say 'It is rot', or 'It is not a fact because the Gita says something', or the Upanishads say something, or the Bible says something - it is a fact that you, your suffering, your pain, your anxiety, your loneliness, your knowledge, is common - I won't use common - is shared by every human being. Right? So you are not a separate soul, a separate atman. I know you don't like this because you were brought up to swallow anything that goes along.

So there must be freedom from fear, from hurts, from every kind of thing human beings have put together. There must be freedom, you understand, not just words. 'India must be free from the rest of the world'. That is just nonsense. Nobody can live by themselves, they need a friend, they need somebody to help them.

So, we are trying to find out, enquire, into what is love. Right? We are saying, as long as there is fear of any kind, biologically, fear of attachment, fear of loss, fear of any kind, the other cannot exist. If there is any kind of attachment the other cannot exist - the other being love. So we are going to enquire, if time allows. Then seeing all this, from the beginning, from the baby to the grown man, seeing what the world is, and enquiring into what is death, why are we all so frightened of death? You understand? You know what it means to die? Haven't you seen dozens of people killed, or hurt, haven't you? No? Are you strange people, or what? Belong to a different planet? We have seen death. We have never enquired very deeply into what is death? It is a very important question, as what is life. You understand? We said life is all this rot. We have said life is knowledge, learning, you know, all that stuff, going to the office regularly every day at 9.0 o'clock, or 10.0 o'clock, quarrelling, battling, wanting this and not wanting, you follow? We know what living is. Right? A series of actions produce a series of reactions and sorrow, pain, that is our life. Then if that is living, which it is, don't say, 'Yes, living is something extraordinary' - this is living, quarrelling, divorcing, fighting. But we have never enquired seriously into what is death. You understand what I am talking about? We know what is living, if you are honest, and you can imagine anything you like but this is living. You can imagine heaven is there and god sort of looking after you, every prayer is answered and all that rot. At least for me, for the speaker. But we have never seriously enquired into what is dying. All right sir?

What is dying? It must be an extraordinary thing to die. No? Extraordinary thing. Everything has been taken away from you: your attachments, your money, your wife, your children, your country, your superstitions, your gurus, your gods, everything is gone. Right? You may wish to take it to the other world but you can't take your money, your bank account. Right? - your attachments, your gurus, your temples. You can invent temples up there, not after you are dead but while living you can invent all the gods on earth. But when death comes it says, 'Look, you cannot take anything with you, all your attachments, all your affections, all your hurts, all the things that you have gathered in life, you can't carry, there is no space for that'. Right? So death says, 'Be totally detached'. Right? That is what happens when death comes. You have no person to lean on, nothing. Right? Have you understood this? You can believe what you will, be reincarnated next life, that is a very comforting idea, but it may not be a fact, it may be your imagination, your longing, your 'I can't leave my wife', I have left so much for my son but I will meet him next life so I'll tell him off and so on.

So we are trying to find out what it means to die, while living, not committing suicide, I am not talking about that kind of nonsense. I want to find out what it means to die. Not jump in the river, I don't mean that, or go off to the Himalayas and die there. But I want to find out for myself what it means to die. Which means can I be totally free from everything that man has created, including myself? You know there is an Italian joke, sorry to repeat it: the whole world will die, perhaps including me! So I want to find out the actual fact when death says, enough. Right? Do you want to find out? No. Do you really want to find out?

What does it mean to die? Give up everything. Right? Not sacrifice, death, sensation, don't use those silly words. It cuts you off with a very, very, very sharp razor from your attachments, from your gods, from your superstitions, from your desire for comfort next life and so on and so on. So I am going to find out what death is because it is as important as living. So how can I find out, actually, not theoretically, make evaluations about it and form societies, and you know, all that circus? But I actually want to find out, as you want to find out, I am speaking for you, so don't go to sleep. So what does it mean to die? One is very healthy, the body is functioning, there is no disease, like K - at ninety one, he has no disease, no pain etc., because I have seen experts, doctors. So what does it mean to die? Put that question to yourself, don't listen to me. While you are young, or when you are very old, this question is always there. Right? It is always asking, demanding what it means to die. Are you interested in this? Are you? Oh no, don't shake your heads. You know what it means? To be totally free, to be totally unattached to everything that man has put together, or what you have put together, totally free. No attachments, no gods, no future, no past. You don't know what it all means either. You don't see the beauty of it, the greatness of it, the extraordinary strength of it. So while living to be dying. You understand what that means? While you are living, every moment you are dying. So throughout life you are not attached to a thing, your wife, your father, your mother, your grandmother, your country, nothing - because that is what death means. Right? You may wish for another life. That is all too easy, too simple, too idiotic.

So living is dying. You understand? Living means every day you are abandoning everything that you are attached to. What you worship, what you think, what you don't think, your gods, your country, nothing. Can you do this? Can you do this? A very simple fact but it has got tremendous implications. So that each day is a new day. You understand? Each day you are dying and incarnating. Oh, you don't understand. There is tremendous vitality, energy there. You understand? Because there is nothing you are afraid of. There is nothing that can hurt, being hurt, it doesn't exist. Thought is limited, therefore it has no importance; it has importance because I have to get up and go in five minutes, but time, thought, fear, attachment, and all the things that man has put together has to be totally abandoned. That's what it means to die. God may be waiting to save you in heaven - it all sounds so ridiculous. So can you do it? Will you try it? Will you experiment with it? Not for just a day; every day. No, sir, you can't do it. Your brains are not trained for this. Your brains have been conditioned so heavily, by your education, by your tradition, by your books, by your professors, all the rest of it. This requires to find out what is love; love and death go together. Because death says be free, non-attached, nothing you can carry with you. And love says - there is no word for it. So love can exist only when there is freedom, not from your wife, for a new girl, or a new husband, but the feeling, the enormous strength, the vitality, the energy of complete freedom.

Next time we meet we will talk about religion and meditation. I hope that is all right. I am sorry there are only three talks but the speaker cannot carry on. You understand? He is ninety one and that is good enough.

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC TALK 4TH JANUARY 1986

You don't mind if we start five minutes early? I suppose we must talk.

Will you kindly participate in what he's talking about? Will you? Follow if you wish what he is talking about. Not only follow, but, together, share, I mean participate in it, not just think about it or casually pay attention to it, but rather together go into what the speaker is going to talk about presently.

One or two things must be made very clear. This is not a personality cult. The speaker has an abomination of all that - to worship somebody - because everything he is saying is contradictory if you personally worship an individual, or make something, him, into a god, into a... all the nonsense that goes on in the world. What is important is to listen to what he has to say, share it, not only listen, but actually participate in what he's saying. You may agree, or disagree, which you are perfectly right to do, but since you are here and since the speaker is here, we are talking over together. We have talked about - I've forgotten - we talked about life, the very complexity of life, the beginning of life. We are going together. What is life, what is the origin of all this, the earth, the marvellous earth, the lovely evening and the early morning sun, the rivers, the valleys, the mountains and the glory of the land which is being disseminated, spoiled?

So, what is the origin of all this? If you say 'god', then it's finished; then you can trot along quite happily because you've solved the problem. But if you begin to question, doubt, as one should, all gods, all gurus - I don't belong to that tribe - if you begin to question all that man has put together through a long evolution of two million years from the beginning of the Sumerians, and so on, the Hebrews, ancient Egyptians, down the corridors of history, they've always asked this question: what is the beginning; what is the origin; how has all this come about? I hope you're asking this question. Don't just listen to me, to the speaker with wide eyes, or with narrow eyes, whatever eyes you have, but share it, tear it to pieces, don't, please accept anything he says. He's not your guru, thank god; he is not your leader. He is not your helper. Right? So, that is the platform, that is the beginning of this talk.

This is a very serious talk we will go into, and unless your brain is active, not just sit there and gaze, is actually active, I'm afraid, one is afraid that you won't be able to follow. That would be useless, for the speaker, if you sit there and listen to a lot of words; but if we could together take a long journey, a very long journey, not in terms of time, not in terms of belief or conclusions or theories, but as we have examined very carefully the way of our lives, fear, uncertainty, insecurity and all the inventions that man has made including the extraordinary computers and so on, if you take a long journey into this, where are we at the end of two million years? Where are we going. Not some theory, not what some wretched book says, however holy it is. Where are we all going? And where have we begun? They're both related to each other: where we are going, where we began. The beginning may be the ending. Do you understand? I don't know if you understand what I'm talking about. Don't agree. Find out. There may be no beginning and no ending and we're going to investigate into that together. Is that all right? Do you approve of all that? It doesn't matter if you approve or not, I will go on.

From the beginning of time, man has always sought, thought in terms of religion, right? The ancient Egyptians had their Isis, Osiris and all the gods and the ancient Hebrews, and so on right down to the present day. What is religion? You understand my question? What is religion? Why are we so inclined, or not, say I don't believe in anything, but man has always sought something more than this world. They've worshipped the stars, the suns, the moons and their own creations; it has been a tremendous endeavour, effort, energy, spent on ancient temples, mosques and the churches of course. They have spent tremendous energy on this. Some of them most extraordinarily beautiful, others are hideous - around the corner you can find them. And we're asking: what is the spirit of man that sought something beyond the work, the present day agony, the travail, the work, going to the factory, to the office and climbing the ladder of success, making money, trying to impress people, trying to command, right from top to bottom? Right? Right? Are you agreeing to this? It is a fact whether you agree or not. You're all seeking power in some form; wanting to be at the centre of things - in Delhi, or here, or in other places. You all want to be there.

But, we're asking: what is religion; what is it that made man spend enormous treasures, or give treasures to a temple and so on; what made him do all this? Are we talking together? Yes? Yes? Somebody tell me a little bit. What made him do all this? What was the energy that was given to all this? Was it fear? Was it a seeking a reward from heaven, or hell, whatever you like to call it? Seeking a reward? Was that the origin? Because man as you, you want a reward, you want something in exchange. You pray three times or five times a day and you hope in return some entity will give you something, from a refrigerator to a car to a better wife, or better husband, or wait for grace, something that you can hope, cling to. Right? This has been the history of all religions, right, organized, you know the temple near here call Tirupati. I'm sure you go there, but it doesn't matter, they make, I believe, a million dollars every third day. Right? Right? No? So, god and money are always together. That's how the Catholic Church was built, tremendous treasures there, extraordinary valuable jewels and all that. So, you too have it here, your various temples and all the puja and worship and all that triviality; all that is really nonsense.

So, we are trying to find out, enquire very, very deeply what is religion, not obviously all this moneymaking stuff. Right? Do you go along with what I'm saying, even for an hour? But afterwards you can go back to your temples, to your prayers, to your - what's it called in Sanskrit, I've forgotten for a moment - it doesn't matter. So, we are asking what is that which is nameless, which is the supreme intelligence, which has no relationship with all our prayers, with all our temples, mosques, churches; of course that's all man-made. Right? Right? All the gods, all the temples, mosques and so on, even that, all that is man-made. No? We have built the churches (not you, you're all in the offices or somewhere else) but the builders of the ancient monuments, ancient temples, all that, all the rituals, all the strange dresses they put on, medieval dresses, to impress the people. But if you brush all that aside, any intelligent man must, brush all that aside, the prayers, the worship, the puja, giving garlands to some idol, right, and the priest muttering some Sanskrit words, probably which he doesn't himself understand, and probably it's his tradition and thereby he earns a lot of money, and so on. If you can put all that aside, not become cynical, not become merely sceptical, but a really enquiring brain, right, enquiring brain. Have you got such a brain? Enquiring brain, a brain that's active, a brain that enquires into everything, not only outside which the scientists are doing in their way, the world, the outside world, but have you got a brain that is enquiring into its own thoughts, into its own consciousness, into its own pains, sufferings, all the rest of it. Have we got such a brain?

Here, we must separate the brain from the mind. You don't mind? The brain is the centre of all our nerves, all our knowledge, all our theories, opinions, prejudices, college, universities, all that knowledge is gathered in the skull. Right? It is there, all the thoughts, all the fears, and so on. Is the brain different from the mind? Don't look at me, I'm asking you a question. If you seriously pay attention to what the speaker asked, is there a difference between the brain, your brain, that is inside the skull and all the knowledge you have gathered, not only you, but your forefathers and so on, for two million years? It's all encased in there. So, that brain will always be limited. Right? Don't agree, sir, this is much too serious. And is the mind different from this, from my consciousness, from my daily activities, from my fears, anxieties, uncertainties, sorrow, pain and all the theories which man has gathered about everything - it is there. Right? And the mind has no relationship with the brain, but it can communicate to the brain, but the brain cannot communicate with it? Am I making something clear to you? Do you understand my question? Don't agree, please, that's the last thing to do, agree with me. The speaker is saying the brain is the keeper of all our consciousness, of our thoughts, of our fears, and so on, and on, and on. All the gods, all the theories about gods and all the unbelievers, it's all there. Nobody can dispute that unless you're a little bit odd. You know the word 'odd'? It's all there, but this brain which is conditioned by knowledge, by experience, by tradition, and so on, it cannot have any communication with that mind which is totally outside the activity of the brain. I don't know if you will accept this; don't bother, just think about it, look at it. But that mind can communicate with the brain, but the brain cannot communicate with that because the brain can imagine infinitely, the brain can imagine the nameless; brain can do anything. You understand? And that's too immense because it doesn't belong to you; it's not your mind, your etc., etc.

So, we are going to investigate - together, please bear in mind always together - not only the nature of religion, but also enquire into the computer. You know what the computer is? Don't you? Yes. It's a machine. It can programme itself. It can bring about its own computer. The father computer has its own son computer who is better than the father. You understand all this? You don't have to accept this. It's public, it's not something secret, so watch it carefully. That computer can do almost anything that man can do. It can invent all your gods, all your theories, your rituals, even better at it than you will ever be. So, the computer is coming up in the world, not only in the factories, but also it's going to make your brains something different. Which is - you've heard of genetic engineering - oh god, don't you hear all these things? They're trying to, whether you like it or not, to change your whole behaviour. That is genetic engineering. They are trying to change your way of thinking. You understand what I'm saying?

Oh, don't stare at me, sir. Will you go and sit somewhere else? Will you? Will you go and sit somewhere else? Because you are staring at me all the time. Sit there, sir, would you?

Q: It's only my eyes.

K: I know, I know. That's good enough. Would you sit there, sir? Good. Thank you.

So, genetic engineering and the computer, when the two meet together - they're going to presently, in a couple of years - what are you? You understand what I'm asking, sir? What are you; as a human being what are you? Your brains are going to be altered. Your way of behaviour is going to be changed. Right? They may altogether remove fear, remove sorrow, remove all your gods. They're going to, sir, don't fool yourself. Because it all ends up either in war or in death. Right? So, this is what is happening in the world actually. Genetic engineering on the one side and computer on the other and when they meet, as they're inevitably going to meet, what are you as a human being? Actually, your brain now is a machine. You are born in India and say: 'I'm an Indian'. You are encased in that. Or you're born in Russia, back again. And so on. You are a machine. Please don't be insulted. I'm not insulting you. You are a machine who repeats, repeats, or says it different - you know a machine, like a computer. Right? Don't imagine there is something divine in you - that would be lovely - something holy that is everlasting. The computer will say that to you too.

So, what is becoming of a human being? What's becoming of you? And we have also to enquire - this is a very serious subject, don't agree or disagree, just listen, you can't, probably you can't take part in it - what is creation? You understand my question? You understand my question at least - creation. Not the creation of a baby, that's very simple, or the creation of a new something or other. Invention is totally different from creation. Invention is based on knowledge. Right? I can improve, the engineers can improve the jet; the improvement is based on knowledge and the invention is also based on knowledge. So we must separate invention from creation. Will you? No, no, sir, don't agree. This requires your total energy, your capacity to penetrate, not just say: yes, yes. The difference between creation and invention, you understand the difference? Invention is essentially based on knowledge. Right? I improve the clock; I have a new gadget, because the old gadgets I have used, I have found something new and I invent something else. So all invention is based on knowledge, right, on experience. Inventions are inevitably limited because they're based on knowledge. Oh, for god's sake, somebody wake up. So, knowledge being ever limited, inventions must always be limited. In the future they may have no jets, but something else and that will go from Delhi to Los Angeles in two hours, that's an invention based on previous knowledge which has been improved step by step by step, but that's not creation. Right? I get rather fed up looking at those faces which say nothing.

So what is creation? So what is life? You understand? Life in the tree, life in the little grass, life in the scientist, life, not what they invent, what they do, but the beginning of life. I don't know if you understand, life, the thing that lives. You may kill it but it's still there in the other.

So, we're asking, don't agree or disagree, don't nod your head, but see we are enquiring into what is the origin of life. C'est d'accord? Vous etes comme moi? I'm sorry. So, we are going to enquire into the absolute - something that's really marvellous. Not a reward. You can't take it home and say: I'll use it.

What is meditation to you? Would you kindly tell me. What is meditation? You meditate, some of you, don't you? No? Oh, god. Some of you do, don't you? What is meditation? The word, it's common language in the dictionary, means: to ponder over, to think over and, to concentrate, to learn to concentrate on something, not let your brain wander all over the place. Right? Right? Is that what you call meditation? Be simple, sir, be honest. That is what? Giving every day a certain period and you go to a room quietly, sit down for ten minutes, quarter of an hour, meditate. Right? Right? Do you agree with that, sir? No? Then what is meditation to you? Concentration? Thinking about something very noble? You can't answer all these questions.

So, we are going to first enquire what is meditation. Any conscious effort to meditate is part of your discipline of the office, because you say: if I meditate, I'll have a quiet mind, or I'll enter into another state. And so on and so on. The word 'meditation' means to measure, which means to compare. Oh, lord. So, your meditation becomes mechanical, right, because you are exercising energy to concentrate on a picture, an image, or an idea and that concentration divides. Right? You understand what I mean? Concentration is always divisive. No? I want to concentrate on that, but thought wanders off. Then I say I mustn't wander off, come back. You repeat that all day long, or half an hour. And then you come off it and say well I've meditated. And this meditation is advocated by all the gurus, by all the - you know, lay disciples, and so on, and so on; and the Christian idea is: I believe in god and I'm sacrificing myself to god. You understand what I'm saying? And, therefore, I pray to save me, save my soul, save my etc., etc. Is all this meditation? Tell me, I know nothing about meditation, at least not this kind. Will you tell me? Is this meditation? Tell me, sir, don't be frightened, I'm not your guru, or your boss, or your - Tell me if this is meditation. It's like an achievement. Right? If I meditate for half an hour, by Jove I feel better. Or is there a totally different kind of meditation? Right, sir? Totally different?

I'm asking you, but since you won't answer I must answer. In the word 'meditation' which is measurement, as I said, which is comparison of achievement, that's not meditation. I say don't accept anything that the speaker says, at any price. The speaker says that is not meditation at all. That's merely a process of achievement. Right? You have been one day not able to concentrate; you take a month and say: yes, I've got it. That's like a clerk becoming a manager. Right? So is there a different kind of meditation which is not effort, which is not measurement, which is not routine - please pay attention to what I am saying - which is not mechanical? Is there a meditation in which there is no sense of comparison, or there is no reward and punishment? You understand what I am saying? So, is there any meditation which is not based on thought which is measurement, time, and all that? You understand my question? How can one explain a meditation that has no measurement, that has no achievement, that doesn't say: I'll be that; I am this, but I'll become that? That being god or super-angel.

So, that requires, if I may point out, not for you to accept or deny, just pointing out, is there a meditation which has nothing to do with will, with an energy that says: I must meditate - which has nothing to do with effort at all? The speaker says there is. You don't have to accept it. He may be nuts. He may be talking nonsense, but he sees logically that the ordinary meditation is self-hypnosis, deceiving oneself and when you stop deceiving, stop all that mechanical process, is there a different kind of meditation. And unfortunately, the speaker says: yes. That is not for you to say: yes, I agree, I'll meditate. You can't get at it through effort, through giving all your energy to something. You can't, there is no - you understand? It is something that has to be absolutely silent. Don't achieve silence now. Don't sit in meditation. Please don't do it, sir. You can't do it. First of all, begin very humbly, very very humbly and, therefore, very gently and, therefore, no pushing, driving, saying: I must do this. It requires a tremendous sense of not only aloneness, but a sense of - I mustn't describe it. I mustn't describe it because then you'll go off on descriptions. If I describe it, the description is not the real. Right? The description of the moon, or of the Himalayas, painted, description is not the Himalayas. Right? So, we'll stop describing. It's for you to play with it, or not play with it, going your own way and your own peculiar achievements through meditation and so on, and so on, reward and all the rest of it. So, a meditation which is absolutely no effort, no achievement, no thinking; then the brain is quiet. You understand? Not made quiet by will, by intention, by conclusion and all that nonsense; it is quiet. And being quiet, it has infinite space. Are you waiting for me to explore? And you swallow what I explore. God, what kind of people are you?

So, is your brain ever quiet? I'm asking you. Is your brain, thinking, fearing, your office work, your thinking of your family, what they will do, your sons and your daughters, thinking, which is time and thought, is your brain ever quiet? Would you kindly tell me?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: What, sir? Don't be nervous. Say what you want to say and if you can't say it forget it. Is your brain ever quiet. Not made quiet by drugs and by all kinds of things, whisky and various forms of drugging yourself. You drug yourself when you believe. You drug yourself and say: yes, this is perfectly right; the Buddha has said that, therefore it must be right. You're drugging yourself all the time, therefore you have no energy of that kind that demands into the penetration of something immense.

So, we're going back now to find out what is creation. You understand? What is creation? Because it has nothing to do with invention. That's gone. So what is creation, the origin, the beginning? What is life? Tell me, sirs, what you think of it. What is life? Not going to the office and all the rest of it, sex and children, or no children but sex and so on and so on. What is life? What gives life to that blade of grass in the cement? You understand? What is life in us? Not all the things we go through, power, position, prestige, fame, or no fame, but shame. So, that's not life, that's part of our mishandling of life. But, what is life? You understand my question? You understand, sir?

Why are you listening to me? What makes you, if you are listening at all, listen to the man? What is the motive behind your listening? What do you want? What's your desire? Behind the desire there is a motive. So what is desire? First, carefully let's quickly examine it. Desire is part of sensation, isn't it? I see this beautiful clock or ugly clock; it's a sensation. The seeing brings about a sensation. Oh, this is normal, sir. From that sensation, thought comes and makes an image of it. That is, I see this clock, rather nice, I would like to have it. The sensation of seeing, then thought coming and making an image of that sensation; at that moment, desire is born. It's very simple. Right? So, is there a brain, your brain, which is not muddled up, muddled by environment, by tradition, by society and all the rest of it?

So, what is the origin of life? Are you waiting for me to answer it? You are waiting for the speaker to answer that question? Are you? Would you kindly tell me yes or no. I'll wait. If you tell me, then I'll go on. This is much too serious a subject for you to play with, because we are trying to enter, enquire into something that has no name, no end. I can kill that bird; there is another bird. I can't kill all birds; there are too many of them in the world. So, we are enquiring into what makes a bird, what is creation behind all this? Right? Are you waiting for me to describe it, go into it? Yes, sir? You want me to go into it? Why?

Q: To understand.

K: What do you understand?

Q: What is creation?

K: Why do you ask that? Because I asked? You see again, you're - sorry, sir. No description fits, can ever describe the origin. The origin is nameless; the origin is absolutely quiet; it's not whirring about making a noise. Creation is something that is most holy; that's the most sacred thing in life and, if you have made a mess of your life, change it. Change it today, not tomorrow. If you are uncertain, find out why and be certain. If your thinking is not straight, think straight, logically. Unless all that is prepared, all that is settled, you can't enter into this world, into the world of creation. It ends.

This is the last talk. Do you want to sit together quietly for a while? All right sirs, sit quietly for a while.

May we get up now? Slowly, slowly, sir.

BROCKWOOD PARK DISCUSSION WITH M WILKENS AND D BOHM 12TH FEBRUARY 1982

K: One of our problems this morning is the difficulty of thinking together, not about something but the capacity to think together. I wonder what prevents people doing that. Is it their opinions, is it their conclusions, their concepts, their ideals, their tremendous deep rooted prejudices?

B: I feel it is because people stick to this thing, that they have an opinion which they are identified with, they don't know it but they are sticking to it.

K: Is that what prevents people from thinking together, co-operating together?

B: Well that is clearly a major factor, you can see it politically, let's say east and west.

K: Oh, politically, of course.

B: Well if we wanted to have peace we would have the two sides ready to discuss without fixed opinions.

K: Of course, of course. But that's impossible with the politicians.

W: Well no, I don't agree it is impossible.

K: I mean at present, as it is.

W: Yes, but I mean, as you say, there is nothing like this which is impossible.

K: No, nothing is impossible but if they want to do it they can do it.

W: Yes, and I think if we want them to do it, we can make them do it.

K: Yes, that's right. If we ordinary citizens want them to do it, they will do it. Now how will you help the ordinary citizens to want this?

W: Well I think they have to overcome their sense of helplessness. And I think ultimately also that they need to recognize their own responsibility, it isn't just the politicians who are being awkward, they are being awkward too.

K: It comes back to being responsible in everything you do, each person. And they don't feel that way, they don't feel responsible. They turn to the leaders, the political leaders, religious leaders, or some kind of leader and they depend on them.

W: And they blame them.

K: Blame them. Exactly! So the thing is so topsy turvy, the whole thing is.

B: Well it seems to me that we can't begin that way either because it is no use blaming people for what they are. But people are unwilling...

K: Therefore one has to begin with oneself.

B: But is it possible that some people could begin anyway, regardless of what the others are doing?

K: Leave the others.

B: Well we can't affect the others at the moment but you have once suggested that later if some people could do it then eventually others would come in.

K: Yes, quite.

B: So it doesn't mean we are neglecting the others but...

K: ...we keep the door open.

B: Yes, it is not the right order to begin with the others.

K: No. I agree. One has to begin with oneself.

B: Or with whoever.

W: But if you say we are ourselves our relationships, that what I am is my relation with other people, and therefore one must look at, observe these relationships, in that sense one is beginning with others. One is beginning...

K: ...with the others and with oneself, constant interrelationship.

W: When you said that there were these blocks and that people couldn't...

K: ...jump...

W: ...between one person and the other, this isn't always the case. Is it not relevant that sometimes between two people who have a close relationship and a loving relationship, there is a great deal of being on the same wave length, and immediately a kind of empathic relationship that one mind is not really separate from the other mind. But is this not possibly relevant to this whole thing of the changing of one's own, the transformation of one's own mind, that it is through this process of interaction.

K: Interaction, quite. Sir, would it be sufficient if half a dozen of us really understood this business? Could we affect the world? I think we could. Hitler affected the world.

B: Hitler was only one, of course. He did it mostly by himself.

K: Of course. The crazy man, he infected the whole world.

B: Well there was a programme recently on the BBC about Thomas Paine, and it showed that he actually had a significant affect on the whole world. He had a tremendous energy and passion. It was very clear in that programme that he affected the whole of history.

K: Yes, sir. Then that raises the question: why is it that we are not passionate? Why is it that we are all so luke warm? I think we are lustful for power, for this, or for that, but we seem to have lost, or never had this passion for doing the correct thing, doing the good thing.

B: I was only going to say that I think part of the reason for this lack of passion is just the failure to comprehend this point: you see many people might feel that it is very important to do something but they say society is so big...

K: So big that you are smothered.

B: Overwhelmed. So the question, there is lack of clarity on this point, that what can we actually do, to make it clear that it is really possible to do something.

K: Yes, sir, absolutely. I feel it is really possible.

B: It has to be so clear that one does not waiver when there is trouble, when it becomes difficult.

W: I think that the society conditions us so that we do feel helpless. That is part of the difficulty.

K: But why are we concerned about society? Why should it smother us, why should it curtail, or destroy our passion? And what is passion? How does one have that - not how, not a method, but when does it take place? That's better. When is passion let loose?

W: Well we know when it is not let loose, and that is when all these native forces stop it. And I suppose the basic thing is that if the individuals in society are being dominated by their own self images then they want to perpetuate the state of affairs where this appears to be so. And so they will exert a conditioning influence through society to keep us all in this state of helplessness and delusion.

K: Does passion for responsibility, say for example, if you have tremendous passion, does it come with the end of sorrow? Is it related to suffering, passion? Is the word passion etymologically connected with suffering?

W: Well that is just a question, in one sense, of scholarship, which I am not up on, but you mean it more deeply presumably.

K: Of course. You see I have just come from India, there were about seven thousand people in Bombay, a whole cross section of society - the very rich, the middle class and some very poor. I talked to them in English, of course, and you see they really don't understand this extraordinary complexity of life, they just want solutions to problems, personal problems, economic problems, spiritual problems, they want solutions. And seeking solutions doesn't solve the problems.

B: No. But I think that is just the point, people first of all generally don't understand that, that solutions are irrelevant, and that helps to dissipate their energy obviously.

K: So the approach to the problem is important, and the approach is not the resolution of the problem but how you look at the problem. Is the problem different from you? Rather, you are the problem, the problem isn't out there.

B: But to communicate that is difficult because you see a person who is unemployed feels his problem is out there, if he only had a job he would be all right. Now you were saying something much deeper: in what sense do we say the problem is you? Suppose somebody starts out, you want to talk with somebody and he is unemployed.

K: Yes, sir, I was listening the other day to the unemployed, they were being interviewed - they were bitter, angry, furious, for three years they haven't been employed, and they were furious about the leaders, conservative leaders, labour leaders and so on. They are not concerned about anything except employment, getting money, food, shelter, that's all they are concerned about. I think the vast world is concerned about that and nothing else.

B: Now, suppose you want to talk to this man, how would you make him concerned with something more?

K: "No," he says, "bread first, for god's sake bread first. Keep all your spiritual stuff for later when you have given me bread." I have talked to a lot of people in India and other places, it is the same problem, sir, whether bread comes first or the other thing comes first. If it is the bread then there is no solution, and we are caught in that, all of them are caught in that, the bread first. And the other is, if you can have it you are lucky. But as the vast majority of people are concerned with immediacy, how are you going to shown them anything? You can't. Therefore is it only reserved for the well-to-do who have leisure, who have certain opportunities to be alone, to look at themselves, talk about it? That seems so terribly unfair. But that is a fact. So will the leisure class, or people who have leisure, will they understand their relationship? Or they use that leisure to amuse themselves, to entertain themselves?

B: Well, it makes no difference.

K: It makes no difference, that's what I am saying. I think leisure is a marvellous thing. I think you learn infinitely more when you have leisure.

B: Perhaps, coming back to this question of salary, you see, people who are suffering they are unemployed, they are ill, badly governed and so on, now you have said that passion is connected with sorrow, so that might be an approach.

K: But you see, will even the leisurely people, even the fairly well educated people, who are really facing the problems of life, and the problems of the world, will they have leisure enough to give their time, their energy, to say, look, let us understand the relationship of each other and go into it all. It seems so extraordinarily difficult for most people.

B: Well, yes I understand that. That's why we are saying if some people could start this might affect the others. There are people who have leisure and who are interested, but I think they do not quite see the real possibility of this. There are people who might be ready to do this but they don't see that anything is possible.

K: Yes, sir, I know.

B: Now if they could see that something is actually possible, more of them might come in.

K: So how do you help - say, for instance, help me to see that there is a possibility, there is a door open for me to escape from all this horror - not escape, sorry - to understand this whole business, how will you help me? By talking to me, by pointing out all the miseries, all the confusion, by analyzing, by seeking a cause? We have done all that.

B: That's not enough. Now we were saying that people with great energy, like Hitler, or Thomas Paine, or various other people, have had their effect on history, some good, some bad. And the question is, is it possible that a group of us to...

K: Possible to?

B: For a group of us.

K: Oh yes, oh rather, of course, that is the only way.

B: Which will actually penetrate all this...

K: ...mess! Of course it is possible. That's what we are trying to do. In Brockwood, or any of the other places, is to gather a whole group of people who think alike - not alike, who think, who have a good understanding of relationship and go into all that. But it seems so incredibly long.

Sir, would you say, to go into another subject, would you say we are the masters of time? That we make our own time? Apart from the physical time, the inward time, the inward hope, the inward getting better, the inward idea of becoming something, all that involves time. If we could shorten the time, that is, I am violent, and I think I can get over that violence given time. And so I invent time. Whereas actually if I have no time 'what is' becomes extraordinarily important and it can be changed. But if you allow me time I am lost. I do not know if I am conveying anything.

W: Well is the following relevant here that if you take someone who has lived their whole life and not been able to in anyway develop much, and they have a few days to live, and while they are dying they suddenly - well I mean I have seen an old man recently who was dying and for the first time in his life he seemed to have a role, he was dying, and no one could take this away from him. Well now, some people would say this is very sad, but it's only for a day or two, but surely the length of time doesn't matter at all.

K: No.

W: Is this partly the kind of thing that you mean that we are always measuring things, and saying, this is important because this is bigger than that in time, but really it is the quality.

K: Can the mind stop measuring? Which means I am the past, the present and the future. I am that. And my time is tomorrow - I hope I will be happy tomorrow. So I am inventing my own time. So I am the master of my time. And if I understood this really deeply, then I would deal with 'what is' and finish with it immediately. I don't know if I am conveying something.

W: Yes, you mean you would be aware of 'what is' instead of being dominated by the thoughts about what was, or what might be in the future. So you would...

K: I would give all my energy to that.

W: To 'what is'. Yes. But then do you mean that the sorrow is a question of memory and of the past?

K: Yes, that's right.

W: And so that these memories from the past are preventing you from experiencing directly 'what is'.

K: Yes. And also if I recognize that I am the past, the present, and the future, I am all that, and whatever happens I have to deal with what is happening immediately, not postpone it, not find any excuse and all the rest of it.

And also we were talking about, at Ojai, with Dr Bohm, has man, human beings, taken a wrong turn?

W: He has always been on a wrong turn!

K: And therefore there is no way out? That is hopeless, to think in those terms is impossible.

B: Well it is the same as we were saying this morning about knowledge. That is, knowledge is time.

K: Knowledge is time.

B: Because it's the past coming to the present making the future. It is the same, to be without time and knowledge, to end the activity of knowledge. Knowledge is not merely abstract knowledge, but it is very active, because it makes time.

K: Thought is time. Can thought come to a stop? Because thought has created all this mess, thought has invented wars, the whole thing is invented by thought.

B: Of course thought has invented all sorts of good things too.

K: Oh, of course. That goes without saying.

B: We want to say that thought comes to an end, which doesn't mean that the useful features of thought will stop.

K: No, no thought has its place.

B: But thought dominating comes to an end.

K: No, I mean thought as time coming to an end.

B: What kind of thought is left without time?

K: Emptiness.

B: Well is that thought as well?

K: No.

B: But I meant, suppose you have to think to do something.

K: There you have to think.

B: But does time come in when you have to think?

K: Yes, of course. I have a job as a surgeon, or whatever it is, and I have to think. That is necessary and right to think there. But I am questioning this whole issue of thought dominating my life.

B: Yes. Thought about oneself.

K: Thought about oneself, thought about the future, thought about the past, thought about my family - thinking, thinking, thinking. Thought is limited, my actions are limited, and therefore more catastrophe, more misery. So I am asking myself whether thought can come to an end psychologically, inwardly, but outwardly I need to have thought? So we can put that aside. So can thought come to an end altogether? Thought is knowledge, thought is time, thought is limited, divisive, and thought has created wars, and the churches, and the things inside the churches, and temples and all the rest of it. One sees thought is very, very limited, destructive.

B: That kind of thought.

K: We have said that. So can thought come to an end inwardly? That means can the content of consciousness, which is the result of thought, can the contents be wiped out? That is fear, anxiety, agony, all the beliefs, all that is my consciousness. And that is time. And so I am asking can time, thought, come to an end? But thought as knowledge in occupation, in professions, in skill, is necessary. We don't have to go back to that, repeat over and over again.

W: But could I transpose this question you are raising to the matter of a relationship, to two people? Then does it go like this: that if thought comes to an end there is some kind of direct apprehension between the people, but the thought has come to an end in the sense that it is not dominated by thoughts of what these people did before, or what they might do in the future, but a direct apprehension of 'what is' at that instance?

K: Now sir, just a minute. My mind - one's mind, I won't say my mind - one's mind is chattering, talking endlessly, reading, tremendously active all the time about the trivial things and the great things. I am asking as thought has its place why should I be thinking about anything. You understand my question? Why should I be thinking about my future, about my past, or about myself, why? Why this accumulation of psychological knowledge? That is really my question. Physical knowledge, knowledge to act skilfully in any field, there it is necessary. But is knowledge necessary inwardly?

W: Well it does seem to me that thought is part of a creative relationship, but it is only a component in the whole thing.

K: Yes, but is thought love?

W: No it isn't.

K: Therefore?

W: But I do wonder a little bit whether thought doesn't come into love somewhat? I mean it is bound to to some extent.

K: No. I wonder if love is thought.

W: No, certainly not.

K: Therefore is it possible to love another without thought? To love somebody means no thought. And it brings about a totally different relationship, a different action.

W: Yes, well I think there can be a great deal of thought in a loving relationship, but the thought is not the primary...

K: No, when there is love thought can be used, but not the other way round.

W: Not the other way round, yes. The one has a primacy over the other. Whereas the trouble, the basic trouble is that it tends to be the other way round, we are like computers which are being run by our programmes. I think what I was trying to do for a minute was that if you say that we are our relationships, I was trying to transpose what you were saying about can thought come to an end, to the relationship and think what kind of relationship is there without thought. I think that was what I was trying to get clearer.

K: Just see what takes place without thought. I have a relationship with my brother or my wife, and that relationship is not based on thought but basically, deeply on love. And in that love, in that feeling, that strange feeling, why should I think at all? Love is comprehensive. And when thought comes into it it is divisive, it destroys the quality, the beauty of it.

W: But is love comprehensive, is it not all pervasive rather than comprehensive because surely love can't express itself adequately without thought.

K: Comprehensive in the sense whole. I mean love is not the opposite of hate.

W: No.

K: So in itself it has no feeling of duality.

W: I suppose love is much more a quality of the relationship, and a quality of being which pervades.

K: Yes. When thought comes into it then I remember all the things she did, or I did, the troubles, the anxieties, all those creep in. That's one of our great difficulties, we really haven't understood or felt this love which is not possessiveness, attachment, jealousy, hatred and all that.

W: Isn't love sort of largely awareness of the unity?

K: Would you say love has no awareness, it is love. It isn't that love is aware that we are all one. It's like a perfume, it is a perfume, you can't dissect the perfume, or analyse the perfume, it is marvellous perfume. The moment you analyse it you dissipate it.

W: Yes, but I think - all right, if you say it is a perfume then it is somewhat like a quality, but then quality is associated with this sense of unity, is it not, that this is one kind of aspect.

K: But you are giving it a meaning.

W: I am talking around it! I am not trying to pin it down. But I mean, can there be love without any awareness of this unity?

K: It is much more than that.

W: All right, it is more than that. But can it exist unless that sense of unity is there?

K: Just a minute. I am a Catholic, and I love, I have compassion. Can there be compassion, love, when there is this deep rooted belief, idea, prejudice? Love must exist with freedom - not the freedom to do what I like, that is nonsense. Freedom of choice and all that has no value where we are talking about, but there must be total freedom to love.

W: Yes, well I mean, what I was going to say was, which you might say is nonsense, the Catholic might have quite a lot of love but it has limits to it in certain situations.

K: Of course. Yes, of course.

W: But it is like your point, can you have an egg which is partly bad!

K: Yes.

W: But this sense of unity is part of the whole business, is it not?

K: If we have love there is unity.

W: Yes, all right. Inevitably. That would satisfy me. I agree with you that having a sense of unity won't turn love on.

K: You see all religions and the people who are religiously minded have always turned love and devotion to a particular object, or a particular idea, a symbol. It isn't love without any hindrance to it. That's the point sir. Can love exist when there is the self? Of course not.

W: But if you say the self is a fixed image, then love can't exist with any fixed image, with anything fixed because it has no limits.

K: That's right, sir.

W: But it seems to me that in the relationship by the dialogue and a movement between two minds with no sense of limit...

K: Ah!

W: ...and necessarily outside time, because time would be putting a limit, then something new can come up.

K: But can two minds ever meet? It is like two parallel railway lines, they never meet. Is our relationship with each other as a human being, wife and husband and so on, is it always parallel, each pursuing his own line, and never actually meeting in the sense of real love for another - love even without object?

W: Yes, well in practice of course there always is some degree of preparation because...

K: Yes, that's all I am saying.

W: I mean if the relationship can be on a different level then there are no longer lines separated in space.

K: Of course. But to come to that level seems almost impossible. I am attached to my wife. I tell her, I love her. And she is attached to me. And is that love? I possess her, she possesses me, or she likes being possessed and so on, and all the complications of relationship. And I say to her, or she says to me, "I love you". And that seems to satisfy us. And I question whether it is love at all.

W: Well it makes people feel more comfortable for a time.

K: And is comfort love?

W: I mean it is limited and when one partner dies the other is miserable.

K: The loneliness, the tears, the suffering. We really should discuss this thing. I used to know a man to whom money was god. And he had plenty of money. And when he was dying he wanted to look at all the things he possessed. And the possessions were him. He was dying to the possessions outwardly, but the outward possessions were himself. I don't know if I am... And he was frightened not of this state of coming to an end but losing that. I don't know if I am conveying it. Losing that, not losing himself and finding something new. Death - well we mustn't begin with that, death is far. Do we go into it?

W: Well could I just ask you a question about death? What about a man who is dying and wants to see all the people he has known, all his friends before he dies, is that an attachment to these relationships?

K: Yes, that is attachment. He is going to die and death is rather lonely, it is a most exclusive club, exclusive action. And in that state I want to meet all - my wife, children, grandchildren, because I know I am going to lose them all and I am going to die, end. It's a terrifying thing. The other day I saw a man who was dying. And, sir, I have never seen such fear in my life, actually absolutely fearful of anything, of ending. And I said - I knew him - so I said, what are you frightened of? He said, "I am frightened of separation from my family, from the money I have had, from the things I have done. And this," he said, "is my family, I love them. And I scared stiff of losing them."

W: But I suppose the man might want to see all his friends and his family to say...

K: ...Goodbye, old boy. That's a different matter. We will meet on the other side!

W: Possibly.

K: I knew a man, sir, it is very interesting, he told his family, next year, in January, I am going to die on such and such a date. And on that date he invited all his friends and his family, he said, "I am dying today", and made the Will. "Please leave me". They all trooped out of the room, and he died!

W: Yes, well if the relationships with all these other people were him and he was going to die, he would just like to see them the last time, and now it is finished - 'I am finished, I die'. That was not an attachment.

K: No. Of course not. And the consequence of attachment is painful, anxious, there is a certain sense of agony, of losing.

W: Constant insecurity.

K: Insecurity.

W: Fear.

K: All the rest follows. And that I call love. I love my wife. And I know deeply inside all the travail of this attachment, but I can't let go.

W: But you still feel distressed that your wife would be sad when you died.

K: Oh, yes, that is part of game, part of the whole business. And she soon gets over it and marries somebody else, and carries on the game.

W: Yes, one would hope so. But one could be worried and afraid of other people's sorrow.

K: Yes sir. Yes sir.

W: Presumably the acceptance of one's own death would reduce their sorrow.

K: No. Is sorrow attached to fear? I am afraid of death, I am afraid of ending my career, all the things I have accumulated both physically and inwardly, all that comes to an end. And fear then invents reincarnation and all the business. So can I really be free from the fear of death? Which means can I live with death? Don't misunderstand that. I am not committing suicide, live with it, thrilled with the ending of things - the ending of my attachment. Would my wife tolerate it if I said, "I have ended my attachment to you"?! There would be agony. So I am questioning this whole content of consciousness put there by thought, and thought predominates our lives, and I say to myself, hasn't thought its place, and only its place and nowhere else. Why should I have thought in my relationship with my friend, or with my wife, or some girl, why should I have thought about it? When somebody says, "I am thinking of you", it sounds so silly.

W: Well one often does need to think of other people for practical reasons, of course.

K: That's a different matter. But I am saying, where love is why should thought exist? Thought in relationship is destructive. It is attachment, it is possession, it is clinging to each other for comfort, for safety, for security, and all that is not love.

W: No. But as you said love can make use of thought, and there is what you call a thoughtfulness in relationship.

K: That's a different matter, yes, yes.

W: So that thought...

K: Look: I am attached to you, I am attached to my wife, or my husband, or whatever it is, or to a piece of furniture. I love my wife in that attachment, and the consequences of that are incalculably harmful. And can I love my wife without attachment? Marvellous it is, to love somebody wanting nothing from you.

W: That's a great freedom.

K: Yes, sir, so love is freedom.

W: But what you appear to be saying is, that if there is love between husband and wife then if one dies you seem to be implying the other would not have sorrow. I think maybe that's right.

K: I think so. That's right, sir.

W: You would transcend sorrow.

K: Sorrow is thought. Sorrow is an emotion, sorrow is a shock, sorrow is a sense of loss, the feeling of losing somebody and suddenly finding yourself utterly desolated and lonely.

W: Yes. You mean a state of loneliness is contrary to nature, so to speak.

K: So if I could understand the nature of ending, ending something all the time - ending my ambition, ending my whatever it is, to end sorrow, to end fear, to end the complexity of desire. And to end it, which is death.

W: Yes, but I think the Christians used to talk about it being necessary to die everyday.

K: That's right.

W: The same idea.

K: Necessary to die everyday to everything that psychologically you have gathered.

W: And everyone agrees that death is freedom.

K: That is real freedom.

W: There is no difficulty in appreciating that. You mean you want to transpose that ultimate freedom into all one's life.

K: Yes, sir. Otherwise we are slaves. Slaves to choice, slaves to everything.

W: Not masters of time but slaves of time.

K: Slaves of time, yes.

LONDON 2ND PUBLIC TALK 6TH JUNE 1982

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday? We went into at some length the question of fear, whether it is possible at all to be totally and completely free of fear. We pointed out the nature and the structure of fear, the contributory causes of fear.

And we said that fear cannot be suppressed or transmuted, or escape from it. It is to be observed, and to discern that the observer is the observed, the observer is not separate from fear. The observer, who is the past, with all the accumulated knowledge, he separates himself, and thereby either suppresses fear, escapes from it, or tries to transcend it, go beyond it. All that implies conflict.

And as we human beings have lived in conflict for thousands of years, we should consider together whether it is possible entirely to eliminate fear, conflict. And that is possible only when the observer realizes he is not separate from that which he is observing, psychologically. Then that division between the observer and the observed disappears entirely. This is not just an idea, a cunning activity of thought. Observation has nothing to do with thought. To observe the whole movement of fear, the complexity of it, not come to it with any kind of motive or try to go beyond it, but just to observe it.

And it's very important, it seems, that one has to learn, if we can use that word, and learning is not a matter of time, here - to observe without the accumulated remembrances of the past. That requires a great deal of awareness, to be aware of the whole contributory causes of fear, and the consequences of fear. And observe it as it grows, as it moves.

And when there is no conflict, which can only take place when the observer realizes that which he is observing is himself, that the observer is the observed, then all energy which we have been dissipating in conflict, in trying to surmount it, go beyond it, suppress it, totally disappears. Therefore when there is the observer, which is the observed, then there is the energy which is not dissipated, which then dissolves entirely fear. This is what we were talking about yesterday.

One listens to a lot of these ideas and draws a conclusion, an abstraction of what one has heard, and that abstraction becomes a principle, an ideal, a thing to be achieved. Whereas if one listens without the abstraction taking place, just listens to the whole psychological movement of fear, not make an idea of it, but actually observe it, as one observes a marvellous mountain, you can't do anything about it, it is there. Similarly to observe this whole nature of fear. And in that observation there is no dissipation of energy. And hence the totality of that energy wipes away fear, entirely. Either we hear all this, make an abstraction, as an idea, and pursue the idea. Or without abstraction observe one's own fear, because most of us have all kinds of fears. We may have no fear at the moment, sitting here in a rather hot hall, but there is this fear, hidden or obvious. And where there is fear there is all kinds of neurotic activity. Is one aware of the whole root of fear, the conscious as well as the hidden fears deeply in the recesses of one's own psyche?

Or we just listen to these words totally unrelated to actual fear that one has. Or you listen very carefully, discover whether it is for oneself false or true. And that very denial of the false in which a great deal of energy is wasted, then that accumulated energy, dissipates fear.

We said too, yesterday, that we'd talk about pleasure - pleasure in various forms, pleasure of possessions, pleasure in becoming something, pleasure in all the sensory responses. But to understand the nature of pleasure one must go into the nature and understand what is love. Because when one loves, if that is possible at all, pleasure has quite a different meaning. It may not be necessary at all. So we ought to, together, as we said yesterday in our conversation with each other, go into this very complex problem of what is love.

And please, this is not a sermon. We have spoilt that word, we use it in so many ways - love of climbing a mountain, sexual love, love of achievement, love of power, position, status, love of something that gives you personal enjoyment and so on. What is the difference between the thought that has created the pleasure of love and love itself? What is the nature of love, which is not desire, which we talked about briefly yesterday, and love which is not pleasure, love which is not recollection of past incidents?

So one asks, is love desire? Is love pleasure, which is the remembrance of some happy events, sensory or psychological happenings? Is the remembrance of past events, the pleasure that one derives from those events, and the cultivation of desire, is - (short gap in tape) How is one going to find out, because it seems to us, in our conversation together, without this quality, what one calls love, and the perfume of it, the reality of it, not the verbal description of it, the actuality of that state of mind, one has to really understand deeply that desire, pleasure, and remembrance has no place at all where love is concerned. Is that at all possible?

In enquiring together into this matter one must go also into the question that the brain records every incident. It's a recording machine, like a computer, so it is mechanical. And being mechanical, it is constantly repetitive. And our conditioning is to repeat a pleasure, either it be sexual or other forms of pleasure. Can the brain register what is absolutely necessary and not register any form of psychological events? Please, this is a very serious question, because all our conditioning, the content of our consciousness, is the mechanical process of the brain which records.

And so one's life becomes mechanical. In that mechanical field, one may invent, but it's still born out of knowledge, and knowledge is incomplete, always, about anything.

So thought is born of knowledge. And so thought is always incomplete. Knowledge always lives within the shadow of ignorance. So we're always functioning within the field of knowledge, which is our conditioning. Please, if I may point out, and one hesitates to point out, please don't just listen to all this as words, as ideas, but enquire with the speaker into the nature of one's repetitive mechanical mind, neither accepting nor denying it, but closely, attentively observing it, observing your own quality of mind, of brain, how terribly conditioned it is, like the British and the French and so on. And also conditioned by the religious concepts, conditioned by the climate and so on, by tradition. And when one is enquiring into a very deep subject like love, it behoves us not to come to it with our conditioning. So can we bring order in the confused, messy consciousness? Can there be order in this disorder of our whole way of life, our society, our culture, the language which we use, our reactions, so contradictory, and observe our consciousness with its content? Because when one observes it, there is such deep contradiction in it, wanting peace, to live a happy life, creative life, and yet doing everything opposite to that. So our consciousness is in perpetual conflict, and rather messy.

And is it possible to bring about order, because order is supreme virtue. Order is totally unrelated with disorder. Having a disordered brain, consciousness, seeking order from that disorder, is still disorder. Right, are we meeting each other - I hope. If I am confused, disorderly, messy, and I try to find order out of this confusion, that order is still disorder. Order exists only when there is total ending of disorder. That is, disorder expresses itself in conflict, in contradiction, saying one thing and doing another, thinking one thing and acting totally differently. We're such, if one may use without creating irritation, we are so, such hypocrites. And out of this disorder, we try to find order.

So can disorder end, because when there is an ending to total disorder, there is supreme order. So one has to enquire into what is disorder, how it arises. I hope you're all interested in all this. Since you're here, probably you are slightly interested in all this, not too deeply, probably it's such a lovely morning you'd like to go out and play golf. But since you are here, sitting in a hot place, uncomfortable and so on, please do consider seriously all that the speaker is saying - don't brush it off. Because the world is in complete disorder, the world is in a state of insanity, talking about peace and killing each other, talking about peace and selling armaments. All that's going on, which we talked about briefly yesterday. It's a very serious matter, not an entertainment, our minds are used to entertainments. So please give your serious attention to all this, if you will.

What is disorder? Because where there is disorder, there can be no love, where there is fear there is no love, where there is mere search for continuity of pleasure, love cannot possibly exist. So one has to enquire, if you are at all serious and very, very honest, what is the nature of disorder, why we live in such disorder.

Is not disorder a contradiction? Is not disorder, which expresses itself in conflict, psychologically, inwardly, or outwardly, is not disorder the pursuit of an ideal? When one is confronted with the actual, is there not disorder when the future is more enticing than the present, and so on? So disorder essentially is a contradiction. That is, as we went into it yesterday, human beings are violent - that's a fact, that's a reality. At the least possible challenge or hurt or considered honour, we are ready to kill another. We've had two terrible wars and we are still pursuing wars and we are still talking about peace - it's a contradiction, utter dishonesty. And where there is conflict in relationship with each other, man, woman, with neighbour or neighbour who is thousands of miles away, where there is conflict in our relationship, there must be disorder.

To perceive that instantly, not rationalize it, discuss it, be clever about it, but to see the truth of it, immediately, that there is only the fact which is, we are violent, and not try to become non-violent. While you are trying to become non-violent, you're being violent, whereas, if we face the fact that we are violent, inherited through various centuries and inherited from the animal and so on. You know, to see the false, see our illusions, and move away from the false, then that which is, is truth. But we have so many illusions, and these are the contributory factors of our disorder. To be aware of this whole movement of disorder, not to say, I must dissolve them, or in order to have order, but to observe it very closely, with all your energy, then that state of disorder in oneself disappears entirely. That is to put one's house in order. There is order then, and there is no contradiction. You mean what you say, exactly. There's no double talk. That means one has to be a light to oneself, not follow anybody; in the realm of the spirit, there is no authority, no intermediary between you and that reality, the truth.

But we have allowed ourselves to have intermediaries, leaders and so on. So if we understand this nature of disorder, then out of that comes, naturally, easily and sweetly, order, which is the highest form of virtue, in our action, in our thinking and so on.

And as we said, where there is disorder in ourselves and contradiction, love is not possible. I may tell my wife, if I have a wife or a girlfriend, I love you. But that's just a pleasurable expression. But love demands a great deal of enquiry. One cannot love another if you belong to any kind of group, nationality, religious adherents. There must be freedom, totally, to love. The very word 'freedom' is the expression of love, the word itself means 'love', freedom.

And without love there is no compassion - social service, doing good, being kind, tender, generous, has nothing to do with compassion, that's only part of sympathy, natural expression and so on. But compassion demands a great deal of intelligence. The intelligence of thought, which is cleverness, is not intelligence.

That supreme intelligence exists only where there is compassion, love and order.

Then we can go to the next subject: there can be no love if there is jealousy, hatred, no sense of antagonism. How can you kill another, if you really love, whether for your country, for your interest, for god or whatever it is, how can you kill another if you love. Please, this is all very serious - do consider all this, because we are living in a world which is terribly dangerous, which has become dangerous, totally insecure, and without this quality of intelligence, born of compassion and love, you cannot bring about a totally different social order.

We also should talk over whether sorrow can end, and what is the relationship between love and sorrow. Can there be love where there is suffering, both inwardly and outwardly? So we ought to talk over together whether it is possible to end suffering, this terrible burden that man has carried for millenia upon millenia. There is not only personal suffering, but the suffering of the world. Those who have been brought up without any clothes, food, or one meal a day, living in degradation, poverty, and these terrible wars. How many people have shed tears, and apparently we don't seem to learn from all this, we are still carrying on, like primitive people, barbarians killing each other. So we ought to consider what is the relationship between love and sorrow. If one loses one's brother, wife and children, if one is attached, and is attachment love? Where there is attachment there must be suffering. Attachment breeds fear, anxiety, pain, grief, sense of utter loss. And that breeds sorrow. Is it possible to love another without any kind of attachment.

And if we do not go into this matter deeply, for ourselves, talking about love has very little meaning. Perhaps some of you have heard the speaker for the last 60 years or more and we are still caught in the old tradition and the old habits of attachment and attempting to become detached, trying to struggle to be detached. Detachment leads to cynicism, cruelty; whereas if one understands the nature of attachment, and goes into it deeply and sees the consequences, then seeing that which is false, then the false drops away. One hasn't time to go more into this, because there is something more to talk over together, if you're not too tired.

We ought to talk over together a very complex problem, of what is death. Why human beings throughout the world, of whatever colour, whatever nationality, whatever race, whatever religion, are so scared of death, so frightened of it. Or you treat life as a jolly good experience, and you die and you say, I had a jolly good life. But those who are really quite serious in their intent to find out the whole meaning of death, must enquire, not only into the fear, which we went into, but also what is death - the ending. What is ending? Why is one frightened so much if things end? I will lose my brother, he's dead, he's dying. And I'm attached to him, I like him, companionship and all the rest of it, or my wife or my sister or my girlfriend. And I'm afraid of losing, afraid of being utterly lonely, facing old age without any companionship. Or being young, the same pattern is repeated, if one thinks, looks at it at all.

So what is death, what is the meaning of death, which means, the ending, the ending of everything - ending of your possessions, ending of all your remembrances, ending all your attachments, ending of all the pleasurable or unhappy habits. So we ought to enquire, not into what is death, but rather into what is the ending of the known. Because our minds, a brain, has always functioned within the known. And when it is challenged, which is the ending of the known, which is death, it is scared, it is frightened, it shrivels up.

So is it possible to end it while living - not commit suicide, I'm not talking about that - the ending. Say, for example, the ending of attachment, attachment to one's work, to one's name, to one's family, to one's ideas and beliefs and doctrines, the ending of one's god, if one has god. The total denial, which is, the essence of death, all the known. That is death, the ending of the known is death. So can we live with death all the time. I wonder if you understand what I'm talking about.

I'm living, plenty of vitality, energy, drive, clear, but I'm attached to something, I'm attached to my reputation, sitting here and talking to them. I'm attached to that - if I am, I'm not, but suppose I am. To end that attachment for addressing large audiences right over the world, to completely, totally, without any effort, to end that sense of dependence, because that is death.

So while living, to live with this constant ending of accumulation, constant ending of every record. That requires a great deal of attention, awareness, energy. When once you perceive that, then it becomes like a river full of water that is flowing.

Also, we should discuss, talk over together, if you're not too tired, the question of religion, meditation, and if there is anything sacred. The speaker puts meditation and religion at the end of the talk, because if you talk about religion and meditation and so on at the beginning, a mind that is confused, disorderly cannot possibly meditate - it has no meaning, it may practice all kinds of silly theories. Please don't be offended by what the speaker is saying

So we should consider what is a religious mind. Religions throughout the world have played an extraordinary part in one's life, seriously or superficially. It has become an entertainment. All the words and the symbols and the processions and the things that go on in the name of religion, are put together by thought. And thought, as we talked about the other day, yesterday and previously, is not sacred at all, it is merely a material process, born of knowledge, memory, stored in the brain.

So first to find out what is truly a religious mind, one must be free of all religious dogma, whether the Hindu, Buddhist, Christian or whatever it is, Muslim, Islamic world, entirely, totally completely free of all that. Because that's part of our conditioning. We have been programmed for two thousand years, as Christians, three to five thousand years as Hindus, Buddhists and so on. Because to find out for oneself what is a religious mind, there must be complete freedom from all orthodoxy, tradition, and all the amusements in the name of religion that goes on.

Because in those ideas, in those conceptions, the symbols, saviours, we have found security for a complex, miserable, confusing life. That's our safety escape from this. But when we have put order in our lives here now, then there is no fear, and the mind that is absolutely without a shadow of fear, psychologically, has that quality of a religious mind.

And beliefs, whether Christian belief or Buddhist, or Hindu or the belief of the Muslim - why should we have beliefs at all? Belief in God - God is the invention of thought, because god is the ultimate security. And in the name of god we have done terrible things, burnt people, tortured people.

So one has to be free entirely of all belief and faith and dogma. Why is it that when we will talk about religious matters we are so gullible, we don't exercise, apparently, our reason, sanity, common sense. We accept everything. And scepticism and doubt is denied in the Christian world; in the Hindu and the Buddhist organization of religion, there is, doubt is encouraged, doubt is a part of virtue.

So the mind can only understand that which is religion in the sense, to find out or to come upon that which is sacred - if there is something sacred. Because technological culture cannot possibly bring about a totally global culture, religion; and that's impossible, global interrelationship of humanity, which is the only goal of all politics. And to come upon this, if there is anything sacred, which thought has not invented, meditation is necessary.

India, unfortunately, has brought this word into this western world recently. The Christian world had its own contemplative order, contemplative state of mind. The gurus and others have brought this idea of meditation. And these people have invented or brought their old tradition from Tibet, from Zen, Japan, from Burma, from India - the mischief began in India, first. That meditation means you must practise something, practise a method, practise to be silent, practise to be aware, practise the moment which is the present and so on - practise.

When you are practising something you're being repetitive, if you're playing the piano and you're practising, you may be practising the wrong note. But here you think it's necessary to practise, day after day, take a vow, being a monk, you know, the whole business, there is no time to go into that. So we practise. The more you practise the more your brain will become dull, obviously, whether you're practising various systems of meditation, which means, your brain is becoming more and more mechanical, it's never free. And to find out or to come upon that which is nameless, timeless, sacred, there must be complete freedom, not brought about by desire, by thought, but by ending that which is not free, like attachment, like pursuit of pleasure, the self-fulfilment, self-centred activity and so on. This demands a great deal of enquiry, great deal of energy, perception, not only knowing oneself, knowing oneself not through any form of analysis, but knowing oneself through observation of one's reactions in our relationship with each other. Those reactions are really what we are. And when it reveals what we are, that revelation becomes knowledge to us, and so we accumulate more and more knowledge of ourselves. And that knowledge becomes a hindrance to freedom. Please, I haven't time to go into this, just see the truth of it quickly.

So one asks, is there a stop to thought and time? Because if there is time, that is if there is thought, the perpetual occupation, as most of us are perpetually occupied, thinking about various things, chattering, the mind is never, the brain is never quiet, but always groping, searching, remembering, hoping. Such a mind, obviously, is never quiet.

But to perceive that it is not quiet, without any direction, say it must be quiet, to perceive it, to observe it's not quiet, then it becomes extraordinarily quiet, without any compulsion, without any practice, which means one requires great sensitivity, attention, awareness. Only in that absolute silence of the mind, a silence which is not cultivated by thought, it isn't a silence between two noises, or between two thoughts, this silence is not that. Silence demand total freedom from all self-centred activity and pursuit of pleasure and fear and so on. Only in that silence completely can there be that which is nameless.

NEW YORK UNITED NATIONS TALK TO AN INVITED AUDIENCE 11TH APRIL 1985

I am supposed to talk on World Peace beyond the 40th anniversary of the United Nations.

Mankind, man, has lived on this earth over fifty thousand years, and perhaps much longer, or for less duration. During all this long evolution man has not found peace on earth - 'pacem in terris' has been preached long before Christianity, by the ancient Hindus and the Buddhists. And during all this time man has lived in conflict, not only conflict with his neighbour but with people of his own community, with his own society, with his own family, he has fought, struggled against man for the last five thousand years, and perhaps more. Historically there have been wars practically every year. And we are still at war. I believe there are forty wars going on at the present time. And the religious hierarchy, not only the Catholics but the other groups have talked about 'pacem in terris', peace on earth, goodwill among men. It has never come about - to have peace on earth. And they have talked about peace when you die and go to heaven and you have peace there.

One wonders, if one is at all serious, why man kills another human being - in the name of god, in the name of peace, in the name of some ideology, or for his country - whatever that may mean - or for the king and the queen, and all the rest of that business. Probably we all know this: that man has never lived on this earth, which is being slowly destroyed, and why man cannot live at peace with another human being. Why there are separate nations, which is after all a glorified tribalism. And religions, whether it be Christianity, Hinduism, or Buddhism, they are also at war with each other. Nations are at war, groups are at war, ideologies, whether it is the Russian, or the American, or any other category of ideologies, they are all at war with each other, conflict. And after living on this earth for so many centuries, why is it man cannot live peacefully on this marvellous earth? This question has been asked over and over again. An organization like this has been formed round that. What is the future of this particular organization? After the 40th year what lies beyond?

Time is a strange factor in life. Time is very important for all of us. And the future is, what is present. The future is now, because the present, which is also the past, modifying itself now, becomes the future. This has been the cycle of time, the path of time. And now, not beyond 40 years of this organization, but now, at the present time if there is no radical change, fundamental mutation, the future is, what is now. And that has been historically proved, and we can prove it in our daily lives.

So the question really is: whether human beings, you and us, sitting on the platform - I am sorry to be sitting up here - are human beings? And as long as we with each other, or with man and woman, are in perpetual conflict there will be no peace on this earth. One may talk about it endlessly. The Roman Catholic hierarchy talks about 'pacem in terris', and they have been also responsible for appalling wars in the past. A hundred years of war, torture, all kinds of horrible things they have done to man. These are all facts, actualities, not the speaker's wish. And religions, including Islam, Hindus, Buddhists, and so on, they have had their own kind of war. And the future beyond the 40th anniversary is what is going on now.

One wonders if one realizes that. The present is not only the past, but also contains the future; the past modifying itself constantly through the present and projecting the future. If we don't stop quarrels, struggles, antagonism, hate, now it will be like that tomorrow. And you can stretch out that tomorrow for a thousand years, it will be still tomorrow.

So it behoves us to ask ourselves whether we, as human beings, single or a community, or in a family, whether we can live peacefully with each other? Organizations have not solved this problem. You can reorganize but war still goes on. So organizations, whether it is world organization or a particular kind of organization to bring about peace, such organizations will never succeed because human beings individually, collectively, nationally, are in conflict. Strong nations, like America or Russia, are at war with each other - economically, ideologically, and actually - not bloodshed yet. So peace cannot possibly exist on this earth if there are nationalities, which, as we said, is glorified tribalism. Nationalities give certain security, man needs security and he invests in nationalism, or in a particular ideology or belief. Beliefs, ideologies and so on, have separated man. And organizations cannot possibly bring about peace between man and man because he believes in something, he believes in certain ideologies, he believes in god and others don't.

I wonder if one has ever considered, religions based on a book - like the Koran or the Bible - become very bigoted, narrow and fundamentalist. And religions like the Hindu and the Buddhist, they have many, many books, all considered sacred, real, straight from god's mouth! They are not so bigoted, they are tolerant, they absorb. So there is this conflict going on: those who rely, put their faith in books, and those who do not put their faith in any book. So conflict between the book and those who accept multiple books. I wonder if one is aware of all this.

And we are asking deeply, if you are serious at all, whether you and I, and those of us who are involved in organizations, can live at peace with each other? Peace requires a great deal of intelligence, not just demonstrations against a particular form of war, against a nuclear or atom bomb and so on. Those are the products of minds, brains that are entrenched in nationalism, in some particular form of belief, ideology, so they are supplying armaments - the powerful ones, whether it be Russia, America, or England or France - armaments to the rest of the world, and they also talk about peace, supplying at the same time armaments.

It is a vast cynical world and cynicism can never tolerate affection, care, love. I think we have lost that quality - quality of compassion. Not analyse what is compassion - it can be analysed very easily. You cannot analyse love, love is not within the limits of the brain, because the brain is the instrument of sensation, it is the centre of all reaction and action, and we try to find peace, love, within this limited area. Which means, thought is not love because thought is based on experience, which is limited, and on knowledge, which is always limited, whether now or in the future. So knowledge is always limited. And having knowledge, which is contained in the brain as memory, from that memory springs thought. This can be observed very simply and easily if one examines oneself, if one looks at one's own activity of thought, experience, knowledge. You don't have to read any book, or become a specialist to understand your own way of thinking, living.

So thought is always limited, whether it is now or in the future. And we try to solve all our problems, both technological, religious, and personal, through the activity of thought. Surely thought is not love, love is not sensation or pleasure, it is not the result of desire? It is something entirely different. To come upon that love, which is compassion, which has its own intelligence, one has to understand oneself, what we are - not through analysts, but understanding our own sorrows, our own pleasures, our own beliefs.

You know wherever you go, all over the world, mankind, human beings, suffer, for various reasons, it might be petty or some very, very deep incident which has caused pain, sorrow. And every human being on this earth goes through that on a minor scale or a tremendous incident, as death. And sorrow is shared by all mankind, it is not your sorrow or mine, it is mankind's sorrow, mankind's anxiety, pain, loneliness, despair, aggressiveness. So you, and we, are the rest of humanity, we are not separate human beings psychologically. You may be a woman, or a man, you may be tall, dark, short and so on, but inwardly, psychologically, which is far more important, we are the rest of mankind. You are the rest of mankind, and so if you kill another, if you are in conflict with another, you are destroying yourself. You can observe this very, very carefully if you look at yourself without any distortion.

So there can only be peace when mankind, when you and I, have no conflict in ourselves. And you might say, "If one achieves, or comes to an end of all conflict within oneself, how will it affect the rest of mankind?" This is a very, very old question. This has been put thousands of years before Christ, if he ever existed. And we have to ask whether in ourselves sorrow, pain and anxiety, and all that, can ever end? If one applies, looks, observes, with great attention, as you look with considerable attention when you are combing your hair, or shaving, with that quality of attention, heightened, you can observe yourself - all the nuances, subtleties. And the mirror is your relationship between human beings, in that mirror you can see yourself exactly as you are. But most of us are frightened to see what we are, and so we gradually develop resistance, guilt, and all the rest of that business. So we never ask for total freedom - not to do what you like, but to be free from choice. Where there are multiple choices there are multiple confusions.

So can we live on this earth, 'pacem in terris', with great understanding of mankind, which is to understand yourself so profoundly, not according to some psychologist, analyst. They too have to be analysed. So we can, without turning to the professionals, as simple laymen we can observe our own idiosyncracies, tendencies. Our brain - the speaker is not a specialist about brain matter - our brain has been conditioned to war, to hate, to conflict. It is conditioned through this long period of evolution, whether that brain with its cells, which contain all the memories, whether that brain can free itself from its own conditioning. You know it is very simple to answer such a question. If you have been going north all the days of your life, as humanity has been going in a particular direction, which is conflict, and somebody comes along and says, "That leads nowhere". He is serious, and perhaps you are serious. Then he says, "Go south, go east, any other direction but that". And when you actually move away from that direction there is a mutation in the very brain cells themselves because you have broken the pattern. And that pattern must be broken now, not forty or a hundred years later.

And can human beings have the vitality, the energy, to transform themselves to civilized human beings, not killing each other?

Chairman: May we ask questions?

K: Yes, sir, ask any questions. Delighted!

Chairman: We have time for some questions and Mr Krishnamurti has kindly agreed to answer any questions you may ask. When you ask a question please raise your hand so that the sound will be connected. Thank you.

QUESTION: I am asking a question with regard to wanting a spiritual expression that I feel linked up with. Am I being heard? I don't think so. I feel there is a disconnecting sense that is being communicated to me. I would look forward to a spiritual connection to myself and fellow people in this group that would be an elevating sense. That is what I would look forward to experiencing at this lecture, a more uplifting spiritual sense of oneness, rather than an intellectual expression.

K: First of all, I don't understand the word 'spiritual'. Is it emotional, romantic, ideological, or something vague in the air; or facing actuality, what is going on now, both in ourselves and in the world? Because you are the world, you are not separate from the world. We have created this society, and we are that society. And whatever experiences one has, so-called religious and spiritual, one must doubt those very experiences, one must question, be sceptical. I wonder if you realize that the word 'scepticism', questioning, enquiring, is not advocated in the Christian world. Whereas in Buddhism, and Hinduism, that is one of the essential things, you must question everything, until you discover or come upon that truth, which is not yours, or any others, it is truth.

And this enquiry is not intellectual. Intellect is only a part of the whole human structure. One must look at the world and oneself as an holistic being. And truth is not something to be experienced. If one may point out, who is the experiencer apart from experience? Is not the experiencer part of the experience? Otherwise he wouldn't know what experience he has had. So the experiencer is the experience; the thinker is the thought; the observer, in its psychological sense, is the observed. There is no difference. And where there is difference, separation, there comes conflict. With the end of conflict there is freedom, and only then truth can come into being. All this is not intellectual, for god's sake. This is something that one lives, and finds out.

QUESTION: You laid a great deal of stress on enquiry and scepticism. I wonder if you could tell me if faith plays a role in that too?

K: What is faith? What do you put your faith in? One has faith in some experience, one has faith in some belief, or in a symbol, and so on. Why does one have faith? Is it out of fear, out of uncertainty, out of a sense of insecurity? When you have faith, for instance as a Hindu in some symbol, and you hold on to that faith, or to that symbol, then you are at war with the rest of the world. But to enquire gently, hesitantly, questioning, asking yourself, then out of that comes clarity. And there must be clarity to understand that which is eternal.

QUESTION: At the end you said that we need to break the pattern of conflict between man. My question to you is, do you see that as something of an evolutionary process that inevitably will happen? Or do you see it as something that we all have to work very hard to achieve? And there is an expression that goes something like this: in times of darkness the eye begins to see. And why I am throwing this at you because in a sense it is either going to happen, or it is not going to happen, but how do you see it happening?

K: I don't quite understand your question, sir.

Q: All right. You talk about breaking the pattern, man has a pattern, the brain has a pattern, and that pattern has to be broken in order for there to be peace in the world.

K: Of course.

Q: Now do you see the breaking of that pattern being an active movement, or a natural progression in the evolution of man?

K: Sir, have we evolved at all?

Q: I think we are continuously evolving.

K: So you accept evolution - psychological evolution, we are not talking about biological or technical evolution - psychological evolution. After a million years, of fifty thousand years, have we changed deeply? Aren't we very primitive, barbarous? So I am asking if you will consider whether there is psychological evolution at all? I question it. Personally, to the speaker, there is no psychological evolution: there is only the ending of sorrow, of pain, anxiety, loneliness, despair and all that. Man has lived with it for a million years. And if we rely on time, which is thought - time and thought go together - if we rely on evolution then another thousand years or more, and we will still be barbarous.

Q: My question is: what would have to happen for there to begin to be psychological evolution as the speaker understands it?

K: What about psychological evolution? I don't quite understand the question.

Q: You have said that you do not think there has been psychological evolution. My question is: what can happen so that there will be, so that there can be, psychological evolution.

K: Madam, I am afraid we haven't understood each other. We have lived on this earth from the historical, as well as ancient enquiry, on this earth for fifty thousand years or more or less. And during that long period of evolution psychologically, inwardly, subjectively, we have remained more or less barbarous - hating each other, killing each other. And time is not going to solve that problem, which is evolution. And is it possible, we are asking, for each human being, who is the rest of the world, whether that psychological movement can stop and see something afresh?

Q: I wanted to ask you the same question phrased in a different way: what should we do in order to effect this resistance towards evolution. I just want to say one more thing. There was a Dr Bohm last month, he said the same thing you are saying in a different way, he is a scientist, he was explaining the same problem. I wonder what do you think we could we do right now in order to effect this?

K: I have got it. What could you do right now? Right? Change completely! - both psychologically and outwardly. First the psychological revolution, not evolution, but revolution, change completely. That is the real action of humankind, not trying to fiddle around on the periphery.

QUESTION: You stated that an important condition for understanding humankind is beginning to understand ourselves clearly. Do you see that within these rooms within the next forty years, at the United Nations, that this understanding of humankind through understanding ourselves will become a part of global decision making?

K: I couldn't answer that question because I don't belong to the organization. Ask the bosses!

Q: I would like to add another note, perhaps a note of greater encouragement in my question. You indicated that organizations may not provide the answer, and you also indicated that the history of humanity would incline you to pessimism about the future or salvation. I think it depends upon the nature of the organizations and whether these are serving the interests of humanity and prepared to evolve, as the UN and many other groups evolve, and as humans evolve, provided we do not kill ourselves off and provided we can connect ourselves by the affection and respect for which our genes are also coded. There is no end to what we might do on or off this planet. And the implication there, which I share, is that we have evolved because we have the capacity for love and cooperation, and that we are not doomed because we manifest hate and fear and greed, and have succumbed in the past to iniquities like that. But by the very existence of the United Nations we have an illustration of man's capacity for growth and shared goals. I think that the present does contain the future and we by acting energetically in the present can affect our future and our survival. Therefore I ask, what is the answer to the question you raised about when one achieves peace within oneself, how will it affect the rest of humanity, given the time limits?

K: What is the question, sir?

Q: The question was: when one achieves peace within oneself how will it affect the rest of humanity without organizational structures?

K: I explained that, forgive me, sir, I explained it. To say, if I change how will it affect mankind, the rest of the world? That is the question, isn't it, sir? Wait a minute, sir.

Q: That is the question.

K: I think if I may most respectfully point out, that is a wrong question. Change and you will see what happens. This is really a very important thing. We have to put aside all the side issues. Please do realize something tremendous: that you are the rest of mankind psychologically. You are mankind, whether you live in India, Russia, China or in America, or Europe, you are the rest of mankind, because you suffer, and everyone on this earth suffers in his own way. We share that suffering, it is not my suffering. So when you ask a question: what difference will it make if I or you change, if I may most humbly point out, it is a wrong question. You are avoiding the central issue. And we never seem to face the central issue, the central challenge that demands that we live totally differently, not as Americans, Russians, Indians, or Buddhists or Christians.

I wonder if you have realized Christians have been responsible for killing humans far more than any other religious group. Don't get angry please! Then Islam, the Muslim world, then the Hindus and the Buddhists come much later. So if the so-called Christians, the Catholics included, about eight hundred million people, if they said, "No more wars", you will have peace on this earth. But they won't say that. It is only Buddhism, Hinduism, said, "Don't kill. If you kill" - they believe in reincarnation - you will pay next life. Therefore don't kill, don't kill the least little thing, except what you have to eat, vegetables and so on. But don't kill.' We as Brahmins weren't brought up that way, not to kill a fly, not to kill animals for your food. But all that is gone. So please we are suggesting that the central issue to stop wars is, you must stop your own antagonisms, your own conflicts, your own misery and suffering.

Why do we choose, apart from physical things - two good materials, clothes, between cars? You choose there because of their function and mileage and so on. But psychologically why do you choose at all? Why is there this choice? There is choice, you can move from one town to another, from one job to another - not in Russia, not in the tyrannical world, in the totalitarian world you are stuck in your place, you are not allowed to move - unless the bosses agree. And in this country, in a so-called democratic societies, you have a choice to do what you like. And you call that freedom - to fulfil yourself, to become a great success. You have there tremendous choice. Now we are talking about choice in the psychological field. If you see things very clearly there is no choice. It is unfortunate that we don't see things clearly. We don't see clearly that nationalism is one of the causes of war. We don't clearly see that ideologies breed wars, whether it is the Marxist ideologies, or Lenin, or our own particular form of ideologies. So we choose from one ideology to another, one religion to another, one group to another, and we think we are free. On the contrary, it shows confusion. And when we are confused we act in confusion, therefore multiply confusion, as the politicians are doing - forgive me.

Q: We have a written question here for Mr Krishnamurti. Do you believe in the so-called realized soul?

K: Do you believe in so-called realized souls? I don't know what it means. Just a minute, sir.

QUESTION: I'm sorry right now you are talking from a public forum and once this lecture is over probably you will return to a privacy that probably you cherish greatly. So there is for most human beings in this world a division between public life and private life. Could you comment on this division? Do you feel it leads to conflict, is it necessary?

K: Between public life and private life? Is that the question? Why do you separate this? Why do we separate public life as though something outside, and private life? If one lived correctly, precisely, not intellectually, but holistically, then there is no outward life and private life. Holistically, that is to live as a whole human being, not as a sectarian, not as an individual, not as a petty little mind, brain active in our self interest. Sorry if I am emphatic. Is that finished, sir?

Chairman: There are two more questions.

QUESTION: If you are living peacefully and the tyrant attacks, do you not defend?

K: What will you do then? If you live peacefully and a tyrant or a robber attacks you, what will you do? That is the question. Do you live peacefully for a day or two? Or you live peacefully all your life? If you have lived peacefully for many years then you will do the right thing when you are attacked.

Sirs, the speaker has been at this talking for the last sixty years, and more - all over the world except behind the Iron Curtain, before the war he was all over Europe - and these questions have been put to the speaker for sixty years. The same pattern is being repeated by the young generation, by a civilization that is recent like America, the same questions, with the same intention, to trap the speaker, or to really understand the speaker, or to understand themselves. And if you have the misfortune or the fortune to have talked for sixty years you will know all the answers and all the questions. There is no difference between question and answer. If you understand the question really deeply the answer is in the question.

Chairman: Mr Robert Miller would like to ask a question.

QUESTION: Well it is not to ask a question, it is to congratulate you for your statement. And to confirm that having lived in this organization for almost forty years and having lived more than sixty years, I have come to the same conclusion as you. We are all being programmed, we are being programmed into a nation, into an ideology, into a religion. And all these are fragmented human beings. It took me forty years to be in this house to be de-programmed from the two or three nationalities imposed on me, each time I got also a gun to shoot at the other direction. And it is here that after having seen the world in its totality and humanity in its totality that I have come to the conclusion that it is more important to be a human being than to be a Jew, or a Catholic or a Frenchman, or a Russian, or a white, or a black.

K: Quite right.

Q: And in my book I will not kill under any reason, or for any nation, or for any religion, or for any ideology. This is the conclusion which is also yours.

K: Is it a conclusion, sir? Or an actuality?

Q: That is my actuality.

K: That's right. Not a conclusion.

Q: I am not arguing about religions but will remind that, 'an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth' is not exactly a Christian precept. On the contrary, Christ thought the peaceful way was to care for your fellow human beings, have compassion and love for one another. But I would like to know how to break this pattern of confrontation among human beings. I am not talking about States because States are formed by human beings and governments too, they are human beings that rule the countries. How can we break this pattern? How is it that mankind has not been able to practise such glowing thoughts as those that Christ wrote to us and were written also by all religions? I would like very much to see if we could find a formula, a solution to break that terrible pattern of confrontation, and hate even between families, as Krishnamurti has pointed out because it is not just war among nations, there is always a confrontation, even among children you see one is with Mama and the other one wants to be there. That pattern, how could we break it?

K: May I answer your question? We are programmed, like computers - we are Catholics, Protestants, Buddhists and so on. As Mr (?) pointed out, we are conditioned. Do we realize, or see actually, actually, not theoretically, or ideologically, but actually see that we are programmed? Or is it just a casual statement? If you are actually programmed do you realize the consequences of being programmed? One of the consequences has been hatred, or war, or separating yourself from others. If one realizes that you are being programmed, pressurized, preached at, and if one really sees that, you abandon it, you don't want a formula for it. The moment you have a formula then you are caught in it. Then you become programmed again because you have your programme and the other fellow gives you another programme. So what is important is to realize the actuality of being programmed, not intellectually, with all your blood, energy.

Chairman: Because of the time element we will not be able to entertain any more questions. On behalf of the Pacem in Terris Society and the Movement for a Better World, we would like to thank our honoured guest speaker and Brother Fellow and Ambassador Barry who are the Honorary Presidents of the Society, and all of you who came to attend the lecture today.

I have a very simple ceremony before you leave. Mr Krishnamurti was here last year on the 17th April, just about the time we had the Pacem in Terris day. And this year we were very fortunate to have on the twenty second anniversary of the Pacem in Terris , and you have already heard about it. On behalf of the Pacem in Terris Society at the United Nations, we have the honour of presenting you, Mr Krishnamurti, the World Teacher, with the United Nations 1984 Peace medal.
