So the fact is: where there is division there must be conflict. If one sees the truth of it, the actuality of it, that is, I want to fulfil my desire, and she does too, so my desire is opposed to her desire. We don't tackle desire. You understand what I am saying. We try to fulfil my desire as opposed to her desire. Whereas the understanding of desire is important, not my fulfilment of my desire. You understand? Have we communicated with to each other? We are concerned with desire, not my desire. Is this all right. So this identity with my particular experience, my particular desire, my particular fear, fear of my particular death, so this identity is with an idea - you understand - or identity with some actual fact, like I have pain, I have a toothache. All right, I have a toothache, get on with it. But not everlasting concern about oneself.

You see the truth of this, that where there is separation there must be conflict - Arab and Jew, what is happening. The earth is ours to live upon, to share, it is our earth, not the Arab world and, you know, for god's sake. And apparently we don't see that. So can we perceive the truth of it, truth, the actual fact, not the theory that separations will bring conflict, the actual feeling, the truth of it.

Can you feel it, see it? Not the intellectual concept of seeing, the intellectual comprehension that division must inevitably create conflict, but the actual fact of it?

If a group of people see it, they are still part of humanity, I mean it is like a tremendous movement in a totally different direction. But apparently we cannot do this. And out of this comes misery, conflict, confusion, problems, endlessly.

You know the speaker has been saying for the last sixty years that truth is a pathless land, which is a fact. There is no path to it, no saviour to it, no leader, no system, nothing but the understanding of the fact that truth has no path. If you see that, and if you see also very clearly for yourself that any form of division must inevitably create conflict, from this questions arises, we live in a society whose laws, governments, religions are all struggling against each other in the world, wanting to be more powerful than anybody else. This is our cycle, this is our culture, and this culture has been like this for a million years. In ancient Egypt, five thousand years they were trying to be supreme over everybody else, and we are carrying that same pattern through life.

So what shall we do? What will you, as a human being, who is actually the rest of mankind, what will you do? You hear something true, which is a fact, a physical fact, the Arab and the Jew, you opposed to somebody else, you with your belief, with your experience, with your knowledge, opposed to somebody else with their knowledge, you follow - conflict. What will you do? If one sees, or when you see the truth that division in any form is destructive, and the world is caught in this destructiveness, what's your relationship with the world? And somebody comes along, takes your property, or this or that, and so creates conflict, what is your action? Do you understand all this? Are we together in understanding verbally even what we are talking about?

So can you, when you leave this grove be free of conflict? And it is only a person that is free from conflict that can meet conflict. Not the person who is in conflict, he merely perpetuates more conflict, but a human being who is free from conflict he can meet it, deal with it, in any way because he himself is free from this torture.

5th QUESTION: You have said that when one gives complete attention to a problem then the problem flowers and withers away. Can you explain this further?

You aren't tired? You are quite sure? This is not an entertainment. You don't get tired with entertainments. Sorry!

Now there is this problem of conflict, can you watch your conflict and give it complete attention? Please just listen to it for a few minutes. Listen. You have a problem, which is conflict. Can you look at it, not only listen to the problem, the tones, the content, the subtleties of the problem, can you look at it without trying to resolve it, without trying to give it any direction, without any motive? When you have a motive it gives it a direction and therefore you are distorting the problem. So can you sensitively be aware of conflict? Not act upon it because you are part of that conflict. You are conflict. So if you act upon it you further create more conflict. So look at that conflict - the little one and the whole human conflict, the personal and the global, look at it. Listen to its story, don't you tell what the story is, let it tell you the story. Like a child who is sitting on your lap whom you love, is telling you a story. You don't interrupt the child. You are not rude to it, you want him to tell you all about it. In the same way let this conflict tell you all about it, only you have to have ears to listen to it, not only with hearing of the ear but also hear inwardly the nature of it. Can you so listen to it, giving your whole attention to it, without any effort? When you are with a child who is telling you a story, you are not making an effort and saying, 'I must control myself, I must be more patient'. You are listening because you love that child. In the same way listen, and then you will see the problem flowers, grows, shows its whole content. And when it has shown all its content it passes away, it is finished. You understand? That is, the flowering and the withering of a problem, which doesn't take time. It is only the impatient mind that has time, that says, I must solve this. But a mind that is listening very carefully, sensitively, alert to all its tiny movements, and its very, very subtle movements, when you listen to it, when you give your complete attention to it, and you cannot give complete attention if you have a motive, if you have a direction, if you say, I must do this - then nothing will happen. But if you give your total attention the problem shows itself fully and so dissolves, like a flower, in the morning the bud is there, in the evening it is withered.

I think that is enough for this morning, isn't it? Is it enough?

Q: Yes.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 9TH MAY 1981

It may be necessary to briefly repeat what we have said during the last two talks. We were saying that this is not a propaganda of ideas, some kind of belief, or some philosophical conclusions, nor some religion, as accepted by that word generally; but we are trying to observe together what is happening in the world. It is not a particular point of view that the speaker is putting forward, or a personal recollection, experience, and all that kind of nonsense. We are together, and the speaker means together, observing clearly, without any prejudice, without identifying oneself with any particular part of the world, or with any belief, religious dogma, and so on. To observe the enormous violence that is going on in the world - the wars, the threat of the atomic bomb, the religious divisions, the nationalistic separation with their armaments and so on. It is a very dangerous world we are living in. And most people, I am afraid, do not realize the enormous degradation, degeneration that is going on throughout the world, not only in this part of the world but everywhere. And we are trying to solve these problems politically, economically, socially, or evangelistically, which, of course, brings about more and more confusion, more and more separation, greater division and therefore greater conflict.

And we said, neither politics, nor the established religions, nor the scientific knowledge is going to solve our problems, nor the psychologists, nor the priests, nor the specialists. But the crisis is in our consciousness, that is, in our minds, in our hearts, in our behaviour, in our way of looking at the world from a narrow, limited point of view. That is where the crisis is.

And together we are going to explore, together investigate if it is at all possible for the human mind, which has evolved through millions and millions of years, conditioned by time and evolution, whether such a mind, limited, such a brain conditioned, and this consciousness which is limited, narrow, exclusive apparently, whether that consciousness with its crisis in the present world can ever be changed, can ever bring about a radical mutation in that conditioning.

And we also said, this consciousness with which we have identified ourselves as mine and yours, is utterly erroneous because our consciousness is the consciousness of mankind. Man wherever he is, including the woman, of course, wherever he is - Japan, India, Middle East, Europe, or here - is in constant travail, in conflict, never resolving any problems of fear, pursuing endless pleasure, never resolving the problems of sorrow, pain, grief, loneliness. This loneliness, grief, pain, sorrow, with occasional flashes of joy and love, is common to all mankind. That is an obvious psychological fact which most of us are reluctant to see because we are so identified with our own particular consciousness, with our own particular grief, with our own particular enjoyment and so on. But the actual psychological fact is, if you observe attentively, with sensitive awareness, that throughout the world human beings go through exactly what you are going through - whether they live in the north or the south, east or west. So this consciousness is common to all mankind. I think this should be, if one may point out, clearly understood. There is no contradiction about it, it is not something, a point of view, something the speaker has invented, but psychologically when we examine very deeply, objectively, not personally, one finds that this is the common ground to all mankind. One may not like to hear this because we all think we are individuals, separate from everybody else, trying to identify ourselves with something, trying to fulfil, trying to become something - all individualistic, narrow, limited. But the psychological fact is that we are not individuals. You are the collective. We are the result of millions and millions of years, our consciousness is the common consciousness of all humanity. Your consciousness is the consciousness of man. And if we do not understand this very clearly one is apt to not continue with the investigation clearly.

The world, wherever one lives, this sense of individuality has been emphasized. Religions have sustained it, education has maintained it. And this supposedly individual freedom has brought about extraordinary chaos in the world, which is a fact. Which again is not a certain conclusion, or a point of view of the speaker, but one can see this clearly. We think we are free because we can choose. And choice implies uncertainty, lack of clarity. Where there is clarity, which can only come about when there is no conflict, such clarity has no choice in it, it is clear. It is only the mind that is obscure, confused, uncertain, that begins to choose. Again, please, investigate this as we go along. And if one may request, we are not laying down the law, we are not leading you anywhere. We are trying - rather, we are actually thinking together, not accepting, not following. In matters of the spirit, in matters of deep psychological investigation one must be free from all sense of following somebody. There is no leader, or a guide, into that realm. One has to watch, observe, see for oneself very clearly what one is - not according to any philosopher, any psychotherapist, or psychologist, they too are human beings, and they too go through pain, sorrow, anxiety, uncertainty, desperate loneliness and so on. So they too are part of this confusion. They too have this common consciousness.

And if one realizes this actual fact, not imposed upon you by another, or by the speaker, but you, yourself, clearly, objectively, non-personally or emotionally observe, this is the common fact that we are the rest of mankind psychologically. You may have a different body, woman, man, you may be a lighter skin, another darker, slant eyed, and so on, but inwardly, deeply, we go through the same phenomenon as the rest of man. This is logical, this is reasonable, this has sanity, and if one understands this very deeply, perceives this fact, then we are totally responsible for whatever is happening in the world.

Please understand the seriousness of these talks. This is not an entertainment, an amusement, intellectual concepts, a verbal oratory, we are dealing with something terribly serious, because human beings throughout the world are degenerating, destroying themselves.

And as we said, this is the common factor, and therefore we are totally, absolutely responsible for whatever is happening in the world. Because we are nationalistic, wanting to be the first country in the world, we are creating war, competition. And competition is destroying people. So we are talking about something dreadfully serious.

And this consciousness, in which there is the crisis, and nowhere else, is put together by thought. Our consciousness is,

with its content, the product of thought. Which is, thought has accepted the propaganda of two thousand years in the western world, religiously, in the eastern world thought created an image, certain rituals, as in the west, certain symbols, and that thought with all its religious superstitious, dogmatic belief, faith and so on, is put together by thought. Again, this cannot be refuted. This is reasonable - and one can see the limitation of reason, but one must have the capacity to reason very clearly.

So thought has built this world, the psychological as well as the technical world. Thought has brought about the relationship between man and woman. In that relationship there is a great deal of conflict. We have been saying this for a number of years. And we are pursuing, investigating together. Please be clear on this point, if you do not mind. We are together, not the speaker is exploring, explaining, putting into words, but together you and the speaker are exploring why man - supposed to be educated, sophisticated, clever at solving problems - why man has come to this point after so many million years. He is in perpetual conflict within and without. He is confused, neurotic, believing in something that is non-real, holding on to certain concepts, and ideals for which he is willing to kill. This may have been the process of time, evolution, which has brought us up to this point. And philosophers and others say, "You must accept human conditioning, you must accept what you are. You can modify it, you can somewhat superficially change, but deeply, at the very depth of one's existence it is not possible for this conditioning to be radically changed. And therefore modify it, live as best as you can, make the best of this world, however miserable one is, it is accepted and try to live within that area without too much conflict". But we are saying that this conditioning, this crisis in consciousness can bring about a radical transformation. Please, as we said, do not accept what the speaker is saying but investigate, think it over, observe it.

And the speaker also says, don't follow anybody, specially in the realm of the psyche, neither the Indian gurus, nor the westernized gurus, nor the so-called meditations that these people have invented, taken the old form and put it into new words, and people, being gullible, as a whole, wanting to be secure in some place or other, easily accept all this nonsense. So please the speaker repeats it over and over again, do not be influenced by the speaker, do not agree with the speaker, do not be influenced by him but observe the world actually as it is, observe it without any direction, without any motive, without any prejudice, look at it.

And this consciousness, as we said, is put together by thought. Thought is a material process. Thought has built marvellous architecture, buildings, the most beautiful architecture, paintings, poems, statues. But thought has not created nature, but thought can destroy nature. Thought has not made the tiger, that beautiful dynamic animal. Thought has not made the rivers, the mountains, the heavens, but thought can despoil them. So one must clearly understand the nature of thought because thought has put together the content of our consciousness, and as the crisis is there thought must be very carefully investigated. What is thinking? Because all our action is based on thinking. That is, our action is born out of knowledge, out of experience, out of accumulated knowledge and memory, stored up in the brain. And thought is part of that memory, part of that knowledge, part of that experience. And as experience and knowledge can never under any circumstances be complete, therefore thought invariably, under all conditions, is limited.

And thought is not sacred. The things that thought has created in the temples, in the mosques, in the cathedrals, in the churches, they are the result of thought, they are nothing sacred. So we are going, as we go along in the next three talks, to find out if there is anything sacred in life, not put there by thought. Thought, as we said, is a material process; even the scientists are beginning to accept that. Of course religious people will not, but they may be the majority, but the majority is generally mediocre. And a religious mind can only find out what is sacred. And to find that out there must be meditation, and that meditation the speaker generally puts at the end of his talks because meditation without the understanding of the world and of oneself has no meaning. Meditation then is merely an escape from 'what is'. And without order in our life, complete, absolute order, meditation is a form of indulgence in some pleasurable and neurotic action.

So one must first look and find out for ourselves if there is right action under all circumstances. Can thought bring about this action, right action? And we mean by that word 'right', a precise, objective, non-personal, non-romantic action that does not bring about more and more conflict. We are going to investigate together if there is such right action. Because now each one thinks fulfilment of one's desire, of one's pleasures without any restraint, without any sense of understanding, that is right action, according to present, modern civilization. But such action, as one has observed, leads to more and more conflict, more and more chaos, which is what is happening on this unfortunate earth.

So we are asking: what is action and what is right, accurate, precise, an action that does not bring about a conflict? Is there such action at all?

It's a lovely morning. To be under the trees is a beautiful thing - dappled light, you are looking at those mountains, with their purity, and the line so delicate, so defined and pure. And living with all that in this marvellous country, which is being slowly despoiled and ruined, man who should be the most extraordinary, excellent entity, has brought about such chaos in the world. It is a great tragedy of which you are not aware - because we are not aware of our own selves, we are not aware of our actions. We are being lead perpetually by politicians, the priests, the evangelists, the professors, the specialists. We are not self-educated. We are educated according to a pattern, which is no education at all, it is only a part of education. The deeper education is self-education, the understanding of oneself, the knowing of the whole content of oneself. And to observe that content of oneself it is shown in relationship, as we talked about it the other day. In that relationship there is conflict, because that conflict arises when each one thinks he is separate, ambitious, greedy, competitive, and all the rest of it, attached to a belief, to a dogma, to a person, to an ideal, to an experience. And such attachment does breed corruption, which we carefully explained the other day.

And now we are asking if there is right action at all - not superficial, not something immediate, satisfactory, but an action that is not born of time. I'll explain what I mean by that. It may lead to some kind of mystical, scientific fiction action, talking about that. One must understand what time is. For most of us time is very important, not only sunrise and sunset, yesterday, today and tomorrow, time by the watch, time by the sun, but also the whole concept of psychological time.

Our brain, if you are sensitively aware, our brain has evolved through time, from the one cell up to now. This brain functions in time, it is conditioned by time. Right? That is clear. And time we use as a means of self advancement, time as a means of learning a language, time as a means of accumulated knowledge in order to act skilfully or not. So time is a factor, a very deep conditioned factor in our life. There is hope, the future, which is hope, and time as the past, with all the memories, experiences, and knowledge is of time, whether it is scientific knowledge or the psychological knowledge, or self knowledge, it's all within the area of time.

When one says, "I will be better", "I will not be this but I will be that", that involves time. Please understand. Let's think and observe together. You are not merely listening to the speaker who is advancing a set of ideas which you gather then remember, then say, "I have learnt". We are together looking at it now, attentively.

So time has been the factor of guide, achievement, self knowledge, self advancement. Time is used in the sense, "I am lonely, but I will escape from it, or I will understand it, or I will do something about it". In all that is implied time. And we say, after accumulating knowledge we will act skilfully. I want to be a good carpenter, I apprentice myself to a master carpenter, and learn after many years, like a surgeon, like a businessman, like the priest and so on. Time is knowledge. From that knowledge we act. Or act and learn from that action, which becomes knowledge again. You are following? There are these two ways of acting: either accumulate knowledge first, like a doctor, ten years learning and so on, then he becomes a doctor, or a surgeon, after studying, learning, accumulating knowledge, act. Or act, and from that action learn, which becomes knowledge. So both are the same. Which is, both are based on the acquisition of knowledge and acting from that knowledge. And knowledge is always incomplete, it is always within the shadow of ignorance. So action must be always limited, and therefore any action born out of an ideal, which is the projection of thought, any action born out of recollection of past knowledge, memory and so on, must also be limited and therefore bringing about conflict, confusion. This is again logical, rational, sane. It is not something, a point of view of the speaker but it is an obvious fact, this is how we act, how we live.

So we are enquiring if there is a totally different way of acting. We must be very clear, if the speaker may repeat, we must be absolutely clear of the function of knowledge. You have accumulated within the last one hundred and fifty years more technological knowledge than ever before, tremendous knowledge, otherwise you couldn't have gone to the Moon, spaceships and so on. You have invented, man has invented all the terrible instruments of war, the atomic bomb which is the main exportation, apart from grain and blue jeans, of America.

And we are asking: is there an action which is not limited, therefore complete, whole so that it does not bring conflict? Please this is important to understand, if you will give your mind, your brain, to attend to find out. As we said, many of you may be interested in meditation and therefore nothing else but if you are only interested in meditation, such meditation is meaningless if one doesn't live rightly, sanely, rationally. Such meditation, whether it is Zen, or X, Y, Z meditation is merely an escape from actuality, an escape from 'what is', which is our daily life. Our daily life is such misery, such confusion, there is so much conflict. And to try and meditate and come into a kind of mystical experience is only an illusion. Perhaps you like to live in illusions, it is more fanciful, pleasurable, but to see 'what is' and then see if 'what is' can be transformed, that's part of profound meditation.

So we are asking: is there an action which is complete and not limited and therefore confusing? That is the question we are asking. We are not saying there is, or there is not. We are asking a fundamental question, not a superficial, passing demand. We are asking something very, very serious: because man for millions and millions of years has lived in confusion, conflict, misery, never resolving the human conflict, the human suffering. He has escaped from it through religions, through all kinds of fanciful, symbolic worship and prayer.

So please together we are trying to find out if there is an action that is whole, holistic. That word 'holistic' means sane, healthy, rational, and also the word 'whole' means holy, h-o-l-y. All that is implied in that one word, holistic. Is there such an action which doesn't bring conflict, which doesn't bring about more problems? How are we going to find out together? How do you approach a question like this? How do you look, or listen to a question put before you? Either you say, there is no such action, and so you have blocked yourself if you say that. Or you may say, it is possible. Again the possibility is not actuality. So it is very important, if you want to find out if there is such action, it is very important to find out how you listen to the content of that question. Whether your mind, when that question is put, whether your brain is trying to resolve the problem, trying to find an answer, or actually listens very carefully to the meaning of the word. The word is merely a means of communication, the word is not the thing, it never is - the symbol is not the actuality. So it is very important how you listen to the challenge - whether you are trying to resolve it intellectually, rationally, reasonably. If you are trying to resolve it reasonably you will inevitably come to the conclusion, it is not possible. The process of logic is the activity of thought which is always limited. Therefore your answer to a challenge will be limited, therefore you have found no answer to the question. I hope this is all clear.

So how do you approach the question? Do you approach it with a mind, with a brain that says, "It is a question I don't quite understand, I'll first watch it, listen to it. Not try to find an answer. Let me see the content of that word". That is, is there an action which is not born out of memory, which is time, and I also know that time is necessary, knowledge is necessary to drive a car, to be a carpenter, to be a surgeon, to be anything, knowledge is necessary. But this question, can it be answered by thought which is the movement of memory? Do you understand? Are we together in this? Which means when you try to answer it, right or wrong, impossible or possible, you are depending on memory. Therefore thought is telling you what to answer. And thought being limited, your answer will invariably be limited and therefore productive of conflict. If this is clear, will you observe, listen to the question without any movement of thought?

I will repeat the question, which is: is there a right action which is not born out of time, which is thought, which is knowledge? There may be no such action, or there may be. So our mind, our brain is free to look. Our brain being sensitive, alert, aware, is listening, paying tremendous attention to the question, not trying to solve it. So when you do that, that is, when you give complete attention, when you are totally sensitively aware, in that attention there is no question of time. But if you say, "I need time to be attentive", that is to learn what it is to be attentive, then you are acting according to knowledge, which is to learn to be attentive. Then you are not attentive. Right? Please see this.

So can you listen to this question with all your being, with all your capacity, attention? When you give that total attention it is like bringing light, putting light upon something that has been obscure. And when you give that attention there is total light on the question. And the question then reveals its own answer. When you see something clearly, that clarity is the answer.

So there is an action - please don't accept it, don't be mystified by it, don't say, there is, there is not, find out for yourself - there is an action which is born out of insight. Insight is not the remembrance of things past, but seeing something directly, purely, without any direction and that seeing, perception, is total action, which is insight. And when you can so look at the movement of thought, which is the content of our consciousness, the content, which is our greed, our envy, our ambition, our nationalism, our beliefs, our experiences, our pleasures, all that is our consciousness, when you think, I believe in god, that is part of your consciousness, or I don't believe in god, that is part of your consciousness. That consciousness is put together by thought, through experience and so on. Now to look, to observe the totality of that consciousness is to observe attentively one action completely. That is, to have an insight into the movement of action.

Right, sirs, that is enough. I've finished. We will continue tomorrow morning, if you don't mind.

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC TALK 10TH MAY 1981

One is afraid that one has to repeat some of the things that we have said before, at the last three talks.

What we are talking about is not a particular point of view, it is not that one is doing any kind of propaganda for any ideal, for any person, for any concept. We have been saying that the world is in a crisis, threatened by war, over population, poverty, terrible division between nationalities, and all the absurdities that are going on in the name of religion. But the crisis, as we said, is in the human consciousness, in the mind, in the brain, in the heart, which cannot possibly be solved by politicians, or by the accumulated knowledge of the scientists, nor is it an economic problem, but it has become dangerously a human problem. And apparently very few are inclined, or interested to concern themselves with that crisis in the human mind.

And if you are at all serious, and I hope we are, we must be concerned with the responsibility of all that is taking place in the world, because as we have explained quite often, our consciousness is not the particular consciousness of one person, it is the consciousness of all mankind. Because all human beings suffer wherever they live, they are in conflict, misery, confusion, searching out leaders who are always betraying them, depending on priests who have given a lot of words and meaningless answers. Nor can one depend on the scientists who with their specialization are helping to destroy the world. And as this crisis is in ourselves, and nowhere else, so the responsibility, as we pointed out, becomes very great and very serious. And when this consciousness with which we have lived for a million years can ever be transformed. There are some who say it cannot, human nature is what it is, modify it, accept it, slightly change it, but fundamentally it cannot possibly be changed. And if one accepts the philosophers and those who think in that manner, then man, human beings, must suffer endlessly, must remain in conflict everlastingly, there must be wars endlessly, as there have been for the last five thousand years, in history, recorded history, practically always a war somewhere on this earth, which is our earth, where we are meant to live and not the American earth, or the English earth, or the Indian, or the Japanese and so on. And this consciousness in which there is this crisis that must be answered, not by any particular specialist, professionals, but by us ordinary, everyday living human beings with their jobs, with their miseries, confusion.

As we said, patience is timeless, impatience is full of time. And one must have patience to listen to ourselves because now we are depending on all the specialists, the professors, those who tell you what to do. We have lost self reliance. We have become more or less slaves to authority, whether it is scientific authority, religious, or economic, or environmental authority. We are losing all over the world our sense of integrity. We are depending on books - books have their place, but to understand ourselves through books, through another, has led us to this confusion, to this crisis. And as we pointed out over and over again, that we are thinking, reasoning, observing together. We are not accepting what the speaker is saying, or rejecting. He is merely acting as a mirror in which we see ourselves. And when we begin to see ourselves as we are then we can throw away, break up the mirror. The mirror has no value.

So we are saying that the crisis is in our minds and our hearts. And we don't seem to be able to understand that crisis. Understanding brings its own discipline - not the discipline of conformity, not the discipline of imitation, not the discipline to accept something however great or small. Discipline means - the root meaning of that word 'discipline' comes from the word disciple. Disciple is one who learns - not from another however wise, however enlightened, however knowledgeable, but learning from our own self education, learning about ourselves because there is our crisis. We have handed ourselves over to the priests, to the scholars, to the professors, the philosophers, and to the analysts. And unfortunately, recently, handed ourselves over to some guru from India or Asia, which is most unfortunate. They have become rich, exploiting people. It has become a great religion, and as it is now it has become a great business affair, which again is obvious.

So we are saying that one has to observe oneself, learn about oneself, not from anybody because they are not themselves studying themselves. They have theories, some speculative ideas which they have experimented on animals, pigeons, and so on, but they never look at themselves actually as they are with their greed, with their ambition, with their competition, with their aggressiveness, violence and so on. All that we are. And in the understanding of that, actually understanding not merely the verbal description of what we are but the actual understanding of our reactions, our thoughts, our anger, our wounds, our aggressiveness, violence and so on, looking at it. Therefore out of that understanding, observation, comes this discipline which is constantly learning anew.

Perhaps in this country we have lost the meaning of that word discipline, we have relegated it to the soldier, to some monks and so on. In this country specially, we have lost the meaning of that word. If you are a careerist, in that career there is a certain demand for discipline. If you are a carpenter, the very understanding of the wood, the tools, the nature of design, that observation, that understanding brings its own learning, its own discipline, its own action. But apparently we have lost that because we are all so terribly concerned to get on, to climb the ladder of success, to become something. If you observe all this. And therefore we are becoming more and more superficial. You have got a marvellous country, one of the most beautiful countries in the world, from the highest snow capped mountains, the desert, to the vast rivers, and the deep valleys, and the great trees. It is a marvellous country. And we human beings are destroying all that because we want to get on, god knows where, but get on. We are observing all this ourselves, please, you are not following the speaker. The speaker is not your guru, your leader, you are not his followers. One has to wipe away all that, and examine closely what we are doing as human beings.

And in this consciousness there is disorder. And we are trying to bring order in that by conformity, by acceptance, obedience. We have never understood what is order. And, as the speaker has been in this country for the last sixty years, I have seen every kind of phase, fad, something always new. And we live practically, socially, morally, ethically, in disorder. And without understanding order in the deepest sense of that word, meditation becomes utterly meaningless. We think that through meditation we will bring order. That is the trick that has been played upon us for a million years. But order begins at home, near.

So we have investigate together what is that order, because our consciousness, as we said, is in total disarray. It is in conflict, it is battling itself against something which it has created. So we are, together, going to enquire into what is order. We are using that word to imply a state of mind, not as an ideal, a state of mind, a state of heart in which there is no conflict whatsoever. Conflict indicates disorder. Choice indicates disorder. A man who chooses is really not actually free, he is confused. Please don't accept what is being said. It is important, one thinks, that one must cultivate or have this sense of scepticism, specially in psychological matters. There must be doubt. And if you observe the Asiatic world, India, and so on, doubt has been one of the precepts in religion. The Hindus and the Buddhists have talked a great deal about doubt. But in the Christian world doubt is denied because that world is based on faith. And if you question, you are either excommunicated, or tortured as they have done in the past, now you are tolerated. There isn't much difference.

So please observe yourself, your environment, your society, and your own thoughts with considerable doubt. And also listen to the speaker with doubt, with questions, demanding, of yourself. You are doubting all that you have thought, observed, learnt. So that a mind, a brain is free to observe. And also doubt must be kept on a leash, like a dog. If you keep a dog on a leash all the time the poor animal withers, you must know when to let it go, run, chase, jump.

Similarly one must hold doubt on a leash, and also one must learn the subtlety when to let it go.

So we are asking, saying, why is it that man has lived in this disorder for millions and millions of years? Why we human beings, wherever we are, why? What is the cause of this disorder? And as we pointed out previously, enquiring into the cause, which is the analytical process, requires time. Please understand this a little bit. If you will kindly give your attention to what is being said.

Analysis has been one of our pet pursuits, not only analysing the heavens, the stars, the expanding and contracting universe, but also we are analysing ourselves constantly. And we have never enquired who is the analyser. The analyser, if you observe carefully, the analyser is the analysed. Thought has separated the analyser as though he is some superior entity, with a great deal of knowledge, experience, and he is capable of analysing. Analysing what? You can analyse the minerals, the nature of the trees, the hydrogen bomb, the various scientific analysis that has produced great benefit and great destruction also.

We are asking, not of those analysis, but we are saying what is it when we are seeking the cause of disorder - do we indulge in analysis? Or there is a different approach to this problem altogether which is not analysis, but pure observation - if you can do it. That is, to break away from the tradition of analysis. Which is, say for example - the speaker doesn't like to use examples, but we will for the moment, because examples are rather deceptive, limited - if I am angry, or greedy, or violent, I want to know the cause of it. Then I begin to analyse, trace it back step by step. And I may find the cause of it. But who is the analyser who says, "I will trace step by step backwards into the true origin"? Who is that entity that analyses? That entity is still part of thought. That entity is the receptacle, or the vessel of previous experiences, previous examinations, previous analysis, he separates himself from that which is taking place and then he says, "I will analyse". But if you observe carefully, giving your sensitive awareness to it, then you will see that the observer, the analyser is the analysed. Anger is not different from me. I am anger. But I have separated myself from anger and said, "I must control it, I must shape it, I must rationalize it" and so on. One hopes this is clear. If you are not used to this kind of thinking, observing, perhaps we had better go over it again. Because most of us are so accustomed, fall into the habit of analysis.

We are saying that analysis takes time. And in that analysis there are a great many deceptive activities going on. So can you observe what is order, and what is disorder? Just to observe it. That is - you see most unfortunately everything has to be explained. We don't jump to it, see it quickly. It has to be put into so many words, so many explanations. But the word, the explanation, is not the thing. You may paint a picture of the most beautiful mountain, that picture is not the mountain. The flowing waters in paint on a canvas, is not the living waters.

So we are together understanding, trying to find out, what is order, and disorder. We said, there is disorder as long as there is conflict, as long as there are in us the contradictions, the want and not want, the desire and the opposite of that desire. In that we are caught - wanting and not wanting - to put it very, very simply, though it is a very complex problem. It is cultivating the opposites, in that there is conflict, and that is disorder.

Now to find this out, go into it much deeper, one has to go into the whole question of desire, because human beings have lived with this desire for life, for everything, desire. Are we together in all this? Or the speaker is going on on his own and you are there sitting under the shade of a tree, under the beautiful leaves, enjoying this sun and having a sun bath! You are enjoying the sun bath and all that - this is hardly the place. But if you are really concerned as a human being, and feel responsibility for the whole world not merely for your family, for your children - and one doubts whether you really feel responsible even there. Thousands and thousands of children are running away from home, beaten, tortured. All the ugly things that are going on.

And if this crisis in our consciousness is really a deep fundamental sacred challenge - one is using the word 'sacred' in its real sense - sacred challenge, then we as human beings must respond to it. Or if you cannot we will destroy each other, which is going on now. The competition between powers, the two powers, each wanting to be top of the other. And that is going on even with the smallest country. This is an odd fact, the world is imitating America. I don't know if you have noticed it. Probably it is the easiest country to imitate. Don't be angry with what I am saying, or be irritated, but observe it. What are we giving to the world apart from grain, the materials of war, scientific know-how which other countries are now almost equal in their knowledge, laser destruction, atomic bombs - what else are we Americans giving to the world? Please look at it carefully. And what is the world giving to you? Nothing. Because we are losing the deep substance of our own depth of understanding. We are losing our freedom, institutions and organizations have taken this over. And all this is adding so much confusion, so much destruction, misery in the world. I don't think we realize what we are doing. And, if one may point out most seriously, to understand all this confusion, this misery, this sorrow, this agony, this loneliness of human beings, we must go into the question of desire.

Man apparently has never been able to understand and go very deeply into this problem: desire. They have learnt to suppress it, or let it run. They have learnt every form of expression of desire - sexual, desire to possess, desire to deny, desire to become powerful, the desire to become a non-entity - you know this whole drive of desire. And the various religions have said, the monks throughout the world must transmute desire by offering themselves, surrendering themselves to a symbol, to a person, to a saviour, to an idea. That's what the monks are all doing throughout the world. But inwardly they are burning with desire. And we too, every human being in the world, is consumed by it. We have never been able to understand and comprehend the nature of desire, not - please listen carefully, what I am saying may be very dangerous unless you understand it very, very deeply. We are saying, mere control of desire is not intelligent, nor the suppression of it, nor the escape from it. But in the understanding of desire, which is a very complex subtle process, in the very understanding of that desire it has its own discipline. Discipline being - please listen - the learning of the whole movement of desire, how desire arises, what is its nature, how it operates. In the fulness of that understanding, order in desire comes.

Now we are going together please, you and the speaker together are going to investigate patiently, step by step, into the nature of desire. When one learns - or rather when one perceives, sees the movement of desire, how it arises, the whole complexity of it, then out of that understanding desire does not create confusion.

So we are enquiring into order, disorder and desire. Desire has created disorder, each one desiring something different from another, pursuing that desire through pleasure, pain, you know, all the rest of it. So we are trying together to understand how desire arises, and when it is controlled, who is the controller, and is the controller different from that which he desires? We are going to go into all that.

I do not know if you have observed anything, the mountains, the hills, the valleys, the beautiful trees, with all your senses. Please as you are sitting under these trees, dappled light, observe, if you can see, the trees, the hills, with all your senses totally awakened. Or you merely observe either visually, or observe through words, or if you have ever observed with all the attention, which means with all the senses totally awakened. When you look at the sea, the blue Pacific, the light, the sparkling waters, and the far reaching waves, do you observe it, or you merely say, how beautiful it is, and you are so anxious to reach your goal? So we hardly ever observe anything with with all our senses fully awakened. That's real sensitivity. And when you so observe with all the senses there is no centre from which you observe. This is not something mysterious, something you got from me - just observe for yourself and you will see. Our senses inform the brain whether it is pleasant or unpleasant, painful or not painful, and so on. So senses are very important. But those senses are destroyed by drugs, alcohol, tobacco, over indulgence, with impatience. So senses help to observe. That is, first you perceive with your senses, then there is a contact, then there is a sensation. Right? Are we meeting each other? Come on, sirs!

The seeing, the contact, then from that contact sensation. Then - please observe closely for yourself, don't accept what the speaker is saying ever, but look at it for yourself - seeing, touching, the sensation. Then thought creates the image, and at that moment desire is born. Right? It is very simple. Explanation makes it a little complex but it is really quite simple. You see a robe, or a shirt, or trousers, or a dress in the window. Go inside, feel it, the sensation, then thought says, "How nice it would if I was in it", then desire begins. Understood? I am not telling you, you are watching it for yourself. Seeing, contact, sensation, then thought creating the image of you sitting in the car and driving it. So desire begins when thought creates the image and at that moment desire is born. Is it clear for ourselves? You are not accepting the speaker's explanation, they are merely words. They have no significance if you are merely accepting the words, but if you see it for yourself directly then you will understand - please follow this a little bit closely - then you will understand whether the seeing, contact, sensation, whether it can stop there, not create the image. You have understood? Have you captured this a little bit?

In that learning there is discipline. You understand? Not control. One of the factors of our education is that there is a controller separate from that which is controlled. That is how we live, I must control. I must discipline, I must learn. So there is always division between the controller and the controlled. And we have been trained in that, educated from childhood. But is that a fact? That may, this division between the controller and the controlled may create more and more conflict, which it is doing. That may be totally a wrong approach to life. But if you understand, the controller is the controlled. Right? Anger, violence, for example, violence - we won't go into the nature of violence and all the rest of it - just the meaning of that word of violence, which is spreading all over the world, etc., etc. - there is violence, human beings are violent therefore I realize I am violent, you are violent. And then we say, "I must change it, I must control it, I must become non-violent" - which is one of the pet idiotic illusions. So violence is not separate from me, I am violent. I wonder if you understand that?

So if there is no separation between violence and the thought that I am different from violence, when there is no separation there is only violence. Please follow this a little bit. There is only that state of sensation which you have named as violence. To look at that, to observe that violence without the word, to observe it, not as an observer looking at violence. Move, sirs! To look at it so that the observer is not but only that thing called violence, which is a sensation as anger and so on.

Similarly, to observe the seeing, the contact, the sensation, then thought creating the image, having that dress, or that shirt, or whatever it is, which then creates the desire to possess, to deny, all that. So can the brain stop with seeing, contact, sensation, stop there, and not let thought interfere with its image. That is learning about desire. Have you got it? Has somebody got it?

So that we are freeing the brain, which has been accustomed to control, conflict, strain, all that, we are helping the brain to observe itself totally anew so that it becomes terribly alive, freed from a pattern which it has accepted for a million years. You understand?

So if there is no contradiction in desire, wanting and not wanting, knowing that to succeed one is ruthless and yet the desire to succeed. You follow, this contraction which is so apparently part of our conditioning, when you observe it you can then see without any control, without any influence, without any direction, you can see the nature of desire, and the understanding of it brings its own learning, which is its discipline. Got it?

So from that, which is, desire and time are the factors of disorder. And when you understand it really deeply, profoundly, there is complete order in one's life. Total order. Not occasionally, not a weekends, but throughout our daily life.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 12TH MAY 1981

You are all warm - the vagaries of the climate in California!

Can we start with the questions right away?

1st QUESTION: What is the relationship between intelligence and responsibility?

I wonder - one wonders what the meaning of that word 'intelligence' is. If each one of us had to give a meaning to it according to either a dictionary or one's own perception of what is intelligence, how would we put it into words? According to the dictionary it is, reading between the lines, and also gathering in, gathering in a lot of information, knowledge, and from knowledge, reason and act. A man who is very scholarly, well read, highly educated but he may not be intelligent in his action. So one must be, I think, fairly clear what we mean by that word intelligence.

To see danger and act is part of intelligence. To see psychological dangers and act immediately, that is intelligence. But if we see the danger both outwardly and inwardly and not act, that is not intelligence. To see, for example, I am taking a very simple, ordinary example, that nationality is a danger to the world, and to continue with that feeling of being a nationalist, surely that is an unintelligent way of looking at life. But to see nationality is a danger and act, would that not be intelligent? Likewise to see all the pitfalls, all the subtleties of psychological conflict, all the travail that human beings go through and not end it but keep going on year after year, year after year, that is an act of unintelligence. To see that one is hurt and be free of that hurt, and never to be hurt, is an act of intelligence, surely.

Would that be clear? Is this clear when we talk about what we mean by intelligence? To see clearly something inwardly, psychologically. And all the traditional approaches to it have not solved our problems, but to see for ourselves very clearly and act, is an act of intelligence.

And also what is the meaning of that word responsibility, to be responsible? Responsible to your children, responsible to your husband, wife and so on, responsible not to destroy nature and so on. And also to be responsible to the whole of mankind. May I go on? That is, psychologically all human beings are more or less similar - they suffer, are anxious and so on, we have gone into that. So we are responsible as human beings for humanity, not only for being personally responsible for one's family but responsible for everything that is happening in the world: the division between the Arab and the Jew, the wars that are going on in South America, the atom bomb and so on. We are responsible for all that. I wonder if we feel that way. Or we say, yes, the problem is between the Jew and the Palestines and leave it at that. That surely is an act of not being intelligent.

And the questioner asked: what is the relationship between intelligence and responsibility. Intelligence is responsibility. In itself it is responsible for everything it does. I wonder if you see. Why do we separate responsibility and intelligence. If one is intelligent one is totally responsible. I wonder if one feels this way. Do we, as human beings, living in a monstrous world where every kind of cruelty is going on, and we know violence is part of human nature, we have accepted it, and wherever one goes violence is apparently in the human being. And to understand violence and to be free of violence is the responsibility of any intelligent man. Do we feel such responsibility? Or is the questioner merely asking, putting a question just intellectually, verbally, for amusement, for some kind of definition? Do we, as human beings, feel totally, completely responsible for all mankind, for whatever is happening in the world?

2nd QUESTION: How does one tackle the dormant seed of fear within one? You have talked of fear several times, but it is neither possible to face fear nor to uproot it. Is it that there is another factor that operates to dissolve it? Can one do anything about it?

I hope the question is clear. Shall I read it again or is it clear? We were going to talk about it on Saturday but we will do it now.

The questioner asks, is there another factor that will dissolve, uproot the very root of fear. You are waiting for me to answer! Can we go into it together, not wait for me to answer such a question, but together investigate a very, very serious problem, and a very complex problem. This fear has been with man since time immemorial, and apparently they have not solved it. We carry, day after day until you almost die, this burden of fear. Can that fear be totally uprooted? That's the question.

And the questioner says, one has tried several different ways but somehow it doesn't disappear. Is there another factor that will help to uproot it?

Can we, sitting here, look at our fear, not only physical fears of loss, of insecurity, the fear of losing one's children, the fear, that sense of insecurity when there is divorce, there is fear of not achieving something, fulfilling. There are various forms of fear.

Fear of not being loved, fear of loneliness, fear of what happens after death, fear of heaven and hell - you know all that kind of stuff. One is so frightened of so many, many things. Now can we, each one of us, consciously, sensitively be aware of one's own fear. Do we know our own fear? It may be losing a job, not having money, death and so on. Can we look at it first, not try to dissolve it, or conquer it, or go beyond it, but to observe it. Consciously observe, sensitively the fears, or one fear that one has, a dominant fear. And there are dormant fears that are asleep, deep rooted, unconscious, way down in one's own recesses of one's own mind. Can those dormant fears, which lie deeply within one, can they be awakened and looked at now? Or must they, those dormant fears, appear only in a crisis, in a shock, in certain strong challenges? Or can one awaken the whole structure of fear? Not only the conscious fears but also the deep unconscious, those shadowy recesses of one's brain which has collected fears? Are we following all this, or am I talking to myself? Can we do that?

First, can we look at our fear? And how do we look at it? How do we face it? Suppose I am frightened - and I am not - that I cannot be saved except by some divine person, there is a deep rooted fear of two thousand years. Right? I am not even observing that fear, it is part of my tradition, part of my conditioning that I can't do anything but somebody else, an outside agency is going to help me, save me. Save me I don't know from what, but it doesn't matter. And that is part of one's fear. And of course there is the fear of death, that is the ultimate fear, and so on. Can one - can I observe a particular fear that I have, and not guide it, shape it, overcome it, try to rationalize it, it is there? Can I look at it? And how do I observe it? Perhaps this may be rather important. Do I observe it as an outsider looking in, or do I observe it as part of me? You understand? Fear is not separate from my consciousness. Fear is not separate, something outside of me. Fear is part of me. Obviously. So can I observe that fear without the division of the observer and the observed? You understand? Are we following each other? Please do follow.

Can I observe that fear without the division that thought has created between the entity that says, 'I must face fear' - just to observe fear without that division. Is that possible? You see, our conditioning, our training, our education, our religious ambitions all point out that the two are separate - the 'me' is different from that which is not me. All right? You see we never recognize or accept the fact that violence is not separate from me. I think that may be one of the factors why we are not able to be free of fear because we are always operating on fear. Right? We are always saying to ourselves, I must get rid of it, what am I to do with it, is there a way? All the rationalization, enquiries, as though fear is something separate from the enquirer, from the person who enquires into fear. All right, can we go on, is this clear?

So can we observe fear without that division? That is, the word fear is not fear. And also see whether the word creates the fear - like the word 'communist' to many people it is a frightening word. So can we look at that thing called fear without the word, and also find out if the word is creating the fear. Are we in this together?

Then is there another factor which is not mere observation, but bringing, or having energy which will dissipate that fear, having such tremendous energy that fear doesn't exist? You understand? Is fear a matter of lack of energy, lack of attention, and if it is a lack of energy how does one come about naturally to have this tremendous vitality, energy that pushes everything, fear away altogether? You understand? We are following each other? All right, please help me. Are we together? Do we understand so far?

So that may be the factor that will dissipate, or that energy will have no sense of fear. You see most of us dissipate our energy in constant occupation with something or other: constant occupation if you are a housewife, if you are a businessman, if you are a scientist, it doesn't matter, a careerist, you are always occupied. And such occupation may be, and is, I think, a dissipation of energy. Like the man who is perpetually occupied about meditation, perpetually occupied with the concern about whether there is god, or, you know, various forms of occupation. Is not such occupation, which is constantly thinking about it, worrying about it, concerned about it, is that not a waste of energy? If one is afraid and you say, 'I must not be afraid, what am I to do', and so on, which is another kind of occupation, and that may be one of the factors of a lack of energy. It is only a mind that is free from occupation of any kind that has tremendous energy. That may be one of the factors that may dissipate fear.

And also another factor is time. Time is fear. I wonder if you understand all this? Time, which is an interval between 'what is' and 'what should be', time between now and the end. We explained that the other day so I don't want to go into it too much. But we can see what a great part time plays in our life. The learning of a language requires time, learning about any technical subject requires time. And we also accept time in the psychological world, in the area where the psyche functions. That is, the area where thought is constructing, building, changing, operating, reasoning, doubting - you follow - all that is the area of time also. When one says, 'I am afraid, but I will not be afraid', the future is time. So I will be, but I am not, but I will be, may the root of fear. I wonder if you understand this? Right?

Or is there a totally different factor at all? We have enquired, facing fear, actually observing it consciously, sensitively aware and without any choice, without any direction, just to watch it. And we said also the watching is important. How you watch, how you observe, if you are an outsider and observing, then you maintain the duality and then conflict arises. Right? And the other is, time is a factor of fear. And is there an energy that has no fear whatsoever? Are we coming together somewhere? Or is there an energy that sees fear and is completely free of it immediately? I wonder if you understand all this.

So: also there are the unconscious fears, the racial fears that one has inherited from time beyond time. Right? The fears of our past generations which one has inherited, which are dormant, can all these dormant, silent, hidden fears, be revealed completely, not go step by step, one fear after the other? You understand? It is possible only to reveal all the dormant fears, fears that have never been observed, never even come to the surface, can all that be totally awakened and in the very awakening of it is the ending of it. Are we moving together, or am I walking a lonely path?

You see, one of our misfortunes is that we are so clever in investigating, analyzing, we never see things immediately as a whole, a holistic perception of all fear. Please don't go to sleep, just let's follow each other. That is, can we see psychologically the whole operation of fear in which the very observation of that, observing wholly, completely, absolutely, the dormant fears must, will inevitably come out, and observe. Are we understanding each other? You see most of us are concerned with trimming fear, like you trim trees, so most of us want to trim fears. And we think that is good enough, but we never challenge ourselves whether it is possible to be completely free of fear. One may have done things wrong in the past, that also brings fear. Look at it, face it.

You see most of us do not demand of ourselves to be free; to be free of these burdens which we have inherited from time past, fear and so on, to say, can my brain be ever free of fear. And questioning it, asking it, demanding it, that needs a certain persistency, a certain sense of immediacy. But we are not like that at all.

Has the question been answered? Or are you still waiting for it to be answered? I think we have energy to meet this holistically, see the whole movement of fear: time, the negligence, our laziness, our acceptance of fear as part of life, all that implies a certain inertia. We don't meet this thing completely so we are always living with it. Isn't that enough?

I stop here now before we go onto the next question because they have to change the tape, and we have to sit for several minutes, do what we like.

Q: I wanted to ask you one thing. What are you waiting to hear?

K: What am I waiting to hear? I don't quite follow your question.

Q: You are asking us a question, do you want an answer?

K: No, no. We are answering questions. I am not waiting for anything.

Q: I just wanted to say that energy knows no fear.

K: I didn't say that, sir.

Q: Well, that is what it feels like to me. I say that energy which knows no fear and no time and no obstacle, no frictions, is always here.

K: Is this a speculative question, or statement?

Q: No, sir. I am saying what it feels like to me. I wanted to say also that it seems as if it is not here, whereas if it is something we have to go somewhere else for, or make some effort for, because our minds are always dissipating it.

K: Yes, sir, that is what we said earlier.

Q: I think it is important for us to realize, it seems to me, I am not speaking for anyone else.

K: Yes, sir. I understand.

Q: That we can all find it, if we only look, see how important it is to look at it. The energy of our life.

Q: What is beauty?

K: I thought we were going to be quiet!

Q: May I go on a bit more sir?

K: No, sir.

Q: All right.

K: No, sir. Afterwards. Right? Can we go on with our questions?

3rd QUESTION: How would you define and value the quality of modesty?

The word modesty means self-abnegation. Right? Not to be assertive. We are examining the word. Not to show oneself off, both physically or psychologically. To be modest, which is implied in that word a certain quality of shyness, reserve, not to be obtrusive. Right? The meaning of that word is all that. Apparently in the world modesty has disappeared. Right? Everybody wants to be assertive, showing off, half naked. You know what is happening in the cinema, the cinema world, and in the television. Apparently we are losing that, or have lost it, or have never had it. Isn't it important to be modest? Not always asserting, aggressive, I say this, and you say. You follow? I want this. Isn't it important to be unobtrusive? The speaker at the moment is not, he is obvious, sitting there. But if that quality of modesty, which disregards totally all reputation, disregards totally the self as being important, then it is surely utter lack of intelligence. Why has the world, specially the American world, lost this sense of modesty? Would you answer it?

Q: It is a sign of mental illness.

K: It is a form of mental illness, it is a form of neurosis, it is a form of self-exhibition.

Q: Modesty is beauty.

K: Modesty is beauty? What are you saying? Sir, please if you all talk. Are we modest? You have to find the word. To be self-restrained, to be somewhat shy, not self-assertive, not trying to say, me first, look at my body first. You know what is happening in this world, especially in this country. I am not criticizing, I am just observing. Everybody wants to be somebody, get into the newspapers, television. You follow? You know what is happening. Isn't modesty part of beauty? Doesn't that require a great sense of self-abnegation? But when one is wanting to be a great success, to be known, to be a star, famous, sell more books. You know the whole thing. Apparently we have lost that and therefore we have become rather vulgar, insensitive. And if one is not modest you have lost a tremendous lot of life.

4th QUESTION: Show me how to dissolve the 'I', the 'me'.
Without that everything else is futile.

The questioner says, show me. One can point out various ways of denying totally the self, the 'me', the selfishness, the self-centred activity, but apparently man has tried so many different ways - religiously, politically, accepting the State and adjusting, you know, all that, apparently man has not been able to totally deny or put away the whole nature and the structure of the self.

Let's look at it first, why self has become so important, why me first. And many people have tried through meditation, through the repetition of idiotic words, tried to be free of all this self. So why has man given such extraordinary importance to the self, why you - forgive me if I talk to you directly - why do you give importance to the self? Has it become a habit? Is it that we are encouraged from childhood? Is it that all religions have maintained that the self exists but identify that self with something greater? You know all that business. And is it that if one feels that there is no self there is nothing? And one is afraid of being nothing.

So the questioner says, show me, help me how to be free of this torture of the self. It is a torture, it is a battle that is going on outwardly and inwardly. The self can have no relationship with anybody. The self in its very nature is an isolating process. And it may be an abstraction, not actual reality - reality in the sense that can be touched, looked at objectively. Is it a series of structures put together by thought? Because the self, the 'me', the egotistic action is tearing the world apart. Perhaps we don't see that. That self identifies itself as a Jew, as a Hindu, as a Muslim, as a Christian, as a scientist. And so in the very nature of the self its movement is to be isolated. Are we meeting together?

And the questioner says: what am I to do. I know all this. I have thought a great deal about all this, I have tried different ways, I have meditated, tried to control, tried to deny myself of everything, but it is still there. Have you played with all this, some of you? If you have, then the question is, what is one to do. It may be that there is nothing to be done. Do you understand the question.

Through complete negation there is positive action. I wonder if you understand all this. To negate. But we are afraid to negate because we have identified ourselves with our body, the perpetual concern over the body, yoga, exercise, beauty, facial, you know, long hair, short hair, beard and no beard, go through the various fads that one goes through, all this is sustaining the self. And in meditation the controller is the self. I wonder if you see all this.

So what is one to do? One has tried ten thousand ways, one has tried many, many way to be free of this torture, this isolating process of the 'me'. I don't know if you have tried it, probably not. But to do it demands tremendous alertness, watchfulness, attention. And in the self there is great pleasure. The saints have done that; self control, self torture, but at the end of it all there is this self deeply rooted. And is it ever possible to have no shadow of the self? Which means no isolation; which doesn't mean, 'I am the whole', you follow, all those tricks. To have a sense of honest, absolute feeling that there is no isolation. Please don't go after the other, which is, 'I am the whole, therefore I am not isolated', which is just another trick of thought. The other day there was a letter in which a man said, 'I am truth, you are part of me, and you don't accept me therefore you are not whole' - you follow? Such nonsense that goes on!

So is it possible to eliminate altogether the feeling of isolation? And that may be love. And that may be the one central factor that totally dissipates the self. But that word love is such a misused word, it has been spat upon, made into such an ugly thing. I love my husband but I fight with him. I love with my wife, but I can't tolerate her, I must have a divorce. You know all that. I love my country, therefore I am ready to kill everybody else. I love god and I will torture anybody who doesn't believe in god. The Catholics have been experts at that. So that word is something very sacred - not the word but the content, the depth and the beauty and the utter reality of it, that is sacred. And if we haven't that, like the questioner says, everything else is futile. Then you might say, how am I to have that love? You can't, it isn't something that you cultivate, day after day being kind, generous, doing social work, going off to some unfortunate country and helping the poor and all that. You see that is one of our strange things, we have lost all reverence. It may be a bourgeois idea. We won't go into that for the moment.

That may be the only factor, the only thing that totally completely dissolves the self. Not, I love everybody. That's again another trick of the brain. I love one therefore I can love all. That's another. But to have the beauty of it in your heart, not in the word, not in the form. And when there is no sense of isolation then the other perhaps is, and then the self is not. When that is the other is not.

5th QUESTION: You have defined both insight and enlightenment as a clear perception of the whole without the observer. But many of us have had insight without being enlightened, so what is the difference between insight and enlightenment? And what prevents insight from being enlightenment?

I don't know who made this statement. The speaker certainly has not. The speaker has said, has acclaimed what is insight, never what is enlightenment. You can describe enlightenment but the description is not the reality. And any person who says, 'I am enlightened' - you know what that means!

So the question really is: the scientists have insight, but it is partial, the musicians have insight, it is still partial, many of us insight, quick perception of something, a quick perception and action, many of us sometimes have it, but that is all partial. Insight means insight into our daily life and action. I may, as a scientist, have an insight into certain factors of matter, but my life may be shoddy, ambitious, full of anxiety, dependency. Insight means insight into the whole movement of life, not just one part of it.

An insight can only take place when thought is absent as memory. Think it out. It is not the result of calculation, mathematical conclusions. Perception without the past, seeing the thing completely. Like when you see, for example, that all accepted established religion, all, whether it is in India, here or anywhere else, is what it is. When you have an insight of that kind you are free of all dogma, rituals, beliefs, faith, you don't belong to any group, to any guru. Such insight is possible only when you are really attentive, your whole being wants to find out.

I think we had better stop now, don't you.

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 14TH MAY 1981

I suppose I have to answer all these questions. I wonder if we put these questions to ourselves seriously would we be able to answer them all truly, authentically, not quote somebody else but answer them for oneself. And the answer must be true, applicable. And to answer it correctly one must have a certain amount of integrity and a quality of humility that goes with integrity. So let's together ask these questions and find out for ourselves the right and accurate answer. Not according to the speaker but find out for ourselves the truth of the answer, the truth of the question and the answer.

1st QUESTION: Imagination and words are the tools that man uses to function in daily life. Is it really possible to achieve an attention so constant, and alert, that one can always see the fine line between the necessary use of thought and where images lead to illusion and conflict?

I hope this question is not too intellectual and is applicable to our life.

Why does one create images about others, about oneself, have images about others and about oneself, and images that we worship, the symbols that we think are sacred, the whole network of philosophical construction of words, ideas and ideals and so on? Why do we always create images? I do not know if one realizes what an important part images have played in our lives. The temples are filled with them, the churches, the mosques. In the Islamic world the mosque has no images, but beautiful writing, which is a symbol, the same thing. So why does man create images either by the hand, or by the mind, by the brain? And the questioner wants to know, is it really possible to achieve an attention so constant and alert that one can always see the fine line between the necessary use of thought and where images lead to illusion and conflict.

Do we understand the question? I am not quite sure I understand it myself. I am glad such a question is put. You see we always use words to communicate. There are many means of communication with each other: through words, through a gesture, through a look, through a slight movement of the head; there is always this communication going on and through words and so on. And words have played an extraordinary part in our lives. First of all, is there thought without words, without images, without constructing symbols? Is there a thought without words and so on? You understand my question? Or words are part of thought? And if one observes our whole mode of thinking is a network of words, symbols, ideas. Right? Are we moving together?

And what is the division, the questioner asks, between thought, the necessary use of thought, the necessary use of knowledge, skill, born of knowledge, and the line between that and the image making that leads to various forms of illusions and conflict. Are we understanding the question together? The question seems rather difficult, doesn't it.

Are we asking where is the line between thought and the action of images, symbols? Are we asking what part imagination plays in life? Is not imagination necessary? I am investigating the question? Is not the capacity to imagine the beauty of the hills as a painter, as a poet, with their extraordinary capacity to imagine and put into words, the painter and so on, is not imagination necessary? And does imagination play a part in our daily life? And if it does, is that imagination put together by thought, a tool which we can use skilfully? You are following? Right? Is it too cold?

A poet, a writer, a painter, a sculptor and so on, they must have imagination, otherwise they can't write, but is imagination necessary in our life, daily life? Or imagination prevents, or fancy prevents the actual perception of what is going on? You understand? Is it not more important to understand what actually is going on in our daily life without all the imaginative idealistic suppositions, 'ifs' and 'whens', actually observe what is going on. Isn't that far more important than having great imagination? If one can observe attentively what is going on, then that very attention throws a light on 'what is'. Throws a light on 'what is', and that light of attention clarifies the problem. Right? Are we meeting, are we thinking together about this, reasoning together? Not accepting what the speaker says, but actually reasoning together to see what place has imagination and where that imagination brings about illusion, which prevents actual understanding of 'what is'. Is this clear?

I am afraid - suppose - and I imagine a state of mind when there is no fear. That imagination becomes very important for me because it offers an escape from actual fear. I live in that. Living in that imagination is an illusion, not actual. And that capacity to imagine some state of mind, or heart, when there is absolutely no fear, it gives me a certain sense of vitality, a certain neurosis, a certain fanciful way of living which is not actual. So perhaps such imagination prevents me from looking directly at fear. And looking at it with complete attention reveals the whole nature of fear. And from that understanding of that attention fear begins to disappear. But if I have imagination about a state of mind, a state of heart, where there is absolutely - a delightful state where there is no fear, I am a bit loony!

So imagination has a certain value for the poets, artists, for the artists, but art - really art means to place everything in the right place. That's the true meaning of that word 'art: to put everything in its proper place. But the poets, the painters and the artists lead a pretty hectic life, a life of conflict. You know all that goes on with those artists, the great and the so-called artists. So we are concerned with the life of our daily life.

And the questioner asks, is it really possible to achieve an attention so constant and alert, that one can always see the fine line between the necessary use of thought and where images lead to illusion? You understand now the question? Right? Do we understand the question? Where to draw the line between the necessary use of thought and where images lead to conflict and illusion. And is it possible to sustain a constant state of attention, alertness, where thought has its place, which is skill, born of knowledge as a carpenter, plumber, scientist, and a state of mind that is constantly in total attention. That's the question. Right?

So we have to enquire what it is to be aware. We will go into it slowly and come to the point what it means to be completely attentive. Are we ever aware, not only of what is going on in the world but also what is going on inwardly, aware? That is, are we aware, as we sit here, of the trees, the nature of the limbs, the boughs, the beauty of it, are we aware of the hills, the mountains, the slopes and all that? And that is perhaps fairly easy. But are we also aware of what is going on inwardly - our thoughts, our feelings, our peculiar attitude towards life, convictions? And if we are aware can we be aware without any choice? Are we following each other? To look, to observe, without any choice. Right? Is that possible? It is possible only when we understand how choice has become very important in life. Choice of profession, choice of jobs, choice of so-called woman, man, choosing, choice of so many things. We choose between this material and that material. So choice plays a great part in our life. That's clear, obviously. A better taylor, better shirt, you follow, the whole business of it. Choice at a certain level is necessary, between a good car and bad car. But when there is choice psychologically, inwardly, does it not indicate confusion? Please look at it for a moment. If there is clarity there is no choice. Right? I wonder if you see that. It's only when we are confused, uncertain, we begin to choose. Right? Isn't this logical? But is it very difficult to be clear? Clarity, not about politics and politicians and all that business, but inwardly to be so absolutely clear so that your action is never born out of confusion, out of choice. Is that at all possible? And we are saying that is only possible when thought finds its own right place. Right, are you following all this? Right place in the sense I must know how to drive a car. Knowledge is necessary in order to speak English, French, or Spanish or Italian. Or if there is to be a career I must have knowledge about it. There knowledge is absolutely necessary. And psychologically we feel knowledge is also necessary. To know somebody, to know your wife or your husband, to know. So can you know ever about your wife or your husband? You cannot know a living thing. Right? I wonder if you understand all this.

So psychologically when we say, 'I must know myself' - please understand this a bit - when we say, I must know myself, one means by it I must accumulate knowledge about myself. Right? Which is the same as the other. Right? To become a good carpenter - I would prefer to be a carpenter rather than a professional, scientist or big shots - to be a good carpenter I must know a great deal about wood, tools and so on; and I carry the same mentality when I say, 'I must know myself', which means I must gather a lot of information about myself. Are you following this? So that I can act rightly, or skilfully, or whatever it is. So can I know myself ever completely according to knowledge? You follow this? Or myself is so subtle, so constantly changing, moving, acting, it is never the same? Right? But I would like it to be always the same. I wonder if you follow all this? So I create an image about myself which is static and I act according to that. So knowing oneself is not accumulating knowledge about oneself, but to be aware of all what is happening with complete attention so that there is no accumulation of knowledge about myself but the movement of myself.

Are we understanding each other? I want to know myself, which is very important. The ancient Greeks talked about it, the ancient Hindus also went into it, the Buddhists, but the religious world of the western world, hasn't gone into this question of 'know yourself'. They have talked about it but they haven't gone very deeply into it. Now we have tried to know about ourselves according to some philosophers, some analysts, psychologists and so on, so we are learning about ourselves from others. Whereas the others are ourselves. You understand? I wonder if you see this. So to know myself I can only observe it in my relationship to another. There, I perceive all my reactions. Right? All my desires, all my conflicts, I perceive it there. Relationship acts as a mirror in which I see myself actually as I am. If we make that mirror a thing which becomes merely images, imagery, then it leads to illusion. So can one be aware of oneself without any choice, and that awareness moves into attention when there is no border, when there is no limited perception of me watching. You understand?

Has one ever given attention, complete attention to anything? Now, are you now listening to this speaker, poor chap, are you giving complete to what you are hearing? And if you so give your complete attention, which means you hear the word, you understand the fullness of the meaning of that word, and the word is not important but the meaning and the content of the word and giving your complete attention, with your nerves, with your ears, with your eyes, with all your energy, then you will see, if you do, there is no 'me' attending. There is no centre from which you are attending, only there is attention. Have you understood this?

So it is only that there can be constant alertness and attention when one has really understood very, very deeply the nature of thought - which we have explained a dozen times. Sorry to have taken half an hour over this question.

2nd QUESTION: I am a writer and I feel responsibility and an urge to voice my understanding. Yet I know my understanding is imperfect, limited. What is right action for one who sees or understands something and is in a position to be heard but whose understanding isn't total?

Most of us are not writers, most of us are not in a position to be heard by the public, by many. But I have heard certain things from the speaker, or from my own perception, from my own watchfulness of the world and so on, and I see my understanding is limited. And what am I to do in my life when my understanding is imperfect, I must act. Right? I must do, but my understanding of life is very limited. Right? Now is that a fact? Or I say, my understanding is limited - you are following this - is it an actual fact that my understanding is limited? Then if my understanding is limited and I realize actually it is limited, my expression will be as limited, incomplete as my understanding. I have heard the speaker for many years, unfortunately, and I have gathered some things from him and I know it is incomplete, it is not a total comprehension of the whole of life, but it is limited, my understanding. So I know it is limited, I am not pretending it is not limited, I acknowledge to myself that it is limited, so I express myself in a limited way, and I acknowledge it is a limited way. You understand all this? There is no pretension about it.

And if I am a writer and I happen to be famous enough to be heard, by the public, and I realize also my understanding of life is limited, imperfect, not complete, naturally I am going to express myself because I am a writer, I want to be heard. And I also say to myself, and to the audience who are going to read, my understanding is limited. You understand what that word means? The public wants everything complete. Right? They want somebody who says, 'I understand the whole of it.' And if a writer says, 'Look, my understanding of life is limited', his publisher - you know! But a writer, his responsibility lies in absolutely having integrity. That's where his responsibility is. I don't know if you are following all this. I am not saying the questioner has not integrity but, sir, to be honest, having integrity, there one can be total, complete. To have complete integrity without any pretension, without any double talk, that demands humility, modesty and a certain clarity.

Shall we stop now for about seven minutes for the tape to be changed. Right sir?

3rd QUESTION: What is the role of the question in life?

That is, what is the role of questioning in life. Clear? Do we ever question fundamentally? Or only superficially? Or only when there is some kind of trouble then we begin to question? But that questioning is trying to find an answer to the problem. And the questioner wants to know, what is the role of always questioning. Has it any importance? When do we ever question seriously, apart from a crisis? You understand? When there is a crisis, when there is a trouble, when we are in pain, suffering and then we begin to question. That questioning is perhaps seeking a way out of pain, sorrow, trouble and so on. We do question then. But the questioner also wants to know, what is the role, what part questioning plays in life. Not at moments of crises but the questioning mind. Is it clear?

Do you ever question, investigate which is part of questioning, into your own experiences, into your own desires, into your own opinions, evaluations, convictions, or do you take those for granted and only question when there is actual trouble? You understand my question? Are our minds enquiring, watching, recollected, aware? You understand? Or only superficially? And is not questioning important? Questioning your beliefs, your faith. You know what would happen if you questioned your faith, specially in the western world? You understand? Your religious faith, if you questioned. The whole thing would collapse. And is one frightened to question? Which is the mind, the brain specially, is always seeking a position of safety where it can be secure. I don't know if you have observed all this for yourself. A child needs to be secure, it needs the mother, the father to love it, so that it feels completely secure, protected. Up to a certain point the mothers and fathers do that, up to a certain point. But they soon get bored with whatever they do, they have their own interests, their own problems, their own travail and gradually the child, the boy or the girl, is neglected, goes off. So one discovers the brain needs security to function. Right? To be a good physicist, to have all the knowledge of physics gives the brain a certain quality of assurance, of safety, protection. Right? And the more you question along that line, the more you learn, the more safe it becomes. Are you following? Come on sirs. We understand all this.

So it is finding safety in knowledge, like a good surgeon, he has operated a hundred times, he knows, and his brain is active along that line, secure - it gives money, position, you know, all that. So it gives the brain a certain quality of limited security. Right? So knowledge becomes important as a means to be safe. And that knowledge, as we have pointed out many times, is always limited, all knowledge is always limited. And therefore the questioning becomes very limited. Right? Naturally.

If one is not a specialized entity, if one observes that security is necessary for the brain, to have food, clothes, you know, a house, it is secure, but having that security, physical security, the brain demands psychological security - security in relationship, security in ideas, security in faith and so on. We never question those. You are following? Right? We are saying now, to have a mind that is questioning, investigating, never caught in a limited understanding, questioning, in that there is a great deal of intelligence. From that arises intelligence, and that intelligence is security. I wonder if you understand all this. Are we together in all this, or am I just talking? Right? Shall we go on to the next question?

4th QUESTION: Life separates friends through death, and physical separation. Is this separation the end of relationship, leaving nothing more real than memory? Is there love between people only when they are physically present? Or can there be something more than thought when they are absent? Is all relationship momentary with no lasting bond?

Lord! There are so many questions involved in this one question. So let's take one by one.

Life separates friends through death and physical separation. Is this separation the end of relationship, leaving nothing more than memory? That's an actual fact, isn't it? Right? I am separate from my wife, I may go off travelling. My wife remains in India, or in Britain, or here, and I think about her, telephone her, I write to her, and so I keep up communication. Right? It is based on memory. I don't quite see what the problem is there, that's an actual fact, leaving nothing more than memory.

Is there love between people only when they are physically present, or can there be something more than thought when they are absent? This is the real question. Is there love between people only when they are physically present, or can there be something more than thought when they are absent? My golly!

Now let's go into it. If we understand very deeply and very clearly the nature of thought, which is, if I may repeat again, thought is the outcome of memory, the response of memory. Memory is born out of knowledge, knowledge is out of experience. Right? This is the cycle: experience, knowledge, memory, action and from that action learn more, so have more experience, knowledge, memory, action. It's a circle, a chain in which we are operating. That's how our thinking is going on all the time. So we must be very clear of the nature of thinking. It is a material process. There is nothing whatsoever sacred about it. Right? Please don't accept this. If you accept it then you don't see the whole meaning of it, unless you have gone very deeply into it. Everything thought has created in the world, technologically, computers, and all the rest of that, the atom bomb, all the things in the temples, the mosques, the churches, are put together by thought. Right? So the symbols, the images, these temples contain, there is nothing sacred about it. Right? But thought, having created it, then thought makes it appear sacred. Right? Examine it please, don't accept it, don't get angry, just look at it.

And is the movement of thought love? That is what the questioner is asking. The questioner says, is there love between people only when they are physically present, or can there be something more than thought when they are absent. So if thought is the only movement in relationship, thought with its images about each other, if that is the only relationship that we have, then what place has love? You are following? Is love the image that we have created about each other in that relationship, pleasant, unpleasant, all the travail of relationship, and in that relationship when there is this conflict, each one acting separately, wanting to fulfil his own desires, his own lust and so on, each one separate and trying to fulfil in his own separate ways - ambition, aggressiveness, greed, you know all that goes on - is there love? And then what is love? Is it put together by thought? Go on, sir, answer all this. Is love desire? Is love the pursuit of self-fulfilment? Is love the pursuit of pleasure? You understand, that is what is happening in the world? And so when that is missing altogether, or perhaps happens rarely, occasionally, then thought is the only means of communicating with each other - telephone, writing letters, thinking about your wife or your friend, you know all that takes place.

So what is one to do? You understand my question? I realize thought has become so extraordinarily important in life, in the business world, in the technological world, in the economic world, and in the world of religion - all the rituals are put together by thought, the dogmas, the faith, everything is based on thought. Thought made through tradition holy. And when one realizes very deeply that thought is not that flame which purifies everything else, how is one to capture it, to hold it, to have it, you understand my question? Are you following me? Now that becomes a problem. Right? And my brain - listen to it carefully - my brain is trained to solve problems. In the technological world it has been trained year after year to solve technical problems - the atom bomb, computers, and so on. And my brain has been educated to solve psychological problems. So I am faced with this question, which is, I know thought is not all that we have said - and I also know without the other life becomes very shallow. So I have a problem. Follow this.

I have a problem. Right? You understand this? So I am ready to solve it. My brain is active to solve it. Whereas love is not a problem to be solved. You understand? The problem is not thought and love, but the problem is this tremendous egotistic, egocentric movement going on all the time. That is the real problem. And so I begin again trying to solve it. I never say, just the problem, let's look at it. I am not going to solve it, let's look at it. I wonder if you are following all this? Don't let me make it into a problem, but let me first look at it, let me look at the whole movement of thought, and also as I don't know the other, perhaps I know it very rarely like a beautiful flower which withers so quickly, I know something of it, but the knowledge of it is not the real thing, so I look, I am aware of thought - rather, not 'I am aware of thought' - thought begins to be aware of itself. You begin to understand this? Are you all asleep?

And the thing is never to make a problem of anything. I wonder. This one thing if we could understand. It is only a mind that has no problems that can solve problems. You have understood? But we have so many problems and we try to solve other problems and so keep on multiplying problems. So we never ask of ourselves, if it is possible to have no problems. But there are problems; but to meet them instantly and finish with them so that the mind, the brain is free from all conflict, problems.

Is all relationship momentarily with no lasting bond? That's part of the question, sorry. I missed that. Is all relationship momentary with no lasting bond? What do you mean by that word 'bond'? Bondage? Depending on each other, holding on to each other? Is that what relationship is, the establishment of a constant lasting bond? Is that what relationship is? I am asking you sirs. Or is relationship something entirely different in which there is no bondage, in which there is no dependency? Which means deep inward sense of freedom and integrity and you follow, having this love. Then love is not bondage.

5th QUESTION: One sees the fact that the essential response to the conflict in the world is a revolution in consciousness, in each individual, but does this mean that without that total action all other lesser but perhaps helpful actions are useless?

One sees the fact that the essential response to the conflict in the world is a revolution in consciousness, in each individual. As we have explained very carefully, and I hope we can go into again if one is not clear on this point, our consciousness with its content is the common ground of all humanity. Right? Your consciousness, which is your education, your beliefs, your convictions, your values, your greed, your suffering, your pain, your anxiety, uncertainty, joy, pleasure, is common to all mankind. Right? Is that not so? Or are we uncertain about that? Go to India, go to Japan, go over to Russia, Europe or here, every human being goes through great sorrow, every human being has conflict, pain, physical, psychological, is wounded, every human being is uncertain, confused, violent, pleasure-seeking. That is the common consciousness of man. Right? It is not your consciousness, or my consciousness. This is very difficult to see, to see this fact because we are all so trained, educated and we take delight in an illusion called, 'My consciousness is different from everybody else's'. Right? Is this so, or not? You won't accept this.

So the revolution is the crisis and its answer is a total revolution in consciousness, which is the ending of fear, the understanding of the whole nature of pleasure which man has pursued endlessly, this sense of anxiety, uncertainty, desperate loneliness, sorrow, death; that is the content of our consciousness. That content makes our consciousness. Right? May we go on from there?

And is it possible to be free of its content? And, as we explained on many occasions, the philosophers, the psychologists, all those people say it is not possible, human nature can never radically be transformed because mankind has lived for five, ten million years, and look, he has not changed radically, so accept what is. You understand? Modify it, control it, educate it to be a little better behaved and so on and so on, but remain within the limits of that. You are following all this? So meditation is within the limits of that. Seeking god, truth, is within the limits of that. And somebody comes along, like the speaker, says, no, it is possible to radically transform that consciousness. Which means, first one must realize that you are not separate from the rest of mankind, you are mankind. Therefore you are not an individual. Right? You see, if you see that it is already a revolution. Right? It's already changed the pattern of thought altogether. Which means you are the world, and the world is you. That's just not a theory, not an ideal, an Utopia, but it's an absolute fact. And therefore you become terribly responsible for everything that is happening in the world.

But does this mean that without that total action, that total revolution, all other lesser and perhaps helpful actions are useless? Answer it for yourself! We never face the truth. We never face facts. We try to cover them up, run away from them, but when you realize that the next questions is answered for itself.

6th QUESTION: I am appalled at what is happening in society today. I do not want to be a part of it, yet I realize I am not separate. What is my relationship to society?

What is your relationship to society? Why do you, if one may ask most respectfully, why do you separate yourself from society? Society is an abstraction, is it not? Society is put together by man in his relationship with another. Right? Are you following? But we have said, I am separate from society, and so I act upon society, I want to change society. It is something abstract, it is not an actually. Society is opinion, judgement, the economics, the political activity, all of that is part of what you call society. That society is built by us, by our parents, grandparents, all that is built by us. So we are that. This is so. Is this also another revolution? Society is not separate from me, I am the society. I am not saying - the speaker is not saying this because he is a communist, or any of that kind of thing. The communists have maintained this as a theory, and as a theory they have said, change society, control it, shape it, become a dictator, totalitarian then man will change. You know all that business. Whereas on the contrary man has created it, unless man changes society cannot change. Unless the computers come along with their robots and change the whole structure of the economic society. You follow all this?

So one is not separate from society. One is the world. If one realizes that you would never put this question.

Then the problem is - the question is, what am I to do, how am I to radically transform myself. That's the real question. How am I not to be self-centred everlastingly, all self-centred activity come to an end? We never ask these questions. So at your leisure moments please ask these questions. When you are not totally occupied with your pleasures, with your occupations, with wanting to be somebody, success, you know all the rest of it, perhaps you will have time to ask this question. Ask it and remain with it, remain with the question, then see what happens. Because if you say, 'I must change myself', who is the man, who is the entity that is demanding change? It is still - you understand all this. So one discovers that the thinker is the thought. There is no thinker apart from thought, there is no experiencer apart from experience, there is no analyzer apart from the analysis, that which is analyzed. So when you realize that there is a totally different movement takes place.

Are you all tired? One last question. Thank the lord!

7th QUESTION: There is a deep root of violence in me. I know it is there behind my other feelings. How do I deal with it?

What is violence? The shooting of people? That's part of violence. The hurting of others? That is part of violence. War is the essence of violence, with its bestiality, cruelty, the appalling things war does. And anger, hate, imitation is violence, conformity is violence. I don't know if you follow all this. And is one aware of all this in oneself, that one is conforming all the time to a pattern, to an ideal, to a concept, imitating, comparing oneself with another, aggression. Is one aware of all this as violence? Or only the killing of somebody with a gun? You understand? Is it not violence when you believe very strongly in something and another believes equally strongly about some belief, and you are trying to convert the other, and the other is trying to convert you, conflict. Is that not violence? This hectic propaganda that is going on in the name of religion, in the name of everything, is that not violence? You see you limit violence to a very small affair.

So what is one to do, the questioner asks. First, if one may point out, don't create its opposite, which is non-violence. Right? I wonder if you understand. Do you want an explanation of this? That is, I am violent and I have been trained, that is part of my habit to say, 'I must not be violent'. You follow? I am violent, and I have created the ideal of being non-violent, so I have a conflict. You follow? Being violent and not wanting to be violent is a conflict. Right? And that very conflict is violence. I wonder if you see this. Are we communicating?

So the first realization is not to create the opposite. Right? Then I am faced with the fact, not with its opposite. The opposite has its roots in its own opposite. Right? Oh, come on! So I am faced with the reality of violence, not with the idea that I must not be violent, which is an illusion, it is not a fact. The fact is I am violent. You see how we have been trained not to deal with facts. So I realize I am violent, and I have no idea of trying to become non-violent. That's completely gone out of my blood. So I am only dealing with fact. Now how do I look at that fact? As an observer looking at something to be observed? Or, the observer himself is violent? You get the point? I wonder if you do. Are we together in this? Come on, sirs!

The man, the entity or the thought that says, I am violent, and it must be changed, or transformed to something else, and the transformer is part of that violence. There is no separate entity, superior entity who is non-violent, who is peaceful. You understand? That is another invention of thought, to escape from the basic fact that I am violent.

So please just follow this, give a little attention, you may be tired, but just give a little attention to this. That is, there is no division between the observer and the observed. Right? There is only the fact, there is only the observation of the fact, not, 'I observe the fact'. Right? There is only the pure observation of that reaction, which in the past a word has been given to that reaction which is violence. So I realize the word is not the thing, but the actual movement of that feeling, of that reaction. And I and that reaction are not separate, that there is only reaction. This requires, you understand, very close watching. Then you will see when you come to that point, which is you are giving tremendous attention to the fact, there is attention of the fact, and that attention is like a light put on something, and that dissipates the violence. Have you got it? No, not got it from me: see the fact, see how deceptive we are, it becomes so deceptive, it's so dishonest all this.

So when you allow time to dissolve an issue, that issue increases, multiplies. It's only the mind that sees clearly acts. I've finished.

This morning we should go into the content of our consciousness. And we said during the last four talks that the crisis is not in politics, economics, social structure and so on, but the crisis is in our consciousness. And that consciousness is the common ground of all mankind, because all men throughout the world, wherever they live, men, women, they go through great anxieties, unhappiness, escape through various forms of amusement, the amusement may be various kinds, including religions which have become meaningless. And this crisis has to be met otherwise mankind is going to degenerate and destroy itself. I think it is obvious for any thinking man, any person who observes, who is not too self-centred, he can see what is happening in the world - the terrorism, violence, wars, and so on and so on. So the crisis is in our consciousness.

And this morning, if we may, together, together, go delicately, sensitively, into the content of our consciousness. The content makes up the consciousness. Without the content consciousness as we know it has no meaning. So we have to together, if we will, seriously, go into this content of our consciousness.

Please if one may point out we are not doing any kind of propaganda, trying to convince you of anything, trying to make you believe in something - new ideals, new Utopia - but together, and the speaker means together, explore the content of this consciousness, both that which is conscious as well as the unconscious, deeply, hidden in one's brain.

I think the first concern, or examination, should be about fear.

What is the beginning of fear; how does fear arise; and how is it to be met, and whether it is possible at all to be totally free of it, both at the conscious level as well as at the deeper layers of one's consciousness where the root of fear is? And fear is the common factor of all mankind. It is not your particular fear. You may be afraid of the dark, of your husband, of something that you have done in the past and so on and so on. This fear exists in every human being, in different forms, whether they live in Asia, India, Europe or here, even in Russia. And mankind, from time immemorial, has carried this burden of fear. Apparently they have never been able to solve the problem of fear - solve in the sense, dissolve it totally, be free from it, liberated from the tremendous burden of it. And this morning together we are going to investigate, examine very closely the nature of fear, the structure, what are the factors that bring about fear, and whether one can both psychologically and physically be completely without any shadow of fear.

One thinks it is important to understand this, if we are serious. And it is a lovely morning, with beautiful sunshine, hills, shadows, and all that, to talk about fear seems rather incongruous. But as we have gathered here for the last two weeks, I think one should give considerable attention to this question.

There are many factors that bring about fear. Either we trim the branches of fear - take one branch, one leaf of fear after another, and examine them; or find out the root of it, not merely the branches, the expression, the action of it, but rather examine very closely the beginning of it, the origin from which fear and the consequences of fear arise. If we will, not as a group therapy which is rather unnecessary, but if you will take your own particular fear, whatever it be - death, insecurity, the sense of desperate loneliness, the sense of wanting to fulfil, the feeling of insufficiency in oneself, whatever that fear is can we first look at it, not run away from it, not substitute it by another thought, or try to avoid it, go beyond it, or try to conquer it. We are trying this morning to observe the root of it, the cause of it, the origin of it.

Most human beings throughout the world - this is one of the factors - get hurt, both physically as well as psychologically, more inwardly than outwardly. This hurt remains for the rest of one's life unless one completely dissolves it. And that is one of the factors of fear, being hurt from childhood, school, college, university and so on - if you are lucky to go through university, and I don't know why one goes through university. But there is this deep wound which may be conscious, or unconscious. And when one is wounded psychologically, inwardly, the consequences of that hurt are building a wall around oneself - I hope we are following all this together, watching your own hurt, if you are at all sensitively aware of that fact. We are all hurt from childhood in one way or another. The consequences of that hurt is to resist, is to avoid, not to be further hurt. And not to be further hurt implies to build a psychological resistance. And the consequences of that is more isolation, greater fear. That's one of the factors of fear.

The other factor is time. Time being that which has happened, might recur again, and time as future when one has no hope, when one is desperately hopeless. Time plays a great part in our lives. Time as an interval between 'what is' and 'what should be' or 'what might be', and time, an interval between now and the ending of life, which is death. So time is a factor of fear. One of the factors. Please, we are not intellectually examining verbally. We are actually seeing ourselves, seeing the nature of our own fear, and the fear of being nobody, because everybody wants to be somebody, the fear of not being able to fulfil, not achieving, not becoming. The 'becoming' implies time. So time is a great factor in the structure of fear.

Then there is the factor of bottomless loneliness. Are we aware of this loneliness? One may have a lot of friends, a happy family and so on, but everyone knows, when one is alertly watchful, of this loneliness, from which arises depression, anxiety and fear of being lonely, utterly unrelated to anything. One is sure that one has been through all this, through this loneliness, one knows this. And being aware of this loneliness one tries to escape from it. The escape is the fear. And that escape may be the church, may be god, may be some fantasy, some imagination, some kind of belief, faith and all that, or even intellectual knowledge - to run away from this agonizing, destructive loneliness. And this loneliness is the self-centred activity, the tremendous concern about oneself - this concern to be, to become and to achieve, and so on.

And also one of the factors of this fear is attachment. I hope we are together following all this. You are not, if you don't mind the speaker pointing it out to you respectfully, you are not merely listening to a lot of words, a lot of ideas. Then if you are merely intellectually, verbally accepting these factors of fear then fear will continue. But if we are aware of our own fear sensitively then we will see that fear has many, many causes, many factors. And we are examining together these factors.

Perhaps many of you are not used to this kind of close investigation, examination. So please if you are good enough pay a little attention. It is important to learn the art of listening. We never perhaps listen to anybody except to our own pain, to our own anxiety, to our own sorrow, loneliness and so on. We never listen completely to another. And if we do listen it is a partial listening. Or when we do listen we translate, or interpret what we hear. There is the hearing with the ear, and there is a hearing with attention. So one hopes that you will so kindly listen. We are not teaching you, we are not trying to point out anything, but together looking at this factor of fear. And it is important to learn this art of hearing completely, which means giving your total attention to this question. The speaker may use these words, and the speaker may act as a mirror in which you see the fears, but the speaker and the mirror are not important, they are totally irrelevant. But what is essential, important, is to observe the fear.

And we were saying one of the factors, among others, is this attachment - why human beings are so attached to a belief, to an ideal, to an image of themselves, to some concept, to the verbal structure. And when one is attached, in that attachment, however deep, however momentary, however pleasant, in that possessiveness, which is attachment, there is fear, there is anxiety. So that is one of the factors.

And the major factor is, if you are examining closely, thought is the factor, the major factor. Thought is the remembrance of things past. Thought is the projection of what might be, or might not be. Thought is movement of time. We went into that somewhat in the past talks. Thought is the response of memory, knowledge, experience. And thought being limited, its actions must be limited, as knowledge is always limited. And therefore knowledge is always in the shadow of ignorance. And thought creates this sense of separateness, isolation, and, if you observe, that thought breeds fear - I might be, and I might not be, I have known past pleasures and I may not have the future pleasure. So in this cycle of the past, modifying itself in the present, and continuing that modification in the future, and out of that future, or in that future there is great uncertainty. And this uncertainty is one of the factors of fear.

These are the many factors of fear. Either you take one factor after another, try to understand each factor, or you take the whole of it, as one unit. It all depends upon your capacity of collecting all the factors immediately and seeing the whole nature and structure of fear. So it depends upon you whether it is to be a perception of fear as a whole, the whole of it, the unconscious fears which have not been examined, and the conscious fears which we are in the act of examining. Either you take one by one, your fears - and that would be endless. You can do this until one dies. But if one takes fear as a whole, then the major factor in all that wholeness is time and thought. We have explained the nature of time and thought. And thought breeds fear. Seeing all that, what is one to do? Not only the conscious fears, but the hidden fears of which one may not be aware. Can those fears, which are not aware, unconscious, deeply concealed in the recesses of one's own consciousness, one's own brain, can those hidden, concealed, very, very subtle fears be totally exposed and looked at?

I hope we are following each other. That is only possible, that is, the conscious as well as the deeper fears of which we are not aware, it is only possible when you give complete attention. Which implies that you have to face fear, face actually what fear is.

Whether that fear is merely a verbal fear, because the words create fear, because words have their associations, their images, and when you use a certain word, that very word may create fear. I hope you are following.

So one must be aware of the nature of the word, and whether that word is creating the fear. Or, as we have explained, the many factors of fear, can one observe it without the word? Like observing a tree, this oak tree, to look at it without the word, because when you are observing if the word comes in you really are actually not observing. And to observe that, observe the whole nature of fear completely. If you take your particular fear, whatever it is, and observe it with complete attention - perhaps you have never given total attention to anything. We are so inattentive. And it is very difficult for most people to be attentive with their whole being.

And attention implies giving your energy. Attention means the total observation of something with complete energy. And when you so give your complete total attention, therefore with all the energy that one has, fear disappears, not one particular fear, fear completely disappears. One hopes that in listening, you are actually doing this.

And fear is another form of pleasure. Man apparently, throughout the ages has pursued pleasure. One observes in this country more and more an everlasting demand for entertainment, for excitement, for any form of pleasure - sexual, inviting different types of pleasure. And again when you observe very closely, what is pleasure? The demand for excitement. If you have observed on televisions, in books, and all the rest of it, this sense of increasing constant demand of pleasure, of excitement. When there is actual pleasure, actual pleasure, is one conscious that it is pleasurable? Or is it a moment after? If it is a moment after it is the activity of thought which has remembered that incident as pleasurable. Please examine all this. So thought again plays a part in this pleasurable pursuit. That's why it is very important to understand the nature of thought, why thought has become so utterly important for all people. It breeds fear and it breeds pleasure. They are the two sides of the same coin.

And if we have time this morning, we must go into the question of suffering. What is suffering? What is the great psychological pain, the grief, the anxiety, the tears that one sheds? What is suffering? And again man throughout the ages has not solved this problem. Christianity has shelved it - identified with one person in all the history of Christianity. And the Asiatic world has its own explanation of grief - past actions and the result is misery, conflict, pain, suffering. Those are all explanations. Those are all various forms of escape. All escapes are similar, there are not noble escapes, or ignoble escapes, escapes are similar. And if one does not escape, can one remain immovable with sorrow? Please follow this a little bit, if you will kindly. Because we all go through great sorrows, not only the sorrow of death, the sorrow of loneliness, the sorrow of isolation, the pain of being something or other, not beautiful and so on, all the trivialities and all the grave issues of life. We all suffer, moderately, superficially or deeply. And without becoming cynical, without verbally, reasonably, rationally explaining it away, is it possible when one is in deep sorrow, the sorrow that comes about when one has lost somebody, the sorrow of the whole misery of life, can one look at it in the sense remain with it without any movement of thought?

You must have unfortunately had some kind of sorrow. Without analysing, without escaping from it, without rationalizing it, without putting it into a test tube, or reducing it to some chemical response, can you look at it, observe it, remain with it completely - whether it is physical pain, or psychological grief, to remain with it totally without any movement of shadow of escape, which means actually giving all your energy and attention to it. Because at the moment of sorrow you are that sorrow. It is not that you are sorrowful, your whole being is sorrow. I do not know if you understand this. There is no fear apart from you. You are part of fear. You are part of all the factors of fear. So you are all the factors that go to bring about this sorrow which mankind has carried throughout the ages. There is not only the personal sorrow, but also this sorrow of mankind. There is not the momentary sorrow of a person, but the global sorrow. The sorrow of ignorance, sorrow of poverty, the sorrows that war has brought about, the tears, the anxieties, the brutality of all that. Look at all that. To be completely, totally in contact with it, then since you give, in that contact there is this total energy. We dissipate our energy - in argument, in endless talk, in being occupied all the time with something or other. The brain is never free from occupation. Observe the scientists, the businessmen, the housewife, the religious people, the priests, they are all occupied with something or other. That occupation, however pleasant, however disagreeable, does dissipate the energy that is demanded to meet all these factors of life. Life is also occupation, but when one is occupied endlessly so that the brain is never free, never quiet, and it is only such a mind, a brain that faces the fact silently, faces fear, sorrow, loneliness, despair silently. Then you will see for yourself such action - such silence dissipates it.

I do not know if we have time this morning to talk about death. That's one of the major factors of life. One of the great factors. And humanity, all of us, seem to be incapable of understanding it. Not chemically, not why the human body perishes by its disuse, smoke, drugs, endless forms of indulgence, but the significance of death. Not the physical organism coming to an end, which it will inevitably, like anything that is used wears away, the body when we have so misused it, and the body has its own intelligence which we have destroyed. But we are asking, the nature of death, the significance, the meaning, the depth of it, not the fear of it, not the fear of old age, senility, some disease, accident. But the meaning of it, the depth of it, there may be great beauty in it.

And, as we said, it may not be possible - I don't think it is possible this morning to talk about it, one will tomorrow morning. Tomorrow morning we are going to discuss that and also what is a religious mind; what is reverence, respect, if there is anything sacred which thought has not invented. That which we worship now is the product of thought, and thought is a material process, so there is nothing whatsoever sacred about thought. Thought, which has created the churches and the content of those churches, temples, mosques, there there is nothing sacred because all that has been put together, the rituals, all that goes on is the result of thought. So we must together examine what is really religion, because religion creates a new culture. One must go into all that tomorrow morning. And also what is meditation. If you don't mind we will stop.

One would like to point out, if one may, that this is not a gathering for any kind of excitement, for any kind of romantic inspiration, or sentimental business. It is a rather serious gathering - at least the speaker is. As there are so many people who may be newcomers, please be assured that we are not in any way doing propaganda, trying to convince you of anything, or bringing some fantastic, nonsensical, Indian, or eastern philosophy or exotic gods and gurus. We are together, having explored for the last five gatherings here, we have together been concerned with the degeneration of the world, the wars, the threat of nuclear bomb and so on and so on. We have been talking about all that considerably.

And also we have said, the crisis is not in politics, nor in the world of economics, nor in the world of so-called organized religions. The crisis is in our consciousness, in our minds, in our hearts, in our activity. This crisis we have been examining considerably at length, and yesterday morning we talked about fear. We have been talking also about order in our life, where there is so much disorder, where in our daily life there is very little restraint, there is no discipline whatsoever. We use the word discipline in the sense that the word comes from the root disciple, which means to learn, to learn in the manner of living, to learn about what is actually religion, what is meditation and so on. Discipline means learning, not merely accommodating oneself to a certain pattern of behaviour, suppressing one's own desires and so on.

We have been talking about all this in detail. And we have said that thought has created this world in which we live, with all its disaster, with the wars, with the division of nations, with the proliferation of nuclear bombs and so on and so on.

Yesterday we talked about the beginning of fear. We pointed out and we together - and the speaker means together, not that the speaker is saying something exotic, out of the way, or an isolated point of view - together we examined our own fears, the factors of fear, how fear arises, the many aspects of fear. The aspects can be examined very closely but they are all contained in this fact which is fear. We talked considerably about that yesterday morning.

And also we talked about together, investigated together, considered these things together, one must repeat this constantly because most of us are used to being told what to do. We are accustomed, specially in this country where there is specialization in every field, those specialists have written books and we read all those books and we are never able to think clearly for ourselves. We have become slaves to others. We went into this at the beginning of these talks.

And again one must repeat very clearly, and I hope you will not mind the repetition, but it must be underlined very clearly that we are observing the world as it is, and the world that is so complex in the psychological state of our being. Together we are examining all that.

And this morning, as this is the last talk, this morning we are going further into the examination of our consciousness and its content. The content makes the consciousness, without the content consciousness as we know it does not exist. So we examined very closely one aspect after another of this content of our consciousness.

We talked yesterday morning together, asking each one of us to observe our own fears, and not to escape from it, not to suppress it, not to hide it away and lock it up. We were saying that we must be able to look at it, face it so that we meet it directly. Because man throughout the ages has carried this burden for millions and millions of years, and we are the result of all that, past fears and the present fears. And if we do not understand the nature of fear deeply and be free of it, fear cannot live with love. We talked about that yesterday.

We also talked about pleasure rather briefly. In this world, specially in the western world, more in America, in this country - please bear in mind we are not criticizing the country or you but we are observing the fact, not my point of view, the speaker's point of view, nor a particular point of view - but when you observe what is taking place in this country, excitement of every form, sexual, and other forms of excitement, the principle of pleasure pursuit, the pursuit of the expression of one's own desire, and the expression of that desire takes the form of pleasure. We talked about it. We went and investigated the nature of desire. Desire is the awakening of the senses. And we are again briefly repeating it. The senses in action, contact, then sensation. And then thought with its image enters into that sensation, and from then begins desire. We talked about it, we explained it very, very carefully, in detail, that fact. Seeing, which is sensation, contact, touching, from that touching sensation, and thought then creates the image, and when thought creates that image then desire begins. And we also pointed out the activities of desire and the contradiction that lies in itself in desire and so on, from which arises our conflict.

Pleasure has been the pursuit of man throughout the ages in different forms, mostly sexual and psychological which expresses itself in action in the physical world. One can observe this closely if you are willing to examine it yourself. And pleasure, whether it is physical pleasure, or the pleasure of power, pleasure of possession, the pleasure of depending on another, must inevitably carry in its track fear. If you observe this you can see it for yourself.

And we began yesterday talking about suffering of man. Man, of course woman included - when the speaker says, 'Man', please, ladies don't get excited about it, woman is included in it - man throughout the ages, from time immemorial has suffered both physically and specially psychologically, inwardly. Suffering has been the lot of man. The Asiatic world, including India, says that it is the result of past actions, so-called karma. And that explanation seems to satisfy most people. And most people in the world seem to be satisfied with explanations. But explanations, the word is not the actuality. Suffering, the word, is not the actual tremor, the actual shedding of tears, the feeling of great emptiness, loneliness. And suffering, specially in the Christian world, has been relegated to some symbol, and we think by giving our suffering over to somebody our suffering will end, in different forms. But man all over the world suffers. Suffering is anxiety, grief, uncertainty, the sense of deep abiding and apparently unchangeable loneliness. You can observe for yourself, we are together observing. You are not merely listening to the speaker but observing yourself as the speaker is depicting what is actually going on in ourselves. And can man ever end suffering? Is there an end to sorrow?

One must ask fundamental questions, not superficial demands and cheap answers. One must ask always one's own fundamental, radical questions. And it is a radical question, whether man, you, can ever end sorrow?

How can there be love - we will go into that word which has been so spoilt - how can there be love when there is fear? How can there be that thing when it has become merely a matter of excitement and pleasure? Is love desire? Is love a matter of excitement? Can love exist when there is ambition, aggressiveness? Can there be love when a human being has been hurt from childhood, can there be love when there is sorrow? Or that perfume, that thing, which we have called love, can only be when all this ends. And is it possible - not intellectually, not merely be satisfied with explanations, or reduce sorrow, fear and other things to a scientific matter of chemicals, chemistry, and be satisfied with all that. How can we kill another, either in war, or in violence, if there is love?

Apparently we human beings are caught in a terrible tragedy of habit, tradition, of an activity of a brain that has become atrophic because we are functioning mechanically - we hold on to beliefs, to faith, to constant repetition of endless meaningless rituals in all the churches of the western world, and the rituals in the eastern world. All these rituals are put together by thought. Thought is a material process, as we have explained over and over again. Some scientists are beginning to accept it. And because scientists have such a dominant influence in one's life perhaps then you will also accept it. But if you examine thought, and the origin of thought, what is thinking, you will find that it is born out of memory, knowledge, experience, and from that experience thought, thought in action, and so on. This is the chain in which the brain works at present. Experience, knowledge, memory stored in the brain, from that memory action, skilful or not skilful, and from that action you learn more knowledge. So you keep this chain going, which is gradually making the brain atrophied. When you repeat over and over and over the same thing, as they do in rituals, in having strong beliefs, convictions, conclusions, the brain must inevitably become not only atrophied but lack nourishment. And one of the factors of this atrophy is that man puts up with every kind of illusion - religious illusions, psychological non-facts, and so on.

Now we are asking if sorrow can ever end. Not only personal sorrow, but also the sorrow of all mankind. Sorrow is sorrow, it is not yours or mine. The sorrow that has been created through these five thousand years of war. The sorrow that human beings are preparing for wars. The sorrow of endless division between people, as the Catholics, the Protestants, the Hindus, the Buddhists, the Muslims, the Arab and the Jew, the American and the Russian, the Hindu and the Muslim, and so on. This constant division is bringing about great conflict in the world. And we don't seem to realize this. We don't seem to realize the appalling danger we are facing. We want to escape from it all into some form of excitement, knowledge, explanation. But to be sensitively aware of all this, the society that man has created, so we are part of all that, and therefore we are utterly responsible, totally, completely responsible for everything that is happening in the world.

You may not accept all this, but as we said, one must critically, sceptically, with considerable doubt examine all this, we must exercise our brains to its highest capacity. And if that capacity is made incapable by our personal sorrow, by our personal fears, we reduce fear of all mankind, which all human beings bear, all human beings throughout the world suffer, uncertain, anxious, in conflict, confused, seeking constantly security. This is the common ground of all mankind, whether you live in India, in the Far East, here, Europe, or anywhere, our consciousness is the common consciousness of all mankind. And in that consciousness there is sorrow, fear, pleasure, and occasional flash of love.

And we are trying to see if suffering which distorts thinking can ever end. Please, be good enough to ask that question of yourself. Not the questioner is asking you to put that question to yourself, but it is your sorrow, the sorrow of mankind. No words, no explanation, no escape, can wipe away that sorrow. One has to face it. Either you face it obliquely, casually, with impatience, trying to go beyond it, then if you are, you are not directly confronting it. That is to remain completely, totally with that which is, without any thought interfering, distorting what actually is sorrow. Sorrow is both self pity, self torture, self abnegation. And the various activities of the self trying to fulfil its own desires, failing or succeeding. And all that is part, and more, of sorrow. Can one look at it closely, be totally in contact with it? One can only be totally, completely in contact with it if there is no division between you and the thing you call sorrow. You are not separate from sorrow. You, the observer, thinking that sorrow is different from you, and acting upon sorrow - trying to escape, suppress, analyse, run, go beyond it, or end it, all that points to the division that exists between you and sorrow. That's the tradition in which we have lived. But the fact is you are sorrow. Not you separate from sorrow. When you are angry, anger is not different from you. When you are violent, that violence is not different from you. When you have created the religious figures, symbols, those creations are part of you. They are not separate from you. Though you may worship them as something separate from you, man has created them, those symbols, images, made by the hand or by the mind.

And as this division brings only conflict, to observe it, to observe that this division exists first of all, that's the tradition, in that tradition we have been educated that the 'me' is separate from sorrow, pain, anxiety, fear and so on, or even pleasure. We have been conditioned to that from childhood. And to break that conditioning and so end conflict, is to observe, be in contact with that sorrow, with that fear, with those desires, without any sense of an observer looking from without within. Like in all relationships with human beings thought has created the division. If you observe in your own relationship with another, however intimate it may be, you will find that you are separate from the other. Obviously. This division inevitably in relationship, or nationally, internationally, must inevitably, that is the law, must bring about conflict. And as we pointed out, in all our relationships this conflict exists, wherever we are.

And we are asking whether being totally in contact with sorrow, without any kind of division, without a shadow of trying to overcome it, or explain it, be totally with it, and when you are so with it you are giving your complete attention to it, and it is this attention, this total, complete attention, with all your energy, it is that energy that dispels, ends sorrow.

And also we must go into the question on a lovely morning like this, with clear sunshine and the beauty of the light on the leaves, and the shadows, and the mountains and the valleys, we must go into the question also, if you are not afraid, if you are enquiring, into what is death. That is part of existence, to be born and to die - between being born and dying, all the travail of mankind. All the terrible loneliness, disorder, the mounting knowledge about the external world, and the mounting knowledge according to the psychologists, the inner world, which is much more complex than the psychologists explain, between being born and dying, there is every kind of relationship, with all its conflict, in which there are moments of joy and pleasure and so on, between being born and dying there is the mounting danger of wars, uncertainty, the dreadful brutal destruction of nature and of human beings. So it is important that we understand, or enquire into what is the significance of death.

Death is part of life. We have broken up life into various segments, various divisions. Look at it for yourself. As fear, as sorrow, as pity, as business, as politics, as commercialism, as man, woman, sex, pain, grief, anxiety, uncertainty. We have broken up life into fragments. And we look at death as a fragment. And we never take life as a whole without any divisions, without being broken up. Life is a movement, and if we divide life, as we do, then death becomes a terrible thing, a meaningless ending. Please observe this for yourself. One's own life is broken up that way. Me and you, we and they, this belief against that belief, this nation against that nation, this race against that race, each one trying to succeed, fulfil, pain, anxiety and so on. We have broken up the living on this earth so separately. And so where there is separation there must be conflict. Where there is division there must be the inevitable conflict. And our life from the moment we are born until we die is endless conflict. Out of that conflict every form of neurosis arises. Then all the problems of that, which the psychologists meet. So we continue this way from the moment we are born until we die. And this we call life, this we call living. And to this we cling, this existence that has become of very little meaning, this life has very, very little significance as we live it. What significance has conflict? Progress? Progress towards what? More conflict? Towards a better society? That society is a symbol, it is not actuality - the better society that is created by our relationship with each other. If our relationship is not right, if our relationship with each other is without conflict then we shall have a society, a government in which there will be no conflict, it will be us. If we behave properly why need we have governments? And because we are so corrupt we have governments which are becoming more and more corrupt.

So this is our life from the moment we are born until we die. And to this we cling desperately, because we think with death all this, and perhaps we are entering into something unknown. This we know, we are familiar with this - with the conflict, with the fulfilment of desire, pleasure, we all know this. But we don't know what happens after death. So the Asiatic world, specially India, from the ancient of times, said you will be reborn next life, there is birth after life. Not the birth in a test tube, not the birth of new experiments in genetics, but life which we live with all its complex travail, if you live rightly now, next life you will have a better chance - instead of being born in a hut you will live in a palace, a better life, both physically and psychologically, you will always be becoming better and better, nobler, until ultimately you reach that highest principle which in India they call Brahman. So reincarnation is the pet theory of all those people - perhaps the whole of the eastern world. And here, in the Christian world, you have your own form of resurrection - you will ultimately sit next to god. But those who believe in reincarnation behave in their usual way - brutal, violent, they actually don't believe in their belief. If they did they would behave righteously, correctly, without any sense of violence, and so on. Here too, in the west we talk about all these things.

So we are asking: what is the significance of death? We must answer that question, not avoid it. We must look at it very closely, whether that death occurs with old age, diseased body, the organism being used in the wrong way, and so on. What is the meaning of death? It is very important to ask this question because this is part of our life. It is not something at the end of life.

Obviously the organism comes to an end through disease, old age, and so on, accident. And we, living as we are, in conflict and misery, confusion, uncertainty, having faith in some fantastic projection of thought, cannot face that fact, what is death, what is the meaning, what is the beauty, what is the significance of it. As we pointed out earlier in these talks, our consciousness is made up of its content. The content is our life, the beliefs, the dogmas, the rituals, the fears, the sorrows, the anxieties, the wounds, the division of nationalities, the Christian, the Buddhist and the Hindu, the Islamic world, our consciousness actually is the consciousness of all mankind. So your consciousness is the consciousness of all human beings. You are the entire world. The world is you. You may have different skin, you may belong to different religion, call yourself by a nationalistic name, but actually, psychologically we are talking about, you are like the rest of mankind, driven, uncertain, tremendously anxious, imitating, conforming and so on and so on.

So when there is death the organism dies. And that consciousness of mankind goes on. It is only those who free themselves from those contents of consciousness, they liberate themselves from that, they liberate themselves from the significance of death.

So we must go and enquire very closely what is the meaning of death. Have you ever ended anything without explanation, without resistance, without seeking a reward or punishment, end something? Have you? Have you ever ended completely attachment? That's what it means to die, to end. You can't when death comes, all that is cut off, your attachment to a person. So the significance of death in its most profound sense is the ending. So a wise man doesn't wait for death to end, but ends, brings to an end fear, sorrow, attachment, loneliness. And when there is an ending so completely there is totally a different dimension.

That is only part of the significance of death. Death has an extraordinary sense of beauty. You will be surprised to hear it. Because with death, the ending of something, also is the beginning of something else, which is love. Yes, I'll show it to you. It is good to be sceptical, it is good to doubt, it is good not to accept anything anybody says, including the speaker, specially the speaker. Doubt your gurus and they will disappear! Doubt your own beliefs, your own longings, your own desires, your own ambitions, your own sectarian spirit. And also you should doubt, question, be sceptical so that you find for yourself what is truth - not depend on anybody - the priests, the rituals, the authority, specially in the world of the spirit, in the world of so-called spirituality. One must be a light to oneself. And you cannot be a light to yourself if you are always depending on somebody else. And this dependence to end it, not in some years, but now. Which is, ending is death. And when you end something, in that ending there is great beauty, not in that which is continuous.

So the whole idea of personal immortality becomes nonsensical when we realize that our consciousness is the consciousness of the rest of mankind.

And also we should go into the question if we have time - time has been given to us this morning - we must also go into the question of what is religion, because as the world is degenerating, if there is no world religion - not Hinduism, Buddhism, Christianity, Islam - world religion, it is only out of a religious mind, a global religious mind that a new culture can come into being. Not the technological culture which is now the culture of mankind - how to build cars, the computers, the robots, the atom bomb, the instruments of war, battleships, aeroplanes, surgery, how to increase grain, and so on and so on, all depending on technology. And again that technology is based on thought, and thought is incomplete because knowledge can never under any circumstances be complete.

So one has find out for oneself what is the meaning of religion. The meaning of that word from Greek, Latin and so on - the speaker is not a scholar, god forbid, the speaker, if one may be a little bit personal, does not read all these books, but he looks in a dictionary for the root meaning of words - the word religion comes from 'religare', to bind. Even the etymologists are doubting the origin of that word. But one can see very clearly that the religions that we have in the world at present, whether in the Far East, in India, the Arabic world and the world of Israel, and the world of Christianity, this religion is based upon thought, a longing, the father figure and so on and so on, which are all cliches. But one can see the actual fact - they are based on fear, deep uncertainty, the hope that some day somebody will clear up all this confusion. And as each person is confused he clings to some image, symbol which he hopes will help him to go beyond his own little self. Our religions are now as they are, utterly meaningless. Don't please get angry. Just look at it. We are not trying to advocate a new religion, a new cult, a new set of rituals, which are all nonsense. We are looking into a much deeper issue. And all the things that are in the churches, the cathedrals, in the temples in India, and the Asiatic world, their rituals, their images, are all put together by thought. And thought is never sacred, but thought has made those things that are in the churches, temples and so on, sacred. So thought is worshipping itself. Right? Thought is worshipping that which it has created, or the symbols it has created, or the actual person of whom he doesn't know, makes an image, and worships that image. This is called religion.

And there are all those innumerable gurus, which are now multiplying all over the world like so many mushrooms, they bring something new, at least they think they are. But this old tradition in which is their own ambition, power, money, all that is involved. They are getting richer and richer in this country. You know all this. All this is called religion.

In the Asiatic world, specially in India, both the Buddhists and the Hindus have said, that is one of the tenets, or one of the roots - doubt, question, be sceptical.

Q: Krishnamurti, may I ask you something?

K: Just a minute, no sir.

Q: May we not die to mankind also?

K: Sir, please. Forgive me, if you want to question you should have come on Thursday or Tuesday of last week or the week before, sent in a question, and those questions, as there were so many of them, we have tried to answer some of them. But this, if you will forgive, this is not a question and answer meeting.

So we are enquiring: what is religion? Please enquire together. Is there anything sacred, anything that is timeless, anything that is not bound by thought, something actual, not invented, not put together out of human suffering, out of human fear, out of human confusion, is there something that is beyond all time, beyond all corruption? How will you find this out? Which doesn't belong to any person, to any group, to any community, which is global - how do you enquire and discover that? Obviously, if you are serious, you cannot belong to anything, neither Christian, Hindu, Buddhist, or be a Muslim. One must be free of all that, totally, completely. Freedom not to do what you like, that is too silly, too immature.

Freedom from bondage. That's absolutely necessary. So the brain is always seeking out security, therefore inventing all kinds of images, illusions, in which it hopes to find security.

So if one is really wanting to enquire deeply if there is anything sacred, holy, one must put aside all those things which are not - the religious books, because if you, as is now being done, if you rely on a book, so-called holy books then you become narrow, bigoted, that is what is happening in the world. And also if you want to find out if there is anything sacred there must be absolutely no fear.

Life as it is now, broken up, that life when it is not broken up, when life is treated as a whole, without any division as sorrow, as pain, as anxiety, as fear, pleasure, when there is no breaking up of life into these compartments, which means to live totally a harmonious life without a single shadow of conflict. If that doesn't exist how can you go beyond it?

So that's why the speaker has put religion, meditation, and if perhaps there is something sacred, at the end of the talks because we must first put the house in order - your house. The house is you. If that is not in total complete order, living a harmonious life, how can you know possibly what love is and what compassion is? With that compassion comes love, intelligence. And that intelligence is the complete total security. That must be before you begin to meditate, because it is only through deep meditation that you find out for yourself whether there is something beyond all time, measure, nameless, timeless.

And meditation is not how to meditate - the Zen system, the recent gurus with their systems of meditation, the transcendental nonsense. It is merely coining money, mantra. You know that word, unfortunately. The actual meaning of that word, it has got great beauty and significance in that word which has been traded for money as a means of meditation, which is nonsense. The word mantra means, the root meaning of it, is to ponder, meditate upon not becoming. And it also means in Sanskrit, end all self-centred activity. That's the real meaning of that word - ponder over, meditate, on not becoming, in this world or in the psychological world, and end all self-centred activity. You understand the meaning of that word, the significance of it? And for that word, mantra, you pay dollars, and you think you are learning meditation. And the people who invented the transcendental nonsense coin money, they have become immensely rich. So that is not meditation.

Any form of systems of meditation, if you practise these systems you become more and more mechanical, more and more dull. Obviously. If you repeat over and over and over again, your brain becomes atrophied. So we have to reject totally all that. It is logical, rational, sane, what we are talking about, nothing abnormal, something exotic brought from strange countries, romantic and all that nonsense. Meditation demands tremendous understanding of yourself, completely, so that you don't create, fall into any illusion. And where there is no understanding of desire and its activity, illusions are inevitable. So one must be very, very clear about all this. You must keep the house, your house in total order, without a shadow of conflict, then only you can talk about meditation, not how to meditate, but what is meditation.

I hope you are not tired, may we go on? To understand what is meditation, which unfortunately from the eastern world is brought to this country, though you have your own form of contemplation in the Christian world, the word meditation according to the dictionary is to ponder over, think over, observe and so on. But that is merely an explanation, that's a verbal definition. But that is not meditation. The word is not the thing. So meditation begins with being totally aware, sensitively, without any choice of what is happening in the world and with yourself. That is only part of it. When we have looked at all the complexity of our life, how it is broken up, all that observation is part of meditation, so that you have established in your life harmony, in which there is no conflict. Then meditation is to bring about, - not you bring it about - because you have laid the foundation of order, ended sorrow, pain, suffering, psychologically, then the brain, the mind becomes quiet, naturally. You cannot silence the mind. Who is the entity that silences the mind? It is still thought then. So by bringing about a life of harmony, in our daily life, in everyday life, naturally, easily, without any effort, there is the quality of silence in the mind, complete silence. That is absolutely necessary. If that silence doesn't exist then thought can invent what it likes, every form of illusion, delusion, images.

So the silencing of thought means the ending of time, which we went into. And then out of that silence, not your silence or my silence, silence, in which there must be silence - it is difficult to go into all this unless you have done it yourself. You know, sirs, without beauty, not the beauty of a face, although there is a beauty in a face, the beauty of a poem, the beauty in literature, the beauty on a canvas is different from the beauty of the hills, of the rivers, a sheet of water sparkling in the sun, and the flight of a bird, and the light on a leaf which is quivering with the breeze. That beauty exists only when you are not there. You understand? When you as the selfish entity are not there, the other is. So meditation is the silencing of all that, a natural ending of all that. Out of that ending comes great depth of silence. The brain has its own activity, but silence in spite of that activity of the brain overcomes, or is part of that natural movement of the brain - which means the brain also becomes extraordinarily quiet, if you have gone into all this.

It is only then you will find that which is sacred - not you will find it - it is only then there is that which is eternally sacred. And when that is, then in you is born reverence. People have lost, or have never had reverence. They have reverence to an image, to a symbol, to things that thought has created, but that is not actual reverence. It is born out of fear, out of conflict, out of loneliness and so on. But the actual reverence, not for persons, power, position, and all that, but the actual reverence comes when that which is immeasurably sacred. I have finished.

RAJGHAT, BENARES 1ST TALK WITH STUDENTS 17TH NOVEMBER 1981

K: Is it my turn to sing also? What would you like me to talk about? Tell me.

Q: The process of learning.

K: All right. You want to talk about learning?

A: Yes.

K: Yes? Does it mean yes, or no?

A: Yes.

K: Have you learnt how many birds there are in this campus? Have you learnt about that? Have you watched all those birds? As it gets colder they come down from the Himalayas, and beyond the Himalayas from Russia, quantities of birds come here. Have you learnt, watched them? Some of you have watched them? Do you know the names of the birds? See how many species of birds there are in this campus? Do you hurt them?

A: No.

K: You don't kill them?

A: No.

K: Thank goodness! Have you learnt the various kinds of trees, and plants and flowers that grow in this compound? Have you? No. Have you seen the poor people around here?

A: Yes.

K: What have you learnt from them? By watching them, carrying that heavy burden, and the people on a bicycle carrying heavy loads of milk and other things - have you watched them? Yes?

A: Yes.

K: What have you learnt from it? Tell me, go on. What have you learnt? You asked, let's talk about learning. Right? Have you learnt by watching those poor people day after day going into town with heavy loads and coming back with very little money, have you watched all that? And what do you feel about it? What's your reaction to it? Tell me, please.

Q: Everybody behaves roughly with them.

K: You behave roughly with them? You are rude to them? You don't care for them? One day, many years ago, a woman was carrying a heavy burden, very heavy. She put it on that pillar there to rest. As I was passing by I helped to lift the thing on to her head. It really weighed an enormous amount, it was difficult to lift it. Have you helped anybody like that?

A: Yes.

K: Good! So you are learning by watching the birds, what kind of species there are, and how many kinds there are. You have watched the trees, the plants, the flowers, the grass, the creepers, have you learnt from them? Not to hurt them, not to tear off their leaves - have you done it? So will you learn about it? And also you have watched all those poor people going by every day, taking a very long walk to Benares, four or five miles, with heavy burdens, coming back after they have sold their few things with a few coins, and going back to the village. Have you watched that? Have you learnt from it? That if you have a little, to share that little with them. You understand what I am saying? That is, if you have ten coins, to give them one coin, not keep it all to yourself.

I think about five years ago I was walking along there, one of the villagers - he didn't know me, I didn't know him - gathered a few leaves and sticks and all that, set it on fire and put a pot with a little rice, an onion in it, two or three drops of oil and was cooking it. I watched him. I watched what he did, gathering leaves, gathering sticks, putting fire to them, and putting the pot with a little rice in it, oil, a large onion, and he cooked it. When it was properly cooked he looked at me and he said, 'Will you share this with me. Take a little'. I couldn't because he said, 'This is my whole meal for the day.' You understand what I am saying?

A: Yes.

K: The whole meal for the day and he was willing to share that little bit of rice with me. You understand how generous that is, what an extraordinary feeling that he would like to give you something. He didn't know me. Have you got that feeling? Feeling of sharing something with another. Or do you want to keep it all to yourself?

So you learn. Please listen. You learn by watching, watching the trees, the birds, the flowers. You learn from watching the poor people, watching their burden, how they are laughing, chattering. And learn to share a little bit of what you have, give a little bit of that to somebody, as that man tried to give me a little bit of his rice, his only meal for the whole day. And you learn by listening. Have you ever listened to the birds?

A: Yes.

K: Have you really listened?

A: Yes.

K: Have you listened to music?

A: Yes, a little.

K: Have you listened to your mother? Careful, here! Have you listened to your father? Casually, with one ear, and forgetting it the next minute. Have you listened to your teacher?

A: Yes. (Laughter)

K: He wants to tell you something. He wants to tell you, perhaps kindly, perhaps rather irritated, but he wants to tell you something. And you are looking out of the window, seeing the lizard on the wall, or seeing a boat going by, or a bird on that branch; you are looking out there on the wall, out of the window, or listening to somebody next to you who wants to tell you something, and the teacher says to you, pay attention, look at your book, don't look out of the window. Right? Does this happen?

A: Yes.

K: Of course it does. That is, you want to look out of the window, which is much more fun, and the poor teacher says, look at your book, concentrate on your book. Now what happens? Suppose I am your teacher - I am not fortunately - I am your teacher, and you are looking out of that window, or looking at that lizard. And I say to you, pay attention to your book. Right? What has happened? You want to look at that lizard, or out of the window, and I, the teacher, says, look at your book because I want to tell you about it. So what has happened? Tell me.

Q: Part of you wants to look out of the window and part to look at the book.

K: So what happens? You want to look at the lizard and I want you to look at the book.

Q: There are two forces working.

K: Yes, two forces are working against each other. Right? So what will you do? Come on, answer it.

Q: Look at the book but think of the lizard outside.

K: You keep looking at the book but your mind is on the lizard. Right? So what happens? Your mind is on the lizard, but you are looking at the book. What takes place in your mind? Come on.

Q: We will not understand anything.

K: You will not understand anything. Right? And also what happens? Go on, further, examine it.

Q: I become angry with the teacher.

K: You become angry with the teacher - why?

Q: Because he is making me do something I don't want to.

K: That's it. He is making you do something which you don't want to do. You want to look at the lizard or out of the window, and I am forcing you to look at the book. Right? So you get angry with me. Or you daren't show your anger to me because I'll slap you. So you keep the anger, but your mind isn't on the book, your mind is on the lizard, or on the window, looking out at those trees. So what is happening to your mind? Aren't you in conflict?

A: Yes.

K: Right? Have you understood that? You are in conflict: I want you, as a teacher, to look at the book and you are looking out of the window. You like to look out of the window much more than looking at the book, so you are in conflict with me, and you are in conflict with yourself, aren't you? Do you understand this?

A: Yes.

K: No, if you don't understand, don't say, yes, I'll explain it more. That is, I want to look at the book, as a teacher, I want you to look at the book, but you are not looking at the book, your mind is on that. So there is conflict, there is struggle, there is annoyance, there is anger. Right? Now, wait a minute, listen to this. I am your teacher, you have to study mathematics, geography, whatever you study, what shall I do? Tell me, what shall I do? You are interested in looking out of the window at the lizard, or talking amongst yourselves, and I want you to look at the book, so what shall I do? You understand my question? Tell me.

Q: If the teacher scolds we can't learn anything, but if he says politely, look at the book, we look.

K: If the teacher scolds you, the boy says, you won't learn anything; but if the teacher gently reminds you politely, without scolding, perhaps - perhaps - you might look at the book. Right?

Now I don't want you to look at the book, I am your teacher, but I want to teach you something entirely different: not the book, not to look out of the window, but I want to teach you something else. Right? Now listen, I'll tell you. I have a book in front of me which you must look at also, but your eyes, your ears, are outside with the lizard, or listening to that bird. Right? You get this? So my concern is to make you aware, attentive. That's my concern. I wonder if you understand this. Have you understood this? I am not interested in you looking at the book, but I am interested that you should pay attention, that you should listen - listen to that bird, listen to the noise in the trees, perhaps listen to that lizard making a peculiar sound. I want you to learn how to attend, how to pay attention. That's all I am concerned with. Have you understood that? So I would say to you, look at that lizard, don't bother about the book, look at that lizard very carefully, see how many legs it has, what kind of colour it is, so that you pay attention to what you are looking at. Then there is that attention, which is that you look at that lizard, listen to those birds, look at the leaf, the sunshine on the leaf very attentively, then you can pay attention to the book without conflict. Have you understood this? Be careful, don't say, yes, be quite clear. What is more important: to look at the book, or look at the lizard? What is important in that?

Q: Paying attention and look at the lizard and the book.

K: So what is important to you? To learn to pay attention. Right? That is, to learn how to listen. If you know how to listen carefully then you will listen to the teacher. Right? I wonder if you understand this? You have understood?

A: Yes.

K: Will you do that?

A: Yes.

K: You asked me to talk about learning, learning from books, learning by watching, watching the poor people, watching the birds, watching the trees, listening to the song of birds. You begin to be alert, you begin to be sensitive. You understand? Then if the teacher says nicely - and also remember the teacher is tired, probably he has quarrelled with his wife, probably he hasn't had enough rest, so he himself is disturbed, irritated, and you are there not paying attention, so he scolds you. So it is a mutual relationship. You understand? Do you understand that? Now, just a minute. You and I have a mutual relationship. That is, I am telling you something, you are polite enough to listen to what I am saying. Right? So there is a mutual communication. But if I am angry and you are bored there is no communication. Whereas if both of us are learning how to look at a bird, how to look at a tree, how to watch those poor people, then we have a common communication, and you learn from each other. Right? Is this clear?

A: Yes.

K: Right. Now there is also learning from a book. Right? Most of you learn from a book, don't you. Now what does that mean? Tell me. Go on, tell me. You are reading history about the kings, wars, and all that nonsense, and you are learning. The teacher says - what's your king here, not Henry VIII? You are learning from a book. Now when you learn what takes place? Come on! I am a teacher of geography - oh, no, I don't like geography. All right, I am a teacher of history - which I don't like very much either but I'll take that! So I am a teacher of history. I tell you first chapter, how India, three thousand years ago had that king, that prime minister, and the wars. Right? And you read that and what do you do when you read it, and when you listen, what happens to you?

Q: We imagine.

K: You imagine. Then what else? Go on.

Q: We compare.

K: Yes, go on, explain more. Go on. Think, think, don't go to sleep, use your brains. What happens?

Q: We try to imagine ourselves in that place.

K: That girl said that. You imagine to be the king. Naturally, it's much more fun than being an ordinary human being. What is happening when you read a book, when you listen to the teacher, what takes place? You are going to have an examination, aren't you, at the end of the term. What takes place? You memorize, don't you?

A: Yes.

K: That's what takes place, doesn't it. That is, I tell you all about the Indian history, you listen, you read, and memorize. Right. Don't you?

A: Yes.

K: So your learning is to memorize. You follow that? And that's what you call learning. You have a lot of facts about Indian history, or a lot of prejudice in Indian history, and you memorize that, at the end of the term you have an examination about history. Right? Your answers depend on your good memory. Right?

So when you listen, when you read about history, of which you don't know, you memorize. Right? I wonder, shall I make it difficult for you? I think you'll understand. Memorize. From that memory you respond. I ask you as an examination paper, I ask you what happened in the 7th century. Who was the king, who was his minister, how many wars did he have. What happens? You, who have memorized, reply. Right? You reply by recalling what you have learnt from your memory. Right? Or when I ask you a question about the 15th century, who was the king, you have forgotten it. Right? But you try to remember, try to say, what happened, because you have heard it so often but you have forgotten it. So you say, I don't know. You are following all this? So you can't answer that question. Or - I want to make it a little more difficult - your memory is part of your thinking, isn't it? Right? You are clear? You think, your memory, then out of that memory you begin to think. Now, look, you know where you live in Benares. Right? It takes so much time to get there. Right? So your memory, thought tells you the direction, the house, the number of the house, the street you live in. Right? Are you following all this? You aren't asleep, are you? You can go to sleep, have a good sleep. It's all right. I don't mind.

So you learn from a book, from the teacher, store it up in your brain as memory, then when you are asked a question you reply. Or you don't remember. Right? So memory, thought, reply. You get this? This is how we operate all our life. We learn something, store it in the brain, in the brain is the memory, and that memory responds when asked. You have got it? This is what we do from childhood until we die - gather a lot of information, which is memory, which is knowledge, that knowledge is stored in the brain as memory, that memory is part of thought, and then thought says, yes, I live in such-and-such-a-place. You have got this? You are quite clear? Good.

Now this is what you do all your life. Don't you? Right? This is called learning. Accumulate a lot of knowledge, a lot of information about your king of the 6th century, and then reply. You keep this machinery going from the moment you are born until you die. This is what is called learning. Right, sir? Have you got this?

There is a different kind of learning - I won't go into that, it's too difficult for you. The more you have memory, knowledge, the more you think you are a very clever person, better job, better this, better that. Right? So knowledge has become very important to people. You understand? Do you understand? So I had better stop there because I don't want to talk about something that is very, very complicated and rather subtle. You are too young for that. I hope you don't mind my saying that you are young.

What else would you like to talk about? Do any of you write poems?

A: Yes.

K: Yes?

A: Yes.

K: I'm glad. Do any of you read English poems?

A: Yes.

K: Yes? Which do you like? Who is the poet you like most?

Q: Wordsworth.

K: Wordsworth. Which poem do you know of Wordsworth? I am not cross examining you, this is not an examination. Have you read Wordsworth's poem on Immortality?

Q: The Daffodils.

K: Oh, the thousands daffodils by the lake side. Good. Whom else do you know?

Q: Robert Louis Stevenson.

K: Have you read his Treasure Island?

A: Yes.

K: I read that book three times. Have you read Huckleberry Finn?

A: Yes.

K: Do you like it?

A: Yes.

K: So do I. Have you read Keats?

A: Yes.

Q: Browning.

K: Which poems do you like of Keats?

Q: Ode to a Nightingale.

K: Ode to a Nightingale. My heart aches, drowsy numbness - do you know it? If you have read it you must know it. All right. What else have you read? Do you read any novels?

A: Yes.

K: Which ones?

Q: Enid Blyton.

K: I don't. Have you read the old Bible? I am not a Christian, I read books, I read the Old Testament, it is beautiful language, very simple, very clear, beautiful words they used. You should read that, the Old Testament. What else?

All right, what would you like to talk about?

Q: Sorrow.

K: The old people are asking, or the young people are asking? Go ahead, sir.

Q: Let's talk about sorrow.

K: Do you feel sorrow when a bird falls to the ground?

A: Yes.

K: Do you feel sorrow when a tree is cut down?

A: Yes.

K: Do you feel sorrow when all those poor people go off day after day, day after day, up and down that road carrying burdens, buying a little oil in a small bottle - do you feel sorrow?

A: Yes.

K: Do you feel sorrow when you sit comfortably with clean clothes, and those people never have clean clothes, do you feel sorrow? Silence!

So what is sorrow? My son dies, I feel sorrow, I shed tears, I feel terrible about it. But I don't feel terrible about it, I don't shed tears, when I see those poor people going by. Right? Why?

Q: It is a sort of sympathy one feels for them.

K: All right. Is sympathy for others and sorrow different?

Q: We only feel sorrow when it happens to ourselves.

K: Quite right! We feel sorrow only when it happens to us.

Right? But if happens to you I don't care. Right? So is sorrow personal? This is too difficult. Is sorrow universal, global? You know how many wars there have been from historical times - you know what historical times are. Historical times are those time in which history has been kept. You understand? Written history. Written history has been kept about five thousand years. That is, four thousand five hundred BC the Egyptians, the ancient Egyptians had the calendar, the first calendar, and before that, that's about five thousand years, there have been wars practically every year. You understand? People killing each other, maiming each other, burning their house, doing terrible things. That has been going on for five thousand years, practically a war a year. Right? Do you feel sorrow for all those people who have been killed? No, of course you don't. But you only feel sorrow if my brother gets killed in the war. Is that it? If my wife dies. So you think there is only sorrow if it affects you. But five thousand years of war has affected humanity. Right? Millions and millions have cried. Their brothers have come home with one leg or one arm, blind. You understand? This is war. And don't you feel sorry for all those people? Sorrow for all those people who have one arm? I was taken to a hospital where very, very few people were allowed to come in, I knew the doctor and he took me in. I have never seen a more horrible sight in my life. People only - I won't go into it - it's terrible. They are the result of war, without leg, without arms, without eyes. You understand? So don't you feel enormously sorrowful for all those people? Or only when it affects me? Don't you feel sorrow when you go to Benares, see all dirt, the noise, don't you feel sorrowful? Or have you got used to it?

Q: We don't have a direct contact with what happened five thousand years ago.

K: Do you see war films?

A: Yes.

K: Then you are directly in contact.

Q: It doesn't touch our heart.

K: So you really don't care. You really don't care what happens to others. Right? Be honest. You really don't care what happens to those poor people.

Q: We do care but we don't know what to do about it.

K: You do care but you say you don't know what to do. Right? Is that it? What do you want to do?

Q: I want to help them in some way.

K: You want to help them in some way. How? Sitting here and talking about helping them?

Q: We aren't the culprits.

K: Aren't you culprits? You support war when you buy a stamp, when you pay tax. When your father pays tax and still has enough money to send you here - we are all involved in war. It's not just the politicians who are doing it, they are horrible people, they are, but we are all involved in it.

What time is it? How long have I talked?

Q: Fifty minutes.

K: I have talked fifty minutes. Is that enough?

Will you do something? Do you know what meditation is? That is, to sit quietly for two or three minutes. Shall we do it? Would you like to do it?

A: Yes.

K: Then sit quietly. Comfortably, don't sit like that, sit comfortably. And shut your eyes - just listen to what I have to say first - sit quietly, shut your eyes, when you shut your eyes don't let your eyes move. You understand? They move because they are looking at something else. So sit quietly, don't move your eyes and find out what you are thinking, what you are thinking about. That's all.

All right, sirs. We meet again the day after tomorrow.

RAJGHAT 2ND TALK WITH STUDENTS 19TH NOVEMBER 1981

K: What shall we talk about?

S: Could we discuss sensitivity and what it means to be sensitive?

K: Are you happy here?

Students: Yes.

K: All of you really happy?

Students: Yes, sir.

K: Good! Do your teachers beat you?

Students: No.

K: No?

Students: No.

K: No, good! Do they scold you?

Students: Yes.

K: Do they scold you?

Students: Sometimes.

K: So they beat you?

Students: No.

K: They don't physically beat you, but they scold you, which is verbally beating you. Isn't it? Yes? So do you like that?

Students: No.

K: No. So how shall we stop it?

S: By not doing wrong things.

K: By not doing what you are not supposed to do - is that it?

First of all, I would like, if I may, to congratulate you about your play last night, which was beautifully done. That arena - you know what arena is? - in the Roman times, in ancient Roman times they had lions released and they killed people there, or they fought. Where there is a space and all the people sitting round it, that space is called an arena. So you have got a beautiful arena, a beautiful setting, and I was enchanted by it, really, I was so delighted to see it. You understand what I am saying? And the setting, the scenario, the dress, the grouping of the groups in one corner and groups in another, it was beautifully done. So may I congratulate you. I hope you don't mind my congratulating you!

You see in a school of this kind we oughtn't to be unkind to each other, we oughtn't to scold. How shall we stop being scolded? How will the teachers stop scolding you? Because you don't do everything that should be done. Right? Quite naturally, you are quite young, full of play, naturally you don't pay much attention to what the teacher is saying. But the poor teacher also has a difficulty because you are not paying attention so he gets irritated, and scolds you. So how shall both of us stop it, you and the teacher stop scolding? You behave improperly, and the teacher with patience not to scold you. It is dreadful being scolded all the time. I think that is one of the reasons why we become insensitive. If I keep on scolding you, telling you how naughty you are, gradually you don't pay attention to me at all, you turn a deaf ear. You understand what I am saying? So can we stop scolding in this place? Let all of us behave properly. Of course we are very young, and therefore we are rather mischievous, naughty, playful, not too attentive, so the teacher, the poor teacher has to say something harsh to you, and so you don't like it, it hurts you and that is one reason why we get insensitive. Do you realize from when you are very young, like this, we get very easily hurt, don't we? Agreed? Do you get hurt? Not physically, not bodily, but inside. Don't you get hurt?

Now if I scold you, or are rough with you, and say something harsh you get hurt. That is the beginning of being insensitive. Do you get that? Do you understand that? The moment you get hurt you are building a wall not to get hurt more. So that is the beginning of becoming gradually insensitive. Right?

And also if you have fear you are also becoming insensitive. Aren't you all afraid of something? Yes? What are you afraid of? Tell me.

S: Darkness.

K: You are afraid of darkness - why? Talk to me, let's talk about it. Why?

S: Because you don't know what you might come up against in the darkness.

K: Are you afraid of the dark outside your room, or inside your room?

Students: Outside.

K: So you are afraid of the dark outside. You don't know what you are coming up against - there are the bushes, the trees, somebody might be there, so you get nervous. Right? Nervous, getting a shock, that's not fear. Would you call that fear? I go out in the dark, I don't know where the steps are, so I am a little cautious. Right? Go slowly, step by step and find out. But that is not fear, is it? You are protecting yourself against falling. Right? That's not fear. Discuss with me, talk to me about it. Would you call that fear? If you are afraid of darkness in the room - are you?

S: No.

K: Oh, then you are perfectly all right. What are you afraid of?
Your parents?

Students: Sometimes.

K: Yes? What does that mean? Sometimes. Why? Tell me please. Apparently you are afraid of your parents - I am quite sure of it. Whether they beat you, scold you, tell you, don't do this, do that - right? Be like this, don't do that - keep on at you. Right? So the parents make you insensitive. Right? Do you see that? Do you see that? By telling you all the time, don't do this, do that, your hair is not right, you don't put on your dress properly, so you gradually shrink, don't you? Is that right? So there again you become insensitive.

So we are finding out what makes you insensitive. First you get hurt, then at home you are scolded, or even perhaps the mother or the father slaps you, which is dreadful, and at school you are also scolded. Right? So gradually you build a wall round yourself, don't you? Do you know what building a wall around yourself means? Not physically, but inwardly you shrink, and so you become insensitive. Right? That's one part of it.

And what is sensitivity? What is it to be sensitive? I'll tell you. I'll tell you all these things, will you do all of what I say, I am not going to scold you? Will you do what I say? Discuss with me, if I am wrong, tell me I am wrong. If I am right, tell me. But if you sit silently I don't know if you think I am telling something nonsensical, or something real. Right?

Do you hear that train?

Students: Yes.

K: That is, what, tell me, go on, tell me. When you hear that train crossing that bridge and whistling, are you aware of it? Or you have got so used to it?

Students: We have got used to it.

K: So if you get used to anything you become insensitive. You are used to puja at home. Right? Some of you at least, some parents indulge in this nonsense called puja. Right? Repeat, repeat, repeat, day after day. They don't know what it means, it is generally in Sanskrit or something or other, you repeat. So anything that is repetitive makes you insensitive. Have you understood this? Right? So find out if you do anything over and over again without thinking. You get what I am saying? Do you do anything without thinking about it?

Now wait a minute: how do you clean your teeth?

S: With a brush.

K: You clean your teeth with a brush, putting toothpaste on it and brushing and thinking about something else. Right? Right?

Students: Yes.

K: Listen. You brush your teeth looking out of the window, thinking about something else, you are not paying attention to what you are doing. Right? What you are doing becomes a habit, without thinking. I wonder if you understand what I am saying.

Students: Yes.

K: So anything that you repeat without thinking makes you insensitive. Got it?

Students: Yes.

K: You comb your hair, thinking about something else, and you are not aware, watchful of what you are doing. Right? Will you pay attention to what you are doing? That is, when you comb your hair watch it, that you are combing your hair, watch how you comb your hair. I do this every morning. I am very, very watchful of what I am doing so that I don't fall into a habit. You understand? The moment I fall into a habit, routine, doing the thing over and over again, I become careless, indifferent, insensitive. Got it?

Now do you see the flowers outside?

Students: Yes.

K: Do you?

Students: Yes.

K: No, don't say, 'yes', have you seen them, actually looked at them, or you look at them as you pass by? What do you do? Do you actually look at them?

Students: Yes

K: Do you watch their colour, the shape of the flower, the smell of the flower?

Students: Yes.

K: Right. Or - this is rather difficult, will you follow me a little bit? - or you have smelt the flower so often that you smell it remembering that you have smelt it before? I wonder if you understand this?

Students: Yes.

K: If I am your teacher - thank god I am not! - if I am your teacher I see you every day. Right? Every day for a couple of hours I see you, I recognise you, I know how you are going to behave more or less because I have watched you; whether you study properly, whether you are looking out of the window, whether you are pulling somebody's hair, I watch you. And as a teacher I almost know you. You understand? I know what you are going to say, I know what your reactions are, so I don't pay much attention. I know you. You understand? I have become insensitive to you. You understand what I am saying?

S: Yes.

K: So as a teacher, can I look at you afresh? This is very difficult. You understand what I am saying? Can you look at me, if I am your teacher - let's put it round the other way - I come to your class, I don't know how I am dressed, whether I am clean, neat, fresh clothes, tidy, or I come sloppy, how do you look at me? If I am your teacher how do you regard me? S: With my past experience.

K: Yes, you look at me with your past experience. Can you look at me as your teacher as if for the first time you are seeing me?

Students: Yes.

K: I look at you as though I have seen you dozens of times, and you look at me as though you have seen me dozens of times. Right? So what happens? What is your relationship to me, and my relationship to you?

S: We take each other for granted.

K: That's it. You take each other for granted. What does that mean?

S: You know what the reactions of the other person are going to be.

K: You take me for granted, and I take you for granted - what does that phrase mean, granted? She used that phrase - we take each other for granted - what does that mean?

S: We become mechanical to each other.

K: Is that what happens? Investigate, sir, think about it. Is that what happens? When I take you for granted, and you take me for granted, what does that mean?

S: You become insensitive.

K: No, don't use the word 'insensitive'. Sorry! I take for granted my mother is going to cook. Right? I take it for granted my parents are going to send me money. I take for granted the servant is going to make the bed. So what happens when I take people for granted?

S: There's a certain carelessness.

K: That's is, a certain carelessness, indifference. Right? So when you take people for granted you become insensitive, don't you? I wonder if you understand all this? So let's find out.

What is your relationship with regard to the teacher, and what is the teacher's relationship to you? You know what relationship means, don't you? Do you? You are related to your parents - most unfortunately. You are related to your brother, to your mother - what is your relationship to the teacher and what is his relationship to you? Tell me. There are all the teachers there! What's your relationship to them?

S: We are concerned with each other.

K: You contaminate each other?

S: No, we are concerned.

K: I prefer contamination! Tell me please. Concerned for each other-is that what you are saying? Is that an actuality? Are you concerned about the teacher? Of course not! And is the teacher concerned about you? Q: We are.

K: Don't tell them, I want them to tell me. Is the teacher concerned about you? Don't be shy.

S: I don't know.

K: What do you mean, you don't know? What is the teacher concerned about? That you study. Right? I am your mathematics teacher, I am concerned that you learn from the book, and from what I know about mathematics. Right? Is he concerned about anything else? Tell me, sirs.

S: No, he is not concerned about me.

K: So as he is not concerned about you, except that you pass some beastly mathematics, he doesn't say, 'How are you? Did you sleep well? Have you any troubles? Have you any problems? Is your health all right?' - you know, enquire. You understand what I am saying? That would be concern, wouldn't it? Right? Do you agree? And your concern then also is to say, 'I hope you have no problems, I hope you didn't quarrel with your wife, or you didn't beat her up' - all that is conversation between two people. You understand?

Now another thing: you have eaten in that hall, haven't you, every day, you have your meals in that big hall. Right? Yes, or no?

Students: Yes.

K: Good! Have you seen what the kitchen is like? The cook?

Students: Yes.

K: What do you think of it? Don't look at her.

S: It is better than other schools, but it needs more improvement.

K: When you ask, as I have asked some of the ministers in the government, this country is very corrupt, they say, 'Yes, but so are the other countries'. So he is avoiding the question - you understand? When I ask him, 'It is very corrupt this country', he says, 'Not so corrupt as Czechoslovakia or Indonesia'. That question is the same, isn't it? 'This is not as good as it should be but it is better than the others'. You understand? Now go this afternoon, before lunch, look at the kitchen, go inside and look at it. I have been there. It is dirty. Right? Right?

Students: Yes.

K: Filthy. The cooks are dirty, the floor is dirty, the walls are dirty, all the posts they touch, they have left their marks, dirty. So what will you do? Now just a minute. You see dirt and you don't do anything. Right? Doesn't that make you insensitive? Right? So what will you do? Absolute silence! That means you see dirt, accept it and become insensitive to dirt and carry on. Right? So what I am going to do is to paint all that place white. Right? The floor, make it clean, cement it, level it - you know, so that it is always clean. Right? Now will you help?

Students: Yes.

K: No, paint the doors white, the walls white so that the kitchen is one of the most important places, where you can have good clean food.

S: What about the cooks?

K: What about the cooks? What will you do with them?

S: Dress them in white.

K: Absolutely, dress them in white. Or take them to the Ganga and dip them!

S: What pollutes them there?

K: So if you demand cleanliness you will have it, but you don't care. You understand? If you, who are the majority here, ten to one probably, if you say, look, sirs, we must have that kitchen absolutely clean - go on strike! And you will see tomorrow that kitchen will be clean! Agree? Will you do it?

Students: Yes.

K: You asked, how to be sensitive: don't accept anything that is dirty, for god's sake. And also to be sensitive, will you look after a tree, plant it, dig manure, plant a tree and look after it? Will you?

S: Sir, it is good that we look after it, it will bear fruit.

K: Suppose if it doesn't bear fruit, will you also look after it? I have planted dozens and dozens of trees in California, dug three feet deep, three feet wide, collected soil, leaf mould and planted it. They are still surviving, they are orange trees. I have milked cows. Will you do all that - if the cows allow it!

So to become sensitive you have to watch very carefully that you don't fall into a habit. You have fallen into a habit with regard to that kitchen: you see it every day and it is dirty. Right? You have become insensitive to it. You see those poor people walking every day, carrying heavy loads, you have got used to it, so you become insensitive. So don't get used to anything. You understand? Suppose I am a bad teacher, I don't know how to teach, you put up with it, you don't go on strike. So you see. A professor from Oxford in England, a friend of mine, came to this country and went to several schools and colleges. He said to me at the end of it, he said 'My god, they don't know how to teach'. You understand? And you accept it.

Now I will show you something. Is it time for me to stop? You are not bored?

Students: No.

K: Three cheers! You know what is mathematics?

Students: Yes.

K: Tell me what it is. You all study mathematics, don't you, unfortunately, or fortunately.

S: Unfortunately!

K: Do you know what mathematics is?

S: The magic of numbers.

K: The magic of numbers. All right. Two plus two doesn't make five, it makes four. Right? What does that mean? Or three multiplied by eight equals twenty-four. What does that mean, all that: two by two, ten by three, twelve by four, what does that mean to you? Not just forty-eight, thirty-six, four and so on. What does it mean to you? You are all learning mathematics, aren't you? Think about it, think, find out, don't let me tell you, find out. You have got brains, use them. I see you are not interested. Doesn't it mean order? Two plus two is four, twelve multiplied by three is thirty-six and so on. Doesn't it show you it is extraordinarily orderly? Right? Extraordinary rhythmic, like a dance, a flow. Right? You agree? So mathematics means order. Right? Now there is not only order in the universe, that is, the sun rising, the sun setting at exactly the same time according to seasons. You follow? There is tremendous order in the universe. You have seen Orion, the stars - doesn't anybody tell you about all this? No? Good lord! It rises - I won't go into it.

So mathematics, the real deep study of mathematics, is discovering order in the universe, in numbers, and also discovering if you have order in yourself. You understand? Or you are confused, you are contradictory, disorderly. Right? Do you see the relationship between mathematics and yourself - do you? You see how difficult it is for them to think. You learn from books, don't you? Why don't you learn looking at the birds, looking at the stars, learn, watch, see? Nobody encourages you, nobody tells you about it. What shall we do? Sirs, you are all responsible for the school, what will you do? Because your minds merely looking at books, learning from books makes you secondhand. You understand, secondhand? Like going to a shop and buying secondhand things, you have all become secondhand, there is no firsthand. You don't say, 'Well sir, I looked at Orion, those stars, the Pleiades, it looks so beautiful' - you follow? So what shall we do? You see how insensitive we become to all this. I am not scolding you so don't go to sleep. I, as an occasional visitor here, and I say, for god's sake, what kind of school is this when you are merely learning from books? I will tell you. I went to school in England, I never passed one exam. You understand? Not one examination. So I was sent to various universities, I couldn't pass. Then they sent me to France, a place called the Sorbonne, where your Prime Minister has just been, and I knew French, and there too I couldn't pass. So Dr Besant - you have heard of Dr Besant - who was looking after me, she had adopted me, she said, 'That's enough. You have been to all these schools, you never pass, so enough.' But you see, I watched, I watched the trees, the ants, the flies, the birds, I watched and listened to very, very famous people, like - you have heard of Bernard Shaw? I used to meet him quite often, I listened to him, I listened to various scientists, painters, poets, and you learn, you absorb so much. But if you merely stick to books - you follow?

S: (Inaudible)

K: I am going to show you, sir. You know, I saw a report in one of the highly respected newspapers in England that - listen to this, listen to this - that when you sing to the tree it begins to move. You understand what I am saying? Do you understand what I am saying? That when you are friendly with the tree, when you sing to the tree, a particular tree it begins to sway, the whole tree. Find out which tree in this campus moves when you sing to it. Find out when you say something harsh it becomes very still. And when you talk to it very gently the leaves flutter, dance with you. Do you understand all this? Will you do it? You may sound cuckoo, singing to a tree, but a tree is one of the most beautiful things on earth. I don't know if you have sat under one, probably here during this season it is too cold to have your lessons outside. And also they have found scientifically that when you are milking a cow if there is music in the shed it gives more. I have told this to Upasaniji, he is going to do it, play music to the cows. You see, learn from outside, not just from books.

Is that enough? Do you know what meditation is? Probably you don't. All you know about meditation is to repeat. Right?

S: No.

K: No? What is meditation then? Tell me. You see meditation means to have a very quiet, still mind, not a chattering mind; to have a really quiet body, quiet mind so that your mind becomes very religious. All this nonsense that is going on in the name of religion is rubbish, but to have a very, very quiet body, to have a very quiet mind, and to keep your eyes quiet, still, so that your whole being is totally harmonious. And in that state other things, greater things, take place. That's real meditation. Not to say, I must be quiet, keep my body very quiet, force it - naturally quiet. So shall we do it for a few minutes? Right.

(Pause) Right, sirs. I hope you all have a nice holiday.

RAJGHAT, BENARES 1ST PUBLIC TALK 25TH NOVEMBER 1981

I am sorry to be sitting on a platform, but sitting on a platform doesn't give me any authority. It is just for convenience.

First of all, if I may point out, the speaker in no way is instructing you, or trying to convince you of anything: to any belief, to any ideal, to any conclusion. But we are talking over together the many human problems. Human problems are common throughout the world, they are not specially restricted to this country. The human problems are very complex and need a great deal of study, understanding and enquiry. And together, you and the speaker, are going to examine freely, objectively, without any personal bias, into what is happening in the world. Together, you are not merely listening to a series of talks, just a verbal communication, but rather together these four days we are going to look very carefully, objectively, into the society in which we live, the politics, the corruption throughout the world, and more so in this country, and into all the religious superstitions - mostly gibberish nonsense. And together let us look into it.

You are not just listening to the speaker, translating some words, some ideas, but what the speaker is saying, he is talking about you as a human being, not as an Indian, but as a human being who is going through a great deal of trouble, who is unhappy, miserable - you know all that is going on in this world, ridden with sorrow, anxiety, loneliness, a sense of utter despair when you observe all this. That is the condition of human beings right throughout the world, whether you go to America, Europe, or even Russia, or China, this is the state of man. And we are together looking at it, examining it, not from any particular point of view, or from any conclusion or ideal. We are looking at things as they are, what is going on, not 'what should happen', which is nonsense, that is just a supposition, an ideal, but examine exactly what is going on: that which is, not that which should be, because that which should be has no meaning, because 'what is' must be transformed, must be changed, must bring about a radical transformation.

That is what we are concerned with, not with ideals, not with beliefs, not with some religious conclusions but we are together going to examine the whole human problem. That is the first statement I would like to make: that together we are going to examine. And what the speaker is saying is a description, is a verbal communication, a statement of what is going on, which probably most people know but it must be stated. And how you translate what you see depends on one's conditioning, it depends on one's opinions, or historical conclusions. If one could put aside all those conclusions, opinions, evaluations, and just observe, as you would observe that tree. You can cut down that tree but just to see it as it is.

Let's find out together what we mean by intelligence. According to the dictionary meaning, it is able to collect, recollect, gather a great deal of information about any subject, or about one's own life, and after gathering as much information as possible, objectively, not merely subjectively, but from the outside move inwardly, and to be able after having gathered all this objective as well as inward information, to act skilfully on that is intelligence. That is, look at the world as it is: the wars, the gathering of the instruments of war, the atom bomb, the neutron bombs, which all the scientists throughout the world are sustaining it, multiplying it, encouraging it. All the people who are against it, 250,000 people have just met in Europe to demonstrate against this neutron bomb. And on the other hand you have all the countries encouraging neutron bombs. So they are all preparing for war because of nationalism, which is really glorified tribalism, the economic division, the political corruption, not only in this country, this is the state all over the world, perhaps it is more so in this unfortunate country. And there is tremendous religious division - the Catholic group, the Protestant group, the Hindu group, the Chinese and so on, this constant division, not only socially but family against family.

This is the state of the world. Neither the politicians, nor the scientists, nor the philosophers, nor the economic experts, have been able to solve our human condition. This is also an obvious fact. And we have always looked for leaders; a great statesman, or a great religious leader, or expert in economics who will save us all from our misery. And all the leaders throughout the world have led us where we are. And I don't see why we depend on leaders at all. Do please consider what the speaker is saying. Don't just reject it. Let us together find out what to do about all this, not theoretically, not as some idealistic conclusion according to which one will act, but taking things as they are: the national, religious, sectarian, the absurd divisions that are going on throughout the world; the conflict between each other, and in ourselves, not knowing what to do we depend on others, on the Upanishads, the Gita, or the Bible, or some preacher or some guru, so that we have become incapable of becoming totally responsible for ourselves. We depend on others. That has been one of the miseries in this country. You have had guru after guru, saint after saint, whatever the saints may be, probably neurotic, and we have had political, religious, every kind of leader, and we have blindly or reasonably, or satisfactorily followed them. And when you observe all this, we see what we have become - unfortunate, unintelligent, in conflict with each other, corruption, preparing for war for which we are all responsible, because when you buy a stamp, when you telephone, or when you pay a tax we are supporting war.

Apparently this country, which has talked a great deal about non-violence, which is nonsense, has bought millions and millions worth of armaments from abroad. And the other part of the world is also preparing the same thing. You understand all this? So having described the state of the world, and the state of the world is produced by man, by you, by the speaker, by each one of us because society is human relationship, not some abstraction, not something that you have to do something out there. But it is a human relationship that has produced this society, this society which is so mad, so corrupt.

So having described all this, and I am quite sure most of us have also looked at the world with clarity, objectively, then what is one to do? Now, not in ten year's time. What, as a human being, is our responsibility? And you can only be responsible totally when you do not depend on politicians, leaders, gurus and all that, when you feel totally responsible for your actions - which we don't. Religiously we have some kind of conclusions, karma. We say, well, past life, or blame environment, or blame the politicians and so on. We never under any circumstances take responsibility so that we act correctly.

Now what shall we do? Will each one of us undertake to be totally honest, absolutely say what you mean and stick to it, be totally integrated? Because if we cannot we are going to bring about great disaster. Can we face our responsibility? Not theoretically, not in any sense of abstract thinking, but actually will each one of us undertake to be absolutely, deeply, profoundly responsible for all our actions? That is the first thing.

When we listen to each other, as we are doing now, can we undertake for ourselves to live with such integrity that we become incorruptible? Because if we could then a group in this part of the world, or in this part of the country, another group, you understand, that is the only salvation for this country. Not your present religion which is nonsense, a mass of superstitions, nonsense. But to have a religious mind, which is totally different from belonging to some religion, to some sect, to have a religious mind. We are going to enquire together what is that religious mind. Because only religion in the right sense of that word, which we will go into presently, it is only religion, not the religion of the Hindus, or the Christians, or the Buddhists, but the real discovery or the understanding what truth is, which depends on each one of us, not on some so-called enlightened people.

So we are together going to examine what is a religious mind. As we said, only religion - we will explain what that word means presently - only religion has brought about at any historical time a new culture, totally independent of the old superstitious, ritualistic, repetitive nonsense, totally different. And we are going to enquire into that. Religion, the word religion etymologically, that is the root, the meaning of that word is not very clear. Each one has his own religion, or pretends to have his own religion, or depends on some tradition, some orthodoxy. But the word religion comes from the root to bind, to bind oneself to something greater. The greater can be invented by thought, but that is not great. I don't know if you are following all this? To have that sense of diligence, to the discovery, or to come upon that which is eternally true, that is really religion. A sense of total dedication, commitment, to uncover that which is beyond time, beyond thought, which is not an experience.

So we are going to enquire together whether human beings, you or another, will be able to come upon that truth, because all our culture is disintegrating throughout the world, degenerating. And the threat of war, the threat of the computer. I do not know if you understand what the computers are doing to our minds. I will go into it. Whether our minds, which includes the brain, whether our brains are capable as they are now to discover, or come upon something that is timeless. Are you, if I may ask most respectfully, depending on the speaker to tell you what to do? Or are we capable of thinking out together what to do, what kind of freedom, which is absolutely necessary, to find that which is beyond time.

So we have to enquire first into what is, not only religion, but what is thought, what is thinking? Because all our activities, all our imaginations, all the things written down in the Upanishads, or whatever the religious books are, are put together by thought. The architecture, all the extraordinary technology that is going on in the world, and all the temples and those things that are contained in the temples, whether it is the Hindu temple, the mosque, the church, are the result of thought. All the rituals are invented by thought. The puja, the worship, everything is based on thought. Nobody can deny that. So we have to enquire together what is thinking, what is thought, upon which we depend? All our relationship is based on thought. All our political structure is based on thought. The economic structure is also the result of thought. Our national divisions are the result of thought. You see we have always enquired about the external things but we have never asked ourselves what is thinking? What is the root and the consequences of thinking? Not what you think about, but the movement of thinking. Thinking itself, not the result of thinking, or thinking about something which is different from the enquiry into what is thinking itself. Right? Are we together in this question? Yes?

I wonder if you have ever asked yourselves: what is thinking? When you are asked a question which is very familiar the response is immediate. We say, 'What is your name?', you answer it immediately because you have repeated it so often it comes out very quickly. But when you are asked a more complex question you take time, time between the question and the answer. During that time you investigate, you think, you ask, you enquire. Either you look at a book or ask somebody, or your own memory, reviving the memory and giving the answer. So there is a time interval between the question and the answer. This is obvious. And also when we are asked some question one is never honest to say, 'I don't know.'

So that there are these three conditions of thought. That is familiar, then the time interval between the question and the answer, and to say, 'I don't know.' You don't know about god, do you? You believe in god, I don't know why but you believe in god. And you have never enquired whether we have not made god, our thinking has made god and if the god exists he must want us to lead a rotten life. Right? You see we never say, 'I don't know.' That is much more honest, it makes your mind clear. So we have to go into this question of what is thinking, what is thought, the beginning of thought, the movement. If one is at all aware, or observing, or enquiring into the nature of thought, to see the first movement of thought. We must be very clear on this point: the description is never the fact. Right? And most of us are just stuck in description, in explanations or in commentaries, but never deal with what actually is. Or translate 'what is' into 'what should be'. 'What should be' is never the fact, so the ideal is never the fact, but only 'what is'. We will go into all this presently.

So first we must enquire into what is thinking, which is the central factor of our life. All the business you do, all the worship, the images that thought has created either by the hand or by the mind, which thought then worships. You understand? I wonder if you understand? Are you all going to sleep, or are we together? You understand? Thought has created the image you have put in the temple - temple, church, mosque, or whatever it is. Thought has created it, invented it. Then thought worships that which it has created. And that, you call that sacred. So we have to enquire whether thought is sacred? Or it is a material process. You understand the difference? Either thought is a material process and therefore whatever it does, whether it creates gods, nirvana, anything it creates beyond its measure is still thought, a material process. Or thought is the only instrument that man has and whatever it does must be correct? So we are going to enquire into what is thinking.

Thinking is common to all mankind. Right? Thought is not my thought, there is only thought. Thought is neither oriental or occidental, East or West, there is only thinking. Right?

Now we will explain what thinking is, but the explanation is not the actual awareness of how thought arises in yourself. The speaker can go into it, describe it, explain it, but that explanation is not your own understanding of the origin of thinking. If that is clear that the description is not your actual discovery, but through explanation, through verbal communication, you yourself discover it. That is far more important than the speaker explaining. Right? Are we clear on this matter?

Sir, the speaker has been accused of collecting a lot of teachings. He has written a great many books, unfortunately. He has talked a great deal throughout the world for the last sixty years. So they have invented a word called 'his teachings'. (Laughter) Just a minute. The teachings are not something out there in a book. What the teaching is, or are, says, 'Look at yourself, go into yourself, enquire what there is, understand it, go beyond it.' And so on. So you are not understanding the teachings but you are understanding yourself. Only the teachings are a means of pointing, explaining, but you have to do, not the teachings but the understanding of yourself. Is that clear? So don't, please don't try to understand what the speaker is saying, but understand that what he is saying is acting as a mirror in which you are looking at yourself. When you are looking at yourself very carefully then the mirror is not important, you throw it away. Right? So that is what we are doing.

What is thinking upon which you all depend for your livelihood, in our relationship, in our search for something beyond itself? So it is very important to understand the nature of thought. First of all the speaker has discussed this matter with a great many scientists of the West, who have gone into the question of the brain. We are only using a very small part of the whole brain. You can observe this in yourself if you have gone into it, that is part of meditation, to find out for yourself whether the whole brain is operating, or only one part - and a very small part. That is one of the questions. Thought is the response of memory. Memory has been stored through knowledge. Knowledge is gathered through experience. That is, experience, knowledge, memory stored in the brain, then thought, then action; from that action you learn more, that is accumulate more experience, more knowledge and so store more memory in the brain, and then act; from that action learn more. So this whole process is based on this movement: experience, knowledge, memory, thought, action. This is our pattern of living, which is thought. Is that clear? There is no dispute about this. We gather a lot of information through experience, or through others who have experienced, stored up this knowledge in our brain, from which thought arises, and action. Man has done this for the last million years, caught in this cycle, which is the movement of thought. Right? And within this area we have choice, we can go within this area from one corner to the other and say, 'This is our choice, this is our movement of freedom', but it is always within this limited area of knowledge. Right? So we are always functioning within the field of the known. Right? And knowledge is always accompanied by ignorance because there is no complete knowledge about anything. Right? So we are always in this contradictory state: knowledge and ignorance. So thought is never - thought is incomplete, broken up, for this reason that knowledge can never be complete, so thought is never complete, it is limited, conditioned. And thought has created a thousand problems for us.

So knowledge is necessary, otherwise you wouldn't be able to go from here to your house. Knowledge is necessary when we are communicating with each other in English, or in whatever language it be. Knowledge is necessary to do so many things, to cook, to wash dishes - perhaps none of you wash dishes, probably not - to do any kind of skill, thought is necessary. But psychologically, inwardly, is thought necessary? Do you understand my question? Please one must understand this question very deeply, not what the speaker is saying. The speaker is only indicating, he is acting as a mirror for you to look at yourself, to look and find out the origin, the beginning of thought. And you will see how thought is operating all the time in our life: when we meditate it is thought, when we seek truth it is thought, or the suppression of thought. And who is the suppressor, which is still thought. And so man through millennia upon millennia has been caught in this pattern. So in this pattern there is never freedom because knowledge can never bring freedom, because knowledge is always limited. I wonder if you see all this? And you need absolute freedom to find that which is eternal. Obviously. Freedom from all attachment, which means from all knowledge. I wonder if you see it?

So knowledge has become necessary in a certain direction, and knowledge is the most dangerous thing that we have inwardly. You understand this? We are now accumulating a great deal of knowledge, about the universe, about the nature of everything, you follow, scientifically, analytically, archaeologically and so on and so on, we are collecting infinite knowledge. And that knowledge may be preventing us from acting as a total complete human being. So that is one of our problems. That is, the computer, of which I am sure you have heard, can outstrip man in thinking. It can outlearn man. It can correct itself. It can learn to play with master chess players and beat them after the fourth game, or fifth game. They are now working out, because we have talked with some people who are super experts in this computer business, in California and other places, they are now trying to find out, and they are creating it, it is coming within the next few years, the ultimate intelligent machine. You understand all this? The mother computer can create its son. The son is better than the mother. And the son's son is still better than the father. So they are now inventing, discovering ultimate intelligent machines, which is the computer, which will beat man in every way. It can write music, not like great musicians, it can invent gods, it can invent philosophy. Please don't laugh, it is taking place now, not in the future, it is happening now. So if the machine can outstrip man then what is man, what are you? You understand?

You have accumulated a great deal of knowledge. The machine, the computer can have far greater knowledge than anybody. The size of a finger nail can contain the whole of the Encyclopedia Britannica, the whole of it. You understand? So what is man? Man has lived so far by the activity of brain, keeping it active because he has struggled to survive, to accumulate knowledge skilfully to be secure, to have safety. Now the machine is taking all that over and what are you? The machine, the computer with the robot is building motor cars. The computer tells the robot what to do and the robot does it, turn on the screws or whatever it does. And when the robot makes a mistake the computer corrects it and the robot goes on. You understand all this? So what has become of man? What is the future of man? If the machine can take over all the operations that thought does now, and do it far swifter, learn much more quickly, compete - follow? - and everything that man can do, except of course look at the beautiful evening star alone in the sky and see the beauty of it, the extraordinary quietness, the steadiness, the immensity of that. Of course the computer can't feel all that, but it may. They are working at it furiously.

So what is going to happen to our mind, to our brain? It is part of thinking. Please follow all this. Our brains have lived so far by struggling to survive through knowledge. And when the machine takes all that over what is going to happen to it? There are only two possibilities: either he commits himself totally to entertainment, outwardly, football, sports, every form of demonstration, or religious entertainment, going to the temple, you know, playing with all that stuff. Or he turns inwardly, because the brain has infinite capacity, it is really infinite. That capacity is now used technologically, which the machine is going to take over. That capacity has been in the gathering of information, knowledge, scientific, political, social, religious, you know. And that brain has been occupied. Suddenly that brain's capacity is being taken over by the machine. And that capacity taken over by the machine is going to whither the brain. You understand? If I don't use my brain all the time it will whither. So if the brain is not being active, working, thinking, which the machine can do far better than the brain can, then what is going to happen to the human brain? Either the entertainment, or the enquiry into himself which is infinite. You understand? I hope you understand all this. Right?

So we have said that thought is the expression, or the reaction of memory. Memory is the result of knowledge, which is experience. In this cycle man has been caught. In this area it can invent gods, it can - you follow - anything. And the machine has taken that over. So either I enquire into myself, which is infinite movement, or plunge into entertainment. And most religions are entertainment. All the rituals, the pujas, it is just a form of entertainment. So we have to enquire what is religion? Which is, we have to enquire whether we can put our house in order - our house, not the house, the house inside us, the structure, the struggles, the pain, the anxiety, the loneliness, the respiration, the aggression, the suffering, the pain, all that is such a tremendous disorder in us. And from that confusion, disorder, we try to bring about order out there, politically, economically, socially, all that, without having order inside. So to expect order out there without order here is impossible. Right? See, please see the logic of it. We want, you want in this country, which is degenerating so fast - anarchy, total disorder is there, corruption, bribery, every form of dirty tricks that one can play from top to bottom, our house which we have created is in total disorder - and we are always asking for order out there; please, the politicians, create order. And we never say the order must come first here, in our house. And then only will you have order out there. Right?

This is logic, please, simple, sane, intelligent logic. But you see we never want order here, we want order there. And we have lived that way. All the past generation upon generation have lived that way. We are the result of all the disorders of thousands and thousands of years. And can there be order in us? And is it possible to bring - not to bring order, but to understand what is disorder? If one understands in the sense realize our disorder, see what its nature is, how it comes about and so on, in the very awareness, in the very comprehension of it, into the very insight of it, comes order. You can't create order when your mind is in disorder. So please follow this a minute, give your attention if you don't mind. We now think order is the opposite of disorder. Right? But if we understand disorder, which is the fact, not order, then the very unravelling of it, the very investigating of it, tearing it apart to find what disorder is, out of that comes order. Order is not a blueprint, it is a living thing, as disorder is. But they are totally separate. Out of disorder order is not possible. What is possible is the ending of disorder, then there is perfect order.

So we are going to enquire: what is disorder? How does it come about? Why human beings, highly educated, highly technologically capable, have conquered the earth, and space, done everything that is most extraordinary, and yet he lives in a total, complete mess in his life. So what is disorder? Come on sirs! Why your own life, if one may take that, why your life is in disorder? What is disorder? Any state of contradiction. Right? Contradiction indicates disorder. Imitation indicates disorder. Conformity is a state of disorder.

Right? That is, where there is division between - please listen - between 'what is' and 'what should be' is a conflict. Right? Where there is conflict there must be disorder. Like two sets of people calling one Hindu, the other group Muslim, the division must inevitably create disorder. Right?

So there is only disorder, not we are seeking order. You see the difference? I am in disorder - if I am. I don't understand what is order, how can I? So it is out of my perception. I am only concerned with disorder. Look, I will put it round the other way. In this country you have talked a great deal about non-violence. Right? Right? Of course. You have spread that philosophy all over the world, politically non-violence, etc., etc. Non-violence is an absurd idea, it doesn't exist. What exists actually is violence. And the ideal of non-violence is not a fact. What is fact, what is actual is violence. But we have invented non-violence as an escape from violence. You are following all this? Please play with me a little bit, would you? So when I am pursuing non-violence, when I am actually violent, there is hypocrisy, there is dishonesty, there is lack of integrity. The integrity is to face the fact, say, 'Yes, I am violent'. Not pretend to eventually become non-violent. If you are saying, 'Eventually I will become non-violent', that eventually is the extension of violence. I don't know if you know all this.

So I am only concerned with 'what is', which is violence. Then what is violence? Obviously to physically hurt somebody, physically to attack somebody, you know, anger and all the rest of it. Or violence is a state of contradiction in which I live. Why is there contradiction? Contradiction exists only when I do not accept 'what is' but always wanting to be 'what is not'. So I have invented duality. I don't know if you follow all this. I am never concerned with 'what is' but I am always concerned with 'what is not', this ridiculous duality in me. And I preach about duality, talk about duality, you know write philosophically and all the rest of it. But the fact is I am violent, that is the only reality. Now what is violence? Not only verbally, not only hurting somebody, war is a violence. It is the greatest disaster that can happen to man, the brutality of it, the terrible things that are taking place when there is a war, and the division between people - Hindus, Muslims, Christians - you follow? - the Arab and the Jew. So where there is division there is war, there must be conflict. And if I am only dealing with facts, with what is actually happening, there is no duality, I wonder if you understand all this?

Violence is in the nature of man, he is part of it, it is inherited from the animal, and so on, I won't go into all that. And can there be an end to violence in us? That is, the end to disorder in us so that we live in complete total order. Then our society will be in order. It is not the other way round. The Communists have tried, saying, create the environment rightly then man will be right. But they have not succeeded. No revolution has succeeded. When they say, change the exterior, laws, the structure of society, all that, but they have never said, 'Is it possible to bring about order in oneself?', which means don't follow anybody. You are all followers, secondhand people. Therefore you are always seeking leaders, and you have had a thousand leaders - religious and otherwise. And at the end of all this, where are you? In the same mess as you began. So can we totally disregard, absolutely, leaders and we become leaders ourselves in ourselves. We are both the teacher and the taught. You understand all this? Which means we are learning, not from somebody but we are learning not merely from books - books are nothing, the computer is the complete book - learning from observing, from listening, from seeing the beauty of the earth, seeing the beauty of the trees, the clouds, the single star of an evening, listening to the birds so that we become extraordinarily sensitive.

Now all your religions say suppress senses. Right? Suppress the reaction of the senses. We are saying quite the contrary, which means the awakening of all the senses, not one particular sense, so that there is total reaction of all the senses when you see the tree. When you look at that tree with all your senses there is no centre from which you are looking. When there is a centre, which is the ego, the me, the self, and all that, the super self, the super consciousness, it is still the self, when there is that self you cannot look at the beauty of a tree.

So to bring about naturally, without the effort, or search for the order, we must understand what is disorder, which we have gone into slightly. Which is, to understand our relationship, not only to nature, the trees, the rivers, the birds, the relationship to all the beautiful extraordinary world in which we live, but also to understand the relationship between each other, man and woman. Do you understand your relationship with your wife? With your husband? Or your relationship to some extraordinary guru who is slightly neurotic? Have you ever looked at your relationship to your children? To your wife, to your husband, to your politicians? Because if we don't understand relationship that brings about disorder, which is conflict between man and woman or between each other. So one must understand to have total order in the house - house, not the house, which is the house in which I live all the time, which is myself, if there is no order there I will never have order with the universe because the universe is living in total order. I don't know if you follow all this? The sun rises, the sun sets, the seasons, the extraordinary things that are happening in the universe, all without cause and therefore with order.

And we live in disorder because we have causes. The cause is either reward or punishment, that is the basic cause of our life. I will do things when I am rewarded or when I am punished. Right? When the train, engineer or the engine driver arrives seven hours, or ten hours late at every - you know all this - that is disorder, it is utterly totally irresponsible. And nobody says anything to him. But if you frighten him he becomes orderly. Or you reward him. Right? If the guru rewards the disciple or punishes him, it is the same thing. So we depend on others to bring about order in our life, and that very dependence is disorder. Because we are then not responsible for whatever we are doing. So if we have time - we will talk some more and finish it.

We have to go into this question of relationship. The way we live in a family, married, husband, wife, children, their education. I don't know if you realize what is happening in this country about education. It is getting worse and worse and worse. The so-called educated need education. So we must understand this extraordinary complex problem of human relationship, which is the basis of our disorder. And we try to escape from relationship of any kind by becoming monks, or escape into being a hermit, into this or that. We have never resolved this question of relationship in which there must be perfect order. So what is relationship? Come on sirs, think it out. We are talking it over together as two friends. Right? I am not preaching to you, I am not telling you what to do. That would be terrible. But together we are looking at it. Have we relationship with anybody? Or our relationship is like two parallel lines never meeting, except perhaps in bed. So our relationship however close, or however intimate, is running like two parallel lines and therefore there must be conflict, where there is division there must be conflict. And so our house is in disorder. You may escape to the Himalayas, or to a cave and become a monk or this or that, but you are always in relationship with something, you can't help it, you can't avoid it. It is there, it is part of life. And you can never escape from it. So we have to understand it, go into it, which we are trying to do now.

What is relationship? Can a married man pursue his particular ambition, his aggressiveness, his own desires, and she follow her own desires, problems. Follow? Two people running together, separate, parallel, never, never meeting. Is that relationship? Please sirs, go into it, don't sit, answer it, find out. The man goes to the office for ten hours a day, or eight hours a day, think of it! Fifty or sixty years of his life in an office, doing something which he doesn't like, or if he likes he becomes more and more proficient, more and more ambitious, climbing the ladder of success in one direction, comes home and tries to be quiet, gentle. You follow? And the wife pursues her own ambitions, her own ends. You see all this. You see it in every family on earth. And how can there be order in the house?

That is, thought in relationship - please follow this - thought in relationship can only bring about disorder, because thought creates the image about her, and she creates the image about you. Right? And these two images have relationship, which is just having a relationship in the air somewhere. Now to see that, to be aware of that, and not create the images. You understand all this? Oh, no, you don't. You have never even thought about all these things. You see sirs we have become so used to something that is dreadful. We have become used to conflict, we put up with conflict, we have explanations about conflict - quote the Gita, Upanishads, or some book or other, but we have never said, 'Can I live completely a life without conflict?' And you can find out the truth of that matter in relationship, which is never to create an image about her, or her about you. You know that requires - what does it require? You are not even thinking. Sir, if I say, 'I love you', you create an image about it, or do you say, 'Why do you love me? Do you want something from me? Do you want my money, my body, my companionship, my encouragement?' Is that love? You are all married, or unmarried, or girl friends, or whatever you have, do you love anybody? That is, to ask from the other person nothing; neither the body, nor the emotions, something from her, nor intellectual romantic dependence on each other. So we have to enquire whether love has a cause. If love has a cause then it is not love. Right sirs. I know you agree, you say, 'Yes, quite right', but you don't live it. You see the logic of it, you see the analysis of it, verbally you accept it, but you say, 'Let me find out if I can live without a single conflict.' Which can only come about when you don't depend on punishment or reward, when you are absolutely integral, completely honest with oneself. But that is far from most people because we are always wanting something from somebody. The religious people are wanting heaven, or whatever it is, through somebody, or sacrifice themselves for something, take vows and all that. They think that is a religious life, to have constant conflict inside, the burning desire. Sirs, do you realize we are tortured human beings.

Now sirs, and ladies, you have heard the speaker for an hour and twenty minutes, or more, what is the actual state of your mind, now, not tomorrow? Just heard the words, the description, the analysis and the logical conclusion and remained there? Or one has become aware of oneself, aware of one's own condition, and whether you accept that condition - the condition of suffering, pain, sorrow, fear, anxiety and so on. That is our conditioning, whether you are living in India, in this country, or in Europe or America, that is the conditioning of all human beings. And specially here in this country where there is such disaster, anarchy almost going on, it is our responsibility to see that all this ends in ourselves first, not out there, that we say what we mean, have profound, immovable integrity.

RAJGHAT, BENARES 2ND PUBLIC TALK 26TH NOVEMBER 1981

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday? As we said yesterday morning, we are not giving a lecture, being talked at, or being instructed. This is a conversation between two friends, two friends who have a certain affection for each other, certain care for each other, and will not betray each other, who have certain deep common interests. And so they are conversing amicably, with a sense of deep communication with each other. And as most of us are accustomed to being talked at, or being told what to do; or you listen casually, not seriously, just a passing incident in one's life, like two ships passing at night. But if we are at all serious as two friends who have known each other for some time, we have walked along the same road, perhaps hand in hand, who have lived a life that is very complex, sad, miserable, unfortunate. So there are two friends sitting under a tree on a lovely day, cool morning with the dew on the grass, talking over together, and that is the relationship which you and the speaker have. We may not meet actually, physically, there are too many of us, but we are walking along a road, a path, looking at the trees, the birds, the flowers, the scent of the air, the beauty of the morning and talking seriously about their lives - not superficially, not casually but concerned with the disillusion of their problems. So that is our relationship. And the speaker means what he says. It is not just a rhetorical to create an impression, because we are dealing with much too serious problems of life.

So having said that, having established a certain communication between ourselves, unfortunately it has to be verbal but between the words, between the lines, between the content of the words, if one is at all aware, there is a much deeper, more profound relationship.

I think we ought to consider what a problem is. We all have problems: sexual, intellectual, mathematical, problems of relationship, problems which humanity has created through conflict, through wars, through nationalism, through so-called religions. We all have problems. What is a problem? A problem - the speaker is not inventing a meaning - but if you look into a dictionary which is the common meaning of all common usage, problem means something thrown at you, something that you have got to face. A problem is a challenge, minor or greater. A problem that isn't resolved demands that you face, understand, resolve, act. That is what problem means: something thrown at you, something unexpected, either at the conscious level or at the unconscious level, which is a challenge, superficial or deep.

Now that is what we mean by a problem. How do you, how does one approach a problem? Because how you approach a problem is more important than the problem itself. You understand? I'll explain. If I approach it, suppose I have a problem, if I approach it with fear, with a desire to resolve it, go beyond it, or if I approach it traditionally, fight against it, wanting to go beyond it, that is generally how we approach a problem. Either the desire to resolve it, to go beyond it, or escape from it, or totally neglect it, or put up with it. Approach - the word approach means coming near. I approach you. I approximate. I come as close as possible. The approach. The word, the meaning of that word is to come near. That is, how do I, having a problem, approach the problem? Do I come near it, close to it? Or do I run away from it? Or I have the desire to go beyond it? So as long as I have a motive, the motive dictates my approach. Are we making this clear? Are we following each other? Please.

If we do not approach it freely we are always directing the problem according to our conditioning. Suppose I am conditioned to suppress the problem, then my approach is conditioned and therefore the problem is distorted. Whereas if I approach the problem without a motive I then come very close to it, then the problem is important. Then in the problem is the answer, not away from the problem. You follow? We are going to go into it presently, in a few minutes.

So it is very important how we approach a problem. The political problem, the religious problems, the problems of intimate relationship, there are so many problems. We are burdened with problems, even the problem of meditation, it becomes a problem. We never look at the problem. Why should we live with problems. Problems, if we have not understood and dissolved, distort all our lives. So it is very important to understand, to be aware, how we approach a problem.

And the next is: to observe the problem and not to find a resolution of the problem. That is in the problem itself is the answer. That depends how you approach it, that depends how you look at it. So the approach is very important: to be aware of your conditioning when you approach it, and to be free of that conditioning to look at the problem. Now how do you perceive a problem? Please, we are thinking together. We are talking over our problems, we are looking at them, we are not analyzing them, but looking at them. That is, what is perception, what is seeing a problem? How do you see that tree? Look at it for the moment. How do you see? With what eyesight do you look at it? Is it merely an optical observation? That is, just looking at the tree partially, partly, only with the optical reaction, as we generally do. Which is to observe the shape, the form, the design, the light on the leaf. And do you, when you observe a tree, not name it, not say, 'That is a tree' and walk by? Or do you look at the tree with all your senses, or only with part of your senses? You understand what I am saying? Are we coming with each other? Because it is very important to understand, if I may point out, how you approach that tree. Is it merely verbal and therefore by calling it, naming it a tree, that word is not the thing and therefore can you look at it without the word? Please don't spend too much time on it, we have got a lot to talk about.

So are we aware how we approach it? Are we aware how we look at it, how we observe it? Do we observe it partially, with only one sense, that is, the optical sense? Or do we see it, hear it, smell it, feel it, see the design of it, take the whole of it in? You are following all this? Or, you look at it as though you are different from it. Of course, when I look at it I am not the tree, fortunately, or unfortunately. But can I look at it without the word, with all my senses responding to the totality of that beauty. Right? So perception means not only observing with all the senses, but also to see, to observe, or be aware that there is a division between you and that which you observe. Probably you haven't thought anything about all this, probably it is all Greek to you, or Chinese, or something else.

Please this is important to understand a little bit because we are going to discuss presently, the approach to fear and the perceiving the whole content of fear, how you approach this burden which man has carried for millennia, how you approach it, and how you perceive it. So I am first saying it is easy to perceive something outside of you, like a tree, like the river, or the blue sky, without naming, merely observing. And can you look at yourself, the whole content of your consciousness - I am moving it a little bit - the whole content of your mind, your being, your work, your thought, your feeling, your depression, all that, to look at it so that there is no division between fear and you? Can we go on? Or are you asleep?

If there is no division there is no conflict. That is, there is conflict between the Arab and the Jew, there is conflict between the Muslim and Hindu, there is conflict between Christianity and Buddhism and so on. Wherever there is division there must be conflict: that is a law. So in us there is a division: the observer, and the thing that is being observed. Right? The observer approaches that which is fear, greed, or sorrow as though it was something different from him which he has to resolve, which he has to suppress, understand, go beyond, all the struggle that comes into it. So where there is a division there must be conflict. Right?

Now we are going to discuss, look into fear, approach fear. And then how you look at fear, how you perceive fear. The meaning of that word perceive means to comprehend, to look at it without any distortion. To look at fear without any reaction to escape, run away, suppress, explanation, or even analysis. I wonder if you follow all this? Now we are going to discuss as two friends what is fear. Most of us are afraid of something or other. You may be afraid of your wife or your husband, afraid of losing a job, afraid of not having security in old age, afraid of public opinion, which is the most silly form of fear, afraid of so many things we are: darkness, death and so on. Now we are going to think over, examine together, not what we are afraid of but what is fear in itself? You are following? Not what I am afraid of. I might be afraid of you, or I am afraid of death. We are not talking about the object of fear. But let us talk over together the nature of fear, how fear arises, how you approach the problem. You understand? I will explain.

I am afraid of fear, I am afraid. What is my approach to it? Is there a motive behind my approach to the problem of fear? Obviously most of us have a motive. That is to go beyond it, to suppress it, to avoid it, to neglect it, I am used to fear for the last fifty years so I put up with it. So we are not discussing the object of fear but the origin of it. Right? How I approach the problem, how I look at the problem. My approach, if there is a motive I cannot come near it. That is clear. Any kind of motive I cannot see it clearly, I cannot come near it. And the other is, how do I look at fear? Is that fear separate from me? Therefore I am an outsider looking inside, or an insider looking out. So it is important to understand how I perceive fear. Is fear different from me? Obviously not. Anger is not different from me. But education, through education, through religion, through all the scriptures, bla, bla, all that makes me separate from that. I must fight it. I must get over it. But I have never asked if that thing called fear is separate from me. Actually it is not. Therefore my perception is that the observer is the observed. Right? No, you are asleep.

Envy is not different from me. I am envy. I may think it is different from me but the actual fact is that I am part of that. I am part of the anger. I am part of greed, envy, suffering, pain, so pain, suffering, greed, envy, anxiety, loneliness is me. I am all that. Right? First see it logically. Logically it is so. And seeing it logically, I may make an abstraction of what I see which becomes the idea. Do you see this? The word idea means, it derives from Greek and Latin and French and so on, means form, the form, the design. Then to look, the word idea means that. The form, the design, to look, to observe and the semblance of the fact. The original meaning of that word is this. But we observe, make an abstraction of it into an idea and carry that idea out. You are following all this? No, you are not getting it. Have I lost you? Or are we together still? You see how we do it. I am afraid - if I am - I am afraid and I want to run away from it, which becomes the idea that I should escape from it; make an abstraction of it, which becomes our idea about it and then work about that idea, which prevents us from observing very closely what is fear. So please when we are discussing about fear don't make an abstraction of it but look at it, be very close to it. Don't make a semblance of it. You understand all this? Right sirs? Which means, I approach it without any motive. I look at it, I observe it as something not different from me. Right? So you understand the combination. That is, I approach it very closely and I can only approach it very closely if I don't have a motive, because motive distorts. And I observe it as part of me, I am that, there is no division between me and that, I am that, therefore my observation is the observer is the observed, it is not different from me. If that is clear then we can go into the question: what is fear?

You are all afraid I am quite sure about something or other, of your guru, sure to be! Which you call devotion. Afraid of losing so many things. So what is fear? Go on, we are talking over together, I am not telling you what it is, I am asking you only to come very close to it. Because you can only see it very closely if you are very near. What is fear? Is it time? That is, time as a movement of the past, the present modified and continued. You understand this? I am the past, the present and also the future. Yes? I am the result of the past, a thousand million years, and I am also the present impressions, the present social conditions, the present climate. I am all that, and also the future. Right? I am the past, modified in the present, continued in the future, that is time. Right? And also there is time by the watch, by the sun rising at a certain time, at a certain part of the year, setting at a certain time. There is time by the morning, the afternoon, the evening. Time to learn, a language, a skill and so on. Right? Time to learn a language, the time I need to learn to have a skill, drive a car, become a carpenter and so on, or an engineer, or even some terrible politician. But there is time outwardly, physically, to cover the distance from here to there, and also there is time inwardly, hope. I hope to come there, I hope to achieve or become non-violent, which is absurd. I hope to gain, I hope to avoid pain, punishment, I hope to have a reward. So there is not only time outwardly, physically, but also there is time inwardly. That is, I am not this but I will become that, which means time. The physical time is actual, right, it is there, it is eleven o'clock or twelve o'clock, or whatever time it is now. But inwardly we have assumed there is time: that is, I am not good but I will be good. That is time, to cover the distance where I am now, where I will be. Now we are questioning that time, not the time by the sun, by the watch, by the distance, but time, is there time inwardly? Do you understand my question? So if there is time inwardly there is fear. You have understood this? That is, I have a job, but I might lose that job, which is the future, which is time. I have been ill, I hope not to be ill. I have had pain, I hope I will never have pain again. That is the remembrance of the pain, and the continuation of that memory, hoping there will be no pain. You are following all this?

So there is time inwardly, at least we think there is time but outward time is necessary. So we are questioning whether fear is not time? That is, I am afraid to lose my job in the future, which is time. I am afraid of having been ill and pain, not to have it again. Right? So there is this constant hope, constant remembrance and avoidance, which is part of time. So we are asking: is not time part of fear? You are following? So time is fear. Right? Don't accept this verbally, please, look at it. Look into yourself, be aware of yourself, of your fear and look how that fear arises. The remembrance of something past, recorded in the brain as remembrance, as an incident and afraid that it might happen again. Right? We are saying time is a factor of fear. Right?

And also another factor of fear is thought. That is, I think about my pain, which I have had last week, it is recorded in the brain and I think I might have that pain again tomorrow. So there is the operation of thought which says, 'I have had the pain, I hope not to have the pain'. So thought and time is fear. Gosh, it takes a long time to explain something, doesn't it? You have understood, not understood verbally, you have observed yourself, in yourself deeply that you see that fear is a remembrance, which is thought and also time, the future. I am secure now, I may be insecure tomorrow, fear arises. I believe in Communism and you come along and show it to me that it is nonsense, I am afraid. You follow? So time plus thought equals fear.

Now, just see the truth of it in yourself, not listening to me, to the speaker, and verbalizing it, remembering, but actually see that is a fact, not an abstraction as an idea. So you have to be aware whether it is by hearing you have made up an idea, an abstraction of what you have heard into an idea or actually facing the fact of fear, which is time and thought. I wonder if you have understood all this?

Now what is important is how you perceive the whole movement of fear. Either you perceive by negating it. You understand what I mean? Or you perceive it without the division as me and fear, but you are fear. So you remain with that fear. Yes, sirs, you are not getting my meaning.

You see there are two ways of negating fear: by totally denying it, by saying, 'I have no fear', which is absurd, or you are negating it by perceiving the observer is the observed, therefore no action. I wonder if you see this thing. Why are you all so silent? Either you have comprehended what is being said, or you don't understand it. We want to negate fear, don't we? All of us do. Negate in the sense get over it, run away from it, destroy it, to find some ways of comforting ourselves against it, which is all a form of negation.

Therefore your negation is acting upon it. Right? Then there is a totally different form of negation, which is the beginning of a new movement, which is, the observer is the observed, fear is me. The observer is fear. And therefore he cannot do anything about it, therefore negation, a totally different kind of negation which means a totally different beginning. Right sirs?

Have you done it? As we were talking as two friends walking along that lovely path, with a lot of trees, flowers and birds, trees and bushes, we have talked. Have you realized this fact that when you act upon it you strengthen it. By acting upon it is to run away, suppress, analyze, find the cause, all that. You are trying to negate something which is not you. But when you realize you are that, and therefore you cannot act - I am brown, or white or pink, or whatever colour, I can't do anything about it, therefore there is non-action, and therefore a totally different movement taking place. I have said it, it is up to you if you don't understand it.

Then there is the question of pleasure. Is pleasure different from fear? We always pursue pleasure. Right? By wearing those strange medallions and beads, it is a great pleasure to you, obviously, otherwise you wouldn't put them on. That makes you feel you are different from all the rest of us. So is that pleasure different from fear? Or fear is pleasure? It is like two sides of the same coin, when you understand the nature of pleasure, which is also time and thought, isn't it? I have had remembrance of something very beautiful and it is recorded, remembered, and I want that pleasure repeated. I remember the fear of an incident, record it and I want to avoid it. So both, they are the movements of the same kind only I call it pleasure and I call it fear. Right? Is this clear, more or less?

Then we must also go into the question of suffering. Can suffering end? Is there an end to sorrow? Mankind has done everything possible to transcend sorrow. It has worshipped sorrow, it has run away from sorrow, it has held sorrow to one's heart, it has tried to seek comfort away from sorrow, it has pursued the path of happiness, holding on to it, clinging to it in order to avoid suffering. Man has suffered, human beings have suffered right through the world. They have had ten thousand wars. Think of the men and women who have been maimed, killed and the tears that have been shed, the agony of the mothers, wives, and all those people who have lost their sons, their husbands, their friends through wars, through millennia upon millennia, and we still continue, multiplying armaments for protecting our nation. The tribal worship. So there is the immense sorrow of mankind. The poor man along that road will never know a good clean bath, clean clothes, ride in an aeroplane - you know, all the pleasures that one has, he will never have. And there is that sorrow. There is the sorrow of a man who is very learned and those who are not very learned. There is the sorrow of ignorance. There is the sorrow of loneliness, because most people are lonely. They may have a lot of friends, a lot of ideas, a lot of scholarship, but they are also terribly lonely people. You know what that loneliness is if you are at all aware of yourself, a sense of total isolation. You may have a wife, children, a great many friends but there comes a day or an event that makes you feel utterly isolated, lonely. That is tremendous sorrow. Then there is the sorrow of death. The sorrow of someone you have lost. So there is the sorrow which has been gathering, which has been collecting through millennia of mankind.

Then there is the sorrow of one's own personal degeneration, personal loss, personal lack of capacity, intelligence, action. You are following all this? I am only pointing out, or showing in a mirror what is happening. So we are asking whether that sorrow can ever end? Or you come to sorrow with sorrow and die with sorrow? You understand all this? And we are asking, as two friends walking along the path, a nice lovely path, is there an end to it? Logically, rationally, or intellectually, we can find many reasons for sorrow, many explanations, according to the Buddhist, the Hindu, Christian or the Islam. But the explanations, the causes, the authorities that explain commentaries away, sorrow still remains with us. So is it possible to end that sorrow? Because if you do not end sorrow there is no love, there is no compassion. So one has to go into it deeply and see if it can ever end.

The speaker says there is an end to sorrow, a total end to sorrow, which doesn't mean he does not care, indifferent, callous, but with the ending of sorrow there is the beginning of love. And you naturally ask the speaker: how? How is sorrow to end? When you say 'how' you want a system, a method, a process. Right? That is why you ask, 'Tell me how to get there. I will follow the path, the road.' So you want direction, you want to be told. Right? When you say, 'How am I to end sorrow?', that is the question. That demand, that enquiry says, 'Show me'. When you ask how, you are putting the wrong question, if I may point out because you are only concerned with getting over it. Your approach to it is: tell me to get over it. So you have never come near it. You understand? If I want to look at that tree I must come near it to see the beauty of it, the design, the shade, the leaf, the colour of the leaf, the shape of the leaf, whether it has flowers, whether it has no flowers, what is its size, I must come near it. But we never come near sorrow. We say, 'I have cried', 'My son is dead', or my brother, or whatever it is, we never come near it because we are always avoiding it, running away from it.

So how you approach sorrow matters enormously. Whether you approach it with a motive of escape, seeking comfort, avoiding it, or you approach and come very, very close to it. Find out what you do, whether you come very close to it. You cannot come close to it if there is self-pity, if there is the desire to somehow find the cause, the explanation. You follow? Avoid it. So if you come to it, if you approach it with a motive you will never understand it. So it matters very much how you approach it, come near it, and how you see it, how you perceive sorrow. Is it the word sorrow that makes you feel sorrow? Or is it a fact? And if it is a fact and you want to come close to it. That is, sorrow is you. You are not different from sorrow. That is the first thing to see: that you are not different from sorrow. You are sorrow. You are anxiety, loneliness, pleasure, pain, fear, the sense of isolation. You are all that. So you come very close to it, you are it, therefore you remain with it. Oh, you don't see it!

Sir, when you want to look at that tree you come to it, you look at every leaf, every shape of that tree, you take time. You are looking, looking, looking, and it tells you all its beauty. You don't tell the tree your story, it tells you, if you watch it. In the same way if you come near it, hold it, look at it, not run away from it, see what it is trying to tell you, its depth, its beauty, its immensity, then if you remain with it entirely, with that single movement of thought, then sorrow ends. That is not a reward. Don't play tricks. Just remember it and then repeat it! That is what your brains are accustomed to: to memorize what has been said by the speaker in a book, or now, and then say, 'How shall I carry that out?' Because you are it, you are all that and therefore you cannot escape from yourself, therefore you look at it. How you look at it is that there is no division between the observer and the observed, you are that, therefore there is no division. When there is no division you remain entirely with it. Are you doing that now? Don't say, please. It is one of the most - it requires a great deal of attention, a great deal of intensity, clarity, not only the verbal clarity but the clarity of the mind that sees instantly the truth.

Then out of that ending of sorrow comes love. I wonder if you love anything. Do you? Do you love anything? Your wife, your children, your so-called country, do you love the earth, love the beauty of a tree, the beauty of a person? Or we are so terribly self-centred we never have any perception of anything at all? Where there is no love there is destruction, degeneration. And love brings compassion. Compassion is not doing some social work.

Compassion has its own intelligence. But you don't know anything of all that. All that you know is your desires, your ambitions, your deceptions, your dishonesty. When you really ask most profound questions which stir up man you become negligent. Look at your sirs, when I ask you a question of that kind, whether you love somebody, your faces are blank. Right?

And this is the result of your religion, of your devotion to your nonsensical guru, your devotion to your leaders - not devotion, you are frightened, therefore you follow. At the end of all this millennia upon millennia we are what we are now, just think of the tragedy of all this. That is the tragedy of yourself, you understand sir? So find out, if one may ask, walking along that path as a friend, ask: do you know what love means, love that does not demand a thing from another. Ask yourselves sirs. It doesn't demand a thing from your wife, from your husband, nothing, physically, emotionally, intellectually, not to demand a thing from another. Not to follow another, not to have a concept and pursue that concept. Because love is not jealousy, love has no power in the ordinary sense of that word. Love doesn't seek position, status, power. But it has its own capacity, its own skill, its own intelligence. Right sirs.

We meet next Saturday I believe, for questions and answers. Next Sunday will be the last talk. We will discuss together next Sunday: what is religion? What is a religious mind? What is something that is beyond all thought? What is meditation and so on? We will go into all that. Right sirs.

RAJGHAT 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 28TH NOVEMBER 1981

There are about a hundred questions, and we cannot possibly answer all of them, and if we did it would take probably the whole month of December, so you wouldn't be here and I wouldn't be here. So we have chosen - a few people have chosen the questions, and if your particular question is not answered please don't get angry or impatient, or that we are trying to evade your particular question.

I wonder why we ask questions. We must ask questions, we must doubt, be very sceptical, question, but why do we question and from whom does one expect answers? You have put here several questions, who is going to answer them? If you put the right question naturally there will be the right answer. If there are questions that are merely intellectual, theoretical, something based on some hypotheses then such questions have no value; but if one asks serious questions then the questioner and the speaker are responsible together - it is not that you are putting questions to me and then I answer you, I am not the Delphic Oracle! Nobody is. But one should ask oneself, I think, why we put questions and from whom we expect an answer. So we are going to answer these questions, investigating the question itself, and in the investigation of that question we will find the answer, not that you put the question and then you expect an answer, but rather together we are going to examine the question. And in the examination of that question we will find the answer in the question. I hope this is clear.

And also if one may remind you most respectfully, we should listen to the question, not wait for an answer, listen to the question itself, and it matters a great deal, if one may point out, how you listen. Whether you listen with an expectation, with a motive, waiting impatiently for the answer, or you are listening not only between the words, the sound of the word - please listen to all this - the sound of the word, each word has a certain content, a certain significance, and the sentence, the sound, the quality, the question itself makes the hearing more acute. And in listening you learn much more than the answer itself. I wonder if you are following all this? So please if one may suggest that you really listen to the question.

QUESTION: What does it mean to enquire? Is enquiry itself a process of thought?

How do we enquire, what is the state of the mind that enquires? What is it it is enquiring, and who is it that is enquiring? To enquire means to investigate, to explore. And to explore very deeply, if the brain is conditioned, your exploration, your enquiry will be limited. Naturally. It's like an animal being tethered to a post, the rope may be long or short, but it is tethered. If the brain is conditioned, as most people's brains are, then the enquiry will be very limited. But the enquiry demands that we be free to look, it is necessary if we are to enquire, which means really part of that enquiry is subtly doubtful, questioning, asking, scepticism. Right? Are we going to together with hesitant scepticism to enquire into this question, explore into this question? Which is: is enquiry a process of thought? That is, we are enquiring into the process, say for example of death - we haven't touched that subject - we are enquiring together into the nature of death, what does it mean? Now one can approach this question either with fear, or with avoidance, or seeking comfort. Now when we approach it in that manner our enquiry is naturally very limited because the motive dictates the enquiry. So can we be free in our enquiry of our prejudices, our desire for comfort, our commitment to some form of belief, and with a fresh mind enquire who is the enquirer and what is it that is being enquired. Is this all right, are we going along together?

Who is the enquirer? I want to investigate into death, the nature of death, what does it mean. So before I can enquire into death I must find out who is the enquirer, who is asking these questions. Who is it that is asking these questions: we say, 'I'. Who is the 'I'? I, the self, is put together by thought. Now you are stuck! The 'me', myself, my form, my name, all the characteristics, tendencies, the desires, the ambitions, the struggles, the pain, the loneliness, suffering, all that is me. Right? The 'me' is the past, the present and the future. The past is all my inherited tendencies, the memories, the experiences, the education, or non-education, all that is the past which is knowledge. Right? Knowledge is always the past. The past, that knowledge, meets the present, modifies itself and proceeds further. All that is me; even the super-self, super-consciousness, all that blah, blah, blah, is still me. Right? So that me is put together by thought - past memories meeting the present incidents, challenges, being modified and proceeding further, which is the future, so all that is me. The 'me' is enquiring. Right? The 'me' is the thought. Of course. I know you will object to this because the 'me' you think is something far superior, some extraordinary entity derived straight from god, or whatever it is, but it is still a movement of thought. So thought is enquiring about itself. You follow? You understand this? Thought is enquiring about death. What is important is to understand the enquirer, not about death, because if the enquirer is very clear, objective, impersonal, free, non-attached, then the enquiry can be extraordinary, but if the enquirer is attached, conditioned, has a motive, his enquiry will inevitably be limited about death.

So it is important to understand who is the enquirer. We have gone into that a little bit, we said, still thought. Now can thought examine itself? Can you? Can thought look at itself? Go on sir. That is, we explained the other day, and bearing in mind that explanations are not the fact, the word is not the thing, the word 'tree' is not the actual, living, beautiful, designed tree. So the word, the explanation, the description, is not the actual, but we were saying the other day that experience, knowledge, memory, thought, action - that is thought. And we are enquiring whether thought can look at itself. Can you be aware when thought arises? Of course one can. But who is the entity that is being aware of thought arising? You are following all this? It is still thought. Is this clear? You see we have divided thought into the thinker and thought. Right? Right, sir?

So the difficulty in this enquiry is we have never been able to go beyond thought. Our whole way of living is based on thought, that is the only instrument we have, apart from emotional, romantic, but it is still thought is feeling, is the romantic sentimentality, it is all involved with thought. We have never been able to enquire if there is something beyond thought which can directly understand. No, this is too difficult. I wonder if you have ever asked yourself whether there is action without thought. That is, our action is based on thought, whether that action is based on an ideal which is again the invention of thought, whether it is based on past memory, which is still thought, whether it is a projected concept in the future according to which one acts it is still thought, so all that we know of action is the reaction of thought. That's clear. We have never asked if there is an action which is not based on thought. That's our enquiry, which is death. I wonder if you see this. You are all asleep, I, afraid.

Is there an action, to put it differently, which is not based on knowledge? You understand? Our action at present is based on knowledge. That's quite clear. Is there an action which is not? To enquire into that one must be entirely free from the past, obviously. Can one? Can you be free of your tradition, can you be free of your gurus, can you be free from all the subtle influences of thought, so that you discover for yourself an action which is not based on thought? I have answered the question. I am not evading it. It is for you to do it. That is to be aware that your actions are based on thought, you may call it love but it is still thought. And to find out for oneself whether there is action totally free from all knowledge, which is thought. Right? Which means, time as memory, time as thought, time as the future, time as the present, time as the future, has altogether disappeared. This requires - you have got it?

QUESTION: You have said, let us think together, does it mean collective thinking? If not, how can two people of different backgrounds think together?

Does it mean collective thinking? Listen to the question carefully please. I'll read it again because you have not listened it, you are just waiting for somebody to say something about it. You are not actually listening to the question. Please do. You have said, let us think together, does it mean collective thinking, if not how can two people of different backgrounds think together? The speaker has said over and over again, let us think together. And the questioner asks, does it mean collective thinking, which is opposed to individual thinking? You understand? When you say, is it collective thinking, naturally it means is there individual thinking. Right? Is thinking collective, or individual, or it is neither? Come on sirs. Let's have some fun! Is thinking personal, individual, collective, or there is only thinking? Your thinking is the result of your past: your past conditioning, if you are a scientist it is the accumulated knowledge of the past scientists, if you are a religious crank, as most of you are, with your peculiar robes, then your thinking is based on your desire, on your fear, on your superstition, and so on. So we are saying - and the businessman thinks according to his background, which is to make money and all the rest of it, or the politician - there is only thinking, not collective thinking or individual thinking, or Eastern thinking and Western thinking. There is only the act of thinking.

The questioner asks: if not, can two people of different backgrounds think together. We are talking of thinking, not of your background. Right? If this is clear, there is only thinking, even the poorest, uneducated man thinks, even the most highly sophisticated intellectual thinks. He doesn't say, 'It is my thinking' he is thinking. Right? So can we not think together, not collective, individual, having different backgrounds, but the act of thinking, not about something, but to watch together that tree. Right? To watch together. That means both of us pay attention to what we are seeing. We may describe it differently, you may say that light on that leaf is not quite so bright as it was yesterday, or there is too much fog, too much dirt, but the act of seeing, observing is together. The description may vary, the reactions may vary, but the act of perceiving we can do that together. The act of thinking, not according to my background or your background, the act of thinking itself can be done together. We can both observe what is happening in the world - wars, the politicians making a mess of the world - are there any politicians here? I hope not! Making a mess of the world and we are helping to help them to make the world worse, and so on. So we can think together about war, how appallingly dangerous it all is, you may want to avoid it, but thinking together means communicating with each other without any barrier, you listen to what the speaker is saying, and the speaker listens to what you are saying, and that we can do together very happily. It is not complicated: if you want to communicate something to me I listen to you because I am interested in what you are talking about, and you listen to the speaker if you are interested. Where there is interest there is communication, where there is care, affection, love, there is communication.

QUESTION: What is the nature of evil? Do you think it is possible to live in the present day world without compromising with evil in some form or another?

I don't know - the speaker doesn't know what you call evil. Each person translates that word according to his fancy, to his ideas, to his concepts, saying evil is the opposite of the good. Right? Each person has a definite idea, concept, gives a different meaning to that word. Now let's look at it carefully.

Is there an opposite to the good? Think it out, let's go into it carefully. We say the opposite is evil. We are asking: is evil the opposite of the good? Or is there an opposite to the good? If there is an opposite to the good, then the opposite must be born out of the good. I wonder if you understand all this? Can we go on? That is, is there an opposite at all? You follow? That is, I am frightened, and the opposite of fear is supposed to be courage. Right? When there is no fear, is it courage? So I am asking: is good the opposite of evil? Or where there is good there is no evil.

So we have to enquire first, what is goodness. Perhaps you may think that it is an old fashioned word, being good, but it is not. What does goodness mean? Let's enquire into that, sir, don't just go to sleep while I am talking, for god's sake. What is it to be good, a good human being? The word 'good' implies being whole, not fragmented, not broken up, that is, saying one thing, doing something else, feeling something, saying quite the opposite to that, or the thinker separate from thought. Where there is fragmentation in one's action, in one's thinking, there is no goodness. Goodness implies the feeling, or the act or acting from whole being, not from fragmentation. Anything that is fragmented has its opposite. Goodness has no opposite. So one questions altogether whether there is an opposite at all, except there is man, woman, light and darkness, but the idea of the opposite; that is, violence, the opposite of that is non-violence. The opposite is a projection of violence. I don't know if you see all this. Right? That is, I do not know how to get rid of violence, and so I invent the idea of non-violence, use that word as a lever to free myself from violence, but I am still violent. So there is only violence, not non-violence. Is this all right? You see we are all brought up from childhood with the idea of opposites, like a long corridor of opposites, our life is, battling from one thing to the other. We are questioning whether there is an opposite at all. Hate is not the opposite of love, there is only hate or love, but we make it an opposite and thereby hope to help ourselves from a difficult condition, or a difficult problem by looking for an answer. Right? Is this clear.

So we are not saying that there is not evil, war is evil, killing another is evil, being terrorists, all the decoys in this country - it is an evil act. Right? But that which is not good is not the opposite of the good. I wonder if you see this?

QUESTION: For living beyond the shadow of time we must discard psychological memory, yet it is necessary to have memory of our skills for daily living. The two types of memory are the contents of the same brain, and each has close association with the other. How is it possible then to retain the essential memory and discard the psychological?

The questioner begins by asking: for living beyond time, the shadow of time, we must discard the psychological memory. How do you know? How do you know, or are aware that you must discard psychological memory to live beyond time, how do you know? Or you have heard somebody, like the speaker, say it and you are repeating it. Please, sir, this is important to understand, the first part of the question. You hear something from another and you take it for granted that it is so, so you become secondhand people. Right? That's what we are. And we are very proud of it, we never say, throw all this out and find out what it is to live firsthand. So when you start with a hypothesis of which you don't know, a theory, then the question becomes rather superficial. Right?

The questioner says further: it is necessary to have memory of our skills for our daily living. The two types of memory, the content of the same brain, and each has its association with the other, how is it possible to retain essential memories, and discard the psychological ones? We will go into that. The speaker has been saying for many years, that we are only functioning with a partial brain, which is conditioned, as Hindus, as Christians, as Buddhists or as Communists, Socialists, Labourite and so on and so on, it is conditioned. And therefore what is conditioned must always be partial. And the brain specialists are discovering that the right part of the brain, this side of the brain is associated with the practical, the daily activities, the remembrances and so on, it is concerned with the daily activity of life; and the left side is theoretical, thinking abstractly, the left side is not practical as the right side and so on. I won't go into details of it, but you comprehend that. Which is, the right the practical, the left non-practical, theoretical, abstract. So the scientists are saying, the right and the left are two separate functions, and of course they are subtly associated with each other, they are not absolute divisions. Right? Left and right.

So out of that arises a very interesting question, if you are interested in it, which we have discussed with some of the brain specialists and others, whether the whole brain can be active at the same moment, not one moment theoretical, the next moment practical, but the whole of the brain in a flow, in a movement. I don't know if you are interested in this. Are you? Don't agree with me so easily, please. The brain functions obviously according to the senses; the senses are taste, smell, hearing and so on, touching, it is communicated through the nose and to the brain. And I am not a brain specialist, I have discussed this a great deal with others who are supposed to be, and also my own enquiry into myself - not `enquiry', I won't use that word. Observing it.

The question is: can the brain which has been so conditioned by knowledge, which is partial, can that brain which has been so conditioned free itself and act as a whole, practical as well as theoretical? It is not theoretical, a total perception, not partial perception. Is this clear? Am I making the question clear? A total perception with all your senses active. Or part of the brain active, which is partial and therefore limited, and therefore creating all the human problems. It is possible for the whole of the brain to be active together, whole, when all the senses are active, not one sense more active than the other. That is, sir, when you look at the waters of that river in the early morning where there is not a breath of air, not a ripple, and the sunlight is on that water, the early morning golden light making a path on that water, can you look at it with all your senses? Where there is such an observation there is no centre; it is only when you observe partially that there is the centre formed. That is, wherever there is a partial observation there must be a limited area. Right? That limited area is the `me'. Whereas if you observe that light on that water and the early morning with the glory of that clear light on that water, with all your senses there is no centre because you are observing totally with all your attention. So there is a possibility, if one is attentive, when one is really serious, it is possible to have only memories that are absolutely necessary for daily living, and not have psychological memories accumulated day after day, day after day, which is the real factor of degeneration.

QUESTION: In the West children are brought up to be separate independent individualists, and this makes them less affectionate. (In this country it is all so very different, is that it?) In the East (I thought so! I haven't read these questions before, this is the first time I am reading them) - in the East they are brought up to share everything with the family. They are more affectionate but this makes them more dependent, more attached. Which of these is a healthier more natural way of bringing up a child?

Need I read that question again? Are we individuals? That's the basic question. Right? The questioner is asking: in the West children are brought up to think of themselves as separate, non-collective human beings; here apparently in the East they are brought up in the family and the family is more important than the individual, but the individual is equally important living in the family, and therefore he is more attached to the family, and so on. Which all means the emphasis either in one direction or the other is the importance of the individual. Right? Now we must question, doubt, enquire, into this problem whether we are individuals at all. All your tradition says you are individuals, separate souls, all struggling, struggling, struggling. Right? Personal illumination, personal realization, personal gods, personal salvation, personal achievement, individual success in heaven or on the earth, in both the West and the East the importance is given to the individual, both psychologically as well as religiously as well as physically, outwardly. Now we are asking is that so? Are you an individual? You may have a different form, you are taller, perhaps darker, there are black people, white people, brown people, yellow people, woman, man, some have beards, some have no beards, some have grey hair, some have different names and so on, does that make you into an individual? Go on sir, enquire into all this, you see you never doubt anything, you take it all for granted: that we are individuals, that we have separate souls, that we have etc., etc.

Is your consciousness separate, which is individual consciousness? You understand? I am only changing the words. Is your consciousness different from another? Your consciousness is made up of the things which thought has put there - fear, belief, whether you are a socialist, or a labourite, capitalist, or a communist, what you believe, your conclusions, your pains, your loneliness, your desperation, your depressions, anxiety, pain, sorrow, loneliness, is the same for all mankind. Right? All mankind goes through this, whether they live in this country, Russia, America or China. Right? They all go through this with greater emphasis on one or the other. That's the ground on which we all stand. Right? So is there an individual? Sir, this is a most important question, don't so easily say, no, and shake your head and say you are free of individuality. Try to find out. You may have a different kind of education than the man in the West, but he suffers as you, he is insecure as you, he follows some superstition, as you, only the figures of superstition vary - you have three hundred thousand gods here but there is only one god there, but still god. So we all stand on the same ground; it is the ground of all humanity.

So are you an individual? So if you are an individual either you are living in an illusion, in a fanciful world called individualism, or the other is untrue. You follow? Either this individual is true, or the other is not true, which is that we are all similar in our consciousness, or the similarity, perhaps various modifications and so on, is the truth, and the other is illusion. Truth has no opposite: this is so or this is not so. Go into for yourself, sir.

So thinking is common to all mankind; consciousness is common - perhaps not common, we won't use that word `common', that gives it a totally different meaning - is similar, the same flow of the river of sorrow, the same flow of the river of anxiety, insecurity, loneliness, despair, terrible things that we are. You understand? We as individuals have a cause, we are the result of causes. Obviously. Climate, food, your education, your Upanishads, your Gita, your blah, blah, and there, the Bible and Jesus and so on. They are all the same with different names. Oh god, sir, it is all so childish. So where there is a cause it must end. You understand? Sir, global interrelationship between all the people will only prevent war. Right? But if you are a nationalist and the other fellow is a nationalist, you are going to have wars because nationalism, which is glorified tribalism, brings about separation, the Muslim and the Hindu, Pakistan and India, such division is going to bring war. And the war people are delighted because they play with the game of killing people. You know all this. So can you, as a human being, recognizing the responsibility of the human which is to have global interrelationship with all mankind, not as Hindus, Muslims, Christians and all that, as human beings, then you will prevent war. But if you stick to individuality, and that is expressed in nationalism - I don't know if you follow all this? - if you stick to your individualism as your god, your own invention of god, and the other fellow does the same, you are going to have religious wars. So when you see all this, apprehend, perceive all this, individual has no meaning at all.

QUESTION: In spite of your warning that the practice of a technique of meditation makes the mind dull and mechanical, it appears to me that your teaching of listening and seeing and learning also involves struggle in the mind to drop its activities. May I request you to enlighten me on this question?

Don't ask me, don't request me, just look at the question itself. Sir, apart from meditation, which perhaps we will go into tomorrow morning, if there is time, what does practice do? What is practice? I'll tell you, sir: you go to the office every day from nine to five - I don't know why you do it but you do. No, no, don't laugh, that's part of your life. And that's a routine, isn't it? Get up in the morning, shave, rush off to have breakfast, rush off to the office, and there you sit at a desk and write, write, whatever you do, or work in a factory. So that becomes a routine, doesn't it? That becomes mechanical, that becomes a practice, a habit. You accept that as the normal way of life, and somebody comes along and says: any system, any practice in meditation will also become mechanical, repetitive, makes the mind dull. Here you accept it and it is also making your mind dull in the office, in the factory. Right? If I am the carpenter, and I all day look at the wood, feel the wood, the right instruments, my mind obviously becomes wooden. A scientist who spends all day long in research inventing, accumulating knowledge - any specialization must inevitably make the mind dull. Obviously. No? You meditate, don't you?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, this is fairly simple, isn't it? If you are all the time accumulating knowledge and theorizing about knowledge you are specializing. You understand, sir? Don't you know this? If I sing, nothing but sing all day, however marvellously, I have specialized in that, my voice becomes marvellous but I know nothing about life, may no nothing about life, because my specialization keeps me in a narrow groove.

Now if this is so, which appears to be so, and the questioner says also, listening, seeing, learning, also involves struggle in the mind to drop its activities. Sir, we have made life into a marvellous machine of struggle. Right? We are struggling for everything, for god, for meditation, for love, struggle, struggle, struggle. Right? And you say, listening, seeing, learning is also a struggle. I say, no. Why do we make life into a struggle? Sir, answer these questions, put it to yourself: whether you can live without any conflict in life. Don't say, no. We are used to conflict. Right? To reach god, enlightenment, nirvana, or self-blah, blah, you must struggle, struggle, take vows, take all the peculiar words that you have.

We are asking: is there a way of living which is not lazy, which is not comforting, which is not merely routine, routine, is there a way of living daily life without a single shadow of conflict?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Those, the gentleman says, those who are in deep sleep - perhaps all of you are! We are talking about daily living, not when you are fast asleep. Even when you are fast asleep the brain is still active, still dreaming. Have you ever even asked, enquired to find out if it is possible to live a life, a daily life, without a single sense of conflict, without a single sense of a problem, without this terrible sense of 'I must control'? Go on, sir, enquire. The speaker says, not theoretically, don't accept it, the speaker says, yes it is possible: not escape, not go off into the Himalayas, or become a hermit, living here on this earth, meeting people, married, if you are, and doing everything that one has to, to live without conflict. Find out, sirs. Why is there conflict in our life? Is it not because we are all trying to become something? Right? If I am not good, I will be good. This idea of perpetual movement of becoming something, ultimately becoming enlightened, which is nonsense.

So what is it that is becoming? You understand my question? Who is it that is becoming? The 'me'? And what is the 'me'? My name, my form, my memory, my education, my attachments, my bank account, if I have one, and so on and so on. Right? Why can't we face all this? Why can't we look at it instead of imagining all kinds of things. So as long as there is a desire to become there must be conflict. Right? Then you will say, 'If I don't become, what will happen? If I don't succeed in the office, what will happen to me?' Go on, sir, answer it yourself, I don't have to answer it. If you don't become something in the office, you won't have more money, better cars, better toilets and so on and so on. Right? And if you don't become something inwardly you will never reach whatever you want to reach. So this struggle is going on all the time, for the rich man, for the poor man.

So can you find out for yourself whether it is possible to live happily on this earth without all this monstrous divisions and mess? Sir, meditation is something immense, it cannot come through struggle. Right? Through practise, through a system, because your mind then becomes routine, mechanical, by listening, seeing, learning you can also make that mechanical. Anything you can make mechanical. But to see for oneself, aware of one's brain, mind, how it is becoming mechanical. The very perception of the danger ends the danger. That is, when you stand on a precipice the very danger demands that you act. Right? When you see a cobra near you, you act. But we don't see the danger of this mechanical process of living. Right? Why don't you see the danger? Why don't you see the danger of having a leader, religious leaders? Look at you all! Because you want somebody to tell you what to do - in meditation, how to lead a spiritual life, what to do in politics, what to do in business - you follow? Told, educated, go to Harvard to become a business manager, go to this place. You understand? You are all being told what to do. And the speaker refuses to tell you what to do so you think he is evading. Whereas he is saying something: look at the facts, just look at it - why you put on those robes, why somebody does it, just look. And when you look very carefully, observe without any prejudice, then the story is told by that which you are observing. Then as the story ends the observation ends.

QUESTION: You often say that thought is a material process, what does this mean?

All right. What is material? Go on, sir, what is material? Matter. Right? Is that so, agree? Look sir, thought, as we explained, is contained in the cells of the memory of the brain, it is a fact. This is what the scientist - I am not a scientist, I have been saying this for many years - the scientists are saying that - the brain cells hold the memory and so the cells themselves are material. Right? So it is a material process, therefore there is nothing sacred about thought. But you can treat matter as sacred: a rock is a sacred thing, a tree is a sacred thing, the fish that live in that river are a sacred thing. You can make anything sacred but that which makes things sacred is still a material process. The idols, whether they are in the Christian church or in the Hindu, or the writing in the Muslim world, are the result of thought, therefore it is a material process the whole thing. Only when thought naturally, without conflict, without struggle comes to an end, which is time, then there is a possibility of that which is eternal. So you say, 'Tell me how to end thought; tell me the system, the practice, I'll do it for the rest of my life.' So you are back again to the same old thing. But if you see, if you are aware, give attention to what you are thinking, and follow it through, that requires very careful slowing down the whole movement of thought; not suppression, control, just the slowing down of thought. We will talk about meditation.

QUESTION: You urge people to look inward and ask fundamental questions, don't you think yoga, meditation and so on prepares one's mind to look within?

First of all, sirs and ladies, I am not persuading you, or urging you to do anything - nothing. All that he is saying is: look! Look in the mirror as you do when you shave or comb your hair, look at yourself as you are: look. Look at the world, look at the society which we have made, look at all the politicians, what they are doing: just look first. But we don't look; we have prejudices, you follow, all our conditionings which prevents us from looking, therefore looking is not important but why you are asking the question, why you are conditioned. You follow? Then naturally you discover what you are, you don't have to look inward, it is all there. But to look at the outer, which will give you a criteria, and from that criteria look at yourself so that there is no illusion about yourself. I wonder if you understand all this?

Now the questioner says: doesn't meditation, yoga and so on help you to prepare yourself to look inward? You have had it for ten thousand years, haven't you, you have been preparing. And you are still preparing, and where are you at the end of it, in spite of your robes, in spite of your meditation, in spite of your real gods? Why don't you ask those questions, sir? Sir, illumination or enlightenment doesn't demand preparation. Take that! Because preparation involves time, many lives, or many years. Right? That's your tradition. You accept it so you say, well, I must life after life, life after life struggle to achieve ultimately this enlightenment which will give me complete happiness.

Q: How can it happen if there is no situation?

K: Oh, then drown yourself and see! Sir, please do listen to this seriously, if you are interested, I am not persuading you to listen, if you don't want to listen, don't listen. Our minds are conditioned to time, our brains themselves have evolved through time. It's not your brain, or my brain, it is the brain - evolved through time and so it sees everything in terms of time: I am not, but I will be, I am violent but I will not be violent. So by its very conditioning it thinks in terms of time as a process, preparation for enlightenment, preparation as when you want to have a good job you prepare through examinations and so on and so on. So our whole way of thinking, looking at life is to prepare for something. I question this preparation. Is enlightenment, the ultimate comprehension of that extraordinary thing called truth, is that to be approached through preparation? Which means what? Preparing yourself for what? Preparing yourself not to be greedy, not to have desires, not to have sex, not to have one meal a day. You are preparing, which means what? You want to reach truth and you are preparing for it, which means truth is a fixed point. Right? And you are preparing to go towards the fixed point which means you don't begin with freedom, you begin with preparing, struggling, controlling. But you also know unconsciously or consciously that freedom is essential for truth. So why don't you ask yourself, begin yourself by being free now, not ultimately - free from attachment, free from your robes, free from your fears. You follow, sir, why don't you begin there, freedom first? Because it is only when you are completely free the other is.

So preparation according to myself is not necessary at all. What is necessary is to begin with freedom, and that freedom goes with intelligence, not to do what you like. That freedom is responsibility, integrity.

We have talked for nearly an hour and forty-five minutes - an hour and thirty minutes - sorry!

QUESTION: What is the basis for your getting pessimistic about the growth of computers?

I am not, the speaker has never been pessimistic or optimistic, he is just showing something to you: that the computers can take over all that man has done, almost, except the computers can't look at the beautiful tree, or the evening star, single, alone in the sky, or the morning light on the waters. When a machine can take over all that you are doing, thinking, learning much quicker than you, what's going to happen to you, as a human being? Sir, some of the people who are concerned with computers, really serious people, are really concerned with this: what is man, what is going to happen to him - while you sit here and meditate - you follow? So either man commits himself to entertainment, which you are doing now, religious entertainment, or football entertainment, or different forms of entertainment. I do not know if you have noticed on television in Europe and in America, sports are becoming more and more important, taking a great deal of time on the television, the new gods are the football players, earn millions and millions. You don't know all this? So either human beings will go around that line of entertainment, or concern themselves with something much deeper. And that is what computers are challenging you. And to look at that challenge, to understand it, to see what is implied it is not pessimism, you have to meet this challenge. Right, sirs.

Q: How does one meet a challenge?

K: How does one meet the challenge - all right. We are back again! I'll reply, madam. How does one meet this challenge, the challenge that the computer plus the robot are going to take over building a car. They are doing it in Japan, and the workers wear white gloves. You understand? And the computer, as we said, is going to outstrip man, in quickness. They are trying to invent, and they are, the ultimate intelligent machine computer. That's the challenge, what is man? Man is all that the computer can do except certain things. That is, your brain has been active for thousands and thousands of years, going to the office, struggling, maintaining her, struggling, which is to keep it active, active in different ways, surgery, medicine, carpentry, it is active. Now that computer is going to take that activity over. Either your brain withers because it is not active, or it becomes active totally in a different direction. I wonder if you follow all this. The activity which we have had is instinctive, and the machine is going to take over your thinking, not entirely, ninety-five per cent of it is going to be taken over by a machine. So your brain unless it is kept, like any organ, like the arm, it is kept active, it will live - if it is kept steady in that position it will wither. So the brain will wither unless it is kept active. So either it is kept active through entertainment, sitting on a platform cheering the idiots playing, or the cinema, or this or that, or the religious nonsense. It is all the same, all entertainments are the same whether you call it religious or football, it is entertainment. So how will you keep the brain active? That's your challenge? To keep it active one has to enquire into something much deeper than the machine.

This is the last talk of the series.

We have talked about various problems of life. We have talked about the corruption in this country, not that it does not exist in other countries; we have talked about relationship between human beings in which there is hardly any relationship at all for there is no love. And we have also talked about fear and the ending of fear, pleasure, pain, sorrow; and with most of us there is very little of love, and last of all, least of all compassion. And I think we ought to talk over together again the problem of death.

I do not know if you are interested in these problems, how deeply you want to go into them. Though some of you may have casual interest, or some of you may be serious, we ought to consider this question of death, whether it be for the young or for the old, death by accident, death by disease, death by old age, senility. Probably we are already senile when we are educated. No smiles! Probably you don't understand the word senility - it is just as well! And man has always been afraid of this unknown problem, the very complex problem of death. Why human beings have always put death at the end of life. Why human beings, after millennia upon millennia, have considered death as something terrifying. Volumes have been written about it. Psychologists have said to prepare for death. And we human beings in the modern age would rather not talk about it, would rather avoid the question altogether. But if we are serious and concerned with the whole problem of living, existence, and all the travail that is involved in daily life, we ought to consider seriously this question of death, which may also help us to understand the nature of meditation.

So what is death? Why man, human beings throughout the world, have been afraid of this terrible so-called catastrophe? Why human beings have not considered what happens before death rather than what happens after death. Most of us are concerned what takes place when we die, but we never consider what happens before we die. You understand my question? Isn't that far more important than what happens after death? Is it not far more important, essential and necessary whether the life that we lead, confused, uncertain, insecure, full of aches and pains and travail of life, whether that is not far more essential to comprehend than what happens after death. And perhaps then living becomes more important than the dying, then perhaps death and life go together. Are we communicating with each other? Or are you merely agreeing to something that you don't understand?

Which is more important, to understand what happens before death, which is our daily life, what we think, what we feel, how we act, what is our thinking, the nature of thought, is it not far more essential to understand that rather than enquire what happens after death? We shall find out what happens after death, we shall go into it, but shouldn't we consider the way of our life: how vulgar it has become with all these absurd costumes that you are wearing. What is your relationship not only with society but with each other; and also why we live the way we do, deceit, dishonesty, lack of integrity and so on. If that is not considered and transformed basically, then what does death mean? The dying? And what is it that dies? The physical body, the form, the name, and all the attachments to which we are accustomed: the attachment to the family, to your beliefs, to your conclusions, to your gods, to your gurus, to your rituals, you are attached to all that. And death means the ending of all that.

So we ought to go into the question together: what is an ending? To end. We never end anything, we are always wanting to continue. When you end an attachment - please, we are not talking theoretically, or in abstraction, but actually, to end, say for instance your attachment to your guru, the attachment to some kind of belief, when you end it what takes place? Do you understand my question? Have you ever ended anything without any motive, without any conflict, to end? Because without ending there is no new beginning. That is so obvious. If I don't, for example, end my attachment to either this particular property, or attachment to a person, or an attachment to a belief, concept, an ideal, there is a constant continuity of what has been. And therefore what has been becomes mechanical. It is only when I, suppose, end my attachment completely, inwardly, completely end it, only then there is a new beginning, not in continuity. In continuity time is involved: I have been, I will be, I am. That is the process of time. In that process there is nothing new. I am continuing what I have, what I have been, which is modified in the present and continues in the future. It is a cycle. In that cycle there is nothing new taking place. There are variations, but it is not something totally new. Whereas if you end something, if you end your belief, your conclusions, your theories, end everything that you have known, then there is a new beginning. And is death a new beginning? Or the continuation of the old? You understand my question?

Please, do pay a little attention. Do consider what the speaker is saying. Because we are facing a great crisis in the world, of which perhaps most of you are not aware. We are facing the atomic bomb, nuclear bomb and all kinds of horrors are there. And we have continued in a certain pattern of existence all of the known days. You have your peculiar culture and you want to perpetuate that culture - if you ever had it, which I question. We want never to end anything. We want a series of movements which is recognizable, which as a sense of continuity, a sense of security and therefore we are afraid to end anything. End a habit, which means we are afraid of something that we have not already recognized, calculated, known.

If this is clear then what is death? The organism through misuse, through conflict, through disease, through malnutrition and so on will naturally come to an end, whether it dies very young, or fifty years, or a hundred and fifty years, it must inevitably come to an end. You can't help it, you can't say, 'Well, postpone it' however much our little brains may want to continue our absurdities. And death means both organically, the brain cells in themselves because of lack of oxygen, and so on, all that ends. That is a fact. Now who is it that dies? The organism, or the psychological inward structure that we have built through forty years, fifty years, or a hundred years? You are following all this? Who is it that dies apart from the organism? Is it thought that has built the whole structure of the 'me' and consciously or unconsciously we are afraid of that structure of the psyche coming to an end?

I do hope you are following, not the words, not the description, but actually discover for ourselves what we are. That is, we have never investigated what we are. The ancient Greeks, about the fourth or third century BC, or fifth century, have said, 'Know thyself'. I am sure all the literature in this country in different ways have said, 'Know yourself'. What is the 'yourself', the self? Don't invent. Don't follow some psychologist, or what the so-called religious literature has said. Find out what is the self, you. It is that you that is clinging to the present and saying 'I don't want to die'. Right? That is clear. So it is important to understand yourself. To understand it, to look at it, to see the nature of the self as you would critically examine something under a microscope, or look at that tree with obvious design, the outlines, the beauty of the light, the green, the shadows, all that. To look. So similarly, can you look at yourself? Because without knowing yourself profoundly, and discovering whether that self is merely - please listen - a series of words, a series of memories, a conditioning according to the various cultures, society, social conditions, economic conditions and so on, whether that self is an actuality or a structure of words. You are following this? Find out sirs, don't agree with me. I am asking a question with which you can't agree or disagree. But you have to find out whether you, that is your form, your name, the things you have learned, the language that you know, the accumulated experience during forty, fifty, thirty, or whatever number of years, all that is not a structure of layers of words and memories. You understand this? Or you are something more than that? When you say, 'I am more than that' - the 'more' is the product of thought also. Right? You are following all this? I want to find some intelligent face with whom I can talk.

So the meaning of the self, the ego, the psyche, is not only the past remembrances, the past memories, those memories may be a thousand years, past structure of various contributory experiences, the 'me' is essentially the product of experience and thought.

Whether you say, 'I am the Atman' - I am this or that, it is still the product of thought. Right? However much you may dislike the idea that you are merely a process of thought, the actuality is that you are. However much you may invent the super, super consciousness, it is still the process of thought. So are you, as a human being, merely, apart from the outer form, merely a structure put together by thought? Yes, sir! If you are, as you are, which is an actuality, then what place has thought and death? You understand? What is the relationship between thought and death, what is the relationship between the living, which is the movement of thought, in different directions, different skills, different specialities and so on, and death? You've got it? Are we communicating with each other? Good.

Now we have to go into something much deeper, which is: our consciousness - you understand by that word consciousness, to be conscious of, to be aware of the content of one's consciousness. The word consciousness from the Greek - I won't go into the etymological meaning - is to recognize, to comprehend. So our consciousness, which is you, is that consciousness different from another? If you say, 'It is my consciousness', which is my struggle, my particular idiosyncrasies, my particular form of expression, my particular form of existence, if you say, 'My consciousness is the result of my thinking, my pain, my loneliness, my relationship, which is a conflict' and so on and so on, is that consciousness different from another. Please go into this very carefully together.

Please, as we said the other day, we are walking together on a path, in beauty, in friendship, with a sense of great affection, together walking on that path, discussing this problem as two friends, this is not a lecture, this is not a 'telling you what to think' or how to think but together we are investigating this question, which is very complex. Therefore one must have a subtle mind, clear thinking, to apply, not just theoretically spin a lot of words. So please bear that in mind when we are talking over together this problem. It is not my problem it is a human problem, it is not your problem, it is the problem of mankind.

So we are asking: is your consciousness, which is what you think, what you feel, all that, your desires, your ambitions, your greed, your violence, is that consciousness different from another? It is not because every human being throughout the world under whatever skies, and whatever the beauty of the land, they all go through what you are going through: sorrow, pain, anxiety, loneliness, depression, arrogance, vanity, the utter sense of hopelessness, just like you. So your consciousness is not yours. Yes sir. It is the consciousness of all mankind. That means, please realize what it means, that you are not an individual, though we are trained, conditioned, religiously, through education, that we are separate entities, separate individuals, trying to reach some other form of thought, some other form of existence. We are not individuals, therefore there is not personal salvation, personal enlightenment. This is a very difficult thing to swallow, to really understand the full significance of this.

So when you die - please go into it, listen carefully - when you die are you, the psyche, dying, or the consciousness continues of all human beings? Have you understood this? Look sir, I die, I am going to die, ten years, another five years, whatever it is, is my consciousness, that is what I think, what I feel, what I have learnt, unlearnt, all the things human beings have collected, for a thousands years, not I have collected, but human beings have collected through millennia upon millennia, I am the result of all that. And my consciousness is similar to the consciousness of the American living far away, who goes through more or less what I have been through, pain, uncertainty, no security, the threat of war, shedding tears, like me, like you. And when I die the consciousness of all humanity continues, but, this is the point, please listen carefully, but if there is a transformation in that consciousness then there is a totally different relationship between that person who is out of that consciousness to the consciousness of all mankind. Have you understood it? No, no sir, please don't agree, it is not a question of agreeing or logically seeing, but the actual experiencing of it, the actual realization that you are not an individual and when you die, unless there is a mutation in your consciousness, the consciousness of humanity continues. But if you, who are part of that consciousness step out of that consciousness you are no longer fearful, uncertain, seeking security, and not finding it, the ending of sorrow, all that, if the brain is not finished with it you are merely contributing to the furtherance of the consciousness. Have you got it?

Please this is not just romantic nonsense, something you would like to have, something that would give hope. When you examine it logically, and most of us avoid, put aside our reason when we begin to think religiously, this demands logical examination, no sense of sentiment, romanticism but careful examination, then you discover that this is the common ground on which all humanity stands, because all humanity suffers, like you. And that consciousness, which is the ground upon which all of us stand, unless there is a movement away from that consciousness you are merely contributing further to that consciousness. And therefore death means - you answer it. I have put the question: so what does death mean? The ending of a physical substance, but thought as a material process, because thought is material, that continues in consciousness.

Now realizing all this let us talk about meditation. That is, if you want to. Which means we have to enquire what is a religious mind? What is a mind that has understood the nature, the true nature of religion? So we have to ask what do we mean by religion? The word religion etymologically is very uncertain. The real meaning of that word the dictionary does not tell you. All it tells you is, when you have looked it up in various dictionaries, the best, will tell you it is to bind, legare, to bind. So that is what the dictionary meaning is. We will leave that aside. We more or less know when we use the word religion, the speaker is using that word in the sense of all the religions that exist now, Christian, Hindu, Buddhism, Islam, all that is organized, the result of propaganda of two, five thousand years, all the rituals, which have lost totally their meaning, a lot of gibberish, all the tradition connected with it - the speaker says that is not religion. Putting on these strange robes doesn't mean you are religious. So the speaker is using that word religion not in the orthodox sense.

So far religion has been the worship of an idol, whether the Christian idol, or Hindu idol - the Buddhists have no idol but they have created their own idols - the Mohammedans have their own scripture which becomes the form of an idol. So mankind has turned to worship idols. We are saying that is not religion because that is invented by thought. Thought either made by hand or by the mind, it is still an idol. Therefore when you worship the idol it is worshipping yourself which is the result of thinking. You are following? So we are using very carefully the word religion. Don't translate it into something else which suits you. It is a simple word with a tremendous content in it, but the content which mankind has put into it is illusion, it has no reality. Reality can only be in living. You can't say, 'I believe in god' and do devilish work. You can't say, 'We are all for peace' and prepare for war. So if you want to have peace, live peacefully. That is, don't hurt another, don't exploit another, don't kill another, don't become corrupt, have a great sense of integrity.

So having examined that word very carefully, we can go much more into it but we haven't time, then what is a religious mind? You understand? That which we call religion is not; all the priests, all the circus that goes on in the name of it is sheer rubbish, whether in the East or West, or North or South. So having described what it is not, I don't know if you have realized something, when you say what is not actually inside and discard it totally, then there is a positive action. The very denial is the positive. I wonder if you see this. Through negation comes the positive. Not saying, 'I am thinking positively'. Right?

So to find out, or to discover, to come upon - that's better - to come upon, approach what is a religious mind, we must enquire then what is meditation? The word meditation means to ponder over. I meditate about a problem. I think over a problem. Or, I ponder over a complex mathematical problem. The meaning of that word is to think over, ponder over, consider, give thought, give attention. That is the meaning of the word meditation, according to various dictionaries, which is the common usage of language. So we are asking, not how to meditate - please see the difference - not how to meditate but what is meditation? Because if you say how to meditate then it becomes very simple; sit in a posture, hold your breath, follow a system, practise this, don't do that - that is not meditation, that is just repetition. Right? That is just continuing the same pattern repeated over and over and over again. Right? So that is not meditation. The system, the breathing, doing yoga, continuing in the same pattern, whether that word be some Koan, or Amen or some other Sanskrit word you use and repeat. That will invariably make the mind dull, obviously. When I keep on repeating, repeating, some kind of word I am mesmerizing myself and so naturally the brain becomes dull. That is what has happened to this country: religion has spoilt, destroyed our thinking capacity because you have followed, obeyed, never questioned, never doubted. Right?

So we are now enquiring into what is meditation? Is meditation apart from life, apart from daily living? That is, give twenty minutes in the morning, go out and do all the mischief you can, then in the afternoon sit quietly. You follow? And then continue in the evening. In the meantime be corrupt, be corrupted, dishonest. Is that meditation? Please enquire carefully. Or, is meditation part of living? Not one part of the day I meditate, the other part of the day

I am raising hell.

So is meditation something other than the understanding, bringing about transformation in the very daily life of one human being? You understand my question? So we are going together into the question of what is it to have a religious mind. And what is it to meditate. And how does meditation relate to daily life? You understand? Now if I don't put order in my daily life, that is inwardly, I cannot have order outwardly. That is very clear. Society is my relationship with another, or with many. Society is made up like that. If I am greedy, ambitious, and you are greedy, ambitious, you are corrupt, I am corrupt, we produce a society, that which you have now in this country. That is a fact. So can I - I am meditating now. Please follow, I am meditating, I am not seeking god. God is another invention of my thought. I wonder if you understand all this? If there is god then god must wish man to have a rotten life. Right? But we human beings, have created god in our image. I wonder if you see all this.

So before - not before - meditation is putting my house in order. My house, not the room, the house in which the mind lives. If the mind is not clear, has integrity, consideration, love, how can I possibly meditate? It has no meaning. So my first concern in meditation is whether I can put my house in order. Logically, please see the logic of it first, the reason of it. Then if you understand the logical conclusions then I must begin with myself, my house. So I am seeking security, security outwardly, security inwardly. Right? That is what all of us are doing. We sacrifice the inward security to the outward security. Right? We are more concerned with the outward security. So we want somebody to guarantee outward security: the government, the business world, if I am a worker the business world must see that I have security. This is what is happening. So we want outward security, and the Communists and the so-called Marxists say have that first, then the human character, the human mind will change. Which means, change the outer, the circumstances, the State, the society, the government, change all that then man will naturally be good. And you have seen the experiment in Russia and all the other parts of Eastern Europe, that doesn't work because man wants freedom. You can't suppress him. And because he is free in the Western world and in India and Asia, parts of Asia, his freedom is to choose. He says, 'I am free because I can choose.' But his freedom is within the field - please listen carefully - within the field of knowledge. You have understood this? So he says, within that field I can choose. Go from one corner to another, North, South, East or West, and he thinks he is free.

So there must be freedom of order, which is intelligence. I wonder if you are understanding all this? So can meditation put the house in order? Or first put the house in order then that very order is meditation? You understand? No, you don't understand, don't agree with something you don't understand. Sirs, are we aware without any direction, aware that we live in disorder? Are we aware of it? Aware in the senses, I know, I live in disorder, my room, the ordinary room, is in disorder, my relationship is in disorder, my struggle, the very conflict indicates disorder. Am I aware of all that? Or the speaker is telling you and then you become aware of it. See the difference. Then you are not aware of it yourself. Somebody is telling you to be aware. I wonder if you see all this. So when you are aware of the fact that you yourself have seen that your house is in disorder and out of that awareness see what are the causes of disorder, when you discover the causes of disorder, the causes, then what has a cause can end. I wonder if you see this?

May I go a little bit further? Don't say 'Yes'. This is not a game we are playing. For god's sake! We have been saying that the universe has no cause. If it had a cause it would end. Anything that has a cause must either continue or end. Continue in the sense of repetition. Cause, effect - no listen - cause, effect, the effect becomes the cause, the cause becomes the effect, it is like a chain. But the universe has not a cause and therefore it is infinite. Right? Whereas human beings have a cause. Which is, their cause is their action is based on either reward or punishment which is a cause - I do this because I am rewarded, or I don't do this because I am punished. You know. This is the common factor in all of us: I will change if you reward me; or, if you punish me I will change. Therefore our existence has a cause, therefore - please follow it - therefore our existence because it has a cause can come to an end, which is death. You are following all this?

So can the house be put in order without conflict, without determination, 'I must have', which again brings conflict? Or the house can be kept in order, the inward house, by perception, only perception. That is, to see 'what is', not 'what should be', to see 'what is' and remain with it. I wonder if you understand this? Look sir: I am in sorrow, suppose I am in sorrow, that is part of my house. The sorrow which has come about for various reasons, my son is dead, my brother is dead, the husband, whoever it is, dead, sorrow, and never to escape from it, never to rationalize it because then you are away, you are moving away from the fact of sorrow. That is, when you rationalize it, when you say past life, when you try to analyze it, that is moving away from 'what is'. If thought doesn't move away from 'what is' then you hold it. Right? Like a vessel that holds water, that sorrow is the water and your mind is the vessel and it is holding it. Not moving away from it, which means you have given complete attention to that which you are holding. I wonder if you are following? You are following this sir?

Then when you give total attention, which is total perception, then that which you are holding has no meaning any more. I wonder if you understand. Please just verbally understand it. But when you begin to realize the depth of it, the beauty of such a thing, then you are putting - the mind itself is putting order in itself. You are not separate from the mind, you are that. So when you hold it without any movement the mind itself is in order.

Now, suppose you have put the house in order, which you have not unfortunately, if you had we would have a different society, different government, different relationship with each other. But since you have not that is up to you. But suppose, if you have put your house in order, complete order by understanding totally what is disorder, not understanding what is order, by understanding what is disorder, out of that comprehension, realization, awareness and giving your total attention to the various contributory causes of that disorder, then order comes without you seeking order. Then what is meditation? You understand?

Are you working as hard as the speaker is working? No, you are not, obviously. Oh gosh! Then what is meditation? Can you look at that tree without the word, without the remembrance that it is called a tree, only observe without any movement of the past interfering with your observation? Have you ever tried this? No, of course not. Just look now sir. There is that tree in front of you. Look at it, if I may suggest, without the word, without the naming, the species, just to observe the whole tree. Can you do it? Similarly, can you look at yourself without the word, without all the past remembrances throwing themselves and so preventing your observation of yourself as you are? You understand? Is this too much in one talk? Please. Are you following what I am saying? No, sir, it is not a moment for a conversation, sorry.

Can you look at yourself, which is meditation, please we are meditating now, can you look at yourself without the process of recognition taking place? That is, can you look at yourself without the observer, who is the past, and looking at the present? You understand? What am I to do? Sir, let me go on, you listen if you can catch it, if you can't it's up to you.

Is truth something that is related to the past? Is truth something that you can capture and hold? Or truth is something that is nameless, timeless, and to come to it, to approach it, there is no path to it. Right? If there is a path to it, it is a fixed point. But truth is a living thing, it is not something dead, static, it is living, dynamic, full of something extraordinary. So as long as the brain is conditioned in the field of knowledge, that is - may I go into it a little bit - that is, our brain is conditioned by experience, experience brings about knowledge, that knowledge is stored in the brain, in the cells of the brain, which then is memory, that memory acts as thought, from thought there is action. In this cycle we are caught, if you observe yourself you can see the fact. Whether your experience or a thousand years experience it is stored, which becomes knowledge - scientific knowledge, technological knowledge, the knowledge of relationship, knowledge. From that knowledge there is memory, knowledge is memory, memory then responds as thought to a challenge, of course: you ask me a question, I reply from memory. And that memory, its reaction is thought, then thought acts, from that action you learn. So you are back again in this cycle. That is, experience, knowledge, memory, thought, action, from action you learn, modify, past knowledge, you are caught in the cycle. Right? That is how the brain functions. Because in that there is complete security, which is mechanical. I don't know if you are following?

So meditation is enquiring, asking, questioning, whether there is an action which is not based on this chain, on this momentum, in this process. Ask yourself this question sir: is there an action which is not based on knowledge? Ask it, find out. Because all our action is based on knowledge, which is thought. And therefore as thought is limited because knowledge is limited, there is no complete knowledge about anything, you can't, therefore thought is limited. Right? Please see that. So is there an action which is not limited? Understood my question? I will give you an example, if I may, which is: most people are nationalistic, their patriotism, their flag and all that nonsense. And the brain has become accustomed to that. And we see the importance of global relationship. Right? Because it is coming, it is taking place now but we still stick to our nationalism. Global relationship is becoming more important, it has to take place, but our brain refuses to respond to that because we are conditioned, we are trained, our education says some dirty little flag, paper, to salute it, to worship it and all that kind of nonsense. So the brain refuses and yet it sees the necessity of the other, so there is a conflict. Now to end that conflict don't be a national. You understand? So our brain refuses to move from that which it has known.

Meditation is to understand the whole movement of the known, and to see whether it is possible to move away from it. Sir, you understand, that requires sensitivity. That means the senses must be awakened, not just one part of them. So meditation is to put the house in order. Meditation is to understand the nature of knowledge, knowledge of the books, the Vedas, Upanishads, and all that stuff, to understand the nature of knowledge and to see how dangerous it is becoming because it is repetitive. And to see, to observe this knowledge and hold that knowledge so completely that itself begins to - it is like holding water, it soon drips away. But you have to hold it, you have to see where knowledge is necessary, where knowledge is not necessary.

Then what is meditation? We are still pursuing, please. Which is to have mind a that has put its house in order, has seen the very complex nature of knowledge, and to find out whether there is an action, a way of living without the whole burden of knowledge. And then also to enquire what is attention? And what is concentration? Because that is part of meditation.

Concentration any person can do. Right? From school you are taught that, concentrate on a book, when you really want to look out of the window the teacher comes along and bangs you on the head, or tells you to concentrate on the book. So you learn very quickly to concentrate on the book. Which means you focus all your energy on a particular point, on a particular page, on a particular skill; if you are a scientist you concentrate on that, or if you are a businessman, concentrate on making money, cheating, you know the whole business of it. No, you all cheat, don't laugh. We are not insulting the business man. You are so ready to laugh at somebody, you are not ready to laugh at yourself. So we more or less know the consequences of concentration, forcing thought to come to a certain point. That is to resist all intrusion of other thoughts, to give thought a particular point upon which it can dwell constantly.

And the other is attention. Attention is not concentration. Attention - now just a minute. Can you attend completely on that tree, attend, which means to look with all your energy, with all your nervous energy, capacity, with all that look? And when you do so look with your total attention there is no centre from which you are looking. Right? Do experiment with this. Look at it. Somebody. Yes, look at your wife, or your husband, or these strange people sitting in front of me, look at them, giving your complete attention. In that attention there is no point from which you are looking, you are taking the whole thing in. You understand? No, you haven't done this.

So attention is far more important than concentration because concentration is merely focusing on one point; attention has no borders because it has no centre so as to have a border. You understand? That which has a centre has a diameter, but when there is no centre there is no periphery. Attention is that.

please follow all this - the mind has put the house in order, has understood the nature of knowledge. Knowledge is necessary to go home, to drive a car, to speak, to do that, but psychological knowledge is not necessary. Psychological knowledge is the 'me', the accumulated experiences and so on. So also I have to understand attention, concentration. Then I am asking: such a mind is completely silent. Either that silence is illusory, put together by thought, determined to be silent. Or silence has no cause. I wonder if you follow this? So the mind has been through all this, not ideationally but actually, then what is silence? There is that whistle of the train, the silence between that whistle and another whistle, the silence between two notes, two noises, between two sounds, the silence between two thoughts, all that is still within the realm of cognition. But when the mind is completely silent it is not aware that it is silent. It must be otherwise be merely playing tricks. I wonder if you understand?

So is there a silence without any cause, and therefore that silence has no end? That which has a cause can end, but a silence that has no cause has no ending. It doesn't say, 'Can I maintain it?' I wonder if you follow all this? Because that silence is absolutely necessary, because in that silence there is no movement of thought. In that silence only that which is sacred, that which is nameless, which is not measurable by thought is. And that which is, is the most sacred. This is meditation. Right sirs.

RISHI VALLEY 1ST TALK WITH STUDENTS

10TH DECEMBER 1981

K: What would you like to talk about?

Q: I would like to ask you a question.

K: Yes, sir.

Q: I have been staying in the school for eight years now, and you have said that the complete development of the human being is the most important thing but...

K: The school has not provided it.

Q:... the school has not provided the ambience for this development.

K: The school has not provided the proper education, proper development of the human mind. That is the question, isn't it? Any other question?

Q: Sir, you say knowledge is limited, where do you draw the line and say this is the limit of knowledge?

K: Any more questions? The school has not provided the proper, not only ambience, environment, but also has not helped each human being, each one of you, to cultivate the whole of your being. Right, Sir? And the other question is: where does one draw the line between knowledge and the freedom from knowledge? Right?

Q: Yes.

K: Any more questions?

Q: Sir, why do we place so much importance to words?

K: Why do we give so much importance to words. By Jove!
Anything else?

Q: Is there a passion which does not die after some time?

K: All right I have got it. Is there a passion which doesn't wither away after a while? Right? I'll answer all those questions presently.

May I ask you a question? Are you all happy here?

Q: Yes.

Q: No.

K: Just a minute, don't be so eager. Are you all happy? Wait a minute, I'll tell you what I mean by happiness. Do you look at the birds? Do you look at all the trees, the plants, the flowers, those hills which are the oldest hills in the world, one of the oldest? Do you look at the moon in the evening? Do you? Not quite! Do you look at the evening star when there is no other star in the sky? Do you? Or you are only concerned with books? Would you answer that question? Are you only concerned with the books that your teacher, your educator puts before you? Or do you look at all this world - a most extraordinary world it is, the beauty of the skies in the evening? Do you? Does each one of you look at it? Or you are too occupied with your books, with your worries, with your play, with your amusement? I am asking a question, would the older boys be good enough to answer that question? And girls.

Q: Many of the senior boys are fully occupied.

K: Yes, occupied with books. So you neglect all this. And you call that happiness, you call that being happy when you are only concerned with books. Have you ever considered what happens to your brain when you are only concerned with books? Have you? Have you ever given thought to the state of your brain, mind, your capacity to observe when you are only concerned with what is printed in a book? Don't your teachers tell you to look at the birds, to look at trees?

Q: We may look at them but we don't do anything further about it, and then we go back to our books.

K: So books have become very important, why?

Q: There seems to be no other way, we have to pass examinations.

K: So you are only concerned with examinations.

Q: I have to get a job when I grow big.

K: You have to get a job and so you have to pass examinations. And do you know how many people are after that one job that you want? You understand my question? I pass from this school to college, university, and I pass some kind of examination with a few alphabets after my name, do you know how many people are at? For one job there are about ten thousand people for one job. Right? Are you aware of this? Yes sir?

Q: What shall we do if we don't pass examinations?

K: I didn't say you shouldn't pass examinations. I said are you aware of it. Are you aware that after you have passed your examinations - BA, MA, PhD, whatever it is - there are so many other people after that job, after any job. Are you aware of this? Are you? Yes?

Q: In order to compete against them you have to do well and perform well in exams.

K: I am asking a different question, lady. I am asking, are you aware after you have passed your exams, that when you seek one job, your particular job, your particular work, there are thousands after that work - are you aware of it? What do you say? Yes, sir? Do you know how dangerous it is, that you may not get the job you want? So what are you going to do? You leave here, if you are lucky you go to college, then after that university, then you search for a job - your uncle, or your father, or some kind of distant relative pulls wires, and you may get a job if you are lucky. But if you don't, what will you do? Most people don't. You understand what I am saying? Then what will you do? Come on sir. You see, you don't think far enough. You just think of passing some beastly examination, and then lost. Right? Then what will you do? What good have your examinations been if you don't get a job?

Q: We have to study hard to avoid that possibility.

K: So you are studying hard to avoid that possibility. What about the other people who don't get a job?

Q: For them exams are useless.

K: If you don't get a job will the examinations be useless? Not for them, for you.

Q: It will be useless for me too because I am doing the exams for the job.

K: My god! This is the school that you are producing. You are only concerned about yourself, aren't you? Right? Right, sir?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Be honest.

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Good. You are only concerned about yourself. As long as you get a job, you hope to be secure, enough money, married, children and a house. And that's all you are concerned about, aren't you? Be honest.

Q: Honestly I am not. I am not concerned about those things but that is generally what happens.

K: So what are you concerned about?

Q: There is so much misery in the world.

K: So you are concerned with misery, are you? What are you going to do about it?

Q: I am conscious of it but I am not sure what I can do about it.

K: Where do you start to understand the misery of the world? Is the world outside there different from you?

Q: Sir, I think if you want to do something about what is happening outside, then you have to do something about yourself.

K: Do you start with yourself? Or those are just words?

Q: I think, sir, it is more words.

K: Just words. So you add some more words to the words you already know. What kind of school is this? Would you tell me?

Q: It is like any other school and then...

K: It is like any other school, and what else?

Q: It is situated in a beautiful valley.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, I asked you a question at the beginning. Are you happy here? Because it is very important to be happy while you are very young, isn't it?

Q: It depends on what you call happiness.

K: I explained, sir. What do you call happiness?

Q: For me it is something that is just passing.

K: Yes. So are you so happy?

So I will ask also, if I may, what would you like me to talk about. You have put three questions: what place has knowledge, and the division between knowledge and freedom, and so on. What would you like me to talk about? What are you interested in?

Books? Exams? Is that all that you are interested in? Would you kindly tell me.

Q: I don't know what I am interested in because at times I am interested in something, I study, and then after some time I find that I don't feel interested. So I don't really know what I am interested in.

K: How will you find out? Are you waiting for somebody to tell you?

Q: I am not waiting for somebody to tell me.

K: Therefore how will you find out what you are really deeply interested in?

Q: He also asked a question, is there a passion that doesn't die away.

K: What do you call passion? What is passion to you? Passion to paint? Passion to be a first-class carpenter, first-class scientist? Not just pass some little examination that says you are a scientist but to have passion behind it, vitality, energy, drive. Have you passion for anything? To be very well dressed? Passion to be the most really religious man? Do you have any passion? Good heavens!

And you also asked a question about the division in knowledge. What is knowledge? Have you ever asked yourself what is knowledge? Somebody raised that question. What is knowledge? Not only learning from books, but also watching: watching the movement of the leaves, watching the hills, watching the trees grow, how the birds fly. By watching, not by learning from a book. So what is knowledge? I wish you would discuss it with me, will you. What to you is knowledge?

Q: Knowledge is experience.

K: All right, knowledge comes from experience. Does it? Right. Now what is experience? You drive along in a car, rather fast and you have an accident. I hope you don't, but people do. And that is an experience, isn't it? Right? You have an experience when you go to a hospital, being sick. Right? You have an experience when there is a thunderstorm. Right? You have an experience when you learn something new. Right? You have an experience when you see or feel something that you have never felt before. Right? So all these are various forms of experiences. What do you learn from those experiences? To avoid an accident? Right? To observe the light on the leaf and watch it very carefully. So all that, all those experiences leave a record which is called knowledge. Right? Would you agree to that? All of you, do you agree to that?

Q: Yes.

K: Then what happens? You have knowledge of an accident, you have knowledge of a hospital where you have been sick, you have knowledge of seeing something totally new; so what happens after that knowledge? You have learnt, or been taught mathematics; you have learnt from the books, you have listened to your educator, and you have gathered information. Right? And that you call knowledge. That knowledge is stored in the brain, isn't it? Right? Agree? And what happens after that?

Q: You apply that knowledge.

K: How do you apply that knowledge? I have learnt, I have been apprentice to a carpenter, a master carpenter, he has taught me how to use the instruments, to feel the quality of the wood, and so on. For a few years I have studied, I have learnt. And that learning becomes the knowledge and I am going to use that knowledge. Right? Right? Now what happens between knowledge, before action? Think with me, learn from me, don't just answer it, learn. I have seen, experienced, I see from experience there is knowledge, but before that knowledge is put into action what takes place?

Q: Thought operates.

K: Thought operates. You follow, look what happens: experience, knowledge, thought and action. Right? Have you got that? I have an experience, from that experience I gather a great deal of knowledge, then I think how to put that knowledge into action. So experience, knowledge, memory, then thought, then action. From that action you learn more. Right? All that is the process of knowledge, thought and action. That's clear? You have learnt in the school, if you have, a great deal of information as knowledge about engineering; you go to college, there you learn more about engineering, mathematics, pressure and so on; then you go to university, there you are also getting more and more knowledge; and then you get a job, if you are lucky, then you operate skilfully or not skilfully according to the knowledge that you have acquired. Is that clear? Have you understood that?

Now just a minute: I have explained, I have put into words what actually goes on in the brain. Now do you see that for yourself, the fact of that, or you have made an idea of it? You understand?

Q: I don't understand.

K: No, you don't. All right. First of all do you see the difference between the word and the thing? The word 'microphone' is not the microphone. Have you understood that? No, no, don't say, yes, unless you completely understand this. The word is not the thing.

Q: The properties of matter, you can see, is not the thing.

K: Come over here. Come and sit down, sir.

Q: The properties which we see...

K: Be simple with me. Not, the property you see. You see that clock, you see that pillar, you see that tree. Go on. The word 'clock' is not the actual thing.

Q: But we are saying...

K: Have you understood what I said?

Q: How can you say it is not the thing?

K: Not how can I, the word clock, is not the actual clock, the thing. The word is not the thing. The word 'father' is not actually your father.

Q: That word only creates a picture of what it is.

K: First see the word is not the thing.

Q: It is synonymous with the thing, it is almost synonymous with the thing.

K: But first, sir, see, it may be synthesis, it may be this, but see the difference how our mind works. The word, say, clock, you immediately imagine that. Right? We don't separate the word from the thing. Right?

Q: Sir, we are always caught up in this.

K: What's your name?

Q: Sapan.

K: Sapan. All right. The word 'Sapan' is not you.

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Though that indicates you. That describes you. But the description is not you. I describe the mountain, I paint the mountain, I write a poem about the mountain, but the poem, the description, the picture is not the actual mountain. Got it?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: You are sure?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Quite?

Q: Then the question arises, what is the mountain, what am I?

K: I am not asking what you are.

Q: But I am.

K: You may be a cuckoo! But I am asking you a very simple question. The word mountain is not the actual rock, the tree, all that. Do you agree to that?

Q: Yes.

K: Good, I am glad. So next is: the knowledge that you have acquired through experience, knowledge, memory, thought, all that is part of you, isn't it? Right? Right? Now the question was asked: is there freedom or division between knowledge and non-knowledge. This is rather difficult. Now you have acquired a great deal of knowledge from books, what other people have said. Agreed? And you repeat that for the rest of your life, don't you. Getting a little more or a little less but you keep on repeating that. Right? So what happens to you, to your brain?

Q: It is not your own.

K: Which means what?

Q: It comes from my parents.

K: Go on sir, enquire. What does that mean? That you are all secondhand human beings. Right? Right? He doesn't like to say that. He doesn't like to acknowledge that he is a secondhand human being.

Q: If I have to discard all the knowledge that is given to me it would take ages.

K: I don't quite follow.

Q: If I have to pick up all the knowledge it would take ages.

K: Of course, sir. Probably it would take many thousand years. But see the point that as long as we are learning about something from others, say for example, if you want to be a scientist, you have to study all the previous scientists and their discoveries, all this knowledge is stored up in books, by your study, it is there in your mind. You can't start right from the beginning to discover what science is, others have discovered it, and so you learn about it, and you repeat what other people have said. Right? Right? Do you agree to all that? Do you? Don't be shy. That is what you are doing old boys.

Q: What is wrong with doing that?

K: Oh, what is wrong with doing that. You are like a machine, aren't you if you keep on repeating, repeating what other people have said. It is just like a machine going round and round and round.

Q: I certainly don't have the feeling that I am a machine.

K: Of course not. You don't have the feeling that you are a machine. But you are. You don't like to think you are a machine. Probably you are studying, I don't know what you are studying, suppose you are studying mathematics, and that's your subject in which you are going to pass your examinations, and you become a professor in mathematics in some unfortunate university, and what happens? You repeat what you have learnt. Right? And you tell the other students to repeat what they have learnt. So gradually your mind, your brain becomes mechanical, like a machine going round and round and round. You may discover something in going round and round, but it is still round and round. Agree?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Are you quite sure?

Q: When I become a mathematics professor I won't be doing mathematics all the time.

K: No, of course not.

Q: I will be doing interesting things as well.

K: You will be doing other interesting things? Which means you are not interested in mathematics! So you realize what you are doing with your life? It's your life: school, college, university, passing some exams, adding some alphabets after your name, and for the rest of your life you do this.

Q: What is the alternative?

K: Do you want to find out? Do you want to learn about it? Do you? Seriously? Will you give as much time as you have done to study mathematics or to your study? Or is it just a passing interest? You want the alternative. I'll tell you what the alternative is. But you must give time to it, won't you. Right? Will you? So you are just asking what is the alternative because it doesn't matter. What matters is exams, title, job.

Q: Sir, but even that alternative is again you are going to do the same thing. Once you say that you want an alternative you are still in the field of knowledge.

K: That's right. Quite right. The field of knowledge. So you move from one knowledge to the other. Knowledge is the same. So do you want to find out how to live a life where knowledge is necessary, where knowledge is not necessary? Knowledge is necessary if you are a carpenter; knowledge is necessary if you want to drive a car; knowledge is necessary if you want to be a businessman, or an engineer, or some crook. Right? Knowledge is all necessary there. Now find out, find out where knowledge is not necessary, or may not be necessary. Find out. Exercise your brain to find out. Do you understand my question?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: All my life I have worked in this field. I go from one corner to the other and I think I am free, but it is still in the same field. Right? I realize that. That's not freedom. It is like a donkey tied to a tether, it thinks it is very, very free because it has got that length of rope, but it is not free. Right? So I have to ask if there is freedom first. Which means freedom from this. Right?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Now how will you find out?

Q: But there isn't any freedom from that. The prime thing is to pass exams, get a job and feel secure. Where is freedom from this?

K: That's what I am asking, sir, there is no freedom from this. As long as you want that there is no freedom from it. You understand? As long as I want a job, good money, house, family, I am stuck there. If I want freedom I have to enquire. I have to say, what is freedom, from what?

Q: You have to enquire into what you want to get freedom from.

K: That's right. First freedom from. Now I am violent. I want to be free from violence. That's one. I want to be free from pain. I want to be free from public opinion. Which none of you want. Right? Right, sir? Public opinion matters very much to you, doesn't it? What? Agree? But you don't want to be free from that, do you? You are frightened what people might say about you. Have you heard of Bernard Shaw? The writer. He is dead. He had over his mantelpiece, 'People say, let them say'. You understand? You have understood?

Q: Yes sir.

K: Do you understand that?

Q: That is again an escape from what people are saying.

K: No, no, old boy. You know people say all kinds of things. All right. People say all kinds of things about me. Who cares? They might say good things, they might say bad things, they might say things to hurt you; let them say what they want, who cares? But you all do.

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Why?

Q: The world which I have figured for myself, public opinion is also an important factor, apart from job and security.

K: So are you frightened of public opinion? Of course you are. You don't even know about it.

Q: What happens after death?

K: Oh! (Laughter) Why are we all laughing? Because a little boy asks what happens after death. We will talk about it another time, but now we are talking of what happens before death, not after.

Q: Sir, some people say who have been dying, and are supposed dead, when they come back they say they went through a tunnel, and at the other end they found their friends shouting at them.

K: Look, don't talk about death now, we will do it another time. Let's talk about what happens before we die, shall we? Right?

Have you ever looked at yourself, apart from the mirror, I don't mean that. Have you looked at yourself? Have you?

Q: Yes, sir, but all the time I have always been forming images about myself that I am this, and I am that, and it does not get me anywhere.

K: Agreed. Now why do you have images about yourself? Listen to my question. Can you look at yourself without any image? Or look at yourself who are the maker of images? Or can you look at the image that you have made about yourself? This applies to all of us. Can you look at yourself, which is your image, look at it? Can you look at your image that you have made of yourself?

Q: It is strongly embedded in me.

K: So you are the image, are you? Right? Right, sir? Do you agree to that? Silence! You make a statement that your image is strongly embedded; and I say look at that strongly embedded image, can you? I see you are not used to thinking things out for yourself. Right?

Q: Everything seems to go blank.

K: I know. Why? How old are you?

Q: Fifteen.

K: Remain fifteen, nice, don't grow old. We have talked for an hour, is that enough? Is that enough?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes! The boy says, yes. What do you say?

Q: You have not answered a single question.

K: Of course not. I have not answered a single question, that boy says. Why? I am not escaping, I am not avoiding. I can answer all your questions but I haven't answered them because I want you to think it out for yourself. I can help you to think it out, but you see you are used to asking a question and somebody answers it, so you have stopped questioning yourself. Right? But whereas if I say, look, you have asked a question like passion, like knowledge, enquire into it, look into it, exercise your mind to understand it, not what I say but find out. That way you have a good brain. But if I say, well, passion is this, or the end of knowledge, and so on, if I explain it all very carefully, which I will, I am not frightened of explanation, but at the end of it what will you do? You will repeat that explanation. Right? Whereas if you and I can think together, explore together, find out, learn, but you are not doing that. Your minds, your brains, are used to being told what to do, how to think. But I don't want to do that. I want, if we can, to help each other to find out, to learn about things anew, fresh.

Is that enough, an hour? Is that enough, sir?

Q: We can continue.

K: Poor chap, he says, you can continue, in a meek voice! I think that is enough for this morning. Will you sit quietly for two or three minutes. Absolutely quiet. Keep your eyes closed. Don't let your body move, twist, fingers, just sit absolutely quiet.

(Long pause) - All right sirs.

RISHI VALLEY 2ND TALK WITH STUDENTS 15TH DECEMBER 1981

K: What would you like me to talk about?

Q: Sir, can we go on where we left off last time?

K: Where did we leave off?

Q: You said there was an alternative to the way we were living, and you said that you wouldn't provide the answers and that we would have to look for them ourselves with your help.

K: All right sir.

First, may I talk a little bit about what I want to talk about and then we can talk about what you want? I would like to ask a question: what do we mean by learning? We learn mostly from books, printed word, or instructed, or told, or informed by the educator, who is already chock full of his own particular subject. We learn through hearing, seeing; and also we learn, if I may use the word, through our heart, which is affection, sympathy, generosity. So there are several ways of learning about life, which is a very complex process. And most schools, and most educational institutions are concerned only with book knowledge. And that knowledge limits our minds, our brains. And we are only using part of our brain, not the whole of our brain. If you are interested in it we can go into the idea, or into the reality of what it is to live or to act with a holistic mind, holistic brain. That is, with the whole of your brain, not with only one small part of it. The small part of it is the accumulated knowledge called learning from experience, from books, from incidents, from observation and so on.

So learning apparently as it is now being taught or learnt is limited to a particular subject, to a particular field, scientific, biological and so on. So is there a learning which is not restricted to a particular point of view? Is there a learning which is not only with the eyes but also with the hearing, not only with the sensual ears but listening much more deeply? And learning from your heart, if I can use that word, or that sense, which is as I said generosity, sympathy, a great deal of affection, consideration, kindness, a great sense of love. When all the three are in complete harmony, working together, that is holistic, or the operation of the whole of the brain.

Because most of us are very selfish, concerned with ourselves, concerned about our exams, concerned about our future, concerned about our own particular little problems, concerned about our own success and so on. Most of us are very, very self-centred. You understand that word, self-centred? That is, very selfish. And apparently we seem to find it terribly difficult to move out of that area. Surely education is not only concerned with the so-called academic side but also it is concerned with the whole development of man, which is your heart, your hearing, your seeing, and learning about yourself: learning what you are. And through that learning go beyond yourself. This is surely part of our education, not merely fix your eyes on a book; there is this vast beautiful valley, this country, seeing what is happening in this country; corruption seems to be the way of life, where tribalism is growing more and more, separatism, the south against the north, the east against the west, and so on. Learning about what the government is, learning about the way you act, the way you think, the way you live. So all that is part of our learning. And nobody can teach you how to learn about yourself. The psychologists, the psychiatrists and the philosophers, have pointed out, what you think, you are. So if we follow them, you are following not what you are but what they think you are. I hope this is clear.

So education is really basically to learn about yourself and your relationship to the world, your relationship to your brother, to your wife, to your husband, to your sister, to your neighbour and so on. Because if we don't learn to understand our relationship with each other we cannot possibly create a new society. And that is part of our education. And also it is part of our education to see that we are good human beings. We explained what that word means. So this is the whole process of learning about the world and oneself, and the relationship between yourself and the world.

Now, I will ask you a question to continue with what we were talking about the other day.

Q: I just wanted to ask one thing: you said that it is important to learn through sympathy and affection. I don't understand that.

K: He is asking: it is important to learn about sympathy, affection, generosity and all that, and he says, 'I don't understand what you mean by it'. Is it so very difficult to be generous? You have to learn about it? If you have a shirt, an extra shirt, will you give it to somebody?

Q: No.

K: No, sir! Quite right. There is all this vast poverty around you, and you seem to be fairly well off, or your parents are well off, and you have got an extra shirt, or extra skirt, will you give it to somebody who is poorer than you? Have you ever done it? That is, to give it to somebody without asking anything in return, that is generosity.

Q: I have, sir, but I have noticed one thing: it is only at certain times that we are prompted to do this.

K: He is only generous at certain times.

Q: He says he is only prompted to do it at certain periods.

K: He is not generous all the time, he is generous when it suits him.

Q: I wouldn't say that either.

K: You won't say that either. Then when are you generous? We are not restricting this to him alone: when are you generous? Are you generous at any time?

Q: When you are happy.

K: When you are happy you are generous. Is that it? When are you happy? So are you saying we are only generous when it suits us, really? Right? When it is convenient for us; when you have some old clothes to give away you are very generous.

Q: No.

K: Are you saying no? When are you then generous? When are you feeling affectionate, kind, generous, sympathetic? Or do you never feel it? Or only occasionally?

Q: Only occasionally.

K: Why, sir? When you say, occasionally, what do you mean by that word? Rarely. Is it?

Q: I would say that.

K: You would say that. That is once a year.

Q: No time, sir.

K: When do you feel generous?

Q: When I am moved by something.

K: When you are moved by something. It is a strange phenomenon, isn't it? Sir, last night you saw that beautiful dance, were you moved by it? Moved in the sense you felt the movement of it, you felt you could almost dance yourself? You followed the rhythm. What made you do that? You saw the beauty of it, the rhythm, the posture, the vitality, the strength of it, and it appealed to you, your sense of the aesthetic, the beauty was aroused. Right? At the moment would you have given anything? You forgot yourself, didn't you?

Q: I very nearly did.

K: Sir, can you be generous without a motive? To give somebody something without a motive?

Q: I don't think so.

K: No. So you are not generous, it is only when it suits you. Not you, sir, I am talking generally, to the whole lot of us. So we neglect totally all that side, the beauty of the land.

Sirs, may I ask you a question, all of you? You know this country is in a state of corruption, corruption is the way of life here. Right? Do you all agree to that? Right? What are you going to do about it? Will you join that corruption?

Q: I really don't know, sir.

K: You don't know. But I am asking you, what will you do. Now think about it sir. Isn't it part of your education to find out your relationship to this country, which is politically, religiously, economically in a state of corruption?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir, yes, I know all that. What will you do about it? What is your responsibility about it?

Q: I don't even know that I shall do anything about it.

K: Can you do anything about politics which is corrupt?

Q: I don't know.

K: You can't. Can you stop the corruption of the other people?

You can't, can you?

Q: No.

K: So will you be responsible not to be corrupt yourself?

Q: I can do that.

K: You can do that. So you are responsible not to be corrupted.

Q: That way you become selfish again.

K: Ah! That way, the girl says, you become selfish again.

Would that be selfishness to say I will not be part of this corruption?

Q: You start thinking about yourself again.

K: No. You may think about yourself, but surely when you see corruption around you, not to join that corruption is not selfishness.

Q: But that is not going to get rid of corruption.

K: Of course not, but you at least are not corrupt. Right? That's something, isn't it?

Q: You won't know what is right and what is not.

K: What do you mean what is right?

Q: I mean you know the actions are not right.

K: Yes, sir, just listen. You know what corruption is, do you know what that word means?

Q: I know what it means today.

K: The word comes from Latin, which means to break, rompere is to break. You understand? Break something to pieces.

Corruption exists as long as you act fragmentarily. Do you understand what I have said? No, careful. As long as you act contradictorily for yourself, say one thing and do another. That's corruption. Promise and not keep that promise, that is corruption. Think one thing and do something else, that is corruption. Which means you are fragmented, broken up, self-contradictory. Right? That is corruption. Corruption is that, and also corruption as it is understood is to bribe, cheat, be dishonest, all that is corruption. Now will you join that group who are corrupt?

Q: I wouldn't like to join them but I don't know.

Q: At this stage one is reminded of an old saying: if you can't beat them, join them. (Laughter)

K: I know this. If you can't beat them, join them. If you can't lift it, paint it. Now I am asking you a very serious question, sir, because we are all facing that in this country, where corruption is the way of life. Will you, as an educated person, sympathetic, generous, will you join that? Don't say, no, or yes. Think about it, look at it, go into it. Because, sir, do you realize one person can do a tremendous lot. You have heard of Hitler, haven't you? Look, one man, what he did. He was a crazy man, but look what he did. So if you are incorruptible, absolutely, then you will stand against the whole current, won't you? Can you?

Q: Sir...

K: Don't answer something else, sir. I am asking you.

Q: That life may be wrong. If you are going to withstand that, it is going to be a lonely life.

K: Lead a lonely life. Stick to what you think is right. This is right, not to join the corrupt world.

Q: Sir, that current of corruption is very strong in this country.

K: I know that, sir, we have agreed to that. What will you do about it? Will you stand up against it? Isn't that part of your education to find out if you can withstand all that ugliness? Do you realize, sir, the gurus are corrupt, religion is corrupt, politics is corrupt, our relationship is corrupt, and you are being educated to join all that? Do sirs, please answer me. You are all very good at discussing, arguing, tell me.

Q: Sir, I can resist corruption or not, but I consider one thing that I won't be corrupt. That is, I won't do a job which will make me corrupt. I will take up a job where I won't be corrupt. I'll find it.

K: Will you, as you grow up, will you stand up against all that?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Sir, listen, if you say, 'Yes, sir', you mean it and stick to it. You may starve, you may have no job.

Q: He said that he will do a job like farming, with no corruption, and not join the corrupt gang.

K: So will you become a farmer?

Q: Yes.

K: That's right, sir.

Q: We can't all become farmers.

K: Of course not. We are all so afraid to go against the current, to stand alone. Right? Why?

Q: Because deep down in every human being...

K: No, not in every human being, about you.

Q: OK. It was me I was talking about.

K: Yes.

Q: Deep down in me I have got a feeling that I want to be part of the whole.

K: Part of the gang?

Q: Yes.

Q: You feel quite secure in that position.

Q: I feel that if you want to go against the crowd you have to have a lot of mental strength.

K: Exactly. You need a lot a strength to stand up against all this. Will you learn about it, how to have strength to stand against all this? You see you really want to go with the current. Right? So you are all cowards. Yes, sir. Right sir?

You asked the other day if there was an alternative to exams, jobs, and all that. Do you want an alternative? You started that question, some of you, do you want an alternative? Do you want to find out?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes? Suppose we get a hundred acres and will you learn how to farm, be trained in that, and a few of you join together and start farming on your own, will you? You understand my question? We are thinking of getting a hundred acres, somewhere, where those of you who do not want to join the gang, or the corrupt business, can go there, learn all about farming and go out and buy a piece of land, perhaps two or three of you together and start farming - would you undertake that?

Q: Right now I am financially dependent on my mother.

K: You are. So tell your father, have the courage, the guts to say to your father, 'I don't want to go and join this stupid business, I want to go and farm, with a few of us'. Will you do that? The other day you asked what is the alternative. Are you frightened of that too?

Q: I don't want to become a farmer, it doesn't sound very hopeful.

Q: He is a lawyer!

K: And becoming a lawyer is very hopeful? Do you know how many people there are who want to become lawyers? You asked for an alternative the other day, and there is this alternative, something else other than the usual passing exam, jobs and stuck for the rest of your life.

Q: There is no security in the job, there is not enough security in farming as a family job.

K: What are you talking about?

Q: Ask the farmer today.

K: It all depends. If two or three of you joined together and bought so many acres, or a hundred acres, you could get a marvellous living out of it.

Q: Excuse me. Speaking for myself, I have a natural sort of inclination - well, what I am saying is that this life seems too good to be true, and naturally I am cautious.

K: What do you mean too good to be true?

Q: I am getting all that I want.

Q: He means here.

K: Farming.

Q: The life seems too good to be true, so naturally I get cautious.

K: What?

Q: He seems to imply that if he took to farming his life would be too good to be true, he has no challenge.

K: There is plenty of challenge.

Q: No, I don't mean that.

Q: What do you mean?

Q: You said that you could get some land and farm of it.

K: A group of you.

Q: A group of us.

K: You understand? Get the idea first. A group of you, with your parent's help, after being trained to be good farmers, you know, modern farmers, buy a piece of land for yourself, with the help of your parents - they will give it to you - and work at that. You are completely secure there.

Q: Yes, sir, that is what I am saying. So I am a human being, naturally I am cautious of that because we have come to a stage where everything we are offered has got something else, some strings attached to it.

K: There is no string attached to this.

Q: There may not be to this. I am sceptical because my experience has always been that there is some string attached.

K: There is no string attached, it is your land. You are all frightened, old boys, that is what it is. Frightened to move along a different line.

Q: I dislike farming.

K: You dislike farming, why?

Q: I don't like it.

K: What do you mean, you don't like it?

Q: You can become a dancer, you can become a musician, you can become an artist, you don't have to become a lawyer because your father is a lawyer.

K: Sir, you can become a photographer, a top photographer, if you want to. An artist, dancer, anything you want to make of your life you can.

Q: But I want to become a lawyer.

K: Well, go ahead. Join the corruption. (Laughter)

Q: Sir, it is possible to become a politician, or lawyer and not be corrupt.

K: Can one become a politician and not be corrupt?

Q: He says it is possible to become a lawyer and politician...

K: Oh, yes, anything is possible, but will you be? Go on, sir.

Q: The first thing my father will do is to put me in an asylum!
(Laughter)

K: Perhaps, behind the asylum you may be the most sane man. You understand, sir, how mad the world is: preparing for war, right, that's madness, isn't it? Right? It's madness to live in a small community resisting all the other communities. Tribalism is wrong, isn't it? Nationalism is wrong, it is corrupt, destructive. Right? No? You see you don't think along these lines. You are just bookish; your father was a lawyer, you are going to be a lawyer, your father was a politician, you want to be a politician. You don't say, let's find out a different way of living.

Q: It is a new experience for us.

K: It is a new experience. All right. Murdering is a new experience.

Q: That's only one form.

K: I see. So how do you know law isn't corrupt as it is now? You want to go through that to find out?

Q: Possibly.

K: Possibly. Wait. Will you get drunk to find out what drunkenness is? Will you take drugs?

Q: No.

K: Exactly. So you take what you want to do, what pleases you because your father, your grandfather, your great grandfather, was a butcher, a lawyer, or something or other, you join them.

Q: There is a very interesting joke about the model of a lawyer: get on with honour, get honoured.

K: Oh, lord. Go on sir, you were asking another question the other day, what was it?

Q: The alternative.

K: We said, that sir. We are offering you an alternative, something else to do rather than just following the usual traditional rut for educated people, so-called educated people.

Q: Couldn't I be a lawyer as well as a photographer?

K: Oh, you can do a lot of things together, but where is your heart in all that? I can be a photographer, a dancer, a lawyer, a politician, what is your main interest? Why do any of these things? Why be a lawyer? Seek injustice, or making money?

Q: Both.

K: Both. Sir, I used to know a man, he came to see me once, an oldish man, a white beard, he was some kind of judge in this country. Listen to what I am saying please. After one of the talks he came to see me. He said, 'I used to be a judge and passing sentences on what is right.' So one morning he woke up and said, 'I really don't know what is right, what is justice. I must go into it'. So he went off into the woods leaving the family - the good old tradition - and he meditated for eleven years to find out what is justice, what is truth. Will you do that? Of course not, you haven't got the guts to do anything.

Q: But...

K: Wait a minute, let me finish my story. Eleven years after he came to one of the talks and he came to see me afterwards and he said, 'You know for eleven years I have been mesmerizing myself not being able to find out what is truth.' He was an old man. You understand, to have the courage to say after all these years, 'I haven't found it.' You understand?

What else would you like to ask questions about?

Q: What is right action?

K: What do you mean by the word 'right' and 'action'? Just think it out, sir, think it out first, don't just say anything that comes to your head, think it out what do you mean by 'right'?

Q: Right now what I think right is a comparison.

K: Quite, so is that right? Wait, listen carefully: something comparing. You compare this with that, and you think that is right. Now this may be wrong and you compare with that, and your comparison may also be wrong. So that may be not right. So eliminate comparison. Right? Right?

Q: The world is made up of comparisons.

K: I know that. I know the world is made up, sir, I am eighty six, I have lived in the world, so don't tell me the world is made up of comparisons. I am asking you.

Q: Sir but always my thought is marred by comparison.

K: Sir, to compare, what does that mean? You are missing it, I won't move from it. I am asking you, what is right? It must be right under all circumstances. Right? It can't vary according to circumstances. Correct? It must be right under all pressure. Right?

It must be so accurate whether it is in this climate or another climate, it is right under all circumstances. Right? So what is that? When you use right doesn't it mean precise, accurate, true - not true according to some ideas of some people but true according to your own perception, and that perception being accurate, logical, sane, rational, that you would call, and much more, right.

Now what do you mean by 'action'? Go on sir, what do you mean by action?

Q: Everything that I do.

K: Everything that you do is action, right?

Q: It seems so.

K: So what you do, does it depend on some future idea? Go on, sir, answer. Go on.

Q: It depends on past ideas.

K: Yes, so if your action is based on past or future ideas, is that action? You know what action means? The doing. The doing not according to the past, or the future, but the doing. Right? Which is what is happening now. So is your action based on belief? Is your action the result of some tradition? Is your action dependent on your father, mother? Is your action based on what other people say?

Q: As far as I can see it is not a right action.

K: Of course not. So right action is action that is accurate, objective, non-personal. Right? That does not vary according to circumstances. And action is the doing without the pressure of the past or the future. Find out what it means to live that way.

Q: The mind has got memories, and the past is always showing.

K: You come up here. What were you saying?

Q: We are memories, sir, we remember things.

K: So you are memory. Careful! Stick to it. You have said something accurate, stick to it. That is, all of you, your thinking, your action, your behaviour, your relationship is based on memory. You are memory. You are not spiritual, you are not divine, you are not something, something superior. You are entirely memory. You understand that? You understand? Hold it, hold it. Memory means the past. Right? Is there an action not based on the past, which is memory? Think it out. Think it out very carefully. Our action is based on memory; memory of the past, clouding the present, and the future. That memory is essentially the result of past thoughts, past. Now is there an action which is not the outcome of the past?

Q: I think memory shouldn't come in between.

K: Don't say, 'should', 'should not', find out, go into it, investigate it, discover for yourself if there is an action which is not based on memory. Find out. Don't ask somebody to tell you what it is, but find out for yourself if there is such action. Or there may be no such action, so find out, spend time, think about it, worry about it, ask your teacher, probably he doesn't know either. So go into it.

Q: Sir, can thought be absent?

K: Thought is memory. Thought is the response of memory. Right? Listen, listen, first find out. You have got it? Thought is experience, knowledge, memory, the response of memory is thought and action. Now I am asking is there an action which is not based on this?

Q: How about thinking?

K: Thinking itself is the past.

Q: What about learning?

K: I am helping you to learn about this. Find out, take time, take trouble, think, go into it, see if there is such a thing as action without all the burden of the past. You understand, this is education because it will make you much more subtle. You understand? Are all of you asleep?

Q: One more thing you said was, end comparison. What do you mean by that?

K: Have you been to museums?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes. Have you seen paintings? Can you look at one painting without comparing it with another painting?

Q: I think I have no memory of it, sir.

K: No, I am asking a question. Just listen.

Q: I have never done that.

K: Do it.

Q: I can't do it.

K: How do you know, have you tried it?

Q: I don't know, sir.

K: Have you tried it? You are a lawyer, you have made a statement which you haven't tried, there is corruption! That is corruption, saying something without examination, without understanding, without going into it.

So you compare yourself with your brother, who is shorter, or taller, or brighter, more intelligent, why do you do that? Why do you compare yourself with another who may be more clever, why?

Q: You want to know where you are.

K: Why? No, sir, go into it a little more.

Q: It will make me work harder.

K: Oh, you think it will make you work harder because you want to be like that? He may be an idiot.

Q: I don't think he is.

K: Wait. Sir, you are all too quick, you don't get the meaning of all this? When you compare yourself with your brother who is brighter, in comparison you think you are not as clever as he is, isn't it. But if you didn't compare what would happen? Would you be clever? Would you be dull?

Q: You are what you are, sir.

K: That's just it: you are what you are. Right? You have said it, stick to it. You are what you are. Move from there, not because your brother is smarter.

Q: But yes, I do compare, why do we compare?

K: I am asking you. Because it is part of our tradition, your school, college, university, go to business, climb, climb, climb. So all that indicates you are not what you are. You have never found out for yourself what you are. You are always imitating somebody else. Right? Right, sir? So you become a secondhand human being, don't you?

Q: How do I find out what I am?

K: That is a different question. I'll tell you, but first realize by comparing yourself with somebody you never find out what you are. Right? Then ask the question, what are you? Go on, tell me, what are you? BSc?

Q: I don't think so. I mean you can answer that, but what do you mean by what are you? You are asking me to compare with something else.

K: No. You said it, what you are, you are what you are.

Q: I mean you can't say what you are.

K: Wait, wait. You said, you are what you are. What are you? Not only you, everybody: what are you? Your name, your form, the way you look: go on, I am telling you, tell me.

Q: Your thoughts.

K: Your thoughts.

Q: Your images.

K: Your images about yourself.

Q: My beliefs.

K: That's right, your beliefs. Go on!

Q: I think I am not myself at all.

K: Stick to it. You have said something good, for goodness sake find out, don't just say something and then go off. You are all these things, aren't you. So you are all these things, aren't you? So are you all these things? Obviously you are. Right? Your name, your form, the way you are physically, what you have learnt, your BA, MA, whatever it is, MAD! Right? You are all that, aren't you, that's what you are. You are all that.

Q: I am not what I am. Or is it that I am not what I am supposed to be?

K: What you are supposed to be is also part of that. You see, you are your name, your form, passing an examination, BA, MA, or whatever it is, you are the tradition, the beliefs, you are all that.

Q: What am I then?

K: You are that. Not, 'what am I then', you are that.

Q: If I am that, so what?

K: I am not saying, so what. You are that.

Q: I want to know.

K: Now, what a minute. Is it possible for your to go beyond all that?

Q: It is very difficult.

K: Why do you say, very difficult?

Q: I mean I can't live without all that because I don't know where I am staying, where I am going.

K: You mean by comparing you feel secure? Right? Are you? By comparing one lawyer against another lawyer, is that security?

Q: Not for you, sir. At times when you compare you might be insecure.

K: Of course you are. Where you are insecure you compare, if you are secure you don't compare. Right? If you are the greatest photographer, as this gentleman is in India, he is secure, he knows he is top of his profession.

Q: Sir but we have to live at times we are very insecure, so he has to live up to that.

K: No. He is good at his profession. If you are a master carpenter and you are top of that, you are secure.

Q: Everybody can't be top of his profession.

K: So what are you good at then? What do you want to do then?

Q: Try to be the top.

K: You can never be the top, old boy. If you keep on trying you will never be the top. But if you are good at something, you understand, not compare. Wait a minute. If you say, I'd love to be a carpenter - not you, you all want to be somebody on top - I want to be a good first-class carpenter, a master carpenter because I love that. I won't compare myself because I love what I am doing.

Q: If I want to be a lawyer...

K: Old man, don't be a lawyer.

Q: To do something excellently you have to be interested in it.

K: That's right.

Q: So how will you find out what interests you, there are so many things in this world, sir.

K: I know there are so many things in this world, but find out what you are interested in. Put your thought sir to it. Don't say, I am interested in gardening, interested in being a farmer, interested in becoming a rich man, in becoming whatever you want. Find out what it is you deeply want.

Q: I think deeply I want to be secure.

K: What? Secure physically?

Q: Physically.

K: Think it out, think it out. First physically.

Q: Yes.

K: You must have that, you must have clothes, food and shelter, that is absolutely necessary. Then finished with that. What is your interest? What are you interested in? This applies to all of you, for god's sake, listen. What are you interested in?

Q: To have...

K: Not interested in, what would you like to do for the rest of your life? Everything is open to you: become a lawyer, politician, a religious bug, a marvellous painter, poet, anything, what is it you want to do? You see, your teachers don't help you in this. Right? Ask, demand, find out together, discuss it.

Q: Only a few are willing, sir.

K: I am asking you now, old boy.

Q: I don't know what I am interested in. I just want to be young.

K: Oh, no. I may as a young boy wanting to be a pilot. Right? As I grow a little older I throw that out. Then I say I want to be a businessman. So I keep on until I am dying and I never find out, because you have never asked what you love to do. Not compare because it gives more money, or my father wants it or that, what is it that you really love to do out of your heart?

Q: Sir, what I want to do people will call me a fool.

K: Let them call you a fool, who cares! If you love something to do it doesn't matter what people say. Look, I am doing what I love to do. Right? And I don't care what people say, it doesn't matter because I love this. Do find out, you are young, find out, give your attention to it, ask.

Q: Sir, I am interested in doing something, very interested but at the same time I can't do it because of responsibility.

K: You have responsibilities at your age? Have you responsibilities?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: What? Feeding your mother, feeding your father, feeding your brothers, feeding your uncle? Do you understand what that word 'responsibility' means? You plant a tree, you are responsible that the tree is protected, watered, looked after, cared for. Right? Have you such a responsibility? Or is it just an idea that you are responsible?

Q: They have to spend a lot of money here and they expect something; so if I do something different they are going to be hurt.

K: Yes. Your mother and father produce you, so they are responsible for you. But it doesn't mean you should do exactly what they want you to do. You have a responsibility for yourself, the way you life.

Q: How can I go against them when they have done so much for me?

K: Oh, really, are you serious in saying this? When they have done so much for you how can you go against them? Right? Aren't you going against them now?

Q: No.

K: Ah, careful! Aren't you going against them when you are listening to what the speaker is saying? That's just a trick of words saying, I am responsible because they have spent so much on me. And you are doing something exactly that they don't want you to do. Don't play those kind of tricks, sir.

All right, that's enough sir, isn't it, right? Right sir? Will you sit quietly now for a few minutes? Really quiet. Close your eyes, keep absolutely quiet.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 29TH JULY 1981

It is a lovely morning for a change. And I hope you had the pleasure of looking at the long shadows of the morning.

We have had many, many questions. We didn't count them but there must have been over a hundred. And out of those we have chosen some, not because they are easy to answer, or what we like to answer, but we have chosen some that may be representative of some of the questions that have been put. There have been, if I may point out, rather absurd questions, but there are these questions which we have gathered together and put for this morning.

When one asks a question, is the answer more important than the question itself? When one looks to an answer one overlooks the question. In the question itself, if we examine it deeply, is the answer. In the question itself. And how one approaches the question is all important, not try to find a rather clever, or not clever, or an answer that is worthwhile or personal. So please bear in mind that we are together, and I must emphasize again, that we are together examining the question. And out of that question, in the investigation of that question, the answer is inevitable. There are ten of them this morning. I don't know if we can answer all of them but we will try.

What do we mean by intuition? Having a hunch, having a feeling that is the right thing. And intuition is also having been sensitive, capturing something which may be conditioned, which may be personal, which may be a desire, wish fulfilment. And we must be clear and hesitant in using that word intuition, because it may be one's own unconscious desire, one's own longing for something to happen, or sudden feeling that it is the right thing to do. But I think insight is different. May we go into it together?

The scientists, the physicists, the technological people have an insight into some invention. They see something new. Is that insight partial or is an insight whole? You understand? We are meeting, I hope, together. I may have an insight as I am an engineer into the structure of a bridge. And I operate according to that insight. That insight being more powerful, I adjust all my knowledge to conform, or adjust, to that knowledge - right? - to that insight. But is that insight partial? A poet, a painter, a musician, may have an insight, but it is still partial. When we use the word 'insight' we mean insight into the whole movement of life, not one part of it - right? So let us together find out what we mean by insight, how does it take place? - if you are interested in it. Because that may be the solution for our problems, specially psychological issues that are such a tremendous travail in all our lives. So together let's find out what we mean by insight.

Is - I am questioning it, so please question it also - is insight an action of memory? One has accumulated a great deal of knowledge, psychologically or physically, and that knowledge may, being limited, see something very clearly. But that knowledge being always in the field of ignorance because there is no complete knowledge about anything, including oneself, and when there is an insight from that limited knowledge that insight must also be limited. So insight, we mean by that word, it is not the outcome of knowledge - knowledge being you can examine, say for example, all the comparative religions, the various sects, the various rituals and so on, you can examine them, study them, and come to a conclusion. Whereas that conclusion may be rational, sane, logical but it is based on the activity of thought. And therefore it is limited. And that conclusion naturally must be limited. That's clear.

Whereas insight has nothing whatever to do with knowledge, it has nothing to do with remembrance, but you have an insight say into all the comparative religions, with all their rituals, sanctions, dogmas, beliefs and so on, if you have an insight into all that you will see they are all similar - right? They are all based on thought and therefore all religions are limited. There is an immediate perception, not a logical conclusion, an action but the total perception of all the religious activities in the world, having an insight implies you see that they are essentially limited because they are put together, invented by thought.

Similarly to have an insight into one's relationship, which is much more difficult. Relationship, as it is now based on images, hopes, pleasures, fears and so on, essentially based on the images that thought during a period of time, it may be a day or ten years, has built it. To have an insight into that, that is, relationship is based on images, to have an insight into that is to dispel the images. I hope you are following some of this.

Suppose I am married, or have a girl friend, my relationship actually is based on my particular like and dislike, my particular attraction, sexual or otherwise, the environmental influences, the biological demands and I establish a relationship with another person based on that. Obviously. And is it possible to have an insight into the whole movement of relationship - not come to a conclusion that I have images, I must break them, how to break them and so on and so on and so on, but to have an insight into it, which means to see basically what it is, fundamentally what it is. And if one has that deep insight the action which comes out of that insight is much more logical, much more sane and has a quality of something original, love. I hope you are following all this. Right?

That is, to take a very simple example: all nationalism is glorified tribalism - right? All nationalism - American, Russian and all the rest of it is glorified tribalism - right? The moment you see that, that it is a very limited, narrow, feeling which divides man, to have an insight into that is to be free from all the tribalism - right? Are you following all this? Or if you have an insight into the question of obedience and following, whether the obedience to a guru, to a priest, to a law and so on, to have a deep insight into this quality of following and obedience, will you obey, follow anybody? Naturally you will obey laws, whether they are good or bad we are not discussing, how far you can go, how far you cannot go, that is not our problem for the moment, but the whole concept of following and obeying - obey a doctor, obey a surgeon and if I am not too neurotic and the policeman isn't too brutal, I will obey him. But the whole psychological desire in which lies the security of following, if I follow somebody I feel safe, whether it is a psychiatrist, or a priest, or my wife or husband, or whatever it is, one feels safe - right? Now if you have an insight into that, that is a mind, a brain that is conditioned to follow, the feeling of following and the urge to follow completely drops away instantly.

So insight is not brought about through will, through desire, through memory, it is immediate perception and therefore action. When we talk about perception, is it possible to observe without the word - please do it as we are talking and you will see - is it possible to observe a tree, a person, the speaker, to observe without the word, the word indicating all the memories, the reputation, the remembrances, the word implying all that. Knowing the word is not the thing, can you observe without the word? Right? And when you observe, is the observer different from the observed? One observes that tree. There the observer, I hope, is different from the tree - right? The observer is not the tree. That would be rather neurotic to say, "I am the tree". But to observe the tree without calling it the tree, without the name. The name and all the things associated with that name, is the tradition, the memory, the past, which says, "That is the tree". To look at it without all that in operation - right? Please do it as we are talking about it. And can one observe oneself without the word, without all the associations connected with that word, to look at it? And when you do observe in such a manner, is the observer different from the observed? Wait, I'll show it to you.

The feeling of anger arises in me: is that anger different from me? Or I am anger? But what thought has done is, a moment later one says, "I have been angry", which means I am separate from that anger - are you following all this? Whereas the actual fact is when there is anger there is only anger, that feeling. There is no observer different from the observed. That division arises only after. Out of that division comes all our conflict - right? So is it possible to observe without the word, without all the memories associated with that word? Then only the observer is the observed and that eliminates altogether the division which brings about conflict. To have an insight into that is to end the division - right?

2nd QUESTION: How can the idea of, "You are the world and you are totally responsible for the whole of mankind" be justified on a rational, objective, sane basis.

I am not sure, one is not sure it can be rationalized on a sane, objective basis. But we will examine first before we say it can't.

First of all the earth on which we live is our earth - right? It is not the British earth, the French earth or the German, Russian, Indian, Chinese, it is our earth on which we are all living. That is a fact. But thought has divided racially, geographically, culturally, economically. That division is causing havoc in the world - obviously. There is no denial of that. That is rational, objective, sane. Right? And we have been saying human beings, living on this earth, which is our earth, all ours, not the isolated, divided communities, it is our earth on which we are all living, though politically, economically we have divided it - for security, for various forms of patriotic, illusory reasons which eventually brings about war.

We have also said that human consciousness is - please go into this with me, you may disagree, you may say it is all nonsense, but please listen to it and see if it is not rational, objective, sane - all our human consciousness is similar - right? We all, wherever, on whatever part of the earth we live, we all go through a great deal of suffering, a great deal of pain, great anxiety, uncertainty, fear. And we have occasionally or perhaps often, pleasure. This is the common ground on which all human beings stand - right? This is an irrefutable fact. We may try to dodge it, we may try to say it is not, that I am an individual and so on and so on, but when you look at it objectively, non-personally, not as British, French and so on, in examination you will find that our consciousness is like the consciousness of all human beings, psychologically. You may be tall, you may be fair, you may have brown hair, I may be black or white, or pink or whatever it is, but inwardly, psychologically we are all having a terrible time. We all have a great sense of desperate loneliness. You may have children, a husband, and all the rest of it, but when you are alone you have this feeling that you have no relationship with anything, totally isolated. I am sure most of us have had that feeling. And we are saying this is the common ground on which all humanity stands. And whatever happens in the field of this consciousness we are responsible. That is: if I am violent, I am adding violence to that consciousness which is common to all of us. If I am not violent, I am not adding to it, I am bringing a totally new factor to that consciousness. So I am profoundly responsible: either to contribute to that violence, to that confusion, to that terrible division, or as I recognize deeply in my heart, in my blood, in the depths of my being, that I am the rest of the world, I am mankind, I am the world, the world is not separate from me, then I become totally responsible, obviously, which is rational, objective, sane. The other is insanity, to call oneself a Hindu, a Buddhist, a Christian and all the rest of it - they are just labels.

So when one has that feeling, that reality, the truth of it, that every human being living on this earth is responsible not only for himself, but responsible for everything that is happening. Now how will one translate that in daily life? How will you translate it? - if you have that feeling, not an intellectual conclusion, as an ideal and so on, then it has no reality. But if the truth is that you are standing on the ground which is common to all mankind, and you feel totally responsible, then what is your action towards society, towards the world in which you are actually living? The world as it is now is full of violence - right? And only a very, very few people escape from it because they are carefully guarded, protected and all the rest of it. One realizes, suppose I realize I am totally responsible, what is my action then? Shall I join a group of terrorists? Obviously not. Obviously competitiveness between nations is destroying the world - the most powerful, the less powerful, and the less powerful trying to become more powerful, which is competition. Not only nationally, which is destroying the world, shall I realize that I am the rest of mankind and I am totally responsible, shall I be competitive? Please answer these questions. When I feel responsible for this naturally I cease to be competitive. And also the world, the religious world as well as the economic world, social world, is based on hierarchical principle - right? And shall I also have this concept of hierarchical outlook? Right? Obviously not, because that again is the one who says, "I know", the other says, "I do not know". The one who says "I know" is now taking a superior position, economically, socially, religiously and has a status. And if you want that status go after it, but you are contributing to the confusion of the world.

So there are actual, objective, sane actions when you perceive, when you realize in your heart of hearts, in the depth of your being that you are the rest of mankind and that we are all standing on the same ground.

3rd QUESTION: You use the term 'psychological time'. This is difficult to comprehend. Why do you say that psychological time is the source of conflict and sorrow?

Let us consider together what is time. Time by the watch, time by the sun setting, sun rising, time as yesterday, today, tomorrow - that tomorrow may be a hundred years and yesterday may be another hundred years backwards, and the time today is that we are sitting here listening. That is time physically, in the acquisition of knowledge, in so-called evolution; to learn a language time is necessary, to become a physicist time is necessary, to drive a car time is necessary - right? That is obvious. Is it that we carry this idea of time, which we have established naturally, logically because I need time to learn a technique, is it that we have carried over this principle of time into the psychological world? You are meeting my point. You understand? Are we meeting each other? Or am I talking to myself? Right.

I am asking the question: one realizes time is necessary in acquiring a skill. Is it that principle we have carried over into the psychological area? Or psychologically time exists for itself? Not that we have carried it over but time as a process of evolution psychologically, time in itself exists. You follow this?

Please let us be quite clear on this point: is there psychologically, in itself, intrinsic in itself, time? Or we have carried over from the time element that is necessary in learning a skill to the psychological world? So there are the two problems. That is: psychologically does time exist per se? Or we have introduced it because we have been conditioned to that therefore we react to the psychological world in the same manner? Clear?

So it is obvious that we need time to learn a skill. Clear? Now we are asking: is time inherent in the psychological structure, psychological nature? Or thought has brought the element of time into it? Are we following each other? Is it too difficult? Right? May I go on?

Wait sirs, let's go slowly into it. I hope you are also working, not just listening. (Inaudible comment) We are coming to that sir, one moment. We will come to that sir, please. It is all right sir, take time! (Laughter) Have patience.

Patience has no time. Impatience has time. Right? When you are patient you are silent, listening. But if you are impatient and say "Let's get on with it", time element comes in. Obviously. So please let's look at this sensitively, not say, "You are right", "I am wrong" and so on, but sensitively let's approach this question. Has thought introduced into the psychological realm the whole idea of time? Or in the very nature of the psyche time is? First of all psychologically thought, which is part of the psyche, thought has introduced time: I am this, I will be that. I am angry, I will get over it. I am not successful but I will be. All that movement is time. The distance covered from what I am to what I shall be. The space between me as I am and as I will be. So time is what is, the space to be covered to achieve that. So the whole process of that is time. I do not know myself, I must learn about myself, educate myself. The same thing is operating as in the world of skill - I am going to learn about myself, which admits time - right? So I am asking - we are asking: time is a factor of thought, thought is the response of experience, knowledge, memory stored up in the brain. And that memory responds which is thought. Again this is an obvious fact.

If you had no experience, no knowledge, you would be in a state of amnesia, or whatever you like to call it. But because we have accumulated a great deal of knowledge, psychologically, and that is stored up in the brain as memory and thought.

So this whole process of accumulating knowledge about oneself, learning about oneself, and gradually building information about oneself, all that implies time. That is: psychological time and time by the day and by the watch. Chronological time and psychological time. Again that is a fact. Now apart from that, is inherent in the psyche this element of time? That is: being and becoming. Right? I am only putting it in different ways. Is there inherent in me, which is the psyche, this question of time at all? Please don't jump to a conclusion. That is: in me there is a timeless state? I am not saying that at all. That is the old tradition. We are not saying that, we are just asking.

Is the me free of time? Right? Obviously not. The me, my family, my nation, my character, my capacity, my loneliness, my despair, my whole travail in existence, is me. The me that is going to die, the me that lives. Going to the office, to the laboratory, factory, whatever you are doing. And all that is the activity of thought, including the me. The me is my form, my name, the image I have about myself, if I have one, the things I have done, the things I want to do, etc. etc. - all that is me, which is my consciousness. The content of that consciousness is put there by thought which is time right?

So there is psychological time, which is the movement of thought, fear, pleasure, pain, suffering, joy, so-called love, all that is the movement of thought; thought being memory, space, time, the achievement of it. Now we are saying - please bear with me - we are saying that the psychological time is the factor of conflict and sorrow. That, the questioner says, why do you say that? As we have been pointing out during the talks, that thought is the root of fear. Thought is the root of pleasure. I have had pleasure yesterday, the remembrance and the desire to continue tomorrow. That is the movement of thought. And sorrow: sorrow, as we said, is the essence of isolation. Sorrow is the outcome of self-centred egotistic activity. We are only putting it differently. So thought is responsible for this. And thought creates, is time itself, of course. So is it possible to have, to be free of psychological time, because that divides? And where there is division there must be conflict - like the Jew and the Arab, like the capitalist and the totalitarian - division between me and another, with my wife and the husband and so on and so on. Wherever there is division there must be conflict, that is law. It is not my law, it is there.

So thought, time, space, psychologically is the source of conflict and sorrow. After examining it, is it possible for thought - please listen to this - for thought to realize its own place, which is in the world of technique and it has no place psychologically? Please don't reject it, just look at it. Psychologically time exists when I have an image about myself and you tread on that image, that brings wounds, that hurts. That is the element of time. Now if I have no image about myself it is finished. Is that possible, living in this world, married and all the rest of it? That is to have psychologically no tomorrow. It is not when Dante talks about all those who enter Inferno that there is no hope, it is not that at all. You know what I am saying? Why do we have hope? I am not saying you shouldn't or should. Why do we have hope? See what happens? I have a hope to be a great man or whatever it is, my hope. And I am working for that. And I am a failure, generally I am. Then I get bitter, angry, violent, cynical. And violent, cynical, bitter, I am adding to the confusion of the total consciousness, to that, I am maintaining that - right? So if I have an insight into this, the image disappears entirely.

You might ask the speaker: are you glibly talking about it and you have your own private, secret image? I know you are terribly interested in that. This question has been asked, I don't know how often, in India, in Europe and in America, and each time that question is asked I am aware, not easily answered, which is when I say there is no image about myself - either you say, "That is nonsense", or you say, "It doesn't matter to me. As long as I have an image about myself" - right? You understand? It doesn't matter if you have no image about yourself, who cares? But what is important is to find out how to live - not how - to find out if it is possible to live in this terrible world, dangerous world, criminal world, to have no image. Find out. Don't say, "It is not possible". Or say, "It is possible". But to study the image that you have and have an insight into it, and end it immediately.

We have only answered three questions in an hour. Oh Lord!

4th QUESTION: How does one draw the dividing line between knowledge which must be retained, and which is to be abandoned? What is it that makes the decision?

I will read it again carefully. How does one draw the dividing line between knowledge which must be retained, and that which must be abandoned? What is it that makes this decision? You have understood the question?

The questioner is asking where does knowledge, which is necessary, to be a skilful engineer, carpenter, plumber, or if you want to be a politician - I hope none of us do - and the line between that and the recording - please listen - the recording of personal knowledge, personal hurts, personal ambitions, where apparently we have sustained knowledge and therefore harmful. So where do you draw the line between that and this? Is it clear? And the questioner says: and what is it that makes this decision: to keep it there and not to keep it here?

Do you see one of the factors in this question: how we all depend on decisions. I will decide to go there. I won't go there. Decide. What is that decision based on? Just look at it carefully please. My arm, my past knowledge, past pleasure, past pain, past remembrance of things which says, "Don't do that anymore", or "Do it". That is, in decision there is the element of will - right? Will is the accumulated, concentrated form of desire - right? Right? Desire, which says, "I must do that", but I call it will. So will is the accumulated, concentration of desire. We have been into the question of desire, I don't want to go into it now because it is - shall I go into it? Eh? No. Thank God!

Q: Why are we sitting here now?

K: I don't know why you are sitting here sir, but we are talking about decision. We are saying there is a great element in decision, will. And on that tradition we are conditioned. I am questioning, the speaker is questioning that action at all. You understand? Because will is a divisive factor, a dividing factor: I will do this, and my wife says I will not do that - right? So will is essentially desire and has in it the element of division - me and not me, and so on. I must succeed and so on.

So is there a way of living - please listen to this - without the operation of will at all? Right? A way of living in which there is no conflict, and conflict exists as long as I exercise will, obviously. I wonder if you are clear. Now let's find out if that is possible.

The questioner asks: how does one draw the line between the accumulating factor of knowledge necessary to act skilfully, and the non-recording factor of the psyche? Not recording my hurts, my insults, the flattery, all the bullying and all that, not recording any of that. How does one draw the line between the two? You don't draw the line. The moment you have drawn the line you have separated, and therefore you are going to cause conflict between the knowledge and non-recording, then you ask "How am I not to record?" I am insulted, personally the speaker has been insulted by professionals, so please don't join the professionals! How not to record the insult, or the flattery, it is the same thing. The two are the two sides of the same coin - you understand? Flattery and insult. You insult me. My brain instantly records it. I get hurt. In the field of technology I must record. But here why should I record? You insult me. All right. Why should that insult be carried over, day after day, when I meet you and I say, "You have insulted me". From that insult I retaliate. Now is it possible not to record at all any psychological factors? You understand? You understand my question? My wife - if I have one, thank God I haven't got any - if I have one, she says something brutal after I have come back from the office because she has had a tiresome day herself with rambunctious children, so she says something violent. Instantly because I am tired I want some kind of peace in the house, so I record it. Now I am asking myself: I am tired, I have worked, I come into the house, she says something brutal and is it possible not to record that incident at all? Otherwise I am building an image about her and she is building an image about me, so the images have relationship, not us. You understand sirs? It is an obvious fact.

So is it possible not to record? The recording process is to strengthen, to give vitality to a centre which is the me - right? Obviously. So is it possible not to do it? And it is only possible, however tired one is, to be attentive at that moment, when the wife or I am brutal. Because as we explained the other day with regard to meditation, where there is attention there is no recording. It is only when you are self-centred, and that very self-centredness is concentration, then there is recording. Right?

So to see the truth of this you need knowledge on this level, and here you don't need knowledge at all. See the truth of it, what freedom it brings you. That is real freedom. Right? If you have an insight into it, you don't draw the line, nor decide. There is no recording.

Do we go on? Enough?

5th QUESTION: Intellectually we understand that the observer is the observed. But what is necessary to perceive this so that it goes beyond the intellectual level?

The question is: what is necessary to go beyond this intellectual acceptance that the observer is the observed? First of all do we even intellectually accept it? Question yourself please. Do you even intellectually, that is verbally, logically, discerning and saying, "Yes, it is so, logically. Because it has been pointed out, objectively, logically." And you say, "Yes" - is that so? Do you even intellectually accept that? Or it is just a lot of words floating around? But if you do accept it intellectually, what does that acceptance mean? When you say, "I intellectually agree with you", what does it mean? It means absolutely nothing. It is just a form of convenient social acceptance, saying, "Yes, you are quite right but you may be wrong". So intellectually we don't even accept it. If we do it is again very superficial, and therefore of no value. But the fact is that the observer is the observed. That is the truth. That is: I am lonely, with all the implications of tremendous feeling of isolation, having no relationship with anything. I am completely absorbed with fear in the sense of detachment from everything. That depresses me tremendously. And my natural instinct is to run away from it, suppress it, run after meeting people, football, religion and all that. But the escape from the fact brings about the division. I am lonely, I must not be lonely - right? The escape from 'what is' gives me not only conflict, because it is divisive, it helps me not to understand this thing called loneliness - right?

Is loneliness separate from me? When I say, "God, I am lonely", is that feeling of desperate, anxious, fear of loneliness, is that something separate from me? Or I am that? Right? You understand? My self-centred activity, my ambition, my image about myself and so on, all that has brought about this sense of isolation, which I call loneliness. That loneliness is not separate from me. If it is separate from me I can act about it, run away - right? Suppress it and so on. But if it is me - please understand this - if it is me that is the state of loneliness, what is one to do? You understand my question? I am lonely, you know all the feeling of it. You may be married, have children and so on but you are basically terribly lonely. If that loneliness is something separate from me, then I am in conflict with that loneliness - right? I fight it, I try to fill it by knowledge, by excitement, by this or that, but if it is me I can't do anything about it. You understand? See, just stop there for a minute.

Before I am accustomed to do something about it. Now I realize I am that. Because I cannot do anything about it, it ends conflict but the thing remains - right? I can't do anything about it so it is there. So can I - please listen to this - can my thought remain with it completely, not run away from it, remain with that loneliness with all its anxiety, fear, all the complexity of that loneliness, totally without any movement, look at it. When you look at it, if you look at it as an observer looking in, then again the problem arises. But the fact is that loneliness is you so we have to look at it without the observer, as a whole. When you do that completely, loneliness disappears totally, never to come back.

Right sirs, I have answered five questions, that is enough.

Again there are many questions. Every day they are piling up and we cannot possibly answer all those questions. It would probably take a couple of months, but I am sure you wouldn't like to sit here, nor I, for a couple of months answering these questions.

As we said yesterday, the answers are not important, but the questions are. Whether we put those questions seriously or flippantly or casually - if the questions are put seriously, a problem that is really disturbing one's mind and one's heart then those questions are worthwhile answering, or enquiring into those questions. So please we have chosen some of the questions, not according to what we like or dislike but which may be worthwhile discussing, going into generally. And in reading these questions we are together examining, not only the questions but the outcome of those questions and whether it affects our daily life, which is what matters.

1st QUESTION: I have a son whom I dearly love. Can I prevent the world from corrupting him? How can I give him a right education?

I hope the question interests you.

They are discovering, the scientists, and those who are concerned with babies and children, that babies are very alert, learn, watchful. And they can know, or realize or sense when the mother is liked or disliked by others. They are testing all this out especially in America. And from the moment he is born, or she is born, the parents are already conditioning him. The parents, their relatives, the people around him, are already shaping his mind, his brain. And so from the moment he is born conditioning takes place. And as he grows older this conditioning is strengthened by the society he lives in, by the parents, by other boys and girls and so on. And in schools, colleges, university - if they are lucky enough to go to universities - the conditioning academically goes on. Knowledge has become extraordinarily important, to act skilfully, to earn a good livelihood in daily life. And most of the parents, educators are concerned that their children, the students, the college graduates and so on, pass academically with high marks. They neglect, both the parents, the educators, totally the whole psychological world of the student. So when we ask, what is right education, is it not, not only academically, to have a good brain, to know the world in which we live, the whole technological development, learn all about it skilfully so that he can have a good job and so on. The parents are concerned that he should quickly marry and settle down. Get a job, with a wife, and screwed down for the rest of his life. That is what the parents are concerned with.

And society is concerned that he should be a good citizen, accept more or less things as they are, both religiously, politically, economically and status quo should remain. The Conservatists politically on the right only want to conserve, and the Liberals and Labour, left, want to change things. So the battle goes on between the political parties and the poor child who has grown in this chaotic world doesn't quite know what to do, what to think, and slips into something quite easy, which is to have a family, job, and for the rest of one's life for fifty, sixty years go to the office and back and forth. Right? This is what we call education. This is what is happening actually in the world, whether in America, or here or in India or Asia. And apparently the vast majority of human beings throughout the world seem satisfied with things as they are. Or dissatisfied because they have no money, want a better position, more power, money - and when you get money, power, position, the world is quite safe, though there are terrorists whose function is to terrorize.

Now what is right education? Knowing all this is going on around the child, around the student as he grows up, that the mother and the father are concerned with themselves, with their careers, with their ambitions, with their separate successes, and so where does the child come into all this? Obviously as in Asia, as one has watched, the babies are cuddled, held by the mother closely. They have no nursing homes, nor batteries of children in a hospital. There, being very, very poor, the children have to remain with the mother, there is no Social Security, therefore they must have more children, more children are necessary to earn a livelihood when they are old because there is no Social Security in the East. So the pattern is repeated over and over and over again.

Now the questioner asks: the parent loves his child and what is right education? You cannot possibly keep the child at home and educate him because he will meet other children and the group instinct is so strong they will condition him in spite of you. You may talk, urge, point out all the conditioning, the absurdities, the cruelties but the spirit of the gang, the group, the other children have far greater influence as one observes on your particular child. Right? These are all facts. If one is aware of all this, wars, brutality, the emphasis on acquiring knowledge academically and each one wanting to find out a job in which he will be comfortable, give him some assurance, and the whole process of all that is modern education.

One is quite sure that you know all about this. If you have looked at the world, if you have looked at your own children, at what is happening, this is the pattern, the mode of modern society. Is that right education? Which is: to emphasize and cultivate academic knowledge, technological knowledge, how to be an engineer, psychologist, doctor and so on, and there end. Or the cultivation of the whole of the human being, not only the academic side but also understanding the depth of the psychological world. Is this possible to do in a school - both? Not only attend to the academics but also help the student to understand his whole psychological nature, the conflicts, the confusion, the fears, the anxieties. And if it is a boy, he enters the army, specially in Europe, not in America or England, for two years, trained to kill, prepare for war and the parents say, "I dearly love my child". That is, you are preparing for the child to be ready to kill and be killed. This is modern civilization. They talk about beauty, love, god, and the hierarchical structure of society, all preparing for war. And this has been going on for five, ten thousand years, and we, ordinary citizens, accept all this. And we say, "What can we do?" What can one, or a group of people do when the whole monstrous structure is geared to war? Probably you cannot do anything; but to be aware of this, to be aware that wars are caused by national divisions, racial divisions, economic divisions, communal divisions, divisions brought about by ideals, beliefs and so on, to be aware of all this. And if one is aware, that very awareness is bringing about its own action. It isn't that you have to do something - join a political party, or this or that, but if one is really, deeply concerned, if one really loves one's children. But I am afraid that is not possible because most parents in the world are very selfish. They want to fulfil themselves. You know all that is happening. The woman has to go out and earn money because she wants a better carpet, better refrigerator, or whatever it is, and the husband wants to climb the ladder of success, so they are absorbed in themselves and the child has very little part in their lives. So the educators take them over and condition them to the desired pattern.

But being aware of all this, not intellectually, but deep in one's heart, in one's feeling, if one really loves one's child, is it possible to educate him, or have a school where he is educated not only academically but much more psychologically, to understand his whole being, to be free of his own problems, to face the problems and end them, not carry on day after day, day after day. So that demands educators who understand all this, who understand what the world is, what society has become, what the culture of which we are all so very proud, which has become so utterly destructive and an educator who realizes his utter total responsibility to bring about a good human being. We are using the word 'good' in the sense of holistic, or whole human being, not a divided, broken up human being, fragmented and therefore perpetually in conflict with himself. That demands a teacher who understands all this. But unfortunately throughout the world the teachers are the least respected, the least paid. The teachers are the most important people in the world because they are bringing about a new generation of people, therefore they must be respected, paid well, looked after as in the old Asiatic world where the teacher was the most important person in society. Such teachers perhaps do exist in some of the schools in which we are connected, but it is a tremendous task because the parents don't want something whole. Society doesn't want it. So if those who are really concerned with education and the right kind of education, if they can come together, put all their resources into this.

One of the parents in a group discussion said, "Why should I sacrifice myself, give up my drinking, smoking, pot, drugging, for my child?", you understand? So they are not concerned, and so we perpetuate this terrible society in which we live.

So right education is the cultivation of the whole of the brain, not part of it. When that cultivation of the whole of the brain comes about there is holistic action in which there is no conflict. And such a human being is a good, compassionate human being. And it is up to you, if you want such a school.

2nd QUESTION: If there are no individuals how can individual effort be made to be serious, attentive, alert? And where in this is the individual's responsibility for his actions?

I hope you have understood the question. Let's be very clear what is an individual, if there is such an individual. And if there is no such thing as individuality then what is that so-called individual to do? That is the question. Which is, right action, seriousness, deeply concerned and responsible. That is the question. We all accept that we are all separate individuals, both in the West and in the East. This is the tradition, this is what we have been educated to accept, from childhood. And also it is very, very, very carefully cultivated by religions, maybe unconscious, but it is cultivated by religions, by the educators, by the woman and the man and the child. This is the pattern that we have accepted. Now we are asking: is that pattern in which the so-called individual functions, is that individual actual? Or he thinks he is an individual: actuality and the thought that says, "I am an individual" - you see the difference? Are we clear on this? The actuality and thought that creates an actuality which it thinks is real. You have understood these two points? Right?

Now, are we individuals? Let's be objective, not emotional, not romantic, sentimental, are we individuals? Or we are the result of thousands and thousands and thousands of years of collective, of a brain that has evolved through time, which has gathered innumerable experiences, has faced many wars, suffered, anxious, uncertain. If you say you are an individual and that is happening to you that has happened to every individual throughout the world - right? To every human being, whether he lives in Russia under tyranny, whether he lives in the so-called democratic world, or in the rather disordered world of the East. Fortunately it is somewhat disordered and inefficient - fortunately because the moment you get very efficient, very orderly, you fall into the groove and there you stay, which doesn't mean we are advocating inefficiency.

Are we individuals? Or our whole consciousness, which says, "I am an individual", our whole consciousness which we think is the individual, is that consciousness separate from you or from another? You understand? You say as an individual that your consciousness is separate from the other - is that so? We are questioning it, we are not saying it is, it is not, is that so? Or your consciousness is similar, modified but similar to the consciousness of every human being in the world - right? He suffers, goes through a terrible time, tortured, poverty, penury and so on and so on, just like you - right? Are we aware of this? That is a fact. You might not like it, you might say, "Well I prefer my own individuality. I have a different character from somebody else, character is shaped by your conditioning", and so on and so on. They say exactly the same thing in India, "Oh, I am different because my name is different, my form is different, my characteristics are different. I have certain tendencies" or this, that and the other. "I belong to a certain class of people" - you know the whole rational explanation for maintaining individuality. But when you look at it very carefully, patiently, observing what is actually going on, human consciousness is similar, modified by their different cultures, outwardly, on the skin of the consciousness as it were, but inwardly the same current, it is the same ground on which every human being stands. This is logical, objective, sane.

So you are not an individual. That is very difficult to accept. It is like being brought up as a Catholic or a Protestant, or a Buddhist and so on, it is very difficult for them to see that religions have been invented, put together by thought, you have been programmed like a computer and you repeat. And it is very difficult to point out and deeply accept that all religions are put together by thought, and thought is never sacred. Whatever the symbols, the pictures, the images, thought has created, those symbols are never sacred because thought itself is a very small affair. Right? So similarly it is very difficult for us to accept that we are not individuals.

And if you are not an individual is it not possible to be much more serious, much more concerned with the whole of humanity, of which you are? From that feeling of wholeness of mankind, right action comes. When you feel utterly, totally responsible for your action as a human being who is the rest of humanity, out of that feeling comes right behaviour. It is not individual behaviour. When there is this feeling that you are the whole of humanity, not intellectually but the feeling in your heart, in the depth of your being, then how can you kill another? How can you then be self-centred? And if you are an individual, which is an illusion as far as the speaker is concerned, then you act as a human being, separate, fragmented, broken up. And out of that fragmentation you act and therefore breed more conflict. This is what is happening. Look what they are doing politically in the world, for god's sake, see all this. Each country concerned with itself, competing with other countries. And it is the job of the politicians to sustain this because otherwise they would lose their jobs.

So it is only when you feel utterly, totally responsible for the whole of mankind, in that feeling is love, and when there is love you will not do a thing to destroy another human being. And that is right action, right behaviour, right thinking.

3rd QUESTION: We know that asking how to maintain awareness is a wrong question, since awareness is moment to moment, but does the capacity of awareness develop, getting stronger and stronger in endurance? And is this what you mean by the awakening of intelligence? If so does this not imply process?

It's hot! First of all let's understand what we mean by awareness. Don't let's complicate it, for god's sake let's keep it simple. What does awareness mean: to be aware where you are at the moment where you are, sitting there, aware of the tent, the shape of the tent, the various divisions that hold the tent up, to see the proportions of the tent, and generally the environment that is around the tent - the mountains, the hills, the green pastures, the running waters and the blue sky, if there is a blue sky. To be aware of all that outwardly. And also to be aware of the person you are sitting next to, the dress, the colour, the look on his face and so on. All this can be observed at a glance - right? To be aware of all this. And the questioner says: awareness is from moment to moment. Is that so? The speaker is supposed to have said it. Is that so? Why should one be aware all the time? You understand - that is what is implied, endurance, to last. Why should it last? Is it because you feel that state of attention, which is part of awareness, is a state that brings you a certain quality of energy, a sense of joy, a sense of feeling without a border. You understand? Is that why you want to maintain, sustain, cultivate awareness?

Then if that is your motive, that is, you want to maintain your awareness, sustain it, enhance it, make it as long as possible, there is a motive behind that and therefore awareness becomes then a matter of choice. You understand? If I have a motive to be aware then I choose the right moments to be aware. Or I desire to have this awareness endure. But is that awareness? If I look at the tent because I like the shape of it, I don't like the shape of it, I wish it were cooler, I wish this or that, I am not then aware, observing the actual fact. So awareness is something that is not cultivable. Either you observe, or you don't observe.

Once the speaker was standing waiting for a bus in a long queue in London. A man with a bowler hat walked past the long queue, got in front. And the man next to him took his hat off his head and passed it down. (Laughter) And the man had to go back! But if the man was aware he wouldn't have done it. But most of us are so concerned with our own problems, with our own - you know, all the muck that we have collected for generations, with that we are concerned. And intelligence is something entirely different. It is a title of a book - The Awakening of Intelligence, but is intelligence to be slowly awakened? Is it a process? Now process implies time - right? I must sleep, I gradually wake up. It may be a waking up immediately which may have a split second interval, which is time, or it may take a long time. Process implies time. That is one thing.

What is intelligence? When you say he is an intelligent man, what do you mean by that? Intelligence according to a dictionary meaning is to have the capacity - please listen - to read between the lines, to read between the words and also it means gathering information by observing, by learning, by information around you and acting according to that information, reading between the lines - all that is implied by intelligence in the sense that thought is operating. That is, thought is reading between the lines, between the words, the hidden meaning. And also thought is gathering information by watching, seeing, hearing, optically reading and so on, it is gathering it. Out of that gathering, reading between the lines, acting, is so-called intelligence - right? That is to be very clever, to be sharp, to discuss opinions, holding on to your opinions because you etc. etc. All that is generally called intelligence - right? We, the speaker, is questioning that, whether that is intelligence. Or intelligence is something entirely different. Are we together in this? The speaker is not laying down anything. He is not being dogmatic but together we are enquiring. We have accepted intelligence as we have just now described. And also we say it is intelligence to go off to Asia and meditate from somebody or other. You follow? All these patterns have been repeated over and over again and we call that intelligence.

Now we are asking what is the depth of intelligence? The depth. That is very superficial - you understand? Gathering information, reading between the lines, watching, learning and cultivating that intelligence of thought, which is common to all mankind, we say that intelligence is really destroying humanity because it is competitive, because it has been reduced to individual intelligence, it has been reduced Einstein this or that. So that intelligence, which is the product of thought, that has become competitive, aggressive and so it is gradually destroying human beings. And we are saying that is not intelligence. There must be another quality of intelligence - right?

Now we are going to enquire together into that quality of intelligence. Not by listening, enquiring you are going to get that intelligence but if one has the capacity to patiently enquire into it, the very enquiry is that intelligence. You understand? Have you understood this? I see you haven't. Oh I am so tired of all this blasted explanation!

We say humanity has accepted that as intelligence. We are not discussing that. We are pointing out its dangerous nature. Now we are beginning to enquire into what is the very root of intelligence, the depth of it, the extraordinary vitality of it, the tremendous energy that is involved in that intelligence. And in that intelligence there is love, compassion. We are enquiring into that. Now to enquire the mind, the brain must be free from its tether, from its prejudices, from its conclusions, from its limited, narrow tradition - all tradition is narrow. So the brain that begins to enquire into what is the depth and the quality of a mind, a brain that is compassionate, love - to enquire, to penetrate that, penetrate rather than enquire, penetrate is to have a brain that is completely free otherwise it cannot penetrate. Obviously. If I am tethered to my belief, tied to my family, tied to a conclusion, the brain is limited, it functions in a very narrow, limited way. Whereas if the brain is free from its anchorage, from its attachment, then it can penetrate, because a mind that is free can only penetrate - right? Obviously. That brain that is free is already intelligent. That intelligence cannot be cultivated. You understand? The very truth of freedom is intelligence, because love is not jealousy, love has no hate, love doesn't belong to one group or one family - love and compassion is not individual compassion for somebody. It is love and compassion and intelligence go together. And from that comes right action.

Now if one has really understood, not intellectually but in your heart of hearts then you are intelligent.

4th QUESTION: I have studied, been to Asia, discussed with people there, I have tried to penetrate beyond the superficiality of religions into something I feel in my bones although I am a logical man, something profoundly mysterious and sacred. And yet I don't seem to apprehend it. Can you help me?

It depends with whom you have tried to discuss. Shall we go on with this question? You are not tired?

One wonders why you go to Asia at all, except for trade. Perhaps people who go there for religious purposes are also trading

- you give me something, I will give you something. One questions why go to the East at all. Is truth there and not here? Is truth to be found through people, through a guru, through a path, through a system, through a prophet, through a saviour? Or truth has no path? There is a marvellous story in India of a boy who leaves home in search of truth. He goes to various teachers, to various parts of that country, walking endlessly, every teacher asserting something or other. And after many years as an old man he comes back to his house after searching, searching, searching, asking, meditating, taking certain postures, breathing rightly, fasting, no sex, and all that. At the end of the time he comes home to his old house. As he opens the door there it is! The truth is just there. You understand? You might say, "It wouldn't have been there if he hadn't wandered all over the place." That's a cunning remark but you miss the beauty of that story if you don't see that truth is not to be sought after. Truth is not something to be attained, to be experienced, to be held. It is there for those who can see it, but as most of us are everlastingly seeking, moving from one fad to another fad, from one excitement to another excitement, sacrificing - you know all the absurdities that go on, we think that time will help us to come to this. Time will not.

So the question is: I am a logical man, something profoundly mysterious, sacred I feel exists. I cannot apprehend it. I can understand it, I can logically see it, but I cannot have it in my heart, in my mind, in my eyes, in my smile. The questioner says, "Help me". If one may point out something, don't ask for help from anybody, because the whole history of man is in you, the whole travail, the mystery - if there is a mystery. Everything man has struggled, sought, found, denied, illusion, all that is part of your consciousness. When you ask for help, forgive me if I point this out, most respectfully, not cynically, if you ask for help you are asking something from outside, from another. How do you know the other has that quality of truth? Unless you have it you will never know whether he has it or not.

So the first thing is, please, I am saying this with great affection, care, please don't ask for help. Then if you do the priests, the gurus, the interpreters, all of them pour on you and you are smothered. Whereas if you look at the problem, the problem is this: man throughout the ages has sought something sacred, something that is not corrupted by time, by slow time, by all the travails of thought. He has sought it, longed for it, sacrificed, tortured himself physically, fasted for weeks, and he has not found it. So somebody comes along and says, "I'll show it to you, I'll help you." Then you are lost. Whereas if you say: is there something sacred? The mystery only exists because it is mysterious, but if you uncover it, it is no longer a mystery. Truth isn't a mystery, it is something far beyond all concept of mystery.

So is it possible for a man - listen to the question first - for a man who has studied a great deal, various aspects of religion, of the East and the West, accumulated a great deal of knowledge both in the scientific world, the Left and the Right, the Marx, etc. etc. read all that. There are lots of people who have read that and their brains are crowded. We used to know an author and he used to say to me that, "I know all the Asiatic religious thought, the Christian thought, 'The Cloud of the Unknown', the various mystics of Europe, and so my brain is full of other people's knowledge. And can I ever experience something totally original?" - you understand? The cry of such a human being who is desperately wanting something - not wanting - seeing something, this is not enough. Then what do they do? They take to drugs hoping to experience that something original. It is not a chemical product that is going to produce that originality.

So, what is one to do? What am I to do - I am asking as though an outsider - I am asking, what am I to do, knowing I am a serious man, I am human, I can laugh, I can shed tears, but I am a serious man. And I have superficially enquired into all the aspects of religion, and I recognise their superficiality, therefore I have discarded them, whether the superficiality of the gurus, the churches, the temples, the mosques, all the preachers in the world, because if I see one actual state of religious aspect of superficiality I have seen the whole lot of them. I don't have to go through them all. So what am I to do? Is there anything to be done? Who is the doer? And what is it that is being done? Are you following all this? Please follow all this, step my step, if you are interested in it. If you can discard all your superficiality with your garlands, pictures, you know, all that nonsense, if you can discard all that and stand alone, because one has to be alone. The word 'alone' means all one. Solitude is one thing, all alone is one. Solitude has in it the quality of loneliness, you can walk alone in the forest and be alone, or you can walk in the forest feeling that you are in solitude. That feeling is totally different from the feeling you are alone. Now what am I to do? I have meditated. I have followed different systems, slightly and I recognize their superficiality. I must tell you another story, if you don't mind.

We were speaking in Bombay, enormous crowd and so on. And the next day a man came to see the speaker. He was an old man, white haired, white beard. He told me the following story: he was one of the important judges in India, an advocat, a judge, highly placed, family, children, respected and all that stuff. And one morning he said to himself: "I pass judgement over others, criminals, swindlers, robbers, business robbers, political robbers and so on. I pass judgement, but I don't know what truth is so how can I pass judgement if I don't know what truth is?" This man who came to see me was telling me. And so he withdrew. That is one of the old traditions in India, highly regarded, respected, he withdrew from his family, went into the forest to meditate. This is the tradition in India still that when a man renounces the world he must be clothed, respected, fed, wherever he wanders in India. It is not an organized society of monks. He is alone. So he withdraws into a forest and he said that for twenty five years he meditated. And after hearing the speaker the other evening he said, "I have come to see you. I have come to say how deeply I have hypnotized myself, how in this hypnosis I have deceived myself." For a man who has meditated for twenty five years, to acknowledge that he has deceived himself - you understand the nature of a human being that says that. Not just these monks.

So what am I, who have a certain amount of leisure, serious, not following anybody - because if you follow anybody that is the end of it. Please see all this that I am saying. It is the end of your penetration into that which is eternal. You have to be completely a light to yourself, not depend on anybody. Their initiations, their garlands, nobody. Otherwise you cannot be a light to yourself. So I realize I must be a light to myself. I don't follow. I don't do any worship, any ritual, and yet that which is eternal is eluding me. It is not in my breath, in my eyes, in my heart. So what am I to do?

First of all can the brain be free of the centre which is me? You understand my question? Can my brain be free of myself, the self, whether that self is super self, ultra, ultra, ultra super, it is still the self. Is there total dissipation of selfishness, to put it very simply? Selfishness, the self-centre is very cunning - it can think it is escape from all selfishness, from all concern about its own entity, its own becoming, and yet very subtly, deeply it is putting out a tentacle - you understand all this? So one has to discover for oneself whether there can be complete and total freedom from all selfishness, which is all self-centred activity - right? That is meditation. To find out a way of living in this world, without being selfish, self-centred, egotistic activity, egocentric movement. If there is a shadow of that, a movement of that, then you are lost. So one has to be tremendously aware of every movement of thought. That is very easy, don't complicate it. When you are angry, for the moment you do not know even that feeling. But when you examine it you can observe the arising of it - right? The arising of greed, the arising of envy, the arising of ambition, aggression, as it arises to watch it, not at the end of it, as it is arising, as you watch it, it withers away. You understand? So the brain can be aware of the arising of a thought. The awareness of the arising of thought is attention, not to smother it, destroy it, put it away, but just the feeling that - don't you know the feeling of hunger when it arises? Obviously you do. Or your sexual feeling, as it arises to be completely aware of it. So the awareness, the attention of the movement of the 'me', my desire, my ambition, my egotistic pursuit, when one is aware as it arises, it withers away. That is absolutely necessary so that there is not a particle, a shadow of this 'me', because the 'me' is separate. I went into all that. So that is the first thing I have to understand. Not control my body, special breathing, yoga - you know all those - you wash your hands of all those.

Then to have a brain that is not partial - right? You understand? That is not acting partially but whole. I do not know if you have gone into this. I am talking so long. I must be brief.

We pointed out the other day that we are functioning not with all our senses, but only partially. The partiality, the narrowness, emphasizes the self - of course. I am not going to go into it in detail, you can see it for yourself. But when you observe the mountain, the trees, the rivers, the blue sky, the person whom you love or whatever it is, with all your senses there is no self. There is no me that is feeling all of it. So that means a brain that is not functioning as a dentist, as a scholar, or a labourer, as a super astronomer, but functioning in the whole of your brain. That can only take place when the brain is completely quiet. So no shadow of self and absolute silence of the mind, quietness, not emptiness - that gives a wrong meaning. Most people's brains are empty anyhow! But to have a brain that is not occupied with anything, including god, meditation, with nothing. Only then the brain is silent, full of vitality and that brain has a great sense of love, compassion, which is intelligence. Right?

SAANEN 3RD QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 31ST JULY 1981

This is the last question and answer meeting. Probably you should meet again next year.

One always wonders why one asks questions. Is it out of curiosity or to stimulate a challenging question which will stimulate the speaker and so bring out something new? Or we ask questions which are put by serious person with serious problem? If it is a serious problem in one's life then such questions have an importance, have a sense of vitality; and such questions can be answered truthfully, in depth. There are some of these questions which have been put, which I have chosen this morning or rather last night. And there are too many questions all together, probably about hundred or more - over hundred and fifty - and it is impossible to answer all those questions. So we have chosen what is probably applicable to all those questions and not according to what one likes or easy to answer but we have chosen these. And I hope, you will excuse us if we do not answer all the questions.

Q: I hope, you excuse me for disturbing you. I hope, I do not disturb you too much. I feel yet so distance from you in order to say that you don't want to be a guru, I still feel that you are. You sitting there; we are so far away from you and I wonder, it cannot be changed. That's my own question.

K: Sitting on a platform doesn't give one authority. Sitting on a platform, little rised above is only for convenience because you can see the speaker and the speaker can see you. And the whole question of authority, guru - we have dealt with that question so very often. Perhaps we should deal with it again. There is a question with regard to gurus little later on. May we wait till then, sir?

1st QUESTION: If two people have a relationship of conflict and pain, can they resolve it, or must the relationship end? And to have a good relationship isn't it necessary for both to change?

I hope the question is clear. What is the cause in relationship of pain, conflict and all the problems that arise in relationship? What is the root of it? Please in answering these questions we are thinking together, I am not answering it and you just receiving it or accepting it, or reject it, but together we are enquiring into these questions. This is a question that concerns all human beings, whether they are in the East, here, or in America. This is a problem that really concerns most human beings. Apparently two people, man and woman, cannot live together without conflict, without pain, without a sense of inequality, without that feeling that they are not profoundly related to each other. One asks why? There may be multiple causes, sexual, lack of temperament, the opposite feeling that of belief, of ambition, there may be many, many causes for this lack of harmony in relationship. But what is really the source, the depth of that source, which brings conflict in each of us? I think that is the important question to ask, to ask and then not wait for an answer from somebody, like the speaker, but having put the question, have the patience to wait, hesitate, let the question itself take seed, flower, move. I don't know if I am conveying that feeling.

I ask myself why, if I am married to a woman, or live with a woman, why do I have this basic conflict between us. I can give a superficial answer - because she is a Roman Catholic and I am a Protestant, or I am this or that, those are all superficial reasons. But I want to find out what is the deep rooted, or deep source of this conflict between two people. I have put the question and I am waiting for the question itself to flower, to expose all the intricacies that lie behind the question because there are a great many intricacies in the question and what the question brings out. For that I must have a little patience - right? A little sense of waiting, watching, being aware, so that the question begins to unfold. As it unfolds I begin to see the answer. Not that I want an answer but the question itself begins to unroll, show me the extraordinary complexity that lies between two people, between two human beings that perhaps like each other, perhaps are attracted to each other, when they are very young they get sexually - and all the rest of it - and later on as they grow a little older they get bored with each other and gradually escape from that boredom through another person - divorcing or quietly, you know, all the rest of it. But the same problem exists with the other. So I have to have patience. Patience, I mean by that word, not allowing time to operate. I do not know if you have gone into the question of patience and impatience.

Most of us are rather impatient. We want our questions answered immediately, or escape from it immediately, operate upon it immediately. So we are rather impatient to get on with it. This impatience doesn't give one the depth of understanding of the problem. Whereas if one had patience, which is not of time, because I am patient, I am not wanting to end the problem, I am watching, looking at the problem, let it evolve, grow. So out of that patience I begin to find out the depth of the answer. Right? Let us do that together now this morning. We are patient, not wanting an immediate answer and therefore our minds, brains are open to look, are aware of the problem and its complexity - right? We are trying - no, I don't want to use the word 'trying' - we are penetrating into the problem why two people can never seem to live together without conflict. What is the root of this conflict? What is the depth or the superficiality of this conflict? And what is my relationship with her, or with somebody? Is it superficial? That is, sexual, the attraction, the curiosity, the excitement, which are all superficial, sensory responses are superficial - right? So I realize these responses are being superficial and as long as I try to find an answer superficially I will never be able to see the depth of the problem. So am I free from the superficial responses and the problems that superficial responses create and try to solve those problems superficially? I don't know if you are following?

I have seen that so I won't find an answer superficially. Therefore I say, what is the root of it? Is it education? Is it being a man I want to dominate the other? I want to possess the other? I am attached so deeply I don't want to let go? And do I see that being tied, attached, will invariably bring about corruption? You follow? - corruption in the sense I am jealous, I am anxious, I am frightened, I want all the sequences of attachment - one knows very well. Is that the cause of it? Or is the cause much deeper? You follow? First of all we said superficial, then emotional attachments, emotional and sentimental and romantic dependence? If I discard those, then is there still a deeper issue involved in this? You are getting it? We are moving from the superficial lower and deeper and deeper so that we can find out for ourselves what is the root of it. I hope you are doing this. Right?

Now how do I find the root of it? How do you find the root of it? Are you wanting an answer - right? Wanting to find the root of it and therefore making a tremendous effort? Or you want to find it so your mind, your brain is quiet, looking - right? So it is not agitated, it is not the activity of desire, will. It is just watching. Are we doing together this? Just watching to see what is the deep root, or deep cause, the basis of this conflict between human beings. Is it the sense of individual separation? See, go into it very carefully please. Is it individual concept that I am separate from the other basically, though biologically we are different but the sense of deep rooted individual separative action, is that the root of it? Or is there still a deeper root, a deeper layer, you understand? I wonder if you are following all this? We are together in this? First sensory responses, sensual responses, then emotional, romantic, sentimental responses, then attachment, with all its corruption? Or is it something profoundly conditioned brain that says, "I am an individual, and he - or she - is an individual. And we are separate entities, each must fulfil in his own way and therefore the separation is basic." - right? Is that so?

Is it basic? Or I have been educated to that? That I am an individual and she - also an individual - must fulfil herself in her own way and I must equally. So we have already started from the very beginning these two separate directions. They may be running parallel together but never meeting. Like two railway lines that never meet. And all I am doing is to try to meet, try to live harmoniously, struggle, "Oh, darling you are so good" - you follow? - repeat, repeat, but never meet. Right?

So if that is the cause, and apparently it appears to be the cause, the root of it, is that separative existence of an individual a reality? Or it is an illusion which I have been nourishing, cherishing, holding on to, without any validity behind it? If it has no validity I must be quite sure, absolutely, irrevocably sure that it is an illusion and can the brain break away from that illusion and realize we are all similar, psychologically? You follow? My consciousness is the consciousness of the rest of mankind, though biologically we differ, psychologically, our consciousness is similar to all human beings. If I once realize this, not intellectually but in depth, in my heart, in my blood, in my guts, the feeling, then my relationship to another undergoes a radical change - right? Inevitable.

Now the questioner asks: we are in conflict, must it end? If we battle with each other all day long, as most people are, struggle, conflict, you know, the bitterness, the anger, the hatred, the repulsion - we bear it as long as we can and then comes the moment when we have to break. We know the familiar pattern of it, there are more divorces after marriages. And the questioner asks: what is one to do? If I am everlastingly in conflict with my wife and somehow I can't patch it over, must the relationship end? Or I understand basically the cause of this disruption, of this conflict, which is the sense of separate individuality and I have seen the illusory nature of it and therefore I am no longer pursuing the individual line, therefore what takes place between me, who has perceived that and lives it, not verbally maintains it but actually lives it, then what is my relationship with the person, with the woman who still thinks in terms of the individual? You understand my question?

It is very interesting. Go into it. I see, or she sees - better put it onto her - she sees the foolishness, the absurdity, the illusory nature of the individual, she understands it, she feels it, and I don't because I am a male, I am more aggressive, more driving and all the rest of that. So what takes place between us? She has comprehended the nature and I have not. She won't quarrel with me, never - right? She won't enter into that area at all but I am constantly pushing her, driving her and trying to pull her out of that area. I am creating the conflict, not she - you have understood how the whole thing has moved? Are you following all this? The whole thing has moved. There are no two people quarrelling but only one. See what has taken place. And I, if I am at all sensitive, if I have real feeling for her, I begin to also transform because she is irrevocably there - you understand? She will not move out of that area. See what happens. If two immovable objects meet there is conflict. I don't know if you see. But if one is immovable, the lady, and I am movable I naturally yield to that which is immovable - right? I wonder if you understand this. This is very simple.

So the problem then is resolved if one has real comprehension of relationship, without the image - which we went into previously. Then by her very presence, by her very vitality of actuality she is going to transform me, help me. That is the answer. Got it?

2nd QUESTION: Would you please go into what you mean by reading the book of one's life at a glance? Or with a single look.

I think it is fairly obvious that we human beings are the history of mankind. Right? In us is the totality of all human psychological knowledge - right? That is fairly obvious. I hope. Must I go into that? That is, the story of mankind, which is wars, tears, bloodshed, pain, grief, laughter, agony, anxiety, loneliness, sorrow, all that is part of me, I am that. I am the story of all that - right? The book of history is me, not the kings - part of the kings too, I am all that. Now can I read that book, which is me, do I have to read it page by page, chapter by chapter, not missing a single line until I come to the end of the book? You understand my question? I am the story of all mankind, that is fairly simple, to see that even intellectually - right? Do I see that intellectually that I am the story of all mankind; all mankind suffers, has shed tears, laughter, irritation, conformity, every sense of indignity, vulgarity, superficiality, I am all that - otherwise I wouldn't elect the politicians as they are - right? So I am all that, including the priest, and the gods that thought has invented. I am all that. Now that book is me. Have I to read page by page? Or can I understand that whole book with one glance, with one single look? You understand the two questions?

We are saying it is impossible to read that book page by page, chapter by chapter. That would take you all your life because all your life is a period of time. During that time you are adding more and more, or taking away little by little. But you are gathering more and more. So the book can never be read page by page. It can never be read - you understand? If you understand that, which is logical, objective, if you realize that it cannot be read page by page then you have only one issue: which is to look at it with eyes that comprehend from the beginning to the end at a glance. You understand? What does that imply? What does it imply to look at yourself, which is the story of mankind, historia, mankind, to look at it? You understand? Again this requires patience. To look at it with a patient, silent brain so that the book itself unfolds rapidly.

Now, just a minute: when you have a map of Switzerland - is it Switzerland, yes - when you have a map of Switzerland with all the lakes and the mountains and all that, the beauty of the land, if you have a particular direction from Gstaad to Bern you are only concerned with that route. You don't look at the rest of the map. That is, you have a particular direction and if you have a particular direction you neglect to look at the rest of the map. Please understand this. But if you have no direction then you look all round. You have understood? The moment you have a motive which gives you a direction, then you are only looking in a particular direction. But if you have no motive and also no direction then you look at the whole map at a glance. You have understood? Now can you do this, the same with oneself - anger, jealousy, brutality, aggression, attachment - all that. That is the whole map of yourself, which requires quietness of the brain and no direction. Then you see clearly the whole of it. You hear the whole tone of that history and you have captured immediately, the wholeness of it - right? Have you got it?

Shall we go on to the next question?

3rd QUESTION: Some of us including myself have had experiences of seeing lights, a feeling of oneness with the universe, energy, the awakening of kundalini, inward clarity. These last sometimes for moments, for hours. Are these not steps towards illumination?

K: Can we be little bit funny? I wonder if one's liver is alright when you see lights, flashes and all that. (laughter) Just a minute, just a minute. You know, some people do have, seriously, certain experiences, certain perceptions. I wouldn't call experiences. Now let's examine what experiences are. What is an experience? Either it is sensory experience, sensual experiences or psychological experiences, actual physical experiences like pain, toothache and so on. We are talking here about psychological experiences.

Now what do you mean by experience? An incident, a happening which you must recognise, name it, and therefore the experience is different from you who are experiencing? I don't know if you follow all this. Therefore it means, if the experiencer is experiencing something, he must know what it is. He must be able to recognize it, otherwise it is not an experience, right? I don't know if you follow all this. If I can't recognize the experience, it doesn't exist. I recognize it because I have already had the symptoms, the knowledge of it. Therefore I say that is an experience. I have seen by experience as a Hindu - if I am a Hindu - some deity because my brain is conditioned to that. If you are a Christian, you have an experience of Jesus or whatever it is. So as long as there is an experiencer separate from the experience, experience - what you call the new experience, is really the old experience manifesting itself in a different form and you recognize it. And you call that experience. Now a mind that is clear, absolutely without that shadow of self, has no experience. Right? Because there is nothing to experience.

Illumination is a state of experience which is so absurd. Because, sir, truth or that ultimate energy, you can't experience. You can't say well, I have reached that. That statement: I have read, that is full of vanity and arrogance. A mind, a brain or a mind that is free from arrogance, which is utterly in its simplicity humble, in which there is no self whatsoever then that eternity might be there. But if you say I am experiencing that then you are - it is like experiencing anger. It is as good as anger. But don't let's call it illumination.

And there is this new brought again from India - I wish they would keep it to themselves - brought from India, about the Kundalini. Probably many of you have heard this. If you haven't, forget it. But if you have, those people who write about it, forgive me please, I am saying this most respectfully, those who talk about do not know anything about it. You might say what right have you to say that. Why do you say that they do not know? Which means you know, right? Naturally that is an obvious question. I don't want - personally, I don't want to enter into this question because anybody who says, I know what it means, they do not know. It's much too complex. The whole idea is this: Energy, when it is misused, destroys the energy that can comprehend the total source of energy. Do you understand? If I misuse my energy in various forms - arrogance, selfish action, competition, aggression, soaked in sorrow and talking endlessly about it, or constantly being occupied with something or other, I am wasting energy. Obviously, like a motor running all the time in the garage; it will soon wear itself out. But the idea of all this is that, this energy when it is not wasted in any direction, that very human energy which is not the energy created by conflict or the energy created by thought, that energy is or apprehends the total energy of universe. That is the idea about Kundalini and all that kind of stuff.

So the questioner says, asks, is this a process of illumination? You can't, if one may point out again most respectfully, you cannot prepare for illumination. It is like cooking a nice dish. You take time till the potatoes collect... (laughter). And illumination is not something that you come gradually, process. It is there if you are utterly, totally unselfish and have a brain that is utterly without a shadow of conflict.

4th QUESTION: You have invited your audience, listeners, to doubt, to question. It becomes necessary to question rightly, so would it be worthwhile to go into the issue of a wrong question and the whole art of questioning? (Which we have done, but I'll read it again.)

Please the speaker has not invited you to question, to doubt, to have scepticism. It is part of one's own natural intelligence. It is not the speaker says, "Let's doubt". That is meaningless. But if we are not gullible, if we want to question, if we want to find out, if we want to enquire, penetrate, you have to have scepticism, you have to doubt your own experiences, your own standards, your own conclusions, your own prejudices. But we don't. We question, doubt what others are saying - right? Now when one is questioning out of one's own innate enquiry, penetration, doubt, then it has importance, then it has vitality, it clears the brain of its prejudices. If I am prejudiced and I hold on to that never questioning it, my brain becomes gradually dull. But if I question my prejudices, my beliefs, my conclusions, my whole concept of religious behaviour, religious all the rest of it, my brain becomes lighter, clearer, active. Right? Naturally. So the speaker is not inviting you to doubt. You have to doubt, that is part of life. It is only the gullible, the people who want to hold on to some fanciful, romantic, sentimental image that daren't doubt.

And the art of questioning: you know there are three arts: the art of listening, the art of seeing, and the art of learning - right? The art of listening is to listen without interpretation - right? To listen without translating what is being said to suit your own comfort and desires. To listen not only with the hearing of the ear but to listen to the word and what lies behind the word and listen so attentively that you capture the depth of the meaning. The art of seeing is to observe without the word, without the name, without the form; which means to observe without any direction, without any motive, to observe so that you capture the whole movement of yourself - you follow? The movement of the trees, of the rivers, of the hills, to see. And the art of learning is, as we have learnt the art now, to accumulate knowledge. That is the art of learning. I don't know mathematics but I study, I have a professor who will teach me and gradually I learn mathematics so that I can apply it as an engineer, or a technician, to the whole technological world - right? (loud noise of engine) Can I wait for that?

The art of learning is to accumulate knowledge about any subject and specialize in that subject, and act skilfully. That is what we call learning. That is, gather knowledge, information and then act. The other is act and from that action learn - which is the same as the other. I don't know if you are following all this? Right? I gather information in order that I can live, have a livelihood, act skilfully or unskillfully. Or the other is: is to act and from that action learn. Which is, from that action I have accumulated knowledge. They are both similar. They are not separate, they are both similar but some are emphasizing the other, which is, act first and learn from action. This is being trotted out by some - I won't go into it. So both are the same: which is, accumulate knowledge and act.

Now is there another form of learning? It is very interesting if you go into it, question it. We are familiar with the old system: accumulate knowledge, and act. Is there another learning - we will use the word learning for the moment, in quotes - is there another learning which is not accumulating? You understand? Because see what happens: when you accumulate knowledge and act skilfully, your skill is always limited - right? Limited according to your knowledge and knowledge can never be complete and therefore your action will inevitably be incomplete and therefore cause conflict - right? That is clear. Now we are asking: is there an action which is not based on knowledge? This is a difficult question, please have patience and find out. Is there another form of action which is not based on learning, accumulating knowledge? See what action born of knowledge implies. One must be very clear on that. Are you getting tired?

Audience: No.

Let's start again. One must be very clear: the implications of learning, being informed, and from that knowledge act. That knowledge can never be complete therefore action can never be complete. And therefore such action must bring about regrets, guilt, the feeling of guilt and conflict. That is clear. Is there another quality of action which is not based on knowledge, which is based on thought - you understand? An action which is not based on thought. Thought being the response of knowledge, experience, memory, stored in the brain. Action of thought is limited therefore there are regrets, pain, sorrow and all the rest of it. Is there an action which is not born of thought? You get the question? Are we meeting the question?

Let's find out. If you see what knowledge and action imply and the truth of it, not the intellectual concept and acceptance of it, but the truth of it - right? - that action based on thought must inevitably create conflict, guilt, regret and all that. Because thought itself is deeply, irrevocably, limited, because knowledge is limited about anything. Now is there an action not born of thought? Probably this is the first time you hear it, therefore your whole attitude to it would be to resist it. Or you might say, "Prove it. We know the other very well but as we don't know this, prove it to us" - right? I am not proving it to you. I am not a conjurer. All that the speaker is saying is: watch the two - you understand? Watch very clearly the limitations of actions borne of thought. And question, enquire, penetrate into an action which is not borne of thought. "For us," you say, "I don't know what that means because I have never even looked at it, considered it." So somebody comes along and says let's look at it together - right? I am that person, the speaker is that person who says, let's look at it together.

Is love thought? You understand my question? Have you understood my question? Is love born of thought, born of desire, born of pleasure? I am asking, the speaker is asking a simple question. If you say love is part of thought, then love is part of hate. Naturally. Can hate and love together exist? And so logically, objectively, perhaps very, very sanely, love has no relationship whatsoever with thought. And thought, as it is not related to love, what is the action of love which has no relationship with thought? You understand the question? Are we meeting each other? Are we a little bit paralysed by this question? I am afraid we are. If we associate love with thought, as we do, then love must inevitably bring conflict, obviously, because we have associated love with desire - sexual and other forms of desire. And also if we associate pleasure with love again it is the operation of thought, as we have been into that, then love is totally involved with thought. And if it is involved with thought it must bring about great travail to human beings. That is simple. Right?

So is there an action which is not born of thought? Perhaps I won't even use the word love because that might complicate it. We say, the speaker says very clearly, definitely, irrevocably, that there is an action not born of thought. And he will explain this to you very clearly. When you perceive something clearly and that perception of clarity can only come when the brain is free from all anchorage, from all sense of attachment to belief, persons, ideas and so on - right? That frees the brain from its conditioning so that it can look afresh. Right? The looking afresh is to have no division between the observer and the observed. We explained that again carefully. So there is an action of perception in which there is no observer and the observed and therefore no activity of thought, and action is free from thought. I have explained it very carefully - right? That is, if I can observe without any prejudice a person, specially in relationship, to observe very clearly, without all the memories one has gathered about her or him for the last twenty, forty, ten days. To be free of that, utterly, a brain that is not collecting hurts, insults and all that: such a brain is free to observe. That observation is the operation of the total brain because there is no hinderance - right? It operates as a whole. Then an action born out of that wholeness is without conflict. It is not the action of thought. Right? I have explained it, it is up to you.

5th QUESTION: Who are you?

Is that an important question? Or would you say, "Who am I" - not who you are, who am I? And if I tell you who I am, what does it matter. It is only out of curiosity, isn't it? It is like reading a menu at the window, you have to go into the restaurant and eat food. But when you are standing outside and reading the menu, it won't satisfy your hunger. So to tell you who I am is really quite meaningless. First of all, I am nobody - right? That's all. It is as simple as that. I am nobody. But what is important is: who you are, what are you? When they ask who you are, in that question is implied that you are somebody very great therefore I am going to imitate you, the way you walk, the way you talk, the way you brush your teeth, or whatever it is. I am going to imitate you, which is part of our pattern, you understand? There is the hero, or the man who is enlightened, or the guru, and you say, "I am going to copy everything you do" - it becomes so absurdly silly - you understand? Childish to imitate somebody. And are we not the result of a lot of imitations? The religions have said - they don't use the word imitate - give yourself over, surrender yourself, follow me, I am this, I am that, worship - right? All this is what you are. In school you imitate. Acquiring knowledge is a form of imitation and of course there is the fashion - short dress, long dress, long hair, short hair, beard, no beard - imitate, imitate. And also we imitate inwardly, so we all know that.

But to find out who you are, who you are, not who the speaker is, that is far more important, and to find out who you are you have to enquire. You are the story of mankind. If you really see that it gives you tremendous vitality, energy, beauty, love because it is no longer a small entity struggling in the corner of the earth. You are part of this whole humanity. It has a tremendous responsibility, vitality, beauty, love. But most of us won't see this, as most of us are concerned with ourselves, with our particular little problem, particular little sorrow and so on. And to step out of that narrow circle seems almost impossible because we are so conditioned, so programmed, like the computers, that we cannot learn something new. The computer can but we can't. See the tragedy of it. The machine that we have created, the computer, can learn much faster, infinitely more than I can, than the brain can, and the brain which has invented that, that has become ultra intelligent machine - right? Whereas our brain is sluggish, slow, dull because we have conformed, we have obeyed, we have followed, there is the guru, there is the priest, there is the rich - you follow? And when you do revolt, as the revolutionaries and the terrorists do, it is still very superficial - changing the pattern of politics, of so-called society, society being merely the relationship between people, and we are talking of a revolution not physical but the psychological revolution in which there is no, at the depth, conformity. You may put on trousers because you are in this country and in India it is different clothes, that is not conformity, that is nothing, childish. But inwardly, not a feeling of conformity. Conformity exists when there is comparison. For a mind to be totally free from comparison, that is to observe the whole history which is embedded in you.

I am afraid this has to be the last question. There are too many of them.

6th QUESTION: Would you please speak further on time, measure and space.

I hope you aren't tired, are you?

Audience: No.

K: Please don't be polite. If you are tired just quietly listen. As most of us are tired, our brains have become exhausted by the usual repetition, going to the office, seeking pleasure, resisting conflict. Our brains, please realize they are tired brains. If they weren't tired you wouldn't be here. I wouldn't be here either. But we are tired human beings because we are frightened, there is terror, there is danger in the streets, financial uncertainty, war, atom bombs, we are really extraordinarily exhausted human beings - through drink, drugs, over indulgence in every form. And we are going to talk about something that requires a great deal of penetration, a great deal of attention. And to go into it very deeply you have also to relax, to be free to look, to penetrate, however much one may be tired.

(Repeats the question: Would you please speak further on time, measure, space and thought.

This is important to understand because man has always asked, the serious ones, whether time has a stop, whether man can ever be free from the limited space he lives in, not only physically. The physical space is becoming narrower and narrower, because of over population, cities, we seem to live in flats, drawers that you pull out and put back. You understand? Push back. Space, physically, is becoming very small, and perhaps that is one of the reasons why there is violence in the world because we have no space. That is why big cities like New York, London, Paris, they breed violence, we are all much too close together. This is one of the facts which have been investigated. They have put many rats in a small space and these rats become totally disorientated, they eat their own children, they kill each other, exactly as we are doing, because they have no space, physical. This is a question that one must go into very, very seriously if you are interested.

Measure - there are three things - time, measure, space. What is time, what is space, what is measure? We are going to enquire into them. Time, measure, space.

And as we said, some of the writers have asked this question, whether time has a stop - psychological time we are talking about, not the chronological time by the watch, you can't stop the sun from setting or rising. But we are talking about time as a movement of becoming or being, or climbing, or expanding - right? Time, which is part of evolution, the psychological evolution. The biological evolution has almost come to an end for man, obviously. He is not going to develop a third arm or fourth arm or something or other. So we are talking about psychological time. Time as hope, as something that has happened yesterday or last year, and that memory of it is time, the repetition of it is time, the endeavour to escape from it is time - you are following all this? To suppress it, to do something about it, all that involves time. And the people ask, not only the writers, the scholars who have written volumes about time and all the rest of it, and also the ancient Hindus have asked this question: whether time has a stop so that a new movement can take place; not imaginary, not fanciful, not romantic and all that kind of stuff but actually psychological time coming to an end. Right? That is one question.

The other is measure. The whole technological world is based on measurement. If you had no measurement there would be no technology - right? Measurement according to a ruler, or measurement by thought and so on, measurement. This measurement has become necessary, to build an aeroplane, even to have this tent. And this measurement has been handed down to the Western world through the Greeks. I am not a Greek scholar but you can observe this. The Greeks were concerned, the ancient Greeks, were concerned with measurement. They were the originators of mathematics and so on, part of mathematics and so on. So we, the Western world, have inherited measurement. Measurement not only technologically, measurement comparing one painter against another painter, one poet against another poet, one sculptor, Mr Moore, against others - right? Measurement. And also in ourselves there is measurement: I am not as good as I should be, the better, the more, psychologically as well as physically, more money, more power, more fun, all that. If I have more money, more power, I have more fun. That is part of measurement. And we are always comparing, psychologically. There is the great teacher and I am not. I compare myself and eventually I am going to get where he is.

And also space. Psychologically as well as physically, we have very, very little space. Specially you observe this when you go into crowded towns, cities and in over populated countries like India, enormous crowds. You have no concept of it. And naturally they live in narrow streets, live in small houses, physically, naturally there is always a battle going on for space, physical space. "For God's sake move over into that corner. Don't crowd me." And also psychologically, that is in consciousness we have very little space. It is crowded - right? It is crowded with our knowledge, crowded with our fears, anxieties, despairs, depressions, seeking happiness, seeking illumination, seeking the powers of Kundalini - you follow, occupied, wanting more, better understanding, greater power. I'll fast, I'll have more energy fasting - you follow? Always occupied and therefore there is very little space. If you observe your consciousness is filled and therefore there is no space. And then realizing there is no space you begin to enquire into the space of the universe. Astrophysicists are doing this, that extraordinary world of cosmos, which is essentially order. Cosmos in Greek means order. The scientist whose brain is limited because of his knowledge, because of his conditioning, his relationship with another, his greed, his desire for more power, more money, more status, more publicity - you follow? And that little brain is enquiring into something immeasurable and translating what they see through telescopes into mathematical problems.

So if you observe there is no sense of stopping time, psychologically. There is no ending of measurement - right? We are always measuring, always looking to the future, better government, better economic position, United Nations will eventually - you follow? - the very idea, United Nations - think of it - tribalism united, how can they? So knowing all this we are asking whether time, measurement can have a stop? That is essentially: is there a stop to thinking? You understand? Because time is thought, time is movement - today, tomorrow, yesterday, time is movement. And time is also chronological, it is movement. Thought is a movement - right? So thought is the movement of time. Thought is time. And we are asking: is there a stop to time and to thought? Or is man everlastingly condemned to this movement, which is hell? You understand? Hell - forget that word. It is a Christian word. They have also their own particular word in Asia. And we are saying also measurement. The word meditation also means to measure. In Sanskrit also 'ma' is to measure. Meditation is measurement, the word. And the Sanskrit word also means measurement and we are conditioned to measurement. Measurement is - 'I am, I shall be' - the ideal and the pursuit of the ideal, how near, how closely I am approaching the ideal. I am violent and I must not be violent, which is a measurement. So measurement, psychologically as well as physically, is a movement of time, thought - right? And space. As our brains, our consciousness is crowded, there is not a spot which is not covered. I don't know if you have noticed it. You may think that there is a space that is not covered but when you think that is not covered that very thought is covering it - you understand? Are you following this? When I think there is in me a field, or a state which is immeasurable, which has immense space, which has no time, when I think about it, it is the product or the invention of thought - right? Therefore it is part of thinking, part of measurement, therefore the concept of super, super, super egos is still part of that thought.

So this is our problem: whether time, thought can come to an end, which is measurement, and can they have space, infinite space, not the space invented by thought? Is this possible? It is possible only when you see the truth or the falseness of measurement, psychologically, imitating, conforming, and all that, when you see the absurdity, the unintelligent way we live, and see where thought, which is time, is necessary to learn a language and psychologically it has no place. When you see the truth of it then consciousness, though it is crowded and beginning to dissipate, when you see that, the truth of that, then there is space. It is not what you do to end time, what you do to measurement, say "I must stop measuring", but seeing the truth of it will set the brain free, will bring freedom to the brain. Then you have space that is literally immeasurable. And it is only then that the apprehension or the perception, which is not personal, of that which is everlasting from everlasting.

BOMBAY 1ST PUBLIC TALK 23RD JANUARY 1982

We are going to talk over together the condition of man. It is not only in this country but all over the world man is conditioned according to his culture, according to his language, according to his religion. And also he is conditioned by economics, socially, and by his parents and so on. Man through out the world is conditioned. And generation after generation man apparently has not changed at all. There has been slight modification, slight change, but generally speaking man, which includes the woman naturally, throughout the millennia has evolved. That is, time and circumstances, culture, has shaped the mind of man - that is your mind. And we are going to talk over together whether that condition, the human conditioning can ever be changed, can ever be transformed; or must it always go on, century after century what it has been - his condition of sorrow, of pain, anxiety, loneliness, despair, and the search for the religious mind, a search for something that is beyond all conditioning. This has been the lot of man. And we, during these six talks here, are going to talk over together, converse together, have a dialogue together, whether it is possible for the human condition to change radically, fundamentally. That is what we are going to go into throughout these six talks if you care to attend them.

There are those who say that human conditioning can never be changed. It can be modified, it can be altered here and there, do a little patchwork but they maintain under very so-called highly intellectual, sophisticated people, they say that the human conditioning can never be changed, it has always been what it has been, and only partially modified. That is their assertion, that is their investigation both psychologically, socially and other ways, they have stated that the human mind, the human condition, the sorrow, the pain, the anxiety, the agony, constant endless conflict, can never be radically - bring about a change. That is their statement.

And we are questioning, doubting, being sceptical, whether those statements, that the human mind can never be changed, we are questioning that. And we are going to investigate together whether it is possible, not superficially, not at the periphery, but basically, fundamentally, whether the human mind, which has brought about a great deal of happiness, technologically, and a great deal of misery in the world, whether that condition of man can ever be changed. We are going to investigate into that. If one may point out, this is not a lecture as it is generally understood, where the speaker puts out some ideas, with which you agree or disagree, some statements with which you can argue about - this is not a lecture of that kind. That is, the speaker puts forth a lot of ideas, concepts and conclusions and you, the audience, merely listen. That is, hear with one ear, let it go through the other ear. Here we are going together to investigate, therefore this is not a lecture. Please understand this very clearly. This is not a lecture as it is generally understood but we are going to face together the innumerable problems that man has, and we are going to look at them, we are going to understand the depth of them; not only the superficiality but the profundity of our human problems.

So though the speaker is describing, examining, putting it into words what the condition of man is, you, as the audience - and I wish there weren't so many, then if there were a few we could talk together more easily - but you as an audience, who are the listener, must share, not only share but communicate with what is being said so completely that you, yourself, are examining, you, yourself are investigating, comprehending, changing radically. So please, if one may again point out, this is not a lecture. And the speaker is not doing any kind of propaganda, for any belief, for any ideals, for any conclusions, or for any systems sociologically or religiously. We are together, freely, going to understand - not only verbally but in our hearts and minds the state of man. That is your state, what is happening to man throughout the world. So please we are sharing together, partaking together, in the investigative process. It is a process. It is a thing you have to understand step by step, not according to the speaker but you are examining your own conditioning, your own condition, your own sorrow, your own pain, uncertainty, insecurity, the terrible world we live in. We are together sharing by observing critically, sceptically, without any conclusion what the world is. The world outside of us is created by each one of us. The society is the product of human struggle, human competition, human aggression, human struggle to achieve, to become, not only economically but religiously. So please be serious, this is not a flippant talk, nor is it to entertain you. The speaker doesn't want to entertain you. Cinemas, the temples, they can do that. But the speaker is very serious about this matter, questioning, doubting, demanding so that each one of us can find out the truth for oneself, not dependent on anybody. So if that is very clear from the very beginning let us proceed together to examine the human consciousness, the human state of mind, it's conditioning.

The crisis is not political, the crisis is not economic, nor is it spiritual, so-called religious. The crisis is in our consciousness. Our consciousness is what you think, what you feel, what you act, how you behave, your beliefs, the whole complexity of human existence. So we are not doing any kind of propaganda. We are not trying to point out a way of how to resolve our problems, but if we could together step by step examine the exact position, exactly what is happening, not only in the world but also in ourselves, then perhaps we can communicate with each other more deeply more clearly. So please this is a serious gathering, it is not an entertainment, intellectual or emotional, but needs a mind that is clearly observing, questioning so that your own mind, your own perception sees what is happening out there in the world, and what is happening inwardly to you.

So first of all that which is happening out there in the world, and that which is happening inwardly, are not two different movements. It is like the tide going out and the tide coming in. But we have divided the world as something outside of us and a life which is inward. I hope you are all understanding all this. It is one unitary movement, going out there and the tide coming in, this constant interrelationship between outside of you and world inside. To bring about a radical social, economic, political change in the world you must understand what is happening inside, in yourself because you are creating the world. Your society you have created and you are responsible for that society. And if you do not put order in your own self, inside yourself, inside your house which is your consciousness, then you will create a world that is destructive, as it is now, malignant, dangerous, preparing for wars, for destruction. So it becomes very important that we understand very deeply not only what is happening out there in the world but also what is happening to all of us, each one of us, as a human being: why we suffer, why we are in conflict, why we human beings are always struggling, struggling. So first let us look around us, the world.

All over the world there is a decline, there is degeneracy taking place all over the world. There is no freedom, freedom in the sense freedom from sorrow, freedom from pain, freedom from loneliness. There are governments that are controlling human minds, trying to shape them through their ideologies, which are the Communist worlds, the totalitarian world. In that world there is no freedom. If you go against the government you are sent off to Siberia or one of the psychological hospitals and so on. The rest of the world there is freedom, somewhat. And there is conflict between nations, economically, socially, religiously: the Catholics against the Protestants, the Hindus against the Muslims, the Muslims against somebody else, and so on, this constant battle is going on, not only physical battle, like in Beirut and other parts of the world, but the conflict in our relationship with each other. One is aware of all this, this is not something new the speaker is pointing out, this is actually what is going on. There is national division, which is tribal division, glorified as nation, there is division racially, the Arab and the Jew, the Hindu and so on. There is division between religions, there is division between gurus, there is division between gods, there is division between man and woman. So wherever there is division there must be inevitably conflict. That is the law. No politician is concerned with the global interrelationship, which is the only way to survive. So politics are not going to solve these human problems. Governments are becoming more and more corrupt, inefficient. Nor can you rely on any leader. This country has had many, many leaders, religious, political, neurotic, and rather limited minds. You have had leaders, they haven't helped you, actually. That is, to bring about a radical transformation in the structure of the mind, in consciousness, no guru, no leader, you have had them all. And where are you at the end of it? At the end of many, many centuries? You have sacred books - I don't know why they are called sacred - but they are books, and you have relied on them as a guide. Right? And at the end of millennia you are exactly where you were when you started.

So the world out there with the politicians, religious leaders, economic strategies, and the accumulation of war material, each country spending millions and millions to destroy each other and nobody is standing against it, saying 'That is all wrong'. We all want to lead a comfortable, easy life. So that world outside of us, we have created it through our greed, through our vanity, through our aggression, competition, through our cowardice, we have created that world. We are responsible for that world, not the politicians, they are like us, crooked, double talk, like we do. So you can't rely any more on politicians, leaders, gurus or books. That is the world.

And when you examine yourself, what you are, what are you? Sad human beings, seeking security, uncertain, confused, miserable, lonely, having certain capacities either technologically or artistically, or some other form of skill. This is what we are, each one of us. And so what we are the world is. Please understand this because we are facing a grave crisis. The crisis is not out there, the crisis is in our minds and hearts, in our consciousness. And if we don't examine them carefully, understand their nature, the structure of our minds and hearts, we will slowly degenerate, as we are doing now all over the world. So we are responsible for what we do, nobody else. You can't put it on a god, or on circumstances, or saying past lives. You are responsible because the world is created by you, the world outside, not the universe. And the gods that you have - your thoughts have made the gods, the gods haven't made you - right? Please understand all this. You have made in this country three hundred thousand gods, or more, as they have done in other parts of the world, gods which have been created by man, by thought - the rituals, the pujas, all the ceremonials are created by thought, by you. You want to escape from this world into a fanciful world, which is the world of puja, football, rushing off to temples or mosques or churches - it is the same thing, a vast entertainment. Right? We are not criticizing, we are just pointing out to you. We are examining together, not agreeing together, not opposing each other, but looking actually at what is going on. And most of us do not want to face things as they are. We would rather escape from them, turn our eyes away from them because we haven't got the integrity to stand and look.

So, during these six talks we are going to do it together, to observe actually what is happening in our consciousness, in our minds, in our hearts. The way we think, the way we act, how self-centred we are, how utterly callous we are becoming. And together we are going to examine first why we human beings have become what we are. You understand my question? What we are actually. What has made us what we are. In asking that question we always want a cause. Please understand this, give your attention to this because it is rather difficult. I am going into something which you will have to pay attention if you want to.

We are asking why human beings have become what they are - greedy, envious, quarrelsome, lonely, sexual, seeking pleasure, frightened, sorrow, that is what you are. And we are asking why, what has made us become like this? Now when you ask a question why, you want to find a cause. Right? Whatever has a cause must have an end. Right? Please understand this. If I have pain, there is a cause for that pain physically - I have either some disease, or some incurable disease, there is always a cause and an effect. Now when we are asking what is the cause, the reason why human beings, highly educated, sophisticated, capable of thinking, why have they become like this, degenerate, dishonest, corrupt, schizophrenic, that is leading double lives, going to the temple and be a lawyer. That is a double life, a contradictory life, which is schizophrenic. Why? When we ask that question - please listen to that carefully - when we ask that question we want a cause for it. Right? Which is, the cause is circumstances, the cause is environment, the cause is I have not been properly educated. We invent a lot of reasons which seem reasonable and say these are the causes why human beings have become what they are. Right? This is not difficult to understand. Right? Now when you are trying to find out a cause you are not looking at the fact. I wonder if you understand this? Look: if I have a toothache I know the cause of it, I go to the dentist, he either pulls the tooth out or does something with it. If I have pain there is a cause for it. Now is there a cause - please listen - is there a cause why human beings have become like this? Or human beings are always like this? You have understood? There may be no cause. Because if there is a cause it can be ended. Apparently after several millennia we are more or less what we were ten thousand years ago. So when you ask why we have become like this, please do not try to find out a cause, because that is an escape from your observation of the fact of what is happening. You understand this? I must go on.

You see when we are analyzing, which is to seek a cause, you are moving away from what is actually happening. You get that? I am lonely, let's say I am lonely. I want to find out why I am lonely so I begin to analyze, examine, go into what loneliness is and so on. When I do that I have moved away from the fact of loneliness. You have understood? From the fact of what is actually happening. So when we look for a cause we are running away from what is happening. So when we ask why human beings throughout the world have become what they are, conditioned, do not try to find a cause but stay with what is happening: that you are conditioned, your minds are corrupt and all the rest of it, look at it, remain with it, observe it, it is a living thing. So if one may point out, don't analyze, that is a waste of time. But observe clearly what is happening. So we are going to learn together what is observation. You understand? We have observed the world, what is happening in the world, and also what is happening inwardly, in the psyche, in our consciousness. So we are going to learn how to observe, what is the nature of observation, the manner of looking, not only optically with your eyes, but also looking inwardly. We are going to see, or observe, learn to observe. Are we together so far?

Somewhat at least.

Do you observe, look with your eyes, at the squalor in the streets, do you observe the moon, the trees, the world around you? Or you are so concerned with your own problems, with your trouble, that you never look. Because when you look at the trees, at the stars, at your own wife and husband, your children, when you look at the squalor, the poverty, the degrading condition of this city, when you look around you become sensitive. You understand? You become sensitive so that you can look more profoundly into yourself. That is why it is important from the very beginning to find out for yourself the manner of observation. To look at a thing, at your wife, at your husband, at your children or the stars, to look without the word. You understand? When you look at a tree, the word tree is a distraction which prevents you looking. You have understood? Right? Is this clear? Let me put it differently: the word is not the thing. Right? The word 'wife' is not the living human entity, the word 'mountain' is not the actual mountain, the word 'door' is not the actual door. Right? So the word is never the thing. The word is a symbol, but the symbol is not reality. Right? So when you look at that thing called a tree, look at it without the word. Right? Then you look at it much more closely, much more sensitively, more accurately. But if the word interferes then the word takes away the actual observation. Right?

So to look at the world, that which is happening in the world outside there, to look without any identification. Right? To look at it as a non-Hindu, non-Buddhist, non-Christian, or Muslim, just to look at it. Right? Can you do that? Because if you do not do that then you are preventing a global interrelationship which alone can solve the economic, social, the problems of poverty and so on, not governments any more. It is a global problem. So you must have a mind that looks at the whole world, not just the Indian world, or the Muslim world, but the whole world of humanity. Right? So you can never be identified with any country, with any people, with any group, with any conclusion, or ideologies, you must be a free person to look at this marvellous world.

So to observe not only the world - now we are going to observe ourselves. Right? To observe, to see exactly what we are. Neither get depressed by what we see, or elated by what we see, not see ourselves as our various imaginary processes, but actually what we are. Right? If you can face it. What are we? We are the past, the present and the future. We are the centre of that - the past, all the remembrances, all the experiences, the knowledge, the incidents, the pain, the past, and the present, and the future. We are all that. Right? So we are time-makers. I wonder if you understand all this? We are not only the result of time but also we make time, we are slaves to time. That is a fact. So the past, the present, which is modified by the past, and the future is born out of the modification, which is tomorrow, all that is part of what we are. We are time-makers. And also we are what we think we are. Right? If you think you are the result of past lives, that is what you are. Right? If you think god created you, it is your thought that has created you. You understand all this? So thought is time - we will go into it much later.

So thought has put together what you are. Right? Right? Thought. Thought has said you are Christian, thought has said you are Hindu, thought has said you are Muslim, or Buddhist, thought has said you are an Indian with a peculiar flag. Thought has invented everything, including technology, what you are. Right? This is very difficult to understand so please go into it with me. Your consciousness, that is what you think, what you feel, how you act, your beliefs, your dogmas, your rituals, your gods, your fears, your pleasures, all that is your consciousness. All that is what you are. Right? And all that is put together by thought. When you say I am an Indian, it is the result of thought. Somebody has told you, or etc., etc. When you say I am a Christian, it is the result of thought. So your consciousness, it's content, is put together by thought. Right? Thought has created the extraordinary technological world - the computer, the submarine, the warship, the cannons, all that is the result of thought. Thought has created the marvellous churches, the temples, the mosques. Right? Thought has put in the temples, in the mosques, in the cathedrals, symbols which are what thought has put there. Right? So thought has created the most extraordinary complicated technological world, the extraordinary surgery that is going on, the medicine, the communication, the rapid transit, all are the result of thought. There is no question about it, you don't have to worry about that. And also thought has made you an Indian. Thought has said you belong to this particular community - the Brahmins, you know, all that, it is the result of your thinking, which has brought about this conditioning.

So we have to examine what thought is. Because if we don't understand what is thinking, we will never be able to delve deeply into that which is beyond thought. So you have to understand the nature and the structure of thought. Why thought has such extraordinary importance in our life. We have emotions but thought recognizes those emotions, classifies them, good and bad, worthwhile and noble and so on. Thought is operating all the time, chattering. You must know that. Your mind is chattering all the time, never still, even in meditation, whatever you call meditation. So together we are going to examine what is thought, what is the source of thinking, how does thinking happen? Because whatever you do, you think, before or after. What you do, either you have thought it out and do, or do and then think it out. So thought is extraordinarily important to understand, and its place. So what is thinking? I may explain it, but you follow it, examine it, look at yourself so that it is not I think and I tell you, and then you accept it, which becomes too silly, we are grown-up people. Which is, I may describe, point out, the speaker may point out, what is thinking, how it comes. But don't memorize it, but rather look at it, find out for yourself the origin of thinking.

First of all we live by thought, we are directed by thought. Our actions are based on thought. Thought is predominant in our lives. If you are a businessman thought is operating, if you are an engineer thought is operating, if you are a guru - I hope you are not - thought is operating. So we must examine very closely what is thinking. When you are asked what is your name, you reply immediately, obviously, why? Because you have repeated your name a dozen times, so in that there is no need to think what your name is, there is no necessity to think. But when you are asked a little more complex question, there is the question and the answer. In that interval between question and the answer there is thinking going on. If I ask you what is the distance between here and Delhi or New York, your mind begins to enquire. You have heard about it, you will ask somebody, you follow, thinking is going on. Which is an interval between the question and the answer, in that interval you are thinking, you are asking, you are looking in books to find out the mileage. And if you are asked a question about which you know nothing you say, 'I don't know'. Because there you don't have to think, you say, 'I don't know'. You understand? So there are three states: the immediate reply, a time interval reply, and the fact 'I don't know'. Right? The 'I don't know', you have said it, 'I don't know', there is no thinking necessary. It is only the time interval that demands your thinking. Right? Are you following all this? Somebody?

Now in the first case you answer it without thinking, second you take time to find out, third you say, 'I don't know'. Nobody says 'I don't know'. You understand? It is a most marvellous feeling, statement when you say, 'I really don't know'. There is a great beauty in that, great vitality of a mind that says, 'I really don't know', it is a fresh mind, not a mind crowded by knowledge, not a mind that is secondhand. It is a mind that says, 'I really don't know', that has great integrity.

So we are going to examine together what is thinking. Thinking is born out of memory. Right? If you had no memory you couldn't think. Memory is the accumulated knowledge of experience, either yours, or human experience. Like the scientists, they have accumulated during the last five hundred years or more, a great deal of knowledge, through experiment, through hypothesis, through trials, they have collected a great deal of knowledge. To be a good scientist you must have a great deal of knowledge of what other people have said, what you have experimented, how you have tried, you have gathered. That knowledge is stored in the brain as memory, that memory responds, if you are a scientist in one way, if you are an engineer another way, if you are a businessman another way. So all have accumulated knowledge. And knowledge is the result of tremendous experience. Right? Experience of millennia of human beings, what they have gone through, their accidents, pain, suffering, anxiety, all that. So knowledge, experience of all human beings, and that knowledge stored in the brain as knowledge, and memory, which is remembrance, and from that thinking takes place. This is a fact. You can observe it in yourself. Now knowledge is never complete. Right? It can never be complete. You can accumulate more and more but it is never complete. They can look through telescopes and so on into the universe but they can never understand the nature of the universe - the enormity, the space, the vastness, the vitality, the immensity of it. So knowledge is always limited, it is always hand in hand with ignorance. So thought is always limited. Get it? Right sirs? Because my knowledge is limited, my remembrances are limited, thought is therefore limited and whatever thought does is limited. I invent a god, it is a limited god, I can say 'God is immense', but it is the creation of thought, therefore it is limited. The rituals, the pujas, are all the inventions of thought therefore they are limited. And therefore you have the Christian prayers, the Hindu - you follow? The battle is going on with this limitation. Like thought has invented the nation called the Hindu and the nation called the Arab, or the Muslim. Right? Thought is responsible for all this.

So what place has thought? If thought is all our life, then all our life is limited, which is a fact. I may go to the temple, I may pray, I may imagine the immensity, but my life is limited because I am caught in this book of knowledge. That book may be ten volumes but it is still limited. Right?

So can there be a mind which is not burdened by thought, but thought has its place? You have understood this question? Look: as we said, experience, knowledge, memory, thought and action; from that action you learn more, so you come back, more knowledge, greater remembrance, thought, action. You are caught in this chain because we are functioning on knowledge all the time and we are seeking that which is not knowledge through knowledge. You understand? I wonder if you have grasped this? Right? We are seeking as human beings something which is not knowledge, which is beyond knowledge, which is really the most profoundly sacred. Not all the inventions of thought, those are not sacred. Thought is not sacred. So we have to find out, discover for ourselves, the place of knowledge, which is, I must have knowledge of English to speak English. If you are a Frenchman you must have knowledge of French and so on. So you have to find out the place, where knowledge is necessary. You understand? To go from here to your home knowledge is necessary. To drive a car knowledge is necessary. To write a letter, to talk to somebody, knowledge is necessary. And know that knowledge is limited. Then find out why you accumulate psychological knowledge. You understand? I wonder if you understand all this? Are you getting tired? You should! Because you are not listening to me, you are thinking, you are watching, you are learning - not learning from the speaker, learning by observing yourself. Observing that your actions are based on knowledge, experience, knowledge and therefore your actions are always limited, and therefore they always bring conflict. There is no holistic action. That is, if you are a tribal minded Hindu, then you will never understand a global relationship of human beings because you are tethered to some idea that you are a Hindu. So you have to learn to find out where knowledge is necessary, and where knowledge is not necessary. I will show you if we have time.

From childhood we are hurt, we are wounded, the parents wound us by scolding us, telling us what to do, what not to do, bully us. In the school the teacher or the fellow students hurt us, in college, in the universities, comparison is a process of hurting - you are better than me therefore I am hurt. We are all, from childhood we are hurt. That memory of that hurt remains. Can one not be free of the feeling of being hurt altogether? That is, be free of the knowledge of being hurt. You understand? Oh, come on sirs. So that your mind is free from hurt. So we are saying psychological knowledge, which we will go into much more deeply later on, is totally unnecessary because that is what is making the conflict. That is the structure of the 'me', the I, the ego. That invents a super ego, super consciousness which is to be brought down, and all the game you play. But this accumulation of psychic, psychological knowledge is the essence of what you are. So when there is freedom from hurt, which is the knowledge that you have gathered through life, that you have been hurt, and hold on to that, that knowledge is totally unnecessary, whereas the other knowledge is necessary. Now can you be free of your hurt? If you are aware of it, most people are not because they have become utterly insensitive to it, they accept everything, the squalor, they accept everything, don't you? The poverty, the habits, the traditions, you know, specially in this country you have become used to everything. You never question, you never doubt, you never ask, you never...

So, hurt begins when you have an image about yourself. When you have an image that you are a great man, somebody comes along and says, 'Don't be silly' and you get hurt. As long as you have an image about yourself, whether you are beautiful, whether you are extraordinarily talented, that you are better than somebody else, and so on and so on, you have built that image from childhood. Either your mother, your father, has given you that image, which you strengthen by thinking more about it, and that image gets hurt. Right? So find out whether you can live without a single image. Which is to observe yourself having images and those images get hurt, and the consequences of that hurt is neurotic behaviour, frightened, more and more withdrawing, isolating yourself and so on, the consequences of that hurt. That is, the accumulated knowledge that you have kept as being hurt is the essence of that image. Now can you live without a single image about yourself? Or about anybody? That is, to have no image is the essence of humility, which has never been touched by vanity. You understand?

So, sirs, we had better stop now. We will meet again tomorrow, if you want to, and we will continue with this conversation together. (Clapping) Don't clap sirs, it is not necessary.

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday evening? We were talking over together the activity of thought, thought that has created the atom bomb and thought that has created marvellous communications, the thought that has created wars, thought that has brought about division among people, thought that has specialized in so-called religion. Thought has been both beneficial and destructive. We also went into the question: what is the origin and the beginning of thought? We went into that too.

And we should also talk over together this evening what is relationship, what is the nature of human relationship. Because, as we said yesterday, we are concerned with our daily life, not with some abstractions, not with some theories and speculative assertions, but rather look at things as they are, both at the outside world and the world in which we live inwardly. We talked about human consciousness and its content, into which we shall go much further later on. And also we talked about, together, why human beings are what they are - confused, seeking security, both outwardly and inwardly, uncertain, unhappy, constant struggle, pain, suffering. That seems to be the lot of human beings. And that has continued for millennia upon millennia, thousands upon thousands of years. And human beings have not changed very much. They are modified somewhat but they continue to live a life of conflict. And apparently no one has been able to solve this problem, either through meditation, which has also become another conflict or through various forms of systems, sociological, political, religious, and none of them have been able to resolve our human problems. And we were asking yesterday why, after these millennia, we are what we are - shrunken human beings, both emotionally, intellectually and of course religiously.

And we said too yesterday, please, this is not a lecture, as it is generally understood. This is a conversation, a dialogue between two people: you and the speaker. They are talking over together their problems in a friendly way, not asserting anything, not forcing each other to accept certain dogmas, theories or ideals. They are walking together down a lane, crowded with trees and birds and the beauty of the land around them. They are walking together as two good friends. That is our relationship between you and the speaker. He is not directing you, he is not leading you, he is not helping you. But together we are going to look at our problems. And if possible resolve them. That is our relationship between you and the speaker, that he is not doing any kind of propaganda, he is not certainly your guru because one has to live one's life not dependent on another politically, religiously and so on, one has to have the strength, the vitality, the energy, the drive to live correctly. We are going to discuss all these problems, not only the problems of everyday life but also the problems of fear, pleasure, pain, sorrow, love, compassion and ultimately that problem of death. And at the end of the talks we are going to discuss together what is meditation. The speaker has purposely put meditation at the end, not at the beginning of his talks because unless you put your house in order, unless there is inwardly order, not confusion, not disorder, it is utterly meaningless to meditate, which we will go into completely, thoroughly, during all these four more talks that are left.

So we are going to talk over together this evening the relationship between human beings, between a human being and nature, which is the relationship between yourself and the environment. The environment is not only the city, or the town or the village you live in, but also the environment of nature. If you have no relationship with nature you have no relationship with man. Nature, which is the meadows, the groves, the rivers, all the marvellous earth, the trees and the beauty of the earth, if we have no relationship with that, we shall have no relationship with each other, because thought has not created nature, like the tiger, thought hasn't made it, the waters of an evening, with the stars on it, the beauty of it, thought has not created it. Thought hasn't created the vast mountains, the snowcapped mountains against the blue sky, the evening sunset and the lonely moon when there is no other star. So thought has not created nature. Nature is a reality and what we have created between human beings is also a reality, but a reality in which there is conflict, there is struggle, everyone is trying to become something, both physically and inwardly, psychologically, psychically, and if I may use that word spiritually. We are all struggling to become something. And when one is trying to become ambitious, competitive, trying to achieve some status politically or religiously, then you have no relationship with another, nor with nature

I doubt if many of you who live in cities with all the crowds, noise, dirt, you know what you live in around, in the environment, probably you have not come across nature. But you have this marvellous sea, you have no relationship to it. You look at it, perhaps you swim there, but the feeling of this sea with its enormous vitality, enormous energy, the beauty of a wave, the crashing of a wave upon the shore, there is no communication between that marvellous movement of the sea and yourself. And if you have no relationship with that, how can you have relationship with another, with another human being. If you don't perceive that, the sea, the quality of the water, the waves, the enormous vitality of the tide going out and coming in, if you are not aware of that, how can one be aware, or be sensitive to human relationship? Please, this is very important to understand this because beauty, if one may talk about it, is not merely in the physical form but beauty in essence is that quality of sensitivity, the quality of observation of nature.

So we are going to observe together our relationship with each other, between human beings. Have they any relationship at all? Please, as we said, this is not a lecture, this is having a conversation between you and the speaker: we are both looking at the human relationship whether it is personal, intimate, or a relationship that has no actual contact except physical contact. We are going to look into this. Because our whole external world of society is based on human relationship. Society is not an abstraction, it is a fact, that society is built, or put together by thought, by human beings who are greedy, struggling, ambitious, competitive, aggressive, selfish and so we have created a society out of our relationship with each other. This is a fact. It is not a theory. I hope we are understanding this question together.

We want to change society. The Communists have tried it, there have been revolutions, physical, always physical, shedding a lot of blood and so on. We want to change society, all of us do because it is corrupt, immoral, without any sense of human contact and you cannot possibly change it unless our relationship with each other is completely radically changed. Again that is very obvious. But we always want to change the outer without changing the inner structure of the human mind. Right? Are we together in all this, or am I talking to myself? I don't want your approval, or clapping but we are together examining, looking, being sensitive, to be aware of what we are doing. As we said, this is a serious conversation, not an intellectual or emotional conversation. A very serious man is a religious man. And we are seriously considering human relationship. In that human relationship there is conflict, pain, misery, and there is also so-called pleasure and we are going to look at all these problems: whether it is possible to radically change a relationship in which there is hardly any love.

So we are asking: what is relationship? What does it mean to be related to another? Please, the speaker is asking the question, but we are thinking together about the question. Now human relationship has become a problem. The meaning of that word problem is to be thrown something at you, it is a challenge, flung something at you, that is a problem. Yes? Something thrown at you, something that you have to face, something that you have to understand, it is a challenge. And a challenge needs right approach. So we have to understand what our approach is to a problem. There is the problem of human relationship. It is a problem in everybody's life. If you are aware of it or not, it is there. How do you approach that problem? You understand my question? There is the problem: how do you come to it, with what mind, with what motive? How do you approach it? How do you come closely into contact with the problem? Is the problem different from the observer who is examining the problem? You are following all this? Probably most of you will find this rather difficult because you have not thought about all these matters at all, so please be patient and let's go into it.

Suppose I have a problem, whatever the problem is, is not important for the moment, but suppose I have a problem. How do I look at that problem? How do I examine that problem? What is my response to that problem? So the problem is not important but how you approach it. Right? Is that clear? I have a problem and how do I approach it? Am I afraid of the problem? Or I want to run away from the problem? Or I want to suppress the problem? Or rationalize the problem? Or I have a motive that I must find an answer to the problem? So I approach the problem with all my confusion, with all my uncertainty, fear. Right? So the problem is not so important as my approach to the problem. Right? So we have to find out what is your approach to the problem, how you come to it. What is your motive if you have a problem? Your motive is to resolve it, if you are aware of that problem at all. You want to resolve it because it is painful. If the problem was most pleasurable it is not a problem. But when the problem becomes painful, confusing, bringing about insecurity then you have to look at the problem, then you have to investigate the problem. So please, what is important is how you approach the problem.

Please sir would you mind being quiet. Please either you are listening to the speaker, or you are listening to your own thoughts, confused, or you want to interrupt the speaker. So would you kindly listen to what he is saying.

How do you listen to what he is saying? What is your reception? Of course, you hear it through the sensual ear. Right? You understand English and the speaker is speaking in that language, you understand the word so you hear through the sensual ear, but also there is hearing beyond the word, beyond the verbal interpretation. To listen so that you immediately understand what he is talking about. That is the art of listening. We are asking now, we have problems, and how do you approach the problem? Because your approach will dictate or resolve the problem. So find out how you approach any problem. It is very simple if it is a scientific problem, you approach it with all the knowledge you have, and try to discover further information about matter, about the atom and so on. If you have a problem, do you approach it with all the past knowledge, with all the past remembrances; or do you approach the problem as though for the first time? Do you understand my question? Are you following? No, you are not, I see you are not following it.

Let's approach it differently. What actually is our relationship between man and woman? Apart from sexual relationship, is there any relationship at all? Or each one, going separately, in their own way, never meeting, except sexually? Like two railway lines never meeting. Right? That is our relationship is it not? No? So our relationship is merely sensory relationship, sexual relationship, and the relationship between each other is based on the images we have built about each other. Right? Are you aware of all this? Am I talking Greek, or Chinese? Are you aware of all this? What actually is your relationship with another? Or you have no relationship at all? Except sexual. If you have no relationship with each other, which I am afraid is the fact, then what is your life? Life is relationship, without relationship you cannot exist. But we have reduced that relationship to mere sensory responses. I wonder if one is aware of this complexity of relationship. You cannot escape from it by becoming a hermit, a sannyasi, a monk, you cannot escape from having human relationship.

So we must examine very closely why human beings have lost not only relationship with nature but also with each other. You understand? Why? As we pointed out yesterday, merely seeking the cause will not bring about the resolution of the problem. You may find the cause. I will show you the cause but the understanding of the cause, the examination of the cause, will not solve the problem. Right? I know for example we are selfish, totally self-centred and we are self-centred because it is our habit, it is tradition, it is our religious upbringing, you are a separate soul, you must seek your own salvation and so on. This emphasis on being selfish, self-centred through education, through pressure, it has existed from time immeasurable. That is the cause of all this misery. Right? That is the cause. We understand that intellectually. And discovering the cause does not make us less selfish. So we said, as yesterday, what is important is not the analytical process of discovering the cause but remaining with the problem, which is, we are selfish. That is a fact. And therefore there is no relationship with each other. Each goes his own way. Divorces are multiplying, in Europe and in America, and it is also coming here more and more, when women can earn their own livelihood, they walk out on men. So gradually there is the world in which hardly any relationship with each other exists, so we become very callous, self-centred, pursuing our own way. That is, our way is to become something. Right? Become more rich, become the chief executive, or become the high priest, the archbishop and so on. There is all the struggle to become something, which is essentially selfish.

Now you have heard this, which we all know. When you hear such a statement what is your reaction to it? Do you accept it and say, 'Yes, what you say is absolutely so' and just let it go? Or you hear it, see the truth of it and remain with that truth so that it operates without your operating on selfishness? Do you understand what I am saying? No, no.

Let's look at it: suppose I am selfish and I say I must not be selfish. That is thought has brought about selfishness. Right? It has structured selfishness. So thought says I must not be selfish, so there is conflict between the fact and what thought wants it to be. Right? No, you are not getting it. I don't know what has happened to all your minds. Come on, let's go into it. Suppose I am violent, we human beings are violent. suppose I am violent. That is a fact. That is so. But I invent non-violence, which is non-fact. Right? I am violent. I do not know how to deal with it, what to do with it. I either indulge in it or try to understand it, try to go into it. And I think it will help me if I have the idea of non-violence, which this country has been preaching endlessly, without any result. So conflict arises between 'what is' and 'what should be'. The 'what is' is fact, the 'what should be' is non factual. So can we drop the non-factual, the ideal, the 'what should be' but only be concerned with 'what is', which is violence? Right? That is a problem. You have the human problem, we want peace but yet we are violent. So the fact is we are violent. How do you approach that fact? How do you look at that fact? What is your intention when you look at that fact? Either you want to suppress it or run away from it, or transcend it, which is that you are not really then facing the fact, you are trying to escape from it. You are following all this? So we are saying: remain with the fact, not translate the fact, not try to run away from the fact, look at it, be with it. When you are with it you give all your attention to it, but when you say, 'I must transcend it', 'I must escape from it', 'I must pursue non-violence', you are wasting your energy. You are following all this? Therefore we are saying, remain with that fact which you call violence, understand it, learn all about it. And you can only learn by watching. Right?

Now, just a minute, there is a difference between learning and memorizing. All of us have been trained to memorize, whereas we are not learning. Learning is to observe and let what you observe tell its story.

So we are asking: what is our human relationship? How do you if you are married, or if you have a girl friend, or whatever you have, how do you look at her, or him? What is your reaction when you look at your husband, or wife? Or you are totally indifferent? Or you say, 'I have responsibility towards her and my children'. You are following all this? What is your inward true response? Are you going your way and she is going her way, so you never meet, because you are ambitious, competitive, wanting more money, better job and so on and so on, and also she has her own ambitions, her own ideals, so there is no relationship when two people are running parallel. You understand this? Of course, it is so simple when you look at it.

So then what is relationship in which there is only sexual pleasure, and is pleasure love? I am asking you a question, please find out. Is love sexual pleasure? Is pleasure love? We won't go into the question of what is love, that requires a great deal of understanding, great sensitivity, appreciation of nature as beauty, beauty of form, beauty of a face, beauty of the sky. And without all that sensitive appreciation of nature you will never find out what love is. But if you have reduced life, the living in relationship to sexual pleasure, and each person pursuing his own way, then you will have tremendous conflict, insupportable rebellion, which is going on in our life between man and woman.

So in examining our relationship with each other, intimate or not, one begins to understand, or learn, and find out whether it is possible to live together as two people, man, woman, without any conflict whatsoever. Being sensitive to each other and yet no conflict whatsoever in that relationship. Is that possible? Because our life, our daily continuous life, day after day is a series of conflicts, endless conflicts until we die. And we have never known a life without a single moment of conflict. And is this conflict necessary in relationship? That is, as long as you have an image of her, and she has an image about you, there must be conflict. Right? You build an image about her, or she about you, through habit, through quarrels, through nagging, through encouraging. You are supporting each other through words, through flattery, through insult, all that is building an image about her, and she about you. Right. This is what we are doing. Right sirs? Now, as we asked yesterday, is it possible to live with another person never having an image about each other? Sir, learn about. That is, I have an image about my wife - I am not married but suppose I have an image about my wife (Laughter) - why do you laugh when I say I am not married? Why do you laugh? Are you laughing because I am a lucky man? Are you laughing because to you laughter is a means of escaping from the fact? So please, we are talking about very, very serious things, about life, about our daily living. Don't pass it off by laughing. We have to face this terrible existence in which there is no happiness, no love.

You see sirs, one is deeply concerned, the speaker is deeply concerned in bringing about a transformation in the human mind. He is concerned. He feels it is a tremendous responsibility and therefore he is talking about it. That as we are living now, utter selfishness, callous, indifferent, brutal, insensitive, we are destroying each other. And we are asking: is it possible to live without a single conflict in our relationship? I say, the speaker says it is possible, completely possible, though he is not married, the speaker has lived with a great many people, in their houses, friends and so on, not to build an image about anybody. You know what that requires? A very quick mind, not a mind that is clogged with knowledge, clogged with remembrances, clogged with experiences, but a mind that is very quick, alert, watchful. Watchful of what is happening around you, in the street, when you get into a bus, or when you get into a train, an aeroplane, or when you are walking along the street, to watch, to look, be sensitive to everything that is happening around you, then you become very sensitive to your relationship. And is it possible to live a life in which there is no conflict whatsoever?

First of all, understand the question, the beauty of that question: to live a life, not ideally, not as an ideal which you must achieve, but the fact whether you can live a life without a single conflict. The question itself has great beauty in it. You put that question because you are sensitive, you are aware of this enormous conflict between human beings, which ends up in war, in divorce, in total neglect of each other, callousness, and all that. But if you put to yourself the question whether you can live a life in which struggle, conflict, can ever end, if you put that question seriously to yourself then that question will begin to evolve, the question itself will stir up a great many problems and you have to face those problems. And in facing them there must be no motive, there must be no struggle to understand it. Look at it. Have you ever been to museums, some of you? You have, I am sure. Have you ever looked at a picture? Not compared the picture of Rembrandt or the modern art, just looking at one picture without comparing it with other pictures? Have you ever done it? Just to remain with that one picture, sit in front of it and look at it? Then the picture will tell you its story. What the artist wanted you to understand. But if you come to look at that picture by comparing if he is as good as somebody else, then you are not looking at that picture. Right? So similarly you are the story of mankind. Right? In you is the residue of all man's endeavour, all man's suffering, his anxiety. Look sirs, you as a human being are not alone, you are like the rest of mankind: you suffer, you have pain, you are seeking security, uncertain, confused, agony, in pain and so is the man in Europe, or in America, or in Russia, or in China. So there is a continuity of human suffering of which you are. You are the rest of mankind, you are the mankind. So you are not alone, you are not in consciousness, as consciousness something separate, you are the rest of mankind. You are not an individual. You are the whole of humanity, because humanity has gone through endless pain, immeasurable sorrow, with occasional flare of joy and love. You are that. So you have to understand that. And the story of mankind is you. So you have to learn how to read the book of mankind which is yourself. You understand all this? Oh god! You are the story of mankind and you have to read that book. Either you read it page by page, which is know all the content of suffering, pain, joy, pleasure, the terrible anxiety and agony, or you skip, you say, 'I know all about it'. Or by reading the first chapter you have understood the whole book. Do you understand all this?

Sir, knowing oneself, which is self-knowing, is important in relationship. If you don't know yourself, what you are, all your troubles, your anxieties, your uncertainties, desire for security, if you don't understand all that, how can you understand your wife or your husband? They will remain two separate entities. So relationship means not only physical contact, which is sexual, but having no image about each other. Therefore there is immediate sensitive relationship in which there is love. Love is not remembrance. Love is not the picture which thought creates about her. That is not love. Love is not pleasure. I wonder if you understand all this?

So sirs, it is important to understand the nature and the structure of relationship. To change this corrupt society you must change yourself radically. And during all these talks we are concerned about that only: to bring about a mutation in the very mind, in the very cells of the brain. The speaker has discussed this problem with scientists, brain specialists, whether the brain, which has been conditioned through time, to function within the area of knowledge, whether that brain can radically be changed; and it can radically be changed when there is a total insight into the whole human problem. Insight is not remembrance. I won't go into it now because it is too complex. So please understand what our conversation is about, which is in our relationship with each other, as two friends, walking along a beautiful lane full of trees and birds, and shadows, numberless, we are investigating the nature of the brain, the mind, nature of our heart, whether in that structure, whether there can be total transformation so that we are different human beings, with different minds, with compassion. So please do become serious some time, not just during the talk, but be serious through life. To be really profoundly serious is to be religious - not the religion of going to temples, doing puja and all that kind of stuff, that is not religion. The man who is diligent in his seriousness, that man is a truly religious man.

BOMBAY 3RD PUBLIC TALK 30TH JANUARY 1982

We are going to talk over together the question of fear. But before we go into that I think we should learn the art of hearing. How to listen, not only to the speaker but to listen to those crows, listen to the noise, listen to your favourite music, listen to your wife or husband. Because we don't actually listen to people, we just casually listen and come to some kind of conclusion, or seek explanations, but we never apparently actually listen to what somebody else is saying. We are always translating what others are saying. I am sure as we are going to talk over together this evening the very complex problem of fear, we aren't going to go into too many details but explain the whole movement of fear, and how you understand it, either verbally or actually. There is a difference between the comprehension of words and the comprehension of the actual state of fear. We are apt to make an abstraction of fear, that is, make an idea of fear. But we never listen, apparently, to the voice of fear that is telling its story. And we are going together this evening to talk about all that.

And we ought also to consider the necessity of scepticism and doubt. Doubt not what others are saying only, but doubt one's own experiences, one's own thoughts, one's own attitudes and values, why we do certain things in life, why we believe. We should have a rational doubt, scepticism, because doubt cleanses the mind, it freshens the mind, it will break down the old habits, the old conclusions, the archaic concepts. So doubt, scepticism, are necessary, not only what the speaker is saying but also doubt your behaviour, your attitudes and so on. So please during these talks having a rational doubt. You know it is like having a dog on a leash, if you keep him all the time on the leash you break the spirit of the dog, but you must let the leash go and let him run because then he becomes alive. So similarly if you doubt all the time then it doesn't lead anywhere, but know when to release and when to hold it in check. That requires intelligence. But to doubt when you release, why you release the dog, your acceptance and so on, unless the mind quickens the thought, awareness.

So please, as we said, we are talking over together. This is not a lecture, where you listen, you are told, or given certain concepts, certain formulas, certain cliches, and you accept them and go home. But here we are not lecturing; we are having a conversation. Like two people having a friendly conversation to find out, to enquire deeply. And I hope you are going to do this, not merely listen to the speaker but also use the speaker as a mirror in which you see yourself. And when you have seen yourself you can throw away the mirror. The mirror is not important. So we are going together to enquire into the very complex problem of fear, why man, millennia after millennia, has sustained, nourished, borne the burden of fear. That has been one of the deep conscious, as well as unconscious factors in life. We are all afraid of something or other, ultimately the fear of death, fear of punishment and so accept reward. Because we are always balancing between reward and punishment. Please watch this in yourself, not just the speaker's words.

So why has man not been able to solve this problem of fear? There are many forms of fear: you may be frightened of the dark, you may be frightened of the future, or frightened of the past, frightened of your husband or your wife, frightened of your guru. You may adore him, you may worship him, that is your own affair, but there is always the lurking of fear behind. So we must examine this problem very closely.

Fear is a movement. It is not static. It is a movement. And it is the aggregate of many other factors - aggregate being the summation, bringing together of all the other factors or the movements that bring about fear. And we are going to examine together please, together, the movements, which are comparison, desire for security. We are going to go into all that, desire for security, authority, desire, time, thought. These are all the various movements of fear. And we are asking whether man can ever be free of fear at all because fear is a dreadful thing. It darkens our lives, from fear we act neurotically, where there is fear there is no love. We are asking whether man can ever be free of this terrible burden? One may not be conscious of it. It may be lurking in the deep unconsciousness, in the deep recesses of one's own brain. You may say, 'I am not afraid, I have no fear', but that is a superficial statement. But most people go through fear and agony of fear. And from that agony there are a great many sorrowful actions, neurotic actions, unethical actions, immoral actions. So please listen carefully, not only to the speaker, listen to your own fear. Don't run away from it, we will hold it together and examine closely what brings about this fear.

We said first of all comparison. We are always comparing ourselves with somebody else. We start this in schools, better marks and so on, right through college, university, this sense of constant comparison. Have you ever tried not to compare at all? That is, of course, you have to compare between two cars, between two materials, if you are choosing furniture you have to compare. But when you compare psychologically then there is always a root of fear in it, the root of fear is there. I compare myself with you; you are very clever, very intelligent, bright, alive, aware, sensitive. And through comparison I say I am not, I am dull compared to you. If I do not compare myself with you, what happens to me? Am I dull? Or I am what I am? And from there I start to find out. But if I am all the time comparing with you who are bright, nice looking, then I am running away from myself, trying to imitate, trying to conform to the pattern you have set. You are following all this? So is it possible to live inwardly, psychologically, psychically without any sense of comparison because comparison is one of the movements of fear? Do we understand? See the danger of comparison, which maintains fear. You are something great, I want to be like you, and if I am not like you I begin to get depressed, all the other factors enter into it. So please discover for yourself, if you can live without any comparison whatsoever. Inwardly, of course, not outwardly because you are taller, shorter and different colour. But inwardly to have no comparison, which doesn't mean that you are vain, that you are arrogant, but if I am comparing myself with you I can never discover what I am. I am always conforming to what you think I am. So that is one of the factors of fear.

Then we are always seeking security, both physically and psychically, that is, inwardly, psychologically we are seeking security. Outward security like a house, food, shelter is absolutely necessary, obviously, otherwise you and I wouldn't be sitting here. So we must have that security. But that security is denied to all people when each one of us is seeking security for ourselves. Right? You are following this? Look sirs: this is a very complex question of security, the search for security, this movement that each of us inwardly as well as outwardly is seeking security. Security being protection, stability, a sense of certainty, a state of mind that is not confused, to be completely secure. Outwardly it has become almost impossible to be secure because there is division between nations, there is division between races, there is division between linguistic differences. I hope you are following all this. There is the division of nationalities which is bringing about the destruction of security for all human beings. This is so obvious. But we human beings, we live in a state of tribalism. See what we are all doing. Either we are Parses, or Hindus, or Buddhists, or Christians, you know, or belonging to some sect, belonging to some guru, and all the rest of it. So this is a form of seeking security outwardly. Inwardly is there security at all? Please question it. Suppose I depend for my security on some concept I have, some belief I have, that belief, that concept, that conclusion gives me a sense of security. I may seek security in knowledge, or in some form of illusion. Right? You are following all this? Illusion. That is, I project an idea, which may be right or wrong, or belief in something that has no rational value and I depend on that, I hold on to that, that gives me a sense of complete security, like a Catholic, he believes in all kinds of extraordinary things, like the Hindus. And in that belief, in that conclusion, in their ideologies there is certain security. But that security can always be thrown away by reason, by pointing out it becomes insecure. You are following?

So, is there security? I may depend for security, psychologically, on my wife, on my husband. I depend. I am attached, and in that attachment, in that dependence, there is a certain subtle form of security. And also unconsciously there is the doubt that this security may not be real because you might go away tomorrow. So there is always doubt, there is always insecurity in the search of security personally, psychologically. Right? So we are asking - please this is very important to ask and find out - if you can live not with security but with intelligence, because that is the ultimate security, a man who is really intelligent, then in that there is no fear whatsoever. So we have to enquire - by Jove, it is hot! - we have to enquire into what is intelligence.

The word 'intelligence', from the Latin and so on, is not only to read between the lines, you understand, read between the lines. Supposing you receive a letter, in that letter everything is not expressed but you have to have a clear mind to read between the words, get the significance of it. That is part of that intelligence. And also intelligence means to gather a lot of information, a lot of knowledge, and act skilfully with that knowledge, that is partly intelligence. If I am an engineer I gather knowledge all about engineering, the stresses and the strains and the mathematics and so on and so on, and according to that knowledge I act. So that is also part of knowledge. But all such knowledge is limited because it is based on knowledge. Are you following? As we pointed out the other day, knowledge is always limited. Right? And if you seek comfort, security in knowledge, you are seeking security is a very limited thing, therefore it will always create fear. Or if you have any kind of concept to which you hold, that also will cause fear. But if you see that any dependence, any attachment, any adherence to a belief, is not intelligent, then that very intelligence gives you security. Is this clear somewhat? Are we making this clear? No? All right.

I hold on to some image I have, image of god, image of some concept and so on. In that I find a great deal of security, I find I am protected. But the god, the belief is a projection of my thought. Right? I have projected it as god, and in that I seek security, I feel safe. But when you tell me to examine this very closely I begin to discover that I am doing a very stupid thing and I get frightened and I run away from it. But if I see the truth of what you are saying, which is that thought has projected god and that which thought has projected thought then worships - which is totally unintelligent. But if I see the fact that it is unintelligent there is already intelligence. Therefore in that intelligence there is security. That intelligence is not yours or mine, it is intelligence. Sir, like there is no western thought and eastern thought, there is only thought. The Western may express in one way and you might express it in another but it is still the activity of thought, which is common to all mankind.

So security exists only in intelligence, not in cleverness, not in knowledge. Intelligence is above knowledge and the feeling of belonging, holding on to something. Intelligence is wisdom and wisdom cannot be bought in books. Wisdom is not the repetition of what somebody has said. Intelligence comes - when there is intelligence there is wisdom. And there is only security in this quality of intelligence which is above all thought.

So this is a movement. That is, we examined comparison, which is competition, which brings fear. We also examined security which also breeds fear. And also we are going to examine together authority. Because the authority of law is one thing. You have to pay taxes, that is one of the laws. That is authority, collective authority for the protection of the collective. Right? We are not questioning that. You can question that, you can question it, change it, politically, religiously and so on. But we are questioning the whole concept of authority, the whole burden of authority which man has carried for millennia.

We are saying one of the causes of fear is authority. Have you ever considered, if you had no authority whatsoever, how would you behave? Social authority, the authority of books, the authority of gurus, the authority of State, the authority of the superior and so on, if you had no authority, would you have fear? Or you do exactly what you want to do, which you are doing now. You are following all this? Are we meeting each other? Or are you merely listening to a talk? We are questioning, and it is right to question, doubt all authority: the authority of a wife, or the husband; the authority of so-called leaders; the authority of the priests, the gurus; the authority of the speaker - the reputation of the speaker, which breeds authority. So why do we obey? Why do we follow? Because in that following, obeying, we feel there is certain security: you know better than I do therefore I follow; you are the authority and I become the slave. It may be pleasurable or unpleasant but I follow you, because in that following I feel gregarious, together, you know what you are doing and I don't so I will accept it. In that there is also fear. I don't know if you are following all this. Because sirs, we are examining and finding out if it is possible at all, to live absolutely without any shadow of fear. We are then extraordinary human beings.

So we have examined together comparison, security, authority. And we ought to talk over together the factor of desire, because desire is also one of the movements which causes fear. What is desire? Why is man a slave to desire? Why desires predominate our lives? Why religions have suppressed, have said suppress all desire? If you want to serve god you must be free from all desire, from all wanting - why? We are asking not how to suppress desire, how to run away from desire, but to understand the movement of desire, what is the essence of desire? Those crows are making a lot of noise tonight. They are saying probably good-night to each other!

So we are together going to examine, look, observe, not even examine, just observe, as you would observe a beautiful sunset, as you would observe light on water, as you would observe the new moon. Just to observe without any sense of regret, without wanting, changing, just look at something without reward or punishment. So we are going to look together at the whole movement of desire because it is very complex. We are not advocating suppression, or escape, or to deny. We are going to see the nature of it, the structure of it. Right? Are we together in this? We are asking: what is desire, not the objects of desire. The objects may be a shirt, a robe, sari, a car, a house. We are not talking about the objects of desire but desire itself. How it arises and why human beings are so caught up with it. You are waiting for me to explain.

That is the tragedy of the modern mind, they want explanations, they want interpretations or an interpreter who will translate what I am saying because they find it awfully difficult to understand what I am saying, so they need a commentator. This is how we live. We never look, understand, delve into ourselves to find out deeply what is desire, what is love, what is compassion, if there is god, what is death. We never ask passionately. And we are asking this question passionately not intellectually, verbally because desire is one of the strongest motives in our lives. It has tremendous energy. A man who is in an office has great desire to succeed, he works like fury to reach the top, the desire to become enlightened or whatever that may mean, and you practise, struggle, sacrifice, deny. So this is very important to understand what is desire, how it arises, what is its origin. You see when you look at the movement of desire - please just listen to it - when you look at the movement of desire there is great beauty in it, there is great sense of extraordinary vitality in it. So please look at your desire - to be rich, to be poor, to be a sannyasi, to be enlightened, to be, whatever the desire is, sexual, sensory, whatever desire it is, look at it. Hold it in front of you and look at it and see how it arises, what is the origin, the beginning of this extraordinary vitality which is called desire. The speaker will explain but the explanation is not desire, the word is not the fact. So you are looking at your desire and trying to understand what is its origin, its depth, its extraordinary expanse.

Please as I said, you are waiting for me to explain. The speaker will explain in detail but stay with your desire, look at it, hold it like a precious jewel so that you are looking at it greatly, with clear eyes. You see, sirs, we have become secondhand human beings. We never discover anything for ourselves. We read, we are told, the psychologists, the gurus, the saints, tell us what to do and we follow them. So we have become secondhand, mediocre human beings. And when this problem of desire is explained you will say, 'Yes, I agree with that.' But it is not your discovery, it is not your passionate understanding of it and you are free of something; but always waiting for some explanation, some direction. I will go into it, patience. You know, patience has no time; impatience has. You understand that? Must I explain that? When you are patient now, looking at your desire, patiently looking at it, you are not thinking about time. But when you are impatient to find an explanation, a resolution of it, then you have time. Whereas if you are patient, that is, looking at something which you have to deeply, profoundly understand there is no time at all. And where there is no time there is patience, real patience. I wonder if you understand all this?

What is desire? Why religions throughout the world have said be without it, always associate it with sex. Sannyasis are supposed to be chaste, no sex, but they are burning inside, and so they suppress and go through all the agonies of it. Now we go together, please together, we are going to go into this question of desire. You have to pay a little attention, if you are asleep please wake up because it is very complex, it requires careful, step by step explanation and understanding.

Our brain is the centre of all senses. It is the centre of all the responses of the senses. And we use our senses partially. If you are an eye doctor you only look partially, at the eye, you don't look at the whole human being. If you are a heart specialist you are only concerned with the heart. You are following all this? The brain is the essence of the senses and its responses. And our brain has been conditioned through millennia to the drive of desire. Right? You are following this? It has become our habit. So in looking at desire you have to be aware of how the brain looks at desire, how it feels it, what is its sensation? All right sir, I will explain. Sensation is the response of our nervous organism, our sense response. You see something beautiful, seeing, then contact with that something beautiful, with that contact there is sensation. Right? I see a beautiful piece of furniture. The seeing of a beautiful piece of furniture, touching it, then sensation from it. Now that is normal. Right? Seeing, touching, contact, then sensation, then thought comes in says, 'I wish I had that furniture in my room.' Which is, thought creates out of that sensation the image of me sitting on that chair in my room. Right? Is this clear? Seeing, contact, sensation, then thought seeing that furniture, creating the image of me sitting on that furniture, so the moment when thought creates the image that is the second desire is born. Have you understood this? This is very simple if you look at it for yourself. I see a beautiful suit, or a beautiful robe, sari, whatever it is - I go inside the shop, touch the material, sensation, then thought creates the image of me in that suit. At that moment when thought creates the image then that is the origin of desire. Got it? You understand this? I see a man riding in a rich car, beautiful car - there are no beautiful cars in this country, but there are beautiful cars - and I see it going by, or I see it in the street, locked. I go up to it, look at it, touch it, then thought says 'I wish I owned that car, sitting in there and driving'. The moment of identification of thought with the image of me sitting in that car, that is the moment of desire. You understand? This is clear. I am not going to repeat it over and over, it has no meaning.

Now can one be aware, attentive - please listen to this - contact, seeing, perception, contact, sensation, and be aware at the moment when thought creates the image? That requires extraordinary attention, so that the image is never formed. You understand this? I wonder if you see the beauty of it? So that the brain is so active at that moment there is no desire, because thought is not creating the image. So desire, being one of the factors of our life, of our daily life, and in finding out, discovering for ourselves the origin, the beginning of that desire, and seeing that desire has its own fear, because I may not sit in the car, I may not have that dress, or if I do I may spoil it. There is always unconscious fear behind desire. So we have said comparison, seeking security, authority, desire; these are the movement of fear. I haven't finished yet, don't stop there!

There is also the factor of time. Time is fear. That is, if I am killed instantly now I have no fear. But if I think about death, ending, not carrying all my wealth to the next world, which I can't anyhow, so I am afraid. Right? So we ought to consider together what is time. I hope you are not tired. What is time? Time is a movement, which is, from here to there requires time. Right? I live here and I am attending this meeting and I have to go back home, that takes time. From one point to another point requires movement, which is time. Covering the distance requires time. And if I have an ideal, which is, I am violent and I have an ideal on non-violence, if I have, to achieve that non-violence, whatever that may mean, that requires time. So time is according to the watch, chronological time, time by the sun, sunrise and sunset, that is the outward time. Psychological time, that is, I am this but I hope to be that. I am not good but I will be good. So 'the becoming' requires time. You understand? Please understand this really deeply because you will see something extraordinary if you understand this. Becoming something requires time. To learn a skill requires time. But if I am not good, say I am a hypocrite - much better. I am a hypocrite because I double talk. And I say to myself I must not be a hypocrite. That will take time. If I am aware at all that I am a hypocrite and not wanting to be a hypocrite, that will take time. At least our brain is conditioned to time because the brain itself has evolved through time. It is not your brain, it is the brain of mankind. I won't go into that for the moment, it is too complex.

So there is time to learn a skill, a language, to drive a car, to learn any trade requires time. And I am this, I hope to be that. Now the 'hoping to be that' is unreal. Are you following all this? What is real is 'what is'. 'What is' has no time. Do you understand this? I am so caught up. 'What is' and 'what should be' are two different things. Right? Looking at 'what is', that is, I am not good, that is 'what is. Or rather let's make it much simpler: I am violent. That is 'what is'. But becoming non-violent is not. That is not a fact. So 'what is' has no time. But if I have something in my mind, in my brain which says 'I should not be that, but be that', then that requires time. You are following this? So to remain with 'what is' and the resolution of 'what is' has no time. Do see this. Right? Have you got this?

So, as we said the other day, we are the past, the present and the future. We are the past, modifying itself in the present and continuing the future. We are the time-makers. Right? We can be free of time or create time. I create time when I say, 'I am this and I should be that', I create time. But I do not create time if I say, this is 'what is' and look at it. In that observation there is no time. The looking without time, which is the past and all that, looking at it dissolves whatever 'what is'. You try it. Do it and you will discover for yourself. Right? We are the makers of time. When I say, 'I hope to be something', that is making time.

So please understand this extraordinary subtle factor that we are creating our own time, and therefore we are a slave to time. Which is, I must achieve something, I must become something, therefore we are creating time. But if you understand the nature of time and remain totally with 'what is' - I am jealous, envious. I am envious. Don't try to transform it into something else. Remain with that envy and look at it, observe it, as you observe it dissolves. In that observation there is no time. Do it. Find out. So time is a factor of fear. I am afraid of the past, or the future, or even the present. So time is a factor of fear. One of the factors of fear is comparison. Don't learn it by heart. Look at it. Comparison, searching for security, which is to deny intelligence, then this whole concept of authority, which makes us slaves, sycophantic, how one grovels in front of authority. I have seen it all over the world, specially in this country. It exists all over the world. You meet a minister and you are all down on your knees; or a guru, or somebody or other in authority. Which is, you are worshipping reputation not the reality.

And also one of the movements of fear is desire. And one of the movements of fear is time. And the other factor is thought. Thought which is the response of memory, memory is the outcome of knowledge, knowledge is experience, that is thought. I think about the future and I am frightened. Right? I think about what may happen. I am very healthy but I may fall ill. Or I have fallen sick, remembered it and frightened not to be sick again. So thought is the operation of past memory, past experience, past knowledge and thought says, 'I hope all that will not happen in the future' - therefore there is fear, which thought has created. I wonder if you understand all this? I have a job, a good job, but I may lose the job, thought says you might lose it, be sycophantic to the boss. You follow? The whole movement of thought creates fear. So the aggregate of all this, which is the collection of all this, all these movements, is the root of fear. If there is a complete intelligent observation of all this, the root, the cause of all this, then where there is a cause there is an end. Right? Do you see this? That is, there is a cause for ill health. If I see the cause, unless I am utterly stupid, that cause tells me why I am not healthy, then I can act upon it. And then there is health. So where there is a cause there can be an end to it. So we see the whole movement of causation of fear. Right? The whole movement of fear, the cause of all this, of this terrible burden man has carried. When you see it all, aggregated as a whole, not as comparison and all the rest of it, when you see it as a whole movement, the totality of that movement, then there is the complete ending of that, of fear.

Now are you free of fear now? Are you going home and starting the whole business again? You might say, ask the speaker: are you psychologically free of fear? Wouldn't you ask that question? No? Of course it is in your mind. If the speaker says, yes, what value has it to you? The speaker doesn't talk about all this unless he does it himself. Right? Which isn't double talk. Where there is no fear there is love. Negation of fear is the most positive action. And the negation is the understanding of the whole movement of fear.

And pleasure is another one of our basic pursuits. The pursuit of pleasure. What is the relationship of fear and pleasure? Have you ever asked that question? Or we are merely pursuing pleasure at any cost?

So we have to go into this question, not now, perhaps tomorrow, if you are here and I am here. I am afraid I will be here! Tomorrow we can talk over this. Because you see sir it is no good talking endlessly about these matters, words don't mean a thing unless you live it, unless you absolutely have integrity, when you say, 'I am not afraid' you mean it because you have examined the whole movement of fear. Then you are an extraordinary human being. Then that is real meditation. What we have done this evening, the understanding of desire, is profound meditation. And that requires a great deal of attention, subtlety of brain, quickness of perception, which no amount of reading, following will bring about. What will bring it is your observation of everything around you, the squalor, the dirt, the terrible misery of human beings. And in that perception we see the whole of the human mind, how stagnant it is, how dead it is. So one has to question, doubt, and out of that doubt cleansing, purifying the past, the whole nature, then you are really an extraordinary human being and there is no fear, then gods disappear.

BOMBAY 4TH PUBLIC TALK 31ST JANUARY 1982

I would like to remind you, if I may, that this is not an entertainment, an intellectual appreciation, or an emotional gathering. This is rather, a gathering of serious people, I hope, people who are gathered together with serious intent. If you are merely attracted by curiosity I am afraid you will be disappointed. But as we have been saying for the last three talks, we have to exercise our brain, we are not repeating something that you would like, or quoting somebody. We are here, if one may point out, to think together, to exercise our capacity to its fullest extent: capacity to doubt, as we pointed out yesterday, to question, not only what the speaker is saying, but also to question one's own intentions, one's own prejudices, point of view, because that clarifies the brain so that it can think clearly, objectively, not all the time personally. So we are together, as we have been doing for the last three talks that we met here, concerned and committed to the whole complex problem of daily living.

As we were pointing out yesterday, fear has been the common lot of human kind. Every human being in the world is frightened about something or other. We went into that yesterday very, very carefully, step by step, pointed out all the factors that are involved in the culmination, which is fear. We said thought is the origin of fear, thought is time, thought is desire, thought is the factor of comparison, searching for security and so on. We went into that very carefully. And tonight, if you are willing, we should talk about together the whole question of suffering. Talk over together why human beings lack the energy to solve their own problems, why they look to another to help them, why each one of us is not capable of resolving our own confused, conflicting, contradictory lives. We are always looking for somebody else to solve our problems, politically, economically, socially or in any other direction, even religiously. And here during this gathering, if one may point out, we are not trying to persuade you to think in a particular direction, do any kind of propaganda for any ideal, for any system, for any philosophy, for any belief or religion. But rather together, the speaker means together, to observe our lives, our daily lives, why human beings have become what they are - mediocre, frightened, conflicting life, in their relationship with each other, without any aesthetic sense, without the quality of beauty, why we have become like this.

It is very important to find out for oneself. As we pointed out also yesterday, we have become secondhand human beings; we quote others, we follow others, the psychologists, the philosophers and all the saints and so on have told us what to do, what to think. We never wipe the slate clean so that our brains are fresh. We never read the story of ourselves. The story of ourselves is the story of the rest of mankind, the story which is you. We never read that book, it is not printed in a book, you cannot possibly learn sitting at the feet of another. Nor can you follow another, but you have to observe the extraordinary evolution, which man is, the extraordinary content of his consciousness, what is his consciousness, what he is, why he behaves in this unreasonable way, without any sense of beauty, love, compassion.

So first, if we may, let us look at the book which we are, each one of us. We are the rest of mankind. Please follow this a little bit, if you will. We are not individuals. Our consciousness, with its content, is like the rest of mankind. Our consciousness, that is what you are, your beliefs, your sorrows, your anxieties, your pain, your miserable existence that you lead, the confusion, the uncertainty, is what every other human being throughout the world goes through, whether they live in America, Russia, or here, or in China, they suffer, they are uncertain, they are caught up in innumerable dogmatic beliefs, as one is. So please observe, look at it. Don't deny it, don't hold on and say, 'I am an individual', look at it carefully.

Your consciousness, what you are, not physically, but inwardly, psychologically, your beliefs, your search for security, fear, pursuit of pleasure, worship of images, is like the rest of the world, only modified, civilized, or uncivilized. Either it is merely a tribal or it is highly sophisticated rational conclusion, but the consciousness of each one is the common consciousness of all mankind. So you are not an individual. This is very difficult to accept because we are conditioned by religion, by education, by society, that each one of us is separate, seeking his own particular salvation, his own particular enlightenment; but when you observe this very closely and carefully, totally impersonally, if you can, then you will see that we are like the rest of the world, like every other human being who is sitting next to you, or sitting miles away. He goes through what you are going through. Physically, bodily he may be taller, fairer, capable, but consciousness, the inward content of your being, is like the rest of the world. So you are the world and the world is you. It is logical, sane, rational. You cannot possibly deny this fact, though you may cling to your individuality, this is the real actual fact: that we are actually the rest of mankind. And we ought to be able to read our lives, which is the rest of mankind, the book of history, of which we are.

So let us enquire together if one is capable of reading the book - I mean the book in the sense, what you are. To look at what you are. And as I said, what you are is the content of your consciousness, both the conscious as well as the unconscious, both the obvious and the hidden, the superficiality and the depth of it. We ought to be able together to read this book. So we have to look at our consciousness. That is, to observe silently without any direction, just to observe what you are. You are obviously a name, a form, you have certain characteristics, idiosyncrasies, capacities, skills, certain limited energy. That is the outward clothing of man. Inwardly, deep inside us, there is a craving for comfort, for security, a craving for some kind of protection from this hideous world, because the world is becoming more and more dangerous because of overpopulation, division of nationalities, division of religions, all the separate States preparing for war. So the world is becoming terribly dangerous. I wonder how many of you realize this fact? Each nation is buying armaments beyond their own financial limitations, piling up instruments of war to kill each other. And here we sit discussing, talking over together casually, not facing this enormous reality that the world is becoming, for which we are responsible. We have created this society, we have created these wars, or the preparation for war, each one of us is responsible because we pay tax, we are supporting all the industries in the world to prepare cannons, all those terrible things they are preparing to kill each other. For that we are responsible. And I am afraid we do not feel responsible at all. That is one of the tragedies. Please this is not rhetoric, it is not an intellectual froth. This is actuality that is taking place under your noses. And we seem so utterly indifferent, utterly callous.

So together, if one may, let us look at ourselves as if in a mirror. What you see in a mirror is not distorted, it is what you are. Thought can distort it, thought can say, 'I don't like what I see', thought can say, 'I get depressed when I look at myself'. But when you are looking in a mirror you can't change your face, it is there. So similarly let us look in the mirror very carefully. The mirror is the relationship between each other. In that relationship, if you are aware, if you are sensitive, actively watching, all the reactions that take place, in that relationship is the mirror in which you see exactly what is taking place. Right? Are we following each other? Or as I pointed out the other day, am I talking to myself? Or are you serious? And it is only the person who is serious that lives, it is only the person that is profoundly serious, he is a religious man.

So what are you? Apart from a name, a form, perhaps if you are lucky a bank account, perhaps a skill, apart from all that what are you? Are we not suffering? Or suffering doesn't exist in your life? Is there fear? Is there anxiety? Greed? Envy? Worshipping some image which thought has created? Frightened of death? Clinging to some concept? A contradiction, saying one thing and doing another? So we are all that. Our habits, our inanities, the endless chatter that goes on in the mind, all that is what we are. And the content of consciousness makes consciousness, and that consciousness has been evolving through time, through tremendous experiences, pains, sorrow, and all that. Now we are asking: can one be free of all that? Free from all sense of fear? Because where there is fear there is no love. And we are going to go into all that this evening. Where there is no sensitiveness, and that sensitiveness cannot exist if there is self-centred activity all the time, without that sensitivity there is no love. And there is no love when there is no beauty. Beauty exists only in the flowering of goodness. Are you understanding all this?

So, sirs, let us first examine and look at what beauty is. Not the beauty of form, which is also nice, the beauty of a lovely tree, the beauty of a green field, the beauty of a mountain, the majesty of it against the blue sky, the beauty of a sunset, the beauty of a solitary flower in the pavement. We are not being romantic, nor emotional. We are enquiring together: what is beauty? Do you have that sense of beauty in our lives? Or it is becoming so mediocre, meaningless, everlasting struggle from morning until night? So we are asking: what is beauty? Because it is a very serious question. It isn't a sensual question, nor a sexual question. Because without beauty in your heart you cannot flower in goodness. So what is beauty? When you look at a mountain, or the blue sea, when you look at it, if you have ever looked without chattering, without making noise, if you have really paid attention to the blue sea, the beauty of the water, the beauty of light on a sheet of water. And when you see such extraordinary beauty of the earth, with its rivers, lakes, mountains, when you look at it, what actually takes place? We will go into it, but first look at something which you have seen which is actually marvellously beautiful: a statue, a poem, a lily in the pond, or a well-kept lawn. And when you see such a piece of beauty - when you see such, not piece - when you see beauty what takes place? At that moment, the very majesty of a mountain makes you forget yourself. Have you ever been in that position? When you have you see that you don't exist, only that grandeur exists. But a few seconds later or a minute later the whole cycle begins, the confusion, the chatter. So beauty is where you are not. Have you understood this? Do you understand sir? Oh, what a crowd! The tragedy of it. Truth is where you are not. Beauty, love, is where you are not. Because we are not capable to look at this extraordinary thing called truth.

So sirs, let us look first at our suffering, whether man can ever end his suffering, not only his personal suffering, which we will also go into, but the suffering of humanity - the humanity that has put up with a thousand wars. Think of all the men and women maimed, hurt. There is sorrow in the world, a global sorrow. And also there is sorrow of your own. They are not two separate sorrows. Please see this. I may suffer because my son is dead. And also I am aware that my neighbour's wife also is dead. I am also aware, it is the same throughout the world. It has been like this for millennia, for thousands upon thousands of years and we have never been able to resolve it. We may escape from it, we may do puja, ceremonials, we may invent all kinds of theories, that it is our karma, it is our past, but suffering is there, not only yours but the whole of humanity. We are asking: can that suffering ever end? Or is it the condition of man that he must continue from time immemorial to the ending of time, suffering. He must suffer, that is his condition. If you accept that, which I hope you don't, if you accept that then you will continue to suffer endlessly. You get used to it as most of us do. But if you don't accept that, what is your position? That human beings in the world, and you who are also a human being, suffer, will you take time to end that suffering? As we said yesterday and in other previous talks, not only here but in the rest of the world, we said you are the past, the present, and the future. You are that. You are the master of time. And you can shorten the time or lengthen the time. That is, if you are violent and you say, 'I will become non-violent', that is extending time. During that interval of time you are being violent, and there is no end to that kind of activity. Whereas if one realizes that you are the master of time, which is an extraordinarily important thing to find out, to realize, time is in your hands. Which means facing the fact of violence, not pursuing non-violence, but facing the fact of violence, and in that observation there is no time at all because in that observation there is neither the observer, nor all the past accumulation, there is only pure observation. In that there is no time. Right?

Are you doing this? When the speaker is talking about it are you actually seeing the truth of it and therefore you are doing it? Suppose I have a habit, a peculiar habit, both physically and psychologically, can those habits end immediately? Or I will take time to end a habit? You understand my question? That is, suppose I smoke - I don't - but suppose I smoke, probably many of you do, I don't know why, but you do. Can you end that habit immediately? The craving of the body for nicotine is different from the perception that you are the master of time, you can shorten the time, therefore that perception is not a decision not to smoke. I wonder if you follow all this? Is this too difficult? Are we understanding each other? Oh, do tell me for god's sake.

You see sir, one can end sorrow, and then only there is passion. You understand the difference? Passion is not lust. Lust is sensual, sexual, it is full of desire, pictures, pursuits of pleasure and so on. Passion is not. You must have passion to create, not babies but passion to bring a different world, different human beings in the world, passion to change the society in which one lives; without that tremendous passion one becomes mediocre, soft, unclear, lacking integrity and so on.

So my son is dead and I suffer. I shed tears, I go to all the temples in the world. I have put all my hope in that son and he is gone. And I have a craving that he will live somewhere else and I hope I will meet him somewhere, in the next life, or somewhere or other. We are always playing that. So my son is dead and I suffer. Suffering is very painful, tears, other people's comfort, my own search for comfort away from that pain does not resolve that pain, the tremendous sense of loneliness. So can I look at it, be with it, without any kind of escape? Without any kind of rational explanation for this death of my son. Without saying reincarnation, this or that, can I remain completely, wholly, with that feeling of great pain? Then what takes place? I hope you are doing this with the speaker. Don't just listen to it. This is not a lecture. This isn't something you are being told what to do. This is not an intellectual play, this is our life, daily existence. The person one loves may go away - jealousy, anxiety, hatred. This is our life and we suffer. My son has gone, cremated, gone. I can't tolerate the idea that he has gone. So without any sentiment, without any emotion, can I remain with that pain, the pain of loneliness. You know most of us know loneliness, don't we? Or is that too abstract? You know what loneliness is, don't you? Yes sir? That is, that loneliness is when you are totally isolated from all relationship, you suddenly find yourself in a crowd but you are utterly lonely, alone. That is part of sorrow, to find such a state. And when my son dies I am lonely. And can I look at that loneliness, observe that loneliness without any past memories? And to observe without the observer? You understand all this? I will tell you, I will show you sir, we will talk about it together.

When one is angry, at that moment of anger, which is a reaction, at that second there is neither the observer nor the observed - have you noticed? There is only that reaction which is called anger. A few minutes or a few seconds later, the observer says, 'I have been angry'. So the observer separates himself from anger and then says, 'I have been angry'. But the observer is the observed. Anger is not different from me, I am anger. I am greed. I am frightened. I am all that. But thought says, 'I must control, I must escape from fear', so thought then creates the observer different from the observed, and in that state there is conflict. Whereas the fact is the observer is the observed, that is, anger is you, anger is not different from you. So similarly you are - not you - I have lost my son. I am in that state, observing without any movement of thought, which is to give total attention to that thing called pain, to that thing called loneliness which brings about such despair, such neurotic activity. So can I remain with that sense of intense sorrow, pain, shock, without any single movement or shadow of thought, that is, to give complete attention to it. And you cannot give complete attention if you are trying to escape from it, that is a wasting of energy, whereas if you give your total attention you are then all the energy focused on a point which you call suffering. When you do that you understand the whole significance and the depth and the beauty of such an extraordinary fact. And then suffering ends. When there is the ending of suffering there is passion. And with the ending of suffering there is love.

What is love? Have you ever asked? Have you ever asked your husband or your wife what is love? No answer! You daren't! Now we are going to ask: what is love? Do I love anybody? You know what that means? Is love desire? Is love pleasure? Is love attachment? Please consider all this. Is love jealousy? Or love has now become a sexual act? So we are going together to see the quality of a mind or a brain that loves. Do you love your children? Or do you feel responsible for them? Your duty? Have you ever considered whether you love your children? You will say, 'Of course.' But we are asking this seriously. If you loved your children would you want them to be what you are? Would you answer that? Or would you want them to be totally different from you? Do you want them to follow your trade, your business, because you are an industrialist, your son wants to be industrialist, you want them to be industrialists? Or are you concerned that he should grow in goodness, flower in beauty? Or are you preparing him for war, to kill and be killed? Is all that love? I know you will say, 'We can't help what we are. We can't help our children. We send them off to school and that is the end of it. Only we want them to get married, settle down' - as you have settled down, in mediocrity, lack of integrity, say one thing and do another, go to the temple and be an excellent lawyer. That is a contradiction. You want your children to be like that? If you loved them would you do this?

So what is love? Please this is a very serious thing. Don't say, 'Does it exist in the rest of the world?' - we are asking you: what is love? Is love jealousy? Is love attachment? I am attached to my wife; what a tragedy it all is, isn't it? I am attached, if I am married, thank the lord I am not, if I am attached to my wife, what are the implications of that attachment? Is that love? I am attached to her, I depend on her, both physically, psychologically, she helps me, I help her, I am attached. That is, I am frightened that she may leave me - it is happening more and more. When the girls are becoming educated they are going to be more free. It is happening in this country, it is happening in Europe - divorce. And if I am attached to her I am anxious that she shouldn't leave me, she mustn't look at another man, she must remain faithful to me. I must possess her, dominate her. And she wants to be possessed and to be dominated. Is all that love, in which there is fear, jealousy, where there is jealousy there is hatred, antagonism - is all that love?

So to deny, to negate everything that is not love, is love. Deny, negate jealousy, completely. Negate totally attachment. Negate every form of possessiveness. Then out of that comes, through this total negation, love. That is through negation you come to the positive. And the most positive thing is love. And one of the odd things about love is: do what you will, that will be correct if you love. You understand? When there is love, action is always right, under all circumstances. And when there is that quality of love there is compassion. Compassion means passion for all. Compassion cannot exist, nor love, if you belong to any sect, any group, or to any organized religion. Compassion comes only when there is freedom from all that. And that compassion has its own extraordinary limitless intelligence. So when there is love there is beauty. Love and compassion with their intelligence is the endless truth. To that truth there is no path - not Karma Yoga, Bhakti Yoga and all that, there is no path to truth. But only when there is that immense sense of compassion which comes when there is the ending of sorrow, then that which is, is truth.

BOMBAY 5TH PUBLIC TALK 5TH FEBRUARY 1982

I would like to, if I may, this evening to talk about many things. Perhaps they are interrelated. The speaker doesn't know where to begin. Most of us, the average person, is wasting his life. Most of us waste our life. We have got a great deal of energy and we are wasting it. We spend our days in the office, in the kitchen, or in digging the garden, a lawyer's life, or the life of a sannyasi, or the life of an average person seems at the end of one's life utterly meaningless, without significance. When one looks back, when you are fifty, or eighty, or ninety, what has one done with one's life? Life has a most extraordinary significance, great beauty, great suffering, anxiety, accumulating money, working from eight or nine until five for the rest of one's life. At the end of it all, what have we got out of life? Money, sex, the constant conflict of existence, the weariness, the travail, unhappiness, frustrations - that is all we have. Perhaps occasional joy, or you love someone completely, wholly, without any sense of the self, the 'me' and you.

And there seems to be so little justice in the world. Philosophers have talked a great deal about justice. The social workers are talking about justice. The average man wants justice. But is there justice in life at all? You are clever, well placed, good mind, nice looking, you have everything you want. And another has nothing. You are well educated, sophisticated, free to do what you want. Another is a cripple, poor in mind and in heart. You are capable of writing, speaking, a good human being. The other is not. This has been a problem of thinkers, of philosophers. The word 'philosophy' means the love of truth, love of life. And perhaps truth is in life, not away from life, not in books, not in some ideas, but truth is where we are, and how we live that life. And when you look around, life seems so empty, meaningless to most people. And can man ever have justice? So as the speaker is sitting on a platform and you are just listening, that is not just. He has been all over the world, talked, televised and you will never have a chance like that. It is most unfair, it is degrading. And so we are asking if there is any justice in the world at all. You are fair, I am dark. You are bright, aware, sensitive, full of feelings, you love a beautiful sunset, the glory of a moon, the astonishing light on the water, you see all that and I don't. You are reasonable, sane, healthy and another is not. So one asks seriously if there is justice in the world at all?

And before law you are all equal, but some are more equal than others. Others have not sufficient money to employ good lawyers. So there is, apparently observing all this in the world, there is very little justice. Some are born high, others low, and where is justice then? It appears there is justice only when there is compassion. And as we pointed out the other day when we met here, compassion is the ending of suffering and that compassion is not born out of any religion or belonging to any cult. You can't be a Hindu with all your superstition and invented gods and yet become passionate, you cannot. Compassion, to have compassion there must be freedom, complete, total freedom from all conditioning. Is that possible? The human brain is conditioned after millions of years. That is a fact. And the more we acquire knowledge about all the things of the earth and heaven, it seems we get more and more bogged down. And if there is compassion, with it there is that intelligence, and that intelligence has the vision of justice. You see we have invented the word Karma, next life. We are going to go into that question presently. And we think by inventing a word, a system, a something that is to happen in the future, we have solved the problem of justice. Justice begins only when the mind is very clear, when there is compassion. And our brain, which is a very complex instrument, is not yours or the speaker's brain, it is the brain of humanity. Your brain has not developed when you were born until now. That brain has evolved through endless time. So our consciousness which the brain holds is not personal. This consciousness, as we pointed out earlier, is the ground of all human beings, on which they stand.

And when you observe this consciousness with its content - the beliefs, the dogmas, the theories, the concepts, the fears, the pleasures, the agonies, the loneliness, the depression and despairs, all that is our consciousness. It is not your consciousness, it is not the individual that holds this consciousness. Please, it is logical, look at it sanely, rationally. We are so conditioned to think that it is our brain, mine and yours, that we are separate individuals. We are not. We have been talking about it a great deal. Our brains are so conditioned through education, through religion, that we think we are separate entities, with separate souls, separate this and that. We are not individuals at all. We are the result of thousands of years of human experience, human endeavour, of human struggle. And is it possible for the brain to uncondition itself? We are conditioned, therefore we are never free. As long as I live in a concept, in a conclusion, with certain ideas or ideals, the brain is not free and therefore there is no compassion. Where there is freedom from all conditioning, which is, not being a Hindu, a Christian, a Muslim or a Buddhist, not being caught in any specialization, though specialization is necessary, not give one's life entirely to money, as long as the brain is conditioned, which it is now, there is no freedom for man. You cannot ascend as some philosophers and biologists are saying, there is no ascent of man through knowledge. Knowledge is necessary, to drive a car, to do business, to go from here to your home, the accumulation of technological knowledge and all that is necessary. But the psychological knowledge, the knowledge that one has gathered about oneself, through experience, culminating in memory, memory which is the result of external pressures, and inward demands.

Please, as we said the other day, and if we may we will repeat: this is not a lecture, where you are told what to do, what to think, how to think and so on. This, we are observing together. Not resisting each other, not clinging to our own particular opinions, knowledge and concepts but together looking at the world and ourselves in the world. So it is not a lecture. We are thinking together, not along any particular direction, or coming to any conclusion. But when one observes purely without any barrier, without any impediment, without any prejudice, then that observation itself finds the answer to all our problems. So please bear in mind that we are walking along the same path, looking at the same thing, like two friends talking over their problems amicably, in a friendly spirit, where there is no division between the two of them. Then we can communicate deeply, not merely verbally but non-verbally also, which is much more important. So please, if one may point out bear that in mind when we are talking over together this evening.

And as we began, our life is broken up, fragmented, divided, it is never whole, we never have holistic observation. We observe from a particular point of view. We are in ourselves broken up. Our life is a contradiction in itself, and therefore there is constant conflict. And we never look at life as a whole, complete, indivisible. The word 'whole' means healthy - to be healthy. And also the word means sanity, and also it means holy - h-o-l-y. That word has great significance. It is not the various parts getting integrated in our human consciousness. We are always trying to integrate various contradictions but is it possible - we are conversing with each other, we are asking each other - is it possible to look at life as a whole? The suffering, the pleasure, the pain, the tremendous anxiety, loneliness, suffering, going to the office, having a house, babies, sex, not as though they were separate activities, but a holistic movement, a unitary action - is that possible at all? Or must we everlastingly live in fragmentation and therefore ever in conflict?

Is it possible to observe the fragmentation and the identification with those fragments? To observe, not correct, not transcend, not run away from it or suppress it, to observe. Our life is so fragmented, broken up and divided, to look at it. Not what to do about it because if you attempt to do 'what to do about it' you are really then acting from a fragment and therefore you are cultivating fragments, divisions. Whereas if one can observe holistically, observe the whole movement of life as one, then conflict not only ceases with its destructive energy but also out of that observation a totally new approach to life comes. We are talking about our daily life, not some philosophy, not some ideas, not some conclusions. We are talking as two people about our lives. Our lives are broken up. I wonder if one is aware of it at all. And if one is aware then one asks: how am I to bring all this together to make a whole? And who is the entity to bring all these various parts and integrate them? You are following all this? Who is the entity who is trying to bring all the fragments together? The entity, is he not also a fragment? Thought is a fragment. Please - shall we go into that? Do you see that? Thought itself is a fragment because knowledge is never complete about anything. And knowledge is the result of accumulated memory and thought is the response of that memory and therefore it is limited. Thought can never bring about a holistic observation of life.

So can one observe the fragment, the many fragments that we have, which is our daily life, look at it? You are a professor, or you are a teacher, or you are merely a householder, a sannyasi who renounces the world and goes off - these are fragments of our daily life. And to observe the whole movement of these fragments, their separate and separative motives, to observe them all. And we said, also, during these talks, to observe without the observer. The observer is the past, the accumulated memories, remembrances, incidents. He is all that past. That is time. The past is looking at this fragmentation and the past is also the result of other fragmentations. Are you following all this? Are we talking together in all this? So can one observe without time, without the remembrances of the past and without the word? Because the word is the past, the word is not the thing and so we are always looking through words, through explanations, which are a movement of words. So we never have a direct perception. And that direct perception is insight. And that insight transforms the brain cells themselves. Our brain is conditioned through time and functions in knowledge. And it is caught in that cycle. And to bring about a transformation in the very structure of the cells, which scientists are asking, discussing - we have talked with some of the scientists and it is possible to bring about a mutation in the brain cells themselves when there is pure observation of any problem.

And, as we also said the other day, we are masters of time. We have created time. Not the time of the sun and the sunset, not the rising and the waning of the moon, but the psychological time, the inward time that man, that thought has put together. We are masters of that time. Please this is important to understand because we are going to deal with something which is much more complex, which is death. We are going to talk about it presently. And that is why we must understand the nature of time which man has created. Time as hope, time as achievement, psychological; you need time to learn a skill, you need time to learn a language, you need time to learn certain technological, complex problems, there you need time, there you need knowledge, there you need application. But we are asking why human beings psychologically, inwardly, have created time? Time when I will be good; time when I will be free of violence; time as achieving enlightenment; time as achieving some exalted state of mind; time as meditation. We have invented that time, therefore we are masters of that time. And when we function within the realm of that time we are bringing about a contradiction and hence conflict. Time is conflict. I wonder if you understand all this?

So we are the master of time - that is really a great discovery if one realizes the truth of that: that we are the past, the present and the future, which is time. Time as psychological knowledge. And we have divided life, the living and the dying. We have created a distance between life, that is our living, the living in our consciousness and the distance as time, which is death. That is, I am living with all my problems and death is something to be avoided, postponed, put at a great distance, which is another fragmentation of our life. Right?

We are saying: to observe holistically, as a whole movement of life, which is to live the living and the dying, the whole of it, that is our life. And we cling to life and avoid, run away, don't even talk about it. So we have fragmented our life, not only superficially, physically, but also we have separated ourselves from death. And what is death? We are going to enquire together into that because it is part of our life.

One may be frightened, one may want to avoid it, one may want to prolong living, and they are doing it perhaps another fifty or a hundred years you may add to your life but always at the end of it there is that called death. So we must enquire together: what is living? What is living, which is our consciousness? The consciousness is made up of its content. The content is not different from consciousness. Our consciousness is what you believe, your superstition, your ambition, your greed, your competition, your attachment, your suffering, the depth of loneliness, your gods, the rituals, all that is your consciousness, which is you. And that consciousness is not yours, it is the consciousness of humanity. That is, you are the world and the world is you. Your neighbour suffers, you suffer, your neighbour goes through most difficult times, you may not, but you also go through difficult times, your neighbour may faint be anxious, lonely, and you will go through that too. So you are your consciousness with its content. That content is the ground upon which all humanity stands. Therefore psychologically, inwardly, you are not an individual. Outwardly you may have a different form, you may be pink, yellow, brown, black, purple, or whatever it is, tall, short, woman, man, but inwardly, deeply, we are similar. Perhaps with some variations but the similarity is like a string that holds the pearls together.

And in examining our living, which we must to comprehend what is living, we are asking what is living? Then we can ask what is dying? What is before is more important than what happens after death. What happens before, not the last minute. It may be an accident, a disease, old age and the end. Before the end, long before the end, what is living? Is this living travail, conflict, without any relationship with each other? That relationship like two parallel lines running, never meeting except perhaps sexually. This sense of deep inward loneliness and that is what we call living - the conflict, the pain, the anxiety, the agony, the loneliness, and the immense suffering; going to the office from 8 o'clock, 9 o'clock, until 5 o'clock day after day, day after day, month after month, what happens to your brain? And this is what we call living. And to escape from that living, so-called living, you go off to churches, temples, mosques, pray, worship, which is utterly meaningless. Or if you have money you indulge in extravagance, the extravagance of this country in marriage. You know all the tricks you play to escape from your own consciousness, from your own state of mind. And this is what is called living. And death is the ending, the ending of everything that you know: every attachment, all the money you have accumulated, you can't take it with you therefore you are frightened. Fear is part of our life. We went into that very deeply the other day. And so whatever you are, however rich, however poor, however highly placed, whatever power you have, whatever kind of politician you are, from the highest politician down to the lowest crook in politics, this is the ending, which is called death.

And what is it that is dying? The 'me' with all the accumulations that it has gathered this life, all the pain, the loneliness, the despair, the tears, the laughter, the suffering, that is me, the words - they are words. The summation of all this is me. I may pretend that I have in me some higher spirit, the atman, the soul, something everlasting which is all put together by thought. And therefore thought is not sacred. So whatever thought invents is not sacred, whether in the church, in the temple, or in the mosque. So this is our life. This is the 'me' that you cling to, are attached. And the ending of that is death. The fear of the known, and the fear of the unknown, because our known is our life, and we are afraid of that life, and we are afraid of death. Have you ever seen a man or a woman frightened of death? Have you ever seen them closely? Death is the total denial of the past, present and the future, which is me. And being frightened of death we think there are other lives to be lived. That is, you believe in reincarnation, some of you, probably most of you do. That is a nice, happy, memory of comfort, invented by people who have not understood what is living. They see living as death, pain, constant conflict, endless misery with occasional flare of a smile, laughter and joy, and they say 'We will live next life. After death I will meet my wife' - or husband, my son, my god. We have not understood what we are. What are we attached to? Look at it. Please look very closely together. What is that we are attached to? To what? To money? If you are attached to money, that is you, the money is you. Like a man attached to old furniture, beautiful 14th century furniture, highly polished, great value, he is attached to that. And that attachment is to furniture, therefore he is furniture. If you are attached to nose and throat specialist, your heaven will be nose and throat. You understand what we are talking about?

So what are you attached to? Your body? If you are really attached to your body you have to look after that body, you have to eat properly, you have to exercise properly, but you don't. You are just attached to the idea of the body - the idea but not the actual instrument. If you are attached to your wife because of your memories, if you are attached to her because she comforts you for this and that, all the trivialities of attachment, death comes and says, 'You are going to be separated'.

So one has to enquire very closely and deeply to what you are attached. Because death says you can't have anything when you die. Please follow this carefully and go into it. Your body is cremated or buried, and what have you left? Your sons, for whom you have accumulated a lot of money, which he will misuse anyhow. He will inherit your property, pay taxes and go through all the terrible anxieties of existence - is that what you are attached to?

Or attached to your knowledge? You have been a great writer, great poet, painter, to film. Or you are attached to a word because words play a tremendous part in our life. Just words. Because we never look behind the words, we never see the word is never the thing, the symbol is never the reality.

So as we are the master of time because we have invented time psychologically, can death, can the brain, the human consciousness, be free of this fear? Freedom to be free. In the democratic world they are supposed to be free, to say what they want, to think what they like, to do what they like - up to a point. In the totalitarian states they are not free, you can't - you know all the rest of that I don't have to go into it. Here you can do what you like, which you are doing: doing exactly what you want to do, yielding to pressure, yielding to circumstances, but pursuing your desire, what you want to do. Choose - to have choice, freedom - is that freedom, to have choice? Choice to move in this one field of knowledge, psychological knowledge, from one corner to the other - and you consider that freedom. I hope you are understanding all this. So is there freedom from fear of death? That is, as you are masters of time, to live with death, not separate death as something to be avoided, to be postponed, something to put away, but death is part of life. That is, to understand the meaning of ending, to understand the meaning of negation. When you end something, it may be a small habit, end your smoking, drinking, end it. Ending your attachment, ending your belief, negating. When you negate, end, there is something totally new. So while living, can you negate attachment completely? That is, living with death. Death means the ending. You are following all this? You understand?

That way there is incarnation, that is something new taking place. The ending is extraordinarily important in life. To understand the depth and the beauty of that word, which is negate something which is not truth. To negate for example your double talk. To negate, if you are a lawyer, and you go to the temple, negate the temple. You understand? So that your brain has this quality of integrity.

So death is an ending and has extraordinary importance in life. Not suicide, not euthanasia; the ending of your attachment, your pride, your antagonism for another, your hatred for another, ending your - oh, so many things you have collected to end. But when you look, as we said, a holistic view of life, they are all interrelated, the dying, the living, the agony, the despair, the loneliness and the suffering, they are all one movement. When you see it holistically then there is total freedom from death. Not that the physical body is not going to be destroyed, but the sense of ending and therefore there is no continuity. You understand? The fear is not being able to continue.

And suppose, or when, one human being understands the full significance of death and the depth of that, the vitality, the fullness of that word and what lies behind that word, he is out of that human consciousness. Because human consciousness is what we have described, but the description is not the content. Then what happens to people, to human beings who have not broken away completely from the content of that consciousness? You are following? Or is this too much for an evening? Suppose I, a human being, have not understood, or gone into myself, and studied the whole content of my consciousness, and I die with fear, separation from my family, from my bank account, from my daily ugly routine, what happens to me? I, who have thought I was a separate individual, my consciousness being separate, my soul, all that is separate, what happens to me when I die? Will I still continue this separation as an individual next life? And if I believe in a next life, as most of you do, then what matters is how you behave now. Right? Because next life you are going to pay for it. Right? But you don't believe in reincarnation really because you are not behaving now. This is just a trick of the brain to give you some kind of solace, some kind of comfort. If you really believed in it you would have extraordinarily good minds and be a good human being now. But you don't believe in anything really. You only believe, you only want your power, your money, your status, your position, your technique, skill and money, and perhaps sex. That is all you want. And that is what human beings want so you will continue in that state. Not you as an individual but that state of consciousness will continue. And this is life. This is the agony of pleasure and pain of life. But when you understand that life and death are one, they are one when you begin to end in living: end your attachment, end your beliefs, end your antagonisms, your prejudices, your conclusions, end all your gods. Negate all that, then you are living side by side with death, which is the most extraordinary thing to do. Which is, there is neither the past nor the present or the future, there is only the ending.

BOMBAY 6TH PUBLIC TALK 7TH FEBRUARY 1982

This is the last talk. I am sure you are glad of it, so am I. It is I think, necessary to make a short resume of all the talks we have had here, which has been five talks. We said society is corrupt, immoral and degenerated. And that society we have created, each human being with his greed, ambition and corruption, with his lack of consideration, lack of love. We have created this society. And to bring about a change in that society which is so necessary, it is important that we, as human beings change radically, not superficially, not environmentally but in the whole psyche of man. And we have been talking about the necessity of transformation in the very brain itself which has been conditioned for thousands and thousands of years. And is it possible, we asked together, whether we can change at all? Human beings have been, more or less, for the past millennia upon millennia what we are now - in conflict, in pain, in sorrow, killing each other, thousands upon thousands of wars. And we seem to be pursuing the same path. And we asked ourselves in our conversation together, whether the human condition can ever be transformed. We said there are a certain group of philosophers who say the human condition can never be changed, it can be modified but it cannot be radically transformed. They have their logic, reason and innumerable examples for their assertions. We are talking together whether it is possible for us to change, admitting that we are conditioned, admitting that we are the past, the present and the future, becoming aware of our conditioning, religiously, politically, economically and so on, to become aware of that, to become aware of the consciousness of which we are. This consciousness, with its content, is one's life, one's behaviour, one's conduct. And if one becomes aware of the content of our consciousness, can there be in that awareness, in which there should be no choice, can there be a radical transformation?

So we took first the human hurt, that we are hurt from childhood, through schools, colleges and universities, and the whole progress of man's evolution is to get more and more hurt. From that hurt he acts neurotically, not reasonably. And we asked if that hurt - and there are a great many accumulated hurts - whether those hurts can be completely wiped away from one's consciousness. We talked about that a great deal, what to do. We are not going over that again this evening.

And also we talked about relationship. The relationship between man and man, between human beings, whether they are near, intimate, or far away. We hardly have any relationship with each other. Man and woman, married or not married, they pursue their own particular line, like two railway lines never meeting, perhaps they meet in bed and that is about all, because the man pursues his ambitions, his greed, his pleasure, so does the woman. So there is no contact, actual relationship between each other. That relationship is the building up of images about each other. And these images, we think, have a certain relationship. So actually we have no relationship, which is obvious.

And also we talked about fear. We went into it a great deal, whether human beings, you, each one of us, can ever be free from fear. Basically, psychologically, most of us are afraid of so many things - fear of loss, fear of not achieving and so on and so on. We went into the whole movement of fear - comparison, desire for security, time, thought. We said thought is the root of fear and together we went into the question of what is thought. Because all of us live by thought. You came here because you wanted to, which is directed by thought. All the technological world with all its complexity and subtleties, is the product of thought. And all the things that are in churches, temples and so on are put there by thought. And we examined what thought is. Thought is the response of knowledge as memory. We went into that very carefully. And most of our actions are based on thought. And thought is always limited. Do what you will, thought is everlastingly limited because knowledge, which is the outcome of experience, is also limited. There is no complete knowledge about anything. So thought with its action must bring about division. Whatever is limited is divisive, separative. So we went into the question together: the movement of thought, which is time. And we talked about time also, that we are the past, the present and the future. We are all that. That is, we are the masters of time. And this is important to understand and we went into it considerably.

And also we went into the question of love, compassion, the ending of suffering. All this has been necessary because that is our life. That is our everyday life of pain, pleasure, anxiety, insecurity and sorrow.

And this evening we ought to talk over together what is order. Because without putting order in our house, not only externally, but basically order in ourselves, meditation has no meaning. And we are going to talk over together what is meditation. Not that we should meditate first and then order, but order prior to meditation. We will go into that. So we are now considering together what is order in our life, and order outside in the world. The order outside in the world can only come about if there is order in ourselves, in the whole structure of our being, complete total order. So we are going to talk over together what is order?

Please, as we pointed out, throughout these talks, this is not a lecture. This is not something the speaker is telling you what to do, or what to think, how to act and so on. Which is the intention of a lecturer to inform you what he thinks. But as we pointed out earlier, we are together examining our lives, together we are trying to find out order, the meaning of that word and the significance of that word. And we are going to go into it together. Please be clear on this point, that we are not trying to persuade you what is order, a blue print, a pattern which you must follow, but rather we are investigating, examining, observing rather - it would be better to use the word observing - without direction, without motive, to observe. To observe a tree without the word, which is, the word interferes or blocks, or prevents the observation of something clearly. To most of us words become all important. But words, explanations are not the actuality. The symbol is never the real.

So what is order? To examine, to come to the point, which is, total order in virtue. And as most of us live in disorder, which is confusion, conflict, the conflict of dualities, all that is disorder. Where there is conflict there must be disorder. As there is disorder when one nation separates itself from another, builds up armaments ready to kill each other, that is disorder. Religions have contributed to this disorder. One has been told there are about three hundred thousand gods in this country. And these gods are invented by thought. And each worshipper is against the other worshipper. So religions with their separative authoritarian traditional pursuits, authority, have also brought about a great deal of confusion in the world. These are facts, it is not the speaker's opinion or judgement, this is what is actually going on. The insistence on the part of the Christian Western world of a saviour, faith and in the Eastern world, the Islamic world, the Hindu world and the Buddhist world, each pursuing, maintaining, sustaining, nourishing their separative ways.

So there is not only economic disorder, national disorder but also there is disorder in ourselves. As we said conflict, contradiction, is the essence of disorder. We never see 'what is', but we are always trying to transform 'what is' into 'what should be', that is duality. There is violence. That is a fact. And the projection of an idea as non-violence is its opposite. So then there is conflict between 'what is', which is violence, and the idealistic nonsense which is non-violence. So there is always this conflict between what is actual and what is not actual - the ideal, the conclusion, the philosophical assertions. So there is only 'what is', there is no duality. The duality is an escape from 'what is'. And one contributes to disorder - the man who pursues an ideal instead of understanding what actually is, himself, his life, so he brings about in himself this contradiction, this hypocrisy, this lack of integrity. Integrity is to remain with 'what is', and not the everlasting pursuit of something which is non-existent.

So we are looking together at this confusion, which is disorder. And in this disorder we are trying to find freedom, we are trying to find what is truth. And volumes have been written about all this. Volumes have been written to escape from actuality, what is taking place now - what is taking place in your mind, in your heart, in your activity. As we do not diligently apply to the understanding of that disorder we create more disorder. So we, together, if it is possible, to observe this disorder holistically. We explained yesterday what it means to be whole. That is, a human being who is not fragmented, not broken up, saying one thing and doing quite the opposite, thinking one thing and acting quite the opposite. This contradiction in our life is one of the major factors of conflict and therefore there is no possibility of observing our life holistically, that is, as a whole movement, which we talked about yesterday.

And as we said yesterday evening: death is part of this life, not something to be avoided, something put away in the distance. But when one observes life as a whole movement, which has its own extraordinary beauty, when you observe it as a whole, with all the movements of pain, sorrow, pleasure, then death is part of our life. Death is the ending, and the ending brings about totally a new dimension. The negation of all the content of consciousness is a religious mind.

So we are going together to first put the house in order. Our house, which is me, you. If you cannot put it in order, which every serious man must, considering what the world is, what is happening around you, if you do not put your house in order, that is, to understand disorder, to understand the nature and the movement of disorder, which is your daily life, you will degenerate. Obviously this is taking place. You will pursue false gods, you will pursue all kinds of gurus with their nonsense. So it behoves us, if we are at all serious, to consider the nature and so observe disorder, not try to change disorder. Observe it, remain with it, hold it, look at it. That is, to diligently bring all your energies to look at it. To look at that disorder. And when there is total perception of that disorder then there is total order. And that total order is complete virtue. One hopes that we are following each other. You are not merely listening to a series of ideas, words. We are examining our own minds and our own hearts and see ourselves directly, not persuaded, not pushed around, but to see directly for ourselves that we live in disorder. And to hold it as a precious jewel, look at it. Then out of that clear perception order comes. And when there is total order there is no order. I don't think you understand this. I will leave it at that for the moment.

Because when you negate totally disorder, totally, with your whole minds and hearts see what disorder has done to man. Then order is a living thing. And in that order there is virtue and freedom. When there is freedom, because you have put your house in total order, freedom has no order.

Now we ought to consider this evening what is religion. Because religion has transformed man. Religion has brought about a new culture, a new order of things, both historically and actually. When you observe the religions that exist in the world, without any motive, without any critical destructive cynicism, all religions throughout the world are the inventions of thought. Thought has created gods because thought is insecure in itself, limited in itself, therefore it projects an idea, a concept of something total, whole, complete. But all the scriptures of all religions are put together by thought. And thought is not sacred. Thought may worship the symbol which it has invented by going to a temple, and all the things that are in it have been put there by thought, not by some outside agency. Man has done it out of his fear, of his insecurity, of his sorrow. So please observe it. Don't accept what the speaker is saying. He said you must have scepticism, doubt, doubt your religions, question. Don't accept but observe how the world is divided by religions and each religion has its own particular form of sects by the hundred. So religion as it is now is not religion.

So we are going to find out together when you totally deny, negate, that which is false, because thought, as we pointed out, is limited because knowledge is limited. And whatever thought does as action, invents both technologically as well as psychologically, must be limited. So all the gods and all the temples, churches, all that are the product of thought, invented by thought - the rituals, all that. Now to find out what is a religious mind one must totally negate all that. Which means to have no fear whatsoever, because religions are born out of fear. When there is no fear at all there is no need for god.

So what is a religious mind? You understand my question? A human being who has lived in illusion and becomes aware of the illusion, either examines it carefully, what that illusion is, how it is born and why one clings to that illusion, and when one negates that illusion, which is the gods, the temples, the whole circus that goes on in the name of religion is an illusion, totally unreal, when you negate the false, in that negation of the false there is truth. You understand all this? So one must have a clear mind to understand, a clear heart to understand what is a religious mind. You are putting on sannyasi robes, putting on whatever you put round your neck - you are not a religious man, it is mere pretension. You are what you are, with all your troubles, anxieties, loneliness, despair. By putting on these strange, unfamiliar, dramatic, theatrical dresses doesn't show you are religious. I know you will laugh but you will continue to do the same thing tomorrow because it doesn't mean a thing to you. You really do not want to find out a way of living which is truly religious, without gods, without following somebody, none of that. You are completely integrated, you have got such deep integrity.

So we are going to examine together - not those people who have put on sannyasi robes, they cannot examine because they are stuck in their own particular groove - but those who are out of that class, out of that orbit, can examine closely what is truly a religious mind. To find that out we are going to examine together what is meditation. Without meditation there is no religious mind. Without meditation, which is the outcome of total order in your house - it is not the other way round: meditate first and then order. If you meditate without order you are merely living in a series of fantasies, imagination, romantic illusions. So to find out for ourselves what is truly, actually, a religious mind we must observe the nature of meditation.

Why should we meditate at all? Is it necessary to meditate? The classical meditation is practise, control, control thought so that it quietens down, practise, follow a system, discipline, torturing yourself to meditate. And to meditate classically is to take certain postures, sit cross legged, do all that circus that you go through. Here if one may tell you a story of a teacher who was sitting on the banks of the river and he was looking at the flowing waters, the beauty of the waters, the ripple of the waters, the line of the bank, the pure waters flushing against it. And as he is looking a man comes, a disciple saying, 'Master, please teach me what truth is'. So he takes a position, the disciple, sits cross legged and closes his eyes. And the master or the teacher - I am afraid not the guru! - picks up two pieces of stone and he is rubbing one against the other. And the disciple, who has come to meditate and find truth from the master, he hears this peculiar noise of two stones rubbing. He opens his eyes and sees the master rubbing two pieces of stone. And he says, 'Master, what are you doing?' He says, 'I am rubbing two pieces of stone in order to make them into a mirror.' The disciple says, 'Master, if I may tell you, you will never make a mirror by picking up two rocks and rubbing. You can do that everlastingly, you will never succeed.' And so the master says, 'Sitting like that, shutting your eyes and thinking you are meditating, you will never meditate.' Do you have humour? Does humour exist in your lives, to laugh, not at somebody, not at some joke, stupid joke, but to have laughter in your eyes, in your mind, in your mouth, laughter. That is necessary. If you don't know how to laugh at yourself you will never be able to laugh at all.

So we are together observing what is meditation. Practice, the everyday practice, practice, makes the brain mechanical, dull, which it is already when it practises. You understand? It is only the dull mind that practises meditation, not an active watchful, vital mind. It is the mind that says, 'I am going, through practice, to get something, achieve some spiritual heights.' So any system of meditation is merely following a pattern, convenient, satisfying, but it has no meaning whatsoever where meditation is concerned, because meditation requires, as we have said, total order in your life. And because we do not know how to bring about that holistic order, we invent all kinds of tricks and entertainments and part of classical meditation, which you do, is a form of entertainment. It doesn't affect your life whatsoever.

So if you deny, as we said, negate that which is false, then in that false you find what is true. You have negated all the systems of meditation because you yourself see that these systems are invented by thought, put together by a clever man, or an unclever man generally, an unintelligent man, not a spiritual man, and you, who are gullible, who want to have some deep satisfaction, some love, something that is stable, permanent, everlasting, because our lives are so shoddy, so uncertain, we want something that is immutable, non-changing. And we think we will get it if we do certain things. Those things are invented by thought and thought in itself is contradictory. So any form of structure in meditation put together by thought is not meditation, whether it is Zen, Hindu, Buddhist, Christian, it is not. You understand what this means? A total denial, negate totally everything that man has invented, psychologically, not technologically. You can't deny that. Here it is right in front of you. But all the things that man has created in search of truth, and writes about it. And we wanting all the escape from our weariness and sorrow, agony, we fall into that trap.

So one must totally deny all postures, all breathing, all activities of thought. When you have done that, negate all that, then the question arises: can thought come to an end? That is, thought as time, can time have a stop? The time, not the external time, but the time which is becoming something - becoming enlightened, becoming non-violent. A vain man tries to become humble. This whole pattern of becoming psychologically is time. Time, we said, is also thought. Can thought come to an end? Not through discipline, not through control because who is that entity who disciplines the meditator? You follow this? There is always in us this sense of duality: the controller and the controlled, the observer and the observed, the experiencer and the experienced, the thinker and the thought. There is always this divisive duality in us.

Probably it is brought over from physical observation: there is duality, there is light and shade, dark and light, there is man, woman, and so on, there is duality. We have probably brought that over into the field of the psyche. So is there a controller which is different from the controlled? Please go into this very carefully. In meditation, classical, ordinary, the much talked about, it may be a lot of propaganda, and all the gurus who are propagating it, coining money, they are always concerned with the controller and the controlled. They have always said 'Control your thoughts,' - because thereby you will end thought, or have only one thought. But we are enquiring into who is the controller? You might say, 'He is the higher self', 'He is the witness.' 'He is something which is not thought.' But the controller is part of thought. Right? Obviously. So the controller is the controlled. Thought has divided itself as the controller and that which he is going to control, it is still the activity of thought. You are following all this? Right? It is a strange phenomena that thought has invented gods and then thought begins to worship them. Have you noticed that? That is self worship. You understand? No, you don't.

So when one understands the wholeness of this movement of the controller is the controlled, then there is no control at all. This is a dangerous thing to say to people who have not understood this. You will probably say the speaker is advocating no control. I am sure you will say that, because you really have no control either. But we are not saying that. We are saying: where there is the observation that the controller is the controlled, the thinker is the thought, then if you remain with that whole truth, with that reality, without any further interference with thought, then you have totally a different kind of energy.

So meditation is the summation of all energy. Not the energy created by thought through friction, but the energy of a state of mind in which all conflict has completely ceased. Religion, the meaning of that word etymologically probably means gathering together, gathering together all your energy so that you can act diligently. A religious mind acts diligently, that is, caring, watching, observing. In that observation there is affection, compassion.

And concentration is another invention of thought. In school you are told to concentrate on the book. You learn to concentrate, trying to exclude other thoughts, trying to prevent yourself from looking out of the window. In concentration there is resistance, narrowing down this enormous energy of life into a certain point. Whereas attention which is a form of awareness in which there is no choice, a choiceless awareness, in that attention all your energy is there. When you have such attention there is no centre from which you are attending. Whereas in concentration there is always a centre from which you are attending.

Then also we ought to talk over together space. We have no space, both physically, the way one lives in the modern world, an apartment on the top of another apartment, there is no space outwardly, and inwardly you have no space at all because our brains are constantly chattering, active. So meditation is to understand or come upon that space which is not put together by thought. Space as the 'me' and the 'not me'. I hope you are understanding all this. Are you all getting tired? I am surprised. Because without space - not invented space, the idea of space but actual space, that is, vast distance, limitless distance, our observation unhindered is this perpetual movement without any barrier, that is vast space. And in that vast space there is no time. Time has stopped long ago, time as thought, because thought has understood, or the observer, or observation has seen that thought has its place and thought has no other place. You understand? Thought has, as knowledge, time, space, when we want to learn a technique, I do not know how to become a carpenter but I need space, that is time to learn the skill as a good master carpenter, there I need time. But psychologically there is no accumulation of any past event. There is always that awareness that cleanses the brain of any accumulation as memory. Memory is necessary at a certain level, at the psychological level, that is the 'me' progressing, the 'me' achieving, the 'me' in conflict, all that has come to an end long ago because you have put your house in order. Then the mind - or rather, let's talk about the brain - the brain has its own rhythm, but that rhythm has been distorted by our extravagance, by our ill treating the brain through drugs, through faith, through belief, through drink, smoking and all that has distorted the brain. It has lost its own pristine vitality.

So meditation is this sense of total comprehension of the whole of life, and from that right action. And meditation is absolute silence of the mind, not relative silence, or the silence that thought has projected and structured but the silence of order, which is freedom. Only in that total complete unadulterated silence, then there is that which is truth, which is everlasting to everlasting. This is meditation.

K: What would be the greatest interest, not only to appeal to the West but also to the Indian mind that has thought about these things, perhaps, much longer than the Western world - considering both the West and the East what would be the greatest significance and lasting, not just passing significance but something that is enduring, that is worthwhile?

PJ: Sir, most of our lives are so futile. And unless one discovers within oneself - I want to use a right word - perhaps the capacity to leap out of the futility. For the mind to have the creative spring so that it can move whatever it does. It is not what it does that is important but the need for something which is new, which is not tainted, so that it doesn't matter what the circumstances are, you seem to go beyond circumstances. And that only happens when the mind is not dependent on anything, and it has some space, some perception. And I have been wondering, perhaps it is a difficult question but it is a question on which I have been wondering for the last few months, and that is, what is the ground of the creative?

K: I wonder what you mean by creative. I mean an artist says he is creative, a poet, a thinker, or some new discovery by scientists. Would you call all that creative activity?

PJ: Perhaps.

K: But it is limited. They might not acknowledge it.

PJ: Sir, why do you bring in the word limited.

K: Don't let's use 'limited', partial.

PJ: You mean that. Why do I bring it in, I don't know the other.

K: No, it is partial because it is not related to their daily life.

PJ: Again...

K: No, one may be a great scientist, and may lead a very, very mediocre life. And the scientist may discover extraordinary things and call that creative.

PJ: But you see that's why I did not speak of 'a creative action'...

K: ...but a creative mind.

PJ: ...but a mind, a perception which rests in the creative.

K: I think we should make it a little clearer.

PJ: You have never answered any questions on the ground of manifestation, for instance. Let's take it at the simplest level: this coming into being of anything.

K: Of birth, of anything.

PJ: Of birth.

K: Whether it is a baby, or a new tree, or a bird.

PJ: What is involved?

K: Are you asking, what is the source of all life, both the manifest and not manifest?

PJ: Yes. I would like to probe, if it is possible to probe into what you have said just now, unmanifest and manifest, the manifest and the pre-manifest. I won't say unmanifest. That instant before manifestation is.

K: Or birth is.

PJ: That's one instant.

K: Are we discussing this subject in a technological, scientific verbiage, or are we probing - probing into something which you and I don't know? Just a minute, I want to make it clear. Because after all the birth of babies we know that, how that comes into being.

PJ: But one may know how it comes into being but one still does not know the quality of life which pervades it. Knowing that a baby is born doesn't give you experience of birth, the actuality of birth is very different from the description of birth. It is the same with everything.

K: The description is not the thing, or the explanation is not the actual.

PJ: But you cannot live through life without going into this coming into existence.

K: I don't quite follow what you are trying to convey. I am not being obstreperous but I don't quite follow. If you have talked about what is the origin of all life, what is the beginning of all existence, not go back and back and back - you follow what I mean - but try to discover, or come upon something which is the beginning of all things. I mean various religious people have said, god - god is the origin of everything. But that is just a word, that doesn't convey the mind that investigates what is the origin. You follow?

PJ: Yes.

K: Now, are we discussing that, having a dialogue about that - to delve very, very deeply into the origin of all life, without any belief, without any dogma, and so on? Or are we having a dialogue theoretically, moving between the actual and not the actual, and trying to probe into something with thought? I don't know if I am making this clear?

PJ: I understand what you are saying. You see, sir, we have narrowed the word 'creative' to mean, as you said, painting, writing a book, or discovering something in science, but basically the whole meaning of a tree, a human being, the earth, the sky...

K: Man has asked this question.

PJ: Of course he has asked this question.

K: He has asked, what is the meaning of all this, and what is the origin of all this.

PJ: Where does it arise?

K: What is the ground from which this all this arises? That is what you are asking, isn't it?

PJ: Yes.

K: What is the source of all existence, all life, all action? Now how does one enquire into that? What is our approach to it? How do we come to investigate into something that demands an extraordinary freedom, an extraordinary sense of non-conditioned mind - if I can use that. A freedom, perhaps that very word 'freedom' is love - it requires that quality of mind that is both practical, sensitive, and has this quality of great compassion.

PJ: I can't start with that because I don't know what it is.

K: How do we come to that point and from there move?

PJ: So if you put it that way then I am stuck.

K: You are stuck.

PJ: Then I can't move.

K: No, I am just asking: I don't say, it must be there. Isn't that the process of enquiry?

PJ: I say this question arises in my mind, and I would like to move with this question into it. If I say that the mind must be free and therefore it is love, then what do I do?

K: You can't do anything. But how do you enquire into something that man has asked for millions of years, and give it a name and be satisfied with it. But we are not doing that. We are saying, how does a mind enquire into something that must be extraordinary, that must have a quality of not only universal, cosmic - if I can use that word - how does one's mind go into such a question, into something of supreme order? How does one's enquiry begin, where? If you enquire with thought, that doesn't lead very far.

PJ: No. You asked how did the enquiry begin.

K: Yes. What is the manner, what is the approach of a mind that wants to enquire into something that it doesn't know, or aware, something that demands an extraordinary quality of deep subtlety, deep capacity of order, and so on. Where do I begin?

PJ: Obviously by being aware of the disorder within oneself.

K: That is, I begin, I am after all the manifest. I am a human being born. I know the process of being born, how a child is brought into being. We are not talking of that. Now I enquire into myself. Where do I begin? Let's go slowly. Take a little time. Where do I begin?

PJ: I begin by what is around me, what is within me.

K: Yes.

PJ: Obviously sir. There can be no other starting point.

K: The world outside, the world inside. What is the criterion which measures the outer and the inner? What is the measurement? I am using not judgement, I am using purposively the word 'measurement'.

PJ: But is it necessary to measure?

K: If I enquire into myself in a monastery, I can deceive myself so enormously. But if I have a measure - just let me use that for a moment - of what is actually happening in the world outside of me, to observe all that without any bias, and to relate what is happening to what is happening inwardly, so that I see that is one movement, not two separate movements.

PJ: Sir, I am not in a monastery. I am in the midst of life. And being in the midst of life I see action at various levels, connected with things, connected with me. I also see the responses within me to action, all the capacity which I may have over the years, been able to even remain without reacting. I see all that. And I move into that - I move with it - it is not into, but with it.

K: You are it.

PJ: Yes, that's right.

K: I move with it.

PJ: I am it.

K: You are this.

PJ: It is easier with the interior movement to see I am it; it is much more difficult with an exterior thing to see that I am it. If you tell me that I am all the wars which are taking place, that is very difficult for me to see.

K: No, we are responsible for all the wars that are taking place.

PJ: Yes. But that is a distant thing for me. You must understand. That is a distant thing. That responsibility is a distant responsibility. I say, yes, perhaps if I take it to its ultimate I am responsible. But I can't link it to saying in the same way with which I link to a response within me.

K: Quite.

PJ: Actually a response within me is a living response, which has much more reality.

K: My next question - would it deviate from what we are discussing: why don't you feel total responsibility for the wars, the brutality, the terrible things that are happening in the world, why doesn't one feel totally responsible?

PJ: How is one totally responsible? By being involved?

K: No, not involved.

PJ: By being born.

K: No, as a living grown-up human being all my tradition, all my way of living, way of thinking, acting, as a nationalist, this or that, has contributed to this, to the present state of the world.

PJ: Sir, you are making it so difficult. A man commits a sadistic murder. I can't say that I am responsible for that sadistic murder. So when you take it to that extent it is impossible for me to feel the reality of it.

K: Let's leave that for the moment.

PJ: It is better to leave that. But let's probe into the ground of existence which is the 'isness' of life.

K: Isness - the verb, is.

PJ: So the only way to probe is to move into oneself, whatever that means.

K: All right. Let's take for the moment that word, go, or move, or enter into the whole complex of oneself. Enter into it, not as an observer from the outside. I am all that.

PJ: It is not even that I state what I am.

K: Yes.

PJ: I don't state. Let me discover, uncover.

K: Uncover rather than discover.

PJ: Uncover what I am. And in uncovering what I am, I comprehend that one is uncovering the whole existence of man. That is possible to see.

K: That is fairly simple.

PJ: In this journey of uncovering, I mean the superficial things are relatively easy, so we won't go into that.

K: No, those are fairly simple.

PJ: But once the superficial, the room has been swept...

K: Isn't that important too? Who sweeps the room? What does it mean, having swept the room, what it is? You follow what I am asking? Is the sweeping, or cleansing, or uncovering, completely moving away from all the superficial reactions, superficial conditioning, and trying to enter into the nature, or the movement that conditions the mind.

PJ: Obviously, sir, you can't say you have swept the room and it is over, dust gathers again. So sweeping is a movement which is part of living. You can't. But the grosser elements can certainly be eliminated. The subtler things survive in corners in which you have not been able to get to. But the more obvious things it is possible to sweep away.

K: Yes. Obvious things can be swept. No, we must be a little more. What are the obvious things?

PJ: You know, for instance, Krishnaji, ambition, or envy.

K: Yes, hatred.

PJ: Hatred.

K: Pupulji, really to be free of hatred, to wipe it - just go into it a little bit - to be free of hatred means something extraordinary, to be free of all sense of aggression, all sense of - there is no enemy.

The enemy is you.

PJ: But hatred is a different thing from the quality of aggression. Let's go into it a little, sir.

K: Aggression is related to hatred because an aggressive nation, or an aggressive person, inevitably hurts the other, and that hurt breeds hatred. It is part of the same movement.

PJ: Yes, that is why I say that there are the coarser things and then the subtler things. Hatred, anyone who has known hatred knows that hatred is a very powerful thing and a very destructive thing. But aggression may be to some extent part of one's nature even. It may be that from the make-up...

K: ...from the animal and so on.

PJ: As a human being you are more assertive than another. And to be assertive is not hatred.

K: All right. Move. Let's move.

PJ: That is why I made the distinction of the grosser things which are possible to sweep clean.

K: But how does one know what is gross and what is subtle? What is the mind that says, this is...

PJ: That's why I think the ordinary way to move into this is to see that nothing is trivial.

K: That no reaction is...

PJ: ...is trivial.

K: Not only trivial but has its source in one's conditioning.

PJ: You know, sir, I saw recently the casting of a tremendous metal cauldron, about seven feet diameter. The slightest flaw, it didn't matter how slight it was, would have cracked the cauldron. And it is exactly like that. It doesn't matter how slight, how subtle, it still cracks the investigation.

K: I understand that. Are you saying to me that it needs a great training, great discipline, a sense of tremendous control, like the potter who did a marvellous thing, it needs a great attention, energy, and very, very subtle hands and so on.

PJ: Does it?

K: Oh, yes it does.

PJ: This is where I think one takes the word 'free' from you.

K: Free?

PJ: Yes. And takes it to mean a certain flabbiness of the spirit.

K: Oh no.

PJ: Please, let me pursue this. It is very important.

K: It is not flabbiness of spirit. Good lord!

PJ: Because it may mean that I don't accept authority, I don't think it necessary to do something. I can live a futile life, I can live a trivial life. It doesn't matter.

K: Freedom. The very word freedom, Pupulji, as far as I understand it, I looked at in several dictionaries, means, the very word is affection, love.

PJ: And a tremendous discipline. Let me use the word discipline.

K: I know you are using the word discipline, but I am not sure.

PJ: When I am using the word discipline, I am speaking of it as the demand for a watchfulness that the trivial does not creep in.

K: Yes, but is watchfulness, which is awareness, does it need training, does it need discipline? Let's understand the meaning of that word discipline.

PJ: No, you see discipline - if I say that I must sit in the morning, cross my legs, look at the wall and fix my eyes and see that my mind has no thought. That is one kind of discipline. But the mind awakening to the fact that it must be aware of every movement within itself is also a discipline.

K: I wonder how you are using that word because discipline, isn't it generally used as training, conformity, imitation, restraint?

PJ: But no sir, without diligence nothing is possible. And so you may discard the word discipline, you put in the word diligence.

K: Wait a minute, wait a minute. Let's go slowly. To be diligent, that means to be aware of what you are doing, what you are thinking. To be aware of your reactions, and from those reactions observe the action taking place, and in that observation, in that awareness is the action controlled, put in a certain framework? What I am objecting to if I may, subject to discussion, what I am objecting to is the word discipline altogether.

PJ: But sir, if I may say so, you have become allergic to that word.

K: No, I am not allergic. I have got an allergy but I am not allergic to the word.

PJ: Because you use it to mean putting it into a framework.

K: Wait a minute. And I also mean the very act of learning is its own discipline.

PJ: Yes. But how does the act of learning come to be? You see, take it one step further back. From what does the need for observation arise?

K: All right. Need?

PJ: Why should I observe?

K: For the very simple reason, whether it is possible for a human mind to change something, to change himself, to change the world which is entering into such a catastrophic area.

PJ: Yes, but if I start with that premise...

K: No, not premise, it is so.

PJ: All right. If I start there, or if I start with sorrow, which is very often the real ground from which one starts.

K: Yes. It is very complex.

PJ: The ground is really sorrow. I think we have moved away. So let's go back to this question...

K: What we started out with was: what was the origin, the ground of all life? Then to enquire into that you have to enquire into oneself, because you are the expression of all that.

PJ: Yes, yes.

K: You are life. Now the origin of that we are trying to discuss. Right?

PJ: Yes, the origin. The state from which that arises.

K: I can only do that by understanding myself.

PJ: Yes.

K: Very simply, understanding myself. Myself is so terribly complex, how do I approach - I am just now asking - how do I approach a problem that is complex, that is not to be easily diagnosed, easily say, "This is right", "This is wrong", "This should be", "This should not be", it is like a living, complex, messy, disordered entity.

PJ: But is it not because one starts with an attention, which is looking for an ordered entity that one is finding disorder.

K: Oh no, I am not looking for disorder.

PJ: In which case if you are looking without concern as to what you are looking for.

K: No, we are missing something. I said the world is in disorder. I observe it. And the world, I see I am also in disorder. I begin with that. I am in disorder. Human beings have lived and created such disorder in themselves, and therefore outwardly. Leave that for the moment there. Now how do I comprehend, be aware of the origin of disorder? You follow what I am saying? If I can begin to understand the origin of disorder I can move more and more deeply into something which may be total chaos, but is orderly. You follow what I mean?

PJ: Isn't it by being as simple as possible about it.

K: Yes, that is what I am trying to be. I am in disorder.

PJ: I have certain instruments of enquiry. I have my eyes, my ears, my senses.

K: Yes, yes. You don't enquire with your ears, or with your eyes.

PJ: Don't you? Don't you enquire with your eyes and your ears?

K: A little bit. I enquire when I look around.

PJ: When you look at yourself.

K: Now can I look at myself with my eyes, my optic eyes, or I can see myself in a mirror. But I can't see the complexity of myself with my eyes. I must be aware sensitively, without any choice into this conditioning.

PJ: Why do you say, sir, that you cannot be aware with your eyes?

K: Again, what do you mean 'with your eyes'? The inward eye?

PJ: No. There is a way of looking out, and there is a way of looking in.

K: Looking in. All right. Looking in with your eyes.

PJ: Looking in, listening in.

K: Yes. We must be a little careful here, we can mislead.

PJ: Yes, let's go into it. Is there any other way?

K: Yes, I think there is.

PJ: Let's go into the other way. But first of all let's go into the way, whatever it is. Is the eye, ear, not part of the other way?

K: Breathing, hearing, seeing, feeling. Those are actually sensory responses. Right? Actually I see that colour. I hear noise. I taste something, and so on. These are sensory responses.

PJ: Yes, but is there not a seeing of anger, the action of anger, and listening to a reaction of anger?

K: Do you listen with your ears, or do you observe anger?

PJ: How do you observe anger?

K: By when you are angry, to look at the cause and effect of anger.

PJ: When you are angry you can't.

K: So later on you...

PJ: You see the nature of the mind which has been in a state of anger. But you see the nature of the mind - the word you use is 'you see the nature of the mind'.

K: All right.

PJ: It is very important, Krishnaji.

K: I understand what you are saying, that the very act of listening, the act of feeling, inwardly, is it that you see it with your eyes, hear with sensory ears?

PJ: You see if you put it that way we will never get to the point because the sensory ear is so used to listening out that it can never comprehend what is, if you take that and try and push it in, you will never get to it.

K: But would it help if we talked about perception?

PJ: No, sir. I say it would help if you talked about seeing, listening with the eye and ear, because there is a seeing, listening, with the eye.

K: I hear you making that statement. From that hearing I have understood the words and see the meaning of what you are seeing. Right?

PJ: Yes.

K: The verbal communication has taken place. But the deeper significance...

PJ: But that is also taking place. While I am listening to you and seeing you I am also listening and seeing my own mind, the ground of the mind.

K: No.

PJ: Then what is taking place?

K: Listening.

PJ: There is listening. I am not saying, who is listening.

K: No, listening.

PJ: There is listening.

K: Just a minute, Pupulji, we must be clear on this point. There is - we must be go into a little more carefully.

PJ: No, sir, but in an act where you are totally attentive, take an act where you are totally attentive, what is the state of that act of being totally attentive?

K: What is the state of action that is born out of complete attention? I think it is clear. I will answer it. First to answer that question we must understand what we mean by complete action, attention. Attention. It's not concentration.

PJ: No, sir.

K: No, no, I want to be clear on this.

PJ: Of course it is not.

K: So attention means there is no centre from which you are attending.

PJ: No, of course not.

K: No, don't say, "Of course not", see what is implied in it.

PJ: You see, sir, I would like to ask you one thing: are we still dusting the periphery?

K: No.

PJ: If you are not dusting the peripheral...

K: ...argument.

PJ: ...then when you ask that question unless I can understand what attention is I can't even take the first step.

K: No, so I just want to be clear: attention means - what does it mean - I attend completely.

PJ: To see, to attend completely is for the 'I' not to be there.

K: That is the real thing. When there is attention there is no 'I'. It isn't, I am attending. There is only that state of mind which is wholly attentive.

PJ: So all the senses...

K: The whole body, the whole...

PJ: Being is awakened, if I may say so.

K: Yes.

PJ: And if you are in that state where the being is awake then you can listen, observe.

K: Yes, yes.

PJ: Now can we proceed from there?

K: We are wandering off. I want to enquire into myself. Right? Because myself is life. In enquiring about what I am, I may, if my enquiry is correct, accurate, not distorted, the ground, the beginning of all life may be discovered - may be uncovered.

PJ: If you are starting from there then I will say the first step you will find that 'I' is there.

K: Yes, yes. First step: see clearly, hear clearly.

PJ: But the 'I' is there. So there is the observer and the observed.

K: Oh, of course.

PJ: Now seeing that, it is also...

K: Now wait a minute, Pupul, don't move away from that. I know there is the observer and the observed. Is that so? I am enquiring? I have taken it for granted.

PJ: No, first obviously, sir, when I first started enquiring I started from the observer.

K: Yes, I start with the observer.

PJ: Now I ask - or you have asked and therefore that thought is in my mind, that is there the observer.

K: Is there an observer different from the observed?

PJ: Now having that statement within me I look for the observer.

K: Yes, yes, who is the observer.

PJ: I look for the observer.

K: Yes, enquire into the nature of the observer. Go slowly into that. Because if I understand the observer - if there is an understanding of the observer, then perhaps the observer may see the falseness of this division between the observer and the observed.

PJ: Who will see it?

K: Not 'who will see it', but the perception of what is truth. Perception, not who sees it, perceiving.

PJ: So the seeing of what is the truth of the observer will end the state of division.

K: Of division, yes. Yes, that's is what I have said a thousand times.

PJ: And it is not a one process, one act, that I end the process of division. You might say it happened once and you have seen everything. But it doesn't happen that way.

K: No. it is generally stated that way.

PJ: For that instance it is so.

K: No. Go ahead, what are you trying to say?

PJ: What I am saying is, diligence - we used that word - diligence or discipline is to have that enquiry alive within one.

K: And that does not, I am saying, that does not need training.

PJ: No, I am not talking of training. You brought it in.

K: When you used previously the word discipline...

PJ: No but I am using the word discipline without yet bringing in the word training. I say discipline is that I cannot expect to have an understanding of this unless the mind is awake to this and is diligent about being awake to this.

K: Yes. All right I won't bring in anything. I'll go ahead.

PJ: You can't deny that.

K: No, it has to be diligent, it has to be watchful, it has to be attentive, subtle, hesitant, it has to be all that.

PJ: It has to observe, and rest in observation, find a new home for itself in observation.

K: Pupul we are wandering off again, perhaps I am wandering off. I said I am enquiring into myself.

PJ: Well that's enquiring.

K: How do I enquire into myself except through my reactions - the way I think, the way I act, the way I respond to the environment, my relationship to another.

PJ: If I am starting from there I find that as I first observe myself - the responses, the reactions, all rapid, confused, continuous...

K: I know, contradictory.

PJ: ...contradictory, but in the very observing some space comes into this.

K: Some space, some order.

PJ: This is just the beginning.

K: I know, I know. We are sticking at the beginning.

PJ: That's what I am asking.

K: I am bored with the beginning.

PJ: So let us proceed further.

K: Pupul, I would like to ask a question. Is it necessary to go through all this? To watch my reactions, to watch my responses, to observe diligently my relationship with another, intimate or not? Must I go through all this? Or...

PJ: Sir, I'll say something now. The fact is one has gone through all this. The fact is...

K: You may have gone through it because you have accepted that pattern.

PJ: No.

K: Just hold a minute, hold a minute, hold on a minute. You see we have all done that: the thinkers, the sannyasis, the monks and...

PJ: And Krishnamurti.

K: I am not sure.

PJ: That's the point.

K: I am not sure. Just a minute. I want to discuss this point very seriously.

PJ: You either have in the last thirty years jumped yourself.

K: Wait a minute, let's see it for a moment. We have accepted this pattern of examination, analysis and investigating these reactions, paying attention to them, and watching, self-recollecting and so on and so on. There is something in it which rings a false note. At least to me.

PJ: You mean to say a person caught in the whole confusion of existence...

K: He won't even listen to all this.

PJ: There has to be space in order to even listen. How does that space arise?

K: Pupul, either you have suffered and you say, "I must find out", or you suffer and say, "God exists, I love him and I am comforted by him".

PJ: So you have still not answered me. You say, is it necessary to go through all this.

K: I am asking that. I think it may not be.

PJ: Then show me how. You can't...

K: Wait, I will show it to you in a minute. Let's go into it. If as long as you accept this analytical process, which we will call for the moment the analytical process of enquiry, watching diligently your reaction and all that, we use one word for that, this analytical self-introspective, this constant watching, watching, watching.

PJ: It is not analytical.

K: All right, put it out. Constantly watching, constantly enquiring - you follow? I feel, as I see it, that man has done that thousands of time.

PJ: He has not, sir.

K: Oh yes he has.

PJ: He has not. He has done something quite different.

K: What has he done?

PJ: He has looked at his mind and tried to suppress.

K: That's part of the pattern: suppress, escape, substitute, transcend, that's all within that framework.

PJ: It is not the same thing as to observe without trying to do anything about the observation.

K: No, I am asking, Pupul, we are not meeting my question, if I may point out, perhaps I may be wrong. You are not answering my question: must I go through all this?

PJ: You are saying the word 'must'.

K: All right, I won't use 'must'. Is it necessary, is it imperative, is it essential that I must go through this?

PJ: No, but are you trying to say that out of the middle of chaos you can leap to a state of total non-chaos?

K: No, I won't put it that way. You see you are trying... No, I wouldn't put it that way.

PJ: Then what are you saying?

K: I am saying very clearly, I am saying, humanity has gone through this process, some diligently, some sacrifice everything and so on. This has been the pattern of our existence. Some have done it. Right? Enquired, analysed, searched, introspective examination, diligently watching every action and so on, at the end he may be just a dead entity, with some illusory concept.

PJ: He may not be.

K: I said, may not be. And very few, very, very few have gone out of it.

PJ: But when you say, is it necessary, then you have to...

K: I know, I know, if it is not necessary then show me the other way. That's what you are saying. I'll show it to you. But first step out of this.

PJ: You see, sir...

K: Wait, wait, wait. I'll show it to you.

PJ: But look what you are asking.

K: I know I am asking.

PJ: If I step out of the other it is already there.

K: Of course. Step out. That's what I am saying. Don't take time to go through all this.

PJ: But what is meant by 'step out of it'?

K: I'll tell you what I mean. I recognize - let me talk a little - I recognize very clearly, perceive, whatever word you use, that this process of introspective observation, diligence and so on, man has tried a great deal, for a million years, in different ways. And somehow his mind is not clear at the end of it, he has got some fixations, he has got some ideas and so on. Somehow this quality of movement is very, very shallow. Now if you listen to that, that it is very shallow to do all this, and you see the truth that it is shallow, which means your disordered mind is now quiet, listening to find out. Right? Your confused traditional mind says, "I am accustomed to this diligent observation of all my activities, and that it is really very, very superficial", if you see the truth of that superficiality you are out of it. It's like putting away something utterly meaningless.

Now wait a minute, let me put it round the other way. My mind is disorderly, my life is disorderly. You come along and say, "Be diligent, watchful of your actions, of your thoughts, of your relationship, diligent, be utterly watchful all the time". And I say, "That is impossible because my mind won't allow to be diligent all the time. It is not diligent, it is negligent." And I struggle between these two: being diligent and negligent. And I see man has done this.

PJ: But you mean to say, Krishnaji, a mind that is not capable of observing...

K: No, I am saying, a mind that is willing to listen.

PJ: But please listen to me, sir. You think a mind can be in that state of listening.

K: That is very simple.

PJ: Is it?

K: Yes. I say just listen to a story that I am telling you, you are interested. Your mind is quiet, you are eager to see what the story is and so on.

PJ: I am sorry, sir, it doesn't happen that way, no.

K: Just a minute. Just a minute. Don't say, no. I asked you, Pupulji, to listen to what I am saying.

PJ: I have listened.

K: Wait a minute. I am going to explain what I mean by listening. Not only with the sensory ear, but with the ear that has no movement, that is really listening, that is not translating, that is not comparing, that is not trying to find - listening. I am listening to what you say so completely, then if you are so listening, a man comes along and says, "Don't go through all this diligent process, it is false, superficial". If you hear that, the truth of it, what takes place? What actually takes place when you see something really true? Now is this diligent process, is it time consuming - right? I have not time. My life is so short. I have got so many problems, and you are adding another - be diligent. And I say, please I am worn out with problems, and you have introduced to me another problem. And I say, please. You have problems, I know you have got many problems which are all interrelated. Forget that for the moment and listen to it. That's all.

PJ: Sir, if that were so, if that were so - listen, sir - if I could listen, and I do listen, to music in that way.

K: Ah, music is different.

PJ: But to listen - if I listen to music in that way it should change me totally. It does not.

K: Of course not.

PJ: Then?

K: We are moving to something else.

PJ: You are talking of a mind which is already - I am using the word in inverted commas - which is mature already, listening to a state like that.

K: No. Pupul, I am not sure we have not made our minds so immature that we are incapable of listening to anything.

PJ: But how, Krishnaji, you start by making things impossible.

K: Of course! See the truth. Something impossible...

PJ: But that kind of energy which is needed to deal with an impossible thing.

K: That's what it is. This has been possible, this diligent affair. I say that is so trivial.

PJ: I'll ask you: what is the mind that can deal with an impossible statement like that? What is the nature of that mind?

K: That which is utterly impossible is non-existent. We are thinking everything is possible. I am getting there.

PJ: See where you are getting to, sir. You are saying, what you said just now, is non-existent. So with a non-existent mind - listen.

K: Look, Pupulji, if you and I, both of us agree, just a minute, even temporarily that this diligent process has really led nowhere. It has led to various activities which may be beneficial and so on, but the enquiry which sees that I must go to the very source of things - not through this way obviously.

PJ: Obviously, that I would accept.

K: That's all. No, if you accept that is not through diligent awareness.

PJ: But, sir, even to come to a point when I see it cannot come to it through this...

K: Therefore, what has happened to your mind? You have then put this aside.

PJ: Yes.

K: Now what is happening to a mind that says, this is too trivial, too superficial, out, put it out, what is then the quality of your mind?

PJ: I know what you are trying to say, sir.

K: You answer my question. What is the quality of a mind which has been caught in the process of diligent enquiry, this time consuming diligence, when it sees that it has no deep fundamental value - value in the sense that this diligent process will led to comprehend, of come upon the origin? This process obviously not because it is time consuming, the other way may have no time at all.

PJ: But look at the danger in what you are saying. The danger in what you are saying is, I will not be concerned with sweeping the room.

K: No, no. I am enquiring into myself. That very enquiry demands that the mind and the heart, the whole existence is orderly.

PJ: You start with the impossible.

K: Of course I start with the impossible, Pupulji, otherwise what is possible - you have done all the possible.

PJ: No, no, sir.

K: You have done everything that is possible. One has fasted, sacrificed, done everything to find the origin of things. That has been possible. And the possibility has led nowhere. It has led to certain benefits, social benefits and so on, and also it has led to a great deal of misery of mankind. So if you tell me that, that this diligent process is time consuming and therefore time-binding, and as long as you are doing this you are just scratching the surface - the surface may be most extraordinary, very nice and pleasant and ennobling and all that but it is just on the surface. If you grant that, not only grant but actually see it, feel it, it is in your blood, that this is false, you have already stepped out of something - that is, the ordinary into something extraordinary. And we are not willing to do that. We want to go through all this. We treat it like learning a language. Learning a language is a disciplinary action, diligent attention and so on and so on. We carry the same mentality into the other. That's what I object to.

PJ: But I put aside the other.

K: It is not a game we are playing.

PJ: No, I am not playing a game. You put aside the other.

K: Which means, careful Pupul...

PJ: Which means even the seeing, listening is at an end - if I may put it this way.

K: Which means what? The movement of diligence has stopped. Of course. If that is false it has gone. So what has happened to my mind? My mind has been caught in the diligent enquiry and so on and so on, which is time-binding, and now it says, "By Jove, I see this to be utterly superficial". And what is the state of the mind which has put away something which man has carried for a million years? What is that state of mind? Right? It is a fresh mind. Right? It is a totally new mind. And such a mind is necessary to enquire - not enquire - necessary to uncover the origin.

If I talked like this to a very disciplinarian, religious man, he wouldn't even bother to listen. He would say, "No, it is all nonsense that you are talking about". But you, in our dialogue, say, "Let's go into it", and so you have put yourself in a position of listening, to find out. But if you keep on repeating this diligent process you are still like everybody else.

Now such a mind, first of all, such a mind has no bondage. Right? It has no bondage to time, which is, this diligent process is to become something, is to clarify, to understand, to go beyond. So this mind has no beyond, it is not becoming something. Would you go as far as that?

PJ: You see the moment movement ends...

K: No, I am asking you, would you go so far as to see the fact that such a mind cannot have any kind of dependence, attachment and so on?

PJ: Yes, that I see, because as movement ends...

K: The movement of becoming.

PJ: ...all this which you have talked about is the movement of becoming.

K: Which is the perpetuation of the self in a different form, in a different network of words. You see if you tell me this, and I start out to uncover the source - and to me that is a passion, I want to find out, I am not just playing a game, and to me it is utterly necessary - if when that uncovering of the origin of all life, when there is that uncovering my life, my actions, everything is different. Must be. But the other diligent process, my god, I will die at the end of it. You see that's why I feel the understanding of that has a time consuming factor which is so destructive. Time consuming is necessary to learn to technique but this is not a technique to be learnt.

PJ: Sir, you have really an antique mind, a mind of great antiquity. Antique in the sense of containing the whole of human...

K: You see, Pupul, that is why it is important to understand, I am the world. You understand? I am the world.

PJ: No one else can make that kind of statement, Krishnaji.

K: One must make it, otherwise where are you when you see all this destruction, brutality, wars, killing which has never stopped. A man who loved - loved - wouldn't be British, or Argentine or Israel, or Arab, or something, he couldn't kill another. So I see this process has been going on for thousands and thousands of years, everybody trying to become something. And all the diligent workers are helping man to become something. Illumination, enlightenment, is to achieve enlightenment. It is absurd!

PJ: You see, sir, with you...

K: Not 'with me'.

PJ: Just listen, sir. The whole movement of the dormant has ended.

K: That is diligence is ended. Becoming has ended.

PJ: The whole thing which is dormant.

K: Pupulji, don't let's make this into something elitist, it is only for the few - the elite can only have this kind of mind. I refuse to accept that. That goes back into the old division of the elite and the non-elite. Any person who gives attention, who wants to hear, who really says, "I must find the source of life", is passionate about it, not just casual, then he will listen - not to me, he will listen. It is in the air. You see, like Buddha is supposed to have achieved enlightenment. Just think of such a statement! Sitting under a tree, meditating, fasting, striving - you follow. And ultimately one day it happened. That's too utterly meaningless. That means you are allowing time to be the factor of enlightenment, time the factor of deep profound understanding. Do we stop?

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND CONVERSATION WITH PUPUL JAYAKAR 23RD JUNE 1982

PJ: Sir, I was wondering whether one could discuss the wonder and nature of birth in the human mind, not birth of having a baby, but a mind that is jaded, old, incapable of perception, can it renew itself, or totally have a new perception? I think that is a problem with many of us. As one grows older one finds that the quickness of the mind, the capacity to perceive, and take in deeply, perhaps dims.

K: Are you asking: is it possible to keep the mind very young, and yet ancient?

PJ: Yes. You used the word 'ancient', I also would like to go into the nature of what is meant by the word ancient. If we could go into the nature of that first because you have used it, and I have heard you use it several times. Obviously that ancient quality is unrelated to time as yesterday.

K: Yes, let's go into it.

PJ: What is the nature of the ancient?

K: After all the human brain, as far as one understands, and if you have listened to some of the television programmes, the scientists talking about the quality of the brain and how the brain works and so on, it has its own protective nature, protective chemical reaction when there is a shock, when there is a pain and so on. We are after all, or our brains are very, very ancient, very, very old. It has evolved from the ape, the ape standing up, and so on till now. It has evolved through time, through tremendous experiences, acquired a great deal of knowledge, both the outward knowledge as well as inward knowledge, and so it is really very, very ancient. And it is not as far as I can understand, as far as I can see, it is not a personal brain, it is not my brain and your brain. It can't be.

PJ: But obviously your brain and my brain have a different quality of the ancient in them.

K: Wait. Don't let's talk of mine or yours for the moment.

PJ: By making a statement...

K: I am just exploring the beginning, laying a few bricks. If that is granted, that we are very old, very ancient, in that sense, and that our brains are not individualistic brains, we may have reduced it, we may think it is individual - it is personal, it is my brain, but it can't have evolved through time as my brain.

PJ: No, obviously.

K: No, it is absurd to think that, no it may be obvious but most of us think it us a personal brain, it is my brain. Therefore from that is born the whole individualistic concept. Leave that for the moment.

Now are we saying such an ancient mind, brain or mind - for the moment leave the mind, let's look at the brain - such an ancient brain, which has been so conditioned, and has lost, or it may be very, very deeply embedded in the unconscious, in the deep down, that it is becoming very, very coarse, superficial, artificial and vulgar. You follow what I mean?

PJ: But an ancient mind, as you just now said, is the result of evolution in time.

K: Of course. Evolution means time.

PJ: In time. Now the search which has gone on for centuries...

K: Since the beginning of time man must have asked.

PJ: ...has been whether it is possible to free this of that, because with time also is inbuilt with this aging quality, is built in with the sense of the ancient.

K: Yes. I understand that question.

PJ: So are you talking, when you say it is necessary to have an ancient mind, are you talking of a brain which has also inbuilt in it...

K: ...the quality of its own deterioration. Of course.

PJ: Why is that necessary? It is so.

K: No, it is so because experience, knowledge has limited it, has conditioned it, has narrowed it down. Right? The more we acquire knowledge, the more there is the limitation of itself.

PJ: No, you seem to be implying two things. One is the sense of the ancient, and the weight of the past, which gives it a sense of being very old.

K: It is old.

PJ: Because it has experienced for millions of years.

K: Which has conditioned it, which has narrowed it down, limited it.

PJ: But the ancient you are talking about, are you talking about that which it has experienced through time?

K: We will go into that in a moment. First let us see how ancient it is in the normal sense of that word. And how it has in its own million years of experience has limited itself. Therefore there is the quality of deterioration. And the modern world, living in the modern world, with all the noise, with all the terrible shocks, and the agonies of war and so on, has made it still more limited, more in conflict. Because the very limitation brings its own conflict.

PJ: Sir, there is a mind which because the sense of these millions years, gives to it a density and weight.

K: Yes, yes, quite.

PJ: Then there is a mind which is brittle.

K: Which is?

PJ: Brittle, easily corroded.

K: No, the mind and the brain, which are you talking about?

PJ: I am talking about the brain.

K: The brain, don't use the word mind.

PJ: All right, I'll use the word brain. The brain has a certain weight to it, and a density to it, which...

K: Yes, a coarseness to it, heaviness to it, quite.

PJ: A heaviness to it. Now is that what you mean by the ancient?

K: Not quite. I just want to go into it a little bit slowly. If we admit that the brain, by its own evolution, has conditioned itself, and therefore it has the inherent quality of its own destruction, and whether that quality can ever be stopped, in the sense of its deterioration, can the brain cells renew themselves in spite of its conditioning? Do you follow what I am saying? In spite of its agonies, failures, miseries, all the complex modern world in which we live, whether that brain can renew itself so as to achieve its originality, not originality in the sense of individuality, but originality in its origin.

PJ: Would you say that a baby, the brain cells of the baby are original in that sense?

K: No. Of course not.

PJ: So what is meant by original, originality of the brain cells?

K: Let's go into it a little bit. What does the word 'original', what does it mean? Unique, special.

PJ: No, it has a quality of 'for the first time'.

K: A pristine quality.

PJ: Yes.

K: Original means that. Untouched, uncontaminated by knowledge.

PJ: Yes.

K: Can it - that's the question - can such a brain which has been conditioned for a million, or two million years, reach that, or wipe away its conditioning and reach that quality of pristine freshness of the brain? It may be a wrong question altogether.

PJ: But it is I think scientifically they would say that the brain cells are dying all the time.

K: All the time.

PJ: Therefore the number of brain cells available...

K: And also are renewing itself. Apparently certain cells die and certain cells are reborn. It is not dying all the time so that the brain goes to pieces, dies.

PJ: No, but the very fact of aging is that the renewal does not keep pace.

K: Yes, that's it. That's the whole point really, isn't it, is it possible for a brain that has been conditioned, and therefore, as you put it, the built in quality of its own deterioration, can that quality stop, end, disappear?

PJ: Yes.

K: That is, can the brain keep young, young in the sense fresh, alive, has a quality of its originality.

PJ: Yes. How would you...

K: ...proceed from that. I think we have to go into the question, what is consciousness? That's part of our brain, part of our whole being, which is our consciousness. Right? What is consciousness? Not only being conscious of things, outwardly and inwardly, but the whole content of consciousness. Because without the content there is no consciousness, as we know it. So can the content, which makes up this consciousness, can that content end by itself so that there is a totally different dimension to consciousness? You follow? Because the brain or the mind has the quality of consciousness. Right? That is consciousness. The content is the consciousness.

PJ: Yes, that is so.

K: The content is pleasure, belief, excitement, sensations, reactions, faith, agony, pleasure, suffering, affection, and so on, the whole of that is consciousness. And as long as the content, which is all this, exists, it must, because of its conflict, its confusion within consciousness, must wear itself out. And that's why the brain becomes old - in the sense old, aging, dies. There is no freshness to it.

PJ: No, sir. Is the content of consciousness identically with the brain cells?

K: Yes, of course.

PJ: Then as the content of consciousness, because of its very nature wears itself out...

K: ...through conflict. Be careful.

PJ: Yes, I understand that. That very process is wearing out the brain cells.

K: Is conflict, the disturbance, the shocks, the pressures.

PJ: So the physical and psychologically are the same thing really then?

K: Yes. And psychological, that's right. Physical reactions, psychological reactions, they are both reactions.

PJ: Because the brain is physical. The content of consciousness is psychological.

K: Which is also a process of the physical. Of course.

PJ: Yes.

K: So it is psychological as well as the physical, with all their reactions bring about the thought of pain, the thought of agony, the thought of pleasure, the thought of achievement, ambition and so on and so on, and belief, faith, is all this.

PJ: It creates disturbance. But the nature of the brain cells is to continually die.

K: Yes. They carry on. The tradition carries on.

PJ: It is inbuilt, that also is inbuilt.

K: Of course.

PJ: Therefore...

K: And also its own protection, its own reaction, chemical reactions, from what one hears, the cells with their reactions, they produce their own chemical to protect itself.

PJ: But so is time inbuilt.

K: Of course, after all that is the product of time.

PJ: Time is inbuilt in the brain cells.

K: The question really is whether all this consciousness with its content can end, in the sense conflict totally end.

PJ: But with conflict totally ending will time end?

K: Yes. After all that is what the sannyasis, the monks, the real thoughtful people have enquired whether time has a stop. Right? Of course, they have all asked this question.

PJ: You are talking of time now as the psychological process of conflict.

K: Conflict, yes.

PJ: Not time as duration, or the watch.

K: No, no. So what is it that we are trying to find out, or rather investigate together?

PJ: What is it that will bring this quality of birth into the mind?

K: The quality of birth. Let's be clear what you mean by birth. A new, a fresh element enter into it.

PJ: Continual - I won't use the word continual.

K: No, you can't.

PJ: Let me cut out continual. But a being born and with the freshness of birth, and purity of birth.

K: No, wait a minute, careful. Birth you mean what - a baby is born, and his brain already has the quality of its father, mother, and also the tradition, it is gradually bringing all that out.

PJ: But birth also has that quality of the new. Birth is, it was not, and it is.

K: Ah, you are using birth in the sense - just let's be clear - the old being born. The ancient mind, the ancient brain, which is neither yours nor mine, it is the universal brain, is reborn in a baby.

PJ: It is reborn in a baby.

K: And the baby as it matures, the brain is the common brain.

PJ: But what is reborn in a mind which is free? Is it the ancient reborn?

K: No, let's be clear. First, is it possible to be free of this conditioning of the brain, which has brought about its own decay, and whether that consciousness can totally end all its conflict. Then out of that comes the new birth. I don't know if you follow what I am saying. As long as my brain, as long as one's brain, that is one's consciousness, is in conflict, there can be no new element enter into it. That's obvious. Would you grant that? Not verbally, but see the fact, that as long as I am fighting, fighting, struggling to become something.

PJ: I think one sees that.

K: All right. Now if one sees that, not merely verbally, but actually inwardly sees it, then the question arises whether it is possible to end it - end, I mean end suffering, end fear.

PJ: You see, Krishnaji, the danger comes in that you can end it without renewal. Please listen. There is a possibility of ending all these things and yet diminishing.

K: Ah, no, we mean two different things by the word ending.

PJ: Ending what?

K: Ending that which is.

PJ: Ending that which is.

K: Which is my consciousness - all the thoughts that I have had, all the complexities that have been accumulated through time, the ending of that. So we will have to be clear what we mean by ending. Either you end it by deliberate act of will, or deliberate ideal, purpose, by a superior goal.

PJ: You see, Krishnaji, when actually ending happens, which is coming to a stop, the real standing still of the mind, it happens without any reason.

K: Yes. Sometimes, let's go slowly.

PJ: Sometimes it happens without reason. It is not due to any single thing. So is it that you throw yourself to chance?

K: No, no. Let's be clear first, Pupulji, what do we mean by ending. Is the ending - does the ending create its own opposite?

PJ: No.

K: Careful! We generally mean that. I end this in order to get that.

PJ: No, I am not talking of that ending.

K: So I mean by ending, the total perception of that which is, total perception of my consciousness, the whole, the complete perception of that consciousness which is insight, that insight has not a motive, a remembrance, it is immediate perception, and the ending of it is there is something beyond, which is not touched by thought. That is what I mean by ending.

PJ: Is it that the million years which you call the ancient?

K: No, that's part of the ancient brain, naturally.

PJ: Is it that the totality of that million years sees itself?

K: Yes, that's right. That's the real problem. Pupul, let's make it a little more simple, or a little more definite. Do we see the point that our consciousness has been cultivated through time? Right?

PJ: Yes, that's easy.

K: Just a minute. And any reaction to the ending of that is furthering another series of reactions. Which is, if I desire to end it, then that very desire creates another object to be gained. So is there a possibility of perceiving without the movement of the future? You understand what I am saying? The ending has no future, only ending. But if the brain says, I cannot end that way because I need a future to survive. I don't know if I am conveying it.

PJ: Yes, because inbuilt in it is the future.

K: Yes, of course. So is there an ending, the psychological demands, conflicts, ending of all that, ending without the thought of what will happen if I end? I don't know if I am conveying anything. Because, look, I can give up something if you will guarantee me something else. I will give up suffering if you will guarantee me that I will be happy with the ending of it. Or there is some extraordinary reward awaiting me. Because my whole brain is constructed as part of that consciousness, reward and punishment. Punishment is the ending, and the reward is the gaining. Now as long as these two elements exist in the brain, the future, the continuation of the present will go on, modified and so on. Right? So can these two principles, reward and punishment, end? When suffering ends the brain is not seeking a future existence in paradise.

PJ: But even if it is not seeking a future in paradise, suffering itself corrodes the brain.

K: Yes. But you see, Pupulji, this is very important to understand that the brain is seeking constantly security, it must have security. That's why tradition, remembrance, the past has extraordinary significance. Right? It needs security. The baby needs security. Our brains need security - security being food, clothes and shelter. Security is faith in god, faith in some ideal, faith in a future better society, all these are contributory causes which make the brain say, I must have deep security otherwise I can't function. Right? So physically there is no security because it is going to die, it knows it is going to die. Psychologically it has no security, actually. Am I going too fast?

PJ: No, it is not that. With all this I still say that there is one central demand.

K: Which is to survive.

PJ: No, sir.

K: What is the central demand?

PJ: The central demand is to have a mind, to have a brain which gives the flavour of a new existence.

K: Wait, wait, who demands it? Who actually wants such a brain? Not the vast majority of people. No, they say, please stay things as they are.

PJ: But we are not talking about the vast majority. I am discussing with you, or 'X' is discussing with you.

K: Let's be clear.

PJ: So it is basically that, there are many ways of getting security.

K: I question whether there is security in the sense 'we want security'.

PJ: So the brain will never understand because inbuilt in its very nature...

K: No, that's why I am saying perception is important.

PJ: Perception of what?

K: Perception of actually what is, first. Move from there slowly, slowly.

PJ: Perception of 'what is' includes the creative things it has done, the stupid things it has done, what it considers worthwhile, what it considers not worthwhile, the perception of all these and the ending of all this.

K: No, just a minute, be careful, Pupul, let's go slowly, if you don't mind. Perception of what is actually going on. Right? Both physically, outwardly, and inwardly. What is going on around me and psychologically, inwardly what is happening. That is 'what is'.

PJ: Yes.

K: Now, the question is: can 'what is' be transformed? Right? Which is my consciousness, which is part of the brain.

PJ: But in the emptying of that consciousness, an emptying of that consciousness...

K: By asking that question, is that possible? Is it possible to empty, or to wipe away the whole of the past? The past is the time, the whole of my past, the whole of the content of my consciousness is the past, which may project the future, but it still has its roots in the past. Right? Now is it possible to empty? Really this is a tremendous question, not just an ideological or intellectual question. Is it psychologically possible not to have the burden of a thousand yesterdays? The ending of that is the beginning of the new, is the new.

PJ: You used a phrase just now: is it possible not to have the burden of a thousand yesterdays. Is the problem in the burden, or in the thousand yesterdays?

K: The thousand yesterdays is the burden. You can't separate the two.

PJ: No, no.

K: How do you separate the two?

PJ: Because the thousand yesterdays is a fact.

K: Oh, you mean in that sense.

PJ: The burden is when I have given a special content to many of these experiences which I have had, but the thousand yesterdays are...

K: Just a minute. Would there be a thousand yesterdays if there was no remembrance of those thousand years of sorrow, or whatever it is, can I separate - I can separate by the calendar.

PJ: Yes you can, sir. You can separate a thousand yesterdays from the burden of the thousand yesterdays.

K: Show me how. Let's be clear first what we mean. When we say a thousand yesterdays, by the encyclopedia, or by a calendar, I can say Egypt was...

PJ: No, but let us take one's own life.

K: One's own life, which is forty, fifty or eighty, ninety, or whatever it is, or twenty.

PJ: Now you can separate the thousand yesterdays of one's own life from the pain, sorrow, burdens, all that which is the burden of the thousand yesterdays.

K: Yes.

PJ: So you can cut away the...

K: The what?

PJ: The pain and the sorrow.

K: Can you?

PJ: Why not?

K: What do you mean 'cut away'?

PJ: Perceive. You just now said it.

K: But it is not a cutting away in the sense - you see cutting away implies two parts.

PJ: You see this is where the difficulty comes in. Can I cut away the fact of my thirty years, fifty, sixty years? I can't do that.

My body is sixty five years old.

K: I know we said that. I can't commit suicide. I have lived eighty seven years - am I eighty seven, or eighty eight - I have lived eighty seven years, of course it exists, but I am talking about the remembrances, of course, that I am talking about. I am saying a thousand yesterdays exist.

PJ: They can be cut away. You can divided.

K: Ah, I can't divide. My body has not existed for a thousand yesterdays. I mean thousand yesterdays in the sense...

PJ: You are talking of the ancient mind of man.

K: I can't cut it away. This whole brain, and all the material processes of the organism is part of it.

PJ: Then what do I do with the ancient mind? Sir, one has understood what one has to do with the superficial yesterdays, with the burden of the superficial yesterdays.

K: Do you know what that means? Have I really wiped, or ended a thousand yesterdays, with all its superficialities, its pettiness, its narrowness, its brutalities, cruelty, and ambition and so on, which are all superficial, can I wipe all that away, can that all end? I can say, I can cut away - but which is the knife, which is the entity that is cutting it? It is part of that.

PJ: No, but I am not cutting away one pain.

K: I am cutting away the whole thing.

PJ: If I were to discriminate and say, "I will cut away this, and not this".

K: No, that is too silly.

PJ: But when I say I am cutting away, I am cutting away the whole burden.

K: Now wait a minute, Pupilji, I understand. Don't say "I cutting away".

PJ: I am not cutting away.

K: Let's be clear on that.

PJ: Let's cut, remove the 'I'.

K: You see I do object - if you don't mind, cutting away doesn't mean - you see when you cut something there are two parts.

PJ: Yes, what I am trying to get at is - you see this is where a lot of confusion takes place.

K: Verbal confusion takes place, semantic.

PJ: You cannot cut away the eighty seven years, or the sixty five years, the sixty six years.

K: Of course not. You are not eighty seven.

PJ: I am sixty six. But you can cut away - cut, that word is wrong.

K: Don't use that word.

PJ: You were using the word, the seeing of 'what is'.

K: The ending of 'what is', that is totally different.

PJ: Why do you want to draw a distinction between the ending of 'what is' and cutting away?

K: Ending, to me, means there is no continuation of something that has been.

PJ: What is in cutting away?

K: Cutting away implies - you know, when I cut a piece of wood there are two parts of the same thing.

PJ: Well I think it is a semantic thing.

K: Semantic. But I am asking: is it first of all possible to completely end the whole content of my consciousness, of human consciousness which has grown through millenia. And that content is all this confusion, vulgarity, coarseness, pettiness, triviality of a stupid life.

PJ: But it is also the goodness.

K: Oh yes. Now wait a minute. Goodness is something entirely different. Goodness has no opposite. Goodness is not the outcome of that which is not good. The ending of that which is not good is goodness. That's a different matter.

Now is it possible to end all this conflict? If there is no ending to conflict, conflict can be modified but...

PJ: There is an ending to conflict.

K: Why do you say that?

PJ: There is an ending to conflict.

K: Is there? Or a forgetfulness of that which has caused conflict, or really end it.

PJ: Do you mean to say, sir, the very fact of the ending of conflict is the birth of the new?

K: Yes. You understand the implications of conflict, the depth of it, not the superficiality that I am no longer British, or French, or I don't belong to this country, or to that country, or that religion, or that race. Those are all very superficial. I am talking of the deep embedded things.

PJ: You are talking of conflict as separation from another, the sense of separateness.

K: That is the real thing. Isolation, which inevitably breeds conflict. Is that possible? What does it mean? There is no conflict. Now wait a minute. Problems may arise but those problems are dealt with immediately, ended. Problem means conflict.

PJ: Why should problems arise?

K: The word, the common usage in the dictionary, is that a problem is something thrown at you, which is a challenge. Problem means that. Something you have to face. We resolve the problem intellectually, or physically and so on and so on, which is still creating further problems. Like the politicians, that is what they are doing: you conquer, and the result of that conquering is some other factor which is another series of problems. You keep this problem going all the time. I am saying there is no problem. Physically or psychologically there is no problem; if I can't live at Brockwood for a few months, all right, I won't live at Brockwood, if nobody feeds me, all right - you follow. There is no problem. If a new thing arises, either my brain is incapable of solving it and therefore it becomes a problem.

PJ: You mean to say, sir, for the birth of the new...

K: That's it, you are getting it. And therefore the birth of the new is the most ancient.

PJ: Can we go into that? Would you say a little about it?

K: After all that is the ground beyond which there is no other ground. That is the origin beyond which there is no other origin.

You see, Pupulji, this is really a problem, not a problem, this is really a question whether the brain can ever be free from its own bondage. After all ending something is not total freedom. Right? I can end, say for example, my hurts, I can end it very simply. But the images that I have created about myself, those images get hurt, and the maker of the images is the problem. So it leads more and more to something else, which is: to live a life without a single image, and therefore there is no hurt and no fear, and if there is no fear there is no sense of safety, god, comfort and all the rest of it.

Would you say the most ancient, of which - no I won't even say that - which is the origin of all life? It must be ancient of ancient, beyond all thought of old or new. That is the origin of all life. When the mind which includes the brain, when that mind reaches that point of that ground, which is totally original, new, uncontaminated, is that possible? Meditation has been one of the means to reach it. Silencing the mind has been the way that one hopes will help, will bring about that coming to it. You see we are all making efforts to come to it. That's what I am saying. It requires no effort. The very word effort means conflict. You see that which has no conflict cannot be approached through conflict. Of course not.

PJ: In this sense, does it really mean that there is no partial approach at all in your teachings?

K: Impossible. How can there be? If I approach it through various parts, which the Hindus have discovered, Karma Yoga and all the rest of it, it is just partial. You can't approach it.

PJ: What do you do? You are an ordinary human being.

K: No, you can't do anything. First of all, you can't do anything. You can only do physical activities. Psychologically you cannot do anything.

PJ: What do you mean by physical activities?

K: Creating a garden, building houses, technological.

PJ: But the physical is going on.

K: It is going on.

PJ: So what does one do?

K: But if there are no psychological fears there will be no division of countries and so on and so on. There would be no division. You follow?

PJ: Yes, but the fact is that there is psychological fear.

K: That's just it. Therefore you will never get a brain which has lived in psychological isolation, which means conflict, that can never possibly come to that ground, that ground which is the origin of all life. Obviously not. How can my petty mind, worrying about my beastly little self come to it?

PJ: That is more futile, sir, the whole of life is more futile if after doing everything you haven't taken the first step. Then where are you?

K: What is the first step? Just a minute, go into it, what is the first step?

PJ: I would say the first step is seeing whatever is.

K: Seeing 'what is'. Wait a bit. How do you see it, how do you approach it? On that depends the totality of 'what is', or only you see the partiality of 'what is'. If you see the totality of 'what is', finished.

PJ: It doesn't just work like that.

K: Of course not. Because our minds, our thoughts are fragmented, therefore I will approach the life, or 'what is' actually with my fragmented mind, fragmented brain which has broken up.

PJ: And again with time the fragmented gets less. Don't jump on me.

K: I know what you are going to say.

PJ: With time the fragmented gets less. And it is possible to listen to you, for the mind to be still, not to make any movements, not to make any effort, but that is still not the first step.

K: No. When you say, please you used the words, the first step to observe, or to perceive 'what is'. Right? That's what you said. If I perceive it partially, then you know, that leads to further complications. Right? Partial perception creates partial problems. Right? Now is it possible to see the whole complex of 'what is'? To see the whole and not the fragment. That means - wait a minute - I have to see if I lead a fragmented life, a life of fragmentation. That is where I would begin. Because if I approach life, which is my consciousness, which is the way of thought, feeling, actions and all that, if I approach it fragmentarily then I am lost. That's what is happening in the world. They are totally lost. Those people who govern us, those people who tell us what is right or wrong, and all the rest of it. Is it possible to look at life as a whole without fragmentation?

PJ: Why doesn't the ancient mind see this?

K: It can't, it won't. How can total complete order?

PJ: But you said that ancient...

K: Just a minute, that is the ancient, the original ground is the most ancient.

PJ: No, that is there.

K: No, no.

PJ: What do you mean, no?

K: Unless it is there as an idea, which is what all people have maintained. God is there. That is just an idea, a concept, a projection of our own desire to be comfortable, to be happy, to be - all the rest of it. Can I live a life, can a human being live a life in which there is no fragmentary action? If somebody says, "Where am I to begin?", I would say, begin there, find out for yourself if you lead a fragmentary life. You know what a fragmentary life is - saying one thing and doing another, the whole fragmented way of living, which is isolation, and therefore I have no relationship with my wife, or with the rest of humanity. So begin there. You know what that means? What tremendous enquiry you have to make to find out.

PJ: What is enquiry?

K: Observation. To observe very clearly without any bias, without any direction, without any motive, how my life is fragmented. Just to observe it. Not say, I am fragmented, therefore I must be whole. The idea of becoming whole is another fragmentation. So the implications of observing the way of fragmentation. Which means thought itself is a fragment. Right? And that is the cause of fragmentation. I am becoming something different from you.

PJ: So the birth of the new...

K: ...is not possible unless you have this. Obviously. We had better stop.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 28TH AUGUST 1982

I hope you are not as nervous as I am! Each time that one talks and goes through all this nervousness, apprehension, one doesn't quite know what one is going to say, at least I don't.

I think one should be aware of what is happening in the world, and not be depressed by it, or optimistic or pessimistic, but to observe impartially, dispassionately what is actually going on. Technologically the Far East is gaining more and more rapidly, advancing more than the Western cultures, probably. And the economic situation right throughout the world is very shaky, uncertain. Socially there is a great deal of confusion, uncertainty. And religions throughout the world have played very little part in our daily life, they have lost actually their meaning altogether, though the organization, the religious organizations maintain status quo, talking about superficial things, not the fundamental realities of life. And what is going to happen to man in the future, to all of us and our grandchildren, or whatever they are, what is going to take place?

One has to look at all this very carefully, not draw any conclusion either Left or Right, or Centre, politically, or in any way take sides, not be committed to any political, religious body but be concerned with what is happening to man. We are preparing for war, armaments are being sold by industrial countries all over the world, their economy depends on it. And killing man seems to be fashionable, seems to be heroic, they are praised, their names are put in cathedrals, and apparently killing other human beings in the name of religion, patriotism, country, has become all important. Nations are divided - the British, the French, the American, the Russian, the Indian, Japanese and so on. There is an economic war between them all, not only physical war but economic and other forms of destructive attitude towards life. These are obviously, for any thinking man, these are the facts. And when one observes all this one asks what a human being, like you and me, what can we do in this world? This becomes a rather serious question. Some of us join some other group, commune, or follow some leader, putting on different kinds of robes and so on, which doesn't really fundamentally affect the whole movement that is going on in the world towards destruction, towards war, in which the human existence has very little value. And when one asks: what am I to do, facing all this? And we must ask this question together. We must think this out together, not accept what the speaker says, but together, you and the speaker. And asking this question: what are we to do in this mad world which is becoming more and more insane, more and more violent, appalling things are happening of which we don't know - chemical warfare, biological warfare, nitrogen bombs and neutron bombs. The scientists are preparing all this. If one country invents something more than the other, the other competes with the other. Scientists are maintaining all this. And the philosophers are merely spinning a lot of words.

Now what shall we, as human beings, living in this world, with our families, our children, what is our action, what is our responsibility? Just to turn our back on it? Retreat into some monastery? Into some ideological conclusions? Inventing new ideologies? - none of these have solved our human problem confronting this frightening state, dangerous world in which we are living.

So please you are not just listening to the speaker expecting to find out what his answer is to all this, what his activity is, his responsibility, but that is a wrong question, if one may point out. It is: what is our responsibility? - not the speaker's responsibility only. It is what is the responsibility of each one of us. And the world is aflame, burning, thousands are suffering in the name of the country, patriotism, and all that nonsense that is going on in the world. So we ought to, during these few talks here and questions, we ought to think together over this matter. Together, not being committed to anything, to no group, to no politics, to no religion, to no country, and together find out what we, as human beings living in this dreadful world, what is our responsibility, what is our natural response to all this horror going on?

First of all, all human beings throughout the world, East, West, or Middle East, are going through a great many difficulties, a great many problems, starvation, overpopulation, bad governments, governments committed to their own particular ideologies, governments and the people who rule us are mad about power, position, prestige, helping the terrorists by selling armaments. The other day one heard on the television 80% of the armaments this country produces are sent abroad and 20% are kept for their own self-defence. This is happening right throughout the world. And human beings have suffered endlessly for millenia upon millenia, and they have found no answer to all this. And more and more we are becoming dependent on outward environmental control, trying to find answers in outward activities, through governments, through special laws and so on and so on. All outward, peripheral activities. And apparently the answer doesn't lie there, neither in politics, nor in separate nationalities, nor in various religious organizations, sectarianism. There is no answer there at all. But we are always seeking answers for fundamental human disturbance in the outward symptoms. We are trying to deal with superficial symptoms without going very, very deeply into why human beings throughout the world are behaving as they are, callous, indifferent, totally concerned with themselves.

Please bear in mind that we are thinking together, not merely listening to the speaker, but be concerned with our responsibility, with our activity of our minds and our hearts about all this.

First we ought to look, I think, at the consciousness of mankind. Why this consciousness, which we are, why it has become what it is. Each one of us thinking that our consciousness is ours, our particular inheritance, our particular evolution. It belongs to each one of us, and we are confined to that limitation. This is what each one of us thinks, it is our consciousness, each one with our particular isolated consciousness. Right? That is a fact. Each one thinks what you are is that you are special, inherited results, yours. Now we are going to question that. Is that yours? Is it your consciousness? Or the consciousness of all humanity, of which you are. That is all human beings throughout the world, wherever they live, under whatever climate, whatever government, religion, they go through great fears, anxieties, sorrow, misery, some vague happiness. This is the common lot of every human being. Right? Of every human being. Even though they may be highly placed, living in great houses, or in a hut in poverty, mankind goes through this. So there is the common consciousness of which we are. So it is not your consciousness. You suffer, you are uncertain, great anxiety, loneliness, depression, seeking something beyond all this, calling it god, outside agency, and so on and so on. Every human being - please do realize this, not a verbal association or verbal comprehension, or some intellectual conclusion but an actuality, a reality that we, each one of us, is the rest of mankind. Please this must be really grasped because from that we are going to find out what to do then. If we are not clear on this point - clear in the sense not verbally or intellectually but in our feeling, in our hearts, in our depth of our being, in our blood - that every human being whether they live in the Totalitarian states or in the so-called Democratic world, Capitalist or the other, Left or Right, Indian, Japanese, black, white, purple, whatever the race and religion, every human being goes through this, as each one of us does, having tears, laughter, worshipping something that thought has invented. This is the ground on which all human beings stand. You cannot possibly refute it. Logically, intellectually, if you will, this is a fact, though on the periphery, on the outside you may be more educated, living in an affluent society, better hygiene, better fed, perhaps a little better government, it is all the peripheral activity. But deeply, fundamentally, each one of us is the whole of mankind. Right? Do we actually comprehend this? Or our brains refuse to accept such an idea, refuse to see the fact because we are so conditioned that my life is mine, my consciousness, my thoughts, my activity for which I am solely responsible. Your brain refuses to face this enormous reality that we, as human beings, are the rest of mankind.

We can endlessly discuss this, pros and cons. We can endlessly analyse whether we are separate from all other human beings, consciously, in our consciousness. You may be tall, you may be short, you may be pale, you may be white or semi white, or brown, black and so on, those are all peripheral, outside activities. But deep inward states we are like the rest of mankind, so you are the mankind. You are the rest of humanity. Right? Please one has to be industrious with regard to this. Work it out so that when this is absolutely irrevocably clear then we can proceed to enquire what we human beings can do.

When we ask that question: what we can do? We are still thinking what I can do. You understand? We are not thinking as a total human being. We are thinking as isolated entities asking this question: what I can do? Right? Which is a wrong question because we are still concerned with ourselves as a separate isolated human being. Of course we are isolated, you are different from me, you are tall, I am short, I am brown, you are white or black, or whatever it is. But when you shift the superficialities of all this, and when you delve deeply in oneself, into oneself which is our consciousness, then you begin to discover that you are like the man next door, or very far away, going through various agonies, depressions and anxieties, loneliness and sorrow.

Very few of us ask such questions. We are all so highly educated as individuals, separate, isolated from each other, as countries are divided. And so when we ask what to do, we are asking as an Englishman, British, French, belonging to certain government, or belonging to certain groups and so on. But we never comprehend deeply the reality that basically we are all one. Can we move from there? Not - we can move, talk about other things very easily but if this ground is not actual on which we can stand firmly, nothing can shake us from that, then we can find out what is our responsibility as a whole human being, not as an isolated human being. We are going to go into it more and more as we go along. We are thinking together about these matters. Please the speaker must insist on this. The speaker is anonymous, he has no authority, he, as a person, he doesn't exist. He is merely, observing, we are both observing together what is happening. So please don't pay any attention, or give any importance to personality. It is like a telephone, you don't respect the telephone, put garlands round it, worship it. You listen to what it has to say. The telephone may be black, white - they have many colours nowadays! But when you give it importance it becomes too absurd and childish.

So we can proceed. Technologically - please understand this question, I am going to go into it - technologically man has turned his mind towards perfecting more and more technology - computers, armaments. So technology is moving more and more to the East, to the Far East. That is, man has given importance to technology: better instruments of war, better communication, better means of killing another human being and so on. I won't go into all that - we probably all know about it. So man has given time, energy, money, his capacities towards that, improvement of technology. Please see this, what is happening in the world. So his consciousness has moved towards greater technology - right? He has given his thought, his energy in that direction. So our brains are becoming more and more technologically minded, gadgets. Please we are not saying that you shouldn't have that, we are saying that is inevitable, that is what is happening. And man has given very little time, energy, thought in any other direction. He doesn't say: "I am going to find out for myself what I am, why I behave like this. What is beyond all this?" We haven't given a thought to it. You understand the two? That is man has given enormous time and energy towards the conquering of environments, which is the sky, heaven, and the world. And we have not given that equal energy or time or vitality to enquire within ourselves, what we are, why you behave like this, is there anything ultimate, is there any existence without cause? Which is the enquiry of something far greater than all technology, all human thought. You understand? You see the picture? Technology is invading our whole consciousness and we are not giving enough energy and time to the other. And if there are a few who do they are submerged by the other. Please see the actuality of all this. I hope this is all clear, that we are all understanding each other in what we have been saying.

One may give energy, time, to the enquiry of that which is material, and that which is far beyond all material explanations, if there is something eternal, beyond all sorrow. Very few of us give time to it. And when we do, perhaps one or two here and there, then the other world submerges it. So if more, if all of us who are listening here give time, energy to the enquiry of something beyond all this, then we are adding to that consciousness something which is not the technological world at all. Do you understand? Am I making this clear.

Suppose you give your time, energy, your capacities, to real enquiry, not accepting, belief, and all that childish stuff, but deeply enquiring. Enquiry is different from analysis. Enquiry is to observe and pursue that observation. So when one human being does this you may add to the whole human consciousness a certain quality to it. And that quality is soon destroyed, or submerged, or diminished by the other. But if there are a thousand people who are concerned with this, not forming a group and all that kind of silly stuff, but actually giving your whole life to this, then you are adding to that consciousness, to the human consciousness a quality of something beyond all words, beyond all thought, beyond all conclusions, something eternal. You understand?

So if this is clear then we can ask: what are we to do? Not before. It merely then becomes a superficial activity. If each one of us said to ourselves, because that is an obvious fact: the world is now becoming technologically minded, I don't know if you are aware of all this - Japan is becoming the centre of know-how, the centre of technology. The Japanese government is investing billions and billions and billions of money to investigate into computers. They have already almost conquered the West by their cars, by their watches, by their cameras, by their gramophones, everything. Other far Asiatic countries are pursuing them, are cultivating this. And not in opposition, not as a reaction to that, but man cannot live on technology alone, and its products, one has to go into something that is immeasurable. So if all of us who listen to all this give time and energy to this enquiry then that very enquiry will answer that question: what am I to do? Right? So we are going together to find out how to enquire, how to observe.

First of all to observe is not to analyse. When you observe a flower you see the beauty, the quality, the colour, the perfume, the untouchable beauty of it. And after that you can analyse it. You can look at the plant, tear it to pieces if you want to, I hope you won't tear it and then look at it. Analysis is a dead process. Observation is not. Analysis implies the analyser and the analysed. The analyser thinks he is separate from that which he analyses. This is the whole psychology that the analyser is separate from the analysed - right? It is not a fact. The analyser is also the result of the past, his memories, his experiences, his knowledge and that which he observes he thinks he is separate - right? I will make it much simpler.

I am envious, envy involves jealousy, comparison, imitation, conformity. And I am envious, it gives me pleasure in fulfilling my desire. And you come and say, "Look, envy is an ugly thing, it is really quite destructive." So in me there is immediately the analyser saying, "The envy is different from me. I am going to control it, I am going to shape it. I am going to mould it. I am going to put it away - or keep it." But when you examine it more closely the analyser is the analysed, envy is part of me, I am not differing from envy - right? Anger is not different from me, I am anger. But my conditioning has been that my anger is different from me, because then I can control it, then I can shape it, then I can rationalize it, give a dozen explanations as to why I am angry. But anger, envy and so on, is part of me, I am anger. You see when there is a division between the analyser and the analysed there is conflict. There is struggle, there is pain, there is every form of substitution, transcending it and so on, but when the analyser is the analysed the whole problem undergoes a radical change because there is no conflict. Then you are really observing. Are we getting clearer between ourselves?

Please don't look so solemn. Is this clear for ourselves? Because we have lived with conflict, all our relationships bring about conflict, from childhood we live with conflict - the more, the better. This measurement, which is the space between 'what is' and 'what should be', this is the measurement, which is time, is bringing about great conflict in us. I am this, but I will be that. Either in the business world or in the artistic world, or in our daily life. This conflict we accept, we say that is normal, healthy, it brings about progress, all that, bla, bla, bla! But if you are enquiring into whether the brain, whether the mind can be free from conflict then you have to go into this question: whether the observer, the analyser, is entirely different from the analysed. Or the analyser is the analysed and therefore the ending of conflict. And therefore observing what takes place when there is no conflict. Because if I am envy, I am envy, I don't say, "I should not" or "I am" but I observe the movement of envy - right? Observe without any pressure, without any future to that which is being observed. This requires a great deal of attention, a great deal of energy to look so clearly. Then the whole conditioning of man who has accepted conflict as the way of life disappears completely.

Human beings in the world in which they have lived for so many million years, not four thousand, five hundred years ago. Not the fundamentalist's idea which is rather absurd, they have lived for so many, many years, centuries upon centuries, they have accepted conflict, they have accepted hate, they have accepted to wound each other, kill each other and when one realizes that our consciousness is not mine, my thinking is not mine, thinking is common to all mankind whether they are poor, uneducated, completely ignorant and superstitious, they think. Or the great scientists, they think. Thinking is not yours or mine, it is thinking. And one begins then to discover that observation is far more acute, direct, has a quality of decision, not analysing, tearing everything to pieces to find out why we act this way and go back to your grandmother, or your mother or your father. That whole business - I hope there aren't any psychologists here - is rather immature. Please, we have discussed this matter with many psychologists. So if there are any psychologists here please don't get hurt. Just look, listen, observe what we are saying, we may be totally wrong, subject to all your correction, but enquire, look at it. Where there is observation there is no analysis. Just to observe as you observe a beautiful mountain, you cannot alter it, its grandeur, its majesty, its great beauty. Just to observe it. In observation there is beauty.

So with such quality of observation we are going to look. Not what I think is observation, but together to observe? You understand? Are we together in this a little bit? To observe, say for example, the hate that is spreading throughout the world, one human being wanting to hurt another by a gesture, by a word, by a look, by something that you are right or say hate. It is spreading throughout the world. The poor man who has hardly anything to eat in the East hates when you go by in your car, have clean clothes - you understand all this? And see what the recent wars in this country and other parts of the world are doing, they are cultivating hate in the name of god, in the name of country and all that, patriotism and all that childish stuff. So observe this hate. Do we hate anybody? It is rather an odd question to ask but we are going to go into all this. Do we hate somebody? Because if somebody you hate for various reasons, he may have hurt you psychologically. Anger is part of hate. When you observe, not analyse, this hate, why human beings have cultivated diligently this hate through wars, can one, in oneself can one honestly, without any sense of hypocrisy, dishonesty, say, "I have observed my hate for another" and it is in observation which is like a flame of attention it wipes away that hate.

And most of us from childhood are hurt, wounded by parents, by teachers, being hurt through comparison, better marks, better - you know the whole business of modern education. You are getting hurt. And to observe that wound, or many wounds - there are not many wounds, there is only one wound, one hurt, that is, hurt. You may be hurt by this person, or that person, for this reason or for that reason, but the hurt is the same. Can you look at that hurt, observe it, not try to transcend it, go beyond it, all the rest of it. Because when you observe the hurt you will see all the consequences of that hurt. It is a wound that is continuous, though it may be submerged, it is continuous, it is producing various results, results of isolation, fear and so gradually resistance and further isolation.

So when you observe very closely this hurt, which is to observe, to give your total attention to that observation, it is like fire that burns out, that cleanses the wound. So we are proceeding still further into the enquiry of observation. Which is to observe our relationship with each other. Observe our relationship whether intimate or not. What actually is our relationship? Is it of dependence, is it that I need somebody to fulfil my desires, to escape from my loneliness, to biologically, sexually to appease my demands? Please you are enquiring - I am not enquiring. We are together enquiring, please don't say I am enquiring and you'll just listen to me. You are enquiring into your relationship. You may not want to, that is a different matter. You can shut your ears or leave the tent, the marquee, but since you are you have to listen to it willy nilly.

So what is your relationship? Just to observe the quality of that relationship. Is it attachment? An escape from loneliness? A sense of dependency? So is your relationship - please listen to this for a minute, if you are interested, has your relationship a cause? You understand my question? Has it a motive? If there is a cause, cause means a pressure, a motive which is a movement of intention, conscious or not, that which has a cause must inevitably end. You understand? If I have a cause to love you - think of the horror of that - if I have a cause to love you because you are sitting in a large audience and it gives me pleasure which is my cause, my motive, then the consequences of that are ugly. So I depend on you. And where there is dependence there is fear. So I am discovering where there is a cause there must be an ending. If I have a cause in my relationship with my wife, my husband, with my children, cause, then that relationship must create conflict inevitably. And there is always an escape from that conflict - god, football, psychologists and so on and so on, and so on, divorce, you know the whole process of it. So when you look at one's relationship, it is as it is now, except on rare occasions, a form of self exploitation of each other and in that there is great ugliness and brutality and violence and quarrels and all that is the relationship which most of you know.

So can one observe this fact? We have analysed it briefly, we can go into it much more deeply but can one observe this extraordinary fact of self, of dependency, attachment? So one asks: is attachment love? Is love possession? - my wife, my girl, my husband - attachment. Is that love? If that is love then it has a cause - right? Because I depend on you because you satisfy me, gratify me and therefore where there is a cause our relationship must inevitably end up in conflict. So has love a cause? You understand my question? Please ask these questions.

So one has to observe closely the nature of relationship and love. Love has now become - you know what it has become, sex, pleasure, a form of entertainment. And where there is the cause to love, love has gone. So can human beings - please ask this question - can human beings live without a cause? Not a political cause or some other cause, I am not talking of such causes. To live in one's life, in one's daily life without a single cause. Is that at all possible? Or we are so conditioned that as we have lived for thousands of years on causation and its effect, it is very difficult to observe a life without causation. You understand the implications of that question?

If the speaker comes here and talks because he has got a motive, propaganda, fame, notoriety, bigger audiences and therefore gratifying to the speaker, all that business, then the speaker has a cause. And then what takes place? He is in a terrible pickle! He then depends on you. He wants your flattery, your criticism, you know, all that. He doesn't want your criticism, he wants your flattery, he is dependent, attached, and so he is perpetually in a state of anxiety and therefore he is a monster, he is exploiting you.

Then we may ask: why is he speaking, what is the cause? There is no cause. Find out what it means to live without a single cause because love has no cause - right?

So we have examined, observed hate in the world, perpetuating, governments are perpetuating it, human beings are perpetuating it. When I say "I am British" I am perpetuating hatred because British means, or French or German, or whatever it is, a process of isolation. Where there is isolation there must be conflict. I go and kill somebody, organized murder. And we looked at the wounds that one has received from childhood. To observe it so that it is totally cleansed, wiped away, which means to be vulnerable, which means to be sensitive. A sensitive person is not wounded, he is sensitive. Right? Because then a sensitive person is attentive, watchful. And when there is attention there is no space for getting hurt. And also we looked at, observed, relationship, which is very important in our life. We cannot possibly live without relationship. You may go off into the mountains by yourself but you are related. Related means you are carrying all the tears of the world, the laughter, the pain, the anxiety, the loneliness is there. You may physically wander off but you are carrying all that weight on your shoulders. As relationship is extraordinarily important, we live by relationship. We cannot possibly escape of relationship, but we dictate what that relationship should be. And so we get caught, we kill each other in our relationships. So one has to enquire very, very deeply, the nature of relationship and love. Where there is a cause there is an ending, a conflict, a brutality in that relationship. So one has to find out what love is. If it has a cause, "I love you because..." Good god! Then it is a trade. And to find out much more is to find out, to live without a cause. You understand what the implication for that is? There is no ending to such a life, such a way of living. Right, we had better stop now.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 29TH AUGUST 1982

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday?
Before we go into that may the speaker remind you this is not a weekend entertainment. You are not here just to be amused, or intellectually excited about it. This is in no way a form of entertainment. We are rather serious and I hope you are also serious.

We were saying yesterday that human consciousness, that is what we are, not superficially but deeply, is a common ground upon which we all stand. Our consciousness is more or less similar to the whole of mankind. Wherever you go there is always sorrow, anxiety, uncertainty, great sense of deprivation, a pursuit of pleasure and the endless pain of thousands of years of tears. This is the common lot of all human beings, whether they live in different climates, whether they live in China or in Russia, or in America, or in different parts of the world, this is the common lot of all human beings. And this is the consciousness, with its content, of all individuals who think they are separate, but they are similar to all mankind. I think this is irrefutable, both logically, intellectually and factually, this is so. It is not a dogmatic statement but when one closely observes what human beings are actually, not ideologically, not in phantasy, or romantically, but actually: each one of us suffers, each one of us is in a great deal of trouble, in sorrow. We are uncertain, insecure, frustrated, wounded, and wherever you go this is so with all human beings. Though superficially they are divided by nationalities, by different cultural religious differences, but those are outward coatings of an inward travail, inward agony, pleasure, joy and so on. So when you consider this carefully, what place have individuals in it at all? We are conditioned to individuality, we are conditioned to think that we are separate from another. We have separate souls, whatever that may mean. We must succeed separately. So is that mere conditioning, or is it an illusion, or it is something that superficially - because we are different superficially, you are tall, I am short, or I am black and you are brown and so on and so on - superficially we may be different at the peripheral level, but that does not constitute individuality. You may have a different capacity from another. I may be an artist and you may be a politician, those are outward dressings, outward coatings. And we take the outward effects, outward appearance as individual.

As we said yesterday, we are not merely listening to the speaker but we are thinking together over this matter. The speaker is not laying down any dogmatic statement. We are questioning, we are enquiring, and doubt, scepticism, is part of this enquiry. Not only doubt what one thinks, doubt one's beliefs, one's conclusions, not merely doubt what the speaker says, that would be quite easy, and it becomes rather superficial, but to doubt one's own behaviour, the way one lives, the whole religious structure, to doubt it, question it; to doubt all nationalities, why we kill human beings who are like us; why we tolerate wars and so on. Scepticism has a place in our enquiry. And we are enquiring together, not the speaker is enquiring and then you follow him. Or you say it is absurd and move away from it. But rather we are together going into this matter. It is not a one-sided affair. So if that is very clear that we are together enquiring into the question: what has happened to man who is supposed to have evolved through millions of years? And through that evolution, through that time, period, we have more or less remained as barbarous as before, killing each other, constantly in conflict, divided religions and so on.

So as we said yesterday, our consciousness, which is what we are, is the consciousness of mankind. And we are concerned whether that consciousness with all its content, the beliefs, the conclusions, the faiths, the acceptance, the fears, the pleasures, the agony, the loneliness, the despair, sorrow and the constant enquiry if there is something more beyond all this, is the content of our consciousness. This is what we are. And thought, as we said, is not individual thought. Thought is common to all mankind. So again very obvious. And thought has created all this world in which we live. Not nature, not the tiger fortunately, not the lovely trees or the mountains, but the society in which we live, thought has created all that. And having created it then thought tries to solve the problems involved in that society, of which we are. We are society, society is not different from us. What we are, the society is. If you are ambitious, greedy, envious, competitive, violent, you create a society which is what we make of it. So as one observes, these are all obvious facts if one has looked into it. And I hope - one hopes that you are doing this, not accepting what the speaker is saying but enquiring together into this very serious matter. And this is not a weekend seriousness, for a few days, for this morning, for an hour or so you are a bit serious and then forget all about it, back into the routine, into the tradition, into the habit. It is a mechanical process of living. We are enquiring together why human beings, you and those people who live miles and thousands of miles away, have made society as it is, and whether it is possible to bring about a radical change in that society, which means a radical change in ourselves because we are society. The world is not different from us. We have made this world. Unless our world, which is the world which is within us, in the psychological area, if that world is not transformed we will go on killing each other in the name of god, in the name of religions, for patriotic reasons. And all that indicates we are thinking in terms of isolation - the British, the French, the Tibetans and so on - thinking in isolation, and hoping to find security both physically and psychologically in this isolation, trying to find security. There can be no security in isolation. It is so obvious. There can be no security in religious isolation. There is no security in Communism because they are isolated. There is no security when we think we are separate from the rest of mankind. Isolation is a very complex problem because we are all conditioned to live and function in isolation. That is our tradition, that is our culture. If you are an artist, you are an artist separate from everybody else, a business man, or the priest, separate. And religions throughout the world are cultivating this separatism. This is a very serious matter, please do pay attention to this because things in the world are getting worse and worse. People are preparing for war. This is not a threat by me but it is there. And we human beings are caught up in it.

The politicians will not listen to any of this because they cultivate isolation, because the vast majority of people in the world think and believe, have faith, that when there is separate nationalities there will be peace. When history has proved there is no peace in isolation, and yet we carry on. We have had a war in this country. There is war going on in different parts of the world because everybody ideologically, nationally and individually are working for themselves, thinking in terms of security in isolation. And, as we said yesterday, to observe this fact, this reality, to perceive it, not emotionally, not as an intellectual concept but as an actuality, a burning reality, that as long as we are thinking in terms of isolation there must be conflict. Conflict in our relationship, as we pointed out yesterday. And this isolation brings about hatred. This isolation brings with it this sense of separate entity who must work for himself, cultivate his selfishness, pursue his own trade, his own capacity. That is what the scientists are doing. The scientists, they are interested in one or two things, really great scientists are concerned with matter, what is beyond matter, but those who are employed by the government, the scientists are maintaining war, as the priests throughout the world are maintaining war - right? These are all facts.

So as we said yesterday, to perceive these facts is not to analyse the fact. That which one observes, to observe. And we went into that question briefly yesterday: what does it mean to observe? Observe what is happening out there, outside of our skin, the society, the world as it is, where technology is advancing so rapidly, it is almost destroying the human brain. And the East, as we pointed out yesterday, that is the Far East is now going to be completely mechanized, technologically advancing far more than any other country, as you know, Japan's cars, radios, televisions and all the rest of it. And the brain has been occupied mostly with that. And now if we do not wisely, carefully, intelligently observe the deeper quality of the brain, the deeper quality of human beings then the brain will naturally deteriorate, as it is deteriorating now. The brain has got infinite capacity but it is limited now as we live. It is limited by our desire to fulfil as an individual, it is limited by the travail, the agony, the despairs, the loneliness, the terrible state human beings live in, all that, by all those activities the brain is limited. When that limitation is broken down it has got infinite capacity - right? And we are enquiring into that, whether it is possible to break down, to be free from this conditioning of, as we said, from hate, because human beings hate each others, you may not hate your neighbour but you hate anybody who interferes with your particular ideas; or you tolerate them, which is the same form.

And we went into the question also of human beings being wounded psychologically. To observe that wound and not carry on and on for the rest of one's life. See the consequences of being hurt psychologically, what it breeds, loneliness, resistance, more fear. To observe it. And observation is like a flame which is attention, and with that capacity of observation the wound, the feeling of hurt, the hate, all that is burnt away, gone, if you observe attentively?

And also we talked yesterday about relationship, human relationship, intimate and not intimate. How we are in constant conflict with each other in our relationship, man, woman. I am sure we know all this. But we tolerate this conflict. We have put up with it, we are educated to accept conflict. And conflict you can say is necessary, a form of progress. So where there is conflict there cannot be love. We talked about it briefly yesterday also. Conflict has a cause and has love a cause? If I love you because you give me food, sex, comfort, dependence, I feel attached to you for various reasons - economic, social, health - is that love? Please we are asking this question - the speaker may ask it but you have to ask this of yourself. Has love a cause? The two words are contradictory because our present so-called love has a cause and therefore in it there is always the seed of conflict. So what has a cause can end, an effect can end.

And we ought to talk over together this morning, there are so many other things involved, like fear, pleasure, loneliness, whether sorrow can ever end. You know man has never understood, or finished, ended sorrow. After millions of years he is still living with sorrow and fear, pursuing something which he thinks is real, true and he is always disappointed, and to achieve that reality, that truth, he must travail, and thinks conflict is necessary to achieve that which is beyond all time. So we are trained, we are educated, it is our habit, our tradition to struggle, to live in conflict. Conflict is not only personal but the conflict with other people, with other nations. We are asking what is the root, the cause, of this conflict? Please you are asking this question with me. Please don't wait for an answer from the speaker. We are both together examining the cause of this endless conflict between human beings: conflict of religion, conflict of nationalities, the destruction of human beings who believe in something different from you, the conflict of ideologies, conclusions. Can this conflict ever end? Or must human beings everlastingly live with it?

What is the root of this conflict, the cause? If one can find out the cause then the effect can naturally be sterilized, wiped away or end. But if we don't find the cause, the deep rooted cause, then you may try to effect, try to alter the cause - you understand? If I don't find cause for my unhappiness I live always in my unhappiness. If I don't find cause for my sense of loneliness I'll always tolerate it, put up with it, be frightened by it, go through the various travail involved in loneliness. But if I can find the cause of it I can end it. So we are trying together, we are not accepting what the speaker is saying. The speaker is totally anonymous, it is not important what the speaker is, but what he says is important.

So what is the cause of this conflict? First of all look at the ideologies man has created. The Russian ideology, Marx, Lenin ideologies, Mao Tse Tung ideologies, the Christian ideologies, the Hindus, the Buddhists, the Tibetan, the American Democrat, is one of the causes of this conflict ideologies? You understand? Please ask yourself this question. You are a Christian, which is an ideology, with your form of worship, mass and all the tradition which goes with it, the peculiar dresses and so on, and I as a Hindu, I am not, I as a Hindu, if I am one, have my own peculiar ideologies, my own belief, my own faith, my own superstitions. So we are in conflict with each other, we tolerate each other but yet there is the strain between us. You believe in one thing and I believe in another. There is the whole Totalitarian ideologies and the Democratic ideologies. These ideologies are at war - right? So we are asking if one of the roots of conflict is any form of ideology, any form of intellectual conclusions based on study, based on enquiry and you come to a conclusion, and you come to a different conclusion, studying the same thing, and so we are at each other - right? So we are finding out whether ideologies are one of the causes of this conflict in the world, and also in ourselves. Which is I conclude something from my experience, I have had an experience of a peculiar kind, I hold on to it. And you have another. So there is a difference, there is conflict. Can one then, if ideologies are one of the root causes of conflict, can one live without ideologies? Go on sirs, work it out, think it together. Do it, please, as we are sitting here, enquiring, do it. See whether one can be free, if you think ideologies are one of the root causes of wars, disturbances, conflict, whether those ideologies are necessary at all. Ideologies are the projection of thought. That thought may have enquired, studied, accumulated a great deal of historical knowledge and come to a conclusion and holds to that conclusion. Another does the same thing. So there are two different camps, dividing each other, arming each other, killing each other - right? And we are doing the same thing in our private lives, in our relationship with each other.

So can one be free of all ideologies? We see the cause of it. The cause is we think that with ideologies, with ideas, with ideals, we will be secure, we will be safe. And we discover that ideologies in themselves created by man will inevitably bring about conflict - right? There is the cause, which is, the cause is isolation. Isolation may be two hundred million people on one side and ten million people on the other. Or two people on one side and ten on the other. So having discovered the cause, which is, the desire to live according to a pattern, traditional pattern, or ideological pattern, or a noble pattern, such ideologies will inevitably bring about isolation. And that may be one of the major causes of conflict. Now when one has observed this fact, and the causation of it, to be free of the cause, that is be free of the desire, of the urge, that in ideas, in conclusion, in concepts, ideals, there is safety. Come on sirs. Either it is a fact, or it is not, it is a wrong conclusion.

Conclusion, you understand, again, which means separate. I don't know if you see that. The moment we come to a conclusion it breeds isolation. I believe in Christ and you don't. I believe in the Buddhist way of life and you don't. So there is this constant struggle, which means the brain has accepted a pattern of living according to some ideal, a concept, a symbol, and there is the illusion in that there is safety, so I cling to it. But when you point out to me the nature of this movement, either I reject it entirely, which is natural, or if I am at all sensitive, at all aware of the world as it is now, then I begin to enquire. Then I begin to see that the facts are much more real than the conclusions about the facts - right? So can one be free of the cause of this ideological concept of life? Which is really a very, very serious question, because from Plato, Aristotle, and from the ancient Indians, ideals have become extraordinarily important, and we live according to the Greeks and their conclusions - though we have expanded, we have narrowed it down and so on. So this same thing, this whole idea of living according to an ideal, which must breed conflict - right? Which is the fact is, 'what is', not 'what should be' - 'the should be' has no fact whatever. 'What is' is a fact - right?

So we are asking also: are there other factors of conflict in one's life? We are asking this question because - not because - we are asking this question naturally: is there a way of living in our daily life, a peaceful, vibrant, active life, not just a sleepy life, to be free from all conflict, to have no problems? Problem is another factor of conflict - right? We are trying to find out a way of living entirely different from what we are living now. The world is becoming more and more insane and for those who want to be sane, it is rather difficult in this world.

So is fear one of the causes of conflict in one's life? We said ideals may be one of the factors of conflict because it takes away from us facing the fact. And we are asking: is fear one of the factors of conflict? Is isolation, which is part of fear, is that a cause of conflict? Isolation - me and you, we and they, the enemy and the allies - you understand? This perpetual process of isolation. Identify with one group against another group, the Buddhist group, the Christian group, you understand? This seems so absurd. And is fear a major factor? What is the cause of fear? Because, as we said, when you discover the cause, the effect can be wiped away. But we are always dealing with the effects. I am afraid of that person, or I am afraid of thunder, or I am afraid of my wife, husband, a dozen forms of fear. And we want to wipe away the effects of fear. We never question whether fear can totally end, which is to find out the cause of it - right? Can we go along together with it? Please you are asking this question of yourself, not merely listening to the speaker. You know we always want to be lead, that is our beastly nature. We all want to be told what to do - Marx tells you what to do, Christ tells you what to do, the psychologists tell you what to do, the politicians tell you what to do, the gurus and you know all that business. We are always looking for leaders - a better political leader than the present one. And the better political leader is always not good enough but the next one will be better. And so we keep this idea.

So we are asking - there is no leader here, please let's be clear on this point. There is no leader as far as I am concerned. You can create the speaker into a leader, which will be utter folly, but the speaker is not a leader. We are together co-operating to discover the cause of all this misery of man. You have had a thousand leaders. They have all failed - right? So it isn't that we must have self confidence, or that we must rely on ourselves, we have also done that. That hasn't lead very far. Whereas if we can co-operate together in our enquiry, find out why these human beings are what they are now. You see there is perpetual misery, conflict and we say fear. Fear is one of the causes of conflict. What is the cause, the root of fear? We are not talking about the branches of fear or trimming the branches of fear but the very root of it, the tree that has many branches, many leaves, many flowers, we are not concerned with that, but the root of it. Is it this eternal seeking of "I am living in isolation"? which is living on the periphery. You have certain characteristics, certain culture, certain way, certain tradition, and you are satisfied with that, you are British - all right? Do you tolerate this? And in France we are French. Go to Spain it is the same. Go anywhere in the world, it is the same assertion. Outwardly and inwardly we are isolated. My desire, my fulfilment, my wanting, and all the rest of it. So is that one of the causes of conflict, isolation? Obviously. Politically, as long as you remain British and the French, and all the rest, there will be no global relationship and therefore there will be no peace in the world at all. Right? Tell that to the politicians and they will say, "Buzz off". And we elect these politicians!

So we are finding out ideologies, isolation, and now we are enquiring into whether fear is one of the factors of conflict in our life. Obviously it is. I am afraid of you because you are cleverer than me. You are more beautiful than me. You know, this constant comparison. So is comparison one of the factors? Of course it is. Can one live a life without any comparison, which means no measurement? I am this, but I will be that - that is a measurement. "I will be that" breeds fear - right? Oh I don't know if you follow all this. So, what is the root of fear, the cause? Is it time? Is it thought? Is it desire? So if these are the causes, if they are, we are saying is desire one of the causes of fear. We will go into it. Is it thought that is the root of fear? Is it time, time being a movement from 'what is' to 'what should be', time being the state of the brain that says, "I am this but I will pursue the ideal." And is thought the root of fear? The remembrance of pain of yesterday, hoping that pain will not occur again. Thinking: is that one of the causes of fear? Don't say, "If I don't think what shall I do?" That is not the point. The point is we are trying to enquire whether thought breeds fear. Of course it does. Is desire the ground on which fear flowers?

So we have to enquire into these factors. What is desire? What is thought? What is time? Shall we go on? You are not tired? What is desire, which shapes our life, which has such extraordinary vitality, drive? We live by desire, the objects of desire may vary from time to time but we are not concerned with the objects, we are concerned with the root of fear. Which is we are asking whether desire is one of the factors, and not desiring that or this, but desire itself - right? What is desire? We have to enquire into what is sensation, both tactile, touching? What is sensation? What is the function of the senses? Are the senses separate in themselves? And if they are separate you cannot hope to do anything about it? But is it possible - please listen to this, you may not of thought of it - is it possible to operate with all your senses fully awakened? You understand my question? I may be very good in seeing clearly with my eyes; or I have a very good taste about wine; or I am sensitive about this or that. But I am asking: is it possible to have all your senses heightened and fully operating together - right? Do you understand my question? Have you ever looked, have you ever tried - I am not asking, please, I am asking this politely - have you ever tried to look at a tree with all your senses, or at the sea with all its beautiful waves and colour and depth and the tremendous vitality of it? To look at something with all your senses, that is to have total sensation, not partial sensation. And sensation, what is sensation? Pain, physical pain, physical discomfort, ill health, and also psychologically the sensation, the feeling of being hurt, being lonely, the sense of depression, and elation, the sense of deep inward loneliness of man. When we talk about man we are also including the woman, so don't get excited about it! We live by sensation, only partially. And is sensation, is that one of the causes of desire? I desire a car, a suit, a shirt, or a robe, or a dress. Look in the window. I perceive, optically perceive and I go inside and touch the material, it is good material, which is sensation - right? So I am beginning to discover that, seeing, touching, contact, from that sensation - right? Seeing visually, contact, sensation. Then what happens? Then thought arises and says, "How nice if I could get into that car and drive fast". Or in that shirt, in that dress, in that"... So thought creates the image of me having that shirt, or something else, when thought creates the image then there is the beginning of desire. Are you following all this? Go into it sirs. This is part of meditation, if you are interested in it, not just sitting cross-legged and going off into some fantasy. This is part of meditation, to enquire very deeply into the nature of conflict, into the nature of desire, not what other people say about desire. The whole concept, the Christian concept of the suppression of desire - as we have come to serve the Lord, have no desire, except one desire to be like him - or whatever it is.

So seeing, contact, sensation, then thought creates the image, at that moment is the birth of desire - right? - with all its problems. Controlling it, not controlling it, accepting it, enjoying it, with all the consequences of pain, struggle, and it may also be included in it, it may be one of the causes of fear, because I may not get what I want. I am depressed by it, frustrated by it, I am afraid I can't get it, and so on. So I discover that one of the causes of fear is desire. I am not asking how to be free of desire, I see the cause. I perceive the cause. By the very perception of the cause something will take place. I am not going to say "I must be free" - or not free of desire - that is very important to comprehend this. Then who is it that is going to suppress desire? Desire itself, surely, isn't it? I suppress desire because I want another form of desire. So it is the same movement. So we are saying we are not discussing, or going into the question of suppression at all, or escaping from it, or transcending it. We see the movement of desire, observe it. Then we say is time the factor of fear? Time. I might die tomorrow, or ten years later. I am all right now but god know what will happen tomorrow. Tomorrow is time - right? There is time by the universe, that is the rising of the sun and the setting of the sun, night, day and all the rest of it. And also there is the inward time. The inward time which is, I have had happiness another day and I hope I will have it in the future. Or I have had an experience, I cling to that experience and hoping nothing will disturb it, or I have had pain, both psychological and physical, and I hope that will never happen again. Time is a movement - right? And thought is also a movement, thought which is born of knowledge. Knowledge is the result of experience. We are the result of thousands of years of experience, thousands of years of knowledge, psychologically. And we need time to learn a language, to acquire various capacities. So there is time outwardly, there is time inwardly. And thought is also the result of time, the accumulated knowledge of centuries stored in the brain as memory, and that memory responds as thought. These are all facts. It is not my invention, it is so.

So, desire, isolation, thought, time are the factors of fear, the root cause of fear. Now how does one deal with a cause? You understand my question? I have found out for myself the cause of fear. And is it possible to dispel that cause without effort? The moment I bring effort into it, it is another form of conflict - right? So is it possible to be entirely free of the cause, or the causation which breeds all this? It is possible only, please we are talking over together - it is possible only when you observe the fact. That is, when there is the realization that the cause is producing all these effects. And also one knows where there is a cause there is an end. If I have a cause for tuberculosis, that is the cause and I cough and all the rest of it. Now there is medicine to cure tuberculosis, there is an end to it. Where there is a cause the effect can be wiped away. So I am asking: I have found the cause, now how am I to deal with it, what is to happen with it? You understand my question? Any movement on my part, that is, any movement of desire to say, "I must be free of fear, I must be free of this cause", that is another form of desire - right? So I realize any movement of thought, any movement of the urge to be free, is part of the same thing. So can I observe without any movement of thought or time, just to observe? And remain with the cause, not move away from the cause. You are following all this? That requires tremendous close attention. So one has to enquire much further into the nature of attention. Not for the moment, today, we will do it another day. But to be aware of the cause and to have no choice about the cause - to go beyond it, suppress it - just to look at it, hold it. When you give your whole attention to that cause, that very attention is like a fire that dispels the cause. Right, that is enough for today. May I get up please?

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 31ST AUGUST 1982

There are several questions that have been handed in. You can't probe into all those questions and we have chosen some of the more representative of those questions.

Do questions need answers? Or there are only questions? Questions are like a challenge and what is important is how one meets the challenge, not what is the answer to the question, but what is one's response to a challenge, to a question, to a demand. I think that is far more important than to ask a question and wait for somebody to answer it, including myself. So let us first find out how to probe a question. Not, if one may remind oneself, not search for an answer, investigate into the outcome of the answer, but rather the cause and one's response to the question.

So how does one approach a question? Suppose I have a question. That is, I question the whole of modern civilization, not one particular part of that civilization, the Christian, or the Hindu, or the Muslim, or the Buddhist, but I want to question the whole cultural development of man. I can study it, all the various historians - that would take too long and I haven't got the time, for am I interested in finding out what others say about history. History is the story of man, which is the story of myself. So how do I approach a question of that kind? I see a whole culture of India, for example, the Brahmanical culture which has lasted from between five to three thousands years completely disappear over night. I don't know if you are aware of all that. It doesn't matter, just to inform you. It has disappeared over night. So what is culture? Is it just a coating? However deep that coating may be, it may have different layers of coating but it is still a coating because deep down man is more or less the same as he has always been - violent and all the rest of it. So how do I approach - how does one approach a question of this kind? The approach matters far more than the question. Please we are talking over together. I am not laying down any dogmatic statements, or asking you to accept what the speaker is saying. But how does one approach any problem? Any question? What is my motive in my approach to the question? What is the problem and the cause of that problem, and one's approach to the investigation to the probing of that cause and the problem? Do I come to it with a motive, with a desire to get rid of it, or go beyond it, suppress it and so on? What is my inward reaction to it? If I am not very clear on that, I am only seeking an answer somehow to resolve the problem, I am not really concerned with the issue at all. I am only concerned with going beyond it somehow. And so the escape from the problem creates more problems - right?

So it matters a great deal one feels, if one may point out, how one approaches a problem, a question. Is the mind or the brain seeking an answer, then we are not investigating the problem, the issue, the challenge, the question, but merely trying to find out an answer which is immediately satisfactory. So I think it matters very much, if one may again point out, how one comes to a problem, how close one gets to it. Approach it means to come near. How close, how near, does one get to the problem? Or the problem is out there and I am approaching it. You understand? Or the problem is me, not somewhere in the periphery of me, the trap is me? So how do I go into all this? Just superficially, casually, or with great hesitation, sensitivity, not coming to any conclusion, probe into it deeper and deeper and deeper? Is the brain capable of doing this? Or we are so terribly conditioned that we say "For god's sake let's get rid of the problem." You understand all this?

Now we are going to investigate, probe into the question, not find an answer to it. The answer is in the question, not away from the question. And who is to answer the question? Some leader, some prophet, some politician, some guru, some priest? - which means we are always seeking an answer from somebody else. And please don't put the speaker in that position, because he is not going to answer, we are going together to investigate the question, which is much more intelligent than say if one answers you say, "Well, that is not good enough," or "That's all right, that is satisfactory" - you begin to discuss about the answer. But if we begin to look, probe, play with it, it reveals a tremendous lot - right?

There are several questions here.

1st QUESTION: You have said that there is a group consciousness. What is the relationship between the group consciousness and the individual consciousness? How can human beings undergo a total psychological change while the group consciousness has not changed totally?

We are going to investigate the question, there is no answer, but when one investigates this really important question, it reveals so much.

First of all is there a group consciousness? Some scientists are experimenting - I have been told by one of them - that a certain species of animals undergoing certain experiments and achieving a certain result, these results are communicated to the whole group - rats, wolves and so on. So they are trying to establish a consciousness of a group which is affected by a few individuals who learn something very quickly. They are doing this. Perhaps some of you have heard about it or read about it. And if this is so, then is human consciousness different from the individual consciousness? And is the group consciousness, like the British, it is a group, British consciousness, French consciousness, German, American - you follow? Now take a group of British, the British group consciousness: traditional, very proud of their past Empire, ready to kill, probably the British have the greatest number of wars to their record and so on and so on. They have a certain consciousness, the group. And in that group there is the individual consciousness. That is what the questioner is asking. What is the relationship between the group consciousness - right? - and the one who lives in that group who is separate from the group? Right? Are we following each other? Need I repeat that again? Yes? All right. There is the Indian consciousness - the British consciousness you may object to it, so I won't go into that! (Laughter) There is the Indian, or Japanese consciousness as a group, and in that group I live with my consciousness. The questioner asks: is that group consciousness separate from my consciousness? Or is my consciousness similar to the group? Right? That is the question. We are investigating this. We are not trying to find an answer.

In that group consciousness of India there are various levels of consciousness - the Brahmanical and so on and so on and so on. And if you are born amongst one of those separate little groups contained in India, what is the relationship of that individual to that group? It may be a limited group but it is the whole of Indian consciousness - you understand? You have to think with me a little bit.

Now the relationship is, surely, there is a coating of group consciousness, level of it, layers of it, and within those layers the individual consciousness. The individual being his sorrows, his anxieties, etc. etc. The group says you are an idealist, if they say so. And you, within that group, have also learnt the importance or unimportance of an ideal. So what is the relationship of one who believes or doesn't believe in idealism, and to the group that believes? You are following this? If he has no belief whatsoever in idealism then he is totally out of that group - right? But if he believes in idealism he belongs to that group.

Now the questioner asks: how can a human being undergo a total psychological change while the group consciousness has not changed at all? I am also reading the question for the first time.

First of all is the group consciousness separate from the individual consciousness? That we have to establish completely. Are you an individual different from the group consciousness of a Britain, or British, or the French, or the Dutch, or whatever it is? Are you different radically from the country, the culture, the economic condition, the cultural education, all that, are you different from the rest of the group? Are you? Are we? Each one of us? Or are we the result of all that? Do you understand? Am I the result of all of India, of Europe, of America, because one has lived in these parts for most of one's life, am I the result of all that? You are following all this? Are we moving together? Or am I totally different from all that? Are you totally different from your culture, from your environment, from your hereditary, from your thousand years of evolution, wars and so on, are you not the result of all that? Right? You are, obviously. Now if you are the result of all that, another group is also the result of all that too - right? Are you following? You may call yourself British, I may call myself Dutch, you may call yourself French, but we are the result of all that, though linguistically we may be different. So go a little further.

Is our consciousness, which is our entire being with its beliefs, its faith, with its dogmas, fears, superstitions, longings and anxieties and loneliness and all that, is that not common to all mankind? Right? You will not accept the next step if you don't understand this. Are we not, each human being, the representative, or is the rest of humanity, psychologically? What do you say? Obviously. You suffer, the man in Japan suffers, though he may be technologically terribly advanced, highly disciplined, industrious, keeping his place, it is part of the Confucian education, culture, but inwardly he is just like you and me.

So if the human being who is the rest of mankind psychologically, if he changes completely, is he not adding, helping, increasing a totally different kind of mind to it? You understand? Are you following this? All right suppose I change radically, belonging, recognising that I am the rest of mankind, and I personally mean it, it is not just an intellectual assumption, and I am the rest of mankind psychologically. I may be darker skinned than you are, but you have suffered, you suffer and so on and so on, and I am the rest of mankind, if I change radically, am I not bringing into the consciousness of humanity, which I am, am I not bringing to it something which is totally different? And if all of us were changing rapidly and adding to that, the content of human consciousness will also be affected. You are following all this? Right? Are we together in this?

So is it possible for human beings, living wherever they are, assessing that our consciousness is similar to the rest of mankind, but clothed in different garments, when there is a change, radical change, it does affect the whole: like Hitler affected the whole of human consciousness: like the war that is going on, it is affecting the whole of mankind - right?

So the next investigation into this question is: Why don't you change? That is what is implied in this question. Why is it human beings who have lived on this marvellous, beautiful earth, which they are trying to destroy, why have they not, after so many centuries upon centuries of civilization, experience, sorrow, tears, joy and all the rest of it, why are they like this? Always waiting for somebody to lead them, always waiting to be told what to do. And even when they are told what to do they don't do it! Now why? Please answer this question. It is not for me to answer it. Question it. Why is it human beings, affluent, well to-do, fairly well placed, having to struggle for food like in Asia, certain parts of Asia, why is it they don't see the extraordinary importance, the urgency of all this? Why don't they move? Is it they need more suffering, which is too callous - you understand? Suffering has not changed man. Reward has not changed men, nor punishment. Those are the two principles upon which we act, reward and punishment. Neither of those two principles have helped man. Nor externalizing some agency, like god, worshipping him, which thought has invented, then thought worships him. A crazy business! And that too has not helped man. So what? Please ask these questions of yourself. We have looked to leaders. We have looked to outside agency, some great influence, some pressure, none of these things have helped man. So what will he do? Go on ask this. Go off into communes and little this, and little that? Or see the great danger of what is going on, see the utter lack of love in all this, utter callousness of human beings, killing for some piece of land, for some honour, a whole group of human beings - you understand? So what will you all do? Go back to our daily routine, to our jobs? You can't help that. You have responsibilities, so we have to do all that. So what shall we do apart from all that? Is it that our brains have become so utterly mechanical that any new challenge is immediately translated into the old pattern, and go on with the old pattern? Please investigate all this.

Now we are probing into the question. What is right action? Right action must be right under all circumstances, not depending on pressure, on climate, or one's prejudices, conclusions, ideals, but when it is right action it must be right under all circumstances - right? So what is right action? What is right? Which means correct, precise, actual, objective, non-personal - right? All that is implied in that word 'right'. Right is not opposed to wrong. If right is opposed to wrong then the right has its roots also in the wrong - right? This needs a little bit of enquiry.

Is goodness separate, totally separate from that which is bad - we are using the word good and bad in the ordinary sense of the word. Is it separate, totally separate? Or is goodness born out of badness? - you understand? I am bad - whatever that may mean. And I am trying to be good. That goodness is the opposite of what I am. I am bad and I am saying I must be good. So it is an opposite. And the opposite is created by thought which says this is bad and I must be good. Are you following all this? So is right the opposite of the wrong? If it is the opposite there must be conflict between the two and therefore the right is not right. Where there is a conflict between good and bad, that conflict is wrong, therefore we are asking: is right totally independent, totally divorced, has no relationship to the bad? Then it is right under all circumstances. But if it is the outcome of the bad, that is, I want to be good, creating the opposite of the bad and then fighting for that - right? Then that which I then call right is wrong. I wonder if you have understood this? - If we have understood each other, rather.

So we have more or less gone into it but we must also go into action. What is action? Any movement is action - right? Going from here to your house, sitting here listening, action, the doing, not having done or will do. That means acting, present participle. So acting. Now what is that acting - what is the root of that acting, the cause of that acting? Has acting a cause? Please this is very interesting if you go into it, it is not intellectual assessment, intellectual entertainment, but if you go into it very deeply it brings out something extraordinary. Our present action is based on past memories, or on a future principle, the ideal according to a pattern I am going to live, and act according to that pattern. That pattern is established by thought, from what I have learnt, or imitated, and I copy that pattern and I call that action - right? Which is, I am acting according to a principle which is rewarding, which will be pleasurable and I act according to that. All the ideologies do this. All the theoreticians whether the Capitalist theoretician, or the Totalitarian theoreticians act upon this, they establish theories and act according to those theories, hypothesis - right? So our action is either based on a reward or punishment, obviously. So action has a motive. That is, I am acting according to my desire, my pleasure, my past memories, or I am acting according to some principle, some ideal, but I am not acting, I am acting according to something. I wonder if you understand this? So can the mind be free of the past and the future and act? It is really very interesting to go into this. Can my brain, which has evolved in time and so it functions in time - time being past rewards, past memories, past accomplishments and so on and so on, and the future with all its rewards etc. So my brain has been conditioned to that - most brains are. And it is acting according to the past or to the future, and that is its conditioning. Now we are asking that brain: is it possible to act without the whole burden of the past and the future business? You understand the question? We will come back to that.

And the questioner asks: violence. He uses the word violence. What is violence? Physical violence, killing each other, hurting each other, maiming each other, physically by word, by a gesture, by a look - right? We hurt each other. And that is also part of violence: the word, the gesture, the blow, the bayonet, the bomb. And also is there not violence when we imitate people? Is there not violence when we are caught in the movement of comparison? I am comparing myself with you, clever brat and so on and so on. Or I want to be somebody. That is also part of violence. Right?

Conformity, comparison, following, obeying, all that is part of violence. We are not saying going against law, we must be careful here otherwise the police will be after us. So realizing this is violence, then we proceed to create a state, a principle, called non-violence, quite the opposite of what I am, what we are. Then what takes place? I have created the idea of non-violence because I am violent. This is a fact, and that is non-fact, and I pursue the non-fact I don't know if you realize this. That then leads to all kinds of illusions, whereas there is only the fact, violence, there is no other fact. Now to understand the nature of violence, to go into it, to encompass the whole content of that word and not move away from it, which is not to escape, not to run away, not to submerge it, not to suppress it, not to go beyond it, just...

So, what is right action which will encompass the whole movement of violence? Right? What is right action? Right? Which is, non-action. I don't know if you follow this. Any action born of violence is violent. One country is aggressive and you respond with aggressiveness to that country. That is what has happened. And that is positive action, it is considered positive action. You hit me, I hit you back. But seeing the whole nature of violence, observing it closely, there is only a state which is non-action. I wonder if you understand this. What is considered positive action with regard to violence in the ordinary accepted traditional sense is to retaliate. This has been our tradition. We own that particular piece of land miles away and if anybody is aggressive, enters into that land I will send all my warships to it. This is what is happening all the world over, meet aggression by aggression. And that is considered positive, realistic action. And this has been the history of mankind. For thousands of years. So when one investigates into this whole problem of violence, any movement from violence is still violent - right? If one understands this. Therefore when there is violence no response to violence, which is the most positive action - right?

3rd QUESTION: You speak of compassion but claim that action should have no cause. In what way does compassion act without being a cause of action.

The questioner says you speak of compassion and you claim - please the speaker doesn't claim anything. Then you can kick him around if he claimed. But as he doesn't claim anything and he doesn't speak of compassion as though something extraordinary that human beings have lost or not found, so we have to go into this question together.

What is compassion? What is love? As it is generally understood love is sensory, sensuous, sexy. Love is understood as pleasure, as some form of self-fulfilment - right? I am just stating what is commonly understood. So we have to enquire, probe into this word, the content of the word, the depth of the word, the real quality of that word. That word has been ruined, spat upon, trodden down, vulgarized, any other word you would like to use. So pushing all that aside, what is love? If it has a cause, "I love you because..." then obviously it is not love. Let's be clear on that - right? "I love god because I hope some day he will help me." "I love my wife because some...", I don't have to go into all that - or my girl friend. So if you are very clear that love has no cause - it hasn't, if it has then it is not love, it is a convenience, self-satisfaction, gratification, companionship, escape from loneliness and all that kind of stuff, but if it real it has no cause. I don't love you because you are an audience which helps me to fulfil myself, which is too silly.

So love has no cause - right? This is not a verbal assessment, a verbal intellectual agreement, it is a deep truth. When one perceives that truth then the cause which we have had disappears altogether - right? And is love different from compassion? Or it is the furthering of the same thing? Can there be compassion, that sense of enormity of it, the beauty of it, the quality, the depth of that word, can that compassion exist where there is sorrow? I may be suffering because I have lost this and I am suffering from loneliness. I am suffering. And out of that suffering I attach myself to certain ideological principles. I become a Hindu, or a Buddhist, or a Christian. I anchor my being in there and go out to help you. Because I think I am compassionate. Is that compassion? You are following? Are we together in this? We are investigating, we are not asking that you should agree. If I am attached to some principle, to some belief, to some faith, and that is my strength, my anchor, and then I talk about compassion - go to the world, to China and help there, or India, the poor people. Is that compassion? Or is it pity? Sympathy? Kindliness? Generosity, which I call compassion? Or compassion cannot possibly exist when there is any kind of anchorage. When I am no longer a Hindu, a Buddhist, a Catholic and so on - you follow? Which is, compassion has its own intelligence. It is unintelligent to have an anchorage of security in some deity, some symbol, some faith. That indicates lack of intelligence. But when there is compassion it has its own intelligence. So intelligence has no cause - right? Because if it has a cause - I am intelligent because I have read books and have clever arguments and so on, that is not intelligence. That is cleverness, erudition, professional activity. So compassion, love, has no cause and therefore as intelligence has no cause, love, compassion, intelligence go together.

Then the questioner asks: when there is that compassion what is action? You understand the question? I haven't got it but tell me about it. I don't know what love is, but what is the action of that love? We are back into theories, hypothesis and idealism. Tell me what it is to live with love though in my heart I don't know what that flame is. And it would be foolish to talk about what that is when one hasn't got the flame. So the question then arises: why is it human beings who have undergone such tremendous agonies, dreadful wars, shedding tears beyond all the rivers and yet they are going on the same way, killing each other and all the rest of it. Where there is compassion and intelligence, that very intelligence is action. But I haven't got it. It sounds good in this tent but when I leave it, it is gone. I have been stimulated by the speaker, or by somebody else, and it is not there. And that is a tragedy. So again what am I to do? How am I to capture that flame? You see love is not an experience. All experiences are sensual, reactions. As love is not desire, pleasure, reward, escape from one's own misery, if one sees that, observes it, then out of that observation the thing may flower.

Shall we go onto the next question? It seems a pity doesn't it?

4th QUESTION: To exist I have to perform daily mechanical tasks without any meaning. This lack of meaning leads to a feeling of destructiveness, an inner rage. I see this clearly in myself and the same process growing in the rise of terrorism, crime and delinquency. There is the feeling that nothing can be done about this increasing chaos. That society is destined to collapse. How does one approach this tremendous chaos both without and within oneself?

I wonder how many of us are aware of this fact? Economically, socially, morally, the structure of society as we have known it is gradually collapsing, imperceptibly or very, very quickly. How many of us are aware of this? Or we just live from day to day and forget the whole bally show? Please enquire in oneself if one is really aware of this, not in the newspapers, not in the magazines, not in the editorials, not in any book, but actually it is going on. Are we aware of it, are we sensitive to all that is happening? What the scientists are doing? They also want to fulfil. Russia invents something, and the other scientists invent something more, better, and so keep this up.

If one is aware of the chaos, the catastrophe - I wonder if one is really aware of it, that is what I want to know. It is really very important to question this: whether one is really deeply aware of this, sensitive, not just what is happening in one's own country but in the world, poverty in certain areas is increasing, overpopulation, total indifferent, callousness. If one is aware of it, why does one have rage, anger about it or be depressed by it? It is a fact - right? The thing is collapsing. Why should one get angry about it, have a tremendous anxiety, rage about it, why? Why don't we look at the fact and see what we can do? You get depressed, full of anxiety, rage and say, "My god, what is going to happen to my family" - this and that, you are lost. But if one acknowledges the real fact of this, not verbally but inside yourself deeply, in your heart, then the questioner says, "What is one to do?"

Where would you begin to understand this chaos? The house is burning, we are not saying something that is not actually so. The speaker is not pessimistic or optimistic, he is just facing things as they are. Where would you begin to bring about order out of this chaos? More leaders? Better Prime Ministers? Better Labour leaders? Better police order? Suppressing crimes - not that there shouldn't be all that but where would you begin? Please ask this question: where would you begin? Out there, or in here? Who has created the outward chaos in this world? We human beings have created it, each one of us - right? Obviously. Our grandparents or great great grandparents, and we are inheriting what they have done and we are contributing to it. This is a fact. So where shall I begin, realizing the outward chaos? I realize that we human beings have created this and as a human being, who is the rest of mankind, I must begin with myself, which is not a selfish movement. I have contributed, caused, brought about this chaos. Each one of us has brought about this chaos, the collapse or the impending collapse. And I must begin with myself - please this is really important - I am mankind, not just a verbal statement. It is in my blood that I am the rest of mankind. I must begin to bring about order in myself because I have lived, and I still live, in chaos inwardly. Chaos being disorder, conflict, struggle. Can there be order in all this? Can order be created out of disorder? Please - I am the result of disorder, I am disorder. I am not saying disorder is out there and I am looking at it, I am disorder. There is no part of me which is not in disorder. I may invent a part. I may think there is a part of me which is completely orderly, beautifully orderly. The rest of me is chaos. So if I assert that then I am pursuing something which I have invented that there is some pure order. Which is, out of disorder I have created order - right? - hoping that order is real. I see the fallacy of that. So I say to myself "I am the cause and the trap of disorder. And can I clear up this disorder?" - not search for order. You understand this? How can my mind which is disorderly, chaotic, how can such a mind create order? It can't. All it can do is to understand the nature of disorder, the structure, the movement the quality of disorder. The essence of disorder is conflict - right? When you have no conflict there is order. So what is the cause of conflict? Go on sirs. I hope you are thinking, you are investigating with the speaker otherwise you are just listening to a lot of ideas and they will have no meaning whatsoever. He will become another stupid leader. And please I beg of you don't put the speaker in that position.

So can there be dissolution of disorder? We are not seeking order. The order, like the universe, will be when there is no disorder. So what are the contributory causes that bring about disorder?

Are you tired? Shall I finish this? You are not tired? I am sorry.

What are the many causes that bring about disorder? Or is there only one cause? We like to think there are many causes because then it gives us time to play around, investigating the many, many causes. That is part of the psychological game which human beings play with. But when looking at it all, there is only one cause. Go on sirs, think. Or shall we investigate various other causes? Which is a waste of time obviously. What is the one cause that is bringing about this great disorder out there and in oneself? Is it the me, the self, with all its conflicts, desires, hopes, fears, past memories, the self-centred entity, who is concerned with himself, isolating himself, holding on, clinging to that which thought has invented as the me? Go on sirs, look at it. And if that self-centred entity, the me, the form, the name, all the accumulated memories, which is the me, which is in essence isolation, the me is always in isolation - right? I may be related to you but I am related to you - right? I am the principal and you are the second. I, though I am related to you intimately, I am pursuing my own desires, ambitions, fulfilment, and you are also doing the same, like two parallel railway lines never meeting. That is, the me with all this sense of isolation, that is the root cause of this chaos out there and in me. And do I realize this? Or is this verbal accumulation which I have gathered and I am living with the words? I say, "Yes, that is me, what am I to do about it?" If I realize that is me I can't do anything. You understand? I can't do anything because the doer is still the me. So there is only a state of pure observation of the fact. And that observation with its intense attention brings out its own action, which is intelligence.

I wonder why you all listen to me? (Laughter) I am asking this seriously, not flippantly: why we listen to others, not that we shouldn't but why? Either we listen to somebody who knows his subject very well and we want to be informed on it, or we turn to some specialist, professional, who will discuss his particular study, or we listen to some music - Mozart, Beethoven and so on - and we are delighted by it, stimulated by it, see the beauty of it and enjoy it. And when we ask why you are listening to the speaker, in which category do you put him in? I think it would be necessary and right if we could probe into these questions co-operatively, that is, we all share together in the exploration of these questions, co-operate, not that the speaker reads a question, investigates it, but if we could do it together it would be really extraordinarily good and important. Few of us know how to co-operate. We co-operate round an idea, if we agree with that idea, or we co-operate round an ideal to be certain that ideal is carried out, then we all get together if we agree with that ideal, that is, if it pleases us, that ideal. Or we co-operate round a person, some authority, as we do round a bishop, or a priest, or a guru, or any of those people. But it all implies, does it not, that we co-operate about something, or with something, or with something. But here we are not co-operating in that sense. We want the co-operation that is not personal, that is nothing to do with ideas, authority and so on but the feeling of co-operation. I wonder if I am making myself clear. Feeling that, let's all tackle this problem together. Because that is the problem of most of our lives, we have so many problems, physical, psychological, and problems invented by thought. And we live with these problems everlastingly until we die. We are never free of any problem. We are always carrying them with us and we never try to find out what it means to live a life without a single problem, psychologically first, not outwardly, which we generally do. Let us solve the outward problems first and then we will tackle the other. But I don't think it ever works that way. We have to solve the psychological problems first and then the other problems can be intelligently, co-operatively, understood and acted upon. So please we are co-operating together, not that you are co-operating with the speaker or with what he says, but coming together to resolve some of these problems.

1st QUESTION: Most of us are married, or involved in a close relationship which began for all the wrong reasons you have so correctly described. Can such a marriage or relationship ever be made into a really positive force? (Laughter)

You poor chaps! Now how do we tackle this question? We went into the question the other day into what is relationship. What does it mean to be related to another? You may be related very closely, intimately, physically, but are we ever related psychologically, inwardly, not romantically, sentimentally, but the feeling of being related? The word 'relation' means to be in contact, to have a sense of wholeness with another, not as separate entities, then coming together and feeling whole but the very relationship brings about this quality, this feeling of not being separate. This is really quite an important question because most of our lives are so terribly isolated, insulated, carefully structured so that we are not psychologically disturbed. And such relationship will inevitably bring about conflict, disturbance and all the neurotic behaviour that one has. So first let's be clear together what we mean by relationship, not only the meaning of that word, the verbal meaning, but the significance that lies behind the word, behind the two people. What does it mean to be related? Are we ever related in the deep profound sense of that word? Can there be a relationship of that kind, undisturbed like the depth of the sea, can there be a relationship if each one of us is pursuing his own particular path, particular desire, particular ambition and so on? Can there be such relationship with the other if these things exist? If you say, "How can they not exist? Is it not necessary for each one of us to fulfil, each one of us to flower with each other?" - whatever that may mean. That sense of separateness exists. If each of us says we are helping each other to flower, to grow, to fulfil, to be happy together, then one is still maintaining the isolated spirit. Now why does the mind or the brain, the human entity, always cling to separatism?

So, please this is a very, very serious question: why human beings throughout history have maintained this sense of isolation, insulation, separatism, division. You are a Catholic, I am a Protestant. You belong to that group and he belongs to that group. I put on a purple robe, yellow robe or a garland round my something or other, and we maintain this, and we talk about relationship, love and all the rest of it. Now why? Please we are co-operating, investigating together. Why do we do this? Is it either conscious, deliberate, or unconscious, tradition, our education? The whole religious structure maintains that you are separate, separate soul etc. etc. Or is it that thought in itself is separative? You understand? I think I am separate from you. I think my behaviour must be separate from yours, because otherwise there is the fear that we will become automatic, zombies, imitating each other. Is thought the cause of this separatism in life? Please investigate together in this. Thought has separated the world into nationalities - right? You are British, another is a German, I am French, you are Russian and so on. This division is created by thought. And thought assumes that in this separatism, in this division, there is security, belonging to a commune, belonging to the same group, believing in the same guru, believing in the same clothes that one wears according to edicts of the guru, one feels secure, at least the illusion of being secure.

And so we are asking: is it pleasure, the pleasurable desire which is the movement of thought also, that separates us? Right? That is, is thought ever complete, whole? Because thought is based on knowledge, which is vast accumulated experience of man, either in scientific, technological world, or psychologically - right? We have accumulated a great deal of knowledge outwardly and inwardly. And thought is the outcome of that knowledge, thought as memory, knowledge, experience - right? So knowledge can never be complete. We agree? About anything, about god, about Nirvana, about heaven, about science, anything. So knowledge must always go with the shadow of ignorance. Please see this fact together. So when thought enters into the field of relationship it must create a division because thought itself is fragmented, thought itself is limited - right?

If this is clear to all of us - I am not explaining, you are discovering it for yourselves - Then what place has knowledge in relationship? Please this is a serious question, it isn't just a casual, argumentative proposition. This is an enquiry into what place has knowledge, experience, accumulated memories, in relationship? Please answer this yourself, don't look at me. If I say, "I know my wife" - or another form of intimate relationship, I have already put that person into the framework of my knowledge about her, or him. So my knowledge becomes the divisive process. I have lived with my wife, husband, girl, or whatever it is, and I have accumulated information, I have remembered the painful statements she has made or one has made, there is this whole building up of memory as an image, which interferes in my relationship with another. Right? Please observe this in oneself. And she is doing exactly the same thing. So we are asking: what place has knowledge in relationship? Is knowledge love? I may know my wife, the way she looks, the way she behaves, certain habits and so on. That is fairly obvious. But why should I say, "I know her"? - or him. When I say, "I know" I have already limited my relationship. I don't know if you understand? I have already created a block, a barrier between myself and her. Does that mean in my relationship to her I become irresponsible? You understand my question? If I say, "I don't know you basically" am I irresponsible? Or I have become extraordinarily sensitive. If I may use that word, that is a wrong word - I am vulnerable, I have no sense of division, no barrier.

So if I have this quality of mind, brain or feeling that in relationship it is a flowering, a movement, it is not a static state, it is a living thing, you can't put it in a crate and say that is it, don't move from there. Then we can begin to ask: what is marriage?

Right? Or not marriage. One may live with another, sexually, companionship, holding hands, talking - you know all the rest of it, and go to a Registrar, or go through a Catholic or Protestant ceremony and I am tied together, only let god put it aside, which means absolutely nothing, just a form of tradition. Or I may live with another without being married. With one in certain conditions, I have taken a vow of responsibility; in the other I don't. And with one I am legally married, separation, divorce becomes rather difficult. With the other it is fairly simple, we each say goodbye and walk off in different directions. And that is what is happening more and more in the world. We are not condemning either. Please we are just looking at this whole problem. The children, responsibility and the feeling of this tremendous burden of children. And there, legally, you are tied. In the other you are not, you may have children but there is always this open door. Now is all relationship in both these cases, a mere form of attraction, biological responses on both sides, the curiosity, the sense of wanting to be with another, which may be the outcome of unconscious fear of loneliness, the tradition which has established this habit. Now in both cases it can become a habit - right? And in both cases there is the fear of losing, possessing, exploiting each other sexually and all the rest of it follows. Now in both cases what is important? Please we are talking over together, I am not telling you what is or what is not. What is important, necessary in both cases? Responsibility is essential - right? I am responsible for the people I live with. I am responsible, not only with my wife, but I am responsible for what is happening in the world. I am responsible to see that people are not killed. I am responsible. I am responsible to see that there is no violence - right?

So is my responsibility just for the one and for my family, for my children, which has been the tradition? And the family in the West is disappearing more and more. Whereas in the East the family is still the centre, tremendously important, for the family they will do anything, even though they are distant cousins they will keep together, help each other, pull wires for each other. But here it is gradually disappearing altogether.

So seeing all this, the responsibility as it exists in marriage, the responsibility as it exists in the other, living with somebody, we are irresponsible because if we have children our responsibility is to see that they are properly educated, not sent off to some kind of... you know get rid of them as quickly as possible. You see sir, when you go into this problem it becomes extraordinarily complex and extraordinarily vital because if you have children, if I love them as I do and I feel responsible, I am responsible for the whole of their life, and they must be responsible for me for the whole of their life. I must see that they are properly educated, not butchered by war.

So all that is implied in this question. And this question, in investigating it profoundly, unless one has this quality of love everything is just beside the point. If I have no love for my wife, that is I am not pursuing my own self-centred activity and she is not too, but if I am and she is not then the trouble begins. That is if I am attempting not to be self-centred, not to be isolated, to have this feeling of deep affection in which there is no attachment, no possession, not the pursuit of pleasure, and my wife feels the opposite, quite different, then we have a totally different problem. You understand this? Then the problem is: what shall I do? Just leave her, run away, divorce. I may have to. She insists something - you follow, it is not a question to be answered by a few statements but it requires a great deal of inward enquiry into this on both parts. And in that enquiry, in exploring, if there is no love then there is no intelligent action. Where there is love it has its own intelligence, its own responsibility - right?

Can we go on to the next question? Not we are bored with that but relationship is one of the most extraordinary things in life, to be totally, completely related with another, without any sense of me interfering with it, without any sense of the self with all its egotistic pursuits, it doesn't enter into that relationship.

2nd QUESTION: Is our continuous search for security a valid need or a neurotic one? Is there a security that is not the opposite of insecurity?

Can we to on with this question? Shall we? Sir, what is an opposite? The contrary? There is man and woman, light and dark, sunrise and sunset, darkness, there is division between nature and man, actual nature and man. There is division between the man who is tall and the other who is short, light skinned, dark skinned, brown skin, yellow skin and purple skin - they are painting themselves. So there is division, obvious division. A marquee and a house, a dome and a flat surface. Now is there an opposite psychologically at all? Please enquire into this together. Is there inwardly an opposite? We have inwardly the opposite - right? I am good, or bad, and I must be good. I am greedy and I must not be greedy. I am violent and I hope one day not to be violent. So inwardly, psychologically there are opposites. Where there are opposites inwardly there must be conflict - right? That is so. I am violent, but thought has created a state of non-violence which is the opposite of what I am actually, what is. And I am struggling through time, experience, to become non-violence - right? Please, can we go on with this?

So 'what is' and 'what should be', so there is conflict. Now 'what should be' is non-fact, it is not so; 'what is' is my violence. That is all; not "I should become non-violent". I wonder if we see this clearly. 'What is' is far more important than 'what should be'. Because 'what should be' will never take place because 'I will be one day'. And in the meantime I am sowing the seeds of violence all the time. So psychologically the opposite does not exist actually. It is an illusion that there is an opposite. Now if the mind, if our conditioning is to create the opposite, if we are free from that conditioning then we can look at 'what is'. Right? So let; look at 'what is'.

What actually is, is that we are insecure. I am seeking security but the actual fact is I am insecure, uncertain, confused, waffling about, moving from one thing, one family to another, one woman to another, one man to another, one guru to another - you follow? I am seeking security and I think there is security in nations, in a community, in a family, or if I am fairly intelligent I say, "No, there is no security but there is security in god." - in obeying, in following, in accepting. But the fact remains all the time that there is this feeling of deep insecurity. So can we put away the search for security psychologically and enquire into what is insecurity? Then I can deal with it. But if I am all the time seeking security and I see very well I can't find it, in churches, in priests, in books, in people, in gurus, in ideas, there is none of it, I see that. So I come back and say now, I am insecure, why? What is insecurity? I am talking first of all psychologically, not first secure outwardly, then secure inwardly. But first psychologically I am enquiring into insecurity. Please see the importance of this. The Communists, Socialists and various other groups have tried to find, bring about security for man outwardly, and they have all failed. The Communists started out - you know, I won't go into all that. All kinds of propositions, ideals and then ended up in Totalitarianism.

So unless we tackle, grasp the inward structure of human behaviour, human mind, psychologically, merely the outward coating will have no effect. One doesn't realize this. So first we are seeking together, trying to find out, why psychologically we live in insecurity, while we feel insecure - right? Not the other. Why? Now when I am insecure, and I know I am insecure, is there subtle urge, subtle intimation, that there is security? You understand? I am insecure. I am married and all the rest of it, but I feel insecure. But there may be also deep down in me the feeling that there is somewhere security and I am pursuing that unconsciously though I am trying to investigate insecurity - you follow? I wonder if you see this? I must be very clear that I am not surreptitiously under the table seeking security though I profess I am insecure.

So we must be clear right through our being that one lives in insecurity - why? Then we can ask the real question, but if you are half and half - you know half and half about anything you become mediocre. That is a good subject, mediocrity, but we won't go into that. The word 'mediocrity' means going up the mountain half way. A person who goes half way is mediocre, who doesn't go right to the top of it, not in professions, not in some particular subject, but psychologically he doesn't go right to the top of it, such a person is mediocre. I am not saying you are! (Laughter)

So what is insecurity? Can there be security at all? Don't be depressed, don't feel anxious, we are investigating. Can there be, though I am seeking, wanting, searching, longing for security, realizing I am insecure, I am also asking: is there really security at all? My search for security may be wrong. What I am seeking is not security but a quality of mind, brain, that will meet everything rightly - right? I wonder if you understand this? I feel insecure and I see life is insecure, there is death always, there is always an accident, there is always something happening, shaking my foundations. I realize that and I say to myself is there security at all? Wait a bit, don't deny it, I am questioning it, going into it, because security is necessary. The brain can only function effectively, vitally, fully with all its extraordinary capacity when it is secure, like a child, baby, must be secure. So the brain must feel that it is completely secure, not be shaken, it must be immovable in its security, then the brain is flowering - you understand? Are we following each other?

So let's find out if there is security at all. And if there is no security the brain cannot possibly function properly. So we are asking: what is security and insecurity? Are you getting tired? We are going to find out first what is insecurity, why we live perpetually in insecurity. Now in that very enquiry, why we live in this state, confusion and all the rest of it, the very awareness of it is the beginning of intelligence. Right? Are you following this? Now let's begin again.

I am insecure. I have searched for security, which is, run away from my insecurity, which is, I have created the opposite and I am in conflict with it: knowing insecurity and wanting security. There is a struggle going on. So I see how stupid that is. The very recognition of this is the beginning of intelligence - right? Are you following? Are we together in this?

Questioner: Not completely.

K: Not completely. Sir, look: we have divided the world into nationalities, and it is nationalities that is one of the major causes of war - right? One of the causes, the economic and so on and so on, but one of the causes is this feeling that we are separate from this person, you follow, nationalities. Now to recognize that and to be free of it is to be intelligent. No? Or would you want to be unintelligent? (Laughter) No, this is important, please. To recognize, to see that which is false and to abandon that is intelligence. Right?

Now I see, after investigating, which we have done, there is no security in belief - right? - because belief changes all the time. It can be argued down, it can be broken down, faith, belief, ideals bring doubt to it and it begins to disappear. So there is no security in that. Therefore my brain has seen that which is illusory, which it has considered before as giving it security, it has abandoned it. So it has become alive, intelligent. And it says: is there security at all? There is when there is intelligence - I don't know if you follow this? Intelligence is the most positive force of security. Right? Is this clear? To abandon psychologically everything that is false, to perceive it, to see it very clearly is intelligence. Where there is intelligence you don't even ask whether you are secure or insecure.

So, can we then, together, see the nature of security and insecurity, and in that very examination, observation, probing, discover for ourselves, not because anybody says, discover for ourselves that there is supreme security where there is intelligence? Not the cunning thought of intelligence - right?

Can we go to the next question?

3rd QUESTION: Would you please clarify what you mean by brain, mind and consciousness?

I am not going to clarify, we will talk over together. First of all we are not professionals, thank god: We are enquiring, not that professionals don't enquire, I don't mean that. We are ordinary laymen, we are enquiring into this very, very complex problem which is, consciousness, the quality - not the structure, the nature, the cells and all that, but the brain and the mind - right? Please don't look at me, look at yourselves.

First of all consciousness: to be conscious, which is to be aware, which is to be attentive, not negligent, but diligently enquire into the nature of our consciousness. There has been the division as the unconscious and the conscious. The unconscious is all the past, all the inheritance, all the memories of thousands of years of man - right? Unconsciously you may have the memories of being conditioned in Protestantism and Hinduism and all the rest of it, two thousand years of Christianity and propaganda has sewn deeply the fear of heaven and hell, the saviour - you follow? - it is there deeply. And if you go to the Islamic world, it is there also. And the Hindu world and so on. So the unconscious is the movement of the past. We won't go into too many details because it is a very complex question we are going into. The past is a thousand memories, thousand years of pain, struggle and all the travail of man. The unconscious is the idea that you are British, French and so on. And the conscious, as one observes, one may be wrong, one must always be doubting, the conscious is all the recent covering, education, technology, the covering. That is, the conscious mind has often the intimations of the unconscious - right? You are following all this? And the conscious mind is always, if one is at all aware, is being guided by the unconscious. You follow? So there is actually, if one is at all alive, aware, there is no unconscious and the conscious. It is one unitary movement, if one is alive, fully aware. And one is fully aware when there is a crisis, when there is some deep disturbing challenge everything, your whole consciousness comes into action. And our consciousness is everything that thought has put there - right? Our belief, our tradition, our faith, our fears of heaven and hell, our fears, you know, our whole movement of our life is our consciousness. That consciousness is part of our brain, of course. If I have no brain I have no consciousness. So the brain is part and the necessary movement of consciousness, acting through, or in the brain. Now the brain - I am not professional, please, I have discussed this point with professionals but they won't accept what we are saying but that doesn't matter, I may be false, I may be wrong. We are saying the brain is now conditioned - right? Technologically, look how much energy has gone into technology. Our brain is limited, conditioned through vast experience, knowledge, conditioned. But to discover the quality of the brain which is not conditioned and therefore infinite capacity, look at what the technological people are doing, they are not conditioned, they are enquiring, pushing, driving to find out, and therefore they have got extraordinary capacity - the atom bomb, the things the technicians, the scientists are creating, some of you don't even know about it, the horrors. So the brain has infinite capacity. But it is conditioned now as British, as French, and all the rest, I believe, I don't believe, I believe in god, in my guru, that guru is better than this guru - you follow? All that nonsense is going on.

So as it is conditioned its capacity is limited, and only when that conditioning is totally free, that means no faith, no fear, you follow? - no attachment of any kind to anything, to past memories, past experiences. And they are that way when they are technologically involved, they are tremendously alive, I have talked to them. They have no time, they brush you off. So is it possible for the brain to be unconditioned? Which means is it possible for the brain to be free of the known? That is, I have to know where I have to go home, which road to take, what language I speak, I have to, there is knowledge, but to be free psychologically, which is the conditioning, which the brain has been conditioned, conditioned by knowledge, to be free of that then it has got extraordinary capacity.

Then we are saying what is the mind? First of all we talked of consciousness, the brain and the mind. When the brain is completely free of that psychological knowledge, then the brain is the mind, because mind is infinite. So to understand all this you have to study yourself, not from books, not from other people, you have to look at your own life, give time, energy, patience, probing. We haven't time because we are chattering all the time. So mind, brain and consciousness are really one, when there is total freedom of all conditioning.

Shall we go on?

4th QUESTION: When we see someone being aggressive verbally or physically towards another, we feel a need to intervene. Can such intervention be just? Or is it a mere subtle reaction of the self?

Can't one find out for oneself, this? Can't one be aware of one's own reaction and see whether it is a self motivated reaction, or it is kindly - you know somebody is hurting, you naturally interfere. But if one is not aware of one's own reactions, it may be selfish reaction, make you self important. Is this question good enough, may I go to the next one?

5th QUESTION: The violence and disorder of the world demands from us an urgency and intensity of response, which we seem to lack. Our intellectual awareness is inadequate. Can there be a deeper awareness which meets the enormity of the problem?

Let's enquire together please, what is it to be aware? To be aware, to be conscious, to be cognizant, to be sensitive to everything, to nature, to people round you, sensitive in your own reactions, what does it mean to be aware? Is one aware of this marquee? Or you take it for granted? Have you counted the number of poles in this marquee? Have you looked at the trees, not give it a name, but to be aware of it, to be sensitive to it. Or is one aware of the person sitting next to you? Aware of his physical movement, how he looks at people, aware of his clothes, his dress or whatever it is. Or we are all so self-centred, we haven't time, we have no regard for another. We are so entangled with our own problems, with our own misery, that we don't look at anything else. So to be aware, does it not mean to see, feel, look, without any choice of what is happening? To be aware of what is happening in the world, not necessarily from newspapers and magazines but to be aware that there are wars going on, people are killing each other, thousands of years of shedding tears and we don't seem to have learnt anything. To be aware of all this without any choice. One is aware as a British, what is happening here, one knows very well. But one isn't aware globally as a human being. So are we aware in such a sense, a global feeling of mankind, not the Arab and the Israelis and British and the French and so on - it all becomes rather silly, all that kind of stuff. To be so aware of this human suffering, human sorrow, human pleasure. And if one is so aware, which is not concentration at all, aware, then the questioner says: is there an awareness of something very deep, from which you act? That is what the questioner says, asks. Then there is attention. Awareness and attention, not concentration.

Concentration is merely focussing all your energy on a particular point. That we can do fairly easily. When you are interested in certain subjects, certain ideas, certain story, you are completely concentrated. Or you may force yourself to concentrate, which is to resist other intrusions of other thoughts. But awareness is different: to be aware, to be sensitive, to have this feeling of a movement which is total, which is human. And attention is this quality in which there is no centre from which you are attending, which means no frontiers to attention, no borders. When there is that quality of attention, which is part of love and compassion, and intelligence, then from there one acts, or non acts.

Shall we go on to the next one? It is the last one.

6th QUESTION: At the talks you give many of us feel, or sense, something of immeasurable importance. This is not romantic fantasy, or illusion. It is more profoundly real than much of the rest of our lives. But after I leave I cannot stop the gradual dissipation of that great profoundness. Sir this is a true tragedy. What can one do?

First, if I may most respectfully ask, are you being influenced? Are you being stimulated? Are you being driven by the words of the speaker, or the feeling of the speaker, that what he says is true - if you think so. Are you being influenced by all that? Then if you are influenced, and I hope you are not, if you are, then it becomes a drug, then you lose it. Then you can't help dissipating that which you have been driven to, or influenced, or that which has been said or felt. If it acts as a drug then it must disappear. Quickly or gradually. But if one - this again is being said most humbly - if one actually hears what is being said and discovers for oneself the truth, then one is a light to oneself. That light itself can never be put out, can never be extinguished. But if one is dependent on another, however much the other may have something, if it is not part of one's life, one's daily beauty of this, then dissipation is inevitable. And the tragedy is that all of us do listen, sometimes profoundly, sometimes casually but that very seed is there, but we never give it an opportunity to let it flower. The world is too much with us. And to be conscious of all this, the vastness of the earth, the vastness of the human brain, and love and all that, is so, if one comes to it, not just verbally, romantically or sentimentally, but actually, then that fire can never be put out.

Right sirs. May I get up please?

BROCKWOOD PARK 4TH PUBLIC TALK 5TH SEPTEMBER 1982

This is the last talk. I suppose you will be glad, and I'll be glad too.

I think one should go over briefly what we have been talking about the last two talks and the two question meetings. We talked about the chaos in the world, the great uncertainty for all of us. Life is becoming more and more dangerous, unpredictable, and the future, from what one observes as things are politically, economically, even socially, it is rather grave. One is not pessimistic or optimistic, but these are facts. They are preparing for war. Man apparently has not learned from past history that killing another human being is of no value, it doesn't solve any problems. But apparently that is the fashion, that is the national inheritance and the accepted orthodoxy. And nobody seems to demonstrate, and there have been a great many demonstrations about nuclear war, about this and that, but nobody, from the highest to the lowest, seems to demonstrate to end all wars, not a particular kind of war, atomic, or a conventional war, or other types of war, but one has not given one's energy, or the drive, or the intensity to stop all wars. Of course the politicians would never agree to that, nor the gurus, nor the highest Christian authorities. If they did they wouldn't be the highest authorities.

And also we talked about the general disorder outwardly and the inward disorder that we live with. We talked about hatred spreading throughout the world more and more, and there seems to be no end to that. We talked also about human beings wounded psychologically from childhood and the consequences of that hurt, the wounds that one receives while being educated, in the family. Education, college, university, and the whole process of living seems to breed this kind of inward hurt, which breeds isolation, fear and the kind of neuroticism that seems to be common.

And also we talked about, perhaps the most important thing is relationship. How essential it is to find out for oneself to live a life in which conflict doesn't exist in relationship - sexual, the individual search for his own fulfilment, pursuing his own ambitions and therefore the relationship is never complete, it is always divided, like two parallel lines that never meet. And that is what we call relationship, and therefore in it there is perpetual conflict. And the cause of that conflict, that lack of deep fundamental relationship is this sense of isolation, not only the individual isolation, the very word indicates isolation, but that word too has a different meaning - indivisible, a human being who is not broken up, living at different levels of his life: business life, religious life, social life, family life and so on. Such a human being cannot possibly have deep abiding, lasting relationship in which there is love. We have talked about it quite a lot.

And also we have enquired together into the nature of fear, whether it is possible for human beings living in this ugly world, to be totally free completely of all fear. Fear is a terrible thing, it darkens, shortens, makes one's mind so brittle. And whether it is possible to be free of all fear, both psychologically and outwardly. Where there is fear there cannot be generosity, cannot be that sense of great affection.

We also talked about love and compassion and intelligence. We said that that which is love cannot be approached positively but that which is not can be put aside: jealousy, ambition, antagonism, ambition, competition, deny the very nature and the beauty of love.

And we talked also about compassion. There can be no compassion obviously if one is anchored in a belief, in a faith, in a dogma, or belonging to some group, some sect. Such a person may have pity, sympathy, generosity but it is not compassion. Where there is compassion there is intelligence. We went into that. We enquired into what is the nature of a human being who is intelligent. If intelligence is based on knowledge, is the outcome of knowledge, then we have a great deal of knowledge of most things in life, but that knowledge has not transformed us, has not made us intelligent. The very antagonisms, national divisions and racial and religious divisions indicate how unintelligent we are. Somebody should write a history about stupidity! I believe they have, perhaps in the thirties somebody wrote a book. But such books are easily forgotten. Put aside.

And we talked about yesterday the nature of suffering, why human beings, who apparently have such extraordinary skill, extraordinary capacity in the technological field, have not used that capacity, that energy, that quality of intensity to wipe away all human suffering, both physically and psychologically. Perhaps they will succeed wiping away physical pain, disease and so on, but man has lived for millenia upon millenia, and yet he suffers. And we went into that very carefully and it would not be the occasion again to repeat what was said yesterday morning?

So we ought to talk over together this morning, and please don't consider it rather morbid, or unnecessary on a lovely morning like this, to talk about death, because it is part of our life, as all the other characteristics of our life, like hate, jealousy, violence and occasional flare of the beauty of love; it is all part of our life. And also we ought to talk over together, not that you are listening to the speaker, copying his words, or his statements or trying to understand what he is talking about but rather together investigate these problems and find out the truth of them. And so please we are talking over together, you are sharing, partaking, co-operating, not just listening and then agreeing or disagreeing and walk off, do your T'ai chi endlessly or your Yoga, or some practice of some guru which he thinks will enlighten you, but we are concerned with our daily life, not some exotic, fanciful religious concepts but actual daily life of conflict, the confusion we live in, the uncertainty, the search for security. We have been through all that, it is part of our life. And also death is part of our life, though we may not acknowledge that fact. We may try to avoid it, slur over it, or only be concerned with the last minute, as most people are. So we should together enquire into the nature, into that extraordinary fact, as life is an extraordinary fact, we ought to consider that also.

And we should too consider before death and meditation, what is beauty. It is important too. Does beauty lie in the eye of the observer? Is beauty a state of mind that has studied all the paintings, the poets and the statuary of the world and come to a certain conclusion. The architecture of the most extraordinary buildings in the world, from the deep pyramids to the Parthenon, to the cathedrals, to the temples and the mosques. And when one observes those marvellous trees, the sequoias that have lived five to six thousand years, some of them, what is beauty, where is beauty? In the poems, in the literature, in the painting? Or when you see a beautiful person, well formed, beautiful features? What do you consider to be beauty? It is important because love goes with beauty.

So one must enquire into this nature of what is beautiful? When do you perceive beauty? You see a marvellous mountain with deep valleys and shadows, against the blue sky, with all the light of heaven upon it, and for a moment you are struck by its grandeur, by the greatness of that enormous solid rock. And for a second you are absent, you have forgotten your problems, your petty quarrels and all the rest of it, and you are facing this tremendous beauty. Does beauty exist only when the self is not? Please do ask these questions of yourself. The self, the me, the person, the name, the form, all those words of fear, violence and problems and deep loneliness with its despairs, that is the self, the me, striving, striving to become something. When that self is absent completely, does that state of mind, being, perceive beauty? As you do when you see a great monument, great mountains, for a second the self is driven away by an accident, by a crisis, then perhaps one sees that which is beautiful. It happens to all of us, please it is nothing extraordinary. When you see a lovely sunset, indescribable light, golden, orange, green, and for a second everything is forgotten. There is the startling clarity of beauty, of light. At that moment the self is not.

Now can one live that way, not be absorbed by something enormous, something majestic, like a child with a toy? The child is absorbed in the toy and forgotten all his eager mischief, for the moment the toy has taken him over until he breaks that toy. So he depends on that toy to make him forget. And we depend on some toy also, grown up people. The toy of a symbol, the toy of a world, the toy of a mantra - the word mantra, in Sanskrit, I believe, means meditate, or think over, not becoming and absorb all self-centred activity. That is the root meaning of that word - and what we have made of it!

So is it possible to live a life without causation? Please enquire together into this. Our life, our whole existence has a cause. I do this because... I love you because... I worship because I am afraid that my life is empty and perhaps some outside agency will help. There is always a cause in our life. And where there is a cause there is an ending. If I love because you offer me sex, pleasure, companionship, because it has a cause that kind of relationship soon ends. But to live a life without any causation is to live a life that is measureless because such a life has no ending. It isn't my life that I am ending. Those people who have a cause will always find an end. Perhaps that may be immortality, not my immortality or yours, but to live a life that has no beginning, which is a cause, and therefore it has no end. If one sees the beauty of that then life has a totally different meaning. Please, as we said, we are talking over together. It is not that the speaker is stimulating you, then the speaker becomes a drug, then you depend and all the mischief begins. But if we are together enquiring into this, probing very, very carefully, sceptically with a great deal of doubt of everything you have examined, because that may not be complete examining, doubt, scepticism are great factors in life.

And so we should together go into this question of death. What is it that dies? And what is it that lives? Both of them go together. When you use the word death, dying, it means that you have also lived. The two cannot be separated. That is a basic truth, that it cannot be separated, as you cannot possibly separate relationship as though by itself, like a hurt, like a wound, like a fear. They are all interrelated. There is no one problem. One problem if it is properly understood psychologically, then in that problem all problems are included. But if you separate and say this is one problem I must solve then you are reducing life into a shoddy little affair. But if one examines one problem completely, and to understand the nature of that completeness one must understand how one approaches a problem. So we must be very clear that life and death go together. They are not something in the distance. When one is young, full of life, enjoyment, and a great deal of energy one doesn't ever think about the other end. As one grows a little bit older, watches one's son die, then you begin to question, then you begin to shed tears and anxieties of life. Death is there for all of us. So what is it to die? And what is it to live? One cannot ask what it is to die without asking what it is to live. If we don't understand the living then we will be frightened of the other naturally. But if we understand the nature of living then we will comprehend also deeply the nature of dying, not what happens after death but rather what happens before one dies. That is far more important to find out what happens before dying rather than what happens after. Volumes have been written of what happens after death. And we are all eagerly searching or waiting, or rationalizing what happens after but we never look at what happens before. So we are going together to look at what happens before. What happens to all of us before, the thing called living, the thing called becoming, the struggles, the pains, the anxieties, the loneliness, the deep endless sorrow, working from morning until night until you are sixty and then retire to die? This is what we call living. And we are questioning whether that is living at all. Please you must question this, not I, not the speaker, but each one of us must question. Question, not find an answer. It is a challenge and you must know how to meet a challenge. This is a challenge. What is our life, the living? The acquisition of money, the search for power, sexual fulfillment, the striving, the conflict, the fears, the anxieties, the loneliness and the deepening sorrows, is that our life? It is our life. It is everlastingly becoming something. That is why you all belong - not all of you - some of you belong to some group hoping to become something, to become illumined, to become rich. So the becoming has a cause and if you don't become in a certain direction you go to the other and keep this strain of becoming all the time. That is our daily life, in the business world, in the political world, in the religious world. Think of it - absurd, in the religious world. The priest becoming the bishop, the bishop becoming the cardinal and the cardinal eventually becoming the top dog! No, please don't laugh, see the fact, see the extraordinary cruelty of it all. And this is what we call living and of course then we are frightened of death.

So we are going to find out if we can whether in this living, whether it is possible to be free completely of all the burden of man. That's what we have been discussing for the last sixty years or so, whether it is possible to be free totally from all fear, from all the wounds that man has given to man: the agonies, the loneliness, the utter separation of existence, whether we are individuals at all, because our consciousness with all the things that thought has put there like fear, faith and so on, is the common lot of all mankind. Our consciousness, though we think it is ours, individual consciousness, it is not when you examine it very closely. It is the common lot, common ground of all human beings. So one questions whether there is individuality at all, though on the peripheral, on the outward existence, you may be better educated, more money, better fed, better clothes, more power, but inwardly we are all the same. You all belong to one sect, or one group, one communal, call yourself or robe yourself differently but inwardly inside the skin, psychologically, you are humanity. And so you are basically not an individual, that is one of our illusions. We also say, "Thinking is my thinking". Thinking is never personal, individual, thinking is common to all mankind from the great philosophers to the mathematicians, to the scientists and to the poor ignorant man never knowing how to read or write or travel. Thinking is again common to all of us. So thinking is neither East nor West. That is our life.

When there is no freedom from this kind of travail and agony, and occasional sense of beauty then what is death, why are you frightened, why are we all so scared? The Hindus, the ancient Hindus have invented a theory that you will live after, carry on with your misery, this life, next life if you behave properly it will be better. You will have more money, better houses, better clothes and you will have greater power. Or you will be a great saint. And the Christians too have their own rationalization - resurrection, you know all the rest of it. Those who believe in reincarnation, that is to incarnate next life, what is it that incarnates next life? Go into it sirs, don't accept the tradition. Go into it, what is it that incarnates next life? Your thoughts? Your loneliness? Your striving? Your utter confusion and sorrow? And is sorrow, anxiety, loneliness and agony to be dispelled through time, which is evolution. We like to think so. We like to think violence will end, give me time. While you have time you sow the further seeds of violence, obviously. So those who believe in this theory, though some of them say, "Oh no, it is very actual" - maybe, one has to be very careful of all these beliefs. It isn't one belief that is going to solve all the problems. If you believe in that, that means you must live now a righteous life, a good life, an intelligent life, a life of love and compassion. But you don't. That is just a theory to comfort you at the last minute.

So what is it that dies? Please answer this question to yourself. Not what the books say, not what your tradition says because that just may be another form of illusion. It doesn't matter who says it, the Buddha or anybody, Shankara according to the ancient Hindus, they may be deceived, and human beings are deceived very, very easily because the root of it all is they want comfort.

So what is it that dies? Obviously your attachments, your bank account, though you may like to have it until the last minutes, it is your bank account, your beliefs, your loneliness, your relationship, intimate and otherwise, all that dies. Just see what happens. That is what is dying. You have collected a great deal of art treasure, wealth, good houses, your character, cultivated this and that, not only the garden but you have cultivated your own mind, your own heart. At the end of it all death is there. That is, all these qualities is you. You may call it the soul, the Hindus give it a different name but it is that centre of the self, the name, the form, the quality, the wounds, the hurts - all that is me. And through disease, old age or accident, all that is cut off. And that is death. Right? So we have separated living and death is somewhere far round the corner.

Now the next question to that is: can death take place while living? Please understand what we mean. I am attached to my family, to my wife, to my house, to the beautiful furniture I just bought the other day - I haven't bought it but - I am attached to all that. Death is the ending of that. Now can I living in this life with all my vitality, end the attachment, which is death? You understand? Are you following? I am attached to my wife, or to my children, more to my bank account, and death wipes all that away. While living with my clear mind, with her clarities, with my vitality, end that attachment, so I am living with death all the time. Do you understand the beauty of it? Do you understand? That is, ending that which psychologically I have accumulated. Therefore the living and the dying go together. Do you understand what it means? Would it be possible to do this? Have you ever tried, if one may ask most respectfully, have you ever tried to end something without any cause? Ordinary things - smoking, drinking, chattering, end following somebody, your leader, your guru, your priest, your specialist, specially psychologically I am not talking of the specialist, the doctor and so on. Have you voluntarily, without any cause, ended something? You may dislike somebody, hate somebody, end it. That is death. So one begins to understand, if one goes into it very deeply that death is not something at the end of one's life, however brief, or however long, but death is a movement of life. Death is closely related to life. And so where there is an ending, complete ending, without causation, then there is a beginning without an end, that is immortality. That is a state of timelessness. But if I am frightened of death, which is frightened of losing, to end that fear, lose now - you understand ? In that there is great beauty.

So we ought next to talk about - we haven't finished the subject of death because it is much too complicated. One has to go into it very, very deeply. That is, what happens to all of us whose consciousness is common to all mankind, what happens to the one who is out of that consciousness? What relationship has that person to the rest of mankind - you understand? I won't go into it now because we haven't got time. As I said death with all its meanings is very complex, needs very careful observation. It cannot be observed when there is fear. It requires great hesitancy, affection, seeing what life and death are.

Now we ought to talk about also, as this is the last meeting, what is meditation? In relation to that we ought to talk over together, what is religion? Go to the smallest Indian village, poor, hungry, probably one meal and that meal is not sufficient, and they have also the feeling of religiosity. They worship a tree, a stone. And you come to a more complicated, sophisticated society, it is the same movement, they may put a garland round a stone with great reverence. In a sophisticated society it is much more polished; there you have got marvellous cathedrals, churches, painted windows, solemnity, chanting, candles, the strange dress. That also creates a great atmosphere. If you have been to some of the old cathedrals where cardinals are performing, it is really an extraordinarily beautiful thing. Big announcements, all the world shall know all the things that go on - it may all be ridiculous but the atmosphere, the beauty of those vast pillars reaching up to the heavens. That is the same quality only polished, clean, healthy, two thousand years of repetition. It is the same as the man or woman in the village who puts a garland, a flower, in front of a stone. Both are so-called religious. Don't call the other a heathen, an ignorant man, he is doing exactly the same thing as you are, worshipping something outside, something, an agency, a god with all the paraphernalia of religious orthodoxy. So what is religion?

This is necessary to understand before we go into the question of meditation. Is all that is going on in the name of religion, the Judaic, the Arabic, the Islamic world, their brutality, their whippings - you know what is happening there. And all the vast superstitions of India with their three hundred thousand gods or more. You can invent as many gods as you like and that is more fun than having one god! But all gods are invented, as all the rituals. But the longing, the feeling that there must be something beyond all this, beyond all the human suffering, beyond all the human sorrow, work, labour, all the materialistic world and their marvellous technology, there must be something beyond all this, otherwise life has very little meaning as it is now. So man invents: my life is empty, shallow, meaningless and I must have something more. So he invents gods. And gods are invented. God hasn't created us - if he has he must be rather a funny god! Because he has made our life into such appalling misery, hate and all the rest of it. So we have made god after our own image, which is the opposite of what we are - kind, benevolent, all-knowing, protective, great comforter and so on. Is all that religion? And man has always searched for something sacred. You may not believe in anything sacred. That is your affair. But there are many millions and millions, including oneself, if one is serious, one asks "Is there something sacred? Imperishable? Not measurable?" And to come upon that meditation is necessary. So we must ask: what is meditation?

To find out what meditation is, the beauty of it, not the word - the word means to ponder over, the meaning of that word, to ponder, to think, to recollect - so to find out what is meditation we must approach it negatively. That is to find out what it is not. You understand? Most of us are so positive, and we think meditation is something that we have to do, practise, but if we can approach it with intelligence, not with desire, but with intelligence, which is to see what it is not. So shall we do it together? What it is not.

First of all it is not a system. If you practise a system your brain becomes more mechanical than it is - right? It is so obvious. If I practise some Tibetan, Zen, or recent money-makers of meditation, then this repetition, whether it is twenty minutes morning, afternoon and evening, repeat mantras, knowing the meaning of that word, if you knew the meaning of that word you would never repeat the mantra, it is so ridiculous. So any practice - it is like practising a wrong note on the piano. You may practise, practise, practise - so please go into this. The Eastern world has brought this unfortunate word here. So meditation is not practising a method. It is so obvious. Whether it is the Zen, which is extraordinarily put together, from ancient India it went to China, from China to Japan. They couldn't pronounce a certain Sanskrit word 'dhyana', and so on and so on. Nor is it a becoming - right? Meditation is not a becoming. That means meditation is not a process of time. Is this clear? That is, according to all the people who have advocated meditation, it is a process of achievement. I am here, I am building layer by layer, brick by brick, day after day, until I am illumined. Whatever that may mean! So it is a practise, a becoming in time. See the implications of this. We are talking over together, you are not accepting what the speaker is saying. See what is involved in this. That illumination is a matter of time. Is it? They say the Buddha went through all kinds of trials, sat under a tree and suddenly got illumined - which I question. Illumination is not a matter of time, which means gradually becoming something, gradually putting away all the miseries of one's life, step by step like you peel an onion, shedding tears, one after the other. See what that means: this constant conscious effort to achieve a result. The result being that which has been promised, that which has something totally different from my daily miserable life. "I will, in spite of all the misery, I will work for that." It is like building a house on sand. And this is called meditation.

Meditation is also called great awareness - be aware of your breathing, your control, step by step, control. That is, becoming aware of yourself, of your thoughts, of your feelings, of your reactions. Is that meditation? You can do all that very easily, why call it meditation?

So if all that is not meditation, which means meditation is not a conscious effort. Where there is conscious, deliberate effort there is the action of will. Will is the summation of desire, as one desires to become prominent in the business world, what is the difference? You call this more holy, the other is mundane. But it is the same movement. So if meditation is not a conscious process, which is will of action - I will practise, I am lazy this morning, I must get up, and all the rest of it, sit cross legged, breathe properly, do this kind of yoga, that kind of yoga - you follow? It all becomes so childish if you look at it all. That is not intolerance, why should one be tolerant about ugliness? That means you put up with it. If all this is nonsense, they are all making quantities of money out of it, they are rich beyond words, some of them are. So if all this is not meditation, then what is meditation?

That is, a mind, a human being, understands this world, the world outside of us, and the world inside. And in the understanding of the world outside and the understanding of the inside, they are like the tide, going out and coming in. Please understand the reality of this. It is a tide - right? The tide has gone out, created the world, the world outside of us - wars and all the rest of it - and then the tide comes in carrying the same movement within us, and we modify it, we cherish it, we do something to it, and it goes out. This is the movement. They are not separate movements - my movement is not separate from the world. It is this eternal movement that has been going on. Man has created society and then he becomes a slave to society. This is the movement.

Now please go into this. To have no such movement - you understand? Have you captured this? To end such a movement, without any cause, because if there is such a movement it is the perpetual reaction, perpetual response to the outer, and then that response creates another reaction in me and I react and create another outward response. So this movement of the outer and the inner, when that stops, comes to an end, not consciously, then you are back - if you do it consciously then you are back into the same movement. That is to see the truth of this, to perceive the nature of this movement, the logic of it, the sanity of it, the truth of it. When one perceives that then there is the ending of that.

To put it differently: I hope you are not tired: to put it differently: we depend on experience, that is what all the meditative people, who have all these kind of strange experiences, that is, to recognize an experience as an experience you must have already known about it. I read a book about some strange experience of another, he may be all cuckoo but yet he has written a marvellous book and I read it, and I say, "By Jove, I have got some pain in my head" - or somewhere - "and I am beginning to have that experience." So to live - please understand this - to live without a single experience, which means to be a light to oneself. Right? And seeing all the religious circus that is going on in the world, in the name of god, in the name of whatever it is, is meaningless, having perceived the truth of all that, having set aside completely all that, that means there is no outside agency, except you. And meditation is the ending of this movement of action and reaction, the outer and the inner.

And then such an ending, because it has no cause it is endless - you understand? It is timeless.

And also we should go into this question of a mind, a brain, that is quiet. This is part of meditation, not make the brain quiet, through breathing, through repetition, through various tricks, but to make the whole physical, psychological entity absolutely quiet, to bring about this quietness, which is to bring about this silence of the brain. There are various types of silence: silence between two terrible noises, silence between two thoughts, silence between two efforts, silence between two notes. It is like silence squeezed between two wars. That is what we are having. There is quietness, there is peace between two wars. That is not silence, that is not peace.

So one has to enquire what it is to have a deep causeless silence. When the brain is totally free of its conditioning, then only there is that quality and a great depth of that silence. Then in that silence there is the flowering of that which is eternal. But that requires, all this requires great seriousness, not just an hour separated from the rest of one's life, but life is serious and if one wants to be serious it is up to all of us. The world demands such a group of beings who are tremendously serious. In that seriousness there is humour too. So a small group can affect the whole world, as one human being can affect the whole world. So this whole movement is meditation and the happening of that which is timeless, nameless, measureless. Meditation means also to have no measure. That is also part of the root meaning of that word meditation, to have no measurement, to have no comparison. That which has happened is finished, you don't build on that which has happened. There must be constant emptiness so that there is a movement without any cause. May I get up please?

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 28TH DECEMBER 1982

There are a lot of questions here, which I haven't seen. It's good to ask questions, and from whom do you expect the answer? Is the answer more important than the question? To put the question rightly also requires an art. When you have put the question, are you putting it to somebody, or to yourself? And if the question is important, does the answer lie in the question, or away from the question? I hope we are communicating with each other. Does the answer lie, or is contained, or held in the question itself and not away from it? So in answering some of these questions we are going to examine the question, not try to find the answer to it, because in the examination of that question the answer itself lies, or is revealed in the examination of that question. I hope this is clear, that you and I are going to examine the question. See the nature of the question, the significance of that question, and in the understanding of that question the answer is revealed in the question. Are we together in this, I hope.

1st Question: In the first talk you said that thought is responsible for all our problems. And you also said that thought has failed to resolve those conflicts, and you raised a question: if there is any other instrument to resolve our conflicts. Please explain.

Do we all agree, or see the truth that thought throughout the world has brought about a great technological advancement, whose future is incalculable, and that thought has created the wars, the destruction of human beings; thought has created all the religious edifices, and the content of those edifices, it has created all this. Are we all together on this point? Are we? Would you agree to that? Or you believe that thought is not responsible for the content of your temples, the churches and the mosques? What's your reaction to it, please if you will kindly talk it over with the speaker. You understand what I have said? That thought, which is the act of thinking, is responsible for all the wars in the world, for the national divisions of the world, that thought has created the gods which we worship, all the rituals, the whole hierarchical outlook of religious structure. Would you agree to all that? Not just intellectually agree, that has no meaning. Do we see this? What's the difficulty? Would you kindly talk it over with me? Or do you think the gods, the various saviours, are not the result of actual thinking? No?

Q: The significance which thought creates is not thought.

K: The gentleman says, the significance of thought is not thought. When we use the word 'significance' it means the meaning. Right sir? The meaning which thought conveys. Thought cannot be separated from its significance, can it? Or significance, the meaning, is contained in the thought. I think that - suppose - I think that India is the most spiritual country, and I think about it, surely it is thought that has given the significance that India is the most extraordinarily religious country. Right? What's the difficulty, sir?

So I am sure you don't agree with this, because for a very obvious reason, that the things that we worship in the temples and so on, are some miraculous happening, are something that is brought about through some kind of divine action. That's why we rather hesitate to accept or see the fact that thought has been responsible for all this. Right?

Q: We do not know any other response.

K: We are going to find out. But that requires a great deal of enquiry and freedom, otherwise you cannot find out. One has to put aside all that which is false. Right? How can one find anything new if we are attached to old traditions which are dead, to some belief which we hold dear, to some ideal we think is necessary - if we hold on to all those there is no freedom for enquiry. Right? Sir, a good scientist, in his research first he acquires, has the knowledge of other people who have researched, has accumulated, and then he must set aside all that to find something new, otherwise he is not a top scientist, he is merely a machine repeating. Would you agree to that?

Q: What is it that generates thought?

K: What generates thought? What do you think generates thought? What is the beginning of thought?

Q: Thought is the result of something happening after observing.

K: Thought is the result of something happening. The happening is - suppose, I have a motor accident and I have broken my leg, and that is an experience which is stored in the brain, an experience stored in the brain, and that experience is knowledge of that accident, and from that accumulated knowledge of that accident there is memory, and from that memory there is thought, that I had an accident which was very painful. It is the whole movement of experience, knowledge, memory and thought. That's the origin of thinking. Not the accident, and then thought, the whole accident took place because I was driving badly. Or somebody ran into me. What's the difficulty in this?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I'm afraid I haven't heard. Has somebody heard? Would you kindly repeat it?

Q: You said the discovery of the findings of the previous scientists had to be set aside for a scientist to discover something new.

K: Obviously.

Q: Or has he to put away as the previous scientist's knowledge and experience in order to find something new.

K: Of course, sir. If I am a physicist I study from college, from school, college, university, and have accumulated a great deal of knowledge about physics, matter, the enquiry into matter, and if I want to discover something new I must put aside all that which I have known. Have you ever considered how the jet - you know, the jet aeroplane - came into being. It didn't just happen. The previous engineers who constructed the piston engine had gathered a lot of information and had put that aside and said this isn't good enough, and they were looking, waiting, searching, and suddenly somebody discovered the jet. But we don't want to do that. And one wonders whether one likes to live in this conditioned brain with all its problems, you follow, and accept it and carry on.

So the speaker said at the first talk that all the activities of thought, both important and unimportant, dangerous and the search for safety, security, are all the movements of thought. It's so obvious. I don't know why we hesitate about this matter. Right sirs? Can we go on from there? No. It is very difficult for us to accept a fact, or a truth, when we are attached to our own particular concepts. If you would kindly for this morning at least put aside all one's conclusions, beliefs and ideas, and look at something different. After all, when you have a refrigerator in your house, if you are rich enough or well-to-do, you have moved away from the old, haven't you. But in the same way would you kindly move away from the old and see what happens. You may not like it, it may disturb you life, but you can go back to it.

Q: I think there might be fear.

K: Of course, of course there is fear. That's why you are all hesitant. It's so obvious. If you are guaranteed that whatever the new instrument is, and you haven't to do anything, you would grab at it very quickly. But unfortunately we are so frightened of anything new. Right? Because it is very disturbing. You have to scrap all the piston engines, you have to invest a great deal of money in something new. And that's what's called material progress, which you are doing. You are not frightened of having a new refrigerator or a new washing machine, or a new car. But one is really frightened to let the old go. Which indicates that one's brain is functioning mechanically. Right, sir? I have known this, I am going to stick to it, and prove, guarantee me something that if there is the new I will also be safe. When you invest money, perhaps some of you do, when you invest money in stock there is always fear that it might not succeed, but you invest it. Right? Because there is the reward behind it. Here there is no reward. That's what your trouble is. Here there is no reward because it requires clear thinking, clear objective, non-personal observation. Right sirs?

Q: Sir I have the realization that religion is a form of security for those who are psychologically insecure. Could you explain the origin of our first thought?

K: The origin of first thought. Do you want my explanation?

Q: Very much so.

K: What for? I'll explain, but what for?

Q: From what I can gather, sir, for thought to observe itself.

K: Have you ever done that?

Q: I'd like to try it.

K: You are all so crazy. You won't do anything original for yourself. You see that means we are so authority-bound, so traditional, so mechanical, and you don't see the mechanical process of thought. All right sir, let's go back to it.

The questioner says, thought has created the problems, like war, like various forms of division between people, and thought then, having created the problem, thought tries to find the answer to the problem. Right, sir, would you agree to that? Would you agree to that? I have created a problem between myself and my wife, we have constant rows, disputes, quarrels. They arise because I want something and she wants something else. Or she tells me what to do which I don't want to do. You understand? This constant division. Now has thought created the problem between me and my wife? I am not married, fortunately, and I am asking you, has thought created the problem, this quarrel between me and my wife? Would you kindly answer this.

Q: Yes, sir.

K: Obvious, isn't it? No? By golly, you are the most extraordinary people all right. You refuse to see something obvious and acknowledge it. Thought has created the problem, quarrelling with my wife, and then thought says, I am going to try and resolve the problems. Right? First it creates the problem, then it tries to solve the problem. You have it in this country politically, haven't you? It is all such a mess here. No? Even that you won't acknowledge. All right, sirs, it's up to you.

Q: Is not a question of collective thought?

K: Yes, sir, it is collective thought. Do you understand, sir, when you said sir, if I may respectfully ask, do you understand what the implication of that is?

Q: There is no me.

K: If thought is collective, then your thinking is collective, and therefore you are part of the collective. Right? So you are not an individual. Look sir, thought has created the problem. I am a Jew, you are an Arab. Right? Could you look at that, what is happening in the Middle East? I am a Jew, you are an Arab. I am a Jew because for the last three to four thousand years I have been programmed. Right? I have been told from childhood, and do various activities of childhood, that I am a Jew. Right? That is repeated to me day after day, day after day. So my brain is conditioned to the acceptance that I am a Jew. Right? And the other fellow across the border, which may be very near, he has been also told that he is an Arab, a Palestinian Arab. He has repeated that for the last fourteen hundred years, and he repeats that. Right sirs? Now has not thought created the Jew? And the Arab? Has not thought created that you are a Hindu? You accept that? If you accept that, then thought is responsible for the division between the Arab and the Jew, between the Hindu and the Muslim.

Right? And thought then, because of this division, brings about conflict. Right? Pakistan and India. Right sirs? Which is, that division has brought about war. So thought is responsible for war. Right? And then thought says, I must solve this problem; we must seek peace. But I still remain a Jew and you still remain an Arab. No?

Q: A noble thought can...

K: So there is a noble thought and ignoble thought. Right? But it is still thought. Right sir? It is still thought. You may think what I say may be ignoble, and you may be noble, but the division, the division between what is noble and what is ignoble is created by thought. No?

Q: Thought arises from experience, cannot thought arise spontaneously?

K: The gentleman asks cannot thought and experience arise spontaneously. No? He didn't say that. I didn't hear properly.

Q: Thought arises out of memory and experience, cannot thought arise spontaneously?

K: Yes, I see. Thought arises from experience, knowledge, memory. Right, sir? And you are asking cannot thought arise spontaneously without knowledge.

Q: And without experience.

K: Yes, that's right. Can thought arise spontaneously without knowledge, without experience and memory? That's the question, sir. Now what do you mean by spontaneity?

Q: Spontaneity means without experience and the past memory.

K: Yes, sir. I am asking, if you will forgive me, I am asking what do you mean by the word 'spontaneous'?

Q: Having no knowledge.

K: Sir, to be spontaneous.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, sir, the word, the meaning of the word, it means something you do spontaneously, you do it without thought, which means you do something from freedom. Right? Are you free to do something freely? If I may ask you a question sir.

Q: We try to do that.

K: You can't try freedom. Either you are free or not free. You can't say, 'I will try to become free'. You see if you are really interested in all this, would you kindly listen first? The speaker has said over and over again that thought is the result of experience, knowledge, memory, stored in the brain, and from that memory thought arises. If I have no knowledge, no experience, no memory, what am I? I am in a state of amnesia. Right? You know that word 'amnesia' means blank. Right sir? Unless one has an accident, or some kind of disease in the brain, human beings have not amnesia - that would be terrible, wouldn't it? So please listen, find out for yourself, whether thought is not responsible for all our miseries, and also thought is responsible for this extraordinary free flowing technology. Right, would you agree to that?

Q: To find out should we not think?

K: Yes. Think. All right, let's think. Let's think. Now wait a minute. Let's think. Right, will you think with me? Or...

Q: You said thought cannot solve our problems.

K: I have said it, the speaker has said it. You may not believe it.

Q: I may not believe it but then to find out the origin of it shouldn't I think to find it out.

K: I am going to point out lady, I am going to do it presently. But first if you don't mind my telling you most respectfully that we must think first. Right? Do we think, or repeat, repeat, repeat? Is repetition thinking? Right? I have been trained as an engineer and I repeat. Right? So are we aware that our brains are mechanical now? You see now there comes our difficulty. Right? Would you agree to that? That our brains now, the educated brains and the uneducated brains have become mechanical. Would you agree to that? Are we aware that your brain, your actions are mechanical? If you admit our brains are mechanical then your life is mechanical. No? Right? You are unwilling to admit that. That's just it!

Q: Sir, when you come to the conclusion that thought is responsible for all our misery...

K: It's not a conclusion, it is a fact.

Q: Whether it is a fact, you see knowledge is limited, and thought is limited because is a kind of knowledge.

K: Sir, the speaker has said knowledge is limited. Right?

Q: Yes, limited.

K: Are you aware the knowledge is limited?

Q: No, according to you.

K: Sir, sir, just a minute if you don't mind. Are you merely accepting what the speaker says, or have you investigated for yourself that knowledge, all knowledge, not a particular subject, all knowledge - the scientific knowledge, the technological knowledge, the knowledge of books, the knowledge of your experience, all knowledge is limited.

Q: Yes, if it is limited then it means that thought, which is a kind of knowledge, is also limited. So we can't say.

K: I don't quite understand this.

Q: Well we accept that knowledge is limited.

K: Don't accept it, sir, it's a fact.

Q: OK, it's a fact.

K: Not, OK. Really most extraordinary. Sir, when you have pain - I hope you haven't - when you have pain you don't acknowledge that you have pain, you have pain. Right sir? Right sir? Now do we see the fact that thought born of knowledge is always limited? Right, sir, can we go on from there? That knowledge is limited, otherwise there would be no technological advancement, if it is limited you stop, but they are breaking through. You understand? Trying to find more and more and more, but whatever they find is always limited because there is something more. Right? Technologically. Agree to that sirs? So as knowledge is limited, thinking which is born of knowledge must always be limited. Right? Would you agree to that? This is logical, sir. So what is limited must inevitably create problems. Right? Would you agree to that? Look sir, I am a Jew, you are a Hindu, or a Muslim, or Arab - the same thing, the Islamic world. The division has taken place by thought. Right sir? Thought has brought this division because thought itself is limited. Right? So where there is division there is bound to be limitation. Right? Where there is limitation there must be conflict. I am a Jew, you are an Arab. Right? This is difficult. Right sir?

I am saying, to put it differently, where there is division, Jew, Hindu, Arab, where there is a division there must be conflict.

Q: There can be division without conflict.

K: Oh, can there be?

Q: Yes.

K: Just a minute, look into it. The Arab and the Jew; the Arab says, god is with me; and a different kind of god is with the Jew - which is created by thought. Right?

Let's go into it again: would you acknowledge, or see the fact for yourself without the speaker influencing you, that thought is limited. It can imagine the limitless but it is still born of thought. Right? Now thought has divided the world into Christian, Buddhist, Hindu, Muslim, so where there is division there must be conflict. Wait a minute, I'll bring it much nearer. Is there not division between you and your wife, or your husband? Right? Would you acknowledge that? There is, sir? So where there is division there must be conflict between you - perhaps not you sir, I hope - but isn't there conflict between you and your wife? That is, if there was no division would there be conflict? No, obviously. So conflict arises always where there is a division - the poor and the rich, the communist and the non-communist, the Marxist and the capitalist and so on. Right? So where there is division, there must be conflict, it's law. Right? It's a law, it's an eternal law. Agree? Where there is division of any kind there must be struggle, conflict, problems.

Q: You cannot do without thought.

K: We are going to find out, sir. You are saying that we cannot do without thought. Now where are the limits of thought? You understand my question? That is, where do you draw the line? Thought has its place, which is going to the office, speaking a language, driving a car, the whole world of technology, thought is necessary. Right? Now where is thought not necessary? Find out, sir, come together, let's find out. You understand my question, sir? Thought is necessary. Thought is necessary to go from here to your house. You take the road, the car and all the rest of it. And we also see that thought has created division, where there is division there must be conflict, that's a law. So where do you draw the line, say thought is necessary, and thought is not necessary? I wonder if you understand this? Is thought necessary - just a minute, listen, please sir - is thought necessary in relationship? Now you are stuck!

Q: If physical needs create division, why hunger?

K: Hunger is hunger. No, sir. It's not your hunger or my hunger, it's hunger.

Q: It's the vital food.

K: Which is what?

Q: I don't know.

K: Don't say you don't know, let's look at it. Survival. I seek...

Q: I need food.

K: I understand sir. I need food and you need food. Now in India there is over population, multiplying every year by ten million or more. You understand the danger of all this, sir? And governments are trying to solve the problem, I don't know if they are, but perhaps you know better. Now can they ever solve it? You want food and I want my food. Right? Hunger - to survive we must be fed. Now if the population is increasing every year by fifteen million, I wonder if you realize what that means. Every year the population of Holland is added to this country. You understand sir? Now how are you going to solve the problem? By being India, which means what? A global relationship. Right? Would you agree to that. A global relationship which means no nationalities. Right?

Q: My physical needs create a division.

K: Yes, sir, I am saying that. Because your hunger, my hunger must be fed. And there are thousands of people in this unfortunate country not being fed. One meal a day, or less than that. And how is this multiplying population going to be fed? Either India has a great deal of rain, no failure of monsoons and so on and so on, even then it will not be enough. Right? Therefore logically, humanly, sanely, there must be no division between people - America, and - which means global interrelationship. Right? And no governments want to do that because you elect them, because you still feel you are an Indian, he still feels a Pakistani. This is all so simple sir. Can you drop your nationalism?

Q: The government encourages nationalism.

K: Of course, the government encourages you to be nationalistic.

Q: Competition will...

K: Yes, sir, I know all that. And you fall into the trap. And you like that.

So, let's come back. Do you see the fact, if I may ask, that where there is division between my wife and myself there must be conflict? Right sir? Now how will you get over that conflict?

Q: By...

K: Wait, sir, look at it carefully. I am married, I have a wife. She thinks one way and I think another way. She wants babies and I don't want babies. She wants to be popular, belonging to some select group, and I say, silly, I don't want that. You follow? There is constant division. Isn't your problem this? No? Gosh, are you ashamed, we don't even face these facts. Right. Now how am I to get over this division which thought has created? You understand? Right? I am ambitious, I am greedy, I am envious, I want to become the executive, or the chief foreman in a factory, and she has her ambitions and so on. Right? So what shall I do? Both are created by thought. Right? So what shall I do? Advise me please.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Drown my wife, are you saying?

Q: The moment I am aware...

K: Sir, just stick to one simple thing sir: there is division between me and my wife, and that division must inevitably create conflict. Right? How am I to get over this division?

Q: Compromise.

K: Compromise. That's - all right, compromise. What am I compromising?

Q: The moment I want something and she wants something...

K: Sir, are you being factual, or just imagining? How do I compromise with my wife? I don't want to go out at night to parties and all that, she does. Wait, sir, listen to this, sir. And what am I to compromise with? I don't want to go out at night, to parties. I think parties are disgusting. Personally I do. I don't want to go out. And my wife who has been brought up differently because her father is rich and all that nonsense, and she says, I want to go out - where is the compromise?

Q: You allow her to go and you don't go.

K: So she goes and I stay at home. And you call that compromise? You are all rather funny, sir. Do look at it please. Stick to one thing.

Q: You can't do anything, you just think about it.

K: No, sir. If there are a whole group of us, not just you and I, but the whole group of us, saying look, nationalism is a disease. Right? Nationalism divides people, nationalism creates - one of the reasons for war is nationalism, economic war, you follow, all that. So I have thought about it and you have thought about it. As long as there is nationalistic division there must be starvation. Right? So the solution to that is no nationalism, a global relationship. People - it is now becoming more and more strong, nationalism - British, British, British; French, French - you follow? So one has to show to all the people logically, sanely, that nationalism is a disease. Then we might have food for all people. Right sir?

Q: In Russia there is no starvation.

K: What are you talking about sir? They are buying grain from all over the world. You people! You see you don't - you always go back to something, explain something else. Please just give this one thought, think about this, that where there is division there must be conflict. My wife and I quarrel, have rows every day. You understand what happens when I have a quarrel with my wife everyday what is happening to me and to her? You aren't even aware of it. What is happening to her? We are destroying each other, aren't we? No? Now if you see the fact, not theories about it, not intellectual comprehension, it is a fact that where there is division there must be destruction. Right? Destruction is quarrels, rows, each wanting his way. Right? So what shall I do? Thought cannot solve this problem. Right? Are you quite sure? Then what will you do? Thought is not the answer to our quarrels, to our divisions, then what shall I do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, sir.

Q: See that nationalism is a danger.

K: Do you see nationalism as a danger?

Q: Somewhat.

K: Not somewhat, sir. Cancer is danger, isn't it? If I have cancer, will I say it is partly dangerous.

Q: Cancer is...

K: I say nationalism is a cancer, is cancerous. Right?

Q: How is the family unit to be secure without nationalism?

K: Sir, you jump from one thing to another. You haven't given up your nationalism, you won't, I know you won't, but you have now turned to the family unit. What is a family unit? Me, my wife, or my wife and me, and my children. Right? I educate them, if I can, send them to a good school, if I can, and I am concerned. As the world is now over populated my son goes off to Bombay, or to Delhi, or to America, and my family is in some village or in some town, the family is broken up. Right? There is no family unit. Even in India that is gradually being broken up. It has broken up in Europe and in America. And that's one of the calamities. Oh, you people don't even think about all this. Right sir?

So is there another instrument which will solve this problem? You understand, sir? You understand my question? Thought has not solved it by yielding to her, or surrendering to her, or she surrendering to me, which is a terrible thing, isn't it. Why should she surrender to me, or I to her? When you surrender you are still what you are. So what shall I do? Knowing that thought will not solve this problem, what shall I do?

Q: End my 'me'.

K: Now, how do you end the 'me'?

Q: By being aware.

K: Don't use just words, sir, don't play with me. This is a serious talk, don't just play with words. Are you aware of your selfish attitudes, are you aware that your wife is selfish and you are selfish? Are you aware that your children are also selfish? And this selfishness is increased by becoming an engineer, a physicist. They may be marvellous physicists, great scientists, but their life is mediocre. No? So what shall I do?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: I am going to show you something. I know you are aware. You are aware of the division. Right sir? And what havoc it is creating in the world. Agree? Sir, this is not an agreement, you have to feel this, it must be in your blood, that wherever there is division there must be conflict. That's a law, like gravity is a law. Right?

Q: Don't be a part of division.

K: You hear that statement, sir? Don't be part of division. He is just throwing words. You are not serious when you just say, drop your division. You can't. Sir, just let's stick to it. We are divided. Right? My name, my form, my desires, my reactions, my education has helped me to keep divided. Right? And that division is creating great danger outwardly as war, and also with my wife and children. What shall I do? Pray to god? Run off? Leave, abandon my wife? Or she runs away. What shall I do? Don't go to sleep, please, find out what to do.

So I have to enquire, haven't I? Right sir? What does enquiry mean? To enquire into something I must be free to enquire - there must be freedom to enquire. Right? I mustn't say, this is the way to solve it, this is the way to solve it, I must surrender, I must do this - I must be free from all that to enquire. Right? Like a scientist, he is free to enquire. Right sir? So are you free to enquire? Or in your enquiry there is a motive. You understand what I am saying sir? If there is a motive, that motive is going to dictate your enquiry. Right, sir? So can you enquire without a motive, without an end, just to have the capacity, the intelligence to enquire. You understand, sir? That is, I have a tremendous problem between me and my wife - which is the same problem in the world - you understand? This problem cannot be solved by thought. So what shall I do? I must find a new instrument which is not thought. Right sir? Now I have to enquire into it, I can't say, tell what is the new instrument. Right? I have to enquire. Right sir? Now to enquire there must be freedom, from my tradition, from my conclusions, from my opinions. Right? I can't say, I'll stick to my opinion, my conclusion, my tradition, and enquire, that is not possible. You understand? It is like a boat in a harbour which has dropped its anchorage, and says, 'I must sail' - it must remove the anchor and then move. Right sir? The anchorage that you have dropped is your tradition, is your belief, is your conditioning, is your conclusions - drop them, otherwise you can't find the new. Right sir? Right? Would you agree even logically to that? Can you drop your conclusion, that there is god, there is no god, that this system is better - conclusion. Do you know the meaning of that word 'conclusion' means - to end all further discussions. I conclude you are great, and I stop there. But if I don't conclude I have freedom to enquire. You follow sir? Most of us have conclusions.

Right? Now to enquire I must drop my conclusions. Right? Which means what? The brain then is becoming free. Right sir?

Conclusion now is conditioning the brain, is limiting the activity of the brain. Right sir? So if I drop my conclusions about politics, about god, about anything, drop it, then the brain becomes extraordinarily alive. Right? Right, sir?

Sir, look, some Indians are going abroad, aren't they? Here they feel there is no opportunity for them. They go abroad and do extraordinarily well - extraordinarily well in the sense of having a great deal of money. Right sir? They are doing very well, joining big companies, inventing new things. And here they say there is no opportunity. I heard an Indian, who is fairly well known on television in England, he was being interviewed, the interviewer asked him, 'Are you going back to India?', and the Indian said, 'No, there is no opportunity there'. Right? Opportunity being more selfish advancement. Right sir? More money. Yes, sir.

So, will you give up your conclusions to investigate? Right sir? Will you? To find out how to end this terrible destruction between me and my wife, between my wife and me. You understand, sir, can't we give up a conclusion to settle this. How tragic it all is, isn't it sir? I can't give up a conclusion, or several conclusions, to end the battle between me and my wife. Right, sir? Which means what? We are so damn selfish. Right sir? Unless you drop, understand naturally, logically, sanely, that any form of conclusion - the word 'conclusion' means to end: I conclude a Treaty, I conclude a marriage, I conclude that god exists, then I can't enquire. If I keep on repeating, 'I believe in god, god, god' - it just a repetitive conclusion. But if I really want to find out if there is god then I have to drop my conclusion and enquire. Which means I must be fearless to find out. Right, sir?

Q: Why do we cling to conclusions?

K: Because why am I clinging to my conclusions, you think in conclusions there is safety, there is security. You don't know what will happen if you give up your conclusions, therefore you are frightened, therefore you hold on to your conclusions.

Q: How can we break it?

K: It is not, how to break it. See the fact. I have got cancer. That's a fact. I don't say, how to break it, it's a fact. So I go to the doctor and the doctor says, my friend, come immediately you have to be operated. If he is a good doctor and you trust him and all the rest of it, I am operated, I may die but I am out of it. Right sir? But I may die. And if I don't, say, 'I may die therefore I am frightened' I don't get operated but I stand with the pain. It's all so logical.

So I am concerned to end my division, quarrel with my wife. I am concerned. I really want to end this division between me and my wife, between me and the world. You understand all the rest of it. And for that I have to give up - I see I cannot conclude, if I do there must be division, and the quarrel will continue. That's all. If you like quarrels, if you like rows, endlessly until you die, it's your life. If you like to live that way, live that way, don't talk about god, puja, that leads to hypocrisy. The rich man doing puja - right sir? You see the cynicism of it? Right sir?

Q: The trouble is that I can't give up my selfishness.

K: I didn't say that. Give up your conclusion.

Q: I can't give up my conclusion.

K: I don't want to conclude - selfishness is such a complex, subtle process, take one thing, which is conclusion, and find out if you can end it. I conclude I must be something, and my poor wife doesn't want any conclusion, she wants to be treated kindly, gently, affectionately. My conclusion is preventing that. Right? Will you give up your conclusion? Oh, no you won't sir, you just nod your head but you won't.

Q: (Inaudible)

K: No, I have made it very clear. I have made it very clear sir, if you don't mind my repeating it. We are together investigating, together thinking, to find out a way of living in which there is no conflict. We are thinking together. I am not your guru, I am not your doctor, I don't want to be your doctor, or your guru. Perhaps because you aren't worth it. Or you are not the right patient.

So, sirs, to end division you must have love. Right, sir? And you don't know what that word means in this country, or in Europe. Right, sir?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: Sir, did you hear what I said? I'll repeat it sir, if you don't mind. Where there is division there is no love. Right? Agree? Not agree, see the fact. See it sir?

Q: If there is no division, then how can there be love?

K: What?

Q: How can there be love without division?

K: Sir, have you been listening to what we have been talking about for nearly an hour and a half? Sir, apparently from this question of this morning, we have come to a certain point from which you can go further, which is, where there is division there cannot be the end of conflict. Conflict will continue as long as there is division, between peoples, between nationalities, between people who are rich and poor. You follow sir? As long as there is division there must be conflict. And between my wife and me there is conflict. And I want to end that conflict because I don't want to destroy her or destroy myself. Right sir? The way we live is destroying us, so I want to end the conflict. And to enquire into how to end that conflict I must be free from my conclusions. Just one conclusion, or half a dozen conclusions, end them. See the fact. Conclusions divide. You understand, sir? You have concluded that you are a Hindu, I have concluded that I am a Muslim. Right? It is a conclusion. I hold to that conclusion, which means I won't think any more about it, it is so, I am a Muslim. I have concluded. You understand, sir? And you have concluded as an Indian. So can't you give up that conclusion? One conclusion. Can you? Because if I can't I am going to destroy her, and she is going to destroy me. Right sirs? So I say, for god's sake, I give it up, it has no value. Because my urge is to live peacefully with her, to have affection for her, not treat her like a breeding instrument, to treat her as a human being. That means I must consider her, I must care for her, I must look after her, I must have sympathy, affection, love for her. But all this is meaningless to you because you have never enquired into the nature of love. Right, sirs?

So we have answered the question, that there is a new instrument, which is not thought. We can go - I'll go into it much more but you must leave your position to understand what the speaker is saying. Right? Not always repeat the old, enquiry means moving together. Right, sir? Will you do that? Because the world is in a tremendous danger, sir. Right? As long as I am quarrelling with my wife I will quarrel with the rest of the world. If there is no order in my house I create disorder in the world. Right, sir?

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 30TH DECEMBER 1982

I hope this meeting is not merely an amusement or entertainment. There are several questions here which I have not seen, and we will talk over together. I wonder if one participates or shares in what we are discussing, we are going to answer these questions. Do we share or do you merely listen to the speaker? Do you understand the difference? Say for instance, I would like to share with you certain thoughts, certain attitudes, certain qualities of the mind. And to investigate that, the quality of one's brain and the mind requires a great deal of patient direct investigation, not through some theories, not through any form of concepts, principles, but putting all that aside to find out why we think certain things, why we believe, what is the cause of our anxiety, our lack of relationship, our lack of communication and so on. Are we aware of the activities of our brain with all its extraordinary capacities? Are we aware of our senses, the senses that are really part of our life? Are we aware of this extraordinary complex movement of life, not only as one lives but the life of humanity which has such varieties, such great aptitudes and capacities? Are we aware of all this, or are we merely aware of our own little problems, one's own dejections, impressions and so on? It is really quite an interesting question to ask of ourselves, whether we are aware, actually not theoretically, of what is going on in the world and in ourselves? Or are we so conditioned, so neglectful, not diligent that we really are totally unaware of the beauty of these trees, the quality of the air, the dirt, the squalor, the ever restless seas, are we aware of all this, or only a very limited life?

So, we will answer some of these questions.

1st Question: The Indian mind for centuries has probed into the nature of self and of cosmos. In spite of this, today it is completely materialistic. What has happened to that ancient wisdom of the mind?

Shall we talk over this together? The speaker has been every winter for the last 50 years coming to this country, travelling abroad, going all over the place. And one sees the decline not only in Europe and America but also especially obviously, palpably, the decline in this country. The speaker has been asking various scholars, politicians, some scientists and so on, what has happened, or what is the quality of the Indian mind? Of course, it is a vast generalization to say what is the Indian mind, because the Indian mind varies from the north, south, east and west, but assuming that it is inaccurate to put such a generalized question, but knowing that and probably it is incorrect to say what is the Indian mind - you are following? What is the Indian mind?

The questioner says the ancient people of this country - this country has exploded all over Asia at one time, historically - as Greece, ancient Greece, exploded waves all over the west - and the questioner asks what has happened to the Indian mind. So, we are going to, if you will, enquire what is the Indian mind today. Are you interested in it?

What actually is the Indian mind, today? Not go back to the ancient world and be proud about it: or that we are a very ancient race and all that kind of business, but actually when you begin to investigate what is the Indian mind, knowing a generalization is always inaccurate because you cannot generalize the whole, what is the European mind or the American mind or the British mind, but if you begin to enquire into what is not only the human mind, the mind of humanity, but also to particularize that mind, geographically as India, what is our mind? I wonder if you have ever asked that question. I doubt it, if you do ask that question what is our mind. Is it materialistic? Drawn towards technology? - following the western world of vast movement in the technique, with the computers. Computers are taking over the world. They outthink, outsolve all the technological problems, think much faster, have infinite memory. Right? Your computer is taking over the world. The speaker saw on a television in California where the Japanese car makers Honda - the workers were in white gloves, white apron, spotless, and there was a computer and the robot. The computer was telling the robot how to build a car and the robot was screwing the nuts and polishing, doing everything that human beings generally do in building a car.

Is our brain computerised? You understand my question? That is, we have been programmed as the computer is programmed. But our brains are much slower, not tremendously active. We only use a very, very, very small part of the brain. So, are we, is the Indian mind materialistic, which is seeking, you know materialism. And is the Indian mind, knowing always generalization is not correct, is the Indian mind - may I talk about it frankly? You don't mind? Are you sure you don't mind? Can you stand it? Right, here goes. Because the speaker would like to be as polite as possible, most respectful, but when we are investigating into a thing like this we must be totally unbiased, totally impersonal, completely unidentified.

The Indian mind as one observes is authoritarian-bound. It functions in a hierarchical movement. Right? It follows, it accepts authority, ancient tradition, the authority of some ancient books, the authority of the guru, the authority of someone who says he knows, he is illumined, bla bla, and you follow. Right? Would this be correct? Which means where there is authority, there is fear. Have you ever watched a high politician meet you, how you grovel, almost double up with false respect. This is one of the conditions of the Indian mind: following authority, psychopantism, fear and therefore total disorder. Right? No? Disorder in the streets, disorder in one's life, disorder in society and each one out for himself. Not that it does not happen or take place in Europe or America or even Russia, but it is more obvious in this country - utter carelessness, total disregard, lack of consideration. Right? Would you accept all this? And the Indian mind is capable of absorbing everything; different kinds of philosophies, however much contradictory they are. It is so tolerant. It will accept everything - contradictory philosophies, contradictory gurus, contradictory concepts. So, when your brain is capable of such absorption, it becomes rather sloppy. (Sorry, sir, you can't see my face, but you can hear my voice. Come and sit in front. Come and sit in front, sir, plenty of room here. Have some fun. Come in please sir, you don't have to look round the corner. I hope you understand English.)

So, when such a mind, a brain is capable of absorbing, tolerant of dirt, squalor, disorder, lack of beauty - probably you never look at a tree, never look at the open skies with all the brilliant stars, put up with anything. So, such a mind is a very sloppy mind. It is not a mind which is active, alive, serious. So, it is tradition-bound and very theoretical, very clever in analysis. That is why they are doing such excellent work in Europe and America; they are capable of great analysis, more subtle than the western world, but it is all theoretical, problematical, hypothetical, quoting the Gita, the Upanishads, and then trying to relate what has been said to your life. Obviously you don't, so essentially the brain has become sloppy. Therefore, it is capable of becoming materialistic - money, money, money. Isn't that so? Do look at it all sirs. Don't accept the speaker's word and then refute it, or argue against it, split hair about it, which you are doing now. But if you really want to try and utterly change such a quality of the brain, which has become so dead, but technologically it has become extraordinarily alive. But in the psychological world which is much more interesting, there, there is not activity at all. You will talk about the self, the cosmos, discuss very clearly, and cleverly - a sophisticated brain which has lived in theories But when you come down to our relationship with other human beings, there is nothing at all. And one asks - may I go on? You don't mind? I don't care if you mind or don't mind, these are facts - and one asks: is there love at all? Love; not attachment, not personal pleasure in sex and so on, but is there love in this country? That is, generous, kind, considerate, having great sympathy - that is only the outward symbols, the outward activity - but the depth of love, compassion. Have you? If you have such love, would there be war, would you allow the government to accumulate armaments to kill other human beings? Enquire into all this sir. Or we don't care what happens, how we treat our women or wives. Have you ever gone into all this? The husband walks in front, the wife follows behind.

And is the Indian mind, apart from the technological inventions, is the Indian mind capable of creation? You understand the word creation? To live a creative life, not a life of pattern. You understand? Following pattern after pattern, system after system, therefore, gradually the brain withers through constant conflict. Is this the Indian mind? Please ask it yourself. I am not asking you, I am not telling you. Is this the Indian mind that is so chaotic, so disorderly, irresponsible? Somebody the other day wanted to telephone to Europe and nobody cared to get the number requested. I waited two or three hours to get it until somebody appealed to a higher authority, and immediately there was action. What do you think of all this? Do please see the tragedy of all this. You may read the Gita, Upanishads - totally unrelated to daily life. There is no application of what you read to daily life. You hear this, and if one may point out it's just words. You don't say: look, am I like that? Is my life disorderly? Is my life, my way of thinking hierarchical? One has to have authority of law - naturally - the policeman and so on. But there too there is such vast corruption. You know all this. So, what is the Indian mind? What is the French mind, the British mind? If you live there long enough, one begins to find out. I won't discuss the French mind or the English mind. That is an easy escape from facing these facts.

So, what shall we do when an ancient race, three to five thousand years of a certain culture wiped out overnight. The Brahmanical culture, don't get upset about using that word. You are all probably anti-Brahmin, pro-Brahmin, or whatever it is. The Brahmanical culture, however bad or good, for five to three thousand years has put a strong imprint on the Indian brain - their cultures, their books, everything, and overnight it is gone. You understand? It is gone. Why? You understand what I am talking? Are you interested in all this? You must ask this very serious question: why a certain culture lasting for thousands of years, which has had such strong imprint, strong impression on the human brain, why there is this anti-Brahminism, pro-Brahminism. You follow? Why has it been wiped out? Now it is the fashion in this country to smoke, to drink, to eat meat. I am not pro, or anti, Brahmin, but I am saying that these are the facts. And what has happened to that culture, whether it is good or bad? Was it just a veneer, surface, like a coat that you put on and throw off? The tradition which is dead, is this the Indian mind? And if it is - we are not dogmatic about it - that is why I am saying if it is - if it is, what shall we do? Come on sirs. Answer this question. Just carry on sloppily, indifferent, sluggish?

Have you ever noticed that whenever you go over to a meeting, somebody is telling you what to do - the politicians, the gurus, the philosophers, who are translating or interpreting the everlasting Gita? You know all this, don't you. Commentaries on Gita - if you have nothing to do, you make commentaries. You live on commentaries.

So, realizing all this, what shall we do? Don't go to sleep. This is a question that you must answer. This is the crisis, not wars or nuclear bombs, this is our crisis. That means one has to observe very carefully, become aware of ourselves because we are the history of mankind. We are the story of mankind. If we don't know how to read that book with clarity, without any interpretation, then we are going to destroy ourselves. But you don't care, do you? You have clever arguments against all that the speaker has said and thereby prevent yourself from doing anything. That is what I call a sloppy mind, a brain that is analytical, clever, very subtle, and in their analysis they remain at that superficial, theoretical level, which has nothing whatsoever to do with our daily life. I hope you see the tragedy of this.

So, is it possible to change radically, break through our conditioning and be free human beings?

Is that enough? Please, there is no sense of scolding about this, no sense of being superior or inferior. I am not your guru. I am not a philosopher. Each one of us has to be both the teacher and the disciple. The teacher who teaches and the disciple who is learning, learning from life, not from books. There is no end to the making of books. But each one of us, if we see what we are and learn from what we are, move, change, then we become both the guru and the disciple.

2nd Question: The body ages, but is the ageing of the mind inevitable?

The body ages, grows old, but is the ageing of the brain - not the mind for the moment - inevitable? As the questioner say, it is inevitable for the body to age, to grow old and die through accident, disease or constant usage, malnutrition, wrong food, the battle that goes on in our heart and mind and all that psychosomatic activity affects the body. Right? Over-drinking, over-sex, overeating, no exercise. Look at you all. So, the body inevitably ages.

And the questioner wants to know is it inevitable for the brain to age and decay. You understand the question? What makes a machine, an internal combustion machine, what makes it age? Any kind of friction in the machine makes the machine grow old. Right? This is obvious. Our brain is a kind of machine and it grows old because we live with friction, we live with conflict, struggle, perpetual battle with ourselves, and with the rest of the world. Right sirs? I am not saying anything new. This is a fact that as long as there is friction, conflict, battle, rows with one's wife, husband, quarrel, abusing each other, hurting each other, the brain must inevitably decay. Right?

And also the computer has come into being. Please listen to this. We have been talking over with experts about this, top people. The computer can do almost anything that the human brain can do. Right? Almost. It can outthink, outplan, remember vast information, outplan. A little chip contains million memories and if the computer can do anything, almost anything that human beings can do - of course, it cannot look at the stars and see the beauty of the stars; it cannot watch the movement of the wind among the leaves; but each generation of computers is better than the other generation. So, what is going to happen to the human brain? You are following all this. Sir, please do ask these questions, for god's sake. This question is not being asked by the professionals, by the top people. They are only concerned with building better computers, more advanced, ultra mechanical intelligence, they call it. If the computer can do everything, almost, then what is going to happen to the human brain? Are you interested in all this? Or are you just listening for the fun of listening? What is going to happen to your brain if the computer does almost everything. The brain has lived because it has to struggle, it has to work, go to the office, it has to be active, active in its friction, but when that friction, that activity is gradually transferred to the computer, what is going to happen to your brain? The computer can invent a new god, a super-god, better than your gods, it can have marvellous theories. It can invent. A mathematical professor can programme a computer, most complex mathematical problems, and the computer comes out with its own new theorems. Go into it all sir. You don't know what is happening in the world.

So, what is going to happen to your brain? Either it is going to pursue entertainment, religious entertainment, football, cinema, the puja, it is all entertainment - aren't they - to pass the time in the name of god, in the name of some kind of silly affair, because we all want to be entertained. You are following all this, sirs? See the seriousness of all this sir, for god's sake. The entertainment industry is already so active: television, football, cricket. I don't know if you have noticed the world of sport is becoming more and more. Right? So, the human brain demands entertainment because it cannot face itself - the trouble, the anxiety, the sorrow, the pain, so it wants to escape into all that. Either you escape through all that and therefore the brain becomes inactive being entertained from the outside, or you go inward. There are only two possibilities. Are you getting tired? You understand, sirs, all this? Either you are being entertained as you are now, becoming more and more caught in the world of entertainment, going to the temples and making more... or you go inward: the whole exploration of the whole psyche, not according to books and philosophers and psychologists, but for yourself enquire into yourself.

So we are enquiring into astrophysics, that is into the heavens, there they are discovering all kinds of things - black holes; but nobody except very, very, very few have gone into the whole inward world. That inward world is vast, immense, incalculably deep. Don't accept my words for it. Don't say it is what our ancients said. Throw the ancients out. You are all too clever, but you have never gone inward and discovered for yourself the great beauty, where a perception that is logical, sane, healthy, a world that is immeasurable, which has nothing whatsoever to do with entertainment. That requires great care, hesitant observation, step by step. That brings about order in one's life. And when there is order in your house, there is order in society. But now we want order in society, in environment while we are disorderly. That is what the communists try to do - establish order outside while there is tremendous suppression and all the rest of it, hoping to change man. It is the same pattern being repeated in a different strata. Right?

So, the brain can remain without ageing if there is no friction, if there is no strain, no conflict, but as long as there is the self - me and you, we and they - as long as there is this idea of the individual opposed to the whole, there must be conflict, and that is what is happening to all human beings. To have a brain that is untouched by memory. You won't understand all this. Our brain - oh, I can go on but what is the point of it - our brain is trodden down by tradition, our brain is caught in past memories, remembrances. There is no pristine quality, a brain that is completely free. Then that brain is ageless, and yet has got extraordinary vitality, passion behind it. Right sir? Will you do something about it? Or just listen to a talk and say, yes, that's good, but, but, but.

3rd Question: Can thought be separated from the sensory perception?

Very good question sir, if you are willing to listen. All religions have suppressed the senses. Right? Face the fact sirs. Control your senses, don't yield to them. The speaker was walking behind a group of sannyasis in Kashmir at one time. There was a marvellous blue sky, clean air, lots of wild flowers, the air was scented with the smell of the hills and the groves and the valleys, the smell of the earth, the dew upon the earth. And these sannyasis in front, about a dozen of them, never looked at the trees. They had their head bent, chanting something or other, muttering, and never took notice of the beauty of the earth. You have seen them haven't you? Which you are doing too - it is not reserved to the sannyasis, it is not their special privilege. And they never, never from mile upon mile, never looked at the trees. You understand? There was a stream flowing by. That stream was chattering, making music. The flow of that stream was clear, unpolluted water, and the sannyasis never looked at that water, nor the trees, nor the blue sky, nor the mountains covered with snow, because sensory responses might lead to sex, might lead to all kinds of desires, therefore, don't look. This happens also, sir, in the west, the monks. Right sirs? Am I telling a strange story? So, the religions throughout the world have said if you want to serve god, you must suppress your senses, you must control them, shape them according to a precept or to a pattern laid down by the abbots and the priests and the sannyasis and the books. So, your senses are completely numb, completely destroyed. Look what has happened to you sirs. You never look at the skies. Do you? The beauty of a tree, the light on a cloud, the new moon, just a slip of light, you never look at all that, do you.

So, we are going to find out what is the relationship between thought and the responses of the senses. What are the senses? Now, please, we are going to talk about it, just follow it, because it is important to understand this. Through tradition, through so-called scriptures, through authority, we have suppressed all our senses, the sensory perception, seeing something beautiful whether it be a man or a woman, whether it be the stream or the cloud, full of light, we never look at them because there is the fear that if we do it might lead us astray, astray in one direction, sexual, pleasurable, and the senses might betray our purpose, our goal, which is to reach god, or whatever you call it. Therefore, suppress it, control it, don't yield to it. So, that is our conditioning, because sex, there you have all that you want. That is one sensory reaction that you have which is free. There you do what you like, but you must not see anything. So we look at life with one or two senses that are awakened. And you eat good food, the taste, and then you become slave to the taste. So, the question is not to suppress any sense, any of the senses. Please listen to this carefully, this requires great deal of understanding. It is not control of senses, it is the awakening of all the senses. Have you ever done that? Have you ever looked at the sea which is nearby with all that vast movement, the tremendous waves, the energy potential, the extraordinary depth of it, the blue of the evening, the full moon. Now when you look at that with all your senses, the seeing, hearing, the smell, the feeling, the depth of the feeling - you understand - looking at that vast movement. Wait, listen to it quietly. Then thought comes along and says: how nice that is, I will come back next evening and have the same sensory response. Right? You are following this? Thought interferes with the senses. Thought is also a sensory response. So, thought controls the senses. Thought then says this sense is right, this sense is wrong, this sense is beautiful, this sense is ugly and so on. So, where there is the interference of thought with the senses, though thought is part of the senses, when one of the senses, which is, thought controls the other senses, shapes the other senses, then there is the beginning of the self, beginning of the ego, beginning of the 'me'. I wonder if you understand all this.

To look at something sir, with all your senses, that means to pay attention to what you are looking at. When you pay such tremendous attention to what you are looking at, there is no self. It is only when thought says I must pay attention, it is only when thought says those senses are good, those senses are bad, then begins the psychosomatic self and you battle with the self - I must not be selfish, I must not be this, I must be that. So, to be attentive to all the senses and to see when thought begins to interfere with the senses, that requires a great attention. It is not control of the senses. It is thought that makes the senses to distort. Sex, when thought creates the image, the pleasure, the remembrance, all that, then sex is merely a mental activity. That is what you are all doing. Then you take an about turn on sex and go through all the tortures. You see how thought is operating. Or indulge in it. So if you are really aware of the whole senses, like being aware of the earth, the fertility of the senses, like the fertility of the earth, virgin earth, earth which has never been trodden on by man. And to have these fertile senses which have not been touched by thought, then out of that comes the extraordinary sense of beauty and life and love.

Now what have you got out of it, and what are you going to do with it? You understand my question, sir? What has the speaker been talking to? A sloppy brain, a brain that is so heavily conditioned that it won't receive anything new - except in the technological world, there is money, position, power. Where there is power, there is evil. Look at the local politicians, how much power they have and what an evil thing it is. And absolute power is absolute evil. You all know this, but each one wants power. Power means position, prestige, you tell the people what to do and get away with it. So, one asks what is one talking to? You understand my question? How do you receive all this? You understand my question, sir, or is it just another talk, another chapter, or you have no book, no chapter, you are living?

OJAI 1ST CONVERSATION WITH BOHM, HIDLEY & SHELDRAKE 16TH APRIL 1982 'THE NATURE OF THE MIND'

JOHN HIDLEY: We are particularly interested in regard to the OJ82CNM1 disorder. Perhaps we could start with the question of what is the source of psychological disorder.

KRISHNAMURTI: Yes, sir. And I would like to ask, if I may, what do we mean by disorder, when the whole world - as one knows, as one sees it from continent to continent - there is a great deal of disorder.

JH: Yes.

K: Economically, socially...

TOM KRAUSE: This is one of a series of dialogues between J Krishnamurti, David Bohm, Rupert Sheldrake, and John Hidley. The purpose of these discussions is to explore essential questions about the mind: what is psychological disorder and what is required for fundamental psychological change? J Krishnamurti is a religious philosopher, author and educator who has written and given lectures on these subjects for many years. He has founded elementary and secondary schools in the United States, England, and India.

David Bohm is Professor of Theoretical Physics at Birkbeck College, London University in England. He has written numerous books concerning theoretical physics and the nature of consciousness. Professor Bohm and Mr Krishnamurti have held previous dialogues on many subjects.

Rupert Sheldrake is a biologist whose recently published book proposes that learning in some members of a species affects the species as a whole. Dr Sheldrake is presently consulting plant physiologist at the International Crops Research Institute in Hyderabad, India.

John Hidley is a psychiatrist in private practice who has been associated with the Krishnamurti school in Ojai, California for the past six years.

In the culture there are conflicting points of view about the proper approach to dealing with one's own or others' psychological problems. And the underlying principles from which these approaches are drawn are in even greater conflict. Without invoking a narrow or specialized point of view, can the mind, the nature of consciousness, its relationship to human suffering, and the potential for change be understood? These are the issues to be explored in these dialogues.

K: Is disorder the very nature of the self?

JH: Why do you say that? Why do you ask that, if it is the nature of the self?

K: Isn't the self, the me, the ego...

JH: Yes.

K: ...whatever word we like to use, isn't that divisive? Isn't that exclusive, isolating process: the self-centred activity which causes so much disorder in the world, isn't that the origin, the beginning of all disorder?

JH: The origin being selfish activity.

K: Yes, self-centred activity, at all levels of life.

JH: Yes, and certainly that's the way in which the patient comes in, he's concerned about his depression.

K: Yes.

JH: Or his fear.

K: His fulfillment, his joy, his suffering, his...

JH: Yes.

K: ...agony and so on, it's all self-centred.

JH: Yes.

K: So, I am asking, if I may, is not the self the beginning of all disorder? The self - I mean the egotistic attitude towards life, the sense of individual - emphasis on the individual: his salvation, his fulfillment, his happiness, his anxiety, and so on, so on.

JH: Well, I don't know that it's the source of the thing. It's certainly the way he experiences it and presents it. He presents it as his.

K: Yes, but I mean, if you go all over the world, it is the same expression, it is the same way of living. They are all living their own personal lives unrelated to another, though they get married, they may do all kinds of things, but they're really functioning from an isolated centre.

JH: And that centre, that self, is the source of the difficulty in the relationship?

K: In relationship.

JH: And the difficulty that creates the symptoms.

K: And I wonder if the psychologists have tackled that problem, that the self is the origin, the beginning of all contradiction, divisive activity, self-centred activity, and so on.

JH: No. I think that the way psychiatrists and psychologists look at this is that the problem is to have an adequate self.

K: Adequate self.

JH: Yes.

K: Which means what?

JH: Defining normality...

K: The self that is functioning...

JH: Sufficiently.

K: ...efficiently.

JH: Yes.

K: Which means furthering more misery.

DAVID BOHM: Well, I don't feel that the psychiatrists would OJ82CNM1 that at the proper, or properly organized self could get together with other properly organized selves and make an orderly society.

K: Yes.

DB: And you are saying, as I understand it, something quite different.

K: Yes.

DB: Which is that no self can do it. No structure of the self can make order.

K: That's right. The very nature of the self must intrinsically bring disorder.

DB: Yes, but I'm not sure this will be clear. How can that be made clear, evident?

RUPERT SHELDRAKE: Sorry, it seems to me that the context is even broader than that of psychology, because in the world we have all sorts of things which are not human beings with selves, they're animals and plants and all the forces of nature and all the stars and so on. Now we see disorder in nature too. It may not be consciously experienced and a cat that's suffering or a lion suffering or a mouse or even an earthworm that's suffering may not come into a psychiatrist's office and say so, but the fact is that there seems to be disorder and conflict within nature. There are conflicts between forces of nature, inanimate things, earthquakes and so on; there are conflicts within the animal world; there are even conflicts within the plant world - plants compete for light, and bigger ones get higher up in the forest and the smaller ones get shaded out and die. There's conflict between predators and prey; all animals live on other plants or animals. There's every kind of conflict: there's disease, there's suffering, there's parasites; all these things occur in the natural world. So is the context of psychological suffering and disorder something that's merely something to do with the mind or is it something to do with the whole of nature, the fact that the world is full of separate things and that if we have a world which is full of separate things and these separate things are all interacting with each other, that there's always going to be conflict in such a world.

DB: So, I'm wondering, is it clear that there is that disorder in nature. Would we say that disorder is only in human consciousness?

K: Yes.

DB: That is, the phenomena that you have described, are they actually disorder? That's a question we have to go into. Or what is the difference between the disorder in consciousness and whatever is going on in nature?

K: I saw the other night on the television a cheetah chasing a deer, killing it. Would you consider that disorder?

RS: Well, I would consider that it involves suffering.

K: Suffering, yes. So are we saying that it is natural in nature and in human beings to suffer, to go through agonies, to live in disorder?

RS: Yes.

K: So what do you say to that, sir?

JH: Well, I think that's the way it's looked at by the therapist. To some degree it's felt that this arises in the course of development and that some people have it more than others... suffering - some people are more fortunate in their upbringing, for example, or in their heredity. But it isn't questioned that that may not be necessary in any absolute sense.

DB: Oh.

JH: Well, that's what we're questioning.

K: That's what I would like to question too.

JH: Yes.

K: Dr. Sheldrake says it is accepted. It's like that.

JH: Yes.

K: Human conditioning is to suffer, to struggle, to have anxiety, pain, disorder.

JH: Well, it's certainly...

K: ...human conditioning.

JH: ...certainly necessary to have physical suffering. People get sick, they die, and we're wondering whether or not psychological suffering is analogous to that or whether there's something intrinsically different about it.

K: No, sir. I do question seriously whether human beings must inevitably live in this state: everlastingly suffering; everlastingly going through this agony of life. Is that necessary, is it right that they should?

JH: It's certainly not desirable that they should.

K: No, no. If we accept that it's inevitable, as many people do, then there is no answer to it.

JH: Yes.

K: But is it inevitable?

JH: Well, physical suffering is inevitable.

K: Yes.

JH: Illness, death.

K: Yes, sir, physical suffering, old age, accidents, disease.

JH: Maybe we increase the physical suffering because of our psychological problems.

K: That's it. That's it. Sir, a mother bearing babies, she goes through a terrible time delivering them. Strangely, she forgets that pain. She has the next baby, another baby. In India, as you know, there mothers have about seven or eight children. If they remembered the first agony of it, they would never have children. I have talked to several mothers about it. They seem to totally forget it. It's a blank after suffering. So is there an activity in the psyche that helps the suffering to be wiped away? Recently, personally I have had an operation, a minor operation, there was plenty of pain; quite a lot. And it went on considerably. It's out of my mind completely gone. So is it the psychological nourishing of a remembrance of pain - you follow - which gives us a sense of continuity in pain?

JH: So you are saying that perhaps the physical suffering in the world is not the source of the psychological suffering, but that the psychological suffering is an action of its own.

K: Yes. Right. You have had toothache, I'm sure.

RS: Yes. I've forgotten...

K: ...you have forgotten it. Why? If we accept pain is inevitable, suffering is inevitable you must continue with it. You must sustain it.

RS: No, we have to accept that it's inevitable, that it happens sometimes. But we can forget physical pain; can we forget the kind of psychological pain that's caused by natural things like loss, death of people?

K: Yes, we'll come to that. I come to you, I've a problem with my wife, if I'm married. I am not, but suppose I am married. I come because I can't get on with her.

JH: Yes.

K: And she can't get on with me.

JH: Yes.

K: And we have a problem in relationship. I come to you. How will you help me? This is a problem that everybody's facing.

JH: Yes.

K: Either a divorce...

JH: Yes.

K: Or adjustment. And is that possible when each one wants to fulfil, wants to go his own way, pursue his own desires, his own ambitions, and so on?

JH: You are saying that the problem arises out of the fact that they each have their own interests at heart.

K: No, it's not interest, it's like - sir, we are all terribly individualistic.

JH: Yes.

K: I want my way and my wife wants her way. Deeply.

JH: And we see that our needs are in conflict for some reason.

K: Yes, that's all. Right away you begin.

JH: Yes.

K: After the first few days or few months of relationship, pleasure and all that, that soon wears off and we are stuck.

JH: Okay, that's the same problem then with the mother raising this child and making it her toy. Her needs are in conflict with the needs of the child.

K: Please perhaps you'll go on, sir. The mother, her mother was also like that.

JH: Yes.

K: And the whole world is like that, sir. It's not the mother.

JH: Yes.

K: So when I come to you with my problem, you say it's the mother.

JH: No, I wouldn't say it's...

K: I object to that.

JH: I wouldn't say it's the mother.

K: Ah, no.

JH: You were saying that it's a much broader problem.

K: Much deeper problem than the mother or the brother didn't put the baby on the right pot, or something.

JH: Right. Then it appears that the needs are in conflict.

K: No, I wouldn't say needs are in conflict. Basically, they are divisive; self-centred activity.

JH: Yes.

K: That inevitably must bring contradiction - you know, the whole business of relationship and conflict.

JH: Yes.

K: Because each one wants his pleasure.

JH: There's self-centred activity on the part of the person who's raising the child or on the part of the person who is in the relationship, married. The child is the victim of that.

K: Of course.

JH: And then grows up to perpetuate it.

K: And the mother's father and mother's fathers are like that too.

JH: Yes. Now why does it have to happen that way? Are we saying that's the way it is in nature? Or are we saying that...

K: No.

RS: Well, I mean, there are certain conflicts in nature. For example, among troops of gorillas or baboons - take baboons or even chimpanzees - there's a conflict among the males. Often the strongest male...

K: Yes, quite.

RS: ...wishes to monopolize all the attractive females. Now some of the younger males want to get in on the act as well. They try going off with these females and this younger male will fight and beat them off. So they'll be kept out of this. This selfish activity of this one male keeps most of the females to himself. The same occurs in red deer, where the stag will monopolize the females. Now these are examples of conflict in the animal kingdom which are quite needless. There would be enough food for these hens without pecking each other. Now these are not exceptions; we can find this kind of thing throughout the animal kingdom. So I don't think that the origin of this kind of selfish conflict is something just to do with human societies and the way they are structured. I think we can see in biological nature this kind of thing.

K: Are you saying that as we are the result of the animal, as we human beings evolved from the animal, we have inherited all those pecking order?

RS: Yes, I think we've inherited a lot of animal tendencies from our animal forbearers.

K: Oh, yes, yes.

RS: And I think that many of these show up in these psychological problems.

K: Yes, but is it necessary that we should continue that way?

RS: Ah.

K: We are thoughtful, we are ingenious in our inventions, extraordinarily capable in certain directions, why should we not also say, we won't have this, the way we live, let's change it.

RS: Well, we can say that; many people had said it.

K: I know, many people have said it.

RS: But without very much effect.

K: Why?

RS: Well, that indeed is a question. Is it that we're so completely trapped in the ancestry of the past?

K: Or so heavily conditioned that it's impossible to be free.

RS: Well, there are two possible kinds of conditioning: one is the genuine biological conditioning that comes from our animal heritage, which means that we inherit all these tendencies.

K: Let's accept that.

RS: Now that is undoubtedly extremely strong. It goes right back into our animal past.

K: Right.

RS: The other kind of conditioning is the kind of argument that I'm putting forward, perhaps: the argument, this has always been so; human nature is like this, there have always been wars and conflicts and all that kind of thing, and therefore there always will be; that the most we can do is try to minimize these, and that there'll always be psychological conflicts within families and between people and that the most we can do is try and minimize these...

K: So, accept the...

RS: ...or at least make them livable with.

K: ...conditioning, modify it. But you cannot fundamentally change it.

RS: Yes. I'm saying this is a possible kind of conditioning: the belief that we can't really change it radically is another kind of conditioning. I'm a victim of it myself. So I don't know if it's possible to get out of it.

K: That is what I want to discuss. Whether it's possible to change the human conditioning. And not accept it, say, as most philosophers, the existentialists and others say, your human nature is conditioned. You cannot change. You can modify it; you can be less selfish, less painful, psychologically have problems, bear up with pain, this is natural, we have inherited from the animals; we'll go on like this for the rest of our lives and for the lives to come. Not reincarnation, other people's lives. It'll be our conditioning, human conditioning. Do we accept that? Or should we enquire into whether it's possible to change this conditioning?

RS: Yes. I think we should enquire into that.

K: If you say it cannot be changed, then the argument is over.

RS: All right, so I'll say...

K: No, I'm not saying...

RS: I'd like it to be changed, I deeply want it to be changed. So I think that this question of enquiring into the possibility is extremely important. But one of my points, to go back to the conditioning point, is that a lot of this conditioning is deep in our biological nature and people who wish to change it merely by changing the structures of society...

K: Oh, I'm not talking about that.

RS: ...are operating at too superficial a level.

K: Like the Communists want to change it.

RS: But the idea that you can do it by just changing environment is what the Communists thought and still think, and in a sense the experiment has been tried and we can see the results in various communist countries. And of course, believers in that would say, well, they haven't tried properly or they betrayed the revolution, and so on. But nevertheless, the basis of that belief is that the source of all the evils and the problems is in society and by changing society man is perfectible.

K: But society is formed by us.

RS: Yes.

K: And you, by us is going to be changed, so we have to change ourselves. We depend on society to change us. And society is what we have made it; so we are caught in that trap.

RS: Yes. Exactly; and if we start off with a heritage which is built in to us, inherited, which comes from our biological past, and if we start with that and we start with these societies that also have bad effects, some of them, and to varying degrees, and we just try to change the society, the other part, the inherited part, is still there.

K: But cannot those also be transformed?

RS: I really...

K: I may have inherited what - violence from the from the apes and so on, so on. Can't I change that? The inherited biological...

DB: Drives.

K: ...conditioning, surely that can be transformed.

RS: Well, all societies surely seek to transform these biological drives we have, and all processes of bringing children up in all societies seek to bring those drives within the control of the society. Otherwise you would have complete anarchy. However these drives are always brought within certain social forms and individual aggression is obviously discouraged in most societies. But is it really transformed? Doesn't it just come out again in the aggression of the society as a whole, war and so on. So we can see that these things are transformed by society, these basic drives that we inherit.

DB: I was going to say they really haven't been transformed, but I think you're meaning by transformed a fundamental change and not just a superficial change or a transfer of the object of aggression from other individuals to other groups. So if you talk of transformation you would say really that they would more or less go away, right? That's as I understand it.

RS: Well, they'd be changed from one form to another...

DB: I meant...

RS: ...that's what I mean.

DB: ...I don't think that's the meaning which Krishnaji is using for the word 'transform,' but essentially can't we be free of them, you see.

K: Yes. That's right. Sir, why do you divide, if I may ask, society and me? As though society were something outside which is influencing me, conditioning me, but my parents, grandparents, so on, past generations have created that society, so I am part of that society. I am society.

RS: Well, yes.

K: Why do we separate it?

RS: I think the reason why we separate it is that there are different kinds of society. And if I'd been born in India instead of in England I would have grown up in a very different way...

K: Of course, of course.

RS: ...with different set of attitudes.

K: Of course.

RS: And because we can think of ourselves growing up in different kinds of societies and we'd be different if we had, that's why in thought, I think, we have the idea that society and me are not exactly the same. We'd always be in one society or another, so society as a whole, all societies taken together, we would only exist within society, but any particular society is in a sense an accident of our birth or upbringing.

K: But even that society is part of us.

RS: Oh, yes. I mean through growing up in it, it becomes part of us and we become part of it.

K: But, I want to abolish this idea in discussion, this separation from me and society. I am society, I am the world. I am the result of all these influences, conditionings, whether in the East or in the West or in South or North, it's all part of conditioning.

RS: Yes.

K: So we are attacking the conditioning, not where you are born or East or West.

RS: Oh, yes. The problem would be conditioning of every kind: our biological conditioning, our conditioning from society.

K: That's right.

RS: Yes.

K: So personally I don't separate myself from society, I am society. I have created society through my anxiety, through my desire for security, through my desire to have power, and so on, so on, so on. Like the animal. It's all biologically inherited. And also my own individualistic activity has created this society. So I am asking, I am conditioned in that way; is it not possible to be free of it? Free of my conditioning? If you say it's not possible, then it's finished.

RS: Well, I would say first that it's not possible to be free of all of the conditioning. I mean, certain of it is necessary biologically, the conditioning that makes my heart beat...

K: Ah, well...

RS: ...my lungs operate, and all that.

K: I admit all that.

RS: Now, then, the question is, how far can you take that? The necessary conditioning.

K: Dr. Hidley was saying - that's his whole point - I am conditioned to suffer, psychologically. Right, sir?

JH: Yes.

K: Or I am conditioned to go through great conflict in my relationship with my wife or father, whatever it is. And you are saying, either we investigate into that and free ourselves from that, or accept it and modify it.

JH: That's right.

K: Now, which is it? That's what I want - which is it as a psychologist you maintain? If I may put such a question to you?

JH: Yes. Well, I think generally the approach is to attempt to modify it; to help the patient make it work more effectively.

K: Why? I hope you don't mind my asking these questions.

JH: No, I think that part of the reason for that is that it's seen as biological and therefore fixed. A person is born with a certain temperament. His drives are the drives of the animal, and I think also because it isn't clear to therapists that the problem can be dealt with as a whole, it is clear that it can be dealt with as particulars.

K: Is it - I am not asking an impudent question -

JH: Okay.

K: Is it the psychologists don't think holistically? Our only concern is solving individual problems.

JH: Yes, they are concerned with solving individual problems.

K: So therefore they are not thinking of human suffering as a whole.

JH: Right.

K: A particular suffering of X who is very depressed.

JH: Right. For particular reasons.

K: For particular reasons. We don't enquire into what is depression, why human beings all over the world are depressed.

JH: Or we don't try and tackle that as a single problem. We try and tackle it with this particular individual who comes in.

K: Therefore you are still really, if I may point out - I may be wrong -

JH: Yes.

K: - you are emphasizing his particular suffering and so sustaining it.

JH: Now, can we get clear on that?

K: I come to you.

JH: Yes.

K: I am depressed.

JH: Yes.

K: For various reasons which you know.

JH: Yes.

K: And you tell me, by talking to me, etcetera, you know the whole business of coming to you and all that, you tell me: my depression is the depression of the world.

JH: Yes, I don't tell you that. I tell you that your depression -

K: When you tell me that, are you not helping me to carry on with this individualistic depression? And therefore my depression, not your depression.

JH: Yes.

K: It's my depression which I either cherish or want to dissolve.

JH: Yes.

K: Which means I am only concerned with myself.

JH: Yes.

K: Myself, I come back to that.

JH: Yes, it's within the context of yourself.

K: Self.

JH: Yes...

K: So you are helping me to be more selfish, if I may...

JH: Yes.

K: More self-concerned, more self-committed.

JH: It is approached within the context of the self, but I would think that I am helping you to be less self-concerned because when you are not depressed, then you don't have to be self-concerned. You feel better and you're able to relate to people more.

K: But again, on a very superficial level.

JH: Meaning that I leave the self intact.

K: Intact.

JH: Yes.

DB: Yes, well, I feel that people generally wouldn't accept this, that the self is not there, you see, which is what you're implying, that the self is rather unimportant. But rather the assumption is that the self is really there and it has to be improved, you see, and if you say...

K: That's it, that's it.

DB: A certain amount of self-centredness people would say is normal...

K: Yes, sir.

DB: ...so you keep it within reason, right?

JH: Right.

K: Modify selfishness, right? Continue with selfishness but go slow.

DB: But I think you're saying something which is very radical, then, because very few people have entertained the notion of no self-centredness.

K: That's it.

JH: That's right; it isn't entertained.

DB: Maybe a few but...

JH: Yes. For biological reasons and because of the universality of the phenomenon? Because it isn't even seen as relevant, really.

DB: I think most people feel that's the way things are, it's the only way.

JH: Yes.

K: That means status quo, modified status quo.

JH: Yes.

K: To me that seems so irrational.

DB: But you must feel that it's possible to be different, you see, at least, more than feel, in some sense there must be some reason why you say this.

K: What?

DB: Why you feel so different from other people about it.

K: It seems so practical, first of all. The way we live is so impractical: the wars, the accumulation of armaments, is totally impractical.

DB: But that wouldn't be an argument, you see, because people say, we all understand that, but since that's the way we are, nothing else is possible. You see, you really are challenging the notion that that is the way we are; or we have to be.

K: I don't quite follow this. We are what we are.

DB: People say we are individual, separate and we'll just have to fight and make the best of it. But you are saying something different, I mean, you're not accepting that.

K: All right. Don't accept it, but will you listen? Will the people who don't accept it, will they give their minds to find out? Right?

JH: Right.

K: Or say, please, we don't want to listen to you. This is what we think; buzz off. That's what most people do.

JH: Well, this question isn't even raised usually.

K: Of course.

JH: Now why do you think that the self, this selfish activity, isn't necessary?

K: No, sir, first of all, do we accept the condition that we are in? Do we accept it, and say, please, we can only modify it, it can never be changed. One can never be free from this anxiety, depression; modify it, always, from agony of life. You follow? This process of going through tortures in oneself. That's normal, accepted. Modify it, live little more quietly and so on, so on. If you accept that, there is no communication between us. But if you say, I know my conditioning, tell me, let's just talk about whether one can be free from it. Then we have a relationship, then we can communicate with each other. But if you say, sorry, shut the door in my face and it's finished.

RS: So, there are some people who accept it, say we can't change it. But there are other people, and I would say that some of the most inspiring leaders of the different religions of the world are among them, who have said we can change it; there is a way beyond this. Now since religions have wide followings and since their doctrines are widely dispersed, there are in fact large numbers of people in our society and in every society who do think it can be changed. Because all religions hold out the prospect of change, and of going beyond this conditioning.

K: Yes. But I would like to know, when you use the word 'religion,' is it the organized religion, is it the authoritarian religion, is it the religion of belief, dogma, rituals, all that?

RS: Well...

K: Or religion in the sense, the accumulation of energy to find whether it is possible to be free. You understand my question?

RS: Yes. Well, I think the second, but I think that if we look into the history of the organized religions and people within them, we see that much of the inspiration for them was in fact that second kind of religion, which still, within that framework, still survives, I think. But it's also something which has often been corrupted and debased and turned into yet another set of dogmas, conditioning, and so on. But I think that within all religious traditions that this second kind of religion you talk about has been kept alive and I think that the impetus in all great religions of the world has been that, though it's then been debased and degraded in various ways. But this vision has never left any of these religions, there are still people within them, I think, who still have it. And this is the inner light that keeps them going over and above the simple political part and all the rest of it.

K: I know, I know. But suppose a man like me rejects tradition. Rejects anything that has been said about truth; about god, whatever it is: the other side. I don't know; the other people say, yes, we have this and that. So how am I, as a human being who has really rejected all this: tradition, the people who have said there is, and the people who have said that's all nonsense; people who have said we have found (inaudible) - and so on, so on. If you wipe all that out and say, look, I must find out - not as an individual - can this truth or this bliss, this illumination come without depending on all that? You see, if I am anchored, for example, in Hinduism, with all the - not the superficiality of it, not all the rituals and all the superstitions - if I am anchored in the religious belief of a Hindu, of a real Brahmin, I am always anchored, and I may go very far, but I am anchored there. That is not freedom. Because there must be freedom to discover this, or come upon this.

RS: Yes.

K: Sir, we are going little bit too far?

RS: No, but I would then go back and say, well, you put forward the question of a man who rejects all these traditions. You say, let us suppose that I am a man who has rejected all these traditions. I would then say, well what reason do you have for rejecting all these traditions in such a way?

JH: Well, that seems to be the problem that we've arrived at. We have said that man is conditioned biologically and socially by his family. The tradition is part of that. We've said that that's the problem that we're up against now. Is it possible for him to change his nature or do we have to deal with each of these problems particularly as they come up?

RS: Well, what I was saying is that the inner core of all the great religions of the world is a vision of this possibility of a transformation, whether it's called salvation or liberation or nirvana or what. There's this vision. Now there have always been people within those religions who had this vision and lived this vision; now...

K: Ah! Sorry. Go on, I'm sorry.

RS: Well, perhaps out of your radical rejection of all religions you've always denied that. But if so, I would say, why? Why should we be so radical as to deny...

K: I question whether they really - I may be sacrilegious, I may be an infidel, nonbeliever - I wonder if I am anchored to a certain organized belief, whether I can ever find the other. If I am a Buddhist, for example, I believe that the Buddha is my saviour. Suppose I believe that, and that has been told to me from childhood, my parents have been Buddhists and so on, so on, so on. And as long as I have found that security in that idea, or in that belief, in that person, there is no freedom.

RS: No, but it's possible that you can move beyond that framework, you see, starting from within it that you can move beyond it.

K: That means I wipe out everything.

RS: It means you wipe it out, but there's a difference between an approach where you wipe it out from the beginning...

K: From the beginning, I am talking about.

RS: And there's an approach where you start within it and go beyond it.

K: You see that - wait, wait; yes, I know, the old argument. What is important, breaking down all the barriers at the beginning, not at the end. I am a Hindu, I see what Hinduism is, you know, all the rest of it, and why should I go through number of years to end it, why couldn't I finish it the first day?

RS: Because I think you'd have to reinvent and rediscover for yourself a great many things that you would be able to get through more quickly if you didn't.

K: No. His question is: I am a living human being in relationship with him or with her. In that relationship I am in conflict. He says, don't go about religion and illumination and nirvana and all the rest of it. Transform this, live rightly here, then the door is open.

RS: Yes, but surely, isn't that easier said than done?

K: I know! I know it's easier said than done, therefore let's find out. Let me find out with him, or with you, or with her how to live in this world without conflict. Right, sir?

JH: That's what we're asking.

K: Can I find out, or is that impossible?

JH: We don't know.

K: No. Therefore we start, we don't know.

JH: Okay.

K: So let's enquire into that. Because if my relationship with life is not right - right in quotes for the moment - how can I find out something that's immensely beyond all this? Beyond time, beyond thought, beyond measure. I can't. 'Til we have established right relationship between us, which is order, how can I find that which is supreme order? So I must begin with you, not with that. I don't know if you are meeting me.

RS: No, I would have thought that you could easily argue the other way around.

K: Of course, of course!

RS: Until you have that, you can't get this right; because the whole history of man shows that starting just from...

K: Ah! Therefore you invent that. You invent something illogical, may not be true; may be just invention of thought, and you imagine that to be order, and hope that order will filter into

you. And it seems so illogical, irrational, whereas this is so rational.

RS: But is it possible?

K: That is it! Let's find out.

RS: But you've now completely reversed your argument to start with, you see. He started with the patient coming to the psychiatrist's office who wants to get his relationships right, get the human relationships out of this state of disorder and conflict into something that's more tolerable.

K: I'm not sure this way - forgive me, Doctor, if I'm blundering where the angels fear to tread - I question whether they are doing right.

RS: But they're doing just what you said now, starting with the relationship, and not going into these bigger questions.

K: But I question whether they are really concerned with bringing about a right relationship between human beings, fundamentally, not superficially, just to adjust themselves for the day.

JH: I don't think that you're denying that larger questions are involved in that, you are just saying that we shouldn't invent ideas about what a solution would be like.

K: Yes. I come to you with my problem: I cannot get on with somebody, or I am terribly depressed or something dishonest in me, I pretend. I come to you. You are concerned to tell me, become more honest.

JH: Yes.

K: But not find out what is real honesty.

JH: Don't we get into the problem of creating the idea of real honesty at this point?

K: No. It's not an idea. I am dishonest. You enquire, why are you dishonest?

JH: Yes.

K: Go - penetrate into it, disturb me. Don't pacify me. Don't help me to say, well, be a little more honest and a little more this or that, but shake me so that I find out what is real honesty.

JH: Okay, that's...

K: I may break away from my conditioning, from my wife, from my parents, anything. You don't disturb me.

JH: No, that's...

K: That's just my point.

JH: I do disturb you.

K: Partially.

JH: Well, what...

K: You disturb me not to conform to little adjustments.

JH: Well, let's look at that.

K: Sorry.

JH: I disturb you to conform to little adjustments.

K: Yes. You don't say to me, look, you are dishonest, let's go into it.

JH: I do say that.

K: No but, go into it, so that he is totally honest.

JH: Well, how deeply do I need to go into it so that I have disturbed you totally?

K: Yes. So you tell me. Do it now, sir.

JH: Okay. You come in and in our talks we notice that the thing that you are up to is that you are always trying to find some other person to make your life be whole.

K: Yes. I depend on somebody.

JH: Yes, deeply.

K: Deeply.

JH: And you don't even know that.

K: Yes.

JH: So I disturb you. I tell you that that's what going on and I show you you're doing it with me. I show you you're doing it with your husband. Now is that sufficiently deep?

K: No.

JH: Why?

K: What have you shown me? A verbal picture...

JH: No, not verbal; not verbal.

K: Wait, wait.

JH: Okay.

K: Verbal picture, an argument, a thing which tells me that I am dishonest. Or whatever you tell me. That leaves me where?

JH: Well, if it's verbal it just gives you more knowledge about yourself.

K: That's all. Knowledge about myself.

JH: Yes.

K: Will knowledge transform me?

JH: No.

K: No. Be careful, sir, careful. Then why do I come to you?

JH: Well, not so that I can give you knowledge. You come thinking that maybe somehow I have some answers, because the society is set up...

K: Why don't you tell me, do it yourself, don't depend on me.

Go into it. Find out, stir.

JH: Okay, I tell you that. I tell you, go into it yourself. And you say to me...

K: I can't do it.

JH: ...I don't know what you're talking about.

K: That's just it.

JH: Yes...

K: So how will you help me to go into myself and not depend on you? You understand my question? Please, I'm not the stage, the only actor. Sir, this is really a serious question. How will you help me to go into myself so deeply that I understand and go beyond. You know what I mean?

JH: No, I don't know what you mean. I understand how to help you go into it without depending on me.

K: I don't want to depend on you. I don't want to depend on anybody.

JH: Okay. I can help you do that. We can discover together that you are depending on me, but I don't know how deeply this has to go.

K: So you have to enquire into dependence.

JH: Okay.

K: Why am I dependent? Security.

JH: Yes.

K: Where is security? Is there such thing as security?

JH: Well, I have these experiences as I grew up that taught me what security is.

K: Yes, which is what? A projected idea?

JH: Yes.

K: A principle.

JH: Yes.

K: A belief, a faith, a dogma, or an ideal, which are all projected by me or by you, and I accept those. But they're unreal.

JH: Okay.

K: So, can I push those away?

JH: Yes. And then you are not depressed.

K: Ah! I am dependent and therefore I get angry, jealousy, all the rest of it. That dependence makes me attached and in that attachment there is more fear, there is more anxiety, there is more... you follow?

JH: Yes.

K: So can you help me to be free or, find out what is true security? Is there a deep abiding security? Not in furniture, not in a house, not in my wife or in some idea - find deeply if there is such thing as complete security.

JH: So you're suggesting that if I simply work on this with you and you come to understand that you're dependent that that's not sufficient because you won't have discovered any abiding security.

K: No. Because that's all I want. I've sought security in this house. And there's none, I've sought security in my wife, there isn't any; then I change to another woman, but there isn't any either. Then I find security in a church, in a god, in a belief, in a faith, in some other symbol. You see what is happening? You are all externalized, if I can use that word - giving me security in things in which there is no security: in nations, all the rest of it. Could you help us to find out if there is complete security which is unshakable?

RS: Are you suggesting that this is one of our most fundamental needs?

K: I should think so.

RS: Drives and activities?

K: I should think so.

RS: So indeed it's a fundamental question as to whether this sense of abiding unshakable security is possible.

K: Yes. Yes. Because if once you have that there is no problem any more.

JH: But this isn't clear, because then is it the individual that has that?

K: No. Individual can never have that security. Because he is in himself divisive.

OJAI 2ND CONVERSATION WITH BOHM, HIDLEY & SHELDRAKE 17TH APRIL 1982 'THE NATURE OF THE MIND'

TOM KRAUSE: This is one of a series of dialogues between J Krishnamurti, David Bohm, Rupert Sheldrake and John Hidley. The purpose of these discussions is to explore essential questions about the mind: what is psychological disorder and what is required for fundamental psychological change?

J Krishnamurti is a religious philosopher, author and educator who has written and given lectures on these subjects for many years. He has founded elementary and secondary schools in the United States, England and India.

David Bohm is professor of theoretical physics at Birkbeck College, London University in England. He has written numerous books concerning theoretical physics and the nature of consciousness. Professor Bohm and Mr Krishnamurti have held previous dialogues on many subjects.

Rupert Sheldrake is a biologist whose recently published book proposes that learning in some members of a species affects the species as a whole. Dr Sheldrake is presently consulting plant physiologist to the International Crops Research Institute in Hyderabad, India.

John Hidley is a psychiatrist in private practice who has been associated with the Krishnamurti school in Ojai, California for the past six years.

In the first dialogue the nature of the self was discussed, its relationship to suffering, to society, and to religion. Questions raised were: can one discover or learn about these relationships and is the need for psychological security the root of the problem?

Today's discussion continues with these questions.

JH: We talked yesterday, we started with the question of the origin and nature of psychological disorder, and suggested that it has its roots in self-centred activity which is divisive and conflictual in nature and that biologically such factors as instinctual aggression and dominance drives, the facts of illness and death all contribute. I wondered if we could start this morning, David, by having you comment on the relationship between these biological factors and psychological security.

DAVID BOHM: Yes, well, biologically if you begin with the animal OJ82CNM2 they're fairly simple. They exist for a short period while the fact is there and then they generally disappear, leaving little trace. There may be a few cases in the higher animals where there's some memory, but it's in man that the memory becomes very significant, remembering all these experiences and anticipating the future you get a very different sort of behaviour. For example, with an animal he might have a bad experience with another animal and shortly afterward he'll be in fairly good state of equilibrium, but say we have a quarrel between two groups, as in Northern and Southern Ireland, this has been going on for 350 years and there is a specific effort to remember it which you can see going on. And I think this is the biggest difference.

JH: Memory being the...

DB: Yes, the effect of memory, the consequences of memory. You see memory by itself would obviously not cause any trouble, because it's only a fact, right? But memory has consequences: it may produce fear, you see, it may produce anger, it may produce all sorts of disturbances to remember what did happen and to anticipate what may happen.

RUPERT SHELDRAKE: You mean thinking about it?

DB: Yes. Based on memory, right?

RS: I mean, obviously the animal that's been attacked by another animal remembers in the sense that when it sees the other animal again, it's afraid. It probably doesn't think about it in between.

DB: Yes, it can't form an image, you see, I don't believe that most animals can form images of the other animals, and I can base that on experience, that I have seen dogs fighting very hard, and as soon as they turn the corner, the dog sort of forgets what happened. He is disturbed but he doesn't know why he is disturbed, you see. Now, if he could remember the other dog after he turned the corner, he could continue the struggle over territory indefinitely. So the point about territory is, the animal maintains it in a certain limited context. But man remembers it and he maintains this territory indefinitely and wants to extend it, and so on, because of his thinking about it.

RS: So, are you suggesting that the basis of the specifically human kind of pain and suffering over and above the kind of suffering we see in the animal kingdom is this ability to remember, to brood over it, to think about it?

DB: Yes, the animal may have some of that, I've seen examples on television of a deer who lost its doe and it was pining away in the wild, but I think it's limited, that is, there is some suffering of that kind in the animal world but with man it's enormously expanded, you know, it seems limitless. Yes, I think the major point is that with man the thing can build up like a tremendous explosion that fills his whole mind, you see, and it can become the major motive in life, to remember the insult and to, you know, to revenge the vendetta, in families over many generations. To remember that the bad experience you had with somebody and to be frightened of what's coming like the examination that the child may be frightened of, or something like that.

K: But have you answered his question, sir?

DB: Which is?

JH: How does the biological fact of illness or death or instinctual drive result in a psychological problem or disorder?

DB: By thinking about it. I say that the biological fact is no a serious problem, in the long run, but as soon as you begin to think about it, and not merely think about it but make images about it along with that thought, you know; and to revive the memory and anticipate the feeling of the future; and while you are thinking then it becomes a very serious problem because you can't stop it, you see. You will never attain security by thinking about it, but you are constantly seeking security. You see, the purpose of thinking is to give you security in practical affairs, technical affairs. Now, therefore you are doing a similar sort of thinking, saying how can I be secure against the possibility of suffering again? And there is no way to do that. You may take technical steps to make it unlikely, but as you think about it, you begin to stir up the whole system and distort the whole mental process.

JH: Well, it seems clear that by thinking about it we stir up the emotions and the associations that are those thoughts, but we're not suggesting we shouldn't think about it, are we?

DB: Well, it depends on how you think about it. You see, this thinking gets to be directed toward giving you a sense of security, you see, an image of security.

JH: Right, I get hurt when I'm little or some time along the line and it creates a fear in me and I anticipate that kind of situation. I may not even remember the incident, but I want to avoid it in the future.

DB: Yes, and now, the point is this: the mind is always searching for how to avoid it, and searching out thoughts, images, you know, saying, that fellow is the one who did it, I must keep away from him; coming to conclusions and if any conclusion gives you an image of security, then the mind holds on to it, right? Without actually any basis.

JH: Could you elaborate on that a little?

DB: Well, if you have had a bad experience with somebody, you may conclude that you should never trust him again, for example. Although that might be quite wrong. But the mind is so anxious to have security that it will jump to the conclusion that it's not safe to trust him. Right?

JH: Yes.

DB: Now, if you find somebody else who seems to treat you well and reassures you and flatters you, then you may jump to the conclusion you can completely trust him. Now, the mind is now looking for thoughts that will give it good feelings, you see, because the feelings of the memory are so disturbing to the whole system that its first function is to make the mind feel better, rather than find out what is the fact.

JH: Okay, so we're saying that at this point the mind isn't interested in what's true, it's interested in getting secure.

DB: Yes, it's so disturbed that it wants to come to order first you see, and it's adopting a wrong way, as I see it.

JH: The wrong way being?

DB: To think about it and try to find thoughts that will make it feel better.

JH: So you're saying the thoughts themselves in some sense are taking the place of reality, that the person is trying to get certain thoughts in his head that make him feel better.

DB: Yes. And that's self-deception, you see.

RS: What makes you think that the primary drive is for security?

DB: Oh, we discussed that yesterday, of course, but I wouldn't be sure that's the only primary drive, but it's obvious for the animal it's a very important drive to want security, right? We also want pleasure, I think that's another drive - they are closely related.

RS: But to come back to this question of security, in its limited forms, security is clearly one goal that we have. People like to have houses and have them secure and cars and possessions and bank balances and that kind of thing. But there's this factor that comes in, when you've got that, there are two things, actually, that come in: one is maybe the fear that you'll lose it, but the other is boredom with the whole thing and the craving for excitement and thrill. And this doesn't seem to fit within this model of this primary and central craving for security.

DB: Well that's why I said it's only one of the drives, right? That there's also the drive toward pleasure, as an example, much of what you said is included in the drive toward pleasure, right?

RS: I'm not so sure.

DB: Excitement is pleasurable and then people hope for pleasure and excitement rather than pain, as a rule.

RS: But don't you think there's a pleasure in itself in curiosity and there's a sense of freedom in discovery that you can get from certain kinds of exploration which is neither just straightforward pleasure, it's not a repetitive kind of pleasure, nor is it security.

DB: Yes, well, I didn't want to say that all our drives are caught in this thing, you see, I said that if you think about them and base them on memory, then they are going to get caught in this problem. Now there may be a natural, free interest in things which could be enjoyable, and that need not be a problem, right? But if you were to become dependent on it and think about it and say, if I don't have it I become very unhappy, then it would be a similar problem.

K: Could we go into the question, what is security? What does that word convey? Apart from physical security.

RS: I would have said invulnerability.

K: Not to be hurt.

RS: Not to be hurt at all, not to be able to be hurt.

K: Not to be able to be hurt and not to hurt. Physically we are all hurt, one way or another: operations and illness and so on, so on. When you talk about being hurt, are you talking about psychological hurts?

JH: Yes, I'm wondering how it is that when a person comes into my office, his complaint is his psychological hurts.

K: How do you deal with it?

JH: I try and...

K: Suppose I come to you. I am hurt from childhood.

JH: Yes.

K: I am hurt by the parents, school, college, university...

JH: Yes.

K: ...when I get married she says something, I am hurt. So this whole living process seems to be a series of hurts.

JH: It seems to build up a structure of self that is hurt, and a perception of reality that is inflicting hurt.

K: Yes. How do you deal with it?

JH: I try to help you see how you're doing it.

K: What do you mean, how I'm doing it?

JH: Well, for example, if you have built up in you the notion that you're one down; or that you're the victim. Then you perceive yourself to be victimized and you perceive the world to be a victimizer. And I help you realize that that's what you're doing.

K: But by showing me that, will I get rid of my hurt? My hurts, very deep unconscious hurts that I have, that make me do all kinds of peculiar actions, neurotic, and isolating myself.

JH: Yes. It appears that people get better, that they realize that they are doing it. And in some local area it seems to help.

K: No, but aren't you concerned, if I may ask, with not being able to hurt at all?

JH: Yes.

DB: What do you mean by that, not hurting somebody else or not hurting inside of you.

K: I may hurt others unconsciously, unwillingly, but I wouldn't hurt voluntarily somebody.

DB: Yes, you really don't intend to hurt anybody.

K: Yes. I wouldn't.

RS: Well, maybe not, but I don't see the connection between not hurting other people and not being hurt oneself. At least I'm sure there must be one, but it's not obvious. And most people's view of the best way not to be hurt would be to be in such a position that you can hurt others so much they'd never dare. This is the principle of nuclear retaliation and so this is a very common principle.

K: Yes, of course.

RS: So it's not obvious that not hurting others is related to not being hurt oneself. In fact, usually it's taken to be the reverse. It's usually assumed that if you're in a position to hurt others very much you'll be very secure.

K: Of course, I mean if you're a king or a sannyasi or one of those people who have built a wall round themselves...

RS: Yes.

K: ...naturally you can never hurt them.

RS: Yes.

K: But when they were children they were hurt.

RS: Yes.

K: That hurt remains. It may remain superficially or in the deep recesses of one's own mind. Now, how do you, as a psychologist, psychoanalyst, help another who is deeply hurt and is unaware of it and to see if it is possible not to be hurt at all?

JH: I don't address the question about is it possible to not be hurt at all. That doesn't come up.

K: Why? Wouldn't that be a reasonable question?

JH: Well, it seems to be what we are asking here. It is the essence of the question that we're asking. We ask it in terms of particulars only in therapy, and you're asking it more generally, is it possible to end this hurt, period. Not just a particular hurt that I happen to have.

K: So how should we proceed?

JH: Well, it would seem that the structure that makes hurt possible is what we have to get at. What makes hurt possible in the first place, not this hurt or that hurt.

K: I think that's fairly simple. Why am I hurt? Because you say something to me which is not pleasant.

JH: Well, why should that hurt you?

K: Because I have an image about myself as being a great man. You come along and tell me, don't be an ass. And I get hurt.

JH: What is it that's being hurt there?

K: There, the image which I have about myself. I am a great cook, a great scientist, a great carpenter; whatever you will. I have got that picture in myself and you come along and put a pin into it. And that gets hurt. The image gets hurt. The image is me.

DB: I feel that that will not be totally clear to many people. I mean, how can I be an image, you see, many people will ask. You see, how can an image get hurt, because if an image is nothing at all, why does it hurt?

K: Because I have invested into that image a lot of feeling.

DB: Yes.

K: A lot of ideas, emotions, reactions, all that is me, my image.

JH: It doesn't look like an image to me, though, it looks like something real.

K: Ah, of course, for most people it's very real. But that is me, the reality of that image is me.

JH: Yes. Well, can we get clear that it's an image and not real?

K: Image is never real; symbol is never real.

JH: You're saying that I'm just a symbol.

K: Perhaps.

JH: That's a big step.

K: From that arises the question whether it's possible not to have images at all.

RS: Well, wait a minute. I don't think we've clearly established that I am an image.

K: Ah, let's go into it.

RS: I mean, it's not entirely clear. I mean, it's obvious that to some extent one is an image, that when I have a feeling about myself and so on. It's not entirely clear that this is entirely unjustified. You see certain aspects of it may be exaggerated, certain aspects may be unrealistic, but, you see, one approach would be, well, we've got to remove, shave off these unrealistic aspects, pare it down to sort of reasonable size. And then that which remains would be the real thing.

K: So, sir, are you raising the question, what am I?

RS: Well, I suppose so, yes.

K: Yes. What are you? What is each one of us? What is a human being? That's the question that's involved.

RS: Yes, that seems unavoidable.

K: Yes. What am I? I am the form, the physical form; the name, the the result of all education.

JH: Your experiences.

K: My experiences, my beliefs, my ideals, principles, the incidents that have marked me.

JH: The structures you've built up that are how you function.

K: Yes.

JH: You skills.

K: My fears, my activities, whether they are limited or my so-called affection; my gods, my country, my language; fears, pleasures, suffering, all that is me.

JH: Yes.

K: That's my consciousness.

JH: And your unconscious.

K: That's my whole content of me.

JH: Okay.

DB: But there's still that feeling of actuality that me is there, you see, I mean, you may say, you could reasonably argue that that's all there is to me, but when something happens there's the feeling of its actual presence, at that moment.

K: I don't quite follow you there.

DB: Well, you see if somebody reacts to being hurt or angry, he feels at that moment that there's more than that, you see, that there is something deep inside which has been hurt, right?

K: I don't quite see. My image can be so deep, that's my image at all levels.

DB: Yes, but how...

K: Wait, sir, I have an image of myself; suppose: that I am a great poet, or a great painter or a great writer. Apart from that image as a writer, I have other images about myself. I have an image about my wife, and she has a image about me, and there are so many images I've built around myself; and the image about myself also. So I may gather a bundle of images.

DB: Yes, I understand.

K: Partial.

DB: Yes, you are saying that there is nothing but this bundle of images...

K: Of course!

DB: ...but you know, the question is, how are we to see this as an actual fact?

K: Ah.

RS: But wait a minute, there is something but this bundle of images; and I mean I'm sitting right here, now, seeing you and all the rest of it. Now I have the feeling that there's a centre of action or centre of consciousness which is within my body and associated with it which has a centre and it's not you, and it's not you, and it's not David: it's me. And associated with this centre of action, my body, sitting here, is a whole lot of memories and experiences and without those memories I wouldn't be able to speak, to talk, to recognize anything.

K: Of course, of course.

RS: So there seems to be some substance to this image of myself. There may be false images associated with it, but there seems to be a reality which I feel as I sit here.

K: Sir,...

RS: So it's not entirely illusory.

K: ...are you saying that you are totally, basically different from the three of us?

RS: Well, I'm in a different place and I have a different body...

K: Of course.

RS: ...and in that sense I'm different.

K: Of course, I'll admit that, I mean you're tall, I' short, I'm brown, you're...

RS: Yes.

K: ...black or you're white or you're pink or whatever it is.

RS: Now at another level I'm not basically different in the sense that we can all speak the same language and communicate, so there's something in common. And at a purely physical level all of us have a lot in common with each other, the same kinds of enzymes, chemicals, and so on. And those indeed - hydrogen atoms, oxygen atoms - we have in common with everything else.

K: Yes. Now, is your consciousness different from the rest? Consciousness, not bodily responses, bodily reactions, bodily conditioning; is your consciousness: your beliefs, your fears, your anxieties, depressions, faith, all that?

RS: Well, I would say that many of the contents of my consciousness or many of the beliefs, desires, etcetera, I have, other people also have. But I would say the particular combination of experiences, memories, desires, etcetera I have are unique, because I've had a particular set of experiences as you have and as everyone has which makes a unique combination of these different elements.

K: So is mine unique?

RS: Yes.

K: So is his?

RS: Exactly.

K: The illusion makes it all common. It's no longer unique.

RS: That's a paradox. It's not immediately clear.

DB: Why isn't it clear? Everybody's unique, right?

RS: Yes, we're all unique.

K: I question that.

RS: We're not unique in the same way. Otherwise the word unique becomes meaningless. If we're unique, each of us is unique, we have a unique set of experiences and environmental factors, memories, etcetera.

K: That's what you just now said, that's common lot to all of us.

RS: Yes, we all have it, but what we have is different.

K: Yes, you brought up in England...

RS: Yes.

K: ...and perhaps another brought up in America, another brought up in Chile, we all have different experiences; different country, different views, different mountains, and so on.

RS: Yes.

K: But apart from the physical environment, linguistic differences and accidents of experience, basically, fundamentally, deep down, we suffer; we are frightened to death, we are anxious, we are agonizing about something or other, and conflict, that's the ground on which we all stand.

RS: But that doesn't seem a very startling conclusion.

K: No, it is not.

DB: But I think what you are saying really implies that what we have in common is essential and fundamental rather than just superficial, you see. And now, I've talked with people about this and they say, everybody agrees we all have these things in common but sorrow, suffering and so on are not so important, the really important point are the higher achievements of culture and things like that, as an example.

JH: Maybe the distinction is between the form and the content. Our contents are all different and they have similarities and differences, but maybe the form is the same, their structure.

K: I would say contents are the same for all human beings.

RS: But you see I can recognize that there is such a thing as common humanity but I would regard that quite possibly as an abstraction or a projection rather than a reality. How do I know that is not an abstraction?

K: Because you go around the world, you see people suffer, you see human beings in agony, despair, depression, loneliness, lack of affection, lack of care, attention, that's the basic human reactions, that is part of our consciousness.

RS: Yes.

K: So you are not basically different from me. You may be tall, you may be born in England, I may be born in Africa, I have dark skin, but deep down the river, the content of the river is the water. The river is not Asiatic river, or European river, it is a river.

RS: Yes, well that is clearly true at some level. But I am not quite sure at what level, you see.

K: I am talking basically, deeply.

RS: But you see it seems to me, why stop there? I can see something in common with all other human beings, but I can also by looking at animals see something in common with them. We have a great deal in common with the animals.

K: Surely, surely.

RS: So why stop at human beings?

K: I don't.

RS: Why not say...

K: Because I say if I feel - I don't like the word 'common' - one feels it is the ground on which all human beings stand. Their relationship with nature, animals and so on, and the content of our consciousness is again the ground of humanity. Love is not English, American or Indian. Hate is not - agony is not yours or mine, it is agony. But we identify ourselves with agony, it is my agony, which is not yours.

RS: We might go through it in very different ways though.

K: Different expressions, different reactions, but basically it is agony. Not German agony and Asiatic agony - British and Argentine, it is human conflict. Why do we separate ourselves from all this? The British, the Argentine, the Jew, the Arab, the Hindu, the Muslim. You follow?

RS: Yes.

K: Which all seems so nonsensical, tribal. The worship of a nation is tribalism. So why can't we wipe out all that?

RS: I don't know. You tell me, why can't we?

K: Because again we have come back to the question: I identify with my nation because that gives me a certain strength, certain standard, certain status, certain security. When I say, "I am British"! This division is one of the reasons of war, not only economic, social and all the rest of it, but nationalism, which is really glorified tribalism, is the cause of war. Why can't we wipe that out? It seems so reasonable.

JH: It seems reasonable on a level like nationalism, people don't think they are England.

K: Start from there.

JH: Okay. But then I have a patient and he does think that he is married, and that it is his wife.

K: Of course it is his wife.

JH: Well, isn't that the same action that you are talking about?

K: No, no. Sir, just let's go into it slowly.

JH: Okay.

K: Why do I want to identify myself with something greater?

JH: Because I am not sufficient.

K: Like nationalism, like god.

JH: I don't feel sufficient.

K: Which means what?

JH: Insecure.

K: Insecure, insufficient, lonely, isolated, I have built a wall round myself. So all this is making me desperately lonely. And out of that conscious, or unconscious loneliness I identify with god, with the nation, with Mussolini, it doesn't matter, Hitler, or any religious teacher.

JH: Okay. Or I get married, I have a child, I make a place for myself. And that's all also identification.

K: Yes. Why do we want to identify with something? No, the basic question is too, why do we want roots?

JH: To belong.

K: To belong, in which is also implied to become. So this whole process of becoming, from childhood I am asked to become, become, become. From the priest to the bishop, the bishop to the cardinal, the cardinal to the pope. And in the business world it is the same. In the spiritual world it is the same. I am this but I must become that.

JH: Okay, what I am is not sufficient.

K: Why do we want to become? What is it that is becoming?

RS: Well the obvious reason for wanting to become is a feeling of insufficiency, inadequacy, in the state that we are. And one of the reasons for this is that we live in an imperfect world, our relationship with other people are imperfect. We are not content for a variety of reasons with the way we are. So the way out of that seems to become something else.

K: Yes. That means escaping from 'what is'.

RS: Yes. But it may seem 'what is' is something we have to escape from.

K: All right. Take the usual experience. I am violent and I have invented non-violence. And I am trying to become that. I'll take years to become that. In the meantime I am violent. So I have never escaped from violence. It is just an invention.

RS: Well you are trying to escape from it. You may escape in the end.

K: No, I don't want to escape. I want to understand the nature of violence, what is implied in it, whether it is possible to live a life without any sense of violence.

RS: But what you are suggesting is a more effective method of escaping. You are not suggesting abandoning the idea of escaping. You are suggesting that the normal way of escaping, trying to become non-violent, is one way of doing it which doesn't work. Whereas if you do another method where you actually look at the violence in a different way you can become non-violent.

K: I am not escaping.

RS: Well, you are changing then.

K: No. I am violent. I want to see what is the nature of violence, how it arises.

RS: But for what purpose?

K: To see whether it is possible to be free of it completely.

RS: But isn't that a kind of escape from it?

K: No.

RS: Being free of something...

K: ...is not an escape.

RS: Why not?

K: Avoidance, running away, fly away from 'what is' is an escape, but to say, look, this is what I am, let's look at it, let's observe what its content is. That is not escape.

RS: Oh, I see the distinction you are making is that an escape in the normal sense is running away from something, like escaping from prison, or one's parents, or whatever, but they still remain there. What you are saying is that rather than escaping from violence, which leaves violence intact and still there, and you try and distance yourself from it, you try to dissolve violence, or abolish it.

K: Dissolve.

RS: Yes.

K: Not abolish it, dissolve it.

RS: All right. So this is different from escape, because you are trying to dissolve the thing rather than run away from it.

K: Running away, everybody runs away.

RS: Well it usually works to a limited extent.

K: It is like running away from my agony by going to football; I come back home, it is there! I don't want to go to watch football but I want to see what violence is and to see if it is possible to be completely free of it.

RS: If I am in a very unpleasant society and I can escape from it by defecting, or leaving it and going to another one. And this does in fact mean I escape to some extent.

K: Of course.

RS: So these are always partial answers and they are partially effective.

K: I don't want to be partially violent. Or partially free from it. I want to find out if it is possible to totally end it. That's not an escape, that's putting my teeth into it.

RS: Yes. But you have to believe it is possible in order to put your teeth into it.

K: I don't know, I am going to investigate. I said for me, I know one can live without violence. But that may be a freak, that may be a biological freak and so on. But to discuss together, the four of us, and see if we could be free of violence completely means not escaping, not suppressing, not transcending it, and see what is violence. Violence is part of imitation, conformity. Right? Apart from physical hurts, I am not talking about that. So psychologically there is this constant comparing, that is part of hurt, part of violence. So can I live without comparison, when from childhood I have been trained to compare myself with somebody? I am talking comparison, not good cloth and bad cloth.

JH: Talking about comparing myself.

K: Myself, with you who are bright, who are clever, who have got publicity, when you say a word the whole world listens. And I can shout, nobody cares. So I want to be like you. So I am comparing constantly myself with something I think is greater.

JH: So this is where becoming comes from, comparing.

K: That's just it. So can I live without comparison?

JH: Doesn't that leave me in an insufficient state?

K: No. To live without comparison? No.

JH: Here I start of insufficient...

K: Am I dull because I compare myself with you who are bright?

JH: Yes, you are dull because you compare yourself.

K: By comparing myself with you who are bright, who are clever, I become dull, I think I am dull. But if I don't compare I am what I am.

RS: Well you may not compare but I may compare. I may say, you are dull.

K: All right. I say, all right. You say I am dull, I want to know what does it mean. Does it mean he is comparing himself with me who is - you follow?

RS: Very frustrating, that. I mean if one compared oneself with somebody and said, "You are dull", and then they said, "What does dullness mean?"!

K: The other day, after one of the talks in England, a man came up to me and said, "Sir, you are a beautiful old man but you are stuck in a rut". I said, "Well, sir, perhaps, I don't know, we'll go into it". So I went up to my room and said, "Am I?", because I don't want to be stuck in a rut. I may be. So I went into it very, very carefully, step by step, and found what does a rut mean, to stick in a groove along a particular line. Maybe, so I watch it. So observation of a fact is entirely different from escaping or the suppression of it.

JH: So he says you are stuck in a rut, then you observe it, you don't compare it.

K: I don't. Am I in a rut, I look. I may be stuck in a rut because I speak English. I speak Italian and French. All right. Am I psychologically, inwardly, caught in a groove, like a tram car?

JH: Motivated by something and not understanding it.

K: No, am I, I don't know, I am going to find out. I am going to watch. I am going to be terribly attentive, sensitive, alert.

JH: Now this requires that you don't react in the first place by saying, "No, that's horrible, I couldn't possibly be stuck in a rut."

K: I wouldn't. You may be telling the truth.

JH: To not have that reaction you can't have that self there that says, I am not the type of person that is stuck in ruts.

K: I don't know. Sir, is there a learning about oneself which is not - this leads to something else - which is not constant accumulation about myself? I don't know if I am making myself clear. I observe myself. And I have learnt from that observation something. And that something is being accumulated all the time by watching. I think that is not learning about yourself.

JH: Being concerned with what you think about yourself.

K: Yes, what you I think about yourself, what you have gathered about yourself. Like a river that is flowing, you have to follow it. That leads somewhere else. Let's get back.

JH: Maybe this is part of the question we are asking because we started with how does this disorder occur.

K: Yes, sir, let's stick to that.

JH: It occurs because I have the image of myself of someone who knows he is not stuck in a rut, I don't like to think that I am stuck in a rut, and somebody says, yes you,you.

K: But you may be.

JH: Yes. I have to be open to looking, to see.

K: To observe.

RS: But then what about this approach: somebody says I am stuck in a rut, I look at myself and think, yes, I am stuck in a rut; then I can respond by thinking, well, what's wrong with that, being stuck in a rut?

K: Sir, that's just blind.

RS: No, you accept the fact, but then you think, well, why should I do anything about it? What's wrong with that as an approach?

K: Like a man stuck as a Hindu, he is stuck. He is then contributing to war.

RS: Well, I may say, well I am stuck in a rut, but so is everybody, it is the nature of humanity to be stuck in ruts.

K: You see, you go off, that is the nature of humanity. But I question that. If you say that is the nature of humanity, let's change it, for god's sake.

RS: But you may believe it is unchangeable. What reason have I for believing that we can change it? I may be stuck in a rut, so are you, so is everybody else, anyone who thinks they are not is deceiving themselves.

K: Cheating themselves. So I begin to enquire, am I cheating myself? I want to be very honest about it. I don't want to cheat, I don't want to be a hypocrite.

RS: You may not be a hypocrite, you may think I am stuck in a rut, and you may be a pessimist. The alternative to being a hypocrite is a pessimist.

K: No, I am neither a pessimist or an optimist. I say, look, am I stuck in a rut? I watch all day.

RS: And you perhaps conclude yes. But then you can take the pessimistic cause and say, yes, I am, but so what?

K: If you prefer that way of living, go ahead. But I don't want to live that way.

JH: Well the person who comes into therapy usually comes in with both sides going on at the same time. He says that, I have this problem which I want to be free of, I don't want to be stuck in a rut; on the other hand when it gets down to really looking at that he doesn't want to look at it either because it becomes uncomfortable.

K: No, of course. To come back to your original question: the world is in disorder, human beings are in disorder, and we described what is disorder. And is there a possibility to live free from disorder? That is the real basic question. We said as long as there is this divisive process of life, I am a Hindu, you are an Arab, I am a Buddhist, You are a Muslim, I am British you are an Argentine, there must be conflict, war. My son is going to be killed, for what?

JH: For as long as I identify on a personal level with my job, or with my family and so on, there will be pain.

K: Of course.

JH: It is the same process.

K: So is it possible to have without identification responsibility?

JH: If I am not identified will I even go to work?

K: But I am responsible for the lady whom I have married. Responsible in the sense that I have to look after her, care for her, and she has to care for me. Responsibility means order. But we have become totally irresponsible by isolating ourselves - British, French.

JH: We handle the problem of responsibility by developing a rut that we can work in.

K: Yes. That's it.

JH: And staying inside that.

K: If I see the fact that responsibility is order, I am responsible to keep this house clean, but as we all live on this earth it is our earth, not the British earth, or French earth and German earth, it is our earth to live on. And we have divided ourselves because in this division we think there is security.

JH: There is stability and security.

K: Security. Which is no security at all.

JH: Well it isn't clear, we have got to go slowly because I think that my job is security, I think that my family is security.

K: You may lose it.

JH: That problem keeps coming up.

K: There is great unemployment in America and in England - three million people unemployed in England.

JH: Well maybe I could get by without my job, but I need to think that I have some self respect.

K: What do you mean, self respect?

JH: What I am trying to say is that there is some place at which I put an identification.

K: Why should I want to identify with anything, sir? That makes immediate isolation.

JH: For stability's sake.

K: Does isolation bring about stability?

JH: It gives one a sense of something hard and firm.

K: Does it? Has it? There have been during the last five thousand years nearly five thousands wars. Is that stability?

JH: No.

K: Why don't we accept - well, I won't go into all that. What is wrong with us?

JH: Well, why don't we see this thing? You are saying that the root of the problem is that I continue to identify with one thing after another, if one doesn't work I just find something else. I don't stop identifying.

K: Yes, sir, which breeds isolation.

JH: But in your example about a person that is stuck in a rut, you say I don't have to identify, I can just step back and look at this thing and see if it is true.

K: Yes.

JH: So you are suggesting that there is something that is not identified, something that is free to look.

K: No. This leads to something else. Why do I want to identify myself? Probably basically the desire to be secure, to be safe, to be protected. And that sense, it gives me strength.

JH: Yes. Strength, and purpose, direction.

K: It gives me strength.

RS: But this is a biological fact. It is not merely an illusion. We again, to come back to the animal kingdom, we see it there: deer go round in flocks, birds have flocks, bees have hives and they are identified with the hive in which they work.

K: But bees don't kill themselves, species don't kill themselves.

RS: Well they kill other bees that invade their hide. They don't commit suicide. They kill others.

K: But we are?

RS: Yes and no, bees do fight other bees that come into the hive.

K: Yes, I know that.

RS: So we see even in the animal kingdom this identification with the group, in the social animals, but many social animals, and we are social animals...

K: Just a minute. Agree. Are we by identifying ourselves with India, or China, or Germany, is that giving us security.

RS: To a limited extent it is.

K: A limited extent.

RS: And by identifying ourselves with our families does because this whole question of responsibility seems closely linked to it. If I identify myself with my family, feel duties, and so on, towards them, protect my sisters, I rush to her defence and make a big fuss about it and threaten, if not actually kill the people who insulted her.

K: We have no sisters.

RS: So if I protect members of my family, defend, rush to their defence, so an insult to them, or an attack, is an insult to me, so I rush to their defence...

K: Of course.

RS: ...there is a reciprocal obligation on their part, if I fall ill or sick they'll feed me and look after me; if I get arrested by the police they will try and get me out of prison and so on. So it does give me a kind of security, it actually works.

K: Of course.

RS: And that is a very good reason for doing it, for most people.

K: Stretch it further from the family, to the community, from the community to the nation and so on, that is a vast process of isolating. You are English, I am German, and we are at each other's throat. And I say, for god's sake this is so damn stupid.

RS: Well it is not entirely stupid because it works to a certain extent.

K: It may work, but it is impractical, it is killing each other.

RS: We haven't killed each other yet, there are more human beings than there have ever been before. So the system so far has gone to the point where far from killing each other we have actually got to the point where we have got a bigger population than the world has ever seen. So the system works only too well, for some reason.

K: So you propose war to kill them off?

RS: No! But there is some aspect of it that does work, and some security that is genuine that these things confer.

K: Yes, sir. At a certain level identification has a certain importance. But at a higher level, if you can call it higher, it becomes dangerous. That's all we are saying. Of course if you are my brother you look after me.

DB: Well it is very hard to draw up a line, you see that starts spreading out.

K: That's right, spreading out.

DB: You know, it slips.

K: That's is what I am so objecting to.

RS: But you see the question is where do you draw the line because if you are my brother then you have the tribal, the clan, or in India, the caste.

K: That's it. Extend it. And then we say, I am Argentine, you are British, he's French and we are economically, and socially, we are murdering each other. And I say that is so insane.

RS: But where do you draw the line, you see. If you say the nation state is wrong, then what is wrong with the tribe, or the caste, then you have got conflict between those.

K: I wouldn't draw the line. I say I am responsible as a human being for what is happening in the world, because I am a human. And so what is happening in the world is this terrible division, and I won't be a Hindu, I won't be a Catholic, Protestant, nothing. A hundred, or a thousand people like that, would begin to do something.

JH: So you are saying that the problem comes up because I mistake my local security, I think that it rests in some local identification.

K: Which is isolation. And therefore in isolation there is no security. And therefore there is no order.

OJAI 3RD CONVERSATION WITH BOHM, HIDLEY & SHELDRAKE 17TH APRIL 1982 'THE NATURE OF THE MIND'

TOM KRAUSE: This is one of a series of dialogues between J Krishnamurti, David Bohm, Rupert Sheldrake and John Hidley. The purpose of these discussions is to explore essential questions about the mind. What is psychological disorder, and what is required for fundamental psychological change? J Krishnamurti is a religious philosopher, author and educator who has written and given lectures on these subjects for many years. He has founded elementary and secondary schools in the United States, England and India.

David Bohm is professor of theoretical physics at Birkbeck College, London University in England. He has written numerous books concerning theoretical physics and the nature of consciousness. Professor Bohm and Mr Krishnamurti have held previous dialogues on many subjects.

Rupert Sheldrake is a biologist whose recently published book proposes that learning in some members of a species affects the species as a whole. Dr Sheldrake is presently consulting plant physiologist to the International Crops Research Institute at Hyderabad, India.

John Hidley is a psychiatrist in private practice who has been associated with the Krishnamurti school at Ojai, California for the past six years.

In the first two dialogues consideration has been given to the process of self identification. A range of subjects has been related to this process, including the problem of suffering, the role of thinking and memory, images, and the uniqueness or commonality of consciousness. Can these processes be observed, and what is the relationship of observation to order, responsibility and change? Today's discussion focuses on the question: is there such a thing as absolute psychological security?

JH: We would like to talk about the question of whether there is a deep security, whether the self can be dissolved. You have suggested that if that's possible, then the problems that the individual brings to the office, the problems...

K: Sir, why do we seek security, apart from physical? Apart from terrestrial security, why do we want security?

JH: Well, we know moments of peace and happiness, and we want to stabilize that, hold that.

K: Then that becomes a memory.

JH: Yes.

K: Not actual security. A memory that one day we were happy, and I wish we could go back to it. Or you project an idea and a hope someday to achieve it. But why is it that human beings, probably throughout the world, seek security? What is the raison d'etre, I mean, what is the demand for security? What makes people ask for security, psychologically?

JH: Well, they're occupied, they're filled with their problems. There's the feeling that if I can solve the problem, if I can find out what the right answer is, if...

K: That's not security, surely. There is great uncertainty, great sense of emptiness in oneself, loneliness. Really, loneliness - let's take that for an example.

JH: Okay.

K: I may be married, I may have children and all the rest of it but I still feel isolated, lonely. And it's frightening, depressing, and I realize it is isolating. After all, loneliness is the essence of isolation, in which I have no relationship with anybody. Is that one of the reasons why human beings seek this desire for security?

JH: Yes, to fill that up.

K: Oh much deeper than that. To be secure in my fulfillment, to be free of fear, free of my agony. I want to be free of all those so that I can be completely secure in peace and happiness. Is that what we want?

JH: Yes.

K: Is that the reason why we seek?

JH: And we want that to be stable over time.

K: Stable, permanent - if there is anything permanent - is that the reason why we crave this, demand, crave for security?

JH: Yes.

K: That means to be free from fear and then I am totally secure.

JH: It feels like I have to be that way in order to function adequately.

K: Function adequately comes later.

JH: What do you mean?

K: If I am secure, I function.

JH: Yes.

K: If I am very anchored in something which I think is false or true, I'll act according to those principles. But is it that human beings are incapable of solving this deep-rooted fear. For example I am taking fear - and they have not been able to solve it.

JH: Yes, that's right.

K: Psychological fears. And to be free from that is to be so marvellously secure.

JH: You are saying that if we can solve these problems at a fundamental level.

K: Otherwise what's the point, how can I be totally secure?

JH: Yes.

K: So, is it the physical security, of bread, of shelter, of food and clothes, spilling over to the psychological field? You understand what I mean?

JH: Do you mean, is that where the psychological feeling of the need for security comes from?

K: Yes, partly. One must have food and clothes and shelter. That's an absolute essential, otherwise you four wouldn't be sitting here. In the search of that, psychologically also I want to be equally secure.

JH: They seem to be equated.

K: Yes, I'm questioning whether it is so.

JH: Yes.

K: Or, the psychological desire to be secure prevents physical security.

JH: It seems like the psychological desire to be secure arises out of the necessity to function in reality.

K: I want to be psychologically secure.

JH: Yes.

K: So I am attached to a group, a community, a nation.

JH: Yes.

K: Which then prevents me from being secure. Security means long-lasting security. But if I identify myself in my search for psychological security and attach myself to a nation, that very isolation is going to destroy me. So why do we seek this?

JH: Okay, then you're saying that there is a mistake, which is that we identify ourselves, attach ourselves to something and seek security in that, and that that's fundamentally wrong.

K: Yes, no, not fundamental. I won't say right or wrong.

JH: Okay.

K: I am asking why? Why do human beings do this? A fact which is right through the world, it's not just for a certain community, all human beings want to be so unshakably security.

JH: Yes.

K: Why?

DB: Well, I think people have some answer. You see, if you say there's a young child, or a baby, he feels the need to be loved by his parents and it seems that at a certain stage the infant has the need for a kind of psychological security, which he should grow out of perhaps, but since he isn't properly taken care of by his parent very often, he begins to feel lost, as you say, alone, isolated, and there arises a demand that he become inwardly secure.

K: A baby must be secure.

DB: Yes, psychologically as well as physically, would you say.

K: Yes, there must be.

DB: Now at some stage you would say that it would change.

K: Yes.

DB: I don't know what age.

K: Why. At a certain age, a small baby or a young child, it must be protected.

DB: In every way, psychologically...

K: Psychologically...

DB: ...it must not be shocked psychologically.

K: ...you protect it with affection, taking it in your lap, cuddling him or her, and holding his hand, you make him feel that he is loved, that he is cared for. That gives him a feeling, here is somebody who is looking after me, and there is security here.

DB: Yes, and then I suppose he will grow up not requiring that security.

K: That's it. I am questioning, as he grows up, and as he faces the world, why does he crave for security?

DB: Well, I think very few children ever have that love to begin with, you see.

K: Oh, that's it. So is that the problem?

DB: Well, I don't know, but that's one factor.

K: That we really don't love? And if one loves, there is no need for security. You don't even think about security. If I love you... not intellectually, not because you give me comfort, sex, or this or that - I really have this deep sense of love for another. What is the need for security? It's my responsibility to see that you are secure. But you don't demand it.

JH: Yes.

K: But human beings do. And does that mean we don't love another?

JH: Yes, it means that what we love is the...

K: I love you because you give me something.

JH: Yes. You make me feel like I'm going to get that security which I crave.

K: No, we are skirting around this. Why? Why do I want security so that I feel completely content, without fear, without anxiety, without agony and so on? Is fear the root of all this?

JH: We seem to have mentioned already several things that are the root of it? As the baby grows up and isn't loved, he feels the need for that, he remembers that, he tries to return to that or get that as an adult, he's afraid because he's not protected, and as an adult he tries to get that protection.

K: Or, sir, is it unconsciously we know that the self, the me, the ego, is really totally unstable.

JH: You are saying that in its nature it's totally unstable?

K: In its nature unstable. And therefore there is this anxiety for security outside and inside.

JH: Why do you say it's totally unstable?

K: Isn't it? Isn't our consciousness unstable?

JH: It seems to have two sides to it. One side says that if I could just get such and such, I would be stable.

K: Yes. And there is a contradiction in that. I may not be.

JH: I may not be.

K: Yes, of course.

JH: I'm not yet, but I will be.

K: Will be.

JH: Yes.

K: No, much more fundamentally, is not this the self itself in a state of movement, uncertainty, attached; fear in attachment; all that? That's state of lack of stability. Therefore I am asking, is that the reason that human beings unconsciously knowing the instability of the self, want security, God, the saviour?

JH: Wanting something absolute?

K: Yes, that'll give complete contentment. Our consciousness is its content. Right?

JH: Yes.

K: And the content is always in contradiction. I believe...

JH: That's right.

K: ...and yet I'm frightened of not believing.

JH: That's why you're saying in essence it's unstable.

K: Obviously it is unstable. So clearly unstable. I want this thing and some other desire comes along and says, don't have that, for God's sake; there is this contradiction, this duality, all that exists in our consciousness: fear, pleasure, fear of death, you know all the content of our consciousness, all that. So that is unstable.

JH: Now sensing all of that, people generally say this problem is too deep or too complex, there's no way to solve it, we can maybe just make some adjustments.

K: Yes, yes. And in that adjustment also there is lack of stability. So unconsciously there must be craving for security. So we invent God.

JH: We keep inventing lots of different things we hope will give us that security.

K: We create God, he's our creation. We are not the creation of God, I wish we were. We would be totally different. So there is this illusory desire for security.

JH: Now wait a minute, why do you say that it's illusory?

K: Because they invent something in which they hope they'll be secure.

JH: Oh, I see. Yes.

K: So, if the content of our consciousness can be changed... quotes, changed - would there be need for security?

JH: If we could eliminate all these contradictions?

K: Yes, contradictions.

JH: Then maybe we would have the security because our consciousness would be stable.

K: So that maybe it. We may not call it security. To be secure, which is a really disgusting desire, sorry. To be secure in what? About what? Personally I never thought about security. You might say, well, you are looked after, you are cared for by others and all the rest of it, therefore there is no need for you to think about security, but I never - I don't want security. I need, of course, I need food, clothes and shelter, that's understood, somebody to...

JH: We're talking about psychological security.

K: I'm talking much deeper issue.

JH: And you're saying that that occurs because the contents of consciousness are no longer contradictory.

K: It may not be what we know as consciousness, it may be something totally different. All that we know is fear, reward and pleasure, and death and constant conflict in relationship: I love you but...

JH: Within limits.

K: Within limits. I don't know if that's called love. So there is the content of consciousness is all that; which is me. My consciousness is me. In this complex contradictory dualistic existence the very fact creates the demand for security.

JH: Yes.

K: So can we eliminate the self?

JH: Well, have we got to the self? It seems like there's somebody in there, in here, who's going to juggle all these things and get rid of the contradictions.

K: But that means you are different from this; from consciousness.

JH: Right.

K: But you are that! You are pleasure, you are fear, you are belief, all that you are. Don't please agree with what we are talking about, what I'm saying. It may be all tommyrot.

JH: I think there are a lot of people who wouldn't agree with that. I think that they would say that...

K: I know there're a lot of people wouldn't because they haven't gone into it. They just want to brush all this aside.

JH: Well, let's look at this. Is there a self that separate, that's going to be able to somehow iron out these contradictions?

K: No!

RS: How do you know? I mean it seems to me that there is - well, at least it may be illusory, but it's very easy to think that one is separate from some of these problems and that there's something inside one which can make decisions.

K: Doctor, am I separate from my fear? Am I separate from the agony I go through? The depression?

RS: Well, I think that there's something within one which can examine these things and that's how it indicates there is some kind of separation.

K: Because there is the observer separate from the observed.

RS: Yes.

K: Is that so?

RS: Well, it seems to be so.

K: It seems to be so!

RS: Now, this seems to be the problem, that it does seem to be so, I mean, in my own experience, of course, and many other people's it does indeed seem that there is an observer observing things like fear and one's own reactions. And it comes out most clearly, I find, in insomnia, if one's trying to sleep there's one part of one that going on with silly worries and ridiculous thoughts round and round; there's another part of one that says, I really want to sleep, I wish I could stop all these silly thoughts. And there one has this actual experience of an apparent separation.

K: Of course, of course.

RS: So this isn't just a theory, it's an actual fact of experience that there is this kind of separation.

K: I agree, I agree. But why does that division exist? Who created the division?

RS: It may just be a fact.

K: What may?

RS: It may just be a fact.

K: Is that so? I want to examine it.

RS: Yes, so do I. I mean, is it indeed a fact that consciousness, as it were, has levels, some of which can examine others, one at a time?

K: No. Would you kindly consider, is fear different from me? I may act upon fear, I may say, I must suppress it, I may rationalize it, I might transcend it, but the fear is me.

RS: Well, we often...

K: You only invent the separation where you want to act upon it. But otherwise I am fear.

RS: The common and ordinary way of analyzing it would be to say, I feel afraid, as if the afraidness was separate from the I. I want to get out of this state of feeling afraid, so I want to escape from it, leaving the fear behind and the I will pass beyond it and somehow escape it. This is the normal way we think.

K: I know.

RS: So what's wrong with that?

K: You keep up this conflict.

DB: But I think he is saying it may be inevitable.

RS: It may be inevitable, you see...

K: I question it.

DB: Yes, well, then how do you propose to show it's not inevitable?

K: First of all, when there is anger, at the moment of anger, there is no separation. Right?

RS: When you're very angry...

K: Of course.

RS: ...what we normally say is you lose control of yourself and the separation disappears, you become the anger, yes.

K: At the moment when you are really angry, there is no separation. The separation only takes place after. "I have been angry." Right? Now, why? Why does this separation take place?

RS: Through memory.

K: Through memory, right. Because I have been angry before. So the past is evaluating, the past recognizing. So the past is the observer.

DB: That may not be obvious, you know. For example, I may have physical reactions that go out of control, like sometimes the hand or the body, and then I say I am observing those physical reactions going out of control and I would like to bring them back in, right?

K: Yes.

DB: I think somebody might feel the same way, that his mental reactions are going out of control and that they have momentarily escaped his control and that he's trying to bring them back in. You see, now, that's the way it may look or feel to many people.

K: So, what?

DB: Well, then it is not clear. Have we made it clear that that is not the case, you see.

K: Sir, I am trying to point out, I don't know if I am making myself clear: when one is frightened, actually, there's no me separate from fear.

JH: But then there seems...

K: When there is a time interval, there is the division. And time interval, time is thought. And when thought comes in then begins the division. Because thought is memory; the past.

RS: Thought involves memory - yes.

K: Yes, involves memory and so on. So thought, memory, knowledge, is the past. So the past is the observer; who says I am different from fear, I must control it.

JH: Let's go through this very slowly because it seems like the experience is that the observer is the present. It seems like he's saying, I'm here now and what am I going to do about this the next time it comes up.

K: Yes. But the 'what am I going to do about it' is the response of the past, because you have already had that kind of experience.

Sir, haven't you had fear?

JH: Surely.

K: You know, something, a fear that has really shaken you.

JH: Yes.

K: Devastating one.

JH: Yes.

K: And at that second there is no division, you are entirely consumed by that.

JH: Yes.

K: Right?

JH: Right.

K: Now, then thought comes along and says, I've been afraid or because of this and because of that, now I must defend myself, rationalize fear and so on, so on, so on. It's so obvious, what are we discussing?

DB: You see, I think that, coming back again to the physical reaction which can also consume you and you say at the next moment, you say, I didn't notice it at the time, thought comes in and says, that's a physical reaction.

K: Yes.

DB: Now I know it, you see, what is the difference of these two cases, you see, that in the second case it would make sense to say, I know that I have reacted this way before, right? You know, I can take such an such an action.

K: I don't quite follow this.

DB: Somebody can feel that, it's true I get overwhelmed by a reaction and thought comes in. But in many areas that's a normal procedure for thought to come in if something shattering happens, and then a moment later, you think, what was it? Right? Now, in some cases that would be correct, right?

K: Quite right.

DB: Now, why is it in this case it is not, you see.

K: Ah, I see what you mean. You answer it. You see, you meet a rattler on a walk.

DB: Yes.

K: Which I have done very often. You meet a rattler, he rattles and you jump. That is, physical self-protective intelligent response. That's not fear.

DB: Right. Well, not psychological fear.

K: What?

DB: It has been called a kind of fear.

K: I know, I don't call that psychological fear.

DB: No, it's not psychological fear, it's a simple physical reaction...

K: Physical reaction...

DB: ...of danger.

K: ...which is an intelligent reaction not to be bitten by the rattler.

DB: Yes, but a moment later I can say, I know that's rattler or it's not a rattler, I may discover it's not a rattler, it's another snake which is not so dangerous.

K: No, not so dangerous, then I pass it by.

DB: But then thought comes in and it's perfectly all right.

K: Yes,

DB: Right?

K: Yes.

DB: But here, when I am angry or frightened...

K: Then thought comes in.

DB: And it's not all right.

K: It's not all right.

DB: Yes.

K: Oh, I see what you are trying to get at. Why do I say it is not all right. Because fear is devastating, it blocks one's mind and thought and all the rest of it, one shrinks in that fear.

DB: Yes, I think I see that. You mean that possibly that when thought comes in it cannot possibly come in rationally in the midst of fear, right?

K: Yes.

DB: Is that what you mean?

K: That's what I'm trying to say.

DB: So in the case of physical danger, it would still come in rationally.

K: Yes. Here it becomes irrational.

DB: Yes.

K: Why, I am asking, why? Why doesn't one clear up this awful mess?

JH: Well, it isn't clear.

K: Look, sir, it is a messy consciousness.

JH: Yes, it's a messy consciousness.

K: Messy consciousness, contradicting.

JH: Yes.

K: Frightened, oh, so many fears and so on, it's a messy consciousness. Now, why can't we clear it up?

JH: Well, it seems we are always trying to clear it up after the fact.

K: I think the difficulty lies in that we don't recognize deeply this this messy consciousness is me. And if it is me, I can't do anything! I don't know if you get the point.

RS: You mean we think that there's a me separate from this messy consciousness.

K: We think we are separate. And therefore we are accustomed, it is our conditioning, to act upon it. But I can't very well do that with all this messy consciousness which is me. So the problem then arises, what is action? We are accustomed to act upon the messy consciousness. When there is realization of the fact that I can't act, because I am that.

JH: Then what is action?

K: That is non-action.

JH: Okay.

K: Ah, that's not okay, that is the total difference.

JH: Yes, I think I understand. On the one hand there's the action of consciousness on itself which just perpetuates things.

K: Yes.

JH: And seeing that, then it ceases to act.

K: It's not non-violence.

RS: Sorry sir, you're saying that normally we have the idea that there's a self which is somehow separate from some of the contents of our consciousness.

K: That's right, that's right, sir.

RS: If someone tells us we're wonderful, we don't want to be separate from that, but if we feel afraid and if somebody tells we're awful, we do want to be separate from that. So it's rather selective. But nevertheless we do feel there's something in us which is separate from the contents of this messy consciousness. We normally act in such a way as to change either the contents of the consciousness or our relation to the world, and so on. But we don't normally examine this apparent separation between the self, the me, and the contents of the messy consciousness. That's something we don't challenge. Now you're suggesting that in fact this separation which we can actually experience and do, most of us do experience, is in fact something we ought to challenge and look at and we ought to face the idea that we actually are the messy consciousness and nothing other.

K: Of course. It's so obvious.

RS: Well, it isn't obvious, it's very non-obvious and it's a very difficult thing to realize, because one's very much in the habit of thinking one is separate from it.

K: So can we move away from our conditioning? Our conditioning is me. And then I act upon that conditioning, separating myself. But if I am that, no action, which is the most positive action.

JH: The way that that would be heard, I'm afraid, is that if I don't act on it it's just going to stay the way it is.

K: Ah!

RS: You're suggesting that by recognizing this, the process of recognizing it, facing up to...

K: It's not facing up. Who is to face up? Not recognize. Who is to recognize it? You see, we always think in those terms. I am that, full stop. We never come to that realization, totally. There is some part of me which is clear and that clarity is going to act upon that which is not clear. Always this goes on.

RS: Yes.

K: I am saying the whole content of one's consciousness is unclear, messy. There is no part of it that's clear. We think there is a part, which is the observer, separating himself from the mess. So the observer is the observed. Gurus, and all that.

DB: You were raising the question of action, though; if that is the case, how is action to take place?

K: When there is perception of that which is true, that very truth is sufficient, it is finished.

DB: You have said also, for example, that that-ness itself realizes its own messiness, right?

K: Yes. Messiness, it's finished.

RS: Sir, are you suggesting that the realization of the messiness itself in some way dissolves the messiness?

K: Yes. Not a separative realization that I am messy. The fact is consciousness is messy, full stop. And I can't act upon it. Because previously acting upon it was a wastage of energy. Because I never solved it. I have struggled, I have taken vows, I have done all kinds of things to resolve this messy stuff. And it has never been cleared. It may partially occasionally...

JH: Well, I think that's another aspect of this. In therapy or in our own lives we seem to have insights that are partial, that we clear up a particular problem and gain some clarity and order for a time. And then the thing returns in some other form or...

K: Yes, yes.

JH: ...the same form. You're suggesting that the thing needs to be done across the board in some way.

K: Before the observer acts upon it, upon the messy consciousness, right? Say, I'll clear this up, give it time, you know all the rest of it. But that's a wastage of energy.

JH: Right.

K: When the fact that you are that - you are not wasting energy. Which is attention. I don't know if you want to go into this.

RS: No, this is very interesting. Please do.

K: Would we agree that acting upon it is a wastage of energy?

JH: Yes. This creates more disorder.

K: No. It creates much disorder, and there is this constant conflict between me and the not me. The me who is the observer and I battle with it, control it, suppress it, anxious, worry, you follow? Which is all essentially wastage of energy. Whereas this messy consciousness is me. I have come to realize that through attention. Not I have come to - sorry.

DB: Would you say that the consciousness itself has come to realize it?

K: Yes.

DB: I mean, it's not me, right?

K: Yes. Which is total attention I am giving to this consciousness - not I am - there is attention and inattention. Inattention is wastage of energy. Attention is energy. When there is observation that consciousness is messy, that fact can only exist when there is total attention. And when there is total attention, it doesn't exist any more, confusion. It's only inattention that creates the problems. Refute it!

RS: But, sir, I don't understand entirely what you're saying. This total attention that you're talking about would only be able to have this effect if it somehow was something completely in the present and devoid of memory.

K: Of course, of course, attention is that. If I attend to what you have said just now, devoid of memory, which is attention, I listen to you not only with the sensual ear, but with the other ear, which is, I am giving my whole attention to find out what you are saying; which is actually in the present. In attention there is no centre.

RS: Because the attention and the thing attended to become one, you mean. You mean there's no centre in the attention because the attention is all there is, the thing attended to and the attention is all there is.

K: Ah, no, no. There is messiness because I have been inattentive. Right?

RS: Yes.

K: When there is the observation of the fact that the observer is the observed, and that state of observation in which there is no observer as the past, that is attention.

Sir, I don't know if you have gone into the question of meditation here. That's another subject.

JH: That may be a relevant subject. It seems that what you're talking about may happen partially.

K: Ah! It can't happen, then you keep partial mess and partial not mess. We're back again the same position.

JH: Yes.

RS: But do you think this kind of attention you're talking about is the sort of thing that many people experience occasionally in moments of great beauty, or occasionally a piece of music they're really enjoying, they lose themselves, and so on - do you think that many of us have had glimpses of this in these kinds of experiences?

K: That's it. That's it. When I see a mountain, the majesty and the dignity and the depth of it drives away myself. A child with a toy, the toy absorbs him. The mountain has absorbed me; toy has absorbed the child. I say that means there is something outside which will absorb me, which will make me peaceful. Which means an outside agency that'll keep me quiet: God, prayer, looking up to something or other. If I reject an outside agency completely, nothing can absorb me. Let's say, if you absorb me, when you are gone I am back to myself.

JH: Yes.

K: So I discard any sense of external agency which will absorb me. So I am left with myself, that's my point.

JH: I see. So you're suggesting that when this happens partially it's because we're depending on something.

K: Yes, of course.

JH: I see.

K: It's like my depending on my wife.

JH: Or my therapist or my problem.

K: Something or other.

JH: Yes.

K: Like a Hindu, Catholic or anybody, they depend on something. Therefore dependence demands attachment.

JH: Now it's possible to listen to you say this and have the idea of what you are talking about and try and do that.

K: Ah, you can't do it! That means you are acting again. You want something out of it. In exchange I'll give you this, you give me that. Just a trade. Here it's not like that, you are enquiring into something which demands a great deal of thought, great deal of intelligence and attention. I say, look, why is there this division, this mess in the world? Because our consciousness is messy and so the world is messy. So from that arises, is it possible to be free of the self? Consciousness, the messy consciousness, is the self.

RS: It is not possible to be free from the contents of consciousness, different experiences, as long as my eyes are open, I'm looking, I see all sorts of different things. Now what you were saying about the attention when one's looking at a mountain, for example, are you suggesting that if I have that same kind of attention to everything I experience, that then this is the...

K: You see, again you experience.

RS: Yes, well, all right, but...

K: You are the experience.

RS: Yes.

K: Right. That means, there is no experience.

RS: There's just attention, you mean.

K: Experience involves remembrance. Time, which is the past. Therefore the experiencer is the experienced. If I seek illumination, enlightenment, or whatever you might call it, I am then trying to do all kinds of things to achieve that. But I don't know what illumination is. I don't know. Not because you said it or Buddha said it or somebody has said it: I don't know. But I am going to find out. Which means the mind must be totally free: from prejudice, from fear, all the rest of that messy business. So my concern is not illumination, but whether the content of my consciousness can be cleansed - whatever word you use. That's my concern - not concern, that's my enquiry. And as long as I am separate from my consciousness, I can experience it, I can analyze it, I can tear it to pieces, act upon it - which means perpetual conflict with me and my consciousness. I wonder why we accept all this. Why do I accept that I am a Hindu? Why do I accept I am a Catholic? You follow?

RS: Yes.

K: Why do we accept what other people say?

JH: Well, we say it ourselves.

K: Yes. No, not only we say it but it's encouraged, sustained, nourished by people outside. Why? Why do we accept it? He is a professor and he is teaching me, I accept that. Because he knows biology much more than I do, I go to his class, and I am being informed by what he says. But he's not my guru, he's not my behaviour guide. He is giving me information about biology and I am interested in it. I want to study it, I want to go out into the field and do all kinds of stuff. But why do we accept authority, psychological authority, spiritual - quote spiritual - authority? Again we come back to security. I don't know what to do but you know better than I do; you are my guru. I refuse that position.

RS: But don't we arrive at the same set of problems if we start not from authority but from responsibility; say I'm the father, I have this child - we've agreed some time ago...

K: You have to instruct it, of course.

RS: You have to look after this baby.

K: Of course, of course.

RS: Fine. But now in order to feed the baby you become preoccupied with security: job tenure, you know, house...

K: Of course, of course.

RS: ...protecting the house against marauders and so on.

K: Of course, of course.

RS: Don't you get into the same lot of things about preoccupation with security starting not from authority but from responsibility for others, for children, for example.

K: Of course.

RS: So then what is the answer to that. It's easy to say you should reject responsibility.

K: Of course, I have money, if I earn money, job, so on, I have to look after myself, I have servants, I have to look after servants, my children, perhaps their children too. I am responsible for all that.

RS: Yes.

K: Physically I am responsible. To give them food, to give the right amount of money, allow their children go to a proper school like my children, I am responsible for all that.

RS: But isn't that going to bring you back to the same position of insecurity and so on that you were trying to dissolve by this rejection of authority?

K: I don't see why I need spiritual or psychological authority. Because if I know how to read myself, I don't need anybody to tell me. But we have never attempted deeply to read the book of myself. I come to you and say, please, help me to read. And then the whole thing is lost.

JH: But I think what Rupert is asking is that if we start by assuming responsibility for other people, that entails...

K: What? My earning capacity.

JH: Which must be secure.

K: Yes, secure as much as possible. Not in countries where there's tremendous unemployment.

JH: So you're saying that that doesn't entail any psychological insecurity.

K: Of course not. But when I say, he's my servant, I'm going to keep him in that place, you follow?

JH: No. Tell me more.

K: I mean, I treat him as a servant.

JH: Yes.

K: Which becomes irresponsible. Naturally.

JH: But if it's a servant, he can come and go. But if it's a child...

K: Ah!

JH: ...he can't come and go.

K: He's part of my family.

DB: I think the question is something like this, that suppose you are responsible for a family and the conditions are difficult, you may not have a job and you may start to worry about it and become insecure psychologically.

K: Yes.

DB: Right?

K: I don't worry about it, there it is, I have no more money. So, my friend, I have no more money, if you want to stay, share the little food I have, we'll share it.

DB: You're saying that even if you are unemployed and you are responsible for a family it will not disturb the order of the mind, right?

K: Of course not.

DB: You will find an intelligent way to solve it.

K: Deal with it.

DB: Yes.

RS: But this kind of worry as a result of responsibility is relative.

K: I don't call it worry. I am responsible.

RS: Yes.

K: And therefore I look after as much as I can.

RS: What if you can't?

K: You can't. Why should I worry and bother, I can't, it's a fact.

DB: You're saying that it's possible to be completely free of worry, for example, in the face of great difficulties.

K: You see, that's what I am saying. Where there is attention, there is no worry, because there is no centre from which you are attending.

RS: There are still problems and there may still be responsibilities that one has.

K: Of course I have problems, so I resolve them.

RS: But if you can't resolve them.

K: Then I can't.

RS: If your family is starving.

K: I can't. Why should I worry about it? I can't be Queen of England.

RS: No.

K: No.

RS: But if you're a poor Indian, unemployed, your family is starving, there's nothing, you've tried everything, you've failed.

And you don't worry. Actually, surprisingly enough, a lot of poor Indians in just that situation don't worry, that's the most amazing thing about India. But then of course people coming along looking from outside say, well, this is fatalism.

K: Yes, that's right.

RS: And it's often regarded as the disease of India, the very fact that so many people manage not to worry in those circumstances... to the degree that we would expect.

K: I'd like to ask you a question. You've listened to all this: messy consciousness - does one realize it, and empty the content: fear, you know, the whole business? Does it interest you?

JH: Yes.

K: Totally?

JH: Yes.

K: That means what?

JH: It means you just listen.

K: No, it means a conversation, dialogue between us. Penetrating deeper and deeper and deeper. Which means you must be free to examine. Free from your prejudice, from your previous experience. Of course, otherwise you can't examine. You can't investigate... 'investigate' means explore, you know, push, push, push it further and further. Now, are you, are we willing to do that, so that actually the self is not? But when the self is not it doesn't mean you neglect your wife, your children - you follow? It becomes so silly, like becoming a sannyasi, going off to the mountains, a monk going off into a monastery. That's an extraordinary escape. The fact is I have to deal with my wife and children and if I have a servant. Can I be so totally without the self that I can intelligently deal with these problems?

OJAI 4TH CONVERSATION WITH BOHM, HIDLEY & SHELDRAKE 18TH APRIL 1982 'THE NATURE OF THE MIND'

K: I don't capture the depth of your meaning, what is implied. You have gone into it and you can say that, absolute attention. I hear it and make it into an idea. And then I pursue the idea.

JH: That seems to be the process.

K: That's what we do all the time.

RS: Yes.

K: So it's gone. Idea is not what you said. What you said had depth in it.

JH: But we don't know that we're pursuing an idea.

TOM KRAUSE: This is one of a series of dialogues between J Krishnamurti, David Bohm, Rupert Sheldrake and John Hidley. The purpose of these discussions is to explore essential questions about the mind: what is psychological disorder and what is required for fundamental psychological change?

J Krishnamurti is a religious philosopher, author and educator who has written and given lectures on these subjects for many years. He has founded elementary and secondary schools in the United States, England and India. David Bohm is professor of theoretical physics at Birkbeck College, London University in England. He has written numerous books concerning theoretical physics and the nature of consciousness. Professor Bohm and Mr Krishnamurti have held previous dialogues on many subjects.

Rupert Sheldrake is a biologist whose recently published book proposes that learning in some members of a species affects the species as a whole. Dr Sheldrake is presently consulting plant physiologist to the International Crops Research Institute in Hyderabad, India.

John Hidley is a psychiatrist in private practice who has been associated with the Krishnamurti school in Ojai, California for the past six years.

The first three dialogues have focused on various processes of self-identification, and their effects. The need for psychological security has been discussed as growing out of a basic division in which the contents of consciousness appear to be separate from consciousness itself. Today's discussion begins with the importance of attention.

K: What is analysis? And what is observation? In analysis there is the analyzer and the analyzed. And so there is always that difference maintained. Where there is difference there must be conflict, division, and that's one of the factors that really is very destructive to the whole psychological freedom: this conflict, this division. And analysis maintain this division. Whereas if one observes closely - I'm not correcting you, sir, I'm just enquiring... the analyzer is the analyzed. Again the same problem, thought has divided the analyzer and the analyzed. The analyzer is the past who has acquired a lot of knowledge, information, separated himself, and is either correcting the observed, the analyzed: make him conform, he is acting upon it. Whereas the analyzer is the analyzed. I think if that is really understood very deeply, the psychological conflict ends, because in that there is no division between the analyzer and the analyzed, there is only observation. Which Dr Bohm and we discussed at considerable length last year.

So if that is clearly understood - I am not laying down the law, but as one has observed this whole business of conflict - whether one can live the whole of one's life without conflict. That means the controller is absent; which is a very dangerous question. I feel where there is inattention, lack of attention, is the really the whole process of conflict.

RS: Yes, I can see that if both sides saw this with the utmost clarity...

K: Yes. That means they are giving intelligence to the whole problem.

RS: What happens if only one party in a conflict sees it with that utmost clarity?

K: What happens? One gives complete attention in one's relationship between man and woman; let's begin with that. You have given complete attention. When she insults you, when she flatters you, when she bullies you or when she is attached to you, all that is the lack of attention. If you give complete attention and the wife doesn't, then what happens? That is the same problem. Either you try to explain day after day, go into it with her patiently. After all, attention implies also great deal of care, affection, love. It's not just mental attention. It's attention with all your being. Then either she moves along with you, comes over to your side, as it were, or she holds on to her separative contradictory state. Then what happens? One is stupid, the other is intelligent.

RS: But the conflict...

K: So there is always the battle between the stupid and the ignorant. I mean between the ignorant, the stupid and the intelligent.

JH: A thing that seems to happen in that situation is that the one's intelligence makes room in which the other person who is caught in some attachment may have freedom to look.

K: But if the other refuses to look at it, then what is the relationship between the two people?

JH: There is none.

K: That's all. You see tribalism is deadly, destructive. You see it basically, fundamentally, and I don't. You have seen it probably immediately and I'll take many years, a long time to come to that. Will you have the - I won't use the word patience - will you have the care, affection, love, so that you understand my stupidity? I may rebel against you. I may divorce you. I may run away from you. But you have sown the seed somewhere in me. But that does happen, doesn't it, really, in life?

RS: Yes.

JH: You said something that interests me here, you said that if you have seen it immediately and the other person may take a long time to come to seeing it. And it seems like in this attention that you're talking about, perception is immediate.

K: Of course.

JH: It isn't built up out of...

K: Oh, no, no, then it's not perception.

JH: Well, that may be part of the reason the other person is having difficulty seeing it, is that they want it to be proved to them.

K: You see conditioning...

JH: Yes.

K: ...is destructive. And I don't.

JH: Yes.

K: What is our relationship between us two? It's very difficult to communicate with each other...

JH: Yes.

K: ...verbally or with care, it's very difficult.

JH: You won't know what I'm talking about.

K: And also I'm resisting you all the time. I'm defending myself.

JH: You're defending what you think you see.

K: What I think is right. I have been brought up as a Hindu or a British or a German or a Russian, whatever it is, and I like it. And I see the danger of letting that go. I might lose my job. People will say I'm little-minded. People might say I depend on public opinion, so I'm frightened to let go. So I stick to it. Then what is your relationship with me? Have you any relationship?

JH: No.

K: No, I question whether you have no relationship.

JH: I can tell you what I see.

K: Yes. But if you have love for me, real, not just attachment, and sex and all that business, if you really care for me, you cannot lose that relationship. I may run away, but you have the feeling of relationship. I don't know if I am conveying what I mean.

JH: In other words, I don't just say, well, I see it and you don't, and if you're not going to listen, the heck with you.

K: No. Sir, you have established a kind of relationship, perhaps very profound, when there is love. I may reject you, but you have that responsibility of love. And not only to the particular person, but to the whole of humanity. What do you say, sir, about all this?

DB: Well, I can't say. I think that this care and attention are the essential points. For example in the question of the observer and the observed or the analyzer and the analyzed, the reason why that separation occurs is because there has not been enough attention.

K: Attention, that's what I'm saying.

DB: So that one has to have that same attitude even in looking at one's own psychological problems.

JH: An attitude of care?

DB: Care and attention to what's going on, you see, one starts to analyze by habit, and one might condemn that, for example, that would not be the right attitude. But one has to give care and attention to exactly what is happening in that just as in relationship with people, right? And it's because that there was no attention or not the right kind of attention that that division arose in the first place, and was sustained, right?

RS: But it's possible to have perhaps this kind of attention towards people that we know: wives, children, friends, etcetera, but what about people we don't know? I mean, most of us have never met any Russians, for example, and we feel, many of us, there's this terrible fear of Russia and Russian nuclear weapons and the Russian threat and all the rest of it. And so it's very easy to think, well, we've got to have all these bombs and so on because the Russians are so terrible. We can think all these things about Russians, we've never met them. So how do we have attention to enemies or imagined enemies that we don't know?

K: What is an enemy? Is there such thing as an enemy?

RS: Well, there are enemies in the sense that there are people who...

K: ...who disagree with you...

RS: ...not only disagree.

K: ...who have definite idealistic ideological differences.

RS: Well, they're usually people who are afraid of us, I mean, the Russians are afraid of us and we're afraid of them. Because they're afraid of us they're in a position of being our enemies.

K: Because we are still thinking in terms of tribalism.

RS: Yes, certainly.

K: Supposing you and I move out of that. I'm Russian, you are English or British or German or French. I move, I despise this sense of tribalism. What's my relationship then with you?

RS: Well, we...

K: I'm not Russian then.

RS: No.

K: I'm a human being with all my psychological problems and you are another human being with all your psychological problems. We are human beings, not labels.

DB: Of course the Russians may reject this, you see, that is, suppose we're in this situation...

K: We are in that...

DB: ...and the Russians will reject this, right. Then what's the next step, right?

K: So what shall we do? You see, I represent all humanity. I am all humanity. I feel that way. To me it's an actuality, not just an emotional explosion, emotional, romantic idea. I feel I am the rest of mankind; I am mankind. Because I suffer or I enjoy, I go through all the tortures and so do you, so do you. So you are the rest of mankind. And therefore you have terrible responsibility in that. So when you meet a Russian or a German or a British or Argentine you treat them as human beings, not labels.

RS: Then does this simply mean that in this largely tribal society with governments and bombs and weapons of war, there'll just be a few individual scattered here and there who've dissolved tribalism in themselves?

K: Yes. If a hundred of us all over the world really had a non-tribalistic attitude towards life, we would be acting like a - I don't know - like a light in the midst of darkness. But we don't. This just becomes an idealistic romantic idea and you drop it because each pursues his own way.

RS: Yes.

K: Sir, I think we ought to differentiate between attention and concentration. Concentration is focussing your energy on a certain point; and in attention, there is no focussing on a certain point. It's attention.

JH: Concentration seems to have a goal in mind.

K: A goal, motive; it's a restrictive process. I concentrate on a page, but I am looking out of the window and I'll pull it back and keep on this business. Whereas if I give complete attention to what I am looking out of the window, that lizard which is going along the wall, and with that same attention I can look at my book, look what I am doing.

JH: Concentration presupposes that there's a controller in there pulling back.

K: That's just it.

RS: But then, if there's no controller of the attention, the attention is simply a response to whatever the present circumstances are.

K: You insult me; I'm attentive. There is no recording that insult.

DB: Yes, that's it.

K: You flatter me: what a marvellous talk you gave the other day. I've heard this so often repeated. And I'm bored with it, so - I'm not only bored, I see - what? You follow, sir? Is it possible... really, that's the much more difficult question - is it possible not to record, except where it is necessary? It's necessary to record when you are driving. To learn how to drive. Record when you do your business and all the rest of it. But psychologically, what is the need to record?

RS: Isn't it inevitable? Doesn't our memory work automatically?

K: Memory is rather selective.

JH: We seem to remember things that are important to us...

RS: Yes.

JH: ...have some connection with who we think we are and what our goals are.

DB: It seems to me that when there is paying attention then in general attention determines what is to be recorded and what is not, that is, it is not automatic any more.

K: It's not automatic any more. Quite right.

DB: If it comes from the past, from the concentration or from the analysis, then it will be automatic.

K: Another problem which we ought to discuss - we said yesterday we would - religion, meditation, and if there is something sacred. We said we would talk about that.

Is there anything sacred in life? Not thought creating something sacred, and then worshipping that sacred, which is absurd. The symbols in all the Indian temples, they're religious, like in the Christian church, or in the Muslim mosque there is this marvellous writing, which is the same. And we worship that.

JH: That's idolatry.

K: No. Thought has created this. The thought has created the image and then it worships it. I don't know if you see the absurdity of it.

RS: Well, that's manifestly absurd, but the more sophisticated members of different religions would say that it's not the thought, the image created by thought that's being worshipped, but the image points to something beyond thought which is being worshipped.

K: Wait a minute, let's look at it. That is, the symbol, we know symbol is not the real, but why do we create the symbol? Please answer it. If there is something beyond, why do we create the intermediary?

RS: Well, I think that this is a question which in certain religions has been central to them: the Jews, who were against all idolatry for exactly this reason, and the Muslims, who don't have images in the mosques.

K: No but they have these scripts.

RS: They have writing.

K: Of course.

RS: But they think writing is what tells them about what lies beyond all symbols, you see.

K: Yes.

RS: Now you could say the writing simply becomes a symbol, but I mean, these are words, and words can help us. We're having a discussion, and these words that we're having, your words may help me, for example. If they're written down, then they're written words like Muslim words.

K: So; why do I have to have an intermediary at all?

JH: Because I think I'm here and it's over there and I don't have it. I need some way to get there.

K: No, you're not answering my question. Is it that you, the intermediary, understand or realized or follow truth or whatever it is, therefore you are telling me about it?

JH: Well, maybe I've seen something and I want to tell you about it.

K: Yes, tell me about it, but why do you make yourself interpreter? Why do you become the intermediary between that - I don't know what that is - and me, who is ignorant, who is suffering? Why don't you deal with my suffering rather than with that?

JH: I think that that will deal with your suffering. If I can get you to...

K: That has been, sir, that has been the old trick of all the priests in the world. We have had priests from time immemorial, right?

JH: Yes.

K: But you haven't released my sorrow. I am still suffering after a million years. What for? Help me to get rid of that. Help me to be free, without fear, then I'll find out. Is it that you want position, power, status, like the rest of the world? Now this is really quite serious.

DB: I think, you know, if we try to give the priests the most favourable interpretation, that they may have considered, at least, the best among them, that as a kind of poetic imagery that people may use to point to something beyond that, right, in a communication, and they are trying to point to this sacred which we were talking about. That's perhaps the way they would look at it. Now would you say that that would that make no sense, you know, to have a poetic image to point to the sacred.

K: But, sir, why don't you help me to see what is happening to me?

DB: Yes, that's your point, don't point to the sacred right away but look at this first.

K: Help me to be free of it, then I'll walk.

DB: Yes, I understand that.

K: We have never talked - nobody has gone into this like that. Always god, some saviour, some Brahma, and so on, so on. And this is what we call religion. All the rituals are invented by thought, marvellous architecture by thought, all the things inside the churches, temples, mosques, created by thought. And thought creates it, then thought worships it. But thought is not sacred.

JH: Yes, I see that. So you are saying, is it possible to put a stop to thought?

K: Thought. Is it possible?

JH: And thought is the thing that gets in the way by creating the images...

K: Of course.

JH: ...which we take for something really valuable.

K: I start out looking for something sacred. You come along and say, I'll tell you all about it. Then you begin to organize it. It's all gone by then, it's finished.

JH: Then I just stay within thought, that's all I have.

K: So, if we reject or understand that thought is not sacred, there's nothing holy about thought, but thought thinks that what it has created is holy. Right, sir?

DB: Right. Would you also add that time is not sacred.

K: Nothing in time, of course not.

DB: Nothing in time, or people would say that.

K: Tomorrow is not sacred!

DB: They always say only the eternal is sacred.

K: But to find out what is eternity, time must stop.

JH: But we get into a real subtle place here, because you have said things like, absolute attention dissolves the self. Then absolute attention can become a thought.

K: Idea of it, yes.

JH: Yes, the idea of it. So we may go the route of creating the idea. That seems to always be the danger.

K: You make a statement: absolute attention. I don't capture the depth of your meaning, what is implied. You have gone into it and you can say that, absolute attention. I hear it and make it into an idea. And then I pursue the idea.

JH: That seems to be the process.

K: That's what we do all the time.

RS: Yes.

K: So it has gone. Idea is not what you said. What you said had depth in it.

JH: But we don't know that we're pursuing an idea. We don't realize at the time that we're pursuing an idea.

K: Of course not, because I am used to this reducing everything to abstract ideas. So could we try to find out or realize that anything though does is not sacred?

RS: That seems self-evident to me.

K: All right. That's self-evident. In all the religions as they are now, there is nothing sacred. Right?

RS: No, there's nothing sacred in itself in the words or the buildings or so on. But in a sense all these religions are supposed to point beyond themselves.

K: Yes. And to help me to go beyond all this, I must start with my being free from my agony, understand my relationship with people. If there is confusion here, in my heart and my mind, what's the good of the other? I am not materialistic. I am not anti the other. But I say, look, I must start where I am. To go very far, I must start very near. I am very near. So I must understand myself. I'm the rest of humanity. I am not an individual. So, there is the book of humanity in me. I am that book. If I know how to read it from the beginning to the end, then I can I find if there is a possibility, if there is really something that is immense, sacred. But if you are all the time saying, look, there is that, that will help you, I say, it hasn't helped me. We have had these religions for millions of years. That hasn't - on the contrary, You have distracted from 'what is'.

So, if I want to find out if there is anything sacred, I must start very near. The very near is me. And can I free myself from fear and agony, sorrow, despair, all that? When there is freedom I can move, I can climb mountains.

RS: Sir, are you saying that the sacred would become apparent if we dissolved fear and all these other things.

K: Obviously, sir. That's real meditation, you see.

RS: Through attention to what is really happening in us.

K: That's it.

RS: And what is really happening between us and other people and all the rest of it.

K: Between our relationships.

RS: Yes. Through attention to this, this action...

K: ...attention and we have discussed too with Dr Bohm, some time ago, having an insight into the whole movement of the self, which is not a remembrance. Insight is total perception of what you are, without analysis, without investigation, all that, total immediate perception of the whole content of your consciousness, not take bit by bit by bit, that's endless.

JH: Oh, we're broken up so we look at each little piece.

K: Yes. And because we are broken up we can never see the whole. Obviously, that seems so logical!

JH: Okay.

K: So, is it possible not to be broken up? What is to be broken up? This confusion, this messy consciousness, which we talked about yesterday. You see nobody wants to go so deeply into all this. Right, sir? First of all, one hasn't the time; one is committed to one's job, to one's profession, to one's science, to one's whatever one is doing. And you say, please, this is too difficult or too abstract, not practical. That's the word they all use. As though all this, what you are doing and all is terribly practical. Our armaments, is it practical? Tribalism, is - oh well, you know all about it.

So, sir, let's move from there. Is silence of the mind a state of attention? Or is it beyond attention?

DB: What would you mean by beyond attention? Let's try to get into that.

K: Is attention an act of will? I will attend.

JH: No, we said that's concentration.

K: Sir, I am asking you, where there is attention is there any kind of effort? Struggle? I must attend. What is attention? Let's go into it a little bit. What is attention? The word diligent is implied in attention; to be diligent. Not negligent.

RS: What does diligent mean? Careful? You mean careful?

K: Yes. Care. To be very precise. Diligent.

DB: The literal meaning is taking pains.

K: Pains, that's right. Taking pain. Which is to care, to have affection, to do everything correctly; orderly; not repetitive. Does attention demand the action of thought?

RS: Well, it doesn't demand the action of analysis, in the way you've explained it.

K: No.

RS: ...and insofar as thought is analytical, it doesn't demand that. And it doesn't demand the action of will insofar as will involves a separation, an attempt to, by one part of the mind, to force another part to do something else. It doesn't imply any sense of going anywhere or becoming anything because becoming leads one out of the present.

K: That's right. You can't become attentive.

RS: But in the act of attention...

K: Just see what is implied. You can't become attentive. That means in attention there is no time. Becoming implies time.

RS: Yes.

K: In attention there is no time. Therefore it is not the result of thought.

RS: Yes.

K: Now: is that attention silence of the mind? Which is a healthy, sane mind: uncluttered, unattached, unanchored, free mind, which is the healthiest mind. Therefore I am asking, in that attention, is the mind silent? There is no movement of thought.

RS: Well, it sounds like it, yes. It sounds like a state of being rather than a state of becoming because it's not going anywhere, or coming from anywhere.

K: Again, when you say being, what does that mean? Being what?

RS: Well, being what it is. It's not being something else.

K: No, what does that mean, being? Are you putting being as a opposite to becoming?

RS: Yes.

K: Ah, then. The opposite has its own opposite.

RS: Well, by being I simply mean a state which is not in a process of going somewhere else in time.

K: Which means non-movement.

RS: I suppose so.

DB: You could say that, yes.

K: Non-movement.

DB: If you say what you mean by movement, that it doesn't mean it's static to say it's non-movement.

K: No, it's dynamic, of course.

DB: But you see it's a little difficult...

K: There is no moving from here to there.

DB: But there is another kind of movement, perhaps.

K: That's what I want to go into. If we use the word being without movement, it is without thought, without time, which is the movement which we know. But the other has its own dynamism, its own movement, but not this movement, the time movement, the thought movement. Is that what you call being?

RS: I suppose it is.

K: Is that being silent? You follow, sir? We have various forms of silence. Right?

RS: Yes. It may not be silent in the sense of soundless.

K: I am using the word 'silence' in the sense, without a single movement of thought.

RS: Well, in that sense it must be silent almost by definition.

K: Yes. So, has my mind - the mind - has it stopped thinking? Has it - not stopped thinking - has thought found its own place and therefore it's no longer moving, chattering, pushing around. Because there is no controller. You follow? Because when there is a great silence, then that which is eternal is. You don't have to enquire about it. It's not a process. It isn't something you achieve, my God! By fasting, by rituals, by all these absurdities. Sir, you hear that.

JH: Yes.

K: You hear X saying that. What value has it? Value in the sense, what do you do with it? Has it any importance or none at all? Because you are going your way. You are a psychologist, you'll go your way, I'll go my way, I have said what I have to say and there it ends. Then somebody comes along and says, I'll tell you what he means. You haven't the time. He has a little time, he says, I'll tell you all about it. And you are caught. This is what is happening. From the ancient of times, the Sumerians, the Egyptians, the Babylonians, they have played this. And we are doing still the same kind of nonsense. And what has religion done to man? It hasn't helped him. It has given him romantic illusory comfort. Actually look - we're killing each other - I won't go into that.

So, sir, let's begin. What is a healthy mind?

JH: It's a mind that's not caught so in this...

K: A mind that's whole, healthy, sane, holy; h-o-l-y, holy. All that means a healthy mind. That's what we started discussing. What is a healthy mind? The world is so neurotic. How are we going to tell you, as an analyst, as a psychologist, how are you going to tell people what is a healthy mind, nobody's going to pay attention. They'll listen to the tape, to television, and they'll agree, but they'll go on their own way. So what do we do? First of all, do I have a healthy mind? Or is it just a lot of pictures, words, images? A mind that's totally unattached, to my country, to my ideas - all totally dispassionately unattached.

JH: And you are suggesting that only then am I in a position to talk to anybody?

K: Obviously! Obviously. I may be married. I may, but why should I be attached to my wife?

JH: Then it's an idea of marriage, it's not a marriage.

K: But love is not attachment. So have I realized that? A healthy mind that says, I love, therefore there is no attachment. Is that possible?

RS: Sir, you make it sound so easy and so difficult at the same time because...

K: I don't see why it's difficult.

RS: Because you see, I hear what you say, I think this is absolutely wonderful stuff. I want to have a healthy mind, I want to be in a state of being, and then you see I realize that it's back into this, that I can't become in a state of having a healthy mind and I can't move by an act of will or desire into this state. It has to happen. And it can't happen through any act of my will.

K: No. So.

RS: I have to let it happen in some sense.

K: So we begin to enquire. You begin to say, now, why? Why am I not healthy? Am I attached to my house? I need a house, why should I be attached to it. A wife, relationship, can't exist without relationship, life is relationship. But why should I be attached to a person? Or to an idea, to a faith, to a symbol, you follow? The whole cycle of it. To a nation, to my guru to my god, you follow? Attach mean attached right through. A mind can be free of all that. Of course it can.

RS: But not just by wanting to be free of it.

K: No. But seeing the consequences of it, seeing what is involved in it: the pain, the pleasure, the agony, the fear, you follow, all that is involved in that. Such a mind is an unhealthy mind.

RS: Yes, but one can even agree with that, one can even see it, one can even see the movements of one's attachments, one can even see the destructive consequences of all this. But that doesn't in itself seem automatically to dissolve it.

K: Of course not. So, it brings in quite a different question.

Which is, sir, do you hear it, merely with your sensory ears or do you really hear it? You understand my question.

RS: Yes.

K: Is it just casual verbal sensory hearing, or hearing at depth? If you hear it at the greatest depth, then it's part of you. I don't know if...

DB: Well, I think that generally one doesn't hear at the greatest depth and something is stopping it, you see. All the conditioning.

K: And also probably we don't want to hear it.

DB: Well, but the conditioning makes us not want to hear it.

K: Of course, of course.

DB: We're unwilling to do so.

K: How can I say to my wife, I love you but I am not attached? She'll say, what the hell are you talking about? But if one sees the absolute necessity to have a healthy mind, and the demand for it, not only in myself, but in my children, my society.

JH: But you don't mean by that going around demanding of myself and other people that they become healthy.

K: No, no, no. I demand in myself. I ask why is not my mind healthy? Why is it neurotic? Then I begin to enquire. I watch, I attend, I am diligent in what I am doing.

DB: It seems to me that you say that we must have to see the absolute necessity of a healthy mind, but I think we've been conditioned to the absolute necessity of maintaining attachment. And that's what we feel, right?

RS: Well, we haven't necessarily, you see, there are many people who've seen that there are all these problems, there's something wrong with the mind, they feel that something could be done about it and all that, and then take up some kind of spiritual practice, meditation, what not. Now you're saying that all these kinds of meditation, concentrating on chakras and what not are all just the same kind of thing.

K: I have played that trick long ago.

RS: Yes.

K: And I see the absurdity of all that. That is not going to stop thought.

RS: Well, some of these methods are supposed to. I don't know if they do or not, you see. They've never done it for me.

K: No

RS: But I don't know if that's because I haven't done them right.

K: So instead of going through all that business, why don't you find out. Let's find out what is thought, whether it can end, what is implied, you follow? Dig.

Sir, at the end of these four discussions, have you got healthy minds? Have you got a mind that is not confused, groping, floundering, demanding, asking? You follow, sir? What a business! It's like seeing a rattler and saying, yes, that's a rattler, I won't go near it. Finished!

JH: It looks from the inside like this is a tremendous deep problem that's very difficult to solve, and you're saying from the outside that it's just like seeing a rattler and you don't go near it, there's nothing to it.

K: It is like that with me.

JH: Yes.

K: Because I don't want to achieve nirvana or heaven or anything. I say, look - you follow?

JH: Well, I think it's interesting why it looks so deep when in fact it isn't.

K: No, sir, we are all so very superficial. Right? And that seems to satisfy us. That's our good house, good wife, good job, good relationship, don't disturb anything. I'll go to church, you go to the mosque, I'll go to the temple, keep things as they are.

JH: Well then you're saying we don't even want to look at it.

K: Of course not.

JH: But say we come with a problem...

K: Sir, if Mrs Thatcher and the gentleman in Argentina looked at it, how tribalistic they are, they would stop it. But they don't because the public doesn't want it. British - you follow? We are educated to be cruel to each other. I won't go into all that.

So, a healthy mind is that, sir. A healthy mind is without any conflict. And then it is a holistic mind. And then there's a possibility of that which is sacred to be. Otherwise all this is so childish.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC TALK 2ND MAY 1982

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday morning? For those who were not here yesterday may we repeat something of what we said? We were saying yesterday morning how the world is broken up, divided through nationalism, which is really a form of tribalism, how religions have divided man, with their dogmas, with their beliefs, with their superstitions, illusions, how human beings have created sects, each one believing that they are going to lead mankind to a different kind of physical world and a so-called spiritual world. There have been various gurus, both in the West and in the East, with their peculiar beliefs and meditations and all that business. It is really good business! And also how man has created armies and all the implements of war to destroy each other in the name of their country, honour, prestige, freedom, anything, an idea to destroy each other. And also ideologically man again has divided himself as the as the totalitarians and the democratic group. While in one country there is absolutely no freedom, it is like living in a prison, and the others are free to do what they want to do. And also man had divided himself with his beliefs. Take in this little valley; if you observe, or if you have gone around, there are so many little sects, so many different congregations, different beliefs, different ideals, different prejudices, bias, and so on. They represent the world which is similar, with their bias, conclusions, ideals, faiths, following this person and worshipping that person, that symbol or another kind of symbol in the East or in the West. Wherever you go you see this extraordinary phenomenon; that man throughout his life has broken not only the earth, the American earth, the English earth, the French and the Russian and Asiatic world; whatever he has touched has brought about misery. And also technologically, he has brought about great benefits. Technologically also, he has created wars.

And so we were saying yesterday the scientists have not helped man; he has helped him technologically, but also he has helped to further wars, the atomic bomb and the conventional war. So the scientists have not basically, fundamentally brought about a mutation in man's conditioning. Nor the politicians; nor the religious leaders, the organized belief, the organized faith, the organized conventional worship of a symbol, of a person, of a saviour. None of those people have helped man to end his sorrow, his loneliness, his despair, anxiety; nor local priests nor the gurus. Apparently throughout the ages man has been led. There have always been political leaders, religious leaders, and of course national heroes, who kill the most.

And observing all this, which is not a Western phenomenon, but also in the Asiatic world, observing all this, if one is at all serious, if one is at all concerned with man's mind, his heart, his whole existence; he must either escape from it all through another form of isolation, commune, or become a monk or escape through some form of entertainment, amusement. Or, if he is at all serious, he has to answer for all this, he is responsible for all this. I do not know how serious the listeners are, but if you are serious, what is your responsibility towards all this. How far will you go in your responsibility, how deeply, how widely; or limit oneself to one's own little life, one's own little experience, pleasures, and forget the vast human suffering, poverty; not be concerned or be concerned with one particular type of war, or be concerned with the ending of all wars, not only outward war but also the inward struggle of man, his eternal conflict within himself and with his fellow man. This has been the history of man, thousands and thousands of years of evolution, man still remains as he was, slightly, probably, a little modified, but basically he is cruel, violent, antagonistic, competitive, and so on.

And, as we were saying yesterday also, each one of us thinks we are independent individuals with his own narrow problems and limited points of view. But when one begins to enquire deeply, as we are doing now, and I hope we can do this together, when we are enquiring deeply why human beings, after so many million years, why have we become like this, divided, fragmented, contradictory, confused, everlastingly seeking pleasure, never ending sorrow, never comprehending his relationship to the world and to each other. Why there is this infinite conflict between man and man.

We were saying also yesterday morning that our consciousness, that is, what you are; what you think, what you feel, your reactions, your beliefs, your conclusions, your experiences, your knowledge, your fears, anxieties, loneliness, despair and sorrow and the fear of death is common to all mankind. Wherever you go, man is conditioned to this state. Wherever you live, whether in the affluent society or in some poor village in a hamlet far from civilization, there too man suffers, is desperately lonely; anxious, insecure, like the rest of the mankind. As we were saying also, seeing this, one begins to question whether there is individuality at all. Or, there is only humanity and you are humanity. Essentially, deeply you are the rest of mankind. But unfortunately we have been educated, conditioned, both religiously and environmentally, educated to the idea that we are separate individuals, each one seeking his own particular salvation, particular happiness, particular enjoyment of life. And this has given a great sense of freedom, each one doing what he wants to do. That is choice. He thinks he is free, because he can choose. But the movement of choice is in the same field from one corner to another. This is not freedom. So we were saying yesterday our consciousness, which is our human daily existence is the rest of humanity. And that consciousness in itself is contradictory; in itself broken up, fragmented.

As we were saying also, this is not a lecture. Lecture being talking about a particular subject in view of giving further information about that subject. In that sense this is not a lecture. But we are thinking together, if that is at all possible. Thinking together, observing together this extraordinary phenomena, what man has become, and what he has done with the world, with his own life, and with the life of the world around him. And so we are observing very closely, impartially, dispassionately, what we are and what we have made of the world. So please, if you are at all serious, and one must be serious because the world is in a terrible state; there is tremendous danger for each of us. And so we are thinking together, observing together, not agreeing together, not seeing things as I see it or as you see it, with our own particular bias, our own prejudices, our own nationalistic, idiotic points of view; but rather be free to observe. Free to observe implies not to have any bias, to see exactly what is going on outwardly. If we do not see that accurately, then we will not be able to relate ourselves to that accurately, precisely. If one observes clearly, without any motive, without any direction, just to observe as you would observe a mountain; it is there, majestic, silent, immovable. In the same way, to observe this extraordinary phenomena of man.

So we are together observing closely, hesitantly, attentively, this movement, this tide that goes out and comes in, which is what we are, we create the world, and then by the world we are trapped. We have created this society; not each one of us, but our past generations, those and us have created this present immoral, destructive society. And we are trapped by that society. That society is made by each one of us. So we are responsible for that society. Whether is possible, not to change society, but is it possible to radically, deeply transform our conditioning, which is, understand deeply our consciousness, which is what we are? Is it possible to transform, not into something, but to bring about a mutation in the very structure and nature of our consciousness. That is the problem. That is the crisis. it is not a political crisis, economic crisis, or the crisis of war, but the crisis is in ourselves. And we apparently cannot face that crisis, are unwilling to face it. And so we try to escape from that fact through various forms of entertainment religious, political, football, and all the rest of it.

Also, as we were saying yesterday morning, the content of our consciousness, the content being what you think, what you feel, your reactions, your longings, your despairs, your pleasures, your depressions, your faith, your dogmas, your sorrow, your beliefs, your desperate loneliness, and the fear of ultimate death; all that is your consciousness. That is what you are. And we are asking together whether the content can end. That is, the conditioning of the human mind, human existence, can that be transformed. So we took yesterday the whole question of belief; which is part of our consciousness. The ideals, the faiths, that divide man against man; the totalitarian ideology and the democratic ideology; the Catholic ideology and the protestant ideology; their belief, their dogmas, their violence is the same in the Asiatic world. That's part of our consciousness, as nationalism, is part of our tribal consciousness. Whether that belief can end totally, completely, having no belief, ideals at all; but actually face facts as they are, not as they should be. Like each one of us seeing the fact of it, the truth of it, the reality of it, the logic it, whether we can be free totally from belief, from ideals, ideology. This requires a great deal of investigation, attention, energy to find out how our minds are crippled with beliefs and ideologies; which is an actual escape from that which is. And being incapable of meeting 'what is', we try to escape into some ideal; which we will go into more in detail as we go along.

And also we took yesterday this question of hurt, psychological, inward hurt of human beings; how each one of us from childhood till we die, we are always hurt by something or something or other. If you are aware of it as you are sitting there, I hope comfortably, whether one is aware that one is hurt, deeply hurt; by the parents, by the school, through comparison, through some kind of harsh word, through a gesture. And as we grow older we carry that hurt, consciously or unconsciously, deeply. And the consequences of that hurt are incredibly complex; because when one is afraid of getting more hurt, and the action from that hurt, either neurotic, defensive, and to defend oneself further from being hurt and therefore fear involved in that hurt. That's part of our consciousness.

As we said, that hurt is the image we have built about oneself. Each one has an image about himself: various types of masks, various qualities and variety of images he has himself, built himself or society has given him the images, because it is one of these images that gets hurt. The image is me; the image is not different from me. We went into that yesterday. So whether it is possible to be totally, completely free from all hurts; never to be hurt; then only the mind can flower; then only there can be proper human relationship with each other. So it is very important to find out whether it is possible to be entirely free of an image about oneself; and it is that image that gets hurt. We went into it somewhat in detail yesterday.

So we should also go into the examination of the further content of one's consciousness. That is, relationship with our fellow man, relationship with another, relationship with the most intimate person; in that relationship, as one observes in daily life, there is a great deal of conflict. There is a great deal of struggle, happiness, ultimately ending in divorce and finding another and beginning same song again. This perpetual conflict between man and man between man and woman; why? We accept this conflict, or if we do not accept it and want to find a solution for it, we go to the professionals to help us, the psychologists, the priest, some authority, some specialist that will help us to get over our particular conflict with another. And apparently, as one observes, if you have also observed, this conflict doesn't end. You may cover it over, you may run away from it, you may somehow forget it and accept it, but there is the conflict, inwardly, in our relationship with all human beings, however intimate, however distant. We have never asked why. Whether that conflict between human beings, intimate or otherwise, can ever end. This is an important question to ask, because all life is relationship, whether you live in a monastery or in a commune or live by yourself in a little flat. You are still related. Life is a movement in relationship. And in that movement there is apparently a great deal of conflict and misery. This is part of our consciousness, submerged or on the surface. Why, after a million years with all the information that we have, all the information which has become our knowledge, why has it not prevented us from this sorrow, conflict of this relationship? Please ask yourself this question. I am not asking you to ask this question. It is a natural question. We have to face this problem and resolve it. If it is not resolved, if we live in conflict, we'll inevitably create a society that will perpetuate this conflict. So please be serious, if you will, with regard to this question. Because it is very important; we are facing wars, war is this ultimate result of our endless conflict within ourselves, conflict with our most intimate persons. So this a very serious question which one must find an answer and resolve it. It is not an academic question, a theoretical question. It's a human question, in which we are all involved, every day of our life; why we live in conflict with our neighbour, whether that neighbour be far away or close by; why we have this struggle, this conflict between man and woman; various forms of struggle - sexual, the struggle of each one pursuing his own desire, his own ambition, his own fulfillment or her fulfillment, each one trying to become something different from each other. This is an obvious daily fact. You may meet in bed, but each one is pursuing different lives, like two parallel lines never meeting; and this is called relationship, in which there is no actual sense of love.

We will go into: love is not pleasure, love is not desire, love is not seeking fulfillment, but we have made our relationship with each other a sense of fulfillment, pleasure, something to be desired and so on. So why do human beings so technologically intelligent, such extraordinary capacity and energy, why human beings have not solved this most essential question, problem. You may meditate. You may seek enlightenment. You may follow the latest guru, the latest expression of whatever you are following, but if you have not solved this problem, all your spiritual attainments and technological achievements have no value at all. Because our life is relationship, our life is something that cannot be lived by yourself in isolation, and because we live or attempt to live in isolation, we are bringing about great catastrophe. As a group, as nations which are isolating themselves - the American, the British, the French, the Russian, the Indian, and so on. This is a form of isolation, and in that isolation they are trying to find security. There is no security whatsoever in isolation. Because ultimately human beings are being destroyed. Similarly, if we have not resolved this essential basic question of relationship, which is at present isolating us from each other, this isolation must inevitably breed all kinds of misery, confusion, hatred, anger. So is it possible to have a relationship in which there is no conflict whatsoever?

What is relationship? What does it mean to be related to another, not physically only, but much more psychologically, deeply, which conditions our physical activity. We always forget that: that we want to improve the environment as society, and we do all kind of legislative laws and so on, and so on, and so on. We never realize that psychologically if we are not clear what we do, we'll bring about a rotten society. Psychologically it is more important to transform our own conflicts, not end merely the outward conflicts. I hope we understand this deeply. The psychological conflicts will inevitably produce world conflict. But we are trying to change the outward structure without fundamentally psychologically, if I may use that word which is so abused, spiritually - if there is no fundamental basic transformation of the psyche, do what you will outwardly, what you have done outwardly will always be overcome by the psyche; as you see in the recent revolution of the Communists. They hoped through changing of the outward structure of society they would change man. And it has been totally the other way, which is so observable.

So relationship is extraordinarily important. And why is there this division between man, woman, between himself, within himself, and with his neighbour; the whole process of relationship? Are you waiting for the speaker to explain it away? Why we live in conflict with each other, man, woman, and so one. Or, we are together observing this phenomena; observing, not trying to resolve it; to observe first and to understand how to observe. Not how to resolve the problem, you understand? There is the problem; I am not married, suppose I am married, I am pursuing my own desires, my own ambition, my own success and so on, and she also is doing the same thing, in different forms, and we may have sex, and all that, children, but we two are separate entities, pursuing our own goals, our own way, our own fulfilment, doing our own thing, as you call it. And naturally, my wife and I are in contradiction, irritated, not able to adjust, or not wanting to adjust. Because where there is love there is love there is no adjustment. So what shall I do? What is my action, or non-action - please listen carefully, action or non-action, because non-action will be far more important than action. The negation is the most positive action. That is, to see the false and see the truth in the false, is to end the false. Just to observe. But we are all so eager to act, to do something about it. My wife and I quarrel, we disagree, you know all the rest of the ugly business that goes on; you are probably much more aware of it than I am. The terrible tension; the loneliness; the ugliness of it all.

Now; together, we are going to observe, not to resolve the problem - please listen carefully - not to resolve, not to end it, or try to find a solution for this; but together we will observe. That is, how you approach the problem, that is, how you look at the problem; you understand? The approach is far more important than the problem itself; isn't it? If I am frightened of losing my wife; or, you know, all that business, I don't have to go into details of all that, my approach then is conditioned by my fear. And the solution then of the problem is conditioned by my fear; so it's not resolved. You understand? So, the approach matters far more than the problem itself. If we could understand this one simple thing. We are always concerned with the problem; the complexity of it, the analysis of the problem. Our mind is directed to the solution of the problem. We are saying - the speaker is saying - don't bother with the solution, but how you approach, how you come close to the problem, how you observe the problem is much more important than the problem itself. Have you got this? Even intellectually see this; verbally: that the solution is not important; what is important is how you come to the problem, how you look at the problem. Is the problem out there and you are approaching it, or - please listen - or, the problem is you. You understand? I won't go into that for the moment, for that leads us somewhere else. So, as we are saying, the approach to the problem is all important. Right? Can we move from there? You are moving, I am not moving. We are saying, how you come to the problem, how you look at the problem, how you gather your energy to look at the problem. Is your approach directed, which means trying to resolve the problem, or have you a motive, and if you have a motive, you approach with that motive. So, when you approach with a motive, the motive is going to decide how you will deal with the problem. Whereas, if you have no motive - please, this demands accurate observation - when you have no motive and therefore no direction, then you are observing the problem purely, without any bias, without any discoloration. You are just observing it. Right? Are we doing this now as you go along? Please, this is not a game we are playing. It's not an intellectual amusement on Sunday morning. This is very, very serious, because life is relationship; if we don't understand that relationship, then we create havoc in the world; we destroy our children; we destroy each other, which we are doing now, through competition, through wars, through all the horror that man is doing.

So together we are observing, why human beings cannot live at peace with each other. That is the fact, that's an actual statement, not exaggerated; and our approach to it is either pure non-personal objective observation or you are approaching it with a personal reaction. If you are approaching with a personal reaction, it'll go on forever, the conflict. But if you approach it objectively, dispassionately, without any direction; you understand - what is then the state of your mind - please follow this - what is then the state of your mind which looks at the problem? You have understood this? Have you understood, somebody? All right, let's put it the other way. Why is there conflict between man and woman, between man and man, you know, the whole relationship; why? Look at it please; answer it yourself, go into it yourself; don't depend on me, on the speaker, it's not worth it. It has no value. He is just a verbal entity, a telephone. But you have to find the answer; why. Is it - we are observing together, so you are not learning it from the speaker, he is not teaching you anything; please understand this. He is not teaching you a thing. Therefore you are not his followers; he is not your authority, he is not your guru. They have all led you astray. Because they have never been able to solve this problem, or never tackled this problem.

So; in observing together, we are going to discover why this conflict exists, whether it is possible to end it completely; not theoretically, not for a day; end it. This conflict exists, must exist - I don't want to tell you, because it becomes so silly. If I tell you, you'll say, yes, that's quite right; and then you are back. It isn't something that you yourself have discovered. You know what happens when you discover something for yourself psychologically? You have immense energy. And you need energy; to free the mind of its conditioning. I quarrel with my wife, if I have one, or a girl friend, whatever it is - quarrel with her because I am a lonely man; I want to possess her. I want to depend on her, I want her comfort, her encouragement, her companionship; I want to have somebody who will tell me that I'm marvellous. So I am building an image about her; and she also wants to be possessed, wants to fulfil in me; sexually; wants me to be something different from what I am. So, there is this, each one living it may be for a week, or a day, or years, has built an image which becomes knowledge. Follow this, please follow this; knowledge about each other. Knowledge - may I go into it a little bit? This is serious. Knowledge is destructive in relationship. Right? If you once understand this: I say I know my wife because I have lived with her, I know all her tendencies, her irritations, impetuosity, her jealousy, which becomes my knowledge about her; how she walks, how she does her hair, how she moves - you follow? I have collected a lot of information and knowledge about her. And she has collected a lot of knowledge about me; so the past - you follow - knowledge is always the past. Right? There is no knowledge about the future; predictable. Predictable; you understand? So, I have knowledge, we have knowledge about each other. Right?

So we have to enquire a great deal into the question of knowledge; what place has knowledge in life? Are we together in this observation? Will knowledge transform man? What place has knowledge in the mutation or in the ending of conditioning? This is conditioning; I have conditioned through knowledge her, and she has conditioned me through knowledge. You are following all this? We are together in this? We are observing together? Please, I am not teaching you. You are observing with all your energy, with capacity to see this fact: that where there is knowledge in relationship, there must be conflict. I must have knowledge how to drive a car; how to write a sentence; how to speak English, or French, or whatever language it is. Or I must have technological knowledge; if I am a good carpenter, I must have knowledge about the wood, tools I use and so on; but in relationship with my wife; or with a friend, whatever it is; that knowledge which I have gathered together, put together through constant irritation, constant separation, ambitions, this knowledge which I have acquired, that knowledge is going to prevent actual relationship with another. Right? Is this a fact, or is this merely a supposition, a theory, an idea? An idea is an abstraction of a fact. Right? The word idea in Greek means to observe, to see, to come very close to perception; not make an abstraction which becomes an idea. So we are not dealing with ideas. But we are dealing with the actual relationship, which is in conflict; and that conflict arises when I have accumulated lots of information about her and she has acquired a lot about me. So, our relationship then is based on knowledge; and knowledge can never be complete, about anything in life. Please realize this. Knowledge must always go with the shadow of ignorance. Right? You can't know about the universe. Astrophysicists may describe it, but to be aware of that immensity, no knowledge is required through information; you have to have that mind that is so vast, so completely orderly, as the universe is, then that's a different matter.

So similarly, knowledge in relationship brings about conflict. See the fact. Not accept the fact; see the fact that knowledge has importance in one direction, in the other it has not. The negation is the most positive; you understand? Right? Can we go from there a little more? That is, do we exercise will to end conflict? That is, to enquire whether will, that is, positive action, I want to end this conflict, whether that will bring about the cessation of conflict. Which we have done before.

So, it's very important to understand the place of knowledge and knowledge as an impediment in relationship. Love is not knowledge; love is not remembrance. When there is no knowledge about her, I look on her as a fresh, new human being, each day new. You know what it does? You are too learned, you are full of book knowledge, what other people have said. And that's why this becomes awfully difficult to comprehend, a very simple thing like this.

Again quarter to one. I'm sorry. We'll continue next Saturday and Sunday; because we are dealing with a very complex problem of living. And that living is the understanding of our content of our consciousness. As long as we have not comprehended the totality of that consciousness we'll always be in disorder. And disorder is the very nature of our consciousness. And that's why we took faith, belief, hurt, relationship, it's part of our consciousness. And out of this disorder order can be brought about, which we'll talk about next Saturday and Sunday.

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 4TH MAY 1982

One has been handed lot of questions. And I don't think it is possible to answer all of them. So we have chosen some out of those.

It is not possible to have a discussion with such a large group; nor have a dialogue, which is a conversation between two people. And so we have resorted to questions written down and to be answered. I don't know by whom, but I believe the questions have to be answered. I do not think that the speaker is going to answer the questions. But together we are going to investigate the question; its import, whether it can be answered superficially or go into it deeply. We are together going to find the answer; not that the speaker is going to reply to your questions, but together we are going to approach the question and see the implications of the question and find for ourselves the answer; which is much more reasonable, rational, and worthwhile. If one expects someone else to answer the questions, then one is not taking the responsibility at all. You are depending then on someone else, whereas if we could this morning together explore the question by carefully going into it, not analytically, but observing the quality, the nature, the structure of the question. If that is clear, that we are together going to investigate and find the answer for ourselves.

1st QUESTION: Our children are aware through television and other means of the threatening world they live in. The violence of crime, wars, nuclear danger. How do we help them to face this?

How do we face the problem, rather than the children? Because after all the parents are also the educators; not merely the teachers of a school, the parents, though they have brought them into the world, they are also really deeply responsible people to teach them. So, what is our responsibility? How do we meet these problems ourselves? The wars, the violence, the terrible things that are shown on television; the terrorism, and all the rest of it, how do we meet it. as parents, as human beings? I wish we could have a conversation about it, a dialogue, but that's not possible.

So how do I or you meet this terrible world? Do we accept things as they are, adjust ourselves to things as they are, modifying our lives but accepting things, status quo, as they are? Do we accept it? Or, if we do not accept them, how do we face the problem? How do I or you personally face the issue? Please, I am asking this question; don't just sit back and let me answer it. Let's find out together how do we face these problems.

What is our action? What shall we do? If I am a parent and I have several children, and I see the things that are going on in the world, the tribal wars, the terrorism, kidnapping, all the rest of it; as a parent how shall I educate him to face this life? First of all, how do I as a parent face these problems? Is my response casual; is my response traditional; my response that I cannot do anything about it, it's too vast, too complicated, and so I leave it to others; the politicians, the economists, the social reformers, and so on. Or, do I take the total responsibility of what is happening in the world?

If I am violent, dishonest, have no sense of a world, global outlook, not parochial attachments; is that possible? That is, to have a global relationship; psychologically; is that possible? Or, I live in a particular country and I have to obey its laws, follow its rules and so on, so I am committed to the limited outlook on life. Is it possible for me as a parent, and so a teacher, is it possible for me to break away from all this, break away from the usual mediocre tradition? And I am afraid most of us are mediocre - and is it possible, can I undertake to educate my children to have a global attitude towards life? What do you say to it? Or shall I leave it all to the teachers, in a school, however advanced, and let them educate my children? Not undertake the responsibility of educating them at home as well as in their holidays and so on.

By nature, by inheritance we are a violent people: aggressive, competitive, arrogant, we have come to that, through various biological demands and also psychological, perhaps necessities which have become habitual. And as we are violent people, we create a violent society and can I educate my children not to be violent? Come on, answer! Perhaps I can talk to them about it, if I have time. Probably we have not time; we are worried about our own problems; and get home rather tired after a long day and want to brush off the children; but if I have taken the responsibility to teach them, to help them, to understand this cruel world; I may talk to them, I may point it out to them. But the televisions, the children's friends, are all encouraging violence. So at home I tell them one thing, and when they go outside they are being gregarious, wanting to follow the tradition, not to be abnormal, different from others, they become like the rest of them, mediocre, cruel, thoughtless; you know what is happening. So, what shall I do? Please, it's your problem. What shall I, as a parent, do?

Can I give up my pleasures? I am in the habit of smoking - suppose; I am not - suppose I am in the habit of smoking, drinking, taking drugs, mildly, marijuana or whatever it is, and I tell my children not to do it; they won't believe me. They'll say, you're a hypocrite. Even though they may not tell me that. So will I give up all those things for my children? Go into it, sir, it's your problem. Will I give up my drink, my irritations, my anger, my drugs and alcohol for the sake of my children? I have heard several parents in Europe and elsewhere say, why should I give up my pleasures for my blasted children? Do you understand the attitude? They have to face the world; and if we make them soft they will be destroyed. So we must make them hard. And all the rest of it. So what shall I do?

Am I educating my children, as a parent at home, or am I educating myself as well as the children? You follow my question? I, as a parent, I feel I have to educate them; but I carry on my own ways; dishonest, having no integrity, occupied with my own problems, with my own ambitions and so on, can I, as a parent and a teacher of my children, educate myself as well as my three or four children? That means I have to break up the pattern in which I have been living. If I love my children, I have to. Because perhaps the influence of the home is far more important than the influence of the school, where the parents are supposed to love their children, care for them, look after them, see to their behaviour, the language they use; cultivate their good taste, appreciation of beauty; that means I myself am educating, all the time. Educating in the sense that, not live in the same old pattern; the same old habits of past generations and amusements and pleasure. Obviously I must give them up. But will the parents do this? Will you do it for your children? And will you help as a parent to bring about a new school?

This has been a problem with which the speaker has been associated for the last 60 years. There are several schools in India, here there is one here, and England. And this is a problem. Not only the biological sexual problem of an adolescent; and also the society is so brutally strong, the outward environment; you may bring them up very, very carefully, but the structure of society is so powerful.

From this arises rather an interesting question: society now demands engineers, scientists, businessmen; computer experts; architects; builders of roads, engineers, society demands that. So there lies the money and all the rest of it. If the society demanded a totally different group of people, you are following? - that is, a group of people who are not concerned with nationalism, with violence, with drugs, alcohol, all those things; but are deeply integrated, have integrity - you follow? Will society demand such a people? Obviously not. Some years ago speaking in Switzerland, where we have been for the last 21 years, at the beginning the particular place where we were speaking, Saanen, didn't want us, at all, in the place. Because - the majority of the people who came there didn't smoke, didn't go to the butcher, didn't drink; so the village people said, why do you come here if you don't spend money? You follow the point of this?

As society does not demand a group of people who have this sense of integrity, the sense of wholeness in their life, a profound religious life, not the traditional religious which has no meaning at all. As society does not demand such people, can we as a group be those people? Do you understand my question? It is a very interesting point. Then we'll have such a person, such a human being, who has such strength, such vitality in himself. And such a group becomes essentially important. They are like a light in darkness. So are there such parents who will be that?

Or, we are all so casual, sloppy, indifferent; please, sirs, this is a very, very serious question because you are bringing about a new generation of people. If that generation is merely the continuation of what you are, with all the violence and all the stupidities of war, society will then become more and more immoral, more and more destructive. So, as a group of parents, is it possible that we demand of ourselves the highest excellence in behaviour, in conduct. Right? So we educate our children in a totally different way.

2nd QUESTION: Great teachers have been on earth; Buddha, Jesus. Do you think there will be less conflict, more understanding when you also depart, or is the world moving in an unalterable direction?

Have we ever noticed that the followers destroy the leader and the leader or the teacher destroys the followers? Have you ever considered that? The Buddha, two thousand five hundred years ago, before Christianity came into being, talked about love, conduct, and so on, not to worship anything. And his followers made images of him, followed him, and so destroyed him. Right? There are various scriptures written down from memory, but the disciples always either exaggerate, distort, or extol; and lose the real depth of his teaching. And the Christian world - I hope I am not treading on anybody's toe - the Christian world, I am sure, have also made up that person into something incredible. And probably when the speaker kicks the bucket, dies, there will be the same phenomena going on.

All this points to something extraordinary. Why have human beings all over the world created symbols and worship the symbols? The symbols have become far more important than the truth of any of those people who have said things which are utterly true. Why do we want interpreters? The mediators between that truth and yourself; you understand my question? The priest; the priests have existed from the ancient of times. The Sumerians, 7,000 or 8,000 years ago, had the priests; so did the Egyptians, the ancient Egyptians. And there are these modern priests: the evangelists, the local priests, the priests at Rome; they will all tell you or interpret or come between you and that. Why do we allow all this? You understand my question? Why can't we as human beings look to anybody? Because the whole history of mankind, his suffering, his agony, his desperate uncertainty, loneliness, it's all in the book. Not in sacred books and holy books and all that; in the book which we are. We are the history of mankind. And if we can read that book ourselves, we will need nobody outside to help.

Our difficulty is we want others to read it and tell us what we are, what we should do. And the difficulty is to read the book of ourselves. And to read that book we need careful observation of every movement of thought, feeling, reactions; and we don't do it because we want something, an easy way to everything. So: thought then invents all the rituals, the marvellous architecture of ancient cathedrals, temples and mosques; and the things that are in the temples, in the mosques, in the cathedrals and churches are put there by thought; invented by thought. And thought is not sacred, which we will go into when we talk about it. And as long as we depend on others, whether it be Buddha and so on, we shall always live in conflict, our life will become hypocritical. Is this so or not? Or, the speaker is merely fantasy. The accuracy of investigation demands that you have flexible scepticism.

So that the outside agency, whether it's the Saviour, the Buddha, or in India, Krishna and so on, as long as that exists there'll be division among people and that division will inevitably bring about conflict. Truth is not Christian, Hindu, Buddhist, or Islam; it is truth, and it doesn't belong to anybody. Like love doesn't belong to you or to me, it is love, compassion. And our minds are so conditioned - two thousand years of Christianity, of propaganda, very clever, thought-out propaganda; and the same thing in the Asiatic world. So, is it possible to be totally, completely free from all dependence? To have one's own deep abiding unshakeable integrity; which involves no fear and so on. Otherwise we create gods, saviours.

3rd QUESTION: My behaviour indicates that I am afraid. Yet the actual perception of fear is elusive. How do I reach and deal with this deep-rooted but unconscious emotion?

Do you want to go into this now? I was going to deal with it on Saturday. It doesn't matter, we'll deal with it on both days.

If one has observed, this problem of fear has existed from time immemorial. Right? It has existed with man. And man has lived with it; both consciously or hidden deep down; its roots very, very deep. And either we have escaped from it through logic, through analysis, through any form of entertainment that helps us to avoid coming directly into contact with it, and holding it; or we have suppressed it. Right? We are doing this. Or we neglect it; we say, what, we have lived with fear for million years, say, what does it matter now? And one knows the consequences of fear. The physical shrinkage, a tendency to be hypocritical, resistance, an avoidance of the fact that one is really afraid.

So if one really profoundly wants to be free from that reaction called fear, one has to go to the very root of it. There are biological fears: the body, the organism, which must protect itself; and the fear of disease, old age, death, and the fears of past memories. So fear is again a common ground upon which all human beings stand. So either we deal with it superficially or enquire into it very, very deeply.

What is the root of fear? I know - one knows various forms of fear: death, old age, fear of tomorrow, fear of uncertainty, fear of insecurity, fear of not being loved or loved and not receiving that love, fear of loneliness; fear of loss, fear of not having anybody to depend on, and so on. There are various forms of fear; the fear of the dark, the fear of light. Do we deal with the outward forms of fear: That is, I am afraid of my wife, or I am afraid of a bully; a bully bullying all the time, you lie, you do all kinds of things; and there is the fear of that constant pressure of an aggressive, slightly demented person. So do we want to deal with fear superficially, which is intellectually, verbally, or do we want to go into it very, very, very deeply? Or, you go into it observing its very nature, structure, how it comes into being.

When we want to deal with it deeply, go to the very root of it, what is the root of fear? Please, I am not telling you; the speaker is not pointing out; we are together investigating into a tremendous complicated problem, which has crippled humanity. And out of fear we have done all kinds of things; invented all the gods on earth. If there is absolutely no psychological fear, then you are beyond all gods. So what is basically the root of fear?

Is it time and thought? Please, we are investigating, I am not telling you; I am questioning. Is it time, the future; or the past; and is it also thought, thinking about the future; thinking about the past; thinking what might happen, or what has happened. The future is time. The past is time. The past modifying itself in the present moves towards tomorrow, the future. The remembrance of an incident, which has caused fear, and the future of that incident awakening the new fear - you are following all this? Am I talking to myself, or we are meeting each other? So there is horizontal fear and vertical fear. Right?

So I am - we are asking, is it time? The past, the present and the future. I am afraid - one is afraid of the present: the instability, the threat of war; the bomb that some country, another great tribal country, might put on this, and so on. So one is afraid of the past, the present, and the future. It is a movement. Right? This is not something that is static, it is a movement. And so a movement means time; from here to the village requires time to travel, to go to the village. From one point to another point means time. So we are asking if time is one of the factors of fear. Logically, it seems so; rationally, sanely. And is thought also the root of fear? I think tomorrow might bring me unemployment, I will be unemployed tomorrow. The thinking about it while I am employed, thinking about tomorrow is also the beginning of fear. Right, you are following? Thinking about the past, the incidents, the psychological accident which has brought about certain forms of fear; thinking about the past, thinking about the future, thinking about the actual moment of life in which there is such tremendous uncertainty, thought breeds fear. Right? You are following all this?

So time and thought are the major factors of fear. And if they are, and as in reality they are, what is one to do? You understand my problem? Are we meeting each other? You have explained this to me; that time and thought is the root of fear, you have gone into it, you have explained it; not in great detail, but I've captured the meaning of what you have said. Now, then you ask me, is it an idea that you have accepted, the words that you have accepted, or listening what you have said to me, from that listening I have made an abstraction of it into an idea and I'm struggling with the idea. Then I ask, how am I to put that idea into action? You see the difference? Vous avez compris? You have understood what I am saying? Is this clear?

We have the habit of making abstractions of a fact. Those abstractions become ideals, ideas, concepts, conclusions; all verbal. And then I ask myself, how am I to carry out these ideals, these ideas, these concepts, that time and thought are the root of fear. You've understood? I have made an abstraction of what you have told me; time and thought are the root of fear; and I am pursuing the idea, how am I to carry it out in life. The speaker says, please don't do that. Don't make an abstraction of what you have heard, that time and thought are the root of fear. Don't translate into an idea, but find out the truth of it, the actuality of it. That is, I see that I really am afraid of the past, which is so. Also I am afraid of the present, because the things are so incredibly destructive around me. And also I am afraid of tomorrow, the future: the atom bomb, the nuclear bomb, the mugging, the mad terrorists and the politicians with their game; that's the present, so also the future. So, I see the fact, not the idea, that time and thought are the root of fear. On next Saturday, I'll go into it much more, in a different way, but this is the root of fear. Now what shall I do? I realize, I see the fact. I see the truth of what you have told me. Not romantic, idealistic, all that; that has no meaning. I see the truth, the actual truth, of what you have told me.

Then the difficulty arises, if you have gone that far, who is the observer who actually sees the fact? You understand all this? Or is this too difficult? All right, who is the observer says, ah yes, I see the truth of it? Is the observer different from what he sees? You understand my question? When I say, yes, I see the truth of what you have told me, I have already played a trick, which is: I see the truth of it; that means I am different from the truth. You are following? Right, is this clear? Wait a minute, let me put it much more simply. When I am angry, is that anger different from me? Or, at the moment of anger, there is no difference. There is this tremendous reaction. A few seconds later I say, I have been angry, therefore I have divided myself as the 'me' who has been angry. Right? You see this? So, when you have told me the truth, the fact, that time and thought are the factors of fear, I listen to it very carefully and I say, yes, I see the truth of it; and the perception of that truth is something out there and me watching it. You are following? Or, there is no observer but only the fact of it. You understand the difference? Are we meeting somewhat? I observe that tree. In that observation words spring up, that's an oak tree, and the very naming of that tree prevents me from actually looking at it. You have understood? If I go to a museum and see a picture, a painting by the old masters - I don't like modern paintings - and I go there and look. When I compare one master against another master, I am not looking at the actual painting of a particular master. Right? I am comparing, judging, I am never observing very closely without any sense of other painters, looking. So, when I observe, when I see the truth of what you have told me, there is no division between the observer and the observed. There is only the truth of it, not, I see it. And that perception, which is holistic, frees the mind from fear completely. Have you got this? Don't look, please, so puzzled.

You are not tired? Can we go on with this? It's very important to understand this. I am afraid - suppose I am afraid, psychologically - I then try to control it, I try to rationalize it, I try to escape from it, I go to somebody to help me to resolve it, so I am always acting on it. Right? Is that clear? That's what we are all doing: acting upon it either to dissipate it or to control it or to run away from it or to suppress it This is what we do, acting upon it. So there is always this conflict. Right? Is that clear? The struggle not to be afraid; which is a conflict. Now, can that conflict end? You understand, I am putting the question differently. Can that conflict between me and the fear, me controlling the fear, suppressing and so on, and thereby this division which inevitably brings conflict, can that conflict end? You get the point? That's my question. I say, how can that conflict end? Why does this division between the 'me', the I who is trying to suppress, control, dominate fear, why is there this division? Is this division actual? Or is it merely semantic? Verbal? Or, not being able to solve the problem, thought has divided itself as the 'me' and the fear. You understand?

Am I talking to myself or can we go on? Sorry, you probably have never thought about all this. So, it is important to resolve this conflict, because we live in duality; I am this, I should not be that, I should be that. So there is always this duality which brings about conflict. Right? Now; I want to find out - no, I won't use that, I want to - can this conflict end? Is there - please listen to it - is there an opposite? I am afraid, the opposite is, not to be afraid. Right? Or have courage. Is there an opposite to fear? Or, there is only the ending of fear, not the opposite of fear. I wonder if you see all this. So, is there an ending of fear - the ending being no conflict? Right? If I end it through conflict, that means I'll go on, it'll be perpetual. You get this? So, can this end. To end something, there must be no me who is trying to end it. Right? If I try to end it, I am in conflict with it. Right? But is there an observation of this reaction called fear without the past interfering with that observation? The past being the remembrances, the many fears I have had. So the past, can it abstain from looking at the fact without the memory of yesterdays? You haven't understood?

Look, sir; if I am married, I meet my wife every day. Every day, rather boring, every day. Listen carefully please, don't laugh. Every day. So, I begin to know her; I know how she looks, what her gestures, all the rest of it, words, so gradually I have built up a knowledge about her, and whenever I look at her all the knowledge comes out. Right? The knowledge is the past. Right? Because I have built the knowledge day after day, day after day, day after day, accumulated it through various incidents and so on and so on. So, whenever I see her, this knowledge which is the past looks at her. Right? You are doing this! This is nothing new. Only we are putting into words. And so this knowledge is the remembrance of things past meeting the present and so dividing. Right? Physically of course my wife is not like me; male and female. But psychologically I have divided myself. You understand? The remembrance of the accumulated memories, which is knowledge about my wife, has separated as the 'me' and her. Got this? The past has brought about this division. Now, similarly, the past remembrances of fears, past remembrance of accidents of fear, the happenings of fear, is stored in the brain. And that brain is remembering the past and so when the present reaction, when it comes, you name it immediately as fear, and record it as fear.

You follow this? Right, is this clear? No, don't tell me this is not clear. I can't help it, sorry. I'll try to put it three or four different ways

The past is time. The past is the observer. And so the observer says, yes, that is fear. I know it's fear, because I have had it so many times. So, the moment it recognizes, it's part of the past. Right? You see this fact. So, can you look at that reaction, is there an observation of that reaction, without the past? And when the past observes you maintain the same movement. But when there is an observation without the past, you are looking it afresh. Which is, when you observe fear from the past, you are using an energy which has already been employed year after year. Right? That's a wastage of energy. Is there a new energy that meets this fear without the past? You understand the question now? Oh, for God's sake!

You see, fear exists only - I realize, one sees the truth that time and thought are the root of fear. Fear exists when there is inattention, when there is no attention. Right? If I give complete attention to fear, it doesn't exist. But my brain has been conditioned not to give attention to this reaction. When you have sexual feeling you - right? Whereas, what do you call it, fear, if you give total attention to it, which is not to analyze it, not to rationalize it, not to escape from it, not to observe it from the past, attention means giving your whole energy to look. Right? Then when you do, fear is not.

I can't go on into this. We can go into it in a different way; on Saturday we'll go into it very much more. Because the mind that has fear is a destructive, aggressive, neurotic mind. Whereas a mind that is utterly free of fear, psychologically, is an extraordinary mind.

We had better stop. We meet again Thursday, if you want to.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 6TH MAY 1982

You are very punctual!

Now in answering these questions we are both of us answering them, you and the speaker. So we are going into it together, and I think what is important is how we approach the problem. We talked a great deal about it the other day, in what manner we approach a problem; whether it is a prejudice, bias or from a fixed point of view; then the question will be directed or shaped by our motive. Can we approach the problem without a motive, without a direction, so that the problem itself reveals the whole content of itself and therefore it is already answered when the whole content of it is shown.

1st QUESTION: The act of attention for most of us is difficult to maintain. Only a small part of one is willing, interested seriously. What can one do to nourish this attention?

I wonder if we can go into this question together: what do we mean by attention? What is the difference between awareness, concentration, and attention? Could we go into that together? To be aware; as one is sitting under these beautiful trees on a lovely morning, nice and cool, not too hot, one is aware of that woodpecker pecking away, one is aware of the green lawn, the beautiful trees and sunlight, the spotted light; and if you are looking from that direction, you are aware of those mountains. How does one look at them? How do you look at this marvellous sight? The beauty of this place. What does it mean to you? Do you observe it, aware of it without any choice, without any desire, or just to observe the extraordinary beauty of the land. And when you observe so easily, aware of all this; the light and the shade; the branches, the darkness of the trunks and the light on the leaf; and the extension of this marvellous earth, how does one react to all that? What is the feeling behind that awareness? Is it that beauty of that land and the hills and the shadows, is it related to our life; is it part of our life; or it is there to be observed; if you are a poet, you write about it, if you are an artist you paint it, or if you are good at conversation or description you put it into words, but this beauty, this awareness of this, what is its relationship to one's life? That's part of awareness, the awareness of the external and the awareness of one's own reactions to the external, and to be aware of the movement of this. As you are sitting there, are you aware of the colours of the shirts or robes or whatever the ladies wear, are you aware of all that?

Or when we are aware is there always a choice? I prefer this land to another land, I prefer this valley to other valleys, so there is always memory and choice operating. And can one be aware without any choice at all, just to be aware of the extraordinary sense of the blue sky, the blue sky through the leaves, and just move with it all? And is one aware of one's reactions, and when one is aware of one's reactions is there a preference; one more desirable than the other, one is more urgent than the other, one is more continuous, habitual, and so on; and so from the outer move to the inner - you understand what I am saying - so that there is no division between the outer and the inner; it's like a tide going out and coming in. That's an awareness of this world outside of us and an awareness of the world deep inside of us, conscious as well as the unconscious. When one is really deeply conscious or aware, there is no remnant or hidden unconscious movement. I don't know if you have gone through all this, if you have done it; not merely listened do a lot of words. So awareness is this movement of the outer and the inner and to discover for oneself whether there is division between the outer and the inner. Of course there is a division between the tree and myself; I am not the tree, I hope. But in observing that thing which we call 'tree,' to discover our reactions to it; how we react to beauty, to ugliness, to brutality, to violence, to competition and quietness and so on.

And what do we mean by concentration? Because they are all related: awareness, concentration, and attention. What is concentration? To concentrate upon a page, upon a picture; to concentrate all one's energy on a particular point: in that concentration is there not the effort to concentrate? Whereas, effort to concentrate, that is, you are trying to read a particular page and out of the window you see a marvellous light on a flower and your thought wanders off to that, but you try then to pull that thought back, and concentrate on something. So there is this constant struggle to focus one's energy, visual, and so on, so there is a resistance, a struggle, and all the time trying to focus on a particular point. Are we meeting? This is right, isn't it, when we talk about attention, about concentration.

The questioner asks, attention happens occasionally and how is one to nourish that attention so that it is continuous, not haphazard? So we are asking: what is attention; to attend. Are you interested in this question? To attend; to attend to that woodpecker. Did you listen to that woodpecker? There it is!

In concentration there is always the one who tries to concentrate, and in that concentration there is an effort and control. So there is a controller and a controlled in concentration. Oh, I hope you see this for yourself. There is the controller who is trying to focus his thought on a particular subject, but thought is all the time moving, wandering around, and so he tries to control it; and in that control there is a form of resistance. There is a division between the controller and the controlled. And so there is an effort, a sense of division. Where there is division there must be conflict between the controller and the controlled; that is generally what we call concentration. Now is there in attention this division? You follow? The controller trying to attend; and therefore there is a division between the thought that says, I must attend, I must learn how to sustain attention or nourish it. I hope you are following all this. So, is there in attention a centre from which you attend, or when you listen to that woodpecker, you are listening.

So is there in attention an entity who is attending or there is only attention? Which means attending with your listening, perception, seeing and giving all your energy to attend to something. Are you listening attentively now? Listening to the speaker, what he is saying about attention; are you actually listening? And when you really listen, there is no centre as the 'me' who is listening. You are following this? Is this right? Whereas, there is always a centre in concentration. We are saying attention has no centre and therefore extends it. And it cannot be nourished; you attend if you are listening, if there is an intensity, you can't, it is attending.

Is this fairly clear? May we go on? So, really, awareness without choice, a choiceless awareness, and concentration, and this sense of extensive, vast attention; attention has no periphery, whereas concentration has; it is limited.

2nd QUESTION: What is an action and state of being that is completely pure?

I wonder what we mean by action. What does action mean to you? To act; does one act according to a principle, according to a prototype or an ideal, or according to some preconceived idea and act approximating that action to that ideal, prototype, to a concept, to a conclusion. Please follow all this, if you are interested in all this. When we talk about action, do we not mean, we are acting either with a motive or with a conclusion which we have come to through experience and set a pattern according to which you are acting; or act according to an ideal, a projected ideal - all ideals are always in the future - or, you act according to some bias, prejudice, or a pattern set by an authority, specialist, and so on. We generally act in that manner. And we are asking, is that action?

Action means the doing now. Not according to something that you have remembered or projected. Then you are acting according to a pattern which has been set by an authority, by your own experience and so on. Right? Are we clear on this matter? So action is always apparently an act according to something or other. I act: I do something through habit, through my conditioning, through my various accumulated prejudices, which I call knowledge; and for most of us that is action. My father, my country has told me what to do, and I do and I act according to that, or I revolt against the pattern, set my own pattern, and act according to that; patterns are the same - given to me or I have made for myself; patterns are patterns. A mould, a norm is a norm. It's not a Christian norm or Indian norm or Buddhist norm, it is a norm; a framework within which I act. Right? Now, we are asking, we are exploring together, I am not telling you how to act, because that would be too silly.

Then what do we mean by action? Does action vary according to circumstances; according to climate, to pressure? All these are involved in that one that one word, action. I don't know if you are exploring it with the speaker. So is there - we are investigating - is there an action which is correct, precise, not changing according to one's mood, according to one's temperament, pleasure, and so on, action that is true; not dependent on the past as a memory or the future as an ideal. You are following all this? This is involved in that one word. So we are asking, is there an action totally free from all conditioning? Conditioning is to have an ideal which then dictates or tries to impose upon 'what is'. Right? I am greedy, and I have an idea of not being greedy. And I try to act according to 'what should be', not 'what is'. Or, I have been so conditioned by commercialism, by television, greed is nonexistent; I want to buy and I buy. They tell me to buy this or that, and I buy.

So, can we find out what is right behaviour, which is action, what is right movement which will not change according to various circumstances. That is really the problem, one of the problems in that question. You have understood? One has exposed the full meaning of that word. Right? The implication of that word, the wide significance of that word. Then is it possible to act without a motive, without an ideal, without any form of conditioning? Conditioning is environmental; conditioning is religious, conditioning is according to what one has read, educated and so on; conditioning. So the problem there is, can the mind, the brain - let's keep to the word mind for the moment - can the mind be free from all conditioning so that it acts? That requires a great deal of attention, a great deal of watching: to be aware that one has ideals and is conforming our actions according to that. I am this, I should be that, which is called self-improvement. Lovely phrase! That is, the self, which is selfishness, trying to improve itself, so it is becoming more selfish. So, is it possible to put away all this and see actually what is and act. You understand?

I don't want to go more into this - shall we go more into it? Is there an action which is not born out of knowledge? Careful now. There is a technological action; physical action; where I must have a great deal of knowledge if I am to be a good engineer; a specialist in computers, I must have a great deal of knowledge about it. Or a good carpenter, a good builder; there knowledge is necessary. And if I act psychologically according to knowledge, I am accumulating knowledge and acting according to knowledge which is incomplete, therefore it is always in conflict; right? Do we see this or am I going too fast? That which is incomplete must always be fragmentary in its action; obviously. Is it right? Shall we go on?

So is there an action - please, enquire with me, don't accept, be a little sceptical about this - is there an action - rationally sceptical - is there an action which is not born of psychological memory? If I act according to my psychological knowledge which I have gathered about myself and I know that knowledge is always limited, my actions then will be limited. Right? And therefore any limited action must invariably bring about its own contradiction.

Right? So my action must breed regret, pain, contradict that action the next day and so on, so on. So is there an action that is free - please just find out, don't accept all this - is there an action free from the past recollections, past memories, past accumulation of all psychological information which is knowledge, and that knowledge, which is me, and therefore that me is limited, and when I say, I will do this and act in this manner, that act on will invariably be limited and contradictory; and therefore confusing and so on.

Right? If this is understood clearly, then is there an action apart from the technological and all the rest of it, is there an action which is totally free from the accumulated experience of the past as me, as memories, recollections? Probably nobody has asked this question. Not that I am the original, but probably we have not asked that question. And we are asking it now. It is a very interesting question, it is really, because that involves - do you want me to go into all this? Is it an amusement for you? As I was saying, if you are interested, I will go into it. If you are interested in it. The brain is always accumulating, recording, every experience is recorded, the accident or some happening is recorded; and according to that record you act; naturally. If I have had a motor accident, I am very careful next time. There it is necessary; but I am asking, we are asking, is there an action which is not previously recorded? You understand? Right? You see? Does it interest you, this?

Ask yourself this question, sir: our actions are based on past records; like a gramophone, you play the disk over and over and over again; that is your record; the record and action according to that past noise. Now, is there an action which is not born out of psychological recording? You are following all this? How do you find out? Here is a problem put to you; you may reject it, say, that's nonsense, that can never happen; that's a possibility. Also, the other possibility, it may happen. Right? It may be true, or it may be false, but you have to investigate it. To investigate it, you can't assert one or the other. Right? So, one must let those two go, the assertive statement that it is not possible, or the negative assertion that it is possible. So they are both put aside. Then, what is the state of your mind - are you interested in all this - what is the state of your mind which is freed from the sense of past recording, and acting according to that? It's free. If it is free, and if it's possible to be freed, then what is the quality of perception, the insight, that is instant action? You are following? You understand? Just listen to it, and I'll explain little more, if I may, and if you are interested in it; if you have the patience to go into it.

I am walking along the mountain, and I suddenly come to a precipice. The action there is instantaneous. The action is brought about by self-preservation; which is intelligence. Right? Self-preservation is natural, a bodily response, which says, guard yourself. There it is also cultivated. It has been the experience of mankind not to fall over a precipice. That past continuous self-preservative motive is recorded, unconsciously or consciously. And the response there is a natural intelligence; now, similarly we have recorded psychological preservation. Are you following this? That is, what am I if I have no memory? If there is no recording, I am nobody. So, the fear of being nobody, and the knowledge of that, gives a central feeling that you must preserve yourself. Right?

You are following all this? And from that you act; therefore, memory, knowledge, is necessary; and there it's the same movement carried over into the psychological field. Is this clear; or am I muddling it? I am afraid I'm muddling it. Clear as mud!

Now I want to find out - I'm serious in this matter; I'll meditate for hours or think, work, I must find out whether there is an action which is not born out of previous records. If that is your intense demand, that is what you want to find out, then one has to watch very carefully any recording taking place. And the recording will not take place when there is complete attention. It's only inattention, lacking attention, that creates - what was I going to say? - that creates the recording. Have you noticed this? When you are looking at those mountains or this landscape with all the trees and the sunlight, and you are giving complete attention to it, that is, watching, watching all the trees, all the movement of the leaves and the light on the leaves and the shadows - complete attention, there is no recording. Please experiment as we are sitting here.

So it is possible not to record; which is an action born out of remembrance, an action born of an insight into an insight; and from that insight there is action. I'll take one example, I hope that'll help; I don't like taking examples, but I will go into it.

One perceives logically that organized religions all over the world, with their beliefs, with their dogmas, with their rituals, with their superstitions, with their particular form of worship, and so on and so on and so on, is just born out of fear, born out of propaganda, born out of the threat of society; threat of society is, if you are a Protestant in a Catholic country, you find it rather difficult. Right? So, to have an insight into the whole nature of the religious organized structure; to have complete insight into it, which means you're neither a Hindu nor a Catholic, Protestant, whatever it is. You see the content of that structure instantly, and that perception, immediate perception, frees you from all organized religious constructed organization. Right? That no so-called spiritual structure, spiritual authority will ever free man from sorrow. To have an insight into it means that you don't belong to anything. There is immediate freedom from all that, as when you come to a precipice, there is instant action. You are getting all this? Are we meeting each other somewhat? It can't be somewhat, it must be entirely understood.

So, there is an action that is not born out of past remembrances or future hopes and ideals; it is being totally aware of 'what is', and having an insight into 'what is', is the ending of 'what is'. I wonder if you see that? Shall I go on to the next question?

3rd QUESTION: Since the word is not the thing, can we truly be enlightened through words? Can symbols undo the damage done by symbols, or are we being seduced by illusions of enlightenment?

I wonder if most of us realize that the word is never the thing. My wife is never the woman, or my husband. The word, you know if you go into this problem of the word - do you want to go into all that? If we realize the word is not the actual thing, the description is not the actuality, the symbol is never the fact; the ideal is never 'what is; and if you observe, if you are aware, our brain is caught in words; network of words. I am a Catholic, I am a Protestant, I am an American, you follow? They are all symbols, they are all words, pictures; and the brain is caught in that. That is, thinking is a word; without a word, is there a thinking? I don't want to go into all this.

It is very interesting for you to find out all these things, because then your mind becomes extraordinarily alert; naturally. To be free of the word, but yet use the word accurately. So the word is not the thing; and the symbol is never the actual. Fear, the word fear, is not the reaction; right? But the word 'fear' shapes our action. Not the feeling of fear, but either the word creates the fear, or, the word shapes the fear; and is it possible to look at that reaction without the word. This is quite simple. 'Can we truly be enlightened through words?' Good God! I wonder why we use the word 'enlightenment'? Obviously - we'll go into the word enlightenment, it's very interesting to go into what we mean by enlightenment, which all the gurus talk about. It is a word to some people that is a sacred word, to be enlightened; not through books; not through knowledge; not through time. You understand? It isn't a thing that you gradually work up to; by practice, by meditation, by doing all kinds of tricks. So: obviously, the word 'love' is not love. And, similarly, what is enlightenment? Who is enlightened? Enlightened of what? Enlightened about what? You follow? Enlightened - I feel funny about it. Surely a mind that is enlightened is free from all conditioning. A Hindu, with his superstitions, with all the business of his religious conditioning, as well as psychological and environmental conditioning has made him call himself a Hindu. How can such a mind, which has been so conditioned, ever be free? Is enlightenment complete freedom from conditioning? Can a Catholic - I hope I am not treading on anybody's toes - can a Catholic, with all his superstition, with his saviours, with his rituals, and the hierarchical authority and so on, can he ever be enlightened? With his conditioning, baptism, you know the whole intellectual, cunning business that holds the people to a pattern. You answer it yourself. Can a mind - can a human being be enlightened when he is frightened? When he is seeking power, position, accumulating money in the name of enlightenment; which is what some of the gurus are doing, vast sums of money; and they talk about enlightenment.

So the word is not the thing. And, the questioner asks, have the symbols done damage to the human psyche? Obviously. If I am a Hindu - personally, I am not - if I am a Hindu - I was born in India, but that has no meaning - if I am a Hindu, I have got innumerable symbols; like the Christian world; their goddesses, their gods, tribal gods and smaller gods and higher gods. I have been conditioned in that. Those conditionings, those symbols, have damaged the clarity of a mind, of the psyche. Right? That is obvious. Symbols obviously have done damage. Because that prevents a human being going directly to truth, to the fact; not worship the symbols.

The questioner also asks: are we being seduced by the illusion of enlightenment? Obviously. That sounds lovely. But enlightenment is not of time. It's not a process. It's not something that you gradually come to. To be free from all conditioning, which also implies to be a light to oneself completely; and not depend on any person, any idea, any particular - a light to oneself. So wholly from that light there is action.

Ah, this is a lovely question, the next one.

4th QUESTION: Why do we not change?

Yes, sir. I was going to ask that question myself. I see people here whom I have known for many years come year after year, and I have asked them, too, why do we not change? What will make us change? Do ask this question yourself? What is the energy, the drive, the intensity, that will make us change? Change; what do we mean by that word, change? Change from this to that. Right? That is preconceived; therefore, it's no change at all. I wonder if you see this? Do we see this? If I change according to some pattern which I have carefully established, it is not change. It's a continuation of 'what is', modified, which I hope will lead me further, and further modification, but it is the same chain. Right? The same movement. So, what do we mean by change? To the speaker it means the ending, not continuation of 'what is' modified. You understand? Take for instance, physical revolution; the Communists, the Leninists, the Trotskyites, change. Their idea of revolution is to change the whole structure of society, therefore they are violent, hoping thereby to bring about a different human being. That is, the outside pressure of change from the Czar to the Communist, Bolshevik and so on, will ultimately or as soon as possible make man different. So, they have not succeeded; on the contrary, they have done terrible things.

So we are talking about change psychologically; change completely the content of our consciousness. Right? Not change consciousness into a better consciousness; into a more polished consciousness; less violent but occasionally violent; and so on and so on. The ending of the content of consciousness is radical mutation. I won't use the word change there. So, why don't we change? Move away from this totally. Have we made the question clear? Why, after millions and millions of years, we human beings have reduced ourselves to the present appalling condition - it is appalling, frightening, the violence, the brutality, the killing for a piece of land, for god's sake! Why? And the question is, why don't we bring about an ending to all this? Please answer this. You are all educated, workers, intelligent in a certain direction, making money, going to work, and all the rest of it, but you haven't solved the real issue. Why? Will outside pressure change you, bring about a mutation of the psyche? Mutation means total change, that which has been is not. Not change to something. That which has been, that is, my anger, my violence, my stupidity, my holding onto some idiotic illusion, some symbol which perhaps will save me from something or other. What will make us change?

Outside pressure obviously has not done it. Right? That's very clear. Is that clear to you? By changing society, you are not going to be changed. Because you have created the society. That's clear? We have made this society what it is: wars; killing each other for some national prestige, honour; a piece of land. You understand what all this is?

And after thousands of years we are not free from fear. What will make us change? More knowledge about yourself? More knowledge of the world, outside of us? Knowledge that we must not kill and we kill? We have accumulated thousands of years of knowledge which has helped us to kill people; and also we have knowledge that we shouldn't kill; where does it lead us?

Right? So, will suffering, pain, attachment, pressure, the carrot - reward and punishment? You follow? Will all that change us? Apparently it hasn't. So what will make us change? Not change, what will make us transform, what will make us end this terrible confusion, sorrow, pain, anxiety, lonely, all that; end? Tears? We have cried enough. Sorrow? Nothing outside. I wonder if we realize that. No gods, no saviours, no external force, agency is ever going to change us. We are much too clever for all that. Much too cunning.

I think this is a very serious question. One should ask oneself: will time bring about this mutation? You have had time, million years, obviously, time will not. So, nothing outside will change us, will bring about mutation. What will change us is only our own attention, our own awareness of the confusion in which we live; and watching that, remaining with that completely, not trying to change it, not trying to do something about it, you understand this? It is very interesting; we reject - if we do - outside agency altogether; gods and all; reject it, any intelligent man does reject it. But he doesn't reject the operator inside. You understand? The actor who says, I will do this. That actor is the past memory; past remembrance, past knowledge. If that could be completely transformed, then you observe 'what is' completely freely; and when you observe so totally with complete attention, that which is, has completely ended.

So it must be one's own perception of one's misery, confusion, and live with it wholly, not trying to act upon it.

It is now an hour and ten minutes, can you stand some more of this?

5th QUESTION: Can you speak more deeply about the meaning of holiness and especially its place in the modern world?

The word holy is not the reality. Right? Is thought holy, h-o-l-y, sacred? Go on, sir, investigate it. Is thought, thinking, which has created the architecture, the cathedrals, the most marvellous 10th, 12th century, extraordinary beauty. If you have been to some of those ancient temples, the ancient cathedrals in Europe; the extraordinary sense of vitality of those pillars, the beauty of the high ceiling. Thought has done all that. And thought also has created all the content within that structure; that marvellous stone structure. Right? That's obvious, isn't it? Right? So what is sacred? That is, what is that which is holy, whole? If thought is sacred, then everything that it creates is holy: the cannon, the atom bomb; the killing of each other; the computer; the saviour; your saviour; the rituals, the beating of somebody. You follow? Then, if you once admit thought is sacred, everything it does is sacred. Right? And, thought has invented that which is not sacred and that which is sacred. It has divided the world as the world and that which is sacred, which is not the world: the saint and the sinner.

So please, this is a very serious question, it's not just a casual question at the end of several other questions. It's very, very serious, this, because thought is tearing man apart: the British, the French, the American, the Russian, the Argentine. You follow? So if you once admit or acquiesce or accept that thought, whatever it does, is sacred, then you have nothing to worry about. Then you will kill each other, you will carry on as you are. That may be what you want. That may be what humanity wants.

If you want to find out that which is most holy, you cannot measure it by words. To measure that which is measureless by words has no meaning. But to come upon that which is holy, sacred - is love thought? Then is love desire? Without love, that which is sacred cannot be.

So all these explanations are not that which is. That which is eternal cannot be put into words. But when time and thought have come to an end, that which is most sacred is. But if you say, how am I to end my thought, how is time to stop, then you are back to the good old... But to find out, to go into it, what is thought, whether it can end, thought cannot end as I am going from this place to that place, when I drive a car, or in the very usage of language, in communication. But, inwardly, can time stop? Can thought come to an end? Not through control, not through will, but the urge to find out that which is from the beginning, which has no end. To go into it, to find out, requires - this is real meditation; which is the whole movement of life.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 8TH MAY 1982

May we continue where we left off last Sunday? We were talking about right kind of relationship. Most of our relationship, in that relationship there is a great deal of conflict, struggle, lack of understanding each other and so on. We went into it very carefully. If you do not mind, we won't go into it again today. That's where we left off last Sunday when we met here. We pointed out how important it is to have right kind of relationship: man, woman, or with people who are far away from us. Because life is a relationship, is a movement in relationship; and apparently we have never been able to solve the problem of not having conflict in relationship. And we went carefully into that problem. And this morning we ought to talk about two things, order and fear.

What is order? That word has a great deal of significance; order from a general, to his soldiers, order, ecclesiastic order, monastic order, order in one's house, order in a garden and so on. That word has extraordinary meaning. We have tried to establish order in society, by laws, by authority, by policemen and so on. Society, the thing in which we are caught, is created by each one of us, by our parents, past generations, and that society is in disorder, confused, that society has almost become immoral, that society is breeding wars, enormous sums are spent on armaments. In that society there is division, conflict; there is the totalitarian society, and the so-called democratic society; whether it is the totalitarian or democratic it is still disorder, confusion, each individual asserting himself aggressively against others, and so there is general disorder. That disorder is created by all of us because we live in disorder. Our house is in disorder, not the physical house, but the psychological house, which is our consciousness is in disarray, disturbed, broken up; contradictory.

If one may point out, this is not an entertainment, intellectual or otherwise. We are talking about human problems. And this is - if I may again point out - this is not a lecture, a lecture being giving certain information, having a discourse on a particular subject, with a view either to convince, or to do some kind of propaganda, and so on. This is not a lecture in that sense; but together we are investigating, we are exploring into the question of order and disorder. Our minds are in disorder; can such a mind create order, bring about order? That's the first problem we have to face. Most of us, in our daily life, are in confusion, uncertain, contradictory; psychologically deeply wounded; psychologically having no right relationship with another; and in that relationship there is contradiction, disorder, disharmony, and so our life, probably from the moment we are born till we die, we live in disorder. One wonders if one is aware of it.

We went into the question of what is aware, to be aware, to be conscious, to recognize the fact that one is in disorder. If one is at all aware of that fact, and if one is, do we escape from it, seeking a solution, or accept a pattern of order, a design of order and therefore conform to a particular norm. Are we aware of all these psychological movements born out of disorder? And how does this disorder come about? Why, after so many millennia upon millennia, we live psychologically in disorder, and therefore outwardly in disorder. Outwardly our disorder is expressed in multiple forms, as nationality, division among people, religious divisions; wars and so on.

So, we are asking is it possible to be free of this disorder, the ending of, disorder and therefore the very ending is order. Order is virtue. You cannot possibly discipline the mind to become orderly. Because the entity who desires order, that entity himself is the result of confusion, and therefore whatever order it creates must bring about disorder. I hope we are all serious this morning, as we have pointed out over and over again, this is a serious affair. Life is becoming so terribly dangerous, uncertain; it's an actuality. And any serious person concerned with the whole problem of living must question all of this: how disorder come about, what is the root of it? When we ask a question of this kind, you are asking the question, not the speaker. You are asking the question of yourself. And trying to find out the root of this disorder. Is it desire? Is it, the very nature and the structure of thought itself disorder? That is, thought itself is disorder. We are asking that question. Does disorder arise out of desire? Does disorder arise out of the very act of thinking? That is, is thought the source of disorder? Probably most of us have not even asked such a question. We accept and live in disorder; we say that is our conditioning, and we must accept that conditioning. And so we become used to disorder, accept it and try to modify it. But we never ask of ourselves why we live in disorder psychologically, inwardly, within the skin, as it were, and what is the root of it, the very substance that brings about disorder? Is it desire? Desire in itself is contradictory: wanting one thing and resisting something else. Desire for happiness and doing everything that brings about unhappiness. Pursuing pleasure, the desire for pleasure and that very desire creates disharmony.

So we are asking seriously, is desire itself the root, the origin, the beginning of disorder? And then, if it is, we are not saying it is, because we are enquiring; we are going deeply into this very, very complex problem of desire. Desire has great energy, drive; desire for so many things; for power, position; for wealth, for freedom, for heaven; desire to live happily, comfortably, and this desire accumulates itself into will. Will is the essence of desire. So we must enquire, what is desire, which may bring about disorder. We desire to have food, that is quite natural. We desire to have a house, a shelter, that's also quite natural; to be clothed, that is quite natural. But are psychological desires, for power, position, to become something beyond what one actually is, to achieve some idealistic state. There are so many kinds of desire, contradicting each other, and sometimes working together. So we should very carefully go into the question of why and what is the origin of desire. And whether it brings about disorder.

Please, we are not telling you what desire is, with which you agree or disagree; we are having a conversation together, we are as two friends talking over together the very, very complex problem of desire. So you are enquiring, not the speaker. The speaker is only verbalizing, putting into words the enquiry which you are making. And if your brain is not active, merely listening to what is being said, then, it's a verbal communication which has very little meaning. Explanations are not the actuality. The speaker may explain very carefully, as we go into it in detail, but those explanations are verbal, have no meaning. But the verbal explanations are means of your own discovery which the speaker is putting into words, I hope this is perfectly clear, that the speaker is not conveying certain ideas, certain conclusions, but rather together we are observing the whole movement of desire, the nature of it, the inwardness of it, the origin of the beginning of desire.

In all religions throughout the world, organized religions, the accepted authoritarian orthodox religions, they have all said, suppress or transmute desire; identify your desire with that which is great, with that which is the saviour, with that which is something you want to achieve, identify yourself with it. And so gradually suppress any contradictory, any sensual desires. This has been the edict of all religions; monasteries are based on it, the monks pursue it; and the Asiatic monks, the sannyasis, do it in their own way. So desire has been condemned. We are not condemning it. We are not saying it must be suppressed or transmuted, or play around with it. We are together going into this very complex problem, observing, without motive, that is the whole point, without motive, just what is desire, which drives most of us, both commercially and psychologically. Please, don't wait for me to think it out, to explain, if you are serious, you are going to go into this. Because we have to find out, if we can, whether it is possible to live an orderly, sane, rational, a holy life; not this conflicting, destructive, warlike existence.

So what is desire? Why has it such enormous power in our lives? As we said, order is virtue. To become virtuous is desire; to have values established is a form of desire. You may have values, patterns, ideas, and so on, but if we do not understand the very movement of desire, whether it's contradictory, whether it's the origin of disorder, we must enquire very, very deeply what is desire. Is not desire born out of sensation? Sensory responses are part of desire. Sensation, that is, through observation, through optical perception, seeing, then contact, then sensation. Right? One sees a beautiful house, a lovely garden; and that very seeing brings about a sensation; from that sensation there is a desire to own that house. Right? That is, the seeing, then the contact, then from that physical contact, sensation. This is obvious. Right? Can we go on from there? You see a woman or a man who is nice, nice-looking; especially as it is advertised in this country; and there is the very seeing, then the contact, then the sensation. Then - please watch carefully yourself - then thought creates the image; then when thought creates the image, then desire arises. Right? That is, one sees a shirt, a robe in the window of a shop; goes inside, touches the material; then the very contact of it creates a sensation; then thought says, how nice that shirt or robe would look on me. At that moment desire begins. Have you understood this?

Have we understood this clearly; that thought with its image creates desire when there is sensation. Right, sir? Are we together in this? And, if this is clear - don't please accept what the speaker is saying, it may totally be wrong - but carefully look at this movement of desire, so that you yourself discover for yourself the whole nature of desire; how it begins, and whether disciplining desire is not the very act of confusion, disorder. Do you understand all this? Because in this there is the entity who controls desire, the entity who is separate from desire. Is desire itself not the observer, who wishes to change what he observes? I wonder if you see all this? May I go on with this? Please sirs, don't look at me. That's not important. Find out for yourself the actuality of the beginning of desire; not how to discipline desire; we'll come to that presently.

But we are just observing the whole movement of desire - the seeing, the contact, then the sensation, then thought creating the image which is the beginning of desire. I see your beautiful shirt, good material, well-made; then, if you'll allow me to touch it, there is a certain sensation out of my sensory responses. Then I want that shirt; thought says, how nice it would look on me, that shirt. That thought creating the image of me in that shirt is the beginning of desire. Clear?

Now, the question is, if that is so, which is logically so, there is no question of refuting that, that is a fact, not because the speaker says so, it is so. If you observe it, it's the movement. And then the question arises, why does thought interfere with sensation? You follow? I see you have got a marvellous car, that I think, I am quite sure will appeal to all of you; a highly polished car. You see it on the road as you pass by, look at it, go round it, touch it; there is that sensation out of it. Then you imagine you sitting in the car and driving it. Then the imagination is the action of desire. Right? Is this clear? Now the question is, is it possible for thought not to interfere with its imagination? See the car, the sensation, and not allow thought creating the image of you being in there. You understand? That requires intense alertness, watchfulness. So there is no discipline, to control desire, but on the contrary, the intelligent observation of desire is in itself an act which frees the mind from the urgency of desire.

I hope you understand all this; because we have got to talk about something much more complex. If this is understood, then we should go on to ask, what is fear? What is the origin of fear, whether the mind, psychological state, can ever be free totally, completely from fear. Not say, it is possible or it is not possible. If you say either one or the other, that conditions your own state of enquiry. But, if there is the intelligent demand whether the mind, whether the human being, his psyche, his consciousness, can ever be free, completely, not partially, not one day free of fear, the next day full of fear; but the entire movement of fear, conscious as well as deeply rooted fear; whether it is possible for the human mind to be utterly free of it? Because fear is one of the factors of disorder; not only desire, but also fear. Most human beings are afraid; either physical fears or psychological, complicated fears. Fears of not fulfilling, fears of not becoming, fears in their relationship, fears of not having jobs, especially now, in this country you have 10 million people unemployed; fear of darkness, fear of death, fear of the very act of living. There are so many, many forms of fear. Naturally, as one observes fear, the state of fear as one goes into it, one can see how fear creates disorder: fear of being secure and not being secure; fear of the past, fear of the present, fear of the future; which we all know. Most of us have experienced some kind of fear, urgently, very deeply, or superficially. When one is afraid, the whole psychological state becomes tightened, strained, you know all that. And where there is fear there is darkness and escape from that darkness. Then the escape becomes far more important than the fear itself. But fear always remains.

So one asks, why human beings, who have lived on this earth for million of years, who are technologically intelligent, why they have not applied their intelligence to be free from this very complex problem of fear. That may be one of the reasons for war, for killing each other. And religions throughout the world have not solved the problem; nor the gurus, nor the saviours; nor ideals. So if this is very clear: no outside agency, however elevated, however made popular by propaganda; no outside agency can ever possibly solve this problem of human fear.

So we must find out - again, if one may repeat, you are enquiring, you are investigating, you are delving into the whole problem of fear; the speaker may only explain, but the explanation has no value unless you yourself go deeply into this question. And perhaps we have so accepted the pattern of fear we don't want even to move away from it. So, what is fear? What are the contributory factors that bring about fear? Like many small streams, rivulets that make the tremendous volume of a river; so what are the small streams that bring about fear? That have such tremendous vitality of fear. Is one of the causes of fear comparison? Comparing oneself with somebody else, psychologically. Obviously it is. So, can one live a life comparing yourself with nobody? You understand what I am saying? When you compare yourself with another, ideologically, psychologically or even physically, there is the striving to become that; and there is the fear that you may not. it is the desire to fulfil and you may not be able to fulfil. You understand? Where there is comparison there must be fear.

And so one enquires, asks whether it is possible to live without a single comparison, never comparing, whether you are beautiful or ugly, fair or not fair, physically, psychologically, approximating yourself to some ideal, to some pattern of values, there is this constant comparison going on. We are asking, is that one of the causes of fear? Obviously. And where there is comparison there must be conformity, there must be imitation, inwardly. So we are asking, is comparison, conformity, imitation, are they contributory causes of fear? And can one live without comparing, imitating, conforming psychologically? Obviously, one can. If those are the contributory factors of fear, and you are concerned with the ending of fear, then inwardly there is no comparison; which means there is no becoming. Right? Comparison entails - the very meaning of the comparison is to become that which you think is better, or higher, nobler and so on. So, comparison, imitation, conformity, which is becoming, is that one of the factors of fear? We are not saying it is. But you have to discover it for yourself. Then if those are the factors, then if the mind is seeing those factors as bringing about fear, the very perception of those ends the contributory causes. Where there is a cause, there is an end. I hope you understand this. If there is physically a cause which gives you a tummy ache, there is an ending of that tummy ache by discovering what's the cause of the pain. Similarly, where here is a cause there is an ending of that cause.

And, is time a factor of fear? That is, time as of the things or incidents or happenings that have taken place in the past, or that might happen in the future, and the present. Time is a movement; physically from here to that place; from one point to another point, a movement from one point to another point requires time. To learn a language requires time. To learn any form of technique requires time. But when we think about the future, what might happen - I have a job, I might lose it; my wife might run away, leave me - future, so is time - we are talking of not physical time, sunrise, sunset, movement of the watch, clock, chronological time, but we are talking about psychological time. I am, I shall be; and I might not be. So, is time a factor of fear? Not how to stop time, you can't stop time, but to observe it first - we will go into it - but first observe the fact that one of the factors of fear is time. Let's say I'm afraid of death. That's in the future; so is time a factor of fear? Obviously it is. Then is thought a factor of fear? Do you understand all this? We said there are various contributory causes of fear, comparison, imitation, identification. And this act of becoming something else - I am this, I must be that; and I may not be that ever. And is time a factor in the movement of fear? Obviously it is. There is a distance between now, the living, and the dying, a distance from this point to that point; to move from this point to that point is fear. Right? Time is fear.

So next we are asking, is thought fear? It's very important to find out. Is thought the root of fear? Time is the root of fear, obviously, as comparison and so on. And is thought also the root of fear? So, time and thought, are they not together? Are you following all this? Is this getting too complicated? Are you getting tired? It's up to you. We are not trying to convince you of anything. We are not trying to ask you to follow the speaker. The speaker is you; the speaker is only pointing out the nature of fear. If you don't see it for yourself, either your mind is dull; because you have drunk too much last night, smoked too much, indulged in various forms of entertainment, sexual or otherwise; so your mind, your capacity, your energy is lacking, and therefore you'll just listen, as a form of verbal entertainment, which will not affect your life. But if you are serious, if your brain is active, not just romantically watching the trees and you know, playing with words. If you are really demanding to find out then you have to apply. Application means looking at it actually now. Probably sitting here quietly under the trees you may not be afraid. But fear is going on unconsciously, deeply, whether you are aware of it or not now.

So we have said time, becoming, comparison, with all the implications of that are the factors of fear. And we are asking now whether thought itself is not one of the factors or perhaps the very major factor of fear. What is then thought? Thought compares; thought imitates; thought says, I am this, I must be that. I must fulfil, I must identify myself, I must be something. It's all the movement of thought. And thought itself may be disorder. We are enquiring, please, go into it. We are not denying thought. We are not trying to point out that thought must be controlled. See that thought may be one of the, probably the major factor of fear. I was last healthy last year, and I am not this year but I hope to be in perfect health next year. There is in that movement the thinking about the pain of last year, hoping not to be this in the future, is the movement of fear; thought. Right? So what is thought? Not, can thought ever not stop and let nature take its own course, but we are enquiring into what is thought, what is thinking? There are several factors in that too. Just look at it simply. When you are asked your name, you respond immediately. Why? Because you have repeated your name so often there is no thinking about it. You may have thought about it at one time, but the constant repetition of your name is without thinking. If you are asked a complicated question, then you are searching, thought is looking all over the place, enquiring till it finds an answer. And when you are asked a very, very complex, or a question of which you have never even thought about, you say, I don't know. Right? Very few people say, I don't know. You understand? That requires a great sense of humility not to know, which we'll go into some other time, that's not important now.

So what is thinking? Thought has created the extraordinary beautiful pictures, paintings, out of stone created something exquisite; the Pieta of Michelangelo, the great cathedrals. And also it created the submarines, the missiles, the atom bomb; thought has created the war, the wars, nationalities; thought has created all the rituals, religious rituals, thought has invented the saviour; whether the Hindu saviour or the Christian saviour. So thought has done the most extraordinary things. The computer, which may take the place of human brain, and what's going to happen to your brain when the computer does it? Which is again a different matter.

So we must find out what is thinking. And whether that thought itself may be the origin of disorder and fear. We give such extraordinary importance, to thought, to the intellectuals, to the scientists, to the people who create marvellous technological things. But those very people who have invented all this, the great scientists, they themselves live in disorder. They have never possibly enquired into why thought is given such an extraordinarily important place. Why thought may be in itself the origin of disorder and fear. We are going to enquire. You are going to enquire, not the speaker. He may explain - I must repeat this over and over again, he may repeat but if you yourself don't apply, go into it, your sitting there listening to the speaker is utterly meaningless. It is a waste of time and your energy. From the ancient of days man has experienced an accident, a sensation, a danger, a pleasure, and this experience has left knowledge. He derives from that experience knowledge. Right? That knowledge is stored in the brain as memory. And from that memory thought arises. Right? So, thought is limited because experience is limited, knowledge is limited. So thought is limited. Thought is a material process; because experience is a material process; there is an accident in a car, and that experience is remembered, which is knowledge, the remembrance of it is pain, which is thought. Right? So thought is a movement, from experience, knowledge, memory, thought. Again there is no question of anybody disputing that fact. If you have no experience, if you have no knowledge, no memory, then you are not thinking, you are just in a state of amnesia. But we are supposed to be thinking human beings.

So, knowledge is always limited about anything. That is so. Thought has created the things in the cathedral, in the church, the rituals; and yet thought worships them. You follow all this? Thought has created all the things that you call religious activity, thought has invented it. And then thought says, you must worship it. So one asks, thought is never sacred. It can never be sacred. But we have made certain things of thought sacred. Like god is an invention of thought. I know you won't like this, but there it is.

And so, is thought the beginning, the origin of fear? Thinking about the future, thinking about some happiness which I have not; thinking about death; thinking I might become that, paralysed; all the rest of it. I might have cancer. So thought, time, are the same. Time and thought are the same. And the contributory causes of all this is thought. Now the question then is, if thought is the origin of all fear, and therefore all disorder, if thought is the origin of disorder, fear, then what is one to do? You cannot stop thinking.

thinking has its place. When you leave here you go to your house, that movement from here to there is an action of time and thought. Thought and knowledge are necessary when you are writing a letter, speaking a language, driving a car, any technological business and so on, thought and knowledge are absolutely necessary. But we are asking: the accumulation of knowledge about the psyche, about yourself, and thinking from that knowledge, is that necessary? You understand this question? Please give your thought a little bit, attention a little bit. Is it necessary to record psychological events? The insult, the flattery, the hurts, the contents of your consciousness, which is nationality, fear, belief, faith, rituals, habits, you know, the content of your consciousness, which is the psyche, which is you.

Can there be no psychological recording? Please ask yourself this question. Perhaps you have never asked it; because we record. We record an insult, we record a flattery. We record the hurts that one has received from childhood; you record your pleasurable activities; you record your fears. So is it possible for a brain to record what is necessary, that is, learning a language, doing business, being a good carpenter and so on, engineer and so on, there you need to record everything very clearly, scientifically, and so on. But is it necessary to record psychological events; do you understand? That is, to carry psychological burdens all your life, psychological problems all your life; the conflict, the misery, the confusion, the agony, the loneliness, the despair. Is it necessary to carry all that? Which are the activity of thought. To find that out, whether it is possible not to record at all psychologically, that means to have no problem - you understand sir? Fear is a problem to us. Order is a problem to us. Not to be something is a problem, our life is a bundle of problems, both psychosomatic, physical, psychological, the whole thing, living is a problem to us. Which is the recording of everything, pleasure, pain, the loneliness, the fears and so on. We are asking can the brain not record the incidents of fear? That is to be aware of the whole pattern of fear, which is very complex, as we pointed out, it is very complex and intricate and one has to observe it very subtly, sensitively.

Then if you observe it carefully, is the observer different from that which he observes? What he observes is himself, the observer is the observed. Where there is a division between the observer and the observed, there is conflict. Now, is the observer which is the past accumulation of knowledge observing the present fear, there is a division, and then the past tries to overcome the present, control it. Whereas the thing that is observed is the observer. When that is absolutely clear conflict ceases. Therefore where there is the observation of fear as me, I am fear, obviously, there is no division between me and fear, I am totally fear, not that there is part of me which is not fear, I am that. And when there is total perception of that, which means giving all your energy to that there is the complete cessation of fear. There is the total ending of psychological fears completely - not for a day; but that which is ended has a new beginning.

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC TALK 9TH MAY 1982

May we continue from where we left off yesterday? We were talking about disorder and the causes of disorder and the very detrimental, destructive nature of fear. We went into it very carefully yesterday, step by step, and that it is possible to be totally free psychologically of the burden of fear. And we also slightly touched upon the subject of conflict, human conflict. If I may suggest, this is not an entertainment, a Sunday morning outing because you have nothing else better to do. Nor is it an intellectual amusement. Life has become, has always been, very, very serious. Serious in the sense that one has to respond fully to all the things that are happening around us; the dreadful wars that are going on; the religious divisions; the various types of gurus with their peculiar entertainment. And as this is a serious gathering, one hopes, it becomes rather necessary that one must exercise one's own brain, one's own capacity, one's own energy, not stimulated by others or by these talks, but rather, as we are together examining the present state of human affairs, it becomes necessary that this gathering should not be treated as a lecture; a lecture being to inform or to have a discussion, transmitting ideas, certain judgments and evaluations. So this is not a lecture, as we have been pointing out over and over again here. The speaker is merely acting as a mirror in which one sees one's own condition, one's own fears, anxieties, loneliness, and the agony of life; with its occasional flare of joy.

So we talked about yesterday morning, fear, disorder, and the other mornings we talked about how human beings are hurt from childhood and that hurt they carry on throughout life. And that it is possible to be free of all those hurts. And also we talked about relationship, human relationship. Why, in that relationship there is so much conflict. And whether it is possible to live a life, not only in all these matters, but essentially, deeply to live without conflict.

Why do human beings, after so many millennia, so astonishingly intelligent in one direction, technological direction, why human beings do not apply that quality of intelligence to their own lives and see whether it is possible to live without conflict. What are the causes of human conflict? Why does one live a daily life, in our relationship, in our actions, why there is such conflict, struggle, such pain? Please, as we pointed out, you are asking this question, not the speaker. The speaker is only putting into words the state of one's own mind, the state of one's own life; the enormous contradictions, saying one thing, doing another; thinking one thing, and acting quite differently. Why human beings after so many centuries, having acquired information outwardly about almost anything, inwardly, psychologically, they have not investigated into their own problems, into their own travail, into their own anxieties, pain, grief? Is it that we have always looked to authority, to somebody to tell us what to do? There is in this country, as one has observed, specialists of various types; religious, psychological, and so on. They are telling us what to do, what to think. And we are gradually becoming dependent upon them; and so losing our own capacity, our own intrinsic energy of intelligence to explore and discover the causes of our conflicts, struggle, pain, and so on.

And this morning we ought to talk over together the cause of conflict. There are various types of conflict, both outward and inward. The inward conflicts express themselves in the outward conflicts, you cannot have in a society, an orderly society unless we human beings live an orderly life, sane, rational, healthy, holy life. And so we ought to, together to think why we have all become like this, what we are.

As we have been pointing out in previous talks, our consciousness with its content, the content being hurts, beliefs, conclusions, judgments, evaluations, fears, pleasures, various types of acquisitive attachments; fear of death, seeking something beyond the ordinary events of life; that is the content of our consciousness. That's what we are. We, or the I, is not different from the content. I think that should be made clear. I may be that one is so conditioned to analysis, we want to find out why we human beings live as we do, and so we begin to analyze, try to discover the various causes for this unfortunate troublesome existence. But we have never enquired who is the analyzer and the analyzed. Is the analyzer different from the analyzed, and can the analyzer merely verbally find the cause and the analyzer then dissipate the cause? And we have done this for thousands of years. We know the causes. Most intelligent people, most people who are aware of their own turmoil, they can easily through analysis find out the cause, or the causes. And so, we have separated the analyzer, who is investigating the consciousness of himself. I hope this is clear. My consciousness and yours is its content. Without the content there is no consciousness as we know it. The content of one's consciousness, one wants to investigate, one wants to look, one wants to find out why that consciousness is in conflict, in contradiction, so one separates oneself from the thing that is being examined. Please follow this, if you will, a little bit. Thought separates itself as the analyzer; that analyzer tries to examine, analyze, that confusion, that turmoil, that loneliness, that despair, and then begins to discover the cause. Then he tries to dissipate the cause, hoping thereby to wipe away the effects of the cause. So there is this division, as the analyzer and the analyzed, and hence wherever there is psychological division in oneself there must be conflict. This is a law, as gravity, that wherever inwardly there is a contradiction, a division, a separation from the analyzer and the analyzed as the observer and the observed, there must be conflict; as the Arab and the Jew, the Hindu and the Muslim; the ideological differences of the capitalist society and the totalitarian society; there must be conflict. And that conflict brings about this division, brings about the feeling of not being whole, because in us, in ourselves there is the division.

So is it possible to realize, not intellectually, but actually see the fact, as one sees a fact of pain; as one has this pain of a toothache and so on, actually realize, see, perceive, that where there is psychological division there must be, inevitably, logically, conflict. And this conflict denies the feeling of being whole. That is, the feeling of whole is the freedom from error; to err, you understand the word, error. So, feeling whole, the feeling of being whole, means not inwardly fragmented, broken up as we are. That is, all problems, psychological problems, are interrelated; the hurt, the lack of order, disorder, the conflict in relationship, all these problems are interrelated. We treat them as separate. And the perception, or the seeing logically, truthfully that all problems, psychological problems, whatever they be, are interrelated, you cannot take one problem separately from other problems. And to perceive the feeling of the whole movement of problems is one problem. A problem means, according to the dictionary, something thrown at you; that's the meaning of a problem. Something thrown at you which is a challenge; that's the meaning of that word, 'problem' means that. It's a challenge, something put before you. You have to meet it rightly. But we meet every problem as though it were separate, to be resolved, unrelated to other problems, as we do in life; religion, which is no religion at all as it is now, is separate from your intellectual, technological life. If you are a great surgeon, you are not concerned about your daily life, what you are inwardly; you are concerned about your technique, about your method of operation and so on and so on.

So we live a life, both outwardly and inwardly, with a sense of fragmentation; which means we never feel the wholeness of life. That life is a movement, not your life and other people's life, life as a whole is one. It's not American life, or Indian life, or a Buddhist life, or a Muslim life, it is life, to be lived on this earth sanely, rationally, not divided as nations; which is a tribal adoration of an idea. That's what is happening in South Atlantic, this tribal war that is going on.

So, we all want to be safe; that is natural. Physically, we want to be safe; to have a house, a shelter, clothing, food. That's natural, healthy, sane, rational, for all of us; not for only for the affluent people. There is a great deal of poverty throughout the world, even in this country. This poverty, this lack of relationship to the whole of the world, is brought about by national divisions, religious divisions, economic divisions. There is no feeling of global relationship. Please listen to all this. And our outward problems will never be solved, never, unless we have this global relationship. That is why it is important to understand very carefully that our consciousness, which is with all the beliefs, dogmas, judgments, loneliness, despair, anxiety, fears, hurts, is common to all mankind; to all mankind, whether they live in Russia, China, or in this country. And because it is common to all mankind, you are mankind. You are not a separate individual. This is hard to realize. Because you suffer, so does a man in the Far East; there he is uncertain, confused, trodden down, and you too, you are confused, uncertain, seeking security, safety; this is the problem of all human beings. And so it is hard to realize, to see the fact, because we are so conditioned to individuality, to see the actual fact that we are like the rest, we are the humanity, we are the whole of humanity. And therefore our actions then will be a global relationship in which national divisions, religious divisions do not exist.

So we should consider this morning whether it is possible for a human mind to be safe, safe from error. Do you understand my question? Human beings have sought security; not only physically through family, group, community, nationality, and so on, but also tried to find safety, to be safe in ideas, collective ideas, collective group, having the same conclusions, same beliefs, same frontiers. Man has sought his safety in isolation. That's what each one of us is doing. We want to be safe in ourselves, separate from the rest of mankind. Safe means to have this feeling of wholeness, of being whole, then you are completely safe. But you cannot be whole or have that extraordinary feeling of total completeness if there is any sense of fragmentation. Now, this statement from the speaker may be false. One must doubt; question. It may be his own peculiar invention or illusion. But, having heard it, one must find out if it is possible or not possible to live a life which is whole, therefore safe. That means you, who have listened to this statement, you have to apply your mind, not agree. You have to question, you have to question your life, your existence, your whole activity, find out for oneself whether it is possible to be totally safe. You cannot possibly be safe in isolation; it doesn't matter whoever says it, it is a law. And so what happens if you cannot be safe in isolation, why is the world divided up like this? The British, the Argentine, the French, the Russian, you follow? And religiously, too; those who are Christians, and the Christianity broken up in their beliefs thousands of different beliefs in Christianity; the same thing in India, all over the world is the same phenomena.

So, we are asking, when one realizes this fact, can one live in the modern world, do your business, whatever one does, with a sense of feeling of being whole not fragmented. Specialization is one of the factors of fragmentation. One has to have specialists; doctors, carpenters, the postman, and so on. But psychologically, inwardly, what is the need to be a specialist? You are following all this? We are human beings.

So, we ought to discuss also the nature of pleasure, as we talked about fear. And also we should go into the question of suffering, whether it is possible for us as human beings who have lived on this earth for so many millennia, whether it is possible to end our sorrow. Please, as we have pointed out, this is a serious question. It's not just a Sunday morning sermon. Thank god we are not in a church or a cathedral, you are under lovely trees. We ought to be serious enough to enquire into all these matters. So we are going to enquire first why man has pursued pleasure at any price, why it has become such an important thing in life. When you emphasize one thing, you deny the others. You are merely pursuing pleasure, pleasure in so many forms; pleasure of possession; pleasure in attachment; pleasure in becoming something; pleasure in having knowledge; pleasure in having a piece of earth; pleasure in feeling that you have achieved something, you have been able to have a very good body; pleasure in drink - you know, so many forms of pleasure. Not only sexual remembrance of pleasure, but the pleasure of seeking, finding, achieving, being somebody. So why has pleasure become so extraordinarily important in life?

What is pleasure? As we examined very carefully into the nature of fear, went into it in great detail, we should also regard, examine pleasure. What is pleasure? Please, you answer the question, not the speaker. Is it a remembrance? Pleasure in prayer, pleasure in worship I don't know what you pray to, what you worship, but it's a pleasure. Is it a remembrance of things that are past, over? Or, is it something in the future? Thinking about that which might give you pleasure. Or, the remembering of something which gave you a delight yesterday. Does pleasure as fear exist now, in that sense of having pleasure at the moment? It's like a man saying, I am happy. The moment he says that, he is not. It's only the remembrance of being happy at one time, or yesterday; that remembrance is the pleasure and the pursuit of that remembrance in action. I hope you are following all this. So, is pleasure a matter of time? Is pleasure an action of thought? As fear, we said yesterday, and we have said this often before, time and thought are the root of fear. Time and thought are the root of pleasure. We want to deny fear, but pursue pleasure. They are two sides of the same coin. You cannot be free from fear if you do not understand the nature of pleasure. When you look at that mountain, though it is a cloudy morning, when you look at these marvellous old trees, and the blue sky, it gives you a delight. It is a marvellous thing to look at nature and the mountains and the rivers and the animals; wild, not kept in the zoo. It gives you a sense of extraordinary width and beauty. You remember that, then that remembrance insists and pursues, demanding more of the same thing. So thought and time are the factors of fear, and pleasure. We are not denying or asserting or suppressing fear, but to observe it, to see what is implied in it, to be totally acquainted with it.

Then one can ask, what is love? You understand, this is very serious, all these questions, human questions which affect our daily life. Is love pleasure? Man has reduced it to that. Is love pleasure? Is love desire? Love of country, love of a person, love of a poem, love of a painting, love of the country; love of acquiring a great deal of knowledge. So what is love? Love of god; it's so easy to love god. We don't know what that is, but we have invented it, and so we love it. You understand? What we invent, we love. So what is love? Negation is the most positive action. To negate that which is false, totally negate that which is false is the most positive action. To negate, for instance, the whole concept of nationalism, or a saviour, or some external agency to reform us, to change us, to bring about a different society; to negate the outward agency of any kind is the most positive action. So to negate totally that which is not love. That is, to negate jealousy, to negate totally every form of antagonism, to put aside competition; to deny the solitude, the sense of separate entity - and you are not a separate entity, you are related, you are the mankind.

So to deny that which is false is the truth. To deny all illusions is to live in reality. So can one deny, put aside, negate that which is not love. Attachment is not love; see the consequences of attachment; attachment to an idea; to a belief, to a conclusion, to a piece of earth, as my country; attachment to a person. What is involved in this attachment? Suppose I am attached to my wife. What are the consequences of attachment? Enquire, please, for yourself. I am attached to my wife, or the wife is attached to me. And the consequences are fear; the loss. If I am attached to a belief, the same thing, fear of losing that belief. If I am attached to some experience, I hold on to that and I battle, resist any form of enquiry by you to doubt it. I dare not doubt it, because I feel without it I am nothing. So, is it possible to have a relationship with a man, woman, or anything, anything, without any sense of attachment? With my wife, if I told her, "Darling, I am not attached to you," what would she say? She would throw something at me, probably. (Laughter) You laugh, but you have not applied, you don't face the facts; that attachment denies totally love. You will say, I understand it logically, intellectually, but I have not this feeling that I must be free from it; because that's one of the factors of conflict. Where there is conflict, there is not only division, there cannot be love. If I love the thing called god which man has invented, there is conflict, because I want his forgiveness, his prayer. You follow?

So love cannot exist where there is antagonism, competition, attachment, conflict, possession. Now can the mind, can a human being negate all that, and live with a man or a woman in society? You have heard this statement; either it is true or utterly meaningless. If it is meaningless, then it has no value. But if you have heard it and find it has value in the sense that it can be applied, why is it that human beings, knowing all this, don't apply? Why is it that human beings never change radically? Nothing outside will make you change. No gods, no gurus, no Masters, no saviours, no authority. There is a mutation in that conditioning, only when you yourself see the truth of it. That means you yourself have to think clearly, objectively, not personally. That means to have this extraordinary sense of the feeling of being whole. Not fragmented, means to be safe, free from all error. And when the mind is in that state, there is love. It's not whether you love your wife or don't love somebody else, love is love. Please see all this. It's not, can I love one person and not love another? It's like the perfume of a flower; when the perfume is there, it is not only for the one who is nearest to the flower, but the flower itself is a beauty of life, to be looked at, admired, smelled by anyone who wants to. This is not a romantic statement where you can kind of admire and smile and say, I wish I had it. Because without that perfume of love, life has no meaning. You may be a marvellous professor, great scientist, and so on; without that life has lost its vitality, its depth, its beauty.

And also we should talk about what is beauty. What is the quality of mind that has beauty? Is it the face, well covered up, all kinds of cosmetics, lovely hair, properly shaped eyes, and so on? Is beauty in the painting of a great master; is there beauty in a lovely poem? What is beauty? Because if you have not that quality of that sense of depth and the clarity which beauty brings about, love has no meaning either, because they two go together. So one has to enquire very carefully, and if you are serious, deeply, what is beauty. Can beauty exist where the mind is in conflict? Where you have problems, one or many, can beauty exist? Or, beauty is there when you are not there. Have you ever looked at a great mountain, the majesty, the dignity, the immovability of that mountain when you look at it? For a moment, the majesty of it drives away all your problems - for a second. That is, at that moment, you, with all your problems, are not there. And you say, what a marvellous thing that is. There, the outward greatness drives away the pettiness of yourself. Then that feeling of immensity, magnitude, that great wordless state puts away the little problems of life. Like a child with a toy, the toy takes the child over; for a moment the child has forgotten; or is absorbed by the toy. And we are also absorbed by something; escape from ourselves. Which is to be absorbed. You are being absorbed now by the talk. So for the moment you are quiet and so on. So when you with your problems, with your anxieties, with your loneliness, with your attachments, are not there then beauty is. And where there is beauty, and love, life becomes an extraordinary movement.

I think we had better stop now. We'll discuss next Saturday the ending of sorrow, what death means, what is meditation, if there is at all something that is utterly beyond all words, beyond all time, and that which is sacred. We'll talk about it Saturday and Sunday. May we get up?

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 11TH MAY 1982

There are many questions that have been put; some rather extravagant and others, if I may point out, rather absurd. Like, why don't I grow a beard? Those we have set aside and taken some of the more serious questions. It's quite funny, isn't it, all this.

May I again remind you, if I may, you are putting these questions to yourself, and trying to find an answer, or to see the implications of the questions. As we also pointed out, it is important how you approach these questions; any question, any problem of life, whether we approach it personally or with some definite or unconscious motive, or with a desire only to find an answer, thereby we never understand the problem itself. As we said the other day, problem means something thrown at you, something that you have to meet, a challenge that you have to respond. But if one responds to it obliquely or in a certain direction, then one is not meeting that challenge completely. So it matters very much, if I may point out, we are not instructing you, we are not teaching you, just pointing out, how important it is how you approach a question, a problem. And one has to learn the approach, rather than the solution of the problem.

1st QUESTION: How do you feel about one million dollars going to educate a small, somewhat select group of children that do not appear to be from the suffering or destitute?

What do you think? This school, Oak Grove School, as far as I understand, has a scholarship fund for poorer people, for the so-called destitute, for children who are not from the well-to-do class.

I wonder why there is a general antagonism or feeling against a group of people who are elite? And why do we object to a school of this kind, which has really a scholarship; why do you object to it - not knowing all the intricacies of the school, problems of the school, and so on? And why don't you, if I may point out, object to the enormous sums of money being spent on war? Why don't you object to that? War, not any particular war, nuclear war, but the whole idea of killing people for one's country, isn't that much more important to object to than to this?

This is also important, we are replying to it. That is, this school, Oak Grove School, they are spending about a million dollars, if they can get it; I think they will get at least half of it; having a secondary school. And there is a scholarship fund for those who cannot possibly afford the full pay. If you feel this strongly, then what will you do about it? Burn up the place? Or, go into the question, why, in an affluent society as in America, as in this country, as in this part of the world, why there are people who are starving, who have very little, who are uneducated, who are submitting to all kinds of horrors? Why this country is spending millions and millions and millions on armament and so on. Why? Do we object merely verbally or do we take action about all this? And what can one do when a country, like all over the world, even the most primitive societies in the world are accumulating materials for war. Each country, like France, England, America, and other countries, are selling armaments to other countries, poorer countries, who are also spending millions on all kinds of horrible means of destruction of humanity. What do we feel about all this? And what can one do about all this?

It seems almost impossible to stop this destruction of man. So do we go to the root of all this or merely consider not to have a certain type of nuclear bombs and so on, superficially, Or, do we go into all these matters deeply? That is, what is the cause of all this? What is the cause of poverty, not only in this country, which is so affluent compared to the rest of the world? What do we do about it? When we go to the Asiatic world, India and so on, the population is increasing every year. In India, 15 or 13 million people are added every year. And, a very, very poor country like that is spending billions on armaments, buying Mirage from France, to oppose another country, a neighbour. We are all doing this. What shall we do? What is the cause of all this destitution, poverty, orphans; in the Asiatic world, people have starved, are starving. The speaker was part of it; not enough food, and so on, as a boy, as a child. So we all know what poverty is. Perhaps not you. I am glad you don't know it. And what is the root of all this?

Is it national pride? Is it some kind of peculiar honour, to fight for one's own country and kill millions of people in that for that honour? What is the cause of this destitution, the increasing poverty in the world? Is it that the nationalism has divided people and therefore one country is enormously well-to-do, and the other countries are not? Is it possible to have a global relationship, interrelationship, so that economically, socially, as politics, everything, it is a global problem, not American problem or Asiatic problem. Can we consider that to stop wars, which is part of destitution, part of this enormous destruction of another human being, who is like you. He may call himself a Turk or an Argentine or a British or Russian, but that human being is like you and me.

Going through all kinds of misery; hoping for security in nationalism, which is isolation, and in that isolation there is no security. So could we or some group of people be free of all nationalism, who are absolutely, totally against war, killing other human beings? I am not telling you to do it, please. There were in ancient societies a group of people who refused to kill under all circumstances; it was their religious deep conviction that to kill was an evil, and if you kill you'd pay for it next life; therefore don't kill - reward and punishment, maybe but the idea of killing something, because life is sacred. So if one feels that deeply, one puts aside all tribalism, and can governments in the world not accumulate armaments? It seems almost impossible. The world has gone insane. If you don't pay tax, you are sent to prison because you are an objector to all this. And if you buy a stamp you are sustaining war. If you pay for petrol, or gas as it's called in this country, part of it goes to war.

So, seeing all this, what is a human being to do? Not only in the school, that's a small affair. What is a human being, confronted with all these problems, what is he to do? Who is responsible for all this? Governments? Politicians? The group of terribly rich people who are controlling governments, big corporations? Who is responsible for all this horror? Please answer these questions. Isn't each one of us responsible? Because we dislike a foreigner; hate people who are not of the same colour as we are, and so on. Isn't each one of us responsible for all this? So, if we are responsible, it's our duty, our intense feeling that we bring about a new society; a new group of people. That's the function of education. At least we are trying in this school to bring about good human beings, whether they are rich or poor, children are children. Good, integrated, honest human beings. They may fail, but it is good to attempt to do something of that kind. So it's our responsibility, it seems to us; that each one of us deeply understands this enormous problem for which each one of us is responsible.

You have heard the speaker saying all this. He has said it all over India, Europe and this country, in Australia and so on. You listen to all this, and apparently we don't seem to apply it. And that is really the most terrible thing to do. If you hear something that is true and not apply it, it acts as a poison. Do you understand? It's a very destructive thing to hear something true, natural, healthy, and not profoundly apply it. Then what you have heard and what you are brings about a contradiction and then there is conflict, perpetual conflict. Far better not to hear any of this, and not apply.

The speaker has a passport, an Indian passport, diplomatic passport. But that paper does not identify himself with the country. That paper is merely for the convenience of travelling.

2nd QUESTION: Why do we confuse function with role? For instance, we may teach or do some work, but why do we make personal these functions, claiming them as attributes of ourselves, thereby introducing will, position, power, and consequently tremendous harm?

The question is fairly clear. Why are we always so personal about almost everything? Please answer this question to yourself. Why is it that we cannot look at the world impersonally, dispassionately? Why do we through function, use that function for status? Please. Why can we not keep function as, say for instance, the speaker has something to say, but why does he - if he does, which he doesn't - why does he through this function want a status, a position, power, all that business, why? Is it that power is worshipped by human beings; status is far more important than function; a prime minister far more important than the cook; a professor is far more important than a man who is learning something or other; master carpenter and so on? You follow? We don't apparently see that function has its own importance, but if you are using function for a status, your function becomes brittle, it has,lost its energy. You know, nowadays - it's an old problem - functions, as that of a teacher or a great scientist or great statesman, a teacher throughout the world is considered rather 'not quite, quite'. Whereas a scientist, a doctor, we all kind of look up to. But the teacher is far more important than any other profession, because a teacher is bringing about a new generation of people. He should be paid the highest; but we don't do that. For us in - in this peculiar society that we have created - the teacher is the least respected, least considered important. Haven't you noticed this, all this? The teacher can't have a Cadillac, or a Lincoln or a Rolls-Royce, but big businessmen can have it, and you respect the Cadillacs, Lincolns and Rolls-Royces; which shows status is far more important than function.

Now, we all know this. Why? Why do we do this? That is the question. The questioner wants to know, why we human beings use function as a means to achieve a status; why? Is it not one of the reasons that we worship success? That goddess of success. We are all trained; every television and so on says you must succeed, succeed, succeed. Success means achieving a certain status. Not function, the honourable state of function in something for itself, but use the function to become something; which is, to be famous, to have a great, or whatever it is. Why do we do all this? You are doing it, sirs, we are all doing it; except perhaps a few. Why do we do this? Is it we all want power, domination over others; more comfort through money?

By the way, I don't know if you have noticed, the world is becoming more and more, if I may use that word, materialistic. They all want to be more comfortable, more clothes, more houses, more money, do the same thing over and over again, the more of it, and that is called culture. You follow all this, I wonder? So it is all becoming so terribly tragic. And why do we do all these things? Why do we want power? Because we see people in great power, what they are doing, influencing people, their name in the papers every morning; and we'd like to have our names in the paper every morning. Is it a form of deep frustrated urge to have a position, a status of respect, of looking up to authority? We all want that. So we use everything as a stepping stone to something else. You know, it is one of the most difficult things to be nothing. Because to be a successful person is the most respectable person. He is respected. But a human being who says, I don't want any of these things, I'll just live. I'll be nothing in this world. That requires a great deal of inward stability; a light to oneself; capacity to stand completely alone.

3rd QUESTION: Is it not political action necessary to bring about total change?

Lots of things are implied in this question, as in every question. What are politics, what does the word mean? The art of government, science of government; that is, to govern people; because people are so dishonest, so wanting to do their own thing; each one wanting his own desires fulfilled, he wants to compete with others. You follow? All that. So people, ordinary human beings like all of us, are striving to express our own personal individual desires, which go against other people's desires, ambitions, and so on. So each one of us is in opposition to another. And so the art of government is to rule the people, because the people are corrupt, people left to themselves are dangerous animals, therefore they must be controlled, they must be ruled, there must be law, and so on. This is what is happening in the world. Please see it for yourself. More laws, more policemen; greater armies, greater materials of war. So what does government mean? What is the art of government?

You know the meaning of the word 'art'? Not the writing of poems, painting pictures, writing novels; art, the word, not the expression of that word. Art means to put everything in its right place; you understand? To put everything - every action, every thought, every human being has its own place. So, when we human beings have not this art in ourselves - you understand? No, sir, I don't know if you do, please don't agree. Art in this sense, to put my house, my house which is me, in order. Then somebody else has to put that house in order. We have created this society, and we leave it to politicians to alter the society. We have created the monster called society, and to control that society we have to have politicians. Politicians may be either good or supported by the very, very rich people, of a small group of rich people supporting; you know all the game that goes on in the world among politicians. The speaker knows a considerable lot of them. And this is going on right throughout the world; that is, we want political leaders. This leader during this period is not good, but when this election is over, we'll have a new president - a new leader, I won't call them presidents, sorry - new leader; and he too or she too might fail, but we wait another election. You follow? We have done this throughout the world, waiting for new leaders. The present leader is no good, but we hope the next leader will be better, and so on and on and on. This has been the game in all political world. Our desires are that. That is, we are always wanting somebody else to lead us; to tell us what to do. And there is no leader, no saviour no guru, no book is going to help us. I think if one really deeply realizes this; no outside agency, no change of environment, changing of certain structure of society is not going to change the human condition. The human condition is what we are, and if we don't apply ourselves to bring about a radical mutation in ourselves, no leader, nobody in the world is going to do it. And we may search in vain for a new political leader, new statesman, new world leader; we're waiting, creating a world still most chaotic more than it is now. It is so terribly obvious to anybody who looks, thinks about all this, looks at all this. But apparently we are always wanting somebody to do something for us, psychologically, which is far more important. Because what the psychological state is, the outward state is.

So, having heard that, what are you going to do about it? Just listen? And say, very good; good idea. But it's terribly difficult for me to change. Because I have not the energy, the whatever is demanded, I haven't got it. So each one of us is so negligent, indifferent, accepting things as they are, and carrying on. So if we realize the world, the society, the wars, the nuclear bomb, all the horrible threats of the destructive thing called war, and if we realize that we are responsible for this, each one of us; a burning responsibility, not a verbal idealistic responsibility, a burning responsibility, a responsibility that demands an intense action in ourselves, not over somebody. Then perhaps there will be a possibility of a new society; a new group of human beings might bring about a different world.

4th QUESTION: Won't we find the truth you speak of through loving service to humanity, through acts of love and compassion?

Oh, this is a lovely question! The do-gooders are always helping society, the poor, devoting their life to poverty and helping others to accept the poverty or to move out of that poverty. This is going on; recognized by religious people as a great act, making them into saints, you know all this, you read about it almost every day in the papers; the missionaries that go out. It's all so ridiculous!

Now, the questioner says, through acts of love, compassion, service, do we find that truth which is not yours or mine or doesn't belong to any religion? Now, do you love? Do you have compassion? Do you want to help or serve another? When you set out to serve another, to help another, it means you know much better than the other fellow does. I think there is a great deal of vanity in all this, in the name of service, in the name of love; don't you think so? A great deal of self-expression. I want to fulfil myself through various activities, maybe service, maybe that which is called love, or through what we call love or compassion. Isn't it natural and a healthy indication to help another? That's natural. Why do we make a dance and a song about it?

And compassion, what is it, what does that mean? The meaning of that word; passion for all; feeling deep passion for all. That means that feeling of great intensity not to kill another human being, not to kill a living thing. Then you will say, when you kill a cabbage, that's to kill something. So, where do you draw the line? To kill a human being? To kill a baby seal? To kill your enemy, who is aggressive, as you yourself have been aggressive last year?

So, can compassion exist, love exist when there is there is antagonism, when there is competition, when each one of us is seeking success? Go into all this, sirs.

So, in having self-knowing - let's put it this way - in knowing myself, which is knowing the content of my consciousness, which is myself, the content, the beliefs, the antagonisms, the agony, the loneliness, the suffering, the pain, desire to be secure, all that, and more is my consciousness. Without knowing that, understanding the whole conflicting, destructive combination which is my consciousness, how can I love? How can I have that thing called compassion? So to know, the understanding of oneself, not the improvement of the self, which is merely the improvement of my selfishness, which can be marvellous if you want that kind of thing; the understanding of myself, the understanding of my reactions, the way I think, why I do - you know, the whole movement of this. The Greeks, the ancient Greeks, and the ancient Hindus, talked about 'know thyself'. But very few people have really studied themselves. They have studied the animals: rats, guinea pigs, dogs, monkeys, vivisection, you know all that, what is happening. And through them they hope to understand themselves. They talk about behaviour, but they never study themselves. We are the greatest experimenters, if we are, in ourselves.

And to know oneself is to understand, look in the mirror of our relationship. I can't know myself just by thinking about myself, whether I am this, whether I am that. But I can understand myself, it's revealed in my relationship to my wife, to my children, to my neighbour, to governments, to everything. I see myself as I am, not as I would like to be, but actually as I am. Then, there is a possibility of seeing what actually is, there is a possibility of changing that, of bringing about transformation in that. But we never study ourselves. We are always studying books, and the books tell us what we are, and trying to adjust ourselves to what others have told us. What others have told us is what we are, so why do we have to be told by others what we are? Do you understand all this? Because we want to be quite certain that what we study is accurate. So we turn to others. We make mistakes, we say, this is right, this is wrong, I did this, but there is this constant awareness of one's reaction in one's relationship. That requires attention, a great deal of sensitivity. And to be physically sensitive, not be drugged, not take alcohol, smoke; how can you be sensitive?

So, compassion, love can only exist when the self is not. As we said the other day, when you are not, that which is immense is.

Do you want to go on? I can go on, but can you?

5th QUESTION: Do levels of spiritual - I haven't seen this question, so I must read it - do levels of spirituality or consciousness exist? What part do psychic healing, astral projection, the ability to see auras, and the entities, etcetera, and so on play in all this? And can these interfere with relationship and our abilities to see clearly? Good god!

I don't know quite how to answer this. First of all, the first question in this is, do levels of spirituality or levels in consciousness exist? That is, is one more spiritual than the other? You understand? The more. That is, is one nearer truth than the other fellow? Now, what is the meaning of the word 'more'? 'The more' is a measurement, isn't it? I am this, I will be more rich tomorrow. Or I am violent now, but I will not be violent in another week's time. So the mind is always measuring; I am tall, you are short, you are fair, somebody is black, somebody is yellow, somebody is pink; measurement. That is measurement is comparison. And the word 'measure' also plays part in meditation. Measurement and meditation are related. Please, this is very important if you want to understand this. Why do human beings measure? Not for clothes, I'm not talking about that. Psychologically, inwardly, why do we want to measure ourselves with somebody? That is, the measurement of 'what is' towards 'what should be'. You follow this? I am not good today, but give me time, I will be good; which is, the allowing of a time interval is the measure. You follow this?

Are we together in this? When I have the concept of psychological time, that time implies measurement. You get this? So, the questioner says, is there in spirituality - whatever that word may mean, for the moment we are using the ordinary sense of that word; the accepted sense of that word - is there in spirituality a measurement? Where there is measurement, there is no spirituality. Right? A guru, a bishop and so on and so on and so on and so on, there is this concept, this idea that someone is nearer god, nearer truth - god, I don't mean god, nearer truth. And he has achieved something, and I have to achieve that, and to achieve that I must have time and I must measure myself every day. Right? And this is obviously so utterly mundane, utterly physical; that is, I am a clerk in an office, and perhaps next year I'll be a superior clerk and ten years later I will be executive. It is the same movement carried over into the psychological area. And so there is the nearest disciple and the novitiate right there. There is a monastery in Italy, the speaker used to go and visit it, where the novitiate waited for nine years. You understand? After nine years he was allowed to go into the inner sanctuary. There is a perfect measurement. And that is called spiritual growth.

And the questioner asks also, are there levels in consciousness? That is, there is unconscious and the conscious. Right? This is how we have divided consciousness: the hidden and the obvious; the thing that is dark and the thing that is light. We have divided consciousness that way. And in that consciousness there are several divisions. Now, to the speaker, consciousness is whole. It cannot be divided. Please see why. If there is consciousness, which is to be fully awake, then there is nothing hidden. You understand? I wonder if - no please, don't agree to this so quickly! Go into it gradually. Freud and all those gentlemen, professionals, have divided it, our consciousness, into various categories. And we poor laymen, not knowing, we accept all this. But as the speaker, and many people, do not read all this, perhaps they have studied their own states; one can see very clearly, when one is conscious of something, either you are conscious fully or very, very partially, as most of us are. When you look at this marvellous country - the hills, the trees, the light and the shadows - when you are completely aware of all this, there is no hidden shadows in your own mind. So if one is completely aware of oneself, there is no division between higher consciousness and lower consciousness. It is consciousness with all its content.

One can divide: belief in some sacred thing is higher than my sexual or sensory responses, but it's part of my consciousness; which I have divided for some pleasurable reasons or for some desire to achieve something, or it's a pattern which I have accepted as measurement, and I measure myself. This is better than this; this is nobler than this. But it is part of this consciousness. Now, can my unconscious, that is the deep - please listen to this - the deep undiscovered places of fear exist when I have gone into the whole movement of fear? You understand my question? I have examined fear, and the causes of fear, because the mind has realized that any form of fear, hidden, secret, personal or physical and so on, any form of fear is destructive. The mind has realized this, not verbally, but actually. So, it is concerned completely with the freedom of fear, freedom from total fear, not partial fear. So, it's willing, it is open to all the hidden movements of fear to reveal itself, through dreams, through acts, through various forms of - you know, when you are walking by yourself in a wood or on the road, suddenly you realize there is a movement of fear, unconscious, which you have not realized before; which means, your mind is open to the revelation of your own fears. That requires a great deal of enquiry into the nature of fear, which we did last few days ago. So the hidden dark fears that are in the deep recesses of one's consciousness, in the mind, can come out, expose naturally if one is insistent, urgent, that there must be freedom from total fear. You are following all this? The very necessity of being free of fear brings about the total exposure of all fear.

That reply demands watchfulness; sensitivity to be alert to every kind of feeling, nuances of feeling, the subtleties of reactions.

So, as long as there is measurement, there must be division, both in consciousness and in so-called spirituality.

What part do psychic healing, astral projection, the ability to see, blah, blah, blah, play in all this and can these interfere with relationship and our abilities to see clearly?

How does one answer this question? What prevents a human being from seeing clearly? Seeing not optically, inwardly; seeing things as they are, very clearly, without any distortion. Outside agency, astral projections, imagination, prejudice, bias, conclusions which you hold on to, experiences which you think are important, aren't these obvious facts that prevent clarity of perception? Why don't we go into those rather than into astral projection?

You know that word, astral projection is - -I won't go into that, sorry.

Psychic healing. One can heal only when there is no self. You understand this? But self is so deceptive, so cunning, that it hides behind all kinds of manner. Suppose I am a devout religious person attached to some form of symbol or idea, a projection; and that projection is me, greater, nobler, is the highest form, I am still selfish. I am still me, only glorified. As long as there is any sense of the self, healing becomes rather tawdry. But when there is no self at all, there is a possibility of healing.

It's an hour and a quarter we have talked. Is that enough?

Audience: No.

K: One more question, that'll be enough, I think.

6th QUESTION: What is it in humanity that has always moved towards something called religion or god? Is it only a projection as a result of fear and suffering, a seeking for help, or is it something deeply real, necessary, intelligent?

As the questioner points out, historically and actually man has always sought something beyond himself. Man has always said, this is not enough; I have my food, clothes, shelter, I live in this world, I die, but there must be something more. I am sure every human being, at least who is alert, who is fairly intelligent, must have asked this question. Even the committed Communists must have asked, is this all? Is this suffering, pain, and nothing more? And as the questioner says, does fear make us invent something, an outside agency that will protect us, guard us.

So we want to go into this question very deeply.

When there is no fear whatsoever psychologically, whatsoever, what is the state of your mind - please enquire together - what is the state of mind that is totally, completely free from all fear? Will it have any desire to protect itself? Will it have any need or necessity to seek something to which it can pray, worship, or ask help? You understand? When you are perfectly healthy, physically, would you go near a doctor? Would you study all the diet books? See every morning the expert doing exercises on the television? Similarly, a very, tremendously healthy mind - healthy in the sense, having no fear, completely no fear, end to sorrow. The understanding of the whole movement of pleasure, you follow? Healthy, sane, rational mind. Will it need to go to any church? Go on, sir, answer for yourself. It's only the mind that is crippled, conditioned, unhealthy, fearful, aching, lonely, deeply sorrowful, wants naturally some help. And so it projects gods, saviours, the whole religious circle. But that suffering, that loneliness, that fear, he has not been able to solve, he hasn't gone into it. And we have had saviours who have had leaders, we have had every kind of help in the world; all the evangelists, all the preachers, all the - you know what goes on. They have not freed man from this ache.

So, the question is really, can we be a light to ourselves, not depend psychologically on anyone; action that will not breed conflict, regret, sorrow, pain, inwardly? You understand? Can we understand ourselves so completely, or is that not possible? We have never tried. We have tried everything else, we have gone to the moon, invented most marvellous machines, extraordinary surgical instruments. The brain has got extraordinary capacity, but that capacity we have never applied to ourselves. Because we have always asked for someone else to help us; that's what you are doing here, now. The speaker is not helping you, he is not teaching you; we are saying, look at yourself.

We have got the capacity, the energy, sufficient intelligence to go into ourselves, look at ourselves, face ourselves; never escaping from ourselves. We have got all the energy to do that. Think what energy is needed to go to the moon; you understand, sir? Enormous co-operative energy, drive. But apparently when it comes to us, the mind becomes slack; we wither, and we hope somebody will give us water that will bring us again to health. Nobody is going to give it to you. That's one absolute fact, irrefutable fact. Because we have had leaders, teachers, we have had saviours, we have had every kind of outside agency, infinite information about ourselves from others. And all that has not freed us from fear. And so, out of our laziness, out of our indifference, out of our callousness, we invent gods and all the rest of it.

And the misfortune is, because we don't know ourselves, we are destroying other human beings. We're destroying this marvellous earth.

Right, sir? May I get up now?

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 14TH MAY 1982

This is the last question and answer meeting. Again, there have been so many questions handed in we cannot answer all of them.

I really would like to ask a question of you, if I may. You have put so many questions for the speaker to answer, the speaker would like to ask you a question; and I hope you don't mind. Why is it, being so educated, living in an affluent society, with marvellous land, with forests, rivers, great mountains, why is it that you do not change? I think that's a very important question to put. Why is it that we are so indifferent - not to outward responses, but to something deep, abiding, something that is worthwhile? Why is it that we don't change?

This has been a question which the speaker has been concerned with wherever he goes. With large audiences, small discussions, interviews and so on, and at the end of the journey there are so very, very, very few who deeply bring about a radical transformation in themselves. They are very friendly, there are social workers, some are politicians, some are some of the well-known gurus. They all seem to follow the same old pattern; outwardly demanding certain political changes to stop a particular kind of war, to have a little more money and so on, but deeply in their relationship, in their enquiry, they go up to a certain point and there it ends. Why? I leave that question with you, and we'll answer these questions and I'll pick up that question again at the end of these several questions that have been put.

1st QUESTION: One sees that chaos in the world is rapidly increasing. Billions are being spent on arms, social justice is being eroded, governments, both totalitarian and democratic are increasingly aggressive, and violent. Though one sees the necessity of much deeper fundamental human change, could the speaker comment on the issue of active political involvement?

Am I Democratic or Republican, is that it? Apart from joking, why, if one may ask, why do we have such great confidence in political leaders? This is the same issue in all the countries; in France, in England, here, in India, and so on. Why? We put such confidence in the economists, in the politicians, in the leaders. Why do we do this? And what do we mean by political action?

Please, we are enquiring together, you are not just listening to the speaker, waiting for his explanation and answer. We are thinking together over this problem which is really a very serious problem, which is affecting the whole of mankind. Some political group, Democratic, comes into power; Conservative or Labour, or Republican or Democrats and they seem to have such extraordinary power, position and authority, and we follow them. They tell us what to do and we accept them. Why is it that sense of trust in them and accepting their judgments. We are sent to war, according to some rulers, government officials, and thousands are being killed; because a majority has voted them into power, position and direction and we merely like sheep follow them. Generally they appeal to our lowest instincts, to our national pride, honour and all that business. And we are stimulated by all that and we are willing to kill others for this, for a piece of land, and so on. Why? Why do we trust them?

Please, you answer this question. And what do we mean by political action which is different from all other actions? Why do we separate politics from our daily living? Why do we separate a political activity of the left, right, centre, or extreme left, extreme right? Why, if one may ask, why is political action so very different from our action of relationship, action with regard to fear in ourselves, and so on? Or is politics part of our life, not something separate. Then politics, as we explained the other day, according to the common usage, which is in the dictionary, is the art of government, science of government. Why do we give this art to the politician?

They apparently are a separate breed, different from us. This is really a question that involves, why do we depend on a politician, a guru, a priest, on anybody to govern us? Please answer this question. Why do specialists take charge of our lives? Is it that we have no so-called confidence in ourselves? We are not sure of ourselves? And we attribute this clarity to the politicians and to the others. Is it in ourselves that we are insufficient and somebody out there is going to make us sufficient?

So, are we to treat life as separate factors, political, religious, economic, and so on? Or, are we to treat life as a whole? Please, question this. The questioner asks, what political action is there that one can take? The questioner perhaps - one may be misjudging him, if one is please forgive us - is that action, political, different from religious action; from the action of an idealist; or does one treat life, the whole living, learning in colleges, universities, schools; relationship; fears, faith, anxiety, and political action - isn't that a whole way of living? Am I conveying this?

Is it that we are so fragmented in ourselves as religious action, political action, family action, individual action, collective action - you follow? Or do we treat life as a total movement in which all these activities are included. But if we separate one from the other, we inevitably bring about contradiction. A religious life is incompatible, one would say with political life; a religious person will have no part with politics, because generally politics is such a crooked affair, controlled by big industrialists, by wanting a great deal of money for the party, and they're depending on rich people and so on and so on and so on. So how do we, each one of us, answer this question? There is increase of armaments; just now they are destroying each other, killing each other for god knows what. And both the democratic world and the totalitarian world are becoming, as the questioner says, more and more aggressive.

So how do you deal with this question? It's very easy to put questions; very easy to put a question and try to find an answer from another. But if we have to answer this question ourselves, taking what is actually going on in the world: the national, religious, economic divisions, wars, tremendous spending of money on armaments; what is your answer? How would you answer this question? If you are American, you say, our way is the best way; and so on and so on and so on. Or, would you consider the right answer, the true answer is, that we cannot separate these activities but treat life as a whole movement?

And what is a political action? Would you like to start a new party, social democratic party? Or, look for a new leader for the next election; condemn the present leader, and when the new leader comes into being next election, again there is doubt about him, you know the whole thing - when the honeymoon is over then begins the whole problem. So, what is your answer? Please, sirs, go into it for yourselves; what is your answer when you have thought it out deeply? Do you want to ask if there is an activity, if there is action which is not divisible; an action that includes politics, religion, economics, everything, the whole bundle of life. And is that possible?

One sees corruption right through the world; black market, rich people getting tremendously more rich; the privileged classes, and so on. Where do you begin to bring about an action that will include all actions? Where do you begin? To go very far, one must begin very near. Right? So what is very near? Me. I am the nearest person, so I begin - not as a selfish activity, or self-centred movement - I am the nearest, or I am the centre from which I start; not out there. Can I live a life that is absolutely not broken up? Not a religious life separate from all other lives, activities, but a life that is political, religious - you follow? Can I live that way?

That implies, does it not, do I understand the whole separative activity completely, and in the comprehension of the separate activities which then become contradictory, conflicting, endless divisions - if I understand that very clearly, perceive it not in abstraction or as an ideal or intellectually, but as an actual thing; from that observation one will act which will be complete. Have I answered the question? If you are actually wanting to start a political action, a new party, new group, new leader of your own, then I am afraid you and I won't meet; we are back into the same old pattern. But we are saying, a life that is complete, sufficient psychologically, from that quality of mind and heart, then all action is included in that.

2nd QUESTION: You say that out of the negative comes the positive. How does one negate the 'I' without aggression, suppression or denial or without conflict? Who is that which does the negating? Can you go into this problem?

You are going to go into this problem; not the speaker.

What is positive action? And what is negative action? The positive action is, I must do that, I will do that, this is right, this is wrong, or what is considered positive following certain idealistic course which will eventually bring about a different world and so on; the positive action, positive thinking as the evangelists and others propagate, positive thinking. And what is negative thinking? To think of others badly? I don't know what negative thinking is, really. Thinking is in itself is negative, but it doesn't matter, we'll go into it.

So the questioner wants to know whether the self, the essence of selfishness, the self-centred activity, can be denied without suppression, without conflict, without any form of evasion. That is the question. We are not saying that you must negate the I; how can you negate the I? And who is it, as the questioner says, who negates or asserts? When you say 'I am', who is it that says 'I am' aggressively? And who is it that says, 'I am not'? Both the positive and the negative, who is it? Go on, sirs.

Is there a separate consciousness, a separate state of mind, a separate clarity in our consciousness? You follow all my questions? Is there some element of clarity in this messy consciousness, messy, conflicting, aggressive, fear, their fears, faith, beliefs, superstitions and all that. In that confusion which is our consciousness, is there a spot of clarity which then can say, I will direct, I won't suppress, I will change this whole confusion. Do you understand my question? Is there? Please if one is terribly honest with oneself, doesn't want to deceive oneself or accept some comforting idea, or merely follow some tradition, then you will say there is a field in this messy consciousness that is clear, unconfused, and that will bring about clarity in the whole field of confusion. You understand my question? This is the old, very old story; that there is, according to the Hindus in the Asiatic world, a certain entity apart from all this - they call it atman, god, or what you like - who is witnessing all this and seeing all this, through various forms of assertions, conflicts and so on, will ultimately free the mind from the confusion. Right? And probably here to, in the Western world, there is this idea of permanent soul, whatever that may mean, who is gradually asserting himself and will ultimately go to heaven. Right? These are all very comforting utilitarian theories. But they have not so far cleared man's confusion, man's conflict, his agonies, his loneliness, his depression, and so on.

So, why not try - when you are all so practical in the West and the East is also trying to copy you by becoming very practical - why not see that this is so utterly impractical; the god within you or the soul within you, or the clarity within you which will wipe away this confusion so easily. If that is not practical, as it is not, apparently, because it has not succeeded; succeeded in the sense - please let's be clear in the usage of that word - succeeded, not to be something in this world, to have more money and so on, succeeded in bringing about complete comprehension, the ending of conflict and so on. As it has not, let's look at it differently. That means one must deny this, negate this. That's going against all your religious tradition; the Bible, the soul; you understand what I am saying? Negating all that. Then if you do, then we can look at it differently, but if you have slight attachment to all that, conscious or unconscious, then you will not look for anything else.

So, first of all, what is the self, the 'I'? All the attributes, all the tendencies, the various forms of idiosyncrasies, various beliefs, the various hurts, the conflict in relationship, fear, loneliness, agony, seeking some illusive security, suffering, all that, the name, the form, is the 'you'. Right? Or do you doubt that? If you doubt it - one should - then when you doubt something it means you must examine it, not just doubt. If you doubt that there is god, doubt - I am not saying you should - if you doubt it, then you must enquire if there is such a thing. But merely to doubt, say, well - has no meaning. Scepticism has great value, but if you are merely sceptic all the time, what's the point, it's like being illusory, caught in an illusion, they are both the same. So where there is doubt there is also the movement of enquiry. So we are enquiring together. This 'I', this separatist activity, so-called individual, which is the essence of the 'I' - and the questioner wants to know how to negate that, the very whole activity of me, my possessions, my qualities, my aggression - you follow? The whole of that. How is one to negate it?

Now, the questioner asks that: how to negate it. Then he goes on to ask, who is it that negates? You follow? First he said, tell me how to negate it. Then he says, who is it that negates. You follow? I wonder if you understand this? So we are not negating it. We are trying to find out what it has done in the world first, this self-centred egotistic activity, what it has done in the world, and see the reality of it, the actuality of it; and then enquire, who is it that is acting all the time from the centre. You understand my question? It is not that we are negating the self, but that the activity of the self in the world, what it has done in the world, what it has done in the family, in the group, in the community, in the nation, in the world, and so on; and seeing the reality of it, not the idea of what it has done in the world, but the actual happening, the actual activity of it, and from there - which is our criteria - from there enquire if that self which is creating such mischief in the world, can that self be looked at? You follow?

Then we will enquire, what is it that is looking at the self? It is the same question put differently. So, first, what has it done in the world? I don't have to answer that question; obviously, it has separated itself into nations, into communities, into various forms of social divisions; it has divided itself from the rest of the community, society, world, as the family, and from the family, the 'me', my aggression, my happiness, my pursuit, and so on so on so on. It has brought about division in the world, because it said, in that division as my particular belief, my particular religion, my particular faith, in that faith, in that belief, in that dogma I will be secure, I will be safe. Right? Are you following all this? So it has created vast division, incredible divisions; and so where there is division there must be conflict. So the I, which is the creator of this division, which is the essence of conflict - right - can that I come to an end? Not suppressing, not evading not avoiding, and so on so on; can that I which has done all this mischief, all these terrible things in the world - separate gods, it has brought about a million wars, thousands of wars. Is that a fact? For you, not for me. Is that a fact? Or is it an exaggeration? Or is it some kind of concept, and you are adjusting yourself to that concept? That is, we think war is cruel, and therefore the I must be - you follow? First conceive an idea, and then adjust ourselves to that idea. We are saying, observe what is happening in the world without bias, without any partiality, and you see what the I, the so-called individual expansion, the individual aggression, the individual success, and so on so on, what it has done in the world.

If you are very clear on that point, then we say, now, seeing what cruelties, bestiality is brought about in the world, can this movement which is the 'me', can this movement ever stop or radically change? When you have put that question to yourself, then who is it that is to bring about a change? The questioner says, who is it that will end this self-centred activity. Right? That is what the questioner is saying. That is, we have to go much deeper into that, which is, is there a difference from the observer and the thing he observes. Please just listen to it; don't agree or disagree or say, oh, you are repeating the old stuff. I have heard this last year, or two years ago, or twenty years ago, you are repeating. Move out of that rut. We'll move out of that rut. It is not a rut, but you may call it a rut.

When you observe a tree, that thing, can you look at it without the word first? Or when you look at it, the instant response is, that's a tree, oak tree or whatever it is. Can you look at it without the word? - word being the symbol, the idea, the memory, which uses the word as the tree. You follow? Experiment for a minute, for a second or two to look at that thing which is around you now. And when you so look without the word, because we are caught in a network of words. I don't know if one realizes it. The word, the symbol has taken the place of reality; when you say, my wife, you have the complete picture; or my husband or my son, my country, the flag; and when you use the word, Communist, it is - you follow - the whole intonation, the quality, what is behind that word. And when you say, I am an American, or I believe in god, I don't believe in god - you follow - this vast network of words in which the mind lives, the brain lives. I don't know if you have noticed all this. I hope it interests you. The questioner asks it, and the speaker says, if you are not interested, it is a nice day. Does one realize that? That one can never look at a thing, a living thing, or a dead thing or a thing that is moving - always with a word; to look at a river, at the flowing water, not call it the Mississippi or Thames or the Ganges, or the Nile - just look at the moving water. It has quite a different quality.

Now, so can you observe - is there an observation, not you observe, sorry! - is there an observation of the movement of the self which is anger, bitterness, hurt; just to look at all that without the word. Are you following all this? The word is the past; right? The word indicates the content of the past. My wife - I am taking an ordinary example - my wife; when you use 'my wife' see the content of that word, the enormous implications of various incidents, accidents, ideas, hurt, all that in the past. Right? And that word 'my wife' indicates the tremendous content of the past. But, can you look at the woman or the man without the past, to look at her? Go on, sirs, do it, don't listen to me, there's no point in listening to me if you are not applying, if you are not doing it.

So first of all we are asking, is there an observation of the whole movement of the self, which we have described both outwardly and inwardly, can you look at that - no - is there an observation of that without the past? You get it? You understand what I am talking about? Look, I have lived 80 years or more; 87 years. A man who has lived 80, 87 years has collected lots of experience; lots of ideas, met lots of people. There are all these past memories throbbing away. And either he is an idiot to live in the past or memory - with this person being very, very, very, very selective - and not live in the past but watch things happening; to observe without the observer, which is the past. Have you got it? Am I making it clear? To observe; to observe one's reactions without naming it as jealousy, as anger; just to observe. When you so observe, what happens? Go into it, sir, I hope you are doing this, not just listening or getting bored with the damn stuff. If you are listening, we are asking a question, which is: when there is an observation without direction, without motive, which is the past, what happens? Now, to find out what happens, actually, you must enquire what takes place when you are directing it, when you are remembering it, your reactions, or giving direction to your reaction. That is, there is a separation between the observer and the observed. Then there is a division and hence a conflict: I must not do this, I must do that; this is right, this is wrong; I say this is right according to my motive, and so on so on so on. So when there is an observation that where there is division there must inevitably be conflict, outwardly and psychologically, that is absolute fact. When I call myself British or American, and I am willing - you follow, the whole thing you've right in front of you. You are willing to destroy thousands of people, spend enormous sums of money, to do something which your national pride or some nonsense dictates.

So, can this conflict in the human mind, which is your mind, it is not my mind, the human mind, which is in constant travail, constant conflict - we are enquiring whether that conflict can end. It can end only completely when the observer is not, only observation is. Is the thinker different from thought? Look at it. Is the thinker - right - different from the thought which he has created? The thinker says, I am a Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, I am a Democrat, totalitarian, whatever it is. the thinker says that. But the thinker has created the Democrat, the Republican, the left, far left, far right, far centre, and so on. The thinker has done that. And is the thinker different from his thoughts? Oh come on, sirs, this is so simple; obviously not. But we have divided it. Right?

So look at another question. Is the experiencer different from experience? Ah, this is - I am glad. Now you are caught! We all want experiences: going to the moon, experience of god, experience of a dozen kinds, of sex, experience of going to the Himalayas and climbing the Everest, you follow? Experiences. Now we are asking, is the experiencer different from his experience? The experiencer must recognize the experience. Right? Otherwise it is not an experience. You follow all this? Am I talking some strange language? I experience - what - a motor accident, I have an experience in an accident in a car, and that is recorded. Pleasant, unpleasant, and as hurt, and so on; the expense of it, and so on; that is recorded. Right? The experience of that thing is remembered, and that experience is a memory which is different from that which has happened last year. Right? So the observer is that experience of last year. Right? Oh, come on, sir. And that experiencer either wants to avoid future incidents of that kind, or if he is prone to accidents, he'll invite them. We are asking, is the experiencer different from the experience? Of course not. I have invented god; and I am going to experience that marvellous state. Right? I have visions of, if I am a Christian, the Virgin Mary, if I was a Buddhist, I've an experience of various types of Buddhist consciousness, or if I'm a Hindu, I have - you follow? Being conditioned to a particular tradition, which is the past, I experience that. Oh, come on, sir, I have projected that and I experience that.

So the experiencer is the experience. And if there is no experience, what is the state of mind? Do you understand all these questions? We are all wanting experiences; and when one actually goes into it very, very deeply, experience, we hope, will bring about more knowledge, more clarity, more this and more that; but the experiencer is the experience, therefore the mind is no longer seeking any experience. Only such a mind is absolutely clear; it requires no challenge. That's a different thing.

So, is there pure observation of the movement of the self; because in that the self is not different from the observer, there is only observation, without the past accumulated memories interfering with observation. When the past memories and accumulated knowledge interfere, then there is wastage of energy. I don't know if you are following all this. Wastage of energy in conflict, in denying, in suppressing, in arguing, why should I, rationalizing the whole business, which is a form of conflict. Now, that's a wastage of energy. Whereas when there is observation without the past, all energy is brought into being, all energy comes in that observations, which dispels that which is observed.

It's up to you; I've said it ten different ways. So there is no conflict with the self, or denial of the self, or suppression of the self. It is the clarity of observation, which is the greatest form of intelligence.

What time is it? (Twelve-thirty) Good Lord, There are about nine questions, I've only answered two questions.

3rd QUESTION: How does one not become a victim while not becoming a predator?

That is, how does one stop exploiting without being exploited? Right? It's the same question, isn't it? I don't want to exploit you, but you are exploiting me. You actually are. You follow? It is the same, very interesting, this question.

How do I - no - the unconditioning of the mind doesn't become another form of conditioning. You have understood? There is a movement away from this trap, and not be caught in another trap. I am a Hindu, I say, it's absurd, and become a Catholic; or I am a Catholic and say, what silly stuff, and I join Hinduism or Buddhism, or become a Muslim. It is the same phenomena, you understand? So one has to enquire, what is freedom?

Does one realize one is caught in a trap? That is, the same repetitive movement, which the computer is doing, it is repeating much more rapidly, more quickly, more intelligently, more alive, quick, programmed; and we are also programmed to be a Catholic, to be a Protestant, to be a Hindu, to be a Buddhist, you follow, to be a Democrat, to be right, left, right; we are also programmed; don't let's fool ourselves. Therefore we are repeating, repeating, repeating; right? Come on, sirs, what are you all waiting for? And the questioner asks: is it possible to be free from conditioning - the predator and the victim - and yet not fall into another form of conditioning? Am I being fair to the question? Of course. You agree?

Now: so I have to enquire - one has to enquire what is freedom? This movement from one corner to the other corner of the field - you understand - the field is my consciousness, this whole world is my field; and I move from one corner of this field, psychological field, to another corner, and I call that freedom; or I choose to move south instead of north, and I call that freedom. So I call choice freedom. I am a Democrat, I choose to become a Republican; but it is the same movement; we are silly enough not to see that. So is that freedom? You are following all this? Does choice bring about freedom? Or where there is choice there is no freedom. I may choose to move from Los Angeles to New York, and I can't do that in the totalitarian state, I have to have permission, special grants and so on; so I feel I am a free man. So at what level, at what depth, or superficial level, do you consider freedom lies? Here in this country you can say what you like, so far. But you cannot say what you like when there is a war. Right? Then we are all united to hate somebody, to kill somebody.

So what is freedom? Enquire, sir. The question is involved in that. What is freedom? To move from trap to trap to trap? To move from one kind of misery to another kind of misery? I am married, I am bored with my wife, I want a divorce and I go, because I like or love, or whatever word one uses, to another woman; but the same pattern is repeated; and I call that freedom. So is there freedom in this moving in the same area; that area may be wide, or very very narrow, but it is the same movement. That is not freedom. Right?

So what then is freedom? Freedom obviously means to totally be free from the whole content of consciousness. You understand? The problem of one corner is different from another corner, but it's in the same field; and we separate the problems, but it's one problem; you understand? I wonder if you see? All problems are interrelated, that's clear; my sexual problem, my problem of earning a livelihood, my problem of god, it's all one movement of this everlasting search for something or other; of becoming. So, freedom is the ending of completely becoming something.

4th QUESTION: What is humility and modesty?

That doesn't exist in this country! Nor in Europe or in India. So what is humility? And why have religions all over the world said you must be humble to inherit the land? Right? They have, certainly. You understand it? The humble shall inherit the earth. And the empire builders have inherited the earth. I wonder if you see this? No, you don't. It doesn't matter. What is humility? Can one ever know, or aware of oneself being humble? When you know, are aware, realize that you are humble, you are not. Right?

And, modesty; are we modest? Go on, sir. We were talking the other day to an India to an Indian, in India. He was looking at a magazine printed in this country; it was one of those magazines where you see half-naked ladies. And he said, my god, what has happened? Have they lost all modesty? And was horrified; because he has an idea of modesty is, that you must be absolutely up to here. You understand all this? So why do we want to be modest or humble? Please ask all these questions. When I try to be humble, that is, willing to learn, willing to be told, abnegating myself in front of authority, and hang my head down to the floor to receive something which you are giving me, is that a form of vanity? It's like a man who is vain, as most of us are, and out of that vanity we try to be humble. Is that humility? A man who is full of aggression, violence, tries to be modest. You understand? It's absurd, it's lost its meaning. Whereas, a man who is aggressive realizes, sees what aggression has done in this world and all the consequences of that aggression, when he ends that aggression, a new thing can begin. The ending - please realize something - the ending of something is the beginning of the new. Right? If I end my vanity, if I have it - I am a big man, I am blah, blah - if I am that and I end it, there is something totally new taking place. But we want to be assured before I end that something will happen; guaranteed. Then what you are receiving is not guarantee, it is the same form, it's the same thing in another form.

Sir, I'd like to come back to our first question. You have heard all this, some many, many, many times, others perhaps for the first time. Why we human beings, who have lived on this marvellously lovely earth, destroying it, why we have become what we are, after so many millennia: vulgar, cruel, bestial, self-seeking, jealous, lonely - you follow - the whole thing. Why don't we change? Why don't we end what we are? Why? Is it we are lazy? Is it we are caught in a particular rut, pattern that we haven't the energy to change that pattern? We have plenty of energy when we want to do something. When we want to go to the moon we have incredible energy. When we want to be champion of the world as in the Olympics run, you have an incredible energy. We have enormous energy when there is an urge, when there is a demand; but apparently there is no urge, there is no demand; why? Is it our food we eat, too much indulgence in sex, in drink, in this and that; too much demand to be entertained? So we are wasting all that extraordinary energy which is part of us in some futile things and therefore no energy to face these things and move, end. Is that it? Please, I can't tell you the cause of all this. There are many causes. But the explanation of the cause is not the ending of the causes.

So why is it, after so many, many years and thousands upon thousands of years we are what we are? So that's for you to answer.

May I get up now?

OJAI 5TH PUBLIC TALK 15TH MAY 1982

We'll continue, if we may, with what we were talking about last Sunday. Some of you probably were not here, so may I briefly restate what we were talking about. One would like to point out, if one may, that this is not an entertainment. Most people are used to being entertained, sustained by somebody else's words, actions and so on. This is not a lecture, as is commonly understood. Nor are we trying to direct or tell you what to do; this is not a propaganda. But we are thinking together, which is a rather difficult problem, because each one wants to think in his own particular way, from his own point of view, and so on. But here, during these last four talks, we were saying how important it is that we should think together. The capacity to think, not about something, but that comes a little later, but to think, which is to observe what is actually going on outside in the world, and also to be aware of all the difficulties, psychological travail, that one has, and to discover for oneself the relationship between the so-called individual and his activity psychologically and the world.

We were saying also, this outward society which has become so dangerous, so insecure, is the result of our own daily activities; perhaps the past generations have added to it, but we are responsible actually for all that is taking place in the world. And also we pointed out that our consciousness, that is, the consciousness of each so-called individual, what he thinks, what he believes, his feelings, his despairs, his loneliness, his fears, his pleasures, his enjoyments, his peculiar form of worship, and so on, those are the content of our consciousness. And this consciousness is common, if one may use that word common, to all mankind. Wherever you go in this marvellous earth, which you are slowly destroying, wherever one goes - even if you go as a tourist - there is this problem for all human beings; they suffer, they go through great agonies; the fear of loneliness, not being able to stand alone; their form of worship, their beliefs, their gods, and so on, just like in the West. So, as we pointed out, when you go into this question very deeply, this consciousness, which each one of us thinks that it is ours, our special property, is the common property of mankind. So consciously, deeply, we are not individuals, though all religions, all society, all families, and so on, have maintained that we are separate individuals with our own peculiar tendencies, capacities, outward forms, name and so on. We are rest of mankind; therefore we are mankind. We are the world and the world is us. This is not a peculiar, exotic theory, something as an ideal, but an actual psychological fact; whether you like it or not, this is a fact. Because you do suffer, and the Asiatics also suffer; you have your many problems and so have they. You are a nationalist, and so are they; you want security, permanency, endurance, continuity, so do they.

So the illusion that we are, in our consciousness, separate individuals, is not a fact. And when one realizes that, not as an idea, not as an idealistic concept, something that we have to strive after, but rather that this is the ground on which all human beings throughout the world stand.

And also we were pointing out that in our relationship with each other, intimate or otherwise, man or woman, there is a great deal of strife, great deal of misunderstanding, contradiction, each one psychologically going his own way, pursuing his own ambition or her fulfillment, and so on. Like two parallel lines never meeting, perhaps sexually. And also we were pointing out the nature of fear; the various forms of fear, and whether human beings who have carried this terrible burden of fear of millennia upon millennia, can ever be free of it completely. We went into it very deeply, step by step, and it is possible, not a theory, not a goal; but it is possible actually to be totally completely free of psychological fears.

And also we talked about the pursuit of pleasure. More and more in this world, outwardly, various forms of entertainment, both religious as well as the various facts of entertainment, football, and so on. And we are also pointing out how mechanical we are becoming; repeating the same thing over and over and over again, which is what the computer is doing; it may do it more rapidly, more efficiently, more widely, but our own minds, our own feelings, are repetitive.

So we are going to talk about this morning, if you will permit it, why is it that we human beings who have lived on this earth for over a million years or more, why we have become what we are, brutal, violent, contradictory, killing each other in the name of god, in the name of country, in the name of peace. There used to be a slogan, after the First World War, which said, "This War (like the next war) is to end all wars". And this repetitive process of killing each other has been going on, though we are highly educated, technologically we are extraordinarily efficient, but psychologically we are very, very primitive. And we were saying, why is it that we do not change? Why is it that there is no end to all this terrible individualistic, competitive drive, which is destroying the world?

And we are going to talk about together the nature of what we consider love. This has been a question that has existed among the ancient Egyptians, the ancient Hindus, and recently the Christian world and the Islamic concept; they have all preached, talked about loving your neighbour, and so on. This has been asserted, religiously, in all the countries, but apparently we have never come to realize what it is. We talk a great deal about it, books are written, but we have created a god, or gods, and we love that god, or gods, we don't know exactly the nature of that beauty. So we ought to - though we went into it briefly the other day - we ought to go into this question very deeply. Is it mere sensory responses, sexual pleasure? Please, as we said, this is not a talk, this is not the speaker asserting any point of view, but we are together examining - please, I'll repeat over again - together we are enquiring into the nature of what one calls love.

So one must ask oneself whether it is mere sensory, sexual responses; which more and more in the Western world, and now which is creeping into the Eastern world, has been turned into pleasure. Is love pleasure? A form of entertainment? A thing which demands some kind of sensory fulfillment? Is it desire? We went into the question of what is desire very carefully; how desire arises and the demand of its fulfillment. When there is no fulfillment, there is frustration and all the neurotic activities of unfulfilled desire. We went into that. It would be unnecessary - if you have come for the first time, one hopes that you will not mind if we will not go into it again.

So is love desire? If it is, then all the complications, frustrations, the demand for its fulfillment, with all the conflicts that arise - so is love conflict? Please, one must repeat this again, you are asking these questions, not the speaker. The speaker is merely pointing out, which you yourself are examining, not merely verbally, intellectually, as a thing passing by, but actually in daily life. Is love a movement which has continuity in pleasure and desire? You are asking the question. And why is it pleasure has become so extraordinarily important in the world? The whole entertainment industry, so-called sports, and, if you will forgive also, the religious entertainment, which is considered sacred; these are the various forms of pleasure. So one asks, is love a movement, an endless movement of pleasure? Is love attachment? Attachment to a belief, to a concept, to knowledge, to a person, or to a symbol. In attachment there is fear, with all the agony of being alone. So if one sees the consequences of attachment: one is attached to the country, to the flag, as everyone in the world is doing that, the separative, symbolic flag; the Asiatics have their own flags, to which they are terribly attached, as in this country, for which you are willing to kill each other, which is what is happening. And we say, that's a principle; a principle that a country which has become aggressive must be pushed back, and so we are willing to kill others. This has been the old repetition from the most ancient of days. And every religion, the most ancient ones and the recent ones of 2000 years, have always said love, do not kill. But our pleasure overcomes this edict.

So one must, if one is at all serious in our relationship to each other, man and woman, relationship with the rest of humanity, whether they're black, white or purple or whatever colour they be, in that relationship, why is there so much conflict? Is it that in that relationship we seek security, safety? And this search for security in relationship, and naturally, fulfillment in that relationship, is that love? So, please, enquire; let us enquire together into this question very deeply. If all that is not love; the attachments, the desire to fulfil, the urge and the fear of being alone, lonely, all that; if all that is not love, like jealousy, hate, arrogance, pride, all that is not love, can it be ended? This is really quite a serious problem; because we never end anything, come to an end; but we want, where there is ending, a replacement. If I give up this, what will I have?

The question of ending a particular problem is really quite important: the ending. Because after all, as we are going to discuss a little later, the ending of life is called death. There you cannot argue, you cannot carry over anything, there is total ending of your memories, attachments, and so on. So one should enquire most seriously if there is an ending - not finding a substitution; not demanding a guarantee that if there is an ending of this, will there be that. So we ought to enquire very deeply, as we said, can all the things which are false, like pride, arrogance, attachment, and the desires, pleasures, and so on, which obviously are not love; can all that end? Because without love in life, the perfume, the passion, the depth of life is lost. Life becomes very, very superficial; very mundane, worldly; which is what most of the world is becoming more and more. Because we have never found out for ourselves what it is to love another. Love is not a remembrance of past events and past pleasures; love is not knowledge. But yet knowledge has played an extraordinary part in our life. Because there are all the scientists and biologists and so on, saying that the ascent of man is only through knowledge. We so easily accept what the professionals say; we never enquire for ourselves. It's one of the calamities, I think - one may be wrong - that books have become so important; what other people have said and written; all the professionals, psychologists. We are talking of not the professionals in the technological world, but the psychological professionals, who have accumulated a great deal of knowledge about oneself, about other human beings; and that knowledge, will knowledge transform man? Transform totally, completely the nature of his consciousness, not partially, not here and there, little less fear, little more kindly, little more generous, less conflict; but will this knowledge that man has acquired through very many, many centuries about the psyche, about the various divisions in consciousness; will knowledge, that is, the accumulated information and accumulated experience, will that knowledge transform the whole content of man, content of his consciousness? Please, ask this question of yourself.

You have studied, you have enquired about yourself, or you have been told by other psychologists what you are, and you have accumulated knowledge about yourself; perhaps not too much, but a little. And has that knowledge - knowledge being always of the past - whether that knowledge has transformed man; or a totally different kind of energy, totally different kind of activity, or non-activity; will that bring about transformation in consciousness? Because this is again important to understand and go into.

school exists believing that, asserting it, writing all about it, they are very, very clever people. And if it cannot possibly be transformed, then we'll perpetually live in conflict; live in contradiction; continue in neuroticism of various kinds. So, is knowledge of one's wife going to transform the conflict that exists between man and woman?

So one has to ask, what place has knowledge? All that you have learned in school, college, university, your own personal experiences; the accumulated reservoir of memory we store in the brain, which is the past meeting the present may modify itself and continue in that modified form, in time as the future. So we are saying, asking, has that knowledge brought about deep change in human beings so that they will not kill, so that there is no fear whatsoever psychologically; so that human beings have this extraordinary capacity to love another? And has not knowledge become a barrier to love? Please, do enquire into all this. So can there be ending to all the things that prevent that perfume? And it cannot be brought about through conflict, through struggle, through the assertion of will; for after all, will is summation of desire, the essence of desire.

We're also ought to talk over together one of the most complex and apparently endless questions: suffering; suffering, not only separative, individualistic, personal suffering, but also the suffering of mankind. There have been so many wars, practically every year throughout the world for the last 5,000 years and more. War; that means, every year killing, killing, killing, how many millions have suffered, shed tears, felt the flame of loneliness; and yet we do not apparently use our intelligence to stop this cruelty, this bestiality of violence, which we talked about too the other day. So there is suffering, both physically and non-physically. The understanding of suffering non-physically will help physical suffering.

So we must first enquire together into the nature of suffering; why human beings, psychologically, inwardly, go through agonies. This enquiry is not cynical or sadistic, but one must enquire whether suffering, psychologically, can end. Is that question self-motivated? Is that question irrelevant? Because we are inflicting, human beings are inflicting psychologically a great deal of suffering on others. We get hurt, deeply, which we talked about at the beginning of these talks - that's also suffering, and the consequences of being hurt psychologically; we went into it, the resistance, the isolation, fears, and so on. And in the Christian world suffering has been avoided in the worship of a symbol; but suffering still exists. In the Asiatic world they have all kinds of explanations for suffering, but yet they suffer. Apparently there is no end to suffering, the human sorrow, the human pain, the grief; that seems to have no end.

And we ought to enquire together - not verbally, intellectually, or romantically; find out whether there is an ending completely of sorrow. Because where there is sorrow there is no love; where there is sorrow there is no compassion; where there is sorrow there is no depth to intelligence. So one must go into this question: who is it that suffers? This is related to the question of death also. We'll go into that too, if there is time this morning. Who is it that goes through agony; tears, and utter loneliness and despair when you lose somebody whom you think you love? Who is it that suffers? What is the nature of that feeling or that state in consciousness?

You are understanding all this? We are meeting each other, aren't we? Or the speaker is talking to himself? These are your problems, not that of the speaker. So please listen, enquire, find out; not leave it to somebody else; because if you leave it to somebody else to solve this problem, then you depend on others and therefore you lose your own intrinsic capacity to solve all the human problems of which you are.

So we are asking, who is it that suffers? When you, shed tears, feel utterly lost, the shock of something you have held dear is gone or lost, who is it that has this feeling of great pain? Which means, who is the 'I' that says, I suffer? Who is this entity that feels this shock and the pain and the despair of loneliness? Please, this is an important question to ask, for when we are enquiring into the nature of dying - though on a lovely morning it may be morbid, but it's not - there, too, who is it that is dying? Who is the psyche, what is the nature of the psyche, the 'me', the 'I' that suffers? You know, we have clung to the idea the 'I' is something permanent; the 'I' has a continuity; the repetition: my house, my knowledge, my experience; my conditioning, my fear, my pleasure, which is secretive; so, who is this 'I'? The various psychologists have given various interpretations to it. If we could put aside all the psychologists, what they have said, and observe for ourselves - including what the speaker is saying - observe for ourselves very clearly without any direction, without any motive, actually what we are.

The ancient Greeks and the ancient Hindus have talked about knowing yourself, not according to some professional, but know yourself. What is that self, and what is it to know about it? You understand? What is the self and to know about it, and what is the knowledge that is accumulated after knowing about it? Do you understand the question? Can I know myself through time? That is, I have learned, I have observed myself, watched all the reactions in my relationship with another, intimate or otherwise; I have accumulated a great deal of knowledge through that observation; and when I observe again other reactions, other idiosyncrasies and sensory responses, that previous knowledge interprets what is actually happening. Right? Are you following all this? So, you are actually not knowing yourself, you are perpetuating the knowledge which you have acquired through various examinations and observations which has become your knowledge and that knowledge is beginning again to interpret the present responses, the present happenings and incidents; so you are perpetuating the knowledge which you have acquired, modified and projecting into the future. This cycle is knowledge, action, learn from that action, which becomes further knowledge to keep the cycle going. I hope you are understanding. Isn't that so? We are not telling you anything that you have not observed yourself, if you have observed.

So, to know oneself really, deeply, previous remembrance, previous knowledge has no place. You have to observe each incident and each response as though for the first time. That is, to know, observe, enter into the field of this immense life which is specialized as the 'me'. Where there is the 'me', the self, there is no love. So it is very important to find out for oneself and not escape from this question. Because it's your life; it's your responsibility. If you merely avoid it and run away into various forms of entertainment, you are bringing about great disaster in the world, for which you are utterly, totally responsible.

And where there is the ending of suffering, there is compassion. Suffering, the ending of it, is to have passion. There is a vast difference between lust and passion. Lust everybody knows. But the passion, not identified with some symbol, Christian or Asiatic symbols. We have not that passion. When the missionaries, evangelists, the preachers of God and all the rest of it, they are salesmen. To have passion; passion to go, understand the brutality, the violence, the fears, the agony, to resolve them so the mind is free from all the contamination of struggle. You must have great energy for that, to go into this. But if one is merely caught in fear, pleasure - pleasure is different from delight, watching something that is beautiful. But the remembrance of it and the desire to continue in that remembrance is pleasure.

And if we have time and if you are not tired this morning, we ought to consider together this immense, complex problem of death. As pleasure, fear, attachment, hurt, the conflict in relationship, that's our daily reality; and death is also a part of our life. It's not something that comes at the end of life, after old age, disease, accident, that's part of this whole business of living. And we never consider the importance of death; the quality, the depth of that word. Most people are afraid of it; and being afraid they have invented all kinds of theories which will give them comfort. In the Asiatic world, the origin of it perhaps born in India, reincarnation; that is, the 'me', dying, will have an opportunity next life to be more happy or more greedy, and so on. In the Christian world there is this whole concept of resurrection. You hear about it all day wherever you go, in the Asiatic world and here. And which is important, what is after death, or before death? Please ask this question of yourself. Because most of us, being frightened of death, either rationalize it, say it is inevitable, like a tree grows, withers, dies, everything grows, becomes old, and ends, withers away. So we rationalize our existence if you are an intellectual; or if you had a very good time during life, popular, money, etcetera, then you'll say, I've had a jolly good life. Or, as most of us laymen, our life is shallow, insufficient, perhaps technologically we are good, money, position, status; or we are just feeble human beings, uncertain, no security psychologically, and so our life becomes rather dreary, meaningless; so shouldn't we consider first what is our life? Not what it is to die, we'll come to that.

What is our life? From the moment we are born till the moment we die, what actually goes on with our life? We know all about it, we don't have to repeat it. If you are grown up, an adult, you work in a factory, or a businessman, a lawyer, from morning till night, repeat, repeat, repeat. And if you are a housewife, you know all that business, one hasn't got to go into all the details of it. So our life is pretty shallow, whether it's a scientist, great philosophers; or generals or politicians, apart from their title and position they are just like other human beings; vain, frustrated psychologically, seeking - you know, all the rest of it. So, our daily life is a routine and an escape from that routine. Our daily life is work, work, work, without any leisure. And if there is leisure, which is called holidays, it's mere enjoyment. So our life is shoddy, tawdry - please excuse these words, they're just describing what it is - with occasional flare of great beauty and depth and happiness. The ending of all that is to die. And man - man, woman - man throughout the world is more concerned about death than living; living without conflict; living with great energy; living in clarity; living without a shadow of conflict. And that is possible only if fear ends completely, psychologically. Then there is no need for gods.

So what is it that dies? The accumulation of the knowledge about oneself? The accumulation of your properties? The accumulation of all the things to which you are attached. So is it possible to live - please understand this - to live with death all the time? That's the ending, as you live, everything, day after day; you understand? That means you are, the mind is incarnating afresh each day. That is creation, that is a mind that is creative; not inventive. There is a vast difference between inventiveness and creation. All the technological world and technicians of that world are inventive, because they are using knowledge. And from knowledge to knowledge they move, but they are never free from the knowledge, so that there is a new beginning totally. So to live with death, not commit suicide, that's too silly, to live with death, to end my hurt, end it completely; end one's attachment, and so on; so that life and living, life and death are moving together all the time. Do it!

If one applies one's mind and energy to this enquiry and its activity, then there is a totally different kind of life. And we'll talk about it tomorrow, what place such a life has in this world and is that a religious life. And the place of a religious life in meditation and so on. May I get up, sirs?

OJAI 6TH PUBLIC TALK 16TH MAY 1982

I do wonder why you have all come; is it out of curiosity? Or, it's a lovely morning, it's an outing for you? Or, are we serious enough to face all our problems, which are mounting, and find out for ourselves if we can resolve them? And as it is not possible to have a discussion with so many people or have a dialogue, then we can have a conversation together; which is that you and the speaker are walking along a shady lane full of shadows and running waters, and are talking about their own problems, problems which confront all humanity; not only each one of us, but also what every human being in the world is going through. And as we were pointing out yesterday, we have assumed our consciousness as being something separate, personal, individual. But as one observes deeply, this consciousness, which is the common ground of all humanity, the common suffering, pain, anxiety, loneliness, and great uncertainty, and the everlasting search for security, is the problem of every human being in the world. It's not your particular problem, it's the problem which is the issue of all human beings, whether they be Christian, Muslim, Hindu or Buddhist.

So we are talking over together amicably, in a friendly spirit, the issues of our life. And as this is the last talk, we cannot go over all the things we have had a conversation about during the last five talks. But we can summarize the whole thing. Most of us are apt to take one special problem and try to resolve it. Or come here hoping that someone else will help you to overcome or resolve or transcend one's particular problem. But if one examines more acutely, critically, every problem is related to all problems. They are interrelated; They cannot possibly be separated and, having separated them, try to resolve them individually or separatively. We talked about various things during the last five talks: fear, the nature of human beings who have been hurt all their life, psychologically, inwardly, and the consequences of that hurt. We went into that very, very carefully. And also we talked about relationship between human beings - man, woman, the neighbour, whether that neighbour be very, very, very far away. And in that relationship, however intimate, however personal, there is always conflict, there is always a certain sense of uneasiness, fear, domination, possessiveness, attachment. All these breed naturally struggle between two human beings. Conflict arises; and we went into that question, whether that conflict can possibly end, or must it everlastingly continue from generation to generation?

And also we talked about fear, which is a very, very, very complex problem; the contributory causes of that fear, conformity, comparison, imitation, trying to be something that you are not, and other factors, bring about fear. We went into that very deeply. And also we talked about the continuation and the demand for pleasure, whether it is the religious pleasure or ordinary pleasure of life; sexual, the form of achievement success, possession, money, prestige, status, and all that.

And yesterday morning we went into the question, what is love. We talked about yesterday morning why human beings have destroyed that one perfume, the absolute necessity in life, without which life has no meaning whatsoever. You may have lots of money, enjoy yourself on the sea, go to various churches, follow various gurus, accept various philosophies as the way of your life, but without that quality and that perfume, that passion, which is different from lust, that comes about when there is love. We went into that sufficiently, extensively yesterday morning.

And also we talked about the ending of suffering; why human beings, so highly educated, in one direction so extraordinarily intelligent, in the technological world, why human beings who have lived on this marvellous earth millennia upon millennia, why they have not understood or ended suffering. Not only personal suffering but the suffering of mankind, where there is starvation, in Africa and in the East, India, where poverty is destructive, degrading, and other economic problems which separate mankind. And we said without nationalism, a global interrelationship alone will solve all our outward economic social problems. We live on this earth together; it's our earth, not the American earth, or the Russian earth, or the Hindu or the Buddhist or the Islamic world; it's our earth, but we have divided it as the American, Russian, Chinese, Japanese, European and Hindu and so on so on. Where there is division, racial, economic, religious divisions, there must be conflict; there must be wars; and these wars have been going on for millions of years. And our intelligence, which we give to the technological world, we have not applied that intelligence to solve this problem of suffering. And we have the capacity, we have the energy, but apparently we are caught in a mechanistic world. Our culture is becoming more and more mechanical; it's a mechanistic culture, which is not only where the machine becomes all-important, but also the culture, which is mechanistic, is to live a life of repetitiveness, to repeat over and over the same, with the same problem, with the same issues, with the same conflict.

And we also talked yesterday, and we shall go into it more deeply this morning, why human beings have become what they are, shallow, superficial, having learned a great deal of life, accumulated a great deal of knowledge, and that knowledge apparently has not solved our human, daily conflict. So knowledge may be one of the factors of sorrow, which we talked about yesterday morning.

And we shall go into some other subjects this morning; but first, please, this is not a lecture, as it is generally understood; lecture being, talking about a particular subject and being concerned with that subject to transmit it as clearly as possible to another. So this is not a lecture; but rather a conversation between you and the speaker in which both of us are observing, thinking about the same problem, looking at the same mountain, the same trees, the blue sky, and so we are together, the speaker means that, honestly together to observe these problems and to find out for ourselves, not according to some philosopher, not according to some priest, not according to authority of a guru and so on and so on; to discard all that completely and observe for ourselves why we human beings have become so deplorably unhealthy psychologically. So please, though the speaker may put certain things into words, but the words are not the actual; the explanation is not that which is explained. As we talked about the other day too, we are caught in a network of words. And words become extraordinarily important: the word 'American' has an extraordinary significance to the people who live in this part of the world. Or the word 'Communist', 'Socialist', 'Capitalist', and so on, Baptist and Catholic. So words are not the actuality; the symbol is not the actual. So please, if one may point out most respectfully, what we are explaining, what we are going into is merely explanation, usage of certain words, but the words, the explanation are not the real.

We ought to talk over together what is culture. The ordinary meaning of that word is to cultivate, as you cultivate vegetables, a garden, a rose bed. Culture implies, not a repetitive, mechanical existence, but to be free from the known and act from that freedom; that's actually culture. That is, we live always in the known. Please, kindly follow all this if you are interested; it's a nice morning, and you may treat this gathering as an entertainment, which would be most unfortunate; as a kind of mental stimulation, a drug. But if you treat this as a form of stimulation, then you lose the reality of one's own life, of one's own shallowness, one's own emptiness, one's own fears, anxieties, and all the travail of life. So please, as the speaker puts it into words, examine that which he says for yourself. Because doubt, scepticism, is a great purifier. Most of us so easily accept things, specially in religious matters and so-called spiritual matters. There authority assumes it knows and you don't know. They act as interpreters. But it is necessary to discover what is truth, there must be doubt. And doubt in the Eastern world, in the Eastern religions, has been emphasized. In the Christian world doubt is an anathema; because if you doubt the whole structure of the church, whether it be local or from Rome or any other, if you doubt it then the whole thing collapses. So in the Western world doubt has been condemned; they have been burnt, those who doubted, called heresy, they have been tortured; as they are doing now to political prisoners in various parts of the world, it is the same phenomena. So, please don't accept a thing that the speaker is saying but try to find out for yourself by carefully listening, if you are interested, if you don't treat this as an entertainment, then please listen and doubt and question and ask. Doubting that which you have created yourself, you are doubting your own ideas, your own conclusions, your own experiences, your beliefs, your faiths. You are doubting so that you find out for yourself what is truth.

And that is very important, because truth demands a free mind; a mind that is completely free. And there is no path to truth, so please, as we are going into this very complex problem, let us listen carefully, with certain quality of doubt. To doubt requires sensitivity. If you doubt everything, then it becomes rather stupid. But to doubt with a light hand, with a quick mind, with subtlety, then that doubt brings about clarity, energy. And we need energy to go into all these problems, to resolve them.

So we are asking, what is culture? Is it merely the mechanical repetition of the known? Which is, we live in the past, the past is our memory, the past is our knowledge through experience, and we live always in the past, in the known; and when we act from the known, it is repetitive. We must act in certain areas with knowledge; like a scientist, he has to have a great deal of knowledge; or a great surgeon must have experience, he must have operated upon many, accumulated knowledge, skill, and a sensitivity of hand; and there knowledge is necessary. And knowledge, which is all our remembrances, all the past incidents, the hurts, the fears, the longings, the despairs, the desperate loneliness; all that's part of our past knowledge. And when we are acting from the past, it must be repetitive. And therefore the mind becomes mechanical. The computer is a repetitive machine, maybe quicker, faster than the human brain, but that machine is repetitive, as we human beings are. And so we are questioning any culture born from the past, from the known; obviously it's mechanical, repetitive. And so we are going to find out what is it that brings about a culture which is totally different from the mechanistic culture which we have accepted for thousands of years. Most of our minds - with some rare exceptions - are mediocre; forgive me if I use that word. One may think one is extraordinarily out of that class; but to think that you are out of that class is also a form of mediocrity. This is not an insult. We are examining together.

What is it to be mediocre? The word mediocre comes from Greek, Latin, 'climbing halfway up the mountain'. That's the real meaning of that word, mediocre; never climbing all the way up, but being satisfied to climb halfway or one-third of the way. That is the meaning of that word, mediocre. And our education, however wide, whatever knowledge one acquires through a particular subject, all these factors of education are limiting the mind. Have you noticed how, specially in this country, which is spreading this fact all over the rest of the world, how specialists, scientific specialists, the doctors, the surgeons, the philosophers, the psychologists and so on, they are ruling each one of us. They are the authority to tell you what to do. They are the experts: how to bring up a baby, how to have sexual relationship properly, how to make up your face; there are these authorities, and we all obey them. Our obedience has at certain times a revolt, but that revolt is merely a reaction and so it's not complete comprehension of the understanding that all specialized knowledge is limited, as all knowledge is limited. And a culture born out of this limitation is no culture at all. There's no American culture; or European culture. They can go back to the Renaissance, to the past history, but deep culture of the mind can come about through freedom from the known. Can there be such freedom?

We are going to talk about it together because only from a religion a new culture can come into being. Religion is not the authoritarian, the accepted form of religion. The state religion, the religion of belief, of faith, of dogma, of rituals, of worship a symbol, that is not religion; obviously. So we are going to enquire into what is religion. Do you understand? Because we've enquired into fear; into the nature of that extraordinary thing called love; whether human beings can ever end their suffering, their misery, their anxiety. And also we should enquire together into what is religion?

Man worships; there are still those people in the East who worship a tree; who worship a mountain; they give in India to the Himalayas a special place, a special name. And they worshipped at one time the earth, the trees, the heavens, the sun - as the Egyptians did. But we consider all that illusion, nonsense. And as we are so terribly sophisticated, we worship a symbol, pray to that symbol, to that saviour or, as in India, another form of the same thing.

Worship has been part of human life from the ancient of days. You may not worship a tree; but you go to the church or to a temple or a mosque and there you pray, you worship. There is not much difference between the worship of a tree, which is alone in a marvellous field of green earth, and the symbol that thought has created in the church, in the temple, or in a mosque. There is not much difference between the two because man suffers, he is in trouble, he doesn't know to whom to turn to, so he invents a comforting god; which is, thought invents a god, and then worships that which he has invented. These are facts, whether you like it or not. You invent the whole rituals of Christianity; as in India, there are complicated rituals. And it is the invention of thought. And then thought says, that is divine revelation. I do not know if you have not noticed. In Asia, which includes India and here, divine revelation plays an extraordinary part. But that divinity is brought about by thought. The interpreter of that divinity is the priest. He thinks and his thought has created various forms of rituals.

So we are asking, is religion all this? Is religion based upon books, the printed word. Where religion is based on a book, whether it is the Christian, Hindu, Muslim, or the Buddhist, then there is dogma; the authority of the book becomes all-important; there is bigotry, narrowness of mind. Both the Muslim world and the Christian world are based on books: the Koran and the Bible. In India, fortunately for them, they have got a hundred books, hundred gods - no, more than that, 300,000 gods. (Laughter) Don't please laugh. This is very serious. It sounds funny. And there they are tolerant, which means they put up with anything: false gods, true gods, any kind of illusion, any kind of assertions of any so-called religious man. Here in the West, as the Muslim world, the book plays an extraordinarily important part. And therefore those who believe in the book, deeply convinced by every word in that book, they become bigoted, dogmatic, assertive, aggressive, and if they are not semi-civilized, they'll kill. This is happening in the world. So is religion - the word religion, the etymological meaning of that word, is unknown. It arises from certain Latin words, which we'll not go into, but it actually means, according to certain dictionaries, the capacity to gather all your energy to discover, to come upon that which is true. That is the root meaning of that word. So we are gathering our energy - all our energy, not a specialized energy; the energy of thought, the energy of emotions, a passionate energy to enquire into what is truth.

And to go into it deeply, we must enquire also into what is thought, which has invented all the religions in the world, all the rituals, all the dogmas, the beliefs, the faiths; it is the result of thought. There is nothing divine about anything. Thought can say what I have invented is divine. But thought is not sacred, is not holy. So it is important to go into this question of what is thought. We have gone into it previously but the more you look at it, the more you enquire into the very nature of thought, the more complicated, the more it demands a subtle mind, it demands a quickness of mind; not a mechanical mind, not a mind that accepts; not a mind that acquiesces; but a mind that is doubtful, questioning, demanding, has this great energy. And when you give this total energy, not an energy which is partial because you are interested in some form of entertainment, or in some form of relief, in some form of comfort; then it is all partial energy: whereas if you demand totally to understand the nature of the human mind, why we live the way we are living, destroying the earth, destroying ourselves, wars, misery; then you have to give all your energy. And where there is this total energy, complete passion to understand, to find out a way of living which is totally different from non-mechanistic, repetitive way.

So we have to go into this question deeply once again, what is thought? Why thought plays such an extraordinarily importance in our life, in our relationship. Is thought love? Please enquire with the speaker; really the speaker is putting your question, it is not his question. You are putting this question for yourself. Thought has created the marvellous cathedrals, magnificent structures in Europe and some of them here; and thought also has put all those things inside the cathedrals and the churches and the temples and the mosques. So one asks, is thought sacred? Because it has put all this in these buildings and then you worship it. I wonder if one sees the illusion of this, the ironic, actual deception; that thought has invented the symbol, the ritual, the host, and the different things in India and Asia, thought has been responsible for all this, some of it being copied from the ancient Egyptians, from India, and so on. And then thought, having created this marvellous structure in stone, then inside is all the symbols, the agony, and in the Asiatic world a different symbol; then thought says, you must worship that. So we are asking, is thought sacred in itself? Or, it is merely - please listen to it, you may not agree; do not agree but enquire - is thought a material process? If it is not sacred, then it is a material process. But thought has invented these, heaven and hell, the saviours of the world, according to different religions, their rituals, it is all the result of thought. And then thought turns around and says, you must worship it. So we must find out for ourselves, not according to any authority, in spiritual, religious matters. There is authority of the surgeon, that's a totally different matter. But to discover, to come upon that which is eternal, if there is such thing as eternity, your mind must be free in all spiritual matters, in all psychic matters; that is, in the psychological realm, which is you, there must be total freedom to find out.

So we are going to enquire together the nature of thought. If you have never thought at all, you are in a state of amnesia, blankness, but that is a rare form of disease. But most human beings throughout the world, the Hindus, Buddhists and so on, communists, the common factor is thought. They all think, whether they are extremely poor, uneducated; or the highly sophisticated, accumulated professor; or the cunning politician; or the highest authority of the church, and so on; they all think. As each one of us does, in our daily life. And that thought dominates our life. So it is very, very important, if one may point out, to understand the whole movement of thought. It has created great poetry, great painting, great sculpture, literature; and thought is necessary to do business, to drive a car and so on. What is thought? What is its origin, the beginning of thought? You are asking the question, not the speaker. Please, apply your own minds, brain, to enquire into this question. Because thought dominates every action in our life. Thought is the determining factor in relationship. So what is that thing called thought, the thinking machinery and the origin of it?

Is not thought born out of memory? You remember where you live, the distance to be covered from here to where you are going, and that's knowledge, and that knowledge has been acquired through experience. So the beginning of thought is experience, knowledge, memory, stored up in the brain. Right? This is a fact, not exotic or absurd illusion. You remember something that happened yesterday, pleasurable or not, and that remembrance is stored in the brain, recorded in the brain; and from that record thought comes into being. So thought, whatever it does, is not sacred. It's a material process. Some of the scientists even agree to what the speaker has been saying for many years. They have experimented on rats, pigeons, and guinea pigs, dogs; but they don't experiment upon themselves. We are also matter, and science is concerned with matter. And if thought is a material process and thought, whatever it does, whether in the religious field or in the business field or in preparing for wars through a gathering of armaments, is the result of thought. Thought has divided people into this type of religious person, this type of human being who lives in certain part of the world, and so on. It's thought that has divided human beings. And thought, because of its divisive nature, because thought is never complete, because born of knowledge, and knowledge is never total about anything, - therefore thought is always limited; and separated, because - I won't go into all that - it's separative. Where there is separative action, there must be conflict, between the communists and the socialists, and the capitalists; between the Arab and the Jew, between the Hindu and the Muslim, and so on. These are all the divisive processes of thought, and where there is division - that's a law - there must be conflict. So nothing that thought has put together, whether in a book, in the church, in the cathedrals, in the temples or in the mosques, is not sacred. No symbol is sacred. And that is not religion, it's merely a form of thoughtful, superficial reaction to that which is called sacred.

So we are going to find out, if we can this morning, giving our attention, our attention to enquire what is sacred, if there is anything sacred at all. The intellectuals throughout the world deny all this. They are fed up with the religions, with their illusions, and all that. They discard; they are rather cynical about the whole affair, because religious organizations throughout the world have great property, enormous wealth, great power; all that is not spiritual, all that is not religious. So, as we said, the word religion, the etymological meaning is unknown, but also the dictionary takes it clear that to enquire into what is truth one must gather all energy, the capacity to be diligent, to act, not according to a certain pattern, to diligently observe your thoughts, your feelings, your antagonisms, your fears; and to go far beyond them; so that the mind is completely free.

Now we are asking, is there anything sacred in life? Not invented by thought, because man, from time immeasurable, he has always asked this question: Is there something beyond all this confusion, misery, darkness, illusions; beyond the institutions and reforms; is there something really true, something beyond time, something so immense that thought cannot come to it? Man has enquired into this. And only apparently very, very, very, very few people have been free to enter into that world. And the priest from ancient of times comes in between the seeker and that which he is hoping to find. He interprets, he becomes the man who knows, or thinks he knows. And is sidetracked, diverted; lost.

So if we want to enquire into that which is most holy, which is nameless, timeless, one must obviously belong to no group, no religion, have no belief, no faith, because belief and faith is accepting as true something which does not or may not exist. That is the nature of belief: taking for granted, accepting something to be true when your own enquiry, your own vitality, energy, has not found out, you believe. Because in belief there is some form of security, comfort. But a man who is seeking merely psychological comfort, such a man will never come upon that which is beyond time. So there must be total freedom. Is that possible, to be free from all our conditioning, not biological conditioning, that's natural, but the psychological conditioning: the hates, the antagonisms, the pride, all the things that bring about confusion, which is the very nature of the self which is thought? And to find out, there must be attention; not concentration. The word meditation has been introduced into the Western world quite recently by some of those people who have accepted certain norms, certain patterns of meditation. There is the Zen meditation, the Tibetan form of meditation, which is different from the southern form of Buddhist meditation, there is the meditation of the Hindus, with their special gurus, who again have their own forms of meditation. Then there is the Christian form, which is contemplation. And the meaning of that word, meditation, implies, the meaning of that word is 'to ponder over, to think over'. And also, a meditative mind must be free of measurement. Please don't go to sleep, if you are interested. That is, the mind that's in meditation first of all - we'll go into that a little later, if we have time.

So all those people who have brought this word, - with their systems, methods and practices, are again put together by careful thought. Perhaps one guru or two - those Asiatic birds - have some kind of experience; immediately that's translated into some kind of a spiritual status, and they have their meditation. And they come here and you are gullible enough to swallow all that; pay for it; the more you pay, the greater the meditation.

So we ought to enquire into what is meditation? To meditate; it's really important, because a mind that's merely mechanistic, as thought is, can never come upon that which is totally, supreme order, and therefore a complete freedom. Like the universe is in total order: it's only the human mind that is in disorder. And so one has to have an extraordinarily orderly mind, a mind that has understood disorder - we went into that the other day - and is free completely from disorder, which is contradiction, imitation, conformity, and all the rest of it. Such a mind is an attentive mind, completely attentive to whatever it does; to all its actions, in its relationship, and so on and so on. Attention is not concentration. Concentration is restricted, narrow, limited, whereas attention is limitless. And in that attention there is that quality of silence; not the silence invented by thought, not the silence that comes about after noise, not the silence of one thought waiting for another thought. There must be that silence which is not put together by desire, by will, by thought. And in that meditation there is no controller. And this is one of the factors in all the so-called meditative groups, and the systems they have invented: there is always effort, control, discipline. Discipline means to learn; not to conform, to learn so that your mind becomes more and more subtle, not based on knowledge, learning is a constant movement. So meditation is freedom from the known, which is the measure. And in that meditation, there is absolute silence. Then in that silence alone, that which is nameless is.

RISHI VALLEY 1ST TALK WITH STUDENTS

8TH DECEMBER 1982

Krishnamurti: What shall we talk about? What would you like me to talk about? Jumping over the moon? No, you don't know what that means. Well, what would you like me to talk about? All right, if you have no suggestions I'll carry on, shall I?

Student: Sir, you may talk about anything.

K: Of course, that's the easiest, isn't it? If I was married, which I am not, and if I had children, which I haven't, what would I want my son or daughter to become, to be in life? Do you understand my question? Suppose I have a son or a daughter, I would like my son and daughter, perhaps one of you is my son and daughter, I would like first of all that they should be highly sensitive. You know what that word sensitive means - to have all your senses, your touch, your seeing, your hearing, highly developed. Because unless one becomes very, very sensitive when you touch, feel, see, your brain will not be greatly active. The senses are part of the brain. Is this too difficult? Could I go on like that?

Oh, I forgot something. The Foundation has appointed as the Secretary of the Executive committee, and the Director of Studies, Radhikaji, there she is sitting over there. She is going to be the executive secretary and Director of Studies. Probably some of you know her already. She has an MA in Sanskrit, Ma in Philosophy, and Phd. That's enough about her!

As I was saying, if I had a son and a daughter here, what would I want them to be, to become, to flower into?

S: A great man.

K: I don't know what you mean by a great man. A great man may be a swimmer, a man who runs one kilometre in two seconds, and so on. I don't know what you mean by 'great man'. Either he is a great scientist, a great archaeologist, or a great professor - I don't know what you mean by 'great'. Do you mean a great national hero?

S: Yes.

K: I thought so. (Laughter). A national hero is the last person to be great. You don't understand it, do you? So I would like a boy or a girl for whom I am responsible to be highly sensitive. I'll go into that presently. So that his brain - that's the only instrument we have, an instrument which is capable of extraordinary things, what it has done in the technological world, it is extraordinarily capable and to be sensitive, and to have a brain that is highly active, not suffocated, atrophied by so-called modern education. Sorry! Do you understand what I am saying? Am I boring you?

S: No, sir.

K: What does that mean? Yes? Why? And I would like that boy or girl to have an excellent body, a very healthy body, pliable, swift, strong, eating the right food, right exercise, clothed properly, with good taste. No response! All right. And to have a good mind, a good brain. You know we have an extraordinary body which has evolved through thousands upon thousands of years. It is an extraordinary instrument, if we don't abuse it, if we don't overeat, over exercise, over indulge, then it can last for a very, very long time, over a hundred years. And to have a good body is essential. Right? You agree to all this? Will you have a good body? Eat right food, exercise, walk so the your body becomes extraordinarily alive, not just a lot of lumpy flesh. Is this all too much? Do you understand what I am talking about? All of you understand English? Yes? I don't speak Tamil, Telegu, Hindi or any other Indian language, but I know French - you know what French is? - I know Italian, I used to know Spanish. I am beginning to forget most of them. My mother tongue has become English. So I am afraid I have to speak in English so I hope you will understand it. And one must have a very good brain. So let's talk about that. Apart from the body, apart from having a good sensitive appreciation of nature - you know all the trees around you. Have you ever looked at any of the trees, have you? Go on, answer it. Have you looked at trees or have you pulled the branches off?

S: We did both. Sometimes we look at them and at the same time pull out some leaves.

K: I know. It is like pulling your hair out. The tree doesn't like it. But have you looked at it actually? Look at it one day after you leave here. Look at a tree. How extraordinarily beautiful it is, so symmetrical, the last highest leaf has extraordinary vitality. Look at it and don't do anything to harm the tree. Have you ever looked at the heavens, at the sky? Have you looked at it, not just casually look at it and go off and do something else, but actually take time to look at the sky, the clouds, the light in the clouds and the shape of the clouds and the moving clouds, how they cast shadows on the hills and how the shadows move? Have you watched all these?

S: Yes sir.

K: No. I am afraid you have not. Probably you are too busy pulling out somebody's hair, too busy talking, chattering, so you never have time to look at the extraordinary world we live in, the beauty of this valley, the ancient hills and the dried river, the stream. Have you looked at all this, every day, as though you are looking at it for the first time? You can't look at it as though for the first time if you say, well, that's a stream, dead, you know. The moment you name it, it is not new. I wonder if you understand this?

So, I would have that child, that boy, that girl, highly sensitive, and that helps the brain to be also very alive, sensitive, active. You know modern education right throughout the world is making the brain dull because it has stuffed with a lot of knowledge, information, specialized career as an engineer, as a doctor, as a chemist or devoting time to research so that the brain becomes conditioned, shaped by the study you do. Right? Are you understanding some of this? Don't you discuss with me, can't you talk? Have you noticed how your brain is conditioned? You call yourself a Hindu. That is a conditioning. You call yourself a Muslim. That is conditioning. Or a Christian or a Communist or a Marxist. Do you understand? Our brain is programmed as a computer. I wonder if you understand all this? Aren't you programmed, haven't you been told from when you were little that you are a Hindu, that you have your own gods, that you have your own particular rituals? Haven't you been told all that? So by constant repetition of that: you are a Hindu, you are a Christian, you are a Muslim and so on, your brain gradually becomes conditioned, shaped, and all the rest of your life, you say I am a Muslim, I am a Hindu, I am a Christian, I am a Catholic, I am this or that. That's conditioning. Isn't it? Am I talking to a lot of dead people, not thinking people? Are you all cynical up there?

S: Whatever we do, aren't we in some way or the other being conditioned? In the way you mean, you look at a tree, you look at something without naming it, otherwise it seems we become conditioned. If we learn to look at it that way aren't we being conditioned?

K: Sir, suppose I want to be a good carpenter. None of you do that. Of course you all want to be lawyers, engineers. Right? But none of you want to be a good master carpenter. I watched one of them in California. He was really a most extraordinarily skilled person. Now, if I want to be a carpenter, I have to study the nature of the wood, I have to study the nature of the implements and the grain of this wood and so on. I have to familiarise myself with the various types of wood. And also the instruments I use I must handle them properly. Right? Now, that actually makes my brain somewhat conditioned in a particular direction as a carpenter. If I want to be an engineer, the same thing happens. Or a scientist or a philosopher or a religious maniac. So - please listen to this - does knowledge condition the brain?

S: Yes.

K: No, don't say, yes immediately. Think of it, talk it over. I go to school, pass examinations if I am lucky or if I am fairly brainy - not brainy - fairly good at memorizing. Then go to college, university and then a career. I have acquired knowledge about mathematics. That knowledge, is it conditioning my brain? Enquire into it. Let us talk about it. Don't keep silent.

S: Conditioning will mean your thought process is going in a particular direction.

K: Yes. So, if I specialize in one subject, does that condition my brain? Apparently it does. A surgeon, a very good top surgeon, he has had ten years or fifteen years of medical study, gets a degree, practises till he becomes a top surgeon. And such a surgeon obviously being a specialist, his brain is conditioned. Right? Some of you are going to be engineers and some of you are going to be lawyers and so on. Your brain is already being conditioned by the idea that you will be an engineer, a doctor and so on. Is that right? Would you agree to that? Now, is knowledge, which is that, I have a great deal of knowledge as a surgeon, a great deal of experience, I have operated on the heart dozens and dozens of times, and my hands are skilful, I know the precise instrument to use and so on, so my brain is conditioned. So we are asking a further question which is, does knowledge condition the brain? Go on sir, answer it. That's what you are doing, you are acquiring knowledge in this school, getting a lot of information and you are memorizing it, it is stored up in the brain. In the very brain cells, you study, mathematics, whatever it is you study it is stored there as memory, that memory of a particular subject does condition the brain. You agree to that? Not 'agree', do you see the fact? S: Well my question now is, you just said, sometime back, look at anything without naming it, otherwise you become conditioned. Isn't that too a kind of gaining knowledge?

S: He said even when I look at something, as you are asking us to do, in that process also he says we are getting conditioned.

K: Now, when you look at a tree, do you name the tree?

S: I don't, because I don't know the name.

K: Right. You don't know the name. So you look at it. When you look at it without using the word 'tree' or a special kind of tree, then you are looking at something very alive. Does that condition you? Obviously not. The moment you name it, the moment you recognize it as a particular species, then with that conditioning you are looking at the tree. You understand the difference? Go into it further. Can you look at your friend without the word, without the picture that you have built about the friend, without the image that you have carefully gathered - without the image, without the picture, without the word, can you look at your friend? The word, the picture, the image is the conditioning. You are following this? So, can you look at something, look at your friend, or look at the speaker, at me, without the image, without the picture you have built about him or the name, or the word, just look. Can you do that? Because if you name it, have an image about it, or the picture you have constructed or put together or put together through reputation, then that is your conditioning. But if you have no picture, then there is no conditioning. Clear? You follow it?

S: I can't do it. How do I decondition my mind?

S: I follow it, but how do you do it?

K: That's an excellent question, 'how do you do it?' Why do you ask that?

S: Because I am interested.

K: You want to achieve that, you want to have that kind of look.

S: Yes.

K: Yes. So you are asking, how. Now watch your brain, how it operates. When you ask the 'how' you want a system.

S: Yes.

K: That's your conditioning. You understand? The 'how' is your conditioning, but to see the fact, to see the truth, that conditioning operates only when there is the naming, the picture, the image that you have built about her or him. That's your conditioning. Just be aware of that, don't say, how am I to get out of it. Just be aware of this fact. Do you understand? Aware. Are you aware of all the trees, of the hills, the shape of the hills, the rocks? Are you aware of all that? If you are not aware of all that, it is very, very difficult to be aware of your conditioning and to see how that conditioning acts. So one has to be aware of the whole environment around you.

S: How do you get along with him, with that person, if you don't have a name, or if you have no image about him?

K: If I have no image, picture, or idea about him, what is my relationship with him - is that it? Have you tried it? Then why do you ask that question? Do tell me please, I am not being impudent.

S: I cannot try it.

K: Why can't you? Look, how many years have you spent in a school or college or university? Years. Right? And to do this you do not even spend half an hour at it, investigating it. You don't spend even ten minutes to find out whether it is possible or not. So your brain is conditioned by your slackness, by your laziness. The moment you pay attention it becomes alive.

S: Our brain itself naturally seeks conditioning and can't help it.

K: Sir, our brain has evolved from the ape and so on, till man, which is about 40,000 years ago, and that's what the scientists say. It has passed through every kind of experience, every kind of incident. Right, sir? So it has gathered enormous information, experience and the brain itself is conditioned. Because it has in the very nature of growth become conditioned. Now, we are saying the conditioning is the word, the picture, the memory, the accumulated information stored in the brain as memory. These are the factors that condition the brain, and more, there are other factors but there isn't time to go now into the various other factors like fear, greed, pain and so on. All these are the contributory causes of the conditioning. So we must ask the question: is it possible to uncondition the brain? You understand my question? There are many scholars, many professors and writers like the existentialists and so on - they say it cannot be unconditioned, that it can only be modified.

S: Logically speaking, those people who say it cannot be unconditioned are right.

K: Maybe, but I have to find out. Why should I accept it?

S: No, you yourself said so.

K: I said that sir. It has evolved from the ape till now, and there is a very great deal of ape in us. Now the fact is it is conditioned. Is it possible to free that conditioning? Otherwise evolution has no meaning. If I am violent from the moment, from the ape till now, I will be violent till the very end of all time. So is it possible to change the whole psychological structure of the brain? Is it possible for you to be completely free of fear? Because, that is one of the factors of conditioning.

S: It is awesome.

K: Of course it is awesome. Why do you call it awesome?

S: Sir, you want to decondition the brain. There is a whole lot of things to get rid of.

K: You young fellows are being rather restive. We ought to discuss this very carefully, step by step going into it. Do you want to do that? Not just with words, not just intellectually spin along, but actually step by step going into it and as you take each step finish with it so that at the end there is total freedom from fear. Will you do that?

The next question is: our knowledge which we are acquiring through books, through conversations, through dialogues, through reading various books is making our brain full of knowledge without having an original experience. You understand what I am saying? I happened to know a very great writer, a literary man. He is dead now, he was a great friend of mine. One day he told me, because I knew him very well, we were great friends, on a walk in the hills, he said: `Look, I can speak about science, I can speak about painting, piano, music, I can talk about Vedanta, I can talk about Buddhism, because he had studied it, Tao and all that, I am full of knowledge, my brain has studied, acquired knowledge about so many things-encyclopedic knowledge. And I wonder if I will ever have an original experience'. Do you understand what I said? So your brains are now over-loaded and you will never have, unless you understand the nature of conditioning, never have something totally original. Then you are just a mediocre human being. You know what that word `mediocre' means? According to the dictionary, which is the common usage of the English language, if it is an English dictionary, it means going up the hill half way, never reaching the top but always going just a few steps up. That's what it means to be mediocre. And most of us are mediocre. We never go to the very end of anything. So look what is happening to you: you are being educated to be mediocre; to have a job, to get married, children and for the rest of your lives - for fifty, sixty years - work, work, work. Go to the office, to the factory or tilling the land. You understand all this? Then you will say, how am I to earn more money, I must have food, shelter and clothing. Naturally.

S: Do you mean to say we must reach the top of the hill? Aren't we ambitious then?

K: No. To reach human excellence, that's the top of beyond the Everest-you understand? - that does not mean ambition. Ambition destroys love. You don't know all this. But to have a brain that is excellent, that means say exactly what you mean, not have double meaning, not to be cynical, not to be bitter, not to hate. Are you interested in all this? Or we are just having a talk on a weary morning when we ought to be out in the sun, with the green leaves and the beauty of the earth? Are you bored with this, are you? If you are bored, and perhaps you are, what would you like to do? Not just sit there and look at the speaker, that's no fun.

S: If I may go back, as you said knowledge leads to conditioning.

K: I said, does knowledge lead to conditioning? I asked a question. I don't say it. I want you to find out.

S: Knowledge does lead to conditioning, but knowledge is important in life. K: Of course.

S: Where do we draw the line?

K: Find out. Do you want me to draw the line and then you accept it? Look: I drive a car. To drive a car I must be taught. That means I must drive with a good driver beside me to tell me what to do, how to change gears, how to put on the brake, the accelerator and so on. I learn. Through learning about driving I become a good driver or a bad driver. That is, I have acquired knowledge to drive a car; I have acquired knowledge to speak English or Hindi, whatever it is, I acquire knowledge to be a good carpenter - I prefer to be a carpenter than an engineer. You understand, I prefer that, not that I am a carpenter. So knowledge is necessary, otherwise you cannot live. So find out for yourselves where knowledge is necessary and where knowledge is not necessary. May I help you in this?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Don't say, yes, sir, and then relax and go to sleep. But find out where knowledge is essential, where it is necessary, where it is important, and also find out where it is not important at all. So, you have got this problem. Now what is a problem? Do you know the meaning of that word 'problem'? It is something thrown at you, that's what problem means. The actual meaning, the etymological meaning of that word means something thrown at you, something that you are challenged with.

S: But that's my problem sir, no one has thrown it at me.

K: Oh yes, I have thrown it at you.

S: No but...

K: I have said, sir, find out where knowledge is necessary and where knowledge is not necessary. Find out. And I added to that: may I help you to find out? Not direct you to find out. You understand the difference? By talking together, having a dialogue together, let's enquire into it. Will you accept that? So, knowledge is necessary, isn't it? Physical knowledge - how to ride a bicycle, how to drive a car, how to write, what to do if I am an engineer, carpenter. There it is necessary. That is the way the whole social structure is built now, that I must work to earn a livelihood. To work I must have knowledge about whatever I do. Now where is it not necessary? Probably you have never asked this question. Now I am asking you where is it not necessary? Come on sirs. You have all studied, you are good, clever, come on sirs.

S: Do you have fear?

K: Do I have fear? You or me?

S: You.

K: I am glad it is a direct question at last. Do I have fear? What do you mean by fear? Passing examinations, a snake biting me, fear of something? Now, there is either physical fear, which is, I walk in the dark, I may be bitten by a snake. Therefore I have to be careful when I walk. And there is the other kind of fear, which is, I might not succeed in my career. Right? I want to be a good doctor, but I may not be capable of being a good doctor, and I am afraid of that. So when you asked me, are you frightened, have you fear, I say to you in humility that I have no inward fear of any kind. You understand what I am saying? I am not afraid of my reputation, you understand, what people say about me. I don't care. Right? What else? I am not afraid to die. What are you afraid of - your wife, or your husband, or your father and mother? As I have no father, no mother, nor a wife, I am not frightened of family. You understand?

Now, sirs, we have got ten minutes more so let's finish the subject you have raised. Are you interested in this? Tell me. It is important for you to find out. You may become an engineer but you have to find out, you have to learn, so learn about this also - where knowledge is necessary, important, essential, to go from here to Madras you must know the route you follow, you must have knowledge. Now where is knowledge an impediment? S:

Thought.

K: What do you mean by thought?

S: I am limited by knowledge.

K: Which means what?

S: I am always bounded in a certain area in which to live. And I am limited by what I know.

K: We agree to that. I am asking a different question sir. We agree that we must have knowledge to go from here to Delhi you need knowledge. You need knowledge to write a book, knowledge to drive a car. Right? To become a good chemist, good scientist you must have a great deal of knowledge.

Now we are asking a question where knowledge is not necessary. Is there any place where knowledge is an impediment?

S: Knowledge is not necessary when you want to be considerate to others. K: Are you saying where there is love, knowledge is not necessary? Have you understood what I am saying? Are you saying that where there is affection, care, love, compassion, knowledge is not necessary?

S: Yes.

K: Look, sir, I will indicate some things for you to pursue it or not, as you wish. Knowledge is not necessary in a relationship. And if I am married, I have a wife, I have built an image about her. Are you following this? And she has built an picture about me. Don't you know all this? You are not married but you have got a teacher, haven't you? An educator, you have a picture about him, haven't you? Right sir? Don't be shy.

K: Good. You have a picture about him. So your picture you have built since you have been here, about him. So your picture, your image about him is not the actual him. He may be different. He may have contributed to that picture. This requires much more investigation, I can't go into it now, but I am pointing out if I may, that in relationship knowledge is a detriment. Knowledge is what divides people, man, woman and all the rest of it. It is knowledge that is dividing the Hindu and the Muslim. Agreed? It is the knowledge that says, I am a Jew, you are an Arab, and because of this division, we kill each other.

Is that enough for this morning? Yes sir? Now before we go, will you sit very quietly for a few minutes. That is, if you want to. Sit very quietly, close your eyes and see what your thoughts are doing. Will you do that?

RISHI VALLEY 2ND TALK WITH STUDENTS 15TH DECEMBER 1982

Krishnamurti: What shall we talk about?

Student: Could we continue with where we left off last time?

K: What was that?

S: Deterioration.

K: I think we went into that. Has your mind stopped deteriorating? We have talked about, if I remember rightly, that conflict is the very nature of degeneration of the mind, of the brain. Conflict is measurement. We have talked about it. Conflict is pretending to be one thing and doing something else. Have you stopped all that?

S: How am I going to stop that?

K: Seeing that your brain is deteriorating, if there is conflict, so you stop conflict. It is as simple as that. We went into what contributes to the deteriorating factor of the brain, and we said measurement, conflict, comparison. Right? And comparison implies time, trying to become better than what is. Right? And all these gradations and implications of conflict, after having listened to it, see the reason of it, the causation of deterioration, has your brain - or you have understood it and so your brain is now becoming much more sensitive, alive, active. Have you?

S: I can see certain things without necessarily going into the...

K: Quite right, you can see certain things. What are they?

S: I can see I am in conflict but I can't...

K: Now, have you found out what is the cause of conflict?

S: The...

K: Just words or actual fact?

S: It is a fact.

K: Then what do you do with the fact. It is like having pain. It is a fact. You just tolerate the pain? Do you or do you not do something about it?

S: Pain is something quite relievable...

K: Can I put the problem differently? What is freedom? You all have freedom, that's why you have come here. More than you should have. You understand what I am saying? You have freedom.

S: In the past two talks I am able to see that I have a certain type of freedom, I have freedom in a particular sense.

K: I will explain to you what I mean by freedom. Is freedom to do with what I like?

S: Provided you take the responsibility.

K: Now, do freedom and responsibility go together? So, freedom, responsibility and discipline. Right? Discipline imposed by another, by society, by study of a certain subject which demands its own discipline. Now what do we mean by discipline, the word? Are you getting bored with this? A little bit.

S: No

K: Are you representing the whole gang up there?

S: I don't represent the whole gang, I am speaking for myself, sir.

K: Why don't you let the others speak?

S: I think discipline is self-control.

K: Discipline, he says, is self-control. You know the meaning of that word?

S: You should have power over yourself and know how to act towards others. K: Now, just a minute. Before you say that, do you know the meaning of that word 'discipline', the meaning? What it means, the dictionary meaning. Do you know what it means?

S: The root is religion.

K: No, sorry. The root means, it comes from the word disciple. Disciple means one who learns. So the meaning of that word is to learn. Right? To learn. Now have you learnt about responsibility? Have you learnt what it means to be free? Have you?

S: I have.

K: You have. So find out first, let us talk about discipline. That is to learn, to learn about yourself, to learn about the environment around you, to learn Hindi, English, Sanskrit or learn yoga. Right? To learn. Do you learn to control yourself? That's what the boy said over there. He said discipline is to control yourself, right? What do you say?

S: (Inaudible)

K: I didn't say that. I said do you learn about yourself? Do you learn what control means, to learn what are the implications of controlling oneself?

S: Yes sir.

K: Don't be nervous, I am not going to throttle you.

S: When we try to control ourselves...

K: Have you understood what it means to control? What are you controlling? Anger?

S: A whole set of things.

K: Now get one set of things of the whole thing, like anger. Now, do you control anger?

S: I cannot control it but try not to show it.

K: You cannot control it but try not to show it. Why don't you show it? S: Because we may hurt others.

K: So in order not to hurt others, you don't show it, your anger. Is that it? Do you feel angry? We are learning about anger now. I am angry with you - I am not, but suppose I am angry with you and I won't show it, because it might hurt you, but I have the feeling. Haven't I? What do I do with that feeling?

S: Try to control it.

K: She said that old boy.

S: We keep it within ourselves.

K: That's what she said. You keep it in yourself. What happens when you keep it in yourself? You have a boil, you have a poison inside. What do you do? Keep it in yourself?

S: You get more angry, if you do that, if you keep it in yourself.

S: You might tell someone else but not the person you are angry with.

K: You are angry with someone else but not with the person you are angry with. (Laughter)

S: No, I said...

K: That's quite good too, isn't it?

S: If you tell someone else, not the person you are angry with, that you are angry with that person.

K: So, you tell somebody you are angry with somebody else. What's the point of that?

S: Just to comfort yourself.

K: This is getting rather childish, isn't it? (laughs). I am asking you: you learn a language, don't you, you learn mathematics, you learn geography. What do you mean by learning?

S: It is a sort of programming.

K: Don't use that word. I used that yesterday. Skip that word.

S: I gain knowledge.

K: What do you mean by gaining knowledge?

S: You become intelligent.

K: You become intelligent by gaining knowledge?

S: You come to know something new.

K: You come to know something new in your life. Now, what is that new thing you have learnt? New language? What do you mean by learning?

S: Get information.

K: You are telling me something and I am asking you something else. I am asking you if I may, what do you mean by learning? The word.

S: To enquire.

K: You would consider learning enquiry? Quite right. Now how do I enquire?

S: Yes.

K: Quite right. Now how do you enquire? Listen first, old girl. What do you mean by enquiry?

S: By asking each other it leads to enquiry.

K: So you ask me and I ask you. Is that enquiry?

S: Acquire knowledge.

K: Acquire knowledge by enquiry.

S: We get information about what we don't know. You ask questions to gain knowledge and information.

K: About something you don't know. But I am not asking that old boy. I am asking you if I may most politely, what do you mean by that word? Not enquire about the ants, or enquire about your grandmother, but I am asking you what that word means.

S: Like to know something which you don't know.

K: All right. I see you are not getting it.

S: Acquire someone else's knowledge.

S: To go into something.

K: That is right. Now, to enquire into why Madanapalle is so dirty. Right? That would be enquiry, wouldn't it? Do you enquire why you control? Do you enquire why you get angry? Why you are restless? Or say I am restless, tell me how to control myself? You understand the meaning now, I am asking. If you enquire, you begin to see the implications or the content, the significance of what it is to control. Right? Am I making this clear?

S: As I see, there is no learning when we control ourselves.

K: Have you asked who is the controller? I say I must control myself. But who is it says that I must control myself?

S: I am the person who is trying to control myself.

K: Who is yourself?

S: My mind.

K: Don't move to another series. Who is it who controls?

S: It is the brain.

K: No, you people haven't thought about it, don't play with words.

S: One part of our mind which thinks that whatever I am doing is not right tries to control.

K: Right. Which is that part of the mind, brain?

S: Conscience.

S: Our conscience is trying to control what we do.

K: What do you mean by the word conscience?

S: Part of our mind which is conscious of what we are doing while why we are doing deals with whether it is right or not.

K: How do you deal with this kind of topic? You are just repeating something. Now let us move from that. We said discipline. Right? Do you discipline yourself or all of you are in that big building, students, do you control yourselves there? Do you discipline yourselves to get up at exactly 6 o'clock in the morning, bathe, exercise, all the rest of it. Do you control, do you discipline yourselves or somebody tells you, you must get up at 6 o'clock. Sirs, answer that question? Come on, sirs, answer that question.

S: After some time, it becomes a matter of course.

K: Yes sir, it is a matter of course, but I am asking you are you disciplining yourself?

S: We discipline ourselves to a certain extent, and afterwards we try to discipline ourselves more and more to meet the situation.

K: I asked a question, sir, and you have not understood my question. Do you discipline yourself, learn about yourself? I explained the meaning of the word discipline. The word means to learn, not to control, to learn about yourself. Right? Right sir? That means to learn. Now do you learn why you should get up at 6 o'clock in the morning?

S: No.

K: No. So, somebody then disciplines you. He says you must get up at 6 o'clock in the morning and you think you are free human beings so you get angry, you resist. Right? Now, are you learning about it, learning which brings about discipline, are you studying it?

S: Learning entails discipline, doesn't it?

K: That's what I am saying. You don't have to discipline yourself. If I am learning, that very learning is bringing about a discipline. Do you understand? Are you doing that?

S: Sir, before I answer your question, I want to clarify myself about what is learning itself.

K: What is learning? Go on. I teach you Sanskrit, right? Or I teach you Hindi or English. What does that mean?

S: You are giving me something which you know and I don't know.

K: So if you don't know and I know, then you listen to me, right? Do you listen to me? Not to me, to the teacher who is teaching you mathematics, do you listen? Or you casually listen but your attention is on that, so how can you listen if you are partly looking out of the window and partly listening to what is being said? You cannot learn, can you? That is where conflict arises. Doesn't it? The teacher tells you, please pay attention to what I am telling you, about mathematics, and you are looking out of the window watching that bird on the branch. So your attention is divided, isn't it? So you are not actually listening, right? So, when you learn to listen, what it means to listen. Will you learn about it? Now I will tell you what it is to listen. You listen to a story. Why?

S: Because it is interesting.

K: Because it is exciting, interesting, there is danger, there is amusement, there is thrill. All that excites you, and you listen. That means what? You only listen to something that is very exciting.

Right? And nothing that is not exciting.

S: Everything in its own way is interesting and exciting.

K: Yes, all right. That sounds very nice. But will you listen to something in your class. Will you listen in your class to something that you are not interested in, not exciting?

S: (Inaudible)

K: Have you ever tried listening? Are you listening to me now?

S: Yes sir.

K: You are not.

S: I am not.

K: Quite right sir. At last somebody is honest. But why aren't you? Is it not interesting, is it not exciting?

S: I am quite sure it is interesting. I don't know why I am not able to listen to you.

K: Quite right. Not to me, do you listen to anybody? To your father, to your mother, to your grandmother, to your teacher, do you listen?

S: Partially sir.

K: Partially. Like a partially cooked carrot. They don't listen partially. If you are listening partially, you are not listening at all. What do you say sirs?

S: We only do half of what our parents say and the other half we leave it alone. (Laughter)

K: All right. But if a very attentive parent watches you, you will have to do the whole thing, won't you? You can't dodge your parent who is watching you all the time. So you hope sometimes he won't be looking at you. You do something else. Don't you?

S: We seem to obey and not to listen.

K: I give up!

S: Sir, what exactly is stopping us from listening?

K: First of all, sir, do you ever listen to anybody? Just answer that question. Right? You don't. Why? Just ask that question, find out the answer. Why don't you listen to somebody completely. All of you. Why don't you listen?

S: Because our attention is divided.

K: Why is your attention divided? Are you ever attentive completely? About anything? Or you are always partially attentive, partially awake, and the rest of the day partially awake and partially asleep.

S: Sometimes...

K: Are you awake now?

S: (Inaudible)

K: Now what does that mean?

S: Partially awake.

K: What do you mean by partially awake, partially asleep?

S: I mean we only listen to half of what others say, the other half... K:...you don't listen. Why?

S: You don't receive it.

K: Why don't you receive it?

S: You cannot listen because you are in no mood to listen. You are half asleep.

K: You are in no mood to listen. You are half asleep. Why?

S: Because you have not had enough sleep. (Laughter)

K: That is a very good answer. Why haven't you had enough sleep?

S: You may have lots of worries.

K: You may have lots of worries?

S: Sometimes.

K: Do you sleep all night and feel rested next morning?

S: Yes.

K: Yes sir. Then can you listen when you are completely rested?

S: Yes sir.

K: Are you rested now. Now sit up here. At last I have a victim.
(Laughter) Are you completely awake now?

S: Yes.

K: So, will you listen to what I am saying? I am saying, discipline means to learn. Learn how to drive a car. Learn how to speak properly, how to walk properly, how to eat correctly, what you eat and so on. Right? That means you are learning how to walk properly. Does anybody teach you how to walk properly?

S: No.

K: Therefore how will you find out?

S: When you are a child.

K: No, answer my question. You don't know how to walk properly. Most people don't. How will you learn about it?

S: By looking at people.

K: That's right, by looking at people who know how to walk. Now when you look at people, will you give complete attention to it?

S: That is if you are interested in it.

K: I am asking you, old boy, to learn how to walk properly. It is nice, dignified. Now when you watch somebody walking properly, will you give your attention to that?

S: Yes sir.

K: Right. Will you give attention to eat correctly? Do it. Not say, yes sir, and not do it. Will you listen to your teacher who is teaching mathematics, completely? (No response) Because you are not interested in mathematics. Don't look at your teacher. Right. Are you listening to what I am saying now? Why?

S: I like it. It is interesting.

K: Which means what? Go into it.

S: It gives me more knowledge.

K: Go into it. Don't just stop there. You are interested, you want to learn, you like what I am saying and also what?

S: It is interesting.

K: Yes, you have said that.

S: It will help me a lot.

K: You are listening to me because, why?

S: Because you have more care for me.

K: Do you like me?

S: Yes.

K: When you like me, you listen.

S: Partially that way.

K: Partially that, partially you want to be helped, partially you want. So put it all together, will you listen to me? Now I am going to tell you what it means to learn. Most of us learn by accumulating a lot of knowledge. That's what you call learning. I learn mathematics. I learn geography. I learn how to walk. I learn how to speak properly. Which is I'm gathering a lot of information, stored up in the brain and then I use that to talk, to walk, to play and so on. This is one kind of learning. Is there another kind of learning?

S: Yes sir.

K: Don't answer yet.

S: There is.

K: What is it?

S: Learning through experience.

K: Which means what? Must you go through every kind of experience to learn?

S: No sir. We only go through the basic things, what is fundamental. Like you try to walk. Suppose I have not yet learned to walk. I fall once or twice, and suppose you have made a mistake in your step, you try to correct that. That is what is experience is.

K: All right, all right. Go on.

S: Suppose you are eating. You spill it on your dress.

K: So next time you don't. Most people learn through experience. The mathematics teacher, Mr Narayanan has learnt a great deal about mathematics. He is trying to tell you what he knows and you listen, put it in your brain and the brain says I have learnt mathematics up to a point. Which means what? You listen, you listen to his experience, to his knowledge, which becomes your knowledge. Right? And you call that learning. Agree to that? Then ask if there is another kind of learning which is not experience, not based on somebody else telling you. You understand what I am asking? Find out if there is another kind of learning.

S: By looking at things.

K: Looking at things. I have got two victims. You were here before, weren't you?

S: Yes.

K: I thought so. Now let us talk together. What did you say?

S: Sometimes I learn by looking at things.

K: Sometimes you learn by looking. Have you looked at a row of ants? Have you looked at it?

S: Sometimes I have.

K: No, don't say sometimes.

S: I have looked at the trees.

K: You have looked at trees. When you look at a tree, what are you looking at?

S: I look at it.

K: You look at it. You call that tamarind tree. Now look at it without the word. You understand what I am saying?

S: Yes.

K: Instead of saying that is a tamarind tree, and look and walk away. But if you don't use the words, will you look more closely?

S: Yes, so that I can know it.

K: No, you are going off to something else. I am asking you will you look at something without naming it? You have got a brother? No? You have got a sister? Will you look at her without calling her sister, having the image of a sister?

S: Yes.

K: Then do it.

S: I have done it.

K: You have done it. What happens there?

S: I seem to like her even more.

K: You seem to like her even more. Before, you did not like her?

S: No, I used to like her even before.

K: (Laughs) So, by not naming a thing, what happens? Don't answer, look at it carefully. Look at the yellow flowers. Don't name them. Just look at them. Right?

S: Yes.

K: Then what happens?

S: We come to know about it.

K: No.

S: You don't exactly think.

K: Did you hear what I said? You don't have to make a face. Look at something, look at your father, sister, your mother, without the word - right? - without the image you have about the father, just look at him. Look at me without the word, the name, without all that you have heard about me. Look at me that way, can you?

S: Yes sir.

K: Look. Then what happens?

S: All of a sudden, I get the name in the mind.

K: It is a serious thing I am asking, extraordinarily serious. If you learn this, it will alter your whole looking at things, you understand? S: Yes.

S: I look at the same thing.

K: No, I am asking you to look at the new moon which is going to come up today probably. Look at it, a very, very thin slice. Isn't it? Look at it without using the word, the moon, the new moon. Just look at it.

S: Perhaps I will be able to appreciate the moon more if I just look at it without naming it.

K: Yes. You are able to appreciate it more. You are able to see it much more clearly. Now will you do that with your father, mother and sister, with your teacher?

S: I can.

K: You can. Have you done it?

S: No.

K: Will you do? That is learning. You understand? Learning to look at somebody without the word, without the picture you have about him.

S: It is not quite easy sir, because the moment you learn, you memorize, you recollect.

K: That's right. I am your teacher. I scold you. All right? I scold you. You know what that means? You know what scolding is?

S: You shout at me.

K: Yes, if you know, then you have a picture of me scolding you. Don't you? Each time we meet, you have that picture. Right? So look at me without that picture, without that memory. Then what happens when you look at your teacher who has scolded you, and you do not bring that picture forward as the man who has scolded you? See what happens between you and the teacher.

S: Relationship becomes better because you can understand better.

K: You look much more closely, you look much more, you see what he is actually.

S: Yes.

K: So will you learn that, do that, not just one day, do it always, do that all your life.

S: I see that. I try to do that. I can't.

K: Don't try. Just do it. You understand? Look, do you know how to ride a bicycle? First two or three days, somebody helps you, after that you do it yourself. Now this morning I tried to help you to ride the bicycle. Right? Afterwards you have learnt. You don't say I will try and do it. S: As far as I am concerned, I can do it for just a moment, but after that the whole pattern of my old thinking comes up.

K: But isn't it important to learn how to look without the word? You may do it for a minute but it comes back. Isn't it important to learn something new? Then that something new is far more important than merely repeating the old thing. Then the important takes precedence over the old. Am I using big words?

S: Sir, friendship increases.

K: The friendship increases. Right. If you remember that I have scolded you and you forget it, we are greater friends. Isn't that so? Will you do it?

S: Our relationship is different.

K: That's right. If you do it, your teacher will also do it. You understand?

S: You must look at your teacher for many other purposes without the word. K: Why?

S: You try much more as to what he is saying, or what he wants.

K: That is right. Will you do it?

S: If I did it...

K: Not 'if'. You see the difference? You say, if I did it, I will try, I must do it, then you are not doing it. But if you say, yes, I see the importance of that, I am doing it. You see the difference?

S: Sir, in that case, if I look at him without the word...

K: You understand what it means 'without the word'?

S: Yes sir, you look at him as he was and not what he had done to you earlier and what you think he will do.

K: That's quite right. So, what happens then? Your relationship with the other is much more direct, isn't it? Will you learn that?

S: I am not very sure if I can do that. I will try. (Laughter)

S: But when you try not to, you are remembering it.

K: Of course, of course. So you go and try and do it. Not try, do it. S: Then you are looking and acting.

K: That's right. Looking and acting. That's right, looking is acting. Have we learnt something this morning? Have you? Will you do it?

S: Yes.

K: Good.

K: (To another student) Will you?

S: Yes.

K: Good. Don't say yes sir, and not do it. Then you become a hypocrite if you say I have understood it and not do it. Shall we sit quietly for a minute?

RISHI VALLEY 3RD TALK WITH STUDENTS 16TH DECEMBER 1982

Krishnamurti: What shall we talk about?

Student: Could we continue from where we left off last time?

K: Where did we leave off?

S: The deconditioning of the brain.

K: Are you really interested in it or you just want to talk about it, just for the fun of it? All right sir, let us talk about it, shall we? You know what the brain is. Most of you must have in your biological study, you must have been told what the brain is. Apparently the brain is the most important part of the body; the heart and the liver are the most important organs of the body. You know what these three functions are. But the brain is an extraordinary instrument. It is now limited. It now only functions - we only use a very, very small part of the brain. We do not use all of the brain, and our brain has evolved from the ape till we are so-called well educated sophisticated human beings. Is that clear? Right?

S: Has the brain really evolved from the ape?

K: That is what the scientists say. You can accept that or you can accept what the Fundamentalists in the Christian world say, that man was created 4500 years ago by god. You can accept that or the scientific theory, or you can invent your own. But if you invent your own, you have to be very careful that it can stand logical investigation. Otherwise you can say my brain is the most important, you know, some kind of fancy, romantic thing we can make out of it. But from what the scientists, biologists and the archaeologists have said, man has evolved as he is now standing on two feet about 40,000 years ago, and our brain has evolved for a much longer period. That is a fact. That is what the scientists say. I rather think they are right. For myself I think that man evolved from the ape. My grandfather was not quite the ape, probably his great-grandfather was. And this brain has evolved, grown, matured, has learned a great deal, has had immense experience, and that is again a fact.

And during all these forty centuries he has always been afraid, afraid of the physical world, living in the forests - the tigers and so on, physical danger, and also there were the psychological dangers, the inward dangers, of which there is fear, pleasure, pain, sorrow, anxiety, loneliness and so on. We are all educated. I don't quite know what it means. Here you are all being educated to become what? Greater monkeys? Glorified clerks, glorified bureaucrats? So you are being educated to become something, to earn a livelihood, to marry, to have a house, and to have a job, to maintain your family and so on. So you go to the office or to the factory or, if you are interested, in carpentry, for the rest of your life from 9 o'clock to 5 o'clock, go to the office day after day, month after month, year after year, till you die. That is your life. Right? Would you agree to that? You may have a weekend holiday or a month's holiday, but the next moment you get a job for the next fifty years or more, you will become a slave to your job. Right? That is what you are all going to do. Unfortunately. Right? Agree to that? Would you agree to this? So, like a computer - you know what a computer is. Do you know? A computer is an electronic machine which is programmed. You know what a programme is? A professor talks to it, programmes it, as it is called, so that the computer knows what the professor knows. It is put on a tape or whatever they do, and it can repeat what the professor told the machine about mathematics.

That is what a computer is. And they are trying to build a computer which will be almost like the human brain. Already they have computers that can invent. You understand all this? The mother computer may be very good but the next generation computer is still better than the mother and so on and so on. They are working at it furiously to bring about a computer which has ultra mechanical intelligence. Right? You understand all this? Ultra mechanical intelligence which can think much more rapidly than human beings, calculate much faster than human beings, in a second what a human brain may take a couple of months and so on. So the computer is programmed. Is that clear? You are also programmed. You have been programmed for the last 5,000 years as a Hindu. You have been programmed as a Muslim within the last 1400 years. Mohammed was 600 A.D., therefore about 1400. And the Buddhist for the last 2500 years, he has been programmed to be a Buddhist. You understand? So you are all programmed. You are all functioning mechanically. Right? When you study engineering, which requires mathematics and so on, your study is programming you to become an engineer. Right? Do you see this? So your brain is programmed to think that you are a Hindu or an Arab or a Jew or a Catholic. So your brain is mechanical. The computer is then a far better instrument. But of course there is a great deal of difference between a machine and the brain. Now what makes the brain deteriorate? That is what your question is. Right? Are you interested in all this?

S: You have made a statement just before this that a computer is better than the brain.

K: I said they are trying to make a computer equal or better than the brain. They are trying to manufacture it. I did not say they did. The Japanese and the American IBM and other companies are pouring millions of dollars and so on to discover or to invent or to bring about a computer that has the quality of the brain. They may succeed or they may not succeed. Right? But the fact remains that our brain is programmed. When you say, I am a BA, you are programmed. When you say, I am in the Indian Administrative Service, you are being programmed.

Now, the question was, if I can repeat it rightly, what are the factors that bring about the deterioration of the brain? And can these factors be stopped so that the brain can continue till it is worn out by long age? What will keep the brain young, fresh? Right? Now let us first find out what are the factors that bring about deterioration of the brain. Right? What do you think of the factors?

S: Memory.

K: The gentleman says one of the factors that make the brain deteriorate is memory. Without memory what would you be? What would you do if you had no memory at all?

S: I would be a robot.

K: No, a robot is pretty intelligent. (Laughter)

S: You will repeat over and over again.

K: That's right. Now, go on. What will happen to you if you have no memory at all?

S: You destroy yourself.

K: No, what happens to you? You would be in a state of no memory.

S: You won't know anything. You won't know what is happening.

K: You won't know what is happening. You won't feel anything. You will just be a blank wall. Probably you would eat - the body has its own function. Right? Its own intelligence. So you would carry on, but no thought, no feeling. You know, I saw in America, when I was there last year or this year, a Japanese factory. You know the Honda car. They were manufacturing a Honda car. All the workmen were in white aprons and white gloves and there was a computer and a robot. You know what a robot is? The computer was telling the robot what to do and the robot was building the Honda car. When the robot made a mistake, the computer stopped the robot, told him what to do, and how to bolt or screw the nut properly, and went after it, kept this going. And the workmen, Japanese workmen, with white gloves wandered around looking at the thing. Right? So our brain without memory would be like a vegetable, a non-active, unaware, blind body. So is that one of the factors of deterioration?

S: (Inaudible)

K: That's right sir. I said that. So is that one of the reasons why the brain deteriorates?

S: It is not that we don't have memory, our memory is deteriorating. Probably that is the cause of it.

K: Yes sir. All right. So is that one of the factors, one of the causes why the brain deteriorates?

S: I don't think so.

K: You don't think so. Quite right, neither do I. So find out what are the other causes.

S: Due to memory, in our brain arise various contradictions, and I would say that the contradictions which arise in our brain are the causes for the deterioration of the brain.

K: Are you saying...

Narayan: He says contradictions that arise are partly due to memory. That's why the brain deteriorates.

K: Now, wait. What are contradictions? What do you call contradictions? Sir, don't go to sleep.

S: I am not sleeping.

K: I don't know, but you are keeping quiet. I don't know whether you are asleep or awake. So, if I may point out, this gentleman says one of the factors of deterioration of the brain is the contradiction. What do you mean by contradiction?

S: When you have two opposite thoughts.

K: When you have two opposing thoughts. Now, is that one of the causes of deterioration, contradiction? Contradiction means also, say one thing and do something else, think one thing and act quite the opposite of what you think. Right? What does that indicate? I say one thing and do quite the opposite. I think one thing and act totally differently from what I think. S: That means you don't have the strength to follow up your thought.

K: No, no. I am not asking strength. See what happens when there is contradiction in you. What happens?

S: You are thrown off balance.

K: No. Don't use these words. Just look at it carefully. What happens? Look at yourself. When you say one thing and do another, do something totally different.

S: I can't trust myself.

K: You can't trust yourself. Quite right. And those grown up people there. There is a boy who says you cannot trust yourself. What does that mean?

S: You become a hypocrite.

K: That's right. You become a hypocrite. You cannot trust yourself. What next?

S: You don't think, you just act.

K: You don't think but you act. I want you to move around. Go on.

S: You become like a computer. You are not thinking what you are doing. K: The computer thinks old boy.

S: It is programmed.

K: So are you. When you say I am a BA, or MA, you are being programmed. When you say I am a Hindu, I am a Muslim, I am a Christian, these statements indicate that you have been programmed. So what? Go on. You haven't touched the root of it. Please go on. Look. I say, I must love, and I hate. Right? I must be generous but I am not generous. What does that indicate - not indicate - what is the result of that? As that boy pointed out, I am a hypocrite.

S: Conflict.

K: That's right. At last. It took a long time. Now one of the causes, perhaps the major causes of the deterioration of the brain is conflict. Would you agree to all that? Yes sir?

S: Yes sir. I agree that it is perhaps one of the causes.

K: I said one. I said it may be the major. I am very careful in my usage of words. I said either one, or the major cause of deterioration is conflict. Right? Are you in conflict? Are you in conflict, any of you? S: Almost all the time you think of doing something but you do something else.

K: Yes. She is going to tell me.

S: I am always thinking something and doing something else.

K: Yes, but what is the result.

S: I get very upset when I do that.

K: You are in conflict, aren't you?

S: Yes.

K: Now we are asking, is that one of the factors of deterioration? Like an engine, internal combustion machine, when it is well-oiled, smoothly running, it can go on indefinitely, but when there is a friction then it begins to wear itself out. Agree? So where there is conflict there is great friction in the brain and so one of the reasons for the deterioration of the brain is conflict, friction, strain. Right? Agree to this? Are you all under strain, friction, conflict? Of course, you are.

S: Yes.

K: No, no.

S: Yes.

K: You are in conflict at your age? You are enjoying yourself, you are not in conflict, old boy! Only those so-called educated big people don't enjoy, don't look at the sky, they are not curious, they don't look at a trail of ants going on the road.

S: At that moment you are not.

K: At the moment you are not, but I am saying, are you in conflict?

S: Sometimes.

K: Sometimes, when? When are you in conflict?

S: When I am angry.

K: When you are angry. Go on. Good.

S: When I want to slap someone.

K: When you want to slap someone. (Laughter) You come over here. Come on. So, when you get angry, when you want to slap someone, when you can't pass your examinations.

S: Yes.

K: When the teacher scolds you. I hope he doesn't. Does he scold you? S: No.

K: No. I am delighted. So when somebody scolds you, when you get angry, when you want to slap somebody, go on, what are the reasons which bring about conflict, struggle?

S: When you want revenge.

K: When you want revenge. Go on. You only think along that line, think along another line.

S: If you are not able to think logically and reason out, you will be in conflict.

K: He says if you don't think logically, you are in conflict. Even if you think logically, you may be in conflict. I may think very logically, I must not be greedy, I must not be angry, but I am angry. So there is conflict even though I think logically. Right?

S: What brings you in conflict?

K: I am asking what brings about conflict. You are asking. Right. They said just now contradiction; that is, saying one thing, doing another. Clear? That brings conflict, one of the causes. So, as I said, a machine well-oiled, perfectly balanced, good material, well-oiled, looked after, that machine can go on for years and years and years. And the human brain is also a machine. So when it is in conflict, it is like putting sand into a machine, then it can't run properly. You understand? Right? So if you are in conflict, one of the reasons of deterioration of the brain is conflict. Right sir? Are you?

S: Am I in conflict?

K: Yes. So your brain is deteriorating.

S: Yes.

K: I am glad you acknowledge that. You may get an MA, BA, or BA, MA, I don't know why, but there it is. And what is the point of it when you are in conflict and your brain is deteriorating. What are you doing?

S: Destroying ourselves.

K: Why do you want to destroy yourselves?

S: I don't want to.

K: Then why don't you stop being in conflict?

S: How do I stop it?

K: I understand. You have asked a question: how do I put an end to conflict? When you ask how, what does that mean? Look. Think it out carefully. You think out carefully, when he says how, what does that word mean?

S: I want a method.

K: Sir, I am not asking, just listen to me first. When you use the word 'how', what does that word mean?

S: You want a method.

K: Stop there. What do you mean by a method?

S: A solution.

K: No, method.

S: The way to do it.

K: Now, the way to do it, follow it up, what does it mean? Go on. Think clearly.

S: We want help.

K: Help. From who?

S: From his brain.

K: When you say how, it means a system. How am I to climb the mountain? Right? Then if you say, how am I to climb Everest, first you must have a certain kind of shoes and so on and so on. That means you want a system, a method, a plan according to which you act. Right sirs?

S: Right.

K: Now, what does that do?

S: (Inaudible)

K: No, listen to what I am saying. What does a system do to our brain? S: You try again and again.

K: Which is ugly. Isn't it? When you repeat over and over again, the brain is mechanical.

S: If you try one system, you get into another system.

K: That's it. You haven't understood what I am saying. Please listen first. When I follow a system, a method, and I repeat it over and over again, am I not? Which means what? That I am becoming more and more mechanical.

S: You are deteriorating again.

K: That's right. When the brain becomes more and more mechanical, it is again deteriorating. So, conflict, a mechanical way of living, saying, I am a Hindu, I am a Hindu, I am a Hindu or I am an Arab, Jew - you follow?-any repetitive verbal statement or repetitive action is another factor of deterioration in the brain.

Right?

S: What does that mean?

K: No. Do you understand that? Proceed.

S: It is inevitable.

K: It is inevitable if you are mechanical, if there is conflict in your life. Right?

S: Does that mean there is another solution?

K: Not another solution. Stop being mechanical, then you are out of it. Then find out if you can live without conflict. If you do, then you are out of it. Your brain is not deteriorating. You understand this? Now what will you do to find out if you can live without conflict?

S: I can stop being in conflict whenever I can.

K: No. Find out what are the causes of conflict. You understand? Suppose I have got tummy ache because I eat the wrong food. So if I stop eating the wrong food, then I have no tummy ache. Right?

S: Yes.

K: So I have to find out what are the causes of conflict and if I can remove the causes, conflict ends. And we say and one of the causes of the conflict is contradiction: saying one thing and doing another; believing in god and killing people: believing that you must be a great saint and being very worldly. So where there is contradiction, opposition, contrary statements, contrary ways of living, there must be conflict, which means there must be conflict where there is division. You understand this? So find out if your life is free of division. You understand what I am saying? When a man says he is an Arab and the other man says he is a Jew or a Muslim or a Hindu, Buddhist, there is conflict between them. When I say I am a nationalist, I am opposed to the nationalists of other countries. So don't be a nationalist. You understand this? Or the nonsense about the flags is nonsense. Agree?

S: Yes.

K: Will you live that way?

S: I hope so.

K: Not 'hope so'. You have to do it. If you want your brain to be extraordinarily alive, fresh, you have to do that. Right sirs? Will you do it after your examination, not before your examination! Will you end your conflicts? Otherwise your brain deteriorates.

S: Will competition bring about deterioration?

K: Yes sir. No, the constant repetition, to repeat over and over again I am a Jew, I am an Arab, I am a Hindu, this and that, just like a gramophone record playing the same tune over and over again, that is wearing out the brain.

S: Competitions. I feel nervous before an examination just because I may come last.

K: That's right. So, unfortunately examinations apparently are necessary. Either you have examinations at the end of your school career - right?-and so no examination until you leave - which would be marvellous. I am in the eighth class, the teacher looks up sees that I am studying properly. If he knows that I am studying properly, why should I have examinations? You follow? So I may have to have examinations when I leave school but a long way ahead. That's another matter. Have you understood this? That is, where there is conflict of any kind, the brain deteriorates.

S: Sir, the whole world is full of conflict.

K: You don't have to make a mountain out of it.

S: I mean, everywhere there is conflict.

K: I know. Everywhere you see it, I agree. Your father, your mother are in conflict. The society is in conflict. The government is in conflict. The priest is in conflict. He wants more money and all the rest of it. So practically every human being is in conflict.

Right? So find out if you can live without conflict. That requires a great deal of intelligence. S: I get very scared when I see this conflict.

K: Yes. When she sees the conflict, she says she is scared. If you are scared, that's another form of conflict, isn't it?

S: Yes.

K: So, one of the factors now we have found is conflict. Now what is the second factor?

S: When you do something without thinking.

K: When you do something without thinking, is that another factor of deterioration? That's what you are all doing. Agree?

S: Yes.

K: You don't think, you go on doing something. You don't think why you should become an engineer, why you should become a clerk, why you should join the navy or the army, or this or that. You don't think, you say, well, I like it, I'll go and do it.

S: If I don't do it, what can I do?

K: If you don't do it, what can you do? That's a good question. Why don't those chaps over there put any of these questions? If you don't do a thing, what can you do?

S: If you don't do anything, you can't live.

K: There you are, that's your answer.

S: Somehow they are trying to live.

K: Anyhow you are trying to live. Therefore, you live in conflict.

S: If you want to climb the Everest, you must wear heavy boots. If you don't wear heavy boots and try to climb, you will die.

K: Of course, so I am asking old girl: what is another factor of deterioration of the brain. We said conflict. What is the other factor? S: (Inaudible)

K: Yes. Look sir, are you sure society is deteriorating?

S: (Inaudible)

K: Do you know it, or logically, verbally have studied it?

S: No, I can see it.

K: Go on. I am glad you are all waking up. Tell me about the other factor of deterioration.

S: It is the condition of the brain. As the brain is programmed, that's why it is deteriorating.

K: Have you all understood that? As my brain is programmed to be a Muslim, to be a Hindu, to become a BA or to be a doctor and so on, the very programming is another factor of deterioration. Would you agree to that? See, that means you are completely deteriorating, because you are all programmed. You are half living? Aren't you?

S: The brain depends on experience and we are being programmed since we are born, so what do we do?

K: I am being programmed from the moment I am born: my grandmother, my mother, my father, my people around me say, you must, you must not. You are this, you are that. Right? You are being programmed.

S: From the origin of mankind.

K: Yes sir. I said that, old boy. I said at the beginning.

S: If you want to decondition, can you negate the whole past?

K: All right. I have got your question. Are you saying: I have been programmed for 40,000 years and as long as I am living in the world of programmes, the brain must deteriorate? Now, can't you get out of it? It's too serious a question to go into because it requires a great deal of enquiry, questioning, asking, pushing.

S: Is there another form of deconditioning?

K: Yes, I understand. You are unconditioned from one form and fall into another form.

S: Deteriorating.

K: Of course, that is what we said.

S: Sir, then how did the mind evolve? Why is it only now the mind is beginning to destroy itself?

K: Probably sir, the moment it has accumulated knowledge through experience, that very beginning is the deteriorating factor. I won't discuss this because it is much too complicated.

S: If you are programmed, are you just like a computer?

K: Nearly. I said nearly.

K: Is that enough for now?

S: I think we should go on.

K: Who should go on? I should go on or you should go on? You see, that's what you are all used to: somebody else tells you what to do.

S: I didn't say you. I said we.

K: Then why don't you go on? (Laughter)

S: How can a computer be programmed?

K: I told you.

S: How can a carpenter be programmed?

K: Carpenter? (Laughter). Have you worked on a piece of wood? Have you done anything with your hands? What have you done?

S: Some pottery we have done.

K: You have done pottery. What else?

S: We have communicated.

K: Yes. What else have you done with your hands? Carpentry and what else? S: Painting.

K: Good. Tell me more.

S: Writing. Leather work.

K: Have you done any gardening?

S: Yes sir.

K: Dug in the earth?

S: Yes sir, gardening.

K: Have you milked a cow?

S: No sir.

K: Have any of you milked a cow?

S: Yes.

K: For how long?

S: Have you sir?

K: Have I milked a cow? Yes. (Laughter) I milked a cow in California for about six months every morning and evening. There were others who were doing it too but I was doing it till I got what they call cow fever which made all my face swell. So I stopped. I did gardening, painted walls, helped to build a house.

S: When you milked a cow, did you do it when you wanted milk?

S: When you milked the cow, were you afraid of the cow fever.

K: No. I got it. After I got it, I stopped milking the cow. I don't know what you are talking about.

S: He is saying, did you milk the cow for drinking the milk yourself or for others?

K: No, we all drank the milk. And I also played tennis. I played golf. Do you know what golf is? I was very good at it.

S: How does the human brain get programmed?

K: When you repeat you are a Muslim, you are programmed.

S: What makes you repeat it?

K: What makes you. Because your mother has told you, your father has told you, your grandmother told you that you are a Muslim.

S: So you have to repeat it.

K: Yes, that's all.

S: Educating is like programming, isn't it sir?

K: Yes sir, you are being educated to be glorified monkeys.

S: Then why do they educate us?

K: Ask them. Ask him, and he will inevitably say to earn money. And that is what everybody is doing.

So I think it is time to stop, it's half past ten. That fellow wants me to go on, but he won't go on. That's enough, or are you escaping from your classes? We can sit here and have some fun. Is that what you want to do? That's enough. Let's sit quietly for a minute. Sit properly. Close your eyes. Let's sit very quietly. Watch yourself, what are you thinking about, will you?

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC TALK 11TH JULY 1982

There are two entertainments going on near here - the tennis and the circus! This is not an entertainment, either politically or religiously, or any kind of stimulation. And so we have to together consider what is happening in the world and our relationship to it and our action in that relationship. So please bear in mind during all these talks, if one may over and over again point out, this is not an entertainment of any kind.

And also one would like to point out we are together going to examine, investigate, criticize, be sceptical, question, never accepting anything the speaker says, but what he says must be examined, questioned, investigated, so that he doesn't become an authority of any kind. To merely quote him is pointless, or to allow yourself to become a follower of the speaker, which again would be utterly meaningless. So please, if I may point out most seriously, the person is not important. The person, K, is not at all important. What is important is that we together, the speaker means together, investigate, examine, be very critical, exercising your own capacity to observe, to doubt, to question, so that we understand the same thing together, not that you are understanding the speaker but we are together understanding what has happened to man - not according to the speaker, not according to what he says, not accepting his perception, his values, his investigation, but rather together, you and the speaker exercising our capacity to think clearly, to observe clearly, not according to the speaker but to observe what is happening in the world, and our relationship to the world and to understand not merely ideologically or verbally what has happened to man after these twenty five thousand years, or fifty thousand years, or a million years. What has happened to us? This is really a very important question to ask.

We have evolved through a million years. If you do not accept a million years, at least twenty five thousand years, we have evolved, grown through time, accumulating a lot of experience, knowledge, and what has happened to us as human beings? What has happened to man after all these centuries upon centuries? Please together we are investigating, you are not looking at the picture I am drawing. Because that is the only problem in the world now: either we are going to destroy ourselves through hatred, through antagonism, through brutality, nationalism and so on, or question, not only the political world, the religious world, the world of entertainment, the world of philosophy, the world of morality and discover for ourselves why we are what we are. We have become violent, brutal, savage, fighting each other in the name of peace, in the name of our country, in the name of honour, hating each other, there is the economic war, the religious war, the actual physical war. We are producing armaments, the industrial countries - as one heard the other day one country is producing so much that they are exporting 80 per cent of their armaments and 20 per cent keeping for their own defence. The investigator asked, "What happens to the 80 per cent?" They said, "We don't care as long as it goes out." So that the so-called enemy buys your armaments which you have produced, and then kills you, which you have produced. This is actually happening. That is man.

So one asks oneself why we have become like this, perpetual conflict, both inward and outward, politically, religiously, economically and in our relationships with each other, the people who hate and do all kinds of mischievous things, the religious leader talking everlastingly about peace. And there is no peace on earth, there is no justice on earth, but only war, killing each other by word, by a phrase, by an idea, conflict between ideologies. I am sure we know all this. The East and the West, the Totalitarians and the so-called Democratic, but when you observe dispassionately, without any bias, the national patriotic spirit dividing people, killing each other. This is what man after millenia upon millenia has become. That is, through evolution he has become what he is now, through various cultures, through great technology, marvellous architecture, great paintings, music but inwardly he is more or less the same as he has been for millenia. That is a fact. It is not a statement by the speaker which you have to accept. It is an obvious daily observable, dispassionate fact. If time has brought us to this level, to this condition, and we proceed to depend on time, evolution, we will continue the same pattern of hate, of wars, of destroying each others, hatred, wanting to be violent, terror and all the rest of it. This has been going on historically, psychologically, for the last ten thousand, or fifty thousand years, this tribalism. So we must first observe this, then discover for ourselves, see the fact that evolution, which is time, has brought us to this state - right? Time has brought us to this state. And if we proceed along the same way as we are doing now, that is accepting evolution, we will continue the same pattern. We must be clear on this subject.

Tradition, which is the past, tradition of war, tradition of nationalism, the tradition of isolation, isolated communities, which are all forms of tribalism, savagery, including that tribalism, and this is our tradition. Each country must look after itself at the expense of other countries. Patriotism is extolled, praised, called a new spirit, and there is internationalism, which is absurd if you look at it. How can isolated countries have any relationship internationally? They are isolated. They look at the world from their isolated point of view. These are all everyday actual facts.

So one asks, and I hope you are asking this yourself, if we go along this pattern, this tradition, modern or ancient, we will perpetuate wars, nationalism, isolation. If that is very clear that we will inevitably follow the same pattern if we accept that we are going to bring about a psychological transformation through time - you understand all this? We shall go into what we mean by time - if we accept the psychological change, the self-centred activity which can be transformed through time, it is a fallacy, it is an illusion. Don't accept what the speaker is saying. That is, he is saying we have accepted this tradition of tribalism, isolation, nationally, economically and religiously, and if we pursue that same direction, the same path, we shall be as we are now in spite of time. You understand this? Is this clear between us?

So what shall we do? That is the real problem. There is no other problem, economic, war, all the horrors that are going on in the world, this is the central problem. The central problem, which is man has become like this through evolution, through time, broken, violent, terror, always ready to kill another at the drop of a hat, hating others, antagonism, which is perpetual conflict in himself and in the world. We have lived like that, religiously, economically, politically, psychologically, inwardly. We have lived like this for fifty thousand years. Nobody enquires into that, why we live like this, why we are willing to kill another in the name of god, in the name of ideologies, in the name of patriotism and so on and so on. We are no better than we were fifty thousand years ago, only we are more civilized, we have better bathrooms, better means of killing others, better literature, music. Those are all peripheral activities, forms of entertainment, but inwardly in our depths, in our hearts, in our minds, we remain what we have been through evolution, through time and we have not fundamentally changed. That is a fact, isn't it? We have peripheral advantages, better communication, better hygiene, better doctors and so on, medicine. That is the peripheral activity. But at the centre, deep down in ourselves we are actually what we are, have been, after these long centuries of evolution. Is this clear? You are not accepting what the speaker says?

First see the tragedy of it all: we are highly intellectual, or tremendously emotional, romantic, worshipping images, which the tribes do, only we worship in a more pleasant place, better architecture, but it is the same spirit. And outwardly this is the state. Inwardly in our consciousness, in our way of thinking, which is isolating, each one of us thinks that he is separate from another. Outwardly we have produced a world that is isolating itself, each group, each community, each religion, each country. And in this isolation they are seeking security. Which is what is happening - the Britisher says we must be secure in our isolation, and other countries are doing exactly the same thing. That is, they feel in isolating themselves by a name - British, German, French, American, Russia - enclosing themselves with a certain frontier, which is the isolating process, they feel they are secure. Of course.

And inwardly we are doing exactly the same thing. Each one of us feels he is isolated, he is separate, divided from all others. He has encouraged this isolating process through religion - religions have said you are separate, you are a separate soul, that soul must be saved. In our education we are educated to be separate, to be isolated, seek your own success. And our own conditioning is along the lines of me, my centre, myself, my isolation and through that isolation I hope to find relationship. So there is this isolating process outwardly and inwardly which is bringing tremendous conflict. Please don't agree with me for god's sake. Look at each one of us - we have our own problems, our own desire to fulfil, to become, to be something, to be a great artist, to be a great painter, to be a great writer, to become something, which is me becoming in isolation - right? And you are doing exactly the same thing, to become something, in isolation, through your ambition, through your greed, through your drive of desire. And another is following exactly the same pattern.

So please look at it: we want to be secure outwardly and inwardly through isolation - right? That is a fact, an irrefutable fact. You mightn't like it but it is so. Each one is seeking his own salvation, his own happiness, his own isolating process of self-centred activity. So one questions whether there is any kind of radical change in isolation? You understand my question? Or we are looking at the whole thing, at this whole process, outward and inward, from a peripheral point of view - you understand? Are we looking at this vast movement of life, which includes all this, from only a superficial ideological, intellectual point of view, which is all peripheral, looking at the whole of life at the edges of it - you understand? You understand what the speaker has said? Am I looking, observing, criticizing from a very, very superficial - from the extreme edge of the psychological field and saying, "What shall I do about it?" - you understand? Please we must be clear on this. Am I in my investigation, examination without any bias, objectively, dispassionately, am I looking at all this, this isolating process, from extreme borders, the peripheral dimension, from there I am looking? And when I look that way I say, "What am I to do?" You understand? It is like looking at a player, tennis or golf, or an actor, and from there looking at life, from the stage. Are we doing that? Or do we enquire into much more deeper issues? Which is: is my consciousness - we will go into that - is my consciousness, my thinking, is it separate, my thinking, is it separate, isolated, is my consciousness only mine and not yours? You understand my question? Are you following all this?

We have accepted thought as individualistic. We have accepted through tradition, through education, through religious dogma, religious assertions, that our consciousness, our thinking, is our own. It is not yours. You have yours and I have mine. Is that so? Is that an actual irrevocable fact? Or it is an illusion? I am not saying one way or the other. We are examining, we are criticizing, we are sceptical, doubting, whether this is a fact, therefore we must always live in conflict. Or this isolating process of thought, with its consciousness, is mine and not yours? Or this whole way of thinking is illusory, is deceptive, is not a fact? This is not an intellectual entertainment. Please one must repeat this over and over again. Or you are not accepting what the speaker is saying. Then it becomes too silly altogether, to quote him, to say, "I am his follower. I have read his books" and all the rest of it, and just repeat, repeat, repeat. But if you see this fact that outwardly this isolating process is going on, economically, politically and religiously. And inwardly we think our thinking is individual, mine, my thinking separate from your thinking, my philosophy is different from your philosophy, what I have understood is different from what you have understood. My cravings, my longings, my desire, my relationship, my god, everything is mine. So we are asking is this a fact? Are we really, fundamentally isolated? British, French, German, Swiss, Italians, Americans - we are far away from Burma, Japan and India, so I won't mention those. It is the same pattern repeated all over the world. The tiniest hamlet in the world, the smallest group - they say "It is ours, mine. I am separate from you. My god is separate from your god".

So let us enquire into this. That is: we are enquiring, questioning, criticizing this tradition. You are not following the speaker. Don't at the end of it say, "Do we understand you?" You have to understand the problem, the issue yourself. There is no authority to help you to that. So please put away altogether this idea of following somebody, worshipping somebody, following somebody, but look at it. It is your life.

So this isolating process inwardly and outwardly has brought about great conflict. That is a fact. In our relationships, intimate or otherwise, outwardly we are in perpetual conflict. After a million years, or twenty five thousand years, there is something wrong in this. You understand? There is something radically amiss. So we are asking: is this an illusion or a reality? We are approaching it. We are not saying it is. We are approaching the central issue - right? Now how do you approach an issue? Crumbs it is hot!

How do you, if I may ask, you are asking yourself, I am putting it into words, how do you approach a problem, an issue, something that has to be resolved? How do you approach it? Because we are approaching the problem, the central issue. Which is: I have to repeat it again: is it a fact that we must always live in isolation, outwardly and inwardly? And this isolation though apparently it gives security will inevitably destroy, which is happening. And inwardly, psychologically we are isolating ourselves. We think our thinking is separate from your thinking. This is the issue. And the speaker is asking how you approach it, how you come to it? You understand? Please understand the word 'approach'. Approach means coming very near, coming into contact. How do you approach this issue? If you approach with a motive - this is important - then that motive directs your investigation. Right, do you see? If I say "I want to find out if this is a fact or an illusion, but I like to believe it is a fact." That is my motive. I have found comfort in that isolation and I approach the problem anchored to a prejudice, to a concept and my investigation then is directed by my concept, by my desire, by my fear and so on and so on. So I must be very clear in my mind how I approach this thing. Please take time, we have got six talks, if you can stand it. How do I look at this thing? How do I hear this whole movement, with all its complicated problems which are growing more and more? How do you look at it? How do you come to it? What is your approach? How close do you get to it? Or is it just an idea? You understand? It is just an idea that I must examine. Or I must examine, investigate, doubt every examination, every question, every conclusion, so that I come to it as though I was really deeply wanting to find a solution. You understand? I want to find out why human beings through so-called million years of education and so on have come to this point: to live perpetually in conflict. Is it isolation that is producing this, inwardly and outwardly? Or life then is inevitable, that is to live in conflict? You understand the question?

Now how do you come to it? You, not me. How do you look at it? How do you listen to the movement of it? The movement of war, the brutality, the appalling things that are happening in the world, technologically? Do you read it and brush it off? The wars, the insults, the Pacific, the South Atlantic, and the Eastern Mediterranean, just pass it off? Or do you say, "What has happened to man to become like this?" Right? So either you examine from the peripheral activity, or you enquire into the very consciousness of man. That is what we are going to do. Is my consciousness, my thinking, separate from yours? Consciousness being my belief, my faith, my experience, my ambition, my god, the philosophy which I have learnt from another, or that I have learnt about myself, my greed, my envy, my hatred, my psychological wounds, my pleasures, my sorrow, my pain, my utter loneliness, all that is my consciousness - right? Please be quite sure of this. That is my consciousness. Consciousness is its content, like a pot is useless, it has no meaning unless you put something into it. So my consciousness is all that: the battle, the conflict, the pleasure, the hurts, the wounds, wanting to hurt others, my arrogance, my sense of haughtiness, the wounds I have received all my life and from there I want to hurt others, and I hate others, that is all my consciousness. Right? Be quite sure of this, not because I tell you. I am only, the speaker is only voicing that which is so.

So this has been my tradition, through school, college, university, through my studies, through my longing, through my loneliness and so on, that is my consciousness. I go abroad to the Far East, or to the Near East, or the Far West, or near West, and I see human beings are exactly the same - right? They suffer, they are anxious, they are in conflict, miserable, unhappy, lonely, poverty - you understand? - their gods, their beliefs, their rituals, exactly, more or less, the same - right? So my consciousness is common to all mankind at the centre. At the periphery you are taller, fairer, I am darker, I am brown, I am a carpenter, you are a scientist, you are the Pope or you are the great man and so on and so on. All that, but inwardly it is the same content. Right? Is this so? Question it, enquire, put your guts into it, find out. Don't you suffer? Aren't you in conflict, lonely, seeking, longing for some comfort, somebody to look after you, to say you are doing marvellously, go on? In the East every human being is doing the same, they are crying over their son's death and you are crying here. So is my consciousness separate from that of yours? Peripherally, outside you are different, you are far more educated than I am, much cleverer, you have a good business sense and so on and so on and so on. But move away from that, you and that man in the Far East, Near East, or anywhere, you have the same problems. You want the solution of the peripheral problems - you understand? How to earn more money, how to have a better house - peripheral. And that has become far more important than the enquiry at the centre. And therefore you insist on being an individual. You get this? Insist that you are an individual because you are always thinking at the peripheral, at the outside, never going into the depth of the thing.

So if my consciousness with all its content is similar to yours - right? - whether you live in Switzerland or in America, or in India, or wherever you are, as a human being your consciousness has the same movement of conflict, of misery, so are you an individual? Are you separate from me? Or at the depths we are similar? The waters of a great river has ripples, on the top and we are concerned about the ripples, building a bank, this and that, controlling, but at the depths we are all the same water. Is that so, or not? You have to enquire, go into it, put yourself...

Evolution, which is the process of time, has been concerned at the peripheral level, at the outside level - better doctors, better health, keeping young, you follow? And inwardly the pot is boiling. It is not your pot or my pot. Right? Is this a fact, or just an idea? An intellectual concept which you accept? Please see the deep significance of this. If you and I, living in India, living in America, or Russia, our consciousness is the same as yours - right? - then where is there isolation? At the peripheral level yes because you are taller, shorter. So if that is so, that you are essentially, deeply, humanity, not Mr. Smith by himself, or Mr. Cragnolini by himself.

So if my consciousness is the common ground on which all human beings stand, then I am the entire humanity. That is logical, that is a fact. My thinking, which I have considered separate, mine, my thinking is common to all mankind. Thinking. You must be clear on this too. We said consciousness is similar. The variety, the outward appearances are different, the peripheral activity is different, but at the core we are all alike. Therefore I am humanity, not as an idea, an actual fact because I have worked at it, discovered it, it is mine - not mine, I have found it. You have to find it yourself, not accept what some other silly man says. The speaker may be totally wrong, trying to hypnotize you into something which is non-fact. You have to go into it, and find out. Then if I see that I am humanity then that means that I am the world and the world is me. Therefore I don't belong to any group, to any guru, to any religion, to no nationality. I have no religion, religion in the orthodox sense of that word. Are you like that? The moment you say, "My consciousness is the rest of mankind", you have dropped away the entire tradition of the past. Right?

So then, if you are the world and the world is you, and you are the whole of humanity in consciousness, not in your capacity as a carpenter, technician, or a musician or a surgeon, then what is your responsibility to the rest of mankind? You understand? I am mankind, I am the world, but what is my responsibility to the world? I don't say I am mankind, my consciousness is like yours, and just remain there. You follow? I wonder if you understand? May I go on? We have talked for an hour. May I go on? You are going on with yourself not with the speaker. How am I, seeing the truth of all this, not as an idea, a conclusion, as an ideological Utopian concept but as an actual fact, as factual as we are sitting in this hot tent, then what am I to do? What is my action, not in relationship to the world because I am the world? I don't know if you understand all this? What is my activity which will not be related to the peripheral activity - you understand? I must go on being a carpenter, I must go on being a surgeon, or a professor. I have to do it as long as I live in this terrible world. But inwardly, psychologically, which is far more important because the psyche always overcomes the outer - right? - when the Communists started out with their evolution they said no soldiers, equality - we were all excited at the time. And now look what is happening. I don't have to go into all that, you know it. So what is my activity, not in relationship to the world? Please understand this deeply. Activity in myself, in myself is the rest of mankind. I am asking what is the activity of my consciousness? You understand? Not in relationship with you, we will come to that a little later. What is my relationship to politics, to war - we will come to that later. But what is my activity when I understand I am the world, my consciousness with its content is like the rest of mankind - right? So where do I begin? You understand my question? Where do I begin? Out there? Or in there? In there I mean psychologically, not some kind of illusory inward, actually inward. So I enquire what am I to do? Is my thinking mine? Right? Or is thinking common? You understand? Thinking, not thinking about something: thinking about god, thinking about my achievement, the very act of thinking, is that individual, yours and mine? Separate? Oh, no, please go into it carefully.

Apparently thinking is common to all mankind - right? They think. They may find a lot of excuses for thinking but now tradition says it is individual thinking. Again is that so? Is your thinking separate from my thinking? You may want a better car. I may want a better shirt. But thinking is the same - right? Right? You are doubtful. Don't accept what I am saying. Is thinking separate from my thinking? Or thinking is common? Then if it is common, what is thinking? Thought - our tradition says your thinking is separate from my thinking. Nobody has enquired into the question of thinking - right? So we are now saying thinking is common to all mankind because thinking is born out of knowledge, experience, memory - right? This happens to the most humble village man, and to the greatest philosopher - right? So thinking is common to all mankind. It is not my thinking, and your thinking separate. So thinking and consciousness are the same, because all the content of my consciousness is the product of my thinking. I think I am separate so the content of my consciousness is the conflict, the loneliness, the despair, the anxiety, suffering, I must resolve it.

So we have discovered for yourself, I am not telling you, that consciousness with its content is the movement of thought. Right? Of course, it is logical. So I see all this, where shall I begin? At the periphery or at the centre? We have been educated to work along the peripheral lines, and we see if you work along the peripheral lines there is no radical change at all. So I have to begin at the very centre, looking at the very centre and see its activity - right? Are we clear on this? Not how am I to get a job - I can't tell you I am afraid. How to stop the war - that is impossible. They are all idiots. How to solve the economic problem - it is possible only when there are no nationalities, no economic divisions. All these peripheral problems can be solved when there is a global outlook, not nationalistic outlook, which is isolated, conditioned outlook. It is only when we see we are all humanity, we are all one, life is one, life is sacred, not my life and your life.

So seeing all that, where shall I begin? I won't begin there, at the peripheral level. So I am beginning to enquire: is my thinking fragmentary? You understand? Is my activity fragmentary? - inwardly. I may say outwardly I am the world but inwardly is my activity fragmentary, broken up? Is that so? So I begin there. You understand? Is it possible to find out a way of living which is whole, not fragmented? I don't say there is, or there is not. I want to find out, enquire, question, doubt, never accept any conclusion I may come to even.

So what is it that breaks up life, life, the movement of living? You understand? What is it that breaks it up as mine, yours and all the rest of it? Please enquire, what is it? Don't reduce it to one word, it is very complex. Why do I live a broken up life, so divisive - you understand - so fragmented, so separate, broken up, why, what makes my life that way? We have got plenty of days to think it over. Study it, not accepting, looking, exercising your brain to find out.

[Interruption]

Sirs, we were asking what makes our life so broken up inwardly? What is the root of it, what is the cause of it? If you find the cause then it is simple to dispel it - you understand? if I find the cause of my disease then it can be cured, or may not be cured. So I must find the cause. When I find the cause the effect can be changed, therefore the cause itself disappears. You understand? We give importance to the cause because we see the effects of the cause - right? But if I understand the cause, why my life is so broken up, so contradictory, so hypocritical, saying one thing and so on and so on, why, what is the root of it? So I discover that all my life is based on thinking. My gods are the product of my thinking, the rituals - everything is based on thought - right? You are clear on this? Then is thought the cause of this, this constant struggle between the broken parts: I want, I don't want, I must, I must not, I must become something and there is fear in it, and so on? You understand? Please see the importance of this. If thought is the cause of this conflict, if that is the cause, contradiction, living one way, actual living, and thinking something else. If thought is responsible for this then what is life, living, in which thought doesn't divide? You have understood this? Are we together in this? I see that thought has created nationalism, obviously. Thought has created god - go slowly, you may not agree with this. Thought has created all the rituals, the symbols of religion, the robes, the non-robes, the wanting to put on a robe of a different colour, it is all the product of thinking. So is there a causeless way of living? You understand my question? A living that has no cause because the moment you have a cause it is broken up. You understand this? This requires a great deal of enquiry. The cause is now thought, thought has broken up the world geographically, nationally, religiously, thought has broken up me separate from you, my soul and your soul. My salvation is through there and your salvation is through there. The activity of thought has produced this - right? Thought is knowledge, experience, which is the past movement. So there is nothing sacred in thought. And all the things it creates are not sacred. You understand what this means? We have worshipped the things which thought has created as sacred, in the East, in the West, in the North and in the South. That is a deception of thought. Thought creates it and then worships it. So there it is, right away there is the breaking up, the divisive process begun.

So that divisive process in religion is brought about by thought and thought itself may be divisive, may be itself broken up because knowledge is never complete. Knowledge always goes with ignorance. So is there a way of living, please enquire, I am not telling you to do it, find out, put your mind, your heart to find out, is there a way of living which has no cause? Love has no cause - right? Love is not thought. But love that has hatred is thought.

I think we had better stop and continue on Tuesday. The day after tomorrow? May I get up? Will you get up too? It is finished.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC TALK 13TH JULY 1982

If I may we will continue where we left off the day before yesterday.

I think it is important to realize not merely verbally or intellectually that our tradition is to follow, either political leaders, religious leaders or psychological specialists. We want to be told what to do, and we naturally follow. Following somebody, it doesn't matter who it is, is totally detrimental to freedom, obviously. Perhaps most of us do not want to be free, not merely outwardly but inwardly, to be completely free. And so there is a great tendency to follow people, to follow what somebody says, including the speaker. So if one really wants to investigate into this whole problem of the world outside of us and the world inside, one must, it seems to us, totally deny every form of authority, inwardly and not to follow anybody. One must repeat that over and over again if you don't mind because our tendency is to repeat what another says, try to say, "We understand you but it is so difficult. We have listened to you for so many years and we have not changed" and all that kind of thing - which implies that you are really, if I may most respectfully point out, not investigating, exploring, examining critically what we are, what we have become, why the world is in such a terrible mess. And being confused in an uncertain world and a dangerous world, we want leaders, political, religious, new kind of philosophy, but all those have betrayed us. And as we said the day before yesterday, it is important to relate what we are to the world, and the world to us, and to understand this interrelationship between the world and ourselves, and that investigation, the real relationship and the realization between the world and ourselves inwardly, doesn't depend on anybody. There is no guru, nor all the popes in the world will help us. We have to investigate, go into this problem of why there is this division, this conflict in all of us.

And as we said the day before yesterday, we have divided, broken up life. There is the political area, business area, the religious area, and the ideological, Utopian concepts, and our own relationship with each other, it is all broken up, it is all fragmented. And the politicians never see this fragmentation, they have their own ideas, their own concepts of what government should be and so on, totally disregarding the whole psychological area of man. People think politics will solve all our problems - better government, better environment, better leadership and so on.

So we have broken up our lives and most of us are unaware of this. So we said the day before yesterday, every form of isolation, nationally, economically, religiously, in that isolation there is no security. You can see that very, very clearly throughout the world. They are building up our armaments and so on - we went into all that the day before yesterday.

And then we said: where is one to begin? Seeing all this most obvious activity that is going on in the world, dangerous, destructive, degenerating, vulgar, coarse, where should one begin with all this? And what kind of action is necessary, not at the peripheral level, but at the psychological level because man has always tried to alter the periphery, the outward things - better system, better government, better this and so on, but as we pointed out the day before yesterday man has lived for thirty thousand, or a million years, and we are more or less the same as we were at the beginning of time. If we go along in that direction we shall never bring about a different world. And seeing all this where shall one begin? That is where, more or less, we left off the day before yesterday.

Do we realize, or are we aware, know, recognize, that each one of us has different departments, broken up - the business world, the world of teaching, the world, if you are a professor, scientist, businessman, politician, or a rather disillusioned religious man, are we aware in our life how fragmented we are? And we said what is the cause of this, what is the origin that makes our life so fragmented, so broken up? Please, as we said the day before yesterday, this is not a lecture that is giving you some information about something, but rather that together we are looking at this problem, together - not I look at it and the speaker tells you, or you tell the speaker; together we are observing this phenomena. So please, if one may point out, don't merely listen to the speaker but observe the thing yourself so that it is yours, not the speaker's.

We said: what is the origin of all this division? - in ourselves and in the world? In ourselves being our relationship with each other, with the world, and the colossal, almost destructive separatism in the world. We said is it thought? Is thought the origin of this division, of this fragmentation in our life? We are asking, so we are, both of us, criticizing, questioning, examining, not the speaker pointing out, then it becomes another circus. But whereas if both of us realize how necessary it is to see what exactly is happening outside of us and inside of us, and look at it very objectively, dispassionately, not say, "I like this, I don't like that." - without any bias, one realizes that our life, the whole process of living, which is a very complex affair, has become more and more fragmented. Now we are asking: what is the beginning of it? Who has brought about this fragmentation? Please ask yourself, don't rely on the speaker. We are asking: is it thought? Or is it natural in life to be fragmented? Because that is the way we have lived: I am an idealist, you are not. I believe in this, I don't believe in that - right? So is thought the origin of this division? Where there is division there must be conflict - right? The Arab and the Jew, and the Russian and German, and so on and so on. And also there is division in us - I am, I should be. I am what I am but I will become.

So there is this constant division. And that may be the way of life: live in a constant conflict, constant destruction, having destroyed, build, and that which you have built destroy - as the animals live in conflict, so we live in conflict. And you may say that is the natural way of life, it has been like that for a million years or thirty thousand years, it is so. Or you question: is that the way of life? And when you begin to question, not accept the tradition of this fragmentation then you begin to ask: how did this come about? Is it thought, because that is the only thing we have? We have lived on thought, all our activities are based on thought, all the armaments, the wars, the brutality, the vulgarity, the hatred, all that is based on thought. A marvellous technology and so on. And when one asks: is thought the origin of this terrible way of living, one must enquire what is the nature of thought? Is thought itself divisive? Is thought itself, in itself, a fragmentary process? Thought, which has done so extraordinarily well in the technological world, in beautiful architecture, the extraordinary things thought has done outwardly; and inwardly there is only one instrument we have, which is thought, and if thought is the instrument, the process that brings about this division, this fragmentation, this conflict in us, is that so? We are examining it together, you are not, please don't accept whatever the speaker says, he may be totally wrong. If you accept you will make him into an authority, which is an abomination to the speaker. Whereas together let's look at it, amicably, hesitantly, with a sense of co-operation.

You know it is one of the most difficult things to co-operate. We co-operate round a person, or round an idea, or we co-operate when we hate somebody, like hating another country everybody joins in, if there is a war they all co-operate to destroy somebody else. We are talking about co-operation in a totally different sense: not round a person, not round some authority, an idea, a concept, but the feeling of wanting to co-operate, the feeling, not co-operate about something, or for something. Here we are co-operating together in that sense of investigating, looking at this question, which is: is thought in itself a process that divides the whole world outside of us, and the world inside of us? Is this clear? If this is clear, and if thought is the origin of it, the cause of it, then we must investigate: what do we mean by cause? Cause for action is a ground, is a motive, is a reason - cause. I act because I have some prejudice, some idea, some concept which is the ground, which is the cause, the reason, the motive for my action. Where there is a cause the effect can be changed - right? But in changing the effect, the very changing becomes the cause. I wonder if you follow all this?

We are investigating together the meaning of that word, because it is very important. Cause means doing something with a motive. Cause implies a process of time which produces the effect. Cause implies the whole movement of the past, which may alter the future - right? This is not an intellectual game we are playing. We are understanding the nature of cause. When I am afraid, which is the cause, I do all kinds of silly things. And I try to alter the silly things I do, not discover the cause of my fear. But when I do discover the cause is it possible to dissolve the cause without the effect, without a future effect? You understand? I wonder if it is clear?

Is this clear? Shall we go on with it? So it is important, it seems to me, to understand the cause. I have cancer - I haven't got it - I have cancer and the cause of that is practically unknown yet. The moment they discover the cause cancer will end, but the ending of cancer has its other problems, other diseases. You understand? So is there a possibility of dissolving the cause without a future effect? You understand? I have done something wrong, of which I am ashamed. I discover why I did that thing which is not correct, and I am concerned with altering that which is not correct because I have not discovered the cause of it. But when I do discover the cause of it and dissolve that cause, there is no effect, which, if I do not dissolve it, the effect can become the cause of another problem. You understand now? Right sir?

So we are asking: is thought the cause of this division? Is thought in itself divisive? And therefore whatever it does must be divisive, separative? So let's go into the question of what is thought, what is thinking, what is the origin of this thinking process? - the origin, the beginning of it. Are you interested in all this? Because you see sirs we live in a very dangerous world, this dangerous world man has made. There is terror, uncertainty, there is tremendous sorrow in the world. And that has been going for thousands of years. Any observant, dispassionate, mind says, "Is there an end to all this?" - not my end, not my ending of my suffering but the ending of suffering of man. And we went into it the day before yesterday, that our consciousness is similar to all the consciousness of the world, of human beings, so we are totally humanity. We went into that carefully, it is no good going back again. We are the entire humanity because our consciousness is not my consciousness, the consciousness that has evolved through time, evolution, and it has come to this present condition. And is there a possibility of totally understanding this whole consciousness and transforming it? That is why it is important to understand the nature of thought because thought is the instrument of all our actions. Thought has put all the content of our consciousness, our beliefs, our ideas, our hopes, our aspirations, fears, anxieties, loneliness, depression - you know, sorrow, it is all the result of thought, because love is totally another matter. Thought is not love, nor the remembrance of past things which give pleasure and that is called love. So we will go into that at another time.

So realizing what the world is and what we have become, it is not a vain question, not a selfish question, to ask: is thought responsible for all this? Do you understand what we are enquiring? Because the whole world is emphasizing thinking, the whole world is acquiring more and more knowledge. Psychologically and outwardly knowledge has become all-important. And what is knowledge? Scientific knowledge, business knowledge, the knowledge of music, composition? And there are those scholars and scientists who say through knowledge alone man ascends, grows, becomes. Please see in our own lives how important knowledge is, because we have to live in the world, to do certain jobs, and to do a good job in any direction you must have knowledge. And knowledge can never be complete about anything. It is so obvious. Knowledge means accumulation of experience, of tradition, gathering all kinds of information which has been stored up, learning about it, and having a degree and functioning. So knowledge has become extraordinarily important. And we never question: can knowledge be complete at any time about anything? Obviously not. Therefore knowledge must always go hand in hand with ignorance - right? Please see the importance of this. There is no complete knowledge about myself. There can't be because to understand oneself is a tremendous movement all the time. It isn't I have understood, gathered information, and accumulated from that information a great deal of knowledge and hold that knowledge. Then when I say, "I know myself", which is a false statement because I can never know myself completely because there is always the shadow of ignorance. The more I delve into myself, the more I discover. But knowledge is accepted as the chief instrument of our life, but knowledge is never complete. Therefore our thought can never be complete because knowledge comes through experience, and you store up that experience as knowledge, which then is held in the brain as memory, and that memory acts, which is thinking. This is normal, reasonable, rational. There is nothing to dispute about it, you can't prove it. They are trying to prove it to build a computer that is exactly like a human mind, human brain. Probably they will succeed because the computer, which is mechanical intelligence, is based on how it is programmed, and we have been programmed, never completely.

So thought born of knowledge, born of experience, stored in the brain as memory, the remembrance of things past, that is thought. And so thought in itself is fragmentary, it is not my thinking and your thinking are separate, there is only thinking. I may think about the tent and look at it with different eyes, its proportion and so on, you may think of it differently, but thinking is common to both of us. Whether you are very, very poor, highly educated, or totally ignorant, thinking is going on. So thought is the origin, the beginning of this division in our life. You are German, I am French, you are British, I am Russian - that is, we have geographically divided the world by thought. That is, thought tries to seek security in isolation, in fragmentation - right? Have you got this? Thought seeks security in isolation because it is fragmented it is the process of its own division - right? Is this clear to all of us? I am not explaining. Please don't accept the explanation. The reality is not the explanation. You may paint a most beautiful mountain with all the shadows, and the depth of light, and the beauty of light, but that picture is not the actual mountain. So please this is your own understanding, your own observation from which you are learning. You are not learning from the speaker. You are learning through observation of what is going on. So you can throw away the speaker, the speaker is not important - I must emphasize this - but what you see, what you understand, and from that understanding to discover that thought is the origin of all this.

So the cause is knowledge, which is incomplete. You understand? Now we asked the other day: is there a way of living without cause? You understand? Please this requires a lot of investigation, not acceptance or denial. Everything we do is based on a cause. Every action, every emotion, every ideation has a cause in thought. And can that cause be altered without trying to change the effect? You understand? This is very important to understand. I am exploring with you. This is something new for me too, for the speaker, I have just heard it the other day when he spoke - the causation. I want to find out, like you, we are trying to find out together, co-operating together, man has lived always with a cause. I hate somebody because he has hurt me and I try to alter the effects of hate - right? But I never enquire what is the cause of my hate? The cause of my hate is that he has done something wrong to me. That is the cause. Now can I alter the cause, which is that he has done something wrong to me, totally forgetting him, he is the effect. You understand? I wonder if you are following all this? Not be concerned with him at all, but the hurt, which is the cause of my hatred, my anger, antagonism, wanting to hit him back. And the cause is the image I have about myself. And that image has been hurt, and that image is me - right? Surely. I have an image about myself, that I am a great man, or whatever you like, or some kind of silly person, illusion and so on. I have got an image very carefully put together by thought about myself. The myself is the image - right? I am not different from the image. Thought has separated me from the image because it can only think in terms of division, so it says "I am different from the image" but the fact is the image is me. That image has been hurt by someone. And the cause of that hatred is the hurt which is part of that image. So I am not concerned about another who has hurt me, I want to find the cause of it, which is my image about myself and the cause says, "Can that end?" - not be concerned with the person who has hurt me. I wonder if you follow all this? It is simple enough.

So the causation is the image. Now can that image end? Please ask this question of yourself. You certainly have an image about yourself - beautiful, clever, depressed, I belong to this group, it will help me - you have an image about yourself. And that image has been put together by thought. And the cause of that hurt is the image. Now if I say to myself I must end the image in order not to be hurt, then that becomes a cause, not to be hurt. So I begin to see how not to be hurt, keeping the image - you understand? So the cause remains and the hurt will remain. But whereas when there is the observation of the fact that the image is hurt and the realization, the truth that the image is hurt, then the dissolution of that image has no cause. It doesn't say, "I must get over my hurt" - you understand? There is no ground, no motive, no reason, to dissolve the image, but the mere fact of observing the truth that as long as there is an image it will be hurt. Is this clear? We will approach it as we go along in ten different ways.

So we are asking, co-operating together to find out a way of life where there is no cause. Please sirs this is a tremendous question, don't just throw it out. I have lived so far - all of us have lived so far responding to the causes, treating the symptoms and never going to the root, which is the cause. We have accepted causation. That is our tradition, that is our conditioning. And there are those extraordinarily clever, erudite people who say you can never change a conditioning. You can modify it, you can alter it, but the conditioning of man will always remain. That means he will always suffer, he will always be in a state of anxiety, fear and so on. But we are trying to observe and ask: this conditioning in which we live has been brought about by various causes, the main cause is the desire to be secure, secure outwardly and secure very, very deeply inwardly, to have no doubt, no uncertainty, to be completely secure. That is how our mind works. Because inwardly there is uncertainty - please follow this - insecurity because I can't depend on anybody, I have discovered that, even in my most intimate relationships I can't depend. And my desire from childhood is my condition which says, "Be secure, for god's sake." - either in ideas, in knowledge, in property, or no property, which is another form of security, go off into the mountains, or into the monastery, that is another form of security, be attached to Jesus, or Krishna, or somebody. So we are inwardly insecure, the cause of it we are going into. The cause of insecurity and the demand to be secure. You understand that we all want security, popularity, to be known.

Now, why is it that we are insecure? Begin inwardly first please. You understand? The outward things are controlled, shaped by inward action. Our psychological demands control the outward circumstances - right? We have created the society, the society in which we live. We are responsible for it, not the present generation, a thousand generations of human beings have produced this, those generations are a part of it. So we have produced this. And we say one must be secure. Why? Because inwardly we are uncertain, confused - right? If I am very clear why should I demand security? So we are going to find out the cause of this urge, this longing for security, what is the cause of it? I feel secure in putting on a certain robe. I belong to a certain group, I feel safe, I feel safe when I say I am British, or Swiss. Inwardly too, when I say I am a great man, or I have a job which satisfies me and so on and so on. So what is the cause of this uncertainty? This deep sense of insecurity? We all want security - right? So what is the cause of it? Go on sirs. What is the cause of my insecurity? My feeling of loneliness, of my feeling totally dissatisfied with everything, discontent like a flame that is burning in me about the things which man has done, which I don't want to do but I don't know how not to do. You understand? I am burning, I am anxious, depressed. I want to change the world but I don't know how. I want to stop wars. And politicians won't listen. The speaker has tried it.

So why is the brain, which can only function in complete security fully, knowing it can only function in that way yet it is constantly living in uncertainty, insecurity, what is the cause of it? Don't look at me. Please look at yourselves and find out.

What do we mean by security? Secure from what? Secure from danger - right? Secure from any form of interference - right? Secure to pursue my own way, to be safe in my desire for fulfilment, inwardly. Outwardly I need to be secure, otherwise you and I wouldn't be here, you must have food, clothes and shelter, that is natural. But that which is natural is being denied by the division of nationalities. Any intelligent man sees this, that there can only be security for mankind if there is a global relationship, and interrelationship economically, socially, a global relationship, not an isolated security.

So we are seeking - please follow this - we are seeking security for ourselves; which is, ourselves is the rest of mankind - right? Because my consciousness is like yours, you suffer, I suffer, we go through terrible times together. All human beings psychologically are on the same ground. It is this terrible illusion that we are all separate entities. So is there security in isolation? Go carefully. Who has brought about this isolation? Having brought about this isolation it protects itself and that protection is called security. And we see more and more observable, this tribal seclusion, isolation is destroying the world. Right? America against Russia, Russia against Afghanistan - all the horrors that are going on. You have your guru and I have my guru - I haven't got one but you have your guru, your priest, your authority. So if one realizes, sees the truth - please, just listen to this for a moment, give your attention to this - if you really see in your investigation that in isolation there is no security. Now thought has brought about this isolation, of course. Now how do you see the truth of the fact that isolation is most destructive? Who sees it? Does thought see it? You understand my question? You have heard this statement that any form of isolation, any form, is destructive, will inevitably bring about total insecurity. You hear that statement, which is, first you hear through the sensory ear, then you hear those words which have significance inwardly - right? And you say, "Yes, I hear it. I see that." Now what do you mean by seeing that? You understand? Seeing the statement by saying "I understand it". "I understand what it means." - right? Do you understand the idea, the words, or the actual fact? Not understand, see the fact. Which is it? Please look at it. The word, which is spoken in English, we speak in English therefore there is the understanding of the word, the conclusion of the whole statement - are you observing the abstraction of that fact as an idea, or without abstraction observing the fact? I observe the fact that I have pain, physical pain. There is no abstraction about it. I don't say I am perfectly well when there is agony. When there is real pain there is no abstraction. But our brain is traditionally conditioned to make abstractions. That is, I hear the statement, I make an abstract of it, the idea of it, the concept of it, the conclusion that by jove, this is so. And I hold on to that conclusion which is totally different from the fact. Now what is it that you are doing? What is it that we are together doing? Observing the fact only without abstraction, without the idea. When you so observe, that is, observing without the desire to transcend it, the desire - please follow - the fact that as long as I have an image about myself it is going to be hurt. I am that image - right? I am that image. But the condition of my brain says, "I am different from the image." So I see the fact that there is this division - right? I say why is there this division? There is this division because thought has separated the fact from me. The me is the fact. The me is the enemy. Right? The me, with the image, gets hurt.

As long as I live in isolation there must be uncertainty. From that uncertainty comes the desire to be secure. The cause is thought has made me insecure - not made me - thought has brought about this sense of division - I am British, you are French, my guru, your guru - my guru is different from yours, my god is different, I will be saved only through that way, and so on and so on and so on. It is all the product of thought. And thought has brought about this isolation, and where there is isolation there is total insecurity. And being insecure, the urge to be secure. Now to see this whole thing, to observe the whole thing, as you would observe a beautiful mountain without any reaction, just watch. When you so observe the very cause disappears, doesn't it? Because it is so. It is so, a fact that thought has brought this isolation. Having brought it about there is confusion, conflict, isolation and therefore in that isolation there can be no security, therefore I seek some. You follow?

If one remains with that fact completely then the causation doesn't create an effect. Got it? We are wanting to change the effect but not see the cause and let the cause disappear.

From this one begins to enquire: what is intelligence? Because this is intelligence, you understand? To see the false and discard the false is intelligence - right? Is that clear? I see and there is perception that nationalism is destructive. To perceive that is intelligence. I perceive this whole religious structure which man has built, with all the rituals, dresses, thought has built it, and to see the fact that it is not religion is intelligence. To see the fact that thought has created isolation outwardly, and also inwardly. And the cause of this is thought which is fragmented in itself. And to see that is obviously intelligence.

Now proceed that way, go in more and more deeply and you will see that we live in a world that is so utterly impractical, utterly unintelligent. To see that, not just verbally to say it is unintelligent. So to discover, not to be told, what is false, what is illusory, to see it, not to act upon it, just to see it, that very perception of the false denies the false. I don't have to fight against it. You understand?

So I see step by step the way intelligence is acting. It is not my intelligence, it is not yours, it is intelligence.

Right Sirs. May I get up now?

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC TALK 18TH JULY 1982

May we continue with what we have been talking about for the last three or four meetings? One thinks it should be made clear that this is not a sermon, nor a lecture as is commonly understood. We are not giving you, if we may point out, any information or any ideological new set of beliefs and tracts and exotic religion and philosophy. Nor is the person who is speaking important.

We were pointing out the other day that we are together co-operating in the investigation of what has happened to human beings after twenty five thousand years or thirty thousand years or millenia upon millenia. We have become coarse, brutal, violent, cynical, a tremendous sense of antagonism, hatred, having enemies and the present structure of religions, the organized, orthodox, dogmatic religions, have no place at all.

And also we point out how dangerous it is to follow somebody psychologically. We pointed out that human beings in a confused world with their wars and self-destruction, we want someone to lead us, to help us out of this chaos, and we have relied on political and religious and other forms of leaders, and they have not actually deeply helped to bring about a new society, new ways of living and so on. So it behoves us, if you are at all aware of what is happening, we have to be a light to ourselves. Which doesn't mean doing exactly what we would like to do, but rather consider our relationship with the whole of humanity and realize that we are the entire humanity, each one. We have been talking about that quite a bit.

And one thinks this morning we should go together into the question: what is it that we human beings are trying to become? What is it each one of us, if one may ask, is trying to do, achieve, and gain an end? If we enquire into ourselves, even very superficially, what is it we all want? Whether we are well placed, poor, or intellectually highly cultivated, each one of us apparently is becoming something, wants to become something. It is natural I think to become something in this world - natural. That is, if we do not know a certain language we spend a great deal of time learning it. That is becoming learned in a particular language. Or if one is not skilful academically, then you strive, study to achieve a certain position academically because it gives you a job and so on. It is also quite natural if one is a poor carpenter to study the nature of the wood, the instruments and so on and become a good master carpenter, or a scientist and so on. That is fairly obvious. If I am a worker in a factory I want to become the foreman in that factory, and so on.

And we are asking: is it natural - and we are using the word natural in the sense that is it inevitable, is it in the nature of human beings psychologically to become something? That is, the becoming something, whatever it be, involves time, naturally. I am this but I will be that. That requires a series of days, weeks or months or years, and during that period one strives to become that. That is, I am violent, one is violent, one will attempt to become free of violence, and so on. And after achieving freedom from violence what is there more to achieve? That is the eternal demand of human beings to achieve, to become something, psychologically, inwardly. If one examines, each one of us, deeply, what is it we are trying to become? More enlightened? To achieve heaven? To achieve in the Buddhist sense Nirvana? Or in the Hindu sense Moksha? What is it each one of us wants to achieve? One thinks this is an important question to ask. Is there anything to achieve? We are predisposed to the concept of becoming something inwardly. That is, we have carried over the same mentality of becoming something in skill, in technological knowledge, in achieving certain status, we have carried that same mentality to the psychological field. I wonder if you are aware of all this?

If one is aware of this, what is it we are trying to become? What is it deeply we are trying to achieve? And each achievement is separate from all other achievements. It is isolated achievements. I am poor inwardly and I want to be rich inwardly. The richness consists in achieving knowledge, in overcoming conflict. So I am always struggling to become what I project, what thought projects, that which is not. And one is trying to become that which is not - right? And this achievement is based on the principle of reward and punishment. The reward is to achieve, to come to a point where one can say "I have got this". And punishment is in not achieving what is projected, which is pain, in which there is a sense of lack of fulfilment, pain and depression, and all the consequences of so-called failure. In this process we are caught.

Please, we are together co-operating in the investigation, examination of this question. The speaker is not stating something which is not actual. We are examining. Please don't accept what the speaker says. That is the first principle. One must have a sense of questioning, doubt, enquiry, scepticism so that we can both of us together investigate why human beings have become what they are, living in eternal conflict, endless wars, terrorism and all the rest of it. Outwardly we have made perhaps what may be called progress, from the horse-drawn carriage, to the jet. That is called progress and we apply the same attitude, the same way of thinking that I am this, I will be that. It has taken many centuries to move, evolve from a bullock cart to the present transportation. And man has said, "I am this but I will take centuries to become that." All this implies time. Right? Time as evolution. And what is time? It is important to understand the nature of time, not only by the sunrise and the sunset, the evening, the night and the morning, time by the clock, and also we have psychological time, "I am this, I must be that". And we also say society is this, with all the terrible things that are going on, the hatreds, the violence and all that, and it will take time to change the condition of man - right? Again we are caught in that movement of time.

So we are talking about time together, I am not telling you, please bear in mind that we are putting into words what you are obviously, if you are interested, if you are serious, we are considering together the nature of time, because we live by time. Hope is time, the future which promises something or other is time. The remembrance of the past is time. And one will require knowledge in order to act properly. So the accumulation of knowledge is in the field of time, and as knowledge is never complete it goes with ignorance. So this whole process, outwardly and inwardly, we have accepted as a movement in evolution, in becoming something - right?

Now as we said the other day, intelligence has no cause, as love has no cause. And we said time also is the cause and the movement of the effect. That is also time. But time may be a second or many years. The cause and the effect. The movement of the cause to bring about effect is time. Right? So where there is a cause there is time - right? Please this is important because we are going to go into the question of whether certain conditioning of man - do those conditions require time at all to be free of them - you understand? We are asking: the human brain is conditioned, mechanical, repetitive, it is conditioned that way and that condition has been brought about through evolution, which is time and whether time, if we proceed along that way, living in this constant time there is no radical change. It is a continuity of what has been, the process of that will go on. But we are asking together - the speaker is not asking, you are asking, if one may point out - can this condition of man, which is the result of time, which has a cause and the effect is what we are, and if we continue in the same pattern, modified, it will be the same line. What has continuity is a process of time.

So can the condition of man be transformed without time? You understand the question? I am conditioned, as born in a certain culture, with certain religious dogmas, superstitions, realities, and a way of life that has conditioned the brain. And there are those who assert that conditionings can never be changed, they can be modified, they can be somewhat, like living in a prison make the prison rather nice. And we are questioning together whether that condition can be transformed, end, without time. Right? We are going into it, we are not asserting a thing. We are together investigating if you are aware of all this, and exercising your brain, not your romantic feelings and activities, but your capacity to think. We are not telling you what to think but how to think, which is quite different.

As we said too, where there is a cause, that very cause brings about its own end. The cause of anger, violence and so on, there is a cause for it. When there is the discovery of that cause the effect can be radically changed. Right? I am lonely, which is a terrible fear and anxiety and ache and the effect of that is isolation, more and more isolation. The cause of loneliness, if one can discover it, that the very ending of the cause is the ending of loneliness - right? Because I have discovered the cause. I have discovered that I have tuberculosis and it can be cured, they have modern medicines that can cure it. So one must discover the cause of this sense of separateness which brings about such deep isolation which is called loneliness. Right? Please go into this.

What is it to be lonely? In that feeling of loneliness, which is deep isolation from all outward and inward relationship, what is the cause of that, this sense of being utterly, without any relation to anything. You all know this perhaps. You may be married, you may have children, you may have lots of friends, position and all the rest of it but there is this deep element, see it in man, that is so desperately alone. Please, what is the cause of it? The explanation by the speaker is not the fact. Explanations are never the fact. Descriptions are never the real. The word is not the thing. So please do not be carried away by the word, by the description or by the explanation. It is like looking at the movement of the river in a picture, in a painting, which is entirely different from the actual beauty of a river that is in full flow. So we are asking the cause of it.

How does one look at this question? How does one enquire into this question? Do you exercise thought to enquire? Please understand this. Is thought the instrument of enquiry into such a problem? Thought being, as we went into it the other day, limited because it is the outcome of knowledge which is limited, and knowledge can never be complete about anything. So thought is always limited. Now do you, do we enquire into this question by the exercise of thought? If you exercise thought, obviously thought being limited in itself, fragmented in itself, can only discover the fragmentary causes, not the actual cause. You follow? Right? So if one does not exercise thought, then what is there as an other instrument? We are used to this one single instrument. That is our conditioning. That is our education. And that is the only instrument we have. And we discover that instrument cannot delve into something much more profound - right? Be sure, be absolutely clear on this point.

Man through fear, uncertainty, confusion, isolation, thought has created an idea called god, invented it. God certainly has not created us. If he had we would be extraordinary human beings. We are not. The cause of this invention is one's fear, one's hope. That is the cause of this effect. So if one is enquiring into something that demands not the instrument of thought, then what is the instrument? You understand? The question is clear, is it not? You are putting this question, not the speaker only. Therefore it is your question. And you have to answer it. Thought is not the instrument.

Then we are asking: is the other instrument, if it exists, is it the invention of thought, which may be unconscious? You are following? I know thought cannot examine the whole universe, the extraordinary order of the universe. And thought cannot examine it because thought itself is limited. So when I say thought is limited and cannot possibly examine that which is limitless, then I am asking: is there a way of observation which is not the instrument of thought? Can I observe, observe this problem of deep loneliness, this sense of total isolation with all its consequences? Where there is isolation there must be conflict. Where there is isolation there must be various forms of antagonism, hatred, inevitably leading to war. So what is the instrument, which is not thought, which is not unconsciously invented by thought, and you say, "Yes, that is it"? So one must be very clear that it is not the activity of remembrance, which is thought. Are we meeting each other?

So we have to go into the question of observation. That may be the instrument. We are not saying that is the instrument, because then it becomes dogmatic and perhaps you will accept it, then it has no meaning. But to enquire, which is only possible when one sees for oneself that thought is limited, utterly. And that thought is not your thought or my thought, thought under all circumstances always is limited. Then only you can put the other question: is there another instrument which is not put together by thought? Only when you have seen the reality, the truth that thought is limited, then you can go to something else. But if you are confused then you will be playing a game? Is this clear? If you are clear on this point then what is observation? Is there an observation without the word, without association, which is remembrance, which is the chain of incidences, remembrance and activity, the chain of it, is there an observation without the past? Is that possible? You understand? Is it possible to observe the whole world as it is, not from any bias, not from the point of view of an American, British,

Russian, an idealist, a terrorist, which are all a bias. Whether it is historical bias, or bias brought about through reason, it is still a bias. Can one observe this world, this society around us and therefore myself, which is my loneliness? Is there an observation without the past? The past being the word, the past being the accumulated memory of experience, which is knowledge. Is that possible? To look as though you are looking at the world around us, the society, for the first time, afresh. Surely it is possible, isn't it? To look at the speaker, I am taking that as an example, without all the reputation, all that nonsense. To look, not at the figure, not at the form, but at what he is saying, which means you have to listen, to listen not only with the sensual ear but the inward ear, to see whether it is false or true. So this listening requires attention, not translate what you hear to please yourself or to accommodate it to the past memories, but to listen without any single movement of thought. To listen.

When you listen to sound, like music, it is a sound. Can you listen to that sound without naming who wrote it, who composed it? Just to listen. There is great beauty in that listening, without any form of association. That means you are listening to it for the first time. Or when you go to Greece and see the Parthenon for the first time, it has an extraordinary significance, you want to kneel to it, the beauty, the colour against the sky, the whole immensity of the Grecian civilization. So in the same way can we look at this problem without the word, without the association, without any form of relationship? Can I look at myself, which is lonely, not that there is loneliness and I feel it, all loneliness is me? I have brought about this loneliness by self-centred activity, by pursuing my own desires, ambitions, greed and all the rest of it.

So the outward activity of isolation and the inward activity of separateness has brought about this. That is the cause. Can I observe the cause - not I - is there an observation of the cause without wanting to transform it, change it? You understand? Just to observe it, as you would observe the flow of that river. You cannot change the depth of that water, the purity of that water, the swiftness of that water. So can you observe the cause? - the cause being the whole way of our life. If you can so observe it, that very observation which is the ending of the cause and therefore the effect which is loneliness is gone. This is not just words. Work at it, look at it.

So from that we should begin to enquire together into the question of fear, because that is one of our major problems in life. Fear of the future, fear of the past, fear of the present. Fear of public opinion, fear what somebody will say, fear of being exposed, that which you have done in the past, fear of death, fear of not fulfilling, fear of not being loved, and fear of loving. We all know the various forms of fear. Fear that I might lose my wife or the girl-friend, what she will say about me. Expand all this. Fear of having no pleasure, physically or psychologically. Fear of being lonely, fear of getting hurt, getting hurt you want to hurt another, and we carry this hurt all through life. And the consequence of that hurt is building a wall round oneself not to be hurt any more, resisting any form of relationship, therefore out of that bitterness, anxiety, loneliness, depression, agony. And there is the fear of not becoming. So it is like a vast tree with many branches, with many, many leaves full of chattering leaves. And we are concerned with one form of fear or another. One may be concerned only with the fear of death and nothing else. Or one may be involved with thought about the fear of tomorrow. Tomorrow is not just the day after, twenty four hours, the whole movement of tomorrow, which is endless. And the fear of having no significance in life, life has no meaning. It has no meaning as it is, which is perpetual striving after something, conflict, misery, unhappiness and all that.

So fear has multiple forms. It is not your fear or my fear, it is fear. You may translate it in one way, express it in a different way, and I or another may describe it differently, but basically it is fear. Right? And naturally most human beings, at least sane, rational, healthy human beings say we must end fear, not merely cut the branches of fear or tear the pieces, tear the leaves on the branches but rather what is the cause of fear? If one can discover the cause then it can, as we went into it, where there is a cause there is an ending to the effect - right? Please that is a principle, that is a law. Cancer, with all its different varieties, the cause of it they have not discovered yet, though they have spent billions on it, they will discover it one day and the effect is ended - right? Please see the significance of this. Where there is a cause with its effect, the cause can come to an end - right?

So we are now concerned with what is the cause of fear, not your fear of mine, the cause, which is so common to all mankind, which is the ground on which all human beings struggle? So please this is not your fear or mine, but fear of mankind. What is the cause? This is important to discover for oneself because man has carried, lived with fear for millenia upon millenia, he hasn't solved it. He has escaped from it, he has disciplined it, or he has rationalized it, or justified it, but it is there, whether it is in the conscious mind or in the deeper levels of the mind. So one must enquire together what is the cause of it? If you discover it, right, if you say, "This is the cause" then hold it. You understand? Like a precious jewel, hold it, look at it. Don't say "I must go away". You have got a marvellous diamond in your hand, a jewel that has its brilliancy. So what is the cause?

We were asking the other day: what is intelligence? We were saying intelligence is not the product of thought, it is not put together by thought. Please, this is very serious. To understand this you will have to go into it, not just see the implications of it. Thought is neither yours nor mine, it is thought. Whether you live as a hermit, or as a saint, or as an explorer, or as a scientist, there is thinking, it may be limited or less limited. So thought is never personal. Then thought cannot through struggle, through study, through accumulated knowledge, thought can never have the capacity of that extraordinary thing called intelligence. And we said intelligence has no cause; like love has no cause. If love has a cause then it is not intelligence, obviously. One sees that very quickly. But one doesn't see that where there is cause there is no intelligence.

So we are enquiring intelligently, which is that intelligence which has not a cause, that intelligence is observing - please go carefully into this - into the nature of fear, the root of it. You understand? When intelligence has no cause that intelligence which is observing - no, I won't tell you, you go on, I will come to it presently. What is the cause of fear? Is it thought? Is it time? Please go slowly into it, enquire. Is it desire, desire being the freedom from fear? So are we looking at the cause with intelligence, which has no cause, you follow? Or we are trying to make an effort to look, therefore the effort has a cause? Because you want to be free from it, you want to live more happily and all the rest of it. So can you observe desire, time, thought? They are not separate, they are interrelated, therefore they are one - right?

So is that the cause? Fear of death, I am not dead but I will be dead. This interval between the living and the ending. I am not, I will be. The 'will be' may be uncertain. So time is involved in this. I have done something wrong, one is afraid of being exposed of that which is wrong, one is afraid of it, which is time. Desire is more complicated. I do not know if we have time to go into it.

Is it desire, time, thought, as one unitary movement that is causing fear? Causing. Effort has a cause, fear has a cause. Intelligence has no cause, love has no cause - right? Psychologically everything has a cause. I do this because. So that is the cause, desire, thought, time - time being a movement, tomorrow psychologically, therefore it is limited. So these may be the factors. We can enlarge it, go into details of the nature of desire, what is desire, perhaps next time we will go into it.

This apparently is the one cause, though they look separate they are all the same movement, within the same area, within the same field. So that is the cause. Please I am not telling you. You, yourself, are using your capacity to observe without any bias, without any sense of wanting to suppress fear, or to escape from fear, rationalize fear, just observe it. Do you see the inward movement of fear, the cause of it? Now when you discover the cause of it, what do you do with it? Now just please go into it a little carefully. You have discovered the cause, discovered for yourself, found it, then what is your action, or non-action? We are accustomed, it is our habit, our condition, to do something. I have discovered the cause, I must do something about it, rub it out, forget it, analyse it, tear it to pieces, I must act. Which is, again that action has a cause, which is thought saying this is unbearable, I must get rid of it, go beyond it, transmute it, whatever it is. So one has to be aware of that condition of action, wanting to do something about it. Now who is it that is doing something about it? You understand my question? Surely desire, time, thought, is you. Right? You are not separate from fear, you are fear. You might like to say, "I can get rid of it", separate yourself from the fact but you are that. Right? Like you are, if you are violent, perpetually seeking fear, caught in some illusion, you are the enemy of mankind. That is a fact. If you are nationalistic, bound to a certain religion, a certain dogma, you are the enemy of the whole of mankind.

So you are that desire, time and thought. You are that. You are not separate from that. So what happens when there is the realization, the truth of it, not just the verbal description of it, verbal explanation of it, but the fact that you are that? And that fear is the root, has its root in this. So you are the whole of that. Don't say, "Am I not also sometimes free of time, I look at the world afresh, waking up one morning after a deep dreamless night, wake up in the morning and say what a beautiful lovely feeling to be fresh." Those mornings are very rare. We can't live on those mornings, which is to live on dead memories. But this is a fact. This is the cause. The cause is me - right? The cause is time, thought, desire and so on, which is the whole composition of my consciousness. The content of that consciousness is the common content of humanity. So our enquiry into the nature of fear is not a selfish activity. Please bear this in mind. It is not a selfish activity that I want to be free of fear. I am concerned - we are concerned with the human fear of which you are part.

So when we look at the nature of fear we are considering the whole of human fear. But if you are looking at it as though it was your personal fear then you have to examine why you think it is your personal fear. Then you will find out when you so think that it is limited. And if you like to live that way naturally you will live that way. Nobody is going to force you. That is what humanity has done, living in separate compartments and fighting each other, destroying each other.

So this observation has led you to this. Your examination, which is very careful investigation, exploration into the nature of fear. Now can the brain, which is accustomed to escape, which is conditioned to rationalize, which is moulded to avoid and escape to some other form of entertainment, can that brain break the pattern and look without any movement of its past conditioning? This requires your application. Then when you so look, that is, when you give complete and total attention to the cause - you understand? - which we don't, we want to escape - when there is complete focussing of your attention on the cause, what happens? That very light of attention dispels the cause, and so there is a total ending of fear.

Don't ask: "But occasionally fear comes up again, can this ending of fear be perpetual?" - you follow how our mind works?

That state which I realized when you pointed out I had captured it for a second, can that second continue? - which is desire, which is time, which is thought. You are back again in the circle. You see our brains are so used to continuity. I have had happiness, it must go on for the rest of my life.

So to look without any movement of thought. That is, to give complete, total energy to observe the jewel that you have caught, which is the cause. Where there is a cause there is an end to the effect, and to the cause itself, naturally.

We will continue if we may on Tuesday, if you are interested. And if one may point out you must see the whole of it, not just that you have told me about fear, that is not good enough. But you have to see life as a total movement, not a fragmentary movement which you are pursuing. Right?

SAANEN 5TH PUBLIC TALK 20TH JULY 1982

What are you waiting for? I think we should go on with our investigation together. We should talk about first, what it is to listen, what is it to learn, and what is it to observe?

Most of us hardly listen. We listen with our sensory ears and it doesn't penetrate much deeper than that generally. To listen without translating what one hears into our own language, without interpreting what is being said, whether by one's friend or relative, or listening to a bird, or to the flow of water, that listening doesn't go very much deeper. You hear a statement by somebody who is telling you something, or the speaker is investigating for you, together we are investigating, whether our hearing is superficial, or the very act of listening opens up the whole problem. So it is important how one listens, not only to what is being said now but to listen, the art of listening, so that one has a great deal of sensitivity in listening. You can reject what is absurd, superficial, that is fairly obvious. But in listening is it possible to see what is false immediately and what is true, not with a lot of explanations, descriptions, analysis, but in the very act of listening perceive?

And listening is perhaps really the greatest thing to do. If one tells you, "I love you", how do you listen to it? Do you actually listen? Or wonder why he says that? What does he want? What is his aim? What is the idea, arriere-pensee, behind the words? So we are not listening actually to the feeling of that person who says, "I have great affection for you". Then if one does so listen there is immediate communication with each other. I wonder - one wonders if it has happened to you that way, to listen so completely so that the whole heaven is open to you.

And also we should consider what is learning? Is there anything to learn, except technological learning, learning a language, learning how to fly or write a letter, learning the fairly necessary things in life? That is necessary. How to read a book, how to drive a car, how to be a very good carpenter. You learn, accumulate and then you use that knowledge to act skilfully. That is what most of us do when we use the word 'learning' - accumulating a lot of information and knowledge stored in the brain, which the brain directs and then acts. That is generally what is understood by what we mean by learning, external learning about the atmosphere, about various things, the peripheral learning. Now is there any other form of learning? Is there a learning which is psychologically accumulated by various incidents, experiences and stored up psychologically, which then in our relationship, in our daily life, will that knowledge help or bring about clarity? You understand my question?

Most of us, as you are doing now perhaps, and I hope you are not, you are listening and learning in the ordinary sense of that word what is being said, accumulating it, and then saying, "Yes, I have understood it." First the listening, then observing the fact or the falseness of what is being said and clinging to something that you feel to be real, and holding on to that, and from there act, accumulating more and more and more. Again the same phenomenon as one does outwardly when learning a language and so on. This is the whole process of learning.

We are asking a question, you and I, is there a different way of observing without accumulating? Because the moment one accumulates and acts, it becomes mechanical. Our brain has become mechanical but when the brain is free of the mechanical process of thought, of reactions, then it has immense capacity, infinite capacity. Look what human beings have done in the technological world, in the world of computers, in the world of warfare, in the world of communication and so on. Within the last perhaps a hundred years tremendous advancement, technologically. So the brain is capable of extraordinary things. The scientists are saying so. Perhaps then you will accept it. That is not being said sarcastically.

Now when we learn as is commonly understood, the learning, accumulating knowledge, that very accumulation process becomes automatic, mechanical. So we are asking a question together whether this mechanical process will ever free the mind, the brain, so that it is in an immense, unlimited state. You understand my question? I hope the question is somewhat clear. Our brain is not yours or mine. That is obvious. Because how can your so-called personal brain evolve? It is the evolution of time - evolution means time - through millenia upon millenia, and this process of evolution has conditioned the brain to certain rewards and punishments, to certain reactions, and so it has made itself limited. And in this limitation it is accumulating knowledge and functioning from that knowledge therefore it makes itself more and more mechanical. It is so obvious, isn't it? It is not something exotic or irrational but when one observes oneself rather deeply and very in the sense aware of what is happening outside and inward, one can see the brain, how it has been conditioned, and that very knowledge which has accumulated is becoming its own instrument of limitation - right? I hope you are meeting this? Are we aware of this? Are we aware that our brains are first of all limited, conditioned - nationalism and so on - conditioned, and we are acting from that conditioning, learning from that conditioning, therefore increasing the conditioning more and more and more - right? Are we aware of this? Know it, perceive it? Not accept that our brains are limited and repeat that they are limited. Whereas if one is aware of this conditioning then one can ask a different question altogether.

Which is: is there any form of psychological learning at all? You understand my question? Are we together in this? Or are we just...?

What is there to learn about oneself - learn in the ordinary sense of that word? What is there when I observe myself, the conditioning, the responses of that conditioning, the reactions to various pressures, influences, strains and seeing this constant pressure externally and inwardly, the strain of it, which becomes more and more, introducing a great factor of conflict - right? And is it possible to be aware of this, to observe this as it is, and find out for oneself whether it is possible to go beyond it? Not to learn what is beyond, because then it is just a quid pro quo - right? This is very important, please, because we are going into something presently which requires your real enquiry.

So we are saying: learning must be there obviously. Learning about the external world totally, as much as one can learn, because learning is never complete about the external world, there is always something being added or taken away. But can one learn, or observe oneself never recording what is observed? Otherwise the recording becomes the knowledge and you are back again. You have understood this? Please we are talking over together. It is not

I, the speaker is laying down any dogma, any belief, any statement, we are enquiring together. Humanity has accumulated a tremendous lot of information, knowledge, which is necessary, externally, with all its pitfalls, with all its dangers, with all its limitations. And is there anything to learn about oneself? Or there is only the act of observation, not learning? We must differentiate between the two: observation and accumulation as learning.

To observe the condition, to observe the reactions, the reactions with their responses as reward, punishment, good and back, the more. Just to observe. And that observation implies holding that which is observed without any movement of thought. Are we together in this or not? One observes that one is afraid, there is fear, conscious or unconscious deep down. The immediate response is to go beyond it, to be free of it, to suppress it, to escape from it. That is our conditioning - right? Now to observe, to be aware of fear and not rationalize it, not give an explanation, not try to discover the cause of it, just to observe it - right? Are you doing it as we are talking?

You observe that you are greedy, envious - envy is not only at the social level but much deeper. Envy implies the more. The more is measurement, the more, the better and so on. It is a form of measurement. Now can you observe envy which has a cause in measurement, in comparison, in imitation, in conformity, in pursuing an ideal, which are all measurements, which are all comparison? Now to observe envy without any accumulated responses to it, are you doing it? Please don't make it difficult. It is really simple. I am envious because I see that you have brains, I see that you are capable, I see you have got extraordinary capacity which I haven't got. And I compare myself with you. That very comparison is the cause of envy - right? - the more. Now to be aware of this process and not move away from my envy, from the envy which is a reaction of my state - right? Can you so hold it as a vessel holds the water, hold it? Are we communicating?

Perhaps some of us are not used to this kind of enquiry. Some of us perhaps come out of curiosity here, or to see that chap, what he is talking about, what he is against or for, and all the things that go on in one's mind, the chattering mind. If one can for an hour give one's attention, it may be sporadic, but give your attention to understand a very complex problem. And the complex problem is: what we have learnt and accumulated all the time is making the brain mechanical. So knowledge is becoming mechanical, making the mind mechanical. I learn how to be a carpenter, I am apprenticed to a Master carpenter and I learn. I have accumulated a great deal of knowledge about the instruments of carpentry, the wood and so on and from there I act, I become a carpenter. That becomes more and more mechanical. If I am a specialist in a certain direction, it is the same thing.

So we are asking a very serious question, which is: is knowledge making us, psychological knowledge, not the outward knowledge, is the psychological knowledge making us more and more mechanical, therefore more and more limiting the capacity of the brain? The brain has an extraordinary capacity, infinite capacity but we have reduced it to a very small affair - right? So can one observe this fact: that psychologically we have been told what we are by the specialists and according to them we try to understand ourselves, according to them we conform, but we never investigate apart from the psychologists. That means enquiring, not knowing, moving. Right? Is this clear?

So there is a hearing, a different action of learning through observation. That learning is not accumulation. The water is flowing, it is never accumulating, it is moving, moving. And when there is the total process of listening, never accumulating from any experience, never recording that which has happened, and this can only take place when you are observing very, very closely, so that the brain which has become more and more conditioned, more and more mechanical, limited, can break down this limitation.

If that is clear then we can begin to enquire into something that is absolutely necessary: what is beauty? What is the relationship of beauty to love, to compassion, to intelligence? Right? Please ask this question, put this question to yourself and find out. We are talking over together, I am not telling you. You are not following the speaker at all. He is totally anonymous. He happens to be sitting on a platform for convenience but there is no authority in this. It is not, "I know and I tell you all about it." On the contrary, we are together co-operating into the investigation into something that is absolutely necessary, the whole of life itself. We have talked about fear and other things during the last times that we met and now we are talking, we are asking: what is this immense sense of beauty?

Our whole civilization, whether in the East or in the West, has been the investigation of the external, making the external as pleasant, as agreeable, as comfortable and so on. Making the external beautiful - beautiful house, beautiful furniture, a lovely garden, beautiful clothes, a marvellous painting, a really quite extraordinary poem, the great cathedrals, the temples and so on. A beautiful woman, a man and so on - external. Making the external as perfect as possible, as accurate as possible. If you live in this part of the country you can see the mechanical things are extraordinarily lasting, you don't have to call the plumber in every other day. Here they endure.

So our history, which is the story of mankind, and that mankind is you, it is the history, the story of yourself. And we have made the external as so-called beautiful as possible. If you see an aeroplane, it is really extraordinarily beautiful, or a diamond, or a marvellous bridge, expanding over vast waters.

So is that beauty? Partly. When you see a mountain against a blue sky, the shadows, the valleys, the rivers, that is an astonishing sight. So one asks: what is beauty? Is there a beauty without having inner beauty? You understand? We will go into the word beauty presently. You may have a beautiful face, beautiful body, proportion, good eyes and all the rest of it. And the external beauty of a person is nice, attractive, pleasant, and is that beauty, without understanding the depth and the meaning of beauty? - You are following? Are we together in this? Yes? Somebody agree with me please. I am not talking to myself.

So what is beauty? Is it only in the external world? And can there be beauty in the external world without understanding the beauty of life in oneself? Right? So we are enquiring together. Please I must emphasize together, co-operating together to find out what is beauty, not according to the magazines, not what the artistic authorities say what is beauty, but to understand for ourselves the nature of beauty. Because without that love cannot be. Has beauty a cause? As love has no cause, as intelligence has no cause, which we went into previously, has beauty a cause? So we are going to enquire if there is a cause to beauty, you understand? A cause. When you see something extraordinarily great, marvellous, majestic, what is your response to it? You observe it, if you are at all aware of something external what is taking place, you say, "How extraordinary, how beautiful that is, let's go and have tea", then such a response is very, very superficial.

Now what takes place when you see something majestic, like these mountains around one? What takes place in you, in each of us? For that single second, or perhaps for some longer period, for that moment the immensity of that pushes away all our problems, all our conflicts, all our unhappiness, for that single instant in the majesty of that great mountain you cease to be, for a second - right? There the outer greatness has driven away the pettiness of oneself? Please observe it, this is so. You stand in front of a great picture, painting, or hear great music, for a moment everything has gone except the sound, and the sound has immense movement, it covers the earth. And at that moment you, as all my associations, is not. When the self is not there is beauty - right? Please see the truth of this, not because the speaker says so. See the actual happening of an incident where you can say, "My god, what an extraordinary thing this is." That is, when your thought and all the implications of thought, and all the things that thought has put together have completely gone for a second. It is not there because something externally has impressed you so enormously you forget yourself. Right?

Now is it possible not to have this enormity in front of you which pushes away the self, the problems and so on, is it possible without any external greatness or beauty or impression to look at life with this sense of not from a centre? You have understood my question? Is it possible for me to look at this life, which is really quite extraordinary, much greater than all the music, and all the temples and all the mountains and poems, this life which is so extraordinary, with all its complexities, with its pain, sorrows, anxieties and so on, to look at it without any response to it, without any reaction to all this? That means can you look at this with absolute quietness? Right? When you look at the mountain you are quiet for a second because that vastness made you be quiet, forced you. Now without any force, without any compulsion, without any pressure externally, have that silent observation not only of yourself, of all the things that are going on, but to have that capacity to observe totally silently. Is not love, which has no cause, one may put it into words, "I love you", but behind those words is a sense of vastness, a sense of extraordinary depth to it. And that depth and that quality cannot possibly exist when there is this tremendous activity of "I should", "I should not" and all the rest of it. Is it possible to look at life that way?

Now we are going to look at a problem which most of have: the problem of dying. It is not the question of old people like myself, it is the problem of everyone whether they are poor, rich, powerful and so on. Together we are going to look at it. Look at it. Not asking for explanations, we will do that presently, later, but to look at this question which has troubled mankind from the time immemorial, death, the dying. Not what happens after the death, not enquire what is more important, which is before death, the whole long period of years before dying, but just to observe the thing called ending. Right? Ending.

Death is the ending. Now what does it mean to end? This is really important, do go into it. To end something; let us take for example attachment. Most of us are attached to a house, to a belief, to a faith, to some ideal, to some pattern of existence, or to a person, attached, which means clinging to that, holding to a person and so on. The consequences of that attachment are fear, anxiety, the pleasure of holding the person or the idea, and fighting for that idea, which is another form of pleasure, following somebody, saying he is my guru, etc. etc. and holding on to him. Or in attachment there is fear, anxiety, some pleasure and the desire to continue in that attachment, never ending it. We all know this. It is so common for most human beings. Now what does it mean to end attachment? Because we see the consequences of it. And also we see the cause of it. I am attached to you as an audience because I derive from that a great sense of satisfaction, a great sense of fulfilment - I don't but suppose I do - a sense of achievement, fame and so on, all that nonsense. We are not talking about detachment. Detachment is the opposite of attachment. When I pursue detachment I am really pursuing attachment. Are you clear on this point? Please see the truth of this. I am attached and it brings me great pain, and out of that pain I say, "For god's sake, if I could be detached from all this." Which is, the response of pain, which has projected an idea of detachment, and I am pursuing detachment. Clear? So we are not talking about detachment. We are only talking about the fact of attachment. Detachment is just an idea, away from attachment.

So we are talking about ending, without the cultivation of detachment - right? Is this clear? So is it possible to end altogether attachment? Which means being aware of all the implications of attachment - right? And end it. The ending is not a process of time - right? Most of us say, "I am attached, yes, I will gradually move away from it. It will take time because I can't let go because there are various reasons and all the rest of it." So it is partly lack of clear observation, partly laziness and the habit of being attached. When one is aware of the whole movement of attachment it is so obvious. When one is deeply aware of this fact of attachment, to a community, to a commune, to a group, you know, the whole of it, to end it because you see the truth of attachment. And the perception of truth is not of time. Right? I wonder if you see this?

Is this clear somewhat? That perceiving that which is false, which is illusory, and that which is true, doesn't take time, doesn't say, "I must think it over, I must analyse it, I must talk to my friends about it, I must cultivate a sense, a silence to observe." So perception, seeing the truth, is not of time. You understand, that's a discovery, because for most of us our tradition says take time, practise. Practise detachment, you may not be free of it today, work at it, which are all so absurd. It is another form of pain, struggle, anxiety.

So to see the fact, the truth is instantaneous if you are aware of the whole thing. But most of us are partially asleep, because we have been drugged by tradition, by what other people have said. If you can put aside all that and look, and see the whole implication of attachment, and end it. The ending is not that there is a future.

Do you understand this? I may end attachment because I have pain in that attachment therefore I want to end it, which has a cause - right? Please understand this. That which has a cause can end. Love has no cause, therefore it is limitless.

So we are asking: as death is the ending, both physiologically and all the things that one has psychologically accumulated. That is the ending. But thought says, "That isn't good enough. What is the future? I have accumulated so much knowledge. I have been virtuous, struggled, what is the reward for all that?" So our mind, our brain is accustomed to reward and punishment. The reward is the future comfort, future security, a continuity of that which has been. And if there is nothing after death life has no meaning. I will go on, struggle, I have done that all my life, it is part of life. But if we understand the nature of conflict and end it.

So what is it that continues? You understand? What is it that has given us the sense of continuity? Physiologically one has continued from the moment you are born until you die, there is a continuity. It is measurable by age, by time, physically. Apart from that, what is continuity? The things that I have accumulated, the furniture, the knowledge, the experience, the vast suffering? Is there a sense of no measurement? Continuity means measurement. Are you following this? Anything that continues can be measured, not by measurement, a tape, but the psychological comparison that I have been this and I am going to be that, that is a form of continuity - right? - which is measurement. Can I look at continuity without measurement? Or is it possible for the brain not to measure? Measurement was born out of Greece - right? Out of ancient Greece measurement was put together. And the western world and the eastern world has followed this pattern, without measurement there is no technology - right?

So our conditioning is to measure - the better, the more. Now is there an observation without measurement? This is rather a complex question, you can't just agree or disagree because all our life is based on measurement. You are tall, I am short, you are clever, I am not, you are beautiful, I am not. You are a great success, I am a failure. So always in the realm of comparison - right? - which is measurement. What does it mean to live without measurement? You are asking this question. I hope you are. To have no measure, which means no comparison. Is love measurement? You understand? Please go into this. I love you, tomorrow I won't love you.

To live a life, if it is at all possible, one has to go into it, find out, to live a life without a cause, which is time, to live a life without measurement. To live a life without the burden which is accumulated in that word 'the better', 'the more', is it at all possible? Or life must always continue in measurement, in cause, therefore always within the limitation of time and knowledge.

Right sirs, that is enough.

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC TALK 22ND JULY 1982

This is the last talk. There will be a question and answer meeting on Sunday.

We have talked about many things together during this Gathering. Together we observed and examined many other factors and problems of our life. We also should this morning explore together whether it is possible to live in this world, which is becoming more and more corrupt, more and more immoral, wars, uncertainty, dangerous, whether in this world we can live at peace, whether the conflict that is going on outwardly, whether that conflict is destroying us also, or whether we have contributed to that chaos in the world.

And we ought to talk over together what does it mean to live at peace? It requires a great deal of enquiry, a great deal of not merely superficial verbal explanation but one has to look at one's life in relationship to the world and find out for ourselves whether we can live utterly inwardly peacefully. One cannot live at peace with oneself if one is in constant conflict. We went into that question: what is the cause of conflict? And we pointed out in our examination together: wherever there is a cause that cause can come to an end. And we have made life into a series of causes. And when there is the ending of cause, is there peace? And we also enquired together into the nature of fear, what is the cause of fear. And we went briefly into the problem of suffering. Mankind throughout the world has suffered a great deal and still goes on suffering. In their desire to be free from suffering they have accepted all kinds of illusions. They have been trapped in various beliefs, dogmas, rituals and concepts, and yet fear remains as one of the major factors of our life. We went into that too.

And we also went into the question: what is a human being, living in this world, what can he do which will both affect his life and the life around him? And if his action is based on an ideal, a conclusion, an ideological concept, any action born from these various causes of action, then there must inevitably be conflict. We went into that quite deliberately, deeply.

And we should also go this morning into the question of suffering, whether suffering can end in mankind, in us. And the question of religion: what is religion? And also to understand, explore into the nature of meditation and whether there is something sacred at all? These are the problems we are going to talk over together this morning.

Man has suffered, and is still suffering, for various causes: the cause of war, the cause of division, nationally, economically, socially. And also he has suffered in isolation. He is isolated both in his activity and in his way of life. He is concerned with himself, though he may be related to others intimately, or not, he is concerned with himself and he is living a solitary lonely life, desiring various, not only physical objects but psychological projections to be achieved in his isolation.

And we talked about human consciousness. That is, our life which is based, which is the result of our accumulated experiences, incidents, beliefs, anxieties, loneliness and so on, which makes up the whole content of our consciousness. Our consciousness is not individual because our consciousness is the rest of mankind. All human beings suffer, even the most uneducated, ignorant, living in a small village or town, he also suffers, which is the common lot of mankind. When one observes this non-verbally, not as an idea but actually then one sees one's consciousness is not a particular consciousness. It is the consciousness of all mankind, therefore your consciousness, with all its content is the consciousness of all humanity, therefore you are actually, when you observe, you are the rest of mankind. You are not actually an individual. That is our conditioning, our tradition, our education and our religious beliefs, that we are separate souls, that our brains are separate, which is totally absurd if you examine it. Our brains are the result of great evolution, time. It is not a particular individual consciousness. There is no individual thought. Thought again is the common ground of all mankind. So there is no individual thought, or individual isolated existence. We went into this very carefully.

And also in talking about consciousness and all its content thought has put together the content of our consciousness - our gods, our rituals, our behaviour, all the things that thought has invented, both outwardly and inwardly And we went into the question: what is thinking? What is the nature of thought? Because all of us live, most of us, on the activity of thought. And part of thought is our sorrow. And whether thought can ever end sorrow? You understand our question? I suffer. Suppose I suffer, an ordinary man living in some country, surrounded by lots of idiocy and so on. I suffer. My son is dead. Or the person whom I think I love has gone. In this detachment, in this isolation, because I have lost something which I have held dear, I have been attached to that person, or to that idea, and that idea is shattered by reason, logic, sane observation. And also my son has been dead, disappeared entirely from this earth. And I suffer. And together, please, as we said, we are enquiring together. The speaker is not at all important, he is totally, completely anonymous, he has no authority. But together we are going to enquire into the nature of suffering.

Suddenly I find myself isolated completely. I have depended on my son, or on my wife, or girl-friend and so on. And one day I have lost him or her. And sorrow, pain, grief, is my lot, as the lot of all human beings living on the earth. And what am I to do? Bear the suffering, which most of us do, in isolation? Or escape from that suffering through some form of drug? - whether that drug be a concept, a future projected formula that "I will meet him when I die"? All those forms are an escape from reality. The reality is that I suffer. I am not escaping from that suffering nor seeking comfort. I hope we are together in this. Because when one seeks comfort when there is sorrow, it is an escape from actuality, from that actual state of suffering. There are various forms of comfort - belief, rationalization, enquiring deeply into oneself. All those forms of observation are another form of escape. So can I, with my tears, with my longing for my son, wife, or girl-friend, or the lost beliefs and ideals, can I remain, can the mind or the brain remain with that suffering? What we mean by remaining is not to escape in any form from the actual, the actual pain, the real grief which brings about tears. Life then becomes utterly meaningless because I have been so dependent, attached, and that which I have been attached to is gone. And I suddenly realize how utterly lonely I am. (Noise of aeroplane)

This is a serious subject not to be interrupted by noise. We should really have these meetings far away from all civilization, where one can talk over things together seriously without any interruption. And as that is not possible we have to listen to the noise, listen to the thunder of an aeroplane, of a jet, without any resistance, and as you would listen to the speaker and to yourself without any resistance. But for most of us resistance is a part of our life. We resist anything new. We resist any change. We resist any new thought, though thought can never have a new concept, thought can project something and call it new and we resist it. If we understand the nature of resistance then we will know when not to resist. When we know what it is to co-operate, not round a person or an idea, or some authority, or for some profitable reason. To co-operate not for a particular reason, or with a motive, but the quality of co-operation, to work together, the feeling of wanting to work together, not for something, nor because of something. When there is that spirit, that clarity of co-operation, then one will know for oneself when not to co-operate, as one will know when not to resist. So one hopes in our conversation together, in our enquiry, we are not resisting each other.

So I have lost, as all human beings have lost, something that I held very closely, dearly, and I find myself totally isolated. So what is the relationship between love, isolation and grief, sorrow? What is the relationship of suffering to love? I love my son. And if love brings sorrow, is that love? Is sorrow part of love? As jealousy, as fear, anxiety, is that the nature of love? Or love has nothing whatsoever to do, has no relationship whatsoever with sorrow. Please we are enquiring together. We are examining so that we find the actual reality of love and suffering. The speaker is not stating something which you have to accept, or deny. We are examining together, therefore it is neither yours nor mine, it is examination. Like a scientist examining the cause of a cancer, if he is a rather shoddy scientist then his personal interest is involved in that examination, which distorts that examination. Whereas we are now, ordinary human beings, with all our daily problems, and one of them is sorrow, asking whether sorrow can ever end? Or it is the lot of man? Is there the ending of this thing? And in the ending is the brain seeking a further result? I hope you are all following all this carefully. I may end sorrow, which requires a great deal of understanding of one's own consciousness, the consciousness of mankind. To go into that very deeply, which means whether thought, which is the central factor, the contributory element in putting together the whole structure of consciousness, what is the relationship of thought to sorrow?

Therefore one has to ask what is the relationship of desire, which for most of us is the actuality, what is the relationship of desire to love? And where there is desire, this urge to fulfil, the energy of that desire, will it end sorrow? Or the understanding of all causation, the investigation of all causation - you are following? - our life is based on causation: I do this because in doing this I will get a reward: if I do this I will be punished. So our life is essentially based on various causes, and where there is a cause there must be an end, so we cling to causation. I wonder if you are following all this? You understand? Causation, the motive, the result, the reward, the punishment, that is our life. And so our life is a process of cause and effect. From that effect becomes the cause, and so it is a perpetual chain. And thought realizes this, if you are at all aware of all this.

And what is life without a cause? Can one live without a cause? Suffering has a cause, which is my desire to be attached, my desire to possess, in that possession I feel safe, in holding on to a belief there is certain security, so there is always this process of cause and effect. So the cause of suffering is my movement of self-centred isolation. This is obvious. Two wars are going on at present - in Lebanon, Iraq and Iran. They are all human beings, they have isolated themselves as the Israelis, the Iranians and the Iraqis, they have isolated themselves. In that isolation they thought there was security. That isolation has brought about tremendous wars throughout the world, in the past and in the present, and probably in the future. So wherever there is isolation there must be grief, there must be conflict. This is a law. This is so. And our whole life is a process of isolation, so there is conflict, there is grief, there is sorrow.

So then one asks: is it possible to live in this world without a cause and without isolation - right? And therefore one asks: has love a cause? Please ask yourself, the speaker is only verbalizing what you are asking, what you want, what your enquiry is. Has love a cause? Has intelligence, the capacity to observe very clearly without any distortion, without any bias, without the previous knowledge which guides? To observe so closely, it has no cause. So love has no cause. And can one live in this world, which is appalling, so utterly destructive, can one live in this world with that intelligence which has no cause, and that love which has no cause? Which means can one live in this world with complete compassion? Compassion can only be when thought doesn't belong to any group, any association, any isolation. You understand all this?

Then we can proceed to find out together what is religion? What is religion? Why human beings are trapped in organized religions, as the Christians, the Buddhists, the Hindus, the Muslims and so on and so on? The small little sects and the large expanding sects, they all call themselves religious. In their religion they have a thousand divisions. I believe there are in India something like three hundred thousand gods. And you can have your choice. And here too you have got a great many divisions, perhaps not so many. But in having many it is rather pleasant, you don't belong to any. But if you have one or two principal divisions it then becomes rather difficult.

So we are enquiring together into what is religion? Why man, throughout the ages, accepting that life is pain, life is sorrow, life is constant travail, has projected something called god - thought has invented it. I wonder how many of us see that fact, that thought is responsible for the gods, for the rituals, for the dogmas, for the various divisions of religions, thought is at the core of it. And whatever thought has put together can never be sacred. Right?

Then if one sees the truth, not the verbal explanation, but the actual, when one sees the truth that whatever thought has created is mechanical, thought being in itself divisive, limited, though the brain, which is now conditioned by thought, that brain has extraordinary capacity, infinite capacity, not your brain but the brain of mankind. So in enquiring into religion, we can discard entirely, completely, all the things that thought has put together, which then thought says you must worship, which is just a form of a game, a form of illusion. The word 'illusion' means, the root of it, is to play. So our religions are a matter of amusement, entertainment, sensation. If one has put aside all that, that means the brain is clear, therefore not afraid what happens in the future, or in the past.

Please follow all this a little more closely if you will, together. The brain as it is now, our brain, is limited, conditioned by vast experience of millenia. Our brains are the result of accumulated knowledge, from books, from the prophets, from all the psychologists of the past, present and future. Our brain is shaped, conditioned, therefore limited. And that brain can never, as it is now, uncover the limitless, the enquiry into the whole universe. The scientists are exploring the universe, through telescopes, through various forms of satellites and so on. It is all the activity of thought. Thought is enquiring into the universe. You understand? And thought can never, whatever it does, understand the deep fulness and the beauty of the universe. Our brain is limited, mechanical and is it possible to free the brain from all its conditioning? You understand? Then one can discover - not one - then there is a possibility to find out that which is timeless, that which has no limitation, that which is not the result of measurement?

So we are asking: a religious man, not one who belongs to various religions, but the religious man who doesn't belong to any community, to any group, no nation, he doesn't have any belief, for all these are factors of conditioning, then one can ask: can one be totally free, is there a freedom from the content of our consciousness? I am putting the thing differently.

Our consciousness is put together by thought. Which is, I believe in god, I don't believe in god, I have faith, I have no faith, I belong to a particular country, I am patriotic, I suffer, I have pain, I have anxiety, I have loneliness. All that is put together by thought as consciousness, which is me. Right? It is so obvious. Can that content end? You understand? Can that content, which is so confused, which is so messy, disorderly, contradictory, can that consciousness with its content totally disappear? That is we have talked about it as fear, the ending of fear. We have talked about various contents of that consciousness, is that possible? You understand?

Now this is meditation, not all the silly things that are going on, with their systems, with their practices, with their desire to achieve something or other. Because the more they practise the more they go step by step, by step, every day the brain becomes more and more mechanical, more and more dull, more and more repetitive. You will do what you please. But if you really want to understand the nature of meditation, what is involved in it, there must be freedom: never to follow somebody, never to accept authority inwardly. Freedom demands tremendous intelligence. There is no cause for freedom. I suffer therefore I must be free - then that which you are seeking is another form of imprisonment. But when one begins to enquire into freedom, it is not going from one corner of the world to another corner, travelling, nor is freedom choice. Our choice is to move from one corner of the field to another corner but remain in the same field, and this movement is called choice.

So one has to enquire together into the nature of freedom. I want to be free because I have pain. There is a motive. I want to be free from all attachment because attachment implies pain, jealousy, anxiety, the fear of being alone. So freedom has no cause.

Then we can begin to examine: what is meditation? The very word implies, the root of it, not only to ponder over, think over, but deeply the freedom from all measurement. Do you understand? Measurement. That is, achieving something which requires time. Right? Every form of measurement - the better, the more, the becoming, the achieving, which ordinary meditations promise, but in meditation there is the freedom from measurement. Follow this carefully. Please this is very serious if you are interested in it. To observe without measurement, which means no comparison. "I have been, I am, I shall be", which is measurement, which is time. Man has asked whether time has a stop. Meditation is the enquiry into time, whether it has a stop. That is, time has put together the 'me', the self, the self with all its knowledge, whether that self, which is the result of evolution, which is time, which is thought, whether that has an end, a stop? Which means, the freedom from all becoming, from all measurement, whether you sit cross-legged, breathe in different ways, become neurotic about your food, accept some kind of fad, and practise some kind of system, all that is a continuity of time, the brain demanding more experience, the more.

So meditation is the ending of the self, the 'me', which is love. How can I love you if I am most concerned with myself? If I am ambitious, greedy, envious, wanting to fulfil, achieve, how can there be love? So to see the truth of it, not take time over it, not analyse it, go into step by step, explanation after explanation, but to see instantly that as long as the brain is caught in time and thought, which is limited, what ever it does will create more conflict. See it instantly, the truth of it, which is to have an insight into it, the whole movement of it. Then, as we said at the beginning of the conversation, the brain has that peace of quietness, silence, naturally. There is no perpetuity of thought all the time chattering, chattering. Living in this world, is that possible? One has to go to the office from nine until five - god knows why! Of course I know why, we all know why - responsibility, money, position, you know, the whole business, nine to five. And there are those who don't want to go to the office, form a commune and work together on their own land, or whatever it is, that is also another occupation, from nine to five. One has to live in this world, one has to have money, shelter, clothes, that is normal, natural. And can one live with that quality of love, with that quality of intelligence and freedom - they are all one, they are not three separate activities, time, thought, intelligence, love - you understand? As we know it now. But when there is freedom of this limitation, love without a cause, freedom without a cause, and intelligence without cause, with that state of quality, can one live in this world? Go to the office, go to a factory, cook, wash dishes, go for a solitary walk even for ten minutes, is that possible living in this terrible world? You have to answer that question, not me. You will answer it only when you have realized that thought is the central issue, that thought is always, under all circumstances, is fragmentary, because knowledge is fragmentary, there can never be complete knowledge. Then meditation is the total denial - denial I am using in the right sense of the word - denial of the self, the 'me'.

Then one asks: is there anything sacred beyond all this? You understand? Because that is what man has enquired. He says this world, in which we live, is perpetual conflict and pain. There may be slight joys and pleasures but there is always this, there is always death, there is always pain, both physically and psychologically, and he says, "Is there something beyond all this?" Because one sees all this is so meaningless, empty, and one asks: is there something beyond, something that transcends all this? So not being able to transcend this he invents the gods, the principles, you follow? So is one aware of this, not to be caught in that trap of the priest, of the specialist - right?

Then in this freedom, love and intelligence, the brain is naturally not chattery, not pursuing one thought after another, is quiet. You know silence has its own sound. The silence that thought creates is noisy. The silence of a brain that is free has its own peculiar sound. Out of that sound is creativeness. You won't understand this unless you have done all this. It is just like words. In that silence with its sound there may be something which is limitless, timeless. That may be the eternal love. Do you understand?

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 25TH JULY 1982

The talks are over. This is a meeting where many questions have been put, written down. And I don't think it's possible to answer all the questions that have been sent in. It would probably take ten days or so to answer each one of them, or perhaps more. So I've chosen some of the questions out of them.

When we put a question to somebody, or to ourselves, what is the intention behind the question? Is it merely to find an answer, and the answer from somebody else, or do we put the question to ourselves and what is the response to the question which we have put to ourselves? As there have been written down questions handed over, apparently you're expecting actually answers from the speaker. I'm afraid that will not be possible. We are going together to explore the question. We're going together not seek an answer, but rather what the question itself means. And so in the very investigation of that question we find the answer - we find the answer is in the question, not away from the question. Right?

The question is an explosion, it's a challenge. And to meet a challenge, whether it is scientific, medical or our own personal lives, one must approach it correctly. The approach, if we can go into it first, matters a great deal. How do we approach any problem? A problem, the meaning of that word is something thrown at you - that's the root meaning of that word, something pushed forward. And how do we meet it? What is our motive in looking at it, the question. What is our cause in inquiring into the question? Is it to find a comfortable answer, a satisfying answer, or to investigate the question so deeply? And to enquire deeply one cannot have a motive, a question when you are looking at it, exploring it, opens its whole depth and significance. So could we, this morning and the next two mornings, in investigating the question, one must be clear whether we approach it with a motive, or observe the question very carefully, so that the question itself begins to unfold.

For most of us we want to narrow down everything to a certain narrow point of view. For most of us any problem which is related to all other problems - there is no single problem by itself - but we would like to reduce this problem to a narrow, limited, enquiry. But in enquiring you must let it flow, let it run, let it move. So that's what we can, I hope, together, go into these questions. The speaker is not answering the questions, but rather together co-operating in the enquiry of the question. Right?

1st QUESTION: Can one slow down the ageing process of the mind? Or is the deterioration of the mind inevitable?

That is a question that all of us are asking as we grow older. Everybody wants to slow down the process of ageing, not only physically but also mentally, intellectually, emotionally, and keep the capacity of heightened sensitivity. Right? We all want that, especially as one grows older. One can be old at the age of ten. Or one can be old at the age of ninety. So we must enquire what do we mean by growing old.

The world outside of us is always pressing down upon us. The world is becoming more and more dangerous, more and more violent, and if we do not respond to it correctly, we'll also be violent, we'll also be destructive and degenerating. So there is the problem, there is the question: can the brain keep young? It doesn't matter how old it is, can that brain be active, efficient, clear, and have the energy of youth, to make decisions, and maintain a certain standard of quality? That is the problem, that is the question.

Right? Is this possible? We would all like to have a very clear, precise, decisive brain, unconfused, uncluttered, always fresh, moving, not bogged down by problems. That's what we all would like, whether we are very young or very old.

And what makes the brain old? Please, we are enquiring together, you're not just listening to the speaker. What makes the brain, which is, as we explained during the talks, not our brain, it is not a personal brain, that it's rather childish and rather immature to think our brain is mine and yours, because the brain has evolved through time, accumulated a great deal of knowledge, has been through a great many experiences, pain, sorrow, anxiety, all kinds of travail. It's not my brain or your brain, it's the brain of humanity that has manifested itself in each of us. I think we have talked about it very carefully so we don't have to go into it now.

So what makes the brain, which is manifest in each of us, old, worn down? Please, we're asking each other this question. Please think it out, not just wait for me to explain it. Any organism, any machinery, wears down through friction - friction, either artificially created, brought about, or the natural friction. Whether it is artificial or natural, it is friction. Everything wears down through friction, friction being strain, disease, ill health, wrong behaviour and so on. It is inevitable that the brain should and must break down, deteriorate. And the questioner asks whether it is possible to keep it afresh. In investigating this question, what is the cause of this deterioration? Is it conflict, perpetual conflict? Our life is not only conflict but adjustment. We are exploring together, you're not accepting what the speaker is saying. We are together looking at this problem. This question has been asked from the ancient of times, and apparently very few have found the answer, the cause. Perhaps we can try to find the correct observation into this matter.

Is it conflict? Conflict in our relationship, conflict in becoming - I am this, I will be that. 'What is' and 'what should be', 'what is', and transform 'what is' into the ideal. 'What is', that is, what I am, what is at the present moment, what is actually happening inwardly, and that happening is translated according to the past, or according to an ideological concept. So there is always this contradictory existence. This very contradiction is the cause, one of the causes of conflict. Right?

Please, let's understand it very carefully. 'What is', that which is actually happening, and we have the ideal, the opposite, and we strive to achieve the opposite, so there is always conflict. Is this very clear then we can enquire if this conflict is necessary. We might say all life so far has been a series of infinite conflicts, it can never end - that's part of life. If you accept that, then inevitably the machinery, which is the brain, will wear down. But if you don't accept that, that conflict is necessary, then we can ask, as we're asking now: is conflict necessary, in relationship, in learning, in acquiring knowledge, conflict? Now, which means, does duality exist at all, the opposite? Right? Are we meeting each other? We're asking each other, does the opposite exist, which is the contrary, which is something totally opposed to 'what is'.

That is - you're following all this, we're enquiring - are you interested in all this? I hope the speaker is not making you interested in it. This is a natural interest of every human being, wherever he be in the world, he wants to find out.

And we're asking, is there a psychological opposite? There is the opposite, man-woman, darkness and light, pain and no pain - there is the opposite, naturally, but we're asking, is the conflict, does it exist in the psychological opposite? Is that clear? So is there an opposite to 'what is'? I am violent, and is there an opposite to violence? And many philosophers and many teachers and many idealists have said it, the opposite is the concept of non-violence. Right? Then we have the problem right away, the concept and the fact. So there is a division of time. Right? Time being, 'what is' and what is violence, that to be transformed through a series of investigations, to arrive at the opposite, which is non-violence, which is the end of violence. Right? Now where there is opposite, there must be conflict, good and bad. Right? We're talking psychologically, first. So there is violence probably in all human beings, inherited from the animal and so on. And cultivated, carefully, through nationalism, separatism, the idea that each one of us is utterly separate from everybody else, psychologically. Right? Religions throughout the world have maintained that you are a separate soul. We've talked about that during the last six Talks.

So we are asking: is there psychologically an opposite to 'what is'? Right? I am violent. Why does the thought create the opposite? The fact is I am violent, the fact is I am anxious, the fact is I am greedy, envious, lonely, those are facts. The opposite is a non-fact. Right? Do we accept that? What matters is not there should be freedom from violence, what matters is to understand the nature of violence, and see if violence can end, not create the opposite. The moment we create, thought creates the opposite, conflict begins. Is this clear? Can we go on from there?

So one is violent. Can we look at that quality, that reaction, and find out whether it is possible to end violence, not create a state of mind which says, "I'm free from violence", ending violence? You understand? Not the continuation of violence as non-violence. Right? That is, the opposite is inevitably born from its own opposite. Right? So is it possible to observe violence and end it? What is violence? Anger, the desire to hurt another, violence is competition, comparison, imitation - all that is generally considered violence. An ambitious man is naturally violent. We have described what is violence. And without creating the opposite, can this state of violence end? Right? Because we see the opposite must create conflict. Right? But if I say to myself, I must end violence in order to achieve another state, that, again, is escaping from 'what is'. Clear?

So can that end, and not let it continue in another form, at another level? Right? So let's find out together whether violence with all its extraordinary complexity can end. That is, can we observe the reaction which the word has awakened - right? - the word - for most of us the word is extraordinarily important, so can we look at this reaction called violence without the word? Right? It's really quite a complex issue this. Can I look at my wife, if I have one, or girl friend, without the word, without the word which creates the image, the word which is the symbol, and discover that thought is the movement of verbalization? Right? Are you doing all this together, are we? Or am I, are you merely listening to the speaker?

You know, we are caught in a network of words. We are German, French, Italian, whatever it is. Those are just words, but behind that word is a great deal of culture, certain traditions and so on, and so on.

So can one observe this fact of violence without the word? That's the first question. Then is the word creating the feeling? Right? When I say 'my wife', the word creates the feeling. So can we look at the reaction without the word? Right? See what the implications of that is. That is, the word is the remembrance or the association of the past incidents which I have called violent. So when I use the word, I have related the present response to the past, and therefore the past is judging. Right? This requires a lot of exercise of the brain, exercise to observe very, very, very closely when you're looking at this fact of violence. So is there a freedom from the word, so that you look? Right? When you free the brain, when there is freedom from the word, what remains? You understand? Only the reaction, what you have named as violent. I wonder if you follow all this. Are we meeting each other - or am I talking to myself?

In observation to be free of time. Right? I'll explain it more. Time being the past - right? - modifying the present, and continuing. Right? The past accumulation of memories, experience, knowledge, meeting the present, modified or not modified, and continuing, which is the future. Now to look at violence without the idea of time. Have you got it?

Now, just a minute. To look at one's wife or friend or whatever it is, afresh, to look at something afresh, time cannot be, cannot come into being. Right? If I look at my wife with all the past memories and incidents and so on, and so on, this accumulation which is the result of time, is observing the wife. Right? So can I look at the person whom I call my wife without the word and without time? You understand? Try it, do it, sir as you are sitting there. You see it requires very, very close observation to do all this. It requires a brain that is active, not just say, yes, a brain that is alert and sensitive to this question. To observe without time and the word, time being all the accumulated knowledge about her and about him. Then you are observing the person or that reaction afresh. Right? Are we doing it?

And the question is: is it possible for the brain not to deteriorate? And we said, conflict is one of the factors of deterioration, strain, pressure, the urge to achieve, the urge to become something, psychologically, all these are factors of conflict. Now we have observed the whole movement of violence, which is one of the major factors of conflict, factors in which conflict is involved. Right? Now can this conflict, psychologically, inwardly, end? Please ask yourself, go into it. Let's go into it again carefully, because one can see any machinery which is in perpetual movement, however well oiled but constantly moving, must wear down. And one of the factors is that thought, thought is perpetually active. Right? Now can thought, which is chattering all the time, creating pictures, all that - can thought come to an end in observing itself in action? You understand? Oh Lord! Which is, can thought quieten down, because thought is constantly active, therefore the brain is constantly being, chattering, arguing, discussing - you follow? Can that brain with its movement of thought, quieten down? Right? And they have said, it is possible if you do certain things, meditate, sit quietly, go for a walk by yourself, all that. Right? But all that has a motive, a cause, because you think by quietening down the brain will become not so old. Right? So where there is a motive, the end is merely a continuation in another form. I wonder if you understand all this.

So, sir, you're not used to this kind of thinking, you're not used to investigation, free investigation. So, we're asking whether the brain, which has become mechanical, which is constantly active, can that activity slow down? Can that activity stop? What is the motive behind that desire, that question: can it stop? Is it that you want to have a brain that is very young, therefore there is a motive behind it. That very motive is going to destroy your investigation. Right? So can one be free of all motives in looking at this fact? Right? If there is freedom from motive, however subtle, however hidden, then can conflict end? Now this is the question - can conflict end? Who's going to answer it? The speaker? Or you have investigated it, explored into it, and it's burst open, and you have to answer it yourself. Right? Can you look at it and find out? Suppose if the speaker said, says, "Yes, it can end", then where are you? It's not important. What is important is to find out for oneself. So the question is answered.

2nd QUESTION: How can one face an incurable disease with all the physical pain and agony that's involved?

There are different kinds of pain, physical and psychological. Now the psychological pain, the agony, the acute suffering, is that what one is concerned with? Or the physical pain, a certain incurable disease, like cancer, how do we meet this? There are various drugs and so on to alleviate physical pain. And one can put up with it. I'm sure most of us have experienced in spite of the drugs, put up with certain forms of pain. When it becomes acute, then you do something, some kind of medicine, medical treatment.

So let us first look at the psychological pain, which may be psychosomatic. And what is pain inwardly? You answer please. What is psychological grief, pain, pain that's caused by many factors, like one wants to fulfil, become, achieve, and there is the pain of all that. Right? There is the pain of being hurt, being wounded by another. And most of us are hurt from childhood, and we carry that hurt all our lives. That hurt brings about a resistance - right? - resistance in my relationship, because I don't want to be hurt any more. So I build a wall around myself, isolate myself, and that creates more fear. So I live with this hurt and fear and resistance all my life. That's one of the hurts that most human beings have. Is it possible not to have the pain of hurt, which is, not to be hurt at all, psychologically? Right? What is it that is hurt? Look at it, please, go into it yourself. When I say, "I am hurt by what you have told me, what you have said", what is it that's hurt? The 'me'. What is that? What is the 'me' which is hurt? The thought which has created the image, the image being myself. Right? Myself is not without the image.

I may have many images. So is it possible to live a daily life without the image which is me? Go into it, sir. You understand? The image is getting hurt, the image is causing pain, the image is created by thought through various incidents, accidents, and so on. That image, with all its complexity, it isn't just an image, is hurt.

The image is I have a conclusion, I've come to a conclusion, and I hold onto that conclusion. And any disturbance of that conclusion is pain. I believe, if I do, in God. And you come along and say, "Don't be absurd." Then that very verbal assertion has hurt, because I'm beginning to question. Or I may not question but I'm hurt, because you say something very serious.

So as long as we have an image, as long as the process of thought, which is constantly creating the image and giving life to that image, there must be pain. Right? This is a fact. Then one asks, can that pain end, which means, can one live in this life without any image? Sir, this is not an intellectual conundrum, a puzzle - this is our life. "I am British", or Indian, or whatever it is. And it is very important to hold to that image. Any slur on that image I get violent, and pain follows and so on. Can one live a life without any image whatsoever? Right? You think it out.

Now there is this psychological pain. If one understands the nature of this pain, inwardly, therefore there is no image and therefore there is no pain as we, psychologically, know it. Right? From there let's move to the physical pain, not from the physical to the psychological, but from the psychological to the physical. Right? We always are concerned with the physical pains, never enquiring into the psychological structure of pain, inwardly. Right? We begin with the psychological, the psychosomatic state of mind and brain, and then enquire into the physical pain.

We live such rotten lives, smoke, drink and all the rest of it, we're all the time corrupting the natural process of life. Right? Pollution, polluting the air, waters, eating dead animals - right? Carcasses. And indulging ourselves in various forms of sensation and taste becomes all-important. So physically we yield to all the things that seem so abnormal. Right? And that may be, and perhaps it is one of the causes of physical pain, disease and illness. We're not going into the question, now what is disease and what is illness - we'll do that another time. Or you've have an accident, in a car. Your arm or your leg is broken and so on. Can one look at all this pain, physical pain, if it isn't too acute, to observe it, and remain with it for a while, as long as one can? You understand my question? Do we accept physical pain, or we are always trying to get rid of pain? If it is acute, naturally, we want to be free of pain. But can we observe pain, not being identified with pain? You understand my question? Suppose I have a bad headache, migraine, can I observe it, not identify myself with it? You understand my question? Or say, "My God, I've got such awful headache, I must do something about it." Or, if it isn't too terrible, can one be free of all identification with that pain? Right? Enquire into it, find out.

Sirs, in all this, what is important is to approach life with intelligence. Now what is intelligence? This is a problem, isn't it - here is a problem - first problem was whether the brain can be kept fresh, young, active, clear. Second question is, can one bear pain, and so on. Now, in observing these two questions, the central fact comes out, which is intelligence. To approach life, which is pain, pleasure, anxiety, sorrow, and all the complexities of this life which man has made for himself, both outwardly and inwardly: the wars, the terrors, the terrorists, kidnapping, the brutality, the vulgarity, the coarseness, the whole of that - which is part of our life, can one approach all this with real intelligence?

So let's enquire, what is intelligence? Right? If you are not tired.

Intelligence, the meaning of that word, is to accumulate information and use it, collect a lot of information and use it so-called intelligently, not according to your pleasure or pain, according to your bias, you have collected lot a of experience, knowledge, and employed that knowledge actively in life, intelligently. Right? That intelligence is not personal, because you have accumulated a lot of information. You may identify yourself with that information, saying, 'My information' but it is information. So can you see that intelligence is not personal, it is not the clever activity of thought? Right?

When we enter into the world of technology there is a vast accumulation of experience, knowledge. A technician may use that tremendous accumulation and identify himself with that accumulation, with that knowledge, and says, "I have done it." Right? Or he uses that information, knowledge, to produce something. Like a scientist who has gathered a great deal of knowledge from previous scientists, and uses it and enquires further and is adding to that knowledge. But the moment he identifies himself with that knowledge as 'me', the great person who has - then that activity is not intelligent. Right? Right? And intelligence is not the activity of thought. This is difficult to understand. We are enquiring, not accepting my definition. You're not accepting my description and the explanation of what is intelligence. We are seeing together what is intelligence, not my conclusion or your conclusion. Right?

Now what is intelligence? Thought is based on accumulated knowledge. Right? Therefore that knowledge will always be limited, there is no complete knowledge about anything. We must be clear on this point. Right? About the universe, about science, about physics, there is no complete, total knowledge, they are always adding, adding. Right? So knowledge goes hand in hand with ignorance. Right? Of course. I know you won't like that, but that's a fact. Right? So knowledge, being limited, thought must be limited. Right? That's so - it is limited. And whatever thought does, cleverly, being limited, is not complete intelligence. Right? You're following this? So it is not the activity of thought bringing about clever perceptions, clever arguments, clever doctrinaire theories - that's not intelligence - right? So what is intelligence? We have negated what it is not. Right? Right, sir? We have said this is not it, this is not it, this is not it. Then what is? If you discard all this, what it is not, which is also to see the false as the false - right? To see the truth in the false. Right? Which is another form of discarding. So if you discard all this, which includes time - right? - because accumulation of knowledge is time - right? - then what remains is intelligence. Right?

Now just a minute. I see something: I see I am vain, proud, arrogant, that is perceivable. Now to take time to dissolve it, if one wants to, that is, I will take time not to be arrogant - is that an intelligent action, because I have allowed there time? I am vain, I play it for a while, I like it, I know it is absurd but I like it, I carry on. And I hope some day it will end. Which is, I perceive, I am aware that I am vain, and I don't act immediately. The immediate action is intelligence. Get it? You understand? Is this clear? When I allow time to dissolve, or put away my vanity, then the action is not intelligent. But to perceive and act immediately is intelligence. Right? Which is, not to allow time to come between the perception and action.

So we can go into this fact of what is intelligence? Right? Look at another factor in this - what is love? We all use that word very freely. What do we mean by that word? You can only find out the depth of that word, the depth of that feeling, the clarity, the intensity of it, only when you discover what it is not - right? Right? It is not jealousy - right? Would you agree to that? I love you. Do I? I love you - I mean it. When I say, "I love you", I mean it. I love you. Has that love any motive? That is, the motive being I love you because I sit on a platform and talk to you, I feel very satisfied, very - you know, all the glamour of it, I am fulfilling that and so on, all that absurd stuff. So when I say, "I love you" if there is a motive, it is not. Right? If there is jealousy, which is, I'm attached to you, I cling to you, it gives me a sense of power, position, a sense of the avoidance of loneliness, and when I say, "I love you" it means I'm attached to you. Is that love? Go on, sir, investigate it. Is attachment love? Obviously not.

So I have discovered jealousy is not, attachment is not. I perceive attachment, I am attached, I won't take time to free myself from attachment, I see the consequences of attachment and end it immediately. That is intelligence.

So what are the factors which love is not? We said jealousy, attachment and isolation - my ambition, my fulfillment, you follow? The whole movement of self-centred activity is not love - right? Sir, don't look so dazed. These are facts. So by negation one discovers what it is, not occasionally or rarely. And if one has gone into this deeply there is that quality, that perfume, that intensity, the beauty of it, and with it comes compassion. I cannot be compassionate if I am attached to any form of conceit. If I love my god and say I'm compassionate, it is not compassion.

So love, compassion, intelligence, go together. So can we approach with this intelligence this problem: psychological pain and physical pain? Not to get neurotic about it, not to be constantly occupied with one's own pain, creating all kinds of psychological problems - right? So at the end of this conversation is there this quality of intelligence, is there this quality of intelligence which is love, which is compassion? Or merely clever argumentation, dialectical enquiry, opinion against opinion, idea against idea, which is conflict? One ideological group against another ideological group. The Communist ideology and the Totalitarian ideology, and so-called democratic ideology - these two are in battle now. So after this conversation together is there this perfume, this quality of intelligence and compassion that is active?

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 26TH JULY 1982

It is not possible to have a discussion with a large group like this. So it's a dialogue, a conversation with two people. And we will, if you do not mind, treat it as such. Two friends are talking over together about their problems. They are real friends, not convenient friends, but friends who have known each other for some time, and they are walking, perhaps, in a wood, sitting on a bench, and talking over their intimate problems, as friends do. So this is not only a conversation between two people, you and the speaker, and it's a dialogue, a friendly conversation, each one trying to penetrate into the problem as deeply as possible, and trying to find an answer to all their innumerable struggles, pain, anxieties and so on.

So that's what we are going to do this morning, two people talking over together and not asserting anything, neither one nor the other, two people who are concerned, deeply, with life, with all its complexities, with all its subtleties, its varieties, the craziness that goes on, in themselves and outwardly. So we are together, like two people who have known each other for some time, friendly, going to have conversation together.

1st QUESTION: My son died three years ago and so did my husband. I find it extremely hard to let go of the memory of their utter desperation. There must be a way, perhaps you may know it. I have come a long distance and found help listening to your talks - could you speak about death and detachment, please.

First of all, let us talk over together, what does it mean to be attached and what is the difference between attachment and dependence. What is attachment? Why is one attached to a country, to a person, to some experience they've had, to some ideology, to some definite conclusion? Why do people do this throughout the world, depending upon their circumstances, upon their environment, social, moral and so on? This is the pattern man has repeated over and over again. I've had an experience, something that stirs me deeply, brings a colour to my life, gives a meaning, and that experience, which has gone, dead, and I hold on to the memory of it. Why do we do this, my friend asks me, and I'm talking over with my friend - why human beings, wherever they live, cling to this in some form or another, to their land, their property, their wealth, their wives, their husbands and so on. Why? Please, we're talking over together, my friend and I - you are the audience who's listening. Why do we cling, be attached? The word attachment comes from attaccare, Italian, which means to put your grips into something and hold.

Is it because in ourselves we are insufficient, inwardly? Is it because there is loneliness, there is a sense of to possess something, whether it's a piece of furniture or a house or a person, to possess something, to say, "It's mine" gives a great deal of pleasure. Is it that we human beings, you and I, have nothing deeper, more vital, and therefore we hold onto something very, very superficial, something that may pass away? We know it unconsciously, something is passing away - but we hold on. We may hold onto an illusion. The word 'illusion' means to play - the root meaning of that word is to play. And we play with illusions, which is very, very satisfactory.

Or we invent a subtle form of ourselves at a different level. So we create all these things and hold on. Why? Is it that one is afraid to be nothing, to have nothing to hold onto? Is it because in possessing, holding, clinging to something, it gives us a great sense of security, a sense of well-being, because life is very uncertain, dangerous, incredibly brutal? You see the world is becoming more and more like a concentration camp.

So why are we attached, each one of us, to something? And when we look at the different forms of attachment, see the consequences of it, that is, fear, anxiety, pain, to see it, and not allow time to end it. That is, I'm attached to my wife; and I see both intellectually and deeply, that this attachment has many consequences, painful, desperate. And I see it all logically, I see it intellectually, rationally, and I can't let it go because I am afraid to be alone, lonely. And I see all this, because my friend and I are fairly intelligent, we are both looking at it. And we say, time will allow me to be free of this attachment, gradually I'll understand, gradually I'll let it go. That attitude of graduality is stupidity, because either I see the whole thing and end it immediately, or I'm foolish, because I like to cling to something, to a memory that is dead, gone. Right?

So intelligence is to see the whole movement of attachment, the whole process of it, both the inward and outward, and the very perception of it is to end it. That is intelligence, not to postpone, not to allow time to dull the mind, the brain, because if one postpones, neglects, accepts, you are living in a pattern that is already over, that is in the memory of the past - memory - it is dead. And so the brain is living with something that is finished, with something that is past. And living in the past always dulls the quality, the vitality of the brain. Right?

So we have examined, you and I, sitting on that bench in the forest, and now let's examine what is detachment. Is detachment the opposite of attachment? If one pursues detachment, and makes that another form of attachment, you are exactly the same thing as before. I hope this is clear. That is, if detachment from my attachment is its opposite, then there is conflict. Right? There is conflict between attachment and "I should be detached". And then my whole attention or my energy is trying to be detached, and yet I know I'm attached. So there is conflict going on. So we have to find out what is the relationship, if there is any, between attachment and detachment. Or there is no relationship whatsoever. When there is an ending of attachment, there is no need to use the word 'detachment'. There is the ending of it. But for most of us, our brain is conditioned to this process of the opposite.

And one has to question if there is an opposite at all. At the physical level there are the opposites, tall, short, wide, broad, ugly, beautiful and so on. But psychologically, inwardly, is there an opposite at all, or only what is? And we invent the opposite in order to leave or get rid of, get rid of what is. Right? I hope you and I sitting on that bench, are talking about this, and we understand each other. There is no authority between two friends. There is no assertion between two friends who have gone into this matter. So it is a mutual, cooperative understanding. It is not, one is telling the other, they are both are travelling together, along the same path with the same intensity, with the same depth.

So if that is clear between us two, that there is no relationship between attachment and detachment, there is only the ending of attachment and nothing else. Now is love attachment? I love my friend, I am attached to every evening to sit on the bench with him, talk over my problems. And I miss, when we don't meet with him, every day on the bench, and sit down. So we are asking each other, is love attachment, to possess somebody, to hold onto someone, whether it is the idea of god, whether it is the idea of liberation, freedom, whether it is the idea, concept, that in possession love grows? So we are questioning, what is the relationship between attachment and love? My friend who is married and has had several marriages, and he's rather wounded by all that. He's rather unhappy. And he thinks that he still loves his present wife. And he says to me, in our conversation, "I can't lose her, I must hold on, because my life is empty without her." You know all this, don't you? "I can't let her go. She wants to do something totally different from me, and it may lead her away from me. So I plead to her, I suppress my desire, my wanting something else, but I'll accept her and follow her. But inwardly there is conflict all the time, between her and me." Right? You know all this, don't you? It's not a new story is it?

So I have reduced the whole immensity of love, which is extraordinary, which I don't understand, to something so trivial. That is, I'm attached, possessive, I don't want to lose. If I lose I'm unhappy. And this I call love. So is it love. Please, don't agree. Don't say it's not. If it is not, that is the end. But most of us, my friend, is afraid to look at it, look at the complexity of it. My friend wants to move away from the subject, because if he really sees that attachment is not love, then can he go to his wife and say, "I love you, but I'm not attached to you." What would happen? She might throw a brick at me. Walk away, because her whole life is to be attached, to the furniture, to ideas, to children, to the husband - you follow?

So then what is my relationship, who have seen that love is not attachment, is not jealousy, not ambition, competition. Then to me that's a reality, not just a verbal structure. And what is my relationship to her who is quite different? Go on, sir, it's your problem, not mine.

She will not accept what to me is truth. And see, sir, see what is involved in this. How painful it all is. It's nothing superficial. It touches the very core of one's being. And what shall I do? Have patience? Patience, to be patient, doesn't require time. Patience is not time. Whereas impatience has the quality of time in it. Think it over. Right? When I realize my wife is different from me, everything which I think is totally wrong, and I have to live in the same house and so on, do I have patience, knowing, for myself that patience is not a process of time? Do I realize that, that process, patience, which is putting up, allowing, time to resolve? I can't do anything but perhaps some other day, another week, another year, we'll settle everything. So I tolerate the situation. And this tolerance loves. Go on, sir, think it out. To put up with something knowing it is wrong, wrong in quotes, and say, "Well, time will gradually eliminate it", which is, I'm really impatient to find a result. Right? So I put up with it. So what shall I do? Go on, sir, - divorce? Run away? Leave her my house, my goods etc. and say goodbye, and disappear altogether?

Or I'm asking, can my love, intense, can that bring about a change in her? Please, you're asking these questions. Can I, who have understood this whole phenomena with all its depth, will that quality of love, compassion, intelligence, bring about a change in her? That is, if she's at all sensitive, if she's at all observant, listening to what I'm saying, wants to understand each other, then there is a possibility of her changing. If she puts a ball, as most people do, then what am I to do? Go on, sir. Don't look at me, look at your selves. You see, one of our peculiarities is that we want a definite answer, we want something settled, because then I'm free, then I can do what I want. So as there is no definite answer to this question, it depends on the quality of your attention, your intelligence, your love.

And the question my friend asks: my son and husband are dead. I'm attached to their memory. I'm getting more and more desperate, more and more depressed. I'm living in the past, and the present is always coloured by the past, so what am I to do?

And the question my friend asks, let's talk over the problem of death. You and the speaker sitting on that bench, with birds singing all round them, with a thousand shadows and the river running down, swiftly, making sweet sound, and he raises this question. He says, I'm quite young, any moment an accident can happen, and there may be death, not only of my son and my wife, but also my own death. He says, "Let's talk about it."

We've spent half an hour with half a question. You don't mind? Let's talk about death. From the ancient of times, historically, culturally, from all the paintings and statuary, man has always asked, "What happens after death?" One has gathered a lot of experience, struggled to be moral, aesthetic, collected a lot of knowledge, gone into the depths of oneself. If death is the end, then what's the point of all this, what's the point of all this struggle, pain, experience, knowledge, wealth? And death is always waiting at the end of it. I may belong to one sect, accept certain costume because I belong to that sect, which is again an isolating process. And death is the common factor for all of us: for the guru, for the Pope, or the innumerable popes in the world. So that's a fact, we all want to understand the significance, the depth of that extraordinary event, which is extraordinary. And what is the relationship between death and living? Please, I hope you're following all this - I'm asking my friend, I hope you're following what I am saying. He says, go ahead, I follow verbally, I understand this.

Various civilizations throughout the world have tried to overcome death. They've said, life after is more important than now. So they prepared for death. And at present now, there are people who say, we must help our patients, our friends, to die happily. We never ask, what is important, before death, or the many years before death or after death, which is important, which is essential? I'm asking my friend. Naturally he says, "Before dying, the long years one has lived, maybe ten, fifteen, thirty, fifty, ninety - those long years before the ending. That is the period of living. That is far more significant than the ending of it." Why is it we are always asking, he and I, why don't we ask this question, not what is after, or help me to die happily. But what is my life that I have lived for eighty years? It has been one constant battle, with occasional lapse where there has been no pain, no struggle, something occasionally rarely happens. But the rest of my life has been struggle, struggle. And I've called that 'living'. Right? That's what we are all doing, not only my friend and I, but all human beings are that, struggling to have work, being unemployed, wanting more wealth, being oppressed, the tyranny of totalitarian states, and so on. It has been a vast jungle. That's been my life. And I cling to that, to the struggle, to the pain, to the anxiety, to the loneliness - that's all I have. Right? That has become all important.

So I'm asking, we're asking each other, what is it that dies? Now this becomes a rather complex question. My friend and I have time, it's Sunday morning and no work, so we can sit down and go into it. Is it the individual that dies? Please, enquire as a friend, who is it that dies? Apart from the biological ending of an organism, which has been ill-treated, it has had several diseases, illnesses, that inevitably comes to an end. You may find a new drug that may help man to live 150 years, but always at the end of 150 years, that extraordinary thing is there, waiting. Is my consciousness the whole of it, with all its content, is it mine? That is, my consciousness is its content, the content is my belief, my dogmas, my superstitions, my attachment to my country, patriotism, fear, pain, pleasure, sorrow and so on, is the content of my consciousness, and yours. So both of us, sitting on that bench, recognise this fact, that the content makes up consciousness, without the content consciousness as we know it doesn't exist. Right? So my friend and we see the logic of it, the rationality of it, and so on. We agree to that.

Then, is this consciousness which I have clung to as mine, and my friend also clings to it, calling ourselves individuals, is that consciousness unlike other consciousness? Right? Please be clear on this point. That is, if you're lucky to travel, observe, talk over with other people, you'll find that they are similar to yours. They suffer, they are lonely, they have a thousand gods and you may have one god, they believe, they don't believe, and so on. All most similar to yours, though on the periphery, there may be varieties, on the outskirts of our consciousness. You may be tall, you may be short, you may be very clever, may be scholarly, you've read a great deal, you're capable, you've a certain technique, efficiency, it's all on the periphery, on the outside. But inwardly, we are similar. Right? This is a fact. Therefore our conditioning which says we are individual, separate souls, is not a fact. This is where my friend begins to squirm, because he doesn't like the idea that he is not an individual. He can't face the fact, because all his conditioning has been that. So I say to my friend, look at it, old chap, don't run away from it, don't resist it, look at it. Use your brains, not your sentiment, not your desire - just look at it, is that a fact or not? And he accepts it, vaguely.

So if our consciousness is similar to all mankind, then I am mankind. You understand? Please understand this, the depth and the beauty of this. If I am the mankind, the entire mankind, then what is it that dies? You understand? Either I can contribute, or I move away from that entire consciousness, which is me, I cleanse the whole of my being from that - right? - that I am not individual, that I am the whole of humanity.

Then is there emptying of the consciousness, which is my belief, my anxiety, my pain, my blah, blah - all that? Is there ending to all that? If I end it, what importance is it? You follow? What importance is it or what value to humanity is it? I am the humanity, I am asking this question. What value, what significance has this when, after a great deal of intelligence, love, I observe this and in that observation there is the total ending of those contents? Has it any value? Value in the sense of moving humanity from its present condition. Right? You understand? Surely it has, has it not? One drop of clarity in a bucket of dirt, confusion, mess, that one drop begins to act.

And the questioner, my friend says, I'm beginning to understand the nature of death. I see that the things I'm attached to, if I hold onto them, death has a grip on me. If I let them go, each day as they arise, I am living with death. You understand? Death is the ending, so I'm ending while living everything that I will lose when I die. Right? So, the question my friend asks, can I let go every day my accumulation, end it, so that I am living with death and therefore a freshness, not living in the past, in memories? Right?

So from this arises a very complex question, what is immortality? One question, we're still going on, sorry! What is immortality? That is, beyond mortality, beyond death. As we said the other day, where there is a cause, there is an end. There is an end to the effect and the cause remains and creates another effect. It's a constant change. Right? And we are asking: is there a life without any causation? Please, you understand? I'm asking my friend, do you understand what I'm saying? We live with causes - you know, I don't have to go into that. All our life is based on many, many causes. I love you because you give me something. I love you because you comfort me. I love you because I'm sexually fulfilling, and so on. That is a cause, and the effect is the word I use is 'love' which it is not, and any motive I have is a causation. So I'm asking my friend, is it possible to live without any cause, not belong to any cause in the sense, organized cause or in myself, to have no cause? Knowing if there is a causation there is an ending, which is time.

Now we're going to find out together, if there is a life, daily living, in our daily relations, in our daily activity, not some theoretical activity, actual - can one live without a cause? Look into it, my friend, don't look to me but look at it, look at the question first. Knowing when I say, I love you because in return you give me something, in that relationship of causation there is always ending of that relationship. So we're asking each other, is there a life without cause? See the beauty of it, sir, first, see the depth, see the vitality of that question, not the mere words. We said, love has no cause - obviously. If I love you because you give me something, it's a merchandise, a thing of the market. So can I love you, can there be love, without wanting, nothing physically, nothing psychologically, inwardly, nothing in any form? So that is love, which has no cause, therefore it is infinite. You understand? Like intelligence, it has no cause, it is endless, timeless, so is compassion.

Now if there is that quality in our life, the whole activity changes completely. That's enough of that question. I hope my friend who put this question has understood.

2nd QUESTION: How do you pose a fundamental question? Is holding, observing a question, a thought, is it a thought process?

I'll read that question. How do you pose a fundamental question? That's what the questioner asks. And looking at it, observing it, holding it as a jewel in your hand, will that lead to a fundamental understanding of this problem, of this question? Or is the understanding, the looking, a thought process? Right? Is the question clear?

Sir, I have a problem, the problem is my death. What is the fundamental question I can put about death? Fundamental, deep question that is reality, not just superficial reaction. "My wife is dead, I'm unhappy, please answer how to get over my unhappiness" - that's a very superficial question. "Tell me how to be detached". That's very simple. But to put a fundamental question, which we rarely do. And does the fundamental question come out, happen, when there is an observation, listening to the question without any bias, without any direction? Or can thought find, discover the fundamental question? You understand? My friend, I said, follow what I'm saying. He says, "Go on."

Have we ever observed without the word? Look at it, sirs, go into it. Because the word has become all important to us, the capitalists, the dictatorship, the German, the French, the word. And do we observe, do he and I observe that our brain is caught in a network of words? Right? Are we aware of this? The word being time, thought, memory. Right? The word is the symbol, the word is the effect of a cause, and we live with words, which is, the movement of thought, expressing itself in symbols, words, but it is movement of a thought which lives with words. Right? Look.

So the question is, can thought with its words and time, can it put a fundamental question? You understand? Thought being limited, broken up, and can such thought ask a fundamental question? Or, the questioner wants to know, my friend wants to know: fundamental question is not related to thought. Then my friend asks, how does this fundamental question arise? You're following? Please look, exercise your brain, your energy, to find this out, not go off to sleep or all that.

Does the fundamental question arise through pure observation? That is, to observe, to observe means not only with the optical eye, but observing is also listening, not only with the sensory ear but the inward ear, to listen, and to look, not translate what you look at into your own terminology, into your own words. If you translate it to suit you or look at it for your convenience, your observation then is limited. Therefore can you observe your wife, the tree, that extraordinary movement of water, those mountains - observe without the word, and listen without the word, and observe without any direction, that is, without any motive? Can you do that? That is, are you listening, I'm asking my friend, are you listening to what I'm saying? Or you can't sustain a state of attention for some time?

So can you listen without the accompaniment of thought? Which is, verbalizing, making an abstraction of what you hear, what you see into an idea and pursue the idea. You understand? Can you observe so totally, completely? And if you so observe, what is the need for a fundamental question? What is the need of a question at all? Look, sir it's like understanding envy. Let's take envy. Look at envy, which most of us are, envious. I'm sure you'd all like to sit on the platform. And you know, the quality of envy, wanting more and more and more power, position, reputation, well-known. Now envy: to look at the reaction called envy, without the word. When you say, 'I'm envious' you are merely associating the present reaction to past memories of envy. Right? Past memory. Therefore you are not looking, observing that movement of envy in the present. Can you observe envy without any movement of the past, which is thought? And when you do so observe, it's a totally new reaction and therefore it is something new which we have to observe. And when you observe the fundamental question may be, is there an end to it? Of course. Yes? Where there is a cause for your observation, there is an end to your observation. When you observe without a cause - you understand?

Shall we do one more?

3rd QUESTION: I have lived in a forest, close to nature. There is no violence there, but the outer world is the real jungle. How am I to live in it without becoming part of its competition, brutality, violence and cruelty?

First, how easy it is to live by yourself in a world. I tell my friend, I have done it, without any boast or anything, it is natural. I've done it, it's very easy, because you're not related to anybody, you look at the trees, the rivers, the plant, they invite you to look at them. The more you look at a tree, the more beautiful it becomes. The shadow, the leaves fluttering in the wind. It doesn't demand anything of you. You are enjoying yourself, listening to the birds, to the sound of water, to the lovely clear morning. And one is tempted to live like that for ever. But you can't. Even there, if you live in a forest, you're related to somebody or something. You're related to the man who brings you milk. So there is always, even though one is a hermit, always living in certain kind of relationship with another. And if you are a neurotic saint, then it becomes very easy. Most saints are neurotic. And then, they bring you food, clothes and all the rest of it.

So when one enters the world, the trouble begins. The world which human beings have created, not only the past generation upon generation, which has created this society, but also all of us have contributed to it. When you buy a stamp, when you post a letter, you are contributing to war. When you take the train, you are contributing to war. So you might say, I won't take a train, I won't post a letter, I won't telephone, I won't pay taxes, and so on. Taxes are rather different, the Government will be after you, if you have money. So what will you do? Withdraw completely, not write a letter, not travel? You understand, Sir, the question has been put to the speaker, often. You say you are against war, peace and so on, but you're contributing to it by travelling all over the world.

So where shall I stop? You understand? Not write a letter, not travel, not do all the things that are contributory, that give, help war? Or do you ask a much more fundamental question, which is, why does war exist at all? Why has man, who is so-called civilized, so-called educated, why does he support killing another, another human being. So what is the fundamental question there? Is it nationality, is it this whole idea of isolation, national isolation, individual isolation, communal isolation. When I put on a monk's robe or a different kind of robe, I am isolating myself. So is isolation the cause of war? Obviously. When I say I'm British, you're French, you're this, you're that, I'm isolating myself; I've a long tradition as a British or in India. If I am an Indian, I have a much more ancient tradition, which is isolating. So any form of isolation must contribute to war, which is war being not only killing each other but the conflict with each other. Right?

Now seeing all that, which requires intelligence, not just a vague Utopian idea, seeing that, the very perception of this fact that where there is isolation of any kind, belonging to one group against another group, one sect against another, one uniform of purple, yellow, isolating. These actually contribute to isolation and therefore inevitable conflict. To perceive that, to see the truth of it, requires intelligence, not say I agree with it. And do nothing about it. But when I see the truth of it, that very perception is the action of intelligence. Right? So with that intelligence, I enter the world. Which is, that intelligence which has no cause, that love that has no cause, compassion obviously cannot have a cause, with that beauty, with that clarity, with that energy, I meet, I meet the world which is brutal. I act from that love. Or rather, that love that has no cause, acts. I may be a beggar, or very good technician, but the quality of that can never enter the world of ambition, brutality, violence.

Now, my friend says, "I understand. I understand very clearly what you say, I have grasped intellectually what you have said, superficially." Now, how am I to capture it, how am I to hold it, as I hold breath, as I breathe, hold something, so enormous? What is the method, what is the system that will help me? Of course, obviously, when you follow a system, you are gone, finished. Because you want to achieve that state of real love, and you want to achieve because you're unhappy, therefore you have a motive, therefore it's not intelligence, therefore it's not love.

So when you have this perfume, then you can go through the world that perfume never losing its beauty.

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 27TH JULY 1982

This is the last Question and Answer Meeting. A lot of questions have been asked, written down, and it's impossible to answer all of them. If we were to answer all of them, probably we'd be sitting to the end of next month. And I'm sure you wouldn't like that.

I wonder why we ask questions. Why is it that we cannot find the answers in ourselves? Why do we depend on others, whether it be a psychologist, a person who is called a guru, a teacher, or on the speaker? Why? Is it that all of us are so accustomed to be guided, we seek help from others, we want guidelines, we want to be told what to do, we want to be helped? The world as it is now growing more and more confused, more and more horrible, and we want somebody to tell us or help us to understand ourselves and the world.

And we're asking, is there any help at all from another. Then you might ask, why do we sit here and listen to you. If there is no help from another, why do we gather at all? As far as one understands, we gather, not to be helped in the ordinary sense of that word, nor depend or look to the speaker. We gather together, not in any spirit of authority, or seeking some kind of solution to our problems, but rather meeting together to converse, to go into matters that are essential in our lives. It's a conversation between two people, between two friends.

And in that conversation, each one is beginning to see clearly his own problems, each one is observing during this conversation, this investigation together, one is beginning to see clearly for oneself, what we are, what has happened to us, what are the causes that have brought us to this present condition. And in investigating together we find, not only the answer, which is not very important, but the unravelling of this whole life, the opening up, if one may use that word, into the very complex problem of humanity. If we look at it very carefully, it begins to flower, it begins to expand, it begins to explode. Whatever then is perceived, understood and lived, that brings about one's own intelligence. But to depend on others, which has become, not only the fashion but also that has been the state of man for many centuries, the priest, the soothsayer, the clairvoyant, the guru, the psychologist, you follow - the whole world which says, we'll help you.

Those who help us are like ourselves: confused, rather unhappy, they are like you and me. And when we do not depend on anybody, literally inwardly not depend on a soul, that means, to be a light to oneself. One may make a mistake, we often do, do the things that are not correct, regrets. And if we do not carry over day after day, those regrets, those incidents that have not been correct, precise, those activities that have brought about confusion, if we see them clearly, and end them immediately, then you need to ask help of nobody. Right? Do we do this? Or just carry on: I'm confused, I'm unhappy, I've followed this and I've followed that, listened to that person or to that individual, and at the end of it all I'm still lost, I'm still confused, unhappy. If we once see the truth that following anybody is most destructive because it denies freedom. And if there is no freedom there is no love.

So in answering these questions, we are together going into these matters, not that the speaker is helping you, the speaker is not guiding you - for God's sake, everyone must realize this, not verbally or casually but very, very seriously, psychologically not to depend on anybody. We do depend outwardly, the surgeon, the doctor and so on, in the technological world, one must naturally follow somebody. But even there, if you are merely copying, imitating, conforming, then you become another machine. Whereas if we could really put away from our hearts and minds the reality of the truth that there is no help from outside.

Don't be unhappy about it. One sees one's own conditioning then, one's own trivial, very narrow desire for help. One of the factors which we'll go into is, the world outside and the world within, are they two different states, or like a tide that goes in and out, the world is out there and we are here, there is an interrelationship between the two, there is constantly flowing back and forth, there is not this clear, definite division between the outer and the inner, it's a movement. That is, the outer, we have created the outer, the misery, the wars, the destruction, the brutality, the hatreds and antagonisms, we have created it, that is the society in which we live. And that society begins to shape us, tell us what to do. We are caught in this, so there is no division but it's an interrelationship. Right? Is this very clear, that there is no division, that is, like a tide, with tremendous rapidity, that flows in and goes out.

From that question arises, these questions, it's not put here, a very fundamental question. This movement from the outer to the inner, and the inner to the outer, inner being psychological movement, which effects the outer, and the outer effects the psychological state, as long as this movement exists, we'll be caught in this cycle of misery. Right? The cycle of confusion, because the outside is pushing us, a great deal of pressure upon us, and we respond to it. You're following? So we're asking a very serious question, which is, can this movement of the inner to the outer, and the outer to the psychological state end? Or must this everlastingly go on? You understand my question? Please, think, look at it. Consider it as two friends talking over together.

Then what is the state of mind, the brain that is not caught in this movement? Is that at all possible? Is it at all possible not to respond hatred by hatred, which is what's happening inwardly? Can you see, having created confusion, seeking clarity, and that clarity is partial, and then caught again by the outer world and so on. Back and forth. This is clear. This is what we are doing, this is what is actually taking place in all of us, responding to the outer, which we have created, and then the outer is challenging us, and we respond to it. Right? See this tremendous mechanical process of our life.

And is there a cessation of this movement, is there a freedom at all from this movement? Then if there is, what is the quality of the brain which is not caught in this repetitive reaction? You're following? We have to find out. It's no good the speaker telling you what it is, we have to work, find out, work at it. Then if one understands this process, this way of living, and if you enquire very, very deeply, then there is a freedom in which there is this quality of affection, love and so on. As long as this reaction goes on between the outer and the inner, there cannot be love. Right? Go into it. If I depend on you, as my guru, and you naturally depend on me, because you can't be a guru without me, so you tell me and I respond to you, which is out, you follow? - the same phenomena going on. How can there be this sense of great love which is intelligence, when I depend on you, and you depend on me? You understand?

So if that is clear, what is the state of the brain that is no longer demanding experience? The reaction to the outer, and the outer challenge to oneself is a constant movement in time and experience. Right? And we depend on experience, to awaken us - experience is a challenge. Right? And can the brain be free of all experience and therefore all challenge, so that it is all the time awake? You understand? So that it is totally a light to itself, without any challenge. Right? Is this clear? You have to work, you have to go into it yourself, if you're interested.

That is, is there a quality of the brain which is not a slave to time, slave to the process of evolution, which is time, the gradual approach? And can the brain be so extraordinarily alive, not caught in various forms of memories, so that it is wholly awake? This is a very serious question which you have to think over, go into.

1st QUESTION: In the seeing and listening of which you speak..

You see, of which I speak, it is not 'we' speak. Therefore the speaker is becoming gradually the authority, which is an abomination, because you have leaders of every kind, political, religious, psychological and so on, and we are where we are at the end of all this millenia. So please, it's not what the speaker is saying, the speaker is only putting into words our problems. He is the mirror into which you yourself are observing, he, you are the mirror, and he's merely putting into words clearly, that's all. If he is the mirror, destroy it. Break it to pieces, because the mind must be free so it begins to live anew, afresh, and not always, depend, depend, like a child. We're all grown-up people.

2nd QUESTION: Is the seeing and listening - I'm cutting out, 'of which you speak' - the same seeing and listening we all know? Or does it imply the awakening of a new perception? And how can we be sure that thought has not crept in more subtly?

Now let's look at it, not K. says it therefore you must listen to it. Let's look at it. Do we ever listen? Or listen very partially? When do we listen completely to anything? Have you asked, do I ever listen completely to, say for instance, Beethoven? Absorb what he's saying, the beauty of it, the vitality of it, the enormity of that music, the strength of it. Or our reactions to that music come immediately? You understand? I listen to Beethoven's Leonara and he is telling me about the prison, I used to know the story, I won't go into it. And I'm emotionally disturbed, and I enjoy this emotion, feel I'm really appreciating that music. Whereas if there is no response emotionally, I am actually absorbing all that he wants to tell me. Right?

So do we ever listen that way, not only to music, to my wife, to your friend, do we ever listen so completely, to catch the intonation, to feel the subtlety of what she wants to tell? Or you say, "Well, the old girl I know, she's been telling me this for 20 years." You understand? To listen so as to catch the subtlety of the voice, the intonation, the feeling behind the word, which means you must actually give attention to what is happening.

When you give such attention - please will you go with me a little bit? - when you give such attention, there is no recording. Right? You see, it's only when we are not completely attending that there is recording, recording an insult, or her encouragement, or all the rest of it. The brain is recording - this is an important question, I'll go into it, it's rather fun. The brain is recording, that's its function, to survive. Right? The language, the skill, the understanding of the environment, seeking security, it has to record. If you want to drive a car, you have to learn, which is recording. And when one's friend or wife says this or that, it's being recorded. And the record is the image, is the noise. And that recording, which is the noise of the tape, prevents my understanding or listening to the person. I don't know whether you follow all this. So one asks - it is necessary to record to live outwardly - is it necessary to record anything psychologically? You understand my question? She says some word that hurts me. Need that word be recorded and the feeling behind that word? If it is, there is a division, there is conflict and all the rest of the ugliness follows. You understand this question - it requires a very clear perception of what is actually going on. I listen to my wife or girl-friend or whatever it is, or to a friend, I listen and find out if that listening is so clear, precise and wholly attentive, and in that attention is there a recording? You understand?

So what do we mean by attention? Are we working together or am I just talking? You don't catch onto this quickly. Attention means, doesn't it, to give, to focus all your energy without limitation. Right? Whereas concentration is the limitation of energy on a certain point. Clear? I concentrate on a book, which is to focus my attention on a certain phrase, on a page, and not let other thoughts pour in. There is a resistance in concentration. Right? Whereas when you give complete attention, there is no resistance. Right? Where there is resistance there is a barrier. So when another person insults or flatters - much more difficult to be flattered - to listen to both with such attention there is no building up, piling up of resentment or acceptance. Right?

Are we doing this now, otherwise it's no fun. So the questioner asks: is it possible to listen so clearly without the interference of thought? Which is, thought being the past memories about one's friend, wife and so on, to listen without that past with its thoughts so that there is no recording whatever, psychologically to whatever ugly things one says about each other. Right?

Now, the questioner asks: is there in that attention a new perception? I'm putting it for the questioner. I attend to what you're saying, without any interpretation, without any reaction, without any resistance. I listen to what you're saying. Such a listening is obviously something totally new, something that's not limited. So there is a perception which is not the activity of thought, but it is perception of total observation, attention, and let the thing that is observed fly, move.

We are always telling stories about what should be done. Right? That's our lot, we never listen to the story, the story being the history of mankind. All the history books in the world are the story of mankind. Mankind is me, it is telling me, the books, about myself. That's the story of myself. Now can I listen to the story without your help? You understand? Without your saying, read it this way, look at it carefully, guide me. Then I become your slave. Whereas I am reading this whole history of mankind, that mankind is me, I am mankind. So can I look at that story, listen to it without a single motive, without a single saying, this is correct, this is wrong, this is right, which is, I'm not listening to the story but I'm telling what the story should be? Right? So when you are so attentive, listen, then there is a totally new perception.

3rd QUESTION: You speak about bringing about a new generation - I speak about it! It is necessary to bring about a new generation, not 'you speak about it'. It is said, that it is necessary to bring about a new generation, will this happen by individuals transforming themselves, which seems almost impossible, or can the change of only a few affect the total human consciousness. Right? You've understood the question?

If the questioner, in our conversation one of you bring up this point, a new generation is necessary, obviously, depending on education and so on. And it seems almost impossible to rely on every human being changing, to bring about a new society, new culture, new this. And as that seems almost impossible, will the transformation of a few people, that's you and I, few people - not the elite - I don't know why you are afraid of using that word 'elite' - the few are the elite, always - will those few affect the whole consciousness of mankind? Right?

I believe the scientists, the biologists and so on, are investigating the problem of one group of animals, if there is a change in one, in that group of one rat, or one wolf, it affects the whole group consciousness. Right? They are experimenting with that. We were talking about it the other day to certain scientists. That is, a group of certain species, like the wolf, like various other animal groups, if in that group one has certain experience, it affects the whole of the others. I don't know if you have not watched the Japanese monkeys. One monkey by chance washed a potato or whatever it was he was going to eat, and it affected then the whole, other groups are doing the same. It's very important to understand this. If you as a human being who are the representative of the whole of humanity - right? - because your consciousness is the consciousness of every human being with their struggles, pain and anxiety, loneliness, unhappiness, suffering. That's your consciousness, it's not yours, it's the human consciousness. That is, you as a human being are the representative of all humanity,, which is marvellous truth.

Now, if you are really transformed, naturally you'll affect the whole of human consciousness. All the great killers of the world, so-called warriors - like - I don't have to explain all this. The war leaders, who tried to conquer the world, from Genghis Khan to present day, they have affected the consciousness of man. Right? Obviously. You and I have not fought a war, but war has been in the consciousness of mankind, killing, killing, not only the whales and the baby seals, but killing each other. That is part of our consciousness. Now if you see that killing is an abomination, I mean it's something unholy, and you then take part in killing. Don't say, do I not kill a cauliflower when I eat? - we're not talking about cauliflower or tomatoes - we are talking about human beings killing each other. If when you as a human being who are the entire humanity, you change radically, change, not new hair, but change at depth, then naturally you affect the mankind.

So from that question arises, are you, as a human being, going to do it, or just carry on, day after day, day after day, the same old pattern being repeated? And say, will the wars ever end? You know, that's our problem, the wars will end if you end war. So a group of people, and I hope there is a group of people, with all one's heart, that there are such people in the world. And if they are transformed it affects the whole of the human consciousness.

4th QUESTION: I have been following a spiritual leader and it has helped me. But after listening to you I felt what you say is right and I have left the poor old guru I was following. (He doesn't say that.) (Laughter) Sorry!. (Laughter) But after listening to you I felt what you say is right and I have left the guru I was following. Now I feel lost without guidance. What do you say?

You know in the Western world faith has become very important. Right? In the Western religious structure, faith, belief have been the central factor of religion. Right? And scepticism, doubt, has been an anathema, a curse. If I doubted in Christianity, belonging to a particular sect, it would collapse. Right? Whereas in the Eastern world, doubt, question, has been one of the requirements of a disciple who is seeking truth, of any man who is seeking truth. That doubt, question, enquire, has been stressed.

Now most of us are rather gullible. Right? I set myself up, putting on a certain robe, and I say, I'll teach you, I'll help you, and you flock around me. You don't question me, you don't say, what right have you to say this, who are you to tell me? You follow? There is no enquiry, questioning, challenging. We're all so gullible. And you hear somebody come along and say, "Look, don't follow, look at yourself, learn about yourself, it's all there." You don't have to go to India or to Jamaica, or wherever it is - perhaps Barbados might be nicer, it's warmer! You go there and there is all this circus going on. And you fall into that trap. And then after spending years, you say, "My God, this may be wrong," somebody tells you it's not right and you're caught. You understand? You never begin by questioning, by doubting, doubting the authority of another. And for years you have followed what he has said, or she has said. And then you come and tell me, "Look, that's all wrong." It's all there, if you look, if you know how to read that book, which is yourself, you don't have to leave your town, go far away - it's there, it's in your heart and mind. And you say, "I can't read. Tell me how to read." Then you're had. Right?

So from the beginning, from the very beginning, psychologically, in matters of the spirit, there is no authority. And one is lost - right? - confused. Now when you're lost, look at your loss, what you have, you understand? - look at it. Don't go away saying, "I am confused, help me." But be confused, enquire into confusion. Why you are confused, because you are confused you accepted somebody outside you, who is trying to guide you. Right? But if you don't rely on anybody, then you're looking at that extraordinary rich device of oneself. Right?

So one begins to ask, what is confusion? Is confusion - please just listen - the opposite of clarity? Right? Is clarity is the opposite of confusion, then the opposite, which you call clarity, is also confused - any confusion, right? There is clarity. But we don't know how to end confusion because we don't look at it, we run away from it, we don't investigate, see why. I'm attached, I'm dependent, I'm that, I'm this, therefore that is bringing about confusion. Right?

5th QUESTION: Is there something sacred in life? Is it possible for all of us to come to that? Is this God?

First of all, we don't know what is sacred. Right? We don't know, actually. We worship something called sacred, in a church, in a mosque, in a temple, we worship something, a symbol, calling that symbol sacred. We pray for it, we genuflect for it and so on.

What is sacred? Is thought, which has put together all this, the symbols which we worship, the figure which we worship, the various categories of saints and so on, which thought has invented. Right? The rituals, the dogmas, the beliefs, the faith. Now, to enquire if there is anything sacred, one has to enquire is thought itself which creates all this, sacred? Right? Is thought sacred? Answer it. The thought that has created wars, divided people into races, groups - right? - thought which has created this division, hoping for security, thought which has brought about the enormous destruction in the world, thought which is creating the bomb, the thought which divides you from your wife, from your friend, the thought that says, 'I am important' not you.' I must get on.' All those are the activities of thought. Right?

Are all those activities sacred? Obvious, I mean it's so obvious they are not. Right? And thought has created god. You won't accept this. Thought has given to that idea of god all kinds of attributes, omniscient, omnipresent, all-loving father, you know, all that business. If god existed, which must be without cause, then if he created us, right? - you've answered that question, he must be most extraordinary entity, to create us, to make us miserable.

So there nothing that thought has created is sacred. Right? If that is clear, it is so logical, so absolute, then, is there in our life, in living, anything sacred? Not to achieve or come near that which is sacred. Right? This is important to understand. To achieve or perceive or come near that which is sacred implies the sacred is there and I have to come to it, I have to achieve, through good behaviour, through this and through that, through sacrifice - you know, all the rest of it. You see what tricks thought plays? It has projected something out there and says that is sacred and I'll work for it. Right? So what is important is not if there is something sacred, but to see the tremendous subtlety of thought, how thought is always projecting something better, better, more noble, more and more - a form of achievement. That is, in this world I am a general manager, ultimately I become the executive. Right? This is the same mentality carried over.

So can thought realize its own limitation? Not say to thought that you are limited, which would be another thought saying - to realize the very activity of thought is limited. Then is there something sacred which is not put together by thought. You understand? Till we understand very deeply the nature of thought, which has its place - right? - I must use thought to use my English, I must use thought to go from here to over there. So to realize thought is a broken up fragment, and that fragment may conceive the eternal, that which is nameless - that is just a concept, projected by thought itself. Whereas if you go into it, very carefully, attentively, to see that thought has its place but has no other place. That is, there is no recording of psychological accumulation, the recording of accumulation, which is the me.

So, one has to enquire into this very deeply and find out for yourself. If the speaker tells you that there is something sacred, it becomes so silly. But if you yourself, as a human being, who are the rest of mankind, if you go into it, seriously, then there is that which is what is.

6th QUESTION: What preparation can I give my children for today's world, what should be the meaning and focus of education?

Sir, what are we all being educated for? Answer it - you're all very educated people, you've probably gone to colleges, universities, gathered a lot of information, knowledge, about various subjects, and you probably have specialized in a particular subject, and if as an engineer, psychologist, and so on, you earn a good living, a good bit of money. And for the rest of your life, there you are: married, children, with all the problems of children, and the wife and so on. That is what is happening in the world. Right? Those who are educated and those who are not educated. Go to India or Far East, not to Japan, there they are very well educated, go to India, and other eastern countries, there's overpopulation, every year in India, 15 to 30 million people are added, which is the population of Holland. And poverty, the degradation of poverty. And they are not educated. Most of them will never know how to read a book. Right?

So modern education as it is now is making the human mind, brain, more and more mechanical. Right? So this is a very serious question. Is knowledge making the human brain more and more mechanical? You understand my question? I specialize in engineering. From college to university I've learnt a great deal about mathematics and so on, and I become an engineer, how to build bridges, or construction of various kinds. That's my life till I die, or retire and die. Right? Is that education? That's necessary, apparently. And psychologically, inwardly, I don't know, I'm not educated. Right? I am what I've been for a million years, slightly transformed. Right? But I am brutal, violent, cruel, wanting to hurt others, and so on.

So what do we mean by education? Answer it, sir. Is it merely to live in a world of technology, science, knowledge - you follow? And that is creating such havoc in the world. And we totally neglect the other, because the other is much more difficult, requires a great deal of enquiry, exercising your brain so that you're looking at life totally differently.

So, from all this which we can't go into in great detail, from all this, education is to bring about a good human being. Right? Good in the old sense of that word - that word is not fashionable. Good. That is, a human being who is highly intelligent in the sense we've used that word, who has the capacity to understand the technological world and live there and also the other, to feel, to have great affection, love, compassion, not belong to any sect, any group, any country. You understand?

There are no such schools in the world. Perhaps one or two exist where we are concerned, but it is very difficult to bring about such quality of mind, because the parents don't want it, the outward conditions are so appalling, so frightening, and so on. So can you, you as a human being, educate yourself, so that you have this enormous depth of love and all the rest?

The last question.

7th QUESTION: What is the future of mankind?'

It's a very good question. What is the future of you? What is you who are mankind, what is your future? As we now are living, which has been the continuity of the past - right? - continuity of wars, hatreds, divisions, the ugliness that is going on, the brutality, everything, if humanity continues that way, and it is you, continue that way, there is very little chance of survival. Right? Obviously. If every country in the world is preparing for war - right - they are - the unenlightened countries are buying armaments from the enlightened countries, those who are highly civilized like Britain, France, America and so on, they are supplying armaments right and left, to everybody, because in industry it is becoming necessary to supply arms. Right? So their economy depends on it. So the continuity of war, destruction, is guaranteed. And what is the future of all of us? Not only of us, of the coming generation, your children? It's really a very frightening world. You may talk about all the rest of the things we've talked about, gurus and followers and all that silly stuff, but this is a tremendous problem. If we go on as we are going on, we are bound to end up in a catastrophe of some kind or other.

And if you accept that, it's all right. If that's what you want, it's perfectly all right. But if you say, that's totally wrong, it's totally unholy to kill another, for whatever cause, for whatever reason, for your honour, for whatever reason, to kill another is the denial of the most holy. (Dog barks) That dog agrees! (Laughter)

So what is one to do? It is really a very serious question. What are you going to do? Because whatever we do is going to supply, help armaments. And the politicians know all this. And the politicians' function is to keep isolation going, my country first. They have no global relationship, they have no idea of that. Right? That we can only exist on this earth when we treat the earth as ours, all of ours, not British, French, German and all the rest of it.

Now, you perhaps and we realize this. Then will it affect the whole consciousness of mankind if I really, if you and I really, deeply do not belong to any group, to any nation, to any sect? Will that affect the whole of the world? Of course, if all of us in this hall, in this tent, really felt this, naturally it would affect the whole of consciousness, even of the politicians. Right?

BOMBAY 1ST PUBLIC TALK 22ND JANUARY 1983

If one may, I would like to point out that this is not a lecture. A lecture generally means to instruct on a particular subject with a view to inform, instruct and teach. So this is not a lecture, but we are going to talk over things together, not that the speaker is going to only talk, but together you and the speaker search out the various issues of our daily lives and to see if there is any solution for them. We are concerned not with philosophy, which is generally understood to mean theories, speculation and a form of intellectual entertainment but rather you and the speaker, slowly, with certain scepticism, doubt, questioning, demanding that we two talk over, converse, have a dialogue over our whole existence. We are not instructing or informing on any particular subject but together, and we mean together, share together, into the many problems of our life. So please it is your responsibility as well as that of the speaker to think together, not you think separately, and the speaker think separately, but each of us discover, find out for ourselves if we are meeting each other, not merely at the intellectual level or emotional, romantic, ideational level, but rather you and the speaker meet in a relationship that is enquiring, not accepting but questioning.

And to question, enquire, one must be free of prejudice, otherwise your enquiry has no value at all. Or if you are committed to a particular form of thought, particular adjustment to an ideal, then we cannot possibly think together. Thinking together requires a great deal of attention, because most of us are already committed to some ideals, conclusions, opinions, and so we never meet. As the speaker has no belief, has no ideals, has no authority whatsoever, he can investigate easily, freely; happily, but if you also were free to enquire, to look into the vast complex of our society, of our governments, not the government of this particular country but governments throughout the world. To not merely have information about them all but why human beings who have lived on this earth for perhaps forty, fifty thousand years of perhaps more, have become what they are, dull, violent, superstitious and following some idiotic nonsensical tradition.

We must be capable to deeply understand the nature of ourselves because we are the society, we have created this society in which we live, and to bring about order in that society, not by legislation, not by governmental laws or a new form of governors and Chief Ministers and so on, but as long as our own house is not in order - our house, the house in which we live, not the physical house, but the house of our struggle, conflict, misery, confusion, sorrow. That is our house and if we don't bring about order in that, mere demand for outward order has very little meaning.

So please we are thinking together. You are not merely listening to the speaker taking a few ideas from him or few slogans, or few concepts and then agreeing or disagreeing. But what we are concerned about deeply is why human beings are what they are, why they have become like this, and the future is what they are now. If they don't change now the future will be exactly what it is now, perhaps with certain modifications, variations, but human beings if they don't radically, fundamentally bring about in their own attitudes, in their own lives, which is to put order, then attending to all these talks, seeing old familiar faces has very little meaning. If that is very clear that we are together meeting at a certain level with the same intensity, at the same time, then communication become very simple. Because obviously the speaker is here to say something, to explore something with you. But if you hold on to your commitments, to your beliefs, to your gurus, and all that business, we can never meet each other.

So please, this is a talk or a conversation between two people, between you and the speaker - a conversation, a dialogue of two friends who are concerned, not only with their own private life, but concerned with the world, concerned with what is happening in the world: the global disorder, the threat of wars, poverty, the violence and the destruction, that is going on right throughout the world. So we are responsible for all that. And it is no good going off into some corner to meditate about god knows what. So please if you will kindly bear in mind all the time that we are together deeply concerned, serious, not flippant, to find a solution to all the problems.

What is a problem? Why have we throughout our life, from the beginning, when we see the light till we die, why do we have problems - social problems, economic problems, mechanical problems, computer problems and our own problems in our daily life, in our relationship, why do we have problems at all? Is it necessary to have problems? The word problem - its root meaning is something that is thrown at you. The meaning of that word 'problem' means something thrown at you, a challenge. That is the meaning of that word. And we are asking why we have problems at all? Is it possible to live without a single problem? If you have problems, obviously those problems act as friction, and wears out the brain, and one gets old and so on.

So human beings throughout the world have many, many problems. They live with problems. Their whole life is a movement of problems. And now we are asking: is it possible not to have problems? We are going to investigate the question, not say yes, it is possible to live without problems, or not. That is not the point. The point is why do we have it, what is a problem, why is the brain always trying to solve problems. There are mechanical problems, computer problems, mathematical problems, problems of design, problems in architecture, physics, in all the technological field, there are many, many problems there. That is inevitable. If you are treading the road of technology, it must have its many problems. And why do we in our life, in our relationship, in our own way of living, in our family, the people one loves, why do we have problems? Whether you should follow a certain guru or not, you know the whole structure of problems of our life.

We see in the technological world problems must exist. When you are building a computer, it demands not only the resolution of the problems there, and in the technological world problems will always exist. And is our brain educated, trained to solve problems? You are following all this, I hope. We live in a mechanical world. We are business people, we are doctors, surgeons, physicists, biologists trained computer experts. And our brain - please follow all this if you are interested - is trained, educated, conditioned to solve problems. So we extend that same attitude to our daily life. You understand what I am saying? Are we meeting each other?

Suppose one is a computer expert. He has several problems there, and mechanically he has to solve those problems, which means his brain is trained, conditioned, educated to solve problems. Right? And we extend that same movement of solution of problems to the psychological field. So in the psychological field, that is in our relationship, in our fears, anxiety, all the rest of it, we have got the same mentality, the same condition that these have to be solved. Right? These are problems that have to be solved, which means we look at life, at our daily living from the point of view of a problem. Are we meeting each other? Are we, or am I talking to myself? What we are trying to point out is if you are trained or educated to solve problems, by solving one problem, you are increasing many other problems. This is what is happening throughout, in all the governments. They try to solve one problem, in the solution of that one problem, they increase or add more problems. So we live with problems. And we are saying something totally different, which is to observe life not with a mind that is trained to solve problems, but to understand the nature why the brain is conditioned, trained, educated to solve problems, and with that same movement we meet life.

So we are going to look at the various issues of our life, not with a brain that is trained to solve problems, but to observe the issues, not demanding an answer, not demanding a solution. Is it clear? Please, this is very serious because to live a life without a single problem is the most extraordinary life. It has immense capacity. It had tremendous energy. It is always renewing itself. But if you are always caught in the field of problems and the resolution of those problems, then you never move out of those problems. Is this clear?

So we are going to find out whether it is possible to look at any issue, and not call it a problem, except a mechanical problem. Look at any issue of our daily life and not label it as a problem, but look at it, observe it, be aware of the whole nature of that issue, the content of that issue. But if you approach it as a problem and therefore try to find an answer to it, you will increase the problem. Say for example, it is important to have an unoccupied mind. It is only a brain that is unoccupied that can perceive something new, that is free, has tremendous vitality. It is necessary to have a very quiet mind because it is only a quiet mind, unoccupied mind, a brain that can see things clearly, that can actually think totally differently. Now you hear that, that it is necessary to have a quiet, still mind, a brain whatever you like to call it for the moment. Then you ask how am I to get it. Then you make a problem of it: I need a quiet mind; my mind is occupied, restless, chattering all the time, and then you say how am I to stop it? The desire to stop it brings about problems. How am I to do it, is a problem. Have you understood? But if you approach the question, is it that one must have an unoccupied mind, then you will begin to see for yourself the nature of occupation, why it is occupied, why it is constantly dwelling on a particular thing. When you observe it, when you are aware of it, it is telling you its story. You understand this?

We are going to go into all this. But first we must be very clear that you and the speaker are treating life not as a problem but as a tremendous movement. And if your brain is trained to solve problems, then you will treat this movement as a problem to be solved. And is it possible to look at life with all its questions, with all its issues which is tremendously complex, to look at it not as a problem, but to observe it: to observe it clearly, without bias, without coming to some conclusion which will then dictate your observation. So to observe this vast movement of life, not only your own particular life, the life of humanity, the life of the earth, the life of the whole world, to look at it, to observe it, to move with it. But if you treat it as a problem, then you will create more problems. Right? Is this clear?

Now let's proceed. What is our first issue in life. I am not using the word problem, as I said problem means something thrown at you, that is the root meaning of that word etymologically. Now what is the first movement in our life - the life of man, life of not only your little life, some business life, or you are a doctor, or a surgeon or some kind of leader. We are not talking about that petty little life which we will come to presently, but the life that is around us, the vast immense complex movement of existence. What is it that strikes you first? What is it that has meaning, that has depth, that has a sense of vitality behind it? What would you say if each one of you was asked that question, what would be your first observation, your first response, your first immediate enquiry? Perhaps you never ask this question and so you are not willing to answer it for yourself, but if you look at this vast extraordinary movement of life, of which one is a part, what is the thing that you meet first? Would it be relationship, would it be your own particular concern about yourself, would it be your own fear, your own anxiety, your own particular narrow, limited enquiry, your own search for god? You understand? What would be your first natural contact, natural demand?

We look at this vast movement of life from a narrow little window, that window being your own little self - your own worries, your own anxieties, your own sexual demands? So enquire with me please, don't go to sleep. Or you are looking at this vast movement from no particular point of view, from no window, from no commitment, or are you so caught in a system, in a tradition, in knowledge as a professor, as a philosopher, or a writer, or a surgeon, or are you looking at it as a specialist? Or do you look at it as a human being, the human being who has to many questions, sorrows, pains, anxieties? How do you look at all this? When you put such a question amongst so many people, naturally each one has a different response. But as we are all human beings who are the rest of mankind - we are the rest of mankind, we are not Indian. We may have a certain background, certain tradition, certain long history. That is only a matter of labels. But primarily you are a human being, not a Christian, not a doctor, not a Buddhist, not a Hindu. You are primarily a human being related to all other human beings. Therefore you are the rest of humanity. Your body may be different from another body, the organism, the physical organism may be different from other physical organisms. You are obviously different from the speaker physically. But the body never says I am. You understand what I am saying.

The body never says, I am something special: my progress, my success, I must seek god, the body never says all that. But thought says all that. You are different physically from another and the physical organism is the most extraordinary organism which we despoil. And the body is never conscious that it is separate from somebody else. It is thought that says, I am different. You understand? It is important to see how thought divides. So that is the first thing, don't you notice, when you look at this vast movement of life, how man has divided himself from another, separated himself from another calling himself an American, a Jew, a Russian, an Arab, a Hindu and all the rest of it. Don't you observe this extraordinary broken up human entity. Are you aware of all that? Isn't that the first thing you see how the world is divided geographically, nationally, racially, religiously. And this division is causing immense conflict. This division is causing wars - the Hindu against the Muslim, the Russian against Afghanistan and so on and so on and so on. Isn't that the first thing you see in this world - how man has created this division? This division must exist because thought has created this division.

Sir, if you are at all alert, aware, one sees what thought, man, human being has done to himself and what he has done to others. That is the first thing one observes - the destruction of this division, the breeding of wars through nationalism. One of the causes of war is nationalism, the economic division, and one never treats this vast movement of life as one unit. That is what one meets the first thing, when you look at the world - man fighting man. And we have lived that way for thousands of years, killing each other, in the name of god, in the name of peace, in the name of country, in the name of a flag and we are still doing this, after thousands of years. So one asks what is wrong with man? Why is he doing this? He is extraordinarily clever in the technological world. He has invented the most extraordinary instruments, most delicate. We cannot imagine the things that they are doing. But we are still carrying on most stupidly our own lives. So that is the first thing that you notice. And one asks what is the cause of it? I hope you are asking that too, not just listening.

What is the cause of all this - this division, these wars, the structure of hierarchical authority in every country, in the religious world, in the political world, in the scientific world. It is all based on hierarchical principles - authority - the authority of knowledge, authority of the experience and so on. Now what is the cause of all this? Who is responsible? Please enquire, go into it with the speaker. Because where there is a cause, there is an end to that cause. If one has a pain, the cause being cancer or what you will then that pain can be ended or you are killed. So wherever there is a cause, there is an end to that. That is a law, that is a principle. So we are asking: what is the cause of all this - this vast misery, unhappiness, the tremendous uncertainty? This uncertainty that is breeding tribal gods, what is the root of all this? Are you waiting for the speaker to tell you or you yourself are discovering it? If the speaker tells you, then you make an abstraction of it as an idea. Then the idea and putting that idea into action becomes a problem. But if you and I together, could discover the cause of all this, not the particular misery of this country. It is overpopulation, misrule and corruption and ugliness and so on, that is going on here, it is happening all over the world. They are preparing for monstrous wars; adding great misery to humanity. What is the root of all this?

May we go into it together? Not I explain, you accept, but together, slowly, carefully, find out for ourselves what is the root of all this? What is the cause of all this? If we don't find it now, the future will be exactly the same, what you are now - wars, division, sorrow, pain, anxiety, uncertainty - you understand? So together let us find out. Please bear in mind, the speaker is not instructing. He has no authority to instruct you. You are not his students. He is not your teacher. There is no reward and no punishment. But together let us enquire. Which means you must be equally eager, equally intense, equally interested to find out, not just attend a talk like this and go off, go back to your own life, narrow, bitter, anxious, sorrowful life.

So what is the cause of this division? And this division breeds wars, rows, quarrels, perpetual conflict, conflict between man and woman, sexually, ambitious. What is the root of all this? How do you, if I may ask, if one may ask, how do you approach a question like that? Approach - the question is, what is the root of this, what is the cause of all this? That is the question. How do you approach that question? How do you come near to it? Approach means to come near, to come into contact. This is a question put to you and are you looking at it as a problem to be resolved, or you come very close to it? If you do, then you are then open to the question, but if you keep away from the question, you are not open, you are not alive to the question. You understand? Right sirs? So are we together approaching this question with no direction, with no motive, because if you have a motive, then that motive dictates the answer, it distorts the perception. Suppose this is my question. I am putting this question to myself, 'What is the root of all this?' I have no answer. I don't know, but I am going to find out.

But to find out, I must be free, absolutely free from any kind of direction. Right? Because if I have a direction, a motive, hoping for some kind of reward, then that motive, that reward is going to dictate my investigation. Right? So one must be free to observe this question. What is the root of all this? Is it thought, is it inevitable that we human beings on this beautiful earth which you are very sedulously destroying, is it for every human being living on this earth, that it is inevitable that he must live in conflict, he must live with anxiety, fear? If you accept that as inevitable, then there is no investigation. You have come to a conclusion and there you have shut the door. Conclusion means the ending of investigation. The very word conclusion is to close, to end. So if you come to any conclusion, then you cannot possibly answer. So one must be aware of how you approach this question. We are asking: is it thought? What is thought? Is thought yours, is thought individual? Is your thinking separate from somebody else's thinking? Every person thinks, the most stupid, ignorant, downtrodden man in a village, he thinks, so does the great scientist. So thinking is common to all of us. It is not your thinking separate from my thinking. Thinking is, you may express it differently, another may express it differently, but thinking is the movement of all mankind. So it is not individual thinking. Right? Do we see that? It is rather difficult to accept it or see it because we are so conditioned, we are so educated, trained to think that my thinking is separate from yours. My opinion is different from yours, but opinion is opinion, it is not your opinion or my opinion.

So is thinking the root of all this misery, this destruction, this decline, this corruption, this decay? If it is, then can that movement of thought which has created such havoc in the world - it has created the most extraordinary technological world, great instruments of war, those extraordinary submarines and so on. And also it has created all the religions in the world. It has built extraordinary cathedrals, mosques, temples and all the things that are in the temples, in the mosques, in the churches. Thought has done that, invented all the rituals, invented the saviour in the Christian world, invented liberation or moksha or whatever you like to call it, in this country. And also it has invented god. The more you are uncertain, the more dangerous the world becomes, thought must find a security, a sense of safety, certainty, and so it creates god - your god and my god. My god is better than your god. My guru is better than yours, he gives me initiations, puts garlands on me and all that silly nonsense that goes on. Thought has been responsible for all this. Right sirs? And if that is the cause, please listen carefully, if thought is the cause of all this, our misery, our superstitions, our immense insecurity, uncertainty and also thought has created the most extraordinary things - communications, surgery, medicines and so on. Thought has done all this.

If that is the cause, is there an end to it. You understand my question. Is there an end to thought? That is, if thought is responsible for all this technological world and the human world of misery, unhappiness, anxiety, if thought is the cause of all this, it must have an end. Right? That is, if one has a certain disease brought about by various incidents, that disease has a cause, and that cause having been discovered, it can be treated and ended, the pain or the disease. Similarly, if thought is responsible for all this - not the technological, that will go on, but our daily confusion, misery, uncertainty, sorrow, and all these superstitions that thought has created around us - if thought is the cause, it has an end. If you say, tell me how to end thought, then you make a problem of it. Because your brain is trained, educated to solve problems. As an expert in computers is trained to solve problems there, that same movement is extended into the psychological world. So if thought is the cause of this, the question is, not how to end it, but to understand the whole movement of thought. I am not treated as my thinking, separate from your thinking. Thinking - you understand. If you treat your thinking as yours, and somebody else treats it as his thinking, then the issues are totally different. That leads to all kinds of illusion, superstitions that have no reality. But thinking is the ground upon which all human beings - the black, the white, the pink, the Muslim, the Hindu, the villager, the uneducated, all of them stand. Then we move away from the idea that it is my thinking. Then you are concerned with global thinking. You understand? Not the Indian way of thinking. You are concerned really with the world, with all humanity of which you are. You are not an individual. Individual means unique, undivided. You are not unique, you are totally divided, fragmented in yourself. And you are the result of all the past generations. Your brain is not yours. It has evolved through thousands and thousands of years. But your religion, your scriptures, your everyday life, says you are separate from everybody else. And you are trained to accept it. You have never gone into it, you have never questioned it, doubted it, fearless scepticism, which must investigate, but you accept, and in that acceptance lies your problems. But if you look at it all as a vast movement of life of which you are a part, this movement that is limitless, that has no beginning and no end, then you begin to enquire into the nature of thought.

What is the origin of thought? Why thought divides in its very nature, the very movement of thinking in itself, is it divisive, fragmentary, limited? Unless you ask all the questions, but if you say merely, since thought is perhaps the cause, please tell me how to end the cause; then you are back into your old field of problems. And if you try to solve this problem, you have other problems. I think, I know thought is creating problems. Tell me how to stop them, how to stop thinking. And there are lots of people who will tell how to stop thinking, and then those people vary from each other - meditate, don't meditate, breathe this way, you know all that nonsense that goes on. So we multiply problems after problems. But if you look at this movement of thought, and with this thought man has lived for thousands upon thousands of years. So one has to ask not how to end thought, that is a stupid question, but what is the nature of it? Why has thought become so important? Because thought implies knowledge. What place has knowledge in life? You follow?

We must stop now, we will continue tomorrow evening. But please when you leave here, investigate for yourself. Don't allow me to stimulate you to think, which is what is happening now. Then the speaker becomes a drug. Then you depend on him, then you make him into a guru, and then out of making him into your guru, you have other problems connected with it. But if when you leave here, look at it, find out. That means an active brain, a brain that is active, thinking, discussing, going, not just stuck in a narrow little groove of tradition or some system. And one of the calamities that is taking place in the world is, that we are all getting old, not merely old in the body, but old mentally. Decay begins there inside, first, because we become mechanical. We never have the energy, vitality, passion, to find out. You have all been told what to do, you have all been instructed. And please don't. This is not a place of instruction or are you being told what to do. Here we are serious to find a different way of living, and you can only find that out when you understand the nature of thought, then the way of living in which thought is not important at all.

BOMBAY 2ND PUBLIC TALK 23RD JANUARY 1983

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday evening. We said, didn't we, the present condition of national divisions, racial divisions, linguistic divisions, religious divisions - national divisions as Muslim and the Hindu, the Jew and the Arab, the American and the European, the Russian and so on, the Chinese. And this tribal division which is called national, glorified tribalism called nationalism - it has brought about a great many wars. Where there is division, we said, there must be conflict, not only division between man and woman in their relationship, but also division, racial, religious and linguistic divisions. And we went into the question: why does this constant conflict between man and man exist. What is the root of it? What is the cause of all this chaos, anarchy, almost anarchy, bad governments, arming each group, each nation preparing for wars, thinking one religion is superior to the other, one guru more important than the other and so on. We are seeing this division throughout the world and also historically it has existed for many, many centuries. What is the cause of it? Who is responsible for it? And we said thought has divided man against man: thought has also created most extraordinary architecture, painting, poetry and the whole world of technology, medicine, surgery, communications, computers, robots and so on. Thought has brought about good health, good medicine, various forms of human comfort.

But thought also, as we said yesterday, has created this vast division between man and man, man against man and we ask: what is the cause of all this? Who is responsible for all this? And we said, where there is a cause, there is an end; like when you have a certain disease the cause can be found of that disease, the disease can be cured. So wherever there is a cause, there is an end to that cause. That is obviously a fact. And if thought has created this confusion, this uncertainty, this perpetual danger - war, if thought is responsible for that, then what is to happen if thought is not used.

And also we said yesterday, this is not a lecture to instruct, to inform on a particular subject. We are together investigating, exploring, asking, to find out why man, of course woman included, why man throughout the world lives and perpetuates conflict, not only within himself but outwardly - in society, in religion, in economy and so on. If thought is responsible which is fairly obvious, that thought is responsible for the mess, for the division, for all the misery of human beings. If one recognizes that fact, not a theory about some philosophical outlook or philosophical statement, but if one realizes the actual fact of it, that thought however clever, however crafty, however erudite, thought is responsible. And if it is responsible then what is man to do?

That is where we left off yesterday. We said also that thought has created marvellous cathedrals, temples and mosques and all the things that are in the temples, mosques and churches are the invention of thought. Thought has created god. Because thought seeks to find security, finding uncertainty, insecurity, conflict in this world, then thought invents an entity, a principle, an ideal which may give security, comfort, but that comfort, that security is the invention of thought. I think it is fairly obvious if you think about it very deeply, if you observe your own thinking, that thought however subtle, however stupid, cunning, crafty, has created this division and this conflict. Then we can ask a question: why does this conflict exist, why have we lived with conflict from immemorial times between the good and the bad, the 'what is' and 'what should be', the actual and the ideal. There is this division.

So let us enquire why, not only conflict, why there is division as the good and the bad, evil and that which is beautiful, holy. Please as we said yesterday, we are thinking together, not agreeing, not accepting, but having observed the state of the world, having observed your own society in which you live, your own governments, your own economic condition, and the various gurus with their assumptions, when you have observed all this objectively rationally, sanely, why does man live in conflict? What is conflict? Please bear in mind, if I may remind you, over and over again I shall, that we are having a dialogue together. You and the speaker are having a conversation together, you are not just sitting there, listening to some ideals, listening to some concepts, to some words, but you are sharing. You can only share, partake if you are actually concerned.

But if we merely treat what is being said as a series of ideas, conclusions, suppositions, then our dialogue ends. Therefore there is no communication between you and the speaker. But if you are concerned as every human being is concerned, at all awake to all the things that are happening in the world - the tyranny, the search for power, accepting power, living with power. All power is evil, ugly - whether the power over the wife, or the wife over the husband or the governments throughout the world. Where there is power, the power goes with all the ugly things.

So we are asking why man lives in conflict? What is conflict? Not only between two people man, woman, but also one community against another community, one group against another group and so on. What is the nature of conflict? Please we are thinking together. So do not go to sleep because we are talking about very serious things, which is not a philosophy, but investigating our daily life: the life that we lead day after day - year after year till we die. So please have the goodness, the responsibility of sharing this concern together. We are asking what is conflict? Why do human beings live with conflict? I do not know if some of you have seen those caves in the south of France where twenty five, thirty thousand years ago, there is a picture of a man fighting evil in the form of a bull and so on. For thousands of years we have lived with conflict. To meditate becomes a conflict. So everything that we do or don't do has become a conflict.

Does conflict exist where there is comparison? Comparison means measurement: one compares oneself with another, one may be bright, intelligent, a man in a position, power and so on. Where there is comparison there must be fear, there must be conflict. So can one live without comparison at all? We think by comparing ourselves with somebody, we are progressing. You want to be like your guru or beat your guru, go beyond him. You want to achieve enlightenment, position, you want a following, you want to be respected and so on and so on. So where there is a becoming psychologically, there must be conflict. Right? Are we together thinking about this? Whether it is possible to live a life, a modern life, without any comparison and therefore without any conflict?

Don't say it is not practical. So we are questioning the psychological becoming. You understand? A child becomes an adult, then grows into manhood. To learn a language we need time, to acquire any skill, we need time. And we are asking, please find out for yourself, we are asking, is becoming psychologically one of the reasons of conflict? I want 'what is' to be changed into 'what should be'. I am not good but I will be good. I am greedy, envious, but perhaps one day I will be free of all this.

The desire to become, which is measurement, which is comparison, is that one of the causes of conflict? And is there another reason which is, there is duality. This is not philosophy. We are examining something to understand the nature of conflict and to find out for ourselves if it is possible to be totally, completely free of conflict. Conflict wears out the brain, makes the mind old. A man that has lived without conflict is an extraordinary human being. There is tremendous energy which is dissipated in conflict. So it is important, if one may point out, the necessity of understanding conflict. We see measurement, comparison brings about conflict.

And also we have stated that there is duality, or some of your philosophers have stated that, posited that there is duality and that one of the reasons of this conflict is because of this duality. There is duality - night and morning, light and shade, tall and short, bright and dull, morning sun rising, and sun setting. Physically there is duality. You are a woman and another is a man. But we are asking, please think together with the speaker, not accepting what he says, think together, because then we can co-operate together. Then we can do things together. It is important that we do think together, which means you must put aside your opinions, your conclusions, your experiences, but if you stick to your opinions, conclusions, experiences and another also sticks to his, then there is no co-operation, there is no thinking together. There is division, there is conflict. So please I beg of you, think together, let us think together. Because it is very serious. Is there psychological duality at all? Or is there only 'what is'? I am violent, that's the only state violence, not non-violence. The non-violence is just an idea. It is not a fact. So where there is violence and non-violence, there must be conflict. And in this country you have talked endlessly about non-violence, but probably you are also very violent people. So the fact and the non-fact: the fact is human beings throughout the world are violent. That is a fact. Violence means not only physical but also imitation, conformity, obedience, acceptance.

There are various other forms of violence. That is 'what is', the other is not. But if you are conditioned to the other, that is to pursue while you are violent, non-violence, that is, to pursue away from the fact, then you must have conflict. But whereas is one dealt with 'what is', that is, I am violent, I am not seeking non-violence, which is nonsense, because while I am seeking non-violence I am being violent, I am sowing seeds of violence. Right? Don't go to sleep please. So there is only one fact and that is I am violent. So in the understanding of the nature and the structure of violence there may be the ending of violence, but the ending of violence is not a problem as we went into yesterday. Our minds are trained, educated to solve problems - mathematical problems, economic problems, political problems and so on. We are trained, educated. Our brains are conditioned to deal mechanically with problems.

And we make of life, as we said yesterday, a series of endless problems psychologically and so on.

We went into that yesterday, we are not going to go into it any more because there is lots more to be talked about. So there is only fact, not the opposite. If this is very clear - that the ideal, the principle, that which you call the noble are all illusions. What is fact is we are violent, ignoble, corrupt, uncertain and so on. Those are facts and we have to deal with fact. Facts if you face them, they do not create problems, it is like that. So I discover that I am violent. And I have no opposite to it, I reject totally the opposite. It has no meaning. So I have only this fact. Now how do I deal with fact? How do I approach the fact? How do I look at the fact? What is my motive in looking at the fact, what is the direction in which I want the fact to move. I must be aware of the nature and the structure of the fact. To be aware without choice of the fact. Are you doing this as we are talking? Or you are just happily listening to lot of words and picking up here and there some words that will be convenient and suitable, and not listening totally to your own enquiry.

How does one deal with fact? That is, how do I observe the fact that I am violent? That violence is shown when I am angry, when I am jealous, when I am trying to compare myself with another. If I am doing all that, then it is impossible to face facts. A good mind faces facts. If you are in business, you face facts and deal with the fact, change the fact, you don't pretend that you will do something else away from the fact. Then you are not a good business man. But here we are so ineffectual, we don't change, because we don't deal with facts. Psychologically, inwardly we avoid them. We escape from them or when we do discover them we suppress them. And so there is no resolution of any of them.

From that we can go to something else, which is important. What is a good mind? Have you ever asked? Is a mind good when it is full of knowledge? And what is knowledge? Go on sir, enquire with the speaker. We are all very proud of having knowledge, scholastic knowledge through experience, knowledge through incidents, accidents. Accumulated memory is knowledge. Right? Accumulated experience, and experience can never be complete. So is a good mind, a mind full of knowledge? Is a good mind, a free comprehensive, global mind? Or is a good mind parochial, narrow, nationalistic, traditional? You understand all this? That is not a good mind, obviously. A good mind is a free mind. It is not a contemporary mind. A good mind is not of a time, a good mind is not concerned with time, with environment. It can deal with environment, it can deal with time. But in itself, it is totally free. And such a mind has no fear. The speaker is telling this because our minds have been so educated, so trained that we have nothing original. There is no depth, knowledge is always superficial.

So we are concerned with the understanding of the human being, his mind, his action, his behaviour, his responses which are limited because his senses are limited. And to understand the depth, the nature of conflict and whether it is possible to be completely, wholly free, one must have a good mind, not just a verbal accumulation of words. Which does not mean a clever mind, a crafty mind which most of us have. We have very crafty minds but not good minds. We are very cunning, crafty, subtle, cunning, you know, deceptive, dishonest, but that is not a good mind. So is it possible for us, living in this modern world, with all the activities, the pressures, the influences and newspapers and constant repetition - our minds are being programmed like a computer - you are a Hindu, that is, you have been programmed for the last three thousand years, and so you repeat. Such a repetition indicates not a good mind - strong, healthy, active, decisive, full of passionate alertness. Such a mind is necessary. It is only then it is possible to bring about a psychological revolution and so a new society, a new culture.

And in listening to the speaker, as I hope you are listening, perhaps you are not, it does not matter, but those who are listening, the art of listening is to listen, to see the truth of it and act. For us, we see something to be true, we understand it, not only logically, reasonably, we understand things very clearly but we don't act. There is an interval between perception and action. Right? Between the perception and action all other incidents take place, therefore you will never act. Right? If you see that violence in you is a fact and not try to become non-violent, which is non-fact, but if you perceive the nature of violence, the complexity of violence - and you can see the complexity of violence, if you listen to violence, that is listen to your own violence, it will reveal the nature of itself not descriptively, you can know it yourself. But if you perceive your violence and act, then there is the end of violence, completely. Whereas perception and interval and action is conflict.

As we said yesterday, a chattering mind, is an unhealthy mind. A chattering mind perpetually talks, talks, talks, thinks - not only about business problems, mathematical problems and so on, but problems of one's relationship with your wife, with your husband, with your children, with your neighbour, perpetually occupied and such occupation will inevitably wear down, weigh down the capacity of the brain. One knows this, it is obvious. So is it possible not to chatter? And when we realize that it is chattering and ask the question, is it possible to stop it, then we make a problem of it. And our brains are trained to solve problems. So we think we solve by saying, I must not chatter, and try to control. And then the problem arises: who is the controller? Is the controller different from the controlled? So problems arise and you are ready to solve them. That is what is happening politically the world over. There are innumerable problems. And their brains, like ours, like yours, are trained to solve problems. In solving one problem, they have multiplied or increased other problems. And this is called government and all over the world this is going on.

So to see something, a fact, that I am violent and to let the story of violence reveal itself, it will if your mind is quiet. But don't make a problem of it - how is the brain to be quiet? Then you might just as well take a drug, or what you call meditation, which is an escape from life and we have the other problems in meditation which all become so utterly stupid, meaningless. So is it possible to look, to observe, to find without any choice, to look at your greed, envy, ambition, your arrogance? Have you noticed how many people are arrogant? Not the politician, that is understood, they want power, possession, prestige. Where there is power there is envy. Absolute power is absolute evil, as has been said. Now are you arrogant? You understand? The man who is trying to become something psychologically is arrogant. I am ignorant, not ignorance of books, I don't mean that. That is still ignorance. You may read the Gita, the Upanishads, or the Bible, or the Koran, repeat them endlessly but you are an ignorant human being. Ignorance means not understanding the depth of yourself, not what you are. And a person is arrogant when he tries to become something which he is not. Are you following all this?

We all want to achieve a state of happiness perpetual, unending happiness. And that can only come about through enlightenment - whatever that may mean. And so a disciple with some strange gods and all the rest of it, he is trying to become enlightened. The becoming is the movement of arrogance. Yes sir, look at it. It denies totally the sense of humility. When you are facing facts then you have to be totally humble, not cultivate humility. Only the vain cultivate humility. Right sirs? When they are vain, arrogant, they may cultivate humility but their humility is still arrogance. Go into all this sirs.

So when one discovers for oneself that one is arrogant - arrogance may be that you are a great scientist, won a Nobel prize, or well-known, or you are a writer who wants to be known, because the more books that are sold, more money. So we are all treading the same path of becoming and therefore being utterly dishonest, pretending what we are not. Whereas a good mind faces the fact, the fact that I am violent, arrogant. Nobody has to tell me that I am arrogant, it is so obvious. The way you talk, the way you behave, if one is at all awake one sees the nature of arrogance. To see it, to comprehend it and to hold it, not try to escape from it, it is so. So when there is perception of that which is, that is arrogance, that very perception demands immediate action. That is intelligence. If I see something dangerous and I don't act, I am just stupid.

Whereas arrogance, violence is tremendous danger for a healthy, sane, rational, passionate mind. And if there is the perception of that, that very perception demands immediate action. That is the ending of it. Perception doesn't demand analysis. I don't know if you have gone into all that. Perception of something actual, understanding it, looking at it, ending it, from there you can reason. That very reasoning will be logical. But if you begin with logic, reason, find out the cause, then you will take time and the cause will multiply. It is so obvious all this. Right sirs?

So to come to the point: is it possible to live a life without a single problem? We are not talking of mathematical problems and so on, but problems of relationship. To have no problem in relationship, is that possible? Please enquire with the speaker. You have problems, haven't you, with your wife, with your father, with your mother, with your children, why? Because we are concerned with daily living. If the daily living is not in order, you can meditate till you are blue in the face, that meditation has no meaning, it is merely an escape; you might just as well take a drug and enjoy yourself. But if you do not put your house in order, which is your relationship, if that house is not in order, then your society will not be in order. You must begin near to go far. The near is your relationship. Why have we problems there? Please enquire with me. Don't let me explain, talk endlessly. Let us together, please I request you most earnestly, investigate why you have problems with your wife, with your husband, with your children, with your neighbour, with your government, with your community and all the rest of it. Which is, what is relationship?

Life is a movement in relationship, living. There is no escape from that. You may become a hermit, take vows, put on strange garbs and all the rest of it, thinking yourself extraordinary, exceptional, but you are related. And to understand relationship is the most important thing in life, not god, not all the scriptures, but to understand the depth, the meaning, the beauty, the quality of relationship.

Are you getting tired by listening to the speaker? Are we drowned by a lot of words? Are you being drowned by a lot of words, or do you catch instantly the depth, the beauty, the quality of relationship without more explanation, more analysis, but see the extraordinary importance of relationship? But as you don't see the beauty of relationship, where there is no relationship there is disorder. So let us look at it together. You know I was listening to something serious, perhaps not relevant - you know most of us have homes, have houses, flats, and we own them and possess them. It is our home. We never realize that we are also guests in that house. Right? You understand the meaning of that: to be a guest in a house, in your own house. Do you understand what it means? Must I explain? That means one must be a teacher as well as a disciple. There is no teacher outside of you. You are the teacher and also you are the disciple who is learning from the teacher, not from the teacher as a guru, that is all silly, but you are learning and teaching. You are the owner of your house and also you are the guest of your house. That means you look after the house, you care for the house, you care for whoever is in the house because you are a guest. Oh, come on sirs, you don't see it.

So let us go back. The speaker has travelled all over the world for the last sixty years, different countries, different houses, wherever he is he is a guest. That means he is always adjusting himself, like a river full of water, a great volume of water behind it, and every boulder, every rock it round it. Do you understand? The guest is like that. Let us go back.

Relationship is one of the most important things in life. Right, it is so obvious. And we have made it such a confusion and such misery. And having created conflict, we say it has become a problem and we are able to solve it because our minds are trained as in business, as in science, mathematics. We have problems there. So we are trained that way. So there are problems in our family and we are going to solve that. By solving them we will have more problems because your mind is trained to solve problems, and never free to look at the beauty or the depth of what relationship is. So let us go into it, if we may. What is relationship? The very word implies being in contact, not physical contact, not sexual contact, that you all know, but to be in contact, mentally, emotionally, psychologically, you know, to be in contact with another, so that there is no division in that contact. You understand? That is relationship. But we have not got that contact. You are ambitious and your wife also is ambitious. You want this and she wants something else. She may be right and you may be wrong. She wants to live in a marvellous house, and you say, please for god's sake. She wants to be popular and you don't care. You are a scholar, a professor in your own little groove and she is also. So you never are in contact with each other except sexually. This is a fact. Why? And you call that relationship, your image about her or her image about you. You are not kind, you are brutal, you are this, you are that, you know.

So where does love come into all this? Do you understand my question? When one says to one's wife, I love you, what does it mean? If you ever say it. I don't know whether you say it at all. I doubt it. But if you do say it, what does it mean to love another? Relationship means to love another. What does that word mean? We use that word in advertisements. You see it. I love Coca-Cola or I love this or I love that. I love god, I love my guru. What does that love mean? Is it based on reward and punishment? Look at it sirs, because we are always caught between the two - reward and punishment. I follow the guru because he is going to promise heaven, give me comfort. I don't lose because he is going to punish.

So we are caught in this. Is relationship a reward and punishment process? Is love a movement of that? Think about it. Or we never meet - the wife and husband, except physically, never psychologically meet, and because we never meet there is conflict. Right? That is, to meet your wife or your husband, your children, your neighbour at the same time, at the same level, with the same intensity, that is love. You understand this? You understand this sir, not physically, I don't mean that. To meet somebody, you must meet him, if he is also willing, at the same time, at the same level, with the same intensity. Then that is relationship, but if you are ambitious, you follow the path, becoming noble, ignoble and all the rest of it and she also follows another path, naturally - you may be married, you may have children and all the rest of it - but you never meet. And that breeds a sense of desperate loneliness. Don't you know all this? When I have no relationship with anyone - with my wife, with my boss, with my foreman, when I have no relationship at all with anybody, because I am self-centred, my actions are self-centred, my wife is also self-centred, so that self-centredness, the lack of relationship brings about great loneliness. And discovering that loneliness, then we make out of that loneliness a problem - what am I to do when I am lonely. And your brain is ready to solve the problem. But you never rest with that loneliness, you never enquire the cause of it.

So where there is love, there is no loneliness. Unless you love your wife, if you are the most extraordinary husband or whatever it is, where there is love in your heart, then there is no problem. Because you have not got it, you have a thousand problems. Having stated that, don't make it into a problem. Look at the fact. The fact is that we are not sensitive, that we don't have the depth of beauty - not a picture, not a painting, I don't mean that - the depth of beauty. And the fact is that we don't love. To look at it, to remain with it, to see 'that is so', not invade it, not try to rationalize it. It is so that I don't love my wife. You know what that means to say that to yourself. You should cry. I want to cry for you all.

So sir, it is like two parallel lines never meeting and therefore increasing conflict day after day till you die. And to see the fact that there is no love in your heart, to have the mind in your heart, the mind, not the heart in your mind. You see the difference? Because we are so clever. We think love can be achieved, cultivated. Love is not something to cultivate. Either there is or there is not. If there is not, look at it, hold it, realize what you are without love in your heart. One just then becomes a machine - insensitive, vulgar, coarse, only concerned with sex and pleasure.

Sir, please, I am not harassing you, I am not scolding you. I am just pointing out what has happened to you. Your knowledge, your books have destroyed you because love is not bought in the books. It does not lie with knowledge. Knowledge and love don't go together. When you say, I know my wife, that is your knowledge which is your image about her. That knowledge is put together by thought, and thought is not love.

So having stated all this, do you have love in your heart? Or is it something romantic, nonsensical, impractical, valueless - it does not give you any money. That is so. So having heard all this, is there a comprehension of the depth of that word so that your mind is in the heart? And then you have right relationship. When you have right relationship, which means love, you can never go wrong. You can do what you like. Right sirs.

BOMBAY 3RD PUBLIC TALK 29TH JANUARY 1983

It is a rather noisy place, isn't it? We have to talk over together not only this evening but tomorrow. Tomorrow will be the last talk. We have to cover a great deal during these two talks and as we are going to deal with a difficult subject, we must together perceive for ourselves what is truth and what is false; not to be told what is false or what is true, what is ignorance and what is knowledge, but to find out for ourselves a quiet corner in ourselves, living in this dreadful city, living in small spaces, dirty, working all day long, commuting, going great distances in crowded trains and buses. We must find for ourselves a quiet corner, not in a house or in a garden or an empty lane, but deep within ourselves, because from there act, live and find out for ourselves what is beauty, what is time, the nature and the movement of fear, the pursuit of pleasure and the ending of sorrow. We must have such a corner, not in the mind but in the heart, the mind in the heart because then where there is affection and love, intellect, understanding, then there comes out of that clarity and from that, there is action. But for most of us, we live such strenuous conflicting lives, so much pressure around us, such terrible things are going on in the world, if we don't find for ourselves some inward space, a space not created by thought - which we will go into when we talk about meditation and so on - but to find this space, uncontaminated, clear, in which there is a light which is not lit by another; a light to ourselves so that we are totally free.

We are not free human beings. We think we are free. We think, because we can choose, because we can do what we want, we think we are free but freedom is something entirely different from the desire to do our own thing. So we must together this evening and tomorrow find for ourselves without guidance, without help, without any outside agency telling us what to do, how to behave, what is right action, but to find in ourselves a space, that has no ending and no beginning.

And if one may point out again and I hope you will not mind, that this is not a lecture, a lecture being telling or explaining a certain subject, for you to be instructed, to learn. Lecture generally means that. But this is not a lecture. Here, we are having a conversation together like two friends perhaps walking in a quiet lane, full of trees and beauty of flowers, the singing of many birds, sitting down on a bench unfrequented, solitary and having a dialogue, because we are concerned, both you and the speaker are concerned with our daily life, not with something beyond, romantic and fantastic because if we don't make our own lives clear, unruffled, non-chaotic, whatever one may do it will have no meaning. So we must begin very near to go far. The near is what we are. So please if one may point out, it is your responsibility to think together, not to accept because one must have a great deal of scepticism, a scepticism that is not trammelled by fear, a scepticism, a doubt, so that one begins to question not only what the speaker is saying but also what you think, what you believe, your faith, your conclusions, your religion. One must have tremendous questioning, doubt, enquiry, not accept, because throughout the world, religion has played an extraordinary part in narrowing down the mind, in narrowing down one's investigation through doubt, through questioning, through deep exploration. So please we are together going to look at many things which confront our daily life. We are not going to talk about any philosophy, any dogma, or encourage any faith, but a mind that is questioning, doubting, demanding to find out for oneself what is true, what is illusory, what is fantastic and what is false.

First of all we are going to enquire together what is beauty? You may say, what has that to do with our daily life? Our daily life is rather ugly, self-centred, concerned about oneself; our daily life is a labour, conflict, pain, anxiety, and that sense of desperate loneliness; that is our daily life. And to understand that, one must not only have a great sense of perception, seeing actually what is going on.

So one of the factors of our life is time. We are going to find out together what is time, what a great part time plays in our life; and whether time which is the process of division, time which is a beginning and an ending, time which is becoming, whether that time, apart from chronological time, apart from the time of sun rising, sun setting, the beauty of the full moon and the slip of the new moon - whether time has a part in, or excludes, beauty. This is important to understand for us because we have lost all sense of an aesthetic way of living. We have lost the sense of natural beauty, not the beauty of a face only, or the good taste of clothes and so on but the quality of beauty. Beauty cannot exist without life. Beauty is not of time. Creation is not of time. We will go into that as we go along. So you must first, if you will kindly allow the speaker to go on, time is a great factor in our life. There is time by the watch, the chronological time and the time to learn a language, a skill, a time to achieve in this world, rise from a clerk to the executive person and so on. There is time in that direction. Is there time psychologically, that is, inwardly? Please enquire with me. Don't accept what the speaker is saying. Is there time which means a progress from here to there? Ideologically in the sense of becoming more noble, more free of greed, anger, violence; is there in this fear of the psyche. You understand the word psyche. This is what you are. That is, time is evolution. Right? From the seed to a tree, from the baby to manhood, the growth, the becoming, all that implies time, time as evolution.

Now we are going to question together whether there is psychological evolution at all? You understand what I am saying? Please one must exercise one's brain, think together, not just let the words flow but to think clearly, not stimulated by the speaker, but to question, to find out the implication of time. This is important because time and thought are the root of fear. Fear cannot end or fade away or be dissipated if you don't understand the nature of time and the nature of thought, which are the roots of all fear. So we are examining together the nature of time. There is physical time, the new moon becoming the full moon, the seed growing into a great gigantic tree. Time is necessary to learn a language, a skill; time is necessary to accumulate knowledge. There time is absolutely necessary. You may learn a language within a week or six months. To go from here to your house takes time; from one point to another. All physical movement, physical activity, learning requires time. The psychic, that is, the bundle of all your thinking, of all your feelings, of all your conclusions, beliefs, gods, hope, fears, all that is a bundle, that is your consciousness, that is what you are. Is that clear? That is what your consciousness is. Your consciousness is made up of all these things - your gods, your knowledge, your faith, your hope, your fears, your pleasures, your conclusions, your loneliness, and the great fear of sorrow, pain. All that is your consciousness. We are asking whether that consciousness has evolution at all? Evolutions means becoming what you are more and more and more. You have understood this? That is, I am greedy, envious, violent. Can greed evolve into non-greed, or anger, loneliness become gradually something else? Are we making things clear? Or have we all gone to sleep after a hard day?

Please, this is rather a difficult subject, because all our tradition, all our religious training, our belief, our faith and all the so-called sacred literature tell you that you will become something if you make an effort, if you strive after, if you meditate from this to that, from what you are to what you should be, that is evolution. Now, the speaker is denying all that. Do you understand? The speaker is saying, greed can never become better greed. There is only the ending of something, not becoming something. Most of you probably believe in reincarnation. I don't know why - it is fairly obvious why, why you believe in it, that is from this life to next life, where you have better opportunities, where you will be a little bit nobler, where you have a little more comfort, more enlightenment; that is from what you are, to become what you should be. That is called evolution. The speaker is questioning that. He says there is no such thing as psychological evolution. You have to understand the nature of that statement, what is implied. That enlightenment, deep perception of that which is true, that is which is beyond time is not through progress, through a continuity. So there is no movement as evolution of the psychic, which means there is no becoming. I don't become noble, I don't achieve enlightenment if I practise, if I strive, if I deny this or control and so on, which is gradation in achievement. So one has to understand the nature of time. Time, as we said, essentially means to divide, break; time implies a beginning and an ending.

So we are going to talk over together the nature of fear; whether fear can end now or it must end gradually. You understand the point? We are used to the idea that gradually we will be free of fear, which is, I am afraid but give me time I will be over it. Please don't look at me, it's not worth it. Just think together. So we are going to find out for ourselves whether fear can disappear through time or the very time itself is the root of fear? Is that clear? So what is the root of fear? Please enquire together. What is the root of fear, what is the cause of it? What is fear? You all know what fear is - fear of not becoming, not achieving, fear of the dark, fear of authority, fear of your wife or husband, fear has many, many aspects. We are not concerned with the many facets of fear, or wipe away one or two fears. It is like cutting the branches of a tree, but if you want to destroy the tree you must uproot the tree, go to the very root of it. So we are together and please look at your own fear. You may put on saintly robes, take vows and all that kind of stuff, but there is fear in you.

So look at that fear. What is that fear? Fear of an accident, fear of disease and of course there is the ultimate fear which is of death or the fear of living. And most of you who put on these strange robes and garlands are frightened of living. It makes no difference.

What the speaker is saying will make no difference to those who are dressed in this fancy dress, will it? They go on because they have got this idea that fear can be surrendered to an idea and they will be free of it. Fear is much too deep to surrender it or to dispel it or to control it or to suppress it. One must enquire into the root of it. What is the root of fear? Is it not time, is it not remembrance, is it not an experience which you have had which was painful and the fear of it recurring again, fear of disease; these are all the symptoms. We are not dealing with symptoms. We are concerned whether it is possible to uproot totally all fear.

If that is clear that we are concerned not with a particular fear, not your own special neurotic fear but the nature, the structure, the cause of fear, because where there is a cause, there is an end. So we are going together to find out the cause. We are saying one of the causes of fear is time, that is, the future, the fear of what might happen; fear of the past which is time, which is a remembrance, which is thought. So we are asking, is time and thought - are they the root of fear, are they the cause of fear? I am afraid of what might happen. That is the future. Or I am afraid of something that has happened in the past that might happen again, that is, the past invading the present, modifying itself and going on. Right? So time is one of the factors of fear. It is so obvious isn't it? Now we are asking whether thought is also a factor of fear, and if there is a difference between time and thought. Can you bear all this? Can you go on with this or are you getting tired already?

We are saying that thought and time are the root of fear. We explained somewhat; you can work it out for yourself the nature of time. Time is division as yesterday, today and tomorrow. Time of something that has happened which was painful a week ago and might happen again. The remembrance of the past projecting into the future and we are afraid of that which might happen. Now is thought one of the causes or the cause of fear? So what is thought? What is thinking? The most ignorant, who does not know how to read or write, who lives in a small village, poverty ridden, unhappy, he thinks too, as you think, as the scientist thinks. So thinking is shared by all. So it is not your thinking. It is not individual thinking. I know it is difficult to accept this. Go into it. You think at the moment, I hope. And we are asking: is thought one of the factors of fear? And so we are investigating what is thinking. Thinking is shared by all humanity whether the most educated, sophisticated, rich, powerful and all the rest of it, or by the most simple ignorant half-starving person. It is common to all, therefore it is not your thinking. You may express your thinking differently and I may express it in different words, but the fact is that we both think and thinking is not yours or mine. It is thinking.

So what is thinking? Why has it become so extraordinarily important in your life? Please understand this. Give your mind to this. Because love and thinking cannot go together. Compassion is not the product of thought. Love cannot exist in the shadow of thought. Love is not remembrance. So we must understand, please give your heart and mind to the understanding of this, that thinking is common to all of us. It is not individual thinking. You may express it differently and another express it differently, most scholastically, most capable but another may not. But thinking is shared by all.

So what is thinking? When that question is put to you, you begin to think, don't you, or do you listen to the question? If you listen to the question, which is, your mind is not interfering with your conclusions, with your ideas and so on. If you are listening with all your attention, which means with all your senses totally awakened, then you will see for yourself what is the origin of thinking. The origin of thinking is experience. Experience gives knowledge, whether it is scientific knowledge or the knowledge about your wife or husband. Experience, knowledge, stored in the brain as memory and response of memory is thinking. Right? This is very simple. It is a fact. You cannot think if there is no memory, if there is no knowledge, if there is no experience. So thinking is a process of time. Right? Because knowledge is a process of time, and knowledge being never complete about anything, including your wife or your husband or about your guru, knowledge can never be complete, therefore thought can never be complete, it must always be fragmented. Is that clear?

So fear is the child of thought. Right? I am afraid because I have done something not right, that I might be condemned for it. That is, to think about it. You understand this is simple enough. So thought and time are the factors of fear.

Now, is thought different from time, or thought is time? Thought is a movement, isn't it? It is a material process. Whatever thought has done is material. Your gods are created by thought; your rituals are created by thought; all the things that go on in the name of religion are created by thought: the gods, the gurus, everything is created by thought. And thought being limited, fragmented, because knowledge is limited, and all action then becomes limited. And where there is limitation, there must be fear.

So we are asking, do thought and time work together or are they different? Or there is only thought which, divides as time, as progress, as evolution, as becoming? Sirs, as we said, please explore all this, search out. Don't let your brains become dull by knowledge, by doing all the rubbish we do. Life is both intellect, emotion, senses. But if you let thought dominate them all, as we do, then our life becomes fragmented, shallow, empty.

We ought to talk over together what is love: would you say that you love somebody, love without attachment, love without jealousy? If there is attachment, there is no love. If there is any kind of antagonism, hate, love cannot exist. Where there is fear, love cannot exist. Where there is ambition, love cannot exist; where there is power of any kind, the other cannot be. If you have power over your wife or if you possess your husband, if you are ambitious, then love is not. So we are asking, do you love, because without love, suffering will go on.

So we ought also to enquire - perhaps not enquire - search out, seek out whether there is a possibility of ending sorrow because all these are linked together. Sorrow is not different from fear. Sorrow is not different from thought. Sorrow is not different from hate, the wounds, the psychological wounds that we receive. They are all related to each other. It is one issue, not separate issues. It is something that you have to approach wholly, not partially. But if you approach it intellectually, ideally or idealistically, romantically, then you don't see the wholeness of life. So we are asking, we are searching out if there is a possibility of ending sorrow.

Fear, pleasure, and sorrow have existed from time beyond thought. Man has always had these three factors in life - fear, the pursuit of pleasure and sorrow. And apparently man has not gone beyond that. They have tried every method, every system that you can think of: they have tried to suppress it, they have tried to escape from it, they have tried to invent a god and surrender all this to that invention, but that has not worked either. So we must find out whether sorrow can end. And to understand the nature of sorrow, the cause of sorrow, is the cause different from fear, is the cause different from pleasure, pleasure of achievement, pleasure of possession, pleasure of having great power, pleasure of talent, pleasure of wealth. I do not know if you have not noticed, this country is becoming more and more materialistic. Money matters an awful lot to all of you and yet you go and worship not god, money. If you are pursuing the path of material happiness, you are going to end up in such chaos. And the world is doing that. There is threat of war - the atom bomb. That is the end of materialism. But you don't understand all this.

So let us find out whether sorrow and fear can ever end? And the pursuit of pleasure is infinite, is endless, not only sexual pleasure, the pleasure of becoming something, the pleasure of achievement, the pleasure of being attached to somebody, whether that attachment is to a person, to an idea or to a conclusion. And while you are pursuing that pleasure, there is always the shadow of fear with it. And where there is fear, there is sorrow. So please don't take one thing as though it is something separate - fear is separate. But they are all together, they are all interrelated and one must deal with them all wholly, not separately. If that is clear and we are not dealing with sorrow separately, as though it was something different from fear. So we are looking, searching out the nature of sorrow and the ending of sorrow because where there is sorrow there is no love. Sorrow expresses itself in so many ways: the sorrow of loneliness, the sorrow of seeing this vast country - poverty, corruption, utter disregard for another human being, carelessness. When you watch all this day after day that is also sorrow. The utter neglect of all the politicians right all over the world, they only want power, position and where there is power, there is evil. And sorrow is the loss of some one you love, whatever that love may mean. Sorrow of losing, sorrow of ending something you have cherished, something that you have held on to; the sorrow of doubt, the sorrow of seeing one's own life such an empty shell, meaningless existence. You may have money, sex, children, be very fashionable, rich but it is an empty life. There is no depth in it. Seeing that, perceiving the nature of it, is also sorrow. The sorrow of a man who has everything and nothing. The sorrow of ignorance. So can sorrow end? It is not your sorrow, it is also mine and another's. Don't deal with sorrow as your particular precious stuff; it is shared by all humanity. But when you deal with it as your particular sorrow, your private quiet sorrow, it is the sorrow of all human beings, whether you are a man or a woman, rich or poor, sophisticated or at the height of your excellence.

So please do not deal with all these factors like fear, pleasure, sorrow, love and so on as something separate from each other. All that is yours, your secret pleasure, your secret sorrow. You must approach this whole thing wholly, not fragmentarily, if you approach it fragmentarily you will never solve it. You see this country is separating itself from all other countries. America is separating from all other countries. England, Russia and each country is trying to solve its own problems - poverty, lack of food, ignorance - not of books, that is fairly cheap, but ignorance of oneself. So either the politicians awake one day and see there must be a global relationship, not national relationship, global human relationship. One wants to cry when such appalling things are going on. So please look at greed, pain, sorrow, as a movement of life, as a whole movement of life, not something different from life. This is our daily life. And to find out whether there is an end to all this - to misery, to conflict, pain, sorrow and fear - one must be able to perceive them, one must be able to be aware of them. So we must understand what is perception, how to look at all this? Is the observer who looks at all this - the poverty, the loneliness, the anxiety, the uncertainty, the suffering - is all that different from the observer or all that is the observer? I will explain this.

We have separated the 'me' who is the observer, as different from that which he is observing. I say I am suffering, and I say to myself that suffering must end, and to end it I must suppress it, I must escape from it, I must follow a certain system. So I am different from fear, from pleasure, from pain, sorrow. Are you different from all that? Or you may think that there is something in you which is totally different from all that. If you think that, that is part of your thought, and therefore there is nothing sacred there. So, please, is the observer different from the observed? Don't make it absurd. You see a tree and when you say, am I different from the tree, you are I hope. But when you are angry, envious, brutal, violent, are you not all that? The meditator is the meditation. Yes, sir, think about it. So the observer is the observed. See the importance of this. Before we have divided the observer from the observed. That means there is a division between that and the other. So there was conflict. You could then control it, suppress it, fight it, but if you are that, if you are sorrow, if you are fear, if you are pleasure, you are this whole conglomeration of all this. And to realize that fact is a tremendous reality. Therefore, there is no division and therefore there is no conflict. Then the observer is the observed. Then a totally different action takes place, a totally different chemical action takes place.

It is not an intellectual achievement, but to see the truth of it, not the intellectual concept of the truth but to see the fact that you are not different from your qualities. You are not different from your anger, jealousy, hatred, but you are all that. You know what happens when you realize that, not verbally but inwardly? Find out. You are waiting for me to tell you? I won't! You see how your mind works. You are waiting for me to tell you. You don't want to find out. If I tell you then you will say, yes, right or wrong, but you will go on, But when you find out for yourself the actual truth of it, that the observer is the observed, the watcher is the watched. When you watch the moon, the full moon of yesterday rising out of that smog, that moon is not you, unless you are loony. But you are the whole bundle of your consciousness, the content of your consciousness is what you are and the content of that consciousness is put together by thought. Now to find out, not the ending of thought but to find out how to observe the content. When you observe without the division, then a totally different action takes place. Where there is love, there is no observer, there is no you and the one that you love; there is only that quality of love.

BOMBAY 4TH PUBLIC TALK 30TH JANUARY 1983

This is the last talk. We have talked about a great many things which concern our daily life. We ought to talk over together the significance of death, not that it is a morbid subject. Also we should have a dialogue about what is religion and meditation. But before we go into all that, I wonder if one is aware of what is happening to our minds, to our brains; if one is aware of the extraordinary capacity of the brain in the technological world, the extraordinary things that the brain, which is the seat of thought, has brought about; extraordinary things are happening in the technological world of which most of us are unaware. And technologically we have progressed, advanced so rapidly, and psychologically - that is what we are, our behaviour, our attitudes, our actions - we are more or less unevolved. We are still aggressive, brutal, cruel, thoughtless - for thousands and thousands of years. And apparently man is still behaving more or less as he behaved 40,000 years ago. And if one had that same energy, that same intensity as one uses in the technological world, if we could go very, very deeply into ourselves and go beyond ourselves, the brain has infinite capacity there too. But very few have taken that journey, very few have gone into this question whether the mind, the brain, can ever be free, totally free and therefore enquire very, very deeply, search out what lies beyond, if there is anything beyond thought. And we are going to talk over that presently.

Some of you perhaps have heard of genetic engineering. That is, man has not progressed, evolved to the same extent as the technological effort. So the genetic experts say that they assume a factor, a creative element handed down from the father to the offspring, certain tendencies, qualities. This is what is called partly the beginning of genetic engineering. They are saying since man, you, have not changed fundamentally for thousands of years, perhaps, and they assume that man can be changed through genetic interference. We are putting it very, very briefly. It is a very complex question which we are not going to discuss. But we must understand what is going on. That as human beings have not deeply changed their characteristics, their way of life, their violence, they are hoping through certain chemicals and so on to change the genes, the factors of that create certain characteristics from the father to the son.

And also we should consider what is happening in the computer world. We cannot neglect all this - the genetic engineering and what is happening in the computer world. They are trying, perhaps successfully or not, to create a mechanical intelligence, ultimate intelligence through the computer which will then think much more rapidly, more accurately and inform the robots what they should do. This is happening already. And they are trying, we have talked to others about this matter, they are trying to bring about a machine, a computer which has ultimate intelligence. You understand all this?

So there is on the one side genetic engineering, on the other the computer taking, acting, as human beings, inventing generation after generation of the computer, improving, and so on. I won't go into all that. So what is going to happen to the human mind? What is going to happen to us when the computer can do almost everything that we do? It can meditate, it can invent gods, much better gods than yours, it can inform, educate your children far better than the present teacher, educators, and it will create a great deal of leisure to man. One has seen in Japan on a television, a computer instructing a robot how to build a car and the robot did some mistake, the whole machinery stopped and the computer told him what went wrong, and the computer did the right thing, and the whole thing started. You are understanding the nature of all this, the significance of all this? That is, what is going to happen to our minds when the computer and the genetic engineering are rapidly advancing, what is going to happen to us?

We would have more leisure, the computer plus the robot will do a great many things that we are doing now in factories, in offices and so on. Then man will have more leisure. And how will he use that leisure? You understand? Please go into this with me for a while. If the computer can outthink you, remember far more than you do, calculate with such astonishing speed and gives you leisure, either you pursue the path of pleasure which is entertainment - cinemas, religious entertainments, you know all the industry of entertainment, including gurus - and either entertainment or psychological search, seek out inwardly and find out for oneself a tremendous area that is beyond all thought. These are the only two possibilities left for us: entertainment or delve into the whole structure of the psyche and acting. Now we are asking what is our human mind, our brain. We are going to find out for ourselves.

So please, as we have said over and over again, we are thinking together, you are not merely listening to the speaker, accepting some words, ideas, or we are communicating with each other, thinking together and finding out.

So we first begin by asking what is the significance of death. It is not an old man's question. It is the question of all humanity whether we are very young or very old. What is the meaning, the significance, of the extraordinary thing called death? Yesterday evening, we talked about several things including what is love, compassion. What is the relationship of life which is not only the whole human existence, what is its relationship to love, to death and to the whole search of man for thousands of years to find something that is beyond all thought? We have to understand the meaning of death because we are all going to die, thank the Lord. Right? We are all going to die. That is an absolute certainty. And we are so afraid of it or we rationalize it. You say, yes, I accept it. I accept death as I accept pain; as I accept sorrow, as I accept loneliness, I also accept death. Which is to submit, to suffer death, to allow the whole of existence of a human being to come to an end, either through disease, through old age or through some incident. We have never found out what it means to die while we are living, not commit suicide but to understand the depth of it. I hope we are together looking at it. We are looking at it as an incident of life, as a fact of life, as violence is a fact of life, as hatred is a fact of life. And we must if we are at all reasonable, sane, we must look at this question of death in a similar manner, not accept it, not just say it is inevitable or try to find out what lies beyond death, but to observe the nature of dying.

What does death mean to most of us? Please we are asking this question not rhetorically but to find out. Surely it means the ending both organically, biologically and to all the things that we have held dear, to all the wounds, pains, sacrifice, resistance, loneliness, despair all that coming to an end. Which means either there is a continuity of the self, the 'me' or the ending of the 'me'. You are following all this. We said death is an ending.

You can believe in reincarnation, as most of you perhaps do. If you do, you have to ask the question, what is it that continues. Is there a continuity or is there constant change - breaking, ending, beginning? You are following all this? So if you believe as most people perhaps in India believe, that you are going to be reborn and what is it that is going to be reborn? Surely not the physical body, but if you believe in that, it is a continuity of what you are now, continuity of your beliefs, your activities, your greed and so on and so on. That is the bundle which is the consciousness, which is the self. That self which is essentially consciousness is put together by thought, your greed, your envy, your religious belief, superstitions, your anger and so on, all those are the activities of thought. You are the result of a continuous movement of thought. And if you believe in reincarnation and all that, you must find out if it is an illusion or a reality. If you are your name, your form, your ideas, your conclusions, your experiences, are they the factor of continuity as the 'me' in the next life?

Now what is that 'me'? Go on, sirs, please search out with the speaker. This is a very important question. Each one of us, we think, is a separate entity, so-called individuals. And what is that individuality? The name, the form, what you remember, your attitudes, your loneliness, your pain, your anxiety, your chaos, your sorrow and uncertainty. You may have a bank account or not; you may live in a nice house or a small little room or a nice flat, but you are all that. You are the bank account. Are you following all this? When you are attached to a bank account, you are that bank account; when you are attached to a house, you are the house; when you are attached to your body, you are that. You may have lovely furniture, perhaps thirteenth, fourteenth century and it is marvellous furniture, and if you are attached to that you are that furniture. So you are all that, which is what? Go on sirs, think it out please. When you are attached to a chair, to a person, to an idea, to an ideal, to a personal experience, what are the implications of that attachment?

Why are you attached, because death says you cannot be attached. That is the end of it. You may believe in the future but death says, you have ended, your attachment is over, your bank account is over, your guru and all your following is over. Right? So what is it that continues, that is reborn? Memories, ideas? Which is what? Something dead? Or there is no continuity at all? Think, search out, please. Continuity means that which is goes on modifying itself. You are becoming something, and achieving it and wanting more. Continuity implies security, certainty. Are you certain about anything? Is there security in your ideas? So we want continuity. We hope to have continuity because in continuity we think there is security. One has been married for ten years, fifteen years or five years, or fifty years, there is certain continuity - legal responsibility but in that continuity there is conflict, misery, unhappiness and all the rest of that, in that relationship. So there is no continuity at all. There is constant change if you are aware of it. Either that can be superficial or a total mutation - not transformation but mutation, change, that which has existed completely undergoes a change.

One must find out for oneself, what is the fact, what is the truth of this matter? One cannot be convinced by argument, by so-called evidence and so on. One cannot be convinced about anything. One has to search out, seek and find what is true and what is illusion. We have lived with this illusion that we are separate entities. Whereas if you examine very closely, our consciousness which is you, is shared by all humanity. They suffer as you suffer; they are uncertain, as you; they are lonely, miserable, confused, anxious, as you are. So your consciousness is not yours. It is the consciousness of all humanity. So you are the entire humanity. It is not mere logical conclusion or observation, that is a fact. And we have been trained, educated both religiously, educationally that we are separate individuals. So we are frightened that individuality should come to an end. You are following all this? But if one sees the reality, the truth that you are the rest of mankind, and then what is death? You understand? Instead of being frightened I may die and I hope to live next life, and I who wish to have continuity and hoping that continuing will modify, change gradually till it reaches god knows what, such a thought, such concept as an individual when one approaches the question of death, there is immense fear of ending.

Have you ever enquired what is the nature of ending, not ending to begin something, ending? That is, you are attached, that is a common fact; attached to your children, attached to your husband, and wife, attached to something or other. And death comes along and wipes away that attachment. You can't carry your money to heaven. You may like to have it till the last moment but you cannot take it with you, and death says, 'No'. So can we living, understand the nature of attachment with all its fear, jealousy, anxiety, possessive feeling, while living, be free of attachment? You are following all this? Are you following what we are talking about? While you are alive, to end something voluntarily, easily without any pressure, without any reward or punishment, to end. In that there is great beauty. Then one understands the nature of freedom.

In the ending, there is no beginning, something new. There is an ending. And when there is an ending, there is that feeling of total freedom of all the burden that humanity has carried for centuries. One knows that you listen to all this, smile, nod your head and agree but you will go on being attached. That is the easiest way, the most comforting and the most painful, anxious, but you will go on. And you call that practical. Whereas if you understand the nature of ending, ending your ambition in a very, very, competitive world, understand the ending of your arrogance, your pride, your status. So when this so-called organism ends, the content of consciousness of humanity goes on, unless you bring about a radical change in that consciousness, a mutation so that you are no longer in that stream of selfishness; you are no longer caught, encaged, put in prison of attachment, uncertainty and so on. There is a totally different way of living.

And also we should talk about religion. Again it is a very complex question. And together we are going to find out what is a religious mind, a mind that is religious, not the mind that does puja, you know all the ceremonials and all the beliefs and all that. That is not religion, that is all the inventions of thought. God is your invention because you find life so dull, boring. It is such a pain, so you invent god who is all perfect, all loving, you know all that stuff. And you worship that. You worship that which you have put together by thought. So thought is deceiving you. I wonder if you understand all this. But you will go on, because you love to live in illusion. So we must find out what is a religious mind because a religious mind brings about a new world, a new civilization, a new culture, a new outburst of energy. So one must find out for oneself, not be told, not be directed, not to be explained like a lot of children what is a religious mind? Obviously all the religions in the world are the result of a great deal of intrigue, property, a great deal of wealth, all put together by thought. There is no denying that, however erudite you are, however sceptical you are or however religious you are - religious in the ordinary sense of that word. If you are willing to examine, as you must, if you are at all concerned with what is happening in the world and what is happening around you, you must enquire what is religion, not accept it, not believe it, not having faith, because such activities are related to one's own desires, comforts, thought.

So what is a religious mind? You can only find out if you deny totally all the present religious structure, religious beliefs and ideas because it is only a free mind that can find out what is the quality of a religious mind. First of all, one can see very clearly freedom is essential; not freedom from something, a prisoner wanting freedom which means away from a prison. First he is caught in a prison, then he wants freedom to leave that prison. That is only a reaction. Right? That reaction is not freedom. Freedom implies the total ending of all illusions, of all belief, of all your accumulated wants, desires. That freedom is something totally different from the desire to be free. A religious mind is a sane, healthy factual mind, faces facts, not ideas. The speaker can go on explaining what is a religious mind. Perhaps you will accept the definitions or deny the definitions but merely arguing, analyzing, questioning may help, but it may not necessarily bring about a religious mind.

We have become too clever. So one has to have a great humility, a sense of not knowing. And also a religious mind acts, because it is compassionate. And that action is born of intelligence. Intelligence, compassion, love all go together.

What is meditation. Don't suddenly sit up properly. That has no meaning. You may sit cross-legged, breathe properly, practise various systems, that is not meditation. We are going to enquire, search out for ourselves what is meditation? The word meditation means, the word, according to a good dictionary, to ponder over, to think over, to look closely, to come in touch with, not something sublime, invented by thought, but come close and touch your daily life. That is the ordinary dictionary meaning of that word meditation. And also meditation implies measurement. The meaning of that word is to measure, also to think over, to ponder over, to consider and to measure. That is the meaning of that word. So we begin by asking why do we measure? What do we mean by measurement? Are we talking together, or are you going to sleep? Are we both meeting each other or is the speaker instructing you? If you are thinking he is instructing you, then you are totally wrong. He is not instructing you, he is not telling you what to do. But together find out what is meditation. We must ask, why is there in our mind and heart this constant measurement? Measurement means comparison. To compare myself with you, who are beautiful, clear, certain, the whole feeling of your being is totally different from me. And I compare myself with you, wanting to be like you, wanting to be like your guru, like your highest - whatever the example is.

Why do we compare at all in life? And we say, we compare in order to make progress. In the technological world you have to compare. There must be measurement. Measurement was invented by the ancient Greeks - to measure. And with us, we are always comparing: you are beautiful, I am not; I want to be as beautiful, as powerful as you are. Right? We want to be enlightened as you are. So there is always this competition of comparison between us. We are never free of that movement; but if we are free, then what are we? You understand my question? If you don't compare, as you must compare between two materials, two clothes, or two cars, there you must naturally compare, but in human relationship why do we compare? And is it possible to be free of comparison, the ending of comparison? If you don't, then you throw away a great burden that has no reality. Because then you are what you are. From there you can begin. But if you are always comparing, becoming somebody else, then you are fundamentally unhappy, anxious, frightened, and all the rest of it.

So please ask the question of yourself whether you can live without comparison, without any form of measurement, which is quite difficult, because we are trained, educated, convinced that we are this, but we will become that. The 'becoming that' is a form of measurement. To live without a single movement of measurement, that is part of meditation. And most people who meditate now follow various systems. Each one has his own guru and he has laid down certain systems of meditation and you practise, repeat certain words over and over and over again, and you call that meditation. When you repeat over and over again, what is happening to your brain? You become more and more dull, you become a machine, and you think that is meditation. And you will go on doing it in spite of what the speaker is saying.

So in enquiring what is meditation, there can be no system, no effort. Effort means conflict. Right sir? Can you be free of systems, practice, realizing the fact that your brain, your senses become dull? And perhaps that is what has happened to this country, the tragedy of it. You are copying all the technology of the West. You have your own aeroplanes, your own guns, your own shells, your own computers, all from the West. And the West is making you more and more materialistic. We are not talking, we are not condemning the West. They have their own problems, as you have. So can you be free of systems? It is so logical, so sensible, so sane that when you practise over and over again, sitting straight - you know all that silly stuff - you are becoming gradually mechanical, gradually dull, like those people who belong to certain communities, form little groups. You can't talk to them reasonably. They believe, they practise, and they are killing themselves. So can the mind, the brain realize what it means to follow somebody; to obey what somebody else tells you what to do, because he has got a different dress, calls himself a guru, all those things have destroyed the beauty of a religious mind.

And meditation is none of these things, yoga included. Standing on your head and doing all those things, none of them are meditation, obviously. Then what is meditation? We want experience. You are craving for some strange experience, so-called spiritual experiences. We have enough of experiences in this world, of pain, anxiety, sorrow, and we say we must have something more, greater experience. Experience has nothing whatsoever to do with meditation. To experience there must be an experiencer, and if there is an experiencer, that experiencer is the continuity of past memories which is the self. Meditation is the understanding of the whole structure of the 'me', the self, the ego, and whether it is possible to be totally free of the self, not seek some super-self. The super-self is still the self.

So meditation is something which is not a cultivated, determined activity. There must be freedom and where there is freedom there is space. I wonder if we understand what space is. Have we space, apart from the physical world? Have we, living in Bombay, space? Hardly. We live in a little flat or a little room and our minds gradually accept that little space. We are talking of space which has no walls. You know when you look at the sea, when the smog has gone and you see the far horizon, the vast distance, and when you look up at the stars and see their extraordinary brightness and vast space, and the space that you have in your mind, how small it is, how narrow it is. That space in your heart and mind is so controlled, shaped, put together, so there is hardly any space in you. To understand that which is sacred, there must be vast space in you, not out there in the sea. You understand? Space is not separation. Space is not division. When you divide there is space between you and your wife, between you as India and another country. But that is not space. The space demanded inwardly can only exist when there is no conflict whatsoever. Then when there is that vast limitless space of the mind, then only in that space there is energy, not the energy and friction of thought because that energy is born out of freedom.

When there is that space and silence and that immeasurable energy, then there is that which is utterly nameless, measureless, timeless, then there is that which is sacred. But to find that, one must have great love, great compassion which must begin at home. You must love your wife, your children, your husband. Love cannot exist with attachment. Then if it is attachment, then you have all the problems of life.

So, sirs and ladies, it is your life. Either you bring about a great radical psychological revolution in yourself, or the chemists, the experts of the genetic world are going to make you do something. Then you will become merely machines. Then life will have very little meaning. But there is great significance, great meaning, if you are aware what love is, compassion and intelligence, and out of that comes great silence and vast space. All that cannot exist if there is any shadow of selfishness. And this is meditation, not the repetition of words, not the discipline of will but the discipline of order which comes when there is no conflict. Right sirs?

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST CONVERSATION WITH PUPUL JAYAKAR 24TH JUNE 1983

PJ: Krishnaji, there is a strange phenomenon happening in the world today where the East reaches out to the West to find sustenance, and the West reaches out to the East for - in inverted commas - wisdom to fill some vacuum which exists. Would you say there in an Indian mind which may have the same directions, or contain the same elements of sorrow, greed, anger, etc., but where the ground from which these spring is different?

K: Are you asking, whether the Eastern thought, Eastern culture, Eastern way of life, is different from the West?

PJ: Well obviously the Indian way of life is different to the West.

K: It is.

PJ: Because the conditionings of the two are different. But they in a sense complement each other.

K: In what way?

PJ: In the sense that the East, or India more specifically, lacks perhaps that precision of carrying an abstraction to concrete action.

K: Are you saying they live more in abstractions?

PJ: Yes. They are not so concerned about action in the environment, action as such.

K: What would you say they are concerned with?

PJ: Today, of course, there is a great change taking place, it is very difficult to say what the Indian mind is. Because the Indian mind today is looking at one level for the same material comforts...

K: ...progress in the technological world.

PJ: Yes, progress in the technological world.

K: And applying it in daily life.

PJ: And consumerism.

K: Consumerism, yes.

PJ: It has percolated very deep into the Indian spirit.

K: So what ultimately is the difference between the Indian mind, Indian culture, and the Western culture?

PJ: Perhaps still, in spite of this material overtone, there is a certain edge to the delving process, if I may put it. When it goes into the field of...

K: Parapsychology?

PJ: No, not parapsychology - parapsychology is very developed in the West. But I am talking about this delving into the self, delving into the within, the insights into things. For centuries the Indian mind has been nurtured on a ground of this feeling. Whereas, from a certain time in the West, there was a movement away. And there has always been a movement away right from the time of the Greeks towards the outer, the environment.

K: I understand. But the other day I heard on the television, a very well known Indian was being interviewed. He said the technological world now in India is humanizing the Indian mind.

PJ: No. I understand that.

K: I wonder what he meant by that, humanizing. Instead of living in abstractions, and theories, and complexity of ideations and so on, the technological world is bringing them to earth.

PJ: And perhaps it is necessary to some extent.

K: Obviously it is necessary.

PJ: So if these two minds have a different essence...

K: I question that very much, whether the Indian thought - I am sorry, I don't mean that - whether thought is ever East or West. There is only thought, it is not Eastern thought, or Western thought. The expression of thoughts may be different in India, and here it may be different, but it is still a process of thought.

PJ: But is it also not true that what the brain cells contain in the West and perhaps the centuries of knowledge and so-called wisdom in the East have given a content to the brain cells which make them perceive in a different way?

K: I wonder how accurate what you are saying is. I would like to question what you are saying, if I may. I find when I go there, there is much more materialism now than there used to be.

PJ: Yes.

K: More concerned with money, position, power and all that. And of course there is over population, and all the complexity of modern civilization. Are you saying that the Indian mind has a tendency to an inward search, much more so than the West?

PJ: I would say so. Just as the Western mind has...

K: ...a technical.

PJ: ...not only technological but environmental...

K: Yes, environmental, economic and so on, ecological.

PJ: The outer. There is the inner environment and the outer environment. I think if you take it that way I would say the outer environment is the concern of the West, and the inner environment has been the concern of the East, of India.

K: It has been the concern, but it has been the concern of a very, very few people.

PJ: But it is only the few people who create the culture. How does culture come into being?

K: That is a question that we should discuss. Before we go into that, is there really a distinction between the Eastern thought and Western thought? I would like to establish that. Or there is only this extraordinary phenomenon of the world being divided into the East and the West.

PJ: But what has divided it?

K: Geographically, first; politically, economically, as a much more ancient civilization - if I can use that word - than the West. All that is the Indian mind - if you can use that word mind with regard to all that. The Western world is much more concerned, as far as I can see, I may be mistaken, with worldly affairs.

PJ: But what turned it in that direction?

K: Climate, much more, very much more, it is a colder climate, and all the inventions, and all the modern technology comes from the Northern part of the world, the northern people.

PJ: Yes, but if it was only climate then...

K: No, it is not only the climate.

PJ: Because Africa, Equatorial Africa...

K: Of course not, of course not.

PJ: ...would have the same mind.

K: No, no.

PJ: But it is not that.

K: It is not only the climate. It is the climate and the whole so-called religious way of life in the West is very, very different from the East.

PJ: That's what I am saying. Somewhere along the line people of one racial stock, seemingly, divided.

K: Divided, yes, from Sumaria and so on.

PJ: And the direction in which the West turned was the discovery of their dialogue with nature, out of which arose technology, out of it arose all the great scientific fine truths. India also had a dialogue with nature...

K: But of a different nature.

PJ: ...of a different nature. The dialogues were in themselves of a different kind.

K: So are you trying to say that the Eastern mind, the Indian mind, is more concerned with religious matters than the West? Here in the West it is all rather superficial, though they think it is rather deep. And there, in India, tradition, literature and everything says the world is not so important as the understanding of the self, the understanding of the universe, the understanding of the highest principle, Brahman.

PJ: This swiftness with which the mind can start the enquiry is perhaps different to the West, where enquiry, insights, the great insights have been in different directions.

K: Of course. But here in religious matters, doubt, scepticism, questioning, is absolutely denied. Faith is all important here. In Indian religion, in Buddhism and so on, doubt, questioning, enquiry becomes all important.

PJ: So out of this today somehow both the cultures are in crisis.

K: Yes, of course. Would you say not only cultures, but the whole human consciousness is in a crisis?

PJ: Would you distinguish human consciousness from culture?

K: No.

PJ: In a sense they are the same.

K: No, basically they are not.

PJ: So the crisis at the very root is making them search some way away from themselves. They feel an inadequacy so they turn to the other culture. It is happening in both countries.

K: But you see, Pupulji, I am questioning whether in their search from their materialistic outlook, if I may use that word, they have been caught by all kinds of superstitious, romantic, occult ideas, and these gurus that come over here, and all the rest of it. What I want to find out is whether human consciousness, if it is in a crisis, as it is, whether it is possible not only to resolve that crisis, without war destroying humanity, whether human beings can ever go beyond their own limitation. I don't know if I am making myself clear?

PJ: Sir, may I just?

K: Of course, this is a discussion.

PJ: The outer and the inner is like the material and the search within. It is two mirror images of these two directions in which man has moved. The problem really is that if man has to survive the two have to be...

K: They must live together.

PJ: Not live together, but a human culture come into being which would contain both.

K: Now what do you mean by the word culture? What do you mean by culture?

PJ: Isn't culture everything that the brain possesses?

K: That is, would you say the training of the brain and refining of the brain?

PJ: The training of the brain and the refinement of the brain.

K: And the expression of that refinement in action, in behaviour, in relationship, and also a process of enquiry that leads to something totally untouched by thought? I would say this is culture.

PJ: Would you include enquiry in the field of culture?

K: Of course.

PJ: Isn't culture a closed circuit?

K: You can make of it that way, or you can break it and go beyond.

PJ: But to take culture as a closed circuit, today culture, as it exists...

K: That's why I want to understand what you mean by culture.

PJ: As we understand it today, Krishnaji, it is our perception, the way we look at things, our thoughts, our feelings, our attitudes, the operation of our senses. You could keep on adding to this.

K: That is the religion, faith, belief, superstition.

PJ: The outer and the inner, which keeps on growing. It may be growing but it is all growing within that contour. It remains a contour. And when you talk of a search which in no way connected with this, would you include it...

K: Search?

PJ: Well, enquiry, search, observation.

K: I understand.

PJ: You can use any word.

K: Of course, of course.

PJ: But would you put it into the field of culture?

K: Of course. Would you say, I am just trying to clarify the matter, would you say the whole movement of culture is like a tide going out and coming in, like the sea, going out and coming in. And the human endeavour is this process of going out and coming in, and never enquiring whether that process can ever stop. You understand? What I mean is we act and react. That's the human nature. Act and react, like the ebb and flow. I react, and out of that reaction act, and from that action react, back and forth. Right? Now I am asking whether this reaction of reward and punishment can stop and take a totally different turn? We function, we live, and our reactions are based on reward and punishment. Right?

PJ: Yes.

K: Physically, psychologically and in every way. And that's all we know, deeply. Now I am asking whether there is this reaction of reward and the avoidance of punishment, and so on, is there another sense of action which is not based on this action, reaction? You understand what I am talking about?

PJ: As this action, reaction is an impulse of the brain cells...

K: It is our conditioning.

PJ: And it is an impulse of the brain cells.

K: Yes, of course.

PJ: It is the way the brain cells respond, and the way they receive through the senses. Now the question you asked...

K: Our question is really, we are enquiring into what is culture.

PJ: What is culture, and we went into that. It can be expanded much further, but still it remains within the same field.

K: The same field but you can enlarge the field.

PJ: Would you say then that culture is that which is contained in the brain cells?

K: Of course.

PJ: Anything else?

K: All our past memories.

PJ: So if you take all that is there anything else?

K: I understand. Now this is a difficult question because one must be careful, very careful. If there is something else, if, then that something else can operate on the brain cells which are conditioned. Right? If there is something in the brain, then the activity of that something else can bring about freedom from this narrow, limited culture. But is there something else within the brain?

PJ: But even physiologically they are saying, Krishnaji, that the operation of the brain cells today is a very, very minute portion of its capacity.

K: I know that. Why?

PJ: Because conditioning limits it, and it has never been free of those processes which limit it.

K: Which means thought is limited.

PJ: Yes. It has put all its eggs in one basket.

K: Thought is limited. And we are all functioning within that limitation, because thought, experience is limited, knowledge is limited for ever, and memory, and thought. So thought is limited.

PJ: What place have the senses in the perceptive process in this?

K: No. That brings another question, which is: can the senses operate without the interference of thought? You understand my question?

PJ: As they operate today, Krishnaji, they seem to have one root. The movement of the senses as they operate is the movement of thought.

K: Therefore it is limited.

PJ: So when you ask a question is it possible for them, what does one do with a question of that type?

K: I am enquiring. I am enquiring with a lot of hesitation and a certain amount of scepticism, whether the brain, which has evolved through thousands of years, experience, untold sorrow, loneliness, despair, and all the rest of it, and its search to escape from its own fears through every form of religious endeavour, whether those brain cells in themselves can ever change, bring about a mutation in themselves. Otherwise a totally different new culture...

PJ: If they don't bring about a mutation in themselves and there is nothing else...

K: I understand your question.

PJ: You see this is a paradox.

K: This is also an everlasting question. I mean the Hindus raised it long ago, many, many centuries ago - you probably know much more about it than I do - they raised this question: which is, is there an outside agency, god, the highest principle and so on and so on, the higher self - that's wrong, a higher self.

PJ: The highest principle.

K: Whether that can operate on the conditioned brain.

PJ: Or is it, sir, can it awaken within the brain? There are two things. One is an outside...

K: ...agency.

PJ: ...agency, or energy operating; or from within the brain cells, the untapped portion of the brain cells, an awakening which transforms.

K: I understand. I understand this question. Let's enquire, let's discuss it. Is there an outside agency, outside energy let's call it for the moment, that will bring about a mutation in the brain cells, which are conditioned? Right?

PJ: May I say something?

K: Please.

PJ: The problem is that energy really never touches the brain cells. There are so many obstacles one has built that the flow of energy from nature, from...

K: Energy.

PJ: ...energy never seems to touch and create.

K: What are we two discussing?

PJ: We are discussing the possibility of a human culture.

K: A culture which is not...

PJ: ...either of India or of the West. Which contains all mankind, if I may say so.

K: All humanity which is not Western, or Eastern.

PJ: And the division between the outer and the inner ends. And insight is insight, not insight into the outer or insight into the inner.

K: So what?

PJ: So for that the instrument is the brain cells, the tool which operates is the brain cells.

K: Is the brain.

PJ: The brain. Now something has to happen in the brain.

K: Yes, I say it can happen. Without the idea that there is an outside agency that will somehow cleanse the brain which has been conditioned, or invent an outside agency, as most religions have done. Right? Or can the conditioned brain awaken to its own conditioning and so perceive its own limitation, and stay there for a moment? I don't know if I am making my point clear. You see we are all the time, are we not, trying to do something, which is the doer is different from that which is being done. Right? I realize, for example, suppose I realize, that my brain is conditioned and so all my activity, my feelings, and my relationship with others, is limited. I realize that. And then I say that limitation must be broken down. So I am operating on the limitation. But the 'I' is also limited, the 'I' is not separate from the other. If we can bridge that, that the 'I' is not separate from the limitation which he is trying to break down. Right? Both the limitation of the self and the limitation of the conditioning are similar, not separate. The 'I' is not separate from its own qualities.

PJ: And from what it observes.

K: And one part observes the other part.

PJ: When you say that we all the time are trying to do something...

K: Operate on the other.

PJ: ...operate on the other.

K: Our whole life is that, apart from the technological world and so on. I am this and I must change that. So the brain is now conditioned in this division. The actor is different from the action.

PJ: That of course, yes.

K: And so that condition goes on. But when one realizes the actor is the action, then the whole outlook changes altogether.

Let's come back for the moment. We are asking, Pupulji, are we not, what brings about a change in the human brain?

PJ: That is really the crucial point. What is it that makes it end?

K: Yes. Let's go into it a little bit more. Man has lived on this earth for a million years, more, or less. And we are as primitive as we were before, psychologically. And we have not basically changed very much. We are killing each other, we are seeking power, position, we are corrupt, everything that human beings are doing in the world today, psychologically. And what will make human beings, humanity, change all that?

PJ: Great insight.

K: Wait. Insight. Now is so-called culture preventing all this? You understand my question? The Indian culture, take Indian culture, few people, great thinkers in India, have gone into this question. And the majority of the people just repeat, repeat, repeat, it is just tradition, a dead thing. And they are living with a dead thing. Right? Now, and here too tradition has a tremendous power...

PJ: Yes, because it is the other way - a few have great insights into science.

K: So looking at all this, what will make human beings radically bring about a mutation in themselves? Culture has tried to bring about certain changes in human behaviour. Right? And religions have said, behave this way, don't do this, don't kill, but they go on killing. Be brotherly, and they are not brotherly. Love one another, and they don't. These are the edicts, the sanctions, and we are doing everything quite the opposite.

PJ: But cultures have collapsed really.

K: That's what I want to find out. Whether it has collapsed and it has no value at all any more, and so man is now at a loss. If you go to America, for example, they have no tradition. Each one is doing what he likes, he is doing his thing! And they are doing the same thing here in a different way. So what will bring about a mutation in the brain cells?

PJ: What you are saying is that it doesn't matter whether the Indian matrix is different, or the Western matrix is different, the problem is identical - the mutation in the human brain.

K: Yes, that's it. Let's stick to that. I mean after all Indians, even the poor Indians suffer as they suffer here - lonely, despair, misery, and all that, it is just the same as here. So let's forget the East and West and see what prevents this mutation taking place.

PJ: Sir, is there any other way but perceiving the actual?

K: The actual. That is what we have been maintaining for sixty years, that the 'what is', the actual, is more important than the idea of the actual. The ideal, the various concepts and conclusions have no value at all because you are away from the facts, from what is going on. Apparently that is tremendously difficult because we are caught up with ideas.

PJ: But in perceiving the actual there is no movement in the brain.

K: That's all I am saying. Facts, if one observes very carefully, in themselves bring about a change. I don't know if I am making it clear. Human sorrow is not Western sorrow or Eastern sorrow. Right? It is human sorrow. And we are always trying to move away from sorrow. Now could we understand the depth and the meaning of sorrow - not understand intellectually but actually delve into the nature of sorrow - and sorrow is not yours or mine. So what is impeding, or blocking the human brain from enquiring deeply within itself?

PJ: Sir, I want to ask one thing: you used the word delving, you used the words enquiring into oneself - both are words connected with movement. Yet you say the ending of movement is...

K: Of course. Movement is time, movement is thought, the ending of movement - can that really end, or do we think it can end? You understand my question? After all, the people who have somewhat gone into this kind of thing, both in the past and the present, have always divided the entity that enquires and that which is to be enquired into to. That's my objection. I think that is the major block.

PJ: So when you use the word enquiry, do you use it as perception?

K: Perception, observing, watching. Now we will go into that in a minute, if we have time. But I want to come back to this, if I may: what will make human beings alter - very simply put - the way they behave? Very simply put. This appalling brutality, what will change all this? Who will change it? Not the politicians, not the priests, not the people who are talking about the environment, and the ecologists and so on and so on. They are not changing human beings. Who will change it, if man himself will not change, who will change it? The church has tried to change man and it hasn't succeeded. Religions have tried, throughout the world, to humanize, or make man more intelligent, more considerate, affectionate and so on, they have not succeeded. Culture has not succeeded.

PJ: But you say all this, Krishnaji, but that in itself does not bring man to that perception of that.

K: So what will make him? You perhaps, say for instance, you and another have this perception, I may not have it, so what affect has your perception on me? Again if you have perception and power, position, I worship you or kill you. Right? So I am asking a much deeper question: I want really to find out why human beings, after so many millenia, are like this - one group against another group, one tribe against another tribe, one nation against another nation. The horror that is going on. A new culture, will that bring about a change? Does man want to change? Or he says, "Things are all right, let's go on. We will evolve to a certain stage eventually."

PJ: Most people feel that.

K: Yes. That's what is so appalling about it. Eventually, give me another thousand years we will all be marvellous human beings. Which is so absurd. In the meantime we are destroying each other.

PJ: Sir, may I ask you something? What is the actual moment of facing the fact? What is it actually, the actuality of it?

K: What is a fact, Pupul? We were discussing the other day with a group of people here: a fact is that which has been done, remembered, and that which is being done now. Being done now, acting now, and that which has happened yesterday, and remembered that fact - remembrance.

PJ: Or even arising of a wave of fear, horror, anything.

K: Yes, yes.

PJ: So how does one actually...

K: Wait a minute. So let us be clear when you say, 'what is', the fact. The fact of yesterday, or last week's incident, is gone, but I remember it. Right? There is remembrance of something pleasant or unpleasant, that happened, a fact, which is stored in the brain. And what is being done now is also a fact coloured by the past, controlled by the past, shaped by the past. So can I see this whole movement as a fact?

PJ: The seeing it as a fact...

K: The whole movement - the future, the present, the past.

PJ: Seeing it as a fact is seeing it without a cliché.

K: Without a cliché, without prejudice, without bias.

PJ: Or without anything surrounding it.

K: That's right. Which means what?

PJ: Negating, first of all, negating all the responses which arise.

K: Negating the remembrances. Just keep to that for the moment.

PJ: The remembrances which arise out of it.

K: Out of the fact of last week's pleasure or pain, reward or punishment. Now is that possible?

PJ: Yes, that is possible.

K: Possible, why?

PJ: Because the very attention itself...

K: ...dissipates remembrance. Now that means can the brain be so attentive that the incident that happened last week, the fact it happened and end the fact, end it, not carry on remembering. My son is dead. And I have suffered. But the memory of that son has such strong strength in my brain that I constantly remember it.

PJ: It arises.

K: It arises and disappears. So can the brain say, yes my son is dead, that is the end of it?

PJ: Does one say that? Or when there is a rising...

K: And then ending? Which means an endless arising and ending.

PJ: But there is an arising.

K: Which is remembrance. Let's keep to that word.

PJ: A remembrance. Out of that there is a movement of pain.

K: Pain.

PJ: The negation of that pain ends not only the pain but the arising.

K: Which means what? Go into it a little bit more. My son is dead. I remember all the things, etc., etc. There is a photograph of him on the piano or on the mantelpiece, and there is this constant remembrance - right? Flowing in and flowing out. That's a fact.

PJ: But the negating of that pain and the dissolving of this, doesn't it have a direct action on the brain?

K: That's what I am coming to. Which means what? My son is dead. That's a fact. I can't change a fact. He is gone. It sounds cruel to say it, but he is gone. But I am carrying him all the time. Right? The brain is carrying him as memory, and the reminder is always there, I am carrying on. I never say, he has gone, that's a fact. But I live on memories, which is a dead thing. Memories are not actual. And I am asking: the ending of the fact. My son is gone. It doesn't mean I have lost love, or anything. My son is gone, that is a fact.

PJ: What remains when the fact is perceived?

K: May I say something without being shocking? Nothing. My son is gone, or my brother, my wife, or whatever it is, is gone. Which is not an assertion of cruelty or denying my affection, my love. Not the love of my son, but the identification of love with my son. I don't know if you see.

PJ: You are drawing a distinction between love of my son and...

K: ...and love.

PJ: ...and love.

K: If I love my son in the deepest sense of the word, I love man, humanity. It's not only I love my son, I love the whole human world, the earth, the trees, the whole universe. But that is a different matter.

So you asking a really good question, which is: what takes place when there is the perception, pure perception of the fact, without any bias, without any kind of escape and so on, to see the fact completely, is that possible? When I am in sorrow of my son's death, I mean I am lost. It is a great shock. It is something terrible that has taken place. And at that moment you can't say anything to the person. Right? As he comes out of this confusion and loneliness and despair and sorrow, perhaps he will be sensitive enough to perceive this fact.

PJ: I come back always to this one thing: this perception of the fact, doesn't it need...

K: A tremendous attention.

PJ: ...a great deal of watching?

K: Watching, of course.

PJ: You can't tell a person who has just lost...

K: No, that would be cruel. But a man who says, my son is dead, what is it all about, death is common to all humanity, why do we... a man who is sensitive, asking, enquiring, he is awake, he wants to find an answer to all this.

PJ: Sir, at one level it seems so simple.

K: And I think we must keep it simple, not bring about a lot of intellectual theories and ideas into it.

PJ: Then why is it - is the mind afraid of the simple?

K: No, I think we are so highly intellectual, it has been part of our education, part of our culture, ideas are tremendously important, concepts are essential, it is part of our culture. The man who says, please ideas are not very important, facts are, he must be extraordinarily simple.

PJ: You see sir, what you are saying; in the whole field of Indian culture the highest is the dissolution of the self. And you say, you talk of the dissolution of the fact, which is essentially the dissolution of the self.

K: Yes. But the dissolution of the self has become a concept. And we are worshipping a concept - as they are all doing, all over the world. Concepts are invented by thought, or through analysis and so on, come to a concept, and hold that concept as a most extraordinary thing.

So come back to the point: what will make human beings, throughout the world, behave? Not behave my way or your way. Behave, don't kill, don't be afraid, don't - you know, have great affection and so on, what will bring it about? Nothing has succeeded. Knowledge hasn't helped him. Right?

PJ: Isn't it because fear is his shadow?

K: Fear, and also we want to know what the future is.

PJ: Which is part of fear.

K: Yes. We want to know because - it is simple - we have sought security in so many things and they have all failed. And now we say there must be security somewhere. And I question if there is any security somewhere at all, even in god, that is a projection of one's own fears.

PJ: What is the action of this dissolution on the brain cells, on the brain itself?

K: I would use the word, insight. Insight is not a matter of memory, not a matter of knowledge and time, which are all thought. So I would say insight is the absence, total absence of the whole movement of thought as time and remembrance and thought. So there is direct perception. It is like I have been going north for the last ten thousand years, and my brain is accustomed to enter the north. And somebody comes along and says, that will lead you nowhere, go east. When I turn round and go east the brain cells have changed. Because I have an insight that the north leads nowhere. Wait, I will put it differently.

The whole movement of thought, which is limited, and which is acting throughout the world now, it is the most important action, driven by thought, thought will not solve any of our problems, except technological. Right? If I see that, I have stopped going north. And I think the ending of a certain direction, the ending of a movement that has been going on for thousands of years, at that moment there is an insight, which brings about a change, a mutation in the brain cells. One sees this very clearly. But one asks, what will make humanity change. What will make my son, my daughter change? They hear all this, they read something about all this, from biologists and so on, psychologists, and they continue in their old way. Is the past tradition so strong? I have thought about myself for the last thousand years and I still am thinking about myself - I must fulfil myself, I must be great, I must become something. This is my conditioning, this is my tradition. Is the past so tremendously strong? And the past is incarnating all the time. Right? Is that part of our culture, to continue in our conditioning?

PJ: I would say that is part of our culture.

K: Look at it. I have been watching this very seriously, how tradition has a tremendous stronghold - not tradition of superstition, I am not talking of that, but a continuity of something of the past moving, moving. The past carrying on in its own momentum. And we are that. Culture may be part of our hindrance, religious concepts may be our hindrance. So what is the brain to do? They are saying one part of the brain is the old, and the other part of the brain is something totally new, and that if we can open the door to the new there might be change. Because according to this specialist we are using only a very small part of our brain.

PJ: Obviously when there is attention the fragment has ended.

K: Yes, that's it. We can talk about it like this, what is attention, go into it, at the end of it a listener says, "All right, I understand all this, but I am what I am. I understand this intellectually, verbally but it hasn't touched the depth of my being."

PJ: But isn't it a question of that first contact with thought in the mind.

K: I don't quite follow you.

PJ: I have a feeling, sir, that we talk about observing thought. It is an entirely different thing to the actual state of attention.

K: That is, thought being aware of itself.

PJ: Yes. That one instant.

K: I understand that. We are going away from the central issue. The world is becoming more and more superficial, more and more money-minded, if I may use that word, money, power, position, fulfilment, identification, me, me, me. All this is being encouraged by everything around you. Right? Now you, who have travelled, who have seen all this too, what do you make of all this business? There are these extraordinary intelligent people, clever people, and the most stupid people, the neurotic, the people who have come to a conclusion and never move from that conclusion, like the Communists - the Totalitarian world is that - they have come to a certain conclusion and that is final.

PJ: But those are all commitments which you can't touch. You can only touch the people who are not committed.

K: And who are the people who are not committed?

PJ: I would said today that is the one sign of health.

K: Are they young people?

PJ: Today, as never before in the last twenty or thirty years, there are people who are not committed to anything.

K: I question that, I would really like to question that.

PJ: Really, sir, I would say so. On the one hand you see this tremendous deterioration of everything, on the other somewhere this movement away from a commitment. They may not know where to turn, they may not have a direction, they may...

K: But don't belong to anything.

PJ: They don't belong to anything.

K: There are people like that, I know.

PJ: I mean they...

K: You see they become rather vague, they become rather confused.

PJ: Yes, because they turn these into concepts. It is so easy to turn what you say into a concept.

K: Of course, of course.

PJ: And to have axioms which contain what you say. But a culture which is so living because it is only living on insight.

K: I wouldn't use the word culture.

PJ: Well, because you started with the word culture as something which contains more than just the... therefore I used it. But it is a human culture which perhaps will be the culture of the mind that dwells in insight.

K: Yes.

PJ: In such a state, if I may ask, what happens to all the civilizations which the world has seen and known?

K: Gone. The Egyptian civilization.

PJ: No, they may have gone but they are still contained in the human race.

K: Yes, of course, it is the same.

PJ: But when you wipe out...

K: Which means, Pupulji, actually, what is freedom? Are we aware that we are prisoners of our own fantasies, imaginations and conclusions, ideas, we are prisoners to all that, are we aware of all that?

PJ: I think we are.

K: Pupul, if we are aware, attentive to all that, the thing is burnt up.

PJ: This is, of course, at some point where we can't... because you don't admit an in-between state.

K: No, that is impossible.

PJ: This is the whole problem.

K: It is like a man who is violent and trying to be non-violent, in-between state he is violent.

PJ: No, not necessarily. Isn't that also a question of this whole movement of time?

K: Time and thought and so on, which is what? Limiting. If we first acknowledge, or see the fact that thought, in any direction, is limited, in any field - surgery, technology, computers and so on, and also thought enquiring into itself, thought being limited, your enquiry will be very, very limited.

PJ: The difference is, sir, I might see that, but the attention necessary for it to remain alive in my waking day is not there.

K: No.

PJ: It is the quantum, the capacity, the strength of that attention which...

K: You see how do you have that passion? How do you have sustained movement of energy that is not dissipated by thought, by any kind of activity? And I think that only comes when you understand sorrow and the ending of sorrow, then compassion and love and all that. That intelligence is that energy which has no depression, none of the human qualities.

PJ: You mean it neither rises nor falls?

K: No. How can it? To rise and fall you must be aware that it is arising and falling. Who is it aware and so on?

PJ: No, not even that way. But is it possible throughout the day to hold that...

K: It is there. You don't hold it. It is like a perfume that is there. That's why I think one has to understand the whole conditioning of our consciousness. You know what I mean? I think that is the real study, real enquiry, real exploration into this consciousness, which is the common ground of all humanity. And we never enquire into it. Not we enquire as a professor or a psychologist enquires, and we study it, but we never say, look, I am going to study this consciousness which is me, I am going to look into it.

PJ: No, one says that. I can't say that one doesn't. One says that.

K: But one doesn't.

PJ: One does it.

K: Partially.

PJ: I won't accept that sir. One does it, one attends, one enquires.

K: Then what? Have you come to the end of it?

PJ: Suddenly one finds that one has been inattentive.

K: No, I don't think inattention matters. You may be tired, your brain has enquired enough, it is enough for today. There's nothing wrong with it. But you see again I object to this question of attention and inattention.

PJ: But that is the basic question in most of our minds. Basically if you ask...

K: I would not put it that way. I would say that where there is this ending of something totally there is a new beginning which has its own momentum. It is nothing to do with me. That means one must be so completely free of the self. And to be free of the self is one of the most difficult things because it hides under different rocks, different trees, different activities.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND CONVERSATION WITH PUPUL JAYAKAR 25TH JUNE 1983

PJ: I saw a short report in one of the newspapers that a spaceship had been released which would travel to the outer spaces of the universe. And that it would be part of the universe, there will be no ending to it because there was no friction, no time, that there would be no ending. Is the within of the self, of the human brain, the human mind, call it what you will, is there a within of things, whether of man, of the tree, of nature, which is a space without ending? Is it a mirror image of that vastness which exists?

K: Are you asking, if I may repeat what you have understood, what you have said, that within the human brain - I'd like to distinguish between the brain and the mind, which we will discuss a little later - whether in the human brain there is, or there can be, a space without end, an eternity out of time? We can speculate about it a great deal, as philosophers have done, but that speculation is not actuality.

PJ: No. But it was an insight into outer space.

K: The human brain has set a machine that has entered into the whole.

PJ: Not but it was an insight first into the possibility of that, which now made it possible for them to experiment and prove it.

K: I understand. To produce a machine that will go beyond, that will enter into the universe.

PJ: If you do not posit a thing then you cannot even...

K: No, I question whether - I want to be clear on this point - we are now in our conversation we are speculating, or theorizing, or we are really trying to find out in ourselves whether there is such immensity, whether there is actually a movement which is not of time, which is eternal. Right?

PJ: But how do you start an enquiry like this? By examination, or posing the question. If you don't pose the question...

K: We have posed the question.

PJ: We have to pose a question.

K: We have put the question.

PJ: Now whether what comes out of it is speculation or examination depends on how you approach it. But the question has to be put.

K: We have put the question. We have put the question whether the brain can understand - not understand - realize the truth that there is either eternity, or not eternity. That is a question, we have asked that question. Right? Now you ask, how do we begin to enquire into it. How do you begin to feel gently, hesitantly your way into this really fundamental question, a question that has been asked for thousands of years, whether man is bound to time for ever, or there is, or there can be, not imaginatively, not romantically, but actually can there be within the brain - or the brain realizes itself in a state of eternity? That's the question we are asking.

PJ: Even to proceed into this you started by drawing a distinction between the brain and the mind.

K: Yes.

PJ: Would you elaborate.

K: We are saying, that the brain is conditioned, at least some of it, that conditioning is brought about through experience. That conditioning is knowledge. And that conditioning is memory and experience, knowledge, memory are limited, and so thought is limited. Now we have been functioning within the area of thought. And to discover something new there has to be, at least temporarily, or a period, when thought is not in movement, when thought is in abeyance.

PJ: The brain is a material thing.

K: Yes.

PJ: It has its own activity.

K: Yes. It has its own activity not imposed by thought.

PJ: But for centuries the operation of the brain has been the operation of thought.

K: That's all, that's what we are saying. That's what we are saying, that the whole movement of the brain, at least that part of the brain which has not been used, is conditioned by thought. And thought is always limited, and therefore it is conditioned to conflict. That which is limited must create division.

PJ: What is mind then?

K: Mind is a wholly different dimension which has no contact with thought. Let me explain it. The brain, that part of the brain which has been functioning as an instrument of thought, that brain has been conditioned, that part of the brain. And as long as that part of the brain remains in that state there is no communication, entire communication, with the mind. So when that conditioning is not then there is communication between that mind which is totally on a different dimension, that can communicate with the brain and act, using thought.

PJ: But you have already posited...

K: Oh definitely.

PJ: ...a state which is outside the realm of thought.

K: That's right. Therefore outside the realm of time.

PJ: But as time seems to be the essential core of this problem...

K: Time and thought.

PJ: Thought is the product of time. I mean thought is time.

K: That's the real point. Where do you start, do you mean?

PJ: No. Perhaps if we could go into this whole business of the flow of time, and at what instant is interception possible?

K: What do you mean, interception? Because I don't quite understand the usage of that word. Nobody can...

PJ: I am not talking of an interceptor. But...

K: The ending of it.

PJ: I was going to use another word, but you can use the word ending.

K: Let's use simpler words.

PJ: Time is from a past immemorial.

K: Yes, which is thought.

PJ: Thought is also from a past immemorial, projecting into a future which is also eternal.

K: The movement of thought. No. The future is conditioned by the past, as a human psyche.

PJ: So unless the human being ends, unless he ceases to be...

K: Ceases to be conditioned.

PJ: No, but you will still use thought.

K: No.

PJ: The content will undergo a change, but the mechanism of thought will continue.

K: The mechanism of thought will continue - let's put it round the other way. Now thought is the chief instrument we have. Right?

PJ: Yes.

K: And that instrument after thousands of years of various efforts, actions, has not only made that instrument dull, it has reached the end of its tether because thought is limited, and time is limited. Right? Therefore it is conditioned, divided and in perpetual state of turmoil. Now can that end? That's the question.

PJ: Now I used the word interception. This movement of the past as thought, as the yesterday...

K: ...as today.

PJ: But what is the today?

K: What today is the movement of the past modified, memory. We are a bundle of memories.

PJ: That is true. But contact with time...

K: Now wait a minute, what do you mean contact with time? Time is thought.

PJ: Time as a psychological process - I am not talking of contact...

K: Leave all that.

PJ: But contact with time as a psychological process is in the present, isn't it?

K: Pupulji, let's be very clear. Time is thought. Right? Don't separate time as though it was something different from thought.

PJ: No, time is thought.

K: So it is time/thought.

PJ: Yes. As the past, present and the future.

K: Are you asking, what is the now?

PJ: Yes, because this interception I am talking about - let me use my word until you...

K: All right. Interception, I don't quite understand.

PJ: Interception is contact with, contact with the fact.

K: Contact with the fact that the whole movement of thought...

PJ: Not even all that, just contact with 'what is'

K: Which is what?

PJ: Whatever is, is your statement now. Whatever you are saying now and my listening to you is the contact with 'what is'.

K: Ah, I understand now. That is, may I put it in the way I understand it? The past, the present and the future is a movement of time/thought. How do you realize it?

PJ: How do you realize it?

K: How do you come to see the truth of it, the fact of it?

PJ: You know, sir, there is such a thing as tactile touch.

K: Yes.

PJ: Now...

K: How do you touch this thing?

PJ: How do you touch this thing?

K: How do you - to use your word - come into contact with it, with the fact? With the fact that I am a whole series of memories, which is time/thought.

PJ: Let us be more concrete. The thought that I am going away this afternoon, and that I will be leaving you. It is a thought.

K: It is a thought. It is an actuality.

PJ: But out of that there is a certain pain of leaving you, which is the emotional, psychological element which come to cover up the fact.

K: Which is what? In the French, partir.

PJ: So what is to be contacted? Not the fact that I am going away.

K: What?

PJ: But the pain.

K: The pain. I understand. Are you asking, the pain of going, the pain of a thousand aches of yours and centuries of pain of loneliness, and sorrow and all that, grief, the agony, the anxiety and all that, is that separate from me who is to feel it?

PJ: It may not be separate.

K: It is me.

PJ: At what point, how do I touch it?

K: I don't quite understand you usage - how do I touch it.

PJ: It is only in the present.

K: Oh, I see what you mean.

PJ: The whole of this edifice rests on that.

K: Yes, that's what I said. The now contains the past, the future and the present. Right?

PJ: Yes.

K: Let's understand this. The present is the whole past and the future. This is the present. The present is me, with all the memories of a thousand years, and that thousand years being modified all the time, and the future. All that is now, the present. Right?

PJ: But the present is also something which is not a static thing, it's over before...

K: Of course. The moment you have said it, it is gone.

PJ: Gone. So what is it that you actually see? What is it you actually observe?

K: Actually observe the fact.

PJ: What fact?

K: The fact - just a minute - the fact that the present is the whole movement of time and thought. To see the truth of that - let's not use the word 'see' - have an insight, perception into that, that the now is all time and thought.

PJ: Does that perception emanate from the brain?

K: Either it emanates, comes from perceiving with the eyes, nerves and so on, or that perception is an insight which has nothing to do with time and thought.

PJ: But it arises within the brain?

K: Yes, or outside the brain, you are asking.

PJ: This is very important.

K: I know, that's why I want to be clear. Is it within the sphere of the brain; or it is that insight which comes when there is the freedom from its conditioning, which is the operation of the mind, which is supreme intelligence. Do you follow?

PJ: I don't follow.

K: Let's be clear. The brain, whatever part it is, is conditioned by time and thought, time/thought. As long as that conditioning remains insight is not possible. You may have occasional insight into something, but pure insight, which means comprehension of the totality of things - yes, I'll use the word 'totality', not wholeness because that word is now being used so much - it is the perception of completeness. Right? That insight is not of time/thought. Therefore that insight is part of that brain which is in a different dimension.

PJ: Without sight there cannot be insight.

K: That's all I am saying.

PJ: So seeing - perceiving.

K: Yes perceiving.

PJ: Perceiving, listening is contained in perceiving, seems to be the essential essence of insight.

K: Would you repeat that again slowly?

PJ: Let us take the word insight - it is seeing into.

K: Into, seeing into.

PJ: Seeing into. Seeing into seeing.

K: No. Seeing into. Just a minute, let's look at that word.

Seeing, comprehending the totality of something, the vastness of something. Right? Insight is possible only when there is cessation of thought and time. Thought and time are limited, therefore such limitation cannot have insight.

PJ: To understand what you are saying I have to have an open ear and eyes that see. Out of that sound, out of that form, out of that whole...

K: ...the meaning of the words and so on and so on.

PJ: ...arises a seeing which goes beyond. I am trying to get at something.

K: What are you trying to get at? I don't understand.

PJ: I am trying to get at - you talk of insight. Now insight cannot arise without attention.

K: No. Don't introduce the word attention.

PJ: Sight, seeing.

K: If we can stick to the same thing, that is, insight cannot exist as long as time/thought play a part.

PJ: You see which comes first?

K: What do you mean?

PJ: In consciousness, in my approach to this, I can't start with insight. I can only start with observation.

K: You can only start by realizing the truth that time, psychological time and thought are always limited. That's a fact.

PJ: Krishnaji, that is a fact.

K: Wait, start from that, and therefore whatever it does will always be limited and therefore contradictory, therefore divisive and endless conflict. That's all I am saying. You can see the fact of that.

PJ: You can see the fact of that outside of yourself.

K: Wait, wait. You can see it politically...

PJ: You can see it outside of yourself.

K: No, wait. You can see it politically, religiously, all throughout the world, this is a fact, that time and thought in their activity have brought about havoc in the world. That's a fact.

PJ: Yes, yes.

K: So the question is: can that limitation ever end? Or is man conditioned for ever to live within the time/thought area?

PJ: You see the difficulty of understanding this is, what is the relationship of the brain cells and the action of the senses - I am not using the word thought at the moment - on a statement like this: do you see the fact that time, thought...

K: ...are limited.

PJ: ...are limited? What does it exactly mean, how does one see that? It is like telling me, you are an illusion.

K: What?

PJ: It is exactly like telling me that Pupul is an illusion.

K: No, I didn't say that.

PJ: But I am saying that.

K: No, you are not an illusion.

PJ: No, sir, it is exactly that, because the moment you say, after all Pupul is a psychological bundle of the past...

K: Psychological movement of time and thought, which is the psyche.

PJ: Which is the psyche. That psyche is limited.

K: ...is limited. Whatever it does is limited.

PJ: Then I would ask, what is wrong with it being limited?

K: Nothing is wrong. If you want to live in perpetual conflict nothing is wrong.

PJ: Move further. To end it, is not only to say, to feel that it is limited, but there must be an ending to it.

K: I said there is.

PJ: What is the nature of this ending?

K: What do you mean ending?

PJ: Just...

K: Let's take the word ending, I must be clear what you and I are saying, so that we both understand the meaning of the same word, to end something - to end attachment, to end, not to smoke, not to do this or that, to put an end to it - the ending.

PJ: The flow ceases to flow.

K: The movement of thought and time ceases, psychologically. What is your difficulty? You are making a simple thing difficult.

PJ: No, sir. There is a point of perception, which is a point of insight, what is that point of insight?

K: What do you mean, point of insight?

PJ: Where I see. In what time/space do I see it?

K: Look, Pupul, just let's be simple. Time and thought have divided the world, politically, geographically, religiously. That is a fact. Right? Right? Can't you see the fact?

PJ: No, sir. I look outside...

K: Wait, wait. Don't look outside.

PJ: I don't see the fact.

K: What do you mean you don't see the fact?

PJ: Because if I saw the fact, if I really saw the fact...

K: You would stop that kind of thing.

PJ: ...it would be all over.

K: That is all I am saying.

PJ: If it is such a simple thing, which I don't think it is, because it has such devious ways.

K: No. The whole point - this is where I am saying something which we are probably putting in different words - if you have an insight that the movement of thought and time are divisive, at whatever level, in whatever realm, in whatever area, it is a movement of endless conflict. That's a fact. Britain fought for some island, that's a fact. Because British, British, French, French, German, Russian - they are all divisive. And India against somebody. This is the whole movement of time and thought. That's a fact.

PJ: Yes but you can see it when it is a matter outside of you.

K: If you can see it outside, this movement, what it does in the world, what misery it has caused in the world, then inwardly the psyche is time and thought, is the movement of time and thought.

This movement has created that. Simple. The psychological movement, the divisive psychological movement has created the external fact. Right? I am a Hindu, I feel secure. I am a German, I feel secure in the word, in the feeling that I belong to something.

PJ: You see, Krishnaji, I would say that all these, being a Hindu, greed, all those one has seen as a product of this movement of time/thought.

K: That is all I am saying.

PJ: But that is not quite...

K: What is your difficulty, Pupul?

PJ: There is within it all a sense of, "I exist".

K: That's it. I don't realize the psyche is that.

PJ: That's essentially the nature.

K: Why doesn't it? Because - it is simple, why do you make it complex - because you have thought the psyche is something other than the conditioned state. I thought there was something in me, or in the brain, or in somewhere, which is timeless, which is god, which is this, which is that, and that if I could only reach that everything would be right. That's part of my conditioning, because I am uncertain, confused, god will give me safety, perfection, certainty. That's all - god or the highest principle, or some kind of conviction.

PJ: What is the nature of the ground from which insight springs?

K: I have told you. Insight can only take place when there is freedom from time and thought.

PJ: It is a sort of unending...

K: No, it is not. You are complicating a very simple fact, as most of us do. If one wants to live at peace, which to live in peace only is to flower, is to understand the extraordinary world of peace. Peace cannot be brought about by thought.

PJ: You see, please understand, Krishnaji, it is the brain itself which listens to that statement.

K: Yes, it listens. And then what happens? Just a minute. What happens? If it listens it is quiet.

PJ: It is quiet.

K: It isn't ruminating, it is not going on, "By Jove, what does he mean", it is not rattling. It is quiet. Right? Wait a minute. When it is actually, not induced quietness, actually when it listens, and there is quietness, then there is insight. I don't have to explain ten different ways the limitation of thought, it is so.

PJ: I see what you say. Is there anything further than that?

K: Oh, yes there is. There is a great deal more: which is, is listening a sound? A sound within an area, or I am listening to what you are saying without the verbal sound? If there is a verbal sound I am not listening, I am only understanding the words. But you want to convey to me something much more than the words, so if the words are making a sound in my hearing I can't deeply understand the depth of what you are saying.

So I want to find out something much more. We started with the present. The present is the now, the now is the whole movement of time/thought. Right? It is the whole structure. If the structure of time and thought ends the now has totally a different meaning. The now then is nothing. I mean when we use the word 'nothing', zero contains all the figures. Right? So nothing contains all. But we are afraid to be nothing.

PJ: When you say, contains the all, is it the essence of all human, racial and environmental, and nature and the cosmos, as such?

K: Yes. I am talking of the fact of a realization that there is nothing. The psyche is a bundle of memories, and those memories are dead; they operate, they function, but they are the outcome of past experience which has gone. I am a movement of memories. Now if I have an insight into that, there is nothing. I don't exist.

PJ: You said something about sound.

K: Yes.

PJ: And listening.

K: Listening without sound. You see the beauty of it?

PJ: Yes, it is possible when the mind itself is totally still.

K: No, don't bring in the mind for the moment. When the brain is quiet, absolutely quiet, therefore there is no sound made by the word.

PJ: There is no sound made by the word?

K: Of course. That is real listening. The word has given me what you want to convey. Right? You want to tell me, "I am going this afternoon". I listen to that.

PJ: But the brain has not been active in listening.

K: Yes. And the brain, when it is active, is noise, is sound. Let's go back to something more, we will include, come back to this sound business because it is very interesting what is sound. Sound can only exist, pure sound can only exist when there is space and silence, otherwise it is just noise.

So I would like to come back to the question: all one's education, all one's past experience and knowledge is a movement in becoming, both inwardly, psychologically as well as outwardly. Becoming is the accumulation of memory. Right? More and more and more memories, which is called knowledge. Right? Now as long as that movement exists there is fear of being nothing. But when one really sees the insight of the fallacy, the illusion of becoming something, therefore that very perception, that insight to see that there is nothing, this becoming is endless time/thought and conflict, there is an ending of that. That is, the ending of the movement which is the psyche, which is time/thought. The ending of that is to be nothing. Right? Nothing then contains the whole universe - not my petty little fears and petty little anxieties and problems, and my sorrow with regard to, you know, a dozen things.

After all, Pupulji, nothing means the entire world of compassion - compassion is nothing. And therefore that nothingness is supreme intelligence. That's all there is. I don't know if I am conveying this. So why are human beings, just ordinary intelligent people, frightened of being nothing? If I see that I am really a verbal illusion, that I am nothing but dead memories, that's a fact. But I don't like to think I am just nothing but memories. But the truth is I am memories. If I had no memory, either I am in a state of amnesia, or I understand the whole movement of memory, which is time/thought, and see the fact as long as there is this movement there must be endless conflict, struggle, pain. And when there is an insight into that nothing means something entirely different. And that nothing is the present. It is not varying present, it isn't it is one day this and one day, the next day. Being nothing is no time therefore it is not ending one day and beginning another day.

It is really interesting if one goes into this problem, not theoretically but actually, the astrophysicists are trying to understand the universe. They can only understand in terms of gases, but the immensity of it as part of this human being, not out there, here. Which means there must be no sense, no shadow of time and thought. Pupul, after all that is real meditation, that's what 'sunya' means in Sanskrit. But we have interpreted it in ten hundred different ways, commentaries, this and that. But the actual fact is we are nothing except words, and opinions, judgements - those are all petty affairs. And therefore we have made our life become petty.

So to grasp, to understand that the zero contains all the numbers. Right? So in nothing all the world is contained - not the pain, and... those are all so small. I know it sounds, when I am suffering that is the only thing I have. Or when there is fear, that is the only thing. But I don't see it is such a petty little thing.

So having listened to all this, what is it you realize? If you could put it into words it would be rather good. What is that you, and those who are going to listen to all this - it may be rubbish, it may be true - who are going to listen to all this, what do they capture, realize, see the immensity of all this?

PJ: It is really an ending of the psychological nature of the self, because that is becoming.

K: Pupulji, I have asked the question because it is going to be very helpful to all of us if you could say, as you listen to all this, what is your response, what is your reaction, what have you realized, what have you said, "By Jove, I have got it, I have got the perfume of it".

PJ: Sir, don't ask me that question because anything I say would sound - because as you are speaking there was immensity.

K: Now wait a minute. There was that, I could feel it. There was the tension of that. But is it temporary, is it for the moment, for a second and it is gone? And then the whole business of remembering it, capturing it, inviting it...

PJ: Oh no, I think one has moved from there. And another thing one realizes, the most difficult thing in the world is to be totally simple.

K: To be simple, that's right. If one is really simple, from that you can understand the enormous complexity of things. But we start with all the complexities and never see the simplicity. That's our training. We have trained our brain to see the complexity and then try to find an answer to the complexity. But we don't see the extraordinary simplicity of life - of facts, rather.

PJ: In the Indian tradition, if I may move away a little...

K: I am glad.

PJ: Out of sound was born all the enemies.

K: You see...

PJ: The sound which reverberates and is yet not heard.

K: That's it, that's it. But, Pupulji, especially in the Indian tradition, from the Buddha to Nagarjuna, and the ancient Hindus, have said there is that state of nothingness, which, they said, you must deny the whole thing. Nagarjuna says, he came to that point, as far as I understand, I may be mistaken, what I have been told, that he denied everything, every movement of the psyche.

PJ: Every movement of the brain cell as becoming.

K: Yes. It is there in the books, or it is there in tradition. Why haven't they pursued that? Even the most intelligent of them, even the most religious devotee, not to some structure, but to the feeling of the divine, the sense of something sacred, why haven't they pursued denying, not the world, you can't deny the world, they have denied the word, and made a mess of their own lives - but the total negation of the 'me'.

PJ: Really you know renunciation - let me use that word - is the negation of the 'me'.

K: Yes, but the 'me' exists still. I may renounce my house, I may get away from my memories but - you follow.

PJ: Basically the renunciation is never in the outer.

K: Inside. Which means what? Don't be attached, even to your highest principle, don't be attached to your loin cloth. So I think what is happening is that we are caught, really caught in a net of words, in theories, not in actuality. I suffer, I must find a way to end that, not escape into some kind of silly illusions. Why have human beings not faced the fact and changed the fact? You follow my question? Is it because we are living with illusions of ideas, ideals and conclusions and all that, unrealities? It is so obvious, all this.

PJ: We are living with the history of mankind. That is the history of mankind.

K: That is the history of mankind. And mankind is me. And me is this - endless misery. And so if you want to end misery, end the 'me'. The ending of me is not an action of will. The ending of 'me' doesn't come about through fasting, you know all that childish business that human beings have gone through, who have been called saints.

PJ: It is really the ending of time, isn't it, sir?

K: Yes. The ending of time/thought. That means to listen without the sound - listen to the universe without a sound.

We were talking the other day in New York, and there was a man, a doctor, I believe he was very well known. He said, all these questions are all right, sir, but the fundamental issue is whether the brain cells, which have been conditioned, can really bring about a mutation in themselves. Then the whole thing is simple. You understand? I said, it is possible only through insight. And we went into it, as we have gone into it now. You see nobody is willing to listen to this in its entirety, they listen partially - agree in the sense, go together up to a certain distance, and stop there. If man really says, I must have peace in the world, therefore I must live peacefully then there is peace in the world. But he doesn't want to live in peace, he does everything opposite to that - his ambition, his arrogance, his silly petty fears and all that.

So we have reduced the vastness of all this to some petty little reactions. Do you realize that, Pupul? And so we live such petty lives. I mean this applies from the highest to the lowest.

PJ: What is sound to you, sir?

K: Sound is the tree. Sound - wait a minute - take music, whether pure Indian chanting, Vedic chanting, Gregorian chanting, they are extraordinarily close together. And one listens to all the songs of praise - which are, you know what they are! Then you listen to the sound of the waves, the sound of strong wind among the trees, sound of person whom you have lived with for many years. You get used to all this. But if you don't get used to all this, then sound has an extraordinary meaning. Then you hear everything afresh. Say, for instance, you tell me, time and thought is the whole movement of man's life, therefore limited. Now you have communicated to me a simple fact, and I listen to it. I listen to it without the sound of the word, I have captured the significance, the depth of that statement. And I can't lose it. It isn't I have heard it now and it is gone when I go outside. I have listened to it in its entirety. That means the sound has conveyed the fact that it is so. And what is so is absolute always. I believe only in the Hebrew tradition, Jehovah, or whatever, the nameless one, can only say, "I am", like 'Tathata' and so on in Sanskrit.

NEW DELHI 1ST PUBLIC TALK 6TH NOVEMBER, 1983

We are going to talk over many things. This is not a lecture. A lecture is intended to instruct and inform. We are not going to do that. But what we are going to do is talk over together, as two friends, the very complex problem of living, daily living, not theoretical, or philosophical, or some speculative concepts and theories. So together, you and the speaker, are going to explore the very complex and confusing world in which we live. So it is your responsibility to listen, not only to what the speaker is saying but also to listen to the world, not a particular part of the world, but the whole of the world - America, Russia, the Asiatic world and the Western world. We must look at the world as a whole, not as Indians, or as Europeans, or British, or French, or Germans, or Americans, or Russians, and the rest of the world - we must look at humanity as a whole.

So please, from the very beginning of these talks we must be very clear that this is not a lecture, this is not an instruction, telling you what to do or what to think. We are not an authority. We must question all authority, the physical, the psychological, the authority of war, the authority of governments, whether it is totalitarian, or so-called democratic. In investigating, in questioning, in exploring, we must have a brain that is sceptical, doubting, asking questions. And if we are going to explore together, as we must, if we are at all serious, explore not from any particular point of view, or belonging to certain tribes, communities, religious or non-religious, we are going to look together at the world, what it is, as it is, not what we would like the world to be. So please, if you would kindly listen and take the responsibility of observing the actual affairs of the world, as it is.

In the world there is no peace. Though governments are talking about peace, there has never been peace in the world. For the last five thousand years historically there have been wars practically every year. Man has killed man in the name of religion, in the name of ideals, in the name of certain dogmas, in the name of god, man has killed man. And it is still going on. That is a fact. And we, inhabiting this unfortunate but beautiful world, we seem to be incapable of doing anything about all that. We are tribal-minded, as Hindus, as Sikhs, as Catholics, Protestants, as nationalists, whether the Western nationalism or the Eastern nationalism, it is a tribal continuity. And that is one of the major causes of war. There are other causes, economic, social, linguistic, religious and so on.

And to bring about peace in the world requires great intelligence, not sentimentality, not some emotional demonstrations against a particular usage of instruments of war, but to understand this very, very complex situation of the society in which we live, requires not only humility, not only objective observation, and also it requires that you as observer, put away all our tribal instincts: you are no longer a Sikh, or a Hindu, or a Muslim, or a Christian, or a Buddhist, but you are a citizen of the world. If that is very clear, we can proceed to investigate. But if you hold on to your particular tribalism, to a particular nationalism, to a particular religion, then investigation into this question whether it is possible to live in this world peacefully, intelligently, sanely, rationally - is that at all possible. Or human beings who have evolved through millions of years have reached a certain point, whether we are going to destroy ourselves, or can we create a different kind of society, moral, ethical, non-communal, not belonging to a particular guru, and all that nonsense. So please don't get angry with the speaker, because all of you belong to a certain tribe, belong to various gurus, you are either Christian, or belong to some community of religious body, and when we explore, as we must, if you are at all intelligent, aware of what is going on in the world, one must put aside completely all that. And it is your responsibility, not that of the speaker. He is not a Hindu, though he was born in this country, he does not belong to any community, to any society. There is no guru, nor authority in spiritual matters.

So we are going together to investigate freely. So please put aside your ideals which is very difficult to do, your conclusions, your intellectual theories, and let us together, as friends, we can talk to each other amicably without trying to influence each other. And it would not be possible to have a dialogue. A dialogue means a conversation between two people. But as that is not possible with such a large audience it must be a conversation, a conversation between two friends, not attacking each other, whether you wear a turban or do not wear a turban, whether you are a Christian, or not, as two friends who have lived on this earth for millennia upon millennia, as two amicable, non-persuading friends, we are walking together through the paths of the world. And if that is understood very clearly, that we are not instructing, we are not informing, we are not telling you what to do, we are not doing any kind of propaganda, it is a horror to the speaker to do any kind of propaganda, nor to convince you of anything. And I mean it.

Now let us look at the world. The world is divided into nationalities, geographically, linguistically, religiously. The world is divided into business, spiritual, religious, non-sectarian, it is broken up, fragmented. You belong to a certain guru, and another belongs to another. And in this matter there is no guru, there is no authority of any book, however ancient, or however modern. We are together exploring. There is war going on in different parts of the world. Society is corrupt, immoral. There is great corruption throughout the world. These are all facts. It is not an invention of the speaker. There is great confusion, disorder, politically, so-called religiously. And we have created this society, each one of us is responsible for the ugliness, the brutality, the violence, the bestiality that is taking place in the world. Unless we put our house in order there will be no order in society. I hope this is clear that each one of us, at whatever level of society we live, each one of us has contributed to the confusion, to the immorality, to the insanity of the world. Unless we change, each one of us, fundamentally, psychologically, there will be no peace in the world. You may think that you will have peace, some kind of peace in your mind, but you will never have peace if you do not have order in your daily life. Right? Is that clear that we, in our investigation, have come to a point where we see the world as it is, and we see the society in which we live, corrupt, immoral, religiously nonsensical, with their superstitions, with their rituals, with their so-called meditations, we are responsible for all this. I wonder, one wonders how many of you, of us, feels this responsibility. You may listen to the talks this evening, tomorrow and the next weekend, but how many of us take all this seriously? We are too occupied, we have no time. That is an excuse. What we have to do, if one may point out, we have to put our house in order. And we are going to investigate together what are the implications of that order.

First, what is disorder? One wonders if one realizes, if one is aware that we live in confusion, each one of us, uncertain, seeking security. One must have security, physical security. Millions are starving, unemployed; in Europe the unemployment is very great, so it is in America, and here too. And those unemployed have no security. And is disorder - please, I am putting the question to you, and please consider it - is disorder brought about by each one of us seeking his own particular security? You understand? You want security. One must have physical security. And to have that security, lasting, abiding, you cannot have wars, you cannot have communal conflicts, you cannot possibly belong to a particular guru, or a particular system, because then you bring about conflict. Conflict is disorder, whether that conflict exists between you and your husband, or your wife, between you and the government, between you and your guru. Right? I hope you are following all this. Don't shut your ears - 'lend me your ears' - not only hear with your ears but also hear much more deeply.

It is necessary to use words to communicate. We are now speaking English, and one has to use certain words in that language to convey certain meaning give to those words, certain significance. But the words are not important. What is important is the content of the word. When one says, I am a Hindu, or a Buddhist, or a Christian, the words do not matter, but the content, what lies behind the word. And words divide people, whether language conditions the brain, probably you haven't thought about all this, it doesn't matter. And one has to see whether conflict in oneself can end. That is the first thing to understand, whether conflict, struggle, the pain, the anxiety, the jealousy, the ambition, the enormous amount of suffering human beings have borne, the struggle to become something, both psychologically as well as outwardly, there is a perpetual conflict in each one of us. That is a fact. To meditate becomes a conflict. To follow somebody becomes a conflict. In our relationship with each other, both sexually, in a family, in a community, conflict exists. And that is one of the major causes of disorder, not only in society, but in ourselves. Would you agree to that? That conflict at whatever level, in depth or superficial, when that conflict exists between people there must inevitably be disorder.

So is it possible to find out, if we are serious, if we want order in our lives, whether it is possible for conflict to end. Conflict ultimately is war. Conflict between two ideologies, the totalitarian ideology and the democratic ideology. You are following all this? Ideologies - the Christian ideology and the Buddhist ideology, the Hindu versus some other ideology. So conflict must exist wherever there is ideology, wherever the brain is entrenched in tradition. You have your tradition, another has his tradition. So to end conflict there must be freedom from tradition, freedom from ideology, theories, hypothesis, and national division, which is really glorified tribalism.

So we are asking whether this conflict can end, not in society, because that society human beings have created. No god, no extraordinary outside agency has created this society in which we live. We have made it with all the confusion, injustice, the brutality, the violence, the bestiality, we have brought it about, each one of us. And if you are at all serious, and we must be serious, in a world that is disintegrating, in a world that is being torn apart, we must be serious, if not for yourself for your grandchildren, for your children. It is necessary to be very serious, committed, urgent, not to any theory, not to any ideology, but to find out for ourselves the cause of conflict, because where you can find the cause that cause can be ended. That is the law.

If there is pain in our body the cause for that pain can be found, and in the finding of the cause there is the remedy and therefore the cause ends. Similarly, if you are really earnest, not playing about with ideas, with speculations, with all that nonsense, if you are really serious, the cause of conflict is very clear. There are many causes, but essentially one cause: that each one of us is egocentric, in the name of god, in the name of good works, in the name of improving society, social work, joining parliament and so on, seeking power and money. That is what most human beings want, not only physical power but spiritual power, to be somebody in a spiritual world. Personally the speaker dislikes that word, 'spiritual'. We all want to be illumined, find illumination, happiness, so we say, we will ultimately achieve that. Time is the enemy of man. Yes, sir, look at it, we will go into it more deeply about the question of time.

As we said, time is the enemy of man. You have to live now, find out now and if you say, 'We will gradually find out', you will never find out. That is an excuse. So the cause of conflict brings about disorder. And so we must first put our house in order - our house, not the physical house, but the psychological world which is very complex. Do you understand? When we use the word 'psychological' we mean the brain that holds all the content of our consciousness, what you think, what you believe, your aspirations, your fear, your jealousies, your antagonism, your pleasure, your aspirations, your faith, your sorrow, all that is the content of your being. That is the very centre of your consciousness. That is what you are, not some extraordinary spiritual entity dwelling in darkness, as some of the people believe. You are what you think, what you believe, what your faith, what you follow, your ambition, your name and so on, that is what you actually are, psychologically as well as physically.

We are not concerned for the moment with the physical side, because when one understands deeply the psychological nature and structure of oneself then you can deal with the physical activity, sanely, rationally. So that is what you are, that is your human condition. That is the human condition that has existed for thousands of years. Man has always quarrelled with another man, always lived in conflict. If you find some of the old ancient monuments in caves and other places you will see man fighting man, fighting animals, which is the same thing. It is symbolical, perpetual conflict. That is the lot of man. When we talk of man we are including the women too, so don't get too feministic. We are human beings. And perhaps a few have escaped from conflict, a few people who have gone into this question deeply, which is to understand the nature of conditioning, human condition.

There are those philosophers in the West who say, human condition can never be altered, it can be modified. He must live in that prison, that prison can be made congenial, more respectable, more suitable and so on. That human condition, which is his anger, his jealousies, his search, his everlasting burden, he must put up with it, that is his condition. That is what the modern and recent philosophers have stated, man cannot be changed at all, but he can be modified in his brutality, in his violence, in his belief and so on. But we are saying, the speaker is saying quite impersonally, emphatically, that the human condition can be radically changed; that is, if he has the intention, if he observes very clearly without any prejudice, without any direction - it is going to be difficult - without any motive, what he is.

Now we are going to, together, and I mean together, you are not sitting there and I am sitting here, this platform is only for convenience. Sitting on a little platform does not give the speaker authority. But what he says may have some significance, and may have a meaning, and you have to follow the significance the meaning, the depth of it. Our condition is that, that condition has been brought about through thousands of years of experience, through various accidents, incidents, that condition has been brought about through the desire to be secure, that condition has been brought about through fear and the perpetual pursuit of pleasure and the never ending of sorrow. We are what we have been more or less for the last million years as human beings. That is our condition. We have created the society. Then the society controls us. So we try to blame the environment, blame education, blame governments and so on, but we have made all this environment. So we are responsible. So we must understand our conditioning. Our conditioning is to be British, to be French, to be a Sikh. Right, sir? To belong to some guru. That is our conditioning. Can one observe very closely and clearly your conditioning? If you say, it is not possible to be free from conditioning, you have blocked yourself, you have created a barrier for yourself. Or, if you say, that it is possible, that possibility also creates a barrier. Do you understand? Both the positive and the negative become a barrier. But if you begin to investigate, look, observe, then you can discover a great deal.

So we must question, what is observation, what is looking? How do you observe yourself? By becoming a monk, by withdrawing from society, by becoming a hermit? Or do you discover what you are through your reactions in your relationship with another? Don't you? That is very close and very near, your relationship with your wife, with your husband, with your girl friend, whatever it is. In that mirror of relationship you see yourself as you are. Right? Are you doing this, or just agreeing with words? Are you listening? If I may most respectfully ask, are you listening to the words, listening your own interpretation of the word, or are you actually now, sitting there, observing in the mirror of your relationship with your wife, with your husband, with your neighbour, with your guru, whatever your relationship is? In that relationship you see your reactions, physical as well as psychological. Right? That is so simple. You start very near to go very far. But you want to go very far first, but you don't start near at home.

So we are saying that relationship is one of the most essential things in life. Relationship is a reality. You cannot possibly exist in solitude, alone. The word `alone' means something else. Alone means, all one. But we are not using that word in that sense. You are solitary and you remain solitary. You think you are an individual and you treat another as an individual. You are two separate entities and trying to establish a relationship between two images. Are you following all this? Does it interest you all this? Or you are accustomed to go to lectures, be talked at, argue and never listen?

Here we are trying to find out a way of living, really a way of living, a daily living in which there is no conflict. And to understand the way of that life one must end conflict, first in ourselves, then in society and so on, to examine, to observe ourselves. So we must comprehend the meaning of that word 'to observe'. Have you ever observed anything without a motive, without the word, without a direction, just to observe. Have you ever observed the ocean, the tree, the birds, the beauty of the land, or the beauty of the tree, just to observe, not use the word, 'how beautiful'. Have you ever observed your wife, your children, if you have them? Or you observe them belonging to you, as a parent with all your authority? Have you ever observed the evening star, the slip of a new moon without the word? And observing, you begin to discover your reactions, your physical sensory reactions first and then observe your psychological reactions. That sounds very simple. But our brains have become so complex that we hate anything simple. We want it all made complex, theoretical, then we follow. But to begin very simply and to begin very near, which is yourself and your relationship, that is the only thing that you have. For god's sake see that, not your temples, not your beliefs, not your turbans, your beards, or whatever you wear. We are human beings.

We cannot exist without relationship. It is the most important thing in life. And in that relationship which is based on image-building, you have an image about her and she has an image about you because you have both lived together for twenty years, for ten days, or one day. You have already created an image. And those images have relationship. And images cannot love. Please do understand this. If you have an image about your wife, about your guru - thank god, I have not got any, but if I have a wife, I have lived with her sexually, she has nagged me, I have bullied her. I possess her and she likes being possessed. And so I have created an image about her and she has created an image about me. And our relationship is based on those images. Right?

I wonder if you see this fact. And when there are images built by thought, built by various experiences and incidents translated by thought and retained as memory, how can there be love? You may love your god, but you don't. You may love your scriptures through fear, because you want to be saved. And where there is fear there is no love. Perhaps you don't ever know, or use that word 'love'. So please seriously with our heart and with your brain, look at the fact. So the question arises whether it is possible not to create images. Do you understand this question? You have images, an image about yourself, haven't you, as a great man, as a powerful man, belonging to a powerful nation, ambassador, commissioner, or you are a politician belonging to a certain party, you have power, position, you have that image. And you have an image of your following some guru that you are gradually coming to nirvana, nearer god. You have all kinds of images, all of us, most people have, but the most intimate image is between you and your wife, or between you and your husband, or your girl friend. You know, the closest. There is the root of conflict. There you must put order. You cannot put order, only you can remove disorder, then there is order. If you remove confusion from your brain there is clarity.

So in relationship conflict is brought about by thought. Right? Please go with the speaker into the question of this, which is of great importance. The speaker is saying that thought is responsible for the image that you have about yourself and you have about another, thought is responsible. Right? We will go into it. We are going to point out. We are going to think together, if it is possible, why thought throughout the world has become so important. And the world has been divided into Eastern thought and Western thought. There is no Western thought and Eastern thought. There is only thought, conditioned according to climate, food, clothes, religion and so on. But there is only thought.

You are not tired, are you? Are you tired? Shall I go on? No, no, you are not encouraging me. I don't want your encouragement because we are going to go into something that requires your attention, not your tiredness" not you acquiescing to what the speaker says, but you have to think, use your brain, not your intellect. Intellect is only part of the brain. We are saying that thought is the root of conflict. Thought has brought about disorder in the world by dividing people into nationalities, into religions. Thought has divided the world as technicians who have invented most extraordinary things in the world. And thought has clothed itself in its psyche. Thought has created the most marvellous cathedrals, most marvellous temples, the mosques, great architecture and great means of destruction, the atom bomb.

Thought has also put in the cathedrals, in the temples, in the mosques, in the places of so-called worship, all the things that are in them. Thought has invented all that. Without thought you could not exist. Thought, having created the image, then worship the image. So we are, the speaker is saying that thought, thinking is the root of conflict. We will go into it. Don't reject it. Don't say, what shall we do without thought. You cannot do without thought, you have to use thought. You use thought to come here, you use thought when you use language, when you do your business. If you are a scientist you have to use your thought. If you are a businessman you use your thought, you may use that thought crookedly, probably you do, but thought is neither East nor West, it is thinking - whether the thinking is of the guru, or the authority, or your own, it is still thinking.

So what is thought which has dominated all our existence, which has controlled, shaped our life. All the so-called sacred books are put down by thought, there is nothing sacred about those books. Your own particular book which you call sacred, the Bible, the Koran, your own literature, it is all put down by thought. You may say, it is revealed - but it is still the activity of thought. Right?

So thought has brought about most extraordinary things in the world, hygiene, surgery, medicine; thought has also brought about the atom bomb, the instruments of war; thought has also divided people as Christians, Hindus, Buddhists, Sikhs, you know all that nonsense that is going on in the world. So we have to understand, go into this question of what is thinking, what is thought. I am - the speaker is not telling you. He is not describing what thought is. Together we are investigating, we are going into it, so you must share, partake in the investigation, not just say, tell me about it, I will say whether it is true or false, whether I agree with you or not. That's rather cheap. That is just an escape, But whereas if you are concerned to find out why thought has done all this, the most extraordinary things and the most diabolical things. Thought has created the image in the temples, in the mosque. Thought has created your guru, your scriptures. So there is nothing sacred which thought has created. So what is thought? Ask yourselves this question, please. I am asking you, but ask yourself, what is thought, what is thinking. Is not thinking limited? All thinking is limited. Don't agree. Please look at it. You will ask, why is it limited, why thought is limited when it has created all this, created the society in which we live, created the ideals, the historical ideals, dialectical. So we are saying thought is limited. And you may ask, why it is limited. It is limited because all experience is limited, all experience, whether the experience of nirvana - please listen carefully - the experience of paradise, sitting next to god, of your achieving - experience is limited, whether it is scientific experience or physical experience or psychological experience. That is a fact, it is limited. Right? Do you see that? And because it is limited, knowledge is always limited - the scientific knowledge which is being gathered day after day, a scientist never says, my knowledge is complete. It is only the guru who says, my knowledge is complete. That is the idiocy of those people.

So knowledge, experience is limited. Knowledge is limited. That is clear if you observe historically, the process of science from the Galileo, from the ancient scientist to the modern scientist they have been gradually building up day after day, and based on experience. So knowledge is based on experience. So knowledge and experience are limited. And that experience is carried, that knowledge is carried in the brain as memory. Right? Memory then responds as thought. So thought is always limited. As all knowledge is always limited either of the future or in the past, or in the present, there is no complete knowledge about anything. And therefore thought is limited. And that which is limited must invariably create conflict. Do you understand this?

If you are living in your backyard, and you are all living in your backyards, self-centred, limited, if you are thinking about yourself all day long, which most of us do, whether you are progressing, whether you are good, whether you look beautiful, whether you are achieving, you are becoming, you know, you are self-centred, when you are thinking about yourself you are very limited, aren't you? Don't be ashamed, you are limited. It is a fact. And that limitation has been brought about by thought, because you are thinking all day long, in your business, in your science, in your philosophy. You are thinking but always from your centre. And that egotistic, egocentric activity is very limited. And therefore you are creating a havoc in the world, creating great conflict in the world. So one asks, please, we will go into it, is there another instrument rather than thought? Do you understand my question?

If you have gone into this question of thinking, and looked at the whole problem and see how limited it is, on the one hand create wars, and the other seek security. The war destroys security, your nationalism destroys security, your worship of one guru, or one clan destroys security of man, for man. And thought is responsible for all this. And so thought is limited. When you really perceive this as an actuality, not an idea, but actually, as you see actually this microphone, then you are bound to ask if you are at all following seriously: is there another instrument rather than thought? Right? Is there another quality in the brain? We will go into the question of the brain, perhaps tomorrow: is there a quality which will find an instrument, discover an instrument that is not thought? Do you understand my question? One can only find out if there is a different totally untouched by thought, is there such an instrument? And to find out one must be very, very clear, the nature and the structure of thought: its responsibility, its usage, where it is limited and recognize its limitations and move away from that limitation. Then one can begin to enquire whether there is totally a different instrument which is not contaminated by thought. Right?

We must stop here. We will meet perhaps tomorrow at the same time, if you want to.

NEW DELHI 2ND PUBLIC TALK 7TH NOVEMBER, 1983

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday evening? We were saying, weren't we, that we all have images not only psychological images but images outside of us. And these images separate man from man - the national images, the religious images and so on. They have been one of the causes, perhaps the major cause of war. Ideals have divided man, ideologies, the Left, the extreme Left, the extreme Right and the centre, they are all ideologies and they have separated man. Ideas. The original meaning of that word 'idea', from the Greek, meant to observe, not to make an abstraction of what one observes. Ideas, ideals, beliefs, faith, a particular devotion to a particular ideal, image and so on, throughout the world for the last millennia, they have divided man against man. And we still carry those ideals, those images, conclusions. And we seem to be never free from any of those things. One asks why, if one is at all aware of what is happening in the world, what is happening in ourselves, psychologically, inwardly, inside the skin, as it were, why do men, intelligent, who have studied history, why do such people carry ideals? Why do you, if I may ask, if one may ask most politely, why do you have ideals? Are you aware, if you have them, that they separate people and therefore bring about conflict? Is it because in those ideals, conclusions, opinions we find security, however fleeting, however transient they be, we find a certain sense of protection, a certain sense of achievement, trying to achieve something. And that gives us a great deal of energy. I do not know if you have not observed deeply committed idealists, how dangerous they are.

And if one is aware that these images created by the hand or by the mind, by thought, have been again a great contributory factor to war. That is, to kill man by another man, inhumanity, bestiality, that has been the lot of man for thousands upon thousands of years. And we are still going on with it, though we are supposed to be more advanced, more progressive, but we are really, inwardly, psychologically quite primitive, quite barbarous, barbarians. I hope, one hopes, you do not mind the speaker using all these words. They apply.

And as we were saying yesterday, in relationship, however intimate, however casual, however passing, in that relationship we create images about each other. You certainly have an image about the speaker, otherwise you wouldn't be sitting here. And so the image becomes far more important than what is being said. What is being said becomes irrelevant when the image, the reputation, all that nonsense, intervenes, acts as a block, so that you do not actually listen to what the speaker is saying. So, could we, this evening, put aside our opinions, our images and look, because where there are images there is no humility. The essence of humility is to be free of all images. You cannot cultivate humility, because we are arrogant people, proud in our knowledge, in our achievements, in our thinking. And so knowledge prevents us from being extraordinarily aware of the depth and the beauty of humility. It is only when there is such humility one begins to learn about oneself, about the world and ask if there is something far beyond the measure of thought.

And as we were saying yesterday, we have lived with conflict all the days of our life. Until we die everything has become a conflict. And one of the causes of conflict, as we said, is the formation and the cultivation and the nourishing of these images. And, as we said yesterday too, you are not hearing a lecture, a sermon, but together, as two friends who are concerned seriously with the world, the appalling state it is in and our own confusions, our own anxiety, fear, our own sorrow, which is our daily life. To understand that daily life, hypothesis is not necessary, no theory, no conclusions, because those conclusions, theories, hypotheses, suppositions, all are unreal. What is real is our daily life. And if our daily life is confused, is in disorder, our society, our environment becomes also disorderly, confused. We have said all this yesterday.

We also said that our brains which evolved through millennia upon millennia, our brains which is the centre of all our thinking, which is a centre of all our reactions and actions, it is the centre also for all our consciousness. That brain which has extraordinary capacity in one direction, the direction of war, science, medicine, surgery, hygiene, transportation and so on. It has got extraordinary capacity, far more perhaps than the computer, though they are trying to find out the ultimate mechanical intelligence which is the computer. I don't know if you have gone into that question, or even talked to people about it. They are trying to bring about a computer that can think, act, invent gods and all that the human beings do much more rapidly, instantly, though perhaps it cannot look at the beauty of the sky, the evening light, or the solemn stillness of the evening. So our brains in one direction materially, technologically have been capable of doing the most astonishing things. And in the other direction psychologically, inwardly the brain has remained more or less what it has been for thousands of years, primitive, brutal, violent and so on. And we are concerned not with the technological aspect of the brain and its capacity in that direction but with the condition of man, of human beings who have lived for so long upon this beautiful earth and are still very violent, without any sense of compassion, without any love and so on. Whether that brain, that is, your brain, can be freed from its own condition. That is, to understand the whole content of its activity, the whole content of its consciousness with its reactions, its inventions of gods and so on, the whole content. Content is what you are, what every human being in the world is, his fame, his belief, his anxiety, his guilt, his remorse, his fears and the pleasure pursuit and the burden of infinite sorrow and the search for permanent security. This is our consciousness. Nobody can deny that. You may add to it, or take away something, but it is still consciousness with all its reactions and responses, all the things that man throughout his existence has collected through experience, through knowledge, through thought. That is our consciousness. That is what we are.

I hope, one hopes, that you and the speaker are sharing this thing together, not merely listening to what he is saying, which is also important, but far more important that we look at the thing together. Not the speaker looks and then conveys it to you, either to accept or deny, but rather together intelligently, sanely, with a sense of affection, look, look what we are, not what we should be. What 'we should be' is unreal. It has no meaning, whether you are going to be a great man next life or a saint, all that stuff, it is unreal, it has no validity, it has no stability. And if we lay our foundation on something unreal, a world of make-belief, then we are escaping, running away from reality of our daily life.

And we are thinking together, please this is important, not that I think and then convey it to you, but rather that you and the speaker are treading the same road, taking the same journey however slowly, however carefully, observing every detail, not skipping anything, avoiding anything. Then we can communicate with each other. Then there is no resistance, it isn't the speaker knows and you don't know, but together to understand this extraordinary complex society which human beings have created and their own life, their own house which is in such disorder, if we see it together, then you don't want a leader, either politically, religiously or in any other direction. If you see it for yourself, the fact, not translate the fact according to your tradition, your desire, but to look at the fact without any reaction. Then by looking at the fact very carefully, then the fact then reveals its whole content. So please be good enough to think together.

Our concern is whether the human brain which is so conditioned, whether that brain which has such immense capacity and which has been held by condition, and as long as that condition exists it has no holistic energy. Do you understand the word 'holistic', a scientific word which means the whole. And to find out for oneself by careful observation, not analysis. When you analyse, who is the analyser? Right? Is the analyser different from the analysed? You may analyse a tree, or the seas, the waves, the dolphins - one does not know if you have seen the beauty of a dolphin. I won't go into all that for the moment. Those you can analyse by careful study something outside of us. So when you analyse yourself who is it that is analysing? Do you understand that question? Is the analyser different from the analysed? Why does one have to explain a very simple thing? One does not have to explain the beauty of the sky, the beauty of an evening star, the love a person, you don't analyse, you love. You see, if you begin to analyse love and find out you love somebody because it gives you comfort, gives you a sense of security, then that is not love. So please find out for yourself the significance of analysis. Apart from the professional psychiatrists, psychologists, apart from them, you have to learn, understand your whole structure of yourself. If you depend on a therapist, a psychotherapist, a psychiatrist and so on, then you are always depending on someone. But if you can discover for oneself the truth of all this, then there is no dependence on anything. That gives you tremendous energy, vitality and clarity.

So it is not a question of analysis. We are not analysing the content of consciousness. We are observing. If you observe as though it was something outside of you, then there is a gap between you and that which you observe. What you observe, is it not yourself? You cannot separate yourself from what you are. You may analyse, but that separation is still the analyser who is also being analysed. Do you follow all this? So analysis is totally irrelevant. What is relevant is observation, how you observe yourself. If the observer is examining what he sees, or translates what he sees, then the observer separates himself from the thing which he is observing. Are you getting nearer to what I am trying to explain? That is, when you are angry, is that anger different from you? When you are jealous, as most people are, is that jealousy different from you? You are that jealousy, at that moment, you are full of it, that feeling, which includes hate, antagonism, violence, at that moment, at that second you are that. Then a few seconds, or minutes later, you say, I have been jealous. Then you begin to analyse jealousy. You follow? You have separated yourself from the fact. So the observer is the past. Right? The past accumulating knowledge about jealousy. And that accumulated knowledge is the observer who says, I am different from that feeling which I have had some time before. So, can you observe, is there an observation without the observer? Do you understand all this? I don't know what I have got to explain all this.

When you look at your friend, or your wife, or your husband, or your girl friend, can you look, observe, without a single thought? You can't. To observe your wife and so on, it is not possible because of all the knowledge you have acquired, gathered about her and she about you. That knowledge prevents you from looking. Right? That is simple. If I have met you before I have a certain image of you and the next time I meet you I project that image. Therefore I do not meet you at all. Whereas to observe without knowledge - if I want to understand you, I can't say, he is a Hindu, he is a Sikh, he is German, British, that prevents me from understanding. My opinions about you prevents me from understanding you. Therefore, if I want to understand you with all my heart and mind, I put all that aside. Then I observe. Are you doing that? Are you doing that now as we are talking, or you are going to do that some time later? The 'later, some time' becomes an impediment. What is to be done is to be done now, not tomorrow. So if that is at least slightly clear, and I hope, one hopes, that is more clear than your faces show, we can proceed.

We can proceed to examine, to observe - I won't use the word 'examine'-to observe the content of our consciousness which is what we are, what each one of us is. This consciousness is shared by all humanity. You go to the far west, California, there the human beings like you with a different affluent world, they are like you, angry, jealous, violent, insecure, uncertain about themselves, just like you. Right? You come nearer, Europe, German, British, Czechoslovakian or Yugoslavian and so on or the amusing Italian, they are all like you. They worship their own particular god, and you worship your own particular god out of fear. If you are free of fear you don't have gods. We will go into that later.

So this consciousness, which you think is yours, is shared by all humanity. Right? That is a fact. You don't need to have to have proof, you talk to an Englishman, he may be proud, reserved and so on, but then you get behind it he is just like the rest of mankind. He is unemployed, he goes to church, hoping somebody will help him, somebody will give him a sense of sense of security. Right? Just like you, the rest of the world is. Right? You have to see that fact. It is not the speaker's invention. It is a fact. So if your consciousness, which you have thought is yours, you find that it is shared by all humanity then you are no longer an individual. Right? It is a shock, you are no longer an individual. And humanity throughout the ages, has thought each person is separate, is a separate soul, separate atman. You know all that stuff. And the whole sociological structure is based on that, you and me. You have power, and I have no power, but when you realize the fact, the reality, the truth that all human beings share the same consciousness, because all human beings go through great travail, great trouble, great confusion, they hate, they quarrel, they are jealous, they are sexual and so on and so on. So you are no longer an individual. Do you understand that? You may like to think you are an individual, individual freedom, individual success, individual god, my own path different from yours. Do you understand? To realize that fact that you are no longer individual means a tremendous psychological change. It is not mere verbal description, but it is a fundamental, radical revolution in the psyche that you are the entire humanity. When one realizes that, you will never kill another human being. It is like, it is our earth, it is not Indian earth, it is not European earth, or the Russian earth, or the American, it is our earth, and we are the rest of humanity. Do you understand what that means? This needs a great sense of compassion, a great sense of responsibility.

So let's proceed. To observe, not as you observe a fish in an aquarium, but to observe what we are. First of all, to observe we must understand the nature of thought, which we went into briefly yesterday, and also the nature of time. This becomes serious, please. Not that what we have said a few minutes ago was not serious, it still is, but this requires a great deal of attention, a great deal of, not concentration - concentration is deadly to attention. It requires attention for you to look, to give your energy, the whole of your being, to find out. We said, thought is limited, yesterday, because thought is based on knowledge and knowledge is based on experience. You see in the scientific world, through constant experience, one hypothesis after another, one theory after another, breaking it down, trying to prove it, accumulating more and more knowledge. No scientist worth his salt will ever say, knowledge is complete. No book, no religious book can ever be complete, it is written down by thought. The words used are the symbol of thought.

So please observe for yourself that your knowledge, your experience is always, everlastingly conditioned, limited. That is a fact. So your thinking is also limited. And any action born of thought which is limited must inevitably create conflict between you and another. Right? Because the very nature of thought is divisive, because it is limited. You follow, not what the speaker is saying, but you yourself are observing, seeing the fact, the truth for yourself that thought will always be limited, because it is based on knowledge, based on experience. And as thought itself is a fragment, because it is limited, therefore, the solution for all our problems is not through thought.

What is a problem, the meaning of that word, not the problem itself, but what you say, problem - what does that word mean? The root meaning of that word is something thrown at you, something that acts as a challenge to you. Right? That is the meaning of that word, from Latin and Greek and so on, I won't go into it - something that is actually thrown at you. That's a problem. And our brains from childhood have been trained, educated to solve problems. Right? A child goes to school and he has to learn mathematics, which is a problem to the child, then geography, history, biology, physics, everything becomes a problem. So his brain, which is your brain, is conditioned to solve problems. Right? So you never solve problems. Do you understand? If my brain is conditioned to solve problems I look at life as a problem, so we are always trying to solve problems. As the politicians are doing throughout the world, they are trying to solve problems, and so increasing problems. And they have never solved any problems because their brains - are there any politicians here? Forgive me! - so their brains are trained, educated from childhood to solve problems. And therefore they have never solved any problems. On the contrary they have increased problems. Don't laugh at the politicians. You are also a politician. The politician is not different from you.

So please understand this very important fact that as long as your brain is trained to solve problems, as the brain itself has become a problem, it can never solve it. Do you understand? So is it possible to have a brain that has no problem? Then only it can solve problems. Do you understand this? Please capture this, please understand this as depth, not superficially. To live a life without a single problem, that means to be free, the brain being free of its education to solve problems, so that it can look at problems, because it is only when there is freedom you can observe. You know that word 'freedom', implies, affection, love. A mind burdened with problems can never love.

I do not know if you understand all this, at least some of you do, I hope. Understand not intellectually, but actually and then put it in life.

So our consciousness is not separate from the rest of humanity. That is a tremendous revelation, greater than any other revelations in any other books, because it then brings about a tremendous, radical change. You are humanity. Do you understand this? So if you are, if your house is not in order, the rest of humanity is not in order. So let us together examine, let us together observe the content of our consciousness, of ourselves. One of the factors is thought and time. Thought has become the major factor. It is the only factor because it has accumulated the whole content of our consciousness. Thought, as we said, is born of experience, knowledge, stored in the brain as memory and from memory thought exists. This whole process is instantaneous. And that thought is limited. Right? This is clear, simple.

Then you must look at time, because for us time is extraordinarily important: the tomorrow with its hope, with its danger, with its sense of achievement, the tomorrow - that tomorrow may be a hundred tomorrows, but it is still tomorrow. That tomorrow is the time of yesterdays. Right? Do you understand this? Yesterday, when you say, yesterday, it is already the past and therefore it is part of time, when you say, it's twelve o'clock, it is past eleven o'clock. So yesterday and many thousand yesterdays are the result of a continuous movement of time. Right? Do you understand? Time, not only physical time, but psychological time: I will be, I am not, but I will be. That is time. I am not good - will any of you say that? You won't! - but I will be good. I am ignorant, but I will be learned. This life has been unsatisfactory, miserable, perhaps next life. The next life is what you are now. Right? If you don't change now you will be what you are tomorrow. Only we postpone to the next life - if there is a next life. But we won't go into that for the moment. Time to achieve, to learn, to become, to become a success, to find enlightenment, to meditate, takes time, both chronologically as well as psychologically is tremendously important. Right? Because your whole life is based on time. Your business, your learning about technology, learning about computer, learning a new language, learning how to drive a car, how to play a violin, or this or that, that requires time. Please listen to this carefully. To learn a language requires time. To learn about any technology requires time. That same, requiring time, is extended to the psychological field. Do you understand?

I need time to learn how to drive a car. So I also need time to learn about myself. It is the same movement. Are you following this? So we must understand the nature of time. There is time outwardly, the sun rises, sun sets. The sun rises at a certain time in the winter and sets at a certain time. The sun rises at mid summer at a certain time, sets at a certain time, and so on. All that is external time. But also we have an internal time which is based on becoming. Right? I have an ideal of non-violence, which you are so fond of, and in the meantime I am violent and one day I am going to get there. Right? In the meantime you are violent. So non-violence is a fallacy. It sounds good. All your saints have preached it, even the recent ones. And you like that, but the fact is that you are violent. That is fact and non-violence is a non-fact. Face it. If you are pursuing non-violence you are really avoiding the actual fact of your being violent. And to face that is more important than the pursuit of non-violence. However much you may talk about non-violence you are actually terribly violent.

So there are these two factors in our lives, major factors: thought and time. You cannot deny that. It is a fact. Are they separate? Is not thought time? Right? You are following all this? Please, I am not teaching you. I am only pointing out - not even pointing out, we are thinking together. We are both of us sharing the food, sharing the food that has been put before us. It is the food that matters, and the food, if it is properly balanced food, nourishes. And this food is thought and time which you must share with the speaker. That means you must understand the nature of time, which is also very complex, as thought is. We are pointing out, both our movements. Thought is a movement and time is a movement. So they are one; it is not thought is separate, time is separate. Thought has created time. Right? I am this and I will be that. That movement is brought about by thought. I will be, I will achieve my ideal. That is a movement of thought including in time. When you say, I will achieve, achievement means time. Right? I hope you see all this together.

So these are the major factors of life, time plus thought. And to look, to observe the content of our consciousness which is shared by all humanity, and therefore you and the rest are humanity. that's a marvellous thing if you understand it. That you are the rest of mankind, that you are not separate from the rest of mankind. So we can examine, so we can observe the content, which is shared by all living things. Do you understand? Then that thing is sacred, that is the holiest of things, because then there is no separation, there is no division. Then your wife is you and you are the wife.

The thing we worship is not love. Your scriptures, your books, your gurus, temples, in there, there is no truth. Truth is to be found in the understanding of your whole being. And is it very near. You don't have to go very far to find truth. You don't have to go to Kashi, to Mecca, to Rome. It is there where you are. Forgive the speaker for his passion.

So let us observe one of the contents of our consciousness. From childhood we are psychologically being hurt. That is a fact.

The parents hurt, society hurts, the school with their examinations, with their marks, with their comparison, hurt the child. This is a fact. And we carry this hurt throughout life. And that hurt makes us build a wall round ourselves, so as not to be hurt any more. Have you not noticed this? Have you not been hurt from childhood, all of us? Of course, obviously. It shows from your face. And what is it that is hurt? You say, I am hurt - what is 'you' that is hurt? The image that you have built about yourself. Right? That is hurt and you have identified yourself with that image. If you had no image you would never be hurt. Right? Which means you have no identification with anything. Where there is identification, with a family, with an ideal, you are always going to be bruised, shaken, hurt, frightened.

So can you live - please, this is a very serious question - can you live without a single image? Otherwise you will always be hurt and also you will never have the beauty of humility. So to become aware of your image that is hurt and in that awareness be intensely aware without any choice-don't choose, you can't choose in awareness. If you are aware now, as you are sitting under a tent, if you are aware of all the colour as you come in, the shape of the tent, the person sitting next to you, the clothes he is wearing - just to observe, not say, I don't like that colour, or the man I am sitting next to he smells, or he is not clean, or his shirt not what I like. So awareness is limited. But if you are aware without any choice, without any direction, then that awareness reveals everything.

So to be aware of the image that you have about yourself, about another, that image of nationality, identified with a nation and so on, that image, as long as you have it, you are going to have grief, pain, it gets hurt. So the question is: can you live without any image? One can. If you understand, if you see the fact, the fact that as long as you have an image and identify with that image you are going to have great problems. And your brain is trained to solve problems, therefore you are caught in problems. But if you see the fact, not as a problem, that as long as you have an image it must be shattered by somebody, therefore you get hurt. Which means one of the contents of our consciousness is fear. Shall I go into it now?

It is a very complex problem because we have lived with fear all the days of our lives. It is a dark shadow, it is something humanity has borne, carried for millions of years. Each one, we know what fear is, fear of the past, the remorse, the guilt, the things that have been done and should not have, the regrets. Fear is very complex. And to understand fear, not verbally, not merely intellectually, but to face the fact that each one of us is scared, frightened. And we have never been able to solve that problem. We carry it with us as our shadow. Fear means to be alone, finding oneself lonely, unloved and seeking love, fear of what might happen, lose my job, I will be one of the unemployed. There are people in the world who do not know what work is. For the rest of their lives they will never work, not because they are crippled, but because society, governments are so limited, so narrow, so brutal, thousands upon thousands, in England nearly four million people are unemployed, and in this country, god knows how many - those people are afraid. You may have a good job, you may have security, but there is always this fear of tomorrow; not only the fear of tomorrow, but the fear of death, fear of never being whole, complete. So fear is an extraordinarily complex problem, not to be dealt with in a few minutes. It is a vast area of our life and in that area you must tread very slowly, carefully, tentatively. It is not how to end fear, but in the very understanding the depth of it, the quality of it, there is an end to fear completely, that can never return, a freedom absolute, psychological freedom from fear. Then no god, no prayer, no scriptures exist. It is only the fearful mind, fearful brain that seeks security in things illusory.

So, as it is now quarter past seven we have to stop. We will go into all this next Saturday and Sunday.

NEW DELHI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 12TH NOVEMBER, 1983

May we go on with what we were talking about last Monday? We were trying to go into the question of fear, which is a very complex problem. But before we go into it rather deeply, if one may remind you this is not a lecture as is commonly understood, to inform and to instruct, but rather it is a conversation between us, conversation between two friends who are concerned with the problem of existence, with all its complexity and intricacies, and they are not to convince each other of anything. They are not persuading each other. They are not doing propaganda at all. What they are trying to do together is to think of the various issues that contain in our daily life. Only in our daily life, not theories, not speculations, not philosophical or intellectual assumptions and conclusions. But rather enquire, think together. And to think together one must listen to each other. There is an art of listening which is to listen not only with the ear but the hearing of the ear, much deeper, more attentive, more concerned, affectionate, not translating what is being said into your own terminology, into your own particular conditioning, but rather to listen to each other. And as it is not possible with a large audience like this to have a dialogue, which is a conversation between two people, we will assume that there is only one person here, and talking to each other.

We were saying the other day, weren't we, that relationship is of enormous importance, because all life is based on relationship. If in that relationship there is conflict of any kind then that relationship brings about division, all the rest of the confusion that lies in our relationship, whether it is intimate or not. And we said too that as long as there is an image forming mechanism about each other then communication is not possible, or relationship, deep relationship, is not possible. We went into that very carefully.

So, please, we are thinking together if that is possible, because most of us are so obstinate, so definite in our opinions, in our convictions, in our conclusions, in our ideals, in our own importance, so we hardly listen to each other, or think together. Perhaps it may be possible, this evening, to think together, not about something, that is fairly easy. If you are a businessman you would think together about doing somebody in the eye and so on, or gaining money, planning for it, then you co-operate. But here thinking together means not about something, the capacity, the urge to co-operate in thinking.

So we are going to think together about fear, what fear is, how it arises, what is its cause, where it leads, to violence, to various forms of neuroticism, psychosis and how it darkens our lives, how fear, both biological as well as psychological, shrinks one. And we were saying also when we briefly talked about it the other day that thought and time are one of the major factors of fear. We went into the question of thought, thought being limited because all experience is limited, all knowledge whether in the past or in the future, knowledge will ever be limited, always continuously limited. And from that experience knowledge is stored in the brain as memory and from that memory springs thought. And so thought is always limited, whether you invent god which is the invention of thought, and all the paraphernalia that goes on in the various temples, churches, mosques is invented by thought which is always limited. Thought can imagine the illimitable, the timeless, the immeasurable, but it is still the movement of thought. And thought is a material process. So there is nothing sacred about thought.

I hope we are meeting each other, we are walking along the same road together. Not that we are trying to persuade you, but that is an obvious fact. You may not be willing to look at the facts, because one may be superstitious, ideological, afraid to look at facts. And so we like to live in illusions. That is our lot, we have lived for millions of years in illusions.

One of the illusions, major illusions, as we pointed out the other day, is our consciousness with all its reactions, with all its content, fear, belief, faith, anxiety, remorse, guilt, you know, pleasure, pain and suffering. All that is our consciousness. And that consciousness is not individual. It is shared by all human beings, whether in the East, West, whatever country they belong to, that consciousness is shared by all human beings. We have talked about that considerably. So when one realizes the sharing of this consciousness by all humanity, you then are humanity, therefore you are no longer individual. This is a statement you won't accept. But it is a fact. Look at it carefully, logically, sanely, with a sense of questioning, with a quality of a brain that doubts, questions authority. And when you begin to investigate, not others, but enquire into your own thoughts, actions, responses, your fears, your anxieties, then you will discover for yourself that all human beings whether they are in the totalitarian governments, or in the so-called democratic governments, broken up by religions, you all share the same anxiety, uncertainty, insecurity, searching for security. So we are, we share this enormous burden.

And one of the major burdens of our consciousness is fear, why human beings, however sophisticated, however learned, however devoutly worshipping some idol made by the hand or by the mind, there is always fear: fear of death, fear of tomorrow, fear of that which has happened weeks ago and so on. We are discussing not a particular form of fear, but the cause of fear, whether that cause can be totally, completely eliminated. So we must begin with the structure of the psyche, not how to get rid of fear outwardly, but psychologically, inwardly, inside the skin as it were. When there is fear inwardly, not spoken about, not enquired into, then that very fear creates externally, in the outward world, a great deal of confusion - which is obvious. You can see that.

So we are going to think together, enquire together, what is the root of fear, whether that root can be totally rooted out. Fear takes many forms: fear is part of violence. Violence is a very complex affair. Aggression, both physical and psychological, is part of fear. And we have never understood or been free from all violence. In this country we have talked a great deal about non-violence. That is one of our favourite slogans, cliches, that we are all attempting to be non-violent. These two words are used politically and by ordinary people. But non-violence is not a fact. It is an idea. What is a fact is violence. Right? We never deal with a fact, but we rather run away from the fact into a concept called non-violence. And that concept is created by thought and we pursue that and sow violence in the pursuit of non-violence. Right? Are you following all this? Are you interested in all this? Am I speaking to somebody or to myself in my room, or writing a book about it all. Are we together in this? I hope so, otherwise I don't know why you should sit here. It is a waste of your time.

So what is the root of fear? Violence, aggression, and when one is uncertain, not clear, that confusion brings about a state of anxiety and where there is anxiety there is also fear. And where there is fear there is the desire to hurt people and so on. And we are not talking therefore of a particular fear, not your particular fear, you may be afraid of your wife, or your husband, or your government, or the boss above you, but fear as a whole thing. Is that clear, that we are not thinking together about a particular form of fear, but rather enquiring about why human beings for thousands of years have carried this burden, why, however intellectual, learned, sophisticated, or technologically advanced, this fear continues. So if we can this evening think together and see if it is possible to totally eliminate psychological fear, not how to be free from fear. When you ask, how to be free, then you want a system, a method, a practice. And that very system, method, practice brings about more fear - whether you are doing it rightly - you follow? Fear is sustained. Are we together in this? I am afraid not. Some of you, some of us, are so trained to systems, methods, so conditioned, 'tell me what to do', 'tell me how to get rid of fear, I will practise it'. Then your brain becomes mechanical. Right? If you practise over and over again it is like a gramophone record playing the same old tune. But whereas if both of us want to go into this question very deeply, and enquire, not 'how', enquire, so that we find out the root of it. When you go to a doctor, he not only deals with the symptom but he wants to find out the cause. And in diagnosis he finds the cause and says, don't eat so much, or take this or that and so eliminates the cause - at least one hopes. But in the same way we are enquiring into the very causation of fear. What is the cause? We are thinking together. I may put into words. I may, one may describe it, by putting into words, the speaker is not helping you to understand fear. You are doing it yourself. Right? You are doing it for yourself, though the speaker may talk about it. Right?

What is the cause of fear? Please, if you find it act, don't carry on with fear. What is the cause of it? Is it thought? Is it time? Thought - I have had certain anxieties, fear last year, or last week and I hope it will not occur again. Follow. The fear has a continuity. Right? Clear? Fear has a continuity, duration, and that continuity implies time. So thought, time is the root of fear. Right? You can't get round that fact. Thought itself creates fear. I have a job, I am quite happy at the moment, but I may lose it. So thought projects into the future a condition which I may live in and that creates fear. Or I have had certain pain, physical pain, the remembering it and hoping it will not happen again. So it is both, thought and time are the root fact.

Now you have listened to it. What can be done? Do you understand? Now you have listened to the fact that thought and time basically, fundamentally is the cause of fear. The next question naturally arises, how am I to put aside thought? Right? Or how am I to stop thought? You are following this? If I could stop thought and the continuity of the movement as time, is that possible? I hope you are asking this question yourself. I am not putting this question to you. You are asking this question of yourself. One sees the truth that thought and time are the essence of fear. Now how do you observe this fact, that thought and time are the causation of fear? How do you look at it, receive it or approach the question? Do you understand me? How do you, when you listen to this fact, what is your response to it, actual response, not calculated response? You naturally say you are stuck. Right? You are stuck in that position. And if you ask 'how', again your reply is mechanical. So you are also stuck there. You are blocked. Right? Are you being held by a fact? Right? I wonder if you see this. You are held down by an actuality, and you have no response to that. Right? If you are quite honest with oneself you see this truth and you know you cannot do anything. Right? That is, for the first time in your life have said, I cannot do anything. Right? Before you have always done something. I wonder. You have always acted on fear: I must control it, I must suppress it, I must rationalize all fear and so on. You always took action about it. Now you can't. Right?

So you observe without reaction, you watch the fact and that the fact is not different from you. The fact is you. Is that clear? Fear brought about by thought and time is you. Like anger is you, greed is you, your ambition is you, your name, your form, your way of thinking is you. So you are stuck with yourself. There is nobody to help you. You have understood it? No. Nobody to help you to be free of fear, because the guru himself is afraid. He wants to reach some other state and all the rest of the nonsense. So you are for the first time in a position, in a situation where there is nobody to help you, no god, no angels, no governments, no saviour. Then what happens to your whole being? Do you understand all this?

Then if you can look at it totally without any reaction, because you are that, then you will see, because you have brought all the energy which you have been wasting and searching for an escape and trying to suppress fear, trying to worship gods to save you from fear, all that wasted energy is brought together as complete energy. And that energy dissolves totally fear. Do it sirs, do it as you are sitting here, listening now, not when you go home, then it is too late. That is mere postponement, avoidance. Whereas, if you can face the fact, then you will always be dealing with facts. Facts are that which has happened in the past and that which is happening now. Facts do not exist in the future. Right? The fact that there has been an accident. It is a fact. I was caught last year in a car accident, and that is a fact. And it is a fact that I am now sitting here and talking and so on. So to always live with facts, not with opinions, not with conclusions, not with ideals, but actually that you are angry, that you are greedy, that you are ambitious, you are violent. That very act of living with the fact of fear because that fact demands your total attention. And where there is total attention, which is bringing all your energy, it is like throwing a bright light on an object, then you see things clearly and therefore totally free from fear. To the speaker this is a fact psychologically. You may not believe it, I don't care. But the fact is when there is freedom from this fear then only there is love.

We will go into that presently, into the quality, the nature of love, compassion and intelligence. But one cannot come to it where fear exists. And also we should consider why human beings throughout the world are pursuing everlastingly pleasure - aren't you? Sexual pleasure, pleasure of achieving, pleasure of power, pleasure of position, pleasure of being somebody. Right? This has been the pursuit of man: power, money, success-why? What is pleasure? Go into it, please, we are thinking together. I am not, the speaker is not lecturing. What is pleasure? To achieve success, to become successful, not only in this ugly world - the world is very beautiful, but we have made it ugly - not only be successful in this world but also to be successful in the other world, it is the same movement, they are not two different things. We have divided this. That is one of our peculiarities of thought, to divide, to divide the world, the materialistic world and the so-called spiritual world. In a spiritual world, if I may use that timeworn word, 'spiritual' - the speaker doesn't like that word but we will use it - in the spiritual world there is tremendous pleasure in achieving: I am this today, but I will be that tomorrow. And in the physical world it is fairly obvious.

So one asks why, why not only this division, but why this search for pleasure, the repetition of it, the mechanical content of it. Do you understand, whether it is sexual or otherwise, it becomes mechanical, habitual. Which means what? Our brains have become, have become so mechanical. Right? You go to school, college, university, acquire knowledge and you function there for the rest of your life. Either skilfully or not, you have set the pattern, the tradition and you follow it. Face the fact, sir. You are going to do exactly what you want to do. You may listen to all this very politely, perhaps a little respectfully and perhaps even less affectionately, but after having listened very carefully for an hour you are going to do exactly what you want to do. That is your pleasure. And why have human beings who are so extraordinarily clever, inventive, open in one direction, the technological world, and why they are so caught in this narrow pleasure, the routine of it? Is it still thought? Is it still time? So thought is both the creator of fear and the continuity of pleasure. Right? Am I making it clear? That is a fact. So we ask the next question: is love pleasure? Is love desire? Is love the instrument of thought? Please, we are, you are asking this question, not me, not the speaker. Or you are only concerned with pleasure and desire? So we have to enquire, if you are not too tired, into what is desire. We have enquired into fear, and facing the fact and not moving away from the fact. We see what thought has done; time and thought have brought about fear, brought about a continuity and a demand for pleasure. And we are asking, is love part of thought? Is love a continuity of time? Right? So we are going to find out together if it is possible to understand, not intellectually or sentimentally, emotionally, because emotion is very limited, narrow, restricted like sentimentality. Sentimentality and romanticism breed violence. I won't go into all that now, there is no time.

So what is love? Do you love your wife, do you love your husband, do you love your children, love. If you really loved your children, really loved them with your heart, there would be no wars. Right? You would educate them differently to see the causes of war, nationalism and so on. If you really loved that perfume, that beauty, that quality and strength then there will not only be no wars, then religions won't divide people: the Christian, the Hindu, Buddhist, Islamic you know all that kind of intellectual divisions that have no reality at all. So together let us find out, not find out intellectually, you will never find out through words, through intellectual gambits. You have to delve into it to find out very deeply. So to ask, is desire love? And then what is desire? Why human beings throughout the ages were slaves to desire. They suppressed it, they dedicated their desire to god. They became monks, sannyasis so as to suppress. Don't look at a woman. And if you are a nun, don't look at a man. Right? So desire has been trampled upon, controlled, suppressed, rationalized, transmuted to some higher purpose, to the service of mankind, to social service, all that bilge - sorry to use that word-all that nonsense, because they have not understood the depth of that word desire.

So together, please, let us enquire, think together, the cause of why human beings have become slaves to desire. We are not against desire. We are not saying suppress it, do something with it. We are enquiring into the nature of desire, the structure of it, origin of it. Right? Are you tired? Of course, you will say, no, because the speaker is doing all the work. If you actually applied your brain to find out then you would find you would have more energy, vitality to go much further into it. But if you merely say, yes, I agree with you, this is so, this is a fact and go home and continue with your own old ways, then it is meaningless. So please let us think together what is desire, not how to suppress it, or act upon desire, but what is the origin, what is the beginning of it? Shall we do that?

Have you ever observed a new moon, the rising moon, with all your senses, or you only say, how beautiful that is, or never look at it? Have you ever seen something with all your senses awakened? Perhaps not. But if you have, in that activity when all the senses are fully in action, there is no centre as the me. Right? Oh, you don't understand all this. So senses are important. Right? Unless you are totally paralysed, I hope you are not, your senses are in action. When you eat, when you drink, when you have sex, all your senses are functioning. But they are never functioning as a whole, they are functioning partially. So the sensory responses are very important. Right? Unless you are partially paralysed, as most of us are, by fear, by anxiety, by all kinds of things, our senses are limited, controlled. So the senses respond. Right? The sense of seeing a car, a woman, a mountain, a tree, there is a response. There is sensation. Right? There is contact, the seeing, contact, sensation. Right? That's normal. We agree? Are we together in it? You see a beautiful, nice shirt in the window. You go into the shop, touch the material and you have a sensation. Right? Then what happens? This is important to find out. I enter a shop and see a good coat, touch the material, which is a natural, normal sensation. Then thought comes along and says, how nice I would look in that coat. Then thought creates the image of me in that coat. At that moment desire is born. Do you understand all this? That is, seeing a nice car, with new beautiful lines, highly polished - not the Indian cars, forgive me - the latest model, in that you can go very fast, control, safety and all the rest of it. You see it, put your hand on it, see how highly polished it is, metallic polish and thought comes and says, by Jove, how nice it would be to get into that car and drive. When thought uses sensation with its image, at that moment desire is born. Clear? Clear in the sense, see it for yourself, not the explanation the speaker is making. Right?

So the origin of desire begins when thought creates the image. Right? This is important, please, if you will kindly listen. Now we discipline desire, we control it, we shape it: this is right desire, this is wrong desire, this is a noble desire, holy desire and this is a worldly desire, ignoble desire, righteous desire and unrighteous desire. But desire is desire. Right? Whether you call it holy or unholy, it is still desire. So unless you understand the beginning of desire, then all the problem of control, suppression and so on arises. Whereas - if you will kindly listen to this - if there is an interval between the seeing, contact, sensation, an interval, then thought does not interfere, then thought does not say, how nice it would be to get into that car and drive. There is an interval, a gap between the sensation and the activity of thought interfering with that sensation. If you can extend that gap - do you understand what I am saying, don't look surprised. I will go into it again. Must one explain all these things. Can't you capture it instantly without innumerable words, intellectual explanations? Apparently you can't so we will have to go into it.

You see that new car, an object in front of you. Then you go up to it and touch it. Right? See how beautifully the chrome is polished, the new colour. Now that is one state. Right? The seeing, contact, sensation. Then thought comes along, creates the image, you sitting in that car and driving off. Right? At that moment when thought creates the image of you in the car, at that second desire is born. Right? See the fact, question the fact, doubt the fact, find out if this is true or not. Desire exists only where there is sensation. Right? And sensation becomes the instrument of thought. Right? Thought uses sensation, in the car. Right? Or thought says, I have had that experience which was tremendously pleasurable, I want more of it. Right? So what the speaker is saying is very simple, that's why you find it awfully difficult. What the speaker is saying is: sensation and thought with its imagination, keep them apart for a while. Do you understand? Look at the car with all the attraction, the sensation, and let there be an interval, a hiatus between thought and sensation - right? - not immediately act, act either physically or act intellectually. Do you understand the question? That means a sense of observation in which there is a certain quality of observation in which there is no attachment. Do you understand?

So we are asking is desire love? For most of us pleasure, desire is love. Don't get bored, don't yawn at this moment because it is rather an unpleasant moment for you. Do you love at all? Or love has become an exchange: you do this for me, I will do that for you. Is love reward and punishment? Do you understand? I am using ordinary English, simple language. That is, you train a dog by rewarding him, and punishing him when he does not do it. You must have dogs, you must have observed dogs, or you have your own dog; if you are training a dog, you reward, to heel, and then you pat him, or you punish him when he does not come, or do what you tell him. So he soon learns how to act according to your instructions, based on reward and punishment. And we are like that too. Right? I will do this if you give me that, that which is more pleasurable, I will do. If it hurts me I won't. The same principle. Do you understand? So I am asking, is love a reward or punishment business? Or has love nothing whatever to do with thought. If one has a wife or a husband, or a girl friend, which is the modern tradition, what place has love? Is love a remembrance? You don't ask these questions. Is love, I will give you this, you give me that, exchange, thought, dominance, attachment, possession, is that love? Or has love nothing whatsoever to do with me? Do you understand that? In love there is no me. Where there is love the self is not. That means no ambition. How can an ambitious man love, a man pursuing power, either politically, religiously, or the power over a person, how can he love? Do you understand all this? Don't say, no, you cannot because you are caught in that position. You don't seek power in any form: political power, religious power, the powers of books, the powers of the gurus, the power of a leader is ugly, evil, brutal, you don't see. You worship power. Don't you? That is why the capitalists exist, because all the politicians flower. We all want power, in one form or another. And therefore where there is power love goes by the window. And that is why the world is in such a fearful mess.

And love has its own intelligence. And where there is love that intelligence acts. It is not the intelligence of thought, not the intelligence of calculation, of remembrances, rewards. Intelligence, which we cannot go into it this evening, there is no time, intelligence is not the instrument of thought. So one has to enquire into what is intelligence. The word means, not only to read between the lines, but to gather information and use that information intellectually, physically and so on. That is the ordinary meaning of that word 'intelligence', in the dictionary, the root meaning, interlegere is to read between. But we are not talking about intelligence that everybody has. We are all very clever. We are all very learned. We know too much, but we are not intelligent. When you know, for example, that one of the causes of war, killing other human beings, is nationalism, tribalism. You know that very well, but you are still Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs, you know all the rest of it, so that, though you know the cause of war you perpetuate that war. That is the height of stupidity. And the people who are in power are that, all over the world.

So, my friends, you have heard, and if you have listened carefully to each other, which means to listen to yourself, not to the speaker. If you have listened to yourself, he is only a mirror in which you see yourself as you are. If you see yourself as you are then you can throw away the mirror, break it. The mirror is not important. It has no value. What has value is that you see clearly in that mirror yourself as you are, one's pettiness, one's narrowness, one's brutality, the anxieties, the fears and all the rest of it. When you begin to understand yourself then you go profoundly into something that is beyond all measure. But you must take the first step. And to take that first step nobody is going to help you. Now we have heard all these three talks. What are you going to do with it? Just carry on in the same old way, follow the same old pattern, callous, indifferent, unconcerned, except for yourself, and the brutality of all the world which we have created, because we are also very brutal people.

So, please, let us think together, consider together and face the facts, not run away from facts, then the doors open to clarity. Then you abolish altogether confusion, you think clearly, objectively and see its limitation. And when you see its limitation then you are asking, looking trying to discover a new instrument which is not thought - which we will go into if there is time. We are going to discuss, to talk over together the question of death which is very complex, the question of what is a religious mind and what is religion, what is meditation, if there is something really sacred, holy which is not touched by thought. We will consider all this, if we have time, tomorrow.

NEW DELHI 4TH PUBLIC TALK 13TH NOVEMBER, 1983

We ought to talk over many things this evening. If one may repeat again, we are thinking together, I'm not telling you what to do, or what to think. But rather that we are together walking a path that is beautiful, full of shade, love-birds and great tall trees and a lovely evening with the sun behind you, and the sunset is something most marvellous. And together we are walking down that lane full of quietness, great sense of beauty.

One wonders what is beauty. Have we ever considered that question at all. You may see some statue or a picture in a museum, or in a house, and you say, what a marvellous picture that is, that is really a lovely head of the Buddha, of some person. But behind the words, behind the structure of a painting, the shadows, the proportions, what is beauty? Is it in the way you look at it? Is it in the picture? Is it in the face of a person? When you see a marvellous mountain against a blue sky, with the great depth of valley and snow-capped peaks, when you look at all that great beauty, for a moment you have forgotten yourself. The mountain is so vast, so extraordinarily lighted by the morning sun, catching the highest peaks and your whole brain is struck by the grandeur, by the enormity of that sight and for a second you forget all about yourself, forget all about your worries, you forget your wife, your husband, your children, your country. And you look at that with all your being, and have a sense of contradiction, duality. It is there, its splendour. And the absence of the self, the 'me', is for a second put aside by the greatness of that beauty.

So this evening, to come down to earth, we are going to go together into the question of sorrow, of death. And we touched yesterday the quality of love, the perfume of it, the strength of it, the immensity of compassion with its great intelligence. And also we are going to talk over this evening, if we have time, what is the brain that perceives the true religious spirit, and what is meditation and if there is something which is utterly holy, sacred, not made by thought or put together for comfort. We are going to go into all this, if we can, this evening. They are really not separate things. Suffering, compassion, intelligence, the ending of sorrow and meditation and all that is one movement, totally related. They are not separate.

So can we look at all this, this human existence with all its problems, with all its confusion and misery, with its travail, with its endless poverty, both physical and the inward poverty? To look at all that as a total movement, not fragmented, not broken up, but as a whole, and therefore a way of living in which there is no contradiction, there is no duality, there is no opposition, a way of living that is entirely intrinsic, integral, whole. Is that possible? We will find it if we can look at ourselves, not as a dual movement of life, but a holistic way of living, which we will go into.

Sorry to make an introduction of this kind but as we entered the tent you look at that moon, very young, new, extraordinarily simple. And therefore one thought, what is the point of talking at all. What is the point of reading books, attending meetings, what is the point of all this existence when one cannot look at this simple thing clearly, with great love and affection, a simple thing, to approach life with all its complexity, simply, without all the accumulated knowledge of our past, our traditions; just to look at this vast movement of life, simply and a brain that is not burdened, a brain that is active, alive, full of energy, with clarity, simplicity.

Having said that, let us proceed together. We human beings have suffered a great deal. There have been incessant wars; historically speaking, for the last five thousand years there has been practically every year a war, human beings killing each other, destroying what they have built, great monuments being destroyed overnight. This has been the history of man, perpetual conflict, war. And through wars man has suffered enormously. How many people have shed tears, their sons, their husbands left maimed for life, one arm, no legs, blind. Man has shed tears endlessly. And we too are shedding tears, because our life is rather empty, lonely. And we suffer too, all of us, not only watching the suffering of others but also the grief, the pain, the anxiety of our own life, the poverty of people, not the poverty of the poor only but also the poverty of our own minds and hearts. And when we begin to discover this enormous poverty in spite of vast information and knowledge that breeds also great sorrow. There is the sorrow of loneliness, the sorrow brought about by inhumanity to man, the sorrow of losing your own friend, your son, your brother, your mother and so on. And we have carried this sorrow throughout our life for centuries upon centuries. And we have never asked if that sorrow can ever end. And we are asking now, together looking at this sorrow of the world and the sorrow in which one lives, in your own heart, in your own mind, in your own brain, and we are asking whether that sorrow can ever end. Or must man, including woman of course, always carry throughout the future and the past, can that sorrow ever end?

You know there is an art in questioning. Like there is an art in painting, an art in friendship, there is an art in love and so on, there is also an art in questioning, doubting, doubting one's own conclusions, one's own opinions, to question why we tolerate this vast burden of sorrow. Sorrow is both self-pity, sorrow is the feeling of utter loneliness, the sorrow that is brought about through great failures, through comparison the whole movement of feeling, the sense of lack of relationship to anybody. I am sure you would all say that at moments, but we never go to the very end of it. We would rather escape from it, seek some form of comfort, some form of a drug that gives us solace.

So, if we could, this evening, not escape, not try to find an answer, not whether sorrow can be conquered, but to be aware, to see the full meaning of that word `sorrow'. Sorrow also means from the original etymological meaning, passion, not lust, passion. And without passion life becomes rather dull, meaningless. And the ending of sorrow brings about passion. So together we are looking at this word, the content of that word, the significance of that thing called sorrow which man has carried throughout his life. To look at it, not to explain it away, not to find the cause. There are many causes of sorrow - that is fairly simple to find out, the causes of sorrow, the death of a son, the failure of not being successful, not being able to fulfil, having no identification and so on and so on. There are many causes for sorrow. But if you are enquiring into the causes of sorrow then you are also preventing yourself from looking at the word, the beauty, the strength of that word. So could we look at that word. Sorrow means grief, pain, anxiety, desperate loneliness, the meaninglessness of this existence. All that is contained in that word and more. So can you look at it wholly as you hold a precious jewel, a marvellous piece of sculpture, to hold it, to remain with it, and not in any way allow thought to come and interfere with that actuality. If you can so remain with that then that very word, the significance of that word is totally ended, but we never stay with anything. You always want to find an end and so we are always moving away from that very jewel that gives us great vitality, great strength, great passion. Are we walking together? Or are you merely listening to these words and getting emotional about it, romantic and therefore never looking at that thing, the pain of it, the grief, the emptiness of one's own being? If one can really completely hold that jewel, it is a great jewel, and man has tried to do everything he can to escape from it, volumes have been written about it, but the books, the explanations, the word, is not the actual. To remain with the actual, then that very attention brings an end to that thing which we call sorrow. Where there is sorrow there cannot be love. Love is not related to any activity of the human brain. Love is something that comes into being when there is no fear, when there is an end to sorrow, then that very love becomes compassion which is passion with its immense intelligence.

Also we ought to talk over together this evening the meaning of death. You are rather bored with all this, aren't you? I am bored with the explanation, because we never capture something quickly, instantly, have an insight into the whole nature of the human mind, brain, our heart, one depends on explanations, descriptions, what other people have said. And so we lose our own integrity, our own perception, insight to look at things as they are and go beyond them.

So we have to talk over together this question of death. To understand what is death, not only the physical organism coming to an end, the ending, the end of the heart beating, which then doesn't supply blood to the brain and the brain then decays. This whole organism, with wrong usage, accident, some disease comes to an end, whether we are very young or very old. And that we consider death. And also we never consider what is living - before rather than after. We are all going to die. That is one absolute certainty, whether you like it or not. We are all going to pop off, 'gathered to your fathers' to use the phrase in the Bible. And we human beings put that as far away as possible from us. And so there is duality: living and dying.

Have you ever considered what is duality? If duality as the opposite exists at all? Are we together in this? We have been brought up by tradition, by education, by the books that there is duality, contradiction, man and woman, anger and not being angry, violence and non-violence and so on. So we have divided the whole of life into duality. Right? Go into it please. Is there such a thing as duality, is there an opposite, psychologically? Of course there an opposite between man and woman, between daylight and darkness, sun-rise and sunset. You are tall, another is taller, somebody is fair and the other is not, one is more learned, the other is not. There is that physical duality, the opposites, dark hair, fair hair, the beautiful and the ugly. Now psychologically, inwardly, is there an opposite? Right? Your tradition says there is. Books have been written about it: it's only the liberated are free from duality - which is such utter nonsense. Sorry.

You and I can look at this problem very simply - simply, not with all the complications of philosophers. There is duality outwardly, but inwardly, psychologically, inside the skin there is only one thing: anger. And when you say, I must not be angry, it becomes duality - right - the ideal which thought has projected, thought has structured from the pain it has. Right? So there is only that fact, like violence is a fact, non-violence is non-fact. So why do we give such importance to non-fact which then becomes the dual, the opposite. Are you following all this? Give a little, if you are not too tired, give a little attention to what is being said, because we are caught in this ugly business of duality which means choice, to choose between the two.

So we are questioning, you and I whether there is an opposite, psychologically, in anything at all. There is violence. Right? You are angry, we hate, we dislike. That is a fact. But to invent a non-fact like non-violence, you must like people and so on and so on, is just unreal, therefore there is only the fact. And fact has no opposite. I wonder if you capture this. So when we live with fact then there is no conflict involved. Have you understood anything of this? Because our whole condition is based on duality: I am this, I must not be that; I am a coward, I must be brave; I am ignorant - ignorant not about books and all that - ignorant about myself, but I must learn this. We are caught up in this. And we are saying there is no opposite psychologically at all, actually. The opposite is structured, or put together by thought to escape from the actual: I am violent - that's actual - but I have been told, there have been great many people telling me that I must be non-violent. So the non-violent is totally unreal, because I am violent. But if I remain with the actuality then I can do something about it, or not do anything about it, not to pretend. To pursue the ideal of non-violence is just playing games with yourself. While you are pursuing violence you are actually violent - you can see it in this country, for god's sake. So we are saying there is no psychological opposite. There is only `what is'. And if you understand that then the conflict of duality, does it exist at all. Right?

So with that quality of brain that has understood this question of duality, let us look at what is called living and dying. Are you working as hard as the speaker? One wonders, you hear all this which are facts and probably you will do nothing about it. We are trying to eliminate altogether this whole conflict between `what is' and `what should be'. Then the brain is free and full of energy to face things as they are. Right? So there is the living and the dying - two opposites. Therefore to understand both, the living and the dying, one must approach this question non-dualistically. Right? Are we together in this or not? Yes or no? We will go on.

What is living, what do you call living? Going to the office from 9 o'clock in the morning to 5 o'clock in the evening every day of your life for the next sixty years, being bossed, being bullied and you bullying somebody else, or you are a businessman always wanting more and more and money, expanding, enterprise, power, chief executive - right? - go home and quarrel with your wife, sleep with her, beat her up verbally, or you may do it actually. And this goes on, constant struggle, constant conflict, the utter despair, hopelessness of it all. Right? This is what we call living, whether you live in America, an affluent society, where it is hectic, making money, becoming successful, you may one day become the President. And on the other hand there is the church trying to save you, save your soul - whatever that may mean - and you pray, worship and in your heart of hearts there is fear, despair, anxiety, grief. That is what you call living. This is actuality, isn't it? And you are frightened to leave that, because death is coming. One has so deeply identified with this, called living, taken roots in that and you are frightened to end all that. Right? And so you say next life. Next life is the continuity of the same old pattern, only perhaps in a different environment. If you believe in the next life then you must live rightly now - right? - morally, ethically, have some sense of humility - if you believe in the next life. But you really do not believe in the next life, you talk about it, you write volumes about it. But if you actually believe, in the sense, work, then you must live now rightly, because what you are now your future is what you are, your future will be the same, if you do not change now your future will be the same. This is logic. This is sane.

So for us death is total ending, the ending of your attachment - right?-ending all that you have collected. You cannot take it with you. You may like to have it until the last minute, but you cannot possibly take it with you. So please listen. So we have divided life into dying and living. And this division has brought about great fear. And out of that fear we invent all kinds of theories, very comforting, may be illusory, but it is very comforting, illusions are comfortable, neurotic. So is it possible, please I am asking you this question, is it possible, as we live, to die to things that we are attached to? Do you understand my question? I am attached to my reputation - God forbid - I am attached to it. And death is coming along, because I am getting older and I am frightened, because I am going to lose everything. So can I be totally free of the image, of the reputation that people have given me? Do you understand? So that you are dying as you are living. I wonder if you understand this? So the division between the living and dying is not miles apart, it is together. I wonder if you understand this please. And if you understand the great beauty of it that each day, or each second there is no accumulation, no psychological accumulation, you have to accumulate clothes with money and so on, that's a different matter, but psychologically there is no accumulation as knowledge, as attachment, saying, 'It's mine'. Will you do it? Will you actually do this thing so that this conflict between death and living with all its pain and fear and anxiety comes totally to an end, so that you are - the brain is incarnated? Do you understand? I wonder if you understand all this. The brain is being reborn afresh, so that it has tremendous freedom. The brain, according to the scientist, has the left side and the right side. The left side is the old, the traditional and the right part of the brain is the new which is capable of thinking new things and so on. So again division. We are saying, to act with the whole brain not with the divided brain. I won't go into that for the moment, because that will lead somewhere else. It is very interesting if you go into it, not speculatively, but actually with your own brain to find out whether the two divisions, the left and the right brain, which are acting differently, but simultaneously, totally, wholly, so the whole brain is active. So there is no old brain or the new brain. That requires a totally different approach. I won't go into that because we have other things to talk about.

So when living be with death, so that you are a guest in this world. Do you understand this, that you have no roots anywhere, that you have got a brain that is amazingly alive. Because if you carry all the burdens of yesterday your brain becomes mechanical, dull. If you leave all the memories, psychological memories, hurts, pains, leave them behind, leave them every day, then it means dying and living are together. In that there is no fear.

And what happens to the person who does not do any of this? Do you understand my question? A vast number of people here are not going to do a thing about it - I was going to say, nothing about it, but I won't. Not a thing about it, they listen, they nod, they shake their head, they say, marvellous, marvellous and do nothing about it. Then what happens to them? Please this is being said with great humility, with great compassion and affection. I hear this from you, a way of living, a totally different way of living, you have persuaded me, not only persuaded me but I see the logic of it, the sanity of it, the clarity of it. I see it intellectually, verbally I have accepted it. And I pursue my own way. I pursue my old ways, the ways of my life, to which I am accustomed. And I am going to die and I am frightened, as most people are frightened. So what is going to happen? Will I be reborn? Will my consciousness accept this way of life and perhaps next life it will have a better chance. Right? So, is my consciousness, which I have said 'mine', is that consciousness mine at all? Now please do not agree, or disagree, just look at it. Because that consciousness is the consciousness of humanity, because all human beings throughout the world go through great agony, sorrow, loneliness, despair, depression, they have faith, they have gods, like yours. So we share, each one of us shares this consciousness. So it is not yours. Please you may not accept it, I am sure you won't accept it, you should not, but you must question, you must question whether your consciousness is yours, your individual consciousness, or it is shared by all humanity. All humanity goes through what you are going through, in a different environment, in a different ambience, so you are not actually an individual. You may have a different body from another, you may have a better bank account. One may be lame, one may be healthy. But inwardly your being is shared by all the rest of humanity. Therefore you are humanity. I wonder if you see it, as it is a reality, it is not a fiction. So as long as you think you are an individual you are living in illusion, because your consciousness, your life is shared by everybody on this earth. They go to the office from morning till night, bullying, being bullied, gaining money, power and position, unhappy quarrelling, just like you. You may have more power, better position, there are also the others too. So your consciousness is shared by all humanity. And therefore you are not an individual psychologically.

So when you put this question, what is going to happen to me when I die, though I don't understand a word about what you are talking, your consciousness will continue, which is shared by all humanity. Right? You are following all this? And that consciousness manifests itself, through Mr Smith, through Mr somebody or other. And then he says. it is mine, I an individual, atman, soul and all that stuff.

So there is only a way of living which is totally different. Therefore you are no longer concerned with dying, but with living, living which contains, which moves with death. Do you understand? I leave it to you. If you don't understand, please don't deny it, find out, question, doubt, your own individuality. The Communists tried to wipe out individuality, making them think what the top people wanted them to think. You know all this, what is happening. But they have not wiped out the `me', the self, the ego, which wants power, position; they go to the office like you every day, they compete more than you do, because if you don't compete, and succeed, you become a labourer, a minor degree and so on. I won't go into it. So, it is possible to live a life psychologically in which there is never a continual recording? Do you understand? The ending of recording. Oh, you don't understand this. Say, you are flattered, or insulted, that is recorded. Now not to record flattery or insult. Right? That is to have a brain that is free, not burdened by a thousand records of a thousand days.

And we ought to talk over - we have got a quarter of an hour - we ought to talk over together what is religion. The word `religion' etymologically has no beginning. They do not know the beginning of that word, but we know what religion means, the religion which exists throughout the world, the Christian religion, the Hindu, the Muslim, the Buddhist and so on, that is, accepting a dogma, accepting some fantastic beliefs, some meaningless rituals, performed every day of your life. In the Christian Church it is very - when you go to the Roman Catholic, high cardinals performing the mass is a beautiful sight. But it is a ritual, repeat, repeat. And people like repetition, it gives them some kind of satisfaction, a sensation, a stimulation, an excitement. And you go to the temples the same way - your sacred temple and the un-sacred temples. Yours is more sacred than the other. You have your faith, your belief, your conditioning as a Hindu, as a Christian, as a Muslim, as a Buddhist. And this structure is called religion, both outwardly and inwardly. You believe god exists. You have never questioned it. If you do question it, as they have done, you are burnt, as the church did, tortured. But to ask what is god, to question, find out if god exists, are you willing to look at it. It is invented by thought. Don't be shocked. If you have no fear - right? - if you have no conflict, if you are living a life that is tremendously integral, whole, unbroken, then there is no place for god, because you yourself have understood the depth, the beauty of the universe. I won't go into all that. Because of our fear, because of our anxiety, our anomalies, we have invented this entity, god has not shaped us, we have shaped god. Right? We want somebody to protect us, an outside agency, somebody to save us from our daily monstrous and ugly life. And there are always saviours - your gurus is a saviour, but he too needs to be saved. So what is religion? If you banish all that, one must find out, one must doubt completely the whole thing, if you have the vitality, the strength, to wipe it out. But if you still cling to it, and say, please, tell me what you think, what you feel, it is like playing a game which has no meaning. So one must question, doubt, wipe away all the structure put together by thought, your scriptures, everything. Because they are the result of thought, the Bible, the Koran, your own Gita and so on. All of them are written down by thought, you say it is direct revelation, from the horse's mouth - sorry! But when you question all this, to find out what is the nature of a religious brain, religious mind, there must be freedom to enquire - if you have an hypothesis, it must be proved under a microscope, or under the clarity your own attention.

So to find out if there is something sacred. That is what the intention of all these structures are. But the intention is destroyed by the priests. If a human being, you, have the intention, the drive, the energy, the passion to find out if there is something sacred, holy. And to do that there must be no fear, there must be no sense of anxiety, there must be complete freedom, that is meditation. I am going into the word meditation in a moment.

What is meditation, not how to meditate. The moment you ask 'how to meditate' then there are a dozen systems, Zen, Buddhist, Tibetan, Hindu, Christian, you know a dozen systems tell you how to meditate. You can invent your own systems, control, suppress, concentrate. You know the whole game. Become aware. What does the word mean? The word, not what you give to that word. The word means to ponder over, to think over. And also that word means to measure. Right? To measure, that is to compare: I am this, but I will be that tomorrow. I am progressing. This is all measurement. So meditation can only be actual, truthful, honest, when there is no fear, no hurt, no anxiety, no sorrow. Otherwise, if you are frightened you can sit down and meditate for the rest of your life, standing on one foot or sitting in a certain posture. But as long as there is this root of fear how can you meditate? Do you understand what I am saying? We say, through meditation, first learn meditation and the other things will disappear. Right? Is that possible? Do you understand? Then if you learn how to meditate, which means learn a system of meditation, then you apply to your physical or psychological state. That means you have already determined, and through that determination, planning, action takes place and that you call meditation. Right?

So we are saying meditation can only take place when there is no conscious effort made to meditate. I am afraid it goes against everything you believe.

How do you come upon that which is sacred? Is there anything sacred? Man has sought throughout the ages something beyond. From the ancient Sumerians till now, from the ancient Egyptians, from the ancient Romans, they have always sought - is there? And they worshipped light, worshipped the sun, worshipped the tree, worshipped the mother, never finding anything. So can we together this evening discover, or rather, come upon that thing which is most holy? And that can only take place when there is absolute silence, when the brain is absolutely quiet. I do not want to go into the whole nature of the brain and all that, because the speaker is not an expert about the brain, he has talked with many brain specialists, with all their theories and so on. But one can discover for oneself if you are attentive, watchful, watchful of your words, meaning of the words, never saying one thing and doing another, if you are watchful all the time, you can find out for yourself that the brain has its own natural rhythm. But upon that natural rhythm thought has placed all kinds of things upon it. For us knowledge is tremendously important. To go to the office, to move from here to your house requires knowledge. To write a letter requires knowledge. To do anything physical requires knowledge, if you want to become a good carpenter you must study the wood, the tools, the grain, the quality of the wood and so on and so on. So knowledge becomes extraordinarily important. If you are an administrator of the government, knowledge is necessary. But psychological knowledge, the knowledge you have accumulated about your hurts, about your vanity, your arrogance, your ambition, all that knowledge is you. And with that knowledge we try to find out if there is anything most holy. You can never find out through knowledge, because knowledge is limited, it will always be, whether physical, technologically and psychologically. So the brain must be absolutely quiet, not through control, not through following some method, system, not cultivated silence. Silence implies space. I do not know if you have noticed how much space we have in our brain. It's cluttered up, full with so many thousands of things, it has very little space. And silence, space there must be because that which is measurable, that which is unnameable, cannot exist or be perceived or seen by a narrow little brain. They are trying, the astrophysicists, to understand the universe through the telescope. They are discovering the nature of Venus, Saturn, various gases and all the rest of it. But if you go, take a journey into yourself, emptying all the content which you have collected, go very, very deeply, then there is that vast space, that so-called emptiness, which is full of energy and in that state alone there is that which is most sacred, most holy.

Sorry to have kept you so long.

NEW YORK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 9TH APRIL 1983

This is not a lecture as is commonly understood; to inform or instruct. This is a dialogue between you and the speaker, a conversation in which you and the speaker are going to explore together the extraordinary problems that we are facing. We have to think together, which is quite arduous, because each one has his own particular opinion, his own values and judgements, experiences and so on, to which he clings to, obstinately, or willing to let go. And this is not a course an entertainment, not something you are told what to do, or be instructed in any way. But together you and the speaker are going to explore the extraordinary crisis, not only in the physical world, but in consciousness, in our way of life, in what we are doing.

One must consider together after forty five thousand years and more why human beings are what they are now. Together we are going to think, not the speaker thinks and then you listen, or wait for an answer from the speaker to your problems. But together we will investigate very carefully, in this very short time, why after perhaps thousands upon thousands of years we are what we are; violent, pursuing endlessly wars, conflict, confusion, uncertainty.

So please, if one may point out most respectfully that we are together going to find out the causes. And when one discovers the cause there is an end to the cause. So we are going to look, perceive together without any motive. Most of you, perhaps, have come here either out of curiosity, or to be intellectually entertained, or be stimulated. And one is afraid if you come with those intentions then we shall not be able to communicate with each other. You are facing very great issues, and to seek an immediate answer is rather futile. We must together explore the extraordinary complexity, the way of our thinking, why we behave in certain ways, and so on. So together let us think and find out.

(Settle down please. You are used to football, to be entertained, to be disturbed. But this is a very serious affair.)

What has brought us to this present condition? Is it thought? Is it mere accident? Is it man everlastingly must live in conflict? Seeing what is happening all over the world, the extraordinary advance in technology, in surgery, chemistry, and the biological experiments they are making in one direction, in one field, all that is going on. Medicine, surgery, going to the Moon, putting some silly flag up there. And psychologically, inwardly, we more or less remain as we have been for centuries upon centuries. There is advance in the field of technology, computers, way of communication, and so on. In the other direction, inwardly, we have hardly moved at all. We are more or less what we have been from the beginning of time: conflict, envy, brutality, violence, the state of anxiety, loneliness, despair, hopelessness, seeing that man cannot possibly change. Either one becomes very, very depressed, or tries to find a way out of all this. Is there a way out of all this? Please, we are thinking together, we are questioning together. The speaker may put it into words, but it is a conversation between you and the person who is speaking, a dialogue with two friends, serious, committed to find out.

Is there a way out of this at all? Politically all the world over, whatever problems they have, and the solution of those problems, there are a hundred other problems in the solution. There is a political division, ideological divisions, religious divisions, national divisions, and the divisions between man and man, between man and woman. These divisions, as the Hindu, the Buddhist, the Christian, and the Muslim, with all their sub divisions, wherever there is division there must be conflict. Wherever there are nationalities, the American, the Russian, the Chinese, and so on, there must inevitably be various forms of economic, social, military, political struggle. Perhaps most of us are aware of this. But we seem to be unable to do anything. We see that where there is division of any kind there must be conflict. The world is divided into nationalities, into racial divisions, colour, religious and so on. All these divisions exist, they are actual, they are not theoretical. And these divisions have brought about wars. Not a particular kind of war, the nuclear and so on, but wars. Apparently nobody is interested in stopping wars, nobody is interested apparently to find out the causes of war, and whether those causes can be totally, completely eliminated. Neither the politicians, nor the religious hierarchy, whether they be Catholic, Buddhist or Hindu, are interested in ending wars. They may talk endlessly about peace. But you cannot have peace if there is division, division as nationalities.

Who has brought about these divisions? Please, this is an important question, to find out for ourselves, not be instructed by the speaker, he is not a guru, thank god! We have to think very seriously, deeply, by asking who and what are the causes of this division, this endless division. Is it thought? Is it that thought, which has been necessary in the world of technology, in the world of surgery, and medicine, communication, where thought must be employed, and is it thought that has created this division? Thought has built marvellous cathedrals, great paintings, lovely poems, great literature, and so on. To find out for ourselves what is the cause, the basic cause, the fundamental cause, why humans have lived through centuries upon centuries divided, endless tribal wars - the American tribalism is called nationalism, it is still tribalism. And they apparently glory in their tribalism, as they all do all over the world. Glorified nationalism is still tribalism. Who has brought about all this misery, confusion, sorrow; and there is so little compassion, love. I hope - one hopes that you are asking the question: who is responsible for all this? Who has created this society in which we live, the immoral society, the society in which man has to work from morning until night, going to the office every day for the rest of his life, until he dies? His fears, his deep anxiety, the desperate struggle to become something, and the all consuming sorrow of mankind. You might ask that each one of us is responsible. Each one of us is responsible for what is going on in the entire world, because our consciousness, with all its reactions, is not your consciousness, or mine; it is the consciousness of the entire humanity. The entire humanity suffers. The entire humanity goes through great agonies of suspicion, of confusion, sorrow, fear, loneliness. All that every human being here, in this country, or in the far away countries, they all share that same anxiety and so on. Your consciousness is not yours. Your consciousness with all its content, your gods, your disbelief, your faiths, and so on, is common, the ground on which all human beings stand. So you actually, if one may point out very carefully, that you are not individuals. We like to think we are individuals because our consciousness, which is our heritage, tradition, the conditioning is shared by every human being living on this earth.

Please investigate it, don't reject it, but find out if one may ask, for yourself find out if this is true or false. If it is true then you will find out for yourself what you are, what the religions have said, what society has said. Everyone encourages this spirit of separation as the individual. And the individual is struggling against everybody else, for his happiness, for his success, to overcome his own obstacles and so on. Surely our consciousness, I hope we understand what we mean by our consciousness: all that we are, the name, the form, the qualities, the fears, the faith, the disbelief, the content of our consciousness is what we are. And that content is common, shared by all human beings. So it is not personal consciousness.

And that consciousness is the movement of thought. Thought is always limited because thought is the outcome of experience and knowledge, stored in the brain as memory. So knowledge is always incomplete about everything. That's a fact. All the scientists are always adding more and more and more. Our knowledge about your wife, or husband, is limited. You actually don't know your wife, or your husband. Your experiences are limited. So thought is always limited. That thought is shared by the greatest scientist, greatest philosopher, or by the most ignorant man who does not know how to read, he may live in a small hut far away from all so-called civilization. He thinks and so does the rich scientist. They may express their thinking in different ways, but they all think. So thinking is not individual thinking. All this may sound rather absurd, or irrational, but if you carefully examine without any bias, without any prejudice, or conclusion, you will see the actual truth of it: that your thinking is not yours, it is the thinking of all man, mankind.

So when one realizes that truth, that it is not your individual thinking, individual consciousness, then you are responsible, one is responsible for everything that is happening in this monstrous, ugly world. As long as each one of us is violent we are sharing the violence of all mankind. If we are envious, we are sharing all the complications of envy of every human being on this earth. And so on. This is a fact. It is not some speculative theory of the speaker. So thought is responsible for all this; for the technological advancement, for the glory of a great poem, or a great painting, and all the things that are contained in the cathedrals, in the churches, in the mosques, in the temples, they are all the result of thought. Thought has created god. I hope this is not too much of a shock to many of you. If you are really shocked, so much the better. But if you merely accept it as an intellectual statement, and go along with it, it will have no value. Words are merely a means of communication. Words, which are common between you and the speaker as English language, are a convenience of communication; but the word is not the thing. The word is not the actuality, the fact, nor the explanation, nor the description. But most of us are caught easily in descriptions and explanations and are satisfied with those. But if one goes into the matter very, very seriously, as one must, when we are facing such an extraordinary crisis, one must find out if thought, which is always limited, because all knowledge is limited. We have discussed this matter with a great many so-called scientists, philosophers. They admit that thought is limited. And so is knowledge. There are other scientists and philosophers who say, through knowledge man advances, ascends, Bronowski, and others. We are questioning that. Can that which is limited, because knowledge is limited which they admit, can there be advance, evolve through limitation? If thought is limited, its evolution will always be limited. Therefore whatever it does must create conflict.

I hope we are together in this, not merely intellectually, verbally, but actually. That we see together, perceive the actual truth that thought, which is the outcome of experience, knowledge, and knowledge and experience are always limited, therefore thought is ever limited. And what is limited must inevitably create conflict.

Thought has created all these problems; the problems of war, thought has divided human beings into different nationalities because thought said, perhaps there is security in a group, as in a family, and the greater community, the nation and so on. And in dividing human beings into nationalities, hoping to find security, it has brought about total insecurity, which is war, and all the diabolical inventions to kill human beings. Thought is responsible for this. There is no question about it, you can't argue against it. You can show what thought has done in surgery and so on and so on, in the technological world, but thought in human relationships is what we are talking about.

Thought has created these innumerable, intricate problems in our life. And thought having created the problems tries to find solutions to the problems it has created. Right? Are we together in this, somewhat? Thought has led us to the present condition. And our brains have been educated, trained, conditioned to solve problems. If you are an engineer, you have problems which must be solved. A scientist, he has problems, and he must solve those problems, mathematicians, or those who are guiding the Challenger and so on. We are trained from childhood to solve problems. Our brain has the capacity, is conditioned, trained to resolve problems. So we treat life as a problem to be solved. Please consider this.

And as thought has created the misery, the sorrow, the conflict among human beings with their separate ideologies, and these ideologies are the product of thought, whether it is the communist ideology, or the democratic ideology, or the dictatorship ideology, they are all the result of thought. Thought has created the problem, this present problem. And thought is being used to solve those problems. And you see what is happening: multiplication, deepening of problems. So when one realizes that, the actuality of it, the truth of it, then one asks, is there a different instrument other than thought? Please we are asking this very, very serious question. Is there a different kind of instrument rather than that instrument which we have used, which is thought, which apparently has found no answer to any of these problems? Are we aware of this fact, that thought has created the religious divisions; thought has created your saviour, and all the rituals, however beautiful they are. The speaker was once in Venice, and a Cardinal was performing a mass. It was the most beautiful thing one saw. It was a great sensation. And people were genuflecting, crossing themselves, it was great fun. Day after day, for some length of time, this went on. And that religion, not only the Christian religion, but the Hindu, the Buddhist, the Islam, have nothing whatsoever to do with our daily living. They are romantic, sentimental. And all that is the product of thought, the gods and all the circus that goes on in the name of religion.

So when you actually see the truth of it, then you begin to ask, and you can only ask this if there is tremendous doubt, scepticism, of all the things that thought has put together, not only your consciousness, your behaviour, your conclusions, your opinions, your values, which are all the activity and the movement of thought. One must doubt all that to find out the truth. But most of us are frightened to doubt because when we doubt there is great uncertainty. It evokes fear.

So we are asking, is there another instrument? Before we can investigate into that we must question also the whole problem of time. Time is a series of movements, both the outer, time by the watch, by daylight, sunlight, sun rising, sun setting, full moon and so on. To learn a language I must have time. To learn a skill one must have time. And psychologically time may be the enemy of man. The speaker is saying that, please don't accept it. Look, please consider it. Together we are looking into it. We have been told, and our tradition says, we must become something, not only in the outward world but also inwardly. The becoming implies time. We carry over from the becoming something in the world to the psychological field. I am this, but I will be that. I am violent but through time, which is evolution, there will be the end to violence, or become non-violent, which is absurd. Violence can never become non-violence. I know it is one of the catchwords which Tolstoy, and others in India, have propagated: that you are violent, human beings are violent, inherited from the animals, apes and so on, and gradually through time, which is evolution, he will become non-violent. Please see the importance of this. Evolution, which is the movement of time, time being a slow inward movement, that evolution through forty, fifty thousand years on this earth, has brought us to this state, to the present condition of what we are: jealous, envious, angry, violent, brutal, cynical, bitter, frightened. After forty thousand years or more, we are what we are through evolution. And we hope through evolution we will be changed. Which seems rather ridiculous. If evolution has not changed us now, will evolution ever change us? Please put these questions to yourself.

So one may ask: time may be the enemy of man, psychologically. There is no psychological evolution. If you and the speaker are the result of forty thousand years or more, and we have come to this peculiar state that we are in, will we, give me another forty thousand years, change? You understand the question? It seems so absurd, nonsensical. Which is, I am violent; through time, through evolution, I will be without any violence. And if I am eventually going to be non-violent, the end of violence, in the meantime I am violent. You understand?

So time, psychologically is the enemy of man. Thought is time. So thought which is a material process, and time is a series of movements from this to that, from here to there, psychologically, and they have brought man to this present condition, to the present condition of great pain and sorrow and passing pleasure. Time will not resolve it, nor thought. If this is very clear, not as verbal explanation, but an actual fact then only we can ask if there is a different instrument rather than that which we have used, which is thought. Like a good carpenter, like a good mechanic, he throws away something that has no longer any use. But we don't. We cling to it. We say, show me the other instrument, then I'll give up the other. And nobody is going to show it to you, including the speaker. Because this is a matter of great serious investigation. Because we all want to be helped. We are in sorrow, pain. If there is physical pain you go to the doctor, which is natural, necessary. But psychologically, inwardly, we want to be helped. And you have been helped. The priests have helped you for the last seven thousand years, as far as civilization is known. From the Sumerians there have been priests, the ancient Egyptians had priests, they told you what to do, as the modern psychologists tell you what to do. There isn't much difference. If you are in trouble you pay a hundred dollars, or more, for an hour, and trot along to the psychologist and he will promptly tell you what to do. Perhaps he will take three months, at a hundred dollars an hour. And we want to be helped. So we invent the guru, who says, "I know, follow me, I will tell you exactly what to do." And the dictators also have told us what to do. And the totalitarian states; the elite know and the layman doesn't know, any dissent, concentration camp, or psychological hospital. So we depend on others to help us. Please this is again a very serious matter. And there is nobody that will help you, psychologically. If one realizes that truth, that fact, because for the last million years, or long centuries, we have sought help and we have created the helper, including god.

Where there is disorder in our life, confusion, that very confusion and disorder creates the authority. There was at one time in Italy a great confusion, physically, trains were late, things were stolen. We were there. And Mussolini came along and created order. Out of our disorder we create the authority. We are responsible for the authority. And then we worship the authority, whether it be the Christian authority, and so on. Because we live in disorder, our lives are confused, uncertain, frightened. There is great sorrow in our life. We are always seeking help from another. And probably, I hope not, you are here for that reason too. There is no help from this person. When one realizes there is no help from outside, either from god, or the angels, the so-called evangelists of this extraordinary country, or the philosophers, the books, and the psychologists and so on, on which we all have depended, and all that dependence has led us to that misery. When one realizes that, that there is no outside authority to help us out, when one realizes that you may get depressed, which is another reaction. Or become hopeless. But such reactions are symptoms of our present day existence; we jump from one thing to the other.

So we have come to a point when you realize really, truly, actually, that time is a series of movements of thought, both are limited, they are similar, time is thought, and thought is limited. And that limitation has brought about this misery, this chaos in the world. When one comes to that point, not verbally, not merely intellectually, but deep down in one's heart and blood, it is not a conviction. You are not convinced that the sun rises and the sun sets, it is a fact. So time and thought are not the answer because they are limited. To come to that point requires great meditation, not just verbal acceptance, or intellectual conceit.

So now we must here ask if we have come to that point, that one is not seeking help from anyone to put our house in order. We have created the disorder in our house, and as human beings with some intelligence, we must put that house in order. If we do not, we create the authority, the authority dictates and creates more disorder. Are we together, treading the same road, going along together on the same path? If we have not, then we must stop and investigate where you have stopped, why we do not proceed further. You understand my question. This is said most respectfully. Do we realize how serious all this is. It is not a Saturday morning passing time, or tomorrow. It concerns our lives, what is the future of man, what is the future of your children. That is, the future tomorrow, that tomorrow extended for a thousand years. Are we responsible for our children, for the future of man? Not American man, not America, or your particular group, or your particular family, but the future of mankind, of which you are. If you separate yourself into families, small group, then that very limitation creates disorder. Please see advisedly this.

So one asks: what is the future of mankind? What is the future of each one of us? And for those who are responsible? Is it all a casual affair, send them off to schools to be educated, and that peculiar conditioning through education, to become soldiers. You understand? To become something or other. One has to earn a livelihood, which is becoming more and more difficult in an over populated world. Here in this affluent society, somewhat affluent, you don't know what poverty is. We have lived through it, from childhood we know what it is. And there are millions and millions who have hardly one meal a day. And when we are only concerned with ourselves, that concern, self-centred concern is limited, and therefore you are responsible for the misery of mankind. Each one of us. And one must ask where are we going, with the extraordinary technology, with the computer, the computer may take over our human thinking, it is doing that, almost, creating a robot. I hope you know what is happening, and what is going to happen to the human mind. We are programmed, our minds are programmed to be a Christian, to be a Hindu, to be this and to be that. And after being programmed for two thousand years as Christians, and Hindus for perhaps three to five thousand years, we repeat. Clever, cunning, destructive. So can a human mind be free from all those states of being programmed? You understand? That means freedom from conditioning.

Can the human condition, what we are now, can that human condition be changed, moved, broken? There are those who say they cannot, great philosophers, great writers have said this. They can only continue in their condition, modified. But if you have gone into it very deeply, it can be, the conditioning can be radically changed, otherwise there is no freedom for man, and he will everlastingly, endless in conflict.

If we may we will continue tomorrow.

NEW YORK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 10TH APRIL 1983

May we continue where we left off yesterday? We were talking, were we not, about the urgency of change. It is becoming more and more important, as one observes what is happening in the world, that human beings after millenia upon millenia have not fundamentally in any way, psychologically, changed. They have produced out of their psyche a very cruel society, a society that is immoral, brutal, violent. And in the twentieth century there have been tremendous advancements technologically. But we have changed very, very little, if at all.

And, as we said yesterday morning, we have been programmed. Our brains though they have extraordinary capacity, probably infinite capacity, which has been shown in the technological world what extraordinary things are being done. And in the psychological world if we could unprogramme ourselves we would then have, there, infinite capacity, the brain. I think most of the brain specialists who have gone into the question of the activity of the brain must inevitably ask if and when the brain can be unconditioned. Though it has its own rhythm, its own movement, but the self imposed conditioning, religiously, politically, economically, if the brain could uncondition itself then it has infinite capacity. Capacity is not merely the accumulated knowledge of experience. As we pointed out yesterday, such experience and knowledge is limited. And is it possible for us human beings who have been conditioned, programmed, definitely moulded in a certain pattern psychologically, is it possible to radically, fundamentally bring about a change?

And that change must be urgent. As we pointed out yesterday, time is an enemy of man. Time as evolution. We have evolved for the last, according to scientists, biologists and so on, forty, fifty thousand years, we have evolved, our brain has grown. But during those forty thousands years psychologically we have remained more or less the same. It is a fact. This is not a pet theory of the speaker. He has no theories, he has no belief, no conclusion. But if one observes very, very carefully, quite impersonally, these are obvious facts. And is it possible, one must ask oneself this question if one is at all serious, and the present crisis demands that we human beings be terribly serious, frighteningly serious, committed to the enquiry of the urgency of change. Which implies, whether it is possible for the whole content of our consciousness, which has been put together there by thought, thought itself being limited, and therefore our consciousness is equally limited, and therefore conditioned. What is limited must invariably bring about division, conflict. And we ask in all seriousness whether that brain which has been programmed for, according to the Christians, if you believe in all that stuff, four thousand years ago, which is rather incredible, and according to the scientists and biologists, perhaps forty, fifty thousand years.

One wonders if one is aware entirely of the present state of the world, and our relationship to the world. And is our relationship different to the world and to the family, to the small unit of the community, however large that community be?

As we said yesterday, if one may remind each of us, that this is not an entertainment, you are not being stimulated, you are not being told what to do, or an exotic philosophy from India or from the Far East. We have gone beyond all that kind of nonsense. There is no eastern thought and western thought, there is only thinking; thinking that can be expressed in eastern terminology, and western philosophy, but it is still thinking. And this thought, being limited, and all the content of our consciousness is put there by thought. And in the enquiry whether it is possible to bring about the urgency of change, one must look into our consciousness. That's what we are. Into our psyche. Not analytically because that takes time. The analyser and the analysed. I hope we are following each other. As we said, this is a dialogue between two friends, without any conclusions, without any belief or bias, but having a friendly dialogue, serious and deeply committed to the discovery whether it is possible for human beings, which is both of us, to be totally free from the conditioning which thought has brought about.

So we are enquiring together into the nature of ourselves, what we are. Not according to any psychologist or philosopher, or what the ancient Greeks, or Hindus have said about what you are; but examining actually what we are now.

Our psyche, which is the consciousness, the awareness of our consciousness, and we are enquiring into the content of it. The content is what we are: our beliefs, our experiences, our faith, doubt, questioning, desires, superstitions, fears, pleasures, and the great agony of loneliness, suffering, and what we call love, which has become merely sexuality, sensory pleasures. And the religious enquiry, if there is something beyond all the manifestations of thought, if there is something utterly untouched by thought, something sacred, holy, which doesn't belong to any religion. All that is our consciousness, is our psyche, is what we are. And our consciousness is limited, and we have made that consciousness as the individual consciousness, my consciousness and yours. And so where there is this division, this limitation as the individual there must be conflict, which is so rampant in the world at the present time. So there is man against man, ideologies against ideologies, my country, my god, and your country and your god; each conclusion opposing other conclusions. This is the whole content of our consciousness, our psyche. That's what we are. Again, this is an indisputable fact. It is not that the speaker is telling you what it is. If you enquire into it quietly, unbiased, deeply, this is what you are, with your name, with your particular form, female or male, your bank account, if you have one - fortunately we have not. And this is our life; conflict from the moment we are born until we die, the fear of death, the fear of living, the fear what lies beyond.

So we are asking whether there can be a fundamental change in this content. I hope we are thinking together, knowing our thinking is limited. That we are communicating with each other not only verbally but much deeper. Because otherwise there is no communication at all, then it becomes a series of ideas, a stupid lecture without any significance. And it would be a waste of your time and of the speaker's. So please we are together going into this matter: the urgency of change.

There are those who say it is not possible, man will always be conditioned. Volumes have been written about it by specialists. You are conditioned and you will always be conditioned, and modify that conditioning, put up with it and do the best you can, making the best of it. And the speaker says this conditioning can be totally, radically changed, not modified. If one has talked or discussed or read what the specialists say about the conditioning, and living in that conditioning, modifying it, if you have read it, if you have enquired into it, please listen to what the speaker has to say, what you and the speaker are enquiring into together. We have to find the truth of the matter, not the opinions of the experts. I do not know if one is aware that we are becoming slaves to experts; not to the experts of medicines, doctors, surgeons and the specialists in computers and so on, but the specialists who tell you what we are, how you should behave and so on. We are gradually becoming overwhelmed by the specialists. And here the speaker is not a specialist, he has no profession. This isn't a job he is doing for personal achievement or entertainment. This is a very serious matter. And so we are together, always please remember that we are together enquiring into this. We are not asserting any authority, any specialized knowledge. But walking together, perhaps hand in hand as two friends, along the same path, the same narrow road of enquiry.

It is your responsibility to enquire, not just follow what the speaker is saying. That means one's brain must be active. And it is very difficult when one is tired - I hope you have all had a good night, fresh, not weary, so we can walk rapidly, because we have limited time, through the content of our consciousness and see whether it is possible to be free from all the misery, confusion and the agony of living.

So briefly we are going to go into it step by step. First we must enquire into our relationship, however limited, however intimate, the relationship between man and woman, between the parents and the children, and our relationship to the world. Because relationship is very important, relationship is life. Without relationship no man can exist. Even the most exclusive hermit, he is related to the world, and all the monks and the sannyasis of the world have relationships. So we must begin with the enquiry into our relationship with each other. Are we related at all when each person is pursuing his own desire, his own ambition, his own fulfillment, his own success? The man and woman who are doing each separately the same thing, each wanting to fulfil, to become in his own way, how can there be relationship at all? Like two parallel lines running, never meeting, perhaps for sensuality purposes, but otherwise apparently in this world the divisions are so deep between man and woman, psychologically they hardly ever meet at that level. And is it possible to meet, not merely sexually, but to have deep relationship with each other? Which means no separation at all. Please, this is a very serious enquiry and don't just accept the words, and twist the words to suit your own particular way of thinking.

Can human beings, man and woman, without each one forming an image about the other, can they live together, with the world? That is, the world of the two individuals with their problems, with their whole being, meet together. That's only possible when each one doesn't make an image about the other. And what place has love in this relationship? Is there love at all? Or merely that love which is called sensual pleasure? Please, you are enquiring with the speaker. Is love desire? Is love pleasure? And if there is love, then what is the quality and the nature of that word, the significance of that word, the holding of that word in your heart and your mind to find out the depth of that word? Do we ever hold a word like that, like suffering, loneliness, anxiety and so on, do we ever live with a word, see the depth of it, the beauty of it, the energy of that word? To learn about that word means to look at it, to feel it, to go into it. And is it possible to have a relationship in which there is no conflict whatsoever? And that is possible when there is no thought building the image about the other, about each other. That means being aware, attentive, diligent. And love has that quality.

And is love desire? And what is desire? Please, if I explain the movement of desire, if the speaker goes into it, you are going into it too, not merely accepting the words and agreeing or disagreeing. We are moving together, enquiring together. So what is desire? How does desire arise? And desire then becomes so potent, so driving, astonishingly powerful. All commercialism is based on it; to acquire more, more, more, desire. So what is desire? We will go into it together, though the speaker will point out, but we are learning together about it. I do not know if you have ever enquired into the nature of learning, what it is to learn. May we go into it? All this is not boring to you? Even though you may be familiar, some of you may have read what the speaker has said before, which would be unfortunate if that remains merely as a memory. But if you could enquire into the nature of desire.

The speaker is enquiring, and so please what he says, question, doubt, be sceptical, strong, when you are enquiring. Surely desire is a movement of time. When does desire begin, what is the origin of desire? First there is sensation: seeing, contact, sensation. You see a beautiful picture, touch it, then from that seeing, touching, there is sensation. That's a natural, healthy reaction, the sensation. Then thought creates the image of you having that picture in your house, in your room. At that moment when thought shapes the sensation by its image, at that second begins desire. Please see this for yourself, not accept what the speaker is saying, he has no authority, he is not a specialist, a guru; he has a horror of all that. So please see this for yourself, discover it: that where there is perceiving, seeing, visual, then contact, touching, smelling and so on, out of that arises sensation. Then thought creates the image and at that second desire arises.

So one asks, can there be a hiatus, a gap, between sensation and the moment when thought creates the image? The awareness of that intrusion of thought requires great attention. You are following all this? You know, we have all been taught to discipline ourselves, to control ourselves. The word 'discipline' means, the etymological meaning arises from the word disciple. The disciple is one who learns, not who imitates, not who conforms, but is one who is learning. And if we are learning together there is no teacher and the taught. Then you are both the teacher and the disciple. I don't know if you are following all this, if it interests you.

So one has to learn the nature of desire. As one learns one begins to understand how desire is born, and be attentive to that movement, not controlling, suppressing or fulfilling, but be in a state of learning. Obviously desire is not love, it can never be. But we have translated in the modern world that love to mean pleasure and sensation, sensuality.

And in enquiring into the nature of love, what it is, we must also look into the content of our consciousness, which is fear, part of that consciousness is fear. We are all afraid of something or other: from this smallest to the greatest, from losing a job, from being lonely, from growing old and dying, from not becoming somebody in this beastly world. There's fear of losing, and the fear of gaining. Everybody in the world from the poorest to the most highly educated, sophisticated human being knows what fear is. You know it, don't you? It is nothing new to you. And what fear does to each one of us. We may have our own pet fear, and we want our particular fear to be solved. But if we understand not the particular fear, but what is fear, in the larger the lesser is included. The lesser is my particular fear, or your particular fear, but if we understand the root of fear, the cause of fear, not how to resolve fear, but in the understanding and the learning of what causes fear, then if you are serious and committed to the understanding and learning about fear, giving your time and energy to find out, then there is an ending to fear completely, not relatively, not for the moment, but the total complete abnegation of that fear.

So we will go into it, and I hope there will be time for other things too, because life is very complex. We ought to discuss what is pleasure, what is sorrow, what is the meaning of death, what is meditation, and if there is something that is beyond all time. All this within an hour! So we will have to go into all this only very briefly, succinctly, hoping that each one of us understands.

So we are enquiring what is the root of fear, not a particular fear but the root of all fear. The root of fear is time: what I will be, what I have been, what I might not be. Time is the past, the present and the future. The past modifying itself in the present and continuing in the future. Fear of something that has happened psychologically, or physically, last week, or last year, and hoping that it will not continue in the future. So time is a factor of fear. The poor man, fear of not being able to find the next meal. You don't know all that. The fear of having no home, no shelter, no food. And the effect of fear, both on the physical organism, and on the psychological, on the psyche, and the very psyche may be made up of fear. Please understand that. The psyche, what you are, may be the result of fear. And probably is. So it is important to understand the depth and the meaning of fear. And that is time and thought. Time as the future, I might die, I might lose, I might be nobody, I am somebody now - which I doubt - but I want to be somebody in the future, the next day and so on. So time and thought are the root of fear.

We went into the question of thought, limited, and therefore one must ask a much more serious question: whether time and thought has a stop. Not fictional, scientific fictional time and thought, but actual thought and time. When we discuss, if we have time, meditation, we shall be able to find that out. Meditation is not all the silly nonsense that is going around, imported by the fantastic gurus, with their nonsensical systems and all that. But to enquire into the ending of time and thought, because as long as those two have movement fear will exist. Fear is related to pleasure. To have an amusing evening, or tomorrow, which is time, thought is already looking forward to some exciting pleasure, and that thinking about that particular form invokes fear, pleasure. So time and thought are related to fear and pleasure. We are not suppressing fear, or overcoming fear, or escaping from fear and pleasure, but understanding, learning the depth of it. When one understands, not intellectually, verbally or ideationally, or theoretically, but by watching, diligently, every movement of thought, not letting one thought escape from the awareness, then you begin to perceive - then there is the perception of the nature of fear and pleasure.

We have very little time, we must go on to the next thing, which is sorrow. Why man throughout the ages, from time beyond measure, why man has suffered, and is still suffering after so many centuries of existence. What is suffering? Why do we tolerate it, why do we carry it in our heart, in the recesses of our mind, why? We have had two terrible wars in this century, in this last hundred years, terrible wars, brutal. You have seen all the horrible pictures, soldiers being decorated, heroes for killing so many; and imagine, or aware of how many women and men have cried, maimed, and been decorated by some silly people for killing others. That is the sorrow of the world. Are we responsible for this sorrow of the world? Of course we are, there is no question about it. As long as we are nationalistic, separatist, tribal, economically, socially, and religiously, we are responsible for these wars, for the killing of millions of people. Probably the Christians have killed more than anybody else. There is only one religion that has more or less avoided killing; first Buddhism, and Hinduism - not recently - and this is what religions have done to us. The religious people from the highest authority of the church talks about everlasting peace. But they never stop talking and say we will excommunicate anybody who indulges in killing another.

So there is sorrow of the world. Then there is this sorrow of each one. Losing somebody through death, and in the loss of that person suddenly becoming aware of one's own terrible incalculable loneliness, shedding tears and so on. One cannot avoid sorrow. It is there. One may seek comfort, and that comfort is so shallow, meaningless, because after a little comfort and the passing of that comfort, sorrow is still there. We all know this. And is there an end to sorrow? Or man is destined, it is his nature, his condition, that he must suffer endlessly? The Christians try to avoid it by saying, one figure has suffered for you and you perhaps will suffer less. But that has been meaningless too. Then there is the whole world of Hinduism with all their explanations of sorrow, karma and so on. I won't go into all that.

So is there an ending to sorrow? That is, is there an ending to self-centred activity. You understand? It is this self-centred activity that has brought about sorrow, not only outwardly, but inwardly. As long as the content of our consciousness is not diligently explored and broken down, there must be sorrow. There is no avoiding it, or escaping it, it is there. Therefore it behoves us, if we are at all serious, that the ending of sorrow is far more important than the pursuit of pleasure, which the world is committed to. This vast entertainment industry, which is spreading all over the world, sports, entertainment, it is taking further and further away each one of us from ourselves. And computers are doing that too. We won't go into that too for the moment.

So unless we understand what we are, what is our actual state, and to question whether it is possible to change it. I will go into that briefly because there is no time, we are limited, we have to discuss death and meditation.

Take sorrow, you know what it means. You look at it, you feel it, you shed tears, become aware of the deep loneliness of one's life. And that brings about sorrow. We never stay with the feeling of that loneliness. Is that loneliness - please follow this for a minute, give your attention, if you will - is that loneliness separate from you? Or you are that loneliness? You see the difference? You see the question? I suffer, and that suffering reveals that I am really an extraordinary lonely person, that loneliness brought about by my self-centred activity, by my asserting, aggressive individualism; that I see as though something different from me. But is that loneliness separate from me, or the very loneliness is me? You understand all this? Are we together in this, a little? When you are greedy, envious, is that envy different from you? Or you are envy? Of course. But when there is a division between envy and you, then you do something about envy, control it, shape it, yield to it, and so on. So where there is division between you and the quality, there must be conflict. Clear? But the actuality is you are envy. That is a fact. You are not separate from envy. You are not separate from your face, from your name, from your bank account, from your values, from your experience, from your knowledge. You are all that. So when one realizes this truth, that you are not separate from that which you feel, which you desire, which you want, which you pursue, which you fear, there is no conflict. Therefore you stay with that. You understand? When you have conflict with envy, you are trying to avoid it, trying to suppress it, trying to do something about it. Here if you are envy, if you are grief, if you are sorrow, you stay with it. You understand? You don't move away from it, you are that. Therefore you have tremendous energy to look at it. You are following? There is a wastage of energy when you suppress, analyse, escape, or try to find a way out of it. That is a wastage of energy. But when you see that you are that, there is no division between that suffering, that loneliness and you, you stay with it. You stay with it like when you hold a precious jewel in your hand. I don't know if you have ever held something very beautiful in your hands. If you have, you stay with it. You look at it, you watch it, you play with it. You understand? There is such a sense of release, freedom.

We ought to enquire quickly into what is death. Why human beings from generation after generation, from the ancient people to modern times, why they have feared death. Why we have separated living from dying. Is it not far more important to enquire before, not after? That is, before dying, is it not much more important to enquire what is living? Isn't it? Not what is death, we will come to that. But isn't it far more urgent, important to see what is it we call living. You can answer perhaps better than I can. What is living? Endless struggle, conflict, work, labour, all the rest of your life. From 9 o'clock to 5 o'clock in the factory, in the office, earning money - we are not saying you shouldn't, please. Battle, sorrow, pain, this is what we call living, with pleasure, excitement, imagination, hoping, living in a great turmoil. And when death comes along, that is the end of it. Your bank account, your friends, everything comes to an end. You understand? And there are those in the Asiatic world who believe that there is a life after death, a life of what you have lived now, continued in the next life. You understand? So you keep going until eventually - it is called evolution - eventually you are freed from this turmoil. You follow? That's what they believe in. And if they really believed it in life, actually, they would change now, not ten years later, or the next life. But to change means disturbance, and they don't want to be disturbed, like you. So we carry on.

So what does death mean? The ending of things we have remembered, which we have now, and the hope of something in the future. A great confusion, turmoil, sorrow. This is our life. And death comes and says, all this will end. So is it possible - please listen if you are interested - is it possible, take for example one thing, attachment. You are attached to a person, to an idea, to a conclusion, to a belief, to some imaginative, romantic pictures, you are attached to it. And death says, it's over, you can't be attached any more, it is finished. So while you are living can attachment end? You follow what I am saying? You understand? Which is death. I am attached now to my experience, to my knowledge, to my wife, husband, children, to the various conclusions I have, I am attached to it. And in that attachment there is fear, jealousy, anxiety, all that. And when death comes there is a break, there is an ending. So can I knowing this, being aware of the whole nature of attachment, can there be freedom from attachment, now, living? So if there is an end I am living with life and death together. You understand? Are we following each other, a little bit? There is no separation from living and dying. There is great beauty in that. There is great truth in it. Not some romantic nonsense. So the brain then becomes more free. And then it has infinite capacity, infinite energy.

Then we ought to talk about what is religion. What is religion? Again man has sought something that is not of this world. From the most ancient of people, until now, man has sought something that time, thought, has nothing to do with that. He has sought it. And in his search he has been trapped by the priests. The priests of the world, who become the interpreters of that - we know, you don't, we will tell you all about it. And the established religions are just nonsense - please don't accept this. For the speaker they are just entertainment, excitement, the thing to do for a while. If you are young you avoid all that nonsense, as you grow older you get frightened and you become this, or that. And all the things that are in the churches, temples, mosques, are put together by thought. God is an invention of thought. So if we can scrap all that from our brain, from our belief, from our hope, then we are free to enquire what is religion. Etymologically that word has not an exact beginning, it is not to bind, as was originally thought.

So we are enquiring into what is the religious mind. Not the believing mind, that is very simple, very easy to explain. But the religious mind, because the religious mind alone can create a new culture; not the believing mind, not the mind that has faith. So we are going to enquire into it, if you are not tired.
