To enquire into it very deeply one must ask what is meditation. Not how to meditate, not what are the systems of meditation, whether Eastern, Far Eastern, Near East, or the present gurus, gurus from India, or gurus from America, they have got systems, methods, which have all become money making concerns. It has no depth to it. So you can abolish all that, put aside all that. That means you are free from all authority to enquire what is meditation? To go into it one must be, as we said, be free from fear, pleasure. The ending of sorrow is the beginning of meditation. In meditation there is no motive. Please understand this. There is no motive to achieve, to arrive, to become illumined, or find illumination. All that is not meditation. Meditation means to have no measure. To have measure means time. Please understand all this. When you have measure, which is comparison - I am this, I will be that, or I'll have more, the better, the words 'the more, the better', the measurement, has completely come to an end in meditation, it must do. There is no motive, or the will to meditate.

But meditation implies a mind, a brain that is freed from the pain of existence. That's the beginning of it. And meditation means attention, to attend, not that you attend. I don't know if you have gone into this question of attention. If you have, when you attend, when you give your attention to something, there is no centre from which you are attending. Right? Have you ever done this? Just watch, when you attend, music, for example, when you go to a concert, not the modern noise, when you go to hear Mozart, or Beethoven, or Bach, when you listen attentively, in that attention there is no you attending. You are listening. Not that you are listening, there is only the act of listening. So where there is attention there is no centre which is the self, the 'me', the psyche. That is meditation, to attend so completely and diligently there is nothing of negligence, then there is the beginning, the real depth of meditation. For in that there is no measure, no time, no thought. And out of that, or in that, there is deep abiding silence. That means the brain is utterly quiet, not chattering. The brain has its own rhythm, let it act out of itself, but not the self imposing, thought imposing something on the brain. The whole structure, the organism, and the mind are utterly quiet. I don't know if it has ever happened to you. It may happen occasionally when you are walking in a beautiful lane, in a wood of trees and birds and flowers, and the beauty of a sunset, or a morning dawn, then for a second or two you are quiet, breathless, watching the beauty of the world. But that is external.

But when the brain is quiet, though it has its own activity, quiet in the sense thought is not functioning, so time and thought come to an end where there is deep attention. And then in that silence, which is not the man-made silence, silence has no cause, then in that silence there is that which is nameless, which is beyond all time. Such a mind is a religious mind. And it is only such minds can bring about a new culture, a new society. And because that is eternal it has immense significance in life.

May I get up now? Please don't clap. If it entertains you, clap. But you are not entertained. It is a waste of energy. May I get up please?

OJAI CONVERSATION WITH JONAS SALK 27TH MARCH, 1983

K: ...not the atomic war or conventional war, but it is man against man.

JS: Yes. I am sure you must have an opinion about that.

K: I don't know if I have an opinion. I have observed a great deal. I have talked to a great many people in my life, and there are very, very few who really are concerned.

JS: What would you like to talk about?

K: What shall we talk about?

JS: I'd like you to tell me what is your deepest interest, your deepest concern.

K: It is rather difficult to put it into words, isn't it, for the cinema?

JS: Yes.

K: But I think, seeing what the world is becoming, I think any serious man must be concerned about the future, what is going to happen to mankind.

JS: Yes.

K: Especially if one has children, what is their future? Are they going to repeat the same old pattern, which human beings have been doing for a million years, or more or less. Or is there going to be a fundamental change in their psyche, in their whole consciousness? That is really the question, whether it is - not the atomic war or conventional war, but it is man against man.

JS: Yes. I am sure you must have an opinion about that.

K: I don't know if I have an opinion, I have observed a great deal, I have talked to a great many people in my life, and there are very, very few who really are concerned, committed to something to discover if there is a different way of living, a global relationship, global inter-communication, not merely stumble over language; not the religious and political divisions and all that nonsense, but really find out if we can live on this earth peacefully, without killing each other endlessly. I think that is the real issue we are facing now. And we think the crisis is outside of us; it is in us.

JS: It is in us.

K: The crisis is in our consciousness.

JS: There is an expression that comes from a cartoonist, Pogo, who says that we have met the enemy, the enemy is us.

K: Yes.

JS: And so what you are saying is that we have now come face to face with ourselves.

K: Yes, with ourselves and with our relationship to the world, both externally and inwardly.

JS: So that the fundamental issue with which we are confronted is relationship; relationship to ourselves and relationship to each other, and I might even go so far as to say to the world and to the cosmos.

K: Yes, sir.

JS: We are really confronted with that eternal question of the meaning of our lives.

K: The meaning of our lives, yes, that's right. Either we give a meaning to our life intellectually, fix a goal and work towards that, which becomes so artificial, unnatural. Or understand the whole structure of ourselves. I feel now, we have advanced so extraordinarily technologically, it's fantastic what they are doing, as you know, but in the other field, in the psychological field we have hardly moved. We are what we have been for the last umpteen years.

JS: Even at the point of having developed what we call artificial intelligence.

K: The computer and so on.

JS: Computers and such devices, and are beginning to focus our attention on how we use this artificial intelligence without recognizing the need that we have to learn how to use our own natural intelligence.

K: Sir, have we natural intelligence, or have we destroyed it?

JS: It's innate, and we destroy it in each individual as they come along. I think we are born with that natural intelligence, but I sometimes think...

K: I really would like to question that, whether we are born with natural intelligence.

JS: We are born with the capacity, with the potential for that, in the same way that we are born with the capacity for language.

K: Yes.

JS: But then it must be exercised, it must be activated, it must be brought out in the course of life's experiences. And it is for this reason that we really have a need to understand what I like to think of as the conditions and circumstances for evoking that potential.

K: As long as we are conditioned...

J: ...we are always conditionable. That's in our nature.

K: But is it possible to uncondition ourselves, or must it go on?

JS: Are you asking, is it possible to uncondition the individual who has become conditioned?

K: The individual who becomes conditioned by society, by language, by the climate, by literature, by newspapers, by everything he has been shaped, impressed, and influenced, and whether this conditioning - whether he can ever step out of it.

JS: With great difficulty, because it does have a tendency to become fixed, and it is for this reason that we must give attention to the young, to each new generation that are brought into a new context, and are shaped by that context, shaped by those circumstances. We have an opportunity with new and as yet unshaped, unformed minds to influence them in a healthier fashion.

K: One has had, if I may speak about it, lots of young people, thousands of them one has come into contact with. From the age of five to twelve they seem intelligent, curious, awake, full of energy and vitality and beauty. After that age the parents are responsible for it, society, newspapers, their own friends, the family, the whole thing seems to drown them, make them so ugly, vicious, you know the whole human race has become like that. So is it possible to educate them differently?

JS: I think so. I have said in something I wrote not so long ago, that we are in need of an immunizing education. The analogy that I am using is of immunizing against a crippling disease.

K: A crippling disease.

JS: In this instance I have in mind the crippling of the mind, not merely the crippling of the body. And I believe...

K: Could we go into that a little bit. What cripples the mind basically, not superficially of course? Basically, if I may ask, is it knowledge?

JS: Wrong knowledge.

K: Knowledge, I am using the word knowledge whether it is right or wrong, but knowledge, psychological knowledge, apart from the academic knowledge, scientific knowledge, the technological of the computer and so on, leaving all that aside, has man inwardly been helped by knowledge?

JS: Are you referring to the kind of knowledge that comes from experience?

K: The whole question of knowledge. Knowledge is after all the gathering of experience.

JS: I see two kinds of knowledge: I see the organized body of knowledge that comes, let us say, through science; and I see the kind of knowledge that comes through human experience.

K: Human experience: just take human experience. We have had probably over seven thousand years, wars.

JS: Yes.

K: And wars now - in the old days you killed by an arrow or a club, two or three people or a hundred people at the most, now you kill by the million.

JS: Much more efficiently.

K: Much more efficiently. You are up in the air and you don't know whom you are killing. It might be your own family, your own friends. So has that experience of ten thousand years of war, or five thousand years of war, has that experience taught man anything about not killing?

JS: Well, it has taught me something. I see no sense in it, and there are others who share that view, growing numbers, there are growing numbers of people who are becoming conscious and aware of that absurd kind of behaviour.

K: After ten thousand years! You follow me?

JS: I follow you.

K: We must question whether there is a learning at all. Or just wandering blindly. If after ten thousand years, or less or more, human beings haven't learnt a very simple thing: don't kill somebody, for god's sake, you are killing yourself, you are killing your future. And that hasn't been learnt.

JS: It has been learnt by some, but not by all.

K: Of course there are exceptions. Let's leave the exceptions. Exceptions will always be there, fortunately.

JS: Fortunately.

K: Fortunately.

JS: It's a very important point.

K: But the majority who vote for war, for the presidents, for prime ministers, and all the rest of it, they haven't learnt a thing, they will destroy us.

JS: If we let them.

K: It is happening.

JS: The ultimate destruction has not happened yet. You are quite right, but we must become conscious and aware of that new danger. And something must arise within us now.

K: Sir, I would like to go into this because I am questioning whether experience has taught man anything, except to be more brutal, more selfish, more self-centred, more concerned with himself and his little group, with his little family, with his little... The tribal consciousness which has become national consciousness, glorified, and that is destroying us. So if ten thousand years, more or less, has not taught man, don't kill, there is something wrong.

JS: I'd like to offer a suggestion, a way of looking at this problem, at this question. I'd like to look at it from an evolutionary point of view, and speculate that we are evolving through a period of time, in which the exception to which you referred earlier may some day become the rule. Now how might this happen? It has to happen or else there will be nothing to speak about after the event.

K: Of course.

JS: Therefore we are confronting a crisis now.

K: That's what we said.

JS: That crisis is imminent, it gets closer and closer.

K: Yes, sir.

JS: And it is for this reason that we may very well have to enter the arena ourselves in a conscious way, and as we are speaking about this fully conscious of what we are saying, aware of the risk and of the danger, some effort must be made, some way must be invented to raise the consciousness of the world as a whole, as difficult as that may be.

K: I understand all this, sir. This is - I have talked to a great many politicians and all the rest of it - this is their argument: you and people like you must enter the arena. Wait a minute. We always deal with a crisis, not what has brought about the crisis. When the crisis arises we are so concerned: answer the crisis, don't bother about the past, don't bother about anything else, just answer the crisis.

JS: That's wrong.

K: That's what they are all doing.

JS: I understand that. And that's why they need your wisdom, and they need the wisdom of others like yourself, who see the future, those who can anticipate, can see the 'handwriting on the wall', and will act before the wall begins to crumble.

K: Therefore I am just saying, shouldn't we go and enquire into the cause of all this?

JS: Yes.

K: Not just say, well, here is a crisis, deal with it.

JS: Oh no. I agree with you.

K: That's what the politicians are saying.

JS: Well, I won't play that game. And I am not suggesting that we do.

K: Only silly people play that game.

JS: Yes.

K: Foolish people. But I mean the cause of all this is obviously the desire to live safely, protected, secure inwardly. I divide myself as a family, then a small group of people and so on and so on.

JS: We are going to discover that we are all one great big family.

K: Ah!

JS: And our greatest security will come from being concerned about others in our family. It will be of no great advantage to us to have others suffer and be a threat to us as well as to themselves, which is the state of affairs now with nuclear war.

K: Therefore I am asking whether we learn through suffering, which we haven't; whether we learn through the kind of agony of wars, we haven't. So what makes us learn, change? What are the factor of it and depth of it? Why have human beings who have lived on this poor unfortunate earth for so long, they are destroying the thing on which they are growing, the earth, and they are destroying each other. What is the cause of all this? Not speculative causes, the actual, deep human cause? Unless we find that we will go on for the rest of our days.

JS: That's quite right. You are asking for the cause.

K: Or the causations, which have brought man to this present crisis.

JS: As I see it, to satisfy the needs for survival under circumstances of threat, when there is something to be had, something to be gained by war, war is something that men engaged in. Now when the time comes when nothing is to be gained, and everything is to be lost, we may be give a second thought.

K: But we'll have lost, sir. You understand? Every war we are losing. Why haven't we learnt that? The historians have written about it, all the great scholars have written, and man has remained tribal, small, petty, self-centred. I am asking what will make him change? The immediacy of change, not future, gradual, because time may be the enemy of man. Evolution may be the enemy.

JS: Enemy? Evolution may be the only solution.

K: If man hasn't learnt after all this suffering and is going on perpetuating this thing...

JS: He hasn't evolved sufficiently as yet. The conditions have not, as yet, been propitious for solving the problems that precipitate war.

K: Sir, if we have children, what is their future? War? And how am I, if one is a parent, how is one to see all this? How is one to awaken, to be aware of all that is going on, and their relationship to what is going on? And if they don't change this thing will go on endlessly.

JS: Therefore a change is imperative.

K: Yes, sir, but...

JS: How are we going to bring it about?

K: That's what I am asking. Change is imperative.

JS: I understand that.

K: If the change is through evolution, which is time and all the rest of it, we are going to destroy ourselves.

JS: But I think we have to accelerate the evolutionary process. We must do it deliberately and consciously. Up until now we have been evolving unconsciously, which has led to the condition which you have just been describing. A new change must occur, a different kind of change, a change in our consciousness, in which we ourselves are using our intelligence.

K: Agree, sir. So I am asking what are the causes of this? If I can find the causes - every cause has an end. So if I can find the cause, or causes, or the many causations that have brought human beings to the present state, then I can go after those causes.

JS: Let me suggest another way of looking at it: let us assume, for the sake of argument, that the causes that have led to this will persist unless some outside intervention is brought to bear to change the direction. Let me suggest the possibility of looking at the positive elements in human beings, the possibility of strengthening those.

K: That means time.

JS: Everything in the human realm occurs in time. I am suggesting that we accelerate the time, that we fore-shorten the time, that we not leave it only to time and only to chance, that we begin to intervene in our own evolution to that extent, and we become the co-authors of our evolution.

K: I understand that. Now I am asking a question that perhaps may not have an answer. I think for myself it has an answer, which is can time end? This way of thinking, give me a few more days before you slaughter me. During those few days I must change.

JS: I think time ends in the following sense: the past ends and the future begins.

K: No. Which means what? For the past to end, which is one of the most complex things, memory, knowledge, and the whole urge, the desire, the hope, all that has to end.

JS: Let me give you an illustration of the ending of something and the beginning of something new. When it was observed that the earth was round and not flat there was a change in perception. From that point on the earth was no longer seen as flat, it was seen as round. The same thing was true for the revolution of the sun around the earth, which then became apparent that it was the earth that revolved round the sun.

K: Galileo, he as nearly burnt by the church for this.

JS: Indeed. And the same thing is likely to happen again.

K: Sir, so my question is this: is time an enemy or a help?

JS: We must use time to our advantage.

K: How am I to use time? That is, I have a future. Right? I have another hundred or fifty years to live, and during those fifty years can I shorten the whole human experience, shorten the content of my consciousness, and in the very shortening bring it to a very, very tiny point so that it is gone? Has the human brain capacity - it has infinite capacity in one direction, technologically, infinite capacity, we don't seem to apply that extraordinary capacity inwardly.

JS: Let's focus on that.

K: Yes, that's what I am saying.

JS: That's the central issue. I agree.

K: If we could focus that tremendous energy on this, we would change instantly.

JS: Instantly. There you have it.

K: I know, sir. Now what will make man to focus that capacity, that energy, that drive on this one point? Sorrow hasn't helped him; better communication hasn't helped him; nothing has helped factually - god, church, religions, better statesmen, the latest gurus, none of that.

JS: That's right.

K: So, can I put all that aside and not depend on anybody? Scientists, the doctors, psychologists, nobody.

JS: What you are saying is that the means has not yet been invented for accomplishing what you have in mind.

K: I don't think it is means, the means is the end.

JS: I accept that.

K: Therefore don't look for a means. See that these people have not helped you in the least; on the contrary, they have led you up the wrong path. So leave them.

JS: They are not the means.

K: They are not the means.

JS: Because they do not serve the ends of which we are speaking.

K: They are not the means. The authority outside is not the means, so inside. That requires, sir, tremendous - I don't like to use the word 'courage' - to stand lonely, to be alone, not depend or be attached to anything. And who is going to do this? One or two.

JS: That's the challenge.

K: So I say, for god's sake wake up to that, not the means, not the end.

JS: I share your view as to where the solution lies. I share your view that it is perhaps the most difficult of all of the things with which human beings have been confronted, and it's for that reason it's left to the last. We have done all of the easy things, for example, we are manipulating artificial intelligence, but not our own intelligence. It is understandable because we are in a sense both the cause and the effect.

K: The cause becomes the effect, and the effect becomes the cause, and so on, we keep in that chain.

JS: Yes. Now since we are at a point at which the human race can become extinct, it seems to me that the only invention, if I may use that term, we are awaiting now to bring that to an end is to find the means for exercising self restraint upon all of the factors and conditions and circumstances that have led to war.

K: Yes, sir. I wonder, sir, it may be irrelevant, the world is bent on pleasure. You see it in this country more than anywhere else, tremendous drive for pleasure, and entertainment, sport, which is, be entertained all the time. In the school here the children want to be entertained, not learn. And you go to the East, and there they want to learn. You have been there?

JS: Yes.

K: They want to learn.

JS: And that's pleasurable too. It can be.

K: Yes. Of course, of course. So if man's drive is to find and continue in pleasure, apparently that has been the historical process: pleasure whether it is in the church, all the mass, all the circus that goes on in the name of religion, or on the football field, that has existed from the ancient days. And that may be one of our difficulties, to be entertained by specialists, you know, the whole world of entertainers. Every magazine is a form of entertainment, introducing a few good articles here and there. So man's drive is not only to escape fear, but the drive for pleasure. They both go together.

JS: They do, that's right.

K: Two sides of the same coin. But we forget the other side, fear, and pursue this. And that may be one of the reasons why this crisis is coming.

JS: It will not be the first time that a species will have become extinct. I think we must ask the question whether or not there are some cultures in some societies that are more likely to endure than others, that have the characteristics and attributes necessary to overcome the problems, the weaknesses to which you have been drawing attention. It seems to me that you are prophesying a time of great difficulty and of great danger. And you are pointing out the differences that exist amongst peoples and amongst cultures, and amongst individuals, some of whom, exceptions there may be, could well be the exceptional ones that will survive and will endure after the holocaust.

K: That means one or two, or half a dozen people survive out of all the mess. No, I can't agree to that.

JS: I am not recommending that. I am simply giving a picture, a number, a quality and a quantity to it so as to make people aware of their responsibility in respect to that future.

K: Sir, responsibility implies not only to your little family, but you are responsible as a human being for the rest of humanity.

JS: I think I said to you, showed you the title of an address I gave in India, which was 'Are we being good ancestors?' We have a responsibility as ancestors for the future. I share your view completely. And the sooner we become aware of this and begin to address ourselves to this consciously as if it were an imminent threat.

K: Again, I would like to point out there are exceptions, but the vast majority who are not in the way of looking at things, elect the governors, presidents, prime ministers, or totalitarians, they are suppressing everything. So as the majority elect those, or the few gather power to themselves and dictate to others, we are at their mercy, we are in their hands, even the most exceptional people. So far they have not done it, but they may say, 'You can't speak here any more, or write any more, don't come here.' You understand? So there is one side the urge to find security, to find some kind of peace somewhere.

JS: Would you be willing to say that those who are now ruling, leading, are lacking somehow in wisdom?

K: Oh, obviously, sir.

JS: Would you say that there are some who have the wisdom with which to lead and to guide?

K: Not when the whole mass of people want to be guided by somebody they elect, or don't elect, but by tyrannies. What I am asking is really, how is a man, a human being who is no longer individual - for me individuality doesn't exist, we are human beings.

JS: Right.

K: We are humanity.

JS: We are members of the species, we are cells of humankind.

K: We are humanity. Our consciousness is not mine, it is the human mind.

JS: That's right.

K: Human heart, human love. All that human. And by emphasizing, as they are doing now, individuals, fulfil yourself, do whatever you want to do, you know the whole thing, that is destroying the human relationship.

JS: Yes. That is fundamental.

K: There is no love, there is no compassion in all this. Just vast mass moving in a hopeless direction, and electing these extraordinary people to lead them. And they lead them to destruction. My point is this has happened time after time, centuries after centuries. And if you are serious either you give up, turn your back on it, I know several people who have said to me, 'Don't be a fool, you can't change man. Go away. Retire. Go to the Himalayas and beg and live and die.' I don't feel like that.

JS: Nor do I.

K: Of course. They have seen the hopelessness of all this. For me, I don't see either hope or hopelessness. It is not. I said this is the state of things, they have got to change.

JS: This is the reality.

K: Instantly.

JS: Exactly. All right. Having agreed upon that, where do we go from here?

K: I can't go very far if I don't start very near. The 'very near' is this.

JS: All right, let's start here. Let's start right here, right here.

K: Right here.

JS: What do we do?

K: If I don't start here but start over there I can't do anything. So I start here. Now I say, who is me who is struggling for all this? Who is I, who is the self? What makes me behave this way, why do I react? You follow, sir?

JS: Oh, yes, I follow.

K: So that I begin to see myself, not theoretically but in a mirror of relationship - with my wife, with my friends, how I behave, how I think, and in that relationship I begin to see what I am.

JS: Yes, that's correct. You can see yourself only through reflection in another.

K: Through relationship. In that there may be affection, there may be anger, there may be jealousy. I discover in all that monstrous creature hidden in me, including the idea that there is something extraordinarily spiritual in me, all that I begin to discover. The illusions and the lies that man has lived with. And in that relationship I see if I want to change I break the mirror. Which means I break the content of my whole consciousness. And perhaps out of that, breaking down the content, there is love, there is compassion, there is intelligence. There is no other intelligence, except the intelligence of compassion.

JS: Well, having agreed on what the ultimate resolution can be, and having agreed that one has to begin here now.

K: Yes, sir.

JS: Here and now.

K: Change now, not wait for evolution to throttle you.

JS: Evolution can begin now.

K: If you like to put it that way. Evolution in the sense moving from this, breaking down to this to something which thought cannot project.

JS: When I use the term, 'evolution can begin now', I am speaking of a mutation event.

K: A mutation, I agree. Mutation is not evolution.

JS: But I am going to add one other factor that I think is important. I believe that individuals see the world in the same way as do you and I, there are others besides ourselves. They are others besides ourselves who see the problems, who see the solution that you speak of. Now let us refer to individuals such as that as exceptional, extraordinary. We might even think of them as unusual, as mutations, if you like.

K: Biological freaks!

JS: If you like. Curious in same way, different from the rest. Can they be gathered together? Can they be selected? Will they select each other and come together?

K: Yes. They come together, not select each other.

JS: I am using the term in the sense of coming together because there is some sense of recognition, something that draws them together, some self selecting mechanism. Now can you imagine that making a difference?

K: Perhaps a little.

JS: Can you imagine anything else making a difference?

K: Not imagine, sir. I see - could we put it this way, sir? Death has been one of the most extraordinary factors in life. We have avoided it, to look at it, because we are afraid of what it is. We cling to all the things we have known, and we don't want to let that go when we die. We can't take it with us, but etc., etc. Now to die to all the things I am attached to. To die, not say, 'What will happen if I die, is there another reward?' Because unless dying and living go together...

JS: Yes, death is part of life.

K: Part of life. But very few move in that direction.

JS: I agree. We are talking now about the same exceptional individuals.

K: And I am saying those exceptional individuals - I am not pessimistic or optimistic, I am just looking at the facts - have they got affected mankind?

JS: Not sufficiently, not yet. Not sufficiently. My contention is that if we do something about it consciously and deliberately we can make it happen sooner.

K: But consciously and deliberately may be another continuation of the self-centredness.

JS: But that is part of the condition we must not include. I understand that. That must be excluded. It must be species-centredness - if you like - humankind-centredness, humanity-centredness. It cannot be the same self-centredness to which you have been referring up to now. That will be the mutation event.

K: Yes, sir. The end of the self-centredness. Do you know they have tried to do this through meditation, they have tried to do this by joining Orders, by renouncing the world - the monks, the nuns, the sannyasis of India. If I may point out something rather interesting: once when I was in Kashmir I was walking behind a group of sannyasis, monks, about a dozen of them. And it was a beautiful country, a river on one side, flowers, stream, birds and an extraordinary blue sky. And everything was really laughing, the earth was smiling. And these monks never looked at anything. Never. They kept their heads down, repeating some words in Sanskrit, I couldn't gather what it was, and that was all. They put on blinkers and say, 'There is safety'. That's what we have done, religiously, politically. So I say one can deceive so enormously. Deception is one of our factors.

JS: Deception, and denial. Negation.

K: Sir, we never start, as in Buddhism and Hinduism, with doubt. Doubt is an extraordinary factor. But we don't. We don't doubt all that is going on around us.

JS: That is very unhealthy. And healthy doubt is necessary.

K: Scepticism.

JS: We must question rather than accept the answers that have been given us.

K: Of course. So nobody can answer my problems. I have to resolve them. So don't create problems. I won't enter into that. The mind that is trained to resolve problems, solutions, such a mind is always finding problems. But if the brain is not trained, educated to solve problems, it is free from problems. It can face problems but it is essentially free.

JS: There are some brains, if you like, some minds that create problems, and some that solve problems. And what you are posing now is the question: can we solve the ultimate problem, the ultimate question with which we are confronted, which is: can we go on as a species? Or will we destroy ourselves?

K: Yes. Death. That's why I said death, I brought it in earlier. Death to things that I have gathered psychologically.

JS: We have to accept the death of those things of the past that are no longer valuable. And allow the birth of those new things that are necessary for the new future. I quite agree that the past must come to an end.

K: Oh, yes.

JS: War must come to an end.

K: The brain must record. But the brain is recording...

JS: ...constantly.

K: ...constantly. Therefore it is recording, then it plays the tape.

JS: It is recording and it is recognizing.

K: Yes.

JS: It is re-cognizing. It is re-examining what it already knows. Now we must at this point in time recognize what has happened in the past, and become aware that there must be a new way.

K: Which is, don't record. Why should I record - language and so on, let's leave all those out - why should I psychologically record anything? You hurt me, suppose. You say some brutal thing to me, why should I record it?

JS: I would relegate it to what I call the 'forgettery'.

K: No, no. Why should I record it? Or somebody flatters me, why should I record it? What a bore it is to react in the same old pattern.

JS: It records itself, but it must be relegated.

K: No, watch it sir, whether it is possible not to record at all. Psychologically I am talking about, not the recording of driving a car or this or that, but psychologically not to record anything.

JS: Are you able to do that?

K: Oh yes.

JS: You must be able to discriminate between what you record and what you don't record.

K: The memory is selective.

JS: Yes, and that was why I used that humourous way of putting it: you select by putting some in the place of memory, and some in the place of forgettery. We are selecting that which you choose.

K: Not choose. I have to record how to drive a car.

JS: Yes.

K: Or how to speak a language. If I have to learn a skill I have to record it. In the physical world I have to record: from here to go to my house or to Paris, I have to do various things, I have to record all that. But I am asking, why should there be recording of any psychological event, which then emphasizes the self, the me, the self-centred activity and all the rest of it?

JS: Well let's deal with that for a moment because it seems to be very central to what you are saying, and to what I implied earlier when I used the word 'self-restraint'. I think we are talking about the same category of phenomena, the need perhaps to liberate ourselves from those experiences in life that make us vindictive, that make it difficult for us to join together to relate to those who may have injured us in the past. And we see this amongst nations now, between religious groups and others, who are incapable of forgiving the present generation who have nothing to do with the perpetration of events at some previous time in history.

K: Yes sir.

JS: Therefore we are now beginning to approach the question that I posed earlier: what is it that we must do, what might we do now, to deal with the cause of the effects that we want to avoid? You have identified these as psychological. You have identified these as within the human mind.

K: So the first thing I would say is, don't identify yourself with anything - with a group, with a country, with a god, with ideologies. Right? Don't identify. Then that which you identify with must be protected - your country, your god, your conclusions, your experience, your biases. This identification is a form of self-centred activity.

JS: And let us assume for the sake of argument that there is a need to identify with things, or to relate to things or to each other. This is the basis for religion, which means - it comes from the word 'religio', to tie together - and there is a need that human beings have for relationship. Now they may very well enter into relationships that are harmful, that in fact are self destructive. Now is it possible to address ourselves to the kinds of relationships which, if developed, would allow us to relinquish those that are now harmful? For example, the most fundamental relationship is to ourselves, not in the self-centred sense, but ourselves as members of the human species, and to each other.

K: That is my relationship as a human being with the rest of humanity.

JS: Yes.

K: Now, just a minute, sir. Relationship implies two: my relationship with you, with another. But I am humanity. I am not separate from my brother across the ocean.

JS: You are not.

K: I am humanity. Therefore if I have this quality of love I have established a relationship. There is relationship.

JS: I think that it exists. I think you have it. And your brothers across the sea have it, in all of the countries of the world this exists, but we are taught to hate. We are taught to hate each other. We are taught to separate ourselves from the other. There is a deliberate...

K: Not only, sir, taught, but isn't there this feeling of possessiveness in which there is security and pleasure? I possess my property, I possess my wife, I possess my children, I possess my god. I am trying to say this sense of isolating process is so strong in us that we can't train ourselves to be out of this. I say, see the fact that you are the rest of mankind, for god's sake see it.

JS: Well what you are saying is that we are both individual and also related to the rest of humankind.

K: No. I say you are not an individual. Your thinking is not yours. Your consciousness is not yours because every human being suffers, every human being goes through hell, turmoil, anxieties, agonies, which every human being whether west, or east, north, south, are going through. So we are human beings, not, I am a separate human being therefore I am related to the human beings; I am the rest of humanity. And if I see that fact I will not kill another.

JS: Now contrast that with what exists today.

K: What exists today? I am an individual, I must fulfil my own desires, my own urges, my own instincts, my own - and all the rest of it, and that is creating havoc.

JS: Now we want to transform one state to another.

K: You can't transform.

JS: All right, what can you do?

K: Change, mutate. You can't change one form into another form. See that you are actually, the truth, that you are the rest of mankind. Sir, when you see that, feel it in your - if I may use the word - feel it in your guts, in your blood, then your whole activity, your whole attitude, way of living changes. Then you have a relationship which is not two images fighting each other. A relationship that is living, alive, full of something, beauty. But again we come back to the exception.

JS: They exist. Now let's focus.

(Short gap on tape)

K: Suppose, sir, you are one of the exceptions - not suppose, please.

JS: I understand.

K: What's your relationship with me who is just an ordinary person? Have you any relationship with me?

JS: Yes.

K: What is that?

JS: We are the same species.

K: Yes, but you have stepped out of that. You are an exception. That's what we are talking about. You are an exception and I am not. Right? What is your relationship with me?

JS: I am...

K: Have you any?

JS: Yes.

K: Or you are outside trying to help me.

JS: No, I have a relationship with you and a responsibility because your well-being will influence my well-being. Our well-being is one and the same.

K: No, sir. You are an exception. You are not psychologically putting things together. You are out of that category. And I am all the time gathering. Right? You know, all the rest of it. There is a vast division between freedom and the man who is in prison. I am in prison, of my own making, and the prison made by politicians, books and all the rest of it, I am in prison, you are not, you are free. And I would like to be like you.

JS: I would like to help liberate you.

K: Therefore what's your relationship? A helper. Or you have real compassion, not for me, the flame of it, the perfume, the depth, the beauty, the vitality and the intelligence of compassion, love. That's all. That will affect much more than your decision to help me.

JS: I agree with that. We are in complete agreement. That's how I see the exceptional. And I see that the exceptional individuals possess the quality of compassion.

K: And compassion cannot be put together by thought.

JS: It exists.

K: How can it exist when I have hate in my heart, when I want to kill somebody, when I am crying, how can that exist? There must be freedom from all that before the other is.

JS: I am focusing my attention now on the exceptional.

K: I am doing that.

JS: And do those have hatred in their hearts? The exceptional ones?

K: Sir, it is like the sun, sunshine isn't yours or mine. We share it. But the moment it is my sunshine it becomes childish. So all that you can be is like the sun, the exceptional, like the sun, give me compassion, love, intelligence, nothing else - don't say, do this, don't do that, then I fall into the trap, which all the churches, religions have done. Freedom means, sir, to be out of the prison - prison which man has built for himself. And you who are free, be there. That's all. You can't do anything.

JS: I hear you say something very positive, very important, very significant. I hear you say that there does exist people, individuals, a group of individuals who possess these qualities for emanating something that could help the rest of humankind.

K: You see that's the whole concept - I don't want to go into that, that's too irrelevant - that there are such people who help, not guide, tell you what to do, it all becomes so silly. Just like sun, like the sun giving light. And if you want to sit in the sun, you will sit in it, if you don't, you will sit in the shade.

JS: And so it's that kind of enlightenment.

K: That is enlightenment.

JS: That we are on the verge of receiving. I think that that is what you have given us today.

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC TALK 14TH MAY 1983

May one remind you, if I may, that this is not an entertainment. It's nice to sit under trees on a lovely morning, cool, fresh, but in spite of all that, this is not in any way to entertain you; neither intellectually or emotionally or to try to convince you of anything. We are not doing any kind of propaganda. Nor is this a lecture, as it's commonly understood; on a particular subject to be informed, to be instructed. It is not a lecture. But together we should look at the world as it is, the whole world, not a particular part of the world or a particular group, or be concerned for the moment with our own particular problems, of which we have many, but to look at the whole world, the whole earth upon which human beings are living.

This world in which we live has been broken up into various forms of nationalities, linguistic differences, nationalistic, patriotic divisions, religious divisions: the Buddhist, the Hindu, the Tibetan, the Muslim, the Christian; and also the recent religion of Communism, Marxism; the totalitarian states through certain parts of the world where there is no liberty, freedom to think what you like, to do what you like. Wars are going on in different parts of the world. Human beings are killing each other for some idealistic, nationalistic or racial division. Human beings are slaughtered by the latest machinery of war. We are not judging, nor looking at all this from any prejudiced point or from any bias; but we are looking at it together to find out for ourselves why this is happening: why there is so much misery in the world; so much confusion; great uncertainty. And the world is becoming more and more dangerous to live in.

In this part of the world you may not have wars, but you are preparing for war. And in this world there are a great many institutions, foundations, organizations, little groups with their particular leaders; the gurus with their absurdities; each person or each group, each community is separating itself from others. This is what is happening all over the world; more so in this part of the world where each one wants to do what he likes; to fulfil himself, to express himself, to assert himself. There are threats of various kinds. This is what is actually going on in the world.

And when one looks at all this: the terror, the suffering, the bad management, inefficient management of governments, each country preparing, accumulating the instruments of war, perhaps helped by religions. And when one looks at all this quite objectively, without any bias, one must ask, if one is at all serious, and I hope - one hopes that you are, not only this morning for an hour but this is a human problem. It's a great crisis. And who is responsible for all this?

One can easily say that it's the environment, the society, the mismanagement, and so on. But in spite of all that, if we can look really seriously, objectively - not as Americans and Hindus or a particular group, but look at all this; take a journey together to find out for ourselves without being told, without being instructed or informed, who is responsible for all these terrible things that are going on. Not only in the technological world, which is becoming more and more complex; such tremendous advancement: computer, the robots, the missiles, the submarines, you know, all that's what's happening: great surgery, medicine, all that. Looking at all this, one asks not only what is one to do, but also, who is responsible, who has brought this about: the chaos, the confusion, the utter misery of man.

And this society, in which we all live, this society is corrupt, immoral, aggressive, destructive; and this society has been going on for thousands of years modified or primitive; but it is the same pattern being repeated thousands of years upon thousands of years. These are all facts. This is not the opinion or the judgment of the speaker.

So, as one must ask, and I hope you will ask, who is responsible? And what is one to do, confronted, facing this enormous crisis; if one is at all aware of this crisis?

Is the crisis outward, outside of us - economic crisis, social crisis, crisis of war; the building of enormous armaments, the appalling waste of all this. And inwardly, psychologically, we are also very confused. There is constant conflict, struggle, pain, anxiety and so on, inwardly. Please remember, this is not a lecture; we are together taking a journey into the whole structure which mankind has created, the disorder that human beings have brought about in this world. So there is misery, chaos, confusion outwardly, in the sense in society, economically, religiously; and inwardly, that is psychologically, the psyche, the consciousness, with its content is pain, beliefs, struggle, and so on, and so on, so on.

Which we'll all go into during these three talks here. And since you have taken the trouble to come here you must ask: what are you going to do about all this? Turn to leaders? Better politicians? This one isn't good, but the next one will be better; and the next one will still better. And so we keep this game going. We have looked to various so-called spiritual leaders, the whole hierarchy of the Christian world. They are as confused, uncertain as we are.

If you turn to the psychologists or the psychotherapists, they are like you and me: confused. And there are all the ideologies: Communist ideologies, Marxist ideologies, the philosophical ideologies, the ideologies of the Hindus and the ideologies of those people who have brought Hinduism here; and you have your own ideologies. You follow all this? The whole world is fragmented, broken up, as we are broken up, driven by various urges, reactions, each one wanting to be important, each one acting his own self-interest. This is actually what is going on in the world, wherever you go; the most poverty-ridden villages in India or the most highly sophisticated people in the west, it's the same issue, the same problems: poverty, hunger, man against man; one ideology against another ideology. This is the actual fact. And what are we all going to do about it all? Who has been responsible? Is each one of us responsible? You and another, are we responsible? Please, do ask this question of yourself. Please, for this morning, if you will, be serious for an hour.

If you look to another to instruct you, to guide you, to tell you what to do - and there are people who will do all that, and they too have not through the centuries helped man to bring about a different world: neither so called spiritual leader - one doesn't like that word 'spiritual', it's an ugly word - nor so called statesmen. So where will you look? If you don't look for leaders, and all leaders are like the led, and the various gurus are, like the disciples, greedy, money-making - you know all that stuff that's going on. So, if all the leaders in the world have failed, not only in this generation but in the past generations, and in the future generations, leaders have not helped, Statesmen throughout the world (if there are any, which I doubt, at the present time), they too have not brought about a different society; put an end to wars. So where will you look? The priests have failed, organizations, institutions have lost their meaning; they have not helped: the foundations, the little groups, the little self-assertive selfish little gatherings, none of that has helped to bring about a change in man.

And man has not changed, though he has evolved from the animal to the present so-called civilized human beings; during all long evolution psychologically we are still rather primitive. That's a fact. So where will you look for help; and can anyone help?

Please, if one may remind you again and again, this is not a lecture. It is not that the speaker is going to tell you what to do or what to think, but together you and the speaker are looking at all these problems, facing them, not avoiding it, not running away. And we have been trained, educated to run away, to seek some kind of comfort, some kind of an answer from somebody. The books can't answer this question. All the religious books cannot possibly answer this question. So knowing no leader of any kind, the local or the imported, the very erudite, the philosophers, the psychologists, none of them have helped man to change himself psychologically. And we are facing a very dangerous world: one ideology, like the Russian Marxist ideologies facing the so-called democratic ideologies.

So there is nobody you can turn to. I wonder - one wonders if you really realize that. Nobody on earth or in heaven is going to help you. You can pray, and that which you pray to is the creation of your own thought. One wonders if you actually face this fact, or surreptitiously, in our anxiety, in our confusion, we turn to another. And probably you are all here for that; if you are not curious, if you are not saying, what is he going to talk about, let's hear for a few minutes, and if it doesn't interest us, we'll get out. It's a nice morning, let's go out for a picnic. But one is confronted with this very, very serious problem of life, realizing that there is nobody that can help us, nobody on earth, or any outside agency. God is the creation of thought, of man, out of his fear, out of his anxiety, desire for comfort, seeking somebody to help. The thought has created this so-called entity, God. That's a fact.

So, realizing all this, facing all this, each one of us is responsible for all this; for any kind of war that is happening in the world, the war that's going on in Beirut, in Vietnam, and I believe about forty five wars are going on now. Because in ourselves we are divided, fragmented, in ourselves we are nationalistic, patriotic - patriotism is not the love of land. If you love the land, you don't want to destroy the land, as it is being destroyed right throughout the world. Each one of us wants to fulfil, immediately. Whatever is the desire, fulfil it - encouraged by the psychologists. So, each one of us is responsible as long as we are violent, as long as we are in disorder, as long as we are trying to fulfil our own particular urges, competitive, aggressive, brutal, angry, violent - which we are. Again, this is a fact. As long as we are all this, our society is going to be that. So we have created this society and nobody else. And to bring about a change in society, in the world - I wonder, one wonders if you really realize what is happening? If you are not too self-centred, occupied with your own particular little problems and desires, pleasures, I wonder, one wonders if you are really aware in spite of the newspapers and so on, aware what is happening. And if you are aware, not merely intellectually observing the things that are taking place, you must be greatly concerned; not only for yourselves, but for your grandchildren, children, for the future. What's the future of man? These are all fundamental questions that one must ask. Not ask someone else, ask oneself.

So, who has been responsible? And, what can each one of us do? What's our action, facing this, not only crisis outwardly, but crisis in ourselves. How has all this been brought about? We have evolved technologically from a bullock cart to the jet, and so on; tremendous evolution. But inwardly, psychologically we have hardly moved. We are still very, very primitive. So what shall we do?

To find out one must be not only free to look, free from all bias, free from all conclusions; the word 'conclusion' implies to conclude, to shut down. We conclude a peace, that means ending of a certain war; conclude an argument, that means to end that argument. So without any conclusion, without any bias whatsoever - if that's possible, and it is possible if you are willing, not from a self-centred point of view. If you look at all this, is thought responsible for all this? Thought that has created the extraordinary world of technology, the inventions, the extraordinary communications, the subtle surgeries, medicine; the whole infinite movement in the technological world, thought has been responsible for all that. Right? Again, that's a fact. Nobody can deny it.

Thought also has created nationalities, divisions, and hoping in divisions to find security. You believe (if you believe) in a particular form of religious ideology. That again is the activity of thought not only political divisions that exist in the world, the religious divisions that exist in the world, the marvellous architecture, the great cathedrals of the world and the small churches, and all the things that are in the churches and the cathedrals, in the temples and mosques throughout the world, are put there by thought: the rituals, the ceremonies, the costumes of the priests when they perform; all that is the result of thought. Do you accept that?

Q: No!

K: I thought you wouldn't. You are thought, aren't you? You are memories, you are remembrances, you are the past; the past which is the accumulation of experience and knowledge; with your tendencies. You are memories. Right? A simple fact. Subtle, sublimated, crooked, one thought suppressing another thought, thought is utterly responsible for all the things that are going on in the world.

Please examine it, don't deny it or say it's right or wrong. Look at it. Have the patience, courage and be serious enough to look at it. It's easy to say no or yes, but to see the truth of it, the actuality of it: what you believe is the activity of thought. Your relationship with another is the remembrance of thought. So you are basically a bundle of memories. You may not like the fact; you may reject it; but that's a fact. If you had no memories of any kind, you would be in a state of amnesia, in a state of utter blankness, vagueness, vacant. This is a hard thing to face.

So thought is responsible for the divisions: religious, political, personal, racial, the wars that are going on between the Jew and the Arabs, between various religious groups, it's all the result of thought. Do you really accept that? If you do, see the fact; see the truth of it. Not the superstition; not some exotic idea; not something imposed upon you by the speaker.

So if you see the truth of it, objectively, impersonally, without any bias whatsoever, then the question arises: can that thought be aware of itself? Please listen to all this, if you will kindly. If you don't want to listen, it's all right too.

What is one then to do with thought? If, and it is a fact, that thought has brought about this disorder in the world, then who is to put order in the world? Who is to bring about order in the world? Or in oneself? The world outside, apart from nature, is the result of our activity: our activity of thought has brought about disorder in ourselves. So the society is in disorder. Unless we put order in the house, there'll be no order in society, in our relationship. That's a fact!

Now, who is to put order in us? Who is to bring about, out of this disorder, clear, strong, irrefutable order? Is the thinker separate from thought? You understand all these questions? Are you interested in all this? If you are not, why are you here? Just to sit under trees and look at the blue sky; and look at those lovely hills? You can do that too. But since you are here, and since the speaker has come a long way, we must together understand this question and find an answer for ourselves, not be told like children! To find answer which is right, correct, precise, true, and not depend on anyone.

Therefore we must examine together. We have separated thinker and thought. The thinker is always correcting thought.

Have you observed it? Controlling it, denying it, shaping it, putting into a mould. So the thinker we think is separate from thought.

Please, go into it slowly, I'll go into it patiently, let's go together; it's a long journey we are taking, so if you take a long journey, you must carry things lightly, patiently; hesitantly. And to take a long journey, you must begin very near; which is you.

So, the question arises, that there is a division between the thinker and the thought. The thinker is always correcting thought, controlling it: this is right, this is wrong, this should be, this must not be; and so there is a division between the thinker and the thought. Right? That's clear. Is that division real? Or fictitious? There is no thinker without thought. Is this all a little bit complex? It doesn't matter. It's up to you. There is a division between the thinker who is the past and the thought that is taking place now. And the thinker says that thought is correct or wrong, right and so on. He controls it, so there is a division between the thinker and the thought. So that is the basis of fragmentation in us. Right? Are we together in this? At least a little bit.

We are asking why, in human beings, inwardly, Psychologically, there is this division, as there is division in the world: the separation, this fragmentation of human beings, Christian, Jew, all the rest of it. What is the root of this fragmentation? The root of it is, there is a division between the two, the thinker and the thought. There is no thinker apart from thought. The thinker is the past, so is thought. Thought is the result or response or the reaction of memory. Memory is the result or reaction of knowledge. Stored in the brain, knowledge is experience; in the scientific world, in the technological world, even the inward world, psychological world, knowledge, experience, memory, and the response of that is thought. That's a fact. And where there is knowledge, knowledge is always incomplete; either in the present or the future or in the past. There is no complete knowledge about anything. There can never be. Even the scientists, biologists and archaeologists and so on, they do admit knowledge is limited.

Where there is limitation of knowledge, there must be limitation of thought. When you say, "I am a Christian," it's limited. When you are thinking about yourself, your problems, your relationship, your sexual pleasures and fulfillment, that's very, very limited. And thought is limited. It can invent the limitless, but that is still the product of thought. It can invent heaven; or hell or whatever - it can invent, it is still limited. So where there is limitation, there must be fragmentation. I wonder if you are following all this? Please do follow this, because it's your life. We are talking about daily life. So where there is limitation there must be conflict. When I say I am a Hindu, it's limited. When I say I am a Catholic, obviously. Where there is limitation there must be division. Where there is division, there must be disorder. And we live in disorder.

In the old world, there was order of some kind, because they followed certain traditions. In the modern world, tradition is thrown overboard, and there is nothing left, so you do what you want to do. And each one of us in this world is doing what he wants to do; his thing. And look at what chaos it's bringing about: politically, with the lobbies, each individual following his own particular inclination religious or otherwise. I wonder if one is aware of all this, of what we are all doing. The immense propaganda that's going on, in the name of religion, in the name of this or that.

So, our question then is, in our relationship, intimate or otherwise, in our actual daily relationship, there is fragmentation. The wife or the girl or the boy or the man follows his own inclinations, his own desires, his own sexual demands and you know all that. There are two separate entities having a relationship - perhaps sexual - but otherwise they have no relationship at all, actually. That's a fact. Each one is pursuing his own ambition, his own fulfillment, his own urges, inclinations, the obstinacy of each one. And we call this conflict relationship.

That relationship is brought about - this division, which is not relationship at all. You may hold the hand of another, embrace another, walk together, but inwardly you are separate from the other. That's a fact. Do face it. And so there is perpetual conflict between the two.

And if one asks, is it possible to live in relationship with another without conflict? The hermits, the monks, those who live in solitude whether in the great mountains of India or in this country. Relationship is the greatest thing in life. You cannot live without relationship. You may withdraw from all relationship, finding that relationship is painful; always living in struggle, conflict, possessing and not possessing, jealous, you know all that happens. There are those who withdraw from all relationship. But they are related, they cannot possibly escape from any kind of relationship.

So is it possible, as it is necessary, to live in relationship without a single shadow of conflict? You are asking this question, please, not the speaker. This is an important question, a deep, fundamental question. If they cannot live in relationship with each other without conflict, then you will create a world which is full of conflict. Even the quail agrees.

So we are asking, what is the cause of this conflict, of this disorder; in ourselves, in our relationship, and the disorder that exists outside of us? What is the actual fact of relationship? The fact, not romantic, you know, all that kind of sentimental stuff, but the actual fact, the brutal fact of it. Because if one doesn't really understand the beauty, the depth, the vitality and the greatness of relationship, we do make a mess of our lives.

Is our relationship based on memory? Is it based on remembrances? Is it based on the past incidents accumulated as various images, pictures? If it is remembrance, if it is various images, then all that is the product of thought. Then one asks is thought love? Do please ask this question of yourself, not that I am prompting you. You are all grown-up people; I hope. Is the accumulated knowledge of each other - which must always be limited and therefore that very knowledge is the root of conflict - is that knowledge, that conflict, is that love? Not love of some romantic idea: love of God, love of, you know all that kind of stuff, love between human beings, a friendship, a sense of communication, communion, nonverbal, verbal.

So, is it possible to live with another without a single image: without a single remembrance of the past which has given you pleasure or pain. Do think, look at it.

And is it possible not to build images about the other? If you do build images about the other, which is knowledge, then it is perpetual division. Though you may have children, sex, and so on, but it's fundamentally division. Like the Arabs and the Jew, the Christian and the Muslim and so on. So where there is division there must be conflict. That's a law. So can I, can you, can each of us have a relationship in which there is no conflict whatsoever? Yes, sir, go into it.

This is part of meditation; not all the silly things that are going on in the name of meditation. This is meditation, to find out; to probe into oneself; whether it is possible to live with another happily, without domination, without suppression, without the urge to fulfil, all that kind of childish stuff. To live with another without any sense of division. The division must exist as long as thought is in operation, because thought is limited; because knowledge is limited. And in that division there is great pain; anxiety, jealousy, hatred; me first and you after.

To observe this fact, to observe, not say, I must have no division, that's all silly. To observe the fact that you are first divided, like to parallel lines never meeting - except perhaps sexually - otherwise two separate lines, two separate rows, two separate railway lines each pursuing the other, his own way; clinging to each other. All that brings about great misery in one's life. So to observe the fact, that you are divided; delve deeply into the fact. When you say, my wife, my girl friend, or this or that, look at the word, feel the word, the weight of the word, the weight of the word 'relationship.' To weigh the word means to hold the word.

To observe the whole implication of relationship; not only human relationship, but also the relationship with nature. If you lose relationship with nature, you lose relationship with man. To observe; to observe without any bias, to look at it, to feel the division, and when you so observe, which I hope you are doing it, when you so observe, that very observation is like a tremendous light put on the the word 'relationship.' You understand? To observe; we'll go into it. To watch; which means to watch without any direction; without the word without any motive, just to watch all the implications, the content of that word 'relationship.' To live with that word; even for an hour, for tea minutes, for a day, find out! To live with it. To so observe, which means live your complete attention to that. When you attend completely, the obstacles, the division disappears. It's like bringing great energy to something that is being broken. You understand all this?

So it is possible - not that you should accept what the speaker is saying; he is not an authority - it is possible to live without a single conflict.

But you may live without conflict, but the other may not. You understand the problem? You may have understood, gone into the question of relationship; shed tears, laughter, humour about it; weighed the word, lived with the word; you may have seen and gone into it, and comprehended it, seen the truth of it. But the other may not. Right? Your wife may not or your husband may not, or the girl friend may not, and so on. Then what is your relationship with the other? What is the relationship between a very, very intelligent man and a stupid man? Suppose you are very intelligent, in the ordinary sense of that word for the moment, which is not intelligence at all, suppose you are very intelligent, then what is my relationship to you? I am dull; I am rather stupid, I cling to my own prejudices, obstinate, my own opinions, and I am rather stupid, what is your relationship to me then? Go into it, please look at it. You will tolerate me? Be sympathetic with me? Be kind to me? That means there is still the division. You understand?

So when the conflict ends - suppose you have ended it - does it imply that there is the sense of love in it? We'll talk about love later on, or the implications of that word, and the depth of that word, the beauty of that word. But, when you have that quality, that perfume, and I haven't, and I am your wife or husband or whatever it is, your father, mother - it's strange in this country, the fathers and mothers don't count any more. They are packed away in some place; right? Sent to old women's home or men's home. Go to Asia, where there is no Social Security, the father and the mother live with their children. And that's why they say, we must have children. That's one of the reasons why population is growing so tremendously. There must be a boy, a boy especially, because when the parents are old the children will look after them. Here, all that's gone. Please consider all this when you talk about relationship with nature; how we are destroying the world, polluting the world, the air, the earth, the sea; destroying the beauty of the earth. And the beauty of relationship, to live completely at peace with one another.

Talking about peace, can there be peace in this world? Not in heaven, that's an old, old traditional disease. Can there be peace between human beings, whatever their colour, their race, their language, their so-called culture? And to find that peace, there must be peace between you and another, between you, your wife, your children. You understand? Can there be peace? Which means no conflict. Where there is no conflict, there is something far greater than the activity of thought. That's an actual fact, if one comes to the truth that to live without conflict. Which doesn't mean you become lazy, a vegetable; on the contrary. You have tremendous energy. Not to do more mischief, but to live rightly.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC TALK 15TH MAY 1983

May we go on with what we were talking about yesterday and continue with it? It's a lovely morning and I'm glad we have such a nice day.

We were talking, weren't we, about the general chaos in the world, not only in society and the divisions that religions are creating throughout the world, the threat of war, and the general chaos, and we were asking who is responsible for all this mess. And we were saying, weren't we, that thought, which has so extraordinarily evolved technologically, but psychologically, inwardly, we are still very, very primitive. And this primitivism - if there is such a word, I doubt it - is creating this misery and confusion. And from there we talked about relationship. How without relationship there would be no humanity, without relationship there would be no existence at all. Relationship, we said, was one of the most important things in life. And that relationship is generally, with most people, based on remembrance and things past. And we went into it somewhat in detail yesterday morning; I don't think it would be necessary to go over it again. Remembrance and pleasure, we said, is not love. Desire to achieve, to become something, denies that perfume which we call love. That's where we stopped yesterday, and we briefly talked about peace.

Man has evolved probably a million years or less or more biologically, and man has always been crying for peace on earth; pacem in terris, the old Latin phrase. And apparently there is no peace in the world. Without peace we cannot possibly flower; we can possibly, not evolve, but see the extraordinary depth of life, the beauty of it; the immensity of all living things. One must have peace. And that peace is denied wherever there is poverty. In this country, there is a great deal of poverty too, though this society is affluent. As you go further east, poverty increases: Africa, Middle East, and India and so on. Where there is poverty, which no special nationalistic government can ever solve, because it's a global problem; a problem of the whole world, not of a particular government, whether it is totalitarian, Marxist, or so-called democratic. And poverty, not only outwardly - if you have lived in a country where there is immense poverty, you see the effect of it: the degradation, the utter slavery of it; the brutality. We have lived through all of it. And this poverty, not only of the mind, and the poverty of the mind is not enriched through books, through institutions and organizations and foundations or forums - that mind is enriched when one understands the whole existence of oneself and one's relationship to the world at large.

And religions have not encouraged or brought about peace in the world. They talk a great deal - all the Christian world talks about pacem in terris, peace in the world - but religions have divided man. There are the Catholics, the Protestants; I don't know how many religious groups there are in this little village, probably dozens of them, institutions and foundations, each trying to tell the other fellows what to do; or inform them. Religions have prevented peace, they have had wars - 'Hundred Years' War in Europe; torture; all the brutality of this particular culture based on certain religious concepts, dogmas and beliefs. And religions throughout the world, in India and Far East and Near East, have prevented man from right relationship with humanity. These are all facts. There has been 5,000 years of war. This is historically stated, and we are still going on with wars; killing each other - perhaps in the beginning with a club, now you evaporate man, vaporize man by the million. We have not psychologically evolved, inwardly. And as long as we are primitive psychologically, our society will be equally primitive.

And can there be peace on this earth? This is a very, very serious question. Not only in oneself to live peacefully, without conflict, is that at all possible? Or man, is condemned forever to live in conflict. (Is that bothering you? The aeroplane? All right.) Is man forever condemned to live in conflict, in wars? Or is there a way out of all this? Certainly not through religions, as they are; not through political organization, whether it is democratic or totalitarian or Marxist. Nor through divisions of nationalities. As long as you remain an American, and the speaker remains a Hindu or a Buddhist or Muslim, we'll have no peace on earth. Nor the racial divisions, as the Jew, the Arab, and the Hindu, and so on. Nor culturally. So it's a very important question to ask of ourselves; not of another, not whether governments can bring about peace. Governments are created by what we are. They have been structured, put together by our own demands.

So, one asks, is it possible to have peace on this earth? This has been a cry for centuries; long before Christianity came into being. 2,500 years ago the Buddha was talking about peace. And we are still talking about it. And so realizing all this, what is one to do? Individuals, so-called individual effort to live in peace doesn't affect the whole world. You may live peacefully in this lovely valley; quietly, not too ambitious, not too corrupt, not too competitive; and live here quietly. Perhaps get on with your wife or your husband, but will that affect the whole of human consciousness? Or, the problem is much greater, much more profound. To find that out, if we are at all serious - and please, if one may remind you, this is not an entertainment, this is far too serious. We have to think together; not the speaker thinks and explains and describes, but together look, like two old friends, sitting under the shade of the trees, and talking about all this, not merely intellectually, but their hearts are disturbed. They are greatly concerned about what is happening in the world and what is happening to themselves. Like two old friends who have an amiable conversation; not convincing one or the other; not stimulating one or the other; not sticking to one's opinions and judgments and conclusions; two old friends who have lived together, walked together, seen many things of the world. You and the speaker are like that; so that we can think together, not what to think, or how to think, but think, observe together; observe the same tree, the skies, the birds, and the astonishing beauty of the mountains. And so together, actually together, not you listen to the speaker, but together explore into this question; the question being - one puts to the other - can we live not only you and I, but the rest of humanity? Because this earth is ours, not the American or the Irish or the English or the French, it's our earth. We are its guests. We have to live here peacefully.

And the one says to the other, what is the cause of all this? If one can find the cause, then the effect can end, the symptom. War is a symptom. The cause is very, very deep, complex. As when you can find the cause of a disease, that disease can be cured. So the two friends - I hope we are friends talking over together - two friends say, what is the cause of all this? Why have human beings become like this? So thoughtless, only concerned with themselves, and nothing matters except their own desires, their own urges, their own impulse; their own ambition, their own success; whether the success be in business world or in the professorial world. And also psychologically, inwardly, we want to be somebody, become somebody. So please, one says to the other, do listen carefully what I am telling you. Is there psychological evolution at all? That's a very, very serious question. That is, is there a becoming at all, psychologically? And that becoming, inwardly achieving, from 'what is' to 'what should be', from misery to some form of happiness, from confusion to enlightenment, which is to become - from that which is to what should be; that is becoming.

That becoming implies time. And this becoming, each one trying to become psychologically something, may be the same movement as physically to become from a clerk to whatever it is - bishop. No - local priest to become a bishop; like a clerk to become an executive. It's the same movement, the same wave, brought over to the psychological realm. I hope - the friend is asking the other - I hope I am making myself clear. He says, you are not quite clear. Go into it a little bit more.

In all religions and psychological world, the idea of change is to become. Right? I am confused, I must change this confusion to become clear. I quarrel with my wife, but the change to stop that, or to end that quarrel is to move from the violence to non-violence. That is, there is always the attempt to be something which is not.

Right? So the friend says, that's fairly clear; fairly, not too clear. But we'll go on with our conversation; it's a lovely morning, we have plenty of time, the sun is warm, and the shadows are many. And the shadows matter as much as the sun. There is great beauty in the shadows; but most of us are concerned with light, enlightenment, and we want to achieve that. This very psychological achievement may be one of the factors of conflict in life. So - my friend says - let's examine that fact. What is it to become? I hope my friend is very interested - and I hope you are too; and listening to this conversation; which is you and the speaker. You and the speaker. There's no friend outside you and the speaker. So, he says, is that the fundamental cause of division? Division must exist, the other explains, as long as there is the psyche, the self, the 'me', the ego, the person, separating himself from the other. But the other says, this has been a long history, this is what the human condition is; that we have been trained, educated to accept both religiously and economically and so on that we are individuals, separate from the rest of mankind, separate from an other. And the friend says, is that so? Are we really individuals? I know this is the tradition, this is what all religion have said - separate souls in Christianity, and the Hindus, and so on. But together, you as the friend and the speaker as the other, are going to examine whether we are really individuals at all. Be patient, please. See all the implications of it before you deny or accept. Now you accept it; it's your condition, as an individual, free to do what you want to do. And the totalitarian denies this; they say you are just a cog in the whole social structure.

So we are questioning not only the psychological becoming may be an illusion, and also psychologically we are not separate; because you suffer, you are confused, you are unhappy, you are anxious, uncertain, insecure; you may have security outwardly - even that is becoming more and more uncertain. There are millions unemployed in this country; and in England. Four million people are unemployed in England; a small country. And the unemployment in India is something they don't know. This unemployment is causing great misery, unhappiness, and conflict, hate.

So we are questioning together - you and the other friend are questioning - whether we are individuals at all. Or, we are like the rest of humanity; the rest of humanity is unhappy, sorrow-ridden, fearful, believing in some fantastic romantic nonsense; they go through great suffering; uncertainty, like you. And our reaction, which is part of our consciousness, is similar to the other. This is an absolute fact. You may not like to think about it, you might like to think that you are totally separate from another - which is quite absurd. So your consciousness, which is you: what you think, what you believe, what your conclusions, prejudices, your vanity, arrogance, aggression, pain, grief, sorrow, is shared by all humanity. That's our conditioning; whether you are a Catholic or a Protestant or whatever you are.

So, our consciousness is your essence, what your life is. That is the truth. And so you actually share the rest of humanity; you are the rest of humanity. You are humanity. This is a tremendous thing to realize. You may believe in a certain form of a saviour and the other believe in certain form of ideologies and so on; belief is common to all of us; fear is common to all of us; loneliness, the agony of loneliness is shared by the rest of humanity. So when one realizes the truth of that, becoming - that is, to change from 'what is' to 'what should be' - has a totally different meaning. The friend says, I don't understand that at all. What do you mean by that? The friend says, I don't quite know, but let's examine it. I hope you are all following all this; because it's your life, not mine. It's your daily life - whether you live in this valley, New York or other big cities, all the cities of the world - it's our life. We have to understand that, not from another, but to examine the facts of our life; to look at ourselves as you look at yourself when you comb your hair or shaving: objectively, sanely, rationally, without any distortion, seeing things as they are, and not be frightened or ashamed; but to observe.

So the friend says, all my life I have tried to change from 'what is' to 'what should be'. I know violence, disorder, I've known all that very well. And that disorder and violence, I've tried to change; that is, to become from violence to non-violence; from disorder to order. Now is there - the other friend says - is non-violence a fact? Or just an imaginary conclusion, a reaction from the fact of violence? I hope we understand each other. I am violent; I project the idea of non-violence, because that's part of my conditioning. I have lived in disorder and I try to seek order; that is, to change 'what is' to 'what should be'. That's part of becoming. And that may be the cause of conflict. And so let's examine that carefully. You're examining it, not the speaker is examining it. I must constantly - one must constantly remember that. And the speaker will constantly remind his friend that it's not a one-sided conversation; it's not one-sided communication. We are both of us friends, you and the speaker are observing all this. The speaker is expressing it in words, but you are also observing it, not only the words but the fact. So the friend says, can this violence end? Not become non-violent. Can envy, greed, fear end? Not become courageous, free from this or that. That's the question. So the other friend says, I'll show it to you. Only perhaps this may be new to you, so please kindly listen most attentively.

First realize what we are doing; that is, 'what is' to become the ideal, which is 'what should be'. The ideal is non-existent, is non-fact. But 'what is' is a fact. Right? So let's understand 'what is' and not the idea of non-violence, which is absurd. This has been preached by various people in India, beginning with Tolstoy and others. This is our tradition, this is our conditioning; this is our attempt to become something. And we have never achieved anything. We have never become non-violent. Never. So let's examine carefully whether it is possible to end that which is, to end that disorder or violence. End, not become something. I hope we understand each other. The becoming implies time. This is very important to understand. When we talk about fear, which shall presently, we'll go into the question of time; which is extraordinarily complex.

So, sir, let's understand whether it's possible to end what is; not to change 'what is' into that which we would like to be. We'll take the question of violence. And if you prefer disorder, both are the same; it doesn't matter what you take. Violence is inherited from beyond all time, from the animal, from the ape and to us. We have inherited it. That's a fact, we are violent people. Otherwise we wouldn't be killing anybody; we wouldn't be hurting anybody; we wouldn't say a word against anybody; but we are by nature violent. Now what is the meaning of that word? To hold that word, feel the weight of that word, the complications of that word. Not merely physical violence: the terrorist throwing bombs; those terrorists who want to change society through various forms of disturbance and bombing and so on, they have never changed society. And there are the terrorists who do it for the fun of it. Violence is not only physical but psychological, much more. Violence is conformity, because to conform to something, not understand 'what is', but to conform, imitate. And violence must exist as long as there is division outwardly and inwardly. Conflict is the very nature of violence. The friend says, yes, I see that. That's fairly clear. Now how do you end it? How do you end the whole complex question of violence? He says, I understand very well that to become non-violent is a part of violence. Right? Part of violence; because you have projected from violence non-violence. And I understand that very clearly, that projection is really illusion. So I have rejected that concept, or that idea, that feeling that you must become non-violent. He says, I understand that very clearly. There is only this fact. Now, what am I to do?

And the friend says, don't ask me - listen carefully - don't ask me, but let's look at it. The moment you ask what to do, or how to do, you put the other fellow as your guide. You make him your authority; therefore friendship ceases. Right? So together let's look at it. Being free, work together from the idea of non-violence; observe what is violence; look at it; give attention to the fact, not escape from it, not rationalize it. Don't say, why you shouldn't be violent, it's part of myself. But if that is part of yourself, you'll always create wars, of different kinds: wars between yourself and your wife, wars, killing others and so on.

So look at it without conflict; you understand? Look at it as though it was not separate from you. You understand all this? This is rather difficult. Which is: violence is part of you, you are violent, like you are greedy. Greed is not separate from you. Suffering is not separate from you. Anxiety, loneliness, depression, all that is you. But our tradition, our education has said, you are separate from that. Right? So where there is separation, where there is duality, there must be conflict. Like the Jew, Arab, I'm taking that, probably you'll understand that better. Between the conflict of two great powers, division, and so on. So, it's you; you are that. You are not separate from that. The analyzer is not different from the analyzed. Right The friend says, I follow this a little more. Go on, explain a bit more. He says, I will.

We observe the tree, the mountain, you observe your wife and your children, and who is the observer and who is the observed? Please, I am going into it carefully, follow this. Is the observer different from the tree? Of course he is different, I hope. The observer is different from that mountain. The observer is different from the computer. But, is the observer different from anxiety? The anxiety is a reaction, put into words as anxiety, but the feeling is you. The word is different - please follow this - the word is different, but the word is never the thing. The thing is the feeling of anxiety, feeling of violence. The word 'violence' is not that. So watch carefully that the word doesn't entangle your observation. You are following? Because our brain is caught in a network of words. When I say, you are an American, you feel very proud.

When I call myself South African or a Zulu, I feel - you follow - something totally different. So one must be very careful that the language doesn't condition our thinking. This is quite a different problem. Right?

So the friend says to the other, observe this feeling without the word. If you use the word, you strengthen the past memories of that particular feeling. Are you following? This is the act of observation in which the word is not the thing and the observer is the observed. The observer who says, I am violent, that observer is violence. Right? So the observer is the observed. The thinker is the thought. The experiencer who says I must experience nirvana or heaven or what, is the experience. Right? The analyzer is the analyzed and so on. So look at that fact, of that feeling, without a word, without analyzing it, just look. That is, be with it. Be with this thing as is. Which means you bring all your attention to it. Right? By analyzing, examining, that's all waste of energy, whereas if you give your total attention, which is give all your energy to the feeling, then that feeling has total ending.

The friend says, are you mesmerizing me by being so vehement, by being so passionate about it? I say, no. I'm not stimulating you, I'm not telling you what to do. You yourself have realized that non-violence is non-fact, it's not real. What is real is violence. You yourself have realized it. You yourself have said, yes, I am violent; not I am separate from the violence. The word separates. But the fact of the feeling is me. Me is my nose, my eyes, my face, my name, my character, that's me. I am not separate from all that. When you separate, you act upon it. Right? Which means conflict. Therefore, you have fundamentally erased the cause of conflict when you are that, not separate from that. Is this clear? Right?

So we have - the friend says, I have learned something. I have learned a great phenomenon, which I have never realized before. Before I have separated my feelings as though I was different from my feeling. Now I realize the truth that I am that. Therefore I remain with it. And when you remain with it, hold it, you are out of that, that gives you tremendous energy. And that energy dissipates, ends that violence completely. Not for a day, not while you are sitting here, but it's the end of it.

So we can go on to the next question, if we have time. Oh, good, plenty of time. I hope you are not tired. We must now take up the question - two friends are asking - how to end fear? Because that's been one of our problems; from time beyond time, man has lived with fear. Fear of various kinds: fear of ending, death, fear of not gaining, fear of being a failure in life, fear of losing a job, fear of darkness, fear of what public will say; fear I might lose my wife, fear of so many kinds. Fear of being dull. When I see a bright man, intelligent, capable, alive, I am jealous of him; that's part of fear.

So, to understand the nature of fear, and the structure of fear; because out of fear we have created gods - you understand? If we are not afraid at all, we are the most liberated man on earth. Then you don't want gods. You are a god yourself. So to understand the nature of fear, we must examine very carefully time. Time is fear. I'm afraid of tomorrow; I'm afraid of that which has happened two years ago. Two years ago is the past; the past is time, and I'm afraid of what might happen tomorrow. That's part of time. I have a job, but I might lose it. That's time. Right? So we must understand, if we can, and go into this question very carefully, what time is.

Time exists not only physically, but psychologically. Time to learn a language, time is necessary to go from here to your home, time by the watch, time by the sun, rising and setting, the darkness of night and the light of day. There is physical time. To put together a computer needs time. You'll understand that better because you're all mechanically minded. That's not a sneer, please. So time is necessary at a certain area. Now we are questioning whether time exists at all psychologically, inwardly. That is, the word 'hope' - don't get depressed by all this; just look at it - the word 'hope' implies time. I hope to be; I hope to become; I hope to achieve; I hope to fulfil; I hope to reach heaven, enlightenment. All that psychologically demands time. We are saying time in one direction, one area is necessary, whether this psychological time may be a total illusion. The word illusion implies, the root meaning, etymological meaning of that word is, to play; to play with something. We play with illusions. Because that's fun. We take great pleasure in having a dozen illusions. The more the better, because the more neurotic they are. The word - that's why we are examining the word itself, the root meaning of that word is 'ludere', to play.

So, is there psychologically tomorrow? Look at it, don't deny it - I am asking my friend - don't get upset about it. Don't throw up your hands and say, buzz off. Look at it, watch it. Don't deny it or accept it. And you might deny it because you are conditioned. And being conditioned, you might say, I can't live with the idea of not having hope. That involves conditioning. Is it possible not to be conditioned? All these questions are interrelated. Conditioned: what does that mean? To be limited. Our brains are conditioned.

Please listen to all this - the friend is saying to the other, please listen to this. Because this is really important if you can understand it. Then you'll be an extraordinary person if you are free of your conditioning. Not that you will be extraordinary, therefore unconditioned, but understand it first, then naturally it happens. There are many scholars and scientists and others who say, human beings, the human brain will always be conditioned: by their language, by their food, by their clothes, environment, society, and all the rest of it. And you can modify that conditioning, but you can never be free from it. Great writers have written about it. We have discussed with prominent people who are convinced that human beings cannot be free from all conditioning.

So my friend says, tell me about it. Is it possible not to be conditioned? What is the factor of being conditioned? What causes the brain to be conditioned? First of all, it's conditioned, there is the demand for security. We're not advocating insecurity. Just listen to the whole story of it. We want security, both physically, which is natural - food, clothes and shelter, that's natural. Everybody in the world must have it, not just the few. And that security is denied when it is only for the few. There's poverty, therefore there must be conflict. So when the brain seeks - which is thought, naturally, you understand? The essence of the brain is thinking. That is the root, the nature of the brain, to think. But thinking has realized that it is in itself uncertain, therefore it seeks security. And that security through division - I am an American, my family, your family - and that security now is being denied; you can see it. So, is there a security which is not of time? You understand? Which is not of hope. You are following? Is there a security which is not put together by desire? Right? The friend says, yes; there is absolute security. Irrevocable security. The other friend says, show me. Don't be too clever about it. Don't say lot of things, just show me where there is security. But the other says, don't be so impatient. Look at it very carefully; that we need security; physical security. And that's being denied by all the division in the world: religious, political, racial, division of ideologies, wars. Physical security is gradually being eroded. So do something about that. So the desire to find security inwardly as separate human being is causing that. I hope you are following all this.

So find out if there is security inwardly. There is no security in attachment. Right? Attachment to my wife, to my friend, to my girl, to my man or attachment to an idea, to a concept, to an image. There's no security - right - in those. When you say, "I agree with you, there is no security in that," what happens? Before you had not examined this, you've just attached. But now, by examining it, there has been a radical change. You are following this? The brain has been conditioned by attachment. There in that attachment it sought security: to my wife, to my job, to an ideal; to some god. So, discovering that there is no security in any of that, what has happened to the brain? Please follow, watch this carefully. What has happened to your brain, which has been traditionally conditioned to be attached, hoping to find security in all this, and suddenly discovers there is no security in all this, what's happened to the brain? You follow this? There has been a total change. You understand all this?

As long as you cling to a particular comforting attachment, and in that attachment you sought security, and you find now, after very careful observation, that there is no security in that. The whole movement has moved away from it. So your brain is unconditioned. Right? And that unconditioning has been brought about because you saw the truth that in attachment there is no security. The seeing that there is no security in illusion is intelligence. That intelligence, the beginning of that, gives you absolute security in intelligence, not in attachment. You have got it? Right? Is this clear?

So, the friend says, now let's go back to fear. It's very interesting, all this, if you go into it; more fascinating than any cinema in the world. You take a long journey; an endless journey; that is, endless, infinite. Which implies, where there is intelligence, there is compassion. We'll go into that later.

So now, my friend and I are talking about fear. The friend says, is there an ending to it? Not for one day, or few hours, but the total ending of it. Because he realizes, he says, I realize what fear does. It darkens my whole life; it cripples my thinking; it's a physical shrinking; a nervous tension. I know very well, the friend says, what fear is. I know several forms of fear; but I am not concerned about the forms of fear, because if I can root out the cause, then I don't have to bother with the branches of it.

So the friend says, I am not concerned with the trimming of the tree of fear, but I am concerned with the ending of fear. Is that possible? Or must we everlastingly live with fear? Man has lived with fear, from thousands of years. And you come along and say, you can end it. What right have you to say it? Is it just another verbal friction Or is it a fact?

So the friend says, we'll go into it together. You must see it for yourself, not I see it and I tell you, and then you reject or accept; but together let's take the journey to find out whether it's possible to end fear; totally, psychologically. Then outwardly it will have its own expression. Right? When psychologically there is an ending of fear, then the ending has its own expression outwardly. Not the other way round. Is that clear? So the friend says, time is a factor of fear. That's a fact. And also thought is a factor of fear. I think tomorrow may be dangerous; I think I am going to be ill; I think what the public might say; I have a job but I might become unemployed.

So time and thought are the root of fear. Go into it slowly. We explained the nature of time. Right? Time is hope, time is becoming, time as learning how to drive a car and so on; outwardly and inwardly. Now, we see time is a factor of fear; obviously. That's clear. And also thought is a factor of fear. I am here; I might die. Thought says, I might die. So thought, without too elaborating the movement of thought, which is, thought is experience, knowledge from experience, knowledge is stored in the brain as memory, memory is the reaction to thought. And thought is always limited, because knowledge is always limited; experience is always limited. In the scientific world, in the biological world, however much knowledge they have, they have to have more, more. So knowledge now or in the past or in the future will always be limited. This is a fact. And so thought is limited. And whatever thought does, its action is limited. So time and thought are the root of fear.

The friend says, yes, I see that, but how am I to stop thought? I say, don't ask how. That's the easiest question to ask. And whom are you asking? I'm your friend, I'm not your guide, I'm not your guru, I'm not your authority; don't ask anybody ever how. But observe! Look very carefully. If time and thought are the root of fear, which they are - please listen, the friend says to the other, please listen carefully: they are the root of fear. And it's not how to stop thought or time; but see the fact that thought is the originator of fear. Realize that, see it. But you need time to go, or thought, to go from here to there. Right? You are sitting here, you have to go home, that requires time and thought. Otherwise you couldn't move. But psychologically, time and thought have bred fear. And you are fear; you are not separate from fear. Right? So the examiner of fear is the examined. Right? The examiner who says, time and thought are the root of fear, after looking at it carefully, that time and thought is you. You are the trap of fear. Get it? You are fear. This is a revelation, you understand; before you said, I am afraid, I will do something about it. I'll run away from it; I'll become courageous, I'll be this, I'll be that. Therefore there is conflict in that. Right? Whereas now you see for yourself that you are that, time and thought. So you can't do a thing about it. Right? I wonder if you realize this.

The friend says to the other, do you realize the immensity of that statement, the depth of it, that you are that, therefore you cannot possibly do a thing about it. Which means what? All action with regard to fear has ended. Right? See what happens then. Before you acted upon it; now you are not acting, you are no longer the actor. You are that; you are both the actor and the act. Right? You are that. What takes place when you are that? This is - please, this is part of meditation - look at it very carefully; take it in your hands, like a precious jewel, and look at it. You are that when all movement stops. You understand? When you realize you are that, all movements naturally stop. Movement is a waste of energy. Therefore - you understand - when there is no movement, you have that tremendous energy to look. And therefore there is the ending of it.

The friend says, I am tired. You have taken a long journey together through valleys and mountains and the meadows and groves. I have understood a great deal. I have not learned. I have learned nothing, but I have observed, and that observance has brought great light, great intelligence; and that intelligence operates - not me operating on that. Right?

One thinks it is right to put questions, but to whom are you putting questions? To oneself, or to somebody that you hope will answer correctly, precisely, perhaps logically and sanely? Is the question more important than the answer? Does the answer lie in the question? Please, we are talking it over together. The question and the answer, are they similar? Or is the answer more important than the question? So we are going together to find out. In understanding the question, in delving deep into it, we might come upon the answer. The answer is not outside the question. When we go into it perhaps you will see it, we'll see it together, the full significance of that. If one puts a question, you expect someone else to answer it. In that is involved the whole problem of somebody who knows, and he will answer according to his knowledge, according to his information, his data, and so on. Is there somebody who will answer all our human questions, or we have to rely entirely upon ourselves, and not depend on anybody.

Please, we are talking the thing over together. We are not the final oracle, from Delphi. You know that? And in investigating the question, seeing what the question implies, perhaps in that very implication we'll be able to understand the answer. So the answer does not lie outside the question.

And it's important also to put the right question. Then one asks, what is the right question? A question can be quite superficial: what kind of food should I eat? There are lots of questions like that. Should I take exercise? Do you advocate yoga? Those are rather, one considers, rather superficial; though they have certain necessities. But to delve deeply into a question, and to find out why one puts the question. As we have been saying in all these talks, during all these years, doubt, scepticism are necessary: to doubt one's own thinking, questioning one's own attitudes and conclusions and perceptions, to be sceptical what another says, whether he is very learned, a specialist, and so on. Questioning, doubting, being somewhat sceptical helps the brain to clear itself. I hope we are following this together. Because our brains are rather clouded and conditioned. And one can put a question from that background and wait for somebody to explain, go into it, as the analyst and the analyzer, and find out the answer from another. And as we have no leaders, no gurus, no specialists in the human problems, one has to understand all this oneself. I hope this we are clear on this matter. If we are clear, then we can go on with the questions.

I haven't read these questions.

1st QUESTION: What is an artist - no, sorry - what is the role of the artist in life and what is the significance of music, poetry, and all art in our relationship to each other and the world.

Are you interested in this question?

First of all, we must be clear what we mean by art. The word 'art', The word art from Greek and so on, Latin, is to join; to adjust; to put things together. That's the root meaning of that word. It also, in Sanskrit means measure, manner, use. The root meaning, we are talking of the etymological meaning. And the questioner asks, what is the role of art in our lives? Having seen what the root meaning of that word is, the root meaning, what is beauty?

Beauty is not something put together. So, we are going to enquire together into the meaning of that word, the significance of that word, the content of that word. I'm not a professor. I'm sorry to sit on a platform, which I don't like, but one has to do it for the convenience of others; otherwise you wouldn't see me if I sat on the ground. I would like to sit on the ground, but I have to sit here.

It's a very complex question, this. If we can go very deeply into it, it has great significance. Art implies, doesn't it, a flowing melodious manner of space, weight, grouping together, and depth. Are there some artists here? I said - the speaker said, a flowing melodious manner of space, depth and grouping together, of words, sentences, or a painting on a canvas or a sculpture or a poem, or literature. Is that right? A flowing melodious manner of space, of depth, of grouping certain things together: trees, people, words; all that is a form of art. Do you agree to this at all? That is, if there is no space, if you see something, say a painting - I hope somebody will correct me if I am wrong - if you see a picture, a painting by the masters, classical masters or recent ones, really great painters, there is space, a sense of space. The figures are grouped together in a certain way; there is a certain depth to it, in colour; in the sense of movement, and it must be melodious. And when you see some of these paintings of landscape, they may paint a little cottage in a field, with a few trees, but there is space; and there is depth of colour, proportion, a sense of harmony, Right? And that would be great painting.

And one has visited - as perhaps you as a tourist, most of the major museums of the world, and one sees all these great masters, from Holland, Italy, England, America, and so on. So we are asking: What is beauty? Is beauty according to a principle? According to certain rules? You follow? Or, beauty is something entirely different, though there must be proportion and all the rest of it.

When we look at a mountain there, when you see those mountains, those hills: range after range, blue in the evening, and early morning when the sun touches it before everything else; when you see that the reaction is either great silence - you keep quiet; there is space, enormous space, between you and that; and beyond. And when you see such marvellous beautiful mountains, snowclad against the blue sky, for an instant you become silent. The very beauty, the very grandeur, the majesty of the mountain keeps you, makes you absolutely quiet. You can say, the shock of beauty. I hope you are looking at those mountains, not at me. The speaker is not important, at all. But what he says may be important and may not be important, but you have to discover for yourself. So when you see something extraordinarily grand, of great height and depth then the very shock of that beauty drives away for the moment all your problems. There is no self wondering, worrying, talking to itself, there is no entity, the self, the me, looking. At that moment when the self is not, there is great beauty. Right? I wonder if you follow all this?

And the questioner asks, what is the role of art in our lives? I don't know. But we're going to find out together.

Why should anything play a role? Please, this is an important question. Why should anything play a role in our lives? The greatest art is the art of living; the greatest, not the paintings, the sculpture, the poems, and the marvellous literature. That has its certain place, but to find out for oneself the art of living, that's the greatest art, it surpasses any role in life.

So, some of the great painters in their lives are neurotic; very, very disturbed lives, like Beethoven, and others, very disturbed. And that disturbance perhaps may help them to write great music. Or, if one led an aesthetic life - are we following each other - aesthetic life, and that life is based on - life is based on relationship; there is no life without relationship. And aesthetic is the capacity of perception; right? Are we meeting each other or am I just talking to myself? Capacity to perceive, which means one must be extraordinarily sensitive. And sensitivity is not shouting, yelling. But sensitivity comes from the depth of silence. Shall I go on? It's no good going to colleges and universities to learn how to be sensitive. Or go to somebody to teach you how to be sensitive. As we said, aestheticism is the capacity to perceive; and you cannot perceive if there is not a certain depth of silence. If you look at these trees in silence - there is a communication which is not merely verbal, but a communication, a communion with nature. And most of us have lost our our relationship with nature: with the trees, with the mountain, with all the living things of the earth.

And sensitivity in our relationship, to be aware of each other, is that at all possible? That's the art of living, to find out; a relationship that is not conflict, that's a flow of a melodious manner, of living together. You understand this? Without all the rows, quarrels, possessiveness and being possessed, fear of loneliness, you follow? The whole cycle of human struggle.

The art of living is far more important than the art of great painters. It may be that we are escaping through music from ourselves; through going into all the museums of the world and talking about them endlessly; reading about books on art. All that may be an escape from our own troubles, anxieties, depressions. So can we live an aesthetic life of deep perception? Be aware of our words, be aware of the noise of this country; the vulgarity of human beings. Because one learns far more in silence than in noise. This all may sound platitudes, but they are not. This requires a great deal of observation of oneself. That observation is prevented by any form of authority; looking to another to teach us how to observe; just to observe, watch, the way we walk, the way we talk, the noise, you know all that goes on. Then out of that comes the art of living.

Art, as we said, is putting things together harmoniously; to observe the contradictions in oneself, one's desires that are always so strong, to observe all that, not create an opposite of it, just to observe the fact and live with the fact. It seems that's the way to bring about a life of melodious harmony. Have we answered the question? Sir, don't bother to clap. I don't know why you do, maybe you like to feel that we have said right things and you appreciate it, but what the speaker has said is what you are thinking, I hope, therefore, don't clap for the speaker.

2nd QUESTION: Is not the observation of thought a continuing use of thought and therefore a contradiction?

Let's examine the question first. Is not the observation of thought a continuing use of thought and therefore a contradiction? When you observe that tree, are you looking at it with all the memories of trees that you have seen, with the shade under the tree under which perhaps you have sat, and the pleasure of a morning; sitting quietly under a tree looking at all the beauty of the leaves, the branches, the trunk, and the sound of the trunk. When you observe all that, are you observing through words, or you are observing through remembrances? Or the memories of those pleasant evenings you have sat under a tree or looked at a tree, then you are looking through the structure of words. Therefore you are not actually observing. Is that right? So, are we aware that we look at everything through a network of words? Words being the past meaning the usage of certain words with their content, with their remembrances and so on. That is, are you looking at a tree or a single star in the heavens, as it was last night with the new moon and Venus behind, together - are you looking at it with words, or you are looking at the whole phenomena of yesterday evening without a single word.

So is observation a perception, a process of thought? Which is a verbal communication to each other, the usage of words which contain the past memories and incidents and so on, or there is pure observation without time; time being thought; time being memory. So please find out. Let's find out what we actually do. Can we look at a person with whom we have lived for a number of days or years without all the past remembrances and incidents, and the pleasures and the comforts that one has derived from that person; or the antagonism, you follow, the whole process of it? Can you observe as though you are meeting the person for the first time? You may remember his face or her face; of course, that is necessary, otherwise it's rather troublesome. But to look at a person, to be so sensitive to a person; and that sensitivity is not possible when there is always the past memory projecting itself all the time. Right?

So from that one asks a question: can thought be aware of itself? This is a rather complex question, I hope - one hopes you don't mind looking at the complexity of it. Can thought, the whole process of thinking, can that thinking be aware of itself, or there is a thinker who is aware of his thoughts? You understand the question? Is this becoming difficult for you? You are interested in all this?

(3rd) Questioner: May I interrupt a moment, sir? I wonder if the group might find it a little more interesting if you could address yourself to some of the striking statements that are in your tapes and books that I have read. I will give you an example of the sort of thing that could be answered, I think relatively briefly, and might be very stimulating. In one tape you refer to marriage as 'that terrible institution'. My question would be, could you elaborate? Do you think a young man and a young woman, for example, should live together without marriage? People should not live together, that kind of thing. And I have other things.

K: All right, sir. Let's have some fun.

Let's answer that question; we'll come back to this. One may live with another person, sexually or in relationship with another, and take the responsibility, entire responsibility, both of us, and continue with that responsibility, not change when it doesn't suit you. When that other person doesn't satisfy you in various different ways. Right? Or, you go through marriage, which is, get a license, go to church and the priest blesses the couple, you know, and there you are tied, legally. And that tie, legally, gives you more the feeling of being more responsible. Right? That you are held by a law. Are you waiting for me to answer this? You are held there by law, and with it goes a responsibility that's one thinks is enduring, lasting. What's the difference between the two? You're legally controlled, it takes time to get a divorce, you have children, and the children may hold you together for a while, until they grow up; and then when they grow up, you say goodbye to each other perhaps; or get a divorce and all the rest of it. If the other, which is not legalized marriage, and if there is a responsibility as much as in the other, and perhaps more, then what's the difference between the two? Either it is responsibility based on law, either the responsibility of convenience, necessity, comfort, and sexual and all the other demands - where is the question of love in all this? Right?

Each one of us, each one, wife and the husband or girl and the boy or whatever it is, are they ever together, except sexually? Whether they are legally married or not legally married, together. They may hold hands in public as they embrace each other in public, as they do in this country - right? In Asia, that's rather considered immoral, immodest, and they do it quietly by themselves in their house. So what's the difference between the two. And where is love in all this? Please answer this question for yourself.

Is love the pursuit of desire? Is love pleasure? Sexual and other forms of pleasure? Is love mere companionship, depending on each other? Is love attachment? Go on, sir, enquire all this. And if one negates intelligently - because you see the reason of it, that attachment is not love, nor detachment, remembrance of each other's past incidents and pressures and insults and all that, living together day after day, month or year after year; the stored-up memories, the pictures, the imagination, all that's not love, surely. When you negate all this, which is through negation, you come to the positive. But if you start with the positive, you end up with negation. That's what you are all doing. Right? Am I saying things which are true or incorrect?

So, that gentleman asked a question, why doesn't the speaker talk about all that? Sir, what is important in life? What is the root or the basic essential in life? As one observes more and more, in television, and literature, magazines, and all the things that are going on, it is becoming more and more superficial; quick answers. If you are in trouble, go to a specialist; they'll tell you what to do. It's all becoming so superficial and vulgar. If one may use that word without any sense of derogatory or insulting. It's all becoming so superficial and rather childish.

And one never asks what is the fundamental questions or fundamental necessity or the depth of life. Surely not beliefs; not dogmas; not faith; not all the intellectual rigamarole, whether in the Communist theology or the Catholic theology, Marxist theology or Lenin or St Thomas Aquinas; they're all the same theory; conclusions and ideologies, based on belief, faith, dogma, rituals. So all that is becoming more and more, in one's life, outwardly, very, very, very superficial. Just out there. And we live like that. This is a fact, I am not saying anything which is not so.

And this marvellous world of entertainment, both religious and football; anything to escape: yell, shout, never quiet conversation, never look at anything quietly, beautifully. So what is the fundamental, basic demand or basic thing that is really of the utmost importance in one's life?

Q: Do you want us to answer?

K: You can answer, sir, if you want to.

Q: The answer is compassion. Compassion.

K: I know, I know, I've heard it. When you use that word, are you again using that word superficially or there is compassion in you? You understand? When you say, yes, compassion, that becomes utterly superficial, you have already stamped it. The word compassion means passion for all; not just for your family. And you cannot have compassion if you are attached to any belief, to any dogma; if there is not complete freedom, there cannot be compassion. And with compassion there is intelligence. So if you say compassion, love is the root of all things in life, in the universe, in all our relationship and action; to find that out, to come upon it; to live with it and act from there - then marriage or not marriage - then you are no longer an individual, there is something else entirely different from one's own petty little self.

Right, sir? Is there another question you would like to ask on that level? Or can we go on with this question; which is really quite important, if we can go into it seriously. We asked: can thought be aware of itself?

That is, thought has created the thinker - right - separate from his thought. Isn't that so? Have you got it? That is, there is the thinker who then says I must be aware of what I think; I must control my thoughts, I must not let my thoughts wander. So there is the thinker separate from his thought. And the thinker acts upon the thought. Right? Now, is the thinker different from thought? Or the thinking, thought, has created the thinker. You understand the question? There is no thinker without thought. Right? Do we meet each other on this? Please, because this is rather important, because if we can find out why this duality exists in us, the opposite, the contradiction, the 'me' and the thought: the 'me' as the thinker, the one who witnesses, the one who observes, and the thing to be observed. That is, the thinker then controls thought. Right? Shapes thought, puts thought into a mould; but is the thinker different from thought? Has not thought created the thinker?

Q: I can see it logically.

K: Wait, sir, first of all let's be logical. Or let us see it intellectually, which is what? Verbally. Verbally I can see very clearly that there is the division between the thinker and the thought, and thought has created the thinker. So the thinker is the past, with his memories, with his knowledge, all put together by thought, which has come into being after experiences and so on, so it is the whole activity of the past, the thinker. Agreed? Clear? And then it says, thinking is something different from me who is the thinker. Right? You accept that logically, intellectually; why? Not you, sir, but we all do. We all say, yes, I understand it intellectually very quickly. But why? Why do we say that, I understand it intellectually?

Q: It seems obvious.

K: No. No. Go into it, sir, why do we say, first reaction, I understand intellectually. Why? Is it not because we never look at the whole thing. We only look at something intellectually. Now, the speaker explained very carefully, logically, the thinker and the thought. And you accept that logically. And I say, why do you do that? Why does one do that? Is it that the intellect is highly developed with most of us, or developed much more than our sensitivity, our immediate perception. Right? Of course. Because we are trained from childhood to acquire, to memorize, right? To exercise the brain, certain parts of the brain, which is to hold what has been told, informed, and keep on repeating it. So when you meet something new, you say, I understand intellectually. But one never meets the new totally, whole, that is, intellectually, emotionally, with all your senses awakened; you never receive it completely. You receive it partially; right? And the partial activity is the intellectual activity. It's never the whole being observing. You say, yes, that's logical. And we stop there. We don't say, why is it that only part of the senses are awakened? Intellectual perception is partial sensitivity, partial senses acting; to create a dynamo, to do that you have to think intellectually. In creating a computer, in putting computer together, you don't have to have all your emotions and your senses, you have become mechanical, and repeat that. So the same process is carried when we hear something new, say I understand intellectually. We don't meet it entirely. So the statement has been made but we don't receive it totally.

So the problem arises out of this, why is it that we never meet anything, especially when you see a tree or the mountains, or the movement of the sea, with all your senses highly awakened. Why? Is it not that we live always partially? That is, we always live in a limited sphere, limited space in ourselves. It's a fact. So to look, if you will now, look at those mountains with all your senses. Which means when that act takes place, all your senses - your eyes, your ears, your nerves, the whole response of the organism which is also the brain, look at that whole thing entirely. Then when one does, there is no centre as the 'me' who is looking. Right?

So we are asking, can thought be aware of itself? That's rather a complex question, because this requires very careful observation. Thought has created wars; right? Through nationalism, through sectarian religion; Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist. Thought has created all this; right? You are quite sure? God has not created all this: the hierarchy of the church; the Pope, all the dress, all the rituals, the swinging of the incense, the candles; right? All that paraphernalia that goes on in cathedral or in a church is put together by thought, copied, some of it, from the ancient Egyptians, and so on; from the ancient Hindus, Egyptians, Jews and so on. It's all thought. Right? So God is created by thought.

A man who has no fear whatsoever of dying, living, problems, no fear whatsoever, does he need god? So thought has put all this together. One can see what thought has done, step by step; right?

So thought can be aware of its own action; you are following? I wonder if you are following all this. So that there is no contradiction between the thinker and the thought; between the observer and the observed. When there is no contradiction, there is no effort. It's only when there is contradiction, which is division, there must be effort. So to find out whether it's possible to live a life without a single shadow of effort, contradiction, one must investigate the whole movement of thought. And one hasn't the time or the inclination; one is too busy; too much to do. But one has plenty of time when one wants to do something; when you want to play golf you have any amount of time.

So to find out what's the activity of thought, to watch it - that's part of meditation.

4th QUESTION: You have said that quietness, silence, comes unsought. But can we live in ways that will allow it to come more readily.

I don't quite know what it means.

Oh, yes, it can, by taking a pill. No? By taking a drug; get drunk. Look at the question. He wants something readily, you don't want to squeeze the orange, but you buy the orange in a tin. You follow? Something readily, quickly.

Have you ever enquired into what is silence? What is silence? What is peace? Is peace between two wars? That's what's happening, what we call peace, it's between two wars. This war, like the next war, is to end all wars. Do you understand that? You have understood that phrase? This war, like the next war, is to end all wars. That is, is peace between two noises, is peace between two wars, is peace between two rows, quarrels? So what is silence? It cannot naturally be bought in a shop or pharmacy; right? We would like to buy it quickly and get on with it. But silence cannot be bought nor peace cannot be bought. Right? If that is so, what is silence?

Silence must mean space, mustn't it? I can be very silent in a small space. Enclose myself, shut my eyes, and put a wall round myself, concentrate on some potty little affair, and in that there can be certain amount of peace, certain amount of silence. Right? I can go into my den, my reading room or quiet room and sit there; but the space is limited when I do that. Not only my little room, but in my brain also, the space is very, very limited. Right? Because most of us have never even asked about, thought about all this.

So what is space? Is space from one point to another? Is space a limited dimension? Or, space without a centre? Therefore without a centre, therefore no border. You understand? As long as I have me, my problems, my selfish demands, my, my, my, it's very limited. Right? That limitation has its own small space. But that little space is a form of self-protective wall, to remain in there, not to be disturbed, not to have problems, not to have - you follow - all the trouble and so on. So, as for most of us, that space of the self is the only space we have. And from that space we are asking what is space. I wonder if you follow all this?

Am I making the question clear?

Q: Sure. You are saying we've got to have space, so that we can have an understanding of silence. We need to have space so that we can have an enjoyment, find the time for the pleasure of silent melody; space; we can't enjoy. or understand silence or have silence without space.

K: Of course. Space to understand, space to enjoy. But always that's limited, isn't it? So where there is limitation, there cannot be vast space. That's all. And space implies silence. Noise doesn't imply space. I don't know if one sees that. All the noise that is going on in towns, between people, and all the noise of modern music, there's no space, there is not silence anywhere, just noise. It maybe pleasant or unpleasant, that's not the point.

So what does it mean to have space? Space between two notes on the piano; that's a very small space. Or silence between two people who have been quarrelling, and later on resume the quarrelling. Right? All that is a very, very limited space, so is there a space that's limitless? Not in heaven; not in the universe, but in ourselves, in our whole way of living, to have space; not imaginative, not romantic, but actual feeling of vast sense of space.

Now, you will say, yes, I understand that intellectually. But to receive that question, what is space, what's the content of that, to receive it, entirely, with all your senses, then you will find out what it is, if there is such a vast space which is related to the universe.

What time is it?

Q: Quarter to one.

K: May I go on with one more question? You aren't tired?

5th QUESTION: Is there such a thing as a true guru? Is there ever a right use of mantra?

I think it is necessary to understand the meaning of that word, those two words, guru and mantra. They are two Sanskrit words. Guru: do you know what it means? The root meaning of that word, I've been told by many Sanskrit scholars, the real meaning is 'weight'. W-e-i-g-h-t, you know. And also it means, one who dispels illusion. Right? And also it means, one who points. Points; not a way, just points. And one who does not impose his illusions on you; his stupidities on you. Please, this is the meaning of that word.

And also, the meaning, the root meaning of the word mantra means to ponder over not becoming. And also it means, dissolve, put away, all self-centred activity. You understand? Ponder over not becoming; and also dissolve, put away, banish all self-centred activity. Right? Guru means all that, mantra means all this.

And the questioner asks, is there a true guru? In Northern India, they call an educator, teacher of a elementary school 'guru'. They call them guruji; because he is teaching; informing. Now, the word 'guru', has been brought over from that unfortunate country to this country, and they are making millions and millions and millions of money out of it. Telling you what to do, Giving you mantras for $500 or $100 or $2, to repeat it. And when you repeat something constantly day after day, your brain becomes what it is.

And there is no right guru, there is only the wrong guru. Because nobody can teach you anything except for yourself. They can teach you how to read, write, mathematics, biology, and so on; but nobody can teach you what you are, about yourself and whether there is freedom from all that tradition, from all the tremendous conditioning of centuries. That implies you are the teacher and the disciple, there is no teacher or a disciple outside you, You understand the implication of this?

We depend on others; which is natural. I depend - one depends on the postman, on the doctor, on the computer expert; how to put together a motor; you depend on all that. On the pharmacist, chemist. And also we think it is necessary that we depend inwardly on others; on my wife I depend, of course, in several ways I have to depend, she has to depend on me, I have to depend on her. But the dependence becomes gradually attachment and all the agony of attachment begins.

So learning about oneself is infinite. You understand? Learning is infinite. Not about books, that has certain limitations; all knowledge is limitation. Obviously, sir, obviously, right? There is no complete knowledge about anything, even the scientists admit it. They are always adding - more and more and more, so knowledge is always limited, now or in the future. And outward knowledge is necessary and that same wave, that continues inwardly, Right? That we must know ourselves. Right? The Greeks - before the Greeks they said 'know yourself'. And 'know yourself' doesn't mean go to somebody and find out about yourself. It means watch what you are doing, what you are thinking, your behaviour, your words, your gestures, the way you talk, the way you eat, watch. Not correct, not say this is right or wrong, just watch, And to watch there must be silence. And in that watching there is learning. And therefore when you are learning you become the teacher. So you are both the teacher and the disciple; and nobody else on earth.

I do not know if you have not noticed in this world, more and more, there are institutions, foundations, associations, for various things, outwardly and inwardly. Right? Foundation for right action, for right thinking, foundation; each holding on to his own little foundation. You might just say, why do you have foundations? I'll tell you. This foundation exists merely to maintain schools, ordinary schools, both in India, where there are six schools, in England, and here at Ojai. And to publish books and to arrange the talks, and nothing else! No spiritual - I dislike that word - no religious content behind that word.

So when one understands the meaning of the word guru, and mantra, they become very, very serious. Mantra means to dissolve the whole structure of becoming. So it means there is no evolution for the self, for the psyche. That's very complex, I won't go into that. And there is nobody that can free oneself, nobody outside, except one's own inward integrity, great humility to learn.

OJAI 2ND QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 19TH MAY 1983

May we go on with the questions?

One wonders, if one may, why you all come. I'm not insulting; I'm just asking. What is the motive of your coming? What is the background or what's the intention that we all get together here? Is it out of curiosity or trying to find out for oneself what it's all about - life, I mean; or you want to hear the speaker; or you want to gather what kind of person he is, either he is a hypocrite, or sane or rational. I wonder why one comes to all these meetings, or goes to any meeting.

If one is sceptical, which I hope some of us are, and questions, not only what others might say, or what one might oneself do, but question, be doubtful of one's own judgments, evaluations, one's own case. Then that has extraordinary importance. But just to listen, or hear a few words, agree or disagree, but if you could be very clear, the intention of our coming here, then that intention, if it is right and honest, has some kind of depth in it. If it's merely to gather a few ideas, few statements, I'm afraid that it'll have not much value.

So may we go on with the questions?

1st QUESTION: Why don't you be more practical and not so abstract in what you are saying?

I wonder what one means, practical? The word practical means 'fit to act'. And also it has another meaning: action repeated, habitual action. And more complex explanations of that word.

Are we practical? When there are wars going on, after many, many thousands of years and the continuation of war, is that practical? Or is it a habitual performance? We have done this for thousands of years, killing each other not only with guns and other means of destroying people but calumny, hate, all the violent things that are going on in the world. Is all that practical? Or we are so used to it - that kind of way of living, and we accept that as the most practical. And the questioner says, why don't you be more practical, and not so beastly abstract? The word 'abstraction' means to divide; to separate; to draw away; to draw away from the fact; to draw away from what one is, actually is; make an abstraction; to separate from that which we feel, which we realize to be so, make an abstraction of it separate from what we feel to what we should be. That's an abstraction. So the questioner asks, why don't you be more practical and not so abstract in what you are talking about?

So are we practical at all? Except perhaps earning a livelihood, having a skill, being a good carpenter, good chemist, a good writer or an excellent thinker. But to be practical, that is, to live a life, if one may point out - we are not advising, only fools advise, but just pointing out, because we are both of us thinking together what it means to be practical. We have defined the meaning of the word according to various good English dictionaries, and dictionaries are the common usage of words, and the meaning of those words.

Practical means, doing, acting repeatedly; thinking, hating, calumny, all that. Being violent: is that all practical? Or we are so used to it, we keep on repeating this action and reaction: you hate me and I hate you; you are violent, I become violent. You hit me, I hit you. This is the pattern that we have repeated through centuries.

You might say, have you not done something? Not practical.

That is, have you done anything, you, the speaker, which is not reaction; which is habitual response; repeated action. We must be clear about what we mean by action. Either one has a moral action, action based on some kind of moral values, moral, aesthetic perception, and if one does something, if another does something which is not correct, which is not moral, then you have a certain relationship, certain responsibility to act. That may not be habitual; a repeated action.

And the questioner also wants to know: why are you talking in abstraction. Are we? Is the speaker talking in abstraction? Or he is pointing out what we are all doing, each one of us; not judging each other; not condemning or slandering, but watching.

In that watching oneself and others, if there is not that quality of silence, then from that watching you can make an abstraction from what actually is, separate it into an idea. The original meaning of the word 'idea' and 'ideals', the Greek meaning and so on, 'to observe.' Idea means to observe. Not make an abstraction of what you observe. I observe the tree, the thing called tree, and I make an abstraction of it, separate it from my perception from that, make an idea of it, and so the actuality of the tree and the idea of a tree are two different things.

Suppose I am afraid. That is an actuality, fear is an actuality. But the abstraction of that, which is to separate from the fact into, "I should not be afraid" is an abstraction. Or, I must cultivate courage, that's an abstraction of the fact that I am afraid. So the idea, which we now accept, is something separate from the fact. Right? So when we are talking about abstraction, we mean bringing about a division between the actual and make an idea of it, and pursue the idea, not the fact. That's what we are doing all the time. The Communists have certain ideologies; very strong, brutal, and all the rest of it. So the so-called free countries have also certain concepts, values, judgments. There is poverty in the world. Now the abstraction of that is, what to do. And each one of us, or each group, or each political party, says this should be done, that should be done. So they are involved in ideas, not with the fact. You can't quarrel about a fact. Right? The sun is hot today; that's a fact.

So to solve a question like poverty, it's no good making an ideology about it, make an abstraction about it. But face the fact whether it's possible to solve poverty in the world. Not through ideas, through concepts. And that's only possible when there is a global relationship, not political relationship. That global relationship can only exist when, there are no nationalities. Right? Obviously. And as poverty is increasing in the world, that poverty can only be solved, not by political parties or socialist parties or various type of parties, but the realization that - which is a fact, not an abstraction - fact that as long as there are these divisions, which are abstractions from the fact, this problem of poverty cannot possibly be solved. Right?

Then one says, what am I to do? As a person living in a country that's full of nationalistic and patriotic spirit, what am I to do? It's very simple: don't be a nationalist. Don't belong to any group, any association, you know, all the rest of it. As long as there is a separative action with regard to a problem, that problem will never be solved. Or rather, that problem in the resolution of that problem there'll be a thousand other problems. I hope this is clear.

So what we are saying seems to be fairly practical; practical in the sense, something that can be done. Not the habitual repeated action, but something that is practical, obvious, sane, rational. Right? Is the question answered? Or shall we go on to the next one.

Americans are supposed to be very practical people, and that's why they pollute all the rivers; pollute the air, destroy the forest, all the marvellous animals of the world, they're all very practical people. Killing baby seals - you know all that, what's happening. And we never question why human beings kill. Not make an abstraction of it; but why do we kill; either with words, with a gesture, with some kind of tricks and so on. Or actually kill each other and nature and the animals of this world. Why has killing become a pattern of our life? You might say, we have done this for the last million years, that's the habitual, repeated action. And so that we call very practical. We never question these so-called practical, habitual, repeated actions: going to the church every Sunday - if you do at all; or obeying some clique or leader, a small group, enclosing by itself and resisting everything else - why do we do all this?

Is it that we want security? And is there security in separation? In division? There is a marvellous example of what is going on in Beirut, or the Israelis and the Arabs. We're all one, human beings, and we have separated ourselves into races, religions, and keep to that pattern, that programme. We have been programmed, like a computer, and we keep on repeating that. And that we call very practical.

So is it possible to be somewhat different? Or I was just going to say, impractical.

2nd QUESTION: Most of my energy and time goes into the struggle to earn a living. Is it possible for me and those like me to be deeply unselfish and intelligent?

Do you want to go into this question? Why are you so eager? Not about the other - the other question was being practical and not abstract, not talk in abstractions.

This is our life; this is our everyday life. Those who are lucky have their own means and they don't have to work endlessly. There are very few of such type. And there are those who have been fortunate or unfortunate to gather money that doesn't necessarily belong to them and live a secluded, somewhat selfish life. And those people who have to earn daily bread from nine to five, factory, office, labour, carpentry and so on, we spend a great deal of energy in all that. And so we, the questioner says, I have very little time to enquire into this business of selfishness and intelligence. I have not much energy. My energy is dissipated; in work; in doing. Right? Is that so?

One has to work, as society is structured, one has to work to earn a livelihood. Or you can live on dole, or what is called Social Security. If we really enquire whether how we waste our energy; not, all my energy is taken away through daily work, but we should enquire really how we waste our energy; whether it's possible to conserve energy, and use it when necessary, and retain it when it's not. Am I making myself clear?

How do we waste our energy? Please understand my question. Not how to use energy, that energy which demands enquiry in being unselfish and intelligence, but rather let's enquire, approach this question from a different point of view, which is, to find out how we waste energy. Right? Then it'll be very clear. Do we waste energy by chattering? Endless talk? Right? Most of us do - endless talk. And is it a wastage of energy to be constantly in conflict - in the office; at home; and so on? Right? Is not conflict within oneself and outside a wastage of energy?

Not how to be free of conflict, for the moment; but to observe how we waste our energy: conflict, the concept or an illusion that we are individuals, and so fighting everybody. Right? Against everybody; enclosing ourselves in a little, neurotic state, building a wall round ourselves through fear, and so on. That's also a great deal of wastage of energy. Right? And to pursue an ideal is a wastage of energy, not the ending of a fact. I don't know if I am making myself clear.

Suppose one is violent; you pursue non-violence, which is non-fact. The pursuit of non-violence is a wastage of energy. Whereas to understand the nature of violence; go into it deeply, the complexity of violence, and see if it is possible to end it, that's not a wastage of energy. But to pursue a non-fact, which is the ideal, whether it's a political ideal, or Marxist ideal, Communist ideal, is a wastage of energy. Isn't it a wastage of tremendous energy, building armaments against each other? No? I don't know if you have been listening to some of the television explanations of how Russia is building up its armament, and America - as you listen to it very carefully, it all seems so insane. So extraordinarily irrational. So one wonders if one is going mad. Probably most of the people who are involved in all this are rather neurotic in different ways. Probably most of us are.

So to find out for oneself how we waste our energy. And the greatest waste of energy is to be concerned with oneself. No? Because to be concerned with oneself, with one's neurotic state, and to be unaware of it, to be concerned with one's own issues and one's own problems, one's own achievements, is a very, very limited energy; it's very limited. And therefore your energy is limited. But when there is freedom from that there is immense energy. But to be free from that concern with oneself and with one's hurts and in return wanting to hurt others; that concern with oneself is bringing about great chaos in the world. To seek one's own enlightenment, following your own particular little guru, is such a wastage of energy. We'll talk about it more when we talk about meditation. So is it possible not to waste energy along all these lines?

And if you have that energy, what will you do with it? Will one become more mischievous? More violent? More beastly? So in the conservation of energy - you follow? - which comes about by understanding the wastage of energy, conserving that energy, not that you conserve energy; when there is energy not wasted, there is energy. In the discovery how you waste your energy, there is the beginning of intelligence. Right? That intelligence is not wastage of energy. That intelligence is extraordinarily alive.

One cannot possibly be intelligent if one is selfish. Right? Selfishness is part of division; separation: I am selfish and you are selfish; in our relationship we are selfish. So to understand the nature of the wastage of energy, not only superficially, but very, very deeply, out of that investigation, probing, questioning, one comes to a certain quality of energy which is the outcome of intelligence; not merely setting aside wastage of energy. I wonder if you understand this. Can I go on with it or do you want to go to the next question

So we really should ask also here: what is intelligence? Are those people who are very, very learned, are they intelligent? I'm not saying they are not, I'm questioning. Are those people who are politicians and building armaments and so on, are they intelligent? Is intelligence merely the activity of thought? However that thought be attenuated, more subtle, more complex. Is the very activity of thought intelligence? I hope you are questioning. One hopes that both of us are thinking together in this matter, in all these matters; not that the speaker is saying and you are listening, but together we are investigating this question of intelligence, as we did the wastage of energy and what is practical, what is abstract. So we are questioning together what is intelligence. We are asking, is thinking, however subtle, however complex, all the activities of thought, including invention, putting very, very complex machinery together, the computer, like a robot, like a missile, or the extraordinary machine of a submarine, or these beautiful aeroplanes; they're all the result of tremendous activity of thought. And also the activity of thought is how we use them. Right? Basing on our ideologies, use, profit, various forms of motives.

So we are asking a very fundamental question: whether thought in all its extraordinarily complex activities and very superficial activities, is intelligence the root of thought? Thought is limited, because thought is based on experience, knowledge derived from experience, as memory stored in the brain, and the reaction to that brain is thought. If there is no memory, if there is no knowledge, if there is no experience, there is no thinking. Right? Every little thing on this earth, the smallest little thing, must have the quality of thought; instinct. But human beings like us, we have evolved - supposed to be. And our greatest instrument is thought. And that thought is actually very limited; because knowledge is always - past, present and future - will be limited. Obviously. As in the scientific world, in the biological world, in the world of machinery and so on, so on, so on, anything born, brought about, put together by thought is limited. That limited thought can invent a limitless, but it's still the result of thought. Thought has divided the world into various religions and all the things that are in the churches, temples, mosques, are the inventions of thought. You can't get beyond that, that's a fact. And what thought has created, then we worship it. Marvellous self-deception!

So we are asking: is intelligence the activity of thought? Or it is totally outside the realm of thought. Which then can use thought. You follow, not the other way around. I wonder if I'm making myself clear? So one has to enquire into the nature of intelligence. One must very carefully examine the only instrument apparently we have, which is thought. Thought includes emotion, sensory responses, and so on, so on, so on. All that is centred in the brain, which is the whole structure of human beings.

The speaker is not an expert with regard to the brain, but one watches; one's own reactions, one's own responses, hurts, illusions, you know - watches. And when one watches silently, without any motive, then that watching reveals a tremendous lot. One learns a great deal more in silence than in noise. Right? That's a different matter. So are we intelligent? Therefore practical? Therefore never bring about a division.

We'll talk more about it when we talk about the whole world, what is the significance of death, suffering, and the great question of compassion.

3rd QUESTION: You travel about a great deal in the world but I must stay with my family in one place and live in a limited horizon. You speak of a global vision. How am I to have this?

I'm sorry, I've never talked about global vision. The speaker doesn't indulge in visions. Or in imagination. Or in fanciful romantic nonsense. He was saying, you cannot have peace in the world, physical world, if you have no global relationship. Not vision, something fanciful, utopian; some ideal which is non-fact. The fact is that we are divided, as nationalities, religions, sectarian, little groups, smaller groups - divided. And there is this question of war, which is being heightened, threatened. And whether man wants to understand the nature of peace, which is very complex. Outwardly there must be a global relationship which means no nationalities, no religious divisions - Catholics, Protestants, Hindu, Buddhists and all that business. He is not talking about business at all. This is practical; the other is impractical. To kill each other by the million through atom bombs and so on is most impractical. But apparently our minds are so conditioned that we stick to the impractical.

The questioner says or asks, you travel about a great deal but I must stay with my family in one place and so my horizon is limited. Do you mean to say your house, your family, prevents you from having a global outlook on the world? Right? I'm asking this question, if I may. One may live in a small village, work endlessly, or live some place where your neurotic attitudes and all that can have full play, play - but while you are living in a small village, you mean to say one can't have a global attitude, a holistic approach to life? I am asking this question most respectfully: does one have to travel all over the world to have global attitude? Most of you have travelled probably all over the world; tourists do, and wherever the tourists go, they destroy that place. I know there used to be lovely villages and towns, not these enormous hotels and so on, before the tourists came. And when the tourists come, you know what happens. Food becomes more expensive, tourists are cheated - you know all that business. So: what is it to have an outlook, a feeling, rather, of humanity? What does it mean to have a feeling that the whole world, human world, is you?

The human world has great troubles; great anxieties and miseries and confusions; and beastly, neurotic activities. And one realizes that what you are is the rest of humanity. That's a fact, if you go into it, simply, not theoretically; not in abstraction, intellectually, but even if you do go into it intellectually, it's a fact that our brains are not individual brains. They have been evolving through thousands of years. And when you observe from one's little village and brook, one can observe what is happening in the world: wars, wars, wars; hatreds; man against man; the eternal quarrel between people, one blaming the other, and taking them to court or divorce, or this or that. All this can be settled if you are somewhat yielding, intelligent. But we are not. And what we are is very, very, very limited.

And you cannot ask, how am I to break through this limitation? To have a feeling that you are the entire humanity. There is no

'how; that's one of our most impractical questions. There is a 'how' when you want to learn to drive a car. There is a 'how' when you want to learn mathematics, or a new language, and so on. But psychologically, there is no 'how'. If you have a 'how', it means a system, a method, and when you practise a system, a method, you're back again the same old limited, narrow, dull mind. So it's not a question of how to get out of this limited way of life to understand the global, holistic way of perception, but to observe the limitation, one's own limitation, one's own narrow, ugly prejudices, conclusions about another; or one's own conclusions and sticking to it. The very word conclusion means the ending. We have concluded a peace, we have concluded a war. So there is no conclusion, but enquiry, probing, questioning, doubting. And the walls which we build round ourselves, that is the real problem: the religious walls, the personal walls, the neurotic walls; that is the problem; to be aware of all this. To observe without motive; and that's very difficult for a neurotic person, for a person who has concluded he is this, he is that, or the other person is that or that. Global relationship alone can solve our human problems, as war, poverty. And to be aware of one's own limitation.

4th QUESTION: You have stated that if one stays with fear and not try to escape and realize one is fear, then the fear goes away. How does this come about, and what will keep it from returning on other occasions in a different form?

Have you understood the question? You want me to repeat it once more? May I repeat it again? You have stated that if one stays with fear, not try to escape from it, but actually realize that one is fear, that is, one is not separate from fear, then apparently, according to you, fear goes away. How does this happen, how does this come about, and what will keep it from returning on another occasion in different form? Clear, this question is clear now.

Please don't accept what the speaker has stated. That's the first thing. Doubt him, question him. Don't make him into some kind of stupid authority. If I may remind you of that.

Someone, or you heard that if one actually stays with fear, then that fear goes away. To stay with fear implies - we are discussing it together, the speaker is not stating anything - if we stay with fear, which means not to escape from it, not to say, search out the cause of it, for the moment; we'll go into it, I'm going to go into it very carefully. To stay with it means not to escape, not to seek the cause of it, not to rationalize it or to transcend it; to stay with something means that. To stay when you look at the moon - to look at it. Right? Not say, how beautiful, how this, how that; but just to look at it; be with it. Then, it is stated, that fear goes away. And the questioner says, is that so? He wants further enquiry into it.

You and the speaker are doing the enquiry. The speaker may put it into words, but we are both taking the journey together; not only verbally, but actually.

As it is said, what is fear? Fear can only take place when there is time and thought. Time as something that happened yesterday or a year before or forty years ago, and that something you should or should not have done, or somebody is blackmailing you about it - look at it. Right? Time is that which has happened, which you are threatened with, and afraid of that threat, because you are protecting yourself; and the future is, not to be afraid. Right? So the whole movement of fear is time, the past - right - meeting the present creates the feeling, the reaction of fear - right - and it continues in the future. So that's a problem of time; right? Is this clear? Are we together in this? Time is a factor bringing about fear. Right? I have a job now, but I might lose the job. Right? The factory might close. It is not closed, but it might close, which is future. It may be tomorrow, or 20 years hence; but the fear it might close. That is, thought, thinking about the future which is time, creates the fear. Right? So thought and time create fear. That's simple enough. Right? One has done something wrong or right or some incident which is there, and you come along and threaten me with it. Right? And I get frightened. Or not frightened. I say, go ahead. You follow? So time and thought are the factors of fear. Clear?

Time is thought. They are not two separate movements. Right? Time is movement, isn't it? From here to there. I need time to go from here to that place. I need time to learn a language, and so on, so on. Thought is also time; because thought is based on experience, acquiring knowledge is time. Right? And memory is time, which is the past. So thought, time are together; they are not two separate movements. Right? Are we together in this? So that is the cause of fear. I might die; I am living, but the idea of ending, which is in the future, causes fear, distance from the living, and the ending. Which we'll talk about another time. You understand? So, those thought-time is the factor of fear.

One has faced this quite recently. Right? We all do. We are threatened by some persons. This is happening the world over. Threatened by one nation against another - you know all that. Or one individual against another; threat is a form of blackmail; you have done... and so on, so on, so on. And to be aware when you are threatened, whether fear arises, or you just observe. You understand? You cannot observe without any reaction when there is an understanding of the nature of time and thought.

The questioner says, how does this happen? Right? How does fear end when you watch? Right? When you understand the nature and watch. To escape, to rationalize, to sublimate it and so on, to go off to an analyst and so on, is a wastage of energy. Right? Isn't it? Be clear on this; let's be clear on this matter. It's a complete waste of energy; to escape. Because if you do, it's always there when you come back - from your football; from the church, it's always at home. Or after you have taken a lot of drink, it is there. And you can keep on drinking, perhaps that may be one way out. Then become more and more sick or mentally ill. So escape is a wastage of energy.

To analyze and gradually discover the cause of fear, either through your own analysis of yourself or the analysis of another, is a wastage of energy. Because if you watch, you can find out what's the cause; instantly. Which is time and thought. Right? You see unfortunately, we are trained to be dull. I won't go into this question. Knowledge may be making us dull. I won't go into it, now, that's too complex a question. We are saying, where there is a cause, there is an end. Obviously. If I have some kind of disease, and the doctor discovers the cause of it, it can end it. Or it cannot be ended. Where there is a cause, there can be an end to the cause. That's a fact.

So watching fear as it arises, and living with it, not escaping from it, you begin to see the fact, time, thought are the root of it.

That's the cause. And, as we said, it's a wastage of energy escaping, analyzing, searching the causes and spending days and months and years to find out. That's a wastage of energy. When you conserve energy, and that is not to escape, etcetera, you have energy. Right? Then that very focusing of that energy on the fact of time, which is something that happened yesterday, might cause, etcetera, etcetera, so the very conserving the energy dissipates fear completely.

Right? Yes. Wait!

That is, fear is you. Fear is not separate from you. Right? Is that a fact? We have separated fear from me. Right? Which is an abstraction, a division. Right? I am angry; there is anger, and I say, I have been angry. Which is, I am separate from anger. But I am anger, there is no separate person from anger. This one must really go into very carefully; or you can understand this instantly. You are greed, aren't you? Greed is not separate from you. We have separated it. You say, greed is separate from me and I then can act upon greed. I, the thinker is separate from thought then I control thought. Right? I try to control, I try to, you know, concentrate and all the rest of it. But the thinker is the thought. Thought has created the thinker, right? No? Otherwise there would be no thinker.

Right?

So when one realizes the actual fact that fear is you then the division ends. Right? And as long as there is a division, there is conflict between you and fear. But if you are fear, therefore there is no division, the conflict ends. I wonder if you realize this. Alright? Is this clear? As long as there is a division between the Arabs and the Jews, the Muslims and the Hindu, Christians and - you know all that division - that creates conflict. This is logical, sane; right?

So as long as there is a division in me, as the me and fear, and me and the greed, me and violence, there must be conflict. But the actual fact is, violence is me. Greed is me. Envy is me. So this division which thought has created between me and fear ends; and therefore you have no conflict and therefore there is great energy; right? That's a fact, naturally when there is no conflict, there is energy. Can we go on from there? This is clear?

I am not teaching you; you are learning from your own observation. So you are your own guru and your own disciple. You are your own teacher and your own etcetera. So. And the questioner says, and what will keep fear from returning on other occasions in different forms? Right?

Fear has many branches; right? Many ways, many expressions; many forms: fear of the dark, fear of public opinion, fear of what you might do, fear of what I have done, fear of so many things. Fear of one's wife, fear of one's losing something, gaining - you know - fear has a thousand branches. And it's no good trimming the branches - right - because they'll come back. So one must go to the root of it; and not cut the superficial expression of fear; one must go to the root of the cause of fear; which is thought and time.

If one really sees the fact of this, the truth of it, and remains with it, not run away from it, then fear - don't accept, please, most respectfully we are saying, don't accept what the speaker is saying. To the speaker, this is a fact. You might say, what nonsense. You live in illusion. You've a perfect right to say it, but it's not so for oneself.

5th QUESTION: Is it some lack of energy that keeps us from going to the very end of a problem? Does this require special energy? Or is there only one basic energy at the root of all life?

First of all, what is a problem? That's what the questioner says, when we go to the very root of the problem, and that requires, the questioner says, energy to go to the very end of it. So we are asking, what is a problem? The word 'problem' means, the Latin, Greek and so on, something thrown at you. Something that you have to face, something different from you. Now, from childhood we are trained to solve problems, mathematical problems, geography, how to write, that's a problem to a child. How to go to the toilet is a problem to the child. So from childhood, our brain is trained to solve problems: how to go to the Moon, how to ride a bicycle, how to drive a car, how to live with another person without problems arising. Our brain is actually trained to solve problems. Right? That's a fact. So our whole life becomes a problem to be solved. Right? See for yourself how this operates. Right? Are we clear on this matter? Then we can proceed from there.

Our whole instruction, information is to resolve problems. We are conditioned from childhood, the brain is. And problem means something thrown at you. You can look it up in a good dictionary, it will tell you, the Latin and so on. So we are always resolving problems. We look at the whole of life as a problem to be resolved.

And the questioner says, does some kind of energy keeps us from going to the very end of a problem. Right? I am asking, not how to end a problem, but why do we have problems? Not that there are not problems. You say, attack me, that becomes a problem, legally or this way, or that way. That becomes a problem, there are problems. But why do we have problems, the mind that says, have problems. You understand? I wonder if we can go into this a little bit. Are you interested in this?

So another question arises from that, which is to live without a single problem. Not that there are not problems, but to have no problems. We will come to that presently. Why do we have problems? You attack me. Or I attack you, for various reason, moral, immoral, various issues because you hold to certain conclusions, neurotically or some idealistic reasons, you hold to them. And you insist that way, never yielding, never apologizing, never concerned except for yourself, and your neurotic way of life. And the questioner says, to go to the very end of a problem, does it require energy? Obviously. Not any special energy, but just ordinary energy of investigation.

Now to investigate very closely, very delicately, deeply, all the intricacies of a problem, you cannot have a motive. Right? If you have a motive in the resolution of a problem, that motive will dictate the answer, not the problem. Right? Are we getting together in this? Suppose I have a problem - personally I haven't, whatever happens happens, I'll deal with it. But I am not going to have any problems. It is stupid to have problems, for myself I am saying. And I need energy to investigate a problem - the problem of war, why human beings kill each other. To go into it, look at it, closely, step by step, that requires energy. And to resolve a problem of relationship, and relationship is extraordinarily important, I need energy to go into it very, very carefully. Right? And other problems. So energy is necessary to investigate closely, delicately, never coming to any conclusion, moving, moving - you follow? But if you are attached to a tether you can't investigate. Right? A tether, a post, tied to it, you know, when you are tied to a post you can only go that far, whatever the length of that rope is. So there must be freedom from any conclusion, any motive, to investigate. That's clear. Obvious. Like a scientist, he may have a great many hypotheses, theories, but he puts them aside to investigate. And then he says that theory is true; but he doesn't insist that that theory is true before investigation. Right? But we do!

So you need energy to go to the very end of a problem. Take any problem that one has - what? Fear we went into.

Q: Loneliness.

K: Is that a problem? All right, loneliness. Why have we made that into a problem? It is there. Right? It is there. You are lonely. Why are you lonely? That is, separated, right, divided. You may be married, have a great many friends but there is this sense of deep loneliness of human beings. How does that loneliness come about, what is its quality? Isn't it brought about by our daily action? Our action is based on our own selfish motives, self-centred activity. I must be a great man, I must be a successful man, I must meditate, I must do this, I must do that. Everything is me, I am the most important person. You hear that on that television everyday. Right? So when you emphasize all day long this limited quality, limited state of mind, it must inevitably lead to a form of a word called loneliness, which is to have no relationship with anybody. Right? Which is brought about by our daily activity of thought and action. And then you say, I am lonely, I must take a drink. Right? To escape from it. I am lonely, therefore I am going to the club, or go to a night club, or whatever you do. Or hold on to your wife, hold on, cling, because you are afraid of being lonely.

Now you see the cause of it, which is very simple, very quick; and to hold the whole thing together and not use the word 'lonely'. Because the word lonely is an abstraction of the fact. You understand? The fact is not the word. But the word has become important rather than the fact. And the cause of the fact is this constant struggle, neurotic or otherwise, constant thought of oneself: I am hurt, I want to be great, I want to be this, I want to be that. You know, sir, all that goes on within the human brain. So there is the fact, and the word is not the fact. When you use the word lonely, it is already used and has its associations with the past. So you never look at that feeling afresh when you use the word lonely. I wonder if you see.

So to live with that feeling afresh, because you can do that only when you see the cause of it - daily concern with oneself. Then you might ask, mustn't one be concerned with oneself. You know, the good old question! And if you want that, to be concerned with yourself, and at the end of it feel lonely, unhappy, miserable and all that, that's your affair. If you want that, pursue it. But if you want to understand a way of living which is totally different, then you have to look at all this very closely, and ask fundamental questions. You can only ask fundamental questions by doubting, questioning, asking.

6th QUESTION: Could you go into the nature of intelligence which manifests itself when perception takes place and is this the only true source of action?

K: This is the last question. What's the time sir? Five minutes? Can we go on with the last question? Sorry, if one is kept with all these questions.

Could you go into the nature of the intelligence which manifests itself when perception takes place? And is this the only true source of action which is intelligence?

...part of my family, it's a part. The earth is for the whole of man, for the mankind but we say, it's my earth, my country, part. Why have we done this all along? Dividing the whole world into nationalities, into - you know all that is going on, why? Isn't it - I am suggesting this, don't accept it, question it, doubt it, all that. Isn't it that thought which has divided thinks it will be secure in the part, secure in being nationalistic, secure in being a tribal, in the tribe, belonging to a tribe, belonging to a particular form of thought which is religion, right? So we are always seeking security in the part. That's a fact, not a theory, it's a fact. My property - I am not against property, I am just saying - my property, my country, my wife, my god, what I think. So we have always cultivated the part and the part is the intellect. And in that intellectual comprehension, we think there is security. Of course, more clever you are, more cleverly you discern, you know. You know, don't you know all the world with professors, scientists, all the writers, when they are intellectual everybody adores them. They become great people. That is, part means the superficial, right? Is perception only a part, perceive by a part - do you understand - by the intellect or only emotions or only a sensory response? Or perception implies a seeing totally, not partially. Do you understand?

One perceives the cause of fear not verbally, intellectually, emotionally. Perception is an action of seeing the whole of nature of fear - right - not the various branches of fear but the whole movement of fear. The movement of fear is time, thought. We went into it. To perceive it not verbally or idealistically but to see instantly the whole nature of fear, right?

Now when you see something wholly, completely, what takes place is something quite different. I am going to go into it if you will have the patience, if you are not tired by hearing the only speaker. For the moment - when you go home, you can all speak but now, unfortunately there is only this person speaking.

Look, let's make it very very simple. Suppose I am being a nationalistic all my life or clinging to my particular "religion", religion in quotes. That is my brain has been conditioned to be a nationalist, to be a particular - belonging to a particular sect, whether that sect has hundred, thousand, million, it is still a sect. My brain has been conditioned that way. You come along and tell me, nationalism is the root of war, one of the causes of war. I listen to you. You explain to me logically if I am willing to listen. If I am not then of course, you can't do anything with it. But if I am willing to listen - which I am, you then explain to me one of the factors or the causes of war, nationalism, racialism. You point it out, various implications of war. I listen to you and I say, look, I tried. Either I accept it intellectually and it does not have great value or I see how true that is. The moment I perceive how true it is, I have moved away; the brain has been unconditioned from the old pattern. Do you get this? The moment I perceive the truth of what you have said, the brain cells which have been conditioned to nationalism, to sectarianism disappears. So perception or insight into what you have said brings about a radical change in the very cells themselves. The speaker has discussed this matter with scientists. Not that you must accept what the scientists say or what the speaker says but he has discussed it. We have argued about it. They agree to this - some of them but the others say, it's not so, it's pure romanticism, etcetra. But the fact is, the fact: I have been going north. You come along and say, that way leads to danger and I listen to you. I argue with you, discuss with you, I may have quick insight into what you are saying and I see the truth of what you are saying. So I move away from going north. I go south or east or west. That very movement contrary to the old habit has brought about a radical change in the brain itself. Because you understand the pattern will be broken. When the pattern is broken, there is something different.

So where there is a perception in which there is not merely intellectual comprehension but a total insight into the problem. Insight to say for example, all organized religions have no value. They are mere entertainments, excitements, sensations, all the - they are essentially - no human, it doesn't bring about human change. In all that you have quick insight. So it's finished. You don't belong to any group.

Q: (inaudible)

K: I explained, sir, fear. If you have an insight into organized or institutions which etcetra etcetra - if you have an insight, that is a quick, instant perception of what is true. But most of us aren't capable of that because we are not quickly sensitive. We are rather dull people. I am not saying, please, I am not saying you are. We are all rather conditioned people. And this condition cannot be changed, bring about a total mutation if there is not insight into conditioning. And insight is not remembrances, conclusions. It's not a process of time and remembrance. It's seeing things as they are quickly, instantly.

Now the questioner says or asks, when perception takes place, there is intelligence and this, the questioner says, is this intelligence the source of life - the source of action, sorry? Do you understand? When there is perception that tribalism which has become glorified nationalism, is the most destructive element in life, bringing wars and so on, if you have instant insight into it, that insight has its own action. It's not insight and then action but insight itself is action. Do you understand? That is the moment when there is a perception that tribalism is one of the factors of war, that insight is action. You are no longer - there is an action that wipes away your particular tribalism in you - wanting to, belonging to a group. Right?

That's the end of the questions. At the end of all this one asks, what have we, what has one seen, learnt, observed? Do you go on with the same old pattern of hate and reaction, action, blackmailing each other? Or all that end - that is quarrels, a sense of communion, affection, all that.

I have stopped. May I get up?

Q: (inaudible)

K: What sir?

Q: It's a goodbye to you.

K: What for? (laughter).

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 21ST MAY 1983

May we continue where we left off last Sunday. We were saying that this is not a lecture about any particular subject, to instruct or to inform. Nor is it a form of entertainment, stimulated by the speaker; nor an intellectual journey into various forms of theories and concepts and ideals, but rather together we are taking a journey, not that the speaker is taking a journey and informing you about the journey, but rather together we are friends taking the very long journey into the human condition. Why human beings, who have evolved apparently for about a million years or less or more, are still about the same: violent, primitive, divided, wars, frightened, insecure, and so on, suffering. And apparently the time as evolution has not solved our human problems. They are increasing, not decreasing, more and more. Life is becoming more and more complex.

And we have had various forms of leaders, both religious, political, social and so on. And various forms of institutions and organizations, foundations and forums. They too have not in any way brought about a fundamental change in man. And when we together, without any bias, without coming to any conclusion, look what is happening all over the world: starvation, insecurity, confusion, great sense of human suffering through wars, through various forms of religious and national divisions, and so on. Technologically we have advanced enormously within the last hundred years. There thought has operated with a capacity that's almost infinite. But psychologically, inwardly, deeply we are about the same: primitive. So it's a lopsided evolution; a process where thought has brought about extraordinary physical results: communication, transportation, and all the rest of it. But thought also has created various divisions in the world: religious, racial, and so on. And we said where there is division there must be conflict, wars. We went into that fairly sufficiently.

And we talked about relationship. We are journeying together; I am not - the speaker is not talking to himself. We are taking a journey together, thinking, observing, watching, not only what is happening outside of us, outside the skin, as it were, but also inwardly, psychologically, what's going on in the whole arena of the psyche. Together we are taking a journey. So please, if one may repeat this often, which we shall during this talk and tomorrow's talk, we are taking a journey together: not an intellectual, verbal, ideological journey but actual observation of facts, what is actually happening. So we have talked about relationship, how important it is in life. And without right relationship there must be conflict, not only between two people but in the world, because the psyche always overcomes whatever regulations, rules and orders are placed exteriorly, the inner always overcomes the outer. This is also an obvious fact, as one has watched in a Communist, totalitarian world.

And also last Sunday we went into the question of fear very carefully. Not the various branches of fear, or the expressions of fear. There are many many forms of fear. But we were together examining, asking, questioning, doubting the root of fear; what's the cause. Where there is a cause and one is able to discover it, then the cause can come to an end; if one is sane, not neurotic. And we said thought and time are the factors of fear. We went into the question of time, not only from here to there, outwardly, but time devised by thought as human psyche becoming something, achieving something. That is, 'what is' should become or try to become 'what is not'. I hope we are taking a journey together! That is, if we are violent, as human beings apparently are from the beginning of time, it's utterly useless to invent or project a concept of non-violence. Non-violence is not an actuality, it's a theory, it's a concept, it's a conclusion. So there is only violence; but when we create an opposite of it, we create a division and where there's a division there must be conflict. So to deal with violence is the only thing that matters, not the ideological invention of non-violence. We went into that carefully.

And also together we must examine this morning not only pleasure or the whole implication of pleasure, gratification, satisfaction, and the complex of desire, but also we should talk over together in our journey the nature of suffering, why human beings have suffered endlessly, not only in their relationship but through wars and so on. Whether suffering can ever end, or man, that is his conditioning that he must suffer forever. And also we should in the journey talk over together the nature of compassion and love and intelligence. And if we have time, we should talk over together also the whole complex problem of death.

So if you are not too tired on a lovely morning like this, pleasant, lovely sunshine, to sit quietly under trees with all the shadows and watching the mountains in the distance, to be aware of all the beauty of the land, the glory of a fresh, new morning, we should together take the journey into all this. Perhaps tomorrow we should talk over also together what is religion. Why religions have existed for thousands upon thousands of years, and why religions have had so little effect on the human being. And also we should go into the question of what is meditation. Religion and meditation we generally put at the end of the talks because unless we have established in ourselves, are very clear and free from all the divisions, fragmentations in ourselves; and the ending of conflict and so on, meditation has very little meaning. We'll go into that tomorrow. But that's not an invitation for you!

We are so eager to learn from another, to be told what to do, how to meditate and all that nonsense, we never find anything for ourselves. I do not know if you have gone into the whole question of knowledge. Knowledge is always in the past, and we live upon the accumulation of experience and knowledge which is the past. That past may be 10,000 years or the past of a yesterday. So we are always living in the past. And we try to live in the present, which is impossible unless one understands very deeply into the nature of the past. Not analyze, investigate, but to observe without any motive or direction, just to observe the whole human psychological accumulation. That is, to observe, not only with the eyes, but to observe in silence. Because when you observe in silence, beauty, it has great significance. But if you are chattering about silence and beauty, you fail to understand both of them.

So we are going together to go into the first question this morning: the nature of pleasure. Why human beings throughout the world, and especially in this country, pursue this thing called pleasure. What is pleasure? We are together examining what it is; exploring. And when one explores, there must be a certain quality of doubt. That's part of scepticism. Otherwise exploration is not possible. Doubt one's own conclusions, theories, concepts, ideals, experiences, then one is free to examine. But if one clings to one's own particular form of idiosyncrasy, particular tendency, then exploration is very, very limited. To understand pleasure - not that we are condemning it - to watch those mountains, see the blue sky through the leaves, and the dappled light, to watch all this is a great delight; to see it all, the wholeness of nature, there is a great beauty, and beauty never fails when there is silence in this observation. So together we are going to observe pleasure; the root of it, the cause, and see the whole complexity of pleasure.

To go into pleasure one must understand desire; why human beings are driven by desire, craving for something, looking for something that'll be gratifying ardently, hankering after, seeking satisfaction in every direction: sexually, power, position, knowledge, try to dominate, not only the earth, air, but also each other. So without understanding the nature and the structure of desire it'll be rather difficult to comprehend the nature of pleasure. So please, together, and one must repeat this phrase over and over again, together examine the nature of desire. Desire means the want of something; longing for something, craving for something. That's the meaning, dictionary meaning, of desire, as in Sanskrit, and so on. What is desire? Why have all the religions in the world, organized, orthodox, traditional religions, have told their adherents to suppress desire? The monks all over the world suppress desire, or identify the desire with a particular symbol, with a particular figure, trying to transcend desire. This happens in Christianity, through prayer, and so on. So we are not condemning or denying desire, but we are questioning why human beings right throughout the world have desire for food, clothes, and shelter, which is normal, and that is denied by this terrible nationalism in the world for all people. That desire for food, clothes and shelter is denied through ideologies, of Communists, socialists, capitalists; through nationalism and so on. Desire is essentially the search for satisfaction.

If we are together in this, understanding the verbal significance of those words, desire, we are asking then, what is desire? How does it come about and why has it such a strong hold on man? You are asking the question. The speaker may go into it, but you are asking the question. And together - we mean together - examine very carefully how it comes about and why it has taken such a strong hold on man. Biologically one can see the activity of desire, sexual and so on. But we are talking about the psychological urges, the reactions, the demands of desire and trying through desire find deep satisfaction, gratification, contentment. Surely desire is something separate - please listen first, then question, it, you may doubt it, but just let's watch it together. Sensation is normal. When you see those mountains, the perception of that is a sensation. The seeing, visually, and then reacting to what you see, which becomes the sensation, that's normal, healthy, actual. And when is desire born? Is it born out of sensation? You are enquiring together? You see a beautiful garden, or a nice motor bike, or one of those marvellous new cars, beautiful lines. You see it, and you touch it - the polish, the lines of it - and out of that perception, seeing, contact, there is sensation. That's natural. When you see the tree, touch it, look at the beauty of the branches, the leaves, and the light upon the leaves, the shimmer, the glitter, and become sensitive to all that, that's natural. So we are asking, does desire come out of sensation? You see a marvellous dress in a shop; a shirt, if you are a man, or if you are a woman, see a marvellous dress. You go in, touch it; there is a sensation, feeling how nice, smooth it is. Then what takes place? Go slowly, you will see it for yourself. Then what takes place? You see the shirt, touch it: sensation, then thought says, how nice it would be if I had that dress, if I had that car, if I had that shirt, or if I had that garden, whatever it is. When thought creates the image of you sitting in the car or in the shirt, at that moment when thought creates the image, then desire is born. Right?

Are we together in this? You are not accepting what the speaker is saying, but we are together examining the nature of desire. That where there is sensation thought inevitably, apparently, comes with its image and desire with its satisfaction is born. Right? Is this somewhat clear? Somewhat. Because unless we understand this movement of sensation and the thought taking over the sensation with its image, and out of that comes desire which is to find satisfaction: satisfaction in the robe, in the shirt, in the car.

That is, one has observed the whole movement of sensation, desire, and fulfillment in satisfaction. This observation, this close watching of the whole movement of desire in oneself, out of that watching comes intelligence. Right? Before we just accepted desire as our condition, and the desire to fulfil, and if it is not fulfilled, feel frustrated, and the agony of frustration and all the neurotic results of being frustrated. And that's generally our process; the way we live. The way we live obviously is rather idiotic, unintelligent. Please, I am not condemning, I am just watching.

And when you observe this whole movement: the seeing, the contact, sensation, and desire which is brought about through thought with its image, if you observe this whole movement without any control, without any motive, that very observation is the beginning of intelligence. Then that intelligence will - if I may use the word discipline - discipline the whole movement of desire. You understand? You have understood? It's not desire must be controlled or suppressed or as in America it happens, how to have everything you want! but rather, the understanding of desire is intelligence. And that intelligence will discipline desire. Please listen, if we can listen to each other carefully, discipline.

What do we mean by that word 'discipline'? The word comes from the word disciple, the one who is learning, the one who receives instruction from the teacher. But we have made discipline into conformity, into following certain mode of operation, of habit, of thought: to discipline oneself according to an idea; according to something that must be done. If you are studying any particular subject, scientific or psychological, the study of it makes its own discipline; right? If you are a carpenter - I am afraid you are not, most of you are too educated - if you are a carpenter, that very career disciplines the way you use tools, understand the wood and the nature of the wood and the quality and so on. But we have made it, discipline to follow, to obey, to conform, to restrain. But where there is discipline there is learning. Right? Learning. And learning is infinite. There is no end to learning; not recording. Can we go into this little bit? You don't mind?

Recording - the brain records an incident, an experience, a hurt, both physical as well as psychological, a wound received from the outside, bodily, and a wound from another hurting the psyche. Right? And all these things are recorded. Record is the past; naturally, like repeating a gramophone record. So the past, this constant recording, if you have ever gone into it - we are talking as two friends - if you have ever gone into it, why should everything be recorded? One needs to record how to drive a car, how to write a letter; you need to record if you are a specialist, or a worker, or businessman, or a psychologist and so on, you need to have recording, which becomes your knowledge and according to that knowledge you act, skilfully or not. There recording is necessary: the brain must record. But we are asking: why should the psyche record at all? You understand all this? Please, it's a fundamental question; put it to yourself and find out. One records a hurt. Right? And from childhood we are hurt, and that is recorded, with its result of always fear of further being hurt, so building a wall round oneself isolating oneself, and getting more and more hurt, you know, the whole problem of recording. Why should that hurt be recorded? You hurt me by - suppose you have hurt another, why should that hurt be received and recorded and held? Please, this is an important question to ask. You are flattered and you accept that and record it; insult and flattery are both the same; they are the two sides of the same coin. And we keep that very carefully recorded.

This recording, which is essentially memory, is the whole structure of the psyche, the 'me', the ego, the person. So the psyche is essentially memory, the recording machine, or rather the record on which the present plays a part. You understand? Can we go on? So is it possible not to record? Only those things that are absolutely necessary. That is real freedom. Never to have a record, psychological memory, of things that have happened, pleasant or unpleasant. Then, where there is that sense of great, vast freedom, there is a totally different dimension. But we cannot go into that now, but we are considering desire. And we said the comprehension, the watching of that whole movement of desire, in that watching there is intelligence. That intelligence will naturally bring about order, which is the essence of learning, that intelligence will bring about order where there is disorder created by desire. I have got it. I've got it myself. Right? I see the truth of it. Are we together in this journey? I afraid some of you are not - if you are not, it's no good going over and over again: perhaps you will talk it over, if you are willing, with your friends, - or read something or other. Books are useful but they don't instruct, they don't tell you. You have to search, ask, demand, question, doubt, stand alone if necessary - and one has to stand alone and not depend on anything. The word 'alone' means 'all one.' Right?

Then we ought to talk over together what is suffering. Why man, including woman, please don't be so particular if I mention man. It includes humanity, which is man and woman, not woman separate from her rights, and all the rest of that business. We are together. Why has man, woman, suffered for centuries: why are we suffering now? What is suffering? And what's the cause of it; and can there ever be an end to tears, to human misery, to unhappiness, to the grief that we carry throughout life? We are looking at it, not becoming sentimental, romantic, tearful, but we are actually facing this fact that human beings, whether they're rich or poor, they have high position or low, all human beings throughout the world suffer. That's a fact; undeniable, true fact. Some escape from it through Christian dogmatism or some person suffering for whole of mankind for their sins; the original sin is invented by thought. So we try to overcome sorrow because of various reasons.

Wars have created sorrow in the world. And there are still wars going on. How many millions of women and men and wives and girls have cried through wars. So there is suffering of the whole of humanity. And also there is suffering of persons, of separate individuals. The word 'individual' means indivisible, not fragmented. But we are fragmented, broken up, so we are not the word. Individual means not only the word individual, but not being broken up, fragmented. So we are not individuals, but that's another statement which you have to go into another time, if we have time. So persons, separate persons, and the whole world have suffered through wars, through great starvation; poverty of mind, poverty of body; and revolutions have tried to change the social structure but they have not succeeded. But through that revolution killing millions of people. That too has brought great sorrow in the world. Perhaps some of you may not be suffering now, but look at the world as it is. You suffer when you don't fulfil. You suffer when you see a poor man; you suffer when you see great ignorance prevailing in the world - not ignorance of books and so on, the ignorance of the actual fact that war destroys human beings. You see all the generals, the politicians throughout the world accumulating the materials of war. And when you see all that, talk to some of them, that is sorrow of their ignorance.

So we are asking, can man live on this earth peacefully without suffering? Please ask that question of yourself on the journey you and the speaker are taking together. Why do we suffer? The loss of a son, the loss of a husband, wife, divorce, you know the various forms, symptoms of suffering. One is not beautiful, somebody else is beautiful, you know the whole business of sorrow. And can it ever end? To go into this question together, trying to find out what is the root of it. As long as there is separation, division, there must be conflict and conflict brings about sorrow. As long as I - as one is separate from his wife, not biologically, but psychologically, inwardly, when there is that separation between two people, however intimate they are, and that separation, that division brings about conflict, and conflict is the very nature of sorrow, because in that conflict we are destroying each other. I wonder if you follow all this? When I - when one quarrels with one's wife, or when you possess your wife and the wife possesses you, or when you are attached to her and she attached to you, that very attachment brings conflict, jealousy, anxiety, pain, sorrow. So can two people live together without conflict, which is a very, very fundamental question, very complex question. Can two people, can a group of people - you see, the very word 'group' means divided - can people, humanity, live together on this world, on this earth? It's their earth, it's our earth, not the American earth or the Russian earth; it's our earth.

Can we live together without conflict? I may have hurt you, and you may have hurt me; why should we keep that going? Why should we keep that record of pain? One has lost one's son, one loved that son or the brother or the husband, what you will; and there is shedding of tears, trying to escape from the actual fact that he or she has gone, and feeling the pain, the anxiety, the loneliness of it; trying to escape from that loneliness. You may escape but it's always there, deep in one's heart and in the deep recesses of one's own brain. What are we holding on to? The image, the memory, the past? We never seem to let go that image; the past. There is a constant memory, reminder of a photograph or a remembered incident. And if we are aware of this, put away the photographs and the memories, then one may feel disloyal; which is again such a false sentiment. The fact is that while we lived together there was a division between us; and that division has brought great conflict and some happy memories. Both are remembrances recorded, and those records keep on repeating endlessly, and so a constant reminder. So when one watches without any motive, without any sense of direction, just to watch this whole movement of suffering, not only one's own suffering, but the whole of humanity's suffering, of which we are a part. We are humanity. If you understand your own sorrow, watching it like a precious jewel, then that very observation - and observation of that with that clarity and purity can only come when there is no sense of escape from it. Then there is an ending of that suffering. Then you are not contributing to the world's sorrow. That means you are no longer separate from the rest of humanity. You are no longer an American, Russian, Chinese, all these silly tribal divisions. You are the entire humanity. So if you are violent, you are contributing to violence: if you have ended sorrow, then you are bringing about freedom from the human mind, human brain's sorrow.

Without understanding the nature of sorrow, love cannot be. If I suffer, how can I love? I know, the tradition is that suffering is part of love; like jealousy is part of love. Jealousy is not love, nor hate, nor ambition, nor trying to become somebody psychologically. So love is something that is not all the movement of thought. Love is not a remembrance, is it? Ask, please, we are asking that question of each other. How there be compassion if I am attached to a particular ideal, and you are attached to a particular ideal? That is, where there is a limited outlook on life, not one's particular life, but life, the life in nature, all the loveliness of nature, from the tiniest thing to the great elephant and to the tiger. The speaker was once very close to the tiger - not in the zoo, thank God - but in the forest. It was the most extraordinary thing to see it. Where there is love, the self is not. Pity is not love; going out and helping the poor, whether in India or here, the social worker, that's pity; generosity: but love has its own generosity. Compassion cannot exist if I am a Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist, and all the rest of it. And where there is compassion, it has its own intelligence.

So this is the whole business of life; not this battle with each other; not this constant dread of insecurity, anxiety, loneliness, pain and the pursuit of pleasure. Life is a whole movement, unbroken.

And if we have time we ought to talk over together the question of death. It's not a morbid question, it's not an old man putting a question. But whether we are young or old, whether we die through an accident, through disease, this is a human problem. The problem that each one of us has to face. We are all going to die; sorry, perhaps not you; but we are all going to die. Have you ever thought if all the people who have lived on this earth never died, what would happen to the earth? So we're all going to die one day, that's inevitable, that's absolutely certain. There is a great deal of humour in this. And we must understand together as two friends who are facing this problem, whether young or old, they are facing this thing called death. To have a conversation with death, to have a conversation with ending, which is death. What does this conversation mean? Who is it that is going to die? Apart from the organism, the organism has a name, you have watched your face for the last fifty or ten years, or two days, or eighty years, you have watched your face, you are familiar with your face, you are familiar with that name, you are familiar with all the things around you, outside of you. You are not familiar with yourself, you don't know yourself. You have been told what you are, by psychologists and that business. But actually their explanation, their statement is not what you are. So you are never familiar with yourself. So your conversation with death is meaningless unless you are familiar with yourself. Right? I hope we understand each other. So I am going to be familiar with myself. So I am asking, what is myself? Myself is the body, all the sensory responses: the name, the form, outwardly, the address, the bank account, the job, all the familiar things of daily life, and the daily activity of life. And so we are asking, let us, you and the speaker, get familiar with ourselves. That is, to know ourselves very clearly: not theoretically, not some ideological, religious, speculative illusion or superstition, but what are you, what we, each one of us? Unless we know ourselves very, very carefully, study it, watch it, learn, see the whole complexity of the 'me', until I am totally familiar with every little thing, every corner, I cannot possibly have an intelligent conversation with death. Right? So we are going together to find out what we actually are. Not be afraid; not get depressed and say, how terrible I am: or how ugly, or how I should be differently, I am not, you know. But actually what we are. Unafraid to look.

We are what we have been told; that's one. We are part of the vast tradition of mankind socially, communally, all the knowledge that we have acquired; that's one part. And also psychologically, inwardly, what are we? Each one of us - first each one of us, and then we'll find out each one of us what we are, whether we are not the entire humanity. Do you understand and my question? We are sorrow, pain, grief, happiness, unhappiness, pain, grief and anxiety, loneliness, faith in god, no faith in god, beliefs, dogmas, rituals, vast recording of all the past incidents and accidents, influences, vast complex memories. Right? Or, you say, I am a soul, separate from my body; which the Christians believe. But that soul is invented by thought. We must be logical, sane in investigation. The Hindus have their own particular division, atman and so on: and there too that idea is invented by thought. So we are the entire result of this movement of thought. Right? You can say, I am infinite. That very statement is put together by thought; and thought can invent the infinite, the super, super-something. But it's still thought. So we are the whole network of thought. Right? Network of memories, experiences, knowledge, which is the past, our reactions and actions; all that is our consciousness. All that is me; the 'me' is not separate from that: that is me, my anger, greed, envy, ambition, loneliness, sorrow, uncertainty, seeking security, satisfaction; all that is me. Losing a job, holding on a job, fearful of the tomorrow of losing a job, that's me. I am not the lathe, the instrument, but the 'me' is the fear of losing. Right? That's me. That me has sustained by separating itself: I am me; I am totally different from you. That's the tradition, that is the accepted norm from childhood. And religions sustain this, because it's very profitable to encourage an illusion. But you, your consciousness, is shared by all human beings. Right?

Please bear in mind that we are talking over together death. So our consciousness, which is its content, the content is the belief, the dogmas, the rituals, the tradition, the recording, the memories, the whole of that, that very complex movement in consciousness, is the movement of all humanity; it's not yours. You may pretend or stick to the idea that you are separate person, that you are working for yourself, that you must fulfil - this is what every human being in the world is doing. So you are the whole of humanity; because your consciousness is the consciousness of the Russian, of the Hindu, of the most primitive human being on earth. Yours may be a little more sophisticated, better fed, but you are like the rest of mankind, therefore you are mankind, your consciousness. When you understand, when you have really seen the truth of it, not intellectually accept a perhaps illusory conclusion or a statement - it's not a statement, it's not a conclusion, it's a fact. When you suffer, your neighbour has also suffered. That neighbour may be next door, few yards away, or ten thousand miles away; he also suffers like you. So this is the common ground which we all stand on. It's not your ground.

When one sees the absolute truth of that, then what is death? You understand? This fact is there, that is a fact. My consciousness is the consciousness of the rest of humanity, therefore I am the rest of humanity, I am humanity. If one realizes that it's got tremendous meaning, depth to that; passion behind it; the responsibility of that is immense: not to another, but to the whole of humanity.

So what is death? Death is the ending of the organism, that is certain. Death is the ending of what I have considered is mine. Do you understand? Mine - my possessions, my quality, my experiences, my wife, the ending of 'me'. The 'me' is the rest of mankind. So what is death then? Please this is a very serious question, this is not just to be understood this morning, or if you have an insight into it, that is, see the whole truth or of it instantly; not take time, thought, and say, I hope what you are saying is nonsense, but I prefer my own individuality. You're perfectly welcome. But to see the fact of it and to remain with the fact that you are nothing but a bundle of memories. And all the noise that bundle makes, rattling about, creating such great misery for the rest of mankind.

And the organism dies. My consciousness is the consciousness of mankind; that's a fact. As long as that consciousness with all the travail and the noise and the bundle of memories, that consciousness is going on infinitely. Right? But if you step out of it, which means, the ending; the ending of your beliefs, the ending of your tradition, the ending of your racial prejudices, the ending of all that, ending of your attachments. Then you are out of it; then there is totally a different movement, because there is no longer that movement. There is no longer the movement of thought with all its travail. To go into all this requires tremendous enquiry, meditation, not just verbal assertions. And knowing the word is never the thing.

So as long as you are contributing to violence, violence will go on. As long as you are envious, you're contributing, encouraging, sustaining, the envy which exists in the world. So can you end envy? This is what death is going to be. End envy completely; attachment to ideals, to experience, to systems, end. Where there is an ending without any motive, ending, there is a totally different movement. That's not an encouragement to end. So while one is living to end. You understand? To end your antagonism to your wife, to end your hurts, to end your psychological ambitions to be somebody. So that in that ending there is the total movement away from the other. That is the depth and the beauty of death.

Immortality is not for the individual. Because individual, the you, is just a structure of memories and bundle of ideas and so on. How can that have immortality? Eternity is not for the limited. There is only that when this idea of total separation is completely gone out of our system.

This is not a sermon. Generally sermons mean a kind of moralizing, semisuperstitious religious character. We are going together to take a very long journey. The last three talks were about our daily life and we went into various aspects of our life, the way of our days, our existence, our struggles, conflicts and miseries, and the ideological divisions that divide the world: religious, social, political, and so on. These divisions have brought about great wars and we are still, after so many millennia, we are still preparing wars to kill each other. Very few people seem to pay attention to the insanity that's going on; to all the terrible things that man is doing against man. We have been talking about all that together as two friends walking in a wooded lane, talking about not only their personal problems but the problems that exist in the world: the problems of human fear, the problems of relationship, and the everlasting pursuit of pleasure.

And we were asking yesterday morning whether it is possible to end all sorrow, this constant battle between human beings, the sorrow of the world, and the sorrow of each one of us. And also we were pointing out, together, to each other, why human beings live the way they do. Why human beings, after so many centuries, from the ancient Sumerians, the Hindus, Egyptians, and the modern civilization, we have never stopped killing each other and destroying nature - overpopulation, poverty, the extraordinary divisions that are going on in the world. The scientists don't seem to pay much attention to the ending of war. Of course the politicians can never do that; that is their metier, their job, to sustain this conflict. And also we were talking about, yesterday, the nature of compassion and its intelligence. And we should talk about together today whether it is possible at all, whether our brains, which have been conditioned, programmed, like a computer, so heavily conditioned, if it is possible to bring about freedom that conditioning.

If one is aware at all that one is conditioned, religiously, morally and that there is no freedom at all, as long as we are conditioned there can be no freedom whatsoever. So we're going to talk over together this morning, not only freedom, justice, goodness, and whether there's the possibility of human beings ever moving away from the stream of so-called conditioned civilization.

So first we should examine if there is justice at all in the world - justice being that which is law, that which is moral, correct, and equality. Law says we are all equal; but some are more apparently equal than the others. Clever lawyers can make anything of law, they can support anything, justify anything. So one asks if there is equality at all; because that has been one of the questions, not only Aristotle, Plato and all the Greek philosophers, but also long before then an has always been asking if there is not a possibility of equality, correct justice for all of us. Apparently there is no equality, there can never be. You are tall, one is short. one is very clever, erudite, scholarly, capable of a great many things, and the other is not: dull, obeying, conforming, mere machine or a cog in a social structure. There is a vast difference between the two. You are beautiful, the other is not; you have a sense of the aesthetic, sense of beauty, the other is not sensitive at all. So where does one find justice, equality? Or it doesn't exist at all apart from the philosophers and theoreticians, whether they be Marxist or theologians - and Marxists generally become theologians - and where does the sense of justice, equality exist? Apparently on the earth, on this earth it doesn't exist among human beings. So if one is enquiring into it as we are doing it now together - please, again, if one may remind you with due respect, that we are taking a journey together, not that the speaker is talking and you are just listening to a lot of words, ideas and concepts; but rather you and the speaker, as two friends walking down a lane in their friendship, who have known each other for a long time, talking about all these things. Neither of them are imposing their ideas on the other, there is no sense of authority - among friends there is no authority. Among friends there is not only sympathy, friendship, affection, but a sense of investigation. And there can be investigation when there is not only freedom from all bias, prejudice, but also a sense of wanting to understand the whole business of human existence. These two friends are communicating with each other. That's our relationship: you sitting over there and the speaker sitting up a little higher. We are taking a journey together. If you don't want to take a journey together, deeply, it's your affair. But if you are going to sit here on a lovely morning, cool, fresh, and if one is aware of the beauty of every day, every fresh morning, the wonder of the world, it's a marvellous world and we are destroying it, in our relationship with each other and in our relationship to nature, to all the living things of this earth.

So please, if one may constantly repeat, we are together in this journey. And this is a serious affair; not something to be got over on a Sunday morning; this is not an entertainment; and as most people are given to entertainment, religious and otherwise, we are, the friend and the speaker are very serious. They are having conversation not only at the superficial verbal level but at greater depth with greater significance. So if one may remind you that you and the speaker are taking a long journey. This journey never ends; that is the beauty of it.

So we are asking, is there equality among human beings? Legally, apparently, we cannot find it. Nor by social dictum; nor religious, saying that we are all brothers in the name of something or other. And when there is no equality there is no justice. So where does equality exist? Because that's a very important question. If there is no equality we are going to perpetually destroy each other. To find that equality, there must be compassion. Only in compassion is there equality and justice, not in law, not through lawyers, not through various forms of United Nations and so on, not through little groups, little communes; but together can we find compassion? Which is not a thing to be invented by thought. It's not a thing to be put together by determination, by desire, but that compassion comes when there is right relationship between each of us. We went into that question very, very seriously in the last two or three talks.

So as our relationship is a perpetual conflict, the ending of that is the enquiry, the absolute immediate urgent change. Otherwise we are going to destroy each other. And he and the speaker are saying to each other, we should talk about goodness. That word is old-fashioned, one hardly uses that word nowadays. The word 'goodness' means together; to bring together many things; to bring together many facets of our life so that all the broken parts, fragmented as we are, are put together, made whole, made harmonious; and from that goodness act. That's the meaning of that word, goodness: to live a life in which there is no fragmentation of ourselves. And a brain that's pursuing fulfillment is fragmented always. So goodness, equality, justice and freedom.

Freedom: the word 'freedom' means love. Freedom is not from a prison; that's only a reaction. Freedom from pain - we are not talking of physical pain, but psychological pain, freedom from it is an entrapment into another bondage. Freedom is not from something but freedom is in itself. If there is psychological hurt - and most of us are hurt from childhood - and that hurt is creating great pain and great misery to oneself and to others, mere freedom from hurt is not actual freedom. Therefore freedom implies a sense of goodness that is whole; a holistic - if I can see that scientific word - a holistic way of living, not one fragment seeking freedom and the other fragments in bondage. There can be only freedom when there is this gathering together of all the fragments and living a life that is whole. The word 'whole' means healthy, physically; the word whole means sanity, rational, and the word also means holy, h-o-l-y. And goodness implies all that.

And we are asking whether the brain, which has been conditioned, been programmed to be a Catholic, to be a Protestant, and all the divisions of Christianity, the worship of one person constantly repeated over and over again, as they do in India and Buddhist countries. There they take a name and that name symbolizes something which they hope to be true, as a Christian world does. In the Christian world you have been programmed, my friend has been programmed for 2,000 years - whether the person existed or not, that is not the point. There is a doubt of his existence, but what the church and all that have made of that person is obviously so unrealistic, such superstition, such idealistic, romantic, sentimental business. They do exactly the same thing in India, in Islam. In the Buddhist countries where they don't believe in God - that's one of their sayings, the Buddhists don't believe in God - but they have made the Buddha into a god. It's the same pattern repeated throughout the world generation after generation. And this is called religion. We'll talk about it presently. So we are conditioned by this. We have been programmed; we receive great many impressions, coercions, propaganda. Day after day to if you listen to the commercials in this country - buy, buy, buy. And the religions do the same thing. So our brains are conditioned; not only by exterior influences, pressures and propaganda, but also inwardly, psychologically, our desires, our fears, our greed, our beliefs, all that, our sorrows and pain, conditions the brain.

So one of the questions, which is very important to ask, can the brain cells - please, my friend and I are talking together, there is no disturbance, we are both together aware of the question, and asking each other that question: whether the brain cells can themselves transform, change, otherwise conditioning will go on forever. There is a whole school which says, conditioning can never be radically changed. It can be modified, it can be made more habitable, easier to live with; there is that whole school. But the friend and I, we are saying to each other, is that so? Or, is it possible to change radically? Not bit by bit, partially, but totally. Unless there is that radical change, man is going to live forever in conflict, pain, sorrow, destroying each other; each one asserting his own demands, his own desires, his own pursuits, his own fulfillment. And so there is never coming together and therefore there is never peace in the world. So the friend says, is it possible? It is possible when you perceive the total content of consciousness. Our consciousness, with all its reactions, is like a tide going out and coming in: action, reaction; it's the movement, that's perpetual movement. And all the content: the belief, the dogmas, the rituals, the pursuits of various kinds, the desires and so on, the whole content of our consciousness is what we are: our name, our form, our bank account, not exact bank account, the attachment, and all that is what you and the friend are. That consciousness is the consciousness of humanity. It's not yours or mine; the consciousness of all mankind. Because all mankind goes through agonies, through great pain, loneliness, despair, depression; chattering away. That's the consciousness, whether you go to India, Japan, Russia or here. So we are humanity. We talked about that yesterday. So is it possible to bring about a radical change in our consciousness?

It is possible if you are aware without direction, without control, without motive, just to watch all the thoughts, the anxieties, just to watch it; not run away from it. Like watching a great jewel in your hand, watching all the facets of it: the colour, the brightness, the dull spots, the open spaces: to watch it without any movement of thought. Then that brings about radical change in the very brain cells themselves. We have talked about it briefly yesterday morning.

We ought to talk now about what is religion. Because religion has apparently, from the most ancient of days, has played an extraordinary part in life. Each civilization, however ancient, have had their idea of religion: worshipping the sun, worshipping the trees, worshipping thunder, lightening - probably that's better than all the other things. From the most ancient days man sought something beyond himself, transcending himself; the ancient Sumerians, the ancient Hindus, the Egyptians, and much later Christianity and still later Islam, all those people through generation after generation of thousands and thousands of years, have established various kinds of religion. And out of those religions came culture, civilization. Christianity, Buddhism - Buddhism exploded all over Asia, and Christianity is doing the same in the Western world, trying to spread its own doctrine, its own philosophy, its own saviour and so on. Man has been seeking throughout his days if there is something beyond.

And in his search for something beyond, thought created God. Please, don't get upset with it, examine it. My friend says, I'm not upset, but I'm listening. I'm cautious; I don't want to become an atheist, a non-believer, but I am willing to listen to you. Thought has created that thing which we call God. Because ourselves are so confused, so insecure, so uncertain, so fearful, suffering, lonely, and I do not know how to solve all those, and I look for somebody outside, somebody to guide, somebody to protect, somebody to give me security. Thought is perpetually seeking security. And as it discovers there is none as long as there are individuals fighting each other, as long as groups are separated from each other, as long as there is tribalism of any kind, there must be wars, insecurity, no protection, therefore thought says, let me have some great figure, father entity - or mother entity, whichever you choose. Both in India, there are many gods and goddesses, there are about 300,000 of them. You can choose one or two as you please; that's more fun. But to have only one god is rather tiresome. But man has always sought this thing. And the priest comes along - he is like the rest of us - he says, I'll help you. He becomes the interpreter, because in the ancient days the priest was the only person who was capable of reading and writing. He interpreted that which he called God. And then he invented all the paraphernalia to make himself important, the robes, mitre, you know, the whole circus.

So man, in spite of all the churches and temples and mosques, has always sought something beyond. And that which is beyond is not to be described or put into words; but a man who discovers it, sees something beyond. His friend says, let's get it organized so we can spread it to all the people. So organizations, religious organizations, kill truth. I hope my friend sees the fact. So we are asking, in spite of all the religions and their nonsense, meaningless words and rituals, with their dogmas, and superstitions - it's really a network of superstitions - whether in spite of all that, what is religion.

The word religion has no etymological meaning. They haven't been able to discover the origin of that word. But generally it's ascribed as 'attention'. To be attentive, to diligently work, think, act, live, behave. And, in asking this question, whether there is something sacred beyond all thought, we're going to enquire together into that; whether in spite of all man's endeavour, his superstitions, his rituals, the terrible things they have done in the name of religion - I wonder if the Christians realize they have killed more people than anybody else - in spite of all that, is there something holy, something totally sacred, not invented by thought, which is not the result of some romantic, sentimental imagination; or sentimental longing? Putting aside all that, we are asking the question of each other, if there is something sacred - not something which is sacred to you and not to the other. Which is beyond all time and measure.

Now the enquiry into this is meditation. The word 'meditation' means 'to ponder over.' To think over, to observe exactly things as they are, not try to escape from what the 'what is', but to understand not verbally or intellectually, to delve deeply into 'what is'. So the word meditation means not only to observe, ponder over, but also it means both in Sanskrit and in Latin, and so on, to measure. As long as there is measurement, psychologically - technologically, from Greeks and from the ancient Hindus and so on, measurement has been necessary. Otherwise you couldn't build a temple; you couldn't bring about the whole world of technology. Measurement is necessary. But measurement psychologically is comparison; to compare 'what is' to 'what should be'. To compare what I was yesterday with what I will be tomorrow. You understand? The whole process of comparison. Where there is comparison, there must be measurement: I am dull, but you are clever, you are beautiful, I am not. There is this constant comparison in us between the ideal and the fact; the fact of violence and the ideal of not being violent, that is comparison. In meditation, that comparison must totally end. Right?

And physically, sometimes it's necessary to compare: between a good car and a bad car; between a good material and a bad material; between a good painting and a bad painting. Comparison between tall and short, comparison between light and darkness and so on; there it's obvious; it exists. But psychologically, inwardly, why do we compare at all? Can one live without comparison? Have you ever tried to live without comparison? Then you start with actually 'what is'. Then you can put your teeth into 'what is'. But if you are always comparing yourself with something else, yourself with a hero, with all examples, then you are never coming face to face with yourself or becoming familiar with yourself. So is it possible never to compare? Comparison breeds conflict. Comparison is a form of competitiveness; aggression.

The speaker generally puts religion and meditation at the end of the talks because for a very simple reason: you cannot possibly find out that which is sacred - if there is such thing as sacred, or what meditation means, unless you have established firmly what is right relationship in which there is no conflict, but learning, where there is no fear, psychologically. We went into this, and the understanding of desire and pleasure; and the ending of sorrow. Unless that is well-established like a great foundation it is meaningless to meditate. You may repeat endlessly various words, whether they be Sanskrit or your own words; whether you repeat the Indian word 'mantra' - lots of people have made money on that. One of these chief business-givers of mantras is a multimillionaire. The word, as we explained, 'mantra' means, to ponder over not-becoming psychologically. And also it means to put away altogether self-centred activity. That's the real root meaning of that word, which is a marvellous word, but look what they have made of it. So what is religion and if there is anything sacred at all or there is no such thing as sacred, just nothing. Or there is something but to find out or to come upon it or for it to exist, meditation is necessary.

Meditation generally has so many forms: there is a Zen meditator. I hope the friend, we are asking the friend, I hope you don't mind going through all this nonsense - there is Zen meditation, there is the Tibetan meditation, there is the Buddhist form of meditation, various forms of Hindu meditations, and in this country it is called contemplation, in the Western religious world. Now all those imply, from the Zen to the latest guru with his twaddle, nonsense, to control thought. And all so-called serious people who have meditated, controlling thought, apparently have never - I hope some of them have - apparently they never have asked, who is the controller? Who is the controller who controls thought? Is not the controller part of thought? Is not the controller the entity who has remembered all the past incidents, travail and anxiety, that remembrance is the controller. The controller is part of thought. As long as there is division between the controller and the controlled, there must be conflict. But the controller of thought is thought itself. So all the advocates of meditation, so many forms of it, practising day after day some system, method, becoming more and more dull, more and more insensitive - it is essential to be sensitive, sensitive to nature, sensitive to each other, sensitive to all the living things of the earth. But if your mind is constantly occupied, whether with sex, whether with god, whether with your own achievements, your own worries, that brain becomes more and more dull, stupid and insensitive. So on the contrary, meditation implies tremendous activity of the senses, and sensitivity, aware of all this.

All this requires a great deal of energy. Not only the energy created by thought, by conflict, but energy which is not being wasted. You understand? Wasted through conflict, wasted through endless chatter, chatter; wasted in the pursuit of innumerable desires without understanding what is desire and so on. We have got tremendous energy - to go to the moon requires tremendous energy and thousands of people. So we have untold energy if that energy is not misused or wasted.

And to find that which is sacred, one must have doubt, scepticism; because that doubt, scepticism, healthy scepticism, you can't doubt everything, but in the process of doubting you clear the brain of all its stupidities, superstitions, its illusions. The brain then becomes extraordinarily alive, subtle. So meditation is not controlling thought, or practising some system or method, but freeing the mind, freeing the brain from its own conditioning.

That's only the beginning of it. When there is that freedom, then we can enquire into what is a brain that is silent. Because, it's only through great silence you learn, you observe, not when you are making a lot of noise. To observe those hills, and these beautiful trees, to observe your wife and your children, or your husband and your relatives, or whatever they are, to observe you must have space and there must be silence. But if you are chattering, gossiping, you know, you have no space or silence. And we need space, not only physically, but much more psychologically, that space is denied when we are thinking about ourselves. It's so simple. Right? Because when there is space, vast space psychologically, there is great vitality, great energy. But when that space is limited to one's own little self, that vast energy is totally contained with its limitation. So that's why meditation is the ending of self.

One can listen to all this endlessly, but if you don't do this, what is the point of your listening? If you actually are not aware of yourself, of your words, your gestures, your walk, the way you eat, why you drink and smoke and all the rest of the things human beings are doing - if you are not aware physically of all that, how can one be aware at depth profoundly of what's going on. If you are not aware, if one's not aware, then one becomes so shoddy, middle-class, mediocre. The word 'mediocre' means, the root meaning of that word means 'going halfway up the hill', going halfway up the mountain, never reaching the top of it. That's mediocrity. That is, never demanding of ourselves excellence, demanding of ourselves total goodness, demanding of ourselves complete freedom - not to do what you like, that is not freedom, that is triviality; but to be free from all pain of anxieties, loneliness, despair, and all the rest of it.

So to find out or to come upon or for that to exist there must be great space and silence. Not contrived silence, not thought saying, I must be silent. Silence is something extraordinary, it's not the silence between two noises. Peace is not between two wars. Silence is something which comes naturally when you are watching; when you are watching without motive, without any kind of demand; just to watch, and see the beauty of a single star in the sky, or to watch a single tree in a field, or to watch your wife or husband, or whatever you watch. To watch with a great silence and space. Then in that watching, in that alertness, then there is something which is beyond words, beyond all measure.

We use words to measure the immeasurable. So one must be aware also of the network of words, how words cheat us; how words mean so much: a Communist, to a capitalist, means something terrible; socialist, or some stranger. You follow? Words become extraordinarily important. But to be aware of those words and to weigh the words, to weigh, to live with the word 'silence', knowing that the word is not silence, but to live with that word and see the weight of that word, the content of the word, the beauty of that word. So one begins to realize, when thought is quiet watching, there is something beyond all imagination, doubt, seeking, and there is such a thing - at least for the speaker. But what the speaker says has no validity to another. Unless you listen, learn, watch, be totally free from all the anxieties of life, then only there is a religion which brings about a new, totally different culture. We are not cultured people at all. You may be very clever in business, you may be extraordinarily capable technologically or be a doctor, professor; but we are still very limited. The ending of the self, the 'me', to be nothing. The word 'nothing' means 'not a thing.' Not a thing created by thought. In Latin 'res' means 'thing.' And thing is that which is created by thought. To be nothing; having no image of yourself. And we have a great many ages of ourselves. To have no image of any kind, no illusion, to be absolutely nothing. The tree is nothing to itself. It exists. And in its very existence it is the most beautiful thing, like those hills: they exist. They don't become something, because they can't. Like a seed of an oak, of an apple tree; it is apple; it doesn't try to become the pear, or another fruit - it is. So when there is nothing, there is. You understand? This is meditation. This is the ending of the search and truth is.

RISHI VALLEY 1ST TALK WITH STUDENTS

12TH DECEMBER 1983

Krishnamurti: What would you like me to talk about?

Student: Fear.

K: You know we have been talking with the teachers, educators, for the last ten days, would you not like to know what we discussed?

S: Yes sir.

K: We talked about what is going to happen to you, as students. What is your future? And also we talked about, the danger of the world, tremendous catastrophes that are going on in the world, the nuclear bomb, the wars, the over population of this country, disease, poverty, tremendous unemployment throughout the world. And I believe there are forty wars going on at the present time. And you, when you leave this place, you are going to face all that: overpopulation unemployment, and if you are going to pursue a career - for that career, of a particular job with about another three thousand people after it. So we talked about that. We said, how are you, as students, going to face all that-intelligently or just follow the routine, the pattern, getting a job, if you can, getting married and settling down. You may be awfully clever, but cleverness is not intelligence. We talked about all that.

We also talked about whether Rishi Valley, the educators here, could help you to be free of fear which we are going to talk about now. Whether you are afraid, not only to pass examinations, but general fear - fear of your parents, fear of your teachers, fear of your friends and so on. We talked a great deal about that. And also we talked about whether you can be a good human being. The word `good' means, an unbroken human being, not fragmented, a whole being. We went into that very carefully.

And I thought you should know what we discussed, because it is your responsibility also, to help the teachers to see, that you have no fear here - that when you leave, you are not just really clever boys and girls, because there are millions of clever boys and girls - but, who are really intelligent. We went into the question of what is intelligence, we will go into that with you, if you permit us during the next three talks. So let us talk over together this morning, whether you can be free of fear - that is what you wanted - didn't you?

And what is your future? This is a very serious question - not only your future, but also the future of the educators, the teachers here - and so, what is the future of mankind, the future of the world. They are destroying animals, all over the world. I believe over fifty million whales have been killed, elephants are disappearing, there are very few tigers left and the dolphins - you know about the dolphins - do you? Yes? Have you been told about them? They are marvellous animals. I used to know a friend who had a private dolphin, in his backyard - he kept it there, until the government found out that he had it and they asked him to remove it, put it back in the ocean or into a larger tank. They are extraordinary animals, great intelligence, I won't go into all that because I don't want to entertain you with stories.

If I may go on with what I am saying about the future, what is your future, the future of the educators here, and so the future of mankind. That is very important to discuss. Now don't keep silent, please, discuss, question, argue, don't sit there without expressing yourself, whether you express it badly or well, does not matter, it is good to express yourself verbally, clearly, if you can. Because we are going to discuss after I have talked. See that your minds are active. The other day nearly two months ago, I was in California. There was a car in front of me - I was being driven by a friend - with a sticker on the bumper, which said, 'question all authority' - and you are going to question, this morning with me. You are going to argue, doubt, not believe - question so that your brains become active, not just merely gathering information, memorizing and passing some silly examination, and equally get a silly job.

So, we are going to talk over this morning, first, we will come to the question of fear later, what is your future? This applies to the smallest child here to your 'A' level or 'O' level, or 12th or whatever it is. What is your future? If you are lucky enough to pass some exams, enter college or university and then seek a job, if your father is fairly powerful politically or locally, then you will fall into the trap, which he has created for you, comfortably or uncomfortably, and then settle down for the rest of your life struggle, conflict, unhappy, miserable, caught in a wheel like a rat, and that is what your future is going to be. Wars, tremendous unemployment, even though you may have a good job, if there is a war, not in India but in Russia, or China or in Europe, all of you will be affected. Face all this - look at all this.

S: How do you connect the problem of a career with a war, and even a mediocre person will go and take up something as a career.

K: What is the relationship between a war and a career and - what else? S: A mediocre person.

K: Are you mediocre? All of you? You know what that word means? The word etymologically, that is, the root meaning of that word - going half the way up the hill and never going to the top of the hill. You understand? You might have a good job either in Madras, in Bombay, or in Delhi - or even in Europe and America - you will still remain mediocre. You may be excellent in your job, but your thinking, your feelings will be mediocre, ordinary. And education throughout the world is turning out mediocre people, without any integrity, without any quality of beauty and sensitivity and so on. So the question which the boy asked was: what is the relationship between wars, career, and mediocrity. Right? Was that the question? Don't be nervous - that is your question, isn't it? No? What do you think is the relationship of a war in India or Pakistan or China with another country and your own particular job. What is the relationship between the two or is there no relationship?

S: (Inaudible)

K: Come over here - you don't mind sitting next to me?

S: No.

K: Good of you. Now what is the question?

S: I said there is no connection - because both are trying to earn a living. You said a person in India - what is the connection between the career, I thought that was what you were trying to say.

K: I am not trying to say - you are trying to say. Don't be nervous - you can say what you like.

S: I am saying both are trying to earn a living - that's all.

K: Yes sir - and what is the relationship between earning a livelihood and war? That is your question - isn't it?

S: No, what I was trying to say was - even if you are educated after a career, you are not going to, and the person who is not after it, both are going to experience, I mean the war or whatever it is.

K: Do you understand what she is saying?

N: Everybody is going to experience the war, in spite of the career.

K: Is that it? Are you experiencing the war in Lebanon - what is going on there? You know there is a war in Lebanon. One group against another group, Christian, Muslims, Syrians against Israel, and so on and so on. There is tremendous murder going on there. Right? Are you related to that?

S: Not at the moment. But may be - K: What do you mean by - by not at the moment.

S: I mean - if is in India - K: No darling, just listen. Are you related to what is happening there or not at all?

S: Yes, in some way.

K: What way?

S: Because, I mean it is happening in a place - and you know of it - K: Then what is your feeling about it, what is your relationship?

S: Sir, mediocre people like us are creating war.

K: Would you come over here - I like a boy and a girl - that is better. What sir? Don't be nervous - I am also nervous - sit comfortably - what were you saying? Mediocre people create wars. Do you understand what he said, he said - mediocre people like us, including him, including you are responsible for creating wars. You agree to that, why? It is easy to agree, but why?

S: We have some ideas and we don't want them to be broken. And so for these ideas, we fight.

K: That is right. Perfectly right. You have ideas that you are Indian. Right? That you are a Hindu and across the border the Muslim thinks he is a Muslim, because that is an idea. And also there are totalitarian countries like Russia, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Rumania, Hungary and so on and all those countries - including Russia have one set of ideas. Right? And democratic countries have another set of ideas - they are fighting with each other. So, would you consider all ideas are mediocre? Use your brain. Would you consider all ideas, all ideals are mediocre, which create wars? Come on old boy, argue, discuss, don't accept what I say, do you understand, think it out. Think out for yourself if ideas, ideals, are separating people - like India, Russia, you follow - nationalities. Nationalities are creating wars. Right? Agree? So, don't be national.

S: If I am a national I will be helping to create wars.

K: That's right - so, would you stop being a national calling yourself a Hindu, or a Parsi or a Sikh, or a Muslim - you know all that business. But you may say, yes I like the idea, you are quite right but inside I will be a Hindu still. That will be hypocrisy - won't it? So, would you? If you are not, then you are moving away from mediocrity. So you see sir, wars are created by tribes. Wars have existed in this world, for the last six thousand or seven thousand years, wars practically every year all over the world and we are still having wars after all these long centuries of evolution; and these wars are caused by ideals, religious ideals, national ideals, and ideals created by thought - which is, I am a Hindu, you are a Muslim, I am a communist, you are a democratic and so on. This is the world you are going to face, whether you have a good job or not. So what is your future? Answer my question sir - what is your future? You understand? You are the result of long series of movements in evolution, you are here now. Your brains have evolved from a very minute cell to this very, very complex brain - you have studied biology. And this brain has become mediocre, because we are frightened, we are nationalistic, we want to follow the same old pattern, so we have become mediocre. You may be very clever. You may be a scientist, you may be an engineer and so on, but your feelings, your thinking is very primitive. So you are still mediocre. Now what will you do about it? Will you break through the pattern? If you don't break through the pattern now, your future is what you are now. Right? Is it clear? You understand what I am saying - that if I don't change now, my future will be exactly what I am now, slightly modified. S: Sir, can one be part of the system of examination, job, etc. and yet not be mediocre?

K: It all depends - you might never pass exams, you might never go through college, universities and a job, yet remain mediocre or you might go through all that process and may not be mediocre - it all depends on the quality of your brain - how you think, how you feel, what your sense of appreciation of the world. Do you understand what I am saying, have I made myself clear?

S: Then there seems to be a contradiction between physical reality and what we aspire to.

K: What is the physical reality?

S: Having a job - after doing examinations.

K: You have to go through examinations. Let us take that. That is actuality - that you have to do. Right? And where is the other?

S: You feel that it is not the most important thing.

K: I personally don't. But your fathers may, your government may, your society may. I never passed through any examination at all. I am still alive. So what is the contradiction?

S: Where does exactly mediocre stand for us to pass over it. Where do we draw the line?

K: Do you know you are mediocre? Or are you too proud to acknowledge that? If you are honest to yourself - are you honest to yourself, any of you? If you are not honest to yourself, or you ask yourself - are you mediocre? Wanting to follow the same old pattern.

S: Perhaps I want to.

K: Then accept it - you are mediocre. But if you don't want to, that is what the girl asked, if you don't want to, how do you break through this. Right? You tell me. Don't let me tell you. But you tell me how to break, how to go beyond it?

S: This routine of job, then marriage and all that will perhaps give you a security sir.

K: Yes, so, are you seeking security?

S: No one wants to be alone - so that is the ultimate thing? Like no one would like to be in a routine job, marriage, and everything. Everyone wants to have that because no one wants to be alone.

K: Now just a minute - what do you mean by that word alone? Careful, careful. Just think of that word - what it means - alone. You know the word alone means all one - that is the dictionary meaning, the root meaning of that word alone means - all one. You mean isolated.

S: Yes.

K: Each person feels isolated, why?

S: Because, everyone wants company, at least I do.

K: Why?

S: We come back to fear, sir.

K: That's all. Which means what? Because you are afraid, go on, pursue it, sir, don't stop there. Find out.

S: You are afraid, and you want someone to share that feeling with you.

K: Which, you want somebody to support you, encourage you, give you comfort, to say, very well, old girl, and so on and so on. Right? So, you depend on somebody - why? Think it out.

S: Again we come back to fear - because you are scared.

K: So, you are scared, you are frightened therefore you depend. Now when you depend on somebody what happens? Think it out.

S: You don't use your brain.

K: No, think it out. See the consequences of that. You know what I mean by consequences. Now, what does it mean - I am attached to you - you are my friend and what happens? In being attached to you I become...

S: My security lies in you.

K: Which means that I depend on you. Go on, pursue it, go into it.

S: If this attachment breaks there might be sorrow - so again there is fear.

K: So when you are attached the consequences are, fear - right? - pain, jealousy - when I am attached to you and you might look at the other person and I get jealous of you. Right? So I am jealous, I get angry, in all that where is my security? Because you are seeking security through dependence and that very dependence denies your security. Right? Do you see it? Use your brain, don't stop there. So how do you find security? Every human being, all of you here need security. That means what - when you say security and you agree, what does that mean?

S: It means I want to have no fear.

K: No sir - security.

S: But I want to feel secure.

S: Protected, want to feel, we want protection.

K: What does it mean? Go on? To be secure, right?

S: You hold on to something, not stand by yourself.

K: No, you know - look, you are all secure here - aren't you? Secure, you have a room to sleep in, bed, clothes, water to wash, and good food - is it good food here?

A: Yes

K: All agree - do you all agree you have good food?

S: Mediocre food sir.

K: Would you like to have it improved?

A: Yes sir.

K: You see how quickly you react to that. So food is very important, isn't it?

K: To be secure means, to have food, clothes, shelter and money. If that is assured you are physically secure. Right?

S: I need some company.

K: Yes, yes - company, friends - you call all that security. Now, that woman there, carrying the burden, very poor, she has no security. Right? From day to day - she lives - frightened, hungry, dirty, but she carries on. So, is there security when people are divided into communities? Which means - when a nation is divided against another nation there will always be opposition, there will always be wars. Therefore the very nationality is denying your security. Do you see that? So, will you be free of nationality? Don't say, yes and go back to nationality.

S: I can't say because, you might feel it but deep inside, you say, OK, I am a Hindu - and I mean you have that feeling.

K: Then wipe it out because that is going to cause war.

S: (Inaudible)

K: I agree - what is next, first you must have physical security. But that physical security is denied to people when there is war.

S: Sir, a small community understands you better than a big community-so nationality is useless.

K: This is a small community, where we live - right? Do we understand each other, help each other, be affectionate to each other?

S: Not to all, to some.

K: So sirs, come back to our question: what is your future? What is the future of each one of you? And if I am your parent, I will be very, very concerned about it. I might try to get you a job, get you to marry and all that stuff in India, but what is your future?

S: Sir, how are we supposed to know our future?

K: You can't. But you can know what you are now. Right?

S: I think it depends on your way of thinking and your parents way of thinking.

K: The parents way of thinking, and the way you think now. If you think in terms of nationality, Hindu, Buddhist, Muslim and so on, then the future will be what you are now. Agreed? Come on sir.

S: You used the word, break down the barrier, once you break down the barrier, where do we go?

K: Once you break down the barrier, where do you go? What is the barrier before you go, what do you call a barrier? Nationality is a barrier?

S: No.

K: Why not, it is causing war. Don't you think it is causing the war? So, that is a barrier. Then if you don't belong to any nationality, what are you? A human being - aren't you? Which is what?

S: Sir, even if there is no nationality here, or suppose the world is one, but even then there is the question of a job, examination, marriage later on.

K: Yes sir, but our whole attitude, our whole way of living would be different, wouldn't it? I may get married, you may get married, get a job, but our whole outlook may not be limited.

S: If only students in Rishi Valley follow this and the whole world goes the other way - we are the ones to suffer.

K: If all of you here followed or thought out, or worked out, and are free of nationality and the rest of the world did not do what you are doing, then what happens to you?

S: What happens to us?

K: Think it out. Either you will be smothered, or you will be smothered, or destroyed by the majority, or the majority might join you, because they might see you have sense. They might see how logical it all is, they might join you.

S: Suppose, they do not realize it.

K: Then you carry on your way.

S: Sir, what happens if the majority thinks that they are making sense?

K: If the majority thinks that they are making sense - is it sense to have wars every year?

S: They think so.

K: I know, I know they think their way of living is very sane, rational, and rather stupid. I have told them that old boy - I have discussed with them. They say, leave me alone. Right? And you come along and say, what a stupid way of living, perpetually at war. Right? And you say, don't be nationalistic; either I say I accept you and begin to put away my nationality. But very few people do this, they talk about it. Do you understand? Very few people actually say, I won't be a Hindu, I won't be a Hindu, I won't be a Catholic or Protestant, nothing.

S: We cannot really dissolve this barrier, because we have to pay taxes, we have to follow certain duties.

K: Of course sir - when you buy a stamp part of it goes to support wars. Right? If you telephone from here to your home, what you pay goes to support war. So what will you do? Not telephone, not write letters, or would you attack the thing much deeper? Attack the thing deeper, which is, nationality, which is the separate religious groups, I am a Hindu, you are a Muslim, I am a communist, you are a Democrat, you follow. This division throughout the world, is destroying the world. You see it, it is happening there - in Beirut - see this. So to think this way is mediocre, to live that way is mediocre.

Now let us come back. You are frightened. Let us talk a little bit about fear. We are going to talk four days together, I hope you don't mind four days. We are going to talk to each other, the day after tomorrow and so on. Now what is fear? You tell me. You think out carefully and tell me what is fear.

S: Fear is: what happened in the past, something that is going to frighten you.

S: What he says is, that something which has happened in the past and you doesn't want it to be repeated for the fear.

K: Right. You have done something in the past that has caused pain and you want that not to be repeated, and so that causes fear. Right? Now you are afraid also of the future, you might have an accident, you might fall ill, you might be scolded. So just a minute - you are afraid of the future. Are you afraid now sitting here? Careful, think it out. Let us begin again: you are afraid of the past, you are afraid of the future - are you afraid now?

S: You mean at the present?

K: At the present.

S: I am afraid of the future.

K: No darling - you don't mind if I call you darling. You are afraid of the past. I have done something and I am frightened. And also I might be frightened of the future - what might happen - what will happen. So, you are afraid of the past, you are afraid of the future. As the present is now - you are sitting here.

S: We might be afraid of what people might think of us.

K: That is future.

S: Right now, sitting.

K: Are they doing it now? You don't know. So at present - be careful in your thinking, precise - future, past, and there is the present, which is now you are sitting here. So is fear always in the future or in the past? Think it out carefully. Always in the future, always in the past, not in the present.

S: Perhaps we have fear in the present.

K: Are you afraid now, sitting there?

S: Yes.

K: Of what?

S: Afraid of people around me.

K: Careful, careful, you have not thought it out. Think it out sir, before you say anything.

S: It is not actually fear. It is your opinion.

K: You are afraid what might happen. You are afraid what has happened. Right? So, at present sitting here, you might think of the future and get frightened or think of the past and get frightened. So, fear is either in the past or in the future, but never in the present.

What do you say to that. Don't agree. Right? So, what are you frightened of? S: Of what might happen.

K: Or what has happened. Now, which means what?

S: I don't want anything to happen.

K: No darling, sir, think it out. What has happened, what does it mean. The memory, the remembrance of something unpleasant, the remembrance, memory. Right? And the future is what might happen also from the past. The future, which means, it might happen. So, both are the process of thinking. Clear? Be clear - careful. Don't accept a thing anybody says, think it out. I am afraid of the past - that is, something happened two days ago which gave me fear and I think about it. Right? It has happened, it is finished, but I think about it. Right? The thinking about it causes fear, thinking about what has happened. Thinking about what might happen, which is the future, thinking about the past, thinking about the future, causes fear. Clear? I am thinking for you. You are not thinking. So, thinking about the past, thinking about the future causes fear. So thinking creates fear.

S: So, are you trying to say, why think?

K: No, I am trying to point out to you, the cause of fear, which is thinking about the past, thinking about the future, the thinking itself is the movement of fear. Then what will you do with thinking? You have to think to get from here to there. This is a little too difficult. Do you understand what I am saying? You work it out carefully. Take time. Thinking about the past, thinking about the future, causes fear, pain. Fear is pain.

S: Thinking spontaneously need not cause fear, the present has no fear.

K: Are you thinking spontaneously? She says thinking causes...

S: But all thinking is from the past, you can't think spontaneously.

K: That is right, you have got it. All thinking is from the past, all thinking is not only the past but also the future. Right? This is a little difficult. So what will you do about thinking? You have to think - to put on your clothes, you have to think, when you clean your teeth you have to think, when you comb your hair you have to think, or go to the barber to get it cut short, you have to think. Right? So you have to think. So then what? Thinking causes fear but yet you have to think. Find out. Thinking about the future and the past causes pain, fear, but you also have to think. To put on your dress, put on your trousers, to listen to the educators, who inform you about mathematics, geography, you have to think. So, where do you have to think, which does not cause fear? You understand my question?

S: When you form an opinion about it.

K: Opinion about what?

S: Like, suppose, there is something which you are not certain about. It can happen.

K: No darling, listen, first get the principle that thinking about the past, and the future, causes fear, but yet you have to think.

S: Sir, now we are not feeling afraid, but in the future we might feel afraid of the now - which is the past.

K: Yes. But in the future you might think, by Jove, I am going to fail in the exams, that might frighten you.

S: No sir, we are not afraid now.

K: Sitting there, you are not afraid, of course.

S: Sir, if we are not afraid now, why should we be afraid in the future? Now is the past then.

N: It is a bit complicated. If you are not afraid now, why should you be afraid of the future, which is now.

K: You are a clever boy. Think it out sir, think it out. You are saying, thinking about the future causes fear. But what? Next step - tell me - he said something very good, sir, tell me.

N: Now, I am not afraid, in the future the now will become the past, and you have said, only the future and the past can cause fear, but if now I am not afraid and in the future this will become the past, how can it cause fear, if now does not cause fear?

K: It is very clever, sir. Have you understood this? Listen to him carefully.

S: Sir, now we are not afraid - in the future, this will become the past. So, if now I am not afraid, in the future, this will be the past.

K: Quite right sir. Quite right? The future is the present. He has said the future is fear, but at present I am not afraid, therefore the present is the future, therefore I have no fear: that is what he said.

S: The present will be the past and future.

K: The present will be the past in the future, therefore in the future there is no fear. He said - please listen to him carefully, it is very interesting - at present I am not afraid, the future is the present, and if I am not afraid now, in the future I won't be afraid. Quite right. That means I am living always in the present.

S: Never in the future.

K: Got it sir? I don't know if you have understood this. That is, listen carefully, use your brains, don't go to sleep, this is not a mathematical class, where you can go on, repeat, repeat. He is saying something very interesting. At the present moment I am not afraid; the present becomes the future, therefore the future has no fear, which means, I am living all the time in the present. Listen carefully, see what it means. Can I live always in the present? That is what he said sir - I am not saying, agree or disagree, listen to what he said. Find out the truth of it, or the falseness of it. If I am not afraid now, the future is what I am now; which means, can I always live now, in the present. Do you understand? Which means - I will explain a little more - which means, the future and the past are contained in the present.

Got it? What? Be careful - don't repeat what I said, find out.

S: (Inaudible).

N: He is saying - I may not be good in Telegu now, so, I might project it to the future and say what am I going to do in the future, if I am not good now at mathematics, or Telegu now, what will I do in the future? He is questioning, whether the present can be a source of fear.

K: Sir, apart from theories, are you frightened, factually, of the past, future, frightened?

S: Yes, sir.

S: Can you bring the past and the future into the present?

K: No, not bring, I said the present is contained in the past and the future.

S: So, both the past and the future bring fear to the present.

K: Yes. So, you have to eliminate fear now. Got it? You people - you see, you say something true and stop, you don't proceed. You said - go on, repeat what you said. It is very good. Do you realize all of you over there, who are much older, don't talk - why?

S: Because maybe, they are not interested, or maybe they don't want to speak.

K: Why? Or they are cynical - this is all childish stuff, we have gone beyond all this, we will pass our exams and get on with this stuff. Right?

S: Or we are listening.

K: Are you listening?

S: I am.

K: What do you mean by listening?

S: When you say something - I am observing.

K: Do you differentiate between hearing with the ear, and listening?

S: Listening and learning.

K: Forgive me sir, if I may repeat again - do you differentiate between hearing and listening?

S: Yes sir - listening is where you take it in, and analyse, but hearing is where it goes in one ear and goes out the other.

K: So you are saying, in the process of listening you are analysing, questioning, doubting. Right? Is that listening? You are telling me, the past is fear and the future is fear - I listen to you, I hear what you are saying, there is a difference. I am not interpreting what you are saying. I am listening which means I am observing what you are talking about and wait till I find out the truth of it. I am not analysing, I am listening, take it in and wait till I completely listen, then I can proceed to analyse. But if I listen and analyse, I have not listened to you. Right? Do you see that?

S: I think listening can cause fear.

K: Ah! - you are right. Listening might have awakened the memories of yesterday, or might awaken the future, therefore you listen, find out if you are afraid, but first, you must listen.

S: In the process of listening you might not be afraid, but afterwards.

K: Yes. Of course - but first, you must listen. Have you ever listened to the song of a bird? Have you? Yes. You are listening and seeing that bird on that branch, singing and then afterwards you say, that bird is - whatever the name of the bird - but you are listening. Do you listen to your educator?

S: If it is boring, we don't listen - when it is interesting.

K: The boy says, when he is bored he is not listening. Quite right, quite right. Which means, the educator is boring.

S: Not always sir.

K: He is being polite - not always sir. Now sir - just a minute, come back. Do you want to be free of fear? Or do you like it?

S: Having a fear may help you.

N: He thinks it is a motivation.

K: Yes. When you are afraid, have you listened to your teacher? When you are frightened, do you ever listen? Of course not. I am asking you, all of you, whether you really want to be free of fear.

S: Yes sir, but then you will have some kind of fear.

K: Darling, just listen. Do you want to be free of it, don't say, there might exist afterwards.

S: Yes.

K: Do you really want to be free? What will you do to be free? You know you go to a temple, Tirupati temple, or some temple and say, please God, I'll give you something, you give me something else.

S: It is a business deal.

K: Right. It is a good business deal, it is really a rotten business. But the priests get a lot out of it. So do you want to be free, completely free - not only now, but all through life?

S: Otherwise you will be going through a lot of conflict. Like your parents might say something and you might not accept it or you might. So, there will be a lot of conflict.

K: Yes. But I am saying - do you want to be free in spite of all that.

S: If you do not know something. You have a fear that you do not know - something will happen to you. Because of that fear, you learn those things.

N: You are afraid you don't know something, so because of that you learn.

K: Is learning - I know the game.

N: He is continuing.

K: He has not moved. Are you saying, through fear you learn? That is what you are saying. Through fear, if you don't listen to the teacher, he might beat you up or he might give you less marks, or he might write to your parents. Therefore, being afraid, you listen to him.

S: It is not always so.

K: You are all too clever. I am asking you a very simple question, you don't answer me. Do you want to be free of fear? Do you? Be serious-don't just say, yes and let's get on with it.

S: No, I want to.

K: Then, what price do you pay for it? Not coins, not go to the temples, and pay a fee of ten rupees. But if you say I really want to be free from fear, deeply, then we will work together.

S: Do what you really want to do, not do it for the sake of others.

K: And also, if you want to be free, you, we three will work it out. You understand what I am saying? Work it out, step by step, so that at the end of it you are completely free of fear. Right? If that is what you want to do, what will you pay for it? Not money. What will you do? You know - give a flower - you must do something to show you are serious, your integrity, not just say, I would like to be free from fear, tell me all about it.

S: Be true to yourself, like, not try to put up...

K; I understand. Let us go into it - don't say, I must do this, I must not do that, let us go into the whole question of fear and see if you can step by step, end it. At each step taken, it is ended.

S: (Inaudible.)

K: By learning. Right? What do you mean by learning?

S: Learning...

K: Wait, listen old boy. Don't answer me before I have finished. What do you mean by learning? Is memorizing learning? Right? Answer that. Is memorizing mathematics, repeating day after day, day after day the same thing, till you have memorised it, is that learning? That is what you call learning. But I question, I doubt, if that is learning. Learning is much more active than merely repeating. Now, what is the time?

S: Sir - if you don't have fear, you might cause trouble to others.

K: By being free of fear, you might cause trouble to others. So you will be a doormat. So I am afraid I might hurt him, therefore I keep my fear.

S: Not that sir, if you are free of fear, you might go and burn houses. You are not afraid of anybody.

K: If you are not afraid, you might burn up the school. Try it.

We had better stop, it is now a quarter to eleven, we have done an hour and a quarter. Do you like this kind of meeting?

A: Yes.

K: We will have it. We will meet again the day after tomorrow. So we will go on with this. First of all, I hope you have enjoyed yourselves. Have a good discussion - discuss - you understand, not just listen and say, I agree with you. That is silly. Let us sit quietly for a few minutes, shall we?

RISHI VALLEY 2ND TALK WITH STUDENTS 14TH DECEMBER 1983

Krishnamurti: You don't mind my talking?

Students: No.

K: You are quite sure?

Students: Yes.

K: All right. What do you think is the greatest profession, the greatest vocation, the greatest job? What do you think about that?

S: Having lots of joy, I like moonlight dinner.

K: Moonlight dinner, she likes. But I wasn't asking about your dinner, I was asking, if I may, what do you think is the greatest profession in the world.

S: Teaching.

K: Why do you think that is the greatest profession?

S: It requires a lot of patience.

S: I think agriculture is the best.

K: Sorry I asked this question.

S: There can't be any profession which is the greatest because every man thinks his profession is the greatest.

K: I know. But what do you think is the greatest? I think being a teacher is the greatest profession in the world because they are preparing a new generation, a new generation of people. Not the politicians, not the scientists, not the businessman, nor the gurus - teaching in the sense helping the students throughout the world to be good human beings. Not good at some profession, some career, some job, but to help other human beings, like yourselves, to become extraordinarily good human beings. I mean by that word `good', not fragmented, not broken up in themselves, contradictory, but whole, unbroken. You understand the word `good'? I am explaining the meaning of that word `good'. Very few of us in the world are good human beings: we say one thing and do another, think one thing and act totally different from what you think, so there is a contradiction in us, a conflict, one desire opposing another desire, so there is always in us this fragmentary activity going on. Are we aware of that? Do you know what I am saying? Don't you say one thing and do another? Right? Think one thing and act totally different from what you think? Haven't you noticed that? That's called fragmentation. That's only part of it: to be fragmented, to be broken up, not to be a whole human being; to use a scientific word, holistic, or a human being that is completely whole, not broken up, not fragmented, deeply integrated, have deep integrity.

And also that word means sane, rational, clear, unconfused. And it is the function of the educator to bring this about with his students, because you are the coming generation, and if you merely follow the old pattern, which is, getting a job, getting married, and settling down, which means for the rest of your life go to an office from nine o'clock in the morning until five o'clock in the evening. You do this, your fathers do this, don't they, from nine o'clock until five o'clock for the rest of their life. Do you realize how terrible this is? You understand this? And this is called living. Of course one has to earn a livelihood, of course one has to get a job, but if one is good in the deep sense of that word, then all the other things take their right place.

Do you understand what I am talking about? Do you? Yes? Do you? I'm afraid not. Do you understand what I am talking about?

Don't you say one thing and do another?

S: Yes.

K: Why? Either you are afraid, you think one thing and say something else because you are afraid that the other person might get hurt, or might hurt you, or you are not quite telling the truth. All that makes a human being fragmented, broken up, like a vessel, a pot, a terracotta vessel is easily broken. So we human beings throughout the world are in this condition of constantly saying one thing, doing something else. So they are in perpetual conflict. Right? And in their relationship, with the wife, or husband, and so on, they are always in conflict. Haven't you noticed it? So what do you propose to do? If you see all this happening throughout the world, what's your responsibility, and what's the responsibility of the educator? Tell me, don't go to sleep - I hope you had a good sleep last night, did you? Did you have a good sleep last night?

S: Yes.

K: Don't go to sleep now then.

S: To teach them to do something good and not bad.

K: How do you teach them?

S: By being a good person yourself.

K: I daren't ask this question, but are your teachers good?

S: Some of them.

K: Some of them are good - don't tell me who are and who aren't! Are you good? Don't bother about the teachers, are you good? You understand? Please understand what I mean by good.

S: (Inaudible)

K: You are rather fat, aren't you? He is a bit fat - I am too thin and he is too fat! Go on, sir, what were you saying?

S: I see myself as a good person, but I don't know about others.

K: I asked you. I told you what a good person was, that is, he doesn't contradict himself, say one thing, do another. Right? Think one thing and say something else. And a person who is not in conflict, but who is not asleep - right? - so such a person is a good person. Now are you?

S: Sir, one might think one thing and do another - I might think I am a good person.

K: You may not be, but thinking you are a good person is not a good person. Actually what you are. Now how do you learn to be good?

S: By doing something that is useful.

K: The government says it is very useful to go and kill your Muslim people. Right? War. Do you think that is good?

S: No.

K: Then will you do it?

S: No.

K: But you are a girl, therefore you are quite safe. But if you are a young man, as in Europe and other parts of the world, every boy at the age of eighteen has to join the army, has to spend two years as a soldier, carrying guns, working, training and all that. If the government asks you in this country to go and kill somebody, would you do it?

S: No.

K: Ah, no, don't say, no. It is very easy to say, no. But when you grow up, when you are eighteen, will you go and kill somebody? Tell me.

S: It depends.

K: It depends on what?

S: It depends on the need.

K: What do you mean, need?

S: My need and my want will kill me.

K: I don't understand this.

S: (Inaudible)

K: I see. You will yield to the pressure of a society - is that it? Your society, your government, puts a pressure on you that you must kill. Will you do it?

S: Yes.

K: You may do it, why?

S: Because the country becomes too bad for me.

K: What do you mean by that, the country becoming too bad for you?

S: The conditions for war may become too bad.

K: What are the conditions you would like?

S: (Inaudible)

K: All right, you are living in a society, who created the society?

S: We ourselves.

K: She says, we ourselves, your fathers, grandfathers - no? So your fathers and grandfathers have created this society which says that you must go and kill. Right? Will you go and do it?

S: (Inaudible)

K: What about violence? You may have a great deal of pressure, I might keep on insulting you, and that hurts you, will you then hurt me back?

S: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking - but will you, yes?

S: I would not but the other chap might.

K: So if he is stronger than you what will you do? Look: you haven't really thought about what I am saying.

S: If you are a good person and you help everybody then you will be good.

K: Do you understand what I am saying first? I am saying the greatest profession in the world, in spite of all the societies, everything else, a teacher, an educator, is preparing a new generation of people, and that new generation is not only academically good, but much more important, much more essential is that you as a student under him should become a good human being.

S: (Inaudible)

K: Wait a minute, old boy, I haven't finished yet. Have you understood so far what I said?

S: (Inaudible)

K: Wait, sir, wait, sir. So I explained carefully what is a good human being. Right? Have you understood that? A good human being is one who is not fragmented, broken up, saying one thing, doing another, thinking one thing and acting in a totally different way - he is broken up. You understand? He is not whole. And we are saying a good person is whole. That is the definition of a human being who is good. You may not agree with that definition, you may say, it is rotten.

S: The teachers want a student to settle down.

K: Then is he a good teacher then?

S: People are like that these days.

K: Do you want to be a good person - forget the teacher for the moment. Do you want to be a good human being?

S: I want to be what I consider good.

K: What do you consider good?

S: (Inaudible)

K: What do you consider good?

S: Study well and get a good job.

K: Is that what you call good?

S: (Inaudible)

K: Yes sir, and lady, but do you say that a human being who is good, study well, get a job?

S: If you study well and get a job that is good for you.

K: Is that all?

S: And lead a happy life.

K: What do you call a happy life? Get a car? What do you call a happy life?

S: Someone to share you happiness with.

K: No, I asked you, what do you call a happy life?

S: When you yourself are happy.

K: What do you mean by happiness?

S: To fulfil all your ambitions.

K: Oh, fulfil all your ambitions is to be happy, is that it? Is that what you are going to do?

S: (Inaudible)

K: Now what is ambition? Think it out, don't just say, ambition.

S: It's a goal.

K: I want to be Prime Minister - god forbid - I want to be a General - again, god forbid - or a lawyer, or something else, I want to be something. Right? Do you agree to that?

S: Yes.

K: Weren't you here yesterday? Too bad you are not here again. So do you know what ambition does?

S: It makes you unhappy.

K: It makes you unhappy - therefore you are not ambitious?

S: I am but I think when you can't fulfil your ambitions you are unhappy.

K: But can you ever fulfil your ambitions?

S: Not all the time.

K: Then what are those that can be fulfilled? Marriage, of course.

S: If you can't fulfil all of the ambitions you have to feel happy with those you can.

K: What are those things?

S: You can be free of all the things you don't like.

K: First of all, sir, do you know what ambition does? You are ambitious and I am ambitious - suppose I am, so what happens to us?

S: It leads to competition.

K: It leads to competition, you are saying - what does that mean?

S: (Inaudible)

K: You and I are fighting each other. Right?

S: You get satisfaction.

K: You are not thinking, you are just saying something. Do think, please, don't just say something and then not mean what you say. To be ambitious, what does that mean? The word 'ambition' what does that mean? To become, or be something, isn't it? No? Are you all asleep this morning? Had a good meal?

S: Yes.

K: Then keep awake.

S: But you want us to become a good person.

K: No, I didn't say, become. That's the difference. I did not say become, I said, be, which is entirely different. You understand the two? Becoming is ambitious - wait, wait. I haven't finished yet. Becoming good incites ambition. Do you see that?

S: How can you become good?

K: I did not say, become. I am saying, sir, becoming means having a goal and striving for that. Right? I didn't say that, I said, be. Being doesn't take time, the other does. This is too complex, I won't go into it. So I said, be good, which means be aware that your life is contradiction, that you contradict yourself, and end that conflict, end that contradiction - not that you will end it. Do you see the difference? No.

S: You can see it logically, but doing it is another matter.

K: You can see it logically but doing is another matter - why is it another matter? If you have a toothache, a bad pain, you say, I will take time to get over it, or do you want it ended immediately? No, this is a bit too difficult, or you are not thinking this morning.

S: I want to get over it.

K: Get over what?

S: Toothache.

K: Quite right. You want to get over quickly your toothache so you do something immediately. Right? But when you say, I will be good - when you say, I will be good, you don't want to do it immediately.

S: If you want to be good you can be.

K: Are you good?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So, sir, please, would you kindly listen. I was saying this morning, I began by saying, the greatest profession in the world is educators, because he is bringing about a new generation of people. Right? Because you are going to be a new generation. And the hope of the world - the world is in such a mess - depends on you. Right? How you grow up, if you merely follow the same old pattern then you are furthering the same misery, confusion of the world.

S: Teaching is not a good profession.

K: Why?

S: Because you hardly get any money.

K: He hardly has enough money. So money is your ambition, is it? To have plenty of money.

S: (Inaudible)

K: You see, for god's sake, you don't listen to what I am saying, sir. Forgive me, you are not listening to what I am saying. You have had thousands of engineers all over the world, thousands and thousands. Right? Great business people, great scientists, and rather unfortunate politicians all over the world - they have not brought about good human beings. Right? So we are saying that the function of an educator, who is really educating, is not only to help them to have good academic brains but also to be good human beings. Right? Because that might change the world.

S: (Inaudible)

K: Have you listened to what I have said, dear?

S: Yes.

K: Then what is your question?

S: How many people do you think will really go after that?

K: Not how many people - will you?

S: I don't think so, sir, it's too difficult.

K: Just a minute, answer my question, will you?

S: I doubt it, sir.

K: Don't say, doubt. Either you want to do something, or you don't want to do something.

S: No, I don't want to do it.

K: That's all very simple. That's very clear. You want to live a mediocre life.

S: I want to live what you call mediocre.

K: Not what I call mediocre - we have agreed. I am not telling you what a mediocre life is. Mediocre means going half way up the hill - the root meaning. And that means, not what I think, don't pass off that kind of game with me, I am very good at this - I am saying, a mediocre life is one who conforms to the pattern, job, marriage, settle down, children, and everlastingly quarrel, fight, struggle. Right? I call all that which produces war a mediocre life. That's all. You may say, that's not mediocrity, then we can discuss it. Right? But if you say, it's your mediocrity, it's not mine, then we can't discuss anything.

S: Sir, just a minute.

K: I'll wait a minute, as long as you like.

S: What you are trying to say, suppose...

K: I am asking you.

S: The next generation...

K: You are the next generation.

S: OK, we also follow the same pattern - how many people do you think will follow the other?

K: I don't care how many. I am asking you, you, do you want to lead a mediocre life? If you agree to the definition, which apparently you seem to do, then do you want to lead a mediocre life, which means creating wars, perpetual conflict for the rest of your life until you die?

S: No.

K: Then what will you do?

S: Well then I would...

K: No, no. Don't escape from it. What will you do? You see you are all too clever, you all want to escape from it, you kind of spin around.

S: It's because we are confused.

K: Are you confused when you said, look mediocrity is this and I don't want to be mediocre like that - that's not confusion. But if you say, I would like not to be mediocre but I am mediocre - and play that kind of game. Right?

S: Why do you call teaching the greatest profession?

K: I have just explained, lady.

S: You are helping the new generation, but what about the other people, the old generation?

K: I explained to you very carefully, if I may repeat it again, I consider, I may be wrong, you have a right to question it, for me the greatest profession in the world is the teaching profession, the educator, not the ordinary educator who is just turning out, but the educator who is concerned with the world, what is happening with the world, the wars, the conflict, the divisions of people, and seeing all that the educator says, there must be a new generation of people who are not like that. If you and I agree to that...

S: Why do you say that teaching is greatest - why do you use the word greatest?

K: All right, I won't use the word greatest if you don't like it. It is the most important function in the world. Is that all right?

S: If teaching is the greatest profession, then what is the profession for those who have gone through these teachers?

K: They will also teach or bring about a good society.

S: If everyone takes to teaching there will be no students.

K: Nobody is going to. You see, this is just a theory. You see you are all theorizing, I object to that. I say, for god's sake I would like to discuss something else. Wait a minute, wait a minute.

S: (Inaudible)

K: I am your teacher - suppose I am your teacher and you are my student. I say I don't know what goodness is - you understand - I understand what K has been talking about goodness, I have grasped it intellectually but I am not living it. So as I am not living it, and you are not living it, we are on the same level. If you are slow and I am fast, then I stop and help you to be fast.

S: What happens if you are slow?

K: If I am slow you help me. I am your teacher, as I said to you, we are on the same level. I don't know what it is to be really good, I understand it verbally, intellectually, theoretically, but to be good means a tremendous thing; I don't understand it, and you don't understand it, so let us work at it together. You understand? Not that I am superior, or inferior, or you are superior, we are together in this. It's like being in a boat, a rowing boat, we all have to row. You understand? So it's your responsibility as well as mine in this relationship to help each other to be good. Will you do it?

S: There are many teachers who are not.

K: There are many teacher who are not, all right, don't bother about them, you be good.

Now just a minute, I'd like to talk about something else, leave that for the moment. What makes the brain degenerate? You understand this question? Do you understand this question? Don't go to sleep. You have got a brain, haven't you? The brain is the instrument, is the place where all your reactions, your physical, emotional, your thinking, is all centred there. And as you grow older it begins to deteriorate. Haven't you seen old people?

S: Yes.

K: Including myself. It begins to deteriorate. Now how will you prevent deterioration of the brain? You understand my question? First of all, do you realize what deterioration means, the word deteriorate.

S: Yes.

K: No, no, look. If it seems so clear tell me.

S: What you are trying to say is...

K: Not, `what I am trying to say'. I asked you, the brain deteriorates with age.

S: You mean it stops thinking for itself.

K: No. You can't stop thinking.

S: Like you follow what other people say.

K: Have you noticed here there are the old people, older students and younger students. Will the younger students become like them - hard, grown-up, superior and so on? I am asking what makes the human brain deteriorate. You have to think about it, don't quickly answer.

S: What do you mean by deteriorate?

K: That's quite right. A fruit ripens at one moment and then it begins to deteriorate and gets worse and worse and worse. Right? So the brain has reached a certain point. You probably don't know all this. Watch your own brain, look at your own thinking, it reaches a point and then stops and gradually declines. Right? You have seen this, your grandfathers, grandmothers - I won't insult your fathers - but they reach a height and then decline. Is this what is happening here in this school? I'll explain what I mean, deteriorate.

The scientists who are studying the brain, with whom I have talked, I know some of them, they say there is the left side of the brain and the right side of the brain. Please listen to this, if you are interested. There are the two sides, the left and the right. The left side of the brain is the practical brain, it does everything everyday, you know, think out, drive a car, learn mathematics, that is the function of the left side of the brain, and more. The right side has hardly been touched, therefore that's quicker, more alive. And that influences the other, perhaps. So these two, one is quiet, you understand, the other is active. Now are you following all this?

S: But...

K: Wait, wait. I haven't finished yet. So they have divided the brain into the left and the right. We are saying, I am saying, by this division you are not employing the whole brain, the complete brain. You understand? If there is no activity of the whole brain there is a deteriorating factor taking place. You understand? You have got it? I am going to show you. The deteriorating factor is repetition. Right? Job, marriage, repeat, go to the office day after day, day after day. A repetition for a long period inevitably deteriorates the brain, like a gramophone record, repeat, repeat, repeat. That's what you are all doing.

S: In the same way, if you have two knives, a sharp knife and a blunt knife, you keep sharpening the blunt knife everyday, and you leave the sharp knife, which do you think would become the sharp knife? In the same way...

K: You haven't understood. The scientists are saying left and right: the left is active, going to the office, writing letters, learning a language and so on, the left is always, but the right is not so active, it is much more watchful, much more aware, and therefore has a greater capacity to deal with the problems. Don't deny it, these are the great scientists, don't play around with them, they will wipe the floor with you. Listen to what I am saying: constant repetition makes the brain dull. Right? And you are doing that all the time. I must have a job, I must get married, and the office, office, office. Right? You understand? Understand what I am saying.

S: But marriage and all that, it's repetition to humanity, but it's not repetition to you.

K: What do you mean, you are humanity.

S: No, everyone gets married, but you are getting married and it is the first time, that is something new to you.

K: Agreed. Agreed. But after the first experience you repeat. Right? You are stuck, old girl.

Now, I'll put it the other way: I have talked about this matter with several computer experts and this is what they are doing. Are you interested in this?

S: Yes.

K: You know what a computer is?

S: Yes.

K: Most of you do, all right. I don't. They are trying to build a computer which is almost equal to the human brain. Japan is putting billions and billions of yen, their money, into inventing a computer which is called an ultra intelligent machine. You understand? An ultra intelligent machine - UIM. Now into that machine they are trying to introduce biological cells, cells which are in the brain. You understand this? And America is doing the same, there is the IBM, which is immensely rich, machinery and so on, others have joined together to outwit the Japanese. So they are trying now to create a machine, a computer that will do almost everything that man does. Now I will tell you, I saw on television in America, was it last year, it doesn't matter, recently, a computer and a robot - you know what a robot is? The computer is telling the robot how to build a car, and the robot is building a car, twisting this way, you follow? And suddenly the whole machinery stops because the computer then says to the robot, 'You didn't turned the screw tight enough'. So the robot goes and turns the screw much tighter. Then the whole machinery starts. And the Honda machines - you know, Honda cars - there they took this television and you see all the workmen in white gowns and white gloves, they are not doing the work, they are watching, and the computer and the robot are doing the work. Right? You understand this? Right, sir? This is simple, there is nothing complicated.

Now if the computer and the robot take over all the activities of human beings what is going to happen to the human being?

S: He will become dull.

K: Now that is exactly deterioration, which you are becoming. You want to be entertained - I don't know if you have gone into it. The entertainment industry, television, radio, magazines, they are controlling you. Right? You want to be entertained. So they say, all right we will entertain you - football, cricket. So gradually what has happened to your brain?

S: You become dull.

K: No, on the contrary, you are deteriorating.

S: How can one get out of this if one is already entangled in it?

K: That's just it. Do you realize you are caught in it? Do you realize your brains are already deteriorating even though you are young. You understand what I am saying? You are young and already your brains are deteriorating because you keep on repeating. You learn from your educator about mathematics and you memorize it and repeat, repeat, repeat. Do you understand? So your brain is becoming gradually, however young you are, through your education, your brain is beginning to deteriorate. So please listen to all this. Mature slowly, not so fast. You understand what I am saying?

S: What do you mean mature slowly, not fast?

K: American girls and boys, and it is now spreading throughout the world, have sex very early. Don't be shy, this is happening.

They want to have all the experience immediately - swimming, cricket, anything, experience, ski-ing, so as they are young they want to experience everything at once in a short time. So as they grow older, see what has happened to the brain.

S: (Inaudible)

K: Yes, grow slowly. Have you noticed the greatest tree grows very, very slowly. That Banyan tree has taken five hundred years probably, it grows slowly. You understand what I am saying? The speaker is going to be eighty-nine in May - you understand? But you, all of you, you are merely recording, like a gramophone, like a tape, recording, and you keep on recording, so your brain is never fresh. And youth is meant to be fresh.

S: Can you say it is your fault because you are sent to school by your parents who expect something out of you.

K: You, you demand something different. You understand? You demand, all of you demand of your teachers that something different be done. But you say, it's all right, sir, I'll do what you ask me to do, I'll learn mathematics by just listening, by rote, you follow, and gradually your brain becomes shoddy.

S: Excuse me, sir, how can you demand?

K: Ask your teachers.

S: Would they listen to us?

K: Oh, yes, they are going to.

S: I doubt if some of them would.

K: Have you done it?

S: No.

K: There you are, you are contradicting, you are saying something you haven't done. If I say to him, he is my teacher, `Sir,

I heard this morning he was saying, don't let's repeat, teach me a way I can learn without repetition'.

S: They won't tell you.

K: Wait, listen. `I have heard this morning K saying, teach me so that I learn not by memorizing a different way of teaching, so teach me'. You are challenging him. And he has to respond. So he says, `By Jove, these children are much smarter than I am'.

S: Sir, what they would say is...

K: Just a minute.

S: What they will tell you is, we still have to go through this process of memorizing, and all the children have passed out well with that.

K: What have they done well? Got more money. Listen. More money and what happens to their brain? They are just mediocre people, they may have a marvellous job, plenty of cars, women and all the rest of it, but their brain is like mud. If you see that, actually see it, you say, by Jove, I am not going to be like that. When I was younger I was offered - I am just saying this out of humility - ten thousand dollars every week to go into the cinema. How many of you would say, `No, sorry, thanks so much, I don't want to'? You would jump at it, wouldn't you?

S: If you give me ten thousand dollars.

K: That's all I am saying, you are all so mad after money, which means freedom, which means pleasure, that's all you want, and you call that living.

S: Society wants us to do that.

K: Who created the society?

S: We did.

K: Therefore change it. Don't bother, you do the right thing.

S: I'd like to do the right thing but what about all the others?

K: Don't bother about the others, do the right thing.

S: I can't face it.

K: Then you are weak and you will deteriorate, that's all, if you can't face it.

S: If you don't study your parents might get worried.

K: I didn't say, don't study. Just a minute, I did not say, don't study. Don't get away with that. I said, teach me a different way of learning, not just memorizing. You follow?

S: My parents don't want me to learn but they just want me to get good marks.

K: Forget the parents, they have sent you here and find out. What's the matter with you? You have already grown old, all of you? Good god!

S: If you don't listen to their words they might...

K:...disown you. So you listen to them politely, carefully, and say, 'Daddy, this is the way to learn, I am learning something'.

S: But if you try it, what happens if there is conflict? They think in another way, you think in another way.

K: All right. You are younger, so you are more polite and say, sorry, you go your way.

S: No, even if you do it, sir, there will think you are arrogant.

K: No, we have been taught to learn the same subject differently, using our brain, using our capacities, using our senses.

S: How can you your senses and capacities in subjects that you have to memorize?

K: There is no subject...

S: History, the dates, how are you going to remember them?

K: I know, it's silly.

S: Yes, it is silly.

K: Find out. You see you stop there. Find out what is history.

Have you thought about it?

S: Well...

K: Just a minute, lady. What is history?

S: It is the story of man.

K: The story of man. Did you think this out, or somebody told you?

S: I got it from somebody else.

K: Somebody else. I am going to tell you but find out for yourself, don't repeat what somebody says.

S: The tree is the forest.

K: Now just listen, it comes from the Latin, historia, which means story of man. The story of man, that's history. Now, who is man? You, it is the story about you. Do you understand that? It is not about beastly King Edward VIIth or some beastly Indian king. It is the story of humanity, which is you. Listen, listen. You have learned something different, old girl. It is the story of humanity, humanity is you. What are you? So you learn. Learn about yourself. And then when you are learning about yourself you see that King Edward XIVth or whatever, or your own Indian kings, you see what they are like. You are learning.

S: What are you learning? You say a king conquers so many places, and a queen...

K: Yes, yes, murdering each other.

S: You see you are learning from them, and you are also doing the same thing, sir.

K: Therefore there is no difference between you and him.

S: No.

K: Then in studying yourself you are studying humanity. You are studying humanity. Will you do that? And then that becomes a side issue.

S: But then why is it that we have to remember all those dates, what's the point of it?

K: That's the silly society that is demanding it. Change society, therefore change yourself.

S: If this school is meant to be a place when you change society why should we follow all that, why should we follow all the history?

K: Will you do it? You stop doing it. Don't always blame the others.

S: When you study yourself you study humanity, but...

K: Listen carefully; I said history, historia, means story, the story of mankind, mankind is yourself, in understanding yourself you understand the whole movement of mankind. Right? That's all I am saying. So you get to know yourself, which is tremendously important. Now you don't know yourself, all that you know is your reactions: I like, don't like, I am ambitious, I am this, but you really don't know. And under the present circumstances of society, they say you must learn history, the dates. You learn it. Silly.

S: OK.

K: Not `OK'. It is silly but it is like that. Or you say, sorry, I don't care.

S: But then society...

K: Wait a minute. I don't care, I don't care if I become a gardener, a cook. Right? Because you want to be somebody in the world, money, position, all that, therefore you have to study all that. As I told you, I don't want to become anything. I failed all examinations, they sent me all over the world for exams, all of them I failed. Thank god! Think differently. I have milked cows, looked after chickens, I have looked after vegetable gardens, I have done all kinds of things, helped to build a house. You don't do all that. And I don't care if I am rich or poor, but you all do, old girl, all of you care. That's why you are caught by society. You understand?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Don't do it then. Be different.

S: If you think what is right and society regrets it, you are scared.

K: You are frightened, so be frightened, it doesn't matter.

S: Yes, but they might harm you.

K: If it is what is right they might harm you, don't mind. It doesn't matter. We had better stop now. Shall we sit quietly for a few minutes.

RISHI VALLEY 3RD TALK WITH STUDENTS 16TH DECEMBER 1983

Krishnamurti: As this is the last talk what would you like me to talk about?

Student: About seriousness.

K: Yes. What would you like to know about it?

S: Looking at oneself, looking hard into oneself and not letting it be just an idea, really to come into contact.

K: Contact with what?

S: Contact with whatever you are looking at.

K: Looking at oneself, being in contact with oneself, observing oneself, aware of what you are doing.

S: Not even that.

K: All that. And you call that seriousness?

S: How can one do that?

K: Why do you make it complex? I want to look at myself, not in the mirror, but where do I look to see what I am? Are you interested in all this? I want to know myself; I am a very complex human being and I have inherited so many experiences, so many concepts, opinions, judgements, tradition, vast accumulation of memories both conscious as well as unconscious; I am all that - my beliefs, my faith, guilt, my anxieties, my loneliness, depression, ambition, remorse, guilt, pain, sorrow, affection - I am all that. Now, how do I look at myself? Where do I see myself as I am?

S: How do I feel that I am all that?

K: I am going to point out, sir. Let's talk about it, shall we. As I pointed out the other day, hearing and listening are two different things. I can hear what you say verbally, understand what you are talking about verbally, intellectually, but actually I am not listening. Do you see the difference between listening and hearing? Hearing with the ear and listening not only with the ear but much more deeply. You were hearing last night some western classical music, you listened and you appreciated it. You listened to it very, very carefully - the beauty of it, the greatness of it, the vitality, the originality, the depth of it - and as you listened you began to see the beauty, movement, running, exploding it. Now how will you do the same in understanding yourself? Do you understand that question?

S: Yes sir.

K: I want to know what I am, let's begin very simply. I can't look at it in my mirror. My mirror tells me what I look like outside. But that mirror can't tell me what is inside, what my thoughts are, what my feelings are. Now is there another mirror in which I can see myself very clearly? You wanted to talk about relationship: don't you see yourself very clearly in your relationship, how you react, what your responses are, in what way you show your prejudices, the weight of your opinion, of like and dislike, of reward and punishment? You begin to observe slowly, bit by bit, in the mirror of relationship. Are you doing that as I am talking to you?

You and I are related because you have seen me several times here; we have walked together, maybe had something of a discussion together. And in that discussion, that walk, in listening to that music - you listened much more than I did - there was a certain relationship. In that relationship, which is a mirror, you can observe yourself, your reactions, all that. Can you? Will you?

S: Yes, it is out there.

K: It is not out there. Just look at it. You are looking at, in that relationship, your reactions, your opinions, your prejudices, your fears and so on. Are all these reactions different from you?

S: Yes.

K: Examine carefully, if you don't mind my telling you respectfully, don't answer immediately.

S: When I say I am observing my relationship with somebody, it seems as if I am dividing myself into two different entities. I am observing something. It seems to be different. When I say, this is my mind, what does that mean?

K: Is your mind, is your prejudice, is your anger, different from you?

S: I don't understand.

K: I am angry, impatient. Is that impatience, anger, greed, different from me?

S: No.

K: When you say `no', what do you mean by it?

S: It is the same thing.

K: So, you are the anger, you are the prejudice, you are the greed. So there is not something outside of you or inside of you at which you are looking. You are that. Suppose you are this colour, you are that colour. You can describe that colour, but the description is different from the colour. Look, I can describe the Himalayas because I have been up there - the beauty, the grandeur, the enormity of it, the immensity of it, snowcapped, clear blue sky and the marvellous sense of aloofness and the great sense of solidarity, the glory of a mountain. I can describe all that, but the description is not the mountain, is it?

S: No, it is not.

K: Why do you say that?

S: It is not the same thing.

K: So, I can describe my reactions, but the description is not my reaction. What is the difficulty? I said I can describe my reactions. The verbal description is different from the actuality. The word 'auditorium' is different from the actual fact. Do you see that?

S: Yes.

K: So the word is not the thing. Are you clear? Your name is not you. S: But sir, very often we tend to...

K: Wait, I haven't finished. That means you are not listening, you are so quick with your answer. So you have learned something: that the word is not the thing, the actual thing. See the implications of that: my wife - the word 'wife' is not the actual person. But the word becomes very important, not the person. So, you begin to discover that the brain is full of words, not actuality. Have you found that? Here is my sister, that is the end of it. The word 'sister' is not the person.

S: But she is called by that name. The name is associated with that person.

K: That is right. When you associate the name with that person, the word becomes all-important.

S: When I say 'sister', it is associated and connected with the thing.

K: All right. You know the word 'microphone'. There is a microphone. The word is not the actuality.

S: What can you call it without the word?

K: What would you call that thing without the word? I don't know. What would you call yourself without the word? What would you call yourself if you hadn't your name? Would you invent another name?

S: Yes.

K: You are not thinking, you are just responding. Find out. I say to you, the word 'microphone' is not the actual thing. That's all. I didn't go any further. So you begin to differentiate the word, the word is not actually the thing. So you begin to differentiate between the actual and the idea - the actual and the idea about the actual. The idea about the actual is not real.

So in relationship you begin to discover what you are, whether that relationship be a very intimate one like husband and wife, or friends and so on. Let's look at it the other way. Are you related to nature?

S: Yes sir, you are yourself nature.

K: You are saying you yourself are nature. How do you know?

S: You are on the earth only, on the earth itself.

K: All right, you are part of nature, you are saying. What is your relationship with nature - all those flowers, all the hills, the trees, the monkeys, the dry river?

S: The relationship is life.

K: I am asking you, what is your relationship with nature? Don't just say, life. Look, what is your relationship to a tree? You see that tree, don't you? What do you feel about it?

S: Affection.

K: Affection? Do you love that tree?

S: I admire the tree.

K: Do you? And then what? You are missing something. You are not paying attention to what I am asking.

S: Sir, it is because of the tree that you come into existence.

K: You are just saying any old thing.

S: My relationship with the tree is: I am looking at it, I feel it, and I am related to it for sometime, whatever. And it is separate from me.

K: I hope so. Though you are separate from that tree, what is your reaction to it? You understand my question? Don't go to sleep.

S: When I see a tree, I just look at that. I don't feel happy or anything like that. I just know it is a tree, that's all.

K: The word 'tree' is not the actual. Now, do you look at it? Take time to look at it? Do you listen to it? Do you listen to the sound of it?

S: (Inaudible)

K: I am asking you something, you reply so quickly. You don't listen to somebody, do you, you have already made up your mind what so say. I am not scolding you, sir, I am just telling you. I am just telling you, you don't listen. I am saying, do you ever stand still and look at a tree, the whole of it? And do you hear the sound of it? See the beauty of it? The extraordinary capacity of it?

S: Not always; whenever possible.

K: You have not even done it. You have never looked at a tree and seen the beauty of it, the quietness, the dignity, the sound, the extraordinary thing that a tree is. Now, do you look at your sister or your wife or your husband that way? Look at them? Or do you say, this is my sister and get on with it? I am asking you sir, because it is very important to understand this. We live by relationship. We cannot exist without relationship. Even the hermit, even the sannyasi or the monk is related. He may disappear into a monastery, into a forest, but he is still related to the world. Right? The world of memory, of all his experiences, he still carries with him. So, relationship is life. Relationship is extraordinarily important in life. Where there is conflict in relationship there is no relationship. So you find or discover or see yourself in the mirror of relationship. Is this clear? S: Clear.

K: And the mirror is not different from you. You are that mirror. Penetrate it, go into it, much deeper and deeper every day. Or, you may take twenty years to understand yourself bit by bit by bit. Or you can take it in, in one second the whole thing. Do you understand what I am saying? I can know myself by studying myself, what other people have said about me - philosophers, analysts, Freud and Jung and all the rest of them, I can also read some so-called sacred books, and say, I am that. But books and the words are not me. So, I have to find myself. This has been so from the ancient Greeks and the ancient Hindus: they have said 'know thyself'. Right? And very few people really know themselves. They have not even tried. Now, I say to you, relationship is the most sacred thing in life, one of the most sacred, and in that relationship you can discover everything that you are. It either takes time, or you understand it instantly. This is more difficult because this requires going into the whole question of time, thought, perception, and to see the past does not interfere with your perception of the now. That requires extraordinary attention.

S: We base our relationship on experiences and memory.

K: Your experiences are based on memory. Now, wait. Go into it a little more. Would you have the capacity to think without experience? Do you understand my question? Think it out carefully. Don't answer something you don't know. Don't become like a parrot. I am asking, sir, all of you, 'A' level, 'O' level, all kinds of stuff - without experience is there thinking?

S: No, sir.

K: No? Go step by step. Why do you say 'no'?

S: Because of experience only can we think. Without experience we cannot think.

K: You are saying, without experience there is no thinking. Is that what you are saying?

S: Yes.

N: He said, because of experience we think.

K: Yes. Now, is experience limited? Carefully answer this. Carefully go into it, boys and girls. Is experience limited?

S: No, sir.

K: Look at it carefully. Don't answer. Think it out.

S: Every day one has a new experience.

K: All right. What do you mean by experience?

S: Something interesting happens to us.

K: It can be unpleasant too.

S: It depends on you whether your experience is limited or unlimited.

K: You are not answering my question, old boy.

S: Sir, whether you want it or not, you gain experience.

K: Is that all that you have learnt in this school, just to repeat? I'll go slowly with you. Learn. Don't memorize, but learn, discover as you go along. I have an experience in a car; I wasn't paying attention and I bumped into another car. Right? And it has destroyed the radiator. So, that incident has been registered in the brain as memory. Right? And I have an experience of going up to the top of the hill and seeing what is on the other side. And there are other hills which are higher. So climbing this little hill is a limited experience. Do you understand? Going to a higher mountain, it is a little more - but that is still limited. All experience is always limited. Carefully, think it out. The scientists, during the last two hundred years, have accumulated tremendous experience, knowledge, bit by bit, theory, and that theory being proved or disproved; and then a new theory, a new hypothesis, proof and disproof, so gradually they build up an enormous amount of knowledge, but that is still limited because there is more to be discovered.

So all knowledge, whether in the past or in the future, is always limited.

S: If experience is limited that implies some sort of division.

K: No, no. Don't bother about division and all that. Just look at the fact that all experience is limited.

S: OK.

K: No, OK. It is so. Is that a fact for you, or are you repeating after me?

S: No, it is a fact.

K: Which means all experience, and therefore from experience you have knowledge, therefore knowledge is always limited. Right? Now proceed a step further. All knowledge is stored in the brain as memory. Right? Agreed? So memory, remembrance of things past and so on, from that memory thought arises. Right? Clear? So thought is always limited. Once you admit experience is limited, knowledge is limited, then memory is limited and thought invariably is limited. See the importance of this. Are you all paying attention to this, the older boys? Are you bored by all this? The upper classes? I am afraid you are. They don't pay attention. All right, some of you pay attention.

So thought born of memory, memory born of knowledge, knowledge born of experience, right through is limited. Right? The thing that limited thought has done is to divide the people - Indian, Muslim, thought has done this. Agreed? Thought has divided the religions, built big cathedrals, temples and mosques, and so on and all the things that are in it are invented by thought. Do you understand? Really see the truth of this because it will help you tremendously. So all our actions, our feelings, everything that we do, is limited because it is controlled by thought.

S: Our whole life revolves around thought.

K: That's right. So, your whole life is limited. And where there is limitation there must be conflict. Right? Look, when you are thinking about yourself all day long, that is a very limited affair. He thinks about himself and I think about myself and therefore what happens? We are perpetually in conflict; because whatever is limited must induce conflict. I think about myself and you think about yourself, and myself is a very small affair, and your thinking about yourself is a very small affair. And our relationship is a very small affair and therefore what is small, what is limited must induce, must bring about conflict. It is a small affair to belong to a country. 'My nation, I am an Indian', it is very limited. And the Muslim says, I am Pakistani and all that. So, there is division, there is conflict. Where there is limitation there is division, and therefore there is conflict. This is the law.

S: You say where there is conflict, there is no relationship.

K: That is further. Do you get this?

S: But nothing is coming out of it.

K: Why should anything come out of that? You don't see something, your brains are so atrophied.

Sir, look, there is America and Russia, so-called super powers. This division exists where there is nationality. This division exists by their concepts of what government is, division brought about by ideals: I believe in Marxism and they believe in democracy; my country, my ideals, and they fight, fight. Right? So, ideals are limited, naturally. So there is conflict. Get it? Get is somewhat.

Now we began by saying you can see yourself, what you are, in the mirror of relationship. Now you can go infinitely far in yourself; you can't go very far outwardly. You can go up to the Himalayas - it may take you several days or several months by walking or a couple of hours in an aeroplane, but that is also limited. You can go round the earth - twenty-four thousand miles - twice or three times. That is limited. But when you know through your relationship what you are and penetrate that, then you can go immeasurable distance inwardly. I won't go into that because that is real meditation, and all kinds of things are involved.

The other day when we met, I asked you, 'What is your future'? Not only your future, the future of your educators, the future of mankind. I asked you this: what is going to be your future? Don't go off, as we did the other day, on 'what is time' and all that. Don't get lost in that. You are young - seven, ten, fifteen, eighteen, twenty, and you are off to university, college, get degrees, get married, if you can you get a job, or some other thing and there you are stuck for life. That is your future. Isn't that future very limited?

S: Yes, sir. It has been brought by thought.

K: It is brought about by thought, and there may be other factors; but it is limited. So your life, being limited, is going to create tremendous trouble for others and for yourself. Do you realize that?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So, what are you going to do? Do you understand? Wars are created through mediocre limitation. We went into all that, what is mediocrity. Mediocrity is, the root meaning, I explained, half way up the hill. You can be very good in a career but yet be thoroughly mediocre - as most people are. And your future life as your parents plan it, as your society plans it, you are going to lead a very limited life, and that very limitation is going to bring about conflict. When I am thinking about myself, you are thinking about yourself, all of us are bound to be in conflict. Right, sir? So, what are you going to do?

S: Why do we live that way?

K: Because you are afraid to let go that way.

S: If we let go, we will get confused.

K: Let go and see what would happens to you. Sir, work it out. Don't be so Utopian and indifferent. See what happens. I don't pass examinations, I am not interested in all this. Then what shall I do? I have to earn a livelihood.

S: I would look at the possibilities.

K: You would look at the possibilities? The possibilities are, you might become a cook, a gardener, a teacher or one of those awful politicians and business people, or a professor - it is all so terribly limited. Follow it, sir.

Now, when you say, thought is limited, what makes you say that? Yes, you see it, and then do you also see that where there is limitation, there is no space. It is limited, and therefore there must be various forms of contradiction, struggle, and all the rest of it. Now, when you say `yes, I see,' is that intelligence operating or are you merely agreeing with the idea? You understand what I am saying? These chaps are getting impatient, I'm sorry.

S: I want to do something, and I do something else.

K: Yes; that's as I said, limitation.

S: How do we break it?

K: You don't break it. You see how idiotic it is and move away from it. If I see that nationality is one of the causes of war, killing people by the million, an appalling idea, brutal, vicious, I no longer belong to any country. Sir, you are missing something really important.

S: Sir, then how do you live? After you realize it, how do you live?

K: How do I live what?

S: If everyone over here sees that it is mediocre to become a cook or a gardener, then I mean they won't become a cook or a gardener, then where do we get food from?

K: If you realize that you are mediocre and you break through that, you are intelligent, then you cease to be mediocre, you are an intelligent human being. Then that intelligence will tell you what to do. You don't have to bother about it. You see this is the unfortunate part of it. I leave off in the middle of something interesting and you have still not grasped the real thing at all.

Now, look at it the other way. What do you consider religion? What is religion to you? Do you understand? You must answer this question.

S: In which way you want to live.

K: Is that religion - the way you want to live? I am asking you, sir, you see people going to temples in India, and you see the mosques, you see the churches, and inside the churches, inside the mosques, inside the Hindu temples, they worship and all that goes on. Do you call that religion? Go on sir, answer me.

S: An easy way to separate yourself from others.

K: No, when you go to a temple, there are lots of people there too. Do you mean to say you have lived in this country and you haven't enquired into all that. What do you say, sir, what to you is religion?

S: Religion is full of hatred, sir, because we can't understand each other.

K: As we can't understand each other, because we are full of hatred, religion has very little meaning. Is that it?

N. He says religion is full of hatred because we don't understand each other.

K: It is the same thing. You see, sir, how can you go out in the world and not understand all this?

S: What I understand by religion is all this - temples and mosques.

K: Do you consider that religion?

S: It is what I have been told.

K: Why do you accept it? Why don't you investigate it? You are old enough. Why don't you find out what religion is? Is it superstition, belief, tradition, going to the temples, doing puja?

S: It is not religion.

K: Then what is religion? If you say it is not religion and you really mean it, then you must find out what is religion, because man from the most ancient of times, has said, what is all this, there must be something much greater than all this. From the most ancient Sumerians, the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Israelites, all those people at Hara, Mohenjadaró, they all wanted to find out what god was, if not god, something else. And it has all come down to some kind of superstitious rubbish. Right? But there be something. What is religion, what is all this about?

S: You would be following your own set of ideas.

K: Religion is to follow your own set of ideas? What are your ideas? You know what ideas mean?

S: Religion is love, the true religion.

K: Religion is love? Do you love the trees? The blade of grass? You love the birds, the monkeys that come?

Sir, put your mind to this. Otherwise life has no meaning - going to the office every day, being a cook all day long, or being a big politician, or having a marvellous career. What is the point of all this?

S: One is forced to do something to keep body and soul together.

K: There is no answer to that! Then do something to keep the thing going. Then you become a cog in the machinery. You see, you are all on the defence, you don't investigate, you don't work it out, go into it. It is the function of the educator to help you in this. If I stayed here - I am not going to, so don't worry - if I stayed here as your educator, I would go with you into all this: what is meditation, is there something beyond all this, something sacred, and if the brain can be quiet, really quiet, and so on. But you see you are all trained, oriented to have a job, that's all we are concerned with. Get married, have a good career and to hell with everything else. Right? Be honest. So you are only concerned about yourself. And yourself is a very small affair. It's like a toad in a little pond, making a lot of noise. The whole world is going through tremendous catastrophe, nuclear wars - if there is a nuclear war, the warfare of germs, ordinary wars, conventional wars, the computer is going to take over your brain. If you go into an American supermarket the girl there doesn't even count, it is done by electronic and laser beams. Our brains are gradually becoming atrophied, as yours are. Unless you actually work, not repeat, repeat, repeat.

Sir, we have talked enough. Let us sit quietly for a while and see. When you sit quietly, watch your thoughts, follow them, whether you can pursue one thought or one thought is interrupted by another thought and so on, just watch it.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC TALK 10TH JULY 1983

It is a lovely morning and I hope you are not too hot! We are going to talk over together many things, serious things and so these gatherings here are not an entertainment, either intellectual, or emotional or romantic. They are serious, and if I may point out throughout the talks that we are exploring, investigating, and enquiring together. The speaker is not merely putting forth some ideas but rather we are going to observe together the facts. The word fact means that which has been done previously and remembered, what has been remembered is not the fact, but what has been done in the past is a fact. And what is happening now is a fact. The word fact is that. The past incident without remembrance and that which is happening now. The future is non-fact, it is a hope, it is an idea, it is a concept but what actually is a fact is that which is happening and that which has happened.

And we are going to deal together only with the facts and not with concepts, with ideas, with speculations, however philosophical, however interesting, but we are going together to consider the fact of what we are, the fact of what is happening around us in the world, and the fact that most of us are concerned with ourselves. And in a world that has no peace whatsoever, there is such chaos, disorder, great danger, terrorism, threats of war - these are all facts. And in this world, living everyday of our lives, with all the turmoil, with all the labour that man has to do, with all the problems we have to face, is it at all possible to live in peace? Because in the world there is no peace. The politicians talk about it, the hierarchy of the Catholic church talk about it, so do the Hindus and the Buddhists and all the Muslims and so on, but actually there is no peace. And peace is necessary in order to grow, to flower, to understand, to have time to look around, to explore into ourselves and what we can find there. We must have peace - not freedom from something. Freedom between two wars, between two rows, between two problems, or a sense of physical relaxation - that is not peace. Peace is something much more fundamental, much more deep than the superficial freedom that one has, or one thinks one has.

So we are going together, this morning, for part of the morning, to talk over together as two friends whether it is possible to live in peace, both inwardly, psychologically and outwardly. We may want peace and we may see the necessity of having peace but we do not live a peaceful life. And the world is preparing for war, ideologies fighting each other. They do not consider human beings but only the extension of power and so on. So we cannot possibly look for peace from the politicians and governments. That is a fact. They have talked about pacem in terris, peace on earth and there has never been peace on earth. On the contrary religions have helped to bring about wars. You know all about it so I won't go into it. They have tortured, condemned, excommunicated, burnt and then the next moment they talk about peace. Probably the Buddhists and the Hindus are the only ancient Buddhists and Hindus, in their religion they have accepted the dictum "Don't kill" - but they do kill. That is just an idea again. And the Islamic world is full of what they are - you know all about it. Those religions that are formed, established on books become bigotry, fundamentalists, and they become terrorists also of the world. And institutions and foundations, groups, have promised peace. But they too do not give peace.

So where does one find peace? Because one must see very clearly that without peace we are like animals, we are destroying each other. We are destroying the earth, the ocean, the air. And politically and religiously we look to leaders to unify and bring about peace in the world. But they have not succeeded either. Governments, politicians, religious people, those groups that are searching for peace, none of them have given human beings, you and me, the speaker, this peace. So where do we find it? Without that fundamental necessity we cannot possibly understand greater things of life.

So together we are going to go into this, not verbally, not intellectually, but find out for ourselves as human beings, without any guide, without any leadership because they have all failed. Without any priests, without any psychologists, can we have peace in the world, in the world and in us? First, can we have peace in ourselves?

The word 'peace' is a rather complicated word. One can give different meanings to it depending upon our moods, depending on our intellectual concepts, romantically, emotionally, we can give different meanings to it. But can we together not give different meanings but comprehend the word and the significance and the depth of that word? It is not merely the freedom from something: peace of mind, physical peace but the ending of all conflict, that is real peace, not only in ourselves but with our neighbours and with the world. Peace with the environment, the ecology and all that, to have deep rooted peace, unshakable and not superficial, not a passing thing but timeless depth of peace.

One has sought peace through meditation. All over the world that has been one of the purposes of meditation. But meditation is not the search for peace. Meditation is something far different which we will go into presently.

So what is peace and how can we establish and lay the foundation so that we build on that - psychologically speaking? You understand sirs, we are talking over together. I am not pointing out. The speaker is not the authority but in talking over together things become very clear. If we can talk over together without any bias, without any prejudice, having no conclusions or concepts what peace is, then we can go into it together. But if you have opinions about peace, what peace should be, then your enquiry stops.

Opinions have no value, though the whole world is run on opinions. Opinions are limited. Your opinion, or the speaker's opinion, opinions of the totalitarian governments, or the opinions of the church people, and governments and so on, they are all limited. Your judgement and the opinion which gives values are all limited. I hope we understand the word, what it means to be limited. When you think about yourself from morning until night, as most people do, it is very, very limited. When you say you are Swiss, it is very limited; or when you are proud to be a British as though you are god's chosen people, that too is limited.

So opinions are limited. When one sees that clearly then one does not cling to opinions, or the values that opinions have created. Because then your opinion against another opinion doesn't bring about peace. That is what is happening in the world. One ideology against another ideology. Communist, socialist, the democrat and so on. So please understand, if I may repeat again, that we are talking over together and if you are adhering to your opinion and I am sticking to mine, then we shall never meet. So there must be freedom from opinion and its values. Is that clear?

Can we go on from there? That you are actually not holding back your opinions and using them as axes to beat each other, to kill each other, but opinions are limited and therefore they must inevitably bring about conflict. If you hold on to your conclusions and your conclusions are also limited, and another holds his conclusions, his experiences, which are always limited, then there must be not only conflict, but wars, destruction and all the rest of it. If you see that very clearly then opinions become very, very superficial, they have no meaning. So please when you are enquiring into what is peace and whether you can live in peace, don't have opinions about it. Be free to enquire, and in that enquiry act. The very enquiry is action. Not that you enquire first and then act. But in the process of enquiry you are acting. I hope again this is clear, that there must be freedom. It is the very basis of peace. There must be freedom from all the values of opinions so that we can together actually, not theoretically, but factually see that you and the speaker have no peace, which is a tremendous demand because we live on opinions. All the newspapers, magazines, books are based on opinions: somebody says that, you agree and that is your opinion too. Another reads another book and forms an opinion. So please to find out the true meaning of peace, the depth of it and the beauty of it, and the quality of it, there must be no bias. Obviously that is the first demand - not that you must have faith in peace, or make the goal of your life to live peacefully, or search out from books, from others, what is peace, but to enquire very deeply whether your whole being can live in peace.

Action is not separate from perception. When you see something to be true that very perception is action. Not that you perceive or understand and then act. That is an intellectual concept and you put that concept into action. The seeing is the action. The seeing that the world is broken up into tribalism - the British, the German, the Hindu, the Buddhist, the Swiss, they are tribes. To see that fact, that they are tribes, glorified as nations, and this tribalism is creating havoc in the world, bringing wars in the world, each tribe thinks its own culture opposed to other cultures. But tribalism is the root, not the culture. So in observing that, the fact of that, is the action which frees the brain from the condition of tribalism. Is that clear? Are we making this clear between ourselves? That when you see actually, not theoretically or ideationally but as a fact that tribalism, which has had certain benefits in it, but the very fact that it exists as glorified nations is one of the causes of war. That is a fact. There are other causes of war, economics and so on - we won't... one of the causes is tribalism. When you see that, perceive that, and that cannot bring about peace, the very perception frees the brain from its conditioning of tribalism. We are together in this? We are talking over together. The speaker is not persuading you. He is not trying to convince you of anything. He is not doing propaganda of any kind. But we are facing things as they are, head on. And one of the factors of contention throughout the world is religion. You are a Catholic, I am an Arab, a Muslim and so on. Based on ideas, propaganda of two thousand years, and the Hindus and the Buddhists over three to five thousand years, we have been programmed like a computer. Please see the fact that programming has brought about great architecture, great pictures, great chants, music, but it has not brought about peace to mankind. When you see the fact of that you do not belong to any religion - you are neither a Hindu, Buddhist, Christian, nothing. Nor when you see that the division takes place when there are half a dozen gurus in the same place - you know what they are doing don't you, they bring about misery, contradiction conflict. Your guru is better than mine. My group is more sanctified than yours. I have been initiated, you have not. You know all that nonsense that goes on. So when you see all this as an actual fact, which is so, round you, then you do not belong to any group, to any guru, to any religion, to any political commitment of ideas. This is very serious if you really want to, and the urgency to live peacefully there must be freedom from all this because they are the causes of dissension, division. truth is not yours or mine. It doesn't belong to any church, to any group, to any religion. The brain must be free to discover it. And peace can only exist when there is freedom from this fallacy. Are we together so far? - even intellectually? You know for most of us to be so drastic about things is very difficult because we have taken security in things of illusion, in things that are not facts. And it is very difficult to let them go. It is not a matter of exercising will, or taking a decision - I will not belong to anything. That is another fallacy. We commit ourselves to something - to a group, to an idea, to a religious quackism, because we think there is some kind of security for us. And in all these things there is no security and therefore there is no peace. The brain must be secure. And the brain with its thought has sought security in things that are illusory - right?

So freedom from that. Can you do it? Are you serious enough to want, or crave, to demand that one must live in peace? Or only this morning, persuaded perhaps by the speaker, you say, "Yes, I understand all that but..." - but, but, but!

So when we are talking over together as two friends, and that is what is taking place as two friends, though you are many we are friends, you and the speaker. And as two friends who are not persuading, or dissuading, not asking each other to commit to something or other, they are not then friends. As two friends asking each other: is it possible that one lives peacefully for the entire existence of one's life? Not at odd moments, not when you have nothing to do and you are captured by the tube, by the box, by the television - those are all superficial relaxations. But to live without a single conflict, without a single problem. Not that there are not problems, there are. But those problems are not being solved because we are the maker of those problems. I wonder if you understand all this?

First of all the brain, which - the speaker is not a specialist, he has discussed the matter with many scientists, don't accept what the scientists say either. It is far more important to discover for oneself how one's own brain is acting rather than be told by experts, professionals, scientists, what the brain is. The only instrument we have is the brain with its thought. And that brain, with its thought has not brought about peace in the world - in the world or in oneself. That again is a fact. And that instrument, which is thought, has reached its tether, its end - we will go into that presently.

And so where does one explore? And also to explore there - we must be very clear who is the explorer and that which is being explored. Is this clear? If I am exploring into what is peace, then I am separate from the thing that is being explored, and so there is division. Where there is division in the enquiry itself there must be conflict. Are we making it clear? Please this is not an intellectual game but really to find out the depth of peace, and all the great significance of it, the ramifications of it, the expansion of it, it can only be found if we understand from the very beginning that the explorer is the explored. The explorer is not different from that which he is exploring. This is difficult for most of us to accept either intellectually or actually because our conditioning is so strong. From childhood this division exists: the observer and the observed, the examiner and the examined, the investigator, who is - thinks he is separate from that which he is exploring. This is our conditioning. This is so. This is a fact. And so we live in perpetual conflict because where there is division - between Catholic, Protestant, between the Muslim, between the Buddhist, Arab, Jew, and all the rest - wherever there is division inwardly or outwardly there must be conflict. And if you like to live in conflict, that is your affair. Have a good time, enjoy it, the fun of it and the pain of it. But if you want to discover how to live peacefully you must understand this basic fact that the explorer is exploring in himself, not something outside of himself. He is exploring his own structure, his own activities, his own movements of thought, his own memories. He is all that. I wonder - one wonders if you have ever observed that you are a movement of memory. You understand? Memory is the faculty to remember. The faculty of time. That is the duration of an incident which might have happened fifty years ago, or yesterday, that incident is over but the faculty of remembering that incident is memory. And we live on memory - a movement, changing, reacting, constantly shaping itself. We are that. I wonder if you realize it? And we think progress is the expansion, the continuation, the heightening of the memories, like the computer.

I do not know if you have gone into the question of the computers - some of you may have. It is rather interesting. There have been - the computer is a machine that will memorize. Which is, it is being programmed by experts. I don't know how many millions can be held, memories, on a single side of a nail. They are doing extraordinary things. I have talked to some of them. Do you understand this? And the activities of man, they have built cars, they will invent. Each passing generation is better than the last. They may not write poems, probably they will. They may not write the music of Beethoven, probably they will do jazz very well. So with this machine called the computer what is going to happen to your brain? Please consider this seriously for god's sake. This is not a threat - we have talked about this to some of the great inventors of computers and their advancement, they do not consider what is going to happen to the human brain. They are only concerned with the advancement, the quickness, the rapidity of the computer. We will talk about it some other time and will go into it.

But we said as long as there is memory, which is the faculty of remembering things that have happened before, which are necessary in the technological and the physical world, and when we discover that we are a movement in time, which is the movement of memory, does peace lie in memories? You understand my question? One can remember the days, or the nights, or the mornings, when one saw the extraordinary depth and the beauty of peace. That perception, that awareness for a minute has gone, but one remembers that, the remembrance is non-fact and so we are living in memories which are dead, gone, finished - right? Please it is not a depressing or absurd thing for you to turn your back against all this, but see what memory does to us.

Memory is my being programmed as a Hindu with all that silly nonsense going on, thinking that my own culture is better than any other culture because it is about three thousand years old, or more, I take great pride. And yours is fairly recent. You are conditioned as the speaker is conditioned - if he is conditioned. Which is, the conditioning is memory - right? Non-fact and so I stick to my memories, which are dead things, and you stick to your memory - as Christian, as Hindu, you know, as an Arab, or a Swiss, or god knows what else.

And also we must have memories - one can't go from here to your house if you have no memory. If you drive a car you must have memory. If you are in the technological world you must be supremely competent in your memories, otherwise you lose your job. But we are talking about the psychological memories of experience, pleasant or unpleasant, painful or delightful. The psychological. So memories are the conditioning factor - right? Please see the fact of it. Not my explanation of the fact. One of our difficulties is that we rather like explanations rather than the fact. Why certain governments are behaving that way - and the journalists and so on explaining it. And we accept the explanations, the logic, the reason, and so on. The description is not the fact. The painting of a mountain, however beautiful the painting be, is not the mountain. All the pictures in the museums, some of them extraordinarily beautiful, but those pictures are not what they want to represent, something which they have seen. You read a novel and it is good literature - if it is - and all the imaginings, romantic business, sex and so on, written by an excellent, well known author; again that is not your life. Your life is here. So to find out how to live in peace - not the method, not the system. That is a wrong question when you say how.

So we are going to go into it more. What is the cause of conflict? Which all of us have. What is the root of it? What is the root of all problems, whether it is a religious problem, problems of meditation, problems of relationship, political problems, religious - problems. The word problem means - the root meaning of that word is something thrown at you. Probably something hurled at you. Problem is a challenge - right? If you respond to that thing called problem from your memories then your memories will not answer the problem because your memories are not alive, they are dead. You understand the significance of this? That we live with dead things. There is a picture of my son - brother, aunt, uncle or whatever it is - on the mantelpiece. He is dead and gone, he can never come back, physically he is gone, incinerated or buried, or whatever they do. But I have that picture, the constant remembrance of something that has gone. And I keep up that romantic illusory memorial relationship. Please see the importance of all this. So our brain is never clear. It is always functioning within the field of memory. And to live with a sense of great abundance, flowing peace, there must be freedom from the past, which is memory - right? Memory not how to get to your home, or to speak a language. If I had no memory of English now I couldn't talk to you, you couldn't understand what the poor chap is telling you. (I wonder if you understand what the poor chap is telling you either) And why the brain holds on to dead things as memory.

What is the function of the brain? The scientists are saying several things about it. One side is this kind of activity, the other side is still not awakened, or awakened but influencing the other, and so on. But if you enquire into yourself sanely, not neurotically, not self-centred, if you are self-centred and enquiring into that you will still condition the brain to be self-centred. So what is the function of the brain? One can see one of its major functions is to live in the physical, is to arrange the physical world - right? But that very brain has brought about chaos in the world - right? That is, the activity of the brain which is the root and the beginning of thought, that is the instrument which we operate, thought. That is the major function of the brain. And that function has created such extraordinary havoc in the world, disorder. And also that very brain has brought about health, communication, and all the rest of it, medicine, great surgery. To communicate from India to the other end of the world, to California, if the operators are not too lazy, it takes a few minutes and you are connected. Of course it is not as rapid as thought. So technology is gallopingly advancing at a tremendous speed. And that very technology is creating havoc in the world too, like the computer, like the atom bomb. You understand? Two great powers - I don't know why they are called great powers, they are two idiotic powers - are talking about; you know - trying to kill each other with the latest bombs - right? That is what thought has done, being one of the faculties of the brain. And also thought has created the marvellous, magnificent cathedrals. And also all those things that are inside them - they are not god given or something mysteriously brought about. All the dressings and the trappings of the priests is the result of thought, copying the Ancient Egyptians and so on. You understand? See what thought is doing in the world. And we, our brains, which have evolved through time, endless generation after generation, that brain is doing all this. Creating and destroying - right? And we accept this way of living. We have never challenged ourselves to find out. We have never asked of ourselves why we live in this chaotic world outside and inwardly, inward chaos. We never realize that to have order in the world outside there must be order in us. Our house is the most important thing to clean up first, not the world around us. Certain things are necessary like an organization not to kill whales, to protect nature, not to destroy the earth, seeking more and more oil - you know what is happening and all that. The rotten governments for which we are all responsible.

So what is the deep fundamental function of the brain? Ask yourself this question. I have got five minute more. If you asked yourself that question, not dependant on what others say, on their answer, on their ideas and suppositions and theories, but when you begin to enquire very, very deeply the fundamental activity which is essential, what is it doing, what does it want? You understand? Is it just survival? Here in this country you do survive very well. Is it just survival? Just to live in this perpetual conflict, division, quarrels? Is it to act and function within its own conditioning ? Is it to live perpetually in some form of illusion and therefore always slightly neurotic, unbalanced, as most people are? If it is none of these things, obviously it is not, then what is its function? Please we are asking this question of ourselves. The speaker is not putting the question to you and for you to wait his answer. We will go into it. We will go into it very, very, deeply but you cannot wait for him to tell you - then it is like - it is like nothing. It is as good as any other idea. But if you really want to find out what is the deep function of the brain and is the brain different from the mind. Or are they both the same? Or when the brain is unconditioned, thoroughly, completely, then the mind can act upon the brain. Which will we go into, all this. But one has to be very, very clear where its physical necessary activities must exist, the technological physical earning a livelihood and so on, there it must - that is one of its great activities. But if the other activity is contrary to that, then there must be perpetual imbalance.

So the first thing is to find out if the brain can be unconditioned. We were talking the other day to some scientists, doctors and all the rest of it - how many specialists there are in the world, one is thankful one is not, one is just an ordinary person and all the rest of it. We were discussing about this fact in New York two months ago: whether the brain cells which are conditioned, whether those brain cells can bring about a mutation in themselves, not genetically, you know all the rest of it, but in living, daily living, can there be a mutation in the brain cells? If not we are condemned for ever to live in our conditioning and therefore in perpetual conflict, and therefore no peace at all - right? So please we must stop now and we will go on the day after tomorrow and enquire what is the deep function of the brain.

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC TALK 12TH JULY 1983

May we go on with where we left off on Sunday?

We were talking about peace: why human beings who have lived on this earth for so many thousands and thousands of years have had no peace at all. There have been innumerable wars and probably there will be more wars. And why with all the technological knowledge we have acquired, and all the protestations of religions about peace, pacem in terris, why we have not peace at all, either outwardly in the world, or inwardly. The world which we have created, the society in which we live is put together by man, by all of us, by the past generations and probably from the future generations. We live in a world very dangerous, uncertain, insecure and there seems to be no peace on earth - why?

We went into that, talking over together - we mean together - not that the speaker says something with which you either agree or disagree but rather together, you and the speaker, together explore why human beings who apparently are so clever, so intelligent - which I doubt - why they have not created a world where we can all live peacefully. I wonder if you have ever asked that question of yourselves and of the world, the politicians, the religions and so on.

And talking it over together we came to a certain point the day before yesterday: what is the fundamental function of the brain? I think that is where we left off. Why the brain, which has evolved for millenia upon millenia, it has had tremendous experience of every kind, sorrow, pleasure and the uncertainty, death - why such a brain has not solved this problem? And who is going to solve the problem? The leaders? New leaders? New political statesmen? The new priests? The new ideology? We have tried all that. Man has tried every way to bring about peace in the world and also peace in himself. And the brain, which is a very, very complex affair, capable of extraordinary technological progress and yet that very brain has become very primitive and has not solved any of its problems.

What is the function of the brain? Just to go on living like this? Acquiring great knowledge in every field and using that knowledge to destroy each other, to destroy the earth, nature and all the rest of it? We all know this very well. And one asks, if one is at all serious, and we are here a gathering of people who are serious I hope, not casual visitors but who are taking life seriously, they must inevitably ask: what is the function of the brain? Most of us are only concerned with ourselves, if we are at all frank and honest. We are concerned with ourselves. Self-interest, from the highest category of people, intellectual and so on, down to the most primitive people, the educated and the uneducated, the sophisticated and the religious people, they may identify themselves with something noble but that very identification is part of self-interest. And the brain, our brain, is concerned only with that - personal problems, problems of mathematics, problems of computers and so on. But basically we are concerned with ourselves. That is a fact - right? However much we may try to hide the self-interest in noble work, in meditation, in belonging to various groups, self-interest dominates, consciously or unconsciously. If you are honest, look into ourselves and our activities, political, religious and so on, we are only concerned basically with ourselves. And we have lived that way from the beginning of time. And we are still living that way. And so the brain only functions in a very, very small limited field.

Is that all the function of the brain - to be concerned with itself, with its problems, with its pleasures and sorrows and pain, ambition, greed and so on? That is the way we have lived. And the result of that in the world is chaos. Each one wanting to fulfil, wanting to achieve, whether illumination, enlightenment, or become a big business man, it is the same thing. So we have reduced our brain, which is an extraordinary instrument, into something so petty. And we have reduced that brain to be very, very limited - right? It may be extraordinarily capable in the technological world, the marvellous instruments that they are creating, instruments of war, instruments of surgery, medicine, communication, computer; there the brain has functioned with an extraordinary vitality, with extraordinary capacity. And that very brain is only concerned with its own self-protective activity. This is all obvious fact. We are only dealing with facts, not with ideals, not with ideas, not with theories, facts. As we explained the other day, facts are something that has been done in the past and remembered, something that is being done now. Those are the facts. From those facts we abstract ideas, conclusions, strong opinions, which have nothing to do with facts.

So the brain lives on memories and not on facts. This is very important to understand if we are going to explore together what is the function of the brain? What is the deep quality of a brain that can penetrate and find out its deep function? We are dealing with facts only, which is that we are a series of movements of memory - which we talked about the other day. Memory. That is the faculty to remember. To remember things that have happened, and the things that are happening now. So memory has become extraordinarily important, which has nothing to do with facts. My son is dead, he is gone, and I remember, there is only remembrance. And on those remembrances I live. On those memories, on those incidents which we had together, I cherish those memories - right? Please, you are doing this, I am not telling you something which you are not doing.

So we are a series of movements of memory and time. Memory is time. Right? Memory is the reaction of experience, knowledge, and the things that one has remembered. This is what the self is, what we are.

I do not know if you have ever enquired into what is the present, what is now? Is it the cessation of memory? Or we don't know what the now is at all? May I go into it a little bit?

Zero contains all the numbers - mathematically. Zero was invented by the ancient Hindus and in the zero all the numbers are contained. Is the now - please listen - is the now the totality of all time? We will go into this further. You see the brain having cultivated self-interest, which is the accumulation of memories and so the brain has become a very, very small psychological instrument, obviously. When I am thinking about myself all day long it is a very small affair. Or when I think about the whole world it is still a small affair. I don't know if you are understanding? We are moving together? I hope. Right sirs?

So why has the brain got caught in this narrow circle of the self? The self, the me, the ego, and all that is nothing but words and memories. Right? It is so. And that self has become so terribly important. And when one is concerned with oneself all our actions must be psychologically limited. And where there is limitation there must be conflict. I am a Jew, you are an Arab. That is a limitation, a tribalism which is limited. And I cling to my limitation, and you cling to your limitation and therefore the perpetual conflict. If you are constantly repeating "I am a Russian", and identify with that particular country, tradition, language and all the literature of that country, it is very, very limited. So we have reduced the brain, the brain seeking security in the self has made itself limited, psychologically. So there is a contradiction between the psychological limitation and the extraordinary limitless technological progress. Is this the function of the brain, to live perpetually in conflict? And therefore there is never a liberation, a freedom. Is this the function of the brain - just to limit, live in a small area psychologically? And is it possible when one understands the nature of the self, as we briefly explained, is it possible to break down this limitation? And who is to break it down? You understand? This limitation has been brought about by thought, thought which has created or sought in the limitation, security. And thought itself is limited because thought is the outcome of vast experience, accumulated knowledge, stored in the brain, in the very brain cells. The speaker is not an expert. I have watched very carefully. And thought is the outcome of memory - right? As memory is limited, knowledge will always be limited, and experience is never complete. You understand?

So the brain is functioning with the only instrument - the limited thought. Are we moving together? And so we are perpetually living in conflict, in struggle, in pain and sorrow, because we seek security in in the limitation, in memories and so on. That is simple. So is it the function of the brain to find security, survival, physical survival - one must survive physically, unless of course one is a little bit dotty, then that is a different matter. But one seeks physical security and also psychological security. Is there psychological security at all? Don't please, don't accept this. Go into it very carefully with the speaker. Together we are examining. We are not imposing a thing on you. We are not trying to convince you of anything. I really mean this. We are not trying to convert you to some philosophy, which is a... please. So we are together walking, perhaps hand in hand, down a lane, shady, full of dappled light, and the beauty of the earth around us. And we are talking about serious things, not petty little things because we are both serious. And we say: is this what we have reduced our life to, just seeking self-security in the limitation? And physically there is no security because of wars, of racial, tribal conflict, ideological conflict, between the Russians, the totalitarians and the so-called democrat, the West and the East. They are preparing for war - you know all that. Of course they won't listen, you can't talk to the politicians because they are concerned to preserve their own position - you know all the rest, I don't have to go into it.

So we are asking: is that the only function of the brain, to seek security in limitation? That is what we are doing. And in the search for security in limitation we are bringing about havoc in the world - right? Such great disorder, confusion. That again is obvious.

Now, what is the function of thought, because that is the only instrument the brain has? We are together in this? What is the function of thought? What is thought? What is thinking? We all think, whether you are highly educated, sophisticated or the most uneducated person, hungry, very little food and all the rest of it, he also thinks. The sophisticated, the highly educated person who can express things clearly, he thinks. And the person who is not, he also thinks. So thinking is common to all of us - right? It is not your thinking. You may think and express it differently, you may be an artist, you may be a mathematician, biologist and so on, and I may be a layman, but we both think. So thinking is not yours. Thinking is not individual. Please this a fundamental thing to understand. And yet this is what we are doing - "This is what I think", my opinion, my judgement, my values of opinions - right? See what is happening to us. We have reduced the whole vast process of thinking as mine - right?

And also we ought to enquire: if your brain is separate from another? Please don't... we will go into it slowly. Don't get impatient or cling to your own particular point of view. The brain has evolved through time, through thousands and thousands, upon thousands of years of experience, knowledge and all the activities of thought in the world - technologically, personally and all that, thinking. And we say "It is my brain through which I think". Is that so? Is your brain yours? Or is it the result of thousands of years of evolution? So it is not your brain, or my brain. It is brain. I wonder if you see the depth of this? And the brain is the centre for our consciousness - right? What is our consciousness? Not according to the experts, but when you ask yourself that question: your consciousness? What is it? Your beliefs, your conclusions, your opinions, your two thousand years of being programmed, whether Christian, or five thousand years as a Hindu and so on - right? Your consciousness is the reaction, the reflexes, the fears, the pleasures, the sorrows, the pain, the grief and all the misery of human beings. That is your consciousness. Is your consciousness different from another? Or your consciousness is like the consciousness of all humanity? Because they suffer in Russia, in India, in China, they may have different outward garments, the environment may be different, but psychologically the content of our consciousness is common, it is shared by all human beings. Right? So your brain and your consciousness is shared by all human beings. So you are the rest of mankind. You may be a German, a Swiss and a proud Englishman, but you are the rest of mankind. Right? Sirs, it is not an intellectual concept, it is not an idea, a romantic sentimental something, but it is a fact. And when that is deeply real, when that is the truth and then your whole outlook on a life changes. Then you are responsible for all humanity. It is rather frightening but it is so.

So one has to understand that in this investigation we are not being self-centred, we are not cultivating the self more and more and more. We are not making the self more intelligent. But we are like the rest of mankind. Out of that comes compassion. You understand?

So is the brain an instrument which is merely concerned with security - psychological as well as physical? If it is not then what is the function of the brain? You understand? If I am not concerned with myself everlastingly in my meditation - you know all that kind of silly stuff, then what place has thought and is there a new instrument altogether which is not the activity of thought? Am I making myself clear? One can see what thought has done in the world. The technological world and the human world. And thought has built the most extraordinary beautiful things - architecture, paintings, marvellous poems, great novels. But also thought has divided people. And thought also, through its division, has created wars. Therefore thought is not the instrument of peace - right? I wonder if this is clear? Right? Are we meeting each other? Are we walking together? So far? That thought, being in itself divisive, limited, it cannot possibly bring about peace in the world. It is shown: the League of Nations, the United Nations - you follow? Napoleon tried to conquer, unify Europe, so did poor Hitler, and so on. So activity of thought, thought cannot possibly resolve human problems - right? If you see that very clearly then what? You understand me?

Suppose I see very clearly what thought has done in the world. I see very clearly what thought has done in the realm of my own psyche. The search for security is the basis of the movement of thought - right? And is there security at all through thought? Do you understand my...? Or there is security only when thought, with its own intelligence, with its own cunningness, realizes its place and does not enter into the area of the psyche. Are we together in this? I will go into a little more.

We cannot live by ourselves. Life is a movement in relationship. In that relationship there are innumerable problems, sexual, psychological, companionship, loneliness, you follow? The whole problem of relationship. So what is relationship? When you are related to your wife, or to your father, husband and so on, what - when you say, "I am related", what does that word mean? Not the dictionary meaning of it, which we all know, but the depth of it, the significance of that word. I am related to my wife. And in this relationship there is perpetual conflict - which you probably know much more than I do - right? Why? When we ask that question we are trying to find out if this conflict can end - right? End. So to find out whether it can end we must face the actual fact of what is our relationship to another, however intimate it may be. Is our relationship based on thought? I am asking you this question please. You have to answer it yourself. We are two friends talking over... we are two friends talking over things together. One friend asks the other: why is there conflict in our relationship? Is our relationship based on thought, on memory, on incidents that have passed, they have happened pleasant or unpleasant and there is the remembrance of those, the memory of those, and each one of us lives on those memories, which is thought - right? I am ambitious and also she is ambitious. She wants to fulfil in her way, and I want to fulfil my way. She has come to some definite conclusions and so have I. So there is always this division - right? And where there is division there must be conflict. Right sirs? This is simple.

So to understand the nature of conflict, and to see whether it is possible to end conflict in relationship, we have to enquire whether thought dominates relationship. Then is thought love? Don't please, this is much too serious to agree or... go into it for yourselves. Is it thought in relationship that has bound us together through memory, through reactions, through pleasure, sexual and otherwise? And thought is the factor in relationship. She has said something to me which has hurt me and I have hurt her, That hurt is being carried on, which is memory, It is like two parallel lines never meeting.

And this we call relationship, whether it is to your guru, whether it is to a woman or man, whether relationship to your political leader, or to the priest, it is all based on thought and memory. So is remembrance the activity of love? Please ask this question. Then if it is, we are living on dead memories. Memories are not in the future. Memories are in the past, the capacity to remember. Now is there a way of living without conflict in relationship? Is there a way of living in this relationship in which memory doesn't enter? One may ask this question but mere asking questions is not the solution of the problem.

So is it possible to live with another without the accumulation of memory about the other? Which is the ending of thought. You understand? And so is love the activity of thought? Come on sirs.

And as we are trying to find out how to live in this world peacefully one has to understand the depth and the nature of thought and memory. And most of us from the beginning of our childhood until now bear the burden of many hurts - right? Many psychological wounds, and the memory of those wounds, and the continuation of those hurts. Can all that be wiped away? If I am hurt, how can I love another? Right? Please, this is not a sermon in a church or in some place. This is real enquiry so that you begin to see for yourself directly that there is a possibility of ending conflict. And that possibility exists only, the truth of it, when you have really deeply enquired into the whole nature of the self, self-interest, which is based on reward and punishment, then you begin to find out for yourself thought is not the instrument in the solution of problems, human problems. Even in the technological problems you may think a great deal, work out problems, but you come to a state there too when thought is in abeyance and you discover something new. If you merely continue in the field of knowledge all the time there is nothing new.

So in enquiring whether the brain can live in peace and therefore perhaps it will affect the society, and it may not. We are not seeking an effect. What will, if each one of us finds the activity of thought, the limitation of thought, and all the activities of memory and therefore very divisive, and consequently conflict, if you actually see the truth of it and you live that way, then you say what effect has this on the vast public? None! Does it matter? Are you concerned with society, with changing the society, making it more orderly? You really are not actually if you face the fact. Therefore it is a wrong question to say: what effect has it on the society if there is a fundamental mutation in my brain? You understand? If one may point out that is a wrong question. You are seeking through facts truth. That truth will act, not you will act.

I don't know if you have ever gone into the question of what is intelligence? I have got three minutes left. It is a very complicated question. Now the speaker asks you: what is intelligence? Right? How do you receive that question? How do you approach that question? Our brain is trained to solve problems. Right? It is trained from childhood to solve problems - mathematical, historical, you follow, examinations, all those are indications of solving problems. So our brain is trained to solve problems. The architectural problems, engineering problems, problems of how to put a motor together. So we approach life with a brain that is trying to solve problems. I don't know if you realize that. So you treat life as a problem and then try to find a solution to the problem. So when the speaker asks you a question like this, what is intelligence, you make that into a problem. Naturally. And then you try to solve that question through a brain that is trained to solve. Now can one, as a friend I am asking, can one look at this question: what is intelligence, not as a problem? Right? Can you do it? If you do that is the beginning of intelligence. That means the brain is already becoming free from its conditioning. But if you approach this question: what is intelligence? and then try to solve it, you are back in the old muddle. But when one realizes that one's brain is conditioned to solve problems and therefore you approach any question with a mind, with a brain that says, "I must solve it." So we never meet a challenge afresh. To meet a problem, any problem, afresh, is the beginning of intelligence.

So we started out by asking whether humanity can live in peace. If you cannot live in peace you cannot flower, you cannot, you know life becomes terribly small and petty. And in that enquiry whether human beings, that is you, me and the rest of the world, can you, being the rest of humanity, you are whether you like it or not, you may stick to your conditioning that you are an individual but you are not. You may have a different body, different name, different colour, you may have long hair, short hair, you may speak German, or Russian, but you are standing on the same ground as the rest of humanity. And we said that the brain has its function. And what is the root of that function? What is the basis of that function? It is not to live in conflict, obviously. Then that question is raised and you say, "I must solve it." Then you ask, "How am I to do it?" Then you read the systems, the methods, the apologies, and all the rest of it, the arguments, the pros and cons. But when the brain is not approaching a challenge, an issue, with its old trained condition, then you can look at that question, that challenge, totally anew, fresh. Isn't that the capacity of intelligence, to look at something clearly? Not try to solve it.

So we are going to go into it further the day after tomorrow when we meet. Whether there is a possibility of finding something totally new which is not the activity of thought. Right?

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC TALK 14TH JULY 1983

Shall we continue with what we were talking about the day before yesterday? I think we ought, if I may point out seriously, that you are not seeking help from the speaker. There is no help outside of ourselves. If that is clearly understood that no political or religious or every type of guru with their systems and theories, trying to help people, or trying to do good. We have had all those things before for the last millenia upon millenia. So there is no help from outside. There is no, if I may use the word, the Christian word, salvation, it is rather an ugly word, outside, through anybody, through any system, through any theological concept, either of the Communist or the Democratic and so on. So one has to completely rely on oneself. Totally be responsible for ourselves - what we do, what we think, and not blame all that we do on others, or the environment, or on heredity, or on genetic processes. We have played with all those things endlessly in different forms. We have pursued every kind of philosophy. And we have great faith in something or other. That is always something outside - a symbol, a person, a conclusion, an idea. And they have all failed because after millenia upon millenia we are what we are now. It is not the past generation that has produced the chaotic world, they have helped, but we are also adding to it.

So if we could together bear that in mind - no book, no theory, no person, no symbol, including the speaker. I am not excluding the speaker because one has to be very careful not to be influenced by him, not to be stimulated by him, not to rely perhaps on his clarification. And of that is absolutely, fundamentally clear that there is no outside help to discover what we are, what human beings have become after all these centuries of evolution - brutal, violent, you know the whole business. You cannot blame it on anybody, or go back to the past and try to find out the various causes and there are multiple causes, and we can quarrel over those causes endlessly. But the fact remains, we are what we are now after millenia of evolution, thousands of years of evolution. So if that is clear as two friends talking over together, we are two friends, actual friends. That is what the speaker feels about friends. And we can talk about things, neither influencing each other, nor dominating each other, having no faith in each other, but as two friends who have known each other for some time we are discussing, talking over the human problem. For that is far more important than the technological problem. The psychological problems unless they are resolved always overwhelm the technological issues, problems - right? You may have a marvellous technological world, mechanical world, the computer, but the human psyche overcomes the computer. It may bring about a series of good laws - the computer, that you should do this, do that and so on, but the psyche, each one of us, can overwhelm, or transcend and do what it wants in spite of the computer. Right? I think this is very clear.

So please we must begin with doubt, with a certain quality of scepticism so that we question everything in human existence, apart from the physical, you can't question a surgeon if he says you have got cancer. You may question it, you may ask him but several of the doctors will tell you, "Old fellow you have got it". Then you accept it, you can't doubt that. You can try various cures, all the quacks in the world will join you but eventually you have to accept their statement. But in the psychological world, which is much more complex, needs great sensitivity, there are great intricacies, subtleties, and that demands a mind, a brain, that is very clear, not confused, not self-centred. You cannot examine, look, at the whole complex of self-pursuit unless you are critical about it, unless you are questioning, doubting, asking. But the present religion in the Western world denies any question of doubt, you mustn't have doubt, you must have faith. And so that quality of doubt, which is most vital to human existence is denied. Whereas in the Buddhist and the Hindu world doubt is one of the pillars of enquiry.

So please we are going to talk over together - together, one must keep on repeating this because there is a human tendency to accept, to be led, to be helped, by reading some book or other you think it is going to do you good. So one must be very clear that one cannot rely on anybody, which means one has to be a light to oneself, which does not mean self-assertive attitudes, having tremendous confidence in oneself. It does not mean the pursuit of one's own desires, one's own fulfilment and so on. To be a light to oneself means standing totally alone psychologically. The word 'alone' means all one. From Latin, Greek and so on that word means all one, together, whole, not fragmented. But we translate that aloneness into isolation. We are afraid to be isolated and therefore we don't understand the meaning and the depth of that word to be alone. It includes the whole of time, the past and present which is now, alone. We will go into all that presently. I hope we are together in all this.

Doubt what the speaker is saying. And also doubt very much more your own reactions to what you hear the speaker saying. Doubt, the seed of doubt, not what you doubt, but the seed. Let it move, let it flower, let it grow until it finds what is truth. And to be alone, to enquire into the nature of that, to find out the truth of that, not the statement of it, the truth of the statement. You understand? Hearing the statement and then accepting the words of that statement but not discovering for oneself the depth of that word. I hope we are all getting together on this. It is very hot here.

As we were saying the other day, we have sought security in the things of thought - right? - in the things that thought has put together, which is in the community, in the family, in the community, in the larger community and so on. Security in isolation, security in the country, in the nation, in belonging to something, belonging to this group or that group, belonging to that church or not - you follow? - belonging. And we have sought security in that.

So one discovers for oneself that there is no security in isolation - right? Now is that a fact? Or just a theory? See the difference? If it is a theory, there are multiple theories but if you examine your own desire to be secure and you will find, if you pursue it, one has sought security in isolation. The isolation may be enormous but it is still isolation. This process of isolation is fragmentation - right? Are we saying something extraordinary? Or are we following each other? Where there is pursuit of security in isolation - in the Arab or Jew - you follow? - outwardly - the pursuit of isolation and seeking security in that isolation is fragmentation. And then the problems arises: how can the fragments be brought together? That is a wrong question altogether - right? Because the search for security in isolation is the cause. If one is free of that cause there is no fragmentation and therefore there is no search in isolation.

Either the isolation of the family, or the self-centred isolation. I wonder if you get all this? Are we... somebody say yes or no!

See what is actually happening in the world. I am asking my friend to look very closely at what is happening. The family, community, the larger community, the nation - isolating processes. And therefore in that isolation there is the search for supreme power, politically religiously - you follow? The whole sense of gaining power. And so there is more and more confusion, more and more problems, more and more destruction. This is very clear if you go into it, not casually, not reading a lot of books but to see the fact of it in oneself. So one has to enquire much more to find out what it is that we are... why we are seeking security. Not that we should not have security. Physically, as we said, there must be security. For the baby to grow up there must be security. For the man to live at least temporarily happily he must have security, he must have food, clothes, house. But this process of isolation is denying all that to everybody. Each government is concerned with itself, with its own economy, with its own people. Saving through the war its own people, not the other people. I don't know if you heard the other day a general talking about the last war - the war in the little island far South. He said, the general said, "I do not like to kill but we must kill them but primarily we must save our people." And they are trained for that. So if one sees the enormous significance, the fact, the truth, that in isolation there is never security, no security whatsoever. Do we see this before we go any further? It is very difficult to break down the condition of the brain which has been taught, educated, conditioned to be, to live, to seek its own fulfilment in isolation.

Now what is security, apart from physical security? What is it to be secure? Please ask this, we are together in this, two friends, sitting down in a quiet room, overlooking a nice valley, a lovely morning, being serious at the same time, and asking each other: what is security, to be secure? Is there security in relationship? You ask yourself that question. One wants security in relationship otherwise if there is no security, which implies trust, confidence, love and all that, and yet we want security in each other. And each other, each one is pursuing his own isolation, his own self-centred activity - right? We want security to have a peaceful life - right? Not to have any conflict, not to have any bother, no problems, just to live. And that is not possible either. So we are asking: what is security? Where do we find it? Not in some theory - right? Not in some image that thought has projected and made it holy, not in any symbol which is the activity of thought. I don't know if you are following all this.

So where does one find total, complete security? The brain needs security. But at present the brain is confused. One philosopher says this, the other scientist says that, one guru, one teacher, the hierarchical church says something else and so on. The brain actually after these thousands upon thousands of years is confused. And in that confusion it says, "I must be secure." So it then invents a new illusion. You understand? I have dropped this illusion, I find there, there is no security. Then I find another illusion and I hope to find security in that. This is what we are doing. So where do you find security? Unless the brain is completely secure, completely certain, unconfused, it must be in a turmoil - right? And if you examine your own life, your own existence, my friend, you will see how confused we are, how uncertain, one cannot rely on anything - right? So where do you find security? Not outwardly obviously. And will you find security in the psyche? You understand? In the me? In the self? No, let's find out, don't say no. Let's find out.

Then we have to ask: what is the self? What is the me, the whole psychological structure? What is the me? Is the me - is it a series of conclusions? It is. I believe, I am convinced, I have faith - right? I am this. And so on. Expand it. So where, if it is not to be found there outside, and is it possible to find out security inwardly? Please ask these questions. I am asking my friend, - both of us are defenceless, we are not defending each other and therefore resisting each other. It is not there, outside, and I hope to find it on the inside, somewhere inwardly - right? Which means I must have more confidence in myself. That is how we translate it. What does confidence in myself mean? In my experiences? In my knowledge? In my prayer? Which is, the me is put together by thought. I have faith in something, I believe in something, I belong to something. All that is the movement of thought - surely? Right? Please let's be very clear on this matter. Thought has created the mess outside, the confusion, the terrible things that are happening in the world; and also thought has created the me - right? We are clear? It is not some kind of divine explosion that created me. From childhood I have been taught, educated, trained, me is the first. Right? So we are examining whether there is security in the me. And the me is put together by thought. We must be very clear on this point. When I say I believe in god and I have faith in god, my security in god: who has created that god? Please be factual. Don't, I am not attacking. I am not attacking my friend. That would be too silly. And he is not attacking me either. But together we are questioning, doubting, asking - right? My friend says, "You have faith in god." Perhaps I have. And being friends we discuss. We don't say, "I believe. I am going to stick to it." We say, "Look, who created this idea of god?" Then he asks, "But how did all existence come into being" - right? And the scientific answer is more reasonable than all the theories and speculations, belief in god and so on - we came from the ocean - you follow? We have taken millenia upon millenia, four, five, ten million years, to evolve to the present state. That means time has taken to bring about a human being - not within the last four thousand, five hundred years, according to some religious people. Four thousand, five hundred years ago the Egyptians invented the calendar. You understand? That means they must have had tremendous evolution before. You can't invent a calendar just on the spot.

So, he says to me, look carefully, the thing that you have created, thought has created, seeking security, being frightened of death and so on, you have created that, thought has created that. And thought then worships that, tries to find security in that, contrary to what you are doing, contrary to your life. I don't know if you are following all this? I may believe in the most extraordinary things, like god and all the supreme intelligence - you know - highest principle, but it has to be a reality in my life, otherwise it is of no value. Please I am not preaching, advocating atheism. I am questioning. We are questioning each other the fundamental issue, which is: the urge and the demand, the necessity for security. And we find we have sought security in illusions - right? Now what happens? Please look at it carefully. If you see something false, to be actually factually false and you hold on to that false - right? - you are not intelligent. I don't know if I am making it clear. If I tell my friend, look, this is not actual, this is just an invention. And in that kind of invention, illusion, some romantic, sentimental nonsense, there is no security in that.

So please to see the false - right? Which means you have already discovered what is true. Is this clear? If I see something false, some illusion as illusion. The word illusion means, in English, to play with something, ludere. Something which is not real. So I tell my friend, look, you live with false things. And when he sees the false things as false what has happened to his brain? You understand my question? The brain has accepted for centuries something which is not actual, which is the vast majority of mankind believes in god because god is their security. But god is the invention - and all the rest of it. When my friend sees that and I see that the conditioning of the brain has broken - you see? I have been going North all my life and you come along and point out to me that the North is an illusion. There is North, I am talking... is an illusion, he shows it to me and as we are friends we talk it over and I say, by Jove, that is right and I turn and go East. Which means what? I have broken the system, the habit, the condition of the brain, which has been going in one direction, suddenly it breaks away from it and goes in another direction. Therefore there is the breaking of a conditioning. I wonder if you understand? Right?

Not... we are going to go into the whole conditioning, we will go into that a little later but I have broken the habit of pursuing an illusion. Therefore the cells themselves have changed. You understand? The brain cells in themselves have changed because it hasn't fallen, it has pursued a habit and has broken the habit. Not through enforcement, through will, through any action, but pure logical sane, seeing the fact - right? I am working very hard for you, aren't I?

So where is security? Surely not in experience - right? Be quite clear on all this. Not in knowledge because knowledge is never complete - right? Knowledge is based on experience, scientific experience, hypothesis, theories, then proving that theory, hypothesis to be true or false, in the scientific world - right? So where is there security? Please go into it with me. Sorry. I hope you are not bored. If you are, it is your affair. It is really a very serious question we are asking, not a casual something or other. It is a demand of the brain to be secure. It hasn't found it there, outside, in an outside agency, outside gods, or it can invent there is a god in me. Lots of people do, millions do.

Audience: I do.

K: A gentleman says he does. And he is going to hold to it. It is not a discussion. We will do that when all the talks are over.

But we have to find out whether there is complete security or not. We have to be very, very clear of the process of thought. Thought - I will go into it again - thought is a limited process, a materialistic process because thought is based on experience, experience is sensory - right? - reaction, reflection, and from that arises experience and that experience is limited and from that limitation, knowledge, so knowledge is always limited, whether in the scientific world or in the psychological world - right? It is so. It is so simple. And so memory is limited, because it is based on time, the duration of time. I will go into the question of time presently. And thought is limited. There is no thought without memory - right? And your memory, remembrance is small, limited. You may remember all the things from your childhood - I hope you don't. Then your brain is nothing but memories and as those memories are limited so thought is invariably limited. And so whatever it does is limited. Your prayers, they are limited. All the things in the church and all that is limited, put together by thought. Right? It is so obvious. What are you all resisting this for? I know why you are resisting. You listen. You are frightened. It's very simple. That's why. You might lose your job. We were talking the other day to some priest, we were having a good discussion, we were friendly. And he said, "All right, I agree with you but how am I to live?" (Laughter) Please don't laugh at it, that is for most of us too. Please understand this very simple thing: when you see something false, when you see the limited activities of thought, and what it does in the world - because where there is limitation there must be conflict - right? If I keep on repeating, "I am a Christian", "I am a Buddhist", I am this or that, it is very limited. And that very limitation must bring about conflict. And in conflict obviously there is no security. Unless you love conflict and say that is part of your being, all right, then that means something, there is a hole in your head.

So we must come back to this point: when you see the false as the false and abandon the false, not just say, yes I see the false as the false and just remain. But you see... when you see that which is not true, which is not actual, which is false, illusory, when you see it, it is the ending of that illusion. Not that you will conclude to end it, the very seeing of the fact, that very seeing of the fact is the ending of that illusion. So what has happened to the brain which has been conditioned to the false, then when it breaks there is a mutation in the brain cells themselves. I wonder if you see this? You understand? Suppose I have a very strong habit. Habits of different kinds. Habit - 'I believe' is a habit. A conclusion to which I stick to is a habit. We won't go into the question of habit. When I break a habit, when there is the seeing of the futility of a habit, there is the breaking of it and there is a change in the very structure of the brain. So what has taken place when I see that which is false as false, the very ending of that, what has happened? You are not doing it as we are going along. If you do it as we go along my friend then what has taken place? Please don't discuss with me, please just find out. Hasn't the brain become clear? It has put away the burdens which are false. Seeing that which is false, seeing is acting. When you see something dangerous you act. So the seeing is the action. Now what has happened to the brain that sees?

We will approach it differently. Most of us want to become something - right? In the physical world we want to be something, to become something. I am just a clerk in a big office, in a corporation and gradually I work up. If I am good, capable, I become the manager. From the manager I step up more and more until I become the executive and the president. I have become through time to be the president. This is the physical process. Now we extend the same movement into the psychological realm. I am this but I will become that. It is the same movement. It is not different. Both require time. Time to become - right? What is becoming? I can understand in the physical world. I can earn more money, better car, better house, more pictures. If I have the money I buy a Rembrandt or - you follow? I drink more. You know, the whole business of it. The modern culture. We mustn't go into the question of culture now, we will do it another time. I become there something. And I extend the same movement, that same movement into becoming something. One day I will be enlightened - right? Enlightened, become, reach the highest principle, god, whatever you call it, by righteous behaviour, step by step, by step, by step I become something - right? That is the whole system of religious thought - right? I go to the guru and the silly guru teaches me. I will one day become like him, which means power, I will have disciples.

So follow all this very carefully, I am telling my friend. So what is it that is becoming? When I say psychologically I will gradually experience enlightenment, gradually build it up, what does that mean? Is there a becoming? Question that. Not that I should become something psychologically but we must question is there anything to become? Myself, my experience, my memories, my projections of what I should be? - which means I must have time for all this. So man has said that to become wise, enlightened, become, you know, all that, you must have... it is a process - right? And we are saying quite the contrary. I am saying to my friend, it sounds nonsense - you know the whole Buddhist concept, you wouldn't know Buddhism, it doesn't matter. The Buddha went through a series until he ultimately reached enlightenment - which I question. Is enlightenment, understanding, perception, a matter of time? What is time? Time is a movement - right? Time to go from here to your house, to your chalet, to your flat, to go to Montreux or Lausanne, or wherever it is. It is a movement in time, to cover the distance - right? You need to have physical time to go from here to your house. That is time. And to become something requires time. You have set a goal for yourself, in the physical world you have set a goal for yourself to become the manager and that requires time. And also you have set a goal to become something - right? To become non-violent. Let's take that. Right? You are violent, my friend and I, we are saying, you are perhaps not but I may be, we are violent. And to be free from violence needs time. To become non-violent needs times - right? We are questioning that, doubting that. You follow? You have to doubt this whole idea of becoming non-violent, which they are preaching a great deal in India. The fact is violence - right? I am angry, I am jealous, I am furious, I hate somebody, I want to be somebody more powerful. That is a fact. But non-violence is non-fact. So what am I doing pursuing, cultivating a non-fact? And to achieve non-fact requires time. See the absurdity of it! And millions upon millions are doing this. And because they are so powerful, the millions, also all the politicians.

So come back: so the fact is I am violent. But to achieve non-fact requires time. So to stay with violence needs no time. To understand, to observe, to perceive the nature and the structure and the causation of violence needs no time. Because it is a fact. If I look at it carefully it will reveal the whole thing. But if I am pursuing non-violence I am not observing. Right? So please understand something: perception does not require time. I am violent, I say to myself, suppose I am really violent, I say what do you mean by that word? You are not physically violent, I haven't seen you in all these years hit somebody, I haven't seen you angry but you are a violent man. And you say tell me what that means to be violent. Violence can exist only when there is contradiction in me. Please understand all this. When there are two separate activities in contradiction with each other. I say one thing and do another, think one thing and act totally differently from the fact, that is a contradiction. That creates the opposites. So you can say, look, you have discovered something: where there is contradiction, opposites, there must be conflict. That conflict indicates violence. Violence - I won't go into more details of violence, which is imitation, conformity. Comparison is essentially violence, right? When I compare myself with you who are much brighter, much more this, much more that, I am envious of you, I am antagonistic, I am jealous of you. Jealousy, conformity, antagonism, is violence because it is clear when I have put away the non real, non-violence, I can see this very clearly, all the intimations, the complexity of violence. And when there is a perception of this there is the ending of that. That violence is not separate from me. You understand? Must I go into this?

When you are angry, is anger different from you? When you are sexually excited, is that excitement different from you? Right? So is violence, comparison, different from you? Or you are all that? My friend has been trained from childhood to compare. He goes to his school, there he is given marks, compares right through that process until the university, if he is lucky enough, or unlucky enough. Then when he comes to a job he is still comparing, fighting, struggling, right? And we say all that is a form of violence, aggression, and so on. Now seeing the fact of that, not the non-fact of violence, which is non-violence, but the fact that I am violent, seeing the entirety of violence. I can only see that... there is a perception of that only when the non-fact is completely put aside. When there is no pursuit of non-violence of any kind, then my whole attention - the whole attention, not my, the whole attention is on the fact. Then the fact moves, reveals, shows what it is. And that very perception is the ending of it because there is no conflict as violence being separate from me. Violence is me, as anger, as your reaction, as when you have pain in your tummy, or in toothache, or headache, that is you. You are not separate from all that. Where there is separation there must be conflict, as the Arab, Jew, Hindu, Buddhist.

So there is security only in intelligence. We won't go into the question of what is intelligence as our time is up. It is intelligence that says that is false - right? Because you have examined it, you have looked at it, you have doubted it, you have questioned, but if you say, "I accept the false as the truth", then you are unintelligent. But the moment when you look at the falseness of things and see clearly the false as the false, that perception is the beginning of intelligence. Right? Now to go into that intelligence profoundly, which we shall as we go along, that is security. Intelligence of that kind is supreme security.

I hope we still remain friends!

SAANEN 4TH PUBLIC TALK 17TH JULY 1983

I hope you are not too hot. May we continue with what we were talking about on Thursday? We were saying, last Thursday, that human beings throughout the world have sought security, and they must have security, not only biologically, physically, but also human beings have sought psychological security. They have invented all kinds of images, theories, hypothesis and so on. In all those man has sought psychological security. And physically it is necessary obviously that all of us throughout the world should have food, clothes and shelter. And that is denied by various forms of division - racial, national, which is tribalism, and ideological differences, which have produced a great many wars, thousands of wars. Throughout history wars have existed. So man has hardly any security physically except those who are well established, plenty of money, following the tradition, conservative and so on. But psychologically, inwardly, security we have sought in various illusions - in god, in ideas, in relationship, in concepts and prejudices, conclusions, convictions. And all those have not given man inward security, which we went into pretty thoroughly last time that we met here.

And we said: is there security at all for human beings? Those of you who have come here for the first time, please if you will kindly bear in mind that this is not a lecture: a lecture being a talking about, a discourse, on a particular subject, to be instructed, informed. So this is not a lecture, this is not something ideological, philosophical, exotic from the East. But as we said, we are talking over together as two friends about human existence, why human beings after so many millenia upon millenia are still primitive psychologically, though technologically highly advanced. They have been to the moon, they have invented a great many things, rapid communication, great surgery, medicine - if you believe in all that - and also computers, which perhaps may take over the whole activity of our brain, not quite, but most of it. So we were talking over together at the last few meetings that we had here, why human beings are what they are now, after a long period of time which is called evolution. They are still violent, brutal, primitive, have tribal wars, which are national wars, economic wars and so on. And apparently there is no peace in the world. The government cannot possibly, of whatever country, cannot bring about peace. We have talked about that a great deal, we are not going to go into all that again because we have another two meetings only - next Tuesday and Thursday - so we must not go back to what we have said over and over again.

And we are talking over as two friends, not the speaker is laying down certain dicta, certain ideas. He has no authority, he is just a friend talking over together the whole question of human misery, human suffering, pain, anxiety, loneliness, despair, depression, uncertainty and all the turmoil of life. So we were talking the other day about whether there is any security at all, psychologically. And we have tried to find psychological security in every form of illusion, attachments, ties and so on. In all those activities there has been no security. Security means being stable, firm, unchangeable, not fluctuating, not changing but a stability, a steadiness, a sense of great strength and vitality. And we said it is only in intelligence that there is total security.

Now we are going to enquire together, together, you and the speaker, investigate what is intelligence. According to the dictionary common usage of that word it means to understand, to discern, to grasp quickly, a statement, an idea, a something put forward, to understand rapidly. And to have sagacity, which is to be able to have the capacity to discern instantly. Each one of us when we hear that word intelligence, we will translate it according to our conditioning, to our prejudices. We say, "That is an intelligent book", "That is an intelligent man". That is, a man who has capacity to investigate, to observe, to think out. That word intelligence, radically the root of that word, is not only to discern, to be able to capture something that is put forward instantly that may be new, but also it means to understand, to have glimpses between the lines, between the two thoughts, between the lines on a page which are not printed. And intelligence, that very word, has an extraordinary sound. When you hear that word, what does it mean to each one of us? First we hear the word, the sound of the word? Because the word is not the intelligence. The word is not the thing. This tent, the word tent is not the actuality. So the word has its own significance verbally, but also behind the word is the sound of that word. The sound contains the deeper significance of that word. Are we meeting each other? Because sound is very important. Music is sound. That river flowing down rapidly makes a sound. We hardly listen to sound. We have our prejudices which prevent the hearing of not only the word to communicate but also to capture the sound of that word. That means one has to listen very, very carefully so that the word itself unfolds the full significance of that word. And you can only listen when there is the sound that word brings about. A sound is not noise. Sound is not an interval between two notes. Sound has great depth. That is, when one listens very clearly, without any bias, without any prejudice, opinion, or any form of conclusion, then you capture the enormous significance of a word like intelligence with its sound. I hope we are doing this together. We are going to talk over many things this morning and one has not only to communicate with words, because we are speaking unfortunately, or fortunately, in English, and English has certain definite meanings to certain definite words. And those words must be used to communicate. That is a nice day. It is a beautiful morning. But the words are not the beautiful morning. The words are not the mountain. But if you listen to the sound of that word - a beautiful morning - you capture the whole significance of that morning, with all its extraordinary beauty, the shadows, the clear air, the mountains. In that sound all things exist.

So we are going to talk over together: what is intelligence? How does one approach a question like this? Each one of us will give a different meaning to it according to our capacity, if you have read a great deal, a great many books, talk a great many languages, gifted in various directions, you would call that intelligence. And someone else might say you must have the capacity to discern without choice, action. Someone might say, to put together the whole complicated machinery of computers is intelligence. So each one according to his predilection, according to his prejudice, bias, conclusion, will say, "This is intelligence". But to investigate what is really intelligence we must negate what is not intelligence - right? We must investigate that which is not intelligence to find out what is intelligence. But to investigate what is intelligence you must first understand what it is not - right? I hope this is somewhat clear, that we are investigating what is not intelligence. Through negation you come to the positive. But if you start with the positive you end up with negation. If you start from childhood believing, having faith in some form of illusion and so on, as you grow up you will invariably end up with not believing in anything.

So we are starting now to find out what is not intelligence - right? That is we are thinking together, not the speaker is telling you what is not intelligence, but together, you and the speaker, as two friends, investigating this enormous problem, a very complex problem, to find out for themselves what is intelligence. And to do that there must be negation of what is not intelligence - right? Are we clear on this matter? If we are we can then proceed.

What is not intelligence? Is war intelligence? All the bestiality, the nastiness, the ugliness, the noise, the brutality, the shedding blood of killing others, is that intelligence? Killing all the things on the earth, the animals, the whales under the sea. We are perpetually killing, not only nature but ourselves. Our brains are degenerating. I do not know if you have gone into this question at all. We see war is not intelligence but yet we are pursuing it. Each one of us responsible for it - right? I do not know if you would acknowledge that as such responsibility. There is a war going on in Beirut, I believe there are forty wars going on in the world at the present time. Killing each other for ideas, ideals, to assert one's own position, power, as a nation, and not to be encroached, surrounded. You know, all that is going on. Is that an act of intelligence? Human beings who have evolved through a long passage of time, have had two appalling wars recently, and yet they are preparing for wars. That is an act of great stupidity - right? Obviously. The cause of it - one of the causes of it is nationalism, which is glorified tribalism - right? My country, my space, my people, my tradition, my god: all such activity is an act of stupidity. It is not intelligence. I think you all agree to that. But do we see the fact of it, not just the verbal assertion that it is stupid?

So what is our responsibility - we will come very near home - what is our responsibility when you see this thing going on? If I belong to a certain tribe called nationalism, certain religious sect, which brings about division, and therefore conflict, I either accept that conflict and follow the usual traditional path, or I no longer belong to any country, actually not belong to any country, to any tribe, to any group, to any sect - right? Or to any religion. Because they are the factors of division, and therefore conflict. And the deterioration of the brain, which has happened to all of us; when we are born very young it is already deteriorating because conflict is one of the factors, or major factor, of deterioration in the brain. Conflict. When human beings from childhood until they die are in perpetual conflict about one thing or another, and that conflict comes into being when there is contradiction, when you say something and do totally a different thing. That is hypocrisy. Will you listen? As a friend are we listening to each other? Or do you say, "Yes, quite right, I agree with you" and carry on?

As we said the other day, this is a serious meeting, not an entertainment, not an intellectual stimulation, or something romantic, sentimental, and all that nonsense. This is a very serious gathering. And life has become most dangerous for most people.

And life has apparently no meaning whatsoever. And if we are to take life seriously, which we must if we are intelligent, we must be concerned with all this, not just one aspect of it. We are concerned with the whole human existence from the moment we are born until we die. Not go off into some kind of absurd meditation, or follow some guru, or accept and be tied to a theory, or an ideal. This is a serious matter to consider. That means exercising one's brain to find out for oneself what is true, and what is illusory, things that are illusory. And nationalism of any kind, bringing about wars, division, is obviously not an act of intelligence. So when you see something to be true the false drops away. There is no longer conflict, or determination not to be a nationalist. You may have a passport, but passport is not... unfortunately it is necessary to travel. So nationalism is one of the factors of conflict.

And also holding on to a prejudice. The word prejudice means preconceived opinion - right? And we are full of prejudices. Your opinion against another person's opinion - right? And there is the political opinion, and dividing people all over the world. Our opinions - opinion means suggestions, lacking proof, based on some emotional reaction, strong adherence to a conclusion, this is also dividing people, and therefore there is conflict. And can we live - please listen my friend - can we live without opinions? Without prejudice? After all it is a prejudice when you believe in some kind of god. When you as Christians and someone else as a Hindu or a Buddhist doesn't believe in a saviour but you very strongly believe in a saviour, and the other chap doesn't. It is just a matter of belief, faith, without any proof, and your belief in a person has not brought about peace in the world. When you see all this: how belief, prejudice, conclusions, ideals, divide people and therefore breed conflict, such activity is obviously not intelligence. So when you hear that will you drop all your prejudices? All your opinions about what one is, what one is not, what should be, and so on. Will you drop all those so that you have a free mind, uncluttered mind? If you say, "That is not possible", then you will never find out for yourself - we are talking as a friend - you will never find out what it is to be intelligent. And therefore you will always search for security in an illusion and never finding security, therefore in great turmoil, confusion, neurotic activity, and escape into sentimentalism and romanticism, or into sensuality. This is what is happening - right?

So as we said, one of the major factors of the deterioration of the brain is this constant division which breeds conflict. Right? Why is there division in us, fragmentation? I hope we are asking each other this question. The speaker is not asking the question. We are asking each other this question. You are asking that question. Why is there in all human beings throughout the world this contradiction, this fragmentation, and therefore the urge to bring all the fragments together and to fulfil? So we are going to examine because we want to see really what is intelligence, supreme intelligence, not the intelligence of thought, not the intelligence of knowledge, not the intelligence of experience, because that intelligence is limited, because experience is limited, knowledge is limited and therefore anything that is limited is not intelligence. I hope we are meeting each other as two friends walking down a lane, quietly sitting on a bench, listening to the birds, listening to the stream as it goes by and seeing the beautiful mountains, quiet, still, and exchanging their investigation into understanding and establishing, not merely intellectually verbally understanding, but establishing in their life this quality of intelligence.

Why is there in us this duality, these opposites? Wanting, not wanting, 'what is' and 'what should not be', or 'what is' and 'what should be' - you are following all this? Greedy, one is greedy, one should not be greedy. One is violent and one should not be violent. One is dull, stupid and conforms or imitates, compares oneself, one's own stupidity with someone who is not stupid. So we have this constant struggle. That is an obvious fact. Are you interested in all this? (Yes) Are you quite sure? (Yes) I hope you won't go to sleep. If you are really interested in it and pursue it to the end and drop it, not just say, "I am interested casually". You are not interested casually about making money. You are not interested casually about having sex. You are not casually interested in having a job, you have to have a job, you have to have money. So this is far more important than the job, sex or any other thing because when there is that intelligence that will operate in all the fields of our life, in all the areas of our existence. But we never go to the very end unfortunately. That is why we are all mediocre. Forgive me for saying that. The word mediocre means going half way up the hill, never going to the very top of the hill. And we are trying to understand and live a life of intelligence. And to do that one has to see not only what are the causes of conflict but also end the cause.

What is a fact? And what is not a fact? When only there is fact, fact has no duality. You understand? Fact has no opposite. Love has no opposite as hate. So the fact is that which has happened before, that is a fact. Or that which is happening now, that is a fact. But we draw a conclusion from what has happened before and hold on to that conclusion. That conclusion is not a fact - right? Or what is happening now, it is a fact, but we never look at the fact but always make an abstraction of the fact as an idea, and then pursue the idea which is non fact - right? Is this clear? Or am I talking to myself? So can we stay only with the fact? I am envious. That is a fact. Not I personally, I am not envious, I don't care - you follow? Suppose one is envious and that is a fact, that is what is taking place, a reaction which we call envy. And out of that fact we draw a conclusion that we must not be envious so we pursue the non-fact, and so create an opposite to 'what is' - clear? So if you don't pursue the non-fact and remain with the fact, and the fact is you, you are not separate from the fact - right? This is difficult for you to see this because most of us say, "The me is different from the action, me is different from the reaction, me is different from my anger, from my envy" and so on. That is what we have been conditioned to. Which means we have been conditioned to conflict. Now somebody comes along and says, "Look, to end the deterioration of the brain, only then the brain can be intelligent." To end that deteriorating factor is to hold on to the fact and put away all non-fact. No idealism, no conclusion, no prejudice - you understand? - only the fact. The fact is one is envy, envious. Now if you hold on to the fact, what is implied in that? The other, when you pursue non-fact, time is involved. I wonder if you understand this? Am I making this difficult? When I pursue non-violence when I am violent, the pursuit of achieving non-violence requires time - right? To become non-violent requires time. But whereas if you remain with the fact there is no time involved in it. I wonder if you see this? This is important, please. So one has to enquire now: what is time?

Are you willing to go into all this? Well, it is up to you; but I am going to go on. Please bear in mind that we are friends talking over together. You are not merely listening to what is being said but you are sharing in what is being said. That is the activity of a friend. You don't talk to a stranger, probably he is not interested. But as a friend we are talking over this matter: what is time? Because all our life is based on time. The evolution of the passage of millenia years is time. What we have become requires time, not only the time that is required to go from here to your house, not only time to become something, become from the clerk to the chief executive, that requires time. If you have got the skill, the capacity, the crookedness and all the rest of it, then you reach the top, if you want to. All that requires time. To learn a language requires time. So time in a certain area is necessary. If you want to catch a train you must be there at a certain time. And is there psychological time at all - the tomorrow? Please understand this carefully otherwise we will create all kinds of mischievous ideas. Time. Time is hope, psychologically. Time is required to become something psychologically. one is envious, to become non-envious requires time. So our brain is conditioned to time, and by time - right? Clear? We have had a thousand years of experience, to accumulate all that experience requires time. To acquire a great deal of knowledge, psychological knowledge requires time. The passage of memory - right? - is time. So memory is the... thought is the response of memory, which is time. So thought is time. Is this all - no? Oh, my lord!

Now this is what I meant: having the capacity to capture this instantly, see the truth of it. That is, experience is always limited - right? You can't have complete experience about anything. So experience is limited and therefore knowledge is limited. That is a fact whether you like it or not. And so memory is based on knowledge, and therefore memory is limited. You may remember from your youth all the things, long passage of time, the remembrance of things past - all that is limited. And so thought is invariably, under whatever circumstances it is limited. Right? So all the things that thought has created are limited. All the religious structures of the world put together by thought are limited. I wonder if you understand this? You are born in India - I won't talk about your Christian world because you might get upset - if you are born in India, or in the Buddhist countries, what the Buddha or somebody in Hinduism has said is complete, finished. They worship an image, thinking that it is the absolute, permanent, everlasting truth, as you do here in your own way, if you don't mind my pointing it out to you. And all that is the activity of thought. They all say he is the direct revelation of the truth - right? Every religion, all says he is the revelation of the truth. But truth cannot be revealed through a book, through a person, through an idea, through a ceremony, or having faith. Truth has to be found, not to be told about it. Therefore there must be complete freedom. And only when there is complete freedom there is no conflict. It is only when the brain with its only instrument, which is thought, and that thought is the only instrument of our life, one must realize that all thinking is limited and must invariably bring about conflict. When I am thinking about my beastly little self all day long, as most people do, it is a very limited occupation - surely, no?

So time is a movement of thought, psychologically as well as physically. Time is not only the past and the future and the present - right? This whole movement from the past through the present, modifying itself and proceeding further. That whole movement is thought and time - right? Are you following this?

So then one asks: if that is the process of time, and that is limited - I hope you are following all this - and when it is limited it must create conflict, and therefore one of the factors of deterioration of the brain. Then to enquire whether the brain can not deteriorate at all one must understand what is the now. Do you understand all this? What to you is the now? Is the now where you are sitting there and listening, partaking, sharing, is that the now? Look carefully. Go into it sirs, don't say, "Yes, that is part of it." The now is not only the past, but the present - right? - the past being you have made a conclusion to come here and therefore you are sitting here. And the future is when you leave the tent and go away - right? So the now contains the past, the present and the future. The past being you have decided to come here and listen to this poor chap, and you are sitting there, and also the now is when you have finished here and go. So the now contains the past, the present and future. That is the now which has no time.

So when you remain in the now, you understand the past with all the human experience of which you are - right? Your consciousness, with its content, is the past, the present and the future - right? Your consciousness is that - what you believe, what you believe you have been told, you have been programmed by the experts in politics, in religion, in education and so on, which is the past - right? Are you following all this? And the past is there now, and the future is the outcome of that past - right? - which is already here. So the now contains all time as past, present and the future. And to understand this in depth so that the now contains the whole thing, all existence is now. Therefore there is no movement away from the now. There is no movement away from the fact and the non-fact. A movement away from the fact to non-fact, that has ended. Therefore there is no conflict. I wonder if you understand all this? Not verbally, please don't take it verbally. See the truth of it. So that the brain, which has lived for thousands of years, which is not your brain, it is not your thought, it is the thought of the whole of humanity, which we went into very carefully the last few days.

So the fact is now. And the fact contains all the past, present and the future. But to listen to that fact is for the fact to reveal the content. Not you tell the fact what its content is. I wonder if you understand all this? Are we thinking together? Or are you merely listening to some words of the speaker and therefore confused? Are we thinking together? That we are now not only the past, all the memories, all the activities, the pain, the anxiety, the hurts, the loneliness, the suffering, the pain, the fears. You are all that now - right? And the future is what is now - right? Obviously sirs. So the future and the past exist now because of what you are - right? This seems so incredible - what is the difficulty? Would you kindly express your difficulty. Very simply please, don't complicate it. Aren't you the past? Right? Your education, your being programmed as a Swiss, as a British, as a German, a Hindu, an American, Russian and so on, you have been programmed. That programme is the past - right? So the past is your accumulated memories - right? Those memories are stored in the brain. So the past is now - right? And the now also contains the future, unless there is a fundamental mutation - you understand? That is, there is complete mutation in the very brain cells of the brain, you are the past memories and continuing in the future as memory. The future is now therefore, and the past is now. Is that clear? Unless there is fundamental psychological change. That is, when there is this conditioning of the human brain - right? That conditioning is memory - right? I am a Catholic, I am a Protestant, I am a Hindu, I am a Buddhist, I don't believe in gods, but I believe in Marx, Lenin - which is the same thing in different words. My guru is better than your guru, and all the rest of that business. So the brain of each one of us is conditioned, programmed, which is the vast accumulation of the past. That is simple enough. So we are memories - right? You may think that you are something more superior than memories but you are not, even when you think you are superior, that very thought is memory - right?

So memory is a movement of time, time as the future in the present. So if you remain with that fact and not move away from it, that you are now. You are the rest of all time. Right? Then when you realize, when the fact is revealed that you are that, and if you give your complete attention, not escape from that - you follow? - that memory is you. You are not different from that memory - right? So there is no division between you and that memory. When there is division there is conflict. So the observer is the observed.

The experiencer is the experience. The analyser is the analysed. And so on. Then conflict ends. Conflict exists only when there is division and therefore the brain then has no conflict, and therefore there is no deterioration of the brain. But most of our brains have deteriorated, or are deteriorating. That is a fact. And so one has to discover why, what are the causes of deterioration. Essentially conflict. A mind that is frightened, a brain that lives in fear - which we will discuss next time, fear and all the rest of it - such a brain must deteriorate. The brain that is seeking constant sensuality, sexuality, must deteriorate. These are facts.

So to find out a way of living, and that is quite... is it possible to find a way of living where is no shadow of conflict? Then your brain is extraordinarily alive. Its activity then is whole because it is free. And the word free means also love. Love has no opposite. Love has no... is love desire? Is love the activity of thought? If it is, as with most of us, it is not love. If thought in relationship, in intimate relationship, if there is the activity of thought then there is no love. Go into it. We shall go into it another time. May I get up?

May we go on where we left off on Sunday? We were talking about intelligence and security, and we came to the point where the past, the present and the future were contained in the now. That is, all time is now. And in the now there is no time at all. I don't know if we have understood that, if we have gone into it fairly sufficiently. And as we have got only today and Thursday we have got a lot of ground to cover so we will not go back and repeat what we have already talked about.

We ought to consider what is the future of mankind? Through various successions of events, vast experience and collective memories, through evolution, that is the whole process of time from the past, infinite past, to the present is called evolution. The successive events, memories, experiences, and so on. And we have arrived at this present stage of human evolution. And what is our future? Not only the future of each one, which I question whether each one is separate from mankind, but what lies ahead of us? Do we proceed along the same path as we have been going for the last million years, or more or less, slowly developing, slowly accumulating vast memories, not only in the technological world but also in the psychological area, in the inward area - if we can so put it that way. And considering what evolution has brought us to now, and what are the successive events, experiences, that lie ahead of us? We have evolved and we are almost primitive psychologically, angry, violent, innumerable illusions, dogmas, beliefs, faiths of various religions and various groups and societies and cultures, all that is inherited by us. We are all that. And there is no question about that. Nobody can argue or theoretically oppose all that. We are the result of vast successive experiences, incidents and so on. That is our consciousness. That is what we are. And from the beginning of time we have not changed very much. Biologically we have reached a certain point and I don't think we can develop a third arm or two heads or something of that kind. And when we look at ourselves, and our society - the society which we have created, the divisions which we have brought about, religious, national, tribal and all the rest of it, one wonders what is the future of all human beings?

This is a very serious question, we ought to consider, investigate together. Not that the speaker is exploring or pointing out, but you and the speaker together are walking along the same road, at the same speed, with the same intention, with the same commitment to find out what is the future of man. Not only the future of our grandchildren, and their grandchildren and so on, but the whole of human kind, not one's own particular future. And our consciousness, which is what we are - our reactions, our responses psychologically and physically, all the beliefs of various cultures, of various people, all the faiths, the dogmas, the environmental conditioning, our fears, our anxieties, loneliness, depression, sorrow, and the constant pain of conflict. This is the common ground on which all human beings stand. That is a fact. When you suffer, when you are lonely, depressed, anxious, in conflict with your own friend, with your wife or husband, this is the lot of all human beings throughout the world, whether they live in Russia, China, India, Asia and so on, in America or Europe, every human being goes through this, may express it differently, may put it into words that are not familiar to you but the feeling, the pain, the anxiety, the sorrow, the uncertainty, the insecurity, faith in something that has no reality but in an illusion, vast network of superstition. This is the common lot of all human beings. That is our consciousness.

Our consciousness, your consciousness is not something private, personal, exclusively one's own. It is shared by all human beings. Whether you go to the most primitive part of Africa or the most sophisticated people in New York or Tokyo, or even in Moscow, they all share this. So it is not our personal consciousness. It is not your private, individual belief in something or other. This belief is shared by everybody. They may believe in something and you may believe in something else, but belief is common to all of us. Pain, tears, laughter, humour, the sense of desperate loneliness, anxiety is shared by every human being on this beautiful earth. So it is not yours. And this consciousness is the self, the me, the person, the ego. And this ego is the common ego of mankind. This is very difficult for most people to accept and see the truth of it because all of us are conditioned to believe that we are separate human beings, separate souls, which religions have encouraged, separate. When we think, we think as though we were separate from all other people who think. Thinking is common to all of us, whether the highly educated, sophisticated thinker, philosopher, or the person, the most primitive person in a small, little withered hamlet or a village, or a hut, he also thinks. Thinking is common to all of us and therefore it is not your individual private thinking. This is very difficult for people who have been brought up from childhood to think that they are separate. That is a marvellous illusion, cultivated sedulously, through literature, through talent, through religions, through national worship and all the rest of it. And this common consciousness, the common self, not your self, the self which everybody clings to, that is the common self, collective self. And what is the future of mankind? That mankind has evolved collectively through millenia upon millenia.

Please we are thinking together, unemotionally, non-romantically, but without any bias or prejudice, if that is possible. We have to investigate this question.

We were talking yesterday with a person who has excellent credentials about computers. He is building one of them, meeting all the top computer people, and their extraordinary activity. In our discussion yesterday the big organizations in America and Japan especially are pouring billions of dollars or yen, not only to cure cancer but also to create a computer, the fifth generation, the ultra intelligent mechanical mind - brain that will, with the robot (Noise of aeroplane) - this is modern civilization, noise, including that of the speaker - they are creating or working to bring about, the top people, not the local inventors, they act too, to bring about a computer with a robot that will outstrip man. You understand all this. The machine can think faster, create more, almost everything that the human brain has done and can do. This is a fact. They are working at it twenty four hours a day, competing with each other, America and Japan. They are producing machines which will control us human beings - which is actually going on now. Machines, computers and other mechanical devices that will control our human activity. We will be shaped by the machines.

You understand? We are being shaped now but that is very slow, casual. But the big industries are producing machines that will control us. In the factories the robot and the computers will build the car and so on and so on and so on. They do operations. That is one side of it. The other side is also they are trying to - genetic engineering to change the genes of the human beings.

And also a certain country is more interested - Russia - in understanding the activity of the brain. That is, thought transference. You understand. To read other people's thoughts. To find out what Mr. Reagan is thinking and Mr. Reagan is trying to find out what Andropov is thinking. And presently, if that succeeds, probably they will because they are putting all their best science and thousands and millions of dollars in all this, governments as well as big companies, to find out what makes the brain function in a certain way and whether it is possible to change that, and to read other people's thoughts. They are working on all this. Perhaps some of you already know that Duke University in America, at one time extra sensory perception, reading people's thought, thought controlling matter - they just touched the peripheral E.S.P. - extra sensory perception. But now they are spending all the scientists, and the top people are working at this. Please these are facts. I am not exaggerating.

So what is the future of mankind? What is going to happen to our brain when the computer and robot take over, and when the great industries invent all these machineries of ultra intelligent machines, and you, what is your future as a human being? You understand my question? This is happening. It is not something in the future. It may take ten years. And they say, "We will do it in ten years" - right? And they are going to do it in ten years, for commercial reasons. So they are acting from the outside on the human brain - you understand? Through bio-chemistry, through electric currents and so on. From the outside. And they may change our conditioning - from the outside. And probably they will. They will invent better gurus than any other guru in the world.

(Laughter) Don't laugh please. This is very, very serious. It sounds funny, humourous but it is a fact. The computer will invent the best god on earth, will bring about a society that will function mechanically - you understand? Face all this.

And what is the future of man if we as human beings don't change from the inner, from the inside - you understand? They are going to change you from the outside. This is inevitable. It is in the cards. We laymen know nothing about all this, what they are doing. And perhaps we don't want to know. And what is going to happen to our brain, human brain, not the mechanical brain invented by top computer experts and the bio-chemists and the genetic engineers, acting from the outside to control the brain - you understand all this? We are not painting a dark picture, it is a fact, it is happening. And what is going to happen to the human brain when we have vast leisure, because the computer, the robot will do all the dirty work? They will build cars, they will sweep the roads, perhaps establish a better relationship between you and your wife. Please this is serious what we are saying. It may give you all the sexual experience through computers - yes sir, swallow that also.

So what is the future of man? Your theories, your particular guru, your doctrines, your churches, will have no place at all because the computer brain is much more active, much clearer, in a millionth of a second it will answer a question. Taking all this in, not being frightened, not being depressed by it, but seeing the actual fact of what is going on. And this friend of ours, who is building a computer, meeting all the top people, in discussing we saw what is the future of man.

Our brain is now conditioned by experience, successive incidents which bring about experiences, the fears, the pleasures, the aches and the anxieties and the pain of sorrow, the death; we are conditioned linguistically, climatically. That is our conditioning. And if we admit that during the successive years or periods of evolution we will gradually inwardly change - which means continue what we are almost indefinitely, which is evolution. Or sudden jump - which is psychologically impossible.

So what we are asking is - as two friends we are talking together, just as two friends we talked yesterday with this person, we have known him for years, and also some of you we have known each other for years - and we were talking over together amicably, in friendly spirit. These are facts. Irrefutable facts. And can we, even a few, change, bring about a mutation in the very brain cells of the brain? Does it take time? You understand my question? Does it take a series of incidents, successive memories to bring about a mutation in the conditioning? Are you following all this? Realizing that in investigating the conditioning we are not investigating personal conditioning, it is the conditioning of the human brain. And that brain has evolved through time, it is not your brain. So we are not talking about your individual transformation, or individual mutation that you become more enlightened, more happy, more some kind of nonsense. We are talking about the human brain because you, as a human being, represent all humanity. You are all humanity because you suffer, they suffer - you understand? You are humanity, not just one person isolated, individual, secretive, concerned with your own beastly little self. Right?

Now we are going to find out, if we don't radically bring about psychological revolution in the sense of bringing about a mutation, our brains will wither because the computer and the robot, and other things they are inventing, will make our brains inactive. I wonder if you understand all this. Now you have to think, you have to investigate, you have to work. That means your brain has to be active. But when the computer and the robot takes the things over, what is going to happen to your brain? Either it is going to wither, or go off into some kind of vast entertainment, which is also taking place - right? I do not know if you have not noticed what great importance they are giving to sports - the Olympics and all that business. So it will be caught in that. You are following? This is happening sirs. Or then you have to investigate whether you can, as a human being who is the rest of humanity, if there is a radical mutation you affect the whole of consciousness of mankind? I do not know if you have not noticed if in America, or in Russia, or in some remote part of Japan, they invent something, the rest of the world picks it up much... it is there. You understand? It is happening. So if when one or two, or a dozen, or a hundred bring about a fundamental freedom of conditioning, they affect the whole consciousness of humanity - right? This is so. As Hitler has affected the whole consciousness of mankind, Napoleon, your religious leader, or the other religious leaders, they have affected humanity. So can we, after stating all this, can we bring about, not through gradual process of evolution, that is out, finished, can we bring about a mutation in our whole being, in our whole behaviour, in our way of looking at life?

So we have to investigate together the content of our consciousness, - you understand? - of which you are, because the content makes up consciousness, without the content, consciousness - as we know - it doesn't exist - right? Are we clear on this matter? If I am a Hindu, with all that business, with all the superstitions, with their gods, with their rituals, with their... you know, with their circus as you as Christians with your circus, and our faith, our belief, our habits, you follow? - all that - can all that radically bring about a change, total change? Right? Have you understood? Can we go on from there?

Please, this is very serious. This is not something to play at. See the danger on one side: what they are outwardly going to do to our brains; and also see actually what our brains are: conditioned, nationally, linguistically, fear, pleasure, sorrow and all that, faith, I believe, I don't believe, my prejudice is better than your prejudice, and so on. That is what we are. Now one of the contents of our consciousness is fear, which is shared by all human beings, it is not your fear, only it is fear. What is fear? How does it arise? Please you are sharing this, thinking together, I am not exploring and you just listen and play with words. You are afraid. That is a fact.

Afraid to die, afraid to lose, afraid not to become something, afraid of your wife or your husband, or somebody or other. Afraid of nature - you follow? - fear. Can that fear, which has conditioned our mind - our brain, can that fear completely end? Not through time, that means evolution, gradually - you follow? I wonder if you are following all this? Please, it is your life, it is not my life, not somebody else's life. It is the life of every human being.

Fear does terrible things. Fear makes you lie, fear makes you kill, fear makes you violent, fear makes one curl in oneself. All of us know what fear is. Is fear one of the causes... one of the causes of fear, is it to become something - you understand?

Psychologically to become something. That is, I am this, I must be that. The 'that' is the projection through comparison. Right? I compare myself with you - right? And I want to be like you, or I don't want to be like you but like somebody else. To become. You understand? The comparison is to become.

So can we now, not tomorrow, end all comparison? Of course you have to compare between two cars. If you have the money you buy the better. When you are comparing one house, one architect, you know, there it is necessary to compare; to get the best of cloth, best of houses, if you have the money, and so on. But we are talking about psychological comparison. To see the consequences of comparison, which is to become - right? And one of the causes of fear is this - right? And seeing the truth of it end instantly all comparison. Are you doing it? Even a few of you for god's sake. So that your mind - your brain is free of this burden, which means you are unconditioning the brain cells themselves. Those cells have been accustomed, trained, educated to compare. You understand? One day you will sit next to god - you know all that stuff. Or you compare what you are with what you should be. So that all sense of ideals, the future, completely ends. And so one of the causes of fear ends instantly.

There are other multiple causes of fear - fear of public opinion, fear what your friends might say about you - you know, a thousand fears. Fear of the dark, fear of your wife, or your husband, fear of this and fear of that. Fear of your guru because you want to be like him - right? He tells you how to meditate - you know all that stupid stuff. So you are always trying to become something. And what is it that is becoming? An idea, a memory, a thought - you understand? You follow? Is that what is becoming? And therefore it is an empty becoming, there is nothing in it but yet we cling to that. So what are the other causes of fear? Please we are investigating together. Is it time? Fear of the future? Or fear of the past? Fear of having done - you know all the rest of it? Both biological fears and psychological fears based on the past, which is time? Fear of future as death? So time and thought are the root of fear - right? Of course. It is so obvious. Can we go on from there.

Do you and I see the fact: comparison, which is also part of time, the becoming, and the thought that says, "I must become", "I must be", both thought, time, are the basic factors of fear? If you say, "How am I to stop thinking?", that is a wrong question. But if you see the fact - you understand? - if you see a dangerous snake in front of you, you act. You don't say, "What am I to do with it? Please tell me how to run from it." You don't ask somebody and say, "What am I to do?" When there is danger there is instant response. And time and thought in relation to fear is a fact, is a tremendous danger - right? And do you actually see the danger? Or the idea of danger? You understand? The idea is stronger than the fact and so we play with it. The idea of a snake is different from the actual snake - right? The actual precipice. You can imagine that you are standing on a precipice and try to fall and play all around, but when you are in front of a deep chasm at your feet, you respond instantly. So if one is aware of the nature of fear and the danger of fear, how it corrupts the mind, the brain - the mind is different, sorry I won't use that word mind. I will keep that word away from the brain. And so does one see the danger and therefore act?

And also one has to consider the whole pursuit of pleasure - sexual, the becoming, the achievement, being tied to something, attached to something, possessing something - you follow? Various forms of pleasure. When you are attached, when you are tied to something, then corruption begins. Right? I wonder if you see all this? When I am tied to my wife, or to my husband, or a to an ideal, or a series of logical deductive conclusions, and I hold on to that, then corruption is inevitable. When I hold on, attached to my wife - you are following all this? - or to my girl friend because I get comfort, sex and all the rest of that, in that attachment, in that tie, there is the beginning of the seed of corruption. When you see the truth that wherever there is any kind of attachment to anything - to your furniture, to a person, to an ideal, to a system, whether it is the democratic, or social, or any attachment, tie, you have already the seed flowering into corruption. Yes sirs. And pleasure is that corruption, if you are pursuing it. If pleasure happens, all right. But if you pursue it, as most human beings do, and are attached to pleasure, then you have all the corruptive process taking place which brings about deterioration of the brain. Corruption is the deterioration.

And also we ought to talk over together a much more complex problem: that of suffering. Mankind wherever they live have suffered enormously. Go to the poor countries where they have one meal a day and not enough to eat, they suffer infinitely. And all the wars of many centuries, how many people have been killed, how many tears. Aren't you aware of all these blasted things? The sorrow of not achieving, the sorrow of ignorance, not of books, not of accumulated professorial knowledge, that is part of ignorance, we are talking of ignorance of the truth of reality, of what is going on inwardly. The sorrow of losing somebody whom you think you love. The sorrow of disease, the sorrow of a thousand things. And mankind throughout the world has borne this sorrow. And we are still going on with it. So what is wrong with us? We know the wars that are going on now - maimed - you follow sir? - those terrible tanks, the aeroplanes from thirty thousand feet dropping a bomb, not seeing the devastation it makes and saying at the end of it that god was with me when they dropped the atomic bomb in Nagasaki or Hiroshima.

So is it possible to end sorrow? Which is to face loneliness and end it - not take time, the causes of sorrow, seeking comfort. There is always a comforter, the priest, the psychoanalyst, the friend, the guru, someone will cry with you, hold your hand. That doesn't end sorrow. It is like having a deep wound: you may cover it up, you may escape from it, but it is always there, deep down in the dark recesses of one's own brain. And to end it, because where there is suffering there is no love. And without love and compassion there is no intelligence. And if we pursue our life, our daily life, as we are living now, year after year until we die, as vast millions and billions of people are doing, they are not contributing anything to the whole collective consciousness of man. But if you and a few of us basically, fundamentally bring about a mutation in the conditioning of the brain, which means in the very brain cells themselves and that is possible only when we are aware of our conditioning, meet it head on, fear, all the faiths and the dogmas, the stupid rituals, fears, pleasures, sorrow, of which we are. If there is no mutation we will be contributing to the ugliness of mankind.

So there is only one choice for us, only one direction for us: either we enter into the world of entertainment - you understand? - the football, the literature, the painting, the talk about pictures and the cinemas, you understand? - the whole world of entertainment, that vast industry which is gradually taking us over. And that industry includes all the rituals of the religious people, it is a form of entertainment. They don't change by going day after day, to mass, or to the Indian rituals. There is a temple in India near the school where we live, it is one of the most famous temples in India. They take vows to that image inside and they pour thousands of dollars a day. It has become a tremendous business affair, like all religions. You understand? The churches of the world. So when one actually sees all this spread out in front of you like a clear map: the computer, the robot, bio-chemistry, genetic engineering and the search into the activities of the brain to read other peoples' thoughts on one side. The other side, vast entertainment. Unless one is extraordinarily aware you are going to be caught in all this. Probably you are already caught. And when there is a change, a radical mutation in the conditioning, which means freedom from all conditioning, and that freedom is love, it is not self interest. That freedom is compassion, in which there is sympathy and all that, but compassion is not attached to any religion. It isn't because

I love Jesus or Krishna or somebody that I am compassionate. I go and help the poor country. Compassion is born only out of total freedom. I've finished. May I get up please?

SAANEN 6TH PUBLIC TALK 21ST JULY 1983

I think it is cooler this morning, isn't it? This is the last talk. There will be questions and answer meetings on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday.

I think one can ask what is religion only when we have established order in our lives. We live in disorder, confused, uncertain, driven by various desires. And we generally muddle along in our disorder. And that disorder has its own order - railways run more or less in the West on time, aeroplanes leave on time, telephones can get to the other side of the world directly, but not in the Asiatic countries - trains are about seven or eight hours late or a whole day late, nobody pays attention, it is part of the daily life. So there is order in disorder in this world, but unless there is total order, not out of disorder, and that can only come about when there is freedom from fear, from all the hurts that one receives from childhood, the wounds, psychological as well as physical wounds, and the understanding and the meaning and the pursuit of pleasure, the becoming and the ending of sorrow, then only where there is freedom and order then one can really ask: what is religion?

If one asks, what is religion when we live a disorderly, scatter-brain life, then we will invent, as we have done, various religions, various established religions of orthodoxy, religions based on books, like the Christian and the Islamic world, and whereas in India there are about three thousand or more... three hundred thousand, I beg your pardon, gods there. That's much more fun than having one god, then you can play with them all. One day you can choose one god that pleases you, next week another and so on, you can go the whole round for two or three years choosing your own gods. All that is called religion, established, orthodox, based on faith, and those religions, whether it is Christian, Hindu, Buddhist or the Islamic world have nothing to do with our daily life. They are a make-believe world, a romantic world, a sentimental, imaginative, superficially comforting world - which we all know. And out of that chaotic disorder we somehow create, or bring about, a religion that is very comforting which has no validity in daily life, which has no fundamental meaning but one goes to it like you go to some kind of entertainment and sensation, and the repetition of constant rituals, incense, you know all that.

So the speaker generally puts at the end of the talks religion and meditation because, after all these five talks that we have had here together, we have understood the whole structure and the business of life, and perhaps some of us are deeply free of fear and no longer carrying with us the various psychological wounds. And also have understood the futility of pursuing pleasure. And perhaps some have grasped the significance of suffering and the ending of suffering, and thereby have that extraordinary thing called love and compassion. Then when there is order in our life, not induced by thought - thought can never bring about order - but only perception of the fact and nothing else. And out of that order, which means having a clear, unprejudiced, unbiased mind - brain, then only, it seems, that we can ask: what is religion? You understand? I hope one has made this clear.

Because if one is afraid, and to escape from that fear, however deep, however superficial, if one is aware of it, if there is fear you can invent anything you like, most comforting, satisfying and so on, which most of us do. And that invention, that imaginative structure of something superior is born out of fear and therefore is nothing whatsoever to do with religion, a religious brain.

So we are together this morning going to investigate what is religion? And also in that investigation we are going to discover what is meditation, not meditation as something outside of our daily life. That again becomes extraordinarily superficial. Or you may think that by having the right kind of meditation, then that meditation will affect our daily life. You understand? But whereas meditation is something extraordinarily important if one understands the significance of meditation, not the practice and all the silly nonsense that goes on, but the deep significance of it, which we are going to talk over together this morning. All right? Is this clear so far? - so that we can go on together. Not that the speaker goes on talking, you just sleepily follow him, but together, take the responsibility together to find out what is religion, what place it has in daily life, and in the process of that, discovering for ourselves what is the depth and the beauty of meditation, for ourselves, not be told. Because you have now various gurus bringing their latest systems of meditation and for a certain coin you pay and then you learn. It seems so absurd, it becomes a business affair.

Before we go into this question of religion and meditation we ought to understand, if one may point out, what is listening. Do we each one of us listen, hear what we say to each other? Or you are talking, you want to tell me something and I want to tell you something. What you want to tell me becomes much more important than what I want to tell you, so there is this battle going on - you understand? You want to say - you are talking to yourself most of the time - and another comes along and wants to tell you something. You haven't the time or the inclination or the intention to listen and so you never listen to the other chap. And so there is this constant deafness, a sense of space in deafness, so that we never listen to each other. There is not only the hearing with the ear but also listening to the meaning of the word, the significance of the word, and also to the sound of the word - the sound, which is very important. When there is sound there is space. Otherwise there is no sound. Unless you have space then only in that space sound can take place. So the art of listening, if one may point out most respectfully, is not only hearing with the ear but also listening to the sound of the word. The word has a sound and to listen to that sound there must be space. But whereas if you listen all the time translating what is being said into your own prejudices and your own pleasurable or unpleasurable process, then you are not listening at all. Is this clear? Can we this morning attempt to listen not only to what the speaker is saying but also listen to your own reaction to what is being said, not correct your reaction to conform to what is being said? So there is this process going on: the speaker is saying something which you are listening to, and also you are listening to your reactions to what is being said, and give space to the sound that your own reactions are and also to what is being said. You understand? It means a tremendous attention, not just getting into a kind of trance and go off, and say, "That's a marvellous speech" and you know, "It was very nice that morning, it was a very good speech, and it is this, it is that, I was glad I was there, he told me a lot of things which I had not thought about", and all that nonsense. But whereas if you listen, and in that listening there is a miracle. The miracle is that you are so completely with the fact of what is being said and listening to that, and listening also to your own responses. It is a simultaneous process - you understand? You listen to what is being said and you react to what is being said, which is instantaneous and then listen to the whole sound of it, which means having space. You understand? So you are giving your whole attention to listening. Am I making this clear? This is an art, not to be learnt by going to a college, passing some degrees that you have learnt listening but to listen to everything - to that river going by, to the birds, to the aeroplane, to your wife or to your husband - which is much more difficult because you have got used to each other, you know almost what she is going say. And she knows very well what you are going to say, after ten days, after ten years. So you have shut your hearing altogether - you understand?

Here we are asking something entirely different, to learn not tomorrow, now as we are sitting there to learn the art of listening. That is, to listen, to be aware of your own responses and allowing space to the sound of your own beat, and to listen. It is a total process, not separate, but a unitary movement of listening. Have you got this? This is art. This is an art that demands your highest attention. Because when you so attend there is no listener, there is only this fact, or the reality of the fact, or the falseness of the fact, is seen - right? I hope we are doing this, this morning, because we are going to go into something very, very complex, And unless of course you want to go off into some romantic trance, it is all right, but if you really want to probe into the nature of a brain that is religious and a meditative brain, you have to listen very, very attentively to everything (Noise of aeroplane)... to that aeroplane so that there is no difference between that noise and the noise the speaker is making and the noise you are making. You understand? It is like a tremendous river moving. So please don't go to sleep this morning, or go off into a kind of imaginative, romantic trance.

We are investigating what is religion. Is it the structure of thought? Or is it beyond thought? You understand? As we have been saying throughout these talks, which both of us have understood, that thought which is always based on experience and knowledge and memory is very limited. That is clear. And anything that is projected, put together by thought, is always limited. The various religions of the world have been put together by thought. One can say it is a divine revelation straight from the horse's mouth - I hope you understand that phrase. An English phrase which means you have got it directly from the highest. And that to be conveyed is put into thought and you put it down on paper, whether that paper be two thousand years old or five thousand years old, it is still the activity of thought - right? And all the rigmarole, all the words, the rituals - you follow? - the whole structure of religious movement, is based on thought. You can sanctify what thought has created and then worship that, as most of us do, calling it religious, which only shows how the brain is caught in the process of illusions. If we are clear on that point and we are trying to find out what is religion which is not put together by the limited thought - right? When you accept your guru and do all the things he says, it is very, very limited - right? He may talk about illumination, and leading you to truth and all that, it is still the activity of thought. And we thinking about it, we say, "That is quite right, let's all follow that." You have seen all this. I wonder if you do?

So one cannot belong to any guru, to any system, to any method - right? Because they are all the product of thought. I wonder - right? You agree? No. You are too committed and therefore you will never understand that thing which is really a tremendous activity of the religious brain. Now to examine that which is beyond thought - you understand? - not thought examining, that is the difficulty. I see personally that the activity of thought is limited, entirely, in any direction, whether it is in the technological world, in the world of the computer and so on, or psychologically it is thought, with all its activity, is limited, and therefore there must be conflict. That is understood. And when that is understood what is the instrument that can probe into something that is not the activity of thought? Is that possible? You understand the question? Carefully please, we are working together, put all your brains into this. Thought can investigate its own activity, its own limitation, its own process of putting things together, destroying that and creating something else. Thought in its own confusion can bring about a certain order, but that order too is limited order - right? Therefore it is not supreme order. Order means the whole business of existence.

So the word perhaps 'to probe' is wrong, to investigate is wrong - right? Because you cannot investigate into something which is beyond thought. You understand? You can write books about it and get a lot of kicks out of it. But you can play that kind of game everlastingly. Theologians and the excited people do all this kind of stuff. But to understand whether it is possible to observe without any movement of thought, to observe. Observe that tree, to listen to that stream, which is part of observation naturally, without any interference of the word - the tree, the river - to observe without any movement of the past remembrance entering into your observation, which requires complete freedom from the past as the observer, and just to observe. You understand this? Are we understanding generally? Let's go into it a little more.

When we look - at your wife, or your husband, your friend or a train passing by - the train, the wife, the husband, the tree have all a particular name. The name is associated with memory, which is time - right? Memory can only take place during the interval of the incident and the remembrance, which is time. Right? So can you look, listen, observe, without the whole movement of thought, which is time? Right? Can you do it? Please listen to this. Don't say it is not possible. Or say, yes, let's get it. One has to observe. One has to see actually how you look at a tree, at that cloud in the morning lit by the morning sun, full of depth and beauty and light, and tremendous activity, to look at that without the word 'cloud'. That is fairly easy because it is nothing to do with us - right? You can look at the tree without the word - or the train, or the river. But the word 'river' is not that river, it is river. All the rivers in the world. Right? But if you associate river with one particular river you never then can understand the whole movement of rivers. Right? Oh, you are missing an awful lot.

So can you observe without the word? Which means to observe without all the remembrances and associations that word implies, contains? Can you look at your wife, or your girl-friend, or your husband without the word 'wife', without all the remembrances that word contains, see the - you understand? - the importance of this so that you look at her or him, or the river as though for the first time? You know when you wake up in the morning and you look out of your window and see these mountains and the valleys and the trees, and the green fields, and the chalets spotted all over the valley, it is an astonishing sight when you look at it as though you were just born. Which means to observe without any bias - right? To observe without any conclusion, prejudice. Will you do that as we are talking? And you cannot do this if you are half awake. This demands again not attention, see what is implied and therefore you do it easily. If I look at my wife from all the images, incidents, memories and hurts and all that, I never look at her. I am always looking at her from the images, past memories, through that I look. You are all... some of you are married, or have girlfriends, haven't you? Look at it. Look at your wife or your husband - careful, careful, not in front of me please! - can you look as though for the first time without all the images, memories and all that nonsense?

So we are going to observe the nature of a religious brain, which is not contaminated by thought. This demands your greatest attention - right? Which means you are totally free, completely free from any commitment - right? To your guru, to your church, to your ideas, to your past tradition. Completely free of that to observe. Right? When you so observe, what has taken place in the very nature of the brain? You understand my question? Please understand the question first before we go into it. I have always looked at the tree, at the river, at the sky, at the beauty of a cloud, my wife, my children, my husband, my daughter and so on and so on, always with a remembrance, with an image. That is my conditioning. And you come along and tell me: look without the word, without the image - right? - without all the past remembrances. And I say I can't do it. First immediate response is, I can't do it. Which means you are not actually listening to what the man is saying - right? Your response is so instantaneous and you say, "I can't do it". Now, to be aware, to be attentive to say, "I can't do it, is a form of resistance because you are committed to your particular rubbish of a guru, or to some form of religious doctrine so you are afraid to let go, therefore your immediate response is "I can't do it". So pay attention to that, right? "I can't do it" and also listen to what the other man is saying - right? That to observe there must be complete freedom of the word, the content of the word, and listen to both. So, this movement - you follow? - the resistance and the listening, wanting to listen, and you cannot listen if you are resisting, and be aware, don't move from that, don't say, "I must understand" - just watch it, so that you bring about total attention - right? Are you doing this, some of you? I hope you are sitting comfortably and paying attention to what is being said so that you can observe, there can be observation without the movement of thought - right? Are you doing it? Or is it just another theory, another wanting to do something like meditation and say "Tell me how to do it", "What is the method, what is the system?". That is all rather childish. Right? Can we go on from there.

That is, pure observation without the movement of the self - right? The word is the self - right? The word, the remembrances, the accumulated hurts, fears, anxieties, pain, sorrow, and all the travail of human existence is the self, which is my consciousness - right? And when you observe, all that is gone. All that doesn't enter in that observation. There is no me observing. Right? Then in that observation in daily life there is perfect order. There is no contradiction. Contradiction is disorder, and that very contradiction with its disorder has its own peculiar limited order. Clear? We are not going off into a trance, are we?

So let's proceed. Then we can ask: what is meditation? The word, the etymological meaning of religion, they have not made it very clear. Look up various dictionaries, they haven't been able to trace the beginning of that word. They have given various meanings at different times, but generally it means to gather. Gather all your energy. I am putting this, not the dictionary says that. So what is meditation? Not how to meditate. When you ask 'how' there is somebody to tell you what to do. Right? If you don't ask 'how' and say what is meditation, then you have to exert your own capacity, your own experience, however limited, you have to think - right? And you say, "Tell me what is meditation, I'll go off into some kind of silly dream." The word 'meditation' means to ponder over, to think over, to be concerned with. And also it means, the root meaning, to measure, both in Sanskrit, Latin, Greek and so on, and in English, to measure. Not only to ponder over, think over, to be concerned, to be dedicated - not to something, but the spirit of dedication - you understand? And to understand the meaning of that word 'measure'. We live by measure. Measure is time, isn't it? I measure myself, what I am now, and what I should be. That is a measurement. I hope you are listening. Not trying to go off into some kind of meditation. I hope you are listening to find out for yourself, for nobody, nobody can teach you what meditation is, however long bearded the gentleman is, or whatever strange garments he may wear. But to find out for yourself and stand by what you find out for yourself and not depend on anybody.

So for that one must understand very carefully the meaning of that word, which means to measure, basically. What does that imply? From the ancient Greeks to modern times, measurement in engineering is essential - right? The whole technological world of the West, Northern West rather, is based on measurement - right? You cannot possibly put together a bridge without measurement, or build a marvellous hundred story high building without measurement. And also inwardly we are always measuring: I have been, I will be - right? I am this, I have been this, I must be that - right? Which is not only measurement but comparison. Measurement is comparison. You are tall, I am short. Or, I am tall, you are short. I am light and you are brown - you follow? - measurement. So to understand the meaning of measurement and the two words 'better' and 'more' - to understand those two words and never use those two words, 'better' and 'more' inwardly - you understand all this? Are you doing it now as we are talking together? You have understood the meaning of that word meditation. To consider together - I won't go into more of it - to consider together, not I consider and I'm right, but together consider. That means you and I are willing to let go our own prejudices, and consider. And also it means to think over together. And to see the depth of the word measure - right? We have touched it briefly. We can go into it much more, I don't want to go into it in detail. But to see the meaning of that.

So when the mind is... when the brain is free of measurement - you understand? Becoming is a measurement. So for the brain to be free of measurement - you understand what has happened when you are free, when the brain is free of measurement, the very brain cells which have been used to measurement, conditioned by measurement, has suddenly awakened to the truth, to the fact that measurement is destructive psychologically, therefore the very brain cells have undergone a mutation. Get it? I wonder if you understand this?

May I repeat that if you are not clear? One's brain has been accustomed to go in a certain direction - right? Let us say our brains have been accustomed to going North, North East, and you think that is the only way to whatever there is at the end of it. What is at the end of it is what you invent naturally. But you come along and tell me that direction, North East, will lead you nowhere. I resist. I say, "No you are wrong. All the tradition, all the great writers, all the great saints, and bla, bla, bla, say you are wrong." Which means you really haven't investigated but you are quoting somebody else. Right? Which means you are resisting. So the man says to me, "Don't resist, listen to what I am saying, listen to what you are thinking, what your reaction is, and also to what I am saying." So listen to both. And to listen to both you must give attention, which means space. Right?

So to find out whether you can live, a daily life, not at moments of peculiar meditation, but to find out if you can live a daily life without measurement. You understand what the implication of that is? Never to use the word better, the more, I am the more, I am better than I was yesterday. Silly nonsense! I am less angry. I have disciplined myself a little more today. You understand? This is what we are all doing in various categories. So to live a life without any sense of measurement, that is meditation. To think together - right? To ponder together. To be concerned together. Together to have no measurement - you understand sir? - except of course when you buy a suit or when you buy a car you have the better, you have to look at various models and so on.

So meditation implies a sense of deep understanding of that very word, and the very understanding, the perception, the insight into that word is the action which is to end measurement, psychological measurement. You understand? Are we doing this? Or are you just playing with this? First of all, don't we measure? - if we are honest with ourselves aren't we measuring always? Obviously. I was poor, now I am rich. I have understood now, I have not understood before. Right? Which is such nonsense. Because you didn't pay attention at the beginning, now you are being forced to pay attention. Do you follow ? And so on. To live a daily life without comparison, psychologically without measurement. Right? Which means the brain cells, which have been accustomed to all their life to measure, have suddenly ended measurement, therefore there is a mutation in the brain cells - right? You may not do it but see the fact. The logical, intellectual fact. It is like your brain is mechanical, obviously, there is no question about it. Responding to various programmes, various propaganda and so on, one's brain has become mechanical, routine, go to the office from 9.30 until 5.0 or 9.0 to 5.0 and so on and so on. So your brain, its cells, have been conditioned. And to break that conditioning instantly, not through evolution, time, is to listen to something that is totally new. That is, no measurement, psychologically. Therefore when you see without any resistance to the fact then that very perception brings about a radical change in the very structure of the cells - you understand?

So, now let's move from there. What further is meditation? We have understood the meaning of that word together: concern, ponder, think over, look together - right? And to understand the meaning of that word measure, never to say "I am short", "I am tall", "I am dull", "You are more clever" and so on. And when you do that, you are what you are, from there you can move - right? If I am constantly imitating you because you are clever, I am imitating, that is not cleverness, because I am dull in comparison. If I don't compare at all with you, who are clever, I am what I am. I don't call myself then dull. I am what I am. From there I can begin. But if I am always pursuing you I have nowhere to begin. I am pursuing you. You understand?

So what is next in meditation? We have understood the nature of attention, complete listening - right? To listen there must be space and there must be sound in that space. And we are saying is there something sacred, something holy, something... is there, we are not saying there is, or there is not... is there something never touched by thought? Not that I have reached something beyond thought, that is silly nonsense. Is there something that is beyond thought? Which is not matter. You understand? Thought is a material process. I don't have to go into all that, we have gone into it. So anything that is put together by thought is limited and therefore it isn't complete, it isn't the whole. Right? So is there something that is so completely out of this world of thought? You understand the question? We are enquiring together. The speaker is not saying that there is, or that there is not. We are enquiring, giving your attention, listening, which means what? All the activity of thought has ended - right? Except in the world, physical world, I have to do certain things - right? I have to go from here to there, I have to write a letter, I have to drive a car, I have to eat, I have to cook, I have to wash dishes, all kinds of things. There I have to use thought, however limited thought, however thought be routine there. But inwardly, that is psychologically, there can be no further activity unless thought has completely come to an end. Right? Obviously. You understand the question? To observe anything beyond thought, thought must come to an end. Not how to end thought, what is the method to end thought, which is concentration, control, who is the controller - you follow? The conflict of control. All that childish, immature stuff.

So to enquire, to have further insight, to observe if there is something beyond, not put together by thought, thought must completely end; the very necessity to find out ends thought. You have understood? I want to climb a certain mountain, the Jungfrau - I can't, but suppose I can - I have to train, I have to work, day after day climbing more and more and more - right? I have to put all my energy into that - right? So the necessity to find out if there is something more than thought, that very necessity creates the energy which then ends thought. You have understood this?

The importance of ending thought to observe further, that very importance brings about the ending of thought. It is as simple as that. Don't complicate it. You understand? Are we clear on this matter? If I have to swim I have to learn. The intention to swim is stronger than the fear of swimming.

So this is important because thought, which is limited, the limitation there has its own space. Right? You understand? Its own order. When there is the cessation of the activity of the limited thought then there is space - right? Space not only in the brain, space. Not the space that the self creates round itself but the space that has no limit. You understand? When thought discovers for itself its limitation and sees that its limitation is creating havoc in the world then that very observation brings thought to an end because you want - you follow? - to discover something new. That is sir, a man who has been accustomed, trained to engineering and the understanding of internal combustion machine, which is the piston, he has worked at it for years. And he says, "I want to discover something more than that." So he has to put all that aside to see something new - right? If he carries all that with him all the time he can't see anything new. You understand? That is how the jet engine was discovered. The man who discovered understood completely the internal combustion machinery, that is the piston and all the rest of it, the propeller, and he said there must be something more. He was watching, waiting, listening. And he came upon something new. You understand? Similarly - it doesn't matter if we have five minutes longer, does it? Similarly I see - one sees thought is limited. And whatever it does will always be limited. Obviously. Because in its very nature it is conditioned, therefore limited. And it cannot go further through using that machinery. Therefore it says, "I have the urge to go further, the machinery must come to an end". Obviously. Then the ending of thought begins. You understand? Then there is space, and silence.

That is, meditation is the understanding of the word, the meaning of measurement, and the ending of measurement psychologically, which is to become. The ending of that. And the seeing the limited thought, thought is everlastingly limited. It may think of the limitless but it is still born of the limit. So it comes to an end. So the brain, which has been chattering along, muddled, limited, has suddenly become silent, without any compulsion, without any discipline, because it sees the fact, the truth of it. And the fact and the truth, as we pointed out the other day, is beyond time. And so thought comes to an end.

Then there is that sense of absolute silence in the brain. All the movement of thought has ended. It has ended but can be brought into activity when there is necessity in the physical world - you understand? It is quiet. It is silent. And where there is silence there must be space, immense space because there is no self from which - you understand? - the self has its own limited space, you when you are thinking about yourself, it is limited and it creates its own little space - right? But when the self is not, which is the activity of thought is not, then there is vast silence in the brain because it is now free from all its conditioning. And where there is space and silence it is only then something new, which is untouched by time, thought, can be. That may be the most holy, the most sacred - may be. You cannot give it a name. It is perhaps the unnameable. And when there is that then there is intelligence and compassion and love.

So life is not fragmented. It is a whole unitary process moving, living.

And we never talked about death. We haven't time. We are not going to begin with that now. We have talked about it sufficiently at other times. But death is as important as life, as living. They go together. Living means dying, which means living means all the trouble - right? Pain, anxiety, to end that is dying. So it is like two rivers moving together, tremendous volume behind it of water.

And all this from the very beginning of these talks until now is part of meditation because we have gone into the human nature, and to bring about a radical mutation in that. And nobody can do it except you yourself. Finished. May I get up.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 24TH JULY 1983

This is a question and answer meeting. There are several hundred questions been sent in and we cannot possibly answer all those. It would perhaps take a couple of months, so we won't be here for a couple of months!

When we ask questions do we expect a reply from somebody else? Here are seven questions this morning. We shall answer them, or rather we shall together investigate the question, not the answer but rather in finding out the meaning of that question we shall then come upon the answer. The question is much more important it seems to me rather than the answer. Why one puts the question, what is the motive behind that question and do we expect a reply categorically, yes or no, or do we try to find an answer from somebody else rather than dig into the question, go into the question much more deeply and in the unfolding of the question perhaps we shall find the answer. The answer is not outside the question, it is in the question itself. I hope we are listening to all this.

It is a nice fresh morning. There was thunder last night and the air is fresh and I hope you are not going off to sleep.

1st QUESTION: I understand that in order to have a deep insight thinking must stop; for thinking to stop there must already be a deep insight. Where does one start? In this isn't the brain working to achieve something and thus preventing insight?

I don't know what the question means but we are going to go into it. I don't know what it all means. Let's go into it.

Do we clearly see, each of us, that our brain has become mechanical? We repeat, we live in the past and the reactions we have are obvious. And the question really is: where does one start? Where does one start to understand the whole problem of existence? Not insight, or thinking, how to stop thinking, but rather what is the meaning of all this? If we could start from there and then investigate more and more, deeper and deeper, then we will come upon something which may be not mechanical. That is, if we can realize that our brains have become mechanical. That is, when you insult another, the other insults you. Action, reaction. Right? A reward and punishment. On this basis, action, reaction, from that reaction, action, and so on, like a tide going in and out. And that is a mechanical process - right? Our memories are mechanical. We live in the past. If I have an experience and it is an exciting experience, it has brought about several rewards and I cling to that, which then becomes mechanical. If I am attached to a person, or to an idea, or to some kind of experience then that being attached becomes mechanical, you repeat over and over again the same thing. Sexual and every other form of repetitive action is mechanical. I hope this is clear.

Then the question is: can this mechanical habit, mechanical brain, which has been programmed to be mechanical because it is seeking security in the mechanical, constant repetition, repeating your own prejudices, is a mechanical process. I think that is fairly clear. And so the question is whether this mechanical process can stop.

Suppose one has a habit, either smoking, drugs, alcohol, sexual and habit of belonging to something, belonging to a group, belonging to some kind of orthodox religion and so on, there you feel safe. There you feel you are among people who also think alike. And this mechanical process gives one a sense of security. This is again fairly clear. I hope you are listening. Are you listening, if I may ask? Because I don't see the point of coming here, going through all the heat, and the troubles one goes through, and sitting here and going off and dreaming something else, why you have come to listen to each other. So please let us listen to each other. Which doesn't mean you must accept what the speaker is saying or cling to your own prejudices, conclusions and so on but both of us are understanding a very, very complex problem. The problem is living, existence. And in that existence of our daily life and so on, one finds the brain keeps on repeating the same thing over and over again. You may put a different disc but it will be the same thing, repeated. And so on. So our brains have become mechanical through long evolution, through innumerable experiences, and the brain has accumulated a great many memories and keeps on repeating the memories. You know, we know all this. And therefore the brain has become mechanical. And in this mechanical process it seeks security. That is all we want. We all want security, both biological, physical, as well as psychological. And when a brain becomes mechanical one thinks there is security. As long as I repeat that I am British, that I am French, that I am - there is security. But that divisive process brings about insecurity. Right? That is clear. Are we?

Now the question is, before we go into the problem of insight, the question is: whether this mechanical process can come to an end? This mechanical process brings about a deterioration in the brain - right? Do we see this? The brain needs stimulation. The brain needs challenging, questioning, doubting, asking, demanding. But if it is routine it stops demanding. It stops being sharp, clear and so gradually it deteriorates. You can see it all round - perhaps not here! But you can see it almost from teenagers to old age. I wonder if one is aware of one's own brain deteriorating by constant repetition. You may revolt against the old and fall into another pattern and then repeat that. "I am no longer a Christian, but I am a Buddhist". "I am no longer a Buddhist but Tibetan" - you know the game one plays all over the world.

So the question is: whether the brain can stop deteriorating? That is really a very, very serious question. As long as we are living in the past, which we are, because we live in memory, we are memories, and that is the past. There is no future memory; future memory may be projected from the past, meeting the present and modifying itself and going on - right? This is the process we all do. The past meeting the present, modifying itself and then proceeding further. But it is still the past in movement, isn't it?

So is there a way of looking at life, living, which is not merely the continuation of the past? Have I put the question? I find my brain - suppose I find - my brain becoming repetitive. The language is repetitive, the symbols that thought has created become repetitive, language which is - language is not limited - but the limitation of the language creates the symbols and so on. I won't go into all that for the moment. So language, the past memories, being attached to, tied to an experience, to a series of memories, all those, because they are mechanical, bring about deterioration of the brain. Is this clear? Can we go on from there? Don't please nod your head and say yes, but watch your own brain, watch your own life, because your life is the activity of action, reaction, memories and all the turmoil, the depths, the pleasures, the anxieties, the loneliness and so on, that is our life. We have lived that way for a million years, or more or less, and that is repetitive. War after war - right? War after war in different parts of the world. There have been two terrific wars within the last few years. So that has been repeating, repeating, repeating. So we have come to that point. I hope you have listened to this.

When you have come to that point, one asks: why does the brain depend so much on the past, on being programmed? You understand? Is that clear? Why does the brain depend, or live with this repetitive action? We are saying this repetitive action gives great security. Freedom doesn't give security - right? We will come to that a little later. So security is the basis of holding on to the past. Tradition is the past. Those soldiers in London going every morning up and down - you have seen all this. Poor devils!

So now we are asking whether the brain can perceive its own mechanical process and that very perception brings about a challenge to move away from it. You have understood? I perceive that my brain is mechanical and I perceive it, not as an idea but actually - right? I perceive it. There is the perception that it is mechanical. That very perception is a challenge - right? Are we meeting this? I perceive a dangerous snake. That is a challenge - right? I have to do something about it otherwise that poisonous snake will kill me, so I have to act - right? There action takes place when there is perception - right? Are we meeting this?

Look, when I - when one is climbing a mountain and you see a precipice, the precipice is a challenge, isn't it? Either you are very capable and so go on, or you get dizzy and hold on to a rock and crawl back. So in the same way when you perceive, when there is perception that the brain is mechanical, being programmed, and in that programme there is no security, though one may want security there is no security because the brain is becoming dull, deteriorating, therefore in that there is no security - right? Right? Clear? So when there is perception of a danger there is action right? When there is perception that the brain is becoming, or has become mechanical, that very perception brings about the energy to end that repetitive action - right? I wonder if you get this? Are we at all together in this? No, no. What am I to talk about it? You tell me what to do.

First of all, let's begin. Does one, each one of us realize that our brains have become mechanical? Do you realize that? Then whether you are a philosopher, whether you are a scientist, whether you are a businessman, whether you are following some guru, whether you belong to some religion or not, the whole mechanical process is going on - right? As long as that mechanical process is going on the brain must deteriorate because the brain needs to be tremendously active. It is active in mechanical processes - right? But it is not active in freedom. Therefore only in freedom the brain doesn't deteriorate. Is this clear, at least somewhat? Can we move from there?

As long as the brain is being programmed, repetitive, there is no freedom, and therefore it must deteriorate. It is like a human being in a prison. And there is no freedom there, therefore, not only biologically, organically, and also mentally, the brain deteriorates gradually. Now let's move from there.

(Noise of heavy rain) It is nice after this fortnight of hot weather it is nice rain, cool.

It is not how to stop thinking, how to break the routine but if you see the fact that repetitive action, clinging to something of an experience which you have had and so on, are one of the major factors of deterioration. If you see that then you have brought altogether a different action - is this clear? Like when there is a perception of danger, physical danger, you act. But when we see that the brain is deteriorating because of various reasons which I have explained, you go on because you don't see the fact that routine is deteriorating the brain. If you saw it you would act. You saw fit to come here - right? You have taken the trouble to come here. You took steps, you saved money, or you had a lot of money and so on, but you decided to come here. Similarly when you see something clearly, the factors of deterioration, you go on. You don't say there must be action - right?

Now from that let's go into it further. What is the process of thinking? You understand? What is the cause, or causations of thinking? We all think, fortunately or unfortunately, some more, some less, some with an extraordinary clarity, logic, others live in a slip shod way. But we all think. And we have never asked: what is the cause, what is the root of thinking? You understand? Do please find out for yourselves what is thinking. When you are asked a familiar question your response is immediate. What is your name? Where do you live? And you immediately answer. Why? Because you are familiar with your name, you are familiar with the road and the house that you live in. And so familiarity and constant repetition, you reply instantly. Right? Suppose one asks a little more complex question, there is an interval between the question and the answer. In that interval you are searching your memory, you are looking. You are saying, "I wonder if this is right", "This is wrong" - you follow? The interval between the question and the answer is time interval. In that time interval you are searching for an answer, whether in the encyclopaedia or in your own memory, or asking somebody - right? So there is an interval between question and answer, which is the time interval. Suppose one asks some very complex question and you say, "I don't know" - right? What is the distance from here to Mars? You don't know. And you say, "I don't know" - right? So familiarity, an interval of time between question and answer and saying "I don't know". So this whole process is thinking - right? Right sirs? Are we together in this? This whole process of the question which you are familiar with, the question which demands time, and you say "I don't know", all that is a process of thinking. Thinking along a particular line, if you are attached to a particular experience and you hold on to that experience, thinking then is round that experience - right? (Noise of heavy rain) Shall we wait a minute? Or shall I go on? I will go on in spite of the rain.

And thinking is based on memory. If you have no memory you can't think. And memory is gathered in the brain as knowledge. Knowledge comes from experience - right? Experience, knowledge, memory, thought. One must be absolutely clear on this - right? Experience is always limited, whether you are experiencing pleasure, pain, sorrow, loneliness, depression, anxiety, all that is limited. Right? A man who says, "I am enlightened" - right? You understand? - when a person is asked, "Are you enlightened?", and the other person says, "I am", that very experience that he has illumined is limited. No sane, rational, really enlightened man says, "I am enlightened" - right?

So all experience is limited and therefore all knowledge in the future or in the past is limited. So thought, which is the child of memory, and memory is limited. So the whole thinking process is limited. Is this clear? Can we go on from that?

Now what happens when thought, which is limited, when there is limitation what takes place? You understand my question? Are you listening to this or the rain? (Pause for heavy rain) Shall we go on? Can you all hear?

When one is thinking about oneself, which most of us do, the thinking about oneself is very limited. You may expand that thinking about oneself as illumined, as a great writer, or... (Rain stops, laughter)... May we go on now? As we were saying that if we are concerned with ourselves, as most of us are, even those people who say, "I have reached the heights", they are thinking about themselves. And consequences of that thinking about oneself is very divisive. Right? If you are thinking about yourself and I am thinking about myself in various ways, it brings about a division, therefore in that division there is conflict - right? So whatever is limited must bring about conflict. I am an Arab and you are a Jew - or if you don't like that - I am a Jew, you are an Arab and so on. So wherever there is limitation there must be conflict. This is very important to understand because all our lives are based on limitation - right? And therefore we are in perpetual conflict. I wonder if we realize this, not verbally as a mere statement, that wherever there is division in our relationship, however intimate, national division, economic division, social division, religious divisions, there must be conflict, struggle, war. This is a law. The law of Moses.

So when one realizes that and that self concern nationally and so on, is brought about by thought, and therefore thought being limited must inevitably create conflict - right? Is this clear? This is logical - right? - rational, sane. That wherever there is division, thinking about myself, my ambition and the other person thinking about his ambition, his fulfilment, this division must breed conflict.

So the question then is: is it possible, seeing the truth of this, that as long as I am an Indian, as long as I am concerned with my piano, with my enlightenment, or with my writing a book, and so on, it must invariably create disturbance, turmoil, conflict. If one sees, if there is perception of that, what is the action? Not how to stop thinking. I wonder if you see that. There is the perception that thought has created this division. Religiously you can see it very well: as long as I am a Catholic, as long as you are something else, we are going to be in turmoil with each other. And that is the product of thought. So what is one to do? You perceive the fact. Does the very fact free you? You understand? Or does the fact merely remain as an idea? You understand? You are not going to sleep? Are we still? The rain has gone, so we can begin again.

When one makes a statement like this: that wherever there is division there must be conflict, in relationship and so on. Is that a fact to you? That is, you see the reality of it? Or you merely see the idea of it? Is this clear? A fact, like a serpent is a fact. But you can draw an idea about a serpent and live in that idea. Therefore you are living with a non-reality away from fact. Is this clear? Can we go on from there? Which is it we are doing now? Not tomorrow, now, as you are sitting there and we are discussing and we discover that where there is division there must be conflict. Is that a fact to you? Truth to you? Or is it just an idea? You understand? Which is it? Is it a fact, like you are hungry? Or is it an idea that you are hungry? You understand? Which is it? If it is a fact, it is so, that where there is division there must be conflict. Or you hear only a statement of it, therefore that is nothing to do with the fact? So which is it for you? If it is a fact it is so, that you will fall down a precipice, that is a fact. So you move away from it. So the fact is the challenge which you must answer - right? Are you answering? Or, you say, "That is too much, I don't know what the danger will be" and so on and so on? So it is up to you.

So it is not a question of thought stopping, but seeing the fact and the perception of the fact in itself brings about a movement which is not thought. I can't go on repeating this umpteen times.

And the questioner asks: what is insight? What is it, how does this perception and action instantaneously take place? That is what he means. You understand? Is the question clear? The question, that is, is there an action which is not based on memory - of course - if it is based on memory it is repetitive - is there an action, please ask this question of yourself, is there an action which is not based on past memories, past experiences and therefore on thought, and if there is action of such kind, that action is limited and therefore must breed conflict. So is there an action which is not based on past memories, experience and so on? Right? That is the question. And he asks, he says, that is insight. You understand? Seeing something clearly, acting - right? For us we don't see something clearly, we take time, during that interval other changes take place, so our actions are always confused. Whereas is there an action - please ask this question of yourself, I am putting forward to you this question, please listen to the question and find out if the question is logical, rational. It is rational, logical because our actions are based on memories, on the past experiences, therefore our actions are mechanical. And the questioner says: is there a movement, an action in which the past, thought, doesn't enter at all. Is the question clear?

Now we are going to find out. Right? Thought as an instrument of action apart from the technological field, has created havoc in the world. Right? Are you clear on this? Oh my god, must I repeat all that over again? Thought has built marvellous cathedrals and thought has put all the things in the cathedral, the ceremonies, the rituals, the mass, all the dresses they wear, all that is the product of thought, and not divine revelation. One might like to think that but it is the movement of thought - right? And that movement is limited, therefore must create conflict. So do we see that the activity of thought, necessary in certain area - right? - but may not be necessary in other areas. Like in one's relationship to one's wife, husband, girl friend and so on, in that relationship, if that relationship is based on thought, therefore divisive, therefore conflict. That is clear, you all see that. Therefore where there is conflict there is no love. Jealousy is not love. Ambition is not love. But when the wife and the husband are both ambitious - right? - therefore there is perpetual conflict. So thought has its place, technologically, from here to there, and thought may not have a place at all psychologically. Do you understand? So find out for yourself whether there is an action which is not based on thought. And the speaker says there is. Don't accept his word, doubt what he is saying, question what he is saying, he is no authority. He says, and he will give you a reason for it presently, that there is an action, that there is an action which is not based on thought. Right?

We are going to find out. Be sceptical please, doubt, question, what he is talking about. Hasn't it ever happened to you in your life, seeing something true and acting? Right? Without the process of thought, without the process of rationalization, without remembering, it must have happened - right? Every person has moments of this. Clear perception without any movement of thought, action taking place at the same time - no? Aren't you all human? Is this very strange? Some call it intuition, but the word intuition is rather a dangerous word. you can intuit your own desires, say "I want that" - you follow? So there is a movement, movement is action, there is a movement in which thought doesn't interfere at all. I will show it to you. Love is not thought - right? Agree to that? Love is not desire - right? Do you see that? Love is not pleasure. Love is not ambition, jealousy and so on, hate. So through negation of what love is not, the positive is. Are we doing this? Can you put aside jealousy, hate, ambition, aggression, violence, all that is not love. So love is an action in which desire is not, pleasure is not, therefore love, if there is such a thing as that, from that any action taking place is not the movement of thought. Are we together in this? Or is it all just a lot of verbiage?

Now put it round the other way. We operate from the background of memory. All our actions are based upon the past, knowledge and so on. Now can you, can the brain see the fact that it is operating from the past, perceive that, and see the consequences of that, and seeing the consequences of it doesn't depend on the past - right? And therefore there is an action which is not of memory. I can't keep on repeating this. Are we getting anywhere near? There is an insight which is not born of remembrance. Insight is not of time - right? Time is thought, time is memory, time is experience, knowledge, and as long as we depend on time, which is divisive, therefore conflict, and to see this, to perceive the actuality of this, then only is there an insight into it.

I am allowed another quarter of an hour. We have talked an hour over one question.

2nd QUESTION: I long to be loved. And it is a constant anguish. What am I to do?

Is the question all right?

Aren't most of us in this position? We all want to be loved, specially by one. Now let's go into this. I have got quarter of an hour. It is a very complex question.

Why do we want to be loved? And why has it become anguish, an anguish? What is the cause, the root, or the motive, wanting to be loved? Do you understand my question? I want to be loved by you - god forbid - but I want to be loved by you. Why? Is it I am lonely? Is it that I feel if I am not loved I have no raison d'etre to live? Is it that if I am loved I feel I can flower, grow, be happy and all that? Right? Is it that in myself I am nothing but when you love me I become something? You are following all this? Please this is your life, not my life. So please listen to this. So there is a cause which makes me say, "I want your love" - right? There is a cause, there is a motive, there is a background which says, "I must have that" - right? So we have seen some of the causes. I am desperately lonely. You all know that, don't you? Married, unmarried, whether you are amongst a group and so on, human beings through their self-centred activity bring about loneliness. Right? Is that one of the causes of the desire to be loved? As long as there is a cause the effect is to demand that you should love me - right? So can I understand the cause and be free of the cause? You have understood what I have been saying? Please sir, this is your life.

I am lonely, depressed, isolated and feel desperately unhappy, and if you love me I will say, "By Jove, everything is so beautiful". So my demand, my desire, my longing, is based on loneliness, demand for companionship, with whom I can talk, unfold and all the rest of it. So there is a cause - right? Now do I see the cause, actually? The cause is I am lonely. I am taking that one instance. I am lonely. And I want you to love me for god's sake. And you don't. You turn away from me. Either I commit suicide - right? Or I become full of anxiety - right? Depressed, more depressed than ever. I then escape from myself - football, church, new guru, or the latest literature, or the latest picture, talk about it - right? So is the cause of loneliness seen? Loneliness is a sense of isolation - right? The isolation comes into being as long as I am self-centred, thinking about myself, I am unhappy, I want you to love me - you follow? I have reduced all my life, which is such an extraordinary thing, to a small affair, that you love me. You understand? Such a petty little affair I have reduced it to. And being isolated I am unhappy and I wish you, I crave for you to love me. (Fly settles on K's face) This particular fly is fond of me! (Laughter)

You understand? See the tremendous complexity of a very simple question. I want to be loved and I am not loved therefore I am full of anxiety. And the questioner says, "What am I to do?". When the brain is caught in such anxiety, such anguish, it can't think clearly, can it? Right? It can't even listen it is so full of its own anxiety, its own sense of desperation. Now can there be an interval in which you listen? You understand? A short period in which you say, "Tell me about it" and then will you listen? Or will you say, "No, I don't want to listen because I still love being in a tremendous state of anxiety" - you understand what I am saying? Most people do. Without that sense of anguish you are nothing. That sense of anguish keeps you alive - no? Oh come on sirs, this is all ordinary psychology, childish psychology. So will you, if you are in such anguish, for a few minutes, listen to what is being said? Or you love your anguish so much you don't want to listen?

So as we were saying the other day, if you really listen, with your heart, with your mind, with all your being, then you have a space, your brain becomes quiet, then you listen. Then that very listening is like a seed that is being sown, then you don't have to do a thing, it then grows, multiplies. And when you understand love is not something to be asked for you don't stretch out your hand to be loved. That means that you are dependent on somebody. That means you really don't love at all. If you are asking another to be loved, if you are asking to be loved by another, it means you have no love in yourself. It is so obvious. If you have love, you don't ask anybody that you be loved. You see we are making ourselves into beggars. That is what is happening. When you go to church, pray, we are beggars. When we want somebody to help us, we are beggars. Or when we depend on books we are beggars. It may be all right to be a beggar but see the consequences of it: you are always depending on somebody else. And there are all those people who will help you fill your bowl full of their rubbish.

So see what has taken place when we hear this question: I want to be loved, and I am not, I live in great anguish, what am I to do? That means one has no love in oneself. Then how can another love you - you understand? If you have no love and you are incapable then of receiving love - you understand? Love is not a vacuum, like a sense of emptiness. On the contrary. If you have that tremendous feeling - not feeling - a quality, a depth, a beauty, then you don't ask anybody for love. It is like a cup being full. Right? If you have listened to this very carefully, then the problem is gone.

Finished for this morning. We will meet again tomorrow morning, if you want to. May I get up please?

There have been a lot of questions. "You say this and you say that." "I read your biography, and why do you say that?" "What is this?" And so on. Innumerable questions about all that kind of stuff. But we never apparently ask a direct question about ourselves. You are always quoting somebody or other. Or who is the greatest mahatma, avatar and all that kind of, you know, immature, thoughtless stuff. And also apparently we don't seem to be concerned really with ourselves, with our problems, with our jealousies, with our hatreds and calumny, and all the travail that goes on in our daily life. I wonder why? Personally I am not interested in what the Buddha or anybody said but I want to know the way I am living, why I am living this way, what are my peculiarities, prejudices, opinions and so on. We never seem to ask such questions. Why we cling to our prejudices, our conclusions and why we follow somebody or other. We never seem to, if we can most respectfully point out, we never seem to be aware of our own deeper anxieties, why our brains have become so shoddy, not clear, bright, alive, active, but always "Why do you say that" and "Why do you say the other thing". That is how we live.

So I would like, if one may, to ask you a question. Not you ask the speaker a question. I would like to ask you a question: What will make you change? What will make your mind, brain rather, extraordinarily active, alive, free so that you have an extraordinary view of life, the great complexity of life, not one's own life, the life of nature, the life of the earth, the trees, the ocean, the immense skies, the beauty of the world. And if one were to ask you that question, what would you say? Why are we all so - forgive me if I use that word - dull? Going along a particular line and never varying, moving away, never seeking real freedom - why? Is it fear? If it is fear then let us deal with it and be out, finished. But if you keep on asking, if one may point out, "Why do you say this?" "What do you mean by that?" - you know, then you are depending on somebody. So please, today and tomorrow, we have only two question meetings left, and could we ask ourselves, if you are listening, ask ourselves: Why we are what we are, after this millenia upon millenia of evolution, why are we violent, so disorderly in our life, why do we have this antagonism for another, why do we get hurt? You understand? The deeper issues of life. But apparently one is not interested in those things. So I will go on with the usual questions if I may.

If you have children, this is the question, is there such a thing as right education? Either a parent has put this question because he has many children and knowing what the world is, the extraordinary brutality and vulgarity and all the terrible things that are happening, what is their future? A parent would be tremendously concerned if he loved his children, which I doubt very much, if he really loved their children, if he asked such a question: what is right education? - and what is one to do with children who are already contaminated, if I can use that word, by other children, by society, by the friends they have, the terrible language children use already? You follow? All this and naturally a parent concerned not only with his own children, but with the children of the world, because those children are going to contaminate my son, my daughter. So this a question which we must very carefully enquire into. Why are we being educated? What does education mean? The ordinary meaning is to draw out - educate. To draw out. But that is just the dictionary meaning. Linguistically it means to help the child to grow, to understand, to comprehend the whole process of living. And he goes to school, there he is taught, he learns to memorize really. So he gradually builds up a whole structure of memories along a particular line, doctor, engineering, philosophy, psychology, physicist and so on. And the computers are taking the place of teachers. A computer can teach far better than an ordinary local teacher. On the computer you can have the top teachers in their special subject. So they can learn from the computers. And the computer is becoming more and more superior to the human brain. Perhaps you know something of it. I have already talked about it so we won't go into that.

And why should he, please just listen first, why should he carry all the encyclopaedic knowledge about one subject or the other and retain all that in his brain? Is that education? You understand, I am questioning. We can look up a book, an encyclopaedia and work from that. You follow? If one is a surgeon you have to naturally know a great deal of the human anatomy, you have to study and go into all that, it may take ten to fifteen years. And technologically to have extraordinary understanding of the whole world of the technique. And that is what we are cultivating more and more and more.

And also we are neglecting totally the whole psychological world, the whole world of the psyche - right? This is what is happening. One side you have an extraordinary development in technology - whether it is science, biochemistry or genetic engineering, or a top surgeon - right? You have that extraordinary field, highly cultivated more and more. And the other side of the human being, which is far more important - you understand? - this is far more important, that is neglected, denied, you say it is not important. You understand? The Communist world, the ideological Communist, not that I have read Lenin, Marx or any of that, but we have talked to a great many Communists - are you frightened of that? There are some friends of mine - you don't mind? They say what matters is not the psyche but the environment. Change the environment fundamentally and then you will change man, which can never take place. But they stick to that theory because Lenin had talked about it, Marx, you follow? So they hold to that.

So both in the Democratic world and the so-called Totalitarian world, and the religious world obviously, education means academic training, academic excellence. To be able to argue, to learn a job, to become a professor, and live in a world of your own in that particular discipline and so on. And the psyche, which always overcomes the outer, you understand? - you may have a marvellous government, rules, laws and so on, but ambition, the drive for power, position, all that overcomes the other - right? You have seen this happening right in front of our eyes in the Communist world. So what is it to be educated? You understand? As a parent - I am not a parent - but if I was a parent that would be my tremendous concern; conscription on the one side, two years or four years in the army - in America there is no conscription, or in England, nor in India because there are so many poor people who can join the army and go on with it. But what is one to do in a world like this? You understand my question?

So what is right education? Is it not both the cultivation of a brain that can function excellently in the world and also psychologically understand the whole meaning of existence, the self, the I, the psyche? You understand? Couldn't these two go together - like two well trained horses trotting along harmoniously together - you understand my question? And apparently one horse is highly developed, the other is still a baby, a foal. And right education seems to be not only academic training, because we have to have a job - you may have a job and work only for two hours if the computers become more and more important you will have more and more leisure. That is taking place already. And that leisure is going to be used, exploited by the entertaining structure, industry. More and more that is going to happen. Obviously you can see it is happening now. So how does one, apart from the academic affairs, how does one become a good human being - right? You are asking this question, I am not asking this question. I have no children but I meet hundreds of children all over the world. I go to various schools and so on. It is your children, not mine. You have to listen to this, find out, not just say some doctor tells me what to do, some psychologist says that I must treat my children this way and that way and so on - you know.

So how am I, having a few children, knowing they are going to be conditioned by other children, knowing that in a school they are going to be conditioned, the newspapers, the magazines, the books, the history books, my country opposed to your country, my kings are better than your kings - you know all that nonsense that goes on. And how am I, as a parent, to bring about a good mind, a good brain, a good human being? The word good has several meanings. It is an old fashioned word, even though it is old fashioned I think it is a good word. How is one to bring about a good human being? My children, I would like them to be good, not sentimental, not romantic, not just having a sloppy brain, what am I to do? You understand my question? You have children, haven't you? No? You mean to say you have no children? (Laughter) And isn't this your problem? First of all good means not only in action, correct action, not righteous action, correct action. See the difference between righteous action and correct? Precise action, talking precisely, clearly, communicating to another what he wants to say, not mumble, you follow, all the rest of it. And also good means whole. If I may use that well worn out word, holistic. I would like my children, daughter and son to have a view of the world as a whole. The view of humanity not from his narrow point of view but humanity. You understand? The whole of the human world. And also to have a good relationship with nature, not to destroy things, the birds, the animals, the whales - you understand? Not to destroy. And to have a great sense of beauty, not the appreciation of art but to have the feeling of beauty. And to have that great sense of affection, love, compassion. These are all just words. Now how am I as a parent and therefore a teacher - teacher is not merely in the school but also being a parent I am a teacher also - so how am I to help him to have this? You understand my question? Please answer this question: how are you, if you see this is the way to live, this is the way to act in relationship and so on, how are you going to bring this about in a student, in your child? If you are an example as a parent, an example, he will turn his back onto you - right? You understand? He won't listen to you. So not to be an example, that is if you smoke don't tell the child not to smoke because he will say, "Well you smoke, why shouldn't I?" And then the whole argument goes on. If you are an example at all - see the implications of being an example. You want him to conform, you want him to copy what you are and so you deny him freedom to work, think, act. Right? You understand all this? Is this getting too complicated?

And he is conditioned, not only by you, by the language you have used, the climate, the food, the social environment, the other boys, his grandmother says, "Look, believe in god", or "Don't believe in this new guru" - or whatever the nonsense the parents tell the child. So the child is being gradually conditioned, narrowed down. How am I as a parent to prevent that? You understand? Is it possible? Is it possible for me in talking with my son to realize I am conditioned, I realize also that he has been conditioned. So I tell him "Look, I am conditioned and you are being conditioned. Let us talk about it. Let us see if we can be free of it." - you understand? It is not "I am the parent, I know far more than you do", but rather in this relationship there is no superior and inferior - right? In this relationship I talk to him. I say, "I also am conditioned. I have been brought up by the Catholic, Protestant, Buddhist, whatever the nonsense is, and you are being conditioned. Let's see what it does in the world." I will go into it with him. I keep on at it, day after day, in different ways, not to bore him. But the pressure from the outside is much stronger - you understand all this? Tremendously strong and probably he will succumb to it, as most children do. There are very, very few exceptions. And I hope my son will be an exception, but I jolly well also know that he is not going to be.

So it is a constant observation, constant helping, guiding, not guiding - you follow? That can only happen if there is love between us. If he respects me and I respect him. Respect. So I am asking you: do you respect anybody? And if you don't what is the good of talking to a child, your son, to have respect? What does that word mean? The meaning is to look back. I won't go into the meaning of that word for the moment. Is respect part of love? Or if there is love nothing else matters? You understand? In love there is generosity, there is sympathy, pity, but pity is not love, sympathy is not love - right? So have I love in my being when I talk of love to him? Or is it just a word? You understand what I am saying? Are you interested in this? Or you want to reach Nirvana? (Laughter) Don't you see, please, unless we lay the foundation in our life you can't go very far. You may sit endlessly in a certain posture, meditate. There used to be a man in India who meditated for twenty five years, day after day, day after day. He came to see us one day and you couldn't talk to him sanely about anything because he was still meditating. So do we love anything at all? Do you love your wife, and husband, or your girl-friend, or whatever it is? Please, do we? If you loved your children you would stop all wars - right? If every parent in the world loved their children, do you know what would happen naturally? You wouldn't allow anybody to kill him or him to kill others. You understand? But our governments all over the world are based on power, position, status, and therefore to protect all that, guns. You know all the rest, I don't have to go into that.

So right education seems to be - I am not saying this, it is for you to find out - right education seems to be not only to have an academic training so it will be excellent in that direction, but also to be a good whole human being, unfragmented, not broken up and contradictory, living in a battle with himself and with others. That requires a great deal of enquiry into the psyche, not according to Jung or Freud, or somebody including that of the speaker, but to watch one's own responses, one's own actions, one's own behaviour. And out of that comes an extraordinary sense of freedom. And freedom, that word has the root meaning in love. That is enough for that. Gosh one question takes a longtime doesn't it?

2nd QUESTION: Could we speak about the brain and the mind?

There is a lot of it. I will read it briefly twice and I hope you will understand a rather long question. I haven't read it before.

Could we speak about the brain and the mind? Thinking takes place materially in the brain cells. If thinking stops and there is perception without thought what happens in the material brain? You seem to say - (again, you seem to say) - that mind has its place outside the brain but where does the movement of pure perception take place if not somewhere in the brain? And how is it possible for mutation to take place in the brain cells if pure perception has no connection in the brain?

Have you understood the question? May I read it once more? It is a good question, so please listen to it. I am listening to it too.

Could we speak about the brain and the mind? Thinking takes place materially in the brain cells. That is, thinking is a material process. If thinking stops and there is perception without thought, what happens to the material brain? You seem to say that mind has its place outside the brain but where does the movement of pure perception take place if not somewhere in the brain? And how is it possible for mutation to take place in the brain cells if pure perception has no connection in the brain?

Right. Have you got the question? So first he wants, the questioner says, to differentiate, separate, distinguish and so on, between the mind and the brain. And then he asks if perception is purely outside the brain, which means thought is not the movement of perception. And he asks, if the perception takes place outside the brain, which is the thinking process, remembering process, then what happens to the brain cells themselves which are conditioned by the past? You follow? And will there be a mutation in the brain cells if perception is outside? Is this clear? Are you sure it is clear?

So let's begin with the brain and the mind. The brain is a material function. It is a muscle - right? Like the heart. And the brain cells contain all the memories. Please I am not a brain specialist. Nor have I studied the experts. But I have lived a long time now and I have watched a great deal, not only the reaction of others - what they say, what they think, what they want to tell me, but also I have watched how the brain reacts - you follow? And so on. I won't go into what my brain is, that is unimportant. I know you would like that (Laughter). So the brain has evolved through time - right? From the most single cell, taking years, millions and millions of years, until it reached the ape and go on another million years until it could stand and so ultimately the human brain. The human brain is contained within the shell, within the skull - right?

It is there. But it can go beyond itself - right? You can sit here and think of your country, or your home, you are instantly there - right? In thought, not physically, you are here, but instantly you are in your home, or in a far away country. The brain has extraordinary capacity - right? Technologically, see what it has done, the most extraordinary things they are doing. If you have asked some of them, and fortunately or unfortunately I meet them very often, they tell me all about it.

So the brain has extraordinary capacity. That brain has been conditioned - right? - that is so - by the limitation of language, not the language itself but the limitation of language, you understand the difference? I won't go into that. It has been conditioned by the climate it lives in, by the food it eats, by the food, by the social environment, the society in which it lives, and that society has been created by the brain - you understand? So that society is not different from the activities of the brain. I hope you are following all this. And a thousand million years of experience - right? Millions of years of accumulated knowledge based on that experience, which is tradition. I am British, you are German. He is a Hindu, he is a black man, he is this, he is that - all the nationalistic division, which is tribal division - right? - and the religious conditioning - so the brain is conditioned. Right? And being conditioned it is limited. The brain has extraordinary capacity but it has been conditioned and therefore limited - right? It is not limited in the technological world, like computers and so on, but it is very, very limited with regard to the psyche. People have said, "Know yourself" - from the Greeks, from the ancient Hindus and so on. They study the psyche in another - you understand? But they never study the psyche of themselves. The psychologists, the philosophers, the experts, they never study themselves. They study the rats, the rabbits, the pigeons, the monkeys and so on and so on and so on, but they never say, "I am going to look at myself. I am ambitious, I am greedy, I am envious, I compete with my neighbour, with my other scientists, I want better... " - you follow? It is the same psyche that has existed for thousands of years, though technologically you are marvellous outside person. You understand? So inwardly we are very primitive - right?

So the brain is limited, primitive, in the world of the psyche. Now can that limitation be broken down? You understand my question? Can that limitation, which is the self, the ego, the me, the self-centred concern, can all that be wiped away? Which means the brain then is unconditioned - you understand what I am saying? Then it has no fear. Now most of us live in fear. Most of us are anxious, frightened of what is going to happen, frightened of death, you know, all the rest of it, a dozen things, anxious. Can all that be completely be wiped away and be fresh? You understand? So that the brain is free. Then its relationship to the mind is entirely different. The mind - I must here say that we have discussed this matter, not that you must accept it, the speaker has discussed this matter with several scientists, the top ones, not the local chaps who are government servants, and they won't go as far as the speaker has gone, they go theoretically - you understand? But actually. See the difference. That is, to see that one has no shadow of the self. And that is extraordinarily arduous, to see the me doesn't enter into any field. You understand what I am saying? No? No, sir, not you. The self hides in many ways, under every stone. The self can hide in compassion, going to India and looking after the poor people, because the self then is attached to some idea, some faith, to some conclusion, some belief, you understand? - which makes me compassionate because I love Jesus or Krishna, and I go up to heaven. The self has many, many masks - you understand? The mask of meditation, the mask of achieving the highest, the mask that I am enlightened. I know of which I speak of - you know. All this concern about humanity. that is another mask. So one has to be extraordinary, have a subtle mind - quick brain rather, not mind, to see where it is hiding. You understand this? It requires great attention, watching, watching, watching. You won't do all this. Probably you are all too lazy, or too old and say, "For god's sake, all this isn't worth it. Let me alone." But if one really wants to go into this very deeply one has to watch like a hawk every movement of thought, every movement of reaction, so the brain can be free from its conditioning. I am speaking, the speaker is speaking for himself, not for anybody else. He may be deceiving himself - right? He may be trying to pretend to be something or other - you understand? He may be, you don't know. So have a great deal of scepticism, doubt, question, not what others say, yourself.

So when there is no conditioning of the brain it no longer degenerates - right? As you get older and older - perhaps not you - but people generally they get older and older, their brain begins to wear out, they lose their memories, they behave in a most peculiar way, you know all that. Degeneration is not merely in America, jazz and vulgarity, degeneration takes place in the brain first. And when the brain is completely free of the self and therefore no longer conditioned, then we can ask - we are now going to ask, not the brain, then what is the mind?

The ancient Hindus, we have talked to some of the so-called learned people in India, they are learned but not the actual reality. They are learned about what other people have said. They have enquired into the mind - right? And they have posited various statements. But wiping all that out, not depending on somebody however ancient, however traditional, what is the mind? There is according to the Christian theory, Genesis, that man suddenly came into being at 4,500 BC - you know - which seems rather absurd because at 4,500 BC the ancient Egyptians invented the calendar. You can look it up if you want to and see what I am saying is correct. But that invention must have come after tremendous search, enquiry of generation after generation, so there was a connection between India, Jerusalem, Israel and Egypt at that time. I won't go into all that, I am not a historian.

So what is the mind? I say Genesis is disorder out of chaos, out of that came order - right? You know. You understand there are two things involved in it: disorder has its own order - right? Are we clear on this? Trains don't run punctually, - right? A day late, two hours late, if you are in the East perhaps the next day it will come, the engineer has gone to see his wife on the way, and talk to some friends - you know. Take it leisurely. But that very leisurely, slack way, has its order, it arrives tomorrow instead of today. But at least it arrives, that is an order - right? I don't know if you have ever watched, a cigarette smoke goes straight up - right? In a room where there is no draught, it goes straight up and after reaching a certain point it goes off. In that going off there is order. They are enquiring into this. It is not my business now. So we live in disorder - right? Our brain functions in disorder. Our brain is constantly in conflict therefore it is disorder. Such a brain cannot understand what the mind is? The mind can only be seen, not my mind, or your brain, or my brain, the mind, the mind that has created the universe, the mind that has created the cell, so that mind is pure energy and intelligence. You don't have to believe all this. So that mind, when the brain is free, that mind can have a relationship to the brain, but if the brain is conditioned it has no relationship. So intelligence is the essence of that mind, not the intelligence of thought, not the intelligence of disorder. But it is pure order, pure intelligence and therefore it is pure compassion. And that mind has a relationship with the brain when it is free. Right?

Now I must go on. I could go lots more into this but I won't. Are you getting tired or are you listening? Are you listening to yourself, or are you just listening to me? Are you doing both? Then are you watching your own reactions, how your brain works? That is, action, reaction, back and forth, back and forth, which means you are not listening. You are only listening when this action, reaction stops, just pure listening. You understand? Are you following this? Oh come on sirs, don't... Look sir, the sea is in constant movement - right? The tide is coming in, the tide going out. This is its action. And the human beings are also in this action - action, reaction, that reaction produces another reaction, that reaction in me produces another reaction and so back and forth. Therefore when there is that movement back and forth there is no quietness naturally. In that quietness you can hear - right? The truth or the falseness - not when you are back and forth, back and forth - right? At least see it intellectually, logically if there is constant movement you are not listening, how can you listen? But only when there is absolute silence you can listen - right? See the logic of it. And is it possible to stop this movement back and forth? I say it is possible, the speaker says it is possible when you have studied yourself, when you have gone into yourself very, very deeply. Understand yourself then you can say the movement has really stopped.

And the questioner asks: as the mind is outside the brain, the mind is not contained in the brain, but outside - we have discussed this with some scientists and they say yes, perhaps casually to please me, or theoretically they see but we are talking - the speaker is talking factually for himself. Right? He may have a hole in his head but... So, he says how can this perception, which takes place only when there is no activity of thought, then how does the brain cells, which are a material process, bring about a mutation? That is the question - right? You have heard the question? May I repeat it? No, I don't have to repeat the whole question.

Sir, look: keep it very simple. That is one of our difficulties: we never look at a complex thing very simply. Right? This is a very, very complex question but we must begin very simply to understand something very vast. So let's begin simply. Traditionally you have pursued a certain path - right? Religiously, economically, socially, morally and so on, a certain direction all your life. I have - suppose I have. You come along and say, look that way, the way you are going leads nowhere. It will bring you much more trouble, you will keep everlastingly killing each other, you will have tremendous economic difficulty - right? - and he gives you logical reasons, examples and so on. But you say, no sorry this is my way of doing things. And you keep going that way. Most people do - right? Most people, ninety nine per cent of the people keep going that way, including the gurus, including the philosophers, including the newly achieved enlightened people. And you come along and say, "Look, that is a dangerous path, don't go there. Turn and go in another direction entirely" - right? And you convince me, you show me the logic, the reason, the sanity of it and I turn and go in a totally different direction. What has taken place? You understand my question? I have been going in one direction all my life, you come along and say, "Don't go there, it is dangerous, it leads nowhere. You will have more troubles, more aches, more problems. Go in another direction, things will be entirely different." Right? And I accept your logic, your statements sanely, logically, you follow?, all that, and I move in another direction. What has happened to the brain? You understand? Keep it simple. Going in that direction, suddenly move in the other direction, the brain cells have themselves changed. You understand? I have broken the tradition. You follow this? You understand? It is as simple as that. But the tradition is so strong, it has all its roots in my present existence and you are asking me to do something which I rebel against, therefore I am not listening - you understand? But whereas I listen to find out what you are saying if it is true or false. I want to know the truth of the matter, not my wishes, my pleasures, but I want to know the truth of it, therefore being serious I listen with all my being and I see you are quite right. I have moved - right? In that movement there is a change in the brain cells. It is as simple as that. Have you got this? Oh, no, don't look so...!

Look sir, if I am a Catholic, or a devout Hindu, practising Catholic and so on, you come and tell me, "Look, don't be silly, all that is nonsense. They are just traditions, words, words, without much meaning, though the words have accumulated meaning." You understand? So you say, "Point out" and I see what you say is the truth, I move, I am free from that conditioning, therefore there is a change, a mutation in the brain. Look I have been brought up, we have all been brought up to live with fear - right? We are all brought up, not only fear of something, but fear - I won't go into it now what is the nature of fear. And you tell me it can end and instinctively I say, "Show it, let's go together, find out" Right? I want to find out if what you are saying is true or false, whether fear can really end. So I spend time, I discuss with you, I want to find out, learn, so my brain is active to find out, not to be told what to do. So the moment I begin to enquire, work, look, watch the whole movement of fear, then I accept it and say well, I like to live in fear, or move away from it. When you see that there is a change in the brains cells. It is so simple if you could only look at this thing very simply. There is a mutation - to make it a little more complex - in the very brain cells, not through any effort, not through the will, or through any motive, when there is perception. Perception is when there is observation without a movement of thought - right? When there is absolute silence of memory, which is time, which is thought. To look at something without the past. Do it sir. Look at the speaker without all the remembrance that you have accumulated about him, not his gestures, but watch him; or watch your father, your mother, your husband, wife, girl and so on, it doesn't matter what - watch without any past remembrances and hurts and guilt and all that coming into being. Just to watch. Then when you so watch without any prejudices, then there is freedom from that which has been.

I have got five more minutes. Shall I go on with the next question? I am sure you want me to go on. But you are not active in your... you should be tired.

3rd QUESTION: I once hurt someone very much. Why is the feeling of guilt such a deep tenuous one that endures in spite of every effort to be free of it?

Right? You have understood the question? Do you feel guilt? Don't most of you here have guilty consciences about something or other - no? Or are you all pure human beings? So there is guilt. What does that word mean to each one of us? Having, doing something one feels one shouldn't. A very simple level. Psychologically hurting another, and the other commits suicide and you feel my god, what a terrible thing I have done. Right? Or you have remorse, which is the same thing - right? You understand? We are talking about guilt - culpa, mea culpa.

People make you feel guilty, that is one of their tricks. Because then they can do what they like with you. We have been in that position very well, all of us. The father, the mother, the big bully or somebody, bullies you and you feel you have done something terrible and then they have you by the neck, blackmailing you. You understand all this? Don't you know all this? And why does one feel guilty? I understand why you make me feel guilty because you want power over me. Then you have me by the tail - right? So that is quite a different matter. But you have been unkind, you have done something to another, physically or psychologically, and he jumps over the bridge. And you feel my god, what have I done? What a terrible - I wish I hadn't done that - right? And you feel guilt. You understand that word, all of us? So I don't have to go into the word, the meaning of that word. Why? I have done everything I can. You want me to love you more and out of my heart, I will do everything, out of myself, not because you want me more - you understand? Are you following all this? It is your life sir not mine. I am your mother, father, whatever it is, I have done everything, I have loved you, taken care of you, all that on my part, but you want me to do more, exclusive. And I can't. I have given you my heart but you want the entire heart, but I would like a little bit of it for somebody else! And you get hurt - right? Then you jump, or commit suicide, do every kind of horror to hurt me. Then I feel guilty. These are cases. I am taking an example which is common. You do it very little or a great deal, but this blackmailing goes on.

So nationally they do it - you understand? You have hold of the whole government because you are going to fast - you know all the tricks they are playing. So why does one feel guilty, with all its anxieties, with its fears, with its kind of shrinking feeling - you understand? - Right? The feeling of my god, I wish I hadn't done that, I wish I had given more. But I have given the best of everything I have but you want something more but I can't. But you want me to feel guilty because I can't give more, and you make me feel more guilty by jumping in the lake, or taking a pill and committing suicide. So I am not going to be blackmailed - you understand? I have given everything possible. Or I don't want to give it - you understand? I don't want to feel guilty, not by your action. But you want me to feel guilty, then you have me. And I refuse to be put in that position - you understand? I won't be guilty. I mean I see the absurdity of it. Unless there has been a trick played on me, that is a different matter. I see very clearly that I have done everything a human being possibly can and you want more and I can't give more. And it is your affair if you want to kill yourself, I haven't done anything. You understand? Why can't we be sensible about all this?

I know - we know many, many people who have carried guilt all their life. It is like a wound never healing because they always remembering and that destroys their life. One has done everything possible, yielded, lied, given but the bully wants more. The responsibility is not yours but that of the bully - right? Finished. May I get up please?

SAANEN 3RD PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 26TH JULY 1983

We have had marvellous weather but a bit hot, except for yesterday's rain it has been marvellous weather. We have been here for twenty two years and this is the first four or three weeks it hasn't pelted with rain. I hope you have all had a nice holiday. This is the last talk. Perhaps we shall meet again next year.

There are several questions here and one wonders, one asks, how you approach a problem. Life has many problems, economic, social, religious and so on, technological. How do you approach a problem? The word approach means draw near, come close to. And the word problem means something thrown at you, the root meaning of the word, something thrown at you, a challenge. And how do you receive that challenge? If we approach a problem with a trance of tradition - that is a good phrase, a trance of tradition - then you will never solve the problem. On the contrary the problem remains and you introduce into it more problems, which is what is happening in the political world and so on. Or if you approach a problem, come near, draw near, with a conclusion already made, then obviously one doesn't answer the challenge, or the problem. Or if one has some ideological conclusion, belief, then if you approach a problem with that, again the same thing continues - right? Are we clear on this? That any problem, whether it be a technological problem, or social problem or personal problem and so on, religious, unless one approaches it without any motive, if that is possible, then the problem has very little significance: what matters is how one approaches it, because the approach is going to dictate the issue. Right? Are we together in this? We are not telling you what to do. We are not your guru and don't you follow the speaker. The speaker is not important, but what he says is important and for you to find out whether it is false or true. So one must have a great capacity to be sceptical, doubt, to question - right? - so that your mind is sharp, clear.

And we are going to answer some of these questions. There are problems and we are going to approach it without any motive, personal, without the deadening weight of tradition, or having a particular bias, prejudice - right? So that your mind, your brain is free to look at the problem. I hope it is clear. That to understand the problem the brain must be free to look at it afresh, otherwise you just repeat, repeat, repeat and that becomes rather tiresome, boring and useless. With that, when that is clear, let's examine these questions together. It is not that the speaker is going to examine them, it is not a problem for him, but as it is a problem for the questioner and for most people, we are going together, so there is no leader and the lead - right? Clear? There is no guru sitting on a platform. Fortunately I have no beard, or strange robes and all that kind of nonsense. So we are together going to examine without any bias, without any tradition, prejudice, to enquire into this problem. It is so hot already.

1st QUESTION: What is desire? And is desire awakened by external objects?

This is a very good question. It requires a great deal of enquiry into this. Are you prepared? I hope you are not going off in a trance in the heat, and all that. I hope your minds are fresh and you are capable of listening not only to the speaker but also to your own reactions, to your own attitudes.

The questioner asks: what is desire? And is desire awakened by an external object? So first let's look together: what is desire.

Desire in our life has become extraordinarily potent. We desire so many things. We desire heaven and if you are a Hindu you desire Moksha, another kind of heaven, liberation; or you desire a car, a woman or a man, or you desire a lovely garden, you have plenty of money and so and so on and so on. What is desire? How does it awaken? What is the purpose, the intent, the drive behind desire - right? You understand what desire is, the word, desirer and so on. Please this is going to be a very complex question and we are going to go into it together and if you will listen to it all, the whole of it, not just little bits of it.

First of all you see an object which attracts you, a car, one of the latest models, beautifully polished, with large tyres, good lines, powerful. And if you have the money to run the car you look at it. You understand? You look at the object and then the object awakens the desire to have it-right? You are following so far? That is, you see something beautiful, a picture, a house, a garden, a car, man or woman, and you are attracted. And the people who manufacture the car want you to buy it, and your own desire is to own it. So the object which is outside, awakens the desire to possess it - right? And if you have the money and so on, borrow, you know. So we are asking the question: is there desire without the object? You understand my question? If there was no car, no woman, no man, no house, attractive position as a saint, or a guru - I hope you haven't any of that - or the desire for power - it is all the outside which then awakens the desire and then you fulfil that desire and you are satisfied, until the next desire, which is another object, not a car but something else. So we are asking, please find out carefully if you are willing to listen, the object creates, awakens the desire - right? Is there desire without the external object? That is one question.

Second is: you may create for yourself an image which is externalized and you want that image to fulfil that image, therefore there is a desire to achieve that which the thought has created - right? You are violent and you create non-violence which is non-fact, and then you desire to become non-violent. So there is not only an outside object which awakens desire but also inward ideologies, inward symbols, psychological pictures, images; having created it then you desire. So external objects or internal objects are both the same because they both awaken desire.

Now we are asking a very serious question, seeing this, is there a desire which is so extraordinarily strong, without an external object or an object created by the psychological process of thought? Right? We are going to find out. And is there desire without either of these? Clear?

So we are going to enquire together, not me enquire and you just listen, together because it is your life: what is desire? Why has it become such an extraordinary potent power in our life? We desire so many things, from the most trivial to the sublime - right? That is our life. So one has to enquire, explore together, what is desire? How does it come into being and whether it can be controlled? Then if you are controlling it, who is the controller? You follow? If you are controlling your desire - right? - the controller is another form of desire - right? We are together there? I desire to achieve some kind of so-called spiritual experience - I don't know why, I must be cuckoo! And the controller, who says, "I must control my desire", the controller wants to achieve that, that kind of funny, romantic nonsense. And then the controller is another form of desire. You see this? So the controller and the controlled are the activities of desire. Clear? Is this clear? We are together in this, are we? Because this is a serious question. One has to go into it very, very carefully.

And we are not advocating or stating you must control, suppress, etc, desire. We are trying to understand the extraordinary movement of desire, look into it. When one understands the whole movement of desire then you will see something else take place, if you are going to go into it step by step, untraditionally - right? If you say, "I must control my desires" then you are off. Then you haven't examined who is the controller and then you are back into your traditional chants, which obviously does nothing. You can say your country is the most marvellous country and keep on repeating it and you mesmerize yourself - right?

So what is desire? How does it come into being? There must be a cause. And we are going to discover for ourselves what the cause is. There is, you see, and if I may go on with this simile, you see a car, the latest Mercedes, and the seeing, the sensation, contact, sensation - right? That is the process: seeing, contact, sensation. Right? That is clear? This is what takes place. Then thought creates the image of you sitting in the car and driving it. You understand? Thought creates the image of you owning it, driving it. Seeing, contact, sensation, then thought takes over, you, the image created of you sitting in the car and then driving it. So there is an interval, or a gap, a hiatus, between sensation - right? - contact, seeing, contact, sensation, instantly thought creates the image, you in the car and driving it. The instant that thought creates the image, that is the beginning of desire. Have you understood this? Please exercise your brains, don't just accept or reject what the speaker is saying, look at it carefully. Right? You see there is perception of a car, then touch it, contact, from that touching, contact, there is sensation which is natural, healthy because you are not paralysed. Then thought creates the image, at that second desire is born. Is this clear? Right? Are we clear on this? Oh, for goodness sake. May we explore more into it? Yes, you want to explore more into it. What is the matter with your brains? You have something put forward to you, very simple, and you...

I see this blue shirt in the window of a shop. I go inside, touch it, see if it is a good material, and if it suits me. I have a sensation, it is a nice blue shirt. Then I say how would it look on me? So I go to the mirror - I don't do all these things, but it doesn't matter - I go to the mirror, put it on and look at myself. Then the image is created at that moment desire to own it. Bien? This is what you all do. Only the thing is so rapid, so quick, but if you slowed it down and watched it, watched the movement, the movement of contact, sensation, slowing down. Then the image created by thought, at that second desire is born. Right?

So the question is not of control, but watching the process slow down. The process of seeing, contact, sensation, thought creating the image, at that moment desire and so on, fulfilling it or being frustrated - right? Now to watch all this process slowly, carefully, step by step - right? So then the question arises, not of control, not of suppression, not of escaping from desire as monks have done throughout the world, they have controlled it, they have suppressed it, but they are burning with it. Therefore they pick up the bible or the Gita, or some other book and keep on reading it, never looking at marvellous heaven. Right, you are following all this?

So can you, can we, slow down this whole process so to watch every step very carefully? When you so watch it, then you find there can be a gap between sensation and the moment when thought takes it over - right? An interval. You are following all this? Is this clear? No? Isn't this clear? At last some young person agrees. So to extend that gap. That is, I see the blue shirt in the window, go inside, touch it, see the quality of it and wait, so that the thought doesn't immediately enter and take over. You understand? That requires very careful attention, watching, all your reactions so that there is an interval between sensation and the activity of thought with its image. Extend that gap then you will see desire has very little potency. You have understood? Right? So that desire then becomes not the master but the slowing down of the sensation and the thought. Got it? So that you are extraordinarily alert. It is the inattentive that are a slave to desire - right? Is the question clear now? The object, the car, seeing, contact, sensation, awakens the desire to own it and then the battle - shall I have it, shall I not have it, have I the money, etc., the desire to fulfil and the frustration not to have it and so on. But when you understand desire is not only for the object outside but also from the psychological projection of an image, Bada, Nirvana, Heaven, reaching some height of some ridiculous nonsense, that is also from the inside but it is projected outside. So if we can observe this whole process totally, that requires your attention, your care, your watching, then desire, you can look at a car and you will have no reaction, unless you want it - you understand? Right?

The speaker is allowed an hour, an hour and a half to go on this morning and I hope you can stand it.

2nd QUESTION: You said it is necessary to have no opinion (you see again you are referring to me, you say - right? Why haven't you found out for yourself? I will read the question) You said it is necessary to have no opinions about anything. I feel it is necessary to have opinions about such serious things as Nazism, Communism, the spread of armaments, the use of torture by governments. One can't just sit and observe these things taking place. Mustn't one say something, or perhaps do something?

You are not going to catch me! I am not going to catch you either! This is not a game we are playing. Why do we have opinions - I am not saying it is necessary or not necessary. Why do we have opinions? Opinions are something that has not been proved - prejudice is another form of opinion - right? So why do we have them? Not that they are not the spreading of Nazism, the spreading of armaments and the use of torture by governments. That is going on, every government is indulging in all this in the name of peace, in the name of law, in the name of patriotism, in the name of god - right? Every religion has tortured people, except Buddhism and Hinduism. Now these are facts. Britain is selling armaments to Argentina. See the ridiculousness of it. It is a fact. France and other countries. And you may have strong opinions that this should not happen. And what are you going to do? Join a group, demonstrate, shout, be beaten up by the police, tear gas? You have seen all that happening on the television, or if you are part of the circus, part of the show. Now what has your opinion brought about, a change? The armaments thing has been going on for centuries - right? They all say we must not and yet big business, great industry says we can't exist if we don't sell armaments. So will you stop paying taxes? If you do you are sent to prison - right? First of all see the logic of all this. What will you do about all these things? They are all wrong, cruel, they bring about a great deal of violence - right? That is a fact. Chile is now torturing people, in Belfast and so on and so on, and so on. No government is free of it, whether it is more subtly, more obviously, but it is going on. Now what is one to do? You may be strongly opposed to Nazism. They have done terrible things in the world - Hitler and company. Watch it all sir. Germany was a most civilized country in Europe, studied philosophy, you know, inventions, they were great at one time. Those very great cultured people were taken over by a lunatic. You know all this.

Now what is an opinion? An opinion that I am against all this. And what value has that opinion? What can I do with my opinion? Will it affect selling up armaments, will it prevent Nazism, will it prevent torture? Or the whole thing is much more deep than mere having opinions? You understand? Are we meeting each other? I am not laying down a law, or I am not offering any opinions about this. But the problem is much deeper than opinions. A more serious, deeper question: why is man against another man? right? Ask that question, not whether my opinion is justified or not. But why, after all these centuries of civilization and so-called culture, man is against man? Why? If we could go into that, which requires much more serious enquiry than holding on to opinions or no opinions, then we will enter into an area where we might do something.

Why are you, as a human being, against another man? Against another ideology? You have your own ideology but you are against another ideology. Democratic ideology and the totalitarian ideology, they are at war. Why do men live by ideologies? Ideologies are not real, are something which thought has invented, or thought, after a great deal of study, historical materialistic philosophy, comes to a certain conclusion and that becomes a law for them and they want all the others to accept that. And the opposite side does exactly the same thing in a different way - right? There, in the democratic world, so-called free world doesn't put you in prison because we can sit and talk, in a totalitarian state probably it would not be possible - right? This is happening sir.

So we are asking a much more fundamental question, deeper issue: why is man against man? Go on sirs. Aren't you against somebody? Aren't you violent? And you are the whole of humanity. I know we like to think we are separate individuals, separate private souls - which we have gone into previously, I won't go into all that - because you are not. You are the rest of mankind because you suffer, you are in agony, you are lonely, you are depressed like all the rest. So you are basically, fundamentally the rest of mankind. You are humanity - right? And if you are humanity, and you are whether you like it or not, in the global sense and if you are antagonistic, violent, aggressive, patriotic, my country is better than your country, my culture is the highest culture and all that nonsense, then you are selling armaments, you are torturing people because they are doing it there of which you are, you have helped to torture people because you are a Catholic, you are a Protestant, you are a Hindu - right? So where there is division there must be conflict and all the rest of it. So are you acting wholly - you understand? - or small little me acting? You understand? Then you are against - man against man. Is that understood that question?

3rd QUESTION: From what we read you have had strange and mysterious experiences? Is this Kundalini or something greater? And we read that you consider the so-called process that you have undergone to be some sort of expansion of consciousness. Could it be instead self-induced, psychosomatic thing, caused by tension? Is not K's consciousness put together by thought and words?

Somebody is interested in this so I must answer it. (Laughter)

You are interested in this? Of course. This is much more exciting than desire. (Laughter) I wish you would be simple about all this. K apparently has had various experiences. They may be psychosomatic, induced by tension, or pleasurable projection of his own desires, and so on. In India the word Kundalini has a great meaning. They have written books about it and several claim they have awakened it. I won't go into it all. Don't be mesmerized by this word. A kind of release of energy so that that energy is inexhaustible, that is the meaning of that word. It has other meanings and different types. The fact is to awaken the energy and to let it function completely. And so-called process may also be imagination and so on. Do all these things matter? One is able to read other people's thoughts. They are experimenting with that in Russia - you understand? Andropov can read Mr Reagan's thought, or Mr Reagan can read Mr Andropov's thought, then the game is over! And if you can read my thoughts and I can read your thoughts then life becomes terribly complex and rather tiresome. They have experimented with this in Duke University in America, they have proved telepathy exists, that thought can control matter and so on. This is the old Indian tradition. Perhaps K has done some of these things but is this all important? It is like having a good bath - right? After a hot day having a good clean healthy bath with clean towel and good soap, but at the end of it you are clean. What matters is that you are clean - right? Put all this at that level. You understand? Don't give this all importance, it is not important. K has been through all this. He knows a great deal about all this. Don't wake up suddenly! (Laughter) But he treats all this as not necessary. There is the energy which has been misused by us, in fights, in quarrels, in pretensions, trying to say mine is better than yours, I have reached this platform and so on. It is far more important to enquire why human beings behave as they do now, not all this triviality. This is triviality. We have discussed this matter with some of the people who claim all this awakening. You know you have a little experience and then you set up shop. You understand? You know what that means, setting up shop? I have a little experience of this kind and then I become a guru, I am in business then. I have disciples, I tell them what to do, I have money, I sit in a posture, and I am very... you follow? All that tommy rot!

So one has to be terribly careful of one's own little experiences. Right? But what is important, really important, is to find out sanelly, rationally, logically, how you waste your energy by conflict, by quarrels - you follow? - fear and pretension. When all that energy which is being wasted is not wasted, you have all the energy in the world. As long as your brain is not deteriorating through conflict, through ambition, through strife, fighting, loneliness, depression and all the rest of it, which we have gone into, when the brain is free of all that, you have abundance of energy. But if you release some kind of little energy then you do an infinite harm to others - right? Is this question answered? Can we go on to the next?

So please don't fall into the trap of those gurus who say, "I know. You don't know, I will tell you," There are various centres in America and probably in Europe and India, where one or two people are saying, "I have awakened this peculiar stuff, and I will tell you all about it. I will teach you." You know, the good old game! It all becomes so trivial when man is fighting man, the world is degenerating, disintegrating, you are talking about fooling little experiences.

And also the questioner says: is not K's consciousness put together by thought? As every consciousness with its content is the result of the movement of thought - right? Your consciousness with its content of fear, belief, loneliness, anxieties, sorrow, following somebody, having faith, saying my country is more, the highest culture and all that business, it is part of your consciousness. It is what you are - right? If you are free of that then you are in a totally different dimension. It is not expansion of consciousness. It is the denying of the content of consciousness - right? Not expanding, becoming more and more self-centred - right? Let's go to the next question.

4th QUESTION: What does death mean to you?

Why to me? What does it mean to you? Much more important. You understand? What does life, the living and coming to the end of it, what does it mean to you? If you believe in reincarnation - you know what that means? - if you believe in reincarnation, that is you are born next life, and if you have lived rightly, correctly, happily, your next life you will have a better chance to reach the higher ladder - right? You understand? But those people who believe in reincarnation live like ordinary other people, fighting, quarrelling, aggressive, mean, right? Vicious, violent. But that belief in reincarnation has very little meaning. But it is very comforting. Now enquire into it. What is it that is going to be reborn? You understand? Suppose you believe in reincarnation, as some of you may do, I don't know why. It may be comforting but when you begin to examine that which is to be reborn, what is that? Is it permanent soul? Permanent something that is beyond time? If it is of time that is not permanent - right? So what is it that is going to be reborn? Your tendencies, your idiosyncrasies, your experiences? That K dies and next life he is born again, poor chap. And what is that K? What is it, who are you, what are you? (Noise of dog barking) - could we ask that dog to be quiet for a while? Who are you? Actually, not theoretically play around with a lot of ideas that you are Atman, that there is god in you, that is all the activity of thought - right? So what are you? You are your experiences - right? You are what you have acquired as knowledge, you are the whole movement of memories, aren't you? Or you don't like that. You like to think that there is something marvellous in you. All that is absurd. I won't go into it, even discuss it. The fact is you are nothing but - I mustn't use 'nothing but' that's wrong - you are a whole series of movements of memories - right? Examine it, please don't agree, look at it. You are not if you have no memories - right? If a certain operation takes place in the brain and then you lose your memories then you become a vegetable. You know - right? The speaker has been in a hospital in California, in America, where they have done all this, I have watched it. It is horrible.

So you are the tradition, the connected memories, the communal family tradition, the tradition of the country, all the memories - right? You are all that. And if you die you want all those memories to go on? What are memories? Things that have gone, remembered something that has been happy, pleasurable, or something you are longing for - right? It is all a movement of the past as memory, modified and going on - right? So what does death mean? You, as an individual, coming to an end - right? Physically coming to an end, but psychologically you say, "No, that is not quite so. I am more than my body. I am more than my thoughts, I am more than any reaction." - right? Are you? I know tradition says you are and you like the idea that also you are more than all this business, so you cling to that and you hope the 'more' will be born next life in a better house, greater power, greater position, nearer god. You understand? All this is a matter of belief and thought - right? Thought has also invented belief because in believing in something it gives you great comfort - right? So if you like that kind of stuff, carry on. And millions do - right? And those others say, "Well, life has been jolly good", if you are successful, or "Life has been terrible, miserable, unhappy and I am glad to die." Right? And before dying all the agony of illness - right? Long, prolonged years of illness, sustained by the doctors to keep the thing going - right? This is our life. This is the way we all live. And we are frightened of death, coming to an end. Though you believe in reincarnation but you are jolly well frightened of death. You can't carry everything with you but you like to have it at the last minute. You understand? If you have a lot of money you like to have it until the last minute, though you know you can't carry it with you.

So this is what we call living and dying - right? Why do we give so much importance to the after? What happens after death? Why? Is it not far more important what is happening before death? You understand? You understand what I am saying? Not what happens after but what is happening during the long years of living, struggling, pain, anxiety, depression, suffering, loneliness, that you all go through - right? Isn't that more important to consider, whether all that can be changed, all that can be ended rather than go on talking about what happens after death? You understand?

Suppose I am attached to my family - suppose, I have no family, thank god - but suppose I am attached to my family, my wife, my children, my house, my furniture, death comes along through accident, disease, or natural weariness, death comes along and says you can't take it with you - right? You have understood? I am attached to an idea, to a belief, to a concept, to an ideal, or I am attached to furniture, to a house to a family and so on. Death means the ending of all that, though I may believe all that I will have next life with my brother, with my sister - you follow? Is it possible to end all that while living? You have understood? While I am living is it possible not to be attached to a single thing? To my furniture, to my house, to my experience, to my books, to my reputation, to my nonsense - you follow? All that? End all that instantly. That is death. Right? Comment?

Audience: That is wonderful.

K: What is wonderful? It is wonderful if you do it. If you don't do it, it is just a lot of words.

So what we are saying is this: death of the body, with all the accumulated memories, brings to an end; unless you believe of course in the other, reincarnation, you are something which is permanent that is going to reincarnate and so on, all that is an invention of thought. So is it possible to end while I am living, while one is living, to be free entirely of all attachment?

Attachment to your guru, attachment to your idea, experience - right? Because that is what death is going to do. So while living, the ending means living with death. You understand what I am saying? No, no you don't, don't nod your head, no sir you don't. Ending, if you end smoking - right? - if you have a habit of smoking, suppose, and you end it, though the body demands nicotine and all that kind of stuff, end it. Because that is what is going to happen when you die. End your clinging to some experience, to some memory so that your brain is new, fresh, clear, not burdened with all this rubbish, garbage. Memories are garbage. I know. So to live is to live with death all the time. You understand? Do it sir. Do one thing that you hold most precious, end that. Not I must end it, how an I to end it, tell me the way to end it, or take a drug to end it, end it because you see death means that. So it is possible to live a life which means a life of freedom, and therefore a life of love, because love is not attachment. Love is not jealousy. A mind that is burdened with all kinds of stuff, a brain that has all kind of problems is not capable of affection, love.

So understand sir the beauty of it: living and the things you are attached to, end it, so that you really understand the depth of freedom.

5th QUESTION: After listening to you and thinking about these matters on my own, how am I to really not just solve my problems but radically bring about a change in my life?

The question, to put it very simply, the question is: what am I to do or not do to bring about a radical mutation in my whole existence? That is the question - right?

Now how do you approach that question? How do you draw near to it so that you are in contact with the question, with the problem? First of all, is one aware how our brains are conditioned - right? Are you aware? Oh, for god's sake. Are we aware, are you aware that you are conditioned? After two thousand years of steady propaganda - baptism, mass, constant repetition, repetition, repetition, you have become a Catholic. Or the other constant repetition is becoming a Hindu, or a Muslim. It is the same process. Are you aware that your brain is conditioned? Right? Sir, that is not difficult to be aware. When you say, "I am a British" - British, British you are conditioned - German, Russian, Hindu. The Hindu may think "I have the greatest culture" but that culture has gone. In India they are completely at a loss, disorder - I won't go into that.

So if one is aware that you are conditioned - right? - is that awareness an idea or actuality? You understand? Are you actually aware of your reactions? Don't be puzzled. It is nothing to be puzzled about. Are you aware that when you meet somebody that you dislike him, or like him, are you aware of your prejudices - you follow? Are you aware of your own laziness? Your own incapacity to think clearly? All your pretensions that you are, oh something extraordinary you have reached? Are you aware of all this? If you are and if you say, "I like this kind of thing", then live it, nobody is going to pay much attention, at least not the intelligent people. You may collect a lot of neurotics, thoughtless people, that is all right too if you want that kind of stuff. But the moment you become aware, watching, all your reactions, but to correct your reaction implies an entity who is also reacting. Have you understood? You react. I hit you and you hit me - right? I hit you because you have said something earlier, so that I react by hitting you. And you react because you don't like to be hit, so both reactions are similar - right? I won't go into it, it is clear.

So when one is aware that one is conditioned and look at it, not as an outsider looking in, the very entity that is observing, or being aware that it is conditioned, that entity is part of that conditioning. Right? Oh don't go to sleep. Right?

Put it another way: the observer who experiences, the observer is not different from the observed. The thinker is not different from his thoughts - right? The analyser is not different from the thing he analyses. Only he has separated himself. I examine myself. I am separated by thought as being a little more knowledgeable, a little more accumulative, past memories, that entity is observing. That entity is part of that which is observing. I won't go into it. If you haven't understood it, read, struggle, go to sleep, whatever you like to do, be lazy with it. Probably you will.

So apparently nothing external or internal changes man - right? Religions have tried to control him, tortured him, forced him, go through all the baptism, and all the circus - and also they do it in their own way in India and in different parts of the world - they have tried everything. And you yourself have tried to bring about a change - right? Haven't you? If you have and the result is negligent, then what do you do? You have tried leaders, you have tried gurus, you have tried various philosophers, you have tried various religions, and yet we remain as we are, lazy, indolent, indifferent, callous, without any spark of love, violence and all the rest of it. What will make us change? Nothing! Nothing from outside, or your own desire to change. So start with nothing, no agency inward or outside, is going to change you. Start with that fact. Right? Don't go to sleep please.

Then you start with something actual, something that is real, you can put your teeth into it then, as nobody outside is going to help you. The Buddha hasn't helped you, all the Christian religions haven't helped you. You are what you are now - right? Start from there. Nothing from outside, or your own desire is going to change you. So you start then and say, look, do I really want to change, basically? Most of us don't. So you carry on. But if you really want to change, it is simple. Change your fears, end your fears completely. Don't say how, we went through all that. Unless you deny totally every form of outside agency to help you or your own volition, your own desire, your own will, that hasn't functioned either, so put aside all that, then you start from what you are and see if that thing cannot be changed radically. It is up to you.

I have got another seven minutes more. The last question.

6th QUESTION: What is a spiritual life?

A religious life, not all the religions, not the monks and all that. They are not religious. I know they would abhor me when I say that. I will show it to you logically why it is not. It is all put together by thought. The invention of god is put there by thought. It is simple. All this is clear when you understand the activity of thought.

So what is a spiritual life? I am asking you. You have strange robes, you attend churches, mass, or do some kind of puja in India, or go to temples and mosques, what is a spiritual life? The word spiritual is not pleasant but we will use it for the moment. What is a spiritual life? Would you say a spiritual life is a life of total freedom? Freedom from sorrow, freedom from fear, freedom from all the conditioning - right? To be free. Most of us are in prison - prison of our own making of ideas, or other people's concepts, their own prejudices, their own experiences, they are like bars that hold us in prison. Most of us are slaves to tradition, slaves to some kind of belief, faith, or to experience. To be totally, completely free of all that. Freedom as we said before, that very word implies love. If there is no freedom there is no love. You cannot possibly achieve that freedom through some figure, symbol, person, idea. Freedom means the ending, the ending of the self, the me, the images I have about myself. Then when the brain is free, only then is there that supreme intelligence. Not all the rituals, all you know, all the trivialities, for god's sake, sitting in a posture, meditating, breathing, you follow? That is not - if one can use that word - spiritual. That is all the movement of memory and thought. And thought is limited, which we have gone into, I won't now. So we have reduced our life into a very small petty little affair. To be free of that entirely. And it is possible. Don't accept my word for it. I say it is possible. Find out. Do it. So that a religious, a so-called spiritual life, then there is no division between you and another. You won't kill another. Your country is the country of the world. The world is your country. The world is your religion. But when you say you belong to no religion, living a spiritual life, a life that is holy, it is not something for the elite, for the few, but if that is what is necessary work at it, not pretend and all that nonsense.

So a religious mind, a religious human being, one that doesn't belong to any religion, but a brain that is functioning with truth and therefore with great intelligence and compassion.

Right sirs. May I get up please?

SAN FRANCISCO NEW DIMENSIONS RADIO INTERVIEW WITH MICHAEL TOMS 28TH APRIL, 1983

Introducer: Born in South India and educated in England, J. Krishnamurti has devoted his life to speaking and counselling. He is regarded internationally as one of the great religious teachers of all time. Krishnamurti is the author of over thirty books, and has founded eight schools to spread his belief about the alleviation of sorrow. To some J. Krishnamurti is an enigma; he does not advocate social reform, nor does he encourage the guru disciple relationship. Rather he suggests that we are the original creators of the chaos, what we see out there starts inside ourselves. He presents us with the ultimate challenge: the challenge of self-transformation, to move through appearances to truth, to liberate ourselves from all systems, all 'isms' and 'ologies', to move beyond the tyranny of the mind and body towards unity and wholeness, complete understanding and love. Join us for the next hour in exploring the depth and dimensions of his work as we speak with J. Krishnamurti. My name is Michael Toms, I'll be your host.

MT: Krishnaji, welcome. You've written and spoken a great deal about meditation, and certainly in America there is a great deal of misunderstanding about meditation, and I think it might be useful for you to speak about your understanding of what meditation really is.

K: I think we ought to talk over first what generally meditation is supposed to be. There is the Zen meditation, there is the Buddhist meditation, there are different kinds of Hindu meditation, and also they have introduced the Tibetan, Mahayana and the Hinayana, South and North, and also all the latest gurus who have come here talking about meditation. After all meditation, the meaning of that word, is to ponder over, to think over, to be concerned, to discern. It's not what we are talking about. All such forms of meditation are a kind of exercise of will, or an attempt to achieve something, a state of illumination, if you like to call it, a state of peace, a state of a kind of bliss and so on. Or it might be considered as a relaxation. One considers all these forms of meditation are really not meditation at all. We have gone into it very, very deeply, with all the people concerned with various types of meditation, they ultimately, after a great deal of discussion, they agree that their form of meditation is really an exercise of will, effort, a sense of achievement and so on.

The word 'meditation' is not only to ponder over, think over and so on, but the word, and in Sanskrit, means to measure: to measure, and to be free of all measurement. I don't know if I am making myself clear.

MT: Yes.

K: To be free from comparison, from becoming. Here in this country they have used the word mantra a great deal. The meaning of that word in Sanskrit, the root meaning of that word, is, consider not becoming, think about it, go into it. And also the word mantra means to put away all self-centred activity. The depth of that statement, very few understand it.

So meditation is not separate something from daily life. If it is separate it merely becomes an escape, a romantic imagination and all that kind of nonsense. But real meditation is to be concerned with one's behaviour, one's relationship, not only with one's own little family, but with the world, because human beings have created this society in which we live, which is rotten, corrupt, immoral and all the rest of it. And meditation is a form of understanding one's relationship to the world and one's relationship to nature, so it becomes not a self-centred activity of some kind of escape from daily boredom and weariness and the general nonsense of life, but it means a tremendous enquiry in which there is no illusion, no self-deception, no imaginative theories and escapes. I hope I am making myself clear.

MT: Enquiry implies a goal of some type. What are we enquiring after?

K: No, enquiring into the whole nature of thinking, enquiring into the nature why human beings are behaving in this way, enquiring into or probing into the depth of life, what it all means, if there is something beyond the ordinary daily monotonous wearisome life. To enquire if there is something sacred.

So one must begin with doubt. That's one of the things in meditation: question, enquire, probe, doubt, and not follow any particular system because that is invented by thought, by another man. And also meditation means enquiring into the whole nature of yourself, your consciousness and so on. It is a very complex thing, not just meditate for twenty minutes and relax and carry on with your daily ugly brutal life.

MT: And certainly part of what you are saying involves us having to release the conditioning that we have all been programmed with as we've come through life.

K: That's right.

MT: Is there a method to that process of releasing conditioning?

K: No, you see the moment you use the word method, it means a process, a system, you practise day after day until you reach something. Which means your brain, which is already mechanical, programmed, if you follow a system, a method, you make it more mechanical, more routine, more stupid. Whereas this meditation as you began to question is something very, very complex. It is not just something you play with, it is part of your daily life.

MT: So it is important to bring meditation into every part of one's life.

K: Life is meditation, not 'you bring meditation'. You understand, sir, you have to question, doubt. In Christianity that is denied, because if you doubted the authority of the church you were either burnt in the old days, or tortured. If you really doubted the whole structure of Christian mythology and Christian doctrine, it would be non-existent, you would destroy it. Whereas one of the things in Buddhism and Hinduism, is you must begin with questioning, doubt, go into it, don't accept authority.

MT: Can the very non-acceptance, or non-believing, become a belief system?

K: Of course, you can make it. But to question why one has belief at all; belief implies a sense of security in some form of ideal, in some form of god, and so on. That is, why should one have belief at all about anything? You don't believe the sun rises and the sun sets, you don't believe in the constellation of Orion, you don't believe London exists, it is there. Belief really, like ideologies, has divided man: the communist ideology, the capitalist ideology and so on. One of the divisions in the world is brought about by ideologies, by ideals, beliefs. And so there is always conflict between human beings.

One of the questions is to find out if man can live without conflict. That requires tremendous probing, not just say, yes he can, or he cannot. Why do human beings live in conflict, why have they accepted conflict as the way of life for the last forty, fifty thousand years?

MT: Some people say it is human nature.

K: That's another slogan we accept. But we have never enquired why human beings live the way we do, why we always have wars, why each human being in his relationship with another, intimate or otherwise, is perpetually in conflict. You see to enquire into that requires not only intellectual comprehension but it requires self examination, not the examination according to some psychologist, whether Freudian and so on but to actually enquire into yourself. And in enquiring one begins to discover that your consciousness with all its reactions - after all, do you want to go into all this? You are interested in all this?

MT: Yes.

K: I am talking, I don't know if you want me to go on.

MT: Please.

K: Some people don't accept, some psychologists don't accept subconsciousness, they say there is only action and reaction. Nothing else. A mechanical process. But if you go further into it you see that human consciousness, which is not only action and reaction, which is mechanical, biological and psychological, you also see that human consciousness is its content, what it is made up of, which is faith, belief, superstition, illusions, fear, pleasure, ideals, ideologies, my country, your country, my god and your god, all that and more - if you want to go into it - is our consciousness, is what one is: a linguistic, psychological conditioning. Right? That's what we are. What we are is what every human being in the world is, psychologically. They suffer, they are in turmoil, uncertain, anxious, lonely, depressed, weary of this whole business of earning money, money, money. So if you go to India, Japan, anywhere in the world, every human being goes through this, whether black or purple, or blue or whatever colour they are, or whatever race they are, whether they are totalitarian, or whether they are other. So human consciousness is not my consciousness or your consciousness, it is human consciousness.

MT: Of which we are part.

K: We are that. Not a part, we are that.

MT: We are that.

K: And therefore we are not individuals psychologically.

MT: So I have to give up who I think I am.

K: Who you are is merely your name, your form or your bank account, if you have one, and your passport.

MT: Most of us become pretty identified with ourselves, we like ourselves and so it is a fearful thing to think about giving up ourselves.

K: It is not a fearful thing, it is a factual thing. One has lived in such fanciful illusions. If I think, sir, that I am an individual free to do what I like - this is what is happening in the world, right - everybody wants to do what he wants to do, what he likes, and he calls that freedom, which is creating such havoc in the world. So in questioning all this, questioning what society is, society has been made by us, if we are in turmoil society is in turmoil. If our house inside is burning we will create an ugly society; we are violent, we have divided the world geographically into America, Russia and India and Japan and so on. So nationalities have been one of the causes of war. It is glorified tribalism. Obviously.

MT: One might say that nationalities and the separations that are created are really out of our mind because we tend to separate and compartmentalize.

K: Therefore you begin to enquire what is thinking, what is thought, why thought has made this society, why thought has created gods and the churches. It is all the work of thought. I mean there is no question about it. You can't say it is divine revelation. One can say it but it has no validity. It is just a belief like any other belief.

MT: So there is a direct relationship between how we think and the world around us.

K: Yes. So one begins to ask, it is part of your question with which you began about meditation, why thought has created this. If you grant that thought, thinking, has brought about the great divisions in the world, why thought has brought about wars in the world, perpetual wars. At the beginning you killed one or two men with an arrow, now you can blast off human beings by the million. You follow, that is what we call evolution.

MT: We create terms like, mega-deaths.

K: So what is thinking? Why has thinking become so extraordinarily important in the world? Technologically you must think to create this microphone, to create an aeroplane, to create the submarine, to create the neutron bomb, but we have also thought and created god. God is our creation.

MT: So as you have said once or twice, god is disorder, because he is a reflection of our disorder. We have created that god.

K: Yes. If you accept, it becomes so absurd the whole thing. So we have to not only investigate what is thinking, and also we ought to probe into the whole question of what is intelligence.

MT: We usually associate it with collecting knowledge in our brains, intelligence.

K: Being programmed in a certain way, using that programme more cunningly. Once you admit, sir, that thought is responsible for everything - right - both psychologically and technologically. Thought is limited. I think all scientists would agree to that. One has talked a great deal to other scientists, they would all see this, obviously, because knowledge is limited. There is no complete knowledge about anything at any time, in the future or now. Perhaps you won't agree to this.

MT: When we think we are thinking about things that have past already.

K: Which means what? Knowledge. Thinking is first the response of memory. If I had no memory I couldn't think. Memory is stored in the brain, memory is the response of knowledge, knowledge is experience. Right? Experience, knowledge, memory, thought. So as knowledge will always be limited, so thinking is limited. Thinking can imagine it is illimitable but it is still limited.

MT: You are suggesting that chain can be broken.

K: Yes. Absolutely. But that requires, sir, not some kind of acceptance of authority. It requires examination, probing, questioning, doubting, which very, very few people are willing to do because they live in false security.

MT: You know in America, Krishnaji, there are probably more 'How to' books sold than any other type of book. Everyone is looking for how to, how do I do it.

K: Yes.

MT: Whatever it is, how do I do it.

K: And also the specialists are willing to tell you how to do it.

MT: Lots of people out there are willing to tell you, yes.

K: If you want to have your hair done properly you go to a specialist; how to raise a baby; how to think; what to do. So gradually, I don't know in this country if one is aware, you are all becoming slaves to specialists: how to make up your face. The other day I heard the most extraordinary thing: as a woman was asking a specialist how to sleep with her husband. You follow, sir, it is incredible.

MT: Yes, it is. We pride ourselves about being a free people.

K: You see, that's what I am questioning. So if we could go into the question of what is thinking, why thought has made life so utterly wearisome, cruel, bestial, you follow, what it is now. If you once admit not only logically but actually that human consciousness is not individual consciousness, it is the consciousness of all humanity. Right? That's very difficult not only to intellectually accept it but to feel it, then you become tremendously responsible for what you are doing.

MT: Once you feel that.

K: Of course.

MT: Krishnaji, when you say feeling the whole, there is a lot of energy behind those words when you say them. And I am reminded about what you said about we are not being serious about the deeper issues of life, and relating that back to what you were saying, feeling the whole, perhaps the reason we don't feel the whole, or can't even think about or move ourselves to feeling the whole is because we are not serious about the deeper issues of life.

K: It is not a question of feeling it. You can imagine you are living in the whole, a feeling of wholeness of life. But what does wholeness mean? To be whole implies living a life in which there is no fragmentation: business life, artistic life, poetic life.

MT: A unified life.

K: Life is one. And we have broken it up. Broken it up professionally, as in career, psychologically, and religiously.

MT: It goes back to thinking again, a fragmented way.

K: That's just it. So, sir, thinking has produced this world. There is no question about it. The marvellous cathedrals and the things that are inside the cathedrals which are considered sacred, but it is the invention of thought. All the Roman structure of hierarchy is the invention of thought. So that instrument, which is thought, has produced this world; the chaos, the wars, thought has killed. So that instrument is no longer valid, which very few will accept. It is not valid because it is worn out, it is producing problem after problem. The politicians try to solve one problem, in the very solution of that problem they increase multiple problems. The scientists are doing the same.

MT: But there are well intentioned, sincere dedicated people who see the problem and feel that there are solutions that can be had by thinking.

K: By thinking. That's just it. So that instrument which human beings have used for thousands of years is worn out, is no longer valid, is no longer worthwhile because we are both outwardly and inwardly we are in great crisis. Economically, socially, morally, in every way we are in a tremendous crisis and all this is brought about by thought. And if we once see that thought which human beings have used has no longer the quality of strength, is no longer valid - if I can keep on repeating that word - then we must look to another instrument. Is there another instrument, or is man condemned for ever to this way of life which is brought about by thought? I don't know if you see this clearly.

MT: Yes, it is very clear.

K: So is it possible for human beings to find a totally different dimension, an instrument which is not the product of thought, which is altogether different? If I may point out, one says it is possible, there is such an instrument. Not what the scientists, the biologists and the doctors are doing, dividing the brain into left and right and all the rest of it. After all, sir, look at this way, or put it this way: we have used knowledge as a means of achievement, and a great many philosophers and biologists say man will ascend through knowledge. Bronowski and others have said, step by step by step. That's called evolution. Evolution implies time. Time means a movement which is thought. Time is thought. And time as evolution, time as thought has not solved a single human problem, psychological problem. It has solved the problem of communication, the problem of travel and so on and so on, but psychologically, inwardly, knowledge has not changed man. He has been what he has been for the last fifty thousand years or more. And we say, give me time we will change. Time may be the enemy of man. I don't if you are following all this.

MT: Yes, sir.

K: So is there another instrument which will radically, psychologically change not only the human cells in the brain but also fundamentally psychologically. You understand? Now one must question it, which means one must doubt the validity of thought, and see its place in the technological world, in the world of communications, in the world of business and so on, and psychologically has it any place at all? We think it has. That is the illusion we live in because we want security. Right? Every human being wants security. The greatest intellect, and the poorest uneducated person who doesn't know how to read or write, he says, give me food, clothes and shelter; I don't care for anything else. We have lived in property, we know this. Is there security in the things thought has created?

MT: There doesn't seem to be security there.

K: I beg your pardon?

MT: There doesn't seem to be security in the things that thought has created.

K: No. It is a fact. In nationality there is no security. In the whole invention by thought of the churches and religion there is no security there.

MT: Sometimes we fool ourselves into thinking there is.

K: That's right. So is there security in the things that thought has created? If there is no security there, is there a security that is irrevocable, unchangeable? One says there is. But to find that out one must move away from the whole time process.

MT: So one has to move outside of time.

K: Not scientific fiction time but time is brought about by thought: yesterday, today and tomorrow. Yesterday is all the accumulation of a million years.

MT: Genetic memory.

K: That's memory. That's tradition. That's what I have been told, programmed. I am a Catholic, Protestant, or a Hindu, Buddhist, all that kind of silly stuff. So is there an instrument, a way of living which is not the way of knowledge? When you put it that way it sounds crazy, but after examining it, discussing with you just now, if one understands the limitation of knowledge and therefore limitation of time, therefore you cannot possibly look to time to change, which is called evolution, then your brain is working totally on a different wave from the former. I don't know if you are following all this. Because you have set aside the importance knowledge, therefore what is important is learning. Learning is not to accumulate, learning. So one begins to learn about fear, whether man can ever live without fear, because we must enquire into it otherwise we can't find the instrument. Whether you can live, not only psychologically but deeply, most profoundly, whether the brain can ever find a place where it has no fear. We say there is such a thing.

MT: How do you know that you are not fooling yourself?

K: Oh, absolutely because you begin with doubt, doubt of everything you think, you feel, doubt, question, probe into whether when you say there is a sense of freedom from fear, is it real? So you watch, you question, you look. Sir you never accept a thing. Therefore there is no authority because man has sought security in authority: the church, the religions and so on. So when one rejects all that as being the invention of thought and therefore limited and so on, then your brain now is not cluttered up, is not conditioned by time. I don't know if you are following all this.

MT: So it is a matter of recreating one's intention?

K: Not intention, there is no intention in this. You see, intention implies thought. I intend to do something. I intend to become a businessman, it is still... the very word creates the element of time. So one must be very, very careful in the usage of words.

MT: Rigorous.

K: Oh, yes, sir, rigorous. And the word must be understood by others, not your own meaning that you give to words. Time we understand, thought we understand, and we understand thought has come to its end. That's very difficult to accept for most people because they don't want to think, they don't want to look, they want, 'Please tell me how to escape'. The entertainment industry is now rampant: football, cinemas, all the religious ceremonies are entertainments.

MT: Clearly there is a lot of desire to escape from what we see as the world around us.

K: Of course, of course. So to find out if there is another instrument you have to exercise your capacity, your intelligence, your way of living, why knowledge has become so important.

MT: Are we coming to intelligence?

K: Yes, sir, I am coming to that slowly. Which means intelligence cannot exist without love. Love is not desire, pleasure, sensory sexual responses. We have made love into all that. We say, as somebody said the other day, sometime ago, that without jealousy I have no love. It sounds so appalling, so trivial.

MT: Yes, it does sound trivial actually.

K: But that person was very well known, a writer and a scholar and all the rest of it.

MT: Do you think love is something you can write about?

K: No, no. You can write it but if there is no feeling there, if your heart has no love how can you talk about it? You may, a poet like Keats, may have had this feeling - I don't know. But I am saying there is no intelligence without love. And there cannot be love if you are ambitious, if there is conflict in you. And love is not the movement of thought. The picture it creates is not love. So love means the freedom from all conflict. It is not a negative state, but through negation you come to the positive. And when there is that love there is that intelligence, which is compassion. That intelligence is completely secure, that intelligence is security. But to come to that one has to meditate, not all the silly stuff, moneymaking business, but one has to be very, very serious about all this, this isn't a passing thing for one day and then pick up another thing the next day. This is one's life. If one doesn't understand one's life, how can you have intelligence, how can there be love and so on?

So it really, sir, requires a clear brain, to think clearly, objectively, unemotionally, unromantically. And thought has created fear, pleasure, sorrow. Where there is sorrow you cannot love. I know people think if my son is dead there is sorrow. Sir, I wonder if we realize that human beings have killed each other, and that has created enormous sorrow in the world. They are still doing it. How many women, men, wives, have cried about this. For thousands of years, and nobody stops it. They talk about peace on earth, they don't mean it. To have peace on earth one has live peacefully. And that peace cannot be brought about through legislation. Peace means a state of mind, brain, where there is no conflict, and therefore there is no limitation, no division. You understand? There is division now between the Arab and the Jew, the Muslim and the Hindu, the Christian and the non-Christian and so on. So division creates conflict. Is it possible to live in this world now, married and all the rest of it, to live without division?

Sir, these are really very, very serious questions, not just pass on on the television or radio for a few minutes. One has to give one's energy to find out all this, not just read about it, or hope to achieve it some day or other. One has to give one's capacities, energies, thought into all this. And very few people are willing to do it. 'Tell me how', they are all concerned 'how to'.

So to come back to your question: meditation is love, and intelligence and compassion. Without that life has no meaning. You can be a millionaire, a great president, a prime minister, generals, or businessman, all that has no meaning. Actually they are just... So to live a life in which there is no conflict means no division. You are no longer a Hindu, a Buddhist, a Christian, an ideologist and theorist. In this way, sir, to live, there is great beauty in this. Beauty isn't the perception of something beautiful. It is the way of living. And without love and beauty and a sense of immensity of the universe, all this becomes rather trivial stuff.

There are some people we happen to know, who say, you can't change the world; the world will go on for the rest of their lives because they are conditioned, programmed - Catholic, Protestants and all the rest of it - and why waste your time on all this? Retire, go back to some monastery, or to some Himalayan cave or jungle and just live there. We don't accept that kind of thinking at all because if you retire into your monastery the thinking is going on. You may worship your particular symbol, your particular image, but it is still the product of thought. So through thought you cannot achieve the immensity of life.

MT: So we have to move beyond thought.

K: Not move, give it its right value. To come here to your house, you have to follow certain rules, you have to think, you have to watch, there thought is necessary. To learn a language thought is necessary. To go from here to there thought is necessary. But psychologically, inwardly thought has no place. But to see that, in the seeing of it thought has its right place. But we don't take time to look at anything.

MT: We are supposed to have dismissed time, Krishnaji.

K: Yes, sir. We never look at the moon, never look at a tree, live with it, look at it, see the beauty of it, the strength of it, the quality of it, or the moon, or the stars, we never look. All that we are concerned is with pleasure, money, and money gives you freedom, power, position, all the rest of it. One is not depressed or optimistic or pessimistic, these are facts. When you look at facts it is neither optimistically or pessimistically. It is so. That thing is red, that's all.

MT: Just like meditation is love.

K: Yes, sir.

MT: Krishnaji, I want to thank you for being here with us today.

K: No, please.

SAN FRANCISCO 1ST PUBLIC TALK 30TH APRIL 1983

One should be clear what the intention of these talks are. They are not to inform, or to instruct, nor to do any kind of propaganda, or programme the audience in a different direction.

From the beginning we must be very clear that you are not being told what to do, or what to think. We have been programmed enough. But in this talk, and tomorrow's talk, we should think together, look at the world as it is, what is actually going on, together, without any bias, without any prejudice, to look at the world that man has created; each human being throughout the world has created this society. This society is corrupt, immoral, and it has always had wars. From time beyond measure they have had wars. They used to kill with arrows, now you can blast whole generations, and millions of people. This is called advancement, evolution. There is poverty all over the world. In the part of the country where the speaker comes from - he has lived in poverty, he knows what poverty is.

And there are religious divisions throughout the world - the Catholic, the Protestant, the Muslim, the Hindu, the Buddhist, the Tibetan and so on. There is a great deal of conflict throughout the world, economically, socially, nationally. And one wonders what is the cause of all this, why there is so much division, so much struggle, so many problems, multiplying. Any problem that is being solved brings about other problems. Why there are wars, there are about forty wars that are going on now. All the religions and the politicians, and so-called leaders, talk about everlasting peace. To have peace in the world one must live peacefully. And there is the threat of nuclear war brought about by different ideologies: the communist ideology, the democratic ideology: the one completely totalitarian, controlling one's thoughts, actions, movements and so on; in the so-called democratic world there is more freedom to do what one likes, each one expressing what he wants to do, 'his thing'.

And what is the answer to all this? Who is responsible for all this? The chaos, the disorder, the insecurity, the sense of great confusion - who has created this society in which we live? And what is our relationship to that society? What's our relationship to the wars? As the speaker said - and I hope we are serious enough to consider all these questions, observing without any bias whatsoever the events that are taking place in this world - what is our responsibility to all this? To the wars they are preparing, the Generals and the politicians are having a marvellous time, inventing new ways of destruction, total destruction. And there have been demonstrations all over the world against a particular kind of war, the nuclear war. Europe is in a turmoil about this. And nobody, including the highest so-called religious leaders, or the politicians, or the recent invasion of gurus into this country, have ever talked about ending all wars.

So one must ask, if one is concerned seriously, whether it is possible to live in this world, both outwardly and inwardly, psychologically inside the skin, as it were, and outwardly, to live in peace, to live without conflict, man against man, man against woman, and all the rest of it. When one looks around objectively, sanely, rationally, as one must if one is to live on this beautiful earth which we are gradually destroying, who is responsible and what can each one do about it?

So please, as we said, we are looking at all these problems together. Not that the speaker looks at it, and you just listen to it. This is not a lecture as is commonly understood. Lecture is upon a particular subject, to instruct, to inform. We are not doing anything of that kind. Together you and the speaker are investigating the cause of all this misery, the confusion, the chaos, the utter callousness of human beings.

To understand all these problems, which are becoming more and more complex, and life is becoming extraordinarily difficult and dangerous, one must question, doubt, be sceptical, not gullible. That is for most of us rather difficult. Because specially in this country the authorities, the specialists, are taking us over. You don't know what to do, you ask a specialist about almost everything - your sexual life, the way you must think, how to do your face, how to dress, and so on. We think we are free, we are not. We are going to probe into all this together. Please this is not an entertainment, and we want to be entertained. The whole entertainment industry, the television, the football, all the entertaining books and magazines have so conditioned us that we want to be told what to do, to be entertained, to run away from ourselves. And this is not a talk of that kind. This is very serious because we are concerned very deeply to understand the cause of all this. Why human beings have become what they are after forty, fifty thousand years, or more. Why human beings outwardly have changed tremendously; the whole technological world, and the extraordinary things they are doing. But inwardly, psychologically we remain more or less what we have been for thousands of years. That's a fact. It's not something invented by the speaker. The so-called evolution which is the time process, time sequence, of a million years, or less, or more, has not changed fundamentally man. And man, human beings, what will make them change radically so that we live on this earth peacefully?

So we must examine together, the speaker means together, you and the speaker, look at all these facts. Not as a democrat, or a republican, a communist, or a Hindu, Buddhist, and all that nonsensical division, but look at all this, face it. And who has done all this mischief, this misery, this nastiness in the world? Human beings throughout the world have created this society in which they live. Society is not different from us, we are the society. You cannot possibly bring about a change in society if you yourself, as a human being, do not fundamentally, basically, change. That's an obvious fact. If you and I, or another, consider that society is something that has existed in spite of us, if we think that, that is a fallacy. It is not a communist conclusion, dialectical materialism; it is an obvious fact that we, as human beings, living on this earth, have created the society, and the society then controls us, shapes us. It is like a tide going in and out. It's this constant reaction between us as separate human beings and the society in which we live, what we are - our agony, our suffering, our confusion, our disorder. Society is what we are. And there is no question or doubt about that. You may disagree, but please examine it. Let's use our brains to look, to observe what we are. Not according to any psychologist, modern, recently, or ancient, not according to some philosopher, or according to a book, but to see what we are, actually. If we are in conflict we will bring about conflict in the world. If each one of us wants to live peacefully - and that again is a very complex problem, whether man can ever live on this earth peacefully - there must be an end to conflict, both inwardly and outwardly. And whether that is possible, living in the modern world, to live without a shadow of conflict. We are going to together to examine that question.

One of the factors is that we are trained to solve problems - biological problems, architectural problems, engineering problems, and scientific, religious problems, from the days we spend in school, universities and so on, our brain is trained and educated to solve problems. So we have made our life into a vast complex problem to be solved. That again is a fact. And we are only dealing with facts first. And when we are able to look at the facts clearly without any resistance, without any direction, then we can go beyond the facts.

So first of all we must look at the fact that we live in disorder. Our life is confused, unhappy, a struggle, aggressive, competitive. And so is society. We are violent people, human beings throughout the world, perhaps derived from the animal, the apes and so on, biologically we are violent people. We get so angry so quickly; we hate people, you are jealous of people and so on. Violence is not merely physical, violent is most complex and deep psychologically. And so we have created a society that has become appallingly dangerous.

So first we must examine, probe together, why this condition has been brought about in the world; and why we human beings live as we do, endlessly working, working, working, quarrelling, having rows, miserable, frightened, unhappy, lonely, depressed and so on. We must look at what we are first, and then we can affect the society in which we live. So the transformation of society is not important; but what is important, essential, is, can our brain, which is the centre of all our thought and emotions and feelings, can that brain which has been conditioned, can that brain change radically? We are saying, the speaker is saying that it can fundamentally, deeply bring about a mutation. We will talk about that presently.

It is not a matter of acceptance. As we said, please, always have a doubt, question, never accepting anything from another, because all leaders have failed. We have had leaders galore, politically, religiously, but they have not brought about order in our lives, nor happiness, security. So one must totally reject psychologically - please bear that in mind - totally, completely reject any kind of spiritual authority. Because we create the authority. If we are disordered, live in disorder, confused, uncertain, that very uncertainty, confusion and disorder brings about the authority. Politically also. I saw this case in Italy with Mussolini and other leaders; where there is disorder in us, that disorder creates the authority, the dictator, the tyrant.

So our concern is, can this disorder in our lives end? And then only can we live peacefully, wholly, with a sense of security and certainty. It is most extraordinary, one of the things is, that we always start with certainties - that god exists, that heaven is there, of course that is old fashioned, but it is still there, about 800 million Catholics believe all that, so do the Hindus; but the Buddhists have no god, but they have created the Buddha into a god. So we live in disorder. What is the cause of this disorder? If one can find, not in abstraction, intellectually, but actually find what is the cause of this disorder. There may be many causes, or only one cause. And if one can discover for oneself, not to be told by another, including by the speaker, if we can find the cause the effect then can be radically changed because the cause can be ended. If one has some kind of disease the causes can be found diagnostically, then that cause can be ended. Similarly if we can find the cause of this conflict, these wars, these religious absurd divisions, then the causes can be eradicated completely.

So we are probing into this question. One observes there is great division in the world, geographically, nationally, religiously, politically, economically, racially and so on. There is tremendous division in this world. That's a fact. In this division man has sought, including woman - forgive me if I don't include the woman; when I say man, woman is included in it, don't get annoyed, or assert yourself when I don't mention the woman. It is all becoming so absurd. Really it is so childish. And we are all supposed to be grown up men and women. We are asking: are we aware of this division first of all, outwardly, linguistically, and inwardly? We are so fragmented. Again this is a fact. Now what has brought about this division? And what has brought about these terrible wars? Because consider we have had two appalling wars in this century, consider how many women and men and wives, husbands, mothers and so on have shed tears, maimed, so-called heroes who have killed more. These wars seem to have no end. And we are responsible for it. So we are considering why this division exists in the world, actually. Who has brought it about? Who is responsible for it? All those people who are being killed, near to this country, and far from this country, who is responsible?

So we must first ask why this division exists? Each one of us wants to live in security. That is natural. That's an instinctive response to have food, clothes, and shelter. Every human being in the world, the most ignorant, the most sophisticated human being wants security both outwardly and inwardly, to be safe. And this division, the national division, has made that security impossible; outwardly wars, you are being threatened by another country, by another ideology, and so you say you must protect yourself. This is what the politicians and all the so-called leaders are saying, because each one of us sought security in division. The family, we thought there we can be secure in the family. From that the nation, the nation is only a glorified tribalism. So we sought security in individuality and we sought security in family, in various forms of division, religiously and so on. So one realizes, actually not theoretically, not intellectually, but actually in daily life that where there is division there must be conflict. That's a law, a natural law. If there is a division between a man and a woman, the husband and wife, and so on, there must be conflict between them. This is so. That's why in this country, and other countries, there are so many divorces, each one wanting his own way, each one wanting to express himself fully, urged on by the psychologists, "Don't restrain, do whatever you want immediately".

The gurus throughout the world, not only imported from India and the Far East, you have your own peculiar gurus too here, the gurus have created this division too - my guru is better than your guru, more powerful, more assertive, more money, more property, because we all want to be secure. And that security is being denied outwardly by war; you may be secure now but what about your children, grandchildren and so on? This earth is not just for one's particular life, or the duration of a particular life. We are meant to live on this earth happily, without suffering, and not only you but your grandchildren, generation after generation. And this division has denied all that.

So is there an end to division? And what has brought about this division? We see security, but much deeper than that, what is the cause of it? I hope we are together in all this. We are thinking together. The speaker is not trying to stimulate you, he is not acting as a drug, intoxicant. But together, with strength, with clarity, we are looking at all this. Our lives, our daily monotonous routine life, lonely, occupied, going to the office from nine to five for the rest of one's life and then die, following some crazy guru, crazy leaders. I do not know if you are aware what is happening, specially in California. Each one has his own particular little sound, his own particular little guru, his own particular nonsense.

So we are probing, please this is very serious, we are probing into what is the cause of all this, apart from security. Man wants security. That security has been denied by his own actions, by his own life, by his own lack of integrity, by his own lack of sanity, intelligence. We will go into the question of what is intelligence a little later.

So who is responsible? Thought is limited because all knowledge, all knowledge, present, past and future, all knowledge is limited. There is no complete knowledge about anything. The scientists, the biologists, the chemists, engineers, whatever they have learnt, whatever they have accumulated through experience as knowledge, is always everlastingly, knowledge in the future or the past is always limited. That again is a fact. As all experience, whether your personal experience or the experience of humanity, there is no difference between humanity and yourself, all the accumulated knowledge of past centuries is limited. And thought is the response of knowledge, response of memory, held in the brain. And so thought has brought about this division because in itself it is limited. If you are thinking about yourself, as most people do unfortunately, from morning until night, about themselves, about their problems, whether they are doing the right thing, or following some bearded guru and so on, that very thinking about yourself is limited. And any action that is limited must invariably bring about division. That's clear. That's factual. That's not imaginary, or an intellectual conceptual theory. Where there is division, between the Jew and the Arab, between the communist and the so-called democratic, where there is division between the Catholic, Protestant, Buddhist, all this has been brought about by thought. Thought has built the great cathedrals of the world, the great temples, the marvellous mosques, and all that which is inside the temples, mosques, cathedrals and churches, is put together by thought. Thought has been evolving slowly from a great many thousand years, and thought has put together the religious life, the monastic life, the celibate life, the life of so-called particular religious life. And thought also has created the marvellous world of technology: the computer, the extraordinary instruments of war, the submarine, the carrier and so on and so on, marvellous surgery, engineering. You must have time to learn a language, a skill, all that is brought about by thought. I am sure nobody can deny that. It is so obvious.

And thought also has brought about this division as me and you, psychologically. The 'me', the ego, the personality, with all its tendencies, idiosyncrasies, with its peculiarities, is brought about by thought. The psyche is the essence of thought. What you think, what you feel, what you imagine, your illusions, your aspirations, your gods, and all the rituals, is the result of a great deal of thinking, a thousand years and more of thinking. Without thought there is no thinker. The thinker is thought.

So thought is responsible for all this. And thought is the content of our consciousness. You may not like to use the word consciousness. Modern psychologists may say, there is only action, and reaction, nothing else. But action, reaction, have the movement of time, memory, thought. Thought with its reaction and action has put together the content of our consciousness. Please be patient in your investigation, if you are at all probing into what is being said. It is not that you are being instructed or informed. You, yourself, sitting there, looking at yourself. Your consciousness with its action and reaction, with its beliefs, ideals, aspirations, fears, the pursuit of pleasure, loneliness, the agony, the anxiety, the uncertainty, the constant suffering, is the content of your consciousness. Again there is no doubt about it, it is a fact. This consciousness is common to all mankind. You go to India, or the Far East, they may have a different form of culture, outward behaviour, outward manners, or no manners, but their consciousness, they suffer like you, they are lonely like you, they are unhappy, uncertain, anxious, desperately lonely, just like you. So your consciousness is not yours. It is the consciousness of humanity, of which you are. You are humanity. You are not separate from other human beings. You are the rest of mankind. This is not a theory but an actual daily fact. You go to the office, being kicked around there. This happens in India and Japan, in Russia. You quarrel with your wife, or husband, and so on; this happens too in other countries. It is a daily common factor. Please realize the truth of this. For god's sake, see what we are all doing. Your consciousness is not yours, it is the whole of humanity's, therefore you are the entire humanity. Therefore you are not an individual. You may think, or you may have the illusion that you are individuals. That has been created by religions, that you are an individual soul; and a different word is used in India. This illusion has been created from childhood. It is one of our conditionings. A fragment says, I must fulfil, I am more important than anybody else. But it is still a fragment. And the fragment is making tremendous mischief because it clings to its division. You are a fragment of the whole of humanity, and when you give importance to the fragment, as you do, your whole culture is that, you have been encouraged by the politicians, religions, psychologists and so on, ambitious, greedy, competitive. The fragment is this. And so you are maintaining the division. And therefore you are utterly, completely responsible for wars because you are insisting that you are American, another is insisting he is an Indian and so on. Not only there is division linguistically, but ideological division. So thought has been responsible for all this.

It is not a question of ending thought, or asking how to end thought. That's one of our favourite conditionings, 'how to', 'tell me what to do'. But thought has its place. Otherwise you couldn't go from here to your house, you couldn't speak a language, you couldn't drive a car, you couldn't possibly do all the technological things that one has to do in daily life. So thought there is necessary, knowledge there is necessary. But is it necessary in the psychological world? We are going to examine that very closely, deeply, taking one thing after another.

We are asking: psychologically, inwardly, inside the skin, as it were, is knowledge - please listen to this a little bit attentively, if you will kindly - is knowledge, which is the movement of time, thought, that movement, is it necessary in our inward life, psychologically, inside? We are going to find out, we are going to question. And I hope you are questioning with the speaker.

We live in disorder, that's a fact. Thought has brought about this disorder, which is again another fact. So we have to examine whether this disorder of our daily life can end, not seek order. Through negation of disorder there is order, naturally. Through the negation the positive is always there. So we are going to find out what is the cause of this disorder. How does it express itself? To see this disorder we must look first at relationship in our life, in the daily relationship with man, woman and so on. Why is there disorder in our relationships? Not with the universe, or cosmos, or something outside, far away, but actually in our relationship with each other. Relationship is the most extraordinarily important thing in life. If we had no relationship we wouldn't be here. The man who retires, or the nun, into a monastery, or the man who disappears into the hills, or takes to a life of a mendicant, as they do in India, there are those people who are very learned, they are not mere mendicants, they too are related. They may abandon their own particular family, abandon their name, and take on a new name, but they too, the hermit, is related to the earth, to his neighbour, to nature.

And to come nearer, which is you, your wife, husband, or whatever it is, there is disorder in our relationship. Why? One dominating the other, each one wanting to fulfil in his own way, each one earning his own livelihood. You know all that is going on in this modern civilization, especially in this country. They may meet sexually but otherwise they are totally unrelated because each one pursues his own individual inclination, his own ambition, his own greed, and so on. So our relationships are like two parallel lines, never meeting, so maintaining perpetual division. And this division, with all its anxieties, quarrels, jealousies, you know this better than the speaker does - your family life. That life is in disorder. And can that disorder in relationship end? Because that is the closest thing we have. To go very far you must begin very, very near, which is you. And can the disorder in this relationship end? Please ask yourself this question. If you say, "It is impossible, man has always lived this way, he has always been conditioned this way", as some of the philosophers, writers, psychologists, professionals maintain, that the brain in its conditioning can only be modified, it can never be completely free from conditioning. We totally disagree with that personally.

So why is there this division between man and woman, and so on? Has not each one of us not only his own image about himself, what he should be, what he must be, and so on, an image about himself, he has an image about his wife - or a husband. That image has been accumulated for ten years, or one day, or fifty years. I am sure you are aware of this. The relationship is between these two images, which thought through time has put together. So there is actually no relationship. There is relationship between two images which time has put together. Now one asks: can one live in this world without a single image? Not only about your wife or husband and so on, but about anything, without a single image. I don't know if you have even thought about all this, if you have thought about it, or gone into it, and if you have questioned it, probed deeply into the question, whether it is possible to live without a single image. Is love an image? Is love thought? Desire? Pleasure? Remembrance? Is that love? Perhaps you never even use that word. You might say you love your wife, or your girl, and so on, but behind it, behind that word, there are a great many complex reactions.

So one begins to ask: how is this - not 'how' - whether this image building can ever end? I hope you are asking this question, being aware of your own images, how you look, your vanity is part of your image, your arrogance, your aggressiveness, your ambition to become something, psychologically. Why have you an image at all? But to find out whether it is possible to live in this world without a shadow of an image requires a great deal of investigation, which is part of meditation. Meditation is not some silly practice, following some absurd system - which we will go into if we have time tomorrow. Meditation is this, to find out for oneself whether it is possible to live without a single image about yourself or another. When there is that freedom there is love then. Love is not then memory, knowledge. It is something totally outside the brain. And disorder exists as long as there is this idea - please listen, if you will - there is this idea of evolution. We are not talking about fundamental absurdities. There is evolution, from the child, from the baby into a grown up man. There is evolution as the seed which grows into a marvellous tree. There is evolution in learning. I don't know Russian - one doesn't know Russian but it needs time to learn, and that is part of evolution. To learn a skill requires time, that is also evolution. Time, thought, is the process of evolution.

So we are questioning: is there - please listen, if you will kindly, amicably - is there psychological, physic, evolution at all? I, you, becoming something? To become implies time, growth, like the seed into a tree. Is there psychological evolution at all? I know we accept that as a fact, that I will become something. Perhaps that is the result of being a clerk, becoming a manager, the manager becoming the executive, the executive becoming god! We carry that same principle into the psychological world, that I will become something, reach heaven, reach illumination, or whatever one aspires to.

So we are asking, questioning, doubting whether there is psychological evolution at all. That is, the psyche, part of the psyche is violence. We all know what violence is, both physically and psychologically. Violence is a very complex problem. Violence exists as long as there is comparison, as long as there is imitation, conformity. Violence, we all know violence, inherited from the past. And it is a common effort to end violence through non-violence. Right? We are all saying this, probably led by several people from India, Tolstoy and others. Pursue non-violence, politically, in other ways. Non-violence is a non-fact. It is an illusion, it has no reality. What has reality is violence. And when you pursue non-violence you are cheating yourself. Non-violence doesn't exist, it is an idea. It is a theory. But what exists actually is violence. And we are asking, as we said, this violence is part of your psyche, of you, will violence end through time, through evolution? I hope you are putting the question to yourself. That is, one will gradually understand, delve, find the cause, and gradually dissipate this violence. The moment you admit graduality and the future, that implies evolution. Violence cannot end through evolution, now or in the future, because man has lived for a million, or less, a thousand years in violence, it is part of his nature, part of his psyche, part of his consciousness, his action and reaction. You hate me and I hate you, you kick me and I kick you. That's what we are doing. That is what man has done for thousands of years. And we say to ourselves, some day it will end, through the League of Nations - absurd, isn't it - through some divine action, through some mutation in the psyche, suddenly.

So is it possible to end violence, not some time in the future, but immediately? The whole content of violence, not the word only, but the significance of that word, the depth of that word, the content of that word, which is not merely the physical action but the whole movement of me, the ego and you, separate, trying to conform, trying to imitate, trying to become. All that is part of violence. Aggression is violence. Competitiveness is violence. And to talk about being free from competitiveness is an anathema in this country. You abhor it. You will say, "Doesn't all nature compete. Doesn't a tree struggle against other trees to find light". But we are supposed to be human beings with some kind of intelligence.

So violence, we are asking, is it possible for it to end instantly, not gradually? It is a very serious question. We will see whether it is possible or not to end violence without any motive, because the moment you have a motive to end violence, that very motive becomes part of violence. I hope you understand all this. If, or when you want to end violence because it is profitable, because it is the right thing to do, or you think violence is anti-religious, you want to live a peaceful life, any kind of motive behind the act of ending of violence, is the continuation of violence. One hopes you understand this. You can look at it for yourself. If you want to end violence it can't have direction, you can't have a motive which says, "I will end it".

So we are going to find out, if there is time this morning, I think there is - half past twelve, we will go on. May we? You aren't too tired? Aren't you?

Audience: No.

K: I am surprised! One is surprised because this is a very serious matter. You have listened for an hour and a half. If you are working, if your brain is active, enquiring, questioning, doubting, your brain must be tired because you are not used to this kind of thinking, looking. But we will go on.

We are asking the question, when we ask a question there is doubt behind it, there is scepticism. And scepticism, doubt, clarifies the brain - which is against all your religion. You don't doubt your guru, you don't doubt your religious authorities, you don't doubt the whole rigmarole of religious entertainment. So when you question whether violence can end instantly, the whole complexity of violence, you are doubting, questioning, asking, asking yourself. Now let's find out, probe together whether it is possible to end violence completely so that you can live on this earth peacefully. Because if you are violent you cannot possibly live peacefully. That's not a motive. But the fact is we are violent - violence between man and man, woman and man, and so on.

What is violence? It is a reaction. It is a response. It is there, inherited perhaps in the very genes themselves. We are asking, can all that end? How do you observe? Observe a tree, observe the lovely sunset, or the beauty of the sky in the evening. How do you observe things? When you look at the new moon, just over the horizon, a slip of light, hardly perceptible, when you look at it, what is your reaction? Do you say, "How beautiful it is", and turn away to other things? Do you ever look totally, completely, attentively at anything? Do you ever look at your wife, or your husband, or your children completely, without any reaction of parent, and all that business? Just to look. Can you look at a tree without naming it? Can you look at the moon, full moon of an evening when the heavens are clear, and all the evening light is awake? Do you ever look at it without the word, without all the remembrance of full moons of yesterday? Just to look at it. When you so look at it there is a totally different movement going on. It is not the movement of thought, it is not the movement of pleasure, it is not a remembrance of something past. You are looking at it as though for the first time in your life when you don't name it.

So can we move from the outer, which is looking at the moon, move inwardly to this whole structure of violence, look at it, without any reaction, without naming it as violence. That sense of clear observation, without any motive, without any reaction, just to look at this extraordinary thing we have called violence. It is like looking at a great precious jewel. It is not yours, or mine, but it is there in your hands. When you so look at it so completely, attentively, that which has been called violence with all its movement ends totally.

You are not, please, you are not learning from the speaker how to observe. You are learning for yourself what it means to observe. Observe the hall, be aware of the nature, the structure of the hall in which we are, the rain, the clouds, those extraordinary clouds full of light and depth and quality, just to observe all this. And so one can observe what violence means. And when there is such observation with great attention - because you cannot observe if there is no attention. The word attention means to grasp, go out and take. We are not meaning it in that sense. To attend, to attend to what you are saying, to attend to your thoughts, to attend diligently to this violence which has brought such great misery to human beings. When there is such pure attention, which is the gathering of all your energy, to focus on this fact of this reaction called violence, there is an ending completely of that violence. Please don't accept it from the speaker. He is not your authority, he is not your guru, he is not a professional. But you are observing this fact for yourself, seeing the truth of it.

Right, sirs. We will continue tomorrow, if we may, go into fear, what the nature of time is, fear, pleasure, whether there is an ending to sorrow, and meditation. There is no time this morning, so we must stop but we will continue tomorrow.

SAN FRANCISCO 2ND PUBLIC TALK 1ST MAY 1983

May we continue where we left off yesterday morning? We were talking about together, having a conversation, friendly, unbiased, a careful examination of what is going on in the world, and what is going on in ourselves, in our behaviour, in our ways of life. And we came to the point yesterday about disorder and relationship. And we were pointing out in our conversation together how important relationship is, because all life depends on relationship. All existence, all activity is a movement in relationship. And there is conflict in our relationship however intimate it may be, or it expresses itself outwardly. If we are violent, greedy, aggressive and so competitive and so on, we human beings create a society out of the pattern of our own self. We came to that point yesterday.

And we have got to talk about this morning, pleasure, fear, sorrow, and whether there is an ending to sorrow of mankind. And we will also go together in our conversation about death, and perhaps if there is time, and we will make time, go into the whole question of a religious mind. Which means the investigation of what is meditation, not how to meditate, but what is the nature and structure. Structure means movement, this movement of meditation.

So as we said yesterday, this is not an entertainment, something romantic, sensational, exotic, nor mere intellectual investigation, exploration which satisfies only a part of our own self, that is the intellect. And most of us are satisfied with the appreciation and understanding verbally of the intellectual activity. But we are concerned with the whole of life, not with theories, not with beliefs, not with some new philosophical concepts, but we are dealing with our daily actual life. Why human beings after living on this earth for so many thousands of years are still what they are; violent, aggressive, brutal, the naughtiness and the ugliness and the brutality of wars. We are together, if you are serious, and one hopes that you are, because only the serious people live rightly, not the flippant, not the generation that does what it likes.

So together we are going to investigate the nature of fear. Because that is part of our life. It is in the very deep recesses of our own brain, this fear that has been the human lot from the beginning of time. And apparently nobody seems to have gone into it very, very deeply, some may have and perhaps some of you have, to find out for oneself, not to be told, not to be persuaded, not to be rewarded, but to probe into the nature and the structure of fear. I hope we can do it all together.

To understand the nature of fear we must also first investigate what is time. Time by the watch, the chronological time, time to learn a language, a skill, time to go from here to there, time to evolve an intellectual concept and put it into action. Time is necessary for the acorn to become the great tree, to construct a robot. In each, time and energy and knowledge. So there is physical time.

Now we are asking: what is time in the psychological world? What is time where the psyche is concerned? I hope we are together in this. It is a pleasant morning, I don't know why we are cooped up here. But since we are cooped up here let us be a little serious, at least for this morning. Because we are going to talk over many things that require a great deal of attention, that demands your energy, not just casual listening and saying, "That was an enjoyable talk". This is not to be enjoyed. This is a very serious matter. And since man has carried fear, a great burden, all the days of his life, one must find out if it is possible at all whether this fear can end. And in the probing into the question of fear one must go also into the question of time. We live by time. We get up in the morning, go to the office, come back home, and this whole process of time is involved. There is physical time, sun rises, sun sets. And we must find out for ourselves, not to be told, not to be suggested, discover for oneself the nature of time in the psychological realm. Time has built up the egotistic, the personal, the whole psychological world. We think time is necessary in that area. And we are questioning whether the psyche, the 'me', the ego, the self, the centre from which all action takes place, whether it is caught in illusion, and therefore pursues the idea of time, whether the psyche, the you, has evolution at all. Or there is no future for the psyche, for the 'me'. The future is the movement of the past, modified by the present, and continues as the future. So the past is maintained, however modified, the past is the accumulated knowledge, experience, the past is the observer. I hope all this is clear.

The past is the knowledge that we have accumulated, whether it be of yesterday or thousands upon thousands of yesterdays. That's the past. That past meets the present; the present environment, society and so on. And the past gets modified, slightly changed, but the past remains as the past, and continues as the future. This whole cycle is called time. The accumulation of knowledge in the physical world, or in the scientific world, needs time. That is, acquiring more and more knowledge, however limited that knowledge is. But we are asking is time necessary at all? Or time is a factor in the psychological world, and the evolution of the psyche, that is, the 'me', the ego, the self, has a future. I hope - one hopes this is all clear. May we go on if it is clear?

Knowledge, which is the accumulation of experience, which is tradition, which is the past, is in fact time. Now we are questioning whether fear which is part of time, whether fear has a process of evolution, gradual growth, ending. Or the future has no time at all. That is, the ending of fear instantly, not gradually. Are we together in all this? Somewhat together? Because our concern is whether fear can end ever. Or it is the lot of man, as sorrow, to have fear to the end of his days. We tolerate it, we accept it as a part of life, and we try to escape from fear. Fear being something that is painful, dangerous, to be avoided - fear of some incident of the past, continued as memory, and that memory breeding fear. We all know what fear is. Not a particular form of fear, fear of darkness, fear of something or other, but we are concerned with the root of fear, what is the cause of fear. And in asking that question to discover for oneself the root of it. Not merely the clipping off the branches of fear, the various expressions of fear. If you want to cut down a tree you don't trim the branches, you cut at the very root of the tree. So we are asking what is the root of fear. And whether it is possible, in the discovering of it, whether it can end, totally, completely; not partially, not it ends sometimes and begins again. Which means the brain - the speaker is not a specialist in the brain, but he has observed very carefully, not only in himself but in the activities of human kind - this fear exists among the animals, and that fear is rewarded or punished. So we depend on reward and punishment. But in the understanding of fear one must go into very, very deeply. That is, we enquired into time, which I think is fairly clear, and also is thought the cause of fear?

Thought is time. They are not two separate activities. Thought has created fear. That is, psychologically one remembers some incident that caused fear, and that incident is recorded in the brain, and the brain then is afraid of that incident happening again. So thought is responsible for fear, as time is. This is a fact. This is not an invention by the speaker, but when one observes, these two elements, time and thought, bring about fear. And out of fear we create a great many illusions. The illusion of god - I hope you don't mind me saying this! The illusion that one can escape from fear by forgetting it, suppressing it, denying it, or tolerating it. Fear has done a great many horrible things in life. Things that any sane man would never do. Fear of war, being destroyed, your homes, yourself, your relations and all the rest of it. But we never enquire into the cause of war, which we went into yesterday: separate tribalism, and whether it is possible to live without any nationality, without any other division. We talked about it yesterday.

One does not know if one realizes, we are in a great crisis, not only outside as war, but also a crisis in our lives, crisis in our consciousness. We are trying to stop a particular kind of war, nuclear war and all the rest of that of business, the desire to find security in division, which creates fear, then that fear brings about wars. I hope we all following all this. Please we are thinking together. We are walking down a lane in a wood, sitting down on the ground, looking at all the magnificent trees, and talking about serious matters, like two friends who are concerned with the world and with themselves. And in their conversation this question of fear arises. They are asking themselves whether this fear can ever end completely. And one of the friends says it can, it is possible. So one must understand, not intellectually, superficially, but very deeply that time and thought are involved in the causation of fear. Now the friend says, I can't stop time or thought, it is impossible to stop it. But the other friend says, it is not a question of stopping it, it is not trying to exercise will in order to stop it, but to understand where time and thought are necessary, and where they are not. So the friend says, time and thought are necessary in the physical world. Learning a language, a skill, and so on. To put together a computer requires time, and thought and knowledge. There it is necessary, the friend says. And the other says, yes, I accept that, that is natural, it is inevitable, it is necessary. But in the psychological world my brain has been conditioned through time, through thought, so to understand the nature of fear one must understand why the brain - I hope you are following all this, we are two friends talking together - my brain is conditioned by knowledge, which is experience, and that experience and knowledge has been the process of evolution, both outwardly, and I thought inwardly. But you are suggesting that what we consider necessary psychologically is an illusion, not a fact.

So they discuss the matter because they have plenty of time, it is a lovely morning, the birds are singing, and the shadows, numberless, of the trees on the ground. It is a pleasant, lovely morning, and the subject is not morbid, but they have to find out.

And it is important to find out. So one of the friends says, if one can understand the necessity of time and thought, where it should be, but has it any place in the area of the psyche? That is, the psyche is put together by thought, and thought says, I will become better. The 'better' is the movement of time. The 'better' is measurement. The 'more' is measurement, comparison. Now can one live without comparison whatsoever? Of course you have to compare between two cars, two houses, two gardens, two machines, and so on. But why should we live always comparing inwardly? Is it possible, he asks his friend, to live without comparison whatsoever? That is, never compare, never try to become something more, because the self, however evolved, however it becomes better, will still be the self, still be very, very refined selfishness.

So when one realizes the fact, that truth, that thought is necessary, and time, in the physical world, then thought and time have no place in the psychological world. I will explain it a little further, more, if you will bear with it.

Why does the brain record every incident? Naturally it records when you drive a car carelessly in an accident, and it has recorded the accident, as painful, or just avoiding injuries, it has recorded. There the recording is necessary, the recording is knowledge. But why do we record inwardly? Why does the brain record if you insult another? Or flatter another? Which is, when you record the insult you are building up gradually enmity, violence. So is it possible not to record psychologically anything? This is meditation, to find out. It isn't just a verbal dissertation, a verbal argument, or deduction. This requires a great deal of enquiry, a great deal of attention, giving your energy to find out. And the friend says, it is possible not to record anything in the psychological world. Which means the self, as we know it, is not. And therefore you have tremendous energy that can be used intelligently, wisely, sanely, in the physical world.

In talking about fear, we also should be concerned with pleasure. Why man has pursued pleasure above anything else, above fear, above sorrow, above anything else, even god - if you believe in god. Why? Why in the West and the East - there is really no West and the East, there is not Eastern thought and Western thought, there is only thought, which can be expressed in the East in a different way, and in the West perhaps in another way - but thought is the ground upon which all human beings live, exist. It is neither East nor West. Expressions may vary, and we cling to expressions. So we are enquiring why pleasure has become so important. Not that there is not pleasure and delight in watching a sunset, or the rising of a moon, or seeing something beautiful, not only in museums, but in the world of nature. To see a tiger in the wild is an extraordinary thing. And what is pleasure? Is it memory? When there is the actual fact of something happening there is neither pleasure or displeasure, there is just the happening. But a moment later thought says that was a most pleasurable thing that I have had; and that means the remembrance of something that has happened before, and that remembrance as pleasure and pursuing that pleasure. And we are caught up, or conditioned in fear, in pleasure. Reward and punishment. That's the way of our life.

We are not advocating the ending of pleasure, which would be stupid, but to understand why the brain, thought, your whole energy, is spent on pleasure, on entertainment, whether the entertainment be religious, in a church or a cathedral, or on the football field, or sexually, sensory pleasures. Why are we a slave to all this? To answer definitely, to say this or that, would be rather unnecessary, but if one understands the whole movement of it, which is to understand desire. Why are we so crippled, or pursue so energetically desire? What is desire? I wonder if one has ever asked this question. Or the moment you see something you like in the window, and you go in and feel it, and you buy it. But you never ask, perhaps, what is the nature and structure of desire. Why man has tried to escape from desire. All the monks, the sannyasis of the world - the word sannyasis is used in Sanskrit and so on. Why has man tried to escape from desire, suppress desire, or overcome desire, and so on? You cannot possibly suppress desire. It is always there. Whether that desire is identified with a symbol, with a person, a concept, that desire is still there. Desire exists in the monk - desire to be saved by some imaginary person. And so on.

So we are enquiring into the nature of desire because that is part of pleasure and part of fear. What is desire? It is important to understand this, if one may point out. In this world desire is rampant. The whole commercial world is based on it. And also in the technological world, ambition, success, and all that. So what is desire? We live by sensation, sensory responses. That's natural. Seeing something clear, beautiful, that very seeing, and the contact, physical contact with it, brings about a sensation. This is a fact. Then thought creates the image, you in the car, you in that shirt, you in that garden, house, or whatever it be, there is sensation.

Then thought creates the image of you in the car, or in the house. At that moment desire arises. Are we together in this, somewhat?

One wonder why you find it all so difficult. You are making a tremendous effort, I hope - I didn't mean "I hope" - you are making effort to understand the speaker. Don't, if one may say so.

Understand your own desire. Look at it. Desire to be beautiful, desire to be tall, desire to be successful, desire to be noble, desire to find out if there is god - you know all the whole business of desire. The objects of desire may vary, but it is still desire.

So we are saying, sensation is natural, is obviously a fact, and when thought creates the image, then at that moment desire begins. This is again a fact carefully looked at and examined. So if one understands that very clearly, even intellectually, because first we say understand intellectually. The bombing, killing many people, and all their friends, their wives and their mothers, their husbands cry. I wonder if we are aware how the world is suffering. There is not only the personal suffering, the pain, the agony of loss, the loneliness, the unbearable sense of separation, and that suffering is not only so-called personal, but it is the suffering of all mankind. We have tried to escape from it, saying that one person has suffered for the whole of humanity, but that suffering still goes on. You have all shed tears. You see the poor man in a far away village, and he will never know a clean bath, a hot bath, clean clothes, ride in a car, not that you should drive in a car, but he sees all the others. And there is the suffering of that man.

Suffering has existed from time immemorial until now, we still suffer, and we have never been able to resolve it, end it. Because where there is suffering there can be no love. I know it is difficult to accept that statement. When you are suffering you are only concerned with yourself, or with suffering of mankind. Concerned, wanting to help. I wonder if we have ever asked why we seek help at all from another. You are all sitting here, and one hopes, the speaker hopes that he is not helping you. Right? Because it is a matter that you, yourself, have to understand, and nobody in the world can help you. That's appears to be rather a cruel statement but it is not. We have had thousands of helpers, leaders, politicians, or "The present politician is not good but the next one will be better." And we keep this game going. The helper is the helped. I wonder if you understand that. So when we suffer we are always wanting comfort, to be helped out of it. And there are people who will do this, help us to escape from it. But the deep rooted agony goes on. Superficially you may smile, but the agony of pain and loneliness goes on. One never asks if there is an end to all that. If my son dies, he is gone. But the memory of it remains. The memory of playing together, talking together, walking together, holding hands, looking at the trees and the beauty of the earth. That son is gone, but the photograph, the picture, the memory remains. That is, the memory is something that is gone. So memory is not actual, living, it is something that is finished, gone. And we think that is disloyal to move away from all this memory. It is like living with a dead thing. Again can we look at it without running away from it? Observe the nature of this suffering, remain with it, not run away, or suppress, or seek comfort. That is, to give all your attention to the loneliness. Then if one so gives whole attention to that there is an ending of that loneliness, that division.

So there is a possibility, there is an ending to sorrow. Then only love is. Then love is not pleasure, is not desire. It is as strong, as deeply rooted in one's heart as one of those marvellous trees. It can never die.

And we should also talk over together what is death. It is not a morbid subject, but one should consider death because it is part of our life. It is part of our existence. My brother and my mother, my son, may die. But we are all going to die, that is inevitable, that is the one absolute fact. Whether you die of old age, senile, gaga, or you die through an accident, some disease, and so on. Death is inevitable for all of us. Thank god! Imagine a world where all the people who are dead living! It would be impossible.

So we are enquiring, the ending, which is called death. The ending of what? The ending of one's bank account? Don't please laugh, this is much too serious. Perhaps you are laughing because you see what it means. The ending, the total separation from your family. The ending of all the things that you have cherished. The ending of your memories, idiosyncrasies. The ending. The ending of your attachments to a picture, to your furniture, to your house, to a person, to an ideal, to an ideology and so on, attachment. That's what it means. Death means the ending completely of all attachment. And is it possible to live a life without any attachment? Because that is what is going to happen. We are concerned mostly what happens after, after death; is there a continuity of me, the self. The whole world of the East believes in some form of incarnation next life, called reincarnation. But what is it that reincarnates? The psyche? Not your bank account, surely. The psyche, the 'me'. The 'me' is put together by thought. It may think that me is super, super something, but it is still thought. The psyche, the 'me' is time and thought, pain, anxiety, loneliness, a sense of utter futility of all this life, the weariness, and so on. That's me. There is no doubt about that. That's me, my name, my form, my bank account, if I have one. All that is me. That they believe will continue next life. So that each life will become more and more - less and less, rather - conflict, less and less loneliness and so on. That is admitting the psyche has evolution, which obviously seems so absurd.

So are we concerned with what happen after death, or are we concerned with what happens before death, this whole life? It may be the life of ten days, or the life of eighty years. What is that life? The life that you lead, what is that life? Not what happens when you die, which becomes so unnecessary, and rather infantile, but what is your life. Pain, ambition, failure, depression, anxiety, uncertainty, conflict, all that is your life. That's a fact. You can't escape from it. And in that life you are attached to your memories, to your experiences, to your knowledge, to a person, to an ideology. And when death comes it is the end of everything that you are attached to. So please just listen, for the fun of it even. Is it possible to live a life in which there is no psychological attachment whatsoever? Which means, living with all your capacities and energies, and at the same time dying, which is the ending of attachment. Not committing suicide, that's too... But a life that is so totally aware of all its activities, its thoughts, its actions, and its actions based on attachment, for example. And ending that attachment now while living with all your capacities. That is living with death all the time. You understand all this? That requires also deep meditation.

We ought to talk over finally, if we have time, there is plenty of time, what is meditation. The very word means to ponder over. That is the dictionary meaning. To ponder over, to think over, to be concerned, to be concerned diligently, using common sense. So we are going to find out together what it means to meditate. Not how to meditate. If you ask how to meditate from another, then you want a system, a method, a practice. When you practise, if you are a pianist you practise, and you practise the wrong note, you are practising the wrong note. So this is what is considered meditation: following a system, a method, and practising that method, that system. This has been brought over in recent years by those Indians who think, or know how to meditate. And they have made a lot of money out of it, an enormous amount, fantastic amounts because people in this country are very gullible. There have been the different types of meditation; transcendental, Buddhist meditation, Zen meditation, the Tibetan form of meditation, the Hindu. They all come over here - I don't know why, I know why, money! In India if you talk about meditation, they know all about it already, at least they think they do. Here it is something new. And you live on fads, change from one thing to another.

So we are going together to find out what is meditation. Which is to ask what is a religious mind. What is religion? One can see what religion is not. Religion is not all the things that are going on in the world, the churches, look at what happens in the churches, in the cathedrals, in the temples, in the mosques, in the Tibetan shrines and so on, that's all put together by thought, by centuries of thought. And is thought sacred, and the things thought has created, apart from the technological world? Is thought and the thing that it has created, are those things sacred? Please ask this of yourself.

The content of a church, the practice, the mass, the rituals that are daily perpetuated in the name of god, in the name of saviours, in the name - all over the world they have their own particular god. In India there are, I believe, one is told, 330,000 gods! It is nice to have so many gods, you can choose any one of them according to your pleasure, according to your comfort, according to your personal inclination. But to have only one god is rather tiresome.

Q: Why?

K: Just a moment, please. I am not being rude. May I finish the talk, and if we have time you can ask the question. I hope you don't mind my saying this.

All that is put together by thought. So one asks, is thought sacred, holy? Or is it only a material process? Thought is a material process stored in the brain, in the very cells of the brain. The cells are matter, and thought is the outcome of knowledge, experience and so on, so thought, whatever thought creates is not sacred. So meditation is to find out if there is anything sacred, or not. But if you practise, follow a system and so on, it is merely making the mind, the brain, more dull, more repetitive, mechanical. If I practise some system of meditation, yoga breathing - you know, I won't go into all that business - if you practise all that your brain, which should be extraordinarily active, full of energy, have a sense of deep perception, that brain if you keep on repeating, repeating, repeating, becomes more and more mechanical, more and more dull. And those people who have meditated for twenty five years, and we happen to know a great many of them, are extraordinarily dull people. (Laughter) I am not laughing at it. They have spent their life on something that is so cruel, that is so limited, that is so mechanical, so superficial.

So we are going together to find out what is a religious mind. The brain is conditioned by our culture, by our knowledge, by our experience, by all the impressions that we receive, conditioned by newspapers, television, by the books we read, and so on, the beliefs, the faiths, all that has conditioned our brain. The language - I question whether language ever conditions the brain but that is a different matter altogether. We are conditioned, the brain is conditioned. And when the brain is not conditioned then it has got infinite capacity. As is shown in the technological world, it has got extraordinary capacity; look at all the things it has invented, from the most convenient things to the most complex, subtle things. But psychologically we are conditioned, the brain is conditioned, and therefore its energy is very, very limited. And meditation is to find out, come upon that freedom which comes from total unconditioning. When the brain is totally unconditioned, then the mind is the religious mind. Not the mind that believes in some ideology and all the rest of that immature stuff.

So we are going to find out together, if you wish, if you are concerned, if there is something utterly beyond thought, something that is sacred, beyond all words, something that is not measurable, something that is totally free from all contamination of thought. When you begin to enquire, when one begins to enquire one must put aside totally and completely the whole world of belief and faith, and all the things that thought has put together as religious activity. Totally, completely. You are neither a Hindu, Roman Catholic, Protestant, Buddhist, Tibetan, and Zen, all that is finished because you have understood them. Not that you have read all about it, or talked to a great many people about these various matters, but you see they are all the activities of a material process which is thought.

So if one is really concerned, enquiring, probing, doubting, all illusion through doubt ends. That is, then you give complete total attention. Illusion, the word illusion means, the root meaning, the etymological meaning both in Sanskrit and English, which is Latin and Greek, illusion is to play with something. To play with something. And we play with illusions. So there is an ending to all illusions. Then only you are facing facts and nothing else. The fact that there is no attachment, not the pretension of not being attached. That there is no psychological fear. And in this meditation there is love and compassion. That love is not within the brain, because love is outside of it. It is not the effort and the convenience of thought. Where there is love there is compassion, passion for everything in life. And where there is compassion and love there is intelligence. Not the intelligence of books and cunning thought and professorial minds, or the intelligence of great knowledge. The very word intelligence is something totally different.

When there is that complete attention, which comes about naturally, not learning what attention is, going to a college, or to somebody to learn and practise attention, it becomes so silly. To be so diligently aware in life, whatever one is thinking, doing, and when there is that total attention the brain is silent. It is not everlastingly chattering. The brain then becomes quiet, though it has its own rhythm. Then in that stillness of the brain and mind is that which is not to be measured by words, that which is holy, which is completely utterly sacred, which is the strength of all life, which is the basis of all life.

May I get up please? Don't clap.

BOMBAY 1ST PUBLIC TALK 4TH FEBRUARY 1984

First of all I would like to remind you, if I may, that this is not a lecture. A lecture is intended to inform, instruct, and bring about certain data, factual or imaginative and so on. So this is not a lecture but a conversation between you and the speaker, a conversation in which you and the speaker are sharing, walking together through the whole field of existence, not only outwardly, externally, but also inwardly. And to understand each other we must think together, not agree or disagree, but to have the capacity to observe together, think together, explore together, and share what we have explored, not from any particular point of view, either yours or that of the speaker. If this is very clear from the beginning that we are together going to take a long journey both externally and in the whole psychological world, which is much more complex than the external world. And to explore both the outer and the inner requires a very clear objective, non-emotional, non-romantic observation. I hope this is clear.

Why do you come to listen? That's an important question to ask. Is it merely to have some kind of religious, emotional excitement? Or is it you want to discover for yourself a way of living which must be totally different from the way we are living now, because at present the world is in great trouble, great uncertainty, there's a great deal of insecurity for human beings. So why, if one may ask most respectfully, why do you come, and why does the speaker has to make a speech? You understand? Why you come, and why the speaker has to say something. Please, are you listening to what I am saying? Why you come and why I speak every year in Bombay. Are you really interested, concerned with the world as it is, and to find out if possible whether a few of us, or all of us, can bring about a way of living which is not monotonous, boring, routine, all the ugliness of modern existence. If that is why you come, because you want to find out from a speaker, who apparently has a certain reputation, and are you listening to the reputation, the image you have built about him, or are you listening to what he has to say? And what has the speaker to say? You understand? The speaker has a great many things to say, both obvious, logical, rational, sane. And also he has, perhaps, a way of looking at life totally differently, a way of thinking, observing, the whole complex process of life. And if you and the speaker meet, then we can go along together: you are sure why you come, what your intention is, whether you are serious, or ready to be amused, to be entertained, then you and the speaker won't meet. You will listen to a lot of words and those words will have very little meaning. But if we are together, taking the journey together, then one discovers enormously a great many things of life. Right? If this is clear, that you have come not merely out of curiosity, not merely as a follower - and I hope you are not - or merely come to be entertained, amused, to be told what to do, then I am afraid you and the speaker will not be able to meet. But if you come with the intention, with the urge, with that quality of seriousness to find out for yourself a way of living which must be rational, logical, sane, in this mad world.

And the speaker has a certain responsibility, to make what he has to say clearly, not obscurely, objectively; , it has to be objective, clear, rational. Right? Do we understand each other now? I hope so.

And also it is important that you question what the speaker is saying, doubt, be sceptical. Not say, well I agree, or disagree, it is right, or wrong, but scepticism, questioning, doubt, not only what the speaker is saying, what everybody is saying, so that your own brain operates at its highest quality. Not just go off to sleep because we are going to look together into a very complex life. So you are not followers, I am not your guru. Because you have followed too many people already, and we have made the world such a mess. So please we are walking together, we are concerned together, perhaps we may have affection for each other, but the affection, the rationalization, has nothing whatsoever to do with our observation, so that you see clearly. Which means we see things together, not I see and then tell you, but together. You understand the meaning of that word?

We hardly ever co-operate. We don't know what co-operation is. We co-operate with a person who has authority, and you follow that authority. Or the authority of reputation. Or you follow an ideal. If you and I agree upon an ideal we then co-operate to do something together about that ideal. If you and I have a common purpose then we co-operate. Right? Because then it is profitable for us. But here the speaker is not offering anything. Right? He is offering you nothing. I wonder if you understand this. Most of us absorb, we are a sponge, take everything in, including what the speaker is going to say. And when you take something in, absorb, as this country is capable of doing, when you absorb you have nothing original in yourself. Right? I wonder if you understand this? You absorbed the Buddha, you absorbed any kind of religious nonsense, and so on, so gradually your brain which should be extraordinarily active, becomes gradually dull. So please, as I said, the speaker is not offering you a thing, not how to behave, what to think and so on. But together you and the speaker are taking a journey. It may be a slow journey, or a very fast journey, express. Or you might go very slowly. So please, listen first. Listen: you hear with the ear, but also there is a hearing - listening is different from merely hearing. You see the distinction? You can hear something that is pleasant, then you will accept it, or if there is something unpleasant, you don't actually listen. So there is an art in listening. What the speaker is going to say may be quite the opposite of what you think or what you feel, but since you are here you have to listen to what he has to say. Not interpret what he has to say, but listen. Have you ever listened to your wife? To your husband? Please answer that question to yourself. Listen to find out what she or he feels, thinks, wants. Sensitive enough to find out. So in listening to the speaker one has to be very sensitive. Naturally.

So there is an art to listening. There is an art to learning. Most of us learn to acquire knowledge. When you go to school you learn about mathematics, geography, history and later on you go to the university, college and so on. You absorb all kinds of knowledge. And from childhood we are trained to memorize. Right? So that our brain is always accumulating knowledge. And that's what we call learning. If you want to learn a language you spend some time studying the grammar and so on, so gradually your brain is conditioned by knowledge. See all this please. So your knowledge is the enemy of love - we will go into that presently. And to learn, it's like a river moving, renewing itself all the time, that's learning, not memorizing.

And also there is an art to observe. To look, not only with the eyes, optical observation, but to look at things without prejudice, without some kind of conclusion you have come to, to observe without the word, without the image that you have built. You understand?

So we are going to do all this together: the art of listening, the art of learning and the art of observation. It's great fun if you do this because it makes the brain extraordinarily sensitive and alive. But if you keep on repeating the same old pattern, then your brain goes dull, as most brains, perhaps, have gone. So together - please don't get bored by my repeating all this, it is important to repeat it, so that you and the speaker understand each other. We have laid a foundation of the house we are going to build together.

Can we observe what is happening in the world, not only the world of India, but the world, the global happenings that are taking place. There is a war, threatening war, nuclear war. Recently some scientists, top scientists have met and issued a certain statement saying that if there is a nuclear war the whole earth, the whole earth, not just Europe, or America, or Russia, the whole earth will be covered with dust and smoke so thick that the sun cannot get through. And the temperature will fall 5 degrees below zero. So nothing will exist. That is what they are all talking about, preparing, arguing. And also there are minor wars going on. And these wars have been going on for five to six thousand years. One started with an arrow or a club, now we have got the extraordinarily destructive nuclear bomb. What is the cause of wars? You understand? What is the cause why human beings are behaving like this? The intellectuals, the philosophers, the scientists, and the so-called religious people, who are not really religious at all, what is the cause of all this mess in the world? Don't wait for me to answer it. You are asking that question yourself. Why is it that human beings who have lived on this earth, according to the biologists forty five to fifty thousand years, we have lived on this earth as homo sapiens. And from the very beginning we have been in conflict with each other: killing each other, maiming each other, hurting each other, competing with each other. Right? Conflict, struggle, pain, anxiety, loneliness, suffering. And we are so extraordinarily clever in the technological world, developing the most extraordinary instruments in surgery, communication, computers and so on, and we have not solved our human behaviour. You understand all this? Why? Yes, sir, this is a very serious question. Why, we human beings who are so capable, going to the moon, with all the extraordinary technological world that is going on, and yet we are primitive, savages, tribal gods, and tribal instincts. What's wrong with us? You understand? I am not criticizing, I am not blaming anybody, but it is a natural question that every decent human being must ask: what is wrong with us? Right? Why are there wars? Pakistan and India, Russia and America and so on, why? What are the causes of war? If you find the cause then it is easy to remove the effect. You are following all this? If I have a disease and the cause is cancer, and it causes a great deal of pain, either it can be removed, or I die, but where there is a cause, that cause, its effect can be ended. Right? Is this clear? Where there is a cause the effect can be ended, because the cause can be ended. Clear? Is this clear?

What is the cause of these wars, the appalling things that are going on in the world? Probably most of you don't know about it. They don't print everything in the papers. The speaker has talked to a great many scientists and so on, and we are not told what exactly is going on - chemical warfare and all the rest of it. Now what is the cause of all this? Is it division? National division, religious division, individual against other individuals, division, separation? You are following all this, or am I talking to myself? You understand what I am saying? One family is against another family, in the family itself there is division. There is division between the Arab and the Jew; there is division between Catholic and the Protestant; there is division between the Hindu, and the Muslim. Right? The Christian, the Buddhist, the Zen, the whole world is fragmented, broken up. Is that the cause of all this mess? You understand my question: that where there is division between communities, between people, between countries, between various gurus, various religious, there must be conflict. Right? You understand this? Where there is division there must be conflict. That's a law. Right? Is that the cause of these terrible wars that are going on? The conflict that exists in each one of us, the competition against each other, division? Right? Economically, racially, socially, so-called culturally, everything brings about the division. Right?

Now we cannot do anything with governments, they are set. They have been unfortunately elected, you can't deal with them. The speaker has tried various ways, met many speakers, but they are... So what can we do, you and I? You understand my question?

You cannot deal with the most powerful people, like the presidents and so on. You cannot deal with them, they are at that level, they have their responsibilities, they want power, you know all the rest of it. So we are asking what you, as a human being, living on this earth, seeing all this is happening, what can you do? Please ask this question. What's your action? Not your theories. The Indians are pretty good at theories. Right? You are very good with explanation, analysis, and finding out the cause and there you leave it, which has nothing whatsoever to do with your daily life. Right? You believe in god, or you believe in some guru, or you believe in some philosophy, but that belief has no actuality in life. Right? This is a fact, I am not saying something abnormal. This is a fact. So we are asking, what is your responsibility as a human being, facing all this, what's your action? Most of us want to escape from it, most of us feel we cannot solve it, therefore we escape - escape in tribal gods, you know all that is happening in this country, or in Europe, drugs, religious entertainments, and the entertainment industry is enormously powerful, the cinemas, the magazines, the gods, their rituals. Right? Is it two gods marrying each other in this country? So there is either escape, or you face actualities, face facts. When you face facts what's your action?

Now together we are going to find out. Right? Together, not I tell you and you listen, or disagree, or agree, then that is too silly, that is childish. But if you and I observe the same thing, live the same thing daily, then it has a tremendous power - not power in the sense political power, power of doing the right thing. Right? Are we together in this so far? We are asking, what is the cause of this war, of wars? One of the factors of war is nationalism. Right?

Which is tribalism. You may not agree, but please quietly listen. Tribalism which has become glorified nationalism with its flags and so on - the British, the French, the Hindu, the Indian, you follow, divided, divided, divided. We are saying one of the causes of war is nationalism. That's obvious. Another cause is economic division, each country concerned with its own economy, and with its own culture - the British and the French and so on. And the other cause is the division in religion: the Christian, the Buddhist, the Hindu, Islam, and they all talk about god. Right? So these and perhaps others are the causes of war. And you, as a Hindu, or a Christian, or whatever it is, are responsible for the war. Right? Because in yourself you are divided. Agreed? Do you see this fact? As long as I am Hindu, committed to a certain tradition, and following some - if you will excuse me - some silly gods, playing with toys called gods, I as a Hindu am responsible for creating conflict amongst human beings. Right? Is this a fact, or not? It's a fact. You may not agree, you may not see the fact, but this is what is causing wars. Now what is your response to that? To be free of nationalism. Right? To be free to look at the world as a whole humanity, not as Indians, Americans and so on, we are human beings. Right? To look at the world globally as human beings. I'll make it more complex.

When you travel around, when you look at people all over the world, in this country, in France, in Switzerland, in America, in Japan and so on, you find that all human beings psychologically share. Psychologically they all suffer. Right? They all cry. They are all lonely. They have shed tears and you have shed tears. They are uncertain, confused, unhappy. And yet you, there, you are unhappy, lonely, suffering, putting up with all kinds of brutalities from your husband, from your wife and so on. It is the world over, it is shared by all human beings. Right? That's a fact. So your consciousness is the consciousness of entire humanity. Right? Do you see that? Shall I go more into it?

We have been conditioned from childhood, both religiously, socially, economically and nationally, that we are separate individuals, separate souls. Right? This is a fact. And we never examine whether we are actually individuals. You are separate, you are a man and she is a woman, that doesn't constitute individuality. Your tendencies, your idiosyncrasies, particular character, your bank account, all that makes you think you are a separate human being. You may be tall, I may be short, I may be pink, you may be black, all that conditions the human brain to accept that we are separate individuals. Right? The speaker is questioning that. Don't accept it; doubt it, question it. He says our consciousness, which is what you feel, what you think, your reactions, your beliefs, your pain, your anxiety, your loneliness, your sorrow, your lack of love, affection, is shared by all human beings. Right, sir? So your consciousness is not yours, it is human consciousness. Right? If you kill another you are killing yourself. You understand this? If you hurt another you are hurting yourself. I wonder if you realize this. If you are in sorrow, it is not only your sorrow, it is the sorrow of mankind.

So you are humanity. You understand? You are the rest of mankind, not a little man working in a little backyard, thinking about himself, his problems, his anxieties. But when you actually realize this fact in your guts, in your blood, not a theory, then your whole outlook on life changes, then you have a different effect, love, compassion comes into it.

So what's your responsibility? When you have seen this, not intellectually, but actually in your heart, with your eyes, with your ears, with all your senses, see this, it is a global problem not a particular individual problem. Take for example, this country has a great deal of poverty. Right? Enormous poverty, you go round the streets of Bombay, they are sleeping on the pavements, go to any village which is not near a town, there is poverty. Since independence you may have a little more but there is still poverty. And this poverty cannot be solved by one government, because there is poverty in America, poverty in France, in England four million people are unemployed. Do you understand all this? So what's your responsibility? Will you still remain as an individual fighting for yourself, fighting for your own illumination, enlightenment? You understand my next question? Or will you look at the world as a whole, not as a Christian, Buddhist, Hindu, and so on? Unless we do this we are going to destroy each other. It is obvious that is what is going on. We want security, we must have security otherwise you and I wouldn't be here. Security, food, clothes and all that, that is denied because each country says, I must solve my own problems. Right? There is no global outlook at all. And all the problems that we have, we reduce it to communal, social, you follow, make it very small.

So after hearing this, is your brain free from nationalism, racialism, religious nonsense, so that you have a global outlook, global feeling? You understand, sir? Or you say, it's marvellous, a lovely idea, make it into a lovely theory, speculate about it and kill it? Right? So that's the first thing. That demands a brain that is free to look. But our brains are now so conditioned with problems. Right? You have problems, haven't you? Please, say, yes or no. You have problems: which is sexual problems, religious problems, economic problems, problems, problems, problems. Right? I can't get on with my wife, my wife bullies me and so on and on and on. What are problems? What is the etymological meaning of that word? The etymological meaning of that word is, something thrown at you. Some challenge thrown at you. Right? That's the meaning of that word, problem. Now, how do we meet problems? We will go into it together. I'm not telling you. Please bear in mind I am not teaching you, but we are learning, observing together. The speaker may have observed it long ago and seen all this, but he is sharing this, he is walking with you. Not sentimentally, not romantically, he says, face all this. Our brains have been conditioned from childhood to solve problems. A child goes to school, learning becomes a problem, mathematics becomes a problem. Problems. Then college, more problems, university, still more problems. So his brain - please listen to this - is conditioned to solve problems. Right? You are following this? Are we following this?

Our brain is conditioned to solve problems. So what has happened to the brain? It's a machine now to solve problems. Right? So problems are increasing because it is mechanically dealing with problems. You are following this, sir? See what is happening. There are many political problems in this country, and the politicians who are trying to solve a problem, in the solution of that problem they have increased other problems. You see this, don't you? Don't you know all this? So our brain is conditioned from childhood so solve problems. And you can only solve problems if the brain is free to look at problems afresh. But if it isn't trained it acts mechanically and always seeking solutions, not understanding the problem. Because the solution lies in the problem. I wonder if you see all this. Right, sir? Can I talk to you?

So is it possible to have a brain that is free so as to solve problems? Not having problems it then tries to solve problems. See the difference? Right?

So what we are talking about is, you and I, that we are the rest of mankind, psychologically, inwardly. That's a fact. It's not a theory, it's not my conclusion, it's a fact because all human beings go through terrible times. And we too go through all kinds of turmoil, travail. So we are one humanity, you are entire humanity. That's one. Second: wars exist because you have divided yourself into nationalities, races, religions, and if you don't change that you will have no security physically, because wars are coming. Third: we have many problems, and to solve those problems the brain must be free to look at them. But if the brain is conditioned to solve problems it is not able to look at problems. You understand?

Now can you do this? Can you, listening to what the speaker is saying, if you are listening at all, can you do this? Don't call yourself a Hindu at any price - all the superstitions and all the rest of it, not belong to any religion, to any group. Yes, sir. Or to any book. Books, religions based on books; the Bible, Christianity is based on the Bible, the Koran is the bible of Islam, have you ever observed what religions based on books become? Here in this country you have dozens of books about religion, you can choose them all, one of them, play with them. So you understand what I am saying? That is, in India there are several religious books, the Upanishads, the Gita, and so on and so on. Therefore you are able to choose one or the other, and play with one or the other; you have dozens of gods you can choose for your own amusement, for your own entertainment. But if you have only one god, according to the Koran, or according to the Bible, you are stuck. And you become bigoted, narrow, and therefore brutal. This is what is happening. So can you, please, seriously the speaker is asking, can you put away all this from you and be grown-up? No nationality, no belief in gods, because belief, faith, is another form which is destroying you. If you have faith, and therefore no doubt, you understand - the whole Christian world is based on faith. Right? And they never talk about doubt, scepticism, question, it is banished. In the Islamic world too it is banished. The ancient Indians had this doubt, question, don't accept, find out. Will you do all that? Or sink back to your own pattern? See the danger. If you see the truth and go back to something which is not truth, that very truth will poison you. You understand? I wonder if you understand all this?

If you see danger you keep away from that. If you see a cobra, a tiger, you keep away, but we don't see the danger psychologically this division is bringing about. If you once see the danger of it, not only theoretically but actually with all your heart, and all your senses, with your intellect, with your love - if you have love - then you will not belong to anything: no nation, no religion, which doesn't mean you are sceptical, which doesn't mean you are anti-god, you don't know what god is, you all pretend.

So could we all put away all this so as to have a free mind, a free brain that we can look at the world and change?

May I also point out something? We said presently that knowledge is the enemy of love - does it mean anything to you? You understand my question? Knowledge, book knowledge, knowledge of experience, knowledge of your wife or your husband, the knowledge of your children, this whole tremendous accumulation of knowledge through experiences, all that. The speaker is saying all that knowledge is the enemy of love. Now look at it closely. In one's relationship with another, the wife or the husband, each has knowledge of the other. Right? Each has knowledge of the other. Right, sir? I know how my wife behaves and so on, I know, and she knows. Right? What happens? When I say, I know my wife, and the woman says, I know my husband, what is the quality of that knowing? Knowledge. Obviously. Which means what? The image I have built about her, and the image she has built about me, the picture. Right? So knowledge is that picture. I wonder if you understand? Right? Do you understand this? So knowledge between a man and a woman, of each other, destroys love. Do you accept that? The women accept it very quickly. I see that. And the men sit back and look. You are a crazy crowd all right.

So what happens, sir, in our relationship - relationship is the most important thing in life. No? Because without relationship you cannot exist. Life is relationship, whether it is my wife or husband, relationship with a neighbour, relationship with governments, relationship is a tremendously important thing in life. And are we related at all? When I have an image about you, and you have an image about me, how can we be related? You understand? Images are meeting, that's not relationship. Relationship means to be whole. Right? Not broken up as a woman and a man with all the ugly problems that arise. Therefore knowledge destroys love. For god's sake understand this. Not how to get rid of knowledge, you can't. But if you understand that in relationship knowledge is an element that brings about all kinds of quarrels and all the rest of it. Knowledge is necessary, otherwise you can't get home. Right? If you hadn't knowledge of English we couldn't understand each other. If we hadn't knowledge how to drive a car - you follow? There knowledge is necessary, but psychological knowledge is dangerous. Please understand this. And that very knowledge is destroying love.

Now I would like to ask you a serious question: do you love anybody? Answer this in your heart, not to me. Do you love anybody? Do you love your wife? Do you love your husband? Do you love your children? Do you understand, see the implication of that word. You can't answer it, can you? And that's what is destroying the world, because we have lost all love, if we ever had it.

So listening to all this has either meaning, or no meaning. We have taken a journey together, and the speaker means actually together, I'll hold your hand and say, let's walk together. If you want to walk fast, let's walk fast, if you want to run, let's run, if you want to go very, very slowly, all right, but you must walk and not theorize. So the speaker has put all this before you, either you share it, like sharing a good meal together, share a beautiful view of a mountain together, see the beauty of a sunset together, or the beauty of a single star in the sky together, but it must be together, not that you have reached there and I am following you. Together we are building a new world, one person can't do it. Do all of you really see this? Together we can change the world. And the world needs complete change, and no group, or one or two can do this, this must be done together. A baby is produced by a man and woman. And this global outlook, this feeling that we are one, that you are humanity, you understand what it does to you when you feel that? It will change your whole outlook on life. Separation then ends, therefore conflict ends. We will talk about tomorrow, the nature of conflict, and see if conflict can end, not outwardly only, but first inwardly. You understand? Whether conflict has no place, whether it is possible to live in this world, in the modern world without a single conflict. That requires intelligence, you understand, an investigation, a mind that is active to find out. The speaker says, it is possible. The speaker says there is living without conflict. You may not believe it, you must question it, doubt it, and if you doubt it then we will go into it. But merely to say, yes, I would like to get to that state, tell me how to get there, then that becomes too childish.

So can we, please, walk together, listen together, learn together so that we have a different quality of brain, a different quality of life.

BOMBAY 2ND PUBLIC TALK 5TH FEBRUARY 1984

Can we wait a little until that noise goes by?

Now we can begin. We were going to talk about, weren't we, if we can live in this world, which is pretty insane, if it is possible to live without conflict. And we have accustomed ourselves to make every kind of effort to achieve, not only biologically but also externally. Our society is so constructed that we have to make tremendous effort to have a vocation of imitation. Can we talk to each other quietly? We are saying that our society is made so that each one of us has to make a great deal of effort; to have a job, to have a career, to accumulate money for security and so on. A great deal of effort is necessary, school, college, university and so on. And also we have the concept that inwardly we also must make tremendous effort. Effort implies control. Effort implies conflict, inwardly, psychologically and outwardly. To this state of things we have become accustomed. Religious people, business people of every kind, must make effort. And in that effort there is involved a great deal of energy in conflict and so on.

We are going to talk over together (what a noisy place this is, isn't it?) - we are going to talk over together this question: why we live in conflict, why we have accustomed ourselves to live in this way, why human beings, right throughout the world, have not found a way of living a daily life without all the turmoil, all the anxiety, pain. And we are trained in vocation, which is imitation. One can understand why we have to make an effort externally. In an overpopulated country like this, badly managed governments and so on, we have to make an effort to live, to have a job. That's understood. And we are asking, why we human beings have to make inward effort. In that is implied control, conflict and various forms of struggle, anxiety and so on. We are questioning why human beings have to make inward effort at all, have inward psychological conflict. Is that question clear?

We are asking is it necessary for human beings in their relationship with each other because we cannot possibly live alone, even though you are a hermit, you are always related to somebody. So we are asking whether it is possible to live in this world of immense turmoil, immense complexity, externally, whether we can live without a single conflict. Right? That is the question we are going to ask. The speaker is not asking the question, you are asking, as both of us are taking a journey together. If that is very clear, we are both of us going to enquire carefully into this question. As we said yesterday evening, we are not giving a lecture. Thank god! Lecture implies giving you certain information on a particular subject, to instruct, to inform, or to do any kind of propaganda. We are not doing any kind of propaganda. We are not trying to convince you of anything. Right? We are not trying to instruct you. And so please as most of us are trained to obey, trained to follow, trained to accept, if your brain is so conditioned you cannot possibly enquire into this very complex question whether it is possible to live in this world without any sense of conflict. Right? So please you are asking these questions of yourself. The speaker is only acting as a mirror in which you see yourself. When you see yourself in the mirror reflected exactly, then you can throw away the mirror, destroy the mirror because you have seen yourself very clearly so you need no longer have a mirror, an interpreter, a person who explains, or analyses. Right? We understand each other up till now? We are not doing any kind of propaganda, we are not trying to convince you of anything. On the contrary we are saying you must have doubt, you must have a great deal of scepticism, because doubt frees the mind from all the accumulated tradition, all the accumulated nonsense which we call religion. Religion is something entirely different, which we will go into a little later.

But to understand this problem, which is whether we can live in this world without a single breath of conflict. Probably you have never asked this question. And probably you will say, it is impossible to live in this world without conflict. If you say, it is impossible, then you have closed the door. Right? But if you say, it is possible, then you have also closed the door. You understand? But if you say, we are going to enquire into a very, very complex problem, because all our life from childhood until we die is a series of struggles, a series of conflicts, everlasting pain and misery, confusion. Right? So please, you are asking this question. And let's go into it carefully.

Why is there conflict in our life? We can understand that there must be conflict, struggle to survive, as the society is constructed at the present time, where each man is out for himself. Right? Aren't you? In your business, in your religious affairs, in your concept of salvation, enlightenment, each one thinks he is separate. And this separation outwardly and inwardly is one of the major factors of conflict. Right? We went into that a little yesterday. Are we following each other? Or are we all asleep on a Sunday afternoon, it is pleasant, having a restful day, and perhaps you have come here to be entertained. We are slaves to entertainment - the cinemas, the magazines, the constant religious ceremonies, they are forms of entertainments, stimulation. And perhaps Sunday evening is another form of entertainment. But this is not an entertainment, it is a very serious matter, and requires a great deal of not only intellectual capacity but a quality of brain that is enquiring, pushing, driving.

To live peacefully in this world we need a great deal of intelligence. To live a religious life requires far greater intelligence. We mean by that word, not only what the dictionary says, which is to read between the lines, to gather information. That's the function of the intellect: to read between the lines, to gather information, store it and use that information, knowledge skilfully. Right? So we need not only the intellectual capacity to understand the depth and to discern, to watch, to observe very clearly what is a fact, and what is not a fact. Fact being that which has happened, which is the past. That's a fact. And also what is happening now, that is also a fact. You are sitting there and the speaker is sitting here, that's a fact. One might have had a beautiful sunset yesterday and you saw it, that's a fact. But the future is not a fact. The future is 'what is', now. This is a little bit complex, I'll go into it.

We are the past, our memories, our remembrances, our accumulation of knowledge and so on, all that has happened in the past. And that past meets the present, modifies itself and goes on to the future, so the future is the present. Right? Have you understood? That is, the present contains not only the past, then the present but also the future. That means the present is all time. I won't complicate it, we'll go round slowly.

So as you observe we are living in the past, our memories, our knowledge, our remembrances are the past. And the present is the past modifying itself and going on to the future. The culture, the so-called culture of this country has disappeared, the ancient culture. And it has adjusted itself to the modern conditions. Right? Money, power, and so on, adjusted itself and is going on into the future. So the future is the past, modified. Right? Right? So the whole of this movement is time, which is evolution. I wonder if you get all this. It is not clever, this is not a clever experience, don't go off and think how clever this is. But see the fact of our daily life; our daily life consists not only of the past, past incidents, past accidents, past hurts, wounds, psychologically, and also the past remembrance of having a toothache, all that is the past. And in that past we live. Right? And that past is all the time modifying itself because there are new incidents, new accidents, new impressions, and therefore it is adjusting itself, but it is always the movement of the past, rooted in the past. Right? Do you see this? Need I explain further any more of this? I will because it is very complicated.

So our life is the past, meeting the present, and therefore the past meeting the present is one of the factors of conflict. Do you understand? Observe for yourself the present state of the world, specially the world of India, of your country - it is not my country; my country isn't Europe or America, I have no country; it is good to be like that, except one has to have a Passport, but Passport doesn't make you an Indian, it is a piece of paper. So look what is happening in this country: an ancient culture, three to five thousand years old, has utterly disappeared - whether it is right or wrong that is not the point. The Brahmanical culture - don't get excited about it - and that has gone. And the Western civilization, which is both cultural, aesthetic, technological has invaded this country. So you have adjusted yourself to that pattern. You see it. So the past is continually modifying itself. Right? And the division between the past and the present is one of the factors of conflict. Do you get this? Please. And therefore is it possible to live a daily life, not a theoretical life - the word and the deed are two different things. For us the word is more important, not the deed. You hear all this, and that becomes words, and it becomes a theory and you carry on with your daily life, totally divorced from what you have heard, or read, or theorized. So there is a division between the word and the action, deed. And that's also one of the factors of conflict. Right? You understand? Somebody say, yes, for god's sake.

So is it possible to live in daily life - please understand this - in daily life so that there is no division between the past, the future and the present. That is, the brain is recording. Right? Like that recorder there, every incident, every accident, tendency, impression, physical hurts, psychological wounds, all that is being taped. The brain is a recording machine. And as long as it is recording, which is the past, that record is preventing you from looking at the new. Right? I wonder if you understand all this.

Now just take a very simple example: psychologically you get hurt, from childhood, through the family, through school, college, university, you get hurt psychologically: you are not as good as your brother, you are not doing well in the examinations and so on. All this process is a factor of hurting psychologically, and that wound is the past. Right? Look at yourself, find out whether you are wounded. Of course you are wounded; every human being is wounded psychologically, by a harsh word from a father, from a mother, from a husband, wife, it acts as a wound. Now where there is a wound psychologically you build a wall of resistance, naturally. Right? So that wound prevents you from further meeting others so that you never want to be hurt again. Haven't you noticed all this? Yes? Or you are so extraordinary human beings you have never been hurt?

So that wound is the past, that wound has been recorded. Right? In the brain. Now as long as that record remains there must be fear. Get it? And therefore conflict. So can we not record? I need to record how to drive a car, to learn a language, to do a crooked business, I need to have all kinds of knowledge to live physically. There the brain has to record. Right? We are questioning, why should the brain record the wound? Do you understand? Because as long as there is a record it must continue in the fear of being further wounded. Right? So we are asking a question, complex, which requires careful examination, whether it is possible not to record psychologically, inwardly. You understand? Put that question to yourself, please, find out. Somebody flatters you, says, what a marvellous person you are - why should you record it? And somebody comes along and says, you are an ass - and you instantly record it. This recording is one of the factors of conflict. Right? If you understand that then you will see whether it is possible not to record at all. Because the self, the ego, the 'me', is the collection of all the records of humanity. Right? Right sir?

The brain has two functions: one to record, where it is necessary, and not to record where it is not necessary. So the brain then is uncluttered, free, and therefore you are not any more living in the past, therefore there is no conflict. Right? You understand? Sir, don't accept what the speaker is saying, for god's sake, or for your own sake. Understand for yourself the fact. The fact is not what you think, the fact is 'what is'. You can think about it, what you think about it is not a fact. Right? The fact is 'what is'. So if you see how to live a life in which there is extraordinary energy, and therefore no conflict, and conflict exists as long as this recording process goes on, then you will ask the question inevitably: how is this possible. Right? It sounds theoretically excellent, but how is this to take place. Right? You are asking this question naturally. Now when you ask 'how', what is implied in that question, how, in that word how? You want a system, you want a pattern, you want a method, which is the past. Do you see this? I wonder if you see this? You see we are always asking, please tell us how to do something. I can understand if I am a carpenter I need to go to a master carpenter to show me how to do things, look at the grain of the wood, whether it is the right wood and so on and so on. But when I ask 'how' inwardly I want a pattern which I can follow. Right? A method which I can copy. So the method, the system, the practice, is being recorded in the brain. Right? You are following this? So never ask, 'how'. That's one of the greatest discoveries: never ask 'how', of anybody psychologically. Of course you will ask, how am I to get from this place to the room I live in. I'd have to ask a policeman, that's a different matter. But to ask a guru - there are you, I see various people with their peculiar dress who have got gurus - they will ask the gurus how to attain enlightenment. The poor chap tells you how. All that you do is repeat, so that your brain is recording. Do you follow? And that record prevents you from clarity.

Now if you don't ask 'how', if you can put that word totally out of your consciousness, then what is left? Then you are looking at yourself, you are looking at your own activity of the past operating on the present, modifying itself, and going on. This cycle. Right? The cycle of action, reaction; and reaction, action. Right? This is the cycle we live in. It's like a tide going out, and the same waters coming in. Right? This is our life.

Now we are going to ask another question, which is - am I disturbing you too much? It's up to you - that is, our life is action and reaction. It's like the tide going out, the tide coming in: challenge, response, question, answer. Now as the water goes out and the waters comes in, can there be a state of brain when there is no action and reaction? This requires a great deal of observation of yourself. I won't go into it, it is too complex for the moment.

So is it possible not to record? Right? Not to record insult or flattery, not to record, somebody says you are an ass, or an idiot, and you think you are a clever man, not to record. That is only possible when you see what the recording process does in life. Right? Suppose you are married, or unmarried, or live with a girl and so on, every incident in that relationship, whether it is sexual and so on, every incident, the word is recorded, is taped, recorded. This is so, isn't it? And you have a record of the husband, those two records are memories. And therefore you are living in the past. Naturally. So what takes place? You never meet each other afresh. Right? You never see anything anew. Right? And there lies the conflict, you are always meeting the new and changing the new to conform to the past. And the making the new conform, similar to the past, is a process of conflict. I wonder if you understand all this.

Are we exercising our brain, or merely listening? Are you using your brain, capacity?

So come back: when you are recording all the time you are wasting energy because you remember what you said to me, and I get angry about it. You follow? So you discover all recording is a wastage of energy. And you need energy. The people who are great scholars, who have read such a lot, who know so many things, haven't you meet them - tremendous lot all stored in the brain. Why carry all that in your brain? It is in the books, you can read them, why carry it here? Enquire, go into it, you will see. You carry it in here because it gives you power, position, scholarly, great pundit. Right? So your brain then becomes so burdened with knowledge, and knowledge is the ending of love. For god's sake. Learn this from your heart, not intellectually. Then you place knowledge - knowledge has its place, and psychologically it has no place whatsoever. Right? Can you live like that? Can you live a daily life never recording psychologically? Would you try it? Would you do it as you are sitting now, there? Or go home and think about it? I know you are going to think about it, which is what you are probably doing, you are thinking about it. And that thinking, which is born of knowledge, is going to prevent love. Right?

So we are going to go into another question: when you think about something, what do you mean by thinking? I think about you, about my wife, my husband, I think about my business. Think.

What is thinking? Thinking about something, and thinking, not about something. Do you see the difference? Oh lord! Can we go on? You aren't too tired? Sunday afternoon! You can learn all over again on Monday morning, the routine so it is safe. This evening you are more or less free you can enjoy yourself to listen to all this rubbish. But it is not rubbish, it is something terribly serious because man is destroying himself, and knowledge is one of the factors of destruction, and therefore where there is love there is no destruction.

We must understand a certain thing, which is, what is thinking, and what is thinking about something. Right? Thinking about something is one factor, and thinking is another factor. Right? Thinking. So I can think about Europe, or Lebanon, the destruction, the murders, the appalling things that are going on, or I enquire what is thinking. You understand? Would you join me in this game? We are working out this together, I am not doing it for my amusement, we are doing it together. What is thinking? When you say, 'I will think about what you have said', which is thinking about what I have said. Or you are actually thinking without the object. Right? Now what is thinking? Because thought has created the most extraordinary things in life: the great temples, the great mosques, the marvellous cathedrals, the splendour of those marvellous structures soaring up into the sky, the great paintings, the sculpture, the great poems. Right? And also thought has created the extraordinary instruments of wars. Thought has also created all the things in the temples, in the mosques, in the churches. Right? These are facts. You may say, no, they are a direct revelation from god, when you say that, that is also thought. Right?

So thought has done the most extraordinary things; and also done the most appalling things. Thought has burnt people, calling them heretics and burnt them. And thought said, you must follow Marx, Engels and so on. Thought has been extraordinarily important in our life. Right? Do you understand this? Now what is thought? What is thinking? Look, enquire, look at it. Look at your own way of thinking. You think about your wife - suppose, if you ever do - you think about your wife, or husband, what is that thinking, when you think about her, or him? You have the experience of that person, the image of that person, the nature, the look, the structure, the appearance of that person, which is memory. Right? Right, sirs? And that memory is based on knowledge of that person. Right? And that knowledge is based on the experience with that person. Right? Do you see this? So thinking is born from experience, knowledge derived from experience, stored in the brain as memory, and the reaction to that memory is thought. Right? So thought is a material process. Right? Would you see that? Right, sir? So thought is not sacred, and whatever it creates is not sacred - your Upanishads, your Gita, your Bible, Koran, is not sacred. See what you are accepting the moment you say, thought is a material process. It is a material process because the brain cells contain the past memories, the past knowledge, past experience, and from that thought arises. If you had no experience, no knowledge, no memory, there is no thought. Right? So look at it carefully, you will see it for yourself. So thought is a material process. Right? Would you see that? So thought has created god, and then thought worships god. Yes, Sir, you are had! This is very important, please look at it.

And if thought is a material process, then what are we? You understand my question? What are we psychologically? Thought says you are a Hindu, thought says you are a great man, thought says you must achieve enlightenment. Right? Thought says you must meditate, thought says obey, follow, become like somebody else. So thought says, become: outwardly, if you are a clerk become the manager, if you are the manager become the executive, if you are the executive the Chairman. Then also thought says, you are a disciple, you will eventually be the master and ultimately the guru, and still further, enlightenment. Thought is constructing all this. I wonder if you realize all this.

So thought, we live by thought. And as experience is limited, so knowledge is always limited, whether it is scientific knowledge, biological knowledge, arithmetical knowledge and so on, all knowledge is always eternally limited. Future knowledge is limited. Right? Do you see this? No, you don't. Right, sir? Knowledge is limited because it is based on experience, and because it is experience it is limited. Therefore thought is limited. Thought can imagine the limitless, and imagine you achieving the limitless. Right? Are you following all this? Thought is words. Thought is the symbol. So enlightenment, the measureless, is a word. And the word is not the actual. You understand all this? So can the brain be free of the network of words? Yes, sir!

And the self, the 'me', the ego, is knowledge. Right? Right, sir? You pundits, would you agree to that? The self, the 'me', is the essence of knowledge. No? All right, let's put it round the other way. What is the self? What are you? Come on, sirs, what are you? Your name, your form, the clothes you wear - you are a sannyasi, you have a peculiar kind - you have a bank account, you are a businessman, you have had a lot of experience, you have had a great deal of pleasure, pain, anxiety, loneliness, sorrow. Right? You are that, aren't you? Right? Would you acknowledge that? Or do you say, 'I am Atman, something far superior'? Oh, yes, you all do. If you say, 'I am far superior', that's also the invention of thought. Right? Because you have read about it, so you think there is a higher self, or some guru comes along and says there is super consciousness, and you must draw it down. Right? So all that process is a movement of thought. Right? And thought is time, because to acquire knowledge requires time. To acquire knowledge, say Russian or English, or Spanish, or French requires a great deal of time, you may spend three months, or a year, that is time. So to acquire knowledge inwardly or outwardly requires time. Right? To learn about yourself is to have time. Right? Do you understand this? See what game you are playing with yourself. I want to learn about myself - self-knowledge, which I have talked a great deal about. Self-knowledge, to know myself, and to know myself I must investigate, I must observe, I must analyze, I must have introspection. You follow? Watch, learn, observe, self-recollection, be aware, all that takes time. Right? Would you agree with that? Do you see that? All that requires time. To know about the moon requires time. This is simple. And also to know myself, we have said, requires time. Right? Which means what? Oh, you are missing so much, what's the matter with you?

Time is the enemy of man. Illumination is not enlightenment through time, it isn't a gradual process, success after success. When you see thought is time, of course - you understand - thought is movement. Right? And time is movement. Clear? So thought and time go together, they are not separate. Thought is time, and time is thought. So thought says, 'I must become enlightened. I must become from what I am to what I should be'. Right? Need I explain all this? I am violent. Human beings are violent. You are violent, aren't you? And you say, 'I must not be violent' or become non-violent. So to become non-violent takes time. During that interval of becoming non-violent you are being violent. So non-violence is nonsense. Right? What is fact is violence. So our brains are trained to become. As you become a clerk, reach the ladder, the same is extended to the psychological world. You are following? There, you say, I am ignorant, I must have knowledge about myself, I am violent, I must become non-violent. Right? I am angry, I must become without anger. Now look at it carefully. You are violent, violence is not separate from you. Would you agree to that? Right? The Hindus are very clever birds! They will agree up to a point. I can see it in their faces. But they have got behind them the idea that the 'me' is different from the observer, the witness, the person who witnesses is different. Right? I know the game you are playing. Is that a fact? Is it a fact that there is an observer different from anger? Careful, don't answer me, look at it carefully. Anger is me. I am not different from anger. Violence is me, non-violence is not me. Right? That's just an idea. The fact is I am violent. That is a fact. Non-violence is non-fact. But we pursue knowledge because we don't know how to deal with 'what is'. You are following this?

So the observer is not different from the observed. Right?

Goodness, I'll go into it. You see that tree over there, if you ever look at trees. When you look at a tree, the tree is obviously different from you. Right? The cloud of an evening, full of light and beauty, is different from you. But when you look at that tree, what takes place, when you do look at the tree what takes place? You immediately use the word. Right? So the word interferes with looking at it. She is my wife, or my husband. Finished. Right? Don't you know all this? So the word is preventing you from observing. Right? And also the word is not the thing. Right? The word 'tree' is not the tree. The word 'my wife' is not the wife. I wonder if you see this. If you see this, your relationship with your wife would be entirely different.

So time is thought, and thought says, 'I am this, I must become that', therefore the becoming implies time. And what are you becoming? You, pundit, answer this. What are you becoming? More enlightened, a better human being? You are not good, but you say, 'I will become good', and when you are becoming good you will never be good. I wonder if you see that. So there is no becoming, which is one of the factors of conflict. But if you say, 'All right, the fact is violence is me, violence is not separate from me', that's a fact. The 'me' is my face, the 'me' is my talent and all the rest of it. But we have separated the 'me' from the thing that is happening. Right? That is, thought has separated violence from the thinker. Right? Are you getting tired? You must be tired. Because you are just not co-operating, working, that's all you say, 'I am not tired'. If you are co-operating, working, you would see what an extraordinary thing is going on with your brain.

Look: violence is me, greed is me, anger is me; later on I say, 'I have been angry', but the fact is anger, jealousy, hate, anxiety and so on, is me. So the observer is the observed. Right? Right, sirs?

Do you see this? Sir, one of the factors of conflict is that we have divided the thinker from thought. Right? Without thought there is no thinker. Right? But we have separated the thinker, the experiencer from the experience. We have separated the analyzer from the analyzed. Right? Haven't you noticed this? So there is perpetual conflict, division. So the observer is the observed. The experiencer is the experienced.

We should go into the question of - oh, we have got no time. You all know to experience, don't you - nirvana, or some other factor, sex, or any other, you want to experience. What is experience? How do you know it is an experience? Only you know it when you recognize it. Right? So, see what is happening, when you recognize it, it is not new. But yet you say, I must have new experiences. So all experiences when recognized are merely the past memories. Yes, sir, take this into your blood and you will see what takes place. Then your mind is so alert, so aware, so attentive, there is no experience at all. Oh, you won't accept this.

So we are enquiring into the cause of conflict. The cause of conflict - one of the causes, is duality. Right? Violence and non-violence, that's duality. The good and the bad, hate and love. Why do you have duality? Don't translate it into adwaita or some other Sanskrit word and get away with it. Why do we have duality? What is duality? You are a woman, I am a man, you are tall, I am short, you are fair, another is lighter, whatever it is. Only duality exists when there is comparison. Are you following all this? When I compare myself with you I have created duality. Right? Right sir? So if I don't compare there is no duality. Right? That is, I have invented non-violence, this country is full of that, non-violence - at least they talk about it. But the fact is they are violent. The fact. The fact has no duality. Oh, do see that. I have just discovered that. You understand? The fact has no opposite. I am angry. That's a fact. But when I say, I must not be angry, then duality arises. So, it's very interesting, I wish your brains would go into all this. So I am angry. That's a fact. What am I to do? I won't say, 'I must not be angry', then I am in conflict. You understand? I won't suppress it. There is no suppression, there is no escape, there is no transcending it. So what happens? Go on, sir. What happens when there is no movement away from the fact? Go on. It is the movement away from it that creates conflict, creates duality. And volumes have been written by clever Indians about duality. The speaker said there is no duality, right from the beginning, because there is only the fact. But when I want to get over the fact, then I create duality. Right? Then what takes place? How to remain with the fact. Not move away from the fact. Any movement away from the fact is conflict and duality.

So when you remain with the fact, what takes place? You work it out. I am working it out, but you work it out. What happens when you remain with the fact? Which means what? I can tell you, you will say, 'Yes, yes', and go away. You don't apply. Sir, look: when I move away from the fact I have lost energy. Right? Do you see that? When I move away from the fact it is a wastage of energy. Right. So when there is no movement away from the fact, all energy is there, which means complete attention there, with the fact. And when there is complete attention then it is like light, a high powered light being thrown on the fact. And then the fact reveals all its content. You understand? Then the fact has no meaning. You understand?

Sir, look: we said knowledge is an enemy of love. And love has no opposite. But we have made an opposite, hate. (Sorry, slight cramp. I am working too hard for you, that is what it is.) So, sirs, we have examined the very, very complex problem, we have examined together, the speaker has not examined, you have examined. The speaker is merely acting as your voice. The speaker is merely showing 'what is', and you are looking at it, looking at yourself. And when you look at yourself, carefully, you are nothing but the past - past memories, past remembrances, past pleasures. And when you suffer, as most human beings do, unfortunately, again escape from it. So when you remain with a fact it is like looking at a bud, looking at a rose bud, and you will see the rose bud open, the perfume of it, the beauty of it, the quality of it, the gentleness, the tenderness. And when you observe the fact it fades away.

We will continue next weekend talking about fear, sorrow, what is religion, what is meditation, what is death. Because all this is part of our life. You cannot separate one from the other. You cannot say, 'I am going to meditate' and be a stupid person. To understand life, this whole complex problem of life, you need great patience, not the patience of time, patience. You need a brain that is alive, questioning, asking, doubting, and then you will find out for yourself, without words, that which is not measured by words.

Sorry if I have kept you.

TALK AT THE INDIAN INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY BOMBAY 7TH FEBRUARY 1984

One wonders why in a place like this we are being educated, for what? What is the relationship between this institution and the world? What place has knowledge, whether it is scientific, biological, or physics and so on - what relationship has that knowledge towards the world? And throughout the world we are all being educated along various lines and with their disciplines; and we human beings have very little place in this world. So one must, I feel, ask why these elaborate years of study, acquiring great deal of knowledge, great effort, and where is it all ending up? What place your scientific and other disciplines have, actual relationship, with the existing world? The existing world is the world in which we live our daily life, whether in America, Russia, Europe or in India or Japan, that very life is being threatened by war, not only conventional war, but also by nuclear war. Some scientists, we were told, top scientists, gathered and wrote what they thought would happen if there was a nuclear war. They said that the whole earth would be covered by a thick layer of dust and smoke and so the sun cannot possibly penetrate that, and the temperature will fall to 5 degrees below zero, so at the end of a nuclear war not a living thing will exist on the earth. That is one activity of human endeavour, highly technological, highly concerned, each technician with his own particular life, with his own particular discipline and totally disregarding what is happening to human beings throughout the world.

And also, as one observes, there is this vast technological advancement, tremendous, so rapid and it may lead to extraordinary results. And also our human brains - not that the speaker is an expert in the study of the brain - but if one watches one's own activity in daily life, one sees there the various activities in the brain. There is this technological world which is progressing with abnormal speed in the last two hundred years, and added to that the computer which probably will take over all the activities of human beings - most of it. Perhaps it will not be able to write, great music of Beethoven, Mozart or Bach, classical western music, but it will do most of the things that human beings are now doing. And what is going to happen to the human brain? That is the technological world and the human world. We have given tremendous importance to the technological world. That is why you have this institution, scientific and various other forms of study with their discipline. And we seem to neglect, perhaps totally, the whole human way of living, what is happening to man; that is, what is happening to you as a student or as a professor, what is your relationship with all the world, with all the things, most terrible things, horrible things that are happening and also all the excellent things in the world of technology - rapid communication, surgery, medicine and all that side. And also they are inventing all the instruments of war that can destroy the whole of humanity with one blow. This is not an exaggeration on the part of the speaker but this is a fact. If one lived in America, they have been talking a great deal about what will happen if there is a nuclear war. Ten million people in New York will be evaporated, completely gone, and hundred million people within a radius of hundred miles, more or less. Technology is developing all that side. And human misery, the hovels, that you see in this country, especially in towns like this - human beings living in those hovels, breeding children, living in dirt, squalor, misery on the other side. What relationship has knowledge - not only scientific knowledge but every kind of knowledge that human beings have acquired during the last forty-five thousand years that they have been on earth as human beings and we end up like this, war which has been going on for last five to six thousand years, destruction, hatred, misery, utter confusion and sorrow?

And on the other side, man is trying to find something beyond himself, beyond his own misery, his own selfishness, his utter insufficiency, his lack of affection. They invent gods, especially in this country, I believe there are over three hundred thousand gods, and all that superstition and vast sums of money spent on all that. We were told the other day that a temple in south India, every third day it has a million dollars. So, we are asking you, the professors with their knowledge and you acquiring their knowledge and searching for a vocation which will be imitation - and what has all that got to do with your daily living? The word and the deed are so far apart and one wonders if you are aware of all this. Or, you are enclosed in your own institution, enclave, so that you forget the world?

So we are asking, what place all your knowledge, we are not against knowledge, we are asking, enquiring, what place has knowledge which you are acquiring, which may be necessary in a certain area, what place has that in your relationship with the rest of humanity? Please, the speaker is not giving a lecture, he is not doing any kind of propaganda or trying to convince you of anything, but we are trying to observe together, see exactly what is happening, without any bias, without the speaker's or your prejudice to see exactly what is taking place and facing it, answer what is our response to all this.

We are enquiring together. What place has knowledge in the world of human relationship, what place has all your scientific information, gathered, stored in the brain as memory? And memory is always in the past. Knowledge is never complete, whether in the future or in the past, knowledge is never complete because experience from which knowledge arises is also limited, incomplete; there can be no complete experience. So from experience knowledge, whether it is scientific, human and so on, stored in the brain as memory, and from that memory arises thought, and thought is the very essence of knowledge. The thinker is knowledge, is the activity of knowledge, and the thought of the thinker is also part of knowledge. There is no thinker apart from thought. And the world, both in the scientific world, and in all the cruelty that is going on, brutality, torture, inhumanity, the utter disregard for the other human beings, all the things that are taking place in the world, poetry, great paintings, music. And this evening when you saw the sunlight on the water, the sparkling water, clear, so extraordinarily beautiful, and all that thought has built, except nature. Nature, the tiger is not created by thought. That lake which you see everyday - probably you have got used to it, probably you hardly look at it - man has not created that. Apart from nature, the heavens and all the things of the earth, thought has not built, has no relationship to all that. But thought has invented gods, thought has built the most marvellous architecture, the great temples of this country, the great mosques, the great cathedrals of Europe and all the things that are in it are put together by thought. And thought is limited; there is no complete thought. Thought can never be complete. It can imagine, it can measure the heavens, but thought is always limited.

And technology, the technological world is the product of thought. Without thought you could not produce a submarine or go to the moon or invent the nuclear bomb. Thought has been responsible for all this, and facing all this, we have innumerable problems, the world is faced with tremendous problems both politically, economically, socially and also, if you are interested in that kind of affair, in religion - not the religion that is going on throughout the world which is mere superstition, lot of faith and belief, which has nothing whatever to do with what is true religion.

So, having laid down, laid before you what is going on in the world - of which I am quite sure, you are quite aware - what is your response to all this, not just one particular aspect of life but to the whole of existence of man, that is, your whole existence till you die, from now till you die, what is the meaning of all this? So what is your answer, your response to the world, to your vocation, which is imitation, conformity, absorption, either using that knowledge skillfully or inefficiently? And what is your relationship with your neighbour, with your wife, with your husband? And what is your relationship with the rest of humanity? If you are at all thinking about these things, you must have an answer. We have lived on this earth, as the biologists and others point out, as homo sapiens for forty to fifty thousand years. We have had wars, confusion, uncertainty, insecurity, misery, great anxiety. After all these thousands and thousands of years, we are still very primitive. We may be extraordinarily technologically advanced, but inwardly, in the psychological world which always dominates the outer, the external, we are primitive, brutal, violent, selfish, superstitious, frightened and so on. So, we are keeping the two, that is, the external, the technological, the daily travail, and the inward life, these two are completely separate. You may have excellent theories about human nature in the psychological world, you may be great technicians, but all that is the movement of memory, knowledge, and that has nothing whatever to do with your daily behaviour. The two are divorced, the word and the deed, and that is what we have been educated for. So, our education, our knowledge, which is completely limited, will always be limited. What has knowledge to do with our human relationship? Does not knowledge kill love?

Do you understand what we are saying? May I go on with what I am saying because this is not, as we have pointed out, a lecture to inform and to instruct? So this is not a lecture. This is a conversation, a dialogue between us in which you are taking part. You are not merely, if I may most respectfully point out, you are not merely listening to the speaker, words, intellectually grasping certain concepts, ideas, but we are having a dialogue, a conversation about the whole of existence as human beings. So please you are taking part in what the speaker is saying, not merely listening to certain words.

We live by words. Our whole brain is a network of words, and words are not the actual. This microphone, the word 'microphone' is not the actual thing you see. But we are so caught up, so conditioned by words, by language, by tradition, by knowledge, and so our brain is never free. We are problem-solving machines, aren't we? We have been trained from childhood to learn mathematics, and that becomes a problem for a child, or geography, or history, physics and so on. And also it becomes a problem in a school, in college, in universities, in institutions. We are problem-solving machines, that is a fact. And we have made life, the living, into a vast dreadful problem. So we are so conditioned, our brains, and our brain has divided the world; that is, a Christian, into the Hindu, the Buddhist, the Islamic world, separate, divided. And this division of nationalism is one of the causes of war. The cause of war is economic division, each country concerned with itself.

There is great misery, poverty, brutality in this country. When you drive down from Bombay, you see all those huts, tents, filthy; human beings are living there. You want to cry when you see all that, and nobody cares. I know, you listen to this, what the speaker has to say, but it will make very little dent. Governments don't care, individuals don't care, because they are only concerned with themselves, with their power, with their knowledge, with their money. The modern civilization is based on power and money. And students throughout the world, because the speaker has spoken at many universities in America and some of the institutions in this country and they are all being trained to seek a vocation of imitation; to be safe, to pass examinations, get a degree, Ph.D. and all the rest it, and get a job either in this country or go to America. Probably, as I was informed this afternoon, 30 per cent of you go to America where you make lot of money. That's all your knowledge is leading you to. And we are asking, if you are at all serious - and youth generally is serious about certain matters - what is your response, your action to all this that is going on? Either you withdraw from it, join some cranky institution, ashram, some gurus, who are making tons of money, or enter into the world, caught in it, or you have a life of your own. And what is the purpose of your existence? What is the meaning of your existence? Please, the speaker is saying all this in humility. He is only challenging you. What is the purpose of all this?

Is life's purpose merely to earn money, to be married, a house, power, position? Is that the purpose of your life? And apparently it is. That is what you are all being trained for. That is what you want, and if you are dissatisfied with that, then you invent a purpose; the purpose is to find god or some kind of imaginative illumination. Or if that doesn't satisfy you, you take to drugs, drink, and all the rest of the vast amusement. One wonders if you have realized what the entertainment industry is doing to you. There is not only the religious entertainment, going to temples, puja and all the circus that goes on around a temple or a church or mosque. Please don't get annoyed, I am just pointing this out. And what is the purpose of all this. On earth we have lived for forty to fifty thousand years. Please realize this. We have evolved, we have gone through great many tears, laughter, pain, anxiety and yet we remain what we are - selfish, narrow-minded, concerned with ourselves and to hell with everything else. That's an actual fact.

So, if one may ask, are you wasting your life - life which is so complex, which has no ready-made answers, life which is so vast and therefore it is something most extraordinarily sacred, and what do we do with it? You have to answer this question, whether you are old or young, well established in a position, wealth, power - is that the whole meaning of life? And if that is the whole meaning of life, which is to have knowledge, knowing that knowledge will always be limited and therefore thought will always be limited and therefore divisive, therefore bringing about great conflict in oneself and therefore outwardly, externally, and knowing - if one has examined it objectively, without any fear - that the whole religious structure throughout the world is just utterly meaningless. So, you as students and professors, with that marvellous lake, with the sun on it, the beauty of it, the poem of it, the grandeur, what is your response, what is your responsibility.

You see, we have always had leaders. In this country especially and also in Europe, more so, you had great leaders here one after the other, both religious, political, social and all that business. And where have they led you? Where has Marx led the communist world? Where have all your so-called sacred literature, Upanishads, Gita and all those books - there is nothing sacred about them, no book is sacred - all those things that we have invented? So, what is the meaning of all this existence? You may not want to look at it, you may want to avoid it. You may say I am too young, it's not my business. And the older people say sorry, we are too old, we can't face it any more. They are willing to die. And so what is your knowledge leading to - conformity? Imitation? Absorption of all this information and nothing original, nothing pristine? And what place has knowledge in love? Is not knowledge the enemy of love, the destroyer of love? Would you please consider this? You give about twenty or thirty years to acquiring - in the acquisition of physics, linguistic experimentation, with biology, sociology, with philosophy, psychoanalysis, psychiatry and so on, you give years and years and you don't give one day or one hour to find out for yourself what you are and why you are living like this. After all, sirs and ladies, you don't mind if I say sirs, sirs includes the ladies, all right? Don't be offended if we do not say sirs and ladies. After all sirs, have you observed that human beings whether they live in America, both the affluent and also there is a great deal of poverty, misery in America, a great deal of poverty in Europe, nearly four million people unemployed in England, and all the tyranny that is going on, in Russia, the brutality of it all in the name of Marx and socialism, or you come to this country, poverty, incurable, most appalling poverty. We have been brought up in it, not you perhaps, who have wealth, power, all of us have. My generation, that particular people, have lived through poverty. And have you realized, if I may most politely point out, that whether they live in an affluent society, whether they live in castles or in huts or whether they live as students, this human consciousness is shared by all human beings because all human beings suffer, go through great agonies, great sense of loneliness, despair, the meaninglessness of this existence. All human beings on this earth, which is so extraordinarily beautiful, and which you are very sedulously destroying. We are living on this earth and all human beings whether they are the poorest, the most illiterate or the highly sophisticated, great professors of great knowledge, they all suffer, they all face death, they are going through great sense of desperate loneliness. We share all this. Every human being on this earth shares all this. Do please listen to what speaker is saying. Don't get bored. Nobody is going to tell you all this. We share the common sorrow, the sorrow of the whole of mankind. Our consciousness is made up of all this. Your consciousness is not yours, though your tradition, religious, economic and social, says you are a separate individual. Your whole consciousness, your consciousness is what you are - your beliefs, your superstitions, your fears, your anxieties, your faith, your lack of love, your selfishness is the consciousness of all humanity. There is no escape from that. That's a fact. And therefore you are not an individual. You may be tall, you may be a woman or a man, you may have fair skin and so on, but you are not an individual - not the individual in the sense, in the communist sense, Marxist sense; we are talking of something much deeper than the social product.

So you are not an individual. You are the whole of humanity, because you smile, you laugh, you shed tears, you go through great turmoil, you make effort, conflict, facing insecurity. The Americans are doing exactly the same thing; so are the Russians. So you are actually the rest of mankind. You are not a Hindu though you like to call yourself a Hindu. That is just your local, provincial, narrow conditioning. Facing all this, are you going to waste your life, getting a job, passing some examinations, being trained to imitate? That's what you are being taught - to imitate, to conform, to fit into the pattern. And is that the end of life? Then you will ask: What shall we do? Is there something else? To find something totally different from all this, you have to have a great deal of intelligence. Intelligence is not knowledge. Knowledge gives you capacity, knowledge gives you position, status.

Knowledge is not love. Knowledge is not compassion. It is only where there is love and compassion there is intelligence, and that intelligence has nothing whatsoever to do with the cunning intelligence of thought.

So we must ask - if the speaker can most politely put it before you - what is the meaning of your existence? Are you wasting your life? And this is the only life you have; you may think there is reincarnation, that you will be born next life; that may be merely theory. But what matters is, even if you believe in reincarnation, what matters is how you live now - if you are good, if you are not violent, if you are a total human being, not broken up into scientists, biologists, special careers. Then your life is broken up, in conflict, and so your life is never a holistic movement. So considering all this, will you waste your life? Nobody can answer that question except yourself. If the speaker were to tell you, which he won't because it is absurd, unintelligent, stupid to say what is the purpose of life. The purpose of life is what you are doing now - study or you have already a job, earn more money, more status, more power and that is what you want, and that is the purpose of your life.

And also you have to face the ultimate thing which is death. You may not face it now, as you are all young people, but it is there for you as well as for the older generation. It is always there, and can you live with death? That requires a great deal of enquiry, to live with death, not commit suicide, not run away from death, but to know the depth and the greatness and the tremendous vitality of death. This is all of life. This is the whole of life, to have knowledge, to be able to enquire into the whole psychological world of which you are. To understand all that not from books, not from philosophers, not from your professors, but learn from yourself what you are. You will discover, if you go into yourself, that your whole life is based on becoming something, as a clerk becomes a manager, the reader becomes the professor, the chief minister ultimately becomes the prime minister and so on - they are always both outwardly and inwardly trying to become something. And this is what we call living, never a moment of quietness, never a moment of great beauty in our life, but the incessant chattering of the brain. And you, if one may point out, you are facing all this. Don't disregard all this because the psychological world, the inner world, what you are inwardly, overcomes whatever social structure, governments are established, always overcomes all that, as you see it in Russia. They started out by having no government, no army, no division, no nationality; they said governments will disappear, but the psyche was far more strong than the superficial social structure. So they have there now the privileged, the top people who have everything in the world, the best of everything, like here the top people.

So what are you going to do after listening to this talk - not a lecture - a conversation between you and the speaker? What is your responsibility? Is your brain open to all this? Is this a global affair or your own narrow little yard, the narrow little self, the 'me', which is a very small affair? Or you are going to be concerned with the whole world, which means you cannot be an Indian any more, you cannot be a Christian, a Hindu, a Buddhist? All those divisions are destructive, they have no meaning. We have to bring a new civilization, a new culture, a new way of looking at life.

I've finished talking. Do you want to ask questions? The speaker has stopped, do you want to ask any questions, written or otherwise? I am not the oracle. Mon Dieu.

Question: Knowledge of any kind cannot be bad. What could possibly be bad is the use of it, the use it is put into. In the opinion of the listener the call of the day is to acquire or cultivate the sense, which is again knowledge, of properly using knowledge for proper causes. Kindly comment.

K: Need I read that question again? Read it once more sir, louder.

Q: Knowledge of any kind cannot be bad. What could possibly be bad is the use of it, the use it is put into to. In the opinion of this listener the call of the day is to acquire or cultivate the sense, which is again knowledge, of properly using knowledge for proper causes. Kindly comment.

K: Who is the user? Who is the entity that is using knowledge properly or wrongly? Right? Is not the entity, the user of knowledge, himself knowledge? You understand my question? You have asked a question that if we use knowledge rightly it is all right, it is the wrong usage of knowledge that is wrong - that's bluntly put. But I am asking, the speaker is asking the questioner, who is the user who uses knowledge rightly? Is not the user, the thinker, the entity, isn't he also knowledge? Is he separate from knowledge? Or the problem is not the right usage of knowledge, right or wrong usage, but what place has knowledge? It is knowledge in the right place, which is to drive a car, to write a letter, if you are a carpenter, to use the knowledge that you have acquired about the wood, the shape of the wood, the quality of the wood, the grain of the wood and so on. There you need knowledge, but do we need knowledge about oneself? Because oneself is knowledge. I don't know if you understand this. Is the speaker answering your question, sir?

First of all, if I may most respectfully point out, the question is wrong. You assume, if I may point out most politely, you assume that the user of knowledge is different from knowledge. Who are you who is going to use knowledge? Are you not the result of centuries of knowledge, unconscious, conscious? You, the self, is knowledge. So you have divided knowledge and the entity that uses knowledge, but both are based on knowledge. So we are saying that knowledge has a definite place in the world of daily activity, but psychological knowledge, that is, the knowledge that you have about your wife, and you have about your husband, that knowledge is divisive, that knowledge prevents love. You can see this simply. You have an image about your wife, and the wife has an image about you, and the images are built through knowledge. You have been with her for twenty years or five days and you have already got knowledge about her, so you have built an image about her, and the images have relationship, not you and the woman or the man. Sir, these are all facts if you examine closely.

Question: As said by you, we are problem-solving machines, which means machines meant for research and scientific investigation, do you think then that all the problems of humanity would be solved if life is organized from the point of view of developing, producing and maintaining these machines scientifically with an aim to promote research and science, and not left to develop haphazardly as is going on today?

K: I don't understand it.

Q: He says, you say we are all problem-solving machines, in which case...

K: Organize it. Yes, organize it. May I tell you a story? Two friends who were walking in one of the dirty streets of Bombay, and one of them picks up something from the pavement and looks at it, and his face is tremendously illuminated, happy, he cannot hold himself. And he keeps looking at this extraordinary thing he has picked up. And his friend says, 'What have you picked up? You look so happy, so radiant, something has happened to you, what have you picked up?' He said, 'I have picked up truth.' And the friend says, 'Marvellous, let's go and organize it.' No laugh? Do you see the point of that story? You want everything organized, put in their categories. Organization demands hierarchy, and you are used to hierarchy, both religiously, politically, socially, somebody always in authority above you. So what does authority do to you? Of course the professor knows more about physics than you do, the surgeon knows more than the beginner in medicine, but why do you need hierarchy, authority in the spiritual world - forgive me if I use that word 'spiritual' because that has been misused that word, why do you want authority about yourself? Who is going to tell you about yourself? The professor? Volumes have been written from the ancient Greeks and Egyptians, what you are. And probably some of you have read them but you remain what you are. And you want what you are to be organized.

So organization in certain areas is necessary, and in the other, the psychological world it is destructive because then psychologically we become slaves to organization.

Question: Throughout your talk you claimed that there is already a lot of confusion in this world, but I do not remember you having given a suggestion or a solution regarding that. Don't you think that this adds to the confusion rather than reduces it?

K: Certainly. Certainly it adds more confusion. But I didn't say the confusion is not there, it is there. I don't claim it. Walk down any street in Bombay, or in Paris or in New York, or where you will, there is a great deal of confusion, that's a fact. Aren't you in confusion? And the questioner says, that's a negative statement. What is your positive statement? You understand? You have said that there is confusion - I claim, as the questioner says - I don't claim it. It would be absurd if I claimed, but it is a fact. The fact is that where there is confusion there is conflict; like the Arab and the Jew, both are semitic people, divided by propaganda on the part of the Jews for four to five thousand years, on the part of the Muslim between sixteen hundred years. They are fighting each other, killing each other. That is the essence of confusion, it's not, I claim it, it is so. Aren't you all confused when you look at yourself honestly, clearly, aren't you all confused? You may be good at your science, you may have a good job, but inwardly, aren't you all asking, what is it all about? You are confused. And the questioner says, what is your positive remedy, positive action, or suggestion about this confusion. The speaker says, there is no suggestion, he is not offering you a thing, he is not telling you what to do, but look at this confusion carefully, don't say, there is no confusion. You mean to say when you drive to Bombay, the centre of Bombay, you don't see all those hovels, people living there, breeding, those children unhealthy, is that not confusion. Poverty is confusion, isn't there confusion about gods - the Christian god, your Hindu god, isn't that all confusion. So the speaker says, look at the confusion, don't run away from it. Then what happens? Where does the confusion begin? Out there, or in here? Please answer that question, who put this question. Where does the confusion lie, who has created those hovels which we pass daily by? We human beings, you, because you have a rotten government, unconscious community, scandalous behaviour and you allow all that day after day, year after year. So if you realize you have brought this about, your government, your gods, you are responsible for all this. You are responsible for war because you are a Hindu or you are a Jew or a Christian. Therefore don't be a Jew, don't be a Hindu so that you are the whole of humanity, you are a human being not a label.

Question: What is love and how does it arise?

K: Good god! Don't you know what love is? Apparently you don't. Do you love your wife, if you are married? Do you love your children? If you loved your children would you make them conform to this particular rotten society, immoral society, send them to war to be killed?

So the questioner says, what is love and how does it arise? My god! It means, sir, first of all what is love? Can you describe it? Can you put it into words? Or would you find out what is not love? Would you approach it negatively, not positively and say what is love, tell me how to get it. Do you realize, sir, what this question implies? That you have never loved anybody, whether you are married, whether you have had sex, children. So what is love? Would you approach it negatively saying what it is not. Is love jealousy? Is love devotion? Is love possessiveness, domination, man dominating the woman as in this country it is happening? Is that love? Is love attachment? Where there is attachment there is fear. Right? If you are attached to your wife and she turns away from you, you become jealous, angry, hatred and all the ugly things that go on. So could you, if one may point out most gently, find out what love is by negating what it is not? An ambitious man, as most of you are, can never know love, he is only concerned with himself. A man who is devoted to god, goes to temples, mosques, churches, tremendous devotion to his guru - you know how they kowtow to the guru, go almost on their knees to the so-called guru, who is just like you. Is devotion love? Or real sentiment, emotion? So find out, sir, find out what it is not, and then you have that perfume, that extraordinary thing, then life has a meaning, not all your knowledge.

I am afraid we must stop now. It is a quarter to eight. And also, if I may spend two minutes, Hindus are accustomed to meditation. It's one of their games. What is meditation? Why do you meditate? You meditate in order to achieve something. Right? Achieve happiness, peace, or whatever you like, illumination, peace of mind and all that business. Your meditation is just like any other person who says, I am going to become a businessman, only you call it meditation, the other calls it business. Both want to achieve something. Is that meditation? Or meditation is something entirely different? I won't go into that question, it is too complicated. But you should look at all this, not think about it, look at it. If you have time, if you have the inclination, if you are interested, and obviously if you are serious and concerned with what is happening in the world, happening to yourself, you have to look at all this.

And of course you are too busy studying books and you won't have time, and therefore you are destroying the world, not looking at your own life and your relationship to the world. Right, sirs.

BOMBAY QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 9TH FEBRUARY 1984

There are several questions, a whole packet of them. How do you approach a question? Is the question more important than the answer? Or does the answer lie in the question itself? So we are asking before we go into these questions, how you receive a question, how you look at a question, how you respond to a question. Or are you merely seeking an answer to the question? If you are seeking an answer, the answer is more important than the question. So we are saying it is very important how you approach a question. And the manner, how you investigate the question, for the answer lies in the question itself, not away from it. I hope this is clear, that we are both seeking to find a solution to a question, but we are saying that it is far more important to understand the nature and the content of the question. So we are both of us, you and the speaker, are going to investigate the question itself, and then in understanding the question the answer is in the investigation of that question. I hope this is clear.

There are several questions here and you and the speaker together are going to explore the nature of the question, and then perhaps we will be able to find the answer in the question itself. Is this fairly clear? So we are going to read these questions first.

1st Question: What is beauty? Why do we like things that are beautiful?

That's the question. So we are together going to investigate, explore, to find out the question itself, the content of the question. Is this clear? The questioner asks, what is beauty. Now when you look around this hall, is it beautiful? When you look at the sky of an evening, with one star in the heavens, is that beautiful? Or when you see a marvellous sunset, full of colour, great depth, great sense of expansion, the whole universe is filled with light and colour, is that beautiful? Or only the things that man has made are beautiful? Man has made the cathedrals, the temples, the churches, and the various types of mosques all over the world. So man-made things like a painting, poem, a sculpture, a building, which are all man-made, and therefore are they beautiful? That is, is man the measure of beauty? Or man is the measure of all things? Do we understand each other?

We are asking to find out what is beautiful. It is a very complex question and requires a great sensitivity to find out for ourselves what is beauty. You see a marvellous sunset, the early morning rising of the sun over the trees, or you see a great mountain against a clear blue sky, tender, quiet, silent, great sense of tremendous dignity, a sense of wonder. When that takes place, that is, when you see a great marvellous thing, what happens when you look at it? When you look at a sunset over the sea, and a great light, brilliant ball of sunset, what takes place in you? Please we are investigating together, you are not just waiting for the speaker to answer your question. We are together exploring the question, whatever the question, political, economic, social and so on.

The questioner here is asking what is beauty. We are saying that beauty exists only when the self, the 'me' is not. Man-made things like a painting, like a marvellous photograph of a tree, or of a person, of a great river flowing down full of light and volume, when you look at all this, the wonder of the earth, the beauty of the earth, what takes place in you when you look at something extraordinarily beautiful? For the moment you cease to exist. You with all your problems, with your worries, with your daily travail and misery, confusion, all that is dissipated or driven away by something that you see with great, tremendous beauty. You, for the moment, are absent. Would you agree to that? Are you listening to all this? If you are listening and you see or perceive when there is beauty, great beauty, not merely physical beauty of a woman or a man, when you perceive that, for a second your self is not there. I would consider that is great beauty.

And also - it is a very noisy place, isn't it - and also the questioner asks, why do we like something that is beautiful. And also that question implies, why do we tolerate something that is ugly, dirty, like the filthy streets of Bombay, why do we tolerate it, why do we allow it? You might say, it is not our responsibility, it is the responsibility of the government, and the government is corrupt and so everything goes to pieces. But are we aware, sensitively, to the environment in which we live, the room in which we live, whether it is orderly, clean, well proportioned or not, are we aware of all this? Or, we just put up with everything? And so most of us become when you see constantly day after day the squalor, the dirt, the inhumanity of man against man, you get used to it, your sensitivity becomes dull, corroded, and so you never see actually that which is beautiful.

2nd Question: Is the perception of the actual possible without the intervention of thought?

Do you understand the question? Is it possible to perceive a tree, your wife, or your husband, or your boss, or your helper, your servant, or the nature around you, to perceive that without the intervention of thought? If the question is clear, that is, can you see a tree, or the new moon, or the setting of the sun, or your wife, or your husband, or your children, without thought interfering with your perception? That's the question. Let us explore the question.

What do we mean perceiving, to perceive, to observe? When you perceive your wife, or your husband, or your girl friend, or your son, do you actually see them as they are, or you have a picture of them, an image of them, and through that image, through those coloured glasses of memories, conclusions, you look through? Please examine kindly what the speaker is saying. Examine your own wife, or your husband, or your neighbour, or your boss and so on, whether you can look at them without a single movement of thought or image or the word. Suppose I am married - which I am not - suppose I am married, I live with my wife for twenty, or thirty, or fifteen days, and during that interval of time I have built through various incidents, accidents, an image about her. She has built an image about me. These images, these memories, prevent me from looking at her actually, what she is.

And then the question arises: is it possible to look at a human being, whether it be my wife, or a neighbour, or a stranger, to look at them without a single movement of thought. That is what the questioner is asking. You are sitting there, and the speaker is sitting up here, you apparently are here with an image, with a conclusion, with memories of the speaker. Right? Right sirs? Are you responding to my question? Can you observe the speaker without all the reputation that you have build about him, all the things that have been said about him, and all the things that you perhaps may have read about him, what he has said, to put away all that and look at him, observe him. Will you do that? Can you do it? That is, to look at something, or a person, or anything, without a previous memory, conclusion, remembrance, just to look afresh, is that possible? That means thought not interfering with your observation. If you have ever tried, or if you ever will do it, you will find the most extraordinary things happen. You begin to discover something which you have never thought of. You begin to discover something totally new. If you look at your wife, or your husband without all the memory that you have accumulated about her, and she about you, then you are looking at her, or him, for the first time afresh. So a relationship is constantly renewed, fresh, not the old memories of relating and interfering. Have you ever tried all this? Or are you just listening, 'Yes, it sounds very grand, but I can't do it', and carry on. So if you actually do it once or twice, to put away all the accumulated memories that you have about her or him, then you are looking at the person for the first time afresh. And when you look at that person afresh something totally new takes place, a new kind of relationship comes into being.

3rd Question: How can one live with a husband who does not care?

I don't know! Let's look into the question. What is a husband, and what is a wife? In America, and other parts of the world, man, a boy and a girl are living together without going through marriage ceremony, or going through the Registrar to register their marriage. That's one thing: a boy and a girl live together without going through marriage, or recording officially. Then there is the other side: you go through a ceremony between man and woman, and that ceremony, that going to church, or the Registrar, that officially makes you man and wife, husband and wife. What is the difference between these two? You understand my question? What is the difference between a man and a woman living together without going through the ceremony of marriage, and what is the difference between them and a man and woman who go through an expensive marriage, what is the difference between the two? One has a paper, legalized, saying, you are husband and wife, society says you are married, you have certain responsibilities to look after your wife, your children and all the rest of it. And also the others who do not go to church and all the rest of it, or go through a marriage ceremony, either they are very irresponsible, or they are very responsible. Both are responsible. Right? If they take living together seriously both are responsible.

So we are asking, what is a husband, and what is a wife? You answer that question, most of you, I presume who are here, are married, or you have a girl friend - perhaps not in India so much but in Europe and America it is quite common. So what is a husband? A husband is supposed to work, go to the office, or go to some kind of work from nine till five o'clock, spends most of the day in an office, either pleasant or unpleasant, a factory and so on. And then comes home. The wife, the woman, cooks the meal, looks after, if she has children, the children, and so on. This is our daily routine. Right? Do you agree to that? For god's sake. Yes? This is what is happening the world over: the woman stays at home, or she goes to the office also to earn more money, and the wife generally looks after the children if she has any, and stays at home. What is the relationship between these two people? The husband who works from nine till five, and also the woman goes off to work from nine till five, what is their relationship? Have you ever thought about it? Life is becoming more and more complex, more and more expensive, so both the woman and the man have to work. And if they have children, which perhaps unfortunately they have, what happens to the children? The woman comes home and the husband comes home, tired, and will they care for each other, except sexually? Will they really care? You ask this question to the speaker, and he is supposed to answer that question. You should put this question to yourself and not to the speaker.

The question is: how does one live with a husband who doesn't care? Either you say, goodbye, old man, or, old boy, or you put up with him. This is generally what happens, you put up with him, getting more and more indifferent to each other, more and more isolated, more and more depressed, and all the misery of living with a man or a woman who doesn't really care at all. It's your problem, not mine. So what will you do? Go after another woman, go after another man? And it happens. It will also happen there, after a little while he will not care. So you are probably always caught in this problem. Which means, is there love at all? When two people live together, is it a sexual, biological activity of coming together, or is there love in their lives, caring for each other? Perhaps you know this answer better than the speaker.

4th Question: Is it necessary to marry in love? What is the physical relationship between man and woman?

I don't know, you ought to know. What a strange question this is, isn't it? Is it necessary to marry in love? What do you say? If the speaker puts this question to you, what will you answer: is it necessary sirs, and ladies, that I should marry? What would be your answer? Your answer probably would be, do what you want to do, why bother me with it. It's up to you.

But you see the question is really much more complex than that. We all want companionship, we all want sexual relationships, a biological necessity. And also we want somebody on whom we can rely, in whom we can find security, in whom there is a sense of comfort, support. Because most of us cannot stand alone, on our own feet, therefore we say, I must marry, or I will have a friend, or whatever it is, I must have somebody with whom I can be at home. We are never at home with anybody because we are living in our own thoughts, in our own problems, in our own ambitions and so on. And we are frightened to stand alone. Because life is very lonely, life is very, very complex, troublesome and one needs somebody with whom you can talk things over. And also when you marry you have sexual relationship, children and so on. So in this relationship between man and woman it is always, if there is no love, that you use her and she uses you, you exploit her and she exploits you. That's a fact.

So the questioner says, asks, should one marry. And what is the physical relationship between man and woman. Don't you know? It's up to you, sirs. But to really enter into this whole complex problem of living together, not only with two people, living together with humanity, with your neighbour, with your boss, with your servant, if you have a servant, with your father, and mother, and children, to live together, it's a very complex thing. Living together as a family gives you a certain security, certain safety, and so you extend that family to a group, to a community, to a state, to a nation, and from a nation which is opposed to another nation, and so there is always division and conflict, and wars. So one has to find out how to live with another without any conflict, without any sense of struggle, adaptation, adjustment. That requires a great deal of intelligence, integrity. But we just marry on because of sexual, biological demands and so on.

Did you make up these questions?

Audience: No.

K: They say, no.

5th Question: What is the difference between the brain and the mind?

This is a very complex question. We know what the brain is. The scientists are saying now, there is the left side of the brain and the right side of the brain. The left side of the brain is used daily. I won't go into all the details of it, you can read it, if you want to, I haven't read it, but some friends who are scientists have told me about it. The left side of the brain is in operation, activity, functioning with all the daily activity. And the right side of the brain is not operating fully, not functioning fully because the right side of the brain is much more intelligent, much more acute, much more aware. And also the brain is the centre of all action and reaction, of all the sensory responses. This is what the speaker is saying. So the brain contains, or has, the whole content of consciousness. Consciousness is your belief, your faith, your name, your faculty, capacity, all the memories, all the hurts, pleasure, pain, agony, sorrow, all that, affection and so on, all that is the content of your consciousness. The content of your consciousness is you, is the self, is the 'me'. That content of consciousness may invent a super-super-consciousness, or invent various kinds of unimagined, or imagined states, but it is still within the content of your consciousness. Do we see this? You, you are your name, your body, your anger, your greed, your competition, your ambition, your pleasure, your pain, and so on, affection, all that, you are that. And that means the content of your consciousness. The content of your consciousness is the past. Right? Past memories, past incidents, past - all kinds of activities, experiences, you are the past. You are knowledge, which is the past. So that is the brain.

We are saying, and the speaker may be wrong, and he has discussed this matter with some of the so-called scientists, and even then the speaker may be wrong, don't please accept what he says; doubt what he says, question, enquire. He says, the brain is the whole limited consciousness, with all its content, pleasant, unpleasant, ugly, beautiful, struggle, all that is your content. And the mind is something totally separate from the brain. The mind is outside the brain - the speaker is saying, the scientists are not saying that. The speaker says the brain is one thing, and mind is something entirely different. The brain with all its content, with its struggles, with its pain, anxieties, can never know, understand the beauty of love. Love is limitless. It is not, I love one person only. It is too vast, too tremendous. And the brain with all its contents, miseries, confusion, cannot comprehend, or hold, or be alive to love; only the mind, which is limitless.

So there is a difference between the brain and the mind. Then what the questioner doesn't ask, there is still a further question involved in this: what is the relationship then between the mind and the brain? The brain is limited, limited because it is made up of all kinds of separate parts, fragmented, broken up, and therefore it is in constant state of struggle, conflict. Whereas the mind is totally out of that category. There is a relationship only when the brain is completely free, if that is possible, from all the content of its memories. This requires a great deal of enquiry, sensitivity.

Intelligence is not of the brain. The intelligence of thought cannot contain the intelligence of the mind. Do you understand all this?

Does somebody understand what I am talking about? No. All right.

Look, sirs, be very simple, because if one can be very, very simple you can go very, very far. But if you begin with lots of complex theories and conclusions, you are stuck. So let's be very simple. Your daily life, going to the office, working and working and working, trained in certain disciplines, as doctor, surgeon, businessman, or a cook, or whatever it is, your brain is being narrowed down, limited. If I am a physicist I spend years and years learning about physics, studying, investigating, research into it, so my brain is being narrowed down. There are two scientists here, they agree! And our brain has become mechanical, routine, small, because we are so concerned with ourselves, always living in a very, very small area of like, dislike, pain, sorrow, and all the rest of it. But the mind is something entirely different. You cannot understand or comprehend the nature of that mind if your brain is limited. You cannot understand the limitless when your life is limited. Right? So that is the relationship, the relationship between the brain and the mind can only take place when the brain is free from its content. This is a complex question, and requires much more going into but we haven't the time for it.

6th Question: What is faith?

Faith in god, faith. I have faith in my wife, she won't betray me. I have faith in my husband. I have faith in my business. Faith. The whole of Christendom, all the religious structure, nature, of Christianity is based on faith. And there they do not question, they do not have doubt, scepticism. If you have faith in god then you cannot possibly allow any form of scepticism, doubt to enter; or in the Islamic world. But in the Hindu world, and in the Buddhist world, doubt is one of the necessary qualities to cleanse the mind, brain. You have faith, haven't you, all of you, belief? Have you ever questioned your belief, your faith and your illusions? Or you just accept them? When you have faith you have put aside altogether any question of investigation. Suppose I believe in god, believe, have faith in god, then every question, every doubt must be set aside because my belief in god is based on fear. I don't know what the world is, somebody has created it, and I like to think god has created it - that's one kind of belief. The scientists say there is no such thing as god, it is a natural growth of evolution from the cell into very, very, very, complex cells of the human brain.

So why do we have faith? Isn't that very restricting, narrowing down, limiting? And doesn't faith divide people - the Christian faith, and the Islamic faith, and the Hindus who probably have no faith about anything at all. And so there is constant conflict between them all.

You see there is also another complex question involved in this: why do we have ideals? The whole communist world is based on the theoretical supposition of Marx, Stalin and so on, Lenin - they are their gods. And they believe in what they have said as the Christians believe in what the Bible says, or the Koran, or you, with your Gita, Upanishads, or something else, you are all absorbing what the books say, but you never, for yourself, question the whole thing, because the moment you question, doubt, you have to rely on yourself, and therefore you are frightened; therefore much better to have faith in something illusory, something that doesn't really actually exist. But if you know for yourself, I have to understand my own life, I have to see if it is possible to bring about a great revolution in my life, then you start from there. But if you have faith in something, you are living in an extraordinarily illusory world.

We have got a lot of questions.

7th Question: If human consciousness is one, how is it that one person is happy and the other is unhappy? Also you say, thought is me - please show me how.

Are you happy? And why is another unhappy? You are born rich and your grandfathers and grandparents have left you a factory, or a business, and you are quite happy with it. And another is born in a little village, uneducated, toiling day after day on a piece of earth which is the size of this room, or half the size of this hall, working on it, living on a pittance, and he is unhappy, he doesn't know what happiness or unhappiness is, he is working, working, working. Does happiness depend on circumstances, on work, on what you are doing, or on your satisfaction in doing something? What do you call happiness, and what do you call unhappiness? Happiness can be said to be when you are satisfied, satisfied in doing something, and feel very happy about it. And I am not satisfied in doing something and I am very unhappy about it. Is satisfaction synonymous with happiness?

And am I seeking continuously satisfaction? Which means I am seeking all the time gratification and I will be happy. Or is happiness something that comes and goes, that is a by-product, it is not very important?

And also, the questioner asks, thought is me, show me how. What do you mean 'show you how'? On a screen on a television? Or make a diagram? Or show you verbally? Which is, you accept intellectually if the speaker explains, thought is me - would you understand it? The speaker will explain, that is, he will describe, he will explain, step by step. And will you see the truth of it, or say, no, that is not the self, the self is something far superior, it is divine, it is atman, it is something else. So how will you receive an explanation, knowing the explanation, the description, the word, is not the thing? Right? The window, the word 'window', is not the actual window. Right? I can paint a mountain, but the painting is not the actual mountain. Right? So we can go into this together, I can't show it to you. I can't put it on a screen, television, and show it to you, there it is. But if we can together investigate, if you are willing - if you are bored with it, all right, be bored with it.

So let us together find out. What are you? If you are really frank, serious, when that question is put to you, what are you? Aren't you your name? Aren't you your face, your eyes, your nose, your hair and so on physically? Aren't you the anger? Aren't you the greed, or the greed is separate from you? Aren't you, when there is anxiety, aren't you that anxiety? When you are suffering, suffering when one loses one's wife, husband, children, or grandmother, you know all that, are you not suffering, and is that suffering something separate from you? Aren't you all that? Or do you think - think - that you are separate from all that? Right, sir? Are you separate from all that? Are you separate from your anger, jealousy, from your bank account? You are your bank account, aren't you? Or if I take away your bank account you say, that's not me? Would you say that? 'You can take my bank account because it is not me'. How you would howl if I took away your bank account! So you are your bank account. You are your furniture; you are your house, your insurance, your mortgage, your money. But if you say, 'I am not all that, there is something in me that is watching all this' - is that a fact? Or you have invented it. Many people say there is super-super-consciousness, above all this consciousness. That is, is that not invented by thought? Right? Is not your bank account, not the coin, not the note, all that is not the result of thought? Is not your recognition of your wife, your husband, isn't that thought? So aren't you all the memory of the past, all the tradition of the past, as a Hindu, as this, you know, a Brahmin, non-Brahmin, and all that business, aren't you all that? Of course you are. So you are the knowledge which is the past. You are nothing but memories. Would you accept that? Of course not. Aren't you? If all your memories were taken away, what are you? You would be a vegetable. So your memories, which is always the past, is what you are. Your tradition as a Hindu, as a Parsi, as a Muslim and so on, that's the result of years of propaganda, years of tradition, which is the activity of thought.

So you are thought. If you don't think at all, what are you? So you are the whole content of the past. That past is modifying itself in the present, and continues as the future. So you are the past, the present and the future. In you all time is contained. Oh, you don't understand all this.

And the self, the 'me', my name, my quality, my achievement, my ambition, my pain, my sorrow, is all the past. And so the self is the essence of the past, which is memory, knowledge. And therefore the self is very, very limited. And that's why the self is causing so much mischief in the world. Each self is out for itself. You are out for your own self, aren't you? If you were honest, see this clearly, aren't you out for yourself? - your ambition, your achievements, your fulfilment, your satisfaction.

So thought is you. Thought is limited, because all knowledge is limited, therefore your self is the most limited thing. And therefore you are causing enormous sorrow, enormous conflict, because the self is separative, divisive.

So, sirs, the speaker has explained. The explanation is not the fact. The fact is for you to see this for yourself. If you see this for yourself and say, 'I like the way I am going on', perfectly all right. But you know for yourself that you are creating havoc in the world. And you prefer to live that way, good luck to you. But there might be some who say, that is not the way to live. One must live with a global brain, without any division, without any nationality, without any self. Don't make that into some kind of heightened illumination - only a few can reach it. Anybody who sets his brain and heart to understand the nature of the self, and be free of that self, anybody can do it if they put their mind to it.

Right sir. May I answer one more question? After that we will stop. It's ten o'clock, probably you have to go to your own jobs and all the rest of it. It's ten past ten, sorry. One more question, and that's the end of it.

8th Question: If the great religions of the world are not true religions, what is true religion?

Right, that is the question. Why do you say, if the great religions are not true, why do you say, if? Are they religions? You answer that question. You all go to temples probably, you have all had marriage ceremonies and puja, and all the rest of it, are they religions? Great religions, Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism, are they religions? Which is, their rituals, their hierarchy, their faith, belief, their going to temples and offering enormous sums of money to some things made by hand or by the mind, which you call god, is all that religion? You accept it as religion. But if you question, doubt, then you begin to ask, obviously, these things are all put together by thought. Right? The Bible, the Koran and your own so-called religious books, they are all put down by thought, they are not divine revelations, they are not straight from god's mouth. I know you love to think that. But thought has operated and put down on a piece of paper, and then you accept it as something extraordinarily sacred.

So if you brush aside all that, and that requires scepticism, a sense of freedom to observe, freedom from fear, totally free of fear, then you can find out for yourself what is religion. That is, is there something sacred, not invented by thought, not measured by words, is there something that is immeasurable, timeless? This has been a question from the ancient of times. The ancient Egyptians, the Greeks, all the great past civilizations have asked this question: is there something beyond all this, which thought has not invented, which thought has not touched, because thought can be measured? Thought is a material process, and whatever it invents is not sacred. So to find that out the brain must be entirely free from its content, from fear, from anxiety, from the sense of terrible loneliness, from death. Then only you will find out what is truth, what is the highest form of religion.

BOMBAY 3RD PUBLIC TALK 11TH FEBRUARY 1984

May we continue with what we were talking about the last time that we met here? We were talking about conflict, whether it is possible to live in this world without problems and conflict. We shall go on talking about that because for most of us life, the daily living, is a series of struggles, conflicts, pain and varieties of anxieties. And we were asking whether it is possible living in this crazy world to live a life in which every kind of problem and conflict doesn't exist. It may sound rather absurd, or even crazy, to think about such things, to live without a single conflict.

As we were saying the other day, all this requires, the enquiry into this question, considerable intelligence, considerable energy, application. Merely to discuss, or to have a dialogue between you and the speaker verbally, theoretically, has very little meaning. So if we could together this evening, in spite of the crows, if we could think together, go into this problem whether there is an art of living in which one can live in daily life, not in a theoretical world, in daily life, can live without, psychologically, inwardly, without all the turmoil, the pain of change, and the anxiety involved in that change, whether it is possible to live such a life.

To ask such a question may seem quite incredible because our life from the moment we are born until we die is a series of conflicts, struggles, ambition trying to fulfil itself, and all the pain of existence, with sorrow, pleasure and so on. So if we could go into this question: the art of living, daily life. We have many arts: the art of painting, the art of making a marvellous shoe, a first-class shoe, and the art of painting, the art of engineering, the art of communication, there are many, many arts. But for most of us, and probably for the rest of the world too, we have never asked this question: the art of living. To find that out - Bombay is rather a dirty country, it makes ones eyes water, I am not crying - requires investigation, how to live. Because the art of living is the greatest art, and the most important art, greater than any other, greater than the art of governments, the art of communication, in spite of all that we have never enquired very deeply, what is the art of living our daily life, which requires such subtlety, sensitivity, and a great deal of freedom. Because without freedom you cannot find out what is the art of living. The art of living isn't a method, a system, or ask another how to find the art of living, but it requires considerable intellectual activity, and also a deep abiding honesty. Very few of us are honest. It is getting worse and worse in the world. We are not honest people: we say one thing, do another, we talk about philosophy, god, all the theories that the ancient Indians have invented, and we are rather good at all that kind of stuff, but the word, the description, the explanation, is not the deed, the action. And that's why there is a great deal of dishonesty. And to enquire into the art of living there must be a fundamental, unshakable, immutable honesty. Honesty which is not corruptible, which doesn't adjust itself to environment, to demands, to various forms of challenges. It requires a great integrity to find out because we are dealing with a very, very complex problem. It isn't just easy to live a life which is perfectly orderly, without dissipating energy, without living in any kind of illusion or tradition. Tradition, however old, however modern, is merely carrying on the old pattern. And the old pattern cannot possibly adjust itself to the new.

So together, and we mean together, it is not that the speaker is saying something to which you agree or disagree, but together exercising your intellect, your reason, your sanity, if you have sanity, and together looking at this very complex problem. As we said the other day, this is not a lecture, this is not a lecture to give you information, facts, instruct you, to persuade you, to slightly, delicately direct you in a particular direction, not doing any kind of propaganda, to inseminate a new set of ideas. It is not anything of that kind. That would be dishonourable on the part of the speaker when he says it is not that, and he means that. So you are exercising your own brain, your own sense of urgency, demand to find out if there is a way of living which is totally orderly. So please, if you will, be serious for this evening. You may not be serious for the rest of the year, or the rest of the week, but at least for once in one's life to be totally earnest, to be completely honest with oneself. Then we can together go into this question, what is the art of living.

How are we going to find out the art? To put everything in its right place, not exaggerating one or the other, not giving one's instinct, one's urges, in one direction, and neglecting totally the other, not trying to fulfil in a particular direction but together you and the speaker are going to find out for ourselves, not that you will be told by the speaker. This is important to understand. I am sorry, the crows are having fun! They are saying good-night to each other. They will quieten down when it gets a little darker.

So please, for this evening at least, see how important it is to find out a way of living in which conflict, problems don't exist. Because conflict and problems waste our energy. One has to find out why problems exist. There are mathematical problems, geographical problems and so on, academic problems; we are not talking about those problems. We are talking about the problems of human beings. They are first human beings, afterwards they are scientists, engineers, businessmen and all the rest of it, first they are human beings. But when you give importance to other things you forget that you are a human being. So please, together, let's find out.

The art of living doesn't it mean to lead a life, a daily life, with tremendous precision, accuracy of order. Order does not mean, does it, conformity, following a pattern set and adjusting yourself to that pattern. We will go into this slowly. Does it not mean to become fully conscious, aware of one's own disorder. Are we aware of that? Or do we think that is merely an environmental difficulty, but inwardly we are perfectly orderly. We are pointing out together that inwardly we live in disorder, in contradiction. That's a fact. Even the greatest saint - they are generally slightly neurotic - even the greatest saints live in disorder, because they are trying to become something all the time. The very becoming - you understand what I mean, I hope we are following each other - becoming, I am this, I will become that, in that endeavour to change 'what is' to 'what should be', there is an interval, a gap in which conflict takes place. And that conflict is the essence of disorder. You have understood what I am saying? Where there is division, different classes of people, racial divisions, and in ourselves a contradiction, a division: I am this, I must become that, in that there is a division. That very division is the root of disorder. Because in that there is a contradiction: I am this, I want to be orderly. When I say, 'I want to be orderly' I recognize I am in confusion so I attempt to bring about order, so I make a barrier, a sketch of what is order and then I try to follow that. We are saying, if you will kindly listen together, that the very fact is the cause of disorder. Right? Have you understood? Are we together in this a little bit, slightly? Not too much, but just enough.

So where there is division in us psychologically there must be conflict, and therefore disorder. Now as long as there is disorder, trying to find order is still disorder. Right? You understand? I am confused. My life is in disorder, I am fragmented, broken up inside, and being confused, out of that confusion I create a pattern, an ideal, a scheme, and I say I am going to live according to that scheme. But the origin of that scheme is born out of my confusion. Right? Clear? So what I have to understand is, why am I confused, why am I disorderly. If I can understand that, then out of that comprehension, perception, order naturally comes without a single effort. That is, if I can find the causation of my confusion, then confusion doesn't exist, then there is order. I wonder if you see this. Are we together in this, a little bit? Are we?

Q: Yes.

K: Good. When you say, yes, sir, do you really mean it? Or is it just a verbal assertion, let's get on? That is dishonesty. If you don't see things clearly, don't say, yes; say, I don't see it. Then we can together have a dialogue. But if you say, yes, then your concern is, let's go on.

So please, look at it carefully. We have got a full hour. And this awareness of confusion, not we should not confused, but the very awareness of confusion brings about the cause of it, the causation. So what is the cause? Do you understand? If I am ill and I go to the doctor, and the doctor, if he is fairly good, says, you are eating or doing certain things that upset your whole organism, so he says, don't do this, don't do that. So I change. I eat properly. In the same way if we can find the cause then the effect is changed. And if there is a change in the effect there is change in the cause. Do you understand? Are we together, or are you asleep? Let's proceed.

So order is only possible when we understand the nature of disorder. And the nature of disorder can be totally wiped out. If I am quarrelling with my wife, or the wife is quarrelling with me, I find out why we are quarrelling. If we like to quarrel, that's a different matter; but if want to stop quarrelling we say, let's talk about it, let's see why we quarrel. And then we find we are quarrelling about opinions: I want this and you want something different. And thereby we begin to communicate with each other and ultimately come to some point where we both of us agree. So similarly, together, to live a life, the art of living so that it is completely orderly. That is the art of living.

Then the art of living implies that there should be no fear. Right? Shall we go into it? Are you interested in this? We are saying that the art of living demands that there should be no fear at all - fear of psychological security, fear of death, fear of not becoming something, fear of losing, you know the whole problem of fear. Shall we talk about it together? Whether it is possible to totally be free completely of fear, because a mind, a brain that is frightened, a brain that is frightened is a dull mind, a mind that is not capable of observing, living. Aren't you all frightened? Be a little honest. You are all frightened inwardly. We will first examine the inner, then we'll look at the outer, not the other way round. You understand? We all want physical security, that's what everybody demands: money, position, safety, security physically. But we never enquire into the security, certainty inwardly. Because the inward activity shapes the outer, controls the outer. Right? You understand?

So, we are asking, the art of living consists of not only having complete order, but also to be totally psychologically, inwardly free of fear. Is that possible? Because we have lived with fear from childhood: fear of the husband, fear of the wife, fear of not achieving, fear of not fulfilling, fear of not being satisfied. You know the nature of fear, I am sure, all of you. So we are asking, what is the nature and the structure of fear. Ask yourself the question first. What is fear, how does it arise, what is the cause of it, the root cause of it? I may be afraid of darkness, I may be afraid of public opinion, I may be afraid of somebody who is going to beat me up. There are various forms of fear. So shall we deal with the various forms, one by one, your particular fear, her particular fear, or my particular fear; or shall we go together and find out the root of it, the cause of it? Right? Which do you want? The various branches of fear, or the very hidden root, hidden nature of fear? You understand? What is the root of fear? Look at it, the speaker is asking you this question, and if you will kindly be honest this evening, you can be dishonest afterwards because that's your nature, that's what you want, but for this evening find out for yourself what is the root of it, what brings all this fear about.

Because fear is most destructive. If one lives in an enclosed - a sense of physical nervous tension, feeling small, frightened, you know the feeling of fear, and where there is fear every kind of neurotic action takes place, irrational, pretending to be rational. So it is important to find out for yourself what is the root of it. Or are there many roots of it, or only one single root? Probably you have not thought about this, you are too busy earning money, you are too busy worrying about your states, you haven't probably ever given thought or enquiry to find out if you can live without fear.

Change from 'what is' to 'what should be' is one of the causes of fear. I may not ever arrive there so I am frightened of that too. I am also frightened of what is going on, I am also frightened of the past. Right? So we are trying together, not accepting what the speaker is saying, but to find out. That requires honesty, scepticism, not accepting a thing that the speaker is saying, but to see for ourselves the essence and the structure of fear. Right? What is fear? Not what we are afraid about. I am afraid about death - suppose - I am getting old and I am getting frightened. We are not asking what you are afraid of, but what is fear per se, in itself. You understand? Are you getting tired?

So what is fear itself? How does it come about? We will go together into the investigation of it, but you must together share it, not verbally accept it. Then if you verbally accept it, theoretically, or intellectually, at the end of it you are still frightened. And that's a waste of time - your time and the speaker's time. But if you and I, the speaker, can walk together, journey together into the whole nature of fear, and you yourself capture the truth of the cause of fear, then you are free. Unless you want to be frightened for the rest of your life, you may like it, because people do like some kind of fear because that makes them feel at least they have something to hold on to.

What is the past? Please listen, we are talking about fear. What is the past, what is the present, and what is the future? The past is all that you have accumulated as memory, the remembrance of things gone, and the present is the past, modifying itself to the future. Right? This is an actual fact. So you are the past memories, past remembrances, past accidents, the whole accumulation of the past. You are that. You are the bundle of memories. That's a fact. If you had no memories you don't exist. So you are that. The past - please listen - is time, isn't it? The past has been gathered through time. I have had an experience, a week ago, that experience has left a memory, and that memory is born from the past experience - when I use the word 'past' I have already time. Memories stored in the past, and also the past is memory, knowledge, experience. Right sirs? The past, the experience, knowledge, stored in the brain as memory, and from memory thought arises. This is a fact. So time which is the past, and also memory which is the past, so time and thought are the same. They are not separate. Right? Are you understanding this? Are we together? A little bit?

So we are asking, fear is both time and thought. I did something a week ago, which caused fear; I remember that fear, and I want to prevent that happening again. So there is the past incident which caused fear, and it is recorded in the brain as memory, that recording is time. Right? This speech, this talk is being recorded, this recording is time, between the word and the thing, that is time. I hope you understand all this. And thought is also time, because thought comes into being through memory, through knowledge, through experience, so thought and time are similar, together, they are not separate. Right? And we are saying, asking, is that the root of fear, time and thought, time/thought? That is, I am afraid of death. Right? Death, I am still young, old, or whatever it is, I am healthy, but death is waiting for me and I am afraid of death. That is, I have put it away from me, but I am still afraid of that. Aren't you all afraid of death? Yes? No? You must be strange people if you are not afraid of death.

So fear, the root of fear, is thought/time. Don't say, how am I to stop time and thought. If you say, 'how', then you demand a system, a method, then you will practise that method which means time. Right? So you are back again in the same old pattern. Have you understood? But if you understand, grasp, have an insight into the nature of fear and the causation of fear, which is thought and time, if you really grasp that, then hold it, don't run away from it.

Look, I don't know why I should explain all these things, they are all so simple. But you are all very complicated people, too intelligent, too learned, too experienced, you can never meet anything simply. We'll go into it.

Fear arises from something that has happened before. I have had a toothache, go to the dentist, he heals it, but it has been recorded, the pain has been recorded. Where there is a recording there must be the memory and saying 'I hope it will not happen again tomorrow'. So the pain of yesterday is recorded, then the memory, which is the recording, says, 'I hope I will not have it', the whole process of that is fear. If you understand the principle of it, the fundamental nature of fear, then you can deal with it, but if you are escaping from fear, trying to rationalize it, trying to say, tell me, help me to escape from it, then at the end of it, as you are, for the rest of your life you are frightened. Right?

So the root of fear is time/thought. If you understand that, see the beauty of it, the subtlety of it. And the other thing is, people are afraid, as you are, most human beings throughout the world, are afraid of death. That's one of the fundamental fears of life. We all know death is for everybody, for you and the speaker. That's an absolute certainty. Right? You can't escape from that. You might live longer by not wasting your energy, by leading a simple, sane, rational life, but however the way you live, death is inevitable. Right? Would you accept that? Not accept, it is a fact. Would you face that fact? You are going to die, so is the speaker. You, who are you? Who are you, sirs, and ladies, who are you? You have money, you have position, you have capacity, you have dishonesty, your confusions, your anxiety, your loneliness, your bank account - you are all that, aren't you? Be simple and honest. It is so.

And we are asking, what is the art of living when we are going to die? It is there, whether you like it not. What is the art of living so that one is not afraid of death? You understand? Let's go into it. Let's go into it not verbally, not intellectually, not theoretically, but actually so that you know what death means. We are not advocating suicide. There are certain philosophers, the existentialists and others, who say, life is a perpetual going up the hill and coming down the hill, pushing up the hill, and after you reach a certain height coming down. And life, such a life has no meaning, therefore commit suicide. Do you understand? We are not saying that is the way to live. That's not the art of living. But we are asking ourselves, why are we afraid of death. Whether we are young, old, and so on, why is there this torment of which we are so - it may be conscious or unconscious. And the fear of death is also suffering. Right? Suffering in leaving my family, suffering - you know - all the things I have accumulated, and I am leaving all that.

So the art of living is not only to find out how to live our daily life, but also to find out what the significance of death is while living. Right? What is death? There is the biological, organic, ending through disease, through old age, accident, through some misfortune - I go down the street a gate may fall on me by chance and I am killed. So what do we mean by dying? If we can understand that then life and death can live together. You understand? Not death at the end when the organism ends, but to live together, to live with death and life. Have you ever asked these questions? Probably not. You ask that question. Put it to yourself, this question: whether it is possible to live, which is the art of living, living and living with death. Then to find that out you must find out what is living. Right? Which is more important, dying or living, before or after? You understand my question? Most people are concerned with after, whether there is reincarnation, all that kind of stuff. But they never ask, which is more important, the living, which is an art, if there is the right living perhaps death is also part of right living. You understand? Not at the end of one's stupid life.

So one must enquire first, what is living. You answer it, sir. We will discuss it, have a dialogue about it, but you have to answer that question for yourself. Which means, what is your life? What's your daily life, which is what your life is, a long series of daily lives. What are those long series of lives? Pain, anxiety, insecurity, uncertainty. Right? Some kind of illusory devotion to some entity which we have invented, some kind of fanciful, illusory existence, a make-believe life, having faith, having belief, all that is what you are. Right? You are attached to your house, to your money, to your bank, to your wife, children. Right? You are attached. This is your life. Would you contradict that? The description, which the speaker has pointed out, that you live a constant struggle, constant effort, comfort, pain, loneliness, sorrow, that's your life. And you are afraid to let that go. And death says, 'My friend, you can't take it with you'. You can't take your money, your family, your knowledge, your beliefs. Right? Death says you have to leave all that behind. Right? Would you agree to that? Or do you deny that? Face it, sirs.

So the art of living is - need I answer it? You see, you are waiting for me to answer it. Look sir, I am attached, to my wife, or to a certain conclusion, I am tremendously attached to it. Now death says to me, 'When I come you have to let go'. Now is it possible for me, living, to let go? Yes, sir! Will you let go? Absolute silence! Right? I am attached, to my furniture, I have polished it, I have looked after it, it's an old piece of furniture, I won't give it away, it's mine. I have lived with it for years, eighty years, it is part of me. When I am attached to that piece of furniture, that furniture is me. I know you laugh, but you won't let that furniture go. So death says, to you, 'My friend, you can't take that desk with you.' So can you be totally free, totally free of that attachment to that piece of furniture. You live with that furniture, but totally free of attachment to that. That is death. You understand? So as you are living, living and dying, all the time. Oh, you don't see the beauty of it. You don't see the freedom that gives you, the energy, the capacity. Where you are attached there is fear, there is anxiety, uncertainty; uncertainty, fear causes sorrow.

And to go into the question of sorrow, that's part of life. Every one on earth has suffered, has shed tears. Haven't you shed tears? Your husband doesn't care for you, he uses you and you use him. And you suddenly realize how ugly that is, and you suffer. Man has killed man throughout history in the name of religion, in the name of god, in the name of nationality. Right? So man has suffered immensely. And they have never been able to solve that problem, never solved suffering. Because where there is suffering there is no love. In suffering there is not only self pity, there is also fear of loneliness, of separation, of divisions, a remorse, guilt, all that is contained in that word. And we have never solved this problem. We put up with it, we shed tears, and carry the memory of the son, or the brother, or the wife or the husband for the rest of your life. Is there an end to sorrow? Or must man for ever and ever carry this burden? To find that out is also the art of living. The art of living is to have no fear. And also the art of living is to have no sorrow.

So to enquire into that complex problem, why man, not only has been inhuman right through, cruel to other people, brutal, violent, killing, by the millions, thousands, and how many people have shed tears over their sons, or their husbands, or their relations and so on? And we are still carrying on the same old rotten, filthy, brutal way, killing each other.

You are going to have, I believe I saw as we came down, a naval show here. Right? And you are very proud of your army and your navy, all that rot. And every culture is proud of its own military instruments, killing thousands of people. And you agree, and you carry on the next day, never enquiring whether you can stop in yourself violence, why wars exist. Do you realize, sirs, there have been wars for six thousand years, man killing man. The filthiness, the ugliness of it all. And you don't mind. It is happening far away somewhere and you don't mind. But you are preparing for it too.

So that is one of the problems of life, whether it is possible to live without sorrow. What is sorrow? Why, when my son dies, my son, not yours, that's your affair, when my son dies something has broken in me, specially if I am a woman. I have born him in my womb, given birth, and I have nursed him, looked after him, and the pain of all that, the pleasure of it, the joy of the mother, and then he ends up being killed - for your country, he will be killed. You understand all this? Why do you allow it?

So what is sorrow? Is it that my son has gone, can never return, though I think we will meet next life, or in heaven or in hell, he is gone. That's a fact. But I carry the memory, I keep his picture round my heart. I live on that memory, shedding tears, I can't forget. It is part of my burden. Don't you know all this? Or is the speaker saying something irrelevant? And you have never asked why we suffer. And we have never enquired into sorrow, into suffering, and asked whether it can ever end, not at the end of one's life, but now, today. If you begin to enquire into it, as we are doing now, I hope, what is the cause? Is it self pity? Is it that he was young, fresh, alive, and gone? Is it that I am attached to him? Face all this, sirs. Is it that I am attached to him? And that attachment, what is that attachment? To whom am I attached? To my son? What do I mean, by my son? Be rational, logical. What is my son? I have a picture of him, I have an image of him, I want him to be something, I want him to be something and he is my son. And I am attached desperately because he will carry on my business, he will be better at getting more money. You know, you are all playing this game, you know it very well. And that's one side.

And also I have a certain affection, we will not call it love, but we will call it a certain kind of affection. If you loved your son you would have a different kind of education. Right? A different kind of upbringing, not just follow in your footsteps, he is the new generation. And a new generation may be totally different from yours. I hope he is. I want him to be a new generation, of a different type of person than me. Not follow what I have been doing - engineer, businessman, and all that business. But I want him to inherit my money, my possessions, my house. You know the game you are all playing. And when he dies everything goes. That is, my picture of him, my wanting him to be this and that, that has come to an end and I am shocked. And I turn to my nephew, my niece, to someone to carry on the same pattern, because I have lots of money. Don't you know all this? How cruel all this is. And this is one of the causes of great sorrow.

And death, of course, is the final sorrow. But if you are living, death and life together, then there is no change. You are incarnating everyday afresh, not you, a new thing is incarnating every day afresh. And in that there is great beauty. That is creation.

Not merely painting a picture, building a house, an architect, but living with this death and life. And that gives you - in that there is tremendous freedom. And freedom implies also, the root meaning of the word freedom is also love. Living, the art of living and the art of dying, together. That brings about great love. And love has its own intelligence, not the intelligence of a cunning mind, intelligence is something outside of the brain. We will talk about that tomorrow.

BOMBAY 4TH PUBLIC TALK 12TH FEBRUARY 1984

This is the last talk. We were talking about the art of living yesterday. I think we ought to go much more into it. Most of us have given very little thought to that, we have hardly enquired into the nature of what life is, and how to live it. Our daily life, with all its ugly turmoil, passing pleasures, and a great deal of entertainment, both religious and otherwise. We have studied almost all the academic subjects, spent years to become a doctor, a surgeon, or an engineer, and you never at the end ask, how - if you have studied perhaps five or six years, have learnt a great deal of information, stresses, strains and the material and so on - you never ask how to build a bridge, because that is his job. But we, ordinary people like us, we are always asking 'how: how am I to live a life without any conflict, without any of the problems that are involved in our daily unfortunate lives. We are always striving, reaching out, getting somewhere, and when a question, a challenge is put before you, like, is it possible to live a life in which there is no problem, in which there is no conflict, when you hear that question, you say, yes, it sounds good, but tell me how to do it, what is the method, what is the system, so that we can live a life of great tranquillity, with a great sense of wonder, a sense of great beauty. Then we say, tell me how. I think we ought to banish from our minds, not in the academic subjects, but in the psychological world we should never ask, if one may most respectfully point out, how, never ask anybody how. They only can offer you a system, a method, which then becomes another bondage, another trap in which you are caught.

So we ought to this evening, go into this question. We have talked about wars, we have talked about human beings psychologically hurt from their childhood, hurt by their parents, by their schools, colleges and universities, by their families, and so on, so they are wounded people. And that wound inevitably breeds fear. We talked about fear a great deal. And we also talked about time, not only the chronological time by the watch, but also time as a psychological means of achievement: I am this, but I will be that, I am violent, I will one day be non-violent. This constant becoming from 'what is', to 'what should be' is also an element of time. Because time is very important for us, not only the physical time, to get from here to there, but also the ideal which thought has invented, to achieve an ideal also requires time. So we are bound to time. And writers and some other people have asked, is there an end to time, is there a stop to time.

And as we said yesterday, and during all the other talks here, we are sharing this together. This is not, I'll repeat it ten times, this is not a lecture. Please kindly pay attention to that. This is not in any way to inform you, to instruct you about various academic subjects, which is what a lecture is. But this is a conversation between you and the speaker; a conversation about life, about the extraordinary complexity of life, the great sense of travail, anxiety, desperate loneliness, and innumerable tears that human beings have shed, wanting to be loved and never finding it, or if one loves you, there's always the danger and the pain of his leaving. So we have talked about all this. And if some of us, perhaps a few, even ten, who are really serious in the sense, honest, an honesty that is unshakable, an integrity that can never be broken under any circumstances, and if there were such people, a few at least, then we could bring about a radical change in society. We talked about society. Society is what we are, we have made this society, this ugly, brutal, venomous - you know what this modern society is. We are responsible for it, each one of us. And to bring about a radical, fundamental mutation in the structure and the nature of society, we have to undergo a tremendous examination into ourselves, not theoretically, not problematically or philosophically, but to see what actually we are. And face that fact, not escape from it, go into it very deeply, and then perhaps a few of us could really bring about a different culture.

And as we said yesterday, for at least this evening, let us be serious, honest. That is, the word is not the thing, the explanation is not the actual, the description of a mountain, however beautiful, writing a great poem about a mountain in the blue sky and the lovely shadow, all those descriptions and the painting is not the actual mountain. But most of us are satisfied with the description, with the explanations, and then we make of that explanation into an ideal, and then strive to live up to that ideal, which then again becomes a series of conflicts. We went into all this during the last few years, and in the last three talks here. So please kindly remember that you and the speaker are investigating together deeply, seriously and with great honesty, how to live a life which is really a great art.

So let's begin to enquire more. Humility is necessary, isn't it, to learn. Humility, not humbleness, not a sense of remote acceptance, but one needs a great deal of humility to learn. But most of us have not that quality of humility, not to somebody whom you respect, that's not humility, that's merely acceptance of authority, and you worship the authority. You saw what was happening this morning.

So humility is one of the factors in life, not arrogance, not vanity. A man who knows a great deal, that gives him a sense of self importance, and he is a vain man, a man who has achieved a position, a status, power, money, and then that vanity tries to become humility. Don't you know all this? And humility is not born out of vanity. Humility is necessary to understand the extraordinary complexity of living. And humility with freedom: we think we are all very free to do what we want to do, what we want, our desires, to fulfil our desires, this is one of the structures of society, each one of us is free to do exactly what he wants to do. Right? You are all doing that. You want to be rich, you want to express yourself, you want to have your own particular way, you are very strong on your opinions, your conclusions. You are free to choose. And we call this freedom. And if you observe what that freedom has done in the world, brought about great confusion, brought about havoc in the world, each one expressing his own particular desire, competitive. And we call this freedom.

So we ought to enquire what is freedom. Please ask this question of yourself. Is freedom a matter of choice. You are free to choose, free to go from here to there, free to have different kinds of jobs, if you don't like one you go to the other. Freedom to express yourself, free to think what you want, and to express it, perhaps, in a democratic society, not in the totalitarian states, there freedom is denied. So what is freedom? Because that is part of our life. As we talked yesterday, death is part of our life, the living and the dying.

We went into it very carefully. Whether there are two, death and life, live together. That requires, as we pointed out yesterday, a great deal of attention, a great deal of enquiry, and great intelligence - the art of living with death. We talked about that. And in the same way, we ought to talk over together what is freedom. Does it really exist? The word freedom, also, some of its root meaning, is love. And is love a matter of choice?

And so we ought to find out for ourselves what is actual freedom. Freedom from something, from pain, from anxiety, and is there freedom, not from something. Do you understand? If it is freedom from something it is merely a reaction. It is like a man in prison saying, 'I must get out of my prison', we live psychologically in a prison, and when it is painful, ugly, not satisfactory then you want freedom from that. So we are saying, freedom from something is the same thing as being in prison. Do we meet each other, or am I talking to myself?

So what is freedom? This sense of inward authentic, deep sense of unshakable freedom, not from something, what is that freedom? Can we together enquire into this, not accept what the speaker is saying, because we went into that. If you accept what the speaker is saying then you are back again to the old pattern of following an authority. The speaker then becomes your guru, and the speaker abhors all gurus. In the world of, if one can use the word, spirit, or spiritual, authority is a sin. So together let's enquire what is freedom.

Probably you have never asked that question. You all want to escape from something. I am lonely, and most people are very, very lonely, they want to escape from it, through various forms of entertainment, religious and otherwise. But is there a freedom which is not a reaction? And to find that out one has to enquire what is love? Is love a reaction? Is love attraction, whether it be sexual or otherwise? Please ask those questions of yourself to find out the right answer. How do you find the right answer to a question? I ask a question, the speaker asked the question, you naturally reply to that question, if you are at all thinking, going along with the question, then you respond to that question. Then the speaker then answers your response. This is really dialogue. Answers to your response, then you respond to my response. Right? Are we following this a little bit. So that there is both question and answer, answer and question. If we maintain this answer, question, question, answer seriously, intensely, then in that process you disappear and the speaker disappears, only the question remains. Do you understand this? Then that very question has vitality. Don't agree please, test it out for yourself. It's like a bud, a rose bud; if the question is left in the air, as it were, then it is like a bud which gradually unfolds and shows its nature. The depth of that question, it has its own vitality, energy, drive. That is a dialogue, not just accepting what the other fellow is saying.

So we are asking, is freedom, not from something, is it love? And is love a reaction? That is, I see a good face, a woman or a man, or a marvellous statue, I'd love to have it, I'd love to have it in my room, look at it day after day, and each time I look at it, it is different, it's a great masterpiece. And for most of us love perhaps may not exist. Please, I am just asking this, I am not saying it does not exist. For most of us perhaps we don't know what it means. We know attraction, we know tenderness, we know pity, we know guilt, remorse and jealousy. Is all that love? Do you understand my question? If it is not love, then love has no reaction. Then that is freedom, which is not born out of a reaction. You may be a Christian, and being intellectual you might become a Buddhist. You have chosen, you are free to become a Buddhist, because Buddhism is much more intellectually active, interesting, and all the rest of it. And you are free from one and trapped in the other. And you may love the Buddha, rejecting your own particular deity. And this is called freedom. The crows are free! This is very important to understand, not intellectually, not verbally, but the depth and the beauty of it.

And we also should ask when we are talking about the art of living, what is beauty. The great architecture, the cathedrals of Europe, the great temples and the mosques of the world, constructed with great architects, great painters, the great sculptors, Michelangelo. When you see all that, that's beauty. So is beauty man-made? Please exercise your brains to find out. A tiger is not man-made. Thank the Lord! A tree in a solitary field alone, solitary, with all the dignity of a marvellous old tree is not man-made, but the moment you paint that tree it's man-made, and you admire it, go to a museum to see that tree painted by a great artist. So another line, which is part of the art of living is to understand the depth and the beauty of freedom, and the goodness of it. And beauty, not the picture, the poem, the marvellous writer, but what is beauty? A beautiful man, a beautiful woman, a face that has depth. And without that aesthetic quality in life, which is born of sensitivity, which is born out of all the senses in action, not one particular, or two, or three senses, but the whole movement of the senses. Surely beauty is when the self is not. When I am not, beauty is. When the self is not, love is.

And so love, freedom, goodness, beauty, are one. Not something separate, not something pursued, one pursues what is beauty and spends the rest of your life on that. But they are all interrelated. Goodness, that word, though it is very old fashioned, that very word has extraordinary depth to that word. To feel the depth of goodness, and that can only be when there is freedom, when there is love, beauty.

And we ought also to talk over together this extraordinary problem, as we dealt with yesterday about death and suffering, we ought to enquire together what is religion, because that is part of our life. And to find out what is truly religious, not all this phoney stuff that is going on in the world - sorry if you are Christians, don't be upset by what the speaker is saying, nor the Hindus, please don't get upset, or get angry. It is all a network of superstitions, a network of beliefs, hurts born out of fear, you invent god. All that, the ceremonies, all the things that are in the churches, in the cathedrals, in the temples and mosques are put together by thought. Nobody can deny that. And thought, as we pointed out, is a material process, because thought is based on experience, knowledge, memory stored in the brain, and contained in the cells, therefore it is a material process. That which thought creates is nothing to do with sacredness. You may worship the things that thought has invented, you may worship your guru and your scriptures, the Bible, the Koran, whatever books you read, so-called religious literature, but they are all the product of thought, not straight from god's mouth - or the horse's mouth. All that is not religion. Right? It is very difficult for most people to see this clearly because we always have hope in our heart for something which will give us strength, which will free us from our mortal travail. We want somebody to comfort us, the great father. Here, I'd love to tell you a good joke, but I won't, it's not the moment.

So we want somebody to comfort us, somebody to tell us what to do, somebody to worship, somebody to cling to in our loneliness and despair. When we are shedding tears we want somebody to hold our hand. And so thought invents all these extraordinary illusions, like god, all the rituals, all the things you worship in temples and mosques, and churches, it's all the product of thought. And so we are saying, all that is not religion. Would you see that? Not just intellectually, then it becomes a game, rather a stupid game, but if you actually see that it has no meaning, it is a sense of deception, hypocrisy, because that has nothing to do with our daily living. You have had every kind of god, from the most ancient of times, pre-history, and these gods and their goddesses and their rituals, have not changed the human brain, human brutality, human wars. You may worship your gurus, follow them, but you are not going to stop any wars, you are not going to change your whole being.

So we ought to enquire what is religion. To enquire one must be free of all superstitions, naturally, from all authority. Will you do that? The authority of the book, the authority of tradition, the authority which you create for yourself based on your own experience. You understand all this? So that your mind, your brain, is free from every kind of illusion. Is that possible because the brain invents illusions, myths? All the mythology of Greece, of ancient Egypt, and your own Christian, and Hindu mythology, they are all the inventions of thought - super-star and so on. Can the brain be actually free of all that? And the brain has been conditioned for centuries upon centuries through propaganda, through tradition, through books, to what religion is. Will you do it? Will you be free of that? Not become an atheist, which is another reaction, but to have a brain that's completely free. That requires a great deal of investigation into oneself, a great deal of attention to every movement of action, so that your whole being is completely denuded of every kind of illusion. Which is not easy because we don't understand the nature of desire. It is the desire for comfort, for some help - you understand - that creates illusions - to desire illumination, that's what you all want.

So we ought to investigate what is desire. You understand this? We are enquiring seriously, honestly, at least for this hour, honestly find out for yourself what is desire. Why desire has made us what we are, fighting each other, competitive, hating each other, then you have a conflict, and conflict destroys, degenerates the brain. So either don't listen, or listen with all your heart and mind so that the word is the action. The two are not separate. So can you have a brain which is totally free from all tradition, all authority, including your own authority, which is having confidence in yourself, which gives you authority. You understand, this is a very complex problem: the authority of a policeman, the authority of the government, the law, which we apparently disregard totally, the authority of taxes. Is that all right, may I go on?

So can your brain be free from all this, and that freedom is not a reaction, because you understand the nature of authority, you understand the nature of tradition - that is mere following mechanically accepting, which degenerates the brain. You see that, and therefore you put it away, it is not a reaction. If you react then you back again into the old pattern.

So then one can ask, what is religion. You understand? Only then you can find out. And that implies meditation. May I use that word? Because that word has been used by every kind of guru, and the money-makers of gurus, with their power, position, they teach you, there are many schools in different parts of the world, teaching you meditation - Tibetan meditation, it all sounds so silly, all this, Tibetan, the Buddhist, the Hindu, the Zen, and your own guru invents a particular form of meditation, and you are caught in it. But you never enquire, because you are too greedy to get something, you never enquire what is meditation. What does it mean? Not, how to do meditate. If you ask how to meditate, then it is very simple: do this and don't do that, sit for ten hours on your head - stand on your head - sit in a certain posture, breathe in a certain way, control your mind, thought. And who is the controller to control the thought? Have you asked that? Who is the controller when you want to control your thought in meditation, or in your own business, or in anything else, who is the controller? Isn't he also part of thought? Right? Isn't he? So the controller who is also thought controls thought. You understand the game you play?

So what is meditation? The meditation that we do is born of desire. No? We want to achieve peace of mind - I don't know whatever that may mean. We want to achieve illumination, we want to reach Nirvana, we want to become something. That's part of meditation, climb the ladder - ladder to heaven - which is, climb the ladder of success, it's the same thing, not much difference: the man who is born a clerk wants to arrive, become the manager; you meditate in order to become, god knows what. So you meditate. Sir, if you can put all that aside, what is meditation? To find that out let's go briefly into what is desire.

What is desire? What is the source of desire? Where does desire spring from? Is desire born from the object perceived? I see a beautiful car, the seeing creates the desire. Right? Please, careful, don't agree with what I am saying. We are going to contradict all that presently, so don't be caught in a trap. Does the object create desire? I see a beautiful house, and I see an extraordinarily intelligent beautiful, dignified man's head, and I say, 'My god, I wish I had that'. So we ought to enquire very carefully into what is desire. Not suppress desire. We are not saying suppress desire, or give in to desire. Like the monks suppress desire, and the others indulge in desire. So we ought together find out for ourselves, for ourselves, not be told, and the speaker is not telling you, for god's sake, he is not telling you, find out what is desire. The object, a car, or a woman, or a beautiful tree, all that you see in a lovely garden, green lawn, the border of flowers, the scent of it, you see all that, and you say, 'My god, I wish I had a garden like that'. Don't you all know that kind of desire? Yes, sir. So we are not suppressing or indulging, we are enquiring into what is desire. If one can understand the nature and the structure of desire, then you can deal with it. You see the car - I am taking that silly example, you can take your own particular example - you see something mechanical, a car, a good watch; seeing, that is visual seeing, then from that seeing sensation - right? - from that sensation what takes place?

Contact, which is part of sensation, then what takes place? Don't repeat it. If you have heard this before from the speaker, don't repeat it, because then that means nothing. Repetition. I saw a parrot once, a beautiful parrot, lovely plumes, it was chattering away what the master had been talking about. And that's what you generally do, repeat, repeat, repeat. So please don't repeat, then you become secondhand human beings without dignity.

So seeing, contact, sensation. Now what takes place after that? Go very slowly, find out. I see this very good watch, a friend of mine gave, I see this in the window. I go inside, examine it, touch it, feel it, feel the weight of it, who made it, and then what happens? Then thought comes in, creates an image and says, 'I wish I had it'. That is, seeing, contact, sensation, then thought immediately creates the image and then that very second when thought creates the image of you in the car, or you having that watch, at that second desire is born. Right? Are we clear on this matter? At least intellectually?

Now if you see that, can there be an interval between seeing, contact, sensation? An interval before thought takes shape, makes a shape of it? You understand? You understand all this? An interval. Can you do it? It's all so rapid. So when you slow it down, like a motion picture, slow it down, then you see everything in detail. And that's desire. So extend the gap. Because you are desire, you are the very structure of thought and desire. So if you understand, if you look into the nature of thought, and your reactions, you can slow the whole mechanism down, very quiet, slow; or you understand this instantly. That requires attention, that requires passion to find out.

So let's go back to meditation. That is, if you have understood, not verbally, if you understand the nature and the structure of desire, then we can go back and find out what is meditation. Is conscious meditation, meditation? You understand my question? Is it? Obviously not. If I consciously sit down for ten minutes a day, or twenty minutes in the morning, twenty minutes in the afternoon, twenty minutes in the evening, then it becomes a relaxation, a siesta, a nice comfortable, enjoyable 'go to bed' - that's what is called, I won't name it, you know all that business. So what is meditation? If you consciously meditate it has a direction, a motive, a desire to achieve. Surely that is not meditation, is it? That's like becoming the clerk, becoming the manager, he is working, working. The two things are the same: you call that business, the other you call religious achievement. Both are exactly the same thing. Do we see that? Gentlemen, do you see, those who meditate? Of course not. That means giving up your pet enjoyment, pet entertainment.

So we are saying, conscious meditation is no meditation because it is born of desire. Therefore it is born out of desire to achieve, to become something, which is the self becoming something. The self, the 'me', becoming god. It sounds so silly. Forgive me for using that word. Then what is meditation, if it is not conscious meditation, then what is meditation? You understand? The word 'meditation' means also to ponder, to think over, and also measure, to measure. That's part of the root meaning of that word, meditation, both in Sanskrit and so on. Now, can your brain stop measuring? You understand? I am this, I will be that. I am comparing myself with you, you are so beautiful, you have grace, you have brains, you have got quality, depth, you are aesthetically wearing something extraordinary, I am not that. You are measuring, which is comparison. Right? Can you stop comparing? Don't agree, stop comparing, find out what it means to live without a movement of comparison.

So, you understand, love is not a reaction, therefore it is free - not to express what you want, that is a reaction. And free is part of that love. Where there is love there is intelligence, not born out of thought, intelligence is something outside the brain. I won't go into all this, it's too complicated. Compassion. Compassion, love, freedom is outside the brain. I know, I could go into it but there's no time. Because the brain is conditioned, it can't contain this.

So meditation is not conscious deliberate act. There is a totally different kind of meditation which has nothing whatsoever to do with thought and desire. And that means a brain that is really, if I may use the word, empty. Empty of all the things that thought, man has made. And where there is space - because freedom means that, love means that, space, vast, limitless space - and where there is space there is silence and energy. If you are thinking about yourself all day long, which most of us are, then you have reduced the extraordinary capacity of the brain to such a small issue about yourself, therefore you have no space. And so the brain, though it has its own rhythm, not that the speaker is a specialist on brains, but he has lived a long time, studied all the time himself, watched others, the brain has its own rhythm, that can be left alone. But when the brain is silent, not chattering, quiet, utterly, then there is that which is not measurable by words, that which is eternal, nameless.

BROCKWOOD PARK DIALOGUE WITH STAFF & STUDENT 16TH OCTOBER 1983

K: What shall we talk about?

Q: I think during the last talks we talked about the question of intelligence, the bit we have touched on, and how to bring intelligence to our lives so that somehow intelligence operates in our lives. And I wonder if we could pursue that.

K: Right. Any other questions?

Q: When and why will a human being genuinely ask what is intelligence?

K: Why do we ask?

Q: And when do we ask.

K: When do we ask what is intelligence.

Q: Genuinely ask.

K: Yes. Any other questions?

Q: I wonder what is the morning meeting for?

K: Good lord! Any other?

Q: Why do you give these talks?

K: Why do you give talks.

Q: Yes.

K: Would you like me to shut up?

Q: No. What is the purpose, if you have any purpose for giving these talks?

K: Why do I talk? I really - no, I mustn't. Is that all?

Q: How do you know all the things that you are speaking about?

Q: How do you know when you are becoming intelligent?

K: How do you know all that you are talking about? Not from books, not from other people. The ancient books, or the modern books, modern philosophy and so on. I'll explain all this a little later as we go along. May I? Any other questions?

Q: How do you know when are starting to get intelligence.

K: How do you know what intelligence is.

Q: No, when you start to become more intelligent. How can you tell?

K: We will find out presently. We were driving the other day, nearly two weeks ago, along the Pacific coast of California. It was a lovely morning. It had rained, and generally in California it doesn't rain that part of the year, and it was a very, very lovely morning. There wasn't a cloud in the sky. And the Pacific was blue, light blue, so calm, like a great lake. It was not the same dark blue of the Mediterranean but it was a light blue, and the sun was just touching it, making a great light on the sea. And in front of our car, Mrs Zimbalist was driving, and it was a good car and on the bumper there was a sticker. The sticker said, 'Question authority!' So we are going to question authority this morning. And in questioning authority we are going to find out for ourselves in the understanding of the very complex problem of authority, we begin to see, for ourselves, what is intelligence. Why we follow, why we accept, why we obey, whether authority and the acceptance of authority leads to intelligence. We are going to talk it over together, right?

Do you question authority? You know what that word means? We won't go into the root meaning of that word, the etymological meaning, but authority. There are various kinds of authority. Right? The authority of the government, however rotten that government that is, the authority of totalitarian governments, the authority of the policeman, the authority of a lawyer, the authority of a judge, the authority of the pope, the authority of a priest. Right? All those are outside, outside the skin. But inwardly, inside the skin, there is the authority of experience, of one's own experience, one's own convictions. Right? Are you following all this? Authority of one's own opinions, authority of one's own convictions - I am convinced I am a great man - that becomes the authority. I am convinced I am a good poet, whereas I may be a rotten poet but I am convinced. I am convinced about so many things. So experience, knowledge become one of the sources of authority. Right? Are you following? Because we are examining a very complex problem, the problem of authority. The authority of the parents, the authority of tradition, the authority of the majority of the voters. Right? The authority of the specialists, the authority of the scientists - there are several of them here - the authority of the Bible and the Indian so-called sacred books, and so on, the Koran, you know what the Koran is, the Bible of the Muslims, the Islamic world, the Mohomaden world - they accept that completely, obey. So there are many, many forms of authority.

Now, what do you question, when you question authority what are you questioning? The authority of rules, the authority of those educators who tell you, inform you? Please discuss this with me. Because in enquiring very carefully step by step and going deeper and deeper into this question you will yourself begin to awaken your own intelligence. You understand? Your own perception, your own how to look at things intelligently, without authority. Is this clear? Have I made my statement clear? You are clear?

Q: Yes.

K: Good! Are you quite sure? The authority that exists outside of us - law, governments, the majority of people who vote for a Prime Minister, the authority of the policeman, the authority of a lawyer, the authority of a surgeon, the scientists who are building the nuclear bomb, the authority of the totalitarian states and so on and on. Outside. Inside of us, I say, I know, that becomes the authority. Or, I am convinced, I am quite sure my opinion is correct. I am quite sure my experience tells me what to do. That becomes the authority. Or, I practise a certain discipline and that has become my authority. You understand? So we are going to question all this. The outer, and the inner; the environment and the psychological realm. Clear?

Now, let's proceed: we are going to question, not say it is right, or wrong, but enquire, question, doubt, ask. Now let's begin. The authority of the policeman. Right? Do you question that?

Q: Isn't it necessary?

K: But question it first. Don't accept, don't say, it is necessary. You see you have already accepted authority.

Q: There's not very much that we can do about it.

K: No, you can't do anything about it.

Q: We don't want that kind of authority.

K: You don't want that kind of authority? Suppose I have been driving in France on the right side of the road, and I come here, I am used to driving a car on the right side of the road in France, in Austria and so on, I come here and I keep to that side. Right? To the right side, and there will be accidents. So the policeman says, 'Hey, get back, go over to the left'. But if I insist on keeping to the right he will give me a ticket. So I accept the authority of a policeman who tells me, 'You are driving in the wrong lane, please kindly go to the left', because that is the custom, that is the law in this country. Right?

Q: That's quite sensible.

K: That's quite sensible, it is. Now: then the authority of governments. This is much more complex. The authority of the government says, you must become a soldier. In Europe you have to become a soldier for two years; fortunately not for women. In Switzerland, in France, in all the European countries, for two years you have to be a soldier. Do you accept that authority?

Q: If you don't, is there anything you can do?

K: No, let's think it out, look at it carefully. They say, we have to protect our country. Right? In case of war we are prepared to fight the enemy. Have you ever heard of that phrase, a General says, 'We have met the enemy, it is us'. Have you heard of that phrase? Have you understood that phrase? We have met the enemy, it's us! We are the enemy to ourselves. Sorry! So find out. The government says, all governments, the most inefficient government also says, you must fight for the country. There is a tremendous authority. Right? What's your response to that?

Q: If I was in that situation, and I'm asked to join the army, I wouldn't do it.

K: Then you would go to prison.

Q: Oh, I'd go to another country.

K: They won't let you.

Q: Well, there are ways.

K: Oh, yes. But you can never go back to your country again.

Q: Yes.

K: I know several people who have done this. But they can never come back to their own country. Is that the answer? Question, question what you are saying?

Q: Perhaps to some degree it is.

K: I said question, sir. Question what you will do when governments say you must become - you are conscripted, drafted, as they use the word in America, here the word is conscripted, and you are asked to join the army. That is supreme authority. Do you question that?

Q: By question, do you mean where authority comes from?

K: No. The government says you must.

Q: What exactly do you mean by question?

K: I mean by question, we are questioning authority, you understand.

Q: It's not clear, I don't understand.

K: I've explained, sir, haven't I, haven't we? I told you the sticker in California, it said, 'Question authority'. That means do you accept authority. Where do you accept authority, where do you disregard authority? Now the government says to you, as you are a young man, or going to be when you are 18, 19, 20, they say you must become a soldier for two years. And you have alternatives, which are rather boring, or when there is a war all the people, grown up boys and young men are conscripted. There is that authority of the government. Do you question that authority.

Q: Yes, but what can you do about it?

K: You are going to find out. We are going to find out. But first question, is that what you will do when somebody, the government, asks you to become a soldier? This is a very complex problem this, I don't know if you can go into this. They say, we must protect our country. Right? Right? So you have to question, what is our country.

Q: It's all that we know around us, our language...

K: Which means what?

Q: That which we are familiar with.

K: Take for instance, England says to you, the British government says to you, we are going to be attacked by somebody, and you must train yourself, carry a gun and all the rest of it and fight. Now what's your response? Poor chaps!

Q: You probably don't want to.

K: Probably you don't want to. Then they either, if you are in Russia, or in other countries, they shoot you. Or they say, if you don't want to, what is your reason.

Q: Don't want to kill another man.

K: So is that your conviction?

Q: No.

K: Careful. I am asking a question. He says, you don't want to kill another human being, is that your conviction, is that your religion, are your parents also religious that way? They ask all these questions, old boy, I am not inventing them.

Q: What's the point of killing somebody else?

K: What is the point of killing people? They have done this for five thousand years, and more. The Greeks did it, the Egyptians did it, the Sumerians and Babylonians and so on and so on. Great empires were formed that way, killing people. The British empire which lasted one hundred and fifty years, not like the Persian Empire, or the Greek, or the Egyptian, the Egyptian civilization for three thousand years, undisturbed. So people have been killing each other for the last five thousand years or more. So what's your answer?

Q: Perhaps you just become a soldier, but not the attitude of doing it for your country, because if you protest, the very fact that you are protesting, in a sense that becomes your own belief.

K: So you become a soldier and you are ready to kill? He said so. He said, you might become a soldier, that means you are prepared to kill for your country. Right? Wait, go slowly. What's your country, what do you mean, your country? We are questioning everything. You understand? What do you mean, your country?

Q: It's the American way, it's the way its done.

Q: I mean you don't go in it patriotically, if you don't perhaps you will be put in prison.

K: You don't go in patriotically, you don't go in for your personal reasons, but you are going to kill people.

Q: We tend not to, we don't kill anybody.

K: Then they kill you. All right. I know a man who became a soldier, he was forced, and the officer said, 'We are going to the front', and this friend of mine said, 'All right, but when I get to the front you are the officer I am going to shoot you first, because you have forced me to that position.' And they said, this man is crazy. And they had the psychologists and the psychiatrists who examined him but he kept on repeating that, so they said, 'Get back home. Don't play tricks like that'.

So you understand, we are questioning. You are not questioning. I am sent, the Indian government - fortunately they can't, I am too old - they questioned me, as in England, and said, you must become a soldier, and you must protect your country. I questioned and said, 'What is my country, what do you mean my country?' Right? Question it. Who says, it's my country?

Q: They won't listen to that.

K: I am questioning myself, forget what the government say.

Q: What do you mean by your country?

K: That's what I am asking you.

Q: The country you were born in is supposed to be your country.

K: Where you are born.

Q: Yes, that's supposed to be your country.

K: That is supposed to be your country. Why do I say, it's my country?

Q: Because you live there.

K: Yes, and you say, it's your country. And I say, it's my country. Right? Why do we say this? Why do grown-up people say this, and the young people say it, and it has been the tradition of thousands of years - it's my country, I am going to protect it; it's your country, you are going to protect it; let's kill each other.

Q: They want to possess it, and if that possession is threatened by another country who feel possessive to their country, then you obviously are going to try to fight to possess your country.

K: I know. So you are willing to kill for your country.

Q: No.

Q: If we had a war, and Russia took over our country.

K: May I ask your name?

Q: Tessa.

K: Tessa. You are not following step by step into this. What is my country? Why has the world, the earth been divided into my country, your country?

Q: It's always my book, not your book.

K: No, no, question all this, sir, don't... Why have human beings for thousands of years said, this is my country, and that's your country.

Q: Well, you have...

K: Why? Why?

Q: OK. You have dark skin, I have light skin, you speak that language and I speak this language, there's a group of people around me who speak the same language, a group around you speak your language and look the same as you. That's your country and I am in my country.

K: Why have we done this?

Q: Well, because you look different, and language.

K: All right. Are we different?

Q: No, it's just skin.

K: Answer him. I am black.

Q: On the surface, yes.

K: You are pink or blue! I am sorry! I am black and you are pink, or white, or whatever it is. Now for that reason we fight each other?

Q: Yes, and you believe in that.

K: No, no, begin slowly. Do you kill me and I kill you because I am black and you are fairly near approaching white - why?

Q: Yes.

K: Why? No, question, sir. Don't answer, question first.

Q: I don't think so because I think it's my book and it's a very precious book, and my friend said, 'It is my book', and I kill him for my book.

K: Yes. So?

Q: And I think that is not because he is black and I am white.

K: Quite right. So what do you say? Go on. Why do we do that?

Q: Because...

K: Question it, I am questioning you and you are answering, you are not questioning it yourself.

Q: Is it not a natural response to want to possess something?

K: Yes, that's a natural response. Where does it begin, when does it begin? Careful, question, question, don't accept anything natural and say it is natural and stick. Question why it is natural.

Q: I don't think a baby...

K: That's it, begin with a baby. That's quite right, begin with the small baby. You give him a toy and he holds it. Right? And the other baby pulls it away. Haven't you seen this? So there it begins. Mine and yours. And we build this up.

Q: It makes you feel safe, you feel threatened when people want it.

K: That's right. So I am saying we build this up gradually as we grow older, this is mine and that's yours. And I am going to hold to mine and you hold to yours. So what does it all mean? Question this. I say it is my country, and you say it's your country. Question why people say that.

Q: Well perhaps through repetition, through education.

K: Of course, through education, through history, through propaganda, through everything you come to the point when you are so conditioned you say, 'It's my country and your country'.

Q: Perhaps because...

K: Question. Question first.

Q: Is it not a matter of security.

K: Security. Now you understand what Mr Smith said, he said, it is a matter of security. I feel secure with my family, right, my father, my brother, my sister, my aunts, I feel they will protect me, they are part of me, the family. Then increase it, the community, move it still further, the nation. Right? I identify myself first with the family, then with the community, with the society, then with the nation - I am British. Right? That means I feel secure. Right? Right, we agree to that? You are quite sure? I feel secure when I say I am British, and the Frenchman says, 'I am French'. He is completely secure: the language, the custom, the tradition, the intellectual approach and so on and so on. French, English, and the German says the same thing. Right? That is they all want security, all of them. Right? Agree? You are questioning: they all want security.

Q: And they are willing to kill for that.

K: That's it. So each person says this is my security and your security, so we are going to fight, which means what?

Q: Then your life is threatened.

K: Yes. So there is no security. Right? Look at it carefully first.

Q: So your security has been completely psychological security.

K: That's it. That's it.

Q: Nothing having to do with actually what's happened.

K: That's right. So, now haven't you become intelligent? Right?

You see something. That is, I seek security in the nation, you seek security in your nation, and we are going to fight each other to be secure. And the governments exploit us, people exploit us for that reason. So there is no security as long as there are nationalities.

Q: What can we do about it?

K: Darling, wait.

Q: But we insist that there is security in the nation.

K: No, first see by questioning we have come to this point that when we try to seek security in the family, in the community and so on, in the nation, and you also seek in your own way the nation, and they quarrel when they fight each other, kill each other, security is denied to both of us. Right? So in nationalities there is no security.

Q: How do we actually see that, that there is no security?

K: It is obvious.

Q: Nothing can be done if everybody thinks like that.

K: The vast majority, ninety nine point nine, say yes, we must kill each other to be secure.

Q: OK.

K: Not OK.

Q: No. Could I just say something? You know, if it is so obvious why don't we actually change? I've talked to students and staff after these talks, and they are just as confused as ever. If it really is obvious that there is no security in my belief, my country and so on.

K: Wait a minute, my country. It's an illusion, isn't it? It doesn't exist. I want security, and you want security and we say security lies in my nation, and you say security lies in your nation, and we are killing each other. Right? The United Nations is like that.

Right? So there is no security in nationalities. Right?

Q: But we see that, but it doesn't change, it is the same, it's my country. I think it is not the security, it is always here.

K: What?

Q: He says it doesn't change after you know it's your security.

K: You change. Don't bother about the rest. You become intelligent. We are talking about intelligence. When you see for yourself there is no security in nationalities, that very perception is intelligence. Right?

Q: But he is saying that he has only partially seen it so when he goes out he still goes on with it.

K: Then you haven't seen it. Be as simple as that. If you don't see it, don't say it's partial. It's like examining a lot of blind people looking at an elephant.

Q: Why do we all say we do see it?

K: Then don't be a nationalist. That's intelligence. Right?

Q: I don't know what intelligence is.

K: You explain it, somebody explain.

Q: Well somebody tell me what intelligence is.

Q: He has just told us.

Q: No, I've already heard what he says, now I want to hear what somebody else says.

Q: What you mean a definition?

Q: No, intelligence, what is it for you?

Q: You mean - well I believe what he says.

Q: No, I don't believe.

K: You don't believe what I say.

Q: No. Would someone care to explain.

Q: I would say it is an action that is not contradictory, somehow intelligence has to be whole, it cannot be fragmented, not that you say something and then you do something completely opposite.

Q: But do you actually live that way?

Q: No.

Q: So it's just a bunch of words.

Q: Yes.

Q: But don't make it is complicated because Krishnaji is just taking one thing and he is talking about nationalism, and he says, if you drop nationalism you are beginning to be intelligent, that's the beginning of intelligence.

Q: Yes, but we always talk about this intelligence, we all want to live intelligently but we never do.

K: It's up to you.

Q: We do that.

Q: Do we really?

Q: From now on.

Q: It's clear that everyone here knows a bit of what is going on, and is a bit intelligent, I think, and still you see the mess in the school. I mean it's nice to be here, but still, exactly the same problems are here as everywhere else.

Q: I can understand it but it's hard to actually do it.

K: If you understand, I have lived in India, and I believe, I am convinced my security is in India, and you are convinced in Pakistan, next door, that your security lies in Pakistan, and we fight each other for our security. Right? Kill each other. You have no security when you kill me, and I have no security. Right? This is intelligence.

Q: I don't actually see it.

Q: Are you nationalistic? Or are you talking about the subtler issues?

Q: Perhaps, I don't know. I can see it on the surface, to believe in nationalism, there is no security in it, but...

K: All right, let's leave nationalism.

Q: But there is still something, I feel I must feel something to actually see this. You know what I mean?

K: Oh, yes, I understand what you mean. People feel very patriotic, don't they? When this country is attacked, or went to war in the Falklands, people were tremendously very patriotic. And for that reason go and kill somebody.

Q: That's murder.

K: Let's take another thing, perhaps that will explain it.

Q: But if he can't see that one, what is he going to see?

K: What?

Q: If he can't see that as intelligence, what can he see?

K: She is insulting you!

Q: I don't mean to insult him.

K: She says, if you can't see that what the hell can you see! So let's take something else. We are questioning authority. In Christianity - I am not condemning Christianity, I am just examining it - in Christianity belief and faith are essential. Right? Why have they made belief and faith so important?

Q: Well according to the Christian belief, how to live eternally.

K: We are questioning, what does that mean?

Q: It is another kind of security.

K: Yes. Right? If I believe in Jesus, if I believe in the Virgin Mary, if I believe, have complete faith, I feel safe. Right? And the Indian, for five thousand years, says, I believe not in Jesus, but I believe in my own god. You come along and say, what nonsense this is. It is just a belief. You can invent any belief and find security in that. Right? So is there security in belief?

Q: No.

K: Right? Why do you say, no?

Q: Because...

K: Why do you say, no, question why do you say, no.

Q: Because if you believe that, and I believe this, there is no security, because we will blow each other into smithereens.

K: It is the same thing with nationalities. Right? That's all. So, understand now, a vast majority of the western world accept this, belief and faith, in all their church and all that, they believe that, very strongly. Which means what? They create an illusion, an image, and believe in that. Which means they are living in illusion. And illusion gives them strength. They feel safe in illusions. Right? Now have I got illusions? Have you got illusions?

Q: Perhaps...

K: Wait, question it.

Q: No, I've read that most of my thoughts are controlled by the subconscious, that which we are unaware of.

K: We will come to that, old boy, presently. I am asking you - I have asked that question, answer it. Do you have beliefs so strongly which give you comfort, you feel, my god, at last I have found something that gives me satisfaction. That means, are you living in illusions. Right? Have you got illusions?

Q: Yes.

K: Question why?

Q: If you think I am a good student, and you think you are a good student, but then you see another person who is a better student, perhaps a bit quicker, and you get jealous.

K: Yes, go on.

Q: And so you definitely - if you try to get away from the jealousy by suppressing it, it doesn't work.

K: No. I am asking you, old boy - if I may call you old boy - I am asking you, have you got any illusions.

Q: Yes.

K; Question why you have.

Q: Because...

K: Question. First realize, first become aware that you have illusions. Right? I have illusions of my country, I have illusions that I am a Christian, I worship and all the rest of it. That's an illusion. And have you any other kind of illusions?

Q: We all have ideas or illusions of what it is to be orderly.

K: Go on. So are ideas illusions? Go on, sir, question. Are ideals illusions?

Q: Yes.

Q: Yes, because they never deal with what is happening.

K: That's right.

Q: It's always something that you want to be, compared to something that you are.

K: So ideals, ideas. Right? And your beliefs are illusions. Why do you have them?

Q: Because if feels secure.

K: Yes. You have found security in illusions.

Q: Everybody thinks.

K: Yes, everybody thinks but I am asking you.

Q: He has something too and sometimes I think.

K: Not sometimes, no. I am asking you now, have you got illusions of such a kind with which you are living? Now, please understand why we are questioning. We are questioning all these things by understanding them, realizing their nature and becoming intelligent. If a man lives in a kind of false illusions he is not intelligent. Right? So we are trying to find out what is supreme intelligence. Supreme intelligence is to have no illusions. That's only the beginning of it. Right? Have you got illusions.

Q: Well I have made an illusion of intelligence. I think that if I find out what intelligence is I will be completely by myself.

K: Oh no. I might join you.

Q: You know, and that scares the hell out of me.

K: All of us might join you, and say, by Jove what an intelligent man, let's find out how he got this intelligence. So do you, all of us in this room, do you have illusions?

Q: Aren't your words illusions for us?

K: What?

Q: Aren't your words illusions for us.

Q: That depends on you.

Q: Isn't what he is saying an illusion for us.

K: If you accept it. But if you begin to question your illusions, not my illusions.

Q: You don't talk about stopping your illusions or suppressing them, just questioning them.

K: Yes. If you suppress them they will pop up again. Like Kleenex!

Q: Isn't it true also that many of our illusions breed from our conditioning?

K: Yes.

Q: And what I wonder is - OK, this is just for myself only, that I've grown up with an exposure to what you have been saying since I've been a baby.

K: So, wait a minute, as you said, do not all these illusions indicate our conditioning.

Q: Yes.

K: Now question your conditioning.

Q: Well I think...

K: First look at it carefully. What's your conditioning?

Q: I haven't had that religious or political conditioning.

K: No, you may not have religious or political conditioning, but you are conditioned. Right? Question that. What do you mean by conditioning? Are you conditioned?

Q: By my own experience even.

K: That's right. Then you begin to question your experience.

Q: I am trying. It's so difficult to separate it.

K: No. By questioning, not saying I am right or I am wrong, by enquiring, exploring, your mind which has become dull through conditioning begins to quicken - not quicken, it becomes more alive. Now will you all do this? You are here at Brockwood not only to be academically excellent, but also psychologically supremely intelligent. Right?

Q: That's an illusion.

K: What's that?

Q: It's an illusion, because it doesn't work.

K: No, no, no. Now just listen. Is it an illusion that you have to be academically good?

Q: If you work hard enough you can be academically good.

K: You can be excellent academically, can't you? By studying.

Q: Yes, but...

K: Wait, wait. Right? Studying, applying, paying attention to your beastly little books.

Q: Yes, but some of it's interesting.

K: What?

Q: Some of the work that you do is interesting.

K: You have to be because if you are excellent academically you may get a good job. Money. You have to earn money. Now psychologically, can't you be supremely excellent? Which means you live intelligently therefore there is never conflict and so on. I won't go into all that.

Q: So we have to think about everything we do, all our reactions.

K: Yes. You have to watch what you think, why you think, why you have such emotions, why you separate yourself from them, and so on. You become aware, you become sensitive, alive.

Q: We try.

Q: Yes, most people in this room have actually tried this, but after a period of time we forget about it.

K: Can you forget hunger?

Q: No. But we become aware of...

K: No, don't go off. Can you forget danger?

Q: No. But that's all the result of the intelligence of the body.

K: Now just wait a minute. Can you forget danger?

Q: No.

K: Sir, why, why don't you forget it? Question it. I am questioning you, and you answer.

Q: I don't want to die. If you are pointing a gun at me.

K: Please, you know what danger is.

Q: Yes.

K: Do you forget it?

Q: No.

K: Why not?

Q: I think you do.

Q: OK, physical danger. I don't forget.

K: Is not nationalism danger?

Q: Yes.

K: So you say, I am not a nationalist, I don't belong to any country. That's a danger, why do you forget it? You can't.

Q: But we do.

K: You do?

Q: Often.

Q: This is all very difficult.

K: No, no. You see you are not questioning, you are saying something without - I am asking you to question everything you do, think, ask.

Q: Well perhaps that is not possible with modern conditions.

K: That's an excuse. You can question.

Q: It seems the past year I have been really questioning, everything I think. And sometimes I feel I am just going in circles.

K: Of course. But you are not questioning thinking.

Q: Well, I am questioning that right now. I am questioning that it seems that within our intellect we try to become more aware of our thoughts, and our it's like our thoughts are aware of our self.

K: Yes, quite right. But, look, I begin to question nationalism. Right? Then I come to the point I question my thinking, thinking itself.

Q: So it's like the intellect is only an instrument, and it's like it becomes sharper and sharper, to a certain point it just becomes - well, there is nothing more you can do with it.

K: It becomes sharper and sharper, though at the end of it it becomes dull.

Q: It's...

K: Are you interested in what I say? The more you sharpen an instrument it gradually wears off and becomes dull. Right? A chisel, keep on polishing and polishing and using it, it becomes dull. So question why your mind is becoming dull by merely going round and round.

Q: Because it is all thought.

K: No, you are not questioning it. I get depressed - suppose I do, I have no depression, I never have been depressed. Suppose I am depressed. I say, yes, I am very depressed. I accept it. I don't say, now why am I depressed? Is it I am thinking about myself? Is it I can't get what I want? Is it somebody is better than me? Somebody is more beautiful than me? Somebody is more rich? And so on and so on. Is that the reason why I am depressed. Right? If I am, then I say, why am I doing this. You follow? Move. Right sir? Are you doing it?

Q: Sir, I think there must be a result or a decision from this very questioning, so shall we go on questioning.

K: I don't quite understand.

Q: The questioning brings about a result. Should we question the result as well?

K: Of course.

Q: When we react.

K: You stop questioning only when there is nothing more to question! That's not a clever statement, but see what happens: that when you begin to question seriously, step by step, then there is a point where there is only that state of mind that has no problems at all. I won't go into all this. But you don't start. You want to reach the end instead of beginning.

Q: Sir, do you say then that if you are depressed, question it, or just be aware of it? If you are depressed you say we should question it, or just be aware of it?

K: Yes. I am depressed. I'll show it to you. I want to know why I am depressed. I don't say, yes I am depressed. I say, why am I depressed. Is it that I have eaten the wrong thing? I have not slept properly? Or I am depressed because I can't get what I want? Or I can't - I am not as good as you, or I am not as clever as you. Right? Which means I am always comparing. Why do I compare? Is it possible not to compare? You see I am questioning all this. Can I live without comparison?

Q: If we ask continually why, can't that process just reinforce the whole...

K: Of course.

Q:... ego thing we are trying to question.

K: That's why I am saying it must be done with intelligence. So you begin with the most ordinary things.

Q: And that intelligence we don't have. We try to get intelligence and we have to use intelligence to get our intelligence.

Q: Exactly.

K: Exactly.

Q: It's like, what intelligence are you talking about? I mean the description of intelligence that we understand is that intelligence is not limited by thought, or experience.

K: Yes.

Q: So how can I use the intelligence I have right now that is limited by thought and experience? I mean it seems so...

K: No. Have you got intelligence now?

Q: I think I do sometimes, yes.

K: Not sometimes. You see, now why don't you question that. Have you got intelligence now?

Q: I don't think I do, no. No.

K: So begin.

Q: Not the kind of intelligence that I want to have.

K: Begin. Begin. Are you nationalistic, or are you seeking safety in your little family, seeking security in your ideas. Sir, I am doing all the questioning, you're not.

Q: What if you seek security in some things but not in others?

K: What?

Q: If you seek security in some things, but not in other things?

K: So what do you seek security in? In your looks? In your family? In some god? In some illusion? You see, I am doing it all. Sir what I am pointing out very simply is, most of us are so conditioned, right, that we become very dull. We repeat what somebody has said; or we read a great deal and are very knowledgeable, but you may be stupid. So I say, find out for yourself what is intelligence. And you can find out that by asking, questioning, doubting. You can't doubt everything: there is electricity, that light is there, you can't doubt it. Right? The tree, you can't doubt it, it is there. Right? The governments are there, the policeman is there, all the churches, all the things in the churches are there. So you begin to question.

Q: Your anxiety is there.

K: Yes, or the scientists.

Q: He said, your anxiety.

K: Anxiety. All right. Question anxiety. Why are you anxious? The majority of people are anxious. Right? Because they have no money, or they are anxious their husband may be looking at somebody else. Right? Anxiety. Are you anxious, any of you?

Q: Yes.

Q: Yes.

K: You are anxious?

Q: Yes.

K: Why?

Q: Because of different things.

K: Tell me one.

Q: No.

Q: Isn't it the desperateness for security is very forceful, that the atmosphere of questioning is not there.

K: Tunki, I can't hear you.

Q: What he says is that the desperate search for security prevents actual questioning.

Q: So how can questioning...

K: Now just a minute, Tunki, when I am very anxious I can't question. Right? But then there must - I am not anxious all the time. There is anxiety when I wake up, and as I take my coffee or tea, or whatever it is, that anxiety recedes a little bit, then I begin to question.

Q: In this questioning of why, would it not be important to question without trying to find an answer. It seems that if we try to find an answer we just give ourselves excuses.

K: Of course. When you question and find an answer, question that answer. You follow, sir? Learn the art. It's not just that you begin to question everything, learn the art of questioning. You stop questioning sometimes and say, yes, by Jove, why am I questioning. Look without questioning. You follow? Learn about it.

Q: People become discouraged with their questioning because they don't get something.

K: Yes sir. They get discouraged, disappointed, hurt.

Q: Because they want something that will give them security.

K: Yes. Or, I have been secure and you have taken it away from me. I become anxious. What I am saying sir - just two minutes, just listen.

I saw that sticker on that bumper in California, and I said, I wonder if the gentleman, or the person who put that sticker on the bumper really questions, or it's just a slogan. You understand what I am saying. It is just a slogan, but he never questions, says, why am I doing this? Why am I thinking this? Why do I believe? So questioning is a great art. Right? It isn't that I question, I move, I see the subtleties of it. Right? See the depth of it. And the beauty of enquiry, see bit by bit, how extraordinarily complex this thing is: why man has lived in illusions for thousands of years, if it is not Christian gods then there are Muslim gods. Right? If it isn't that, there have been gods by the thousand for the last five thousand years and more. Some people, like the Buddhists, deny god, but there is always this search, longing for something beyond all this misery. Right? All this conflict, all this ugliness in the world. So they invent something and they worship it.

Q: Like enlightenment.

K: Yes, quite right. Enlightenment is not something you experience. Or something that somebody gives you. That's all such nonsense. So as I was saying, sir, find out the art of questioning. Learn a great deal about it. You spend a great deal of time, don't you, in mathematics, learning mathematics. Right? Or geography, history, or whatever it is, and you don't give even ten minutes to this. And so you become excellent in one direction and dull in the other direction.

What time is it?

Q: One o'clock.

K: I think we had better stop, don't you. No? Would you like to try something?

Q: Yes.

K: Sit very quietly - just a minute, before you sit very quietly, absolutely quiet, with your eyes closed and find out what you are thinking. And why you are thinking that particular thought, or a series of thoughts. Try it! And find out if your brain can be so quiet, without a single thought. Don't go to sleep though!

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST BRAIN SEMINAR 8TH JUNE 1984

A: Some of the unresolved questions in the area of brain research lie in perception, memory and the nature of intelligence. You, Krishnamurti, have explored these questions without any scientific background and yet have indicated that thought is limited. You have also indicated that there is an intelligence beyond the ordinary functioning of the brain. As long as there is psychological conditioning, which is the self, this intelligence cannot act.

I would like to introduce you to Dr. Shainberg, he is a psychiatrist from the United States. Dr. Peat is a physicist, writer and film maker from Canada. Professor Bergstrom is a neuro-physiologist at the University of Helsinki, Finland. Professor Varela is a neuro-biologist at the Max Planck Institute for brain research in Frankfurt. I am a neuro-biologist and teacher at Brockwood Park.

One important instrument in the understanding of the brain has been thought. I was wondering if we could discuss whether thought can help us to understand the brain, and the complexity of life.

K: Do I start right off?

A: If you wish.

K: Sir, can one understand one's own brain and the activities and the complexity of the brain without operating on animals, dead bodies and so on? Can one observe the very complex structure and nature of the brain in oneself, rather than seek it externally, outside? Is that possible? I feel it is possible if one can watch very carefully, objectively, without any bias the reactions, the biological responses and the inward urges and temperaments and idiosyncrasies, the whole complexity of human existence.

To approach this very, very complex problem, if one has a complex mind then it is not possible to understand complexity, but if one can approach it very simply. I mean by simplicity, without compulsion, without will, without a direction, motive, just to watch the whole operation of one's own activities and so on. And then I think it is possible to examine, or to observe the activity of one's own brain without seeking it externally.

C: What do you mean by understand?

K: By observing, I don't mean understand. By watching very carefully the complexity of oneself. What is the operation of thought, how thought arises, what is the cause of it, the origin of thought and the activities both externally, technologically, the moment of thought and the limitation of thought.

B: When you say, is it possible to understand the brain, do you mean only thought and psychological reaction, or do you mean things like the fact that I can see the glass. Perception, do you mean, as well?

K: Yes, perception, surely.

B: And the use of language?

K: Surely. Linguistics, all that. The whole complexity of human endeavours, actions and feelings, all that, imagination, the whole content of that.

B: And learning.

K: Watching.

B: Watching and being able to learn something new. Being able to learn and work in a totally new situation.

K: Would you call it learning? What is there to learn by just watching?

E: Well that seems to me precisely where there seems to be a fundamental distinction between merely observing, not merely, observing, completely observing...

K: Yes, without the me.

E: ...without the me, and a notion of creating a way of understanding how that observation comes to be, which is traditionally what western thinking has done, including science, creating what one can call a model, a process, a theory, a law, whatever. Now would that endeavour be out in the approach you are proposing?

K: I don't quite understand out, what do you mean?

E: Would not be pursued, would be left behind. That actually coming up with a theory or a model that would explain how does it come that we see what we see.

K: Theory or model. Is it necessary to have a theory and model to see what is actually going on?

E: I wouldn't say it is necessary to see what is going on. But it seems to be necessary, as far as I can understand it, to understand why do I see what I see. If one has the inclination of asking the question beyond the seeing, why do I see what I see.

K: Why do you see what you see, why do I feel what I feel.

E: Yes, why do I see blue when I see blue. Very simple questions like that, which are the ones that I have been concerned with.

K: Yes, I understand. Is it we have all called that book, book.

E: Right.

K: And I accept that. We accept it, all of us. That thing is called a book. And that thing is called a table. But a computer can't call it a table immediately.

E: But then you can ask yourself a question why the computer can't and we can. How are we made different?

K: Because we have got the capacity to see anything, four legs, or two legs, or one leg, a table, instantly.

C: But what is that capacity?

E: This is the point.

C: What is the capacity to do it, and then what is the relationship of that capacity - in other words, what is the relationship of your capacity to say, "That is a book", to your capacity to say, "It is a table"? What is your capacity to see it is a table?

A: Well perhaps I think we should go to the very beginning question. You introduced the question of observation somehow, which was different from theorizing about something. I think perhaps it would be good to clarify what we mean by observing something.

K: Shall we do that sir?

E: I felt that he clarified it very well. I felt that I understood what he meant by observing.

C: Well can you tell me what you think he meant?

E: All right, I'll try! I think he meant by observing completely bracketing a preassumed understanding and going into a mode of not being self-centred but of being with the object or with the movement without any precondition. To the extent that that is possible then there is an experience, there is an observation.

K: Sir, does that imply to observe there must be no conditioning?

E: Yes, I think I understand that.

A: We have to go slowly here because somehow you mentioned an observation without the me. It doesn't seem for me so clear because whenever I am looking at something there seems to be the separation between my observing and something. There seems to be this division in the brain.

K: Is that our conditioning?

A: It seems to be one of them. Why is that?

K: There is the see-er and the seen.

A: Yes.

K: The observer and the observed, the thinker and the thought, the experiencer and the experience.

B: Well turning it the other way from what Professor Varela was saying, I would like to know what you think the relationship is between the theory and observation?

A: Well this is precisely where I wanted him to move.

K: I don't think there is any theory.

B: Well all right. You accept therefore that the endeavour you are proposing would be a radical departure from what has been all of the models of knowledge from the west.

K: Yes sir. I may be wrong.

B: No, but this would not have anything...

K: In observing why should I have a theory about it?

E: Well it seems to me - may I try just for a moment?

K: Yes, please.

E: When I look at that question it feels that there is something inside me that by itself is inquisitive about why is it, how comes this is the way it is. Isn't it interesting that the paper is white and book is blue, isn't it interesting, why isn't it red?

K: Oh, there is a red book there.

E: Yes but why is that red and not this one red?

K: We have called that red.

E: Yes, but why have we called that red? What is the process from which that comes about?

K: Yes. What is the process.

E: That is the natural inquisitiveness that leads one into building this sort of theory, which eventually, for example, might allow me to build a machine, which would have a mind, with big quotation marks, with thoughts which could say, "Oh, that is a red book and that is a blue book", just at the same time when I would say it.

K: Yes.

E: I would consider that interesting. That is what interests me in science.

K: That is not very interesting.

E: No.

K: Go on sir!

E: I find it interesting.

K: All right sir, go ahead. I thought you said that was not very interesting.

E: No, no, I find it interesting. That is why I said when you asked do we need a theory at all, I said not really but there is this inquisitiveness that seems to constantly come up of asking the question of how is it like that, how can we understand that, how can we have an image, a representation of the process where that comes up?

C: I don't think you are saying enough. I wish you would say more. It is not just the theory because you are inquisitiveness but the theory also functions to establish for you and for me the interrelationship between these issues, therefore you are not just looking - because this will ultimately come down to our question of what is the relationship of theory to observation - but your theory function is a way to help you to distinguish red, white and blue and why you are seeing it, and therefore you have an interdigitation of many different aspects of your curiosity.

E: We are talking about perception and it is not clear if we are talking about perception as psychological perception. But if we just ask how you see the glass and Krishnamurti has said it is possible to explore the whole mechanism of seeing the glass of water by one can observe oneself doing it. All the other scientists would say that is nonsense, that can't be possibly be true. There must be many levels of operation which are purely mechanical, which we never can have any direct experience of, at the level of the eye and the optic nerve. And Krishnamurti seems to be saying something different but I am not sure if I understand that he is saying something much more radical than that. We must be aware of every level of the process.

D: Coming back to the original question about the brain, understanding the brain as such, or dissecting it. So if we see from the point of view of the brain surgeon, there exists as a matter of fact two kinds of brain. The whole brain, which sees red or blue and so on; and then the other brain is the brain which consists of the parts, the cells, molecules and so on. And the physiologist looks, and here comes the theory, experimenting, dissecting, theorizing and so on, looks at the brain which consists of the parts. And then the other way - now I am coming to the original question - we had to face as physiologists also that brain which perceives, which is only one me, or whatever the individual calls itself, and that is another way. I always think that we have to distinguish between those two. And the first will be the theoretical brain, with fragments, parts and so on, and the other will be the human brain.

K: Sir.

D: And therefore I think we can really know about brain without dissecting it.

E: That we cannot?

D: That we can study the brain as a whole.

K: Why do we divide the brain at all?

E: Yes, that's the question.

K: Why not treat it as a whole movement?

C: I don't have anything against that. That doesn't resolve the issue of whether we need a theory for the observation.

K: No, wait sir.

C: Because I can have a theory which is a holistic theory, which deals with the brain as a totality.

K: Not a holistic theory but it is so.

A: But I think the theory comes into being in order to organize the certain facts that you have. You have to give certain coins and logic to the facts that you are accumulating. And I think Professor Varela said something very interesting, you take for example a child. From the very beginning it seems this natural tendency to discover things and to attribute meaning to things.

D: But a theory cannot be holistic, there are always parts, a collection of parts.

E: Oh, that would take us in another direction.

K: By collecting all the parts you make the whole?

E: No. Of course not. I agree absolutely but what I mean by holistic theory is a theory that has built in itself the awareness of its fragmentedness.

K: All right.

E: Which is quite a different thing.

K: Can we put it this way: one is aware that we are fragmented human beings - right? Those fragments we are trying to bring all of them together, and that doesn't make the whole.

E: Absolutely.

K: So.

A: How is one to proceed then?

K: You see the obvious.

A: It doesn't follow from that

K: I mean spokes. You collect all the spokes of a wheel and the spokes don't make the wheel, you have to put it together - right? I don't quite see the difficulty in this.

B: To put the wheel together you also need some technical knowledge as well as the perception of the whole.

K: Yes.

B: And where does the technical knowledge come from?

K: Is that what we are trying to do? Technical knowledge, how to put the brain together?

B: No but you say to understand the brain, the technical knowledge is not really important.

K: I didn't say that sir.

B: Oh.

E: I said, can we.

B: Can we, without the dissection, I don't mean the whole of seeing all the parts inside.

E: For my part I can say that for me is a fascinating question because there is nothing that I would like more than to be able to ask the questions about how knowledge works without having to disrupt an embryo. It sort of pains my heart that we have to carry on with this knowledge by disrupting life. I don't like it. As a matter of fact I don't want to do it anymore.

K: No, sir.

E: But still the inquisitiveness is there.

K: Now wait a minute sir. Where shall we begin, we have put some many things?

D: There is one reason why we should know a little bit about brain cells and so on, and that is the diseases and so on, and that must be one of the reasons why they began to fragmentize this.

A: Perhaps we could come back and stick to one question. We started by saying that can the brain understand itself, what does that mean really? And is it possible that thought can understand the brain? I think we should stick to that somehow.

K: Would you say, sir, the brain is the centre of thought, feelings, physical responses, biological responses. And also the brain is the centre of one's 'consciousness', fears, pleasures, anxiety, all that, sorrow, the whole of that consciousness, if you will accept that word, is in the brain. It is not out there.

B: I am afraid I would have to disagree.

K: Oh, delighted!

B: I don't think that thought or consciousness is in the brain.

That this is precisely one the greatest mistakes...

K: Wait sir. Thought is outside.

B: It is neither outside nor inside, there is a quality of relationship which thought...

K: Wait a minute. Then we have to enquire what is thought. Can we begin with that? Would you agree?

E: Yes, let's do that.

K: Let's do that. What is thought? What is thinking?

B: Do you want us to answer?

K: It is a discussion.

B: OK. I would say that thought belongs to a form of action which is related to separating precisely, to separating a unit from its context. That any separation of a unit from its context is a form of cognition or thought, at a fundamental level. Therefore the thought cannot exist without the relationship between that which is distinguished and that which it is distinguished from.

C: Wait a second. Would you say that thought is an event that arises... or is it some sort of process event which articulates the separation and arrives at the awareness - in other words the arrival of thought is the articulation of the separation of thought?

B: It is an emergent quality.

C: So it is not the no-go separation, it is an emerging of that.

B: Yes.

K: It is emerging.

C: Yes, but emerging not a separation at the instant but...

B: ...it is imminent in the action.

K: It is emerging, being born.

C: That is an important distinction.

K: Yes sir. Being born all the time.

B: Exactly.

K: From where?

B: What is the source?

K: Wait, wait. Thought is being born, emerging, growing, coming and going - right? From where?

C: Wait a minute, that may be the wrong question: from where, because you have already defined a definition.

K: No, no.

C: You have separated out process, you have made a distinction, by saying where you have got a definition.

K: No, I want to know the cause. Put another word if you like.

C: I would prefer what is the action that arrives in thought?

K: Wait a minute sir. Then you have to ask what is action.

B: What is this movement.

K: Yes, what is this whole movement.

E: OK When I inspect that question for myself, in myself, the only answer I can give to it is, its an unlimited frontier, that is, the moment I am in thought I have obscured for myself that which I am asking. Therefore the source of movement, or the source of thought is an unlimited space which is beyond thought.

K: I wonder!

E: All right. What do you wonder?

K: I wonder what is the relationship between thought and action? That's what we are discussing, aren't we.

E: Yes. But thought occurs, thought happens. I find myself in thought.

C: Therefore it is action.

K: Sir, you just now said thought is born, comes into being - right? It must have some causation.

E: Yes, but in order to see the causation I have to put myself out from thought.

K: We will see. Sir we ought to enquire whether it is possible to observe the causation without the observer, who is the outside - right?

C: Right.

E: Right, absolutely. And the question as you phrase it.

K: Wait. So can one observe the cause without the observer? Can the causation be observed without the outsider or the observer, the witnesser, which means the observer, the person who perceives, is not the observed the observer?

C: Say that again.

K: I can't repeat. I'll put it another way. There is a perception of you sitting there and I sitting here. When I see you, you have been introduced to me and so on, I remember all that memory of it, it is the observer. Can I look at you without the observer? Without the knowledge of you? You understand? Of course I can.

A: I think we have to go slowly there, it is a great step.

E: Yes, you can.

K: Of course. Therefore the observer is the observed.

E: Yes.

K: There is no separation. There is separation only when there is the observer different from the observed.

B: Absolutely.

E: So that is an observation.

K: That is real observation without the observer. The observer is the past, memory, knowledge, experience. All the observer is the past. Can I look at something without the past? Of course it is possible.

D: I don't know.

K: Just a minute, let me finish. And then what is action? You understand?

E: What is action for that...

K: What is action. Leave that for the moment.

E: OK

K: What is action? When there is no observer - right? - what is action?

A: Well I would like to come back to the question. You see why are we normally doing this separation between what we observe, the brain is normally doing that anyhow. So perhaps one could say it might be normal for the brain.

K: That may be our tradition, that may be our education, that may be we have been told from childhood that is different from you, you are different from me.

C: Yes, but when you were introduced to him your perception of him at that instant was the observation without the observer. Then now when you look...

K: I begin to accumulate. The brain begins to accumulate the knowledge about him. He says he won't operate anymore, so I say, "By Jove, is he..." you know all the rest of it. Forget. No, my point is to put it much simpler: not to record.

C: You did record.

K: I did but that is very simple.

C: You didn't record, then you did record.

K: No sir. No. Just a minute. In my relationship with you, with you all, I have recorded - suppose I have recorded - then that record becomes the observer; but if there is no record there is only seeing, observing.

C: Suppose we say the brain is recording.

K: I see. No, sir, is it possible not to record? I know the mechanism of recording.

C: But we have agreed that it is possible to observe without recording.

K: Is that a theory or.?

C: No.

K: Actuality?

C: Yes. It is possible.

K: No, the moment you say it is possible you have made it a theory.

B: I think we have to agree it is a theory for us.

C: I don't think we are being honest.

K: Of course sir.

C: We are just saying yes, but we don't really believe that, no.

A: You see for example I don't know what you would say.

Normally in science there is a person doing science and to a certain extent one could say that this division between the observer and the observed is necessary to a certain extent. Right? When you are dealing with some experimental outside world. So now it doesn't necessarily follow that psychologically we are doing exactly the same.

K: I understand sir. After all as a human being with the result of fifty thousand years - right? - tremendous accumulation of knowledge, experience, all that, I am that. And that is looking at something else, so separating itself constantly.

E: Yes, but go slowly. You see this is precisely the point that this separation has to be sustained by an ongoing process which has constant breakdowns. And the point of those breakdowns there is the closing the gap. So in my perception of you right now I am constantly having gaps or flashes of this observer.

K: I say why is this contradiction all the time.

E: No, no, this is precisely the point. Why do we have to see contradiction there?

K: One can explain it.

E: I was actually going back to something you raised. That it seems we have both of them, observation with the observer and...

K: At one level, yes. If I met you again tomorrow I can't re-introduce, it would be silly. But at that level it is necessary - right? But at a deeper level, why should I carry all the memory of meeting you, why should there be a recording of it at all. I meet you, finished.

E: You have just answered the question by saying if you did one without the other, if you just met me without accumulation then tomorrow we would have to go through it again.

K: Sir that is insane.

E: Therefore both of them are necessary.

K: Yes, at one level.

C: I have never heard you use those words 'level'. What do you mean by levels and what is the relationship between levels in your terms?

K: I think it is fairly simple.

C: Well I am stupid I don't understand!

E: That makes two of us!

K: Sir, I need to know how to write a letter - right? There knowledge is necessary, to drive a car or anything. Physically to do anything I must have a great deal of information, knowledge and accumulated memory and so on. Right? Psychologically, if you don't like to use that word, inwardly, why should I accumulate? Why should there be accumulation?

A: Yes but if I understood what you were saying, Francisco and you, even when you say that the brain does not record there is still a process of recognition, you see, which necessarily must involve certain levels of memory.

K: We said that. We said that.

A: So what do you mean by, when the brain does not record?

K: Is that possible first of all psychologically not to record? You understand my question? You say something brutal to me, why should I record it? This recording is the self.

B: Suppose I said that to see anything there has to be a great accumulation. You could say there could be no perception without the accumulation and accumulation includes the actual structure of the brain that has evolved over millions of years, that is in a sense a form of memory. Matter is born in certain connections and that is preserved over a very long time. So I could say that there is no perception without so-called accumulation of memory and knowledge.

K: Of course, sir, we agree, we have stated that.

B: So without it there is no perception and this is something that always continues. And is this different from psychological recording?

K: That is what we are asking.

A: That is an important question to clarify.

K: Sir, we made it clear just now, didn't we?

E: Absolutely.

K: That we need knowledge - if I am a carpenter I need a great deal of knowledge. The quality of the wood, the grain and the instruments, and so on and so on. That is necessary. I don't object to that. That is so, otherwise we can't live. But at the inward level, inward - forget the word, throw the word out! Inwardly

C: What is inward?

K: The feeling, the psyche - you should know!

B: Is there a connection between the two? Are you pulling the two apart and saying that is the psychological, that's the practical?

K: No, no. I see knowledge is necessary, and also I am questioning whether inwardly, psychically, psychologically - any word you use - inside the skin as it were, why should there be any recording at all?

C: OK.

K: Just a minute sir. This recording inwardly is the divisive process. The divisive process is the self, the me and the not me, which is creating havoc in the world - right? That's all. Let me finish.

Is the mechanism which has gone on for centuries the me and the not me, can that mechanism stop so that there is no me inwardly? The me being the self and all the rest of it, that's all. This has been not only a question for the scientists, but for the religious people, the serious ones, not the phoney ones. The real religious people have said, can there be no self at all, and live in this world, not go off into monasteries or run away to some kind of fanciful entertainment. Actually live without the self. That's all. Which requires a further statement, which is: is it possible not to record inwardly, psychically, and all that? I say it is possible. You may say, "You are a nut, you are crazy", but that is all right, we will discuss it.

D: There is I think a stage in the development of the child, you see very, very early child, possibly a child can have this.

K: You see it already in the child. Give him a toy and you try to take it and he says, "It is mine".

D: But I think before that stage, a child at one or two years, but then comes the time when it is mine, but I think they live together, they are one with the mother and so on, so there might be...

K: Sir, I have read somewhere, or been told, I am not a reader, I have been told by scientists who are looking at the babies that the babies already know when a visitor is friendly to the mother or not.

D: Yes.

K: Already, you understand sir?

D: Already.

K: By the atmosphere, by the feeling, by the mother's shrinking, or seeing the mother.

E: But in your question, one of the reasons why it has so many sides to it, as a brain researcher, as a scientist, it seems reasonable to say that the brain is organized so as to construct a stable world, therefore to solidify, to be caught, in your words. That is what it is there for.

K: I understand sir.

E: I mean this is what his history has been. Now it is only when it comes to human beings where this question is posed. Then we can ask ourselves the question, is this no recording possible, as a swimming against the current of natural history, as it were.

C: Of evolution.

E: Of evolution. Because natural history goes the other way. And at the moment the possibility arises and it is impossible to unlearn evolutionary wise so as to come to the state of living in the world without recording, without self, and yet be a functional human being, able to brush your teeth.

K: Of course. I said that.

E: Yes, I know. My feeling is that is a question that can only be answered by exploring it from actual experience of human beings. And the history seems to say, yes, it is possible. We have examples and we know people who seem to have done that. Now from a point of view of what that implies for the brain is a fascinating point.

K: Therefore could we put the question differently? The brain has evolved through time, centuries, a million years, or forty million years, or whatever it is, forty thousand. And it is probably at its highest level, as much as it can. And that involves time, duration. What is time? Right? Unless we understand what is time I can go on indefinitely - right? People have asked too, is there an end to time, not science fiction, actually. Right? Now what is time, apart from the clock? Cut that out. Time is the past and the present and the future. So time is contained in the now, all time. So the future is now.

E: Yes.

K: No, sir, it is not a theory.

E: No, I understand.

K: The future is now and the past is now - right? Then what is action? If action is, "I will do", the future, or "I have done", it is not action. Action is now. The very word 'act' means now - right? So can the brain which has evolved - you follow my question - go on sir.

E: The description of saying the brain has evolved, is already the trap.

K: We said that, it is a fact. I am not denying that. But if there is no radical revolution psychologically I will tomorrow be exactly, modified, as today.

C: I would like to come back to where we were at the very beginning of this because I see a connection here, which is the fact that at the level at which you talked about, the so-called inward level...

K: Leave the word level, I said cut it out!

B: Inwardly.

C: ...inwardly, there is an action. Now at the beginning we talked about the fact that imminent in that inward action is thought, and imminent in that movement of action is thought which separates. Now that's where time gets...

K: Yes sir, that is what we are saying. We are saying thought is limited.

C: Yes, but what I am trying to get at is the fact that in the inward level, and I will keep that word for the minute, out of the inward level comes thought. Now the question is what is the relationship of that movement, that action to thought?

K: I don't quite follow you.

C: In other words, the state of observation without the observer, the action is imminent within a thought.

K: No sir. The observer is the observed. We agree to that - right? It is not a theory.

C: But imminent in that...

K: Sir, just wait a minute sir. The observer is the observed. That is a tremendous fact. It is not a theory. It changes the whole way of living. There is no division as the observer and the observed, therefore no conflict. That's a theory, but to live that way, which means total eradication of conflict, upon which the brain has evolved. You follow?

E: Yes.

K: So when the observer is the observed and no conflict, there is a radical change in the brain. You follow?

E: Yes.

K: A whole mutation takes place, if I can use that word.

E: Yes, but your mutation implies time.

K: No, mutation is, biologically as well inwardly there is a radical revolution, because the brain has lived for forty thousand years on conflict.

E: Now can I ask you what is the connection now between that possibility...

K: You see I wouldn't use the word possibility.

E: All right. What would you use?

K: When you use the word possibility, it means it may be possible.

E: Yes, OK that actuality.

K: Actuality.

E: And the question you posed at the beginning: can I observe my brain?

K: Yes.

E: Without tearing it apart.

K: Yes and without books.

E: How do these two things relate?

K: Would you state that question again?

E: OK. You said at the beginning, I would like to say that I investigate my brain without tearing it apart, by seeing 'what is'.

K: Yes. By seeing exactly 'what is'.

E: And now you have also said, there is the actuality of the everpresent nowness of the non distinction where the observer is the observed.

K: Sir, do you realize what that means?

E: I do and I don't! It comes and goes.

K: To you it is a theory. Forgive me, I am not being personal. It is a theory.

E: Well sometimes it is not.

K: Ah! Either it is, or it is not.

E: It comes and goes.

K: No, it can't.

E: Why not?

K: Sir, make it simple. When you see something dangerous, it is finished. You don't go and say, "I'll go and play with something dangerous", it is over.

E: No, but you can see the car coming and get out of the way.

K: No, but you can't each time you see a car coming keep out of the way all the time.

E: Sir are you telling me it is not possible to learn by having a glimpse of something. When you have the glimpse you are there, and then something else happens that takes you off. But there is a possibility of building on the continuity of the glimpse. Why does it have to be a black and white.

K: Don't put it as black and white. There is total division.

E: That's what I understood.

A: I think what you are saying in one's life time one sees certain things one discovers and then that becomes again a memory from which one acts.

E: Which is not the thing itself.

A: Yes, but I think what you are saying that the moment when you have an insight into that it is obviously not memory somehow.

E: It is actuality.

A: Yes.

E: But then it becomes memory, then it becomes actuality again.

K: Back and forth, back and forth.

E: Back and forth.

K: No.

E: How is it then?

K: Sir, look, I am not a philosopher or anything, I will put it very simply. I have been going north for the last forty thousand years. You come along and say, look that goes nowhere, go south, or east, or west. The very movement of moving away from north to south, in that second, moving, in that movement the cells of the brain have changed, because it has been accustomed to going there - keep it simple.

E: So your reason is that at all the case? Is that available to human beings?

K: Oh yes, if they pay attention.

E: Yes, but this is precisely my point that in my own experience...

K: They don't.

C: Why don't they?

K: Sir, that is simple enough. They have so many interests, so many. First of all that they have to earn a livelihood, not that we don't have to. They have a dozen problems.

C: You came in and you have been introduced to Professor Varela, you were introduced to him.

K: And to you and to him and him.

C: And tomorrow you come along and you say to me, "Oh hello how are you today?" implying that you have remembered. So now what is the relationship between that and this other?

K: Sir, we have made that clear.

C: No, we haven't because are you in that state at that moment, it seems to me you are caught by something else.

K: I recognize sir that it is necessary that constant being introduced is silly. I see that is necessary, but inwardly it is not necessary.

C: What is your relationship to me at that moment that you are recognizing me and seeing it is not necessary?

K: What do you mean, it is not necessary?

C: But at that moment what is the state?

K: I don't quite understand.

C: In other words at the moment there is recognition what is the action - is there a state of action without the memory also going on?

K: I don't quite follow this.

A: Well perhaps what he is saying, the very fact that you recognize somebody implies memory.

K: Of course, I have said that sir.

C: But what is the action then at that moment of the memory?

K: What do you mean by action sir?

C: Is one able to observe without memory while using memory? While seeing the relevance of memory but not...

K: I see it is relevant to have memory of a certain kind. Inwardly why should I have the burden of memory? You say something to me flattering, why should I carry that, it is silly.

E: So here is our man, walking for forty thousand years to the north, and then you come along and say it is possible to walk south. And for the first time I turn around...

K: At that moment there is...

E: Yes. But now the observation, this is not theory, the observation of both the world, the natural world and in myself, is that I tense up and say, no, I have to go north. Well maybe I can go south. There is this kind of process until one finds a permanent or reorientation.

K: Now, why? Why? I'll show you in a minute. Why do we do this? I have been going north and you come and tell me, look don't go that way, it is stupid, go east. And I am not quite convinced. I am not quite sure whether you are right because I have been used to going north.

E: That's right.

K: Wait. I have been used to that, and you say to me go east. I wonder if he is right. Let me look at this. There is this attraction to north, which I have been going on for forty thousand years and also I listen to you, there is some logic in what you say, reasonable, seems sane, and I turn but the attraction goes on, which means what? I have not really listened to what you have said. Whether you are really serious - you understand? Whether you mean what you say. It's your, not theory, it's yours, you understand in the sense you have found it. So what you are, the quality of your voice, the quality of your being, says, go east. And I say, by Jove, I have listened to you very, very carefully and then I go east, I forget north. It depends whether you are speaking the truth or a theory. Not you personally.

E: No, no, I understand.

K: I mean somebody says go north, I say, my dear chap what do you know about it?

E: But again I go back to the observation that that kind of complete communication...

K: That's all.

E: ...but that kind of complete communication...

K: Complete communication then I forget north.

E: Why doesn't it happen?

K: Because we have never - it is really simple sir. Going north you have found security.

C: But that's not true.

K: Yes sir. Don't reject it. Look at it a bit more closely. Sir to change a habit, physical habit, which is fairly simple, but a psychological habit demands much greater energy.

C: OK Then look, let's go at more concretely, what is it that would break the habit of memory?

K: No sir, no, no. Memory is necessary - right? To write a letter, to read a book, to drive a car, linguistic communication, all that is necessary. But inwardly why should there be all this memory carried on: what you said to me, why you hurt me - you follow? All that stuff, throw it out.

C: That's too simple. That's simplistic, just throw it out, we don't.

K: It may sound simplistic but it is not.

C: We don't.

K: Why. That is the point he was raising. Because first of all sir, you come and tell me, I have been going north for the last forty thousand years, and you come and tell me, go east. I don't believe you. Who are you to tell me? What do you know about it? I begin to doubt, I begin to question, I become cynical, so I have shut it off, all communication. But if you are really serious, in the sense that you have gone east, your whole being is different. I don't know. It is no longer a theory, it is a fact. I think we are cursed with theories - sorry!

E: I go back and look at the history of many of the greatest and most alive spiritual traditions, and all they have been concerned with is precisely coming up with skilful means to constantly open up, reopen up that communication because human beings seem to be incapable of actually sustaining that communication except in the most extraordinary cases.

K: Why?

E: The only way I can say of why, is to become again a biologist and say there is just too much past.

K: Yes sir.

E: And it takes a long time for a change to occur.

K: Look sir.

E: There is no way we can change that fast.

K: I know that argument. So we have taken forty thousand years and now another forty thousand years.

E: Well maybe less.

K: All right, twenty thousand years! You don't say that to a person who is suffering.

E: No.

K: No. Exactly. A person who is frightened, lack of security, would say we can't wait twenty thousand years.

C: Wait a second. You just said that I am going north and I don't change because I am finding security in the north, but I am not really finding security in the north.

K: I think I am.

C: But I think I am.

K: That's it.

C: That's it. OK Now what is the understanding of the false security? In other words how am I going to understand that it is false security?

A: Where does understanding come into the whole thing to see what is false?

C: You tell me I am going north and you say go east and I say, this is fine by me. Why should I listen to you that that is any better?

K: You don't.

C: That's right.

K: Why?

C: Because both seem - I don't know why!

B: I will tell you what I think, why one listens at least for glimpses, and then frightens back, is because north causes pain.

K: Going north, why?

B: Because the security is constantly based on this sense of struggle, which is painful. Therefore that is what allows the communication of the alternative to happen because you say, that seems better. It is as simple as that.

K: But would you grant that human beings want security?

B: Yes.

K: The brain can't function as its highest energy if it is not secure. Right? So where is there security? Wait. Either it is an illusion, or in a bank account - right? Or in my relation to somebody. I want in my relation to somebody, I want to be secure. No change. For god's sake remain as you are, and no living being can remain what they are, so there is conflict. And in spite of that conflict I say I must have security in her, or in him - right? Or I seek security in god, in some faith, in some belief - right? That is all illusion. So I seek security in illusion, in relationship, in the bank account, or in the nation, in my tribe - right? My brain is wanting security.

A: The brain wants security in memory and thought but why is that?

K: Of course. Of course. It must have security. And now the professors, the scientists come up with new theories, new problems, new issues, and the politicians, you know what they are doing. And you come along, oh, so many gurus, you follow, I am lost. So I say, my god where am I going to find security - right? So another theory comes along and I say, yes, I will hold on to that, it sounds reasonable - right? So the brain is always searching for security somewhere - right?

C: The same perspective but slightly different in the sense that the brain is not only searching for security, but the brain is offering itself security in the process of the actual insecurity.

K: Yes sir. Agreed. Add that to its...

C: But that is essential because it means that we are stepping on our own toes all the time.

K: That is what I am saying. You invent god and then worship god.

C: Exactly.

E: So it like somebody building up a Hollywood state and then forgetting it is built.

E: I think we have the same question. This is precisely the point, we are so used to that which we can understand, it is crazy, it is completely crazy.

K: Absolutely.

E: But it is like a body which has been falling for twenty thousand metres and five metres before the ground he cannot say, stop! He can say, it is stupid that I am falling, but there is this mass of inertia and so on. And the experience of man's past has been that that kind of complete communication of completely grasping the craziness of keeping on going north, has to go through that flicker and if the learning is stabilizing that flicker until one internalizes that. It might take a - I don't know, a life time, or whatever.

K: That's the whole point. You say going north has taken time.

E: Oh, a long time.

K: A long time. And also you need time to go east. So you think - not you - we think time is necessary to change. Yes, yes.

C: No, I don't think that. No. I don't think that. I think we need to come to an awareness. The thing I object to in what you are saying is that you are implying somehow or other that we can see it, and I am saying that we are so caught by stepping on our own toes we will never get out of it, we have to somehow come to terms with what we are.

K: Yes sir. Just a minute.

C: We are stepping on our own toes, that's our nature.

K: Yes sir, but wait a minute. Somebody like me, or X, comes along and says, just keep quiet for a minute. Please keep quiet. Just listen. But we can't keep quiet - right? There is chattering, telling me you are right, you are wrong. And I say for god's sake keep for five minutes quiet!

C: Do you know the story of the scorpion and the turtle? The scorpion comes along and he says to the turtle, "How about taking me across this lake?" The turtle says, "Do you think I am a nut. We are going to get out in the middle there, you are going to sting me and we are going to drown". "Why would I do that?" says the scorpion, "We will both drown". So the turtle says, "You are right, we will both drown, get up on my back." So they get out into the middle and the scorpion stings the turtle and he says, "What did you do that for?", and he says "That's my nature".

A: But I mean where are we now? We started with the question can we understand the brain.

K: Let's begin again! First of all I would like to ask: do we see thought is limited? Whatever it does it is limited. And I don't know why you accept it so quickly!

E: That is something that I have been exploring myself.

K: Which means our experience is limited, our knowledge is limited, now or in the future. Therefore our memory is limited and without memory there is no thought, so thought is limited. The sequence. So whatever it does is limited. Technologically, psychically, or inwardly, it is limited - right? And limitation must inevitably cause conflict, division - right? And therefore is it possible for thought to operate where it is necessary and not operate in other directions? You understand?

D: Is there something which is not limited?

K: Maybe, we don't know but you can only find that out if thought has its proper place and no other place.

A: But I think the confusion arises when you say thought might be used in one place and in the other place not. You introduce a certain fragmentation in it.

K: No, sir. Thought is necessary, I am speaking to you. There I must know English and you know English. If you spoke French and I spoke French, then we would be speaking the same, or Spanish, or Italian - right? So knowledge is necessary to speak in English - right? Of course. Has knowledge any place in the psyche?

A: It helps to a certain limited extent to understand oneself.

D: May I say that in Finnish, the Finnish language has a word ? and it would be in English rote, as knowledge. But then understand in Finnish ? is to embrace. In the Finnish language to know would be to go along a road and not to know anything else but then this understanding in Finnish, is embrace, go around, and therefore I objected when you said knowledge and understanding would be the same. But the brain has two ways: the knowledge is really to go a particular way, to search and search and search, but then this understanding that is a function of the brain also, it is to embrace. That might clarify.

A: What I was saying was that even knowledge has in itself a certain understanding that might be limited, might be so.

K: Would you use a different word?

A: A different word?

K: Insight.

E: Or intuition.

K: No. Intuition is a bit doubtful, because having desires you can...

A: Could be say then the understanding coming out of memory and thought is to a certain extent...

K: Let's use the word insight. I have an insight going north is futile, and the insight says goes east and I move. There is no interval between the movement.

E: Again we keep coming back exactly to the same point.

K: That is what I am saying.

B: Yes, but sir, you asked a question a moment ago: can we have thought to take its proper place, there. That is to say we are respectful for what it is. Now when you say I have the insight to go east and I do it, to be respectful to thought is also to realize that it is in the nature of thought to obscure that insight, to fill it with thought.

K: Of course, then it is not insight.

E: And continue to go north.

K: It is not insight.

B: Well it was for a moment and then it was occluded.

K: I understand, you are repeating the same thing.

E: Well we are all going around the same subject because I am trying to see - let me put it this way, the question I have: what is the basis from which you are saying that in that insight all thought would be put into its right place without the flickering. What is the basis for that?

K: It is now five minutes past one. Shall we stop?

E: We can pick it up next time, from there please.

K: Anywhere you like sir.

So first of all we ought to discuss what is insight, the word. To have sight in something. An insight implies no memory, no time, quick perception, instant perception.

A: Yes but the perception has to display itself through...

K: Wait, wait. Instant perception. Have we got that? Have you got that? Say for instance, I see something instantly and that perception never changes. I see the futility of all religions, organized. That's over, I don't belong to any religion. There is no going back to the temple, or to the church, or to another guru, it is finished. I recognize those are all forms of entertainment really, so I don't want to be entertained, it is finished. Wiped out. There is not any kind of temptation to go and investigate, to look, I understand it. And this is a fact to me because I have done it. I am not boasting or anything, it is so. Right? Take any factor which human beings cling to, this terrible nationalism. I say to be a Hindu, to be a Muslim - right? So I have finished with it. I don't go back and say, "Oh, let me play with nationalism a little bit." So can one move that way, all through life?

Do we stop sir?

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND BRAIN SEMINAR 10TH JUNE 1984

A: I would like to say few words today, at the beginning of the Seminar. I would be somehow nice if we could have a friendly dialogue in the sense that when we go into the questions we have a certain hesitation, rather than assert things. And somehow all of us together could go into whatever the questions that we are going to discuss. And yesterday we were saying, we opened up the Seminar by asking whether thought can help us to understand the brain. And also we went into the question of whether it is possible for the brain to not have psychological recording. And finally we opened up very briefly the question of insight. And I think that is where we stopped. So I wonder what question would we like to start with.

It seems to me the question doesn't seem so clear of whether the brain can be in a state of not recording. I think perhaps that might need a little bit of clarification. What do you think?

K: Sir, I would like to ask whether we are discussing speculatively, theoretically, or actually? Actually in the sense of applying, apply in the sense, functioning not theoretically but with facts. Right? Could we do that? Am I proposing something outrageous?! Because to me theories, speculations, whether psychological, spiritual, have no meaning to me. What has significance to the speaker, to K, is dealing with facts. Facts being that which has happened, that which is happening, not what will happen.

E: So is the brain a fact now?

K: Of course.

E: How so?

K: Because it is functioning. Functioning in the sense that it wants to communicate something verbally, and also perhaps non-verbally.

E: All right communication is fact.

K: Is a fact.

E: But when you call it the brain that is an inference, a theoretical inference. But when you describe that as the brain doing something or other, that is a theoretical inference.

K: That is a fact.

E: No because there is inference between the fact of communication now and when you used the word brain, because the brain is associated to communication through a long series of observations which are not now.

K: Of course, of course. Which is now taking place. Now observation has been, I said that, the fact is what has been, what is now. What has happened, what is happening now - right?

D: May I ask if you mean that insight has really something to do with brain? Or would it be apart from brain?

K: Are we discussing insight, or are we establishing first whether we are theoretically discussing, or discussing - I have pain, suppose I have pain.

C: That's the fact.

E: OK Now the question is, how are we going to address such a fact?

K: Fact. No, how am I going to be free of my pain? That's all I am concerned with.

C: No, no. You have made a jump though. First you have your pain, that is your fact.

K: Wait sir. The fact is I am in pain.

C: Period.

K: Full stop. And also the fact that there must be freedom from the pain.

C: What do you mean there must be?

K: It is human nature. What are you saying? There must be.

A: What K might say, you see when you are in pain you somehow want to get rid of it.

K: That is all, a fact.

C: The thing I am trying to say is that the fact is the pain, the next fact is...

K: ...is also wanting to get rid of it.

C: Ah, that's two facts.

K: Those are both facts.

C: Right. Those are the facts.

K: But wait a minute. Are we discussing about pain, not having pain, which becomes a theory?

E: I would like to discuss pain as a fact. I want to go back to the fact that you used the word brain as related to pain.

K: Of course. Otherwise if the brain didn't function I wouldn't know what pain was.

E: But sir, isn't that an inference? How is that happening now? The fact is you used the word brain is because there have been people in the past who...

K: I would like to get at this, I don't quite understand this. I am not disputing.

E: Maybe I am not understanding you correctly, but when you say, "I experience pain", it is clear to all of us that this is now. Now I come around and say, "Pain has to do with brain". Now the relationship to juxtapose these two words, brain and pain has a long series of intermediate steps, which required work from the past of people who actually pointed out the existence of such a thing as brain, which is not something we are doing now. We are not opening up a skull and saying this is brain, and cutting the brain in parts and doing all the kinds of things...

K: Don't do it with me please!

E: I won't. So you see what I am saying, the moment I invoke the word brain, I am bringing with it a huge edifice of inferences and relationships which are not now.

K: Yes, sir, which is all the past.

E: So how is the fact that you use the word brain now consistent with your desire to deal only with present facts? Could you clarify that?

K: I don't quite follow. I am trying to understand this.

E: Can I say it in some other way?

K: Please understand between us: I am not resisting anything.

E: Absolutely. OK.

K: I am enquiring.

E: May I phrase it some other way?

K: Yes.

E: You are trying correctly, as far as I am concerned, to establish the ground of what are we dealing with. And you say, can we deal with facts now and not theories about things. Fine. So the next moment you say brain, which I am claiming cannot be said unless we invoke theories.

K: I agree.

E: OK So how are these two things consistent?

K: The brain is the result of long evolution - right?

E: That is also a theory.

K: No, it is a fact.

E: Can we say that from what we are experiencing now?

K: That is a fact.

B: If I have a pain in my hand, there is a pain. But to talk about the brain is to talk about something I have read in a textbook.

There are a lot of nerve cells and...

K: Yes sir, if I had no brain I wouldn't feel it.

B: But what we are saying is...

K: Nerves and all the rest of it.

E: That you don't know from the observations you are having now.

K: I don't understand your point.

B: We don't experience the fact of anything being in here, I don't experience the nerves, the connections.

K: Tell me simply, sir.

A: Yes, simply.

K: Sir, I am a stupid man so tell me simply.

A: What we are trying to say is that there are facts that are actually taking place now, and some facts that are in the future.

K: Not future, I said past. I said the past with all the memories, etc. etc. are also facts.

C: That's a jump. What we are saying is that really all you have is the fact of your pain, and then you have the fact that you want to be free of the pain.

K: That's all.

C: But when you make the statement, "the brain is responsible for the experience of pain", you have entered a whole new world of language. When using the word brain it connects you to assumptions that people have made about what a brain is, what a brain does.

K: I know nothing about that.

C: Well then you can't use the word. All you have got as fact is pain and that is all you have got.

K: Wait sir. All right. All that I have is pain.

C: You have got pain.

K: Pain. And also the fact I must be free of pain.

C: That is all you have.

K: That is all I have. All right proceed from there.

E: No, no. The point is, and I really appreciate it honestly, that to have these conversations and we are all biologists or scientists, so supposedly the enquiry has something to do with what science can contribute to it, maybe not but maybe yes, it's open. If there is something that science has to contribute, then it must address to what science can say. Things like brain, or atoms or whatever.

K: Yes, I understand.

E: So if you rip that apart and say, all we have is the moment you experience now.

K: No, I don't rip that apart.

E: OK. So we have to evoke brain, therefore we have to jump out of the immediate experience of now.

K: Yes, sir, agree.

D: So that in order to be free of pain we need nowadays to do something with the brain, with medicine or...

K: Yes, I go to the doctor, he gives me a pill and I take it and the pain is gone.

D: Yes, it influences the brain. Is that a fact, this process of getting free from pain, getting pills, or something, is that a fact or is that a theory?

A: Could we say that whatever goes inside the brain is the fact whether it is an illusion, whether it is a pain, or so on, but perhaps the difference is whether it is actually taking place in this moment or not.

K: Is that it? Is that it?

B: Could we ask you have the pain which is the fact, and the fact of you wanting to be rid of the pain, does knowledge and science have anything to do with the very next step? Does knowledge and science come in in the next step?

E: What is the relationship between the actual fact and...

K: ...and knowledge.

E: ...and knowledge.

K: Keep it to that. At last! What is the relationship between what is happening now, pain, and knowledge.

E: Such as brain, etc.

K: What do you mean by knowledge? Go slowly. I am not a scientist.

E: I am only an apprentice.

K: I am a human being. I am not a scientist. What do we mean by knowledge? What is knowledge? Knowledge is accumulation of various experiences, incidents. And those experiences can be enormous or very small. And all those experiences have become knowledge - right? Knowledge stored in the brain as memory.

That's all. And from that thought.

E: Yes, absolutely.

K: Right?

E: I would add one more thing, which is, scientific knowledge is accumulated by language agreement between people. This is the fact, do we agree, yes we agree and so we put it aside and move to the next. So there comes this network of assumptions and presuppositions.

K: It is all that. I said that. Knowledge is all that. Now what place has knowledge, what is the relationship of knowledge to pain? It is not a question, it is a fact. If there was no knowledge I would have no pain.

E: Can you go slowly now please? You must go slowly at this point.

K: Please sirs, you are all scientists, you are all experts, I am not. I am saying, knowledge is stored in the brain, or in the heart, or wherever you like to call it, stored - right? And we function with that knowledge, as a carpenter, as a surgeon, as a psychologist, we function with what we have learnt as knowledge, accumulated.

E: Absolutely.

K: I communicate with you in English, or French if you want it, or Italian, or Spanish. I know those four. So we can communicate with each other. So there is knowledge, accumulated, and what is the relationship of that knowledge to action? Let's put it that way. Not pain, let's leave pain for the moment. Would you agree?

B: Action.

K: There is this knowledge - right? And I have to act. Is action born of knowledge?

A: It seems to be that way.

E: That is the question you are asking?

K: I am questioning. Apparently it seems so - right? Agreed?

So, of course.

D: In the brain, not always.

K: Leave the brain for the minute, we will come back to it a little later, if you don't mind.

E: It is not so clear because if I look at that I see that knowledge has something to do with it but with action, with the manifestation of a present situation.

K: So we have to enquire what is action before we...

E: To me it doesn't follow that it is just knowledge that...

K: Now wait sir. There is knowledge, we have come to that - right? What is action? Either action according to a memory, knowledge, from the past, or action which is an idea in the future, or an ideal. Either according to the past, or according to the future. I will do this. Right?

E: But what about the actions that your description doesn't cover? In my experience is those actions that seem to be born out of nowhere.

K: Wait, I am coming to that. Out of language.

E: Out of nowhere.

K: We will come to that in a minute. Right? Action born from the past, memory, I have done this, I will do that tomorrow. So what we know of action is born of the past or of the future.

A: So action involves information.

K: Information - right? Agreed?

E: Maybe.

K: Then that is a limited action.

D: Yes, limited.

K: Right?

E: It is limited by the knowledge you have.

K: Or knowledge which you have accumulated, which the race has accumulated.

A: The present, the past and the future, that is the...

K: When action is based on the past or on the future that action must invariably be limited.

D: Is there another kind of action?

K: Just a minute, we will come to that.

D: I am interested in that.

K: So is there an action which is not limited? Because if action is limited it must create conflict.

D: Yes.

B: Maybe I haven't quite gone that distance. I don't quite go that whole distance. If every action born of knowledge must be limited...

K: No, I didn't say that.

B: Action born of knowledge must be limited.

K: Action - we first of all said action according to the past or to the future is limited.

E: By definition because you are acting on a limited resource of knowledge.

B: I pick up this glass and drink the water, now is that limited, does that lead to conflict?

K: No, no.

E: I am not sure about the leading to conflict but it is limited in the sense for example you are not a left hander but a right hander. And you pick it up with your right hand and not with your left hand, but I pick it up with my left hand. Why do you do that and I do this is because we have accumulated a different style of approach and it is limited. That is why you pick it up with your hand and not with your foot.

B: But can there be an action in that which is just a simple, mechanical self-contained action which begins and ends and that is the end of it?

E: OK Why is the limited action leading to conflict?

K: That's it.

E: Not necessarily, it can.

K: I am going to explain why. If I am thinking about myself all day long, which most people do, it is a very small action, a limited action. Right? When I am associated or identified with a nation, it is a very small action. Therefore there are wars. One of the reasons of war is nationalism, based on economic division, and so on and so on. Those are all very limited. Right? Agree?

E: Absolutely.

K: So...

B: Well these are psychological actions.

K: Even physical actions.

B: Well yes but are they to do with simple things like digging a hole, lighting a fire? Let's make a distinction between that and the larger actions which are motivated by nationalism or relationships.

A: It seems you know that you might have an action within the limitation that can be also be rational, it might not necessarily create conflict.

K: Of course.

A: It seems we understand. But I think you are addressing another question, which is, psychologically, when your action is based on the limitation there is conflict.

K: Just a minute. When I am thinking about myself, I am digging a hole for myself, it is small. Right? When I am thinking about my future, my problems, you follow, it is all enclosed, small.

A: So it is limitation that creates conflict.

K: Yes, naturally. Right? You are doubtful.

E: Yes, I am doubtful because it seems that when you say that if the knowledge has me has reference point it will create conflict.

K: That's all.

E: Question: does it have to have that me reference by necessity? Or is there not a possibility of a limited action, limited understanding, but which does not have me has a reference point?

K: There may be limited action, sir, when I am digging a hole, to take his example. But we are talking about a much wider issue.

E: No, even wider issues for example...

K: No, let me finish what I want to say. Any action born out of limitation must inevitably create conflict. If I am a scientist and I am only concerned with my career, with my investigation, with my research, you follow, and it is a very small affair. And I don't care a hang what happens outside in the world.

E: But is that a limitation of thought or it is a limitation of...

K: It is a limitation of thought, limitation of capacity, limitation of environment. I include everything.

D: How can you widen this?

K: Just a minute. We will come to that. You understand sir, are we communicating with each other?

E: I understand what you are saying but again you seem to me to be shifting from the nature of knowledge to the nature of a kind of knowledge.

K: No, no. We started with knowledge, we agreed. And I said, what relationship has action to knowledge?

E: And you said every action born of knowledge is limited and it creates conflict.

K: Yes, because knowledge is limited.

E: Yes, but again I am trying to examine that step of the relationship between the limited actions born of limited knowledge, which we agree is limited, to the conclusion that such actions necessarily lead to conflict.

K: I'll show it to you.

E: You invoked an extra quality to knowledge which is self-centred knowledge.

K: No, wait. We said knowledge and action - we both understand that - and action born of any limited knowledge the action also must be limited. Next step: such action breeds division. Let's take it step by step. Where there is division there must be conflict. Just a minute, he is working it out!

E: I must say that I can see the conflict arising only when this extra quality of having an absolute reference point to the division arises, such as me.

K: I say this, sir.

E: The division in itself is not conflictive. It the division plus a solid reference point that makes the division divisive.

C: Suppose you work in the laboratory and your knowledge is limited and you are working on this chemical, or whatever, you forget about everything outside. Now you may say there is no self in that but that phase a lot of conflict for the world. Your starting point is so limited, you don't take into account the whole environment, you don't take into account the implications of what you are doing.

E: I don't see that. Let's transport that metaphor to an ecological metaphor. If I take foxes. Foxes like rabbits. Is the limited inclination of foxes to chase these other animals a limitation because they do not take into account the entire eco-system. It doesn't seem to be the case. The eco-system is a very harmonious totality. Every part of it has a limited part but they all work as an harmonious totality.

K: We don't.

E: I mean the eco-system, not human beings. Human beings add something extra. What you are pointing out is something extra to knowledge, to limited knowledge, which is a solid reference point of 'me-ness'. This the fox does not do. It simply does what it does.

C: What is the distinction between difference and division. You seem to put differences and division into one part.

K: Sir, division, all right, let's stick to the word division.

C: No, let's make a distinction between difference and division.

A: What do you mean by difference and division?

C: In other words, foxes are different from rabbits.

E: And they only know how to chase rabbits.

C: And they only know how to chase rabbits. And that is a difference but that is not a division.

K: No. That tree is different from me.

E: Exactly.

C: And there is no conflict necessarily.

K: Of course not.

E: OK So we agree then that this step from knowledge that is limited and creating divisions or distinctions does not necessarily lead to conflict. Because for example the fox being limited in his knowledge of the world doesn't create conflict.

K: Sir, see what is happening in India, or in Beirut, or the Arab and the Israel.

E: Sir, I have been through a civil war myself.

K: Yes sir, I know that. So what happens? What has brought about this division?

E: It has been brought about by the division plus this sense of me being right.

K: Yes. That's all.

E: No, no, please understand me. I am not denying that point, I entirely see it, I think. But it seems to me that we have to separate that extra, which is the 'me-ness', or the self-centredness, from knowledge as such. Knowledge as such can exist in a limited way.

K: I understand. Knowledge as such in those books.

E: No, no, knowledge as such as, for example, my knowledge that I can pick up this glass of water, or larger knowledge of how to run an economy.

K: Of course, that is understood.

A: Are you trying to say...

E: I am trying not to put what seems to be a distinction of knowledge for a particular kind of knowledge...

C: I can't quite go along all the way on that, particularly with the foxes. I don't think that is a good analogy between foxes and humans. I think maybe we are going off the track.

A: Let's return to the question that all our actions seem to be born out of knowledge. There seems...

K: Yes, sir. And that knowledge, as we already said, is limited. So action is limited - right? Of course. Let's start from that.

And the next step for me: that as knowledge is limited, action is limited. And that is one of the reasons, or one of the causes of human division, in their relationship, the me, my ideas, my ambition, his ideas, his ambition, his competitiveness and my competitiveness, my aggression, and so on. This constant division is naturally breeding conflict in the world. That's all.

A: The next question would be...

K: Wait, wait. Let's agree to that. Right? And I say, for god's sake let's stop this conflict because it is killing human beings, the Russians, the Americans, the democrats, the totalitarians, you know all the game. The Arab and the Jew, the Muslim and the Hindu, the Sikh and - I say we are destroying each other - right? And I say to myself, is there an action, seeing all this, which is not limited? That's all. Which transcends this, goes beyond this, otherwise we can't solve this. I stick to my Indian, and he sticks to his Arab, and we fight - right? So can we communicate dropping your Arab and my dropping my Hindu, and as human beings let's solve this problem, not to kill each other. Right? So is there an action which is not divisive, which is not limited - right? Would you agree to that? Now how are we going to find that out? That's all my point.

E: It seems to me that you are asking two questions at the same time. If the hope to find a way in which this strife can be stopped.

K: That's one question.

E: We are fully agreed it is something absolutely essential, necessary. It seems to me there are two possibilities of answering. One, is the one you propose, which is: can we have an action which is not born out of limitation? But the other possibility is to say, is there not a possibility of learning action born out of knowledge, therefore limited, but which is not centred in defending the point of view of me.

K: Of course, of course.

E: Both are equally valid to me.

K: Of course, both are valid, and both are contained in this one question.

E: Both are contained in the same question?

K: Of course.

C: Now wait a second. Both are contained in this same question but there is another question: now we are all scientists sitting here in a sense, and one of the things that has come out of science, or investigation of the brain in a scientific way has been the fact that we never perceive anything except with reference to what we already know.

K: I question that.

C: I know you question it. But it seems to me that there is some sort of edge of discussion here, then if that is true then the only way we can discover an unlimited action, the only road that we can take is through that kind of situation.

K: I understand.

C: If that is not true then it may be possible to have an unlimited action. Now how can we discuss, you question if there is all this other statement to the effect that it questions you.

K: Yes sir, what are you trying to say sir?

C: Well I am saying that there is some question among scientists as to whether it is possible to have an action that is not born out of knowledge.

B: You are saying that perception...

K: Keep to that, keep to that.

C: Action goes from perception.

E: There are two separate questions therefore. One is, can we actually discover actions which are unlimited, and two, is that action something that can be possibly related to what science is.

K: To human existence, which is part of science.

C: You see what I am interested in is the fact that we really only know limited action.

K: That's all.

C: That's all we know.

K: Agree. Agree. Don't go on! And somebody, he comes along and says, perhaps there is an action which is not limited.

C: Exactly, yes.

K: Unless I am totally blind, and deaf and dumb and stupid, I listen to it.

D: I just wanted to go back, not to the brain because - yesterday I talked about small children. There is a stage in children where action is not that limited. It begins of course the limitation then, but in the beginning they have some quality of action which is not that limited. They are open to the whole of the environment, to the family, to other children. They don't distinguish between nationalities.

K: Babies, children don't. Later on they are trained.

D: Quite.

K: But they are educated to hate the black and purple and blue.

D: May I still say one thing: when we grow older we have still this brain of the little child in our brain, in our mature brain. We have it, we know it, and as I see it we have in our brain - I beg your pardon, I am talking about brain - we have this part which can act, we know it, which can act quite unlimited, but not that limited. So I think we have to, as a scientist I am saying that, we have to find again being adult we have to find this childlike view. You understand me?

K: Yes, I understand you. Yes sir. You are also saying the same thing in a different way that there is in all of us a divine spark.

D: Yes, exactly.

K: It comes to the same thing! Please I am not laughing at it. Millions of people feel that there is in them something far superior than this ordinary brain, far superior to environment, economics, etc.

C: Krishnaji, if you take a small child, take a child of three months, an experiment that was done with a child three months old. And these children were hooked up to where they were sucking a breast. If they sucked that breast there was a picture on the wall... no, no, listen.

K: I am listening!

C: There was a moving picture on the wall, if they sucked this breast in a certain way - these were three month old children - the picture came into focus. In other words, the child responded at three months old positively to the picture coming into focus.

K: I understand.

C: There is something built into the organs which responds to focussing.

K: I understand all that sir.

A: May I say something, K raised a question as to whether there is an action not born out of limitation. How are we going to find out?

B: I think David added the question is there a perception, could there be any perception that it doesn't require knowledge?

K: Yes sis, yes sir.

E: OK Let's stick to that one.

D: But in the little child there is this kind of perception. Little children are still perceiving. I a little child.

E: Yes, but a little child is different but not because it is different, it is less limited.

A: Can we go back perhaps to the original question? We said there might be - let's perhaps say what is perception.

K: No.

E: Let's continue with the investigation of how can we know, or come to know, this unlimited action, unlimited perception.

C: Is it possible? That's the whole question. Science says no, there is no such thing as unlimited action.

K: All right, finished.

D: No, science says yes.

K: Just a minute sir. There are millions of people in the world who say there is god. You come along and say that is just the invention of thought. The other says, all right, go to hell, I will go on worshipping. That's that. We are not in that position, I hope.

E: So let's investigate.

K: So we have to explore it. We have come to a point where we have said action born of limited knowledge is divisive, and therefore conflict arises where there is division. That's all we have stated. Then the next question arose: is there an action which is not limited? Right?

C: OK. Right.

K: Now, how are you going to find out?

A: Do you have any suggestions?

K: Go into it. I am asking, you are the scientists.

E: Well I said before, I agree entirely with David, from the point of view of the scientific framework there is no way to approach that question. But at the same time, as a human being, by examining my own being...

K: You are a human being, not a scientist. Thank god! We can talk as human beings.

E: I see, I am a human being. Fine. But also I happen to have this craft as a scientist.

K: Yes, yes, sir. That is of secondary importance.

E: Secondary important, all right. But as a human being when I observe my mind I do notice that there are certain actions I do which do not seem to come out of knowledge.

K: That's it.

E: But seem to be born out of themselves.

K: We will find out.

E: OK This is observation now.

K: Yes. So it may be false, it may be true.

E: It is observation.

C: Before we go on, I want to present him this question: is it conceivable, or isn't true, that in our scientific investigations very often when we think that this action is born out of an unlimited, it seems to appear that on further investigation we discover how limited it was. More often than not.

K: Agree.

E: There is nothing I could counter to that.

K: I want to find out if there is an action which is not limited.

B: Exactly.

K: Which is not consciously or unconsciously connected with knowledge. The same thing.

C: Same thing, fine, there we are! That means that you have to be available from my most astute going after it to find out if I can find a way to show to you that really did come out of your knowledge.

K: I am willing.

C: OK.

K: What is your response sir to that question?

E: Oh, I think I said all I know.

K: I know what you said. But let's go a little deeper than that.

E: Fine.

K: We are asking a question, is there an action in which there is no limitation? Right? The self is limited, the me - right? The self is knowledge. Go slowly. I'll explain. The self is a bundle of memories. Right? So as long as that self is acting there is limitation. Right? So is there an ending to the self, ending not continuing? That is the first question. To end the whole, may I use the word consciousness, with all its memories, with all its fears, sorrows, pain, anxieties, depression, faith, belief, the whole content of consciousness is the movement of thought. Right? Agree? That is the self. Right? That is knowledge. We said the self is a whole series of memories, it is a bundle, and as long as that action is born from there it is limited, therefore conflict. Agree to that?

E: Yes, yes, no problem.

K: So can the self end? It is only then there is action which is not limited. It is a logical step.

B: Yes, absolutely.

K: Can the self end? And the self is so deceptive, it can hide behind the most holiest things - right? And the most extraordinary imagination, and in the scientific - it can hide like a cockroach! Can that self end? Sir, the word mantra, you have heard that word, means that. The original root meaning of that word is ponder, think over, meditate on not becoming. And also put away all self-centred activity. The meaning of that word is that, the root meaning. You understand what I am saying?

E: Yes, I understand.

K: Meditate on not becoming, which is an immense factor. That means there is no psychological evolution - right? For the me. There is no me to evolve.

B: Absolutely.

K: But we think there is me continuing, in heaven, in hell - you follow? I write a book, there it is, immortal! Or you throw it in the waste paper basket. So can the self, which is a whole series of memories and time, can that completely end, knowing that it is the most deceptive thing - right sir? Find out! I say it can totally end and live in this world.

E: Well, if indeed it can end, and you are saying you are still in this world...

K: Absolutely.

E: It means that for example this person who has no self and who is in this world, drives a car.

K: Of course there he has to use self.

E: But then that means that that knowledge is there.

K: Of course.

E: So that action out of knowledge is limited.

K: Of course. But we said also...

E: So what is - now this is the question I am asking you...

K: It is simple, sir, it is simple, you can see it. Don't ask me, it is simple.

E: No, let me put it this way...

K: Sir, I have to write a letter, which means a great deal of knowledge writing the letter, sequence, the word.

E: Fine.

K: It means tremendous knowledge is involved in writing a stupid letter. That knowledge is necessary.

E: Then its self-centred action.

K: It is not.

E: Why not?

K: If the self is not that is not.

E: But how could it not be self-centred action according to your definition of self, it is a bunch of memories.

K: Not my definition. At least we agreed. Don't say.

E: Wait a second, we agreed but I repeated at least a couple of times that at least to me there was a difference between knowledge, and self-centred knowledge, and that not all knowledge was self-centred knowledge. And there was a possibility...

K: Wait. I said sir, the self is knowledge.

E: Yes, so if there is no self there is no knowledge, that follows.

K: But I can use it. Just a minute, careful. So we have to enquire into something totally different, which is: what is intelligence?

E: OK. I am willing to enquire into that, but why do we have to do that?

K: I tell you why in a minute. I will show it to you. Where there is intelligence, that intelligence can use knowledge. And intelligence is not born of knowledge.

D: From where is it?

K: Take it slowly. You may all disagree, tear it to pieces, but I will go into it. Right?

So we have to enquire: what is knowledge? If knowledge can say, well I will use this, and nowhere else, knowledge has a certain place, but psychologically, etc. etc. it has no place whatsoever.

A: From what you say it seems to me that being free from the self doesn't mean that you are completely free of knowledge.

K: Sir, I said to drive a car, to write a letter, to talk a language - right?

E: Yes but we are back to the question.

K: That is why...

E: We have to be careful then.

K: We have settled all that.

D: Intelligence.

K: What is intelligence? Is it born out of knowledge, born of thought? Sir, it required tremendous knowledge to go to the Moon. Tremendous - right? The work of three hundred thousand, or ten thousand people, co-operating, making every part perfect, to go the Moon. That is the intelligence of thought.

E: Yes, and then you are asking the question where does intelligence come from.

K: No, that intelligence is limited.

E: It is clear, yes. Yes, so when I examine what happens is that in thought there is intelligence that is proper to thought, which is limited, like when I resolve an equation.

K: Yes, limited.

E: And there is also an intelligence which seems again to have a quality out of nowhere.

K: We will come to that in a moment. We will come to that.

E: All right. Therefore to me there is the two intelligences.

K: Yes sir. Let's wait. There is the intelligence which thought has brought about.

E: In the logical sense.

K: No, rational, illogical, clever, cunning. The businessman is very intelligent in his business. A terrorist organizes beautifully to kill somebody.

E: There is an intelligence to build itself as ego.

K: So there is so-called ordinary intelligence born of thought, therefore that intelligence becomes cruel, kindly, you follow, the whole series of human activity, which is limited. Then is there an intelligence which is not born of thought? I say there is, I may be cuckoo. I say there is. And that intelligence can only come about - if you want to go into it I will go into it.

E: Yes but we have gone into investigating the nature of intelligence.

K: Yes, that's it.

E: Out of the quandary or the paradox of what you said before, in order to find out unlimited action I have to finish with the self, which was a collection of memories. But if I am finished with the self as a collection of memories it seems, from what we said even before, that there would be no knowledge, therefore that this person could not write a letter.

K: I didn't say that. On the contrary he can write a letter.

E: But if he writes a letter which requires thought...

K: That is why I said sir, let's enquire into intelligence which will then say, "I will use knowledge, and no one else".

E: I see. So intelligence is now the mediator.

K: Don't use the word mediator. Keep the word for a minute.

E: Right, so what is intelligence?

K: What is intelligence? If we say thought with its extraordinary capacity has created a certain intelligence, building a cathedral, most beautiful houses, gardens, furniture, implements of war - right? It is all the result of thought. The atom bomb - right? Such intelligence is limited. Agree? Now is there an intelligence which is not limited? Right? Now how do you enquire into this?

Exercising thought...

C: Well we seem to...

K: Wait, wait, wait!

E: The same way you would investigate action which is unlimited, namely by observing, by completely observing without thought.

K: Is that possible, first?

E: Well it seems that it is possible.

K: Not a theory.

E: No, no, no.

K: Let's be clear. That perception is not based on thought.

E: Yes, right.

K: Keep that perception going.

E: Do you agree with that?

C: I don't agree, no.

K: Convince him please!

E: You mean it is not possible for you in a day that you are walking out of your house and all of a sudden, it is a very sharp beautiful day, and you open the door and you see the tree, and there is a moment when you simply see the tree, there is no thought coming in. The quality of the experience is that there is no thought, there is a gap in your thoughts and there is absolute purity of perception. There is a complete sense of present-centredness. The treeness of the tree is right there. And then thought comes up again. Isn't that an experience for you?

C: Well I think - I am going to play the devil's advocate. The devil's advocate is this, that I think in that very experience there are elements in which there is a sense in which we project out our knowledge.

K: No.

E: Wait a second. I didn't say there was no knowledge. I said there was no thought.

K: Please just a minute. Is there a perception without the word?

C: Without the word?

E: Yes.

C: I think...

K: Just answer step by step sir.

C: Well your step by step is sometimes - well you set up a question that is already a trap.

K: I am not trapping you.

C: Perception without a word, yes.

K: Without the network of words.

C: But there is a sense in which perception without the word is already based in some sort of knowledge.

K: No sir. I am just saying, look we have been through all this. Can you look at me without all the image, all the nonsense, just look at me?

C: I don't think we can, no.

E: Are you saying scientifically?

C: I am saying actual fact, I think in some way we are always operating out of some knowledge.

E: Can we take this slowly.

C: Very slowly.

K: I understand.

E: I can look at you, I think, I can look at you, or a tree, whatever, and not have thought.

K: Yes, sir, that is all I am saying.

E: Fine, fine. Question: when I see the tree, nevertheless I see a tree, I don't see a cat.

K: Of course not.

E: No, what he is saying, which I think is important, that that is knowledge.

K: Important sir, I have got it.

E: It is limited knowledge.

K: All right. Begin to move.

C: So there was a point.

K: I understand this.

C: But there is an important question here, Krishnaji, what is the relationship of intelligence to the actuality that I am saying you can't have a perception without knowledge?

K: We are going to find out, sir.

C: That's what I want to get at.

K: We are coming to the same thing in a different way. What is this intelligence, if there such intelligence, which is not cultivated by thought - right?

A: But it uses thought.

E: We don't know if it uses it yet. We have come to the point of seeing that there is an intelligence that seems to come out without based on a train of thought.

K: Yes, that's all I am asking. Is it temporary? Is it something casual, perchance? All those. Or is there an intelligence which is not intermittent, which is not fiction, theoretical and so on? Or imagination, deceptive, illusory, you know all the implication of all those words. I say there is.

E: How do we find that out?

K: Now I am coming to that. You are all - I am ninety years old. I have been at it for a long time!

What place has all this, what place has love in all this? Is love desire? Is love pleasure? Is love sensation? Right? Is it?

D: No, limited love.

K: Don't - love is love, not limited, unlimited. Go slowly sir. Is love desire? All the rest of it.

E: Why do we need to examine love now?

K: I will tell you in a minute, we will come to it! The ball is in my court!

E: So you are now asking us to examine the nature of love because it seems to be necessary to answer the question, of how to we get to examine, to understand...

K: Not get. How does that intelligence exist? I say it cannot exist without love.

D: What is love?

K: We are saying what is love. You understand? I say that intelligence which is not born of thought which is limited, that intelligence is the essence of love. Therefore I say, is love desire? Is love ambition? Is there love when there is pleasure and so on and so on. Or is love something outside of the brain? Do you understand sirs? Let me finish. You can jump on me afterwards. It is still my court!

E: OK that's the question.

K: And which means compassion. Where there is love and compassion there is that intelligence, which is not the product of thought. And that is not intermittent. That doesn't come and go. And that love is not the opposite of hate. Love has no opposite. Right? And compassion, love cannot exist if there is any form of attachment. I am a Catholic, or a Hindu, or a Sikh, and I am attached to my god, attached to my anchor and say I have compassion, then it is not compassion. Limited.

D: Yes, it is limited, yes.

K: Right Sir? Now proceed. Wait, wait! Get ready. To me, or to K that is the only thing that matters. If that does not exist the rest is all limited. And therefore you will have perpetual conflict between each other, between the world and so on and so on. That's all.

C: Are you ready for me?

K: Wait sir, have you understood what the speaker has said?

What K said?

C: I think I have but I have a question.

K: Wait, wait. Have you felt it, smelt it, have you tasted it, have you swallowed it before you kick it?

C: I don't want to kick it.

K: Wait a minute, I am asking you.

C: I say, I think I have.

K: Sir, it means unconditioning the whole human, or the structure and the nature of thought. Right?

E: Now we have grasped that, and listened to that.

K: Now proceed. It is in your court!

C: May I ask you a question: a few minutes ago I brought up the fact of this three month old infant that drives the focus.

K: Sir, just a minute. I have seen it with my eyes actually, I don't have to look at that.

C: Fine. What I want to say is what can we say about that here we have a three month old infant that I told you about and this in a way is the basis for desire. In other words the desire for that focus.

K: Yes sir.

C: That is the essence of desire at three months old.

K: Yes sir.

C: Now given that back, the desire is so central to the brain, we will use that word, what is the relationship of what you have just said to this basic fact that desire is so...

K: Yes, sir, I will tell you. Then you have to ask what is desire.

E: I have another question which is related. We might be able to handle both of them at the same time. Which is that I have heard you, I have grasped it or felt it and then I have the question, how do I know it is true?

K: You don't know.

E: I don't know.

K: Which means?

E: Which means I have to investigate it.

K: With what?

E: Well this is exactly the point, with what? The only way I know is to observe very carefully what happens in my experience, which means that what I see is not the continuity of that intelligence but the intermittency of that intelligence. So how can you, beyond saying, actually make it possible for people to see that it is not just words?

K: Therefore you have to go into the whole question why, what is the place of desire.

E: Yes, that is why the two things are related.

K: What is the place of desire, and why has desire become so important in our life. You follow the whole movement of desire.

E: Yes.

K: Have we time?

C: A few minutes. Not really.

E: It is up to you. I am happy to go on.

K: There are people waiting for lunch!

C: Well I mean this is a crucial issue.

K: Yes sir I will come to that.

A: We have got five minutes.

K: If there is no becoming psychologically, you understand sirs, there is no self. Theoretically it sounds all right.

C: You keep going back to this, in theory it sounds all right, but...

K: To see the reality of it and cut it.

A: How do you see that?

K: I mean he tells me, he has been at it for a number of years, he says, look, there is no becoming. Is it this becoming has spilled over from the physical becoming, becoming a clerk, stepping up the ladder - you follow? Is that movement spilled over into the other field and therefore you are still thinking in terms of becoming psychologically, inwardly. And don't let it spill. Expand from there. Then is there a becoming? I will be. I must not. I am comparing myself. So the ending of measurement. You understand? Complete ending of measurement, which is comparison.

Sir, is there an end to knowledge?

C: Well is there an end to desire?

K: No, sir. Is there an end to knowledge?

E: I don't see that.

K: Ask that question sir.

D: I think there is an end.

K: If we are functioning all the time within the field of knowledge it is very limited. Is there an end to something?

E: Is there an edge, a place where it is no longer there. Yes there is.

K: Sir, which means what?

D: That means we are not coming forward always with this kind of knowledge.

K: Sir, could I put another question? Can the brain stop chattering? Completely, empty? Only act when it is asked, like a drum, highly tuned, but it is always empty, it is only when you strike on it that it gives a note. Right?

D: What is emptiness?

K: That is what I am saying: is there an end to knowledge? Of course. That's another matter.

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD BRAIN SEMINAR

12TH JUNE 1984

A: During the last two days we have been talking about many topics, and what has struck me is that it seems very difficult to penetrate a topic. And I was wondering what does it mean to enquire into something in an intelligent way. And perhaps with that spirit to go into the question of intelligence, what we were talking about yesterday.

K: I thought we did that yesterday. We said, if I remember rightly, that there is the intelligence of thought, and that intelligence is limited. And is there any other kind of intelligence which is not bound to time? And we said that there is. So we went into that, love and compassion, and out of that, that intelligence which is not limited at all. Because we said if love is limited then it is not love. If love has an opposite as hate, anger, jealousy and so on then it is not love. That is what we discussed yesterday.

How would you enquire into that intelligence which is not born of thought?

A: Well it seems to me that if we are using thought then we have to be very hesitant in what we say.

K: Not only that, but how would you enquire into that intelligence which is not the product of thought? How would you enquire into it? Right sir? That is what you are saying. How do you enquire into it? Would you enquire into it by saying that which it is not?

A: You mean by what is false?

K: Yes, what it is not. I don't know if I am conveying this. We said hate is not love - right? So is there in our psyche, in the brain - in the skull, I won't even use the brain now because I am apprehensive with all you experts! - in the skull, which is all the enormous activity of human beings, all the activities of human beings are contained in the skull, within the skull, within that sphere. And is love within it, or outside it? We asked that question too, yesterday. How do you enquire into it?

A: Well perhaps we could start by saying what is an action which is not intelligent? For example if we take a machine. A machine you could say that it is repetitive all the time, doing the same thing. And in the same way one could say that the brain is disposed to work according to its condition. And this condition is somehow always the same. For example when I see a person that I don't like, the brain seems to give meaning to that situation and plays itself out. And in that sense I would say that it is the same as a machine, you see a machine has a programme, preset.

K: After all we are programmed.

E: Well but also this very same process, I wouldn't call it a machine, is capable of coming up with something which is completely new, creative. So in that sense it is nothing to do with a machine. And precisely the fact that it can up with creative acts...

K: Creation?

E: It means that the process cannot be so simply characterized as being mere repetition, as in a trivial machine. I would make a distinction between what we call a trivial machine, which is a coca-cola machine, you know 10 pence going in or 50 pence going in and a coca-cola comes out. That is a trivial machine. This is not what life is about.

K: Of course not.

E: So let's not set up a strong man and say what it is not. The brain is not that kind of machine.

A: Could we say that this intelligence has not to do with a certain pattern which is repetitive? Would you agree to that? Because somehow intelligence has to do something that's new, out of the pattern.

D: I think what you said is true. We know in brain surgery, when we are studying the brain in the usual way, then we know that for instance that the brain is capable of producing values, constantly it is ordering the whole outer world in a new way. In that sense it produces quite new kind of attention or values. And that is not the same as knowledge, it is just...

K: Is it new, or is it a different aspect of the old?

A: Yes, that is an interesting question.

D: That is a good question.

B: What is the nature of the creative act?

K: Then we must go into what is creation, and what is invention.

E: All right, shall we do that? I don't know.

A: Yes.

E: Not interrupting you?

A: No, no. Yes I mean the question is how does one come about this intelligence?

K: That intelligence, can it be cultivated? All cultivation implies thought, time.

C: Are we acting intelligently now?

K: No, just a minute. Let's finish this. What did I say just now?

E: That all cultivation is in time.

K: Is in time and also it has a motive and a result. Cultivation implies motive, result and time. That is the factor of any cultivation. Is that intelligence which is born of some totally different time, carrying a different state, or whatever you like to call it, is that cultivable?

A: It doesn't seem so.

B: I am not so sure.

E: Well I would say that the cultivation would come from actually observing that in our life this quality of the new, the flash of the creative, the fresh of perception, for example, the freshness of perception is something that is happening all the time, but we normally tend to obscure it because our mind is too speedy. But it is possible to cultivate a more slow pace of thought and thereby one begins to see constant flashes of this quality of creative insight, or creative intelligence happening all the time. So it seems to me that it can be cultivated, not so much as to cultivate it as such, but to cultivate one's accessibility to it.

A: You mean by a process of observation rather?

E: Well observation is not the word I would use. It is more a quality of taming the poor quality of one's mind.

K: Would you use the word attention?

D: Attention would be good, yes.

E: I am not so happy with attention because it implies something that is too forced somehow.

K: No, awareness - I don't want to go into all that. What are we discussing now, let's be clear.

C: Intelligence.

A: Intelligence, yes.

E: You have asked the question: can this intelligence be cultivated?

K: Can that intelligence which is not born of thought, can that be cultivated? Obviously not.

A: Yes. But somehow there must be...

K: We will come to that in a minute, sir, go slowly. We will get at it. We said any kind of cultivation implies a motive, time and a beginning and an end. Is love cultivable in that sense? I know you don't like that word, it is foreign to you, probably to all of you.

D: If we begin to evaluate things differently then in my brain I am changing my brain also. We know that changes occur which we don't know from where they come. They come there. So I think after all there is some kind of possibility for changing the brain and it is with the values.

K: Sir that means, doesn't it, a quality of silence.

D: Yes, a quality of silence.

K: The quality of quietness, a sense of everything in abeyance. And then in that tranquillity something happens.

D: Yes, not of thought, being quiet, letting the brain just be.

K: Can that be?

D: Yes.

K: But our brain has been active from childhood: work, work, work, struggle, pain, learn, don't learn, the whole human struggle, human endeavour, can the brain, which has been so conditioned, can it ever be quiet?

D: There exists the possibility but it is difficult. But can you tell us brain researchers what value could it possibly be because we are limited, you see, but in the brain changes occur and these changes bring about new values, but what are they? We don't know because with knowledge we cannot go into them. We cannot. Can you please?

K: We both agree that there must be a certain ground of quietness, of tranquillity so that something new can come. Right? Would you agree to that?

E: And that that can be cultivated.

K: Wait sir, question it, go into it.

E: I mean the attitude.

K: No silence is not an attitude.

E: No, but to make yourself available to silence is an attitude.

K: No. Then who is it that is making you available?

E: That which needs, or requires or wants the silence.

C: Desire.

K: Again desire. Again thought.

E: There has to be a desire to make itself available to non-desire.

K: You go back again, you see.

D: Physiologically no because we let the brain be, it is just there.

E: We might go into a very long discussion here when you say the brain stops. I have never seen a brain stop which is not dead.

D: I have seen my brain stop. Be silent.

E: If I put an electrode, as an electro-physiologist you know that if I put electrodes in your brain it will not be inactive. It will be just as active as now. So that doesn't mean anything.

K: Would you say the brain - I won't even say that! - that thing which is inside the skull, it has its own rhythm.

E: All right.

D: Yes.

K: And there is the rhythm of thought - right? Can the rhythm of thought be quiet? That is all we are saying.

E: Yes, it can.

K: No. Wait a minute sir. Quiet, not just temporarily, not off and on but quiet.

E: Once and for all?

K: Yes. Just let me explain. You see you are objecting to this when you say once and for all it means time. You see this is our difficulty. Silence is not once and for all. You want it once and for all. And then when you say, once and for all, you introduce the whole movement of time.

E: Are we in time now? Right now?

K: Of course.

E: So we can only point to what we are not now. We are in time and you are mentioning something which is out of time, how can we do it except by a pointer in time?

K: No. We are asking sir, whether the brain, the thing inside the skull, can ever be quiet apart from its own rhythm? That is the question we are asking.

A: I think this is important to clarify that perhaps quietness doesn't mean that the brain rhythm has to stop.

K: I said that. The rhythm goes on.

E: He is talking about the rhythm of thought, not the rhythm of the brain, which if it stops is dead.

A: Yes.

K: Of course. No oxygen and there is the end of it.

B: This is the old St.Peter experiment, cut off your head there is no life.

D: It is possible for that which is inside, I don't mention brain!, it is possible for it. We know that the thought stops but nevertheless there are functions going on which are part of thought. We call it in brain research, consciousness. It is just a being or whatever is inside, that is not the thought, not the sensation, the sensory, not the perception, not action. That we know quite well.

A: But let's come back to the question.

K: This has been a question not only put now but in the most ancient days they put this question: can thought come to an end? Stop?

C: But if we say thought can come to an end, will it be a function of choice?

K: No.

C: You don't think there is any choice?

K: The sun is setting, it is finished. It may come up again tomorrow, but the sun has set.

C: And that is not an act of choice.

K: No, of course not sir.

E: But it is an event in time.

K: I question that.

E: But the sun setting is not in time?

K: I introduced that, forget the sunset. Silence, quietness, tranquility, which means the ending of thought - right? Not for a few seconds, but ending. Apart from the realm of...

C: Would you conceive of that as being some sort of event of the brain? Or of thought?

K: No, sir. I am thinking all day long about my problems, my wife, my children, my career, my research, I am at it all day long, and when I go to sleep it is there again going on, all day and all night, ceaselessly. And it is wearing itself out. Now I am just asking can all that movement stop? Stop, not stop for some days, or some hours, stop.

E: It is not my experience. Because...

K: Wait, please.

E: May I something at this point please?

K: When you say it is not my experience then your experience may be very limited.

E: Of course.

K: Therefore that's not...

E: But that is all I have.

K: No, no.

E: I can hear something when you say thought can stop, I can hear it as a possibility but it remains for me a possibility unless it becomes reality.

K: Would you like to learn about it?

E: Of course.

K: Would you like to find out?

E: Yes, but can I say something before?

K: Yes of course.

E: It seems that there is a third middle way, may I say possibility, which is not thought as ceaseless, neither is thought gone, but there is an intermediate possibility which is close to my own investigation, or experience, which is, thought as being permeable. In other words, thought at the beginning, it seems that thought is a solid thing, that it never stops; upon close investigation one sees that thought has actually lots of gaps. It is like not a solid veil but it has big holes in it. In between the holes there is...

K: An interval between thoughts.

E: No, it is not just intervals, it is like thought is like little glimmers in a much large space. It is not just a space.

K: But it is still the movement of thought.

E: There is movement of thought but within a vaster context.

K: Yes, yes, it is still thought.

E: Yes but it is in a vaster context which is not the same as ceaseless thought. There is a dramatic change from one to the other. So I want to know whether this is not also part of your experience.

K: I distrust all experience.

E: Including yours?

K: Including mine!

C: Including yours?

K: Yes sir, I am very sceptical about my own experiences, because you can get deceived terribly.

E: So what is the source of the understanding then if it is not your own experience, or my own experience for myself?

K: Let's leave the word experience, that is a complicated word.

E: OK What would you use instead?

K: I don't know, we'll find out. We are asking a very simple question, which is very complex: there is the rhythm of the brain inside - right? You agreed to that.

E: Yes, no problem.

K: Then there is the rhythm of thought. Can that rhythm, not in a vast consciousness, can that rhythm of thought stop? Right?

That's all. Not induced, not cultivated.

C: Not chosen.

K: When you choose there is the activity of desire.

C: Right.

K: So is there a cessation of thought?

D: Could it be that if it should not be induced there would exist the possibility that if I devalue, you understand me, the thoughts, that I don't give any values to thought, could it be possible that then thought ceases?

K: I don't quite know. Just a minute sir. How do we investigate into this?

E: Fine I hear the possibility now.

K: I don't even know the possibility, I just...

E: Or the question.

K: I just posed that question.

E: All right.

K: No, just a minute sir. See what happens: if I pose a question, and you reply to it, and then I reply to your question, and we keep this dialogue going until only the question remains and you and I disappear - you follow all this? There is only the question, which then has a tremendous vitality. You understand what I am saying?

E: Absolutely.

K: Are we together in this?

E: Yes.

K: That is we have posed a question. That is, can the rhythm of thought which has been going on from the beginning of one's life until we die, can that rhythm of thought come to an end? You reply and this dialogue goes on. And then you said, look, in that process only the question remains - right? You don't answer, I don't answer. Now when the question remains your brain is quiet, because you are not acting, I am not acting, only the question. Right? And this has been a problem of every human being, to have some quietness inside there, some peace, say, for god's sake stop. Right sir? And they have invented various methods to stop it - right? Control, suppression - agreed?

E: It seems that history records many, many attempts to do this, yes.

K: Many systems, many methods to say, for god's sake let me have some peace, so that my brain, the thing is quiet, apart from its own rhythm. Right?

A: Yes but why does the brain do that? This shutting, why did it fall in the dark from the very start?

K: I don't understand

B: Why does it have to be so full of itself?

K: Ah! From childhood, I have been trained that way, we have been educated, all education is work, work, work, learn, learn.

A: You mean it has been conditioned that way?

K: Yes, of course. Right?

E: It doesn't seem complete to put only the two alternatives of either having thought going or stopping it. There is again the middle way possibility of not stopping thought but making so much room for it that it is not bothersome anymore.

K: But it is still thought moving.

E: Yes but this is like having a very wild animal, a wild monkey in a small room. That is very bothersome and very complicated, but if the same monkey gets in a large field it is fine, it doesn't bother anybody.

K: Yes it does, but still give it any amount of space it is still there, the activity of thought.

E: Yes it is the monkey running around.

K: Monkeying around.

E: But it doesn't bother anyone.

K: It is not a question of bother.

E: No, no, but you say, I want some peace. Or men have said, give me some peace.

K: People have asked this question thousands of years ago, saying can thought, however much it may have space, in that space can it be silent.

C: Krishnaji, it could be that the very reason that people experience so much noise is because they are looking for it to be peaceful.

K: No.

C: In other words if you take his position and have a dialogue here with the question, the fact of the matter is that if you give it plenty of space you don't experience the desire to have that peace. The people that experience you know, give me that quiet peace are people who are searching.

K: Are you saying because I live in a city, in a drawer, various drawers, I want space and therefore that is my desire?

C: Yes. Your relationship inside your thought process is the thing that's the matter, not the fact that you have thought. You are so busy trying to get out of thought that you are cramped.

K: So if you are in the country, not in a city's drawer, you then say, my god, how beautiful all this is. You revel in it, you say, it is beautiful. But thought is still going on. That's is all my point. I am not saying...

E: No, no, but you raised the question of stopping thought and that question was, and you yourself implied it and I agreed, it has a motivation which is the desire to be free from that slavery.

K: So, all right.

E: So we are raising the possibility that to be free from that slavery maybe it is not necessary to stop thought but simply to give it space and may be then that state of mystery can come.

K: Would you say thought was a material process?

C: What does that mean?

K: I don't have to tell you that.

E: I am afraid I would have to ask you that because in some sense it is and in some sense it isn't. In the same way that the image on the television screen, is that image a material process? It is because it needs those little chips, but it doesn't, it is not because it is a relationship.

K: Agreed but it is still a material process.

C: Yes but it is a relationship. What is more important it is a relationship with a material process.

K: No, no, I am not saying relationship, I am just stating something. I am not saying, what is the relationship etc.

E: Well if you just put the question so bluntly I would say, no it is not a material process.

K: All right, let's put it more softly! He doesn't want it bluntly, then softly.

C: How do you want to put it softly?

K: What is thought?

C: It's a relationship.

K: With what?

C: It's a relationship that is built like you were saying the other day, it is imminent in the fact that your existence as a human being on this earth.

K: Yes sir.

C: It emerges out of that.

K: All right. A human being, what is he?

C: He is a relationship in the sense that he is a form that has taken place in all of this.

K: All right, do you want to discuss relationship?

C: You can't discuss thought without discussing relationship.

K: Yes sir. Let's discuss relationship. What is relationship?

What do you mean by that word? To be related. I am related to my brother, my father, my mother, my wife, my children. I am related to the world.

C: To the trees.

K: Nature.

C: You are not related. You express the relationship...

K: I express - you see.

C: No, I am talking at a very basic level.

K: Yes sir. So am I. So are we related to nature?

C: By definition yes.

K: Definition, I don't mean definition, it has no meaning. When you see that tree in all those marvellous fields, and flowers, and the animals, are you related to it?

C: Actually yes. You are in actual connection to everything around you.

K: Are you? Sir, don't let's quibble.

C: No, no, I mean actually.

K: That means what? That you will not kill anything.

E: Right, OK.

C: That doesn't necessarily mean that.

K: Oh yes. Because if you kill that you kill yourself.

C: Yes but the fox is in relationship to the rabbit.

K: Yes sir, but kills the rabbit.

C: Yes and it is in relationship to it.

K: So you kill the fox.

C: That's right.

K: And somebody else kills you.

E: That seems to be the way of nature's relationship.

K: Just a minute. This is the accepted way of living.

C: Yes but that's built into nature.

K: Just a minute sir. I know this game! I have played this game.

I know all this.

A: But are we not going a little bit away from the main point?

B: There seems to be tremendous resistance. We have asked can thought stop, can there be an end to it and we won't go into the question. We want to go round in different directions and nobody seems to want to stay with the question.

E: I want to stay with the question but I want also to see that the entire question is dealt with, which is the possibility of thought continuing, the possibility of thought stopping, and the possibility of thought having so much space that it doesn't create the problems that we find it normally creating. I would like the three possibilities to be considered and not discard one off-hand.

C: And therefore relationship becomes an issue.

K: Now which shall we take?

C: What would you consider an intelligent way to approach this issue since we have said that we want to consider all aspects of thought and we have said thought is relationship, what is the intelligent way to proceed, given this fact?

K: I don't know.

B: I don't think we have come here for someone to give us the answers.

K: What is the question? Step by step. First question, what is the question? Desire? I am asking. Is it desire? Is it space? Thought being contained in a small space? If it has vast space there would be no problem? Does space prevent thought from having problems?

E: OK that is a perfectly valid question.

K: You are saying yes?

E: I am saying yes because that is something I can explore and it is part of my experience.

K: Yes.

E: But stopping is foreign to my experience.

K: Forget the stopping. Throw it overboard for the moment.

E: If I may say so I would not like to throw it away because I am interested in learning something which is not available for me.

K: We will come to that presently. We said before, yesterday and the other day, that thought is limited. It can have vast space it is still limited.

E: Yes absolutely the monkey will still be a monkey.

K: It is well known this monkey business!

E: Agreed.

C: All right, agreed.

K: Next question: it is still the monkey, then what is the next question? You say there are three possibilities.

E: The three possibilities to me have to do with the fact that when the monkey is, when I discover that I can relate or see the monkey's action in a vaster space...

K: It is still the monkey.

E: ...it is still the monkey but the space around it has a completely new quality.

K: Yes, but it still remains the monkey.

E: The monkey does but not the space around the monkey.
That's new.

K: That's it.

C: Francisco, are you saying that somehow you can control thought?

E: No. Precisely not. This is exactly what I have not been saying.

C: If you have enough space...

E: Listen to me for a moment. Stopping to me is a synonym of control: instead if I take this wild animal which is uncontrolled thought, and not throw it away, and not hit it on the head and try to kill it, but seem to make room for it, then by itself the wild monkey in the big field simply goes to sleep.

C: Then you think there is enough room in the universe for thought?

E: That is precisely my point that it seems to be the human experience is that it is possible to grow infinitely.

K: Grow? I question that. What is it to grow infinitely? What is growing?

E: That which is around thought.

K: The space. Space can go on.

E: I am not talking about literal physical space. I am talking of that which is where thought lives, the space around thought.

K: Just a minute! You see where he is leading to!

D: I don't understand it.

K: It is speculation.

C: Well it's speculative to say thought can stop too.

K: No, I am asking a question.

E: It is speculative only to the extent that one is not willing to see the source of the observation. The source of the observation is to remain in silence and see how thought moves.

K: I don't quite follow all this, sorry.

C: I think Krishnaji was having issue there because he wouldn't say, at least I have never heard you say in our previous discussions - he would say staying in silence is an act of control. In other words to stay in silence implies that I am going to think my way into silence. That's just another form of control too.

K: The observer is the observed. We agree to that.

B: You are saying that all these actions begin with some sense of desire, or a goal, or some sense of control. And if you begin with control, can you control thought? Either by giving it a lot of space, or by controlling it, by trying to stop it. I guess we are saying that that doesn't seem possible to begin that way.

K: Sir, you used the word space. I can go to the Himalayas and there is immense space. I have been to one spot in the north where you see three hundred and fifty miles of snow. Tremendous. But the monkey is still there! That's all I am saying.

E: I am not disagreeing with that.

K: And that space doesn't affect the monkey.

E: Oh, yes it does.

K: Somewhat.

E: It makes it tame and it usually just takes a nap, goes to sleep. It is like a monkey in a small cage is all neurotic but once it has all the jungle it is a happy monkey, it goes to sleep.

K: Please. This isn't quite accurate sir because you give man any amount of space, any amount, both physically - are you talking physical space?

E: No.

K: Psychological space, inward space. Wait. Inward space. Then how does it come about?

E: It doesn't come about.

K: Then human beings haven't got that space.

E: They have it, it is a matter of paying attention to it, of making yourself available to it. It is not that...

K: Available to space.

E: Available to, yes.

K: Which means what?

E: Which means not speeding so much so that I don't see that it is there.

K: Which means sir, would you say for the skull to have space there must be no self?

E: Yes.

K: That's all.

E: I agree.

D: That's better.

K: Right? That means the self is limited, there should be no activity of the self, no deception, saying I have no self, but I am hiding there. Then the monkey doesn't exist.

E: Well this is again where I don't see.

K: We said...

E: It continues to exist.

K: No, wait sir, of course I exist, the self I am talking about. The me, both the physical, psychological, all the me, memory, this vast bundle of memories which is me, if that bundle of memory ceases, then there is infinite space - that's all.

E: Right.

K: Now...

C: Where is the monkey now?

K: There is no monkey.

E: Well this is what I don't see. The monkey is still there, it is just in a bigger space.

K: Let's define it. You mean the monkey as the body...

E: The monkey as the self, as the body, the memories, the sense.

K: We said that. Memory, thought, experience, knowledge is limited. Therefore give him any amount of space inwardly it is still limited.

E: One thing is that it is limited, the other thing is that in its limitation it is tame so that it is not the source or the cause of further trouble.

K: But it is still limited. That's all.

E: OK I sometimes I don't know what you mean by, that's all.

K: I mean it may somehow create, or bring about, or exist, or live in that space. And I say that space, however wide, however extensive, however deep, the monkey, the self is still there. You agree?

E: That's fine.

K: That's all.

E: We are in agreement!

C: That's an agreement. The monkey is there.

K: The monkey is still there. I know all the tricks of the monkey.

B: It doesn't matter.

K: I know all the tricks. I have watched the monkey operating at various levels, it is still the monkey. What is the next question? If the monkey is very satisfied, says, I have got a lot of space, I am happy, I am building my tail and related to everything and blah, blah, blah.

E: Fine. So the next question I would ask myself is: that seems to be the fruition of a process of cultivation which I need to start where I am, which is the monkey is small space, to cultivate the larger space.

K: Now can the space - it comes to the same thing sir - can that space be cultivated?

E: The space itself, no. My attitude to it, yes.

K: Ah! You see!

E: Well can I put an example. I can say for example, just a metaphor, if I close the curtains of this room it doesn't mean that there is no sky - right? I have to have an attitude to open up the curtains, and say, oh, there is sky. So it is not that I cultivate sky, I cultivate my attitude to make myself available to the perception of sky. It is the same sort of phenomenon.

K: I have an attitude that war is ugly, brutal. I have an attitude but I go on killing.

E: It is a possibility.

K: But sir, that is what...

E: Or the attitude might bring me to say, I won't kill anymore.

K: It is not an attitude. What do you mean by attitude?

D: I wanted to ask what are they. Do they have something to do with values, attitudes?

K: Values are already...

D: Attitudes we are talking about.

K: No, I am just asking: how does the monkey create space for itself?

C: That is a big question.

E: That is a great question.

C: That's the great question.

K: I put that question.

C: Yes.

K: And what do you do with that question?

D: It needs a change.

K: Kick it around? Put it this way, that way, and the other way, but the question still remains.

B: How about trying different ways?

K: You have tried it, ten different ways now, this morning. I can see what we have done! You have kicked the monkey from corner to corner, in the same field - right? So what is the next question: can the monkey create the space for itself, which means the monkey has to end? Not as a physical monkey, but the whole inward structure, inward state, inward - right?

E: Well...

K: I am putting it quickly. You can expand it, kick it around. We'll come back to the same thing! Can the monkey create its own space?

C: The question that comes up there is the monkey is caught in the self, the monkey makes small space.

K: The monkey wherever it is will make a small space.

C: Yes. Now that monkey is in that small space, it seems to me that there is some understanding of seeing that small space that dissolves it.

K: That's it. Now wait a minute. Keep to that one statement: when the monkey realizes, sees, perceives, pays attention, whatever word you like to use, that itself whatever it does is still limited - agree? Whatever it does, prays to god, goes to science - right? Whatever it does it is still the monkey, so it cannot create space.

C: Right.

E: At that moment it makes itself available to it though.

K: No. You see, when you say available, it is still the monkey.

E: Up until the point at which he actually lets go of his being the monkey.

K: Wait a minute, that's the whole point.

E: He has to be monkey, make himself available to drop it before he can actually drop it.

K: He is still the monkey sir whether he can drop it or not - right? It cannot create space. Agree to that? Just a minute.

E: Sorry. It is like going to back to David's point. The monkey to be monkey has to be very smart to create all of the illusions of its own enclosure. That intelligence is so intelligent that he can also see his own trappings.

K: We have said that.

E: Right. That is precisely the interesting thing: that this intelligence is two sided. On the one hand it can create this confusion and on the other hand it can see itself. But when it sees itself it is, in some sense in a limited sense but nevertheless in some sense, its own creation.

C: This is important Krishnaji because in our past discussions at this point we usually say that the insight of the monkey into the fact that he is enclosed in a space, it is that that in some way brings a stop to the monkey. But the question is, is there more to the stop than the insight?

K: When does the monkey realize its own limitation?

C: When did you say?

K: When.

E: At the moment it sees its own futility.

K: Now when does that happen? Go slowly sir. Go slowly!
When does this happen? When you knock it on the head?

B: When it is suffering.

K: Wait. I am coming to it. Let's look into it. When does it see, my god whatever I do will always be limited?

E: When there is a breakdown in its world.

K: When does it break down?

E: All the time there is a breakdown.

K: No, sir. Just. Look, I am the monkey.

B: OK, you lost your wife, or your house burnt down.

K: So it means what? In a crisis.

B: Crisis, suffering.

K: Wait. A crisis. See what you are saying! That it needs a crisis for it to wake up. Right?

E: Yes.

K: I question that.

E: It needs it as a usual first step. But then one realizes that the breakdown is happening all the time, right now.

K: No, no, just a minute sir. I asked just now, when does the monkey realize the fact, the reality, the truth, that it is limited? It can climb trees, it can run, it can swim, it can enter into laboratories and dissect, do everything it wants, it is still the terrible monkey. And when does it realize, when does it say, my god, I am limited - not theoretically.

A: In a crisis, we said.

K: I question that. We have had crises. Every year we have crises, every day we have a crisis. I quarrel with my wife. Governments are cheating us, misruling us. You say one thing, another scientists says another thing. When do I realize that I am limited? I have had suffering - right? Untold suffering, not only me but the world. When I see that D-Day entertainment, I suffer, I have suffered. That hasn't changed the monkey because we have suffered for thousands of years.

D: Why?

K: We have had thousands of pleasures.

E: So you need the convergence to think. The suffering and the possibility of somebody, or something, or some...

K: That's your brain, you are now off again.

E: I want to say you have to have the combination...

K: When you say off you mean outside agency.

E: No, I am saying, that the outside agency can be a perfect clear manifestation of the inside agency.

K: Yes.

E: But we have to have the combination of the two of saying it is futile and there is an alternative. It is like your example the other day you run into somebody who says, you could go south. It is the same sort of thing.

K: Yes sir. So when does the monkey wake up and say, I am limited? Do you know what that means sir? Any action - you understand? - any action of the monkey is still the monkey. Vertical, horizontal, create space, it is still the terrible little entity called the monkey. So man has invented god, outside agency will help me, he has prayed, he is still the monkey.

D: Can you say what should be done?

K: I can.

D: I am waiting.

K: Right? Just a minute sir. Have you come to an impasse?

E: In the dialogue, in the conversation?

K: No. When I said whatever the monkey does, whatever, it is still the monkey. Agree?

E: Yes agree.

K: That means you have come to a stop. It is an impasse, you have come against a wall. Wall. You understand? Don't misunderstand wall. You are stuck there.

E: You come to a realization.

K: No, you have come to the realization whatever it does is...

E: ...is limited.

K: Limited. What does that mean? Is it a theory? Is it you say, yes, let's discuss it? Or it is an actuality that you are up against a wall, you can't move? Yes sirs! There is no escape.

D: But there are people who know that. Also researchers, scientists, know that it is so. We agree.

K: Then what do we do sir?

D: There are some of us who know that you are right.

K: What do we do?

D: May I say this: I don't know. What should we do? We should do something, we just can't wait.

C: We are stuck in the room now.

B: We are stuck with the question, we can't go out of the room.

K: Look what you are doing sirs, look what you are doing! You don't stop, and say, look I am at an impasse.

C: Let's stop right there. You say, we don't stop. What about that act of stop?

K: You are against a wall, you don't have to stop. The wall prevents you moving. We never come to that point.

E: I question that.

K: Otherwise you have the answer.

E: Of course.

D: What should we do?

C: Well tell us. We are here now.

E: We have already said. One thing is that we don't know what to do, the other thing is that we don't apply ourselves to do it. We talked about creating space around the monkey, didn't we.

C: Nobody understood that.

B: There is nowhere else to move. We can't talk about it anymore. We are stuck.

E: We are not.

D: Then what should we do?

B: To speak about it is to move away from it. We are stuck there.

D: What should we do? Slowly, tell. I am waiting. Very much in my being at Brockwood I hoped that I would tell something to those people at home who are exactly of the same opinion.

K: Have I said I can't move anymore?

E: No, you have said we can't move anymore.

K: You have said that to yourself.

E: No, sorry, I never said that.

D: What should be done?

E: I don't feel that that is true. There is the realization of the absolute impossibility, and at the same time there are all the gaps, all the holes, all the space right there.

K: No, there is no hope when you are up against a wall.

E: It is not true. The sudden realization of the complete limitation brings with it the complete clarity of the space with it.

K: Is that an actuality to you?

D: I don't understand.

E: Is it not sir? Why couldn't it be shared?

K: We can share it together if we are both hungry and food is put.

E: But it is here.

K: Yes sir. Do I realize that whatever I do I am still the monkey? Either in the future, or in the past, whatever I do. It is a tremendous shock to realize that. Right? Shock, both organically and psychologically. Right? Shock. And if you can remain with that shock, not dissipate it - you understand? So that there is no escape, no explanation, no rationalization, anything I do is still the monkey. See what has happened. There is then a totally different action. Yes sir.

E: I thought you said there was no hope. This is exactly what I just said.

K: No, it is not a hope. I have no hope.

E: Oh no?

K: No sir, I have no hope because I am against the wall. If I hope I want to escape.

E: But you have just said there is a totally different action coming out of that.

K: Ah, for me, not for you, maybe.

C: What do you mean, "For me and not you"?

K: No, sir. Do I realize, you, Shainberg, that whatever you do, whatever you think, whatever you act, whatever you hope, it is still the monkey playing? That means you have come to a complete stop. Have you? I am not asking personally, that is up to you. Have you? Complete stop. No argument.

C: No, no. Let's take it in another sense. How can I put it, the stop - what happens to you in the now. Now we are together in this stop.

K: I asked sir, has Shainberg...

C: That thing Shainberg.

K: No, no, you are there in front of me. Have you stopped?

C: There is no answer to that question.

K: Yes sir, there is. Don't dodge it. We have argued for three days - right?

C: Well if I say, I have stopped, that's I and I haven't stopped.

K: No, no. That would be absurd. But you have come to realize, not you sir, forgive me, I am not being impolite or impudent, you have come to realize whatever you do it is still the monkey, and therefore always limited. You understand sir? I will tell you something sir. I met a man, I used to know him, he was a judge. And one day he said, "I am passing judgement, left and right, about crime and murder, all kinds of things, but I don't know what truth is." So he said to his family, "I am going away, I am going to find it." He spent twenty five years, these are facts, meditating to find out what truth is. So somebody brought him to one of the talks which I was giving, and he came to see me afterwards, he said, "For twenty five years I have been mesmerizing myself, deceiving myself. I haven't found truth." You understand? There it is. For an old man to realize that he has for twenty five years deluded himself. To admit that.

You see sir, when one actually faces the fact that you cannot do anything, the monkey, the brain, the inside, apart from the rhythm comes to be quiet, says, right. No tricks any more. Sir this has been the problem of meditation - you know the word? I am not insulting you sir, I am sure you know the word. They have tried every method - you understand? Zen, Buddhist, Tibetan, going off in solitude, following various systems invented by thought, to come up against this and say, "Look, this is the end".

He is looking at you.

E: Well maybe he is looking at me because to go back to about half way in our conversation this morning when I said it is not my experience!

C: Yes, but what about right now? But now in a sense, not in a sense, this stop and now. Now what?

E: Now won't you cultivate that?

C: Is there cultivation?

E: I don't know if it is cultivating according to Krishnaji.

K: No, not according to me sir. Not according to me. We all said cultivation...

E: I don't know according...

K: We all agreed cultivation implies motive, time, end and effort.

E: Yes absolutely. I don't see that as an intrinsic problem. The problem would be that that motivation would not be cognizant of its limitations. But if a motivation says, "I know of my lack of vision but it is an attitude that makes it possible to constantly come back to that realization of limitation", then that is cultivating a meditative action.

K: Therefore...

E: Motivation by itself is not problematic. Motivation is problematic when it is completely devoid of any context of its limitation, when it believes in itself. At least this is as far as you know, any practical way of cultivation.

K: Sir, you, not you sir, the monkey is still active. Yes.

E: I said again I don't see a problem with the monkey acting and being a monkey. The problem is when the monkey is in a little room.

K: Right sir.

E: I don't have any animosity against...

K: ...against being a monkey.

E: I don't have any animosity against being constrained.

K: No, no. I am not concerned sir. What do you mean by that word concerned?

E: Constrained, I said.

K: Constrained. Aren't we constrained.

E: Indeed. That is precisely what needs to be worked on and dealt with. Therefore what really interests me is what are the actual practicalities, the actual practicalities of cultivating that spaciousness? Because the monkey is not the problem, the constraint is what makes the monkey crazy.

K: You see the difference? I say it is not the constraint, it is the monkey constraining himself.

E: It comes to the same thing. The way we cultivate it is to make room for it. Not to hit it on the head.

K: The monkey cannot make room for itself.

E: Oh, I thought we concluded that it can because we said its intelligence can apply to see its limitations.

K: We said whatever it does is limited.

E: Yes, and when it becomes aware of that limitation there is space right there.

K: When it becomes aware that whatever it does...

E: ...is limited, it creates space right there.

K: Yes. All right.

E: Well isn't that a fact?

K: If you say so.

E: I am posing you the question very much in the spirit of hearing what your experience is.

K: I would question myself whether one has - not you sir, I am not trying to be impudent - whether one has really realized the nature of the monkey, the monkey whatever it does is still the monkey, and the depth of that realization, which may be very superficial, or it may be profound. When it is profound it totally changes one's life. That's all I am saying. I am not saying anything else.

E: I guess I am saying that that is possible but it may not be possible for every human being. Wait a second. My experience, and this is all I have, my experience, I cannot go by your experience...

K: Of course not.

E: ...nor anybody else's, my experience is that those realizations come and go and come in different degrees of depth. Sometimes it is a realization of a stupid limitation that I have imposed on myself and I can drop it. Sometimes it can be profound, then it is forgotten again. It is not a one-shot deal. It is not like that.

C: I think you are raising another issue. That is the fact Krishnaji is what you seem to be saying is that when the monkey is the monkey, caught up in the monkeyness, in the monkey business, that it has no relationship to the intelligence whatsoever.

K: It is still monkey.

C: It is still monkey. Therefore there is no intelligence at all. And in a way, the brain itself - again coming back to the brain, or some of its functions - when that monkey business is going on it is all monkey business. Now the question is: whether the intelligence comes in and for instance there is an aspect of the monkey which is intelligent. And therefore the intelligence appreciates the limitations of the monkey and at the same time - yesterday you said, or our discussion took in the statement that the intelligence sees that thought is limited.

K: No, sir. I said let's first define and go into the question of intelligence. The intelligence of thought, and the intelligence of love.

C: And I asked you, or we tried to get at - that's where we ended the other day - what is the relationship between the intelligence of love and the intelligence of thought?

K: What is the relationship - I understand your question - what is the relationship of the man who doesn't hate and the man who hates? There is no relationship.

C: None?

K: No.

E: That's not true. That is not my experience.

K: Not experience. I doubt everybody's experience, including my own. But I am saying let's discuss that, not experience, then you are lost: my experience, your experience, but what is the relationship of the man who loves, in the sense we are talking about, and the man who hates? Just look at it sir. How can there be?

C: I think there is a relationship.

K: All right.

C: I think you think so too. I have seen you embrace people who you know hate.

K: Just a minute sir. Of course.

C: So what is your relationship when you embrace a man you know who hates?

K: Ah! No. Hate has no relationship to love; but love has a relationship to hate.

C: OK

K: That's all. That's all. Not the other way round.

C: So then intelligence has a relationship to thought?

K: No, sir.

D: Love has to do with embracing. As I told you the first day, that is a good word, embrace in Finnish, so that I can understand. Not the other way round.

C: What is the relationship between intelligence and thought?

K: We said that sir.

C: No, we haven't.

K: Thought has its own intelligence - right? We agreed that. Love, compassion, has its own intelligence. The intelligence of thought has no relationship with that intelligence, but that intelligence has a relationship.

C: Sir, what is the relationship of intelligence to the monkey?

K: None.

C: Not this way?

K: That way, yes, but not the other.

C: OK Now what is the event of intelligence finding, seeing the limitations of the monkey?

K: Sir, just a minute. It is very simple: you are no longer the monkey. I am the monkey. What is my relationship to you? None.

C: But what is my relationship to you?

K: You have relationship, you have love, compassion, all that. But I have no relationship with you, I am still the monkey. When I cease to be the monkey I don't want you, I am - you are finished. Right. We had better stop.

I am not referring to you gentlemen. Each one is pursuing his own way - right?

E: Is there a way to overcome that?

K: Yes sir. I want my career, my business, and he says to me, all of us are doing this in the world - right? Creating havoc in the world.

E: So how could it be otherwise? You do what you do, I do what I do?

K: No. Can we all be together?

E: Yes.

K: Where?

E: Cultivate our love.

K: Oh, no. Don't say cultivate love.

E: Why not?

K: Sir, that means what?

E: That means making yourself available to that possibility. Why does it have to be...

K: Just a minute. We have discussed this point, you are going back to that again. That is not cultivatable.

E: Itself it is not, but...

K: All right sir. This is it. This is what makes us - you stick to your point, another sticks his point. And this world is like that.

D: Beginning again the same round.

E: Well it is not that.

K: The communist sticks to his ideology, won't budge.

E: But Krishnaji I wouldn't harm you because you think differently from myself.

K: I understand sir. But I am telling you sir...

E: Not for one minute.

K: Look sir, can we all be together, not physically but inwardly so that you are a light to yourself.

C: For that to happen it seems to me you have to see him as a monkey in your space who has plenty of room to play.

K: Don't go back to that monkey business! No, sirs, this is our difficulty.

C: I think one of our difficulties is that we don't recognize we are different. You do your thing, I do mine, I can love you but if you are different I love it.

K: If the love is there, there is no difference.

C: Well that is looking at it at different levels.

K: If I love my wife and I have any difference, no.

C: Yes, you have difference in similarity.

K: No, no, sir. Arguing again. It doesn't lead anywhere. We had better stop.

IN CONVERSATION WITH RONALD EYRE BROCKWOOD PARK 24TH JUNE 1984

Ronald Eyre: I would like to ask you about playfulness which matters to me more and more.

K: Playfulness?

RE: Playfulness, knowing that if I tackle a piece of work with a certain solemnity, however serious I am, it sort of destroys itself; but if there is in it an element, in my approach, of playfulness, of letting it happen.

K: I wonder what you mean by playfulness.

RE: Well, I suppose over-solemnity is rather conceited. I mean you have an idea that you would like to do this, you would like to finish it, so you have the end in the beginning, you know what it is going to be. What I mean by playfulness is allowing for things to come in from the side which you hadn't expected - thoughts, or notions.

K: You mean when you are working you are concentrating, and when that concentration is not focused then the other things happen.

RE: Yes, you see I was brought up, like many of us, in a very Puritanical way, brought up to believe that effort was a fine thing. And I believe I am having to learn that effort is a double edged matter, and that it can be over-solemn, it can push you towards conclusions, it can blind you and deafen you to all sorts of things you should be hearing and seeing. I need, I feel, to sit back and play more. Does that make sense?

K: Letting other thoughts come in rather than having one continuous effort and thought.

RE: And let it organically shift so that it shapes itself organically, maybe in a direction you hadn't intended.

K: Would you say that distraction is necessary? It is that.

RE: It is distraction, isn't it. It is to do with - if I could use a phrase like, mindful distraction, not merely being open to anything.

K: Being empty minded.

RE: That's right.

K: So concentration, a sense of distraction of which you are aware.

RE: That feels quite important.

K: But when you are aware that it is distraction, is it distraction?

RE: It is extremely subtle concentration perhaps.

K: That's what I am asking.

RE: I feel it to be. I feel that it is connected with fear. When an element of fear comes into it - fear you may go wrong, or that something unwelcome may happen, then it freezes you, and you think you are concentrating, you are actually shutting out. Would you say that is correct?

K: That's it partly only. Can we discuss what is concentration and then come to the other. What do we mean when we say concentrate? To focus one's thought.

RE: Focus feels a bit positive as though your intention is maybe a little too much in it.

K: Yes. Concentrate on what one is doing. Don't let anything come in.

RE: To be available totally to what one is doing is another way of putting it.

K: Yes, all right. What does that do when one is so centred, focused? Aren't you shutting off every other form of thought, every other form of distraction, if we can use that word. So you build a wall round yourself and say, "Please, no, don't think of anything, let's think about this."

RE: There is a distinction, isn't there though, between somebody - when you did that gesture it was a slightly worried gesture, you know, please don't bother me, I am concentrating on this. That, I think - although I certainly do it quite a lot - it seems to me to have fear in it and to be probably not so useful as an openness to a thing which merely, quietly presses other thing to the side.

K: I am not sure.

RE: Ah! Tell me more.

K: Could we begin by discussing what makes us concentrate? Will, desire, an end to achieve, a motive, a direction, a purpose, an intensified desire which is in will, and say, "This I must do, this is necessary", I concentrate and therefore I push aside every other thought that comes in. So I build a wall round myself for a moment. So that is a form of resistance. That is a form of - may I put it differently? - a self-centred attempt to hold something, which then becomes fear.

RE: Yes, I see. It is quite certain, I find, that when you describe that, and the shutting out, I know that that is a prelude to failure. It's the thing that happens before you can't do it.

K: Yes.

RE: So I am interested in the further state of what is the state then in which you are really - we have to use the word concentrate again because it is the language, but perhaps there is another word.

K: There is another word.

RE: Freely open and available for things to come in.

K: There is another word, attention.

RE: Attention, more useful, yes.

K: But that is much more complicated. Not one is available, but to attend.

RE: In attention do you allow yourself to be surprised by things that come in to you?

K: I would like to discuss that a little bit. When one is attending, which means giving all your energy, all your sensitivity, your nervous organism as well, not only hearing, eyes, everything is tremendously alive, in that state of attention there is no centre as the 'me' attending. Therefore there is no fear in that.

RE: Ah, yes.

K: I don't know if I am making myself clear.

RE: I understand absolutely, yes.

K: We have been trained from childhood to concentrate. Teachers say, "Concentrate, don't look out of the window". And so there is a contradiction there, I want to look out of the window, so fear begins. So effort.

RE: So why I started talking about playfulness was entirely in this area. I am interested in that very necessary and fearless attention you may say, which is not unserious but it isn't solemn.

K: Attention is attention.

RE: Is just where it is. You see I am interested in the word 'play' because it happens that professionally all my life, I was a child that never got tired of stories. That has been my burden and my pleasure so I naturally work in a theatre, and I tell stories to myself and others, or I write them. And then the word 'play', of course, happens to be the word given to these events and when I was in India making some films...

K: You saw that statue?

RE: Which?

K: Of Suba playing.

RE: Absolutely. And Lila as play. And I wanted you to talk to me about that because it seems wonderful that the word play should actually be the word to describe the way things are.

K: Dancing, playing football, playing golf and so on - why have those things become important? You play them, you dance. But when we say it is a release, away from concentration. That's what we are doing - work all day in an office, nine to five, or whatever it is, and then go to a bar, drink, distracted, you know, cinema, this, that, the other, so there is tremendous contradiction in this.

RE: None of it is play.

K: None of it is play, it is a distraction. Distraction isn't play.

RE: I have an increasing feeling - I mean I don't give myself programmes for what I am on earth for, but I give myself a little programme just to think that that's my job, it seems to me, is to increase the amount of play. That's one way of putting it. Does that make sense? Increase the possibility in my life, or even in the things which could be drudgery, it is kind of to avoid drudgery, which does mean altering your job.

K: No. Of course not. But suppose if we drop the word distraction, play, for the moment, then what happens?

RE: How do you mean?

K: I have been working in a factory, and it is a terribly tiring, dirty, noisy, smelly job. I come home, or go to a bar, and there I relax, take a drink and so on. Go home in that state of relaxation and the wife begins to quarrel, say something, I get irritated and we clean that up. And in between sex and all that, but I keep that going. So sex becomes a distraction. You follow? The whole thing, the job forces me to distractions - the night club, you know.

RE: Yes, sure. I suppose I can look on areas of my life. I think of myself as very free footed because I move from job to job. In another sense I move from distraction to distraction, I actually move, I go to a situation for comfort - if you take on a new job it feels comfortable temporarily, and then eventually it becomes its own straight jacket and imprisons you, and you have to move from that prison. So I don't know quite - well I know there must be an alternative.

K: You see in all these there is an element of fear. I am not doing my job properly, I drank too much, or too much sex, and I am losing - you follow? So there is this cycle of fear set going.

RE: Now we can't crack that cycle by thinking we can crack that cycle, can we?

K: Do we do anything that we love?

RE: Not much.

K: No.

RE: If anything.

K: If anything. One is forced by circumstances, specialized as a carpenter, or as a scientist, or a writer, you know, all that. So gradually the brain itself becomes very, very narrow, limited. And that limitation itself becomes a bore. Right? And then break that, go and play, beer, sex, night clubs, football.

RE: There is almost a process in each of these things that for the moment of change it is almost as if a whiff of oxygen is given to you, a whiff of extra energy at the moment of change, and then as soon as you get into the next phase, whatever it is, beer or sex, or whatever distraction it may be, it hardens up and oxygen is then drawn away.

K: So is there an energy which is not wasted at all? And therefore no fear.

RE: And can this energy ever be constantly available?

K: It is there.

RE: Is it there?

K: Of course. But I misuse it. I do something which I hate to do. I want to go on a lovely morning like this for a walk but my wife says, let's go to church.

RE: Yes, that's right. Yes. So what are we frightened of then?

K: That is what I wanted to ask. Are we talking of the ending of fear and therefore living - not, playing and not playing?

RE: Do you think we think we will die if we don't have the next diversion?

K: Of course, of course. There is this terrible fear of death.

RE: In many subtle forms.

K: Of course. Sir, I don't know if you want to go into all that.

RE: Please, I do, yes.

K: You see that involves a becoming, not only physical becoming, I am weak but I will get strong, I haven't run so much but I will, you follow, get physically well. And I make tremendous efforts towards that. They are all doing that now, that is the fashion. And has that spilled over into the psychological realm? I don't know if I am conveying it.

RE: Yes, I understand. You mean we are not talking about the fear of death, we are talking about trying to avoid the cycle of life in a way.

K: Yes. Therefore if I am afraid of life... So the whole way of living has become a movement in fear - fear of death, fear of losing a job, fear of my wife or husband, I am not becoming a successful man. You follow? This whole way of living has become step by step leading to the ultimate fear of death.

RE: Yes. Good. That's wonderful. All fear has these roots going back to the fear of death. If fear is to be absent at any moment it is some conquest of death.

K: No. If we understand living, the significance of living, not this perpetual battle, struggle, conflict, I must have, more, better, this constant measurement of myself with somebody else, he is famous so I must become famous, he is on the television, I am not! This terrible sense of poverty. And in the attempt to be rich there is the burden of fear. I may never get rich because there is somebody much richer.

RE: Sure. So in a sense I see these little prisons we inhabit, one by one, these little distractions, are the fact we know as we go into them that they are incomplete, there is something in us that knows that it won't work. So that is the cause of great misery. I mean at least if you go into a place where you think it may be nice you are not deceiving yourself until it becomes nasty. There is something in us that knows that it doesn't work.

K: We know it doesn't work but we go on with it.

RE: Isn't that strange.

K: Like war, we know it is appalling, most wasteful, destructive. I heard the other day, you know when they had the D-day celebrations, twenty thousand young men were killed at the first attack. Twenty thousand! And the politicians pass it over.

RE: The problem is, isn't it, that now if you, for instance, express that you won't watch D-day celebrations, or your pour scorn on the whole think of these memorials, you are considered to be disrespectful to those who died. But it's quite the opposite. I feel it is infuriating.

K: It sounds so monstrous.

RE: What you want to say is, because I loved those who died I don't want to have anything to do with the poppies. For some period of years, when I was making films that had a name religion over them I began to find obviously that religions have frequently been used as temporary havens from fear of death, obviously they have. But one can't just stop there because anything, a house can be a religion in that sense, or a job, or a distraction, so the world isn't quite so tidy, is it? If we could only say the religions are doing it we would feel free. But that isn't the case.

K: So what are we talking about?

RE: Well I am talking about fear of death, I feel. Because I feel it to be pervasive and I can't understand why moment by moment in my life there is some sort of censor or judge.

K: Would you say death is part of play?

RE: Absolutely, in the sense that good death is part of play.

K: What do you mean by 'good death'?

RE: Well I just mean the possibility if you climb a thing and may fall off it and don't care, then there is the possibility of the fall, of the other side of the action. That's what I mean by a 'good death' the other part of the action, is what I mean by good death.

K: Say for example, a very rich man who has got everything in life, writes books, and at the end of it he says, "I have had a jolly good life", and dies. Right? And there are those who are paralysed or maimed and all those terrible cases that are more and more increasing in the world, to them death may be an extraordinary event.

RE: What may be an extraordinary event?

K: The paralysed ones.

RE: Yes.

K: The invalids, the incurables. Are we talking about fear of death, or fear of life which makes us fearful of death?

RE: That's more like it.

K: So why are we afraid of life? What is the cause, what is the reason, the many reasons, that make one fearful of living?

RE: I wish I knew.

K: Let's discuss. One of it is from childhood I am forced to learn, memorize, and I am trained to meet problems. One's brain has been conditioned to solve mathematical problems from childhood, college, university - problems, problems, problems. So the brain is conditioned to problems, and then it meets problems and its resolution of the problem is making the problem more complicated, and in the solution of it increase ten different other problems. That is what the politicians are doing.

RE: I get something quite good. Our education seems as you describe it, to be a series of trial runs, solving problems. But the problem when it arises is not the problems that you have done the trial run on, never.

K: No, therefore what happens?

RE: You apply the rules you have learnt in the hope that they work.

K: They don't work.

RE: And they don't.

K: So that is one of the real problems of human beings, to approach a problem without having problems at all.

RE: Very good. In fact I suppose the way you are taught defines the problem for you. But the problem may be quite, quite different. So you can only solve the problems you have been taught to solve. You can only see as problems things that you have been taught to solve and may be much greater and more terrifying things are killing you.

K: And therefore you approach it with a brain that is trained to problems. Say, I mean, most religious people in the world believe in god. And to reach that godhead you must torture yourself, you must fast, you must undergo every kind of denial - no sex, don't look around you, don't feel anything, control your desires. You follow? And we are conditioned to that. So to reach god I go through all this. And you become a saint.

RE: Isn't it crazy when you come to think of it.

K: That's it.

RE: In Christian scriptures, for instance, there is enormous amount of stuff about people who were outsiders, about the prostitute and so on, but as the religion becomes hardened and is utilized it isn't so, is it?

K: It is crazy! So just let's look at it for a minute. We are afraid of living because then we say, what is the significance of living, the meaning of life. And not finding any we invent - the philosophers comes in, the specialists come in, and the psychologists come in, you follow - we invent. And that invention becomes our security. Then I hold to that. I fight for that, kill for that.

RE: It is like a poison, isn't it?

K: That's it. This is what is happening, sir.

RE: Do you know why I am here actually? One of the reasons - I will tell you a little story that happened. When I came here for the first time there was two hours to wait and I was put in a room and shown video tapes of you. And over two hours I conceived quite a strong dislike for you.

K: Good.

RE: A strong dislike. And then I went with my dislike to have lunch, and a voice behind me said, "You should try the grated carrot, it's very good", and that's was you and we got on fine after that. Now this is the curious thing you see, I was obviously manufacturing, I was education myself in you, I was trying to see what you were about. You see what I mean? I was getting all sorts of notions and the effect of them was deeply depressing. And yet carrots and your presence was fine, I had no problem with that. So I am extremely keen that anything we say to day should not be capable of giving any of that sort of feeling that we have anything of importance. You never know.

K: We are discussing, aren't we, why life has become so meaningless. The tree doesn't ask that question, the tiger doesn't ask that question. Right? It says, "I am living".

RE: So?

K: So sir, if there is no conflict in living I would never ask that question. I don't know if I am conveying anything.

RE: I didn't understand the last sentence.

K: If there is no conflict in one's life, no conflict whatever, you would never ask that question.

RE: The question of the meaninglessness of life.

K: The significance of life.

RE: Because implied in it is an idea of some perfection which you ought to be having.

K: Yes.

RE: Which is another fiction. So we blunder from fiction to fiction.

K: Illusion to illusion, fancied, and so on.

RE: And I suppose the awful truth is that...

K: What makes human beings ask this question? Because in their own life it has no meaning - going to the office from nine o'clock to five o'clock, until you are sixty, responsibilities, house, mortgage, insurance and the conflict in relationships and so on and so on. And at sixty five, seventy, eighty, you pop off. And then you say, what is the meaning of this?

RE: What is it about?

K: Then there is death. And then you say, "I am going to die, I hope I will live next life" - you follow. That whole cycle begins. Hope, despair, depression, fear, I achieved so much this life. What does it mean, coming to the end of it all? I was told of a man who was enormously rich, enormously. His cupboards were filled with gold, paper money of every description, specially Swiss. And he was dying, he said, "As I can't take it with me, keep it all open, keep all the cupboards open so that I can look at them as I am dying". Just think of it.

RE: Wonderful. What a wonderful last thought. I just have a feeling, when you talk about it, death - we know it is the obscenity, we know it is the thing that you may not talk about, the last century it was sex, we can't talk about death this century. I have got a feeling the absence of really living with it, sitting with it, just makes our situation so impossible.

K: I am not sure, sir. After all death means total ending - all the memories, all the experiences, the knowledge, the attachments, the fears, the sorrows, the anxieties. It is like somebody cutting all the thread which you have gathered to pieces, ending. We ought to discuss what is ending. Do we ever end? Or in the ending there is another continuity?

RE: It seems unnecessary. I haven't ever had much sense of starting, or much sense of the time going on, and I have not much sense of my ending either. So I have every reason to believe what is around - am I making sense?

K: Oh, yes. What is ending? That is death. Right? I may believe I shall be born next life.

RE: Death is something observed by somebody else, surely.

K: Not only by somebody else. I want to believe it, it is comforting. I want to believe it. It gives me great comfort to say, at least I have another chance.

RE: I see what you mean.

K: I mean the whole Asiatic world believes in reincarnation. And some of that is accepted here now, books are written, people say, I believe in it, and all the rest of it.

RE: I mean the after life, which is well generally believed, I think, in this country, in this tradition.

K: In the Christian world they believe in a different form, resurrection and so on.

RE: This is a subtle way of keeping you quiet about what is going on now.

K: Yes. So there is death, ending, and there is living. The living has become so - we don't have to go into it, we know it very well. And there is that waiting - not waiting, it is there. We are all going to pop off, die. That's the question. Right? There is an time interval. The time interval may be a hundred years, or five years, or fifty years, it is a time interval. And during that time interval I am living. I am acting, living, suffering, despair, all the rest of it. I haven't solved this problem, this way of living, if there is a way of living in which there is no pain, there is no suffering. And there is also the other, which is the ending of all this. Now if there was no time interval, they go together.

RE: Yes.

K: Therefore which means ending everything everyday.

RE: Yes, yes.

K: Your attachment: this is my school, my... you follow. That makes the brain so small, limited.

RE: But our means of attachment are so extraordinary. I mean one can congratulate oneself on getting rid of attachment A while B - Z line up to take over.

K: Yes, sir.

RE: It is an extraordinary killing problem.

K: So is it possible to live that way?

RE: What do you think?

K: Oh yes, I think so. That is the only way to live otherwise you go through hell.

RE: Sure.

K: So that life is not - or rather life contains death, living is death. So everyday what you have collected, put it aside. If I am attached to this house, I know death says, "Old boy, you can't, it is the end of you", so I say, "All right, I will be free of attachment to this house." Be not attached.

RE: Unattached, yes.

K: You are completely free of it.

RE: And yet use it. This is the problem, non-attachment can frequently go into forms of resistance.

K: So I am living in this house, I am responsible for this house, I am responsible for what is happening here, but also I am going to die. So while I am living that day I am fully responsible.

RE: And you are not responsible for the day when you are not here.

K: Yes.

RE: There must be something in us that thinks that life will hurt if we live it.

K: Life hurts?

RE: If we live it. We must have a feeling - you see while the mind will say, oh yes, I know that it is stupid to believe in whatever it is, relationships, or drink, or the job, or whatever it is, to be a little haven, while the mind is saying that it must also subtly, with a quiet voice be saying, the alternative is more terrifying.

K: Yes. You see that's why one has to enquire, is there a becoming and therefore the ending of becoming is fear.

RE: The ending of becoming is fear - yes.

K: And is there psychological becoming at all? But there is a becoming in the world. I mean one is apprenticed to a master carpenter and you gradually work with him until you become as good as he is.

RE: Sure.

K: That same attitude, or that same activity is spilled over, or extended into the other field, the psychological, the inner field, I must become something. If I don't I am lost, I am failure, I am depressed, look you have become something, I am nobody.

RE: That implies somehow that the later stage is preferable to the earlier, that the master is preferable to the apprentice. I have a sort of feeling that the people I admire as well as having their calendar age have also stuck at another age. The people I really like are about three years old.

K: Children.

RE: Yes, but also people who have got that curious sort of wide eyed thing. I am always a bit suspicious at the thought of building up to anything, or a growth to something. I have a feeling that it has already been neglected. Does that make sense, that it has already been here - reclaiming one's childhood, in some way. And any way that one tries to device to break out of one's little prisons, whatever it is, because it is an idea, because it is an idea has the fear written into itself as an idea.

K: Quite. So idea becomes fear.

RE: That's right. So the idea of liberation is fear. So we wait.

K: No.

RE: What do we do then?

K: Whether it is possible to end fear.

RE: To end fear.

K: To end fear.

RE: Yes.

K: Not of a particular fear, but end fear, the whole tree of fear.

And we are trying to trim the fears.

RE: What is the axe? How do you get at it?

K: I'll show you. We will go into it. What is time?

RE: What is time.

K: Not by the watch, the clock, sun rising, sun setting.

RE: I think I can only understand time from something that is past.

K: Sir, you have said it. So time is that which has happened yesterday.

RE: That gives me the idea of time.

K: Yes. That which has happened yesterday, or a thousand yesterdays, or forty five thousand years that man has supposed to have been on earth, that is the whole duration of forty five thousand years, which is in the present.

RE: Our thought is in the present and everything we know of it is in the present.

K: Yes, all that is in the present. And the future is the present.

RE: We assume there is going to be one and we make it into a projection.

K: The future, tomorrow.

RE: Yes, sure, you can't have it tomorrow, you have got to have now.

K: No, no. The past, as we say, is now, in the present.

RE: That is how we must take it, yes.

K: That's so, an actuality.

RE: Sure.

K: I remember meeting you last year, so there is that duration of time, the recognition, if I recognize it, and the future is the same as now because I will meet you again next year and say, "Hello, old boy". So the future is also now. So the present contains the past, the present and the future. So there is no future. I don't know if you see this.

RE: Yes, I do see what you mean.

K: The future is what you are now.

RE: It is amazing how we inhabit this future, this invented future with ill possibilities, and lord knows what. Yes.

K: So the future is now. And if there is no breaking down of the 'me' now I will be tomorrow exactly the same. So one questions, I question whether there is any psychological evolution at all. You understand?

RE: Yes, I do.

K: There isn't any.

RE: There doesn't seem to be able to be, except some fiction, again that somebody has invented in observing you.

K: So I see for me there is no 'more' or 'better'. The better is future. Better is measurement, what I should be. And so what I should be is an avoidance of what I am. So that creates a conflict. So if I see actually, not theoretically or sentimentally, the actual fact that the whole of time is now and therefore there is no becoming, no ideal to be reached.

RE: That is such a radical thought. The feeling about it that one has kind of heard it, it is not an unfamiliar thought but it is desperately unfamiliar, it challenging everything that one lives by. Tell me about this axe as well.

K: I am coming to that.

RE: Because I want to take it away!

K: Sir, what is change? If I change according to the future ideal, that ideal is projected by thought, in which is also implied time, thought is time. So if one really grasps the depth of this statement, or the feeling of time is all now, and so therefore there is no tomorrow, in the sense, I will be something tomorrow. So there is an ending to conflict.

RE: Yes.

K: Which is an enormous factor. We have accepted conflict as a way of life. There is no conflict at all. That is, I have to understand change, I am this but if I don't change I will be exactly tomorrow what I am now. So what is change? Is there psychological change at all? I don't know if you understand?

RE: Yes.

K: Or only 'what is', and the giving attention to 'what is' is the ending of 'what is'.

RE: Yes.

K: But one can't give total attention to 'what is' when you have got an ideal.

RE: That's right.

K: I was asked to speak at the United Nations. It is a contradiction in terms, United Nations, first of all. And they say we must gather together, become friends, and all that blah, and it does not take place. Because the principle is wrong - my country and your country, my god and your god. The Russians have their ideal and... So if one really realizes, feels the depth of this all time is now, the whole, it is like a light that changes.

RE: When you say, all time is now, is 'now' always joyous?

K: What?

RE: Is 'now' always happy?

K: Don't use the word happy.

RE: All right. You see...

K: Why should it be happy?

RE: Quite. That's my point.

K: Why should it be anything?

RE: Anything. Indeed.

K: You know sir, there is something which we should go into, if we have time. What is to be nothing? Because we want to be something. The wanting is a sense of lacking. I haven't got a good house, I want a better house. I don't know all the knowledge in books, I must read. So there is this tremendous craving. And what is the craving for? I am not a philosopher.

RE: No, no, I know.

K: To me, what are we craving for? We want peace. We crave for peace, and we live violently.

RE: We always look for the sources of the violence outside ourselves.

K: That's it. And therefore we say, non-violence. While a human being is violent, living violently, fighting, quarrelling, in conflict, and he is working for peace.

RE: I'll tell you actually where my happy came in - I wasn't really talking about happy in the sense that I think would cause a problem. It was just that I remember there was a thing at a big exhibition at Olympia, Mind, Spirit and something or other. And there were many little booths with various religious persuasions, and they were all smiling. And they were selling this sort of smile, this 'blissed out' quality - you know. And I ached to have one booth where everybody in it had a splitting headache! I just wanted to go to them and be there. Not because it was either bad or good, but also one mustn't be kind of... there is very great difficulty. I mean anything you say can so easily be associated with extremely destructive thoughts too.

K: Quite.

RE: I mean this is your burden.

K: So sir, the word change implies, I am this, I must be that. We are conditioned from childhood to that.

RE: To expect.

K: So heavily conditioned. I see a small car, I must have a bigger car. I see you on the television, and by god, why am I not there?!

RE: We should be there together, you see.

K: You know this tremendous craving, not just for publicity, but the inner craving for god, for illumination, for living a right life, that we must all be together. Why do we have such craving?

RE: I don't know. There is a great unlovedness about it, the feeling of actually that you are not loved, and that possibly the larger car will put its arms round you in a way that the smaller car doesn't, will make up for it. It is a displaced feeling, of lack of affection, I would have thought.

K: Partly. Is it in oneself the sense of insufficiency? I am not loved.

RE: That feels to me very real.

K: I am not loved. I am not loved by that woman or by that man. And I must be loved by that man, or by that woman. But that leads to another very complex question: what is love?

RE: I would tend to say, possessiveness.

K: Of course it is. Attachment, possessiveness, jealousy, sexual pleasure, desire for more.

RE: It is also self love.

K: We call all that area love. Some person said to me, how can there be love without jealousy?! Which means without hate - you follow.

RE: Yes, true. Well in a sense of possession there can't.

K: And therefore one asks: what is the relationship between love and death?

RE: Love in the sense we are talking about?

K: Possession, all that, the whole idea, in that one word so many things are contained.

RE: But if you say, perfect love casteth out fear, it is not perfect, is it?

K: No, I don't know.

RE: Exactly, I know, I know, it's a killer!

K: If you ask that question, sir, what is love, and what is that state of love with death? - the love in the ordinary sense of that word. Is there any relationship at all? And if it has a relationship how does that show itself? How does that manifest itself?

RE: I can see love in the sense we are talking about it as a series of faulty insurance schemes against death, where the insurance house is really bound to collapse. But you still take out the insurance.

K: First of all we never ask that question.

RE: The connection between death and love, no. As we are plunging into love we certainly don't.

K: Now if you ask that question, I put to you that question, if I may, what is your response to it?

RE: The connection?

K: Yes, what is the connection, what is relationship? Is there any relationship? If there is, what is its nature?

RE: Well it feels like an attempt to ward it off, to have it not happen. Possession in the terms we are talking about, it is an attempt to have a permanence where there can be no permanence. Therefore it is an attempt to contradict the fact that things die.

K: That's it. Death is impermanent.

RE: Death is impermanent. Death is a permanent word to describe an impermanent happening.

K: Death is impermanent. And possessiveness, hoping for permanence.

RE: Absolutely. An attempt to make it go on for ever.

K: To go on for ever, yes.

RE: It is curious how love poetry, at least cheap love poetry, has always got a doing everything for ever. Good love poetry is usually about things collapsing.

K: What is the relationship? What is the relationship between darkness and light?

RE: You can't have one without the other.

K: No. To ask that... but I am asking the relationship between the two.

RE: Could you tell me?

K: That is, darkness, we know when there is no moonlight, no stars, nothing, dark in a forest. I have been like that. Dark, absolute impenetrable darkness. And the sun comes up and everything is light. What is the relationship between that and that?

RE: You tell me.

K: I don't think there is any.

RE: Really?

K: Light is light. Let me put it the other way. What is the relationship between good and bad? Is there a relationship at all?

RE: Before we do good and bad if I could do dark and light. If I am asked to describe something, if I am asked to describe it then I do need the presence of one before I can do the other. For instance if I am describing this forest in which I can't see a tree, that's darkness, then of course when the light comes up the trees become visible.

K: So you are judging light and darkness according to your perception.

RE: Yes. That's right.

K: That's obvious.

RE: Yes, that's right. But it is only when I have to come to describe it that the relationship exists because of that.

K: But move a little further, deeper. What is the relationship between that which is good, and that which is so-called evil, or bad? Is the good born out of the bad? Because I know what is bad, or experience that which is painful, bad and all the rest of it, and so I am moving, or trying to get away from the bad to the good.

RE: I would use good or bad to describe very temporary things.

K: No, is good temporary? That which is good, that which is beautiful, it is not temporary.

RE: Why not?

K: I'll show it. Let's look at it for a minute. If the good, or any other word you like to use, is the outcome of the bad, has its roots in the bad, then it is not good, it is part of the bad. So every opposite has its roots in its own opposite.

RE: Good. I get that.

K: So is there a good which is not born out of the bad?

RE: Not something that I could give that word to. I couldn't give that word to it because we have already used it.

K: Give another word, it doesn't matter. It is a good old fashioned word, the good, the beautiful, the true. Now I question altogether whether there is an opposite at all.

RE: To good?

K: To opposite.

RE: To any opposite?

K: Any opposite. Of course there is man, woman, tall, short. I am not talking about that.

RE: These are conveniences.

K: Yes. Apart from the conveniences, is there something so absolute and not related to the relevant?

RE: I would be always conditional myself about handling it. I couldn't do it in any way. I would be very frightened of people who do because they become murderers.

K: No, no, on the contrary.

RE: What do you mean?

K: I mean the freedom of goodness, not the misuse of freedom. The misuse of freedom is what is happening in the world. But freedom is good, it has the goodness quality in it. I don't like to use the word moral, virtue, that has no meaning, but that sense of depth in it.

RE: We are somehow alongside fear again, and absence of fear.

K: That's what - of course. That's why we said, is it possible to be free of fear totally? Not what might happen, of which I might be afraid, or that which has happened of which I am afraid, but these two elements, the past and the future, is now. Right? So can the now, which is fear, be completely wiped away?

RE: Always the presence of now, as you would handle it, is dependent on having these fictions of past and future with one.

K: That's right.

RE: So even to talk about now is risky.

K: But one has to use that word present, now. You are sitting there, I am sitting here, that's now.

RE: But you have got to get the scalpel further.

K: Of course, of course. I mean you have to have a little bit of subtlety in this.

RE: Yes, that's right. But the fear remains until the knife has gone much further.

K: That's it.

RE: Than now.

K: Of course. So what is fear? Not theoretically, actually in one's heart, in one's brain, what is fear, how does it come? What is the source of it, the root of it, the beginning of it?

RE: Roughly, off the top of my head, it is a feeling of not being in the right place, of not feeling where you should be. An 'ought' is involved in fear, the ought to be.

K: We have said that. The ought to be, I ought to be.

RE: Yes, we are talking about another fear.

K: Fear. All this is fear. What is the root of it? We said fear is like a vast tree. There is a marvellous tree here, an oak, it covers the ground, an acre. Now our fear is like that. But the root of that oak is there, in the centre, the branches are enormous.

RE: What is the root? How would you describe the root? Or are you asking me to describe it?

K: Not describe. The fact of it is time and thought.

RE: We can play with thought.

K: No, time and thought are the root of fear. We are trying to understand whether it is possible to be free of fear, totally, completely, psychologically we are talking about. And the root of that, the beginning from which the oak tree grows, becomes enormous, the root of it is time and thought - time being, I will be, if I am not I am frightened. Thought says, "I have been, and my god, I hope I will be".

RE: Is there a sort of fear that is not connected with thought? Or is all fear connected with thought?

K: It is all connected with thought.

RE: All connected with thought.

K: Of course.

RE: If suddenly something happens to you which terrifies the organism...

K: At that second there is no fear. Then thought comes in.

RE: The intervention of thought, however rapidly, beyond the speed of light, and then the reactive fear. Yes. Yes.

K: Then the question arises: can thought in certain areas be active, writing a letter and so on, talking, active, fully active, and in other areas not at all, which is in the psychological world, not at all?

RE: Discursive thought I have never understood at all. I have never had any feeling for actually even putting sentences together. I have always felt that things that have ever made sense to me have always come like that, sudden flashes of things.

K: Our thought is linear.

RE: Well we are trained in a linear way, but I have never felt comfortable.

K: We are trained, like the Chinese, it is still linear.

RE: Yes. It is still linear. That's the schooling, isn't it, that's where you pass or fail your exams.

K: Thinking is a series of connections, associations, always.

RE: So you are running a school based on thought to stop thinking.

K: No. Thought is necessary in certain areas, absolutely. That requires a great deal of attention, a great deal of knowledge, a great deal of capacity, skill, and ingenuity, invention. And is it that same activity has spilled over, extended into the other area?

RE: Very good, that's excellent. To know where it is useful, to have it as a useful tool.

K: Of course. If I understand, really see the depth of it, the seriousness of it, then I would question why is it that thought is always moving, active, in the psychological world. In the psychological world is the 'me' - my consciousness, my failure, my success, my reputation, my 'I must be', 'I must not be', my faith, my belief, my dogma, my religious attitude, politics, fear, pain, pleasure, suffering, all that is me. All that is memory. So all that is memory, me is memory.

RE: And the 'me', if you are brought up like a lot of us in this country...

K: All over the world.

RE: All over the world may be, in a sort of Bunyan tradition of you hold your own, you are responsible for yourself, I mean there is an element again in which that makes sense. There is also an element again in which it is quite, quite destructive. I remember hearing, somebody told me a story, I think in Japan, they said it was a possible way of life, a man running away from his own shadow, who then realized that all he had to do was to hop under a tree and the shadow disappeared. And I remember feeling immediately very methodistical about that, you may not get away from your shadow. But obviously you may and must.

K: So thought and time are the root of fear, why does thought come into this area, the realm of the psyche?

RE: I wonder. It appears to stop danger. When you have a thought it is like asbestos to hold something hot, you have the illusion that with the thought you can control something which in an uncontrolled state might be overwhelming.

K: That is, there is the thinker who holds something hot and the thought that says, don't hold it.

RE: Yes. Beware.

K: So there are two separate entities. The thinker and the object of which you think. Now what is the thinker?

RE: A thought.

K: Right. Thought says, I am the thinker separate from...

RE: Yes.

K: But to realize the observer, the thinker, the experiencer, is the experience, is the object, are one, they are not separate, sir that means a tremendous revolution, inwardly, psychologically. Which means when there is no division, there is no conflict, there is only that fact. And when you give attention to the fact the fact is burnt away. But thought is kept to plant a tree, bring that flower into being.

RE: That makes sense, yes.

K: So if you give attention to that then that will never create problems.

RE: Yes, I understand. You see everything we are saying is bringing something to a T junction. Because we can't conceive, it is uncomfortable for us to think that you have to shed various ways of handling this.

K: The other day somebody said, you have to burn your icons.

RE: Burn you icons, indeed. Yes. And that's uncomfortable, and there is no way past it.

K: So when you burn your icons, death is - you understand?

RE: Yes.

K: And also sir, I don't know if you have gone into this, not theoretically but actually, what is creation then? Not invention, I am not talking about invention. Invention is born out of knowledge, the scientist can invent more atom bombs, or something new, but it is always born out of knowledge.

RE: What is creation in what sense?

K: Creation which is not born out of knowledge. Because knowledge is limited.

RE: Limited, yes indeed.

K: Now or in the future.

RE: And it is pre-limited.

K: It is limited. If creation is born of knowledge it is not creation, it is invention, it is all kinds of things.

RE: Certainly even in whatever I have done, in my humdrum way, there have been odd moments, writing something where certainly it was not any form of pre-knowledge which created it. My boundaries seemed to be almost illusory, and that I was not as confined for some reason, and then something else was fed in, and then you write something or you do something which has a muscle which is not yours.

K: No, let's be clear. Must creation always be expressed? You understand?

RE: Sorry?

K: Must it always be expressed? Put into writing, in a sculpture, in painting - you follow?

RE: Yes. I don't see why it should at all have to be expressed.

K: So if both of us see the fact that creation cannot be born out of knowledge...

RE: Yes, for sure.

K: Born out of knowledge is vast invention, of various kinds, at various levels and so on, and so on. But is there a state of mind, brain, or mind, where knowledge is not?

RE: Where creation is?

K: Where creation is. You understand what we are saying? It is dangerous!

RE: Well I think there must be - I am sure there is. Well why should one have to write it, that seems awfully...

K: I mean, I don't know, first of all, am I, who have been writing, talking, or inventing, and call my invention creation, I paint a picture and say it is a marvellous creation. Leonardo paints something and I say, "What a marvellous creation that is". We have used that word both as an invention and also...

RE: We do, it is an end stop, a product.

K: A product.

RE: We use it as a product. Thus when you get sketches by say a master, because we may as well use their example, a sketch, an incomplete thing, part of a process, somehow makes you tingle in a way that may be the finished thing doesn't.

K: Of course, of course.

RE: The patron, the man who has paid for the picture, somehow comes into it, frequently at the stage when it has to be completed. Whereas the energy, whatever was going on in the making of it, didn't have to push it to that conclusion, and it is present in an early stage.

K: You see this has been one of the questions that have been asked by the most ancient people, that is, is there a state of mind, brain, mind, where knowledge ends? Though it is useful in other directions, don't let's confuse. Complete ending of it, then only there is something new. And that thing is creation. That is creation.

You understand?

RE: The end of knowledge is creation itself, yes.

K: That requires not a discipline of conformity but tremendous alertness involved in it, a sense of deep watchfulness that the other doesn't slip in.

RE: You have to shed everything then. You wouldn't be who you are. It is a scary thought.

K: We had better stop because it is a quarter to one.

RE: Yes, we have done well. Thank you very much indeed.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 25TH AUGUST 1984

Good Lord there are so many people, aren't there?

There are going to be four talks and a couple of question and answer meetings during these ten days. I would like to remind you, if I may, that this is not an entertainment. It is not something you come for a day, or spend an hour, listening to some talk, or talks and questions, but rather this is a very, very serious affair. And if you have come here out of curiosity, or because you have seen something on the TV and you feel like listening to this chap, that isn't good enough. You are here at a Gathering of very serious people, at least one hopes so. And we are not trying in any way to convince you of anything, of any new theories, new conclusions, new concepts or ideals. To the speaker all those things are really an abomination, they have no meaning in daily life. And this is not something popular. Popularity is the last thing that is desired. What is important, it seems to us, is that we consider together both objectively and subjectively all the problems, all the conflicts, struggles, pains, sorrow, fear and so on while we are here during these talks and question and answers. Please bear in mind that if one may remind you, and we shall keep on reminding you, that the speaker has no authority as a person. This is not a personality cult, or something that you agree or disagree. Because we have to exercise our brains, reason, logic, sanity. Not say, "I like you therefore I agree with you", or, "You are some strange person therefore I disagree with you", but rather that we are going to think over together. Not agree, or disagree but observe together the whole phenomenon of existence, our daily life, our way of living, our thoughts or emotions or reactions.

And to enquire deeply into the whole process of living, what is happening outwardly in the world, objectively, and what is happening inwardly, subjectively. That is psychologically, or if you do not like that word subjective, or psychological state, inside the skin, not the bones and the blood and sinews and so on but the whole unexplored, by each one of us, though specialists may have explored it superficially. But together, and the speaker means together, not that he is going to talk and put forth certain ideas but rather together we are going to observe these extraordinary events in our life, the conflicts, the many, many human problems, the problems of relationship, why human beings get hurt, psychologically wounded. But we are also going to talk over together the whole question of fear: whether it is possible ever to be free of fear, first, not outwardly, objectively, but subjectively, inwardly, to be entirely free of fear. And we are going to talk over together the question of pleasure which human beings in different ways pursue. And also the enormous burden of sorrow, not only of one's own but the sorrow of humankind.

And also we are going to talk over together the question of religion. Not that which is organized, not that which you believe in, or don't believe in but the question of what is religion, what is the state of the brain that is free and is able to perceive that which is sacred, true. And also we are going to talk over together, death, which is the lot of every human being in the world. That is one thing that is absolutely certain. And also we are going to talk over together meditation and so on.

So we are concerned with the whole of life, not one aspect of it. Nor one particular form but the whole of our existence on this earth. And we will also talk over together what is beauty. If there is no beauty there is no truth. Not only the beauty externally, environmentally, but also the sense of what is really beautiful. So we are going together, without any kind of persuasion or enticement, or reward or punishment, think together, observe together, take a very long journey into ourselves, long journey objectively in the world and also subjectively, inwardly. And to do this very carefully and minutely, precisely there must be the quality of doubt, scepticism, questioning, never accepting anything, neither one's own experience or another's or any philosophical, theoretical, ideological concept. If we are prepared for this, each one of us, then we see for ourselves how important it is, how serious it is, not something one comes for a weekend, and it is a long holiday I believe, Bank Holiday, but rather we give our energies and we have leisure. At least for an hour or two this morning. And talk over together these problems.

Which means: one must put aside for the time being, if you will, or completely, one's own prejudices, one's own bias, one's own obstinate or light opinions because they distort, prevent, block when the accurate perception is to take place. Can we go together on this journey? Not with tremendous effort, but rather hesitantly, tentatively, not following anybody. There is no guru and all that nonsense. In so-called psychological, subjective matters there is no authority. Either the authority of one's own experience, the authority of one's own knowledge, and all knowledge is limited. We will go into all this. Or obeying some concept. All this prevents naturally clear perception. Is this possible at all? To be free of one's own conclusions, the concepts and images that one has built for oneself as a guide, or some ideals projected by thought in opposition or with the connivance of the present so the brain becomes very clear, active so that we can observe, think and take this exploration into the world outside and into ourselves.

That is the concern, the - of all these talks and question and answers. There is no authority in this matter. Each one of us is responsible for his actions, for his thoughts, for the way he lives and so on. And if we want to blame others, or the environment or the society, the society is what we have made of it, the social structure is what human beings have put together through centuries. Through their ambitions, through their competition, their aggressiveness, their fear, their pleasure and so on. So the society in which we live is corrupt, preparing for wars, is the consequence, the result of the way we live, the way we think and feel and so on.

In considering all this, are we wasting our life? The wastage is conflict. The conflict in which we live perpetually from the moment we are born until we die. That is a fact. And human beings have never been able to solve their problems. Which is a very complex affair, whether human beings throughout the world, including all of us here, can ever be free from every kind of conflict. Or is it natural for human beings, both historically and actually, that we must live not only in inward conflict but also externally through perpetual wars, killing each other. Perhaps in the old days five or six thousand people were killed; now you can vaporize a million human beings with one bomb. And this is called progress. And every nation in the world is gathering armaments, of which you all know, supplied by this contract - 80% of it goes abroad, for armaments, America, Russia, Germany and so on.

We have accepted this as a natural way of life: conflict, butchery, maiming each other, terrorism, and all that is happening in the world. And apparently we don't seem to mind. We say everything is in struggle, nature. There is struggle in nature, conflict, killing - the tiger, the deer and so on, so it is natural for human beings to kill each other, though their religion, their so-called religion, their belief says live peacefully, love one another, which has been said thousands and thousands of years before, not just Christianity. Christianity has killed probably more people than any other religious organization.

So we have accepted as natural, inevitable, conflict. Conflict between each other - man, woman. And one asks through all this long fifty thousand years of evolution we are now at the apex of so-called sophisticated human beings, is this natural, is this inevitable? That we must live in conflict - right?

Can we go into this together? And see if we can really deeply understand it, not verbally or intellectually, but see the fact, the fact that one is in conflict. And whether it can possibly end. What is conflict? Do ideals bring about conflict? Do every form of the future and the present, are they responsible for our conflict. The future one does not know and the present is the past. The past is in conflict with the present. And with the future. I hope one is following all this. Is conflict the duality of like and dislike, the good and the bad, what should be and what is. Does conflict arise from these factors? It is an obvious fact if one is at all serious and aware that one lives in conflict. From childhood, the long years or short years of one's existence, conflict seems to be one of the major factors of life. Unless one discovers for oneself the causation of this conflict, merely trimming the outward expressions of conflict will have very little significance. What is the cause of conflict? Wherever there is a cause with its effect, when the cause is understood deeply, not merely verbally, theoretically or intellectually, but as a fact in one's life, understand it profoundly then the cause can come to an end. And therefore conflict can come to an end.

So we are together going to find out what is the cause of conflict. The cause, the root of it. And of course if you admit that conflict is inevitable, it is natural for human beings for the last millenia have lived in conflict, so why shouldn't we also? That kind of argument is rather, if I may say, is rather silly and inept. But if one could go into it, examine, perceive, have an insight into the causation of conflict and then perhaps that will end. The - to discover the cause it is not a process of analysis. Analysis implies, doesn't it, the analyser and the analysed. Right? The one who says, "I must find the cause of this conflict" and then he begins to investigate as though it were something outside of him, then he analyses that. Is not the analyser the analysed? Please go into this a little bit if you will.

We are asking: is not the analyser - or put it differently: is the analyser different from that which he analyses? Who is the analyser? Apart from the professional psychologist, psychiatrist and so on, in this, what we are doing now, is to understand the causation of conflict. Is that conflict, the cause, is that to be analysed? Then if you are analysing the cause, then who is the analyser? Right? Is the analyser different from that which he analyses? Do you understand my question? Am I talking to myself? Are you really interested in all this?

Audience: Yes.

K: Don't please, don't encourage the speaker. He is not worth it. (Laughter) Are you really interested in all this?

Audience: Yes.

K: No, please, this is very serious, you understand. It is not just something for an hour. It is your life. It is your way of living, the whole question of love, tenderness, care, affection, all that is involved in this. It isn't just agreement with the speaker which becomes rather absurd. If you are really deeply interested in this, which is to find out for oneself, not from the speaker, but for oneself, to find out the cause of conflict. And when there is the discovery of the cause then the effect disappears because all - any cause can be changed. If one has a toothache or a headache it has a cause. And when you find the cause that disease disappears. Similarly if we can find out the cause, or the causes of why we live in perpetual conflict, and to delve deeply into that it is not a process of analysis because analysis implies a division between the analyser and the analysed. And therefore in that process of analysis there is still conflict. I hope you understand all this. But if we could observe the fact, or come upon the fact of the cause, which demands attention, care, deep urge to find out, passion to step out of this conflict, that requires energy. And analysis is a process of wastage of energy.

So is it possible to observe clearly, perceive, have an insight into the causation of conflict? If we can find out the causation then this thing disappears altogether, the effect which is conflict.

So we are trying - asking - not trying - we are asking is the cause thought? Thought itself. Let me first - I am putting - the speaker is putting out these things, don't agree or disagree, we are going to examine. Is the cause this sense of duality we have, division between what I am, what I should be? The 'should be' is a projection of thought. That is one does not like the way one is living, or it is painful, therefore one projects a concept of a better way of living, an ideal, and conforming oneself to that ideal, and therefore conflict. The actual and the ideal. Is that the cause - one of the causes of conflict? Which means we never face actually what is - right? Always moving away or escaping, from actually observing the actuality, the pettiness of our life, the idiosyncrasies and so on.

To observe without any prejudices, opinion, without the background of one's own culture, conditioning. Is that possible? Or is it given only to the few, to the elite and therefore it is not something that each person can be free of? Do you understand all these questions?

So is one of the causes of conflict, is it time? Which is the future, the present and the past. Do you understand? All right? Are we going together a little bit at least? That is, the past, all our experience, knowledge, tradition, all the things we have learnt, which is knowledge, all that background which is the past, the tradition, which is acting now, which is the present, and the future will be what we are now. Right? Tomorrow is what I am today, modified perhaps slightly on the edges, on the frill, but tomorrow will be what I am actually now. And of course unless there is a radical change tomorrow then is totally different. That is, all time is contained in the present. The past, the present and the future. All that is now - right? So future is now. The tomorrow is now. And is thought one of the factors of conflict? Right? We are examining, we are looking into it, we are not stating a dogmatic statement. We are asking whether thought, the whole process of thinking, is that one of the basic causes of conflict, which is also war ultimately? Right? Therefore one has to enquire, as we did, into what is time. Time is the past, the present and the future. It is a continuous series of movements associated. So that time is the past, the present and the future. And that time is contained in the now. Is that one of the factors of conflict? Time?

And also we are asking: is thought, the whole process of thinking, both objectively and subjectively, thinking, is that also one of the major causes of conflict? And to go into that we have to ask: what is thinking? We spend our days and nights and years in thinking. All our actions are based on thinking. In our relationship with each other thinking plays an immense part. Thinking is part of recognition, knowledge. Thinking has done extraordinary things objectively, from the latest bomb, the atom bomb, to the most complicated ceramic structure, the great battleships, submarines, computers. And also thinking has given mankind great medicines, surgery and so on.

So we have to enquire: what is thinking? When the question is asked: what is thinking? - are you thinking or listening to the question, what is thinking, and observe thinking? You have understood? No. Someone is asking you: what is thinking? Do you immediately find what is thinking, work at it, or enquire, search, or do you listen to the question - you understand? Listen, which means there must be a quality of silence when you are listening - right?

We are asking: what is thinking? Probably you have never asked this question of yourself. Or perhaps the professionals have not written about it. Perhaps you are used to being told by the professionals what is thinking and then you will repeat. But that is not - that prevents enquiry into what is thinking, you are just merely repeating, that is not thinking. So what is thinking? What is the origin of thought? The thought that has put man on the moon, the thought that has divided the world into nationalities, the thought that has made wars, the thought between you and your wife, and husband, girl, boy and so on, what is this enormous energy of thought? Is not thinking a process of the - or a process of memory? Right? Process of memory. Memory is stored in the brain, memory comes with knowledge, knowledge is based on experience - right? All scientific knowledge is based on experiment, theories, hypothesis, knowledge. Always adding more and more and more. In any field, whether it be in the mathematical world, biological or aerodynamics and so on, in every field knowledge is based on experience. When there is knowledge it is being added all the time, accumulated, therefore experience is limited, so knowledge is limited - right? Both now and in the future. Because knowledge is always limited. And so memory is limited, and thus thought is limited. Anything that is limited must cause conflict - right? If one is thinking about oneself from morning until night, as most people do, their worries, their problems, their like and dislike, they are perpetually concerned with their own self, that is a very, very limited way of living and therefore that which is limited must inevitably cause conflict. When Britain says, "We are British", it is very limited and therefore they are perpetually at war, they have lost empires - you know all that business. France is limited, and so every country wanting security creates boundaries of thought, culture, then language and therefore it is limited. So every form of limitation must inevitably cause conflict. And one finds security in this limitation - right? Because the brain is seeking all the time in some form of security, whether the security is illusory or actual. And most of us want security, in some form of illusion. These are facts. And so thought being always limited, it can think expansively, it can imagine the limitless horizon, limitless universe, but because it thinks, it imagines, therefore that is limited.

So wherever there is a limitation there must be war, there must be conflict because that limitation divides, separates. Are we together in this, a little bit at least? So when you see that will you cease to be British, will you cease to be German, French, Indian, and all that nonsense? Because then your brain is extraordinarily free from limitations and it has got tremendous energy then. So limitation is the wastage of life. You understand this? When one is thinking about oneself, that is how to meditate, how to become religious, how to be happy, how to be... you know. How to be free of problems, which is all thinking about oneself. That thinking about oneself is very limited and therefore in our relationship there is always conflict. Therefore thought and time we said is the causation of one of the major reasons of conflict. If one understands that deeply, not verbally, not merely repeating something somebody has said but actually your own perception, seeing the truth of it, that very perception frees the brain from conflict.

Then the question arises from that: is it possible in our relationship with each other, man, woman, boy and girl, you know, all the rest of it, can we live in a relationship in which there is no shadow of conflict? Are you getting tired? Can we go on?

To understand that, we have to examine actually what our relationships are, actually, not what we think should be. The actual fact of our relationship with another, whether it be a man or woman, man and man, and so on, what is your relationship? We cannot possibly exist by ourselves. One may go to a monastery, or go off to some Asiatic country, including India and disappear into the mountains in search of some truth, or some guru, all that business, nonsense. One cannot live on earth without relationship. Relationship is the most important thing in life. And in that relationship there is conflict, marriage or no marriage, divorce and no divorce, the whole thing. And in that relationship what is actually taking place? - apart from sexual demands of each other, are we using each other? Exploiting each other, trying to fulfil our own desires, our own urges in each other? And what is the relationship of this conflict with love? In relationship? Can the two exist together? Can jealousy, antagonism, each one pursuing his own way, each one pursuing his ambitions, his fulfilments, his urges? And sexually meeting and having children, but the conflict goes on. And in relationship can there be an end to all this?

So what - again what is the cause of this conflict in relationship? Is it desire? Is it the obsession of possessing each other, depending on each other, "I can't live without him or her"? And so this dependence implies possession, possessiveness, and where there is possessiveness there is weakness - right?

Is the speaker telling a fairy story? Or is he describing, or stating facts? And those facts are: there is no love. One may talk about love, "Oh I love her so much" - you know all that business very well. And in that there is dependence, attachment, fear, antagonism, gradually jealousy - you follow? - the whole machinery of human relationship with all its agony, fear, loss, gain, despair, depression, you know all this. Don't you know all this? How extraordinarily silent you are when it comes to actual facts. And how can all this end so that we have real relationship with each other, between man and woman. Is it knowledge of each other? Do look at it, please consider it. I know my wife, which is what? When you say, "I know her, she is my wife", what does that mean? Or it is my girl friend, or whatever it is, actually. Is it all the pleasure, the pain, the anxiety, the jealousy, the struggle with occasional flashes of tenderness. Is all that part of love? Is attachment love? Sir, I am asking these questions, go into it, find out Sirs. One is attached to one's wife, tremendous attachment. What is implied in that attachment? One cannot stand by oneself, therefore I must depend on somebody, whether it is a husband or some psychiatrist, or some - you know, guru, and all that tommy rot! Where there is attachment there is fear of loss. Where there is attachment there is a sense of deep possessiveness and therefore it breeds fear, you know all this.

So can we look at the fact of our relationship and discover for ourselves the place of thought in relationship. As we said, thought is limited, which is a fact. And if in our relationship thought plays a prominent factor, then in that relationship, that factor is limiting, so our relationship with each other is limited and therefore inevitably must breed conflict. There is the conflict between the Arab and the Israeli, because each is clinging to his own conditioning, which is, he is being programmed, each human being is programmed like a computer. I know it sounds cruel but it is a fact. When one is told that you are an Indian, from childhood, belonging to a certain type, or certain category socially, religiously, and you are conditioned, and for the rest of one's life one is an Indian, or British, or French, or German, or whatever it is. Would you like to be included Russia in this? Yes. So there it is.

So our relationship which should be the most extraordinary thing in life, is one of the causes of wastage of our life. We are wasting our life in our relationships. And when you really see the fact of it, give your attention to it, that is, to understand very deeply the nature of thought and time, which has nothing whatsoever to do with love. Thought and time is a movement in the brain. And love is outside of the brain. Please go into this very carefully because what is inside the skull is very important, how it functions, what are its blockages, why it is limited, why there is this perpetual sense of chattering, thought after thought, a series of associations, reactions, responses, the whole storehouse of memory, and memory obviously is not love. Therefore love cannot - is not inside the brain, inside the skull. And when we are merely living inside the skull all the time, all the days of our life, thinking, thinking, thinking, problem after problem, which is to live inside the limitation, that must inevitably breed conflict and misery.

One has heard all this, if you have listened at all, and what are we going to do about it? Do we carry on the old way? Or seeing the actuality of our life, our daily life, and see the various classifications, division, limitations, and enquire into them, pursue them day after day, never letting one thought escape without understanding it? Or we have become so used to everything, used to our religion, used to our way of living, accepting everything. What we really want is an easy life! What we want is comfort, some kind of security, both outwardly and inwardly, biologically and objectively. We never ask is there security at all? Is there security outwardly in any nation? If when there is security in community, in a co-operative state, or under dictatorship, totalitarian, or different kinds of dictators, is there security when there is war? Every other day they are perpetuating wars. Is there security outwardly? There is the threat. And inwardly, psychologically, is there security? Which is far more important to discover first: whether there is inward, deep security, safety, protection, is there? What is security? Outwardly you may have insurance, mortgage, you know, all the rest, I won't go into that. One must have outwardly security - a house, flat, tent, some kind of roof under which one sleeps and lives, clothes and all that. That one must have. Every human being in the world must have that. That is being denied through nationalities - you understand? Through division, Britain, France, India, Russia, America, etc. So inwardly is there security? One can invent an illusion - God, the ultimate illusion. And one can cling, one can hold on to that. And we have lived historically for millenia upon millenia in this illusion - with priests, rituals and all that business, power - right? Power, position, status, outwardly, that is very important for the people who want power. And power is strangely destructive, whether it is a political power, religious power, or the power over your wife or husband, or the power of the guru - my God, just think of it! Which is the priest and so on.

So where is there security for human beings? Please ask this question of yourself. Where have you, as a human being living on this earth, which is so marvellous, which is being destroyed slowly, where is there our security? Security means something permanent, something that doesn't change, that has no disappearance, that is firm, solid, immovable. Is there such security? Because the brain needs security, otherwise it cannot function at its highest level. But it has found various forms of security, illusions, ideologies, families, nations, tribalism, various forms of outward security but never has a human being found an inward sense of deep abiding, unchangeable security. And is there such security? If there is one has - if one has come upon it then there is no fear of any kind. That is timeless.

So is there such security? Thought cannot possibly provide that security because thought, as we said, is limited. Whatever it has invented is still limited. And we have lived in the field of limitation of thought. And in that there is no possibility of ever having security, and therefore our brain is always searching, asking, questioning, demanding, fearful, uncertain, depressed - do you follow? - the whole process of our activity. And security, there is such a thing as security. But that demands a great enquiry. Security in freedom. Freedom is not from something, freedom from fear, freedom from anxiety and so on. Those are all partial, limited. That freedom is not limited. Is there such freedom? And who is asking that question? The man in prison asking, "Is there such freedom?" he can only find out such freedom if he leaves the prison. But we want to live in the prison and yet we are asking for freedom. Right? This is an obvious fact. We love our prison, or we are unaware of it. And when it is pointed out, the prison, all one does is try to accept the words, you know all that business, but one never breaks the prison, never shatters the prison. And when there is freedom there is intelligence. It is that intelligence which we will talk about as we go along. That intelligence in itself is absolute security, unshakable. For it depends on nothing, not environment, on a person, or on any kind of ideology.

So: we began this morning talking over together the enormous problem of living, which is becoming very, very complex. And that which is very complex must be approached very simply. Not a simple mind but the quality of humility and simplicity. Not the simplicity of clothes and all that but the simplicity of a brain that starts a journey and must go on until it finds the end of it.

We have talked for an hour and a quarter. I think that is enough for this morning. We shall meet tomorrow morning if you will, and we will continue where we left off.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 26TH AUGUST 1984

May we continue with what we were talking about yesterday morning?

I think it is important to remind you if I may, if one may, that this is not an entertainment, it is not a weekend amusement in a nice place. Sorry for the bad weather, but there it is! You are in England! And we are not trying to convince you of any ideology, of any concept, or a series of programmed investigations. But rather that we are all thinking together if we can, over our problems, not only human, psychological, physic problems, but also the problems outside of us, outside in the world which is so full of danger, terrorists, ideological commitments - the Communists and the so-called Democrats, the totalitarians and the dictatorships, and also all the great inventions that are going on in the world. Tremendous inventions, not only to destroy man and destroy the earth but also great inventions to distort the brain of the human beings. There are the computers, which is an extraordinarily important thing - we have been talking about it to some specialists who are building and who are concerned with the computers - in America and so on, and here. Computers probably can do almost anything that human beings can: think much faster, calculate much quicker, in seconds. Carry a million memories on a small chip. And also what is going to happen to the human brain when the computer, which can do almost anything, will the human brain wither? Please consider all these problems. Will the human brain, our brain, which has striven, struggled, aggressive, competitive, calculating, working endlessly to earn money, or to achieve some ideological concepts and pursuits. And the computer can do all this much better than any of us can. And then what happens to the human brain which now is so occupied with itself, will it wither away? Or will it be caught in the vast entertaining world, in the entertaining industry, not only the cinema, televisions, all the religious entertainments that are going on in the world in the name of God, which is another form of entertainment, whether it is done in the temples in India, or in Rome, or in some mosques, it is still entertainment. Or the brain will occupy itself with something much vaster, greater and deeper. That is, to turn, not selfishly, not self-centred, inward look but rather turn to something beyond all that which man has accumulated through millenia upon millenia. To find something vast, immeasurable, not to be measured by words, by thought and so on.

So we are not only at a crisis in the world psychologically, a crisis in our consciousness, but also there is a crisis going on at the present time in the world. And we were talking about yesterday morning, and we are talking over together, we are talking over our problems, not mathematical problems, or geographical or other kinds of problems, but human problems with all our fears, anxieties, sorrows, pain depressions, long enduring conflicts. We are talking about those things because it is our life.

And we also talked about yesterday wasting our life. We mean by wasting doing things that are practically becoming meaningless, apart from earning a livelihood, and so on. And we were talking yesterday also about time, thought and security. The brain can only function excellently, at its highest capacity and energy when it is completely secure, when it is not living or holding on to some illusions, some concepts, beliefs, faith, some fantastic ideas or the ideals of Marx and Lenin and so on, or our own democratic ideals and holding on to them. We were talking about time and what relationship has time to security? Time being tomorrow, time being the thousand tomorrows following each other. Is there security in that tomorrow? Do we understand each other? The speaker is asking a question whether there is security in the pursuit of tomorrow, in the pursuit of the future, which is time. Right? Are we... please, we are talking things over together, I am not talking to myself, and this is important to understand if we want to go into ourselves and understand our whole... what we call the psyche, which is our being. And to understand that very deeply one must go into this question of security. We seek security in the family, in the community, in a commune, or in a particular sect whether it be the sect of Catholicism, or Protestantism and so on. Or Hinduism and so on. Is there security in time? Do you understand my question? Is there security in the future? And what is the future? The future is what we are now, what one is now, with all the turmoil, anxiety, depression, violence, self-centred activity, sorrow, affection and the pain of separation and the fear of death, is what is now, what we are now. That is our psyche, that is our consciousness, that is our being. And has that, which is the result of vast experiences, knowledge, of that which we have accumulated during thousands and thousands of years, that is what we are now. The tradition, our conditioning, both linguistically and, which is another matter, we won't go into the question of whether the brain can be conditioned linguistically. Are you interested in all this? A Sunday morning? This is not a sermon. If you are really interested in your own life, not in what the speaker is talking about, if one is interested to understand this enormous complex society in which we live, with all the immorality, with all the corruption, and the great sorrow every society brings to every human being, and that society which we have created, that society is not different from us, we have created it through our greed, through our violence, through our aggression, through our competitiveness and so on. We have made it. And we are caught in that which we have made. So we are fighting not only society externally, trying to adjust ourselves to it, and also rejecting it, and withdrawing ourselves from that society, it is all part of this self-centred projected activity of every human being in the world, whether he lives in the most smallest hamlet, village or in the great cities of the world. We have made this mess. And we are asking as what we are now, what is the future of us now? And has the future, that is tomorrow, and the thousand million tomorrows, is there security in that? We hope and in that hope we try to find some kind of security in hope. Hope implies the future. So as we were pointing out yesterday, we should understand this very seriously because it may totally bring about a psychic revolution. We may look at the world and ourselves totally differently if we understand the nature of time. Time is not only to cover a distance from one point to another. Time is necessary to learn a language, to learn a skill, to build a house, to acquire a skill, to drive a car and so on, time is necessary. But is time, that is, movement of becoming - you understand? Are we together in all this? Are you getting mesmerized? Please, the person is not important at all. The speaker is not important in any way. But what he says is important. Either we see the truth of it or the falseness of it, the logic, the sanity, the reason of it. That's what matters, not the personal, personality cult. The speaker is merely a telephone and the speaker means it, it is not just a word.

And so we are trying to understand whether there is security in time. That is, we are the past, there is no question about it. And that past is operating, modifying itself, in the present. The present, if there is no fundamental change, not some superficial scratching, but fundamental change, the future is what we are now. So all time, the past, the future, the present is in the now. Right? And that if we can really capture the significance of this, then we begin to see the implication of what it means to change. I wish I could discuss this matter with somebody who is following this intimately, closely, not just listening casually, because it is really very important because it really will alter the whole way of looking at life. If you accept that there is no tomorrow, how do you look at the world, how do you look at yourself, how do you consider God? How do you consider becoming something? You understand? Becoming something implies time. And you see all time is contained in the now - you understand? - then what is becoming? Is there psychological becoming at all? I wonder if you follow this.

And what does then - if you understand this - relationship mean? To be related to somebody in which there is no time, no becoming - do you understand? Are we following this a little bit? Or would you like to see the video? (Laughter) Because these are really important questions, fundamental questions one must ask oneself. What is it - what does it mean to change if there is no tomorrow, because tomorrow is now. And if change implies gradualness, then you admit time. And that time, the future, is now. So is it possible to change instantly, not allowing time to interfere at all. So can the brain, which has been accustomed to gradualness, and gradually become good, gradually end violence, gradually get over my idiocy and so on. The brain is accustomed to that. We are educated that way. You will gradually learn how to write properly at school, how to learn mathematics gradually, take two years and you have to take several years to become a doctor, but we have extended that same feeling, that same movement into the whole psychological world. So we say, "I will gradually become something", - gradually learn how to meditate - good God - you understand? Gradually learn how to live peacefully. All that implies the - our conditioning to the concept of becoming. And if time is - if all time is in the now, which is a fact, it is a statement of a fact, that statement may not be true, so you have to find out for yourself if that statement is a fact or not, not merely influenced or coerced, or encouraged by the speaker. Therefore one must have doubt, question, there must be scepticism to say "Is it true?" So that your own brain is active, you yourself see things as they are.

As we were saying, if all time, the past, the present and the future, is contained in the now, what is our relationship to each other? That relationship with man or woman who are in conflict, each wanting to fulfil, each helping the other to sustain themselves, if one is weak he will depend on somebody strong and so on. That is the present relationship of conflict. And can that conflict end instantly, not gradually - you understand my question?

And then what is action? Action is according to a memory, conditioned by the past, or action of tomorrow. "I will do this", "I will try to understand", "I will try to listen to what you are saying". So what is action when there is no - when all time is now? You understand the question? I wonder! One is greedy, or one is violent. Violence has many aspects: conformity, imitation, adaptation, adjustment, or physical gestures, and action physically, hating somebody and so on, throwing a bomb. Those are all based on concepts, ideas, memories, ideals and so on. So if there is no tomorrow - you understand? - what then is action?

All right Sir, put it the other way, perhaps we will get at it better. Most of the people in the world believe in God - right? I don't know why but they do! The ancient literature, the very ancient literature there is no mention of God at all. God is only a recent invention. And that God, whom we worship, whom we pray to, who has built the world, created the world, he is the essence of all that and so on and so on and so on. And all of us, most people in the world, are trying to achieve, or realize that sense of godliness. But if there is no tomorrow - you understand what is implied? - there is no sense of achievement at all, except you do achieve a job, do achieve a certain status, or you have - work hard to accumulate a lot of money, or power, for that there is plenty of tomorrows, specially for money and power. I wonder if you have ever gone into the question of power. Power over people, power of the few over the many, or the power of one, whether he be a guru, or a dictator, or the power of the few representing an ideal, holding this immense power to control, shape the human brain - the professors, the scientists, and every human being wants power in some form or another. The man over the woman, or the woman over the man, sexual power, the power of thought - you understand all this? Power of the man who says, "I know, and you don't know. I will tell you all about it." The power of knowledge.

So power is evil in any form, whether it is the power of the pope, or the man over his servant. And all of us want some kind of power. We have never tasted the essence of humility, and innocence. The word 'innocence' means not to hurt another, or be hurt. May I go on? Or do you want to see the video? Are you actually listening to what the speaker is saying? Listening not only with the ear, but listening beyond the word, grasping the significance instantly, not demanding explanation after explanation, description after description. Do we listen at all? Or we are always interpreting what is being said to suit our own conditioning, our own like and dislike and so on? If we could listen very seriously to this fact that all time is now, the past, the present and the future, then the truth of it becomes extraordinarily vital. It is a living thing, not just a series of words, concepts and beliefs. Then relationship, change and action have totally a different meaning.

We ought also to consider this morning the question of fear. Fear of the future, what might happen, fear of insecurity, fear of death, fear of what has happened in the past. There are so many fears that human beings carry with them. Or one dominant fear. Most human beings have fear, not only physical fears, of getting hurt, not only physically getting hurt but inwardly getting hurt. We have fear of that. We have fear of oppression, fear of losing a job, fear of unemployment in this country, there are people between 18 and 30 who have never known what work is. And so they become rowdy and you know all the rest of it, what is happening in this country and in the other parts of the world. We are not talking of a particular form of fear, not your particular form, or my particular form. I might be afraid of public opinion - I am not but suppose one is - what somebody else might say. And there is the fear of not achieving, not achieving enlightenment - you know, whatever that might mean. Not - so many things we are frightened of. Agree? At least do we see this? As we said, we are not talking about a particular form of fear, but what is fear? You understand my question? One may be frightened of the dark. Or frightened of what one's wife might say and so on. Those are all expressions of - multiple expressions of the central fact of fear - right? So we are talking about the central fact of fear, the root of fear, not the various forms of fear. And what is the root of all this? And fear has been one of the major factors of our life, not only now but in the past millenia, centuries upon centuries ago. The most primitive people were frightened of thunder, lightening, so they made that into God. You understand? Anything that we are frightened of we make it into God, or into something to be worshipped or something to be killed. Probably that is what we are doing now. So we are frightened people. Frightened of a pain of yesterday recurring again today or tomorrow. Pain of losing one's eyesight, hearing and ultimately dying. And we are asking: what is the cause of all this fear? What is the origin, the beginning of fear? And can that fear first psychologically, inwardly, not the fear of outward things, but first the inward, inside the brain, inside the very hidden part of the brain, the very recesses of the brain, what is fear? Why have we not solved it? If there is no fear at all, at all, inwardly, would we have gods? Yes Sirs, it is fear that is making, creating gods all over the world. So it is very important to understand and find out for oneself whether it is possible to be totally free of fear. First psychologically, inwardly, subjectively.

If you ask the speaker: "Are you talking this as a fact, or are you free of it subjectively?" - what if he answered, "Yes", and then where are you? Do you understand my question? So it is not important to ask whether the speaker is free or not but whether one is free or not. And how important, how essential it is to be free of fear.

So what is fear? What is the origin, the beginning deeply? Not only in the deep levels of the brain, the so-called unconscious fears. The speaker doesn't like to divide consciousness into the unconscious and conscious, it is all consciousness. You can play around with those words but consciousness is whole, you can divide it. Either for profit, for amusement, or for various other subjective reasons. But consciousness is whole. It is really indivisible, but we like to divide, break it up.

So let's go into this question: what is the root of fear? Is it thought? Thought being the accumulated memories born of knowledge, experience, and thought born of knowledge and knowledge being limited, so thought is limited. Is fear subjectively first, inwardly first, is that fear born of thought? Thinking about tomorrow, thinking about what might happen. One's wife may run away. Thinking in terms of not the actual present, but in terms of the future, or the past. Is that the cause of fear, thought? If it is the cause of fear, which the speaker says it is and please don't accept it, then what will you do with thought? You understand the question?

If I am afraid of you because you might not get tomorrow a larger audience, a small audience, if I am frightened, I want to find out the cause of it. And the cause is I want to have a large audience to make myself - you know - I am glad you understand that. And so on. And I want to find out the cause, the origin of fear, how it comes. As we said the other day one is not analysing, one is watching, one is perceptive, which requires sensitivity, not a conclusion, not saying "I must get rid of it, I must do something about it, I must escape from it" and so on, but watch it. To watch very clearly without any direction, without any motive, to see, to find out for oneself if thought is the origin of this fear. Then I say to myself what shall I do with thought, if that is the cause of fear how can I stop thought? You understand? Are we following each other? Please come on. Then I have to ask who is the entity that stops thought? Right? You are following this? That entity is also thought that wants to be free of fear - right? So one thought is battling with another thought - right? Do I see that clearly? That this is a battle between two thoughts. The thought that is saying I must be free from fear, and the thought that says what is the origin of thought. The origin of thought, thought says, is very thinking itself. And then the other thought says, how can I stop thinking? You understand? So there is conflict. Are we following each other? So there is conflict. Then I assume how can I end that conflict? So I build this thing, one thing after another, one association after another and I am far away from fear. And I started trying to solve fear and ended up with such confusion, such conflict, such misery and still fear remains. Just hold on a minute.

And then I ask - one asks: is there another cause of fear? Time.

Time is a movement, a series of movements and time, which is tomorrow, I might lose my job, I might become blind, I might - all the rest of it - tomorrow. So time is a factor of fear - right? So time and thought are the roots of fear. Time is thought. So that is the root of fear. I understand this, one understands this intellectually, verbally, it has been explained very carefully. Time as tomorrow, time as the past, time as the present, and tomorrow is all important to me. A thousand tomorrows, tomorrow is all important because I want to get rid of it gradually. So I see - one sees very clearly that time and thought are the root of fear, time, thought is the root of fear. Do I see it as an idea, or do I see it as a concept, or do I see it as something actual, factual, not an idea and then work that idea into a fact? Are we following each other, a little bit at least?

What generally happens is that one hears a statement, like, all time is now. I don't quite understand it but I make an idea of it, a concept of it, and then I try to follow that concept. That concept is not the actual, so again I enter into the field of conflict. So can I, can one listen completely to this fact? That time and thought are the root of fear. Time, thought, is the root, the beginning of fear. Just to perceive it, not what to do about it. You understand? We want - unfortunately we want to achieve that so we are making an effort. But if you listen quietly, silently, not be mesmerized, but listen to it quietly, deeply, then you see, then the very perception of that silence and watching without any effort, fear has no place at all. This is not a romantic illusion. This is a fact. When you hold something without movement you see the beauty, or the ugliness of that jewel completely. But we never look at the jewel. We say, "How beautiful" and pass it on. But when we hold it in our hands, the most extraordinary jewel in the world, and look at it carefully, how extraordinarily complex, how delicate, subtle, its capacity so great. One begins to learn what it is. Learning is different from memorizing - right? My lord! Are we saying too much in one talk?

Audience: Yes.

K: Yes? Quite right. You are right. Saying too much in one talk. It can't be helped. Sorry!

Have you ever held fear? Hold it. Not move away from it. Not try to suppress it, run away from it, or transcend it, or do all kinds of things with it, just to see the depth of the fear, the extraordinary subtleties of fear. And you can only be aware of all that when one is looking at it without any motive, without trying to do a thing about it, just watch it.

One can do the same thing with pain, of course not extreme pain. When you watch pain carefully, not trying to rush to the dentist immediately, when you watch it, stay with it, not morbidly but see the - all that is happening. How you react to it and so on and so on. If you do that the pain lessens naturally. In the same way if you hold this jewel. Fear is an extraordinary jewel, extraordinary something which has dominated human beings for forty thousand years and more. And if you can hold it and look at it, then one begins to see the ending of it. Not the gradually, the ending of it completely. Which means fear is part of our self-centred, egotistic activity. Fear is when the ego, the me, is isolated, when the me, the self, this self-centred movement because it is separative, because it is the very essence of conflict and all the rest of it, that is the root of fear. But when you hear this, "How can one live" you will say, "In the world without being self-centred?"

Right? This is natural, healthy question. But first be free and then you will find out, not the other way round. You understand what I am saying? It is like saying, "What is on the other side of the mountain?" You have to climb the mountain to find out. But the description of what is on the other side of the mountain is still a description. But if you walked up the mountain then you will find out. You see what we want is guarantees. If I give this up will you assure me of that?! And there is no assurance. Actually there is no giving up.

So we are asking now: if thought and time, or thought/time is the fact of fear? And we see it is. And the brain has been conditioned, shaped, moulded, has accepted fear as the way of life. And the brain is reluctant to let go. It has lived for thousands of years in the realm of fear, it has got used to it, all the cells, you know all that is going on inside, it says that is natural, that is part of our life. And either one learns through a tremendous shock, which is bad for the brain, or you see the fact instantly. And therefore action takes place instantly.

And we were talking about security. Obviously there is no security in the future - right? I wonder if we see that. The future is when you say, "I will be safe the day after tomorrow", or "There is God in whom I find security", or in some form of illusions. Is there security in time? Please go into it. Or there is only security, complete security in the understanding the truth that all time is in the now. The now is the ultimate security. Come on Sirs! Do you understand? The now is that which you are now. What you are is your consciousness - right? Your consciousness is what you are. Your consciousness - the consciousness contains your fears, your aspirations, your longings, your desires, your fulfilments, your depressions, your anxieties, sorrow, pain, all the rest of it, your gods, all that is your consciousness. And in that consciousness is this whole movement of time and thought - right? I wonder if you understand all this? You are your consciousness, aren't you? No? Of course. No? So your consciousness is your faith, your belief, your nationality, your fears, your gods, your British, French, German, Indian, Sikh, and all this divisions which thought has divided the world and human beings. So all that consciousness is you. The selfish activities and trying not to be selfish and so on and so on. The whole of that consciousness is you. And this consciousness is the consciousness of the rest of mankind because every human being in the world, everyone from the most primitive, from the most uneducated, to the most highly sophisticated, educated, they go through all this - faith, fear, longing, depression, anxiety, sorrow, pain, every human being in the world goes through it, whether he is a Communist, Socialist, Capitalist, or Democrat, or doesn't belong to any group. So this consciousness is shared by all human beings. Right? I am afraid you won't accept that. Quite right. Because you have been trained, educated, religiously and in other ways, that your consciousness is yours and nobody else's. And somebody comes along and says, look at it carefully, what you are inwardly - the outward trimmings may be different - but inwardly your consciousness is like the man in a far away village, primitive, ugly, uneducated. He is just like you, almost similar to you. And so you are not individual at all. I know all this is very difficult to accept. You are the rest of mankind, you are humanity. And when you separate yourself then begins all the problems. The separation causes conflict, fear, isolation. And your heaven is filled with isolated spirits.

So is this a fact, or not? Or just a romantic concept? That every human being suffers, either physically, or psychologically, inwardly. Every human being is anxious about something or rather. Every human being is frightened. He wants some comfort, hope, God, a father figure, or a mother figure, or whatever you like. So your consciousness is shared by all of us, by all of us, by all humanity, therefore you are humanity, not some separate British, French - for God's sake! You understand all this?

Then one begins to realize the immense responsibility one has. Then one begins to realize the nature of love. Though you may love another, but that love is not restricted to one because you are the entire humanity. You are the world, and the world is you.

May I get up please?

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 28TH AUGUST 1984

A lot of questions have been asked, a whole sheaf of them. Some of them are letters and some very short questions. And we can't answer all of them. That would be impossible. It would take many, many days. And some questions have been chosen out of that lot.

Before we go into these questions we ought to talk over together if we can ask a question from a state of mind, or brain, that is holistic, that sees, comprehends, or perceives the whole human problem. Not just one particular problem but all problems are related to each other. There is no one separate problem disassociated from the others. If that is so then to ask a question, or to face a problem from an integrated outlook. You understand what I mean? Most of us are fragmented, broken up - business, religious, family life, sexual life, religious life and so on and so on. We are all not a holistic whole human being, which is a fact. We look at life from a particular point of view, from a conclusion, or from some idealistic concepts. These are all fragmentations, fragmented outlook on life - right? We are talking things over together. And can we ask a - or face a problem from a wholly different outlook, which is not fragmented at all? Do you understand? Are we meeting each other in this? We have just thought of it as we came across the lawn here. Whether we ask any question, or face any problem holistically. I hope you don't mind using that word. Though it is a so-called scientific word - I hope the scientists will forgive us if we use that word. From a point of total integration, integrity and ask questions. It is rather interesting if we go into it.

Is it possible, recognizing that we are fragmented, broken up, divided in ourselves, contradictory, opposing one desire against another desire and so on, knowing all that, being aware of all that, could we face a problem, which is from a different focus? Why do we have problems? We have got so many problems - political, religious, sexual and so on - we have multiple problems in life. And problems are increasing. In a society that is so sophisticated, so complex, over population, bad governments and so on. And in the resolution of one problem we seem to increase many other problems - right? Why? In answering these questions that is going to raise - the answer is going to awaken similar problems. Why do we have problems and is it possible to meet a problem without a brain that is already conditioned to solve problems? Do you understand my question? Eh? You don't understand it. Neither do I for the moment! (Laughter)

So let's look at it. We go to school, very young, almost five or seven and so on. And children are faced with a problem - mathematical problem, how to write, how to read, how to learn mathematics, you know, it becomes a problem. So from childhood our brain is conditioned to solving problems. Right? This is a fact. It is not some fantastic theory of the speaker. So one goes to college, there are again problems. And university, jobs, various functions, vocations and so on, problem after problem. Our brain is full of problems - right? And we are always seeking from a brain that is conditioned to solve problems, we are always seeking a solution to problems - right? Is this clear? We are together in this? Now how can the brain solve problems if it is not free from problems? Right? Are we together a bit in this? It is rather an interesting question this, please let's go into this.

Our brains are conditioned to the resolution of problems, the solution of problems from childhood. And as the brain is conditioned to solve problems it is always seeking a solution, and it is not understanding the problem itself but the solution of the problem - right? Are we together a little bit in this? Good! And is it possible not to have a brain - to have a brain that is not conditioned to problems? You understand my question? I am asking you Sirs, and Ladies, your brain is conditioned now to the solution of problems, and we have never solved the problems. They are increasing more and more and more - why? Is it because a conditioned brain, which is embedded in problems can never solve problems? Right? You have understood this? Have I put the question? Oh, come on Sirs! Is it possible to have a brain that is not conditioned to the solution of problems but to the understanding of problems? Isn't there a difference between the solution of problems and the understanding of the problem? In the understanding of the problem the solution may lie in the problem. Not away from the problem - right?

Take a very ordinary example: we have never stopped wars. Human beings on this earth since they came on this earth have had wars, and we have never solved the problem of war. But we decided to reorganise how to kill man better. And this reorganization, how to kill man better, is called progress. I don't know if you are following all this. This is not a joke. So we move from organization to organization, we had first the League of Nations, and now we have the United Nations, but wars go on. They have different organisations - you understand? So we move from one organization to another hoping thereby to solve problems and multiply problems. So we never stop wars. And the cause of wars is nationalism, economic division, local division and so on and so on and so on - division - linguistic, racial, religious, economic, cultural and so on. These divide man. We are all human beings, we all suffer, we all have pain and anxiety, boredom, loneliness, despair. We don't tackle that but we want to solve the problems that seem to have external causes - right?

So we are asking: can the brain, recognizing, seeing that it is conditioned to the solution of problems from childhood, be free of it and then face problems? Right? All right Sirs? Will you do it? That is the question. To be conscious, to be aware that our brain, that we as human beings, from the beginning of life, we are always struggling with problems and trying to find the right answer to them. The right answer can only be when we recognize the brain is conditioned and as long as that brain is conditioned to solving problems we will never find the right answer - clear?

So do I recognize that fact, not the idea but the fact? There is a difference between idea and the fact - right? I hear this statement and from that statement I draw a conclusion - quite right, this is so, and from that statement I abstract an idea and then pursue the idea, not the fact that my brain is conditioned to solve problems. That is the fact, not that I should be free of this conditioning. That is non-fact. You understand? So the brain is conditioned and as long as that condition exists, multiplications of problems will go on, reorganization of the problems will go on and changing from one Capitalist society to Totalitarian society or this or that, will always bring about enormous problems - right? Can you and I be free of the brain that is conditioned? That is to be aware of it and see the depth of it, the truth of it, the logic, the sanity, the reason of it, and not move away from that, not find some abstract explanations. Right.

Is this all right? I am asking if it is all right, perhaps it is all wrong! (Laughter) No, it is not all wrong. This is a fact. If one cannot get on with one's wife, quarrels, contentions, you know, all the rest of it, and I divorce, one divorces, then choose another person. And keep on repeating this - right? If one has the money! (Laughter) If one has plenty of time and energy this is the game that is going on in the world, on a small or a bigger scale. But the problem is not divorce or - and all the complications of relationship, but to understand the depth of relationship, the meaning of relationship. Relationship, as we pointed out, is one of the most important things in life. Not the emotional expressions of it, the tantrums, the neuroticism of relationship, but what is important, significant, has depth in relationship. And we never ask that question. We want to solve the problem of relationship. You understand? And so we never solve them. The psychiatrists, psychotherapists and so on and so on, are multiplying in the world, like mushrooms. And they are not solving problems. They are not solving the depth of all this.

So we should consider together what is the art of living. Do you understand? Oh come on Sirs. It is a nice morning.

Audience: Are you saying that if we have a system for solving problems then every time we approach a problem we use our system instead of understanding?

K: That's right. The lady is saying if we have a system, a pattern, of solving a problem then the system is operating, not the understanding and the depth of the problem. It is the same thing. We were talking about the art of living - sorry these are the questions but they - You don't mind! (Laughter) We will come to them. There are many of them so we have chosen six of them. That will be enough for this morning. But we are asking what is the art of living? We have the art of poetry, painting, the art of so many - are of cooking, specially now, and so on. But we have never asked ourselves, perhaps which is the greatest art, what is the art of living? Is there an art? Or is it all just chance, or is it all some genes, a biological chance and so on? If one answers it, don't make a problem of it. Then the art is thrown out of the window.

So, let's look at it together to find out what is the art of living? - art in the widest and the depth of that word, not just all the contents of a museum. If you are asked that question, what is the art of living, what would be your answer? Not calculated answer, personal answer, or emotional, or romantic answer, which are meaningless - right? If I answer that question emotionally - oh, it is - the art of living is the highest aspiration - which is sheer nonsense. The art of living is the most exalted, intellectual, activity - right? That is only very partial. Or the art of living is to have an holistic outlook on life. It sounds excellent but factually it isn't. So what is the art of living? Obviously no conflict whatsoever - right? A brain that is in conflict all the time, having problems all the time, this tremendous self concern, such a brain must inevitably be limited - right? If one is thinking about oneself - how to meditate, whether you can - all the rest of it - your very meditation is self-centredness. So the art of living it appears - you can add to it more

- is to live without conflict. Is that possible at all? That is, to understand the opposing elements in one's life - right? Desiring one thing, opposed to that desire another thing. You know this corridor of dualities. And the self-centredness, as long as that self-centredness exists there must be conflict because self-centredness is limited, small, petty. But you listen to all this but carry on. Right? And you say that is not possible in modern society to live without self-centredness, at least a little bit of it. (Laughter) Have you ever tried? Have you ever done, lived without self-centredness for one day, not to think about oneself? Just even for an hour! (Laughter) And see what happens. You haven't committed to anything! You can go back to your self-centredness, nobody is going to say how wrong it is, or right it is, that is the normal state of human beings apparently. So if one really tries for an hour, actually do it, not try it, do it, and see what happens. And if you do it one hour you can extend it. (Laughter) And it gives you tremendous energy. It gives you great sense of passion, not lust and all that business, but passion to pursue something profoundly to the very end of things. Right? Is that enough for this morning? We had better come back.

I haven't read these questions first. I haven't - this is the first time I am looking at them. So you are also looking at them for the first time.

1st QUESTION: What is attention if it has nothing to do with thought? Is it an activity of the brain? Is it a physical process? How does it come into being? You say we cannot bring about attention by an act of will? What must one not do in order to allow attention to exist?

Do nothing! Sorry, I must answer it.

What is attention if it has nothing to do with thought? Is it an activity of the brain? Is it a physical process? How does it come into being? You say we cannot bring about attention by an act of will? What must one not do in order to allow attention to come into being? Right? You have got the question?

He is asking what is attention, is it a physical act? Is it the movement of thought? Is it an action of desire, which is the essence of will? Desire is the essence of will - right? How does this attention come about? Which is, can it come naturally, easily, without making tremendous effort - going to colleges, or attending some guru, being trained, can it all come about, this attention, naturally? We are going to talk over together - right? We are going to look at the question, not the answer. The question is: what is attention? In which is implied, not only the hearing of the ear but hearing without the ear. You understand? And also attention implies seeing, perceiving - right? Seeing visually, but also seeing with the inner eye, as it were - right? And attention also means learning - right? Agree? Seeing, hearing, and learning. Those three things are implied. Which means what is learning? Is it memorizing? You are following this? Somebody say, "Yes" - I don't want to go on talking to myself. So is it memorizing as we do when we go to the school, college, university, memorizing, storing up knowledge from books, from professors, from teachers, from house-masters and so on and so on? Which is always accumulating as knowledge and using that knowledge skilfully or not. Right? A carpenter - an apprentice to a master carpenter is learning the nature of the wood, what kind of wood, the grain, the beauty of the wood, the feeling of the wood, and the instruments which he is employing and so on, he is learning. And that learning is through experience, day after day, month after month, accumulating knowledge about carpentry, making a master cabinet maker - right? That is what we call learning. That kind of learning is limited, obviously because all knowledge is limited, now or in the past or in the future - right? Because all the scientists, biologists, etc. and so on are accumulating. They killed a man with an arrow, or a club, at the beginning of time, now you can blast the whole, millions and millions of human beings with one blow. That is tremendous accumulation of knowledge, to do that. Whether for good or for bad.

So - and that knowledge is always limited - right? So is there a learning which is not limited? It's fun, go on. I am just discovering something myself. Is there a learning that is not an accumulative process of knowledge, learning? In which is implied, hearing, not only the words, the significance of the words, your reactions to the words, your responses to certain favourite words, like love and hate, you know, and all the rest of it, and also seeing without any prejudice, seeing without the word - you understand? Can you look at a tree without the word? You understand? Have you ever done all this? That means seeing without direction, without motive, without any network of thought or blocking the seeing. And learning, which is a limitless process. So attention implies all that plus, or the beginning of it is to be aware - right? Are we aware as we sit here, the extent of this tent, the great number of people accumulated here, and the number of posts along there, and to look at all that without a single word. To be aware. But in that awareness you begin to choose. I like that blue shirt better than what I am wearing - right? I like the way your hair is done, better than mine. Right? You are always comparing, judging, evaluating, which is choice and to be aware without choice - you understand? As we are talking will you do all this? Or you are just listening to words? If we are doing this, then you begin to discover awareness is entirely different from concentration. Concentration implies focusing all thought on a particular subject, on a particular page, on a particular word. Which implies cutting off all other thoughts, building resistance to every other thought, which then becomes narrow, limited - right? So concentration is limited. But you have to concentrate when you are doing something, washing dishes. You have to wash the dishes very carefully - the right kind of soap, the right kind of water. You know all this. And awareness without choice, which means without concentration, to be aware of all this without judging, evaluating, condemning, comparing and from that move, which is attention, which is natural. That is, I want to listen to the story you are telling me, a very exciting thriller. And I listen to you very carefully. Or you are telling me something very, very serious and I pay, I am so eager, so attentive to understand what you are saying. I understand what I am thinking about, that is irrelevant, but I am tremendously concerned with what you are saying. Therefore I am all attention - all my nerves, my whole being says what are you talking about, I want to understand. In that attention there is no me - right? Get it? When there is this tremendous attention, which means all your energy is given to understand what you are saying, I am not thinking about myself, therefore there is no centre in me that says "I must attend" - right? I wonder if you get all this?

Audience: Is that the right question?

K: What Sir?

Audience: Is that the right question?

K: What is the right question here, the gentleman asks, if I understand rightly. Sorry if you ask questions from the audience we can never get through this. Not that we must get through it, but there are too many people, if you don't mind. What is the right question here and what is the right answer? If it is a right question you will never ask it! (Laughter) This is not just cleverness. A right question, if you put it you have the answer. But the right question is - doesn't - is not put because you want an answer, you are concerned, you are worried, you are biased - you follow? The right question, when you put it, the right question is the right answer.

2nd QUESTION: If the whole of life is one movement, with its own order, why is man so disorderly?

If the whole of life is one movement, with its own order, why is man so disorderly?

Why do we assume that the whole of life is one movement, with its own order? You first state a fact, it is supposed to be a fact, and then try and say why is there disorder. You understand? First you assume, one assumes that life is a vast movement, and in that vast movement, that very movement is order. You state that first: if. And then you say why is man so disorderly? Right? You understand? Wouldn't it be the right question to ask: why is man disorderly? Not assume that life is perfect order - right? The fact is we live disorderly, why? That is the question. Why do we live disorderly? What is disorder? What is disorder to you? Disorder is the activity of thought which is in itself limited. Right? Whatever the limited activity of thought does, it will bring about disorder. Because thought in itself is limited, because thought is born of knowledge, and knowledge is limited. Right? Oh God! This is not an epigrammatical statement. What is - I mistook it, sorry. What is order and what is disorder? How will you find order? Is order a definite pattern which you have set, which thought has set? You say, "I must get up at 6 o'clock in the morning, do this, this, this and go to the office" - or factory - is that a determined, planned, day after day, is that order? So we must first ask not what is order, but what is the cause of disorder - agree?

What is the cause of disorder in our life? First of all we must admit, whether we like it or not that we live a very, very disordered life. That is a fact, isn't it. Would you agree to that one thing at least? No? What is disorder? And then you have to ask, if it is lack of order, then what is order. How can a mind, brain, which is so disorderly find out what is order? Why don't we be a little bit logical, rational - though reason, logic are limited, you must begin with that and then go beyond it. But if you say order is this, then it becomes military - right? It becomes a tremendous discipline - agree? This is all so simple. All right.

So, we have to go into this carefully. First let us enquire what is discipline? The soldiers are trained day after day, month after month, haven't you seen them. The beating of the drum, the sergeant and all that, order, discipline, obey. And the obedience to an Abbot, to a Pope, to a... and so on - is called order. There is order according to the policeman. In Europe you drive on the right hand side, in this country you drive on the left hand side. That is order. And the man who is used to driving on the left hand side, goes over there and says that is disorder. Follow all this. So what is the cause of disorder. If I can understand that and be free of that cause there is naturally order. I don't have to find out what is order. So I have to first enquire why this enormous importance is given to discipline - in the schools, in our whole way of life, what is discipline? The word 'discipline' comes from the root disciple. A disciple is one who is learning from the master, learning - right? If you are learning in the sense we are talking about, not accumulating knowledge but learning without accumulation then discipline - the very learning is its own discipline - you understand? I wonder if you understand all this?

Audience: I still don't understand what learning is in your terms.

K: What?

Audience: I still don't understand what learning is because if one watches one's thoughts surely one is watching with one's thoughts. So I don't quite understand how you use learning.

K: I have tried to explain it. Must I go into it again? First of all are we aware, or do we see the fact, accumulating knowledge all our life is very limited. That's a fact because knowledge is limited whether now or in the eternal future it is still limited. And therefore if we act on that knowledge our action will always be limited. And therefore that is one of the causes of disorder - right? If I act always with the previous knowledge which I have accumulated and I know that knowledge is limited, and whatever I do is limited, and any limitation must produce disorder. That is, the Arab and the Jew, the Hindu and the Muslim, the Buddhist and the Catholic - you follow? - they are all limited. They are all functioning within the field of knowledge which is limited, or tradition. Right? We are following all this? So their activity of limited activity is bound to create disorder. If the wife or the husband, or the girl or the boy is thinking about himself - his ambitions, his progress, his fulfilment, and the other man or the woman is also thinking of his progress - right? - they are in conflict obviously. They may talk about love, they may talk about all kinds of things, but each woman and man is pursuing his own particular direction, his own ambition, which is all very self-centred, limited. Right? And so in the relationship that limitation creates disorder. Naturally. Are we meeting this?

So we are beginning to discover the disorder comes where there is limitation - right? Where I am thinking about myself and you are thinking about yourself, and we have a lovely relationship! We hold hands, we sleep together, we walk together, look at - but we both are going in different directions. Right? And therefore those directions are designed by thought, by desire. Is there time to go into desire here, now? No, that's too complicated.

So we begin to learn, to see, to have an insight - we are using the word 'insight' which is to observe something without time, without motive. To have an insight is not remembering, calculating and so on, it is to have instant insight into disorder, which is ultimately any limited action. Are we getting together on this a little bit? A fraction? And if it is a fraction, keep it and move with it, then you will see the thing begins to break up this self-centred process of living.

May I ask a question? Are you, all of us here, are we putting equal energy, as the speaker is putting it? (Laughter) Or are you just sitting and listening, listening to the aeroplane and listening to your own thoughts going on, or - you understand? - you are passionate to find out.

3rd QUESTION: How can our listening be adequate to the depth of what you are saying? What is the quality of mind that will allow the fullness of what you are saying to act in us?

I am afraid that is a wrong question but I will read it.

How can our listening be adequate to the depth of what you are saying? What is the quality of mind that will allow the fullness of what you are saying to act in us?

The speaker is saying something which you haven't, you yourself have not discovered. He is not talking about what he has discovered. That is totally irrelevant. But the words, what the telephone is saying, what the words, the content of the words, all that you are listening to. And the listening is watching your own thoughts, your own feelings, your own reactions - right? The speaker is merely acting as a mirror in which you, by listening, you are discovering yourself. You understand what I am saying? The speaker, as a person, as he has oft repeated, has no importance whatsoever. And he means this. And what he is saying is not something that is foreign, that you have to understand, that has to act upon you. Then if that is so, that it is something foreign that must act upon you, you might just as well take a drug. But if you are listening to what he is saying and saying, "What do I feel to what he is saying, what is my reaction to what he is saying?", there is a communication between what he is saying and yourself. Right? Communication ceases when you are merely listening to what he is saying. But what he is saying, and your relationship to what he is saying, and to discover your reaction to what he is saying, and your responses to his subtleties, or stupidities, or intelligence, you are then moving together. Then it is yours not his. I wonder if you understand.

Audience: No, you...

K: Please Madam, just I understand. Take a little time with what I am saying. Don't immediately - if I may ask most politely - don't immediately answer. But see what he is saying.

First of all he says he is not your guru, absolutely not. That is an anathema to him. And you are not his followers - right? And you haven't got to live what he is talking about. What he is saying is what your own deep undiscovered life - that's all - right? He is talking about you, not himself. He is talking about your life, your daily, monotonous, boredom, tiresome, fearful, sorrowful, lonely life. The violence, the chicanery, the dishonesty, the lack of integrity. Where there is integrity there is strength. But that's another matter. Then you can stand by yourself. Then nothing affects you, then you are not influenced by anybody because you are then discovering what is true for yourself. Not according to - truth according to you, or according to somebody else - truth, which is not his, or yours, it is something entirely not outside the activity of brain. I won't go into that for the moment.

So we are together finding what is truth. We are together finding out what is the art of living, what is the way to listen, what is the way to learn, what is the way of seeing. And if you see, it is yours, then you need no guru, no leader, no book - you understand? We are living on other people's knowledge. We have no insight into ourself, into our own existence. Right? Can I go on to the next question?

4th QUESTION: Is there such a thing as good or evil in the world - sorry I must read it again. Is there such a thing as good or evil in the world, or are these human concepts, values, projections? Is there such a thing as good and evil in the world? Or, are these human concepts, values, and suppositions and projections?

What is good? And what is so-called not good? If we use the word 'evil' that has got such connotations behind that word. Let's forget the word evil for the moment. The good and the bad. The badies and the goodies! - according to the cinemas. (Laughter)

What is good? Now please, try, look at it for a minute. The speaker is asking the question, what is good? How do you listen to the word? How do you receive that word? It doesn't matter who says it. How do you listen to it, receive it? What is your taste of that word? What is your feeling, instinctive feeling to that word? Instinct - I don't mean - your immediate feeling for that word. And when you say the bad, what is your response to it? A repulsion? A thing that you see some bad thing being done? So to discover for oneself the reaction to these two words. Not what philosophers say. Not what other people, the bishops, the priests, the popes - I don't mean merely the Roman popes but the popes of all over the world of different religious organizations, with their heads, with their tails and all the rest of it. When one listens to these two words, which have had tremendous effect on mankind historically, right from the beginning, the Christians have said, "This is good, if you go against it we will burn you" - they have - heretics, tortured them, burnt them for what they have done. And that is considered good. And you go to India to be burnt for your belief is considered a horror. You understand? So what - apart from all this - what is good and what is bad?

Now, I will go on, may I? Is the good related to the bad? And is the good in conflict with the bad? Novels are written about it. The good always conquering at the end! Even in the thrillers! And the bad is always being destroyed and the bad always coming up. The battle has been going on. You see it in Lescaux and other caves in France and other parts of the world, the battle - right? Good and the bad. The evil - I don't like that word evil, it stinks! Forgive me if I use that word. (Laughter) Sorry! (Laughter) So what is good and what is bad? Are they related to each other? Is goodness born out of that which is bad? Because I know that which is bad, tradition, conditioning, that which has - people have said, written, and that evil, that bad, that which is bad, is fighting that which is good. And the good is fighting that which is bad - right? So I am asking is that which is good born out of that which is bad? You understand my question? It is a simple question. If goodness is born out of that which is bad it is not good - right? Then they are related to each other. Therefore it is not good. Are you following? So they are two entirely different things, the one cannot become the other. If it can become the other it is already recognized by the other - you understand all this? - therefore it is not good. Goodness is something totally divorced from that which is bad - right? But we have mixed the two together and we say we must fight - each thing must be fought. You must resist, fight, put away evil, bad in order to be good - you understand? So the goodness is always in terms of the bad. And we are saying something entirely different. Goodness has no relationship whatsoever with that which is bad. For the goodness to exist the bad must cease. That's all. Not a battle between the two. This is simply logic, sanity.

Now to come very near home: in us there are these two opposing elements, this duality. Duality of wanting, aspire - I don't like, sorry, aspiration is a wrong word. Aspiration is something romantic and idealistic and rather stupid. Forgive me if I use that word. We are all aspiring for something. You are aspiring to become a manager of a good corporation. And you are also aspiring for God. It is the same thing. You understand? God is another form of good corporation! I am not being blasphemous but this is all so obvious. So goodness cannot exist where that which is bad. From the bad you cannot possibly go to the good. It is not a movement from this to that. It is not a process of time, from that which is bad to achieve that which is good - right?

Now the question arises from that: what is bad? You understand? I will know what is good only when that which is bad is not. So let's put away the good, don't let's say, "Tell me what it is secretly" - or tell me openly. Then I will follow that. But to understand that which is bad. Is it bad to be nationalistic? Come on Sirs, answer it. Say I am a Frenchman, I am British, or I am a Hindu, or a Sikh, or a Muslim - you know. Is that bad?

Audience: It might not be to some, but to us.

K: To other people, we are including all of us Sir, I am not saying, to me it is bad and to you it is not bad. That's rather... we are asking: what is bad, not according to me or according to somebody else. As long as there is division - right? - racial division, class division, religious division - right? Political, economic and so on, divisions, those divisions create conflict, war ultimately, killing each other. You understand? Isn't that bad? No?

Audience: Yes, yes.

K: Good, I am glad. (Laughter) And yet religions have supported it, you support it - you understand? You know all the rest of it. Can we be free of all that first? Not belong to any country, to any group, to any guru, to any religious organization because they are all divisive. That brings about another question: authority. Political authority, religious authority, the totalitarian authority - you understand? Is authority evil? Not authority in the hands of the wise is good. Do you understand? We have said that: authority of the wise is the salvation of the foolish! (Laughter)

So authority of the policeman, the authority of law. You have to pay tax - not for myself but... you have to pay tax. If you don't pay it you are punished in some way or another. So there is authority outwardly - right? Authority of keeping to the left side of the road, the authority of keeping to the right side in France and Europe. And there must be authority in a school, in a college, otherwise you can't - you follow? But we are talking about authority, the feeling of authority, the power of authority, to slaughter people. So authority, spiritual, authority in the deepest sense of that word is bad, is evil.

So, then the question is: the bad. The bad we said is any kind of division. Don't misunderstand. The religious division - right? The division that says "We are closed, you can't come in here" - psychologically. But the door is open if you want to come in. You understand? That is not closed. So go into all this. It all comes down to any form of psychological, individualistic division - the Arab, the Jew, the Muslim and so on. Any psychological organizational division in that sense of that word. That's bad.

Right? And can one be free of all that? And not just say, "Yes, I see your point, but it's all right but we will go on with our war. It is nice. We are violent people, that is part of our expression of violence, the ultimate expression of violence to kill a million people at one blow." Or do we end all that in ourselves? In ourselves first not organizational thing. You know that story which the speaker thought out? There were two men walking along - you know it some of you, heard this? If you have forgive me. Don't get bored with it. Two men were walking along on a street talking about various things of life. And one of them sees something on the pavement, picks it up. The moment he looks at it his whole face changes, something tremendous has taken place in him. And he puts it in his pocket very carefully, in his inner pocket. And the friend says to him, "What is it you have picked up? Why have you become so extraordinarily... your face has changed." He said, "I have picked up truth". And his friend says, "By Jove, is that really so? I can see by how you look. So what shall we do about it?" And the friend says, "Let's go and organize it" (laughter) This is an old story which the speaker invented about forty or fifty years ago.

So can we, each one of us, not join an organization that will help us to be free from war. That's another form of organization. You follow? We don't begin with ourselves first. Can we, each of us, end this division in ourselves? Then you can use organisations - you understand? But if you use organizations to change the inner you will never succeed.

So can we, each of us, put anything that divides us from another? Of course you must have your own house, your own garden, your own - you follow? - not psychologically, inwardly, subjectively. Then you don't have to search for the good. Then the good flourishes. Then goodness flowers. The beauty of that is endless. It never can be destroyed by anything.

Audience: Sir, in the animal kingdom...

K: Sorry I have to stop now.

Audience: In the animal kingdom the tiger eats the goat. Doesn't the goat look upon the tiger as a badie?

K: Of course not. The tiger kills the beautiful deer. And the tiger too is very beautiful. Have you been very close to a tiger, any of you? Of course not. You have seen them in zoos. I have been very close, about ten feet away from them. Don't bother. I am not inviting you to go and meet them. (Laughter) The tiger eats the deer. The big things eat the little things. And the bigger things eat the bigger - follow? Up and up. Is that evil? The tiger killing the deer? Of course not. You follow? That's nature. Why do we say the tiger is cruel? The cat playing with a mouse - you understand? Haven't you known that. That's rather ugly - you know. Our whole civilization is so monstrous - right? So we must begin with ourselves, not tigers, elephants and rats and snakes. I am afraid we all do this. We want to escape from ourselves. And ourselves is the most important thing. And to penetrate this sheathe, this outward appearance, outward show, outward thing, deeply to go inwards, that journey is endless, it has got such extraordinary beauty.

We will stop now. We will go into it another time.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 30TH AUGUST 1984

I am sorry the weather is breaking up.

Before we begin to enquire into the question, or questions, we should talk over together what is peace and its relationship to intelligence. You don't mind if I talk? In a world that is disintegrating with wars, and nationalism, and sectarianism, idealism and every form of division, opinion against opinion, data against data, judgement against judgement and so on, can we have peace in the world first? Or can we live peacefully? What does it mean to live together, man, woman and so on, or a group of people, not committed to any belief or faith and so on, can we live together peacefully? Apparently this is one of the most difficult things in the world. Here too, there is a great deal of disturbance going on, in England, strike after strike, and all the travails of human beings. And in the search for peace one goes off to a monastery, shaving one's head, putting on some kind of garb and taking vows. This has been tried for generations upon generations, both in India and in the West and in the Far East, a group of people committed to live peacefully, and to subjugate all their opinions, conforming to a certain pattern of idealism, certain dogmas, a way of monastic life and so on. One heard the other day rather an extraordinary fact, thing; there was a man who was very good at writing, literary, he was doing quite well, newspapers, magazines and all the rest of it, and he gave up all that one day and he went off to some kind of retreat, ashrama, a guru collects round himself. And there what do you think he is doing? Pulling old nails out of old wood and he is perfectly happy. You understand? And he is living peacefully, he says. Is that peace? To completely forget the world, what is happening in the world. Forget any kind of responsibility, put aside any kind of relationship with another and disappear into a commune, into a community, or enter into a monastery - which is highly organized, with the abbot whom he must obey utterly and so on.

How does one find peace in the world, and in oneself? I am sure one has asked this question of oneself: to live completely peacefully in relationship to others, not isolate oneself, that is fairly simple and also it has its own dangers. The dangers are that you become more and more self-centred, or commit yourself to some symbol, a figure, or to some doctrinaire concept, and devote all one's energy to that, keeping that to oneself and working in a garden, or in a vineyard. Champagne and the good wines of France were produced by the monks. (Laughter) And the monks have also fought, killed people. This has been going on for centuries. And one is living in a world that is really monstrously destructive, divisive, every form of brutality and so on. Where does one find peace? Can a group of people live together peacefully? Whether they are teachers, educators, or man, woman and so on? Does one look for peace? Or does one bring about peace? You understand? Does peace lie externally, outside the skin, as it were; or does one really want peace? If one sets aside all the things that desire, will, thought, has conceived what is peace, wanting peace, and committed to some form of regulation, whether it is so-called spiritual or otherwise. Lots of people have disappeared in the army because they have no responsibility there, governments look after you, like in a monastery, but you work, march, ready to kill and so on.

So can one bring about peace within oneself and is it possible, living in this world, knowing what the world is becoming more and more, both scientifically and so-called nationally, can one live, or bring, create peace? You understand my question? Can we wait a few minutes for that? (Noise of aeroplane). To live in peace implies no act of divisiveness - right? No act of separation, no sense of me first and you second, both in a queue (laughter) and at home. Is that possible at all? - not only for oneself but living with a group of people. The speaker has been for many, many years, sixty or more years (noise of plane) - the speaker has been living for over sixty years with a group of people. In India, in America, here, all over the world, part of the world rather. And there there is always contention, always dissension, opinion against opinion, why shouldn't I think this way, you think your way, and so on. This process has been going on, not only now, always perhaps. And one wonders if it is at all possible to create peace. One is using the word 'create' in the ordinary sense of the word, not creation - that's another matter. Can one, in a group of people, create peace, in your house, perhaps four of you, or two of you, in a family? Can we bring peace about? Or is that impossible? Do you understand my question? Does one really want to live in peace? And if one does, what price do you pay for it? - not in coins, not in bank notes and so on, but what are you willing or desirous, or saying as we must live in peace, and it is only in peace that one can really flower, what will you do, what will you put aside, what gesture will you make? You understand? It is very easy to superficially say, "Yes, I am willing to live in peace. I will join your beastly little community, or your commune, or I will follow a guru and come and live in that community". that is very easy and rather slack. Forgive that word. Rather indifferent to what is happening to the rest of the world. It is a form of exclusiveness, not one is against elite but the exclusive way of looking at life - you understand?

Now are we willing to give up, put aside our own particular opinions, particular judgements, not that one must not have objections, discussions, stating what one thinks and if one sees what one thinks is not correct, yield, change. Is all that possible? Or we are all so obstinate - you understand my question? - that we never under any circumstances yield, unless we are forced? So we come to a point, if one wants really peace in oneself and in one's family, or in one's group of people, to be highly sensitive, not only to one's own particular desires. That is fairly simple. To one's own self-centred images, but to be sensitive to nature, to other people's ideas, other people's way of looking, their difficulties, the whole process of living together, which requires an enormous sense of yielding and watching, and observing, and highly not interpretative but seeing what the other is: he may be brutal, he may be insensitive but help him to be sensitive, help him not to be... you follow? It is a constant sense of movement, not taking a stand at any time. Is that at all possible? Not only in a family, or in a group of people, like in a school - and we are very close to a school here and we are having a lot of trouble there too. So this is a great problem which not only we who are responsible here at the school at Brockwood but also responsible to ourselves and to our environment, to the way we live. Because peace requires a great deal of intelligence. You can't just say, "I must live peacefully. I must leave the place where there is conflict." and go somewhere else hoping to find where there is inward - where there is no conflict. Such a place doesn't exist unless one becomes completely dull, completely insensitive and doesn't care a damn what is happening - sorry, you don't mind? (laughter) - and so on.

So one has to enquire also what is intelligence? Because peace requires tremendous intelligence. It isn't a thing you buy in the market, or in books, or repeating some chants, or some words, or pray for peace - good God! Humanity has prayed for peace from the beginning of days, and there has been no peace in the world, or in oneself. And to have that quality of peace which is unshakable, which has no shadow of disturbance in it, requires great intelligence. So we must ask ourselves: what is that intelligence? Is that intelligence born of books? Is that intelligence the outcome of complicated subtle thought? Or is it a projection of an ideal and conforming to that pattern? Thought with its limitation has a certain quality of intelligence, otherwise we couldn't be sitting here. You need intelligence to travel, to go to the moon; to go to the moon there must have been thousands of people co-operating together to produce that rocket that went up there. That is a form of intelligence. And a scientist, a surgeon, to operate requires great skill, requires some form of intelligence. So is all that born of knowledge, born of experience, accumulated skills with their high discipline, all the result and the product, the movement of thought? And thought being limited, as we talked about it the other days, can thought bring about peace? Which has its own limited intelligence. Right? Or is intelligence nothing whatsoever to do with the activity of thought? You are following all this? Not only verbally but see the logic of it, the reason. Thought with its limitation has created the most extraordinary things in the modern world - the rapid communication, one does not know if you have been on a battleship or on a submarine, the complications of it, the extraordinary energy that has gone to build those things. And the dynamo, motors and so on. Immense energy, a great deal of thought, knowledge, has gone into all this and therefore there is that quality of limited intelligence because it is based essentially on thought, or knowledge. And is there an intelligence which is not limited? One must ask these questions if one wants peace. One must ask these essential questions. Not only peace, a way of living with great depth, with great beauty and it is only that quality of intelligence that can bring this about.

That is, can there be peace without love? Do you understand my question? Can there be peace without a sense of compassion? Can there be compassion if one belongs to a certain sect, religion, group and so on? You understand my question? If I am attached to my particular conditioning - as a Hindu, Muslim, Christian or Buddhist - I can read the books that talk about compassion as being essential. There is no end to making of books - right? Are we all together? Or am I talking? So where do I find - where does one find this intelligence, or come upon it? One cannot possibly cultivate that intelligence. You can cultivate the limited intelligence in the world of science, biology, mathematics, art and so on, that can be cultivated carefully, day after day, until you have that extraordinary skill. But is compassion, with its extraordinary intelligence, is that cultivable?

Then, as it is not, you cannot cultivate day by day love - right? So what will you do? If you want to live peacefully, deeply, without a single shadow of conflict between each other, what shall we do? Or, not do?

One has to go really very deeply into the question of desire, will and love. We have talked for half an hour. I am not answering the questions. So perhaps we can do this on Saturday and Sunday. We have a lot to talk about, not only that, intelligence, love and the whole problem of pain and sorrow and death and meditation, religion, and all that we have to talk about. So the speaker had better pick up the questions!

1st QUESTION: You spoke on Tuesday about goodness. But I am still not quite clear about whether the quality of goodness or evil is outside - is an outside agency, or forces existing in the world, or only a projection of our thinking.

You spoke of Tuesday about goodness. But I am still not quite clear about whether the quality of goodness or evil is an outside agency, or force existing in the world, or only a projection of our own thinking.

Right? The question is clear? The questioner, as we understand it, wants to know is goodness and evil something outside, nothing to do with ourselves, but putting ourselves aside does this goodness exist in the air, as it were, and the evil outside? Is it totally independent of our human beings? You understand it? This is what the questioner is asking, if we understand it rightly.

There have been wars - sorry to talk about wars - there have been wars for thousands upon thousands of years. There has been killing of human beings by the million and that killing has created immense sorrow. Is that sorrow outside, separated from us? We have our own sorrow, our own pain, our own anxiety, our own sense of goodness and badness - or if you like to use the word 'evil'. Apart from that does evil and goodness exist - exist? You understand? What do you think? As the questioner asks: is it our projection, our prejudice, our sense of the good and the bad? Or is there evil, something separate altogether from human endeavour, human existence?

This is a very serious question this. It is not just a flippant question.

People have talked about goodness for years. Aristotle, I believe, talked about it, Plato and before Aristotle, Plato there was the ancient Hindus. And before them there was somebody else talking about it, enquiring. The same thing as we are doing now. The evil that man has created. The goodness that man has pursued, the ideals and the conformity and something that exists outside of us. There are people in the world, like the terrorists, like the Imperialists, the great conquerors of the world from Ghengis Khan, Napoleon, you know all the rest of it, they wanted power, power by hoping to unify Europe. The church, the Catholic Church has hoped to unify all Europe by dogma, rituals, belief, torture and all the rest of it. Wars. And those exist still, that feeling - right? Or do you object to that? And there have been a great many people who pursued goodness, not, not people didn't know them, they were not famous people, they were people who said, "I will live a good life." - not the good life in the modern world with good meals and good drinks and all the rest of it, but the good life of austerity, not just putting on a loincloth, or one robe. Austerity is something entirely different. And they have pursued that and the building of that goodness, though those people have died and gone, must exist. Haven't you found when you enter a house, a strange house, the atmosphere of it, no? One can feel if there have been quarrels in the house, there has been violence, there has been perpetual conflict in that house. One can feel it. So it is outside - right? Do you object to that? So there is goodness and that which is called evil or bad, it exists in the world part from our own contribution to it. And one can become highly sensitive to all that and put an end to our own conflicts, divisions, holding on to opinions, and saying, "My opinion is a fact" - you know the regular process of holding on to something and battling for it.

All this requires a very careful observation, perception of oneself, perception of one's own activities, behaviour. Either one contributes to goodness or to the so-called that which is bad.

This is rather a close question this, near the bone!

2nd QUESTION: Do your schools, here, or elsewhere, give the students an understanding of the total human problem, the immensity of human life and its possibilities?

Do your schools (underlined) (laughter) - here or elsewhere give the students an understanding of the total human problem, the immensity of human life and its possibilities?

The question has been put to the speaker, so take a rest!
(Laughter) First of all the speaker helped in various countries, in India there are five schools and there are going to be other schools, and there is one school here at Brockwood, and one in California, at Ojai. They are not the speaker's schools. They are the schools where not only the speaker and others have helped to bring it about. So it cannot be called your school. I know K's name is used but it is not his personal school. And that wouldn't be correct or true. It is a school - all the schools in different parts of the world have been built or come together with hundreds of people working for it. You understand? It is not just one person. That would be terrible, you couldn't do it. There are schools in India that have existed for over sixty years, which we helped - the speaker helped to bring it about with the help of others. One in the North near Benares, and the other in the South near Madras, and so on. And there is one here. And one in California.

Teachers, educators are like you and me. They are human, they have their own personal problems, their own difficulties, and the students come already conditioned by their parents, by their neighbours, by other children, and come to these various schools. And the teachers are also conditioned, unfortunately. And you are asking a question if the total human understanding of life, the immensity of human existence and its vast possibilities. First of all do the parents want this? Do you understand my question? Generally the parents want their children to have some kind of degree, technological degree or human degrees, you know, various degrees, so that they can get a good job, settle down in life and marry, children, carry on. Generally that is what the parents want. And the children feel certain responsibility towards their parents, so they are more or less, especially in the Asiatic world, they conform. Do you want to go into all this?

Parents, the speaker has met them all, most of them - California, here - some of them don't care a damn. Whether they pass examinations or not, so long as the parents are relieved of their children. They send them off to boarding houses - you know all that - in England too. And they hardly have any relationship except - with their children except in the summer holidays, or winter holidays. And the responsibility of the educator becomes immense. And to teach them, to help them to understand the immense - the immensity of human life, the vastness of existence, not only one's own personal existence but existence, nature, the animals, the whole universe. That requires not only a capable mind, brain and enquiring into that, and also teaching a particular subject - you understand? Because as society now is if you are a good engineer you get a better, good job. So the students also wants a good job, they don't want to become a saleswoman or salesman in a shop. So they want a good job. So their whole concentration, if one can use that world, is to getting a good degree, A level, O level and all the rest of it. And there is the pressure of society which you all have created. And there is the pressure of the parents and so on. You understand the difficulties of all this? And if you understand it very clearly and deeply, will you join us? No, careful, you can't just join because you want to join. You have to do something. You have to be a good cook, good gardener, oh yes, good teacher, good parent. You want this. Don't leave it to us. The educator needs educating, as the parents need educating, so do the students. It is a process of living, working, co-operating, feeling together, not battling with opinions. And this requires a great deal of energy, and which parent - and there are many parents - at Brockwood School, I believe there are fifteen to nineteen nationalities - and that school is not what it should be, but it will be. We are working for it. Help us - you understand? I am not asking you for money. That is easy stuff! But join together to create something together.

3rd QUESTION: Would you enlarge on what you mean by saying that the future is now? Is it that the seeds of the future - seeds underlined - of the future are contained in the present? Or that the future already fully exists on a different time scale?

Would you enlarge on what you mean by saying that the future is now? Is it that the seeds - underlined - of the future are contained in the present? Or that the future already fully exists on a different time scale?

We certainly vary our questions, don't we! This is a very complicated, like all human problems, question. Apart from scientific fiction and the theories which the scientists have about time as a series of movements and so on, apart from the demand that the future be comfortable, safe and happy and all the rest of it, what is time? Can we go into this together? Together. Not just I speak, the speaker says something and you agree or throw it out. This requires really very serious enquiry.

What is time? You can see time as a movement from point to point - right? To go from here to your house, to your home, there is a distance to be covered which will take time. That's obvious. And also time is the whole movement of the past - right? - in which is implied all the traditions, accumulated traditions handed down from one generation to another - their knowledge, their books, how to play the violin and so on, the whole movement of this enormous past is there, of which we are - right? We are the past. The past being memories, you are the whole movement of memory now. Right? That's a fact. So you are a bundle of memories, whether you like it or not, that is a fact. Without those memories, pleasant, unpleasant, remarkable, satisfying, fulfilling, all those memories are in the present. And without those memories you would not exist. You may exist as a vegetable - no, probably trees have their own way of responding, we won't go into that. So you are - we are, each one of us, memories. Which is, the whole process of accumulation of knowledge, responses, reactions, judgements, condemnations, acceptance, and so on, this whole process which has brought about, not only biologically, subjectively, is what we are now. We are after forty, fifty thousand years, all those centuries, that vast sense of time, is now. Because you are that. That is clear, isn't it? And that is the future if there is no break. That's simple surely.

A very simple example: tribalism has existed from the beginning of time. I belong to that tribe. It still exists in Africa, and which exists in every country, glorified as nationalism. It is still tribalism. Right? And that tribalism is dividing people, holding on to one's beliefs and all the rest of it. So that is the whole accumulation of a group, or a tribe, or a nation, a community, is the past. Right Sirs? And if you consider after fifty thousand years of human existence on this marvellous earth we are about the same - right? Psychologically, subjectively, inwardly, we are still very, very, very primitive. You may pick up a telephone and talk to the other end of the world but what you say is still rather primitive. (Laughter) Either it is business, or cursing somebody, or talking to somebody and saying, "Darling how are you?" It is the same process that has been going on, much more difficult in past centuries, now it can be done in a second. So the past is now, is what we are, and what we are after forty thousand years - you understand? How extraordinarily - time has not changed us - right? Be honest to oneself. We have made so-called progress technologically. Immense progress, incredible but inwardly we are somewhat very, very little, on the frills perhaps, at the core we are barbarous, primitive - right? Killing each other, all the rest of it.

So time - please listen - time has not changed us. Right? Do we see this? So evolution has not changed the psyche. On the contrary it is making it more and more strong. The psyche being the whole accumulation of memories - racial, national, tribal, religious divisions. The ancient Sumerians, the ancient Hindus, they never called them Hindus, but it doesn't matter, and the Egyptians and from those forty, fifty thousand years we are still, after evolving we are still primitive. Time is going on. Time is a movement. So the future is what we are now - right? We will have wars, now we know how to kill millions of people at one drop, we hate each other, we compete with each other, we are angry with each other, seeking sexual fulfilment, or different forms of fulfilment. They have done this - you understand? - and we are still at it. And the future is still what we are now. So the future is now, not the seeds of it, the actuality of it. So is it possible to radically change all that? Not allowing time at all - you understand? You understand my question? Time has not changed us, evolution has not changed us, different organizations have not changed us, different religions have not changed us, suffering has not changed us. And we said time will help us to change. I am coming to that Sirs. Give me a little time! (Laughter) A little time!

So we are saying, if one looks to time, that is tomorrow, to bring about a change then it is futile hope - right? That's clear.

Therefore you have to enquire: what is change? Is change in terms of the future? Is change something from that which is to something else? Please go into it, don't... I am this, I will be that. I will be that means future, brought about by desire which is the essence of will, desire is the essence of will. So you say, "I will do something later", "I will change gradually" - right? "I hope to become noble", "I will get rid of my opinions" - you follow? All that implies that you are looking to time to change. So we are asking what is change in which there is no time? Do you understand Sirs? The moment I say to myself, "I will change", you have already admitted the future. Right? "I will become", "I will change", "I will flower", "I will love" - all that admits time and time has not changed us - right? Because we have evolved for fifty thousand years and that vast space and experience has no deep effect on us at all.

So is there a totally - please understand this - totally ending of something which has been, now. You understand? Wait! Suppose I am greedy - you know what that means, of course everybody does - greedy, envious - perhaps envy is a better word. I am envious. I can rationalize it, say it is natural, it is cultural, it is part of commercial process of gaining and losing - production, and all that stuff. So I can say, "I am greedy", and man has been greedy from the beginning of time - right? And time has not changed me at all. Because through greed we have created this appalling society, both commercially and through envy, which is comparison, we have destroyed each other. This is a fact. And can that envy end instantly, not "I will gradually" - you understand my question? Have I made the question clear? Is there an ending - ending - and not a continuity? A continuity implies time - right? Oh, come on Sirs.

So can one not allow time at all to enter into the world of change? That change means ending. Ending not knowing what will happen because what might happen is still hope, time and so on. Is it possible to end envy, instantly, completely, so that it never exists any more? Yes, Sir! That's why it is very important to understand the nature of time. Time is a movement, like thought. And time is necessary to learn a language, to acquire a skill, time is necessary to go to the moon, time is necessary to put a warship together, or a dynamo, or a motor. But psychologically, subjectively, if we think in terms of time and change there will be never change. See what is happening. You have had United Nations at one time - no, League of Nations, now you have United Nations, another blow up will be another kind of... another United Nations. But it is the same process - you understand? Reordering the same misery in different forms.

So is it possible not to have tomorrow? To look at life, to live with that life which has no tomorrow at all.

May I go on to the next question? You see that implies enormous things. You are not really understanding this thing, time. A drum is tuned carefully, and because it is tuned, because inwardly, inside it is empty, and when you strike on it it gives the right note. And to have that inward quality of nothingness but highly sensitive, then you have something extraordinary. The speaker is not enticing you into something. He is not persuading you, rewarding. There is no reward or punishment.

4th QUESTION: Why do you not find value in prayer?

Why do you not find value in prayer? Do you find value in prayer? Would you kindly... would you. I don't know why you accuse me of not having any value in prayer. Why do we pray? You know that there are a whole group of community, or monks who are perpetually praying. One group finishes praying, another group takes it up. And we also pray when we are in difficulties. When there is a great crisis in our life we want to pray, or say, "Somebody help me, please". You know that joke of a man hanging onto a cliff? He says, "Please, God, save me" and God says, "Have faith and jump!" (Laughter) And the man who is hanging on to the cliff says, "Isn't there somebody above that still?" (Laughter) Sorry!

Why do we pray at all? This has been going on, praying in the Christian world, in the Islamic world, and in a different way in the Buddhist and Hindu world, praying. To whom are you praying? To an outside agency? Outside agency being God, or the Lord. The Lord according to different countries and cultures and traditions. The Almighty of different concepts? To whom are we praying? And why do we pray? Does prayer answer our difficulties? In some cases when you are praying, not merely using certain words, chanting and so on, but praying silently without words, you understand what I am saying? - perhaps you might get an answer because your whole brain has become quiet. And in that quietness, in that stillness of the brain without the movement of thought, you find an answer. And then you say "I must pray more and more". Which is, you have achieved, you have gathered some experience and that experience has brought certain result and you like those results and so you keep this going! Then it becomes a habit and you have lost everything.

Why do we pray at all? We are not condemning or saying it is all right, but we are questioning the whole thing, with certain scepticism, with certain quality of brain that says give me the reason, not just emotional reactions. And one is in great difficulties. There is great crisis, pain, sorrow, insoluble. And at that moment we look to somebody to help. And the somebody is not my husband, wife, children, and my neighbour, or somebody across the street, because I know them too well, they are also in the same position as myself. And so I turn to some outside agency. Outside agency means not something that is organized by thought, God, Christ and in India it is another deity and so on. I pray on my knees because I can't solve this problem at all. I cannot resolve my sorrow, my pain, my loneliness, and so I gradually begin to depend on something externally. Either it is the doctor, psychiatrist or God. They are all the same, the moment I want to be helped. One may call saintly prayer, the other he says, "Well, that's mundane" - you pay ten pounds and you get, you know what happens. I don't have to go into all that. So they are both the same, all the same. So why do I do this? Because I want to be helped. I am not able to solve the problem. Or I think I am not able to solve the problem. It is very painful, devastating, it disturbs my whole life and I want someone to calm my being, to help me to overcome this. And this has been done for forty, fifty and more thousands years. It was the thunder, lightening before, then it was the worship of trees, then it is now the worship of symbols and images. Not much difference.

So I have to ask: why do I want help? Is it not possible - it may sound rather cruel, but it is not, the person who is always asking for help becomes weaker and weaker and weaker, duller. Then he becomes - he then becomes utterly dependent on something, either on drugs, or on people, or on ideals, ultimately his concept of God. Whether it is a drug or God it is still along the same lines because you want to be helped.

Now we are asking ourselves: is it possible for me to solve my own problems without a single aid from another? Which requires a great deal of stamina, energy, to go and say, "Now this problem of envy, what is envy, it is always comparison, and a little more than comparison". The craving, the want. And can that end without time? Then I don't have to pray. Then the person who is like that is totally free from all contamination of thought. So it requires the understanding of fear to be able to stand completely on your feet. And that is now slowly being denied. Drugs, cocaine, heroine and all that is spreading in the world. We are bored with life and we want substitutions for life. And so prayer is your own desire to achieve something which will be most gratifying. An easy way to live without any understanding. It is much more complicated than merely the statements of the speaker. You see we are all so petty, small minded. And if we could step out of that, not tomorrow, now, then life is something that is endless, immense.

It is now ten to one. Ah, here is a good question!

5th QUESTION: When you are no longer physically with us (laughter) - what a pity! - what are those of us who understand your message, even if only intellectually, to do? Do we continue working on ourselves and forget the rest of the world? Or try to spread your teachings as we see it?

When you are no longer physically with us - why add 'physically'? - among us what are those of us who understand your message, even if only intellectually, to do? Do we continue working on ourselves and forget the rest of the world? Or try to spread your teachings as we see it?

(Laughter) Need I answer this question? (Laughter)

Sir, it is your message, not mine. It is your book, not mine. If the way you live is the message, if you live in the way we are talking about, timelessly, that's - your very living is the life. That doesn't depend on anybody. K - it is one fact in life, we are all going to die. That is an absolute, irrevocable fact. And the future is now, death is now. You understand? That is the ending is now, not in ten years time, or fifty years time. And if one lives that way your very living is the message, it is not K's message, it is yours. Then your life is spreading. The very living, the way you live, you then spread that which you are living. Not spread that which someone else has said. You understand? So very, very simple, this. Beauty is yours, not somebody else's. We had better stop now.

May I get up?

BROCKWOOD PARK 3RD PUBLIC TALK 1ST SEPTEMBER 1984

May we go on where we left off last Sunday? We were talking about various problems of life, not technological problems but human problems. Our psychological hurts, the wounds that one receives from childhood which we carry throughout life. And these hurts prevent us from having real relationship with others. And these hurts bring about fear. We resist every form of further hurts, therefore we have to build a wall round ourselves and thereby become more and more isolated, neurotic and so on. We talked about that. That we have created an image for ourselves about ourselves and these images whether they are political, religious or one's own psychological images, that is subjective images, are the cause of these hurts. They are also the images that are hurt. And we talked about relationship. How important it is to have really good, healthy, rational, without any conflict between man and woman and so on. And we went into that fairly deeply.

We talked about fear last Sunday and the whole problem of time. We said time is the movement of the past, modifying itself in the present, and the future is what is now. So we said all time is contained in the present. If one could really deeply go into that question, the nature of time, the nature of thought and time is thought, we talked about that quite considerably. And if all the present, if all time is contained in the now, then what is change, is there any change then at all? And what is action? And what is also relationship when there is no tomorrow? Tomorrow and the further thousand tomorrows are contained in the present. And if there is no radical change in the present the future is what we are now. We are, as we said, a whole accumulation of memories, we are memories, gathered through thousands of experiences, knowledge, from experience, and that knowledge is limited and therefore all knowledge, whether in the past, the present, or in the future, is always limited. And thought, which is also the response of memory, that thought is also limited. So we are going to enquire this morning, several things like morality, justice, whether it is possible completely to end sorrow. And if there is time we will also talk over together what is the nature, what does it mean to die? And also we would like to point out this is not an entertainment, intellectual, romantic, sentimental. This is not a propaganda by the speaker. He is not inviting you to any theory, to any ideology, to any form of persuasion. And also we would like to point out that he is not a guru and all that nonsense.

So we should talk over together, that is, you and the speaker investigate together. And therefore when that investigation is true, deep and continuous, then it is your own, then it is nothing to do with the speaker. As we pointed out quite often, the speaker is merely a telephone, and what he says is important - important in the sense that it covers the whole of our human existence psychologically, subjectively, inwardly, and therefore if we could think together, explore together, take a long journey together, then that journey, that investigation is yours, therefore it is your own understanding, not the understanding of what K is talking about. That is very clear.

Then we should talk about morality. The word 'morality' means behaviour, manner, habit according to any kind of culture, environment, and is there a morality that is not time-binding? Can we go along with this together? A morality that is not within the field of time. Our morality is relative. Our morality, which is habit, custom, manners, behaviour, all that is either born of thought and thought being limited, therefore morality is limited, relative, or it is brought about through various cultures, environment and so on. All that is relative and therefore in the field of time and thought. Are we together in this? And we are asking: is there a morality which is action, manner, that is not within the area of time and thought? One thinks this is important to discover because on that is freedom. Freedom per se, for itself, not freedom from something.

So we ought to talk over that first perhaps. What is freedom? Is freedom a reaction from bondage, from loneliness, from every form of depression, anxiety, loneliness, despair and so on? If there is a reaction from those and you call that freedom then that is not freedom, it is merely a response to a condition. Freedom implies also, as we understand it now, is choice. We can choose to come here, or go there, choose between various jobs, functions and vocations. Choose whom you will marry or not marry and so on. Choice implies confusion. And choice is not freedom. Freedom is not a reaction to a condition. So is there such freedom? Are we together in this? I hope the tent is not too hot, or you are comfortably hot.

So this is really a very serious question one must ask of oneself: whether freedom is from bondage, or from the prison which we have created for ourselves, away from the prison, and therefore it is still within the area of the prison. If one is in a prison, both physically and inwardly, subjectively, then the physical control being enclosed within a certain area, and to escape from that one calls freedom. And psychologically one has built a prison for oneself by one's own desires, one's own anxieties, loneliness and so on. And freedom from that is still within the area of that prison, psychological prison. Are we together? Therefore it is not freedom at all. So is there a freedom that is not a reaction, a freedom per se, for itself, not away from something, or from something?

So one must understand for oneself why we are always trying to escape or to rationalize, or to go beyond that which is. If one understands that which is, understand not merely intellectually, verbally, but see the depth of it, see the truth of it, the substance of it, the vitality of it, then observe, perceiving that and remaining with that and explore into that movement, learning, not memorizing, from that, if one goes very deeply, then there is freedom per se.

Now morality is still within the area of time and thought. I think you will agree to that. Depending on the countries, cultures, religious conditioning, national bondage and so on. So that is a relative morality. Is there a morality that is totally free from all time and thought? Are we following this? Or is the speaker talking to himself? And to find such - or to discover it, or to live with that sense of timeless morality, morality not put together by thought and therefore limited, relative, passing, and to go into that very deeply, as we said, time must be understood, the nature of time. Time is a series of events and movements. Now time is also the whole accumulation of forty thousand years, or fifty thousand years of human existence on this earth with all their experiences, racial, tribal, religious fears and so on, all that is the past, the tradition. And that past is now operating, working, which is the past is conditioning us. And the future, the tomorrow is the continuation of the past, modified but it still has its roots in the past. And if there is no radical, fundamental change now, the tomorrows will still be what is now. So the tomorrow is now. The future is now - right? I think it is fairly simple to understand this. We have lived on this earth, according to the biologists and scientists, for fifty thousand years, more or less. We have supposed to have evolved through that time, through that long duration of time. Both physically, biologically, and also all the content of our consciousness. And during this long period of time we still remain very primitive, barbarous, cruel, destructive, wars. So we have changed very, very little because we are still violent, appallingly violent - terrorists, wars, all the things that are going on in the world today. And this has been going on for fifty thousand years, more or less. Perhaps we didn't kill a million people with one bomb. We killed another with a cudgel, an arrow but still the killing instinct of other human beings is still with us. So after all this long evolution we are still barbarians. And we shall remain barbarians - I am using that word, one is using that word in the real sense, not in the Roman sense. The Roman sense was anybody in the ancient Rome who does not belong to the Roman Empire, or who didn't speak Latin and so on. We are using that word 'barbarous' in the sense that we are extraordinarily primitive, self-centred, amazingly violent, incredibly violent and brutal. In our gesture, in our words and so on. We are still tribalists - the British, the French, the Indian with their division of Sikh and all the rest of it. And if we are that now after centuries of evolution we will be still that in the tomorrows. So the future is now. Right?

And is it possible to change now, completely, without the concept, the idea of tomorrow? And if there is such fundamental timeless change that is true freedom. And when there is freedom of such a kind there is no fear and therefore there is no all the invention of gods and rituals and all that disappears.

And we ought also to talk over together: what is suffering? Why human beings, who are technologically so vastly advanced, so capable, both intellectually and physically, why after all these years and centuries, why we have not ended sorrow. We all suffer from the most highly sophisticated individual to the most primitive person, uneducated and so on. We all suffer. For various reasons - suffering from lack of food, from lack of clothes and so on, in that physical sense. And there are thousands and millions of people in India and elsewhere who have very little to eat. And also there is the suffering of millions of people through wars, what is happening in North Ireland, Lebanon and so on, Afghanistan and India. And that suffering of wars, of thousands and thousands of years ago wars continue. And those wars have created immense suffering for mankind. And also there is suffering if one loses one's friend, one's - with whom one has lived for many years. And also there is suffering of not fulfilling, not achieving, not becoming and so on. So there is the vast human suffering of which we are. That suffering has existed for thousands of years. And also there is personal suffering, the limited suffering. We don't think that is limited suffering because it is ours, my suffering. So what is the cause of suffering? Why haven't we resolved it after such a long duration of time? Are we at all aware of this great suffering of humanity? And also this suffering of each one of us? And when we become aware it is a great shock, something that nearly paralyses one. All suffering makes one's own outlook narrow, petty, very destructive. And why is it that we have not solved this question?

Christians have avoided this question. The Hindus, including the Sikhs and all those tribal divisions, or religious divisions, they have explanations as Karma, that is what you do you sow and so on. Everyone has some kind of explanation for suffering. But the explanations, the causes of suffering, if we merely explain it, put it into words, as we shall presently, knowing that the words are not the feeling, the actuality of pain, so the word is not the thing. The explanation, the descriptions are not the actual. So if we are caught in the words then we shall not be able to understand the substance, the quality, the depth of suffering. So first can we be free of words? This is important because words condition our thinking. Words like Communist, or Socialist and so on, they have already - those words have certain significance and we accept those significances and thus we are conditioned by words.

Audience: (Interrupts)

K: Sir, would you kindly let me finish the talk. We asked last Tuesday and Thursday, we answered many of the questions that have been given, not all the questions because that would be impossible. There were two or three hundred questions. That would take perhaps several weeks. We can't sit here for several weeks. At least we can't.

Audience: But you were talking about suffering and being irritated. It is suffering, isn't it?

K: What Sir?

Audience: Talking about suffering and getting annoyed, irritated about suffering.

K: Would you mind Sir, you ought to have put this question the other day. So if you will kindly forgive me I will go on with what I wanted to say. I hope you don't mind.

There is this suffering. Is the word like fear brings fear? The word itself. Or is fear free from the word? Like love. That is a word, but that word is not the actual. So the word suffering does it shape our thinking? Therefore one has to be very careful, if one may point out, that we are not a slave to words, which is quite difficult. Father, mother, wife, husband. Those words have tremendous significance. And we are - those words shape our thinking. Words have immense power, either destructive, or words that have to be understood, the depth of it, the meaning of it, the quality of it, the tonality of it.

So we are not dealing with explanations, descriptions, or the words that can entangle us. We are trying - we are, not trying, actually, we are endeavouring, going into the question of what is suffering.

When we suffer there is intense pain, not only physical pain, but the subjective, psychic, inward pain. That pain acts on the nerves, our whole thinking is a process of shrinking. And it awakens us to a sense of desperate loneliness. We are saying facts not imaginative statements, facts. What is. And that sense of shock, sense of loneliness, brings the urge to find some comfort, a sense of wanting to be helped. Don't you go through all this? And the desire to be helped is one of the causes of suffering. You understand? We are always seeking help. That is why most of you probably are here. We want to be helped with our problems, with our secret desires conflicting, with our secret longings and so on, which causes pain, discomfort, a sense of annoyance and so on. And we want to be helped. When we want to be helped from another, whether it be the priest, the psychiatrist, and so on, we then become dependent, we then become attached to that dependence. And that is one of the basic causes of suffering. Right? Please this is important to understand because all our gods, our prayers and so on are the demands of every human being throughout the world seeking help. And therefore when one is being helped one becomes weak. If you are constantly depending on some kind of drug, pill, to escape from suffering, pain, then you become more and more dependent on those drugs, pills, doctors. I hope there are no doctors here. (Laughter) If there are, we need doctors but we are talking about dependence. And we are saying that where there is dependence there is attachment. And attachment is one of the causes of sorrow. When I am attached to my wife, to a building, to some ideological concepts, I am attached to it, I cannot live without them. They mean so much to me. My God, my faith, my belief, my ritual. If I depend on all those, and when they are questioned - like they should be questioned - when somebody becomes sceptical about all that then you suffer. So can there be total freedom, not a reaction from all kinds of attachments? Attachment is to the memories of pleasure - are you following? - sexual pleasure, attachment to it, holding on to it. And the pleasure of power and the pleasure of knowledge, and being attached, holding on to that as though there were something concrete. And where there is this attachment there must be sorrow.

And why are we attached? We are questioning. We are enquiring into this. We are not saying you must not, or you must. The speaker has no 'must' or 'don't' - it is up to you. And we are asking: in attachment there is desire, and what is desire in all that? Perhaps if we have time we will go into it. So can we, knowing the nature of time, that is tomorrow is now, and if we - there is no ending of attachment tomorrow will be still - we will still be attached, therefore we will still be suffering - you understand?

So is there an instant ending of attachment? Not allowing time to enter into the ending of it. Time is continuity. Right? And the gradual process of time is, "I will gradually get rid of attachment, gradually become non-violent" - all that stuff is nonsense. So suffering is synonymous with attachment. And we are attached because we are so lonely, we are nothing in ourselves. We depend on books, paintings, on other people's knowledge. The whole religious world is based on other people's experience, and experience is always limited, but they have become sacred. One doesn't know why but they have become sacred. A printed thing is never sacred! What you - and so on one won't go into all that.

And suffering also, suffering comes when there is self-centred pursuit - right? Self-centredness, egotism, selfishness, is very, very limited. It is always living in a small little area of one's brain. The brain has extraordinary capacity, as you see it in the technological world. Immense capacity, limitless capacity. And when we are self-concerned, as most people are (coughs) sorry - the self-concern is very limited and therefore it brings conflict. Anything that is limited must inevitably bring conflict. When we say, British, French, Indian, American, Russian, it is all just very limited geographically, nationally it is a form of tribalism. And that is why wars - one of the reasons of wars is this limitation. So attachment to a person, to a concept, to an image, to some form of knowledge, must inevitably bring trouble, disturbance, sorrow with its pain. And also where there is this self-centred outlook on life, life being so extraordinarily vast, that limited outlook, that limited way of living must inevitably bring sorrow. And is there an ending to sorrow? Completely ending. Because without ending sorrow there is no love. So we should consider, go into the question of what is to end. The finality, the ending of something, not the continuation in a modified form of what has been, or what is.

So what is ending? Ending immediately a habit, a manner, ending. Not "If I end this what will I get from that?" - you understand? Are you interested in all this? Really? Or is it just a form of amusement?

Have you ever really enquired what it is to end? Have you gone into that question of terminating something and discovering what happens after if you end? Isn't that death? We will come to that presently.

So we are saying where there is suffering there is no love. And is it possible to end all sorrow? You might say what effect has that ending of sorrow, if one is free from that sorrow completely, then what effect has that on the world, on the majority of people? That is the usual question one asks. Isn't that rather an unreasonable question? First end it and see what happens. Not say, "If I do this what effect will it bring about?" One feels that is a way of escape. One person has affected the world. Right? One leader in a war, from the most ancient of times until now, they have affected the world. One or two propagandists in Christianity have affected the world. Peter and Paul. One person, like the Buddha, has affected the whole of the Asiatic world. He didn't ask the question: "If I do this will it affect mankind?" - such an absurd question. Forgive me if I use that word. So when there is an ending of sorrow there is love. And then we have to ask: what is love? That word, like every other good word, has been spoilt. Is love desire? Is love pleasure? Is love a movement of thought? And time? One can ask these questions, the speaker is asking that question but the asking of that question if one doesn't remain with the question, with the words, then we can go into it very deeply. We asked if love is desire? To us it is, love is pleasure, love is something possessive, power, position, status. So we ought to consider together first what is desire. Perhaps some of you, if you will kindly accept what the speaker is saying, have heard this word - the explanation of what is desire and perhaps you say, 'Yes, get on with it.' But to find out for oneself very deeply the nature and the structure of desire, and see its relationship in life, and find out why human beings throughout the world are driven by that, in various ways, for power, for position, for - you know, all the rest of it. Desire, that extraordinary energy. The desire to go to the moon and how they worked at it, 300,000 people probably worked at that one project, to go to the moon. And then put a silly flag up there. (Laughter) If the British put their flag up there it would be still silly.

So what is desire? Look at it yourself. Why is it that we are so - we are slaves to desire. The various religions in the world have said desire must be eliminated, or one must transcend it, or that desire must be concentrated on a figure, on a symbol. Suppress every other desire except the search for God. The monks have been doing this for centuries. But desire is a flame. You can't burn it out. You can't put it out. It is there. You can have desire for something noble, and so on. It is still desire. And desire is causing havoc in the world. Each person desires his own way of living, his own way of thinking and so on. That is so obvious.

So we must understand very deeply, not intellectually, but profoundly what is desire. Not escape from it, not rationalize it, not find a substitute for it, but what is desire? Desire is born out of sensation. Physical sensation. Sensation of perception, seeing, visual seeing, the hearing, the tasting, those are all the reactions from any sensation. Those are normal healthy sensations. And we have tried to suppress those natural sensations by fasting, discipline, by attributing all that, or turning all that energy towards a particular object and so on. So out of desire - out of sensation there is desire. That's obvious. That doesn't need further explanation. One sees a thing in the window, a blue shirt, or a nice dress; the perception, going inside and touching it and sensation and then desire to own it, or not to own it. Right? It is as simple as that. And what makes - how does that desire arise out of sensation? You understand? You see something beautiful, a woman or a man, or some beautiful dress or a car, or something, and there is sensation. Then what takes place? Then thought creates out of that sensation the image of you owning that car or that shirt. When thought creates the image out of sensation, at that second desire is born - right? Can we go along with this? Do you refute that? That is, I see a beautiful thing, a beautiful picture, or a statue, or a woman, or whatever it is. We are not discussing what is beauty, that is a different matter. And there is sensation immediately. Then thought says, "I wish I had that". Thought then says, "I will get into the car and drive" - you understand? Then desire is born.

Now, just a minute. So the question is: is it possible for sensation and thought not to immediately - for thought to immediately give shape to sensation? You understand? Do we understand what it is? That is, to have a gap. If one has - we will use the word time interval between sensation and thought creating an image out of that sensation, if there is a little space between the two then desire becomes something entirely different. You understand? So that requires extraordinary attention, extraordinary awareness of the sensation and the image immediately being formed so that there is an interval. And you can then extend the interval, not suppress it, not try to transcend it, not try to escape from it. When you understand something very deeply it becomes very simple. A mechanic, to him it is very simple the whole motor, but to us it is rather complicated. But if we see this it becomes extraordinarily simple. Then there is no conflict between desires - right?

So we are saying, asking: is love desire? You answer that question for yourself. Desire, we said, is sensation, and thought giving shape to that sensation. The remembrance of pleasure and the demand for that pleasure, more and more and more. So is love pleasure? Is love jealousy? Possessiveness, attachment, fear? Or is love something totally - please just listen to it - totally outside the brain? The brain is the response, is the centre of all response of nerves, thought, emotions, reactions. One doesn't have to go to the brain specialist. This is so obvious. And if love is within the centre of that, which is conflict, pain, desire, anxiety, all the nervous responses, then how can love exist there? And if it - if all that is free you wouldn't even ask whether it is outside or inside. You understand? And what is the nature of compassion? The word itself, passion for all, and all that business. What is compassion? Is compassion pity, sympathy? Compassion helping the poor? We are examining the word, the meaning, the significance of that extraordinary word. Where there is suffering and the ending of that suffering is passion. You understand? Passion. And with the ending of that suffering there is passion. And is that passion part of compassion? You understand? Can there be compassion if one is attached to one's religion, one's guru, one's beliefs, anchored in a particular sect, in a particular belief? You understand? I am asking. Or is compassion something that is entirely per se, for itself, free from all that? And being free from all that, therefore it is supreme intelligence. And where there is compassion, love and intelligence then action, behaviour, morality, is entirely different, it is not then time-binding. And to live with that, not just words. To live with that extraordinary sense of depth and passion, with that intelligence.

We also ought to talk over together death. Are you tired at the end of this?

Audience: No.

K: No? Why? Please you say, no, but why? Is it that you have not expended energy? Your energy, not the speaker's energy. Your energy. Going into this so deeply. So pursue it to the very end, not stop in the middle of it. That requires tremendous energy. And we waste our energy. And to enquire into this question, which demands a great deal of energy to go into it, the nature of death. The total ending of something. Actually to find out, not just agree, or disagree, or say that is hopeless, or saying how can I end everything in the modern world, and so on and so on. But if we understand at its greatest depth the nature and the ending of something, that brings tremendous vitality, energy. And that you need that energy to meditate, to find out what is truth, what is sacred, if there is something permanent, something that is timeless and so on. It requires not only physical energy but the energy of intelligence. Intelligence is not, as we have often repeated, the energy of thought. Thought has been tremendously intelligent, creating a computer, in putting this television, or the microphone, or the implements of war, surgery and so on. Thought has been extraordinarily intelligent, but that intelligence because it is born of thought, it is limited. As all painting, all sculpture, all books, all poems and all the gods put together, that is still limited. And that limitation causes conflict, war, conflict between us, each one. So to enquire, to explore into the nature of death, see the immensity of it, not just personal dying, or someone else dying, the immensity of death, which is the ending. And if there is an ending what is there? And so on.

So we will continue with this tomorrow morning, if you don't mind. May I get up please?

BROCKWOOD PARK 4TH PUBLIC TALK 2ND SEPTEMBER 1984

Next year we will have to have a bigger tent!

One hopes that you have had a pleasant week, instructive, learning and exploring into oneself the immense depth and width of life. We are going to ask several fundamental questions this morning. Perhaps some of you have not asked these questions and it may sound rather extravagant or nothing to do with our daily life or that it is merely theoretical. The speaker does not in any way indulge in theories, ideologies or any sense of - have any sense of beliefs, dogmas and all that business.

First of all what is it to be honest? Really, deeply honest. We are honest to some extent, that is conformity, which we call honesty to some fictitious belief, faith or ideologies. But honesty seems to be to one where there is total integrity. That integrity is not mediocrity. Mediocrity - the meaning of that word, according to the dictionary is one who goes half way up the hill and never goes to the top of the hill. Perhaps we go to the top of the hill in science, in all the technological world, but we never go to the very top of it, top of our own enquiry, of our own understanding and find out for ourselves the depth and the beauty of our own lives. Where there is integrity, that is a wholeness, a sense of - not completeness - but a sense of non-fragmented way of life - out of that comes great honesty, unyielding, not easily persuaded or dissuaded but living a daily life in which is this holistic way of conducting oneself - morality - and all that business.

We were going to talk over this morning, together, as we have talked about several other factors of life, like conflict - whether conflict could ever end in our daily life, and we also talked about fear, sorrow yesterday morning, and the nature and the depth and the strength of love, compassion and intelligence. We ought to talk over this morning together what is death, what is immortality and what is continuity. In the understanding of all that we have to really delve very, very deeply into the nature of time and thought, which we have been doing from the beginning of these talks.

Time we said is the past, modifying itself in the present, and the future is the present having its roots in the past, continuing, which is the future. Right? So the future is now. That is, we have evolved according to the biologists, scientists - we have been on this earth as human beings evolving for 40, 50 thousand years. During that long interval of time, during that duration, we have accumulated a great deal of information, knowledge, experience and technologically we have advanced in the most extraordinary way but inwardly, psychologically, subjectively, we are very primitive, barbarous, and we have not fundamentally changed, are violent, brutal, competitive, terribly aggressive and so on. And unless one deeply understands, not merely theoretically, but the nature of time, when and what is time.

Is time a continuity? - I am this... I will be... When is time? You understand? Is there time in the very act of doing? Is there time in the very action of life? You plant a seed in the ground and it grows, flowers, bears fruit and dies and while that seed is growing, moving, living, there is no concept of time. It is only we human beings have the concept of time. And when we are doing something completely, holistically, without any sense of fragmented outlook or behaviour, the doing - in that act of doing there is no time. Haven't you noticed all this? As you are sitting here and listening unfortunately, or fortunately, to the speaker, as you are listening very attentively, which I hope one is doing - this attention has no time. Right? It is only time comes into being when you say, "What is he talking about? I don't quite understand", - or make a tremendous effort to understand - then time comes into being. But when there is actual listening, seeing very clearly, then there is no time at all. And understanding this we are going to enquire together, the speaker means together, all of us together, into the nature and the depth and the beauty of death.

When one used the word beauty, what do we mean by that word? What is beauty to you? Because we are saying beauty is truth, like love is truth. What is beauty? A beautiful person, a beautiful painting, great mountain that is immovable, full of snow, valleys, shadows and the deep blue depth of a vast valley. The great paintings, the ancient sculptures and when we look at them we say how marvellously beautiful they are. Is beauty something in the beholder? - in the observer? - in the seer? Or is beauty when the observer is not? Do you understand? Are we meeting each other? Have you had enough? Enough is enough. Because in our daily life there is so little beauty. We want to have a beautiful body, beautiful face, and you do all kinds of things to bring that beauty about, exercise, so-called yoga! Can we go into that word a little bit?

In the ancient days yoga was taught only to very, very few and in doing yoga other factors entered into it, a meditation. In the ancient days, I am not talking now about what is considered yoga.

And it was an act of dedication to find out what is truth, what is the way of living according to that truth and so on. But now yoga has become a commercialized affair and if you can't do anything better you are going to teach yoga. Those people who are experts at it are accumulating money, you know the whole commercial process. So yoga is something that demands a great deal of attention - in the old days - a great deal of self observation, self-recollection and so on. Not just having a beautiful body.

So, what is beauty, we are asking. When you compare two great paintings, the comparison between that painter and that painter, or that poem or the other poem, or this book or that, what is actually going on in one's brain? You are comparing, you are judging, you are evaluating. Some have said Keats is the greatest poet who ever lived, or if he had lived longer he would have been far greater than Shakespeare, and so on. And when you put aside all the paintings in the world, in museums and in your own house and so on, and when you see the great mountains with their snow and against a blue sky in the morning light, there is a certain quality of silence, certain quality of breathless adoration and the perception of that immovable - the deep valleys, the lakes and the rivers and the forests - when you see all that the very greatness of it drives away our petty little life, may be for a minute, or for a few seconds: when the self is not beauty is. Are we together in this? When you look at all those mountains, rivers and the beautiful architecture, or read a poem, some part of the ancient literature, the Old Testament or the Upanishads and so on, to observe all that without thought, without the me interfering with your perception, then there is that quality of immense beauty which is not put together by thought.

And to come upon that beauty is to enquire whether the self, the me, the persona, all the characteristic tendencies and all the troubles, pain and anxieties, can all that be put aside, not make that which is great make you put everything aside, then that greatness becomes merely a toy. But if one can put all that aside, the very nature of the self, the psyche, then there is that immense beauty which is really timeless existence. Now let's go on to something else.

Which is: what is death? We are going to enquire together what is death? And also we are going to talk over together what is it that continues? And the continuity is a movement of time - right? Are you following? So we must ask also: is there anything permanent in us, in the world, outside of us, is there anything imperishable that cannot be destroyed, that is endlessly permanent? Man has asked this question from the most ancient of times because he sees round him everything in a flux, everything changing, gaining, losing, being destroyed and put together again. And we also see in ourselves changes, not only biologically but psychologically - we are all moving a little bit, bit by bit, moving, changing, not fundamentally changing but a little. So seeing all that, this constant change, dying and being reborn, one asks: is there anything permanent, lasting, and what is that thing that lasts? Is it a continuity of what we are? You understand? Does this all interest you? Don't just say "Yes", that's no fun! But if you are really interested in this because it has to do with one's life, one's daily life, and is there anything in one's daily life that is permanent? There is always at the end of that so-called continuity, there is death. One has lived 90 years, or 50 years or 10 years and during those 80, 90 years there has been a long continuity of memory, continuity of activity, labour, striving, aspiring, hoping to make oneself more excellent in some skill or other, or inwardly, psychologically, to find something that is not always changing. We see all this - an ancient oak dies - everything seems to come to an end, dies, and observing all this one asks oneself, as I hope you are asking yourself, is there something permanent that will last, that will have its roots in some place, that will always grow, will always be immense, permanent? Right? Don't you ask all these questions? Or I am asking for you? And so we are asking: what is continuity? What is it that continues in our daily life? Is it not memory, a series of associations and a continuity exists also between when one thought is silent for the moment, another thought arises. There is an interval between those two thoughts and in that interval we observe a sense of timeless existence for a second, but that interval between two thoughts is still thought in absence. Thought then is absent between those two intervals but is still two thoughts. We will go into all this. Is it too complicated? Probably it is.

Is continuity immortality, because it is one of the things man has sought - immortality - that which is beyond death. And the ancient books, like the Upanishads, the Vedas and the Hebrew literature, the ancient and the Bible, Shakespeare, Keats - they are in a way immortal, they are going to last when you and I pop off, they will be there - is that immortality, the name, all the things associated with that name - so what is immortal? Mortality, we know what that means, man dying, human beings coming to an end. And human beings have asked this question: is there immortality, a state in which there is no death at all, not a continuity but - because continuity implies time and where there is time there is death, where there is immortality, if there is such a thing, then there is no death at all, there is no ending or beginning. Are you going into all this? I'll go into it if you are interested, we'll take the journey, if you are not, it doesn't matter. I hope you are comfortably seated.

What is death, what does it mean to die? - and that is an absolute certainty that we are all going to die, and what does that mean? One has continued from childhood till the moment of death - continued with one's thoughts, with one's ideas or new set of ideas, thoughts, trouble, pain, anxieties, loneliness and all the travail of life, that is what we call continuity. And in that process time is a factor. And when we die all the Asiatic world believes, at least some of them, majority of them, including India and so on - this continuity will continue after death - which is called rebirth, reincarnation. That's a very comforting idea! What you sow you reap. If you are not good in this life then in next life you pay for it, or you pay for it now. Right? Cause and effect. Causation separate, as though it was separate from the effect. We are saying causation has in it inherently effect. It is not two separate things. I wonder if you get all this? This is not philosophy, it is not some kind of exotic nonsense. You can see one's own life, if you do something ugly it has its own reward, or its own pain. If you do something correctly, without the self, then that brings about its own goodness. So continuity is a form of causation, effect and the effect becomes the cause, and so it is a chain. And we are asking what is death? Biologically, when the brain has not sufficient blood, breath and so on, it decays very rapidly and that is called death, physical death. Either this is brought about by some kind of disease, natural old age or some accident. We acknowledge that because that is inevitable but we think we have gathered all this experience, all my life I've worked, all my life I have tried to do this and that and what is the good of it all if I come to an end of all that? Don't you ask these questions? So we have to ask: what is it to end? - to end something in which there is no continuity. You understand? To end. All right.

One is attached. There is no question about it. Attached to an idea, to a book, to a saying, to your money, to your wife, or to some ideal and so on. One is deeply attached. We are not saying it is right or wrong. One is attached. Death comes along and says sorry! - cuts that attachment, and we want that attachment to continue, and without it - when there is freedom from attachment we feel a bit lost. So we are frightened of death because it may end everything that you have. Following? And one asks: what have you? At the end of 90 years, I am asking this of myself, and you must be asking of yourself, what is it that you have? - a house, a bank account, if you are lucky enough or unlucky enough, a wife, a husband, the pleasure of sex and all the conflict of one's life? Actually what has one in your life? What have you? And if one was very, very honest, you need to have a house, you need to have a shelter, food clothes, that is natural, normal, otherwise what have you? A series of memories - right? A bundle of memories and nothing else. In those bundles of memories there are all aspirations, wanting, not wanting, seeking God - you know all that, or not seeking God, or saying "There is only this" - that is pleasure, money, power. The mundane activities of one's life - that is all one has and death comes along and says, "You can't carry it with you, it all has to come to an end". End of that, end of all your memories, all your experiences, all the things one has travelled through life to accumulate. When a scientist, a great scientist, not employed by the government, but free of governments, those scientists they have accumulated an extraordinary amount of knowledge, skill, great penetration into matter, questioning what is matter, what is energy and so on, they too die, like us, and at the end of their life what have they? And the Totalitarian dictators - what is going on in Russia - all the dictatorships in the world - what have they? You understand? We want what we have, which is memories, to continue - right? And when those memories come to an end, which is the fact of life, which is death, and knowing all that, one is frightened. You want to know what happens after, and you want to know what happens afterwards according to your already existing knowledge. Right? You understand? You follow this? You are adding more knowledge by asking what is there when one dies. All that one wants is more knowledge, more certainty of knowledge. And knowledge is limited. You understand? Because knowledge is based on experience which is limited and knowledge is memory and so thought is limited. So we keep going round in that circle. And is there an end to all this? And that is death. And so one asks: is it possible to live with death, not commit suicide and all that silly stuff, but to live with something, live with an absolute fact. The absolute fact is that one is going to die and that death means the ending of knowledge and memories. So can one live with death and not keep the two apart? You understand? You follow all this?

What does it mean to live with death? What does it mean to own nothing? You may have money, a wife, children but to hold and wanting that which you have held to go on, and death means you hold nothing.

Can one live a life in this world, living and death together? That means living and dying every day. Oh come on Sirs. So it means never, never becoming something, becoming something psychologically, which is so-called psychological evolution. In that there is time, a continuity and the memory held in the brain, of course. And living with death means that which has been accumulated, gathered psychologically, ending everything everyday, not at the end of the day but at the beginning and in the middle and all the time. You understand what that means? Never having roots in any place, never having a sense of ownership, possession, attachment so the brain becomes extraordinarily alive, free, and therefore no fear.

We said we would also talk about meditation: religion, meditation and what is creation. Are you interested in all this?

What is religion? What is the religious mind? What is the mind? - we must differentiate. The brain is the storehouse of all memories. It is the seat of all reaction and action, response, both neurologically, psychologically, subjectively - it is contained as consciousness in the brain. Right? It doesn't matter. I'll go on, just play with me, will you? And so the brain is limited although it has got infinite capacity because in the technological world look what they are doing. And psychologically, subjectively, we are very limited. That's part of the brain. The mind is something entirely different. The mind is outside the brain. This requires a great deal of enquiry but perhaps we cannot go on with that because our time is limited.

Like love is not within the brain. It is outside. If it is within the brain it is a process of thought, memory, recollection, remembrance, pleasure, pain and all that, which is the brain contains all consciousness. Our consciousness is its content. There is no consciousness as we know it if the content is not. Right? The content is our pain, loneliness, beliefs, faith, hopes, aspirations, anxieties, all that is our consciousness. And that is contained within the skull. So love is not that surely. Love is not a battleground, love is not a reaction, or a remembrance, and when there is reactions, remembrance, and all that, it is still in the brain and love is, if that, love is still part of the brain, that's reaction and all that, then it is not obviously love.

So we are going to investigate together what is religion. Why has man spent such energy, great enquiry, suffered, fasted, tortured himself to find truth, to find that which is timeless? Every religion has done this. That is, every religion says: to find that which is immense, immeasurable, you must do certain things, deny the flesh, control, discipline, give your life, dedicate your life to that and only then you will find it. They put this very simple statement more complicatedly but that is what religions have said. And in the Christian world as in the Hindu and the Buddhist world, and the Islamic world, a figure, a symbol, in the mysteries of a not too light a place, cathedrals and churches with all the rituals, accepting, obeying - all that is called religion - agreed? Is that religion? Or religion is something entirely different. Now we have intermediaries, the priest - between that highest and the so-called the lowest - he is the interpreter, like the psychiatrist, and the priest has played a great part in history from the Egyptians and before the Egyptians, the Sumerians and so on, the priests were the learned people and all that. And they have established certain laws, rules and if you are sceptical - and I hope you are - doubting, questioning, never accepting anything psychologically - except the policeman and the tax laws, otherwise to question, doubt, never psychologically obey without going into it, not belonging to any sect, to any guru, to any organized religion as Christianity, Islam, not so organized rather disorderly Hinduism and so on. If you put all that aside, if you can, because we are heavily conditioned by propaganda of 2,000 years, or propaganda has made your brain programmed to 3 to 5,000 years as in India and so on. If you can put all that aside, as one must if one wants to find that which is nameless, then what is religion? What is the quality of a mind or brain that has totally set aside all man's endeavour to find that, all his systems, methods, his systems of meditation, breathing correctly, cross-legged - you know all that. Those are all meaningless. To calm the brain, breathe properly, quietly, sit in silence, in a room or under a tree - that will not bring about that which is immense. So what is the quality of a mind, of a brain, that has set aside all this? It is untrammelled, it has not any bondage, it is free, completely free. That word freedom also has its root, etymologically - love. Freedom means love also, not sexual love, love.

So, is that possible when all the world is shouting, when all the world is being entertained by religions? Is it possible to live in this world daily with such total freedom from all tradition, from all knowledge except where knowledge is necessary? We are asking a really very, very difficult question because knowledge prevents true perception. From that arises: what is meditation? - not how to meditate. That word meditation and all the implications with that word apart from contemplation of Christians and so on, that meditation has been brought over by the gurus into this country, also spreading all over America and so on. They have their systems, their practices, their disciplines and the guru gets a lot of money out of it and all that business goes on. There are Hindu meditations, Tibetan meditations, schools of meditation - right? - Zen - the whole lot of them. What are they offering? What is meditation? - not how to meditate, or what system to follow. That is too immature, too childish but if you ask them deeply what is it to mediate, why should one meditate. The word meditation also, etymologically and in Sanskrit, means measure, not only to ponder over, to think over which is part of meditation, but also it means understand measurement. Measurement means comparison, now I am saying, the speaker is saying: where there is comparison there is no meditation. You understand? Are we following a little bit with each other? We are always measuring, the better, the more, the less and the greater. This whole movement of measurement, which is comparison, can that completely end, both psychologically and outwardly, that is part of meditation. That is what, when you are enquiring into what is meditation, it means not only think, ponder over, look and observe, but also it means complete ending of all comparison - short, tall, broad, wide, beautiful, not beautiful, all those are a pattern of the self. Where there is measurement there is self, right? So is it possible to live a daily life without any form of comparison? Then you will see for yourself the extraordinary quality of the brain. Then the brain itself has its own movement, apart from its own movement it has another quality, then it is extraordinarily stable, firm, it doesn't mean it doesn't yield but it yields in firmness, in strength. And meditation also means the freedom from the network of words and thought. Right? So the brain is not entangled with words, with patterns, with systems, with measurement. Then there is absolute silence. And that silence is necessary. Silence has its own sound. Have you ever listened to a tree? This is not some crazy question. Have you ever listened to a tree, an old tree, when the wind and the breezes have come to an end and the tree is utterly silent, no leaf is fluttering and then you listen to the sound of the tree. We were asked that question by a scientist. He accepted that, so you better accept it too - because you will love scientists, people who accumulate knowledge. But to find out the sound in silence and where there is this complete, absolute, not relative silence. The relative silence can be brought about through thought, through will, saying, I must be silent. That is not silence at all. There is silence only when there is freedom from all the things that man has accumulated. In that silence there is an enormous sense of vastness and immensity, you don't ask any questions any more. It is.

Then we ought to ask also a question: what is creation? If you say, "God created the world", then that is the end of it. That is one of the convenient statements in various books. That is no answer. But if one begins to ask, "What is creation? How has all this come into being, the tiger, the deer, the marvellous tree, and the majestic mountains and the great rivers of the world, and this vast population, how does all this happen?" We must distinguish between creation and invention. Creation is totally different from invention. Invention is still within the field of knowledge. The man who invented the jet, he moved from knowledge to knowledge. He invented, all the new inventions in the technological world is based on knowledge. Perhaps a second of not thinking and then something comes but it is still within the area of knowledge. Creation is not invention. Creation is there only when knowledge has come to an end. You understand all this? Then that creation is, if we can use that word, 'nothing'. Nothing means not a thing. A thing in Latin and so on is thought. When there is no - when there is absolute silence of thought then there is totally a different dimension.

May we get up please.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST CONVERSATION WITH MARY ZIMBALIST 5TH OCTOBER 1984 'CONDITIONING'

MZ: Sir would you like to go into the basic question of conditioning, its effect on our thinking and what we can do about it?

K: I wonder what we mean by conditioning. Is it the tradition, not only the present day tradition, but centuries and centuries of tradition that has been handed down from generation to generation, and is this conditioning the whole background of civilization, culture, the social impacts and the many, many experiences that one has? Does all this contribute to the conditioning of the brain? Not only all this but also the various impressions, the propaganda, the literature, the television, all this seems to add to the background, to the conditioning of every human being, whether he is very, very, very poor, uneducated, most primitive, and to the most highly educated, sophisticated human beings. This conditioning seems to be inevitable. It has been a factor that has endured probably for a million years, or fifty thousand years. If all that is the conditioning, or the background of every human being, and that obviously shapes our thinking, controls our reactions and responses, and our way of behaviour, conduct, and the way we eat and think and feel and react, and all that. That seems to be the normal conditioning of human beings.

And that has shaped our society in which we live. The society is what we have made of it, what each individual throughout the million or fifty thousand years has according to their desires, ambitions, conditioning to their personal tendencies, to their aggression and so on, all this has actually contributed to the society in which we live. So the society is not different from us. That is a fact we seem to forget when we talk about society. Society is something that gradually has come into being, to which we have given all our endeavour, all our struggles, all our imprints and tendencies. This is the society, and society is us. It is not two separate entities. I think this must be clearly understood. The Socialists, perhaps some of the Capitalists, and certainly the Communists, tried to change the social structure by laws, by various edicts and so on. It appears that they forgot the human quality, the human conditioning and tried to shape the outward structure without taking into deep consideration the human character, the human behaviour, the human structure, the condition of his brain which has been programmed for thousands of years. And it seems to us the conditioning of the human being is to be examined much more thoroughly, gone into very, very deeply and find out whether the human condition can ever be radically changed, and so the social structure which is born of human conditioning can also be changed. That is the real problem, not only the freedom of human beings who have been programmed - we are using the word programmed in the sense that a computer is being programmed by experts, by specialists and so on, so we human beings, whether we live in the most primitive, brutal state, or the highest educated, scientific community, we seem to neglect, or even forget that this psychological structure, the subjective entity, who has brought about this really rather insane world, whether that human condition can ever be radically changed. That is the chief concern in your question surely.

So we must go into that, not only superficially, the outward signs of it, but also the human brain, which has evolved through thousands upon thousands of years, that brain itself, through tradition, through religious propaganda, through the propaganda of the politicians and the leaders, the leaders of religious hierarchy, the philosophers of India and Asia, all that has to be taken into account. Which basically means the brain of human beings has been shaped by experience, by knowledge, by propaganda and so on. If we are clear on that then we must inevitably ask, naturally, whether the brain can ever be cleansed - if we can use that word - of all the process of time?

MZ: Sir, am I correct in understanding that this conditioning of which you speak goes into the human consciousness before the birth of the human being? In other words he is born with a certain loading of condition, a certain content in his very brain that you would call conditioning. It is not only what happens to him in his actual life as he grows up?

K: Not only that. We have used the word consciousness, which is, if we can examine that for a while, that consciousness is all our reactions, responses, all our idiosyncrasies and tendencies, both biological as well as psychological, and all the beliefs, faith, the gods man has invented, the rituals, the daily routine of work with its boredom, with its mechanical responses; and also the fears, the anxieties, the pain, the depression, the elation, the intense sorrow, the loneliness, the uncertainty of the future, all that, and the fear of death and the continuity and all that is our consciousness. That consciousness, with its content, is the conditioning. And that conditioning is centuries old.

So the brain itself is the centre of all this. Though the speaker is not a specialist in the brain and all that, he wouldn't even claim that, it would be absurd, but he has watched very carefully, not only the way his own behaviour and other people's and so on, and has acutely observed, and one can see for oneself that the brain is the centre of all action, all thought, all our fears, all our tendencies, propaganda, the innumerable, subtle impressions, and all that. The brain is that. And can that brain, which has evolved through millenia upon millenia, can that brain ever be cleansed of all the time-binding quality? That is the real, the deep question.

Probably one never asked this question because the biologists and the others are really interested in research, in the quality of the brain, how the brain works, how the electrical responses and so on, but they never ask, not that they have not asked, some may have, but we human beings who are not professionals, who really live, ordinary, intelligent human beings, we never said, asked, or even enquired deeply, this brain which has evolved through a long duration of time, whether that brain can ever be free of its content? And that is the question we are asking now. Can the brain itself, which has been programmed, conditioned, ever ask that question? Or one really watches, very diligently, acutely, how the brain works in our daily life, how it reacts, how quickly its responses are according to its background, according to its knowledge, according to its tradition. And in watching these quick responses one discovers how conditioned those responses are.

MZ: Sir, would you include instinct in this area?

K: Instinct is part of our...

MZ: Is that conditioning?

K: Instinct is part of our conditioning, is part of our brain which has been programmed. My instinct sees a dangerous animal and it says, run, or kill or do something about it. I hope you are not killing. To kill that beautiful animal like the tiger, or the cobra in the field. One has watched these animals fairly closely in the wild and the most extraordinary things they are, not to be killed but to establish a relationship with them so that there is no fear in looking at them. That is a different matter.

Instinct, that is really quick response, is coloured, naturally by our past knowledge. That knowledge may be very, very hidden, subtle but without that knowledge instinct is not possible surely? Like intuition is another word which is used very often, again intuition may be the background of our desire, of our longing, of our hidden, deep recesses of one's own brain, which has hidden fears, hidden longings, hidden loneliness and so on.

So really what we should concern ourselves with, during this morning dialogue, is to see whether the brain, which has evolved endlessly through time, whether that time can ever free the brain? Or must the brain struggle endlessly in the field of knowledge, trying to ascend through knowledge to freedom? Of course it is so obvious knowledge can never bring freedom.

MZ: Could you say, sir, briefly at least, why this is so necessary? What is so terribly wrong with knowledge and conditioning? Why should the human being seek to change himself in that respect?

K: I don't know if we have time this morning to go into this question of knowledge. After all knowledge, to put it very briefly, knowledge is the result of experience, whether very limited experience, or experience from which you gather knowledge more and more and more, as in the scientific world. That knowledge is always limited. Anything more, or anything better is always limited because it is measurable, both psychologically as well as objectively. Anything that is measurable is limited. And knowledge must always be limited. I think this is so obvious. There can never be complete knowledge about anything. There may be complete knowledge about some dead thing, but a living thing, it is living, moving, changing and you cannot have knowledge completely about a thing that is constantly changing, moving. Knowledge is limited.

MZ: But that knowledge and that conditioning...

K: Knowledge is conditioning.

MZ: Yes, but still they play a very vital part in the life of everybody.

K: Of course, of course. Technologically and so on it is a tremendously important thing. It is there you must have measurement, comparison, evolving certain facts and moving, constantly moving. You can see what is happening in the technological world, you invent something one day and a few months later somebody changes it and adds more and so on, it is constantly being added to, where there is invention and so on and so on. That is quite clear that. And perhaps that same movement is carried over to the psychological realm where we consider knowledge is necessary. That is, in the subjective world we consider knowledge is essential to know oneself. To know oneself is really a very limited comprehension, because knowledge is limited. But knowing is a movement, not to know. I don't know if there is a difference between knowing and something which we know.

MZ: Could you enlarge a little bit upon that please?

K: The something which you know is static, to which you can be adding. And what you add to what is already, it becomes static, mechanical. But the constant knowing that is learning, not accumulating knowledge, but constant learning, moving, enquiring, exploring, pushing, pushing, pushing. That is not based on knowledge, it is a movement. Like life is a movement, whether it is the movement in a tree, in a small blade of grass, or in the most amazing animals like the tiger, the lion, and the giraffe, or the small insect. And it is the same life as in us. Therefore one has to respect life, not kill life.

So we must come back to our beginning, which is, can the brain be ever free from all the programmes we have received? And the speaker, K, says it is possible. It is possible only through watching, not condemning or accepting, but just watching the whole movement of your thought, watching the very activity of thought, watching the origin, the beginning of thought. And so in this watching the brain then becomes much more sensitive, not only to its own responses but sensitive to nature, to everything around one, to the world that is becoming more and more dangerous, and to the world of one's own psyche, so that there is a constant objective and subjective relationship, an interchange, never coming to a final decision. That is, never taking a position from which you move. And this requires not only a great deal of leisure in the sense, not doing it as a hobby, but it is part of life. One must have leisure to look at life. One must have this time to see what is actually happening, not what you wish or desire to happen, but what is actually in our daily life going on. And that watchfulness makes the brain extraordinarily acute, sharp, clear. And this clarity is really, if we can go into this very, very deeply, is total freedom.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND CONVERSATION WITH MARY ZIMBALIST 5TH OCTOBER 1984 'FEAR'

MZ: Sir, there is a subject you have talked about so many, many times but it keeps coming back and back in people's questions and preoccupations, and that is the subject of fear. Do you want to talk about that?

K: It is a rather complicated subject. It really requires a great deal of enquiry because it is so subtle, so varied and so abstract. And also it is actual too, though we make it into an abstraction. The actuality of fear and the idea of fear, which is the abstraction of fear into an idea. So we must be very clear what we are talking about. The abstraction as an idea of fear, or the actuality of fear. You and I sitting, and all of us sitting here, at this present moment we are not afraid. There is no sense of apprehension, or danger. At this instant there is no fear.

So fear is both an abstraction, as an idea, as a word, and also the fact. First of all let's deal with these two. Why do we generally make an abstraction of things? Why do we see something actual and then turn it into an idea? Is it because the idea is easier to pursue? Or the ideal is our conditioning? Or we are educated to ideas, or in ideas, not educated to deal with facts? Why is this? Why is it that human beings throughout the world deal with abstractions - what should be, what must be, what will happen, and so on, the whole world of ideation and the ideologies, whether it be the communist ideology based on Marx and Lenin, or the capitalists ideas of so-called free enterprise and so on, or the whole world of religious concepts, beliefs, ideas, and the theologians working these ideas out. Why is it that ideas, ideals, have become so extraordinarily important? From the ancient Greeks, even before the Greeks and so on, ideas prevailed. And even now ideas, ideals, separate man and they bring wars, all kinds. Why do the brains of human beings operate this way? Is it because they cannot deal with facts directly and so escape subtly into ideations? If one sees ideas are really very divisive factors, they bring friction, they divide communities, nations, sects, religions, and so on, which is, ideas, beliefs, faith, all that is based on thought. And facts, what are facts? What exactly is a fact, not an opinion about a fact, or opinion made into facts.

MZ: What is the fact of fear, sir?

K: I am coming to that. First we must establish the distinction between the idea of fear, the abstraction as the word fear, and the actual fear. The actual fear is the fact, not the abstraction of it. If one can move away from the abstraction then we can deal with fact. But if they are both running parallel all the time then there is a conflict between the two. That is, the idea, the ideology dominating the fact and the fact sometimes dominating the idea.

MZ: Most people would say that the fact of fear is the very painful emotion of fear.

K: Now let us look at that, not the idea of fear. So let us look at the fact - that is what I am coming to - the fact of actual fear, and to remain with that fact, which requires a great deal of inward discipline.

MZ: Can you describe what remaining with the fact of fear actually is?

K: It is like holding a jewel, an intricate pattern by an artist, who has brought this extraordinary jewel. You look at it, you don't condemn it, you don't say, "How beautiful" and run away with words, but you are looking at this extraordinary thing put together by hand, by cunning fingers and the brain that has brought this. You are watching it, you are looking at it. Turn it round, look at the various sides, the back and the front and the side, and you never let it go.

MZ: Do you mean that you just feel it very acutely, very sensitively, with great care.

K: With care, that is what happens.

MZ: But you feel it because it is an emotion.

K: Of course. You have the feeling of beauty, the feeling of the intricate pattern, and the sparkle, the brightness, and the sparkle of the jewels and so on. So can we deal with the fact of fear and look at it that way, not escape, not say, "Well I don't like fear", get nervous, apprehensive and suppress it, or control it, or deny it, or move it into another field. If we can do all that, just remain with that fear. So fear then becomes an actual fact, which is there, whether you are conscious of it or not, whether you have hidden it very, very deeply, it is still there.

So then we can ask very carefully and hesitantly, what is this fear? Why human beings, after this tremendous evolution, still live with fear? Is it something that can be, like a surgeon, operated upon and removed, like a disease, like cancer, or any other dreadful, painful disease? Is it something that can be operated upon? Which means there is an entity who can operate upon it, but that very entity is an abstraction of trying to do something about fear, that entity is unreal. What is factual is fear. And this requires very careful attention not to be caught in this abstraction of the one, who says, "I am observing fear", or one who says, "I must put away fear, or control fear", and so on. It is we are watching fear, not who is watching. The one who watches is also the outcome of fear. If this is clear, that the observer, to go back to our old saying, the observer is the observed, the thinker is the thought, the doer is the entity who is doing, there is no division. And so if there is no division, which is an extraordinary fact to realize, a fact, not an idea I must realize, it is an extraordinary fact that there is no division between the observer and the observed, and therefore there is no conflict. Conflict exists when there is the observer different from the observed, which is what most of us do and therefore live with perpetual conflict. That is another matter.

So can we look at that fear, and in the very act of looking, watching fear, one begins to discover the origin of fear, the beginning, what is the causation of fear. Because the very fact of looking at it is to see how it came about, not analyse fear because the analyser is the analysed. Not analyse, dissect fear but that very close, delicate watching reveals the content of fear, the content being the origin, the beginning, the causation because where there is a cause there is an end. Right? The cause can never be different from the result. So the discovery, or in the observation, in the watching, the causation is revealed.

MZ: Sir, the causation that you are speaking of is presumably not an individual fear, a particular fear? You are speaking of the causation of fear itself.

K: Fear itself, not the various forms of fear. See how we break up fear.

MZ: Yes.

K: That's part of our tradition, to bring about a fragmentation of fear, therefore be concerned only with one type of fear, not the whole tree of fear; not a particular branch, or a particular leaf of fear but the whole nature, the structure, the quality of fear. And in observing that very closely, watching it, in the very watching there is the revelation of the causation - not you analyse to find out the cause but the very watching is showing the causation, which is time and thought. Of course. That is simple when you put it that way. Everybody would accept it is time and thought. If there was no time and thought there would be no fear.

MZ: Well, could you enlarge a little bit on that because most people think that there is something. That there is - how can I put it - they don't see that there is no future, they think "I am afraid now" from a cause, they don't see the factor of time involved.

K: I think it is fairly simple. If there was no time, or if there was no saying "I am afraid because I have done something in the past," or I have had pain in the past, or somebody has hurt me, and I don't want to be hurt anymore - all that is the past, the background, which is time. And the future, that is, I am this now, I will die. Or I might lose my job, or my wife will be angry with me and so on. So there is this past and the future, and we are caught in between the two. That is, the past has its relationship with the future, the future is not something separate from the past, it is a movement of modification from the past to the future, to tomorrow. So that is time: this movement of the past, which is the past as I have been, and the future, I will be, which is this constant becoming. And that too is another complex problem which we won't touch for the moment. That may be the causation of fear, the becoming.

So time is a factor, is a basic factor of fear. There is no question about it. I have a job now, I have money now, I have a shelter over my head, but tomorrow or many hundred tomorrows might deprive me of all that, some accident, some fire, some lack of insurance and so on, as it has happened in this house. All that is a time factor. Not the ending of time, but see the factor that fear is part of time, not say, "Can I end time?" - that is a silly question. Sorry to use the word 'silly'. And also thought is a factor of fear. Thought. I have been, I am but I may not. The factor of thought, which is limited, which is another matter. Thought is limited because it is based on knowledge, knowledge is always accumulative and that which is being added to is always limited, so knowledge is limited, so thought is limited, because thought is based on knowledge, memory and so on.

So thought and time are the central factors of fear. Thought is not separate from time. They are one, they are not divorced, they are not separate. So these are the facts. This is the causation of fear. Now that is a fact, not an idea, not an abstraction, that thought and time is the cause of fear, not are. It is singular.

So a man then asks: how do I stop time and thought? Because his intention, his desire, his longing, is to be free from fear. And so he is caught in his own desire to be free but he is not watching very carefully the causation. When you are watching very carefully without any movement watching implies a state of the brain in which there is no movement, it is like watching a bird. And if you watch the bird very closely as we watched this morning that dove on the window sill, you watched all the feathers, the red eyes, the sparkle in the eyes, the beak, the shape of its head, the wings and so on, you watched very carefully, and that which you watch very carefully reveals not only the causation but the ending of the thing that you are watching. So this watching is really most extraordinarily important, not how to end thought, or can I be free from fear, or what do you mean by time, and all the complications of it, which is complex, But when we are watching fear without any abstraction, which is the actual now, and in that quality of the now, because the now contains all time, which is the present holds the past, the future and the present. So if we can listen to this very carefully, not only with the hearing of the ear, but listen to the word and go beyond the word, and see the actual nature of fear, not read about fear, but how watching becomes so extraordinarily beautiful, sensitive, alive.

All this requires an extraordinary quality of attention, because in attention there is no activity of the self. The self-interest in our life is the cause of fear. This sense of me and my concern, my happiness, my success, my failure, my achievement, I am this, I am not: this whole self-centred observation with all its expressions of fear, agonies, depression, pain, anxiety, aspiration and sorrow, all that is self-interest, whether in the name of god, in the name of prayer, in the name of faith, it is self-interest. Where there is self-interest there must be fear, and all the consequences of fear. Then one asks again: Is it possible to live in this world where self-interest is predominant, whether it is in the totalitarian world, with its search for power, and holding power, the capitalist world with its own power, self-interest is dominant, whether it is in the religious hierarchical catholic world or in every religious world self-interest is dominant and therefore they are perpetuating fear, though they talk about living with pacem in terris, which is peace on earth, they really don't mean it because self-interest with the desire for power, position, for its fulfilment and so on, is the factor that is destroying not only the world but destroying our own extraordinary capacity of the brain. The brain has extraordinary capacity, as is shown in the technological world, the extraordinary things they are doing. And we never apply that same immense capacity inwardly to be free of fear, to end sorrow, to know what love is, and compassion with its intelligence. We never search, explore that field, we are caught by the world with all its misery.

IN CONVERSATION WITH MARY ZIMBALIST AND RAY MCCOY BROCKWOOD PARK 14TH OCTOBER 1984 'RELIGION'

MZ: Sir, if you were willing, we would like to ask what to you is religion? You differ so fundamentally from most people's concepts of religion, we would like you to go into that, if you will.

RMc: You often speak of religion and the religious life but it seems not to be in the way that people generally speak or think of religion.

K: First of all it is really rather a beautiful day today, especially in the middle of October to have such a marvellous clear blue sky, with all the trees gradually turning into marvellous colours. It is really a very beautiful day. And I think religion is concerned with that too.

RMc: With beauty?

K: With beauty. I don't know what we mean by the word religion. There are so many interpretations of that word. There is the Catholic religion, the Christian, the Protestant and the innumerable divisions of Protestantism, and there is Buddhism, Hinduism, Sikhs and so on. So many religions in the world, organized, some are brutal, the Islamic world and so on. So what do you consider is religion, the word? Is it the search for human beings something outside of their own daily life, something other than their petty self-centred activity, beyond their cruelty, bestiality and their vulgarity and all the rest of that? Is it that human beings have always sought from the most ancient of times something beyond themselves? If we consider that, something beyond themselves, beyond their daily life, then that becomes a religion of escape, which probably most religions are, as they are now. It is not connected with their daily existence. It is based on belief, on a book, or on faith, or on some dogma, rituals, the repetition of daily rituals which goes on practically all over the world - incense, dressing up, fancy dress and all that. All that, prayer included, is called leading a religious life, going, as they do in India at one time three times a day to the temple, and the Islamic world five times prayer, and the Sunday mass and so on. So this is considered religious, or rather a religious attitude. We are questioning that.

I would like rather to question the whole nature and the structure of present day religion. There are so many sects. They have found that Christianity is very limited, so they go off to Buddhism, or to some kind of sectarian gurus and so on, the multiplication of this search for something other than the daily boredom, daily loneliness, the constant conflict and so on. This has been the pattern. Would you agree to that?

RMc: But underlying this that goes on in the name of religion, still it seems to be aimed at something that we need, that we want.

K: Yes, we said that. There is something that man is seeking, and gets caught in all this nonsense really, invented by various priests from the beginning, between god and man and they were the interpreters. At one time they were, they were the scholars, they were the people who wrote, who studied, who invented the language and so on. And there has been all the interpreters in between. If one rejects all that, as I do personally because it seems to me rather immature, rather trying to play, or pacify, or gratify human demand for something or other than this mundane life, so-called spiritual life.

MZ: Sir, are you saying that the fundamental search, the fundamental moving towards something, is a real one, it is not...

K: ...a real one, it is natural.

MZ: ...just an escape from the difficulties and the pains and miseries of life. It is something real in the human psyche?

K: I think really it is something in the human psyche, which is in constant conflict, facing constant problems and their solutions, the pressures, the poverty, the unemployment, the whole human modern existence. In spite of all this any thoughtful person wants to find out if there is something more. And he turns to parapsychology, miracles, you know, all that becomes extraneous as far as I am concerned. So if one discards all this, if it is possible, discard rituals, discard totally faith, belief, altogether put aside the spiritual hierarchal system.

RMc: Any authority.

K: The authority, which to me is a criminal act, to have in the world of so-called spirit an authority. That seems to be an anathema to me. So if we can put aside all that, if it is possible, and I think it is possible, not only possible, it is actual, then we have to enquire what is religion? What is the religious mind, or the religious activity of a human being, not away from daily life, not something outside our activity from morning until night? If it is concerned with life then we have to enquire: is it possible living in this modern world, with all the noise that is going on, preparation for wars, violence, and so on, we all know that, living in this world, in this state, wherever you are, is it possible to find out, not through others, not through some book, whether it be the Koran, or the Bible, or some ancient Hindu literature, sacred literature, but for oneself. And the enquiry into that is not a selfish activity. The enquiry, or the exploration, or if you like to use the word research, to find out if there is something beyond man's process of thought. Because after all thought has put all this together - the robes, the rituals, the demand for faith, the dogma, the whole thing has been built up carefully, with great deliberation, the whole structure of so-called religious way. Would you agree to that?

RMc: Yes, but religion seems to say in its commonly accepted sense that thought must be used to approach whatever it is that man is trying to find.

K: That is what we are asking. That we are saying, and also questioning whether thought, which has built this whole so-called religious structure, and also thought has built the extraordinary world of technology. It is the same thought. Thought in one direction, the technological direction, and thought seeking out something other than the daily boredom of existence, or the loneliness of existence, or the suffering of existence. Is thought the instrument? Because thought, perhaps you will disagree with this, but thought is essentially limited because thought is based on knowledge, memory and experience. So experience is limited, knowledge is limited now or in the future, as you can see in the scientific world it is always gathering more and more and more, and therefore when there is more it is limited. I hope I am making myself clear on this point.

RMc: Yes. Whatever there can be more of...

K: ...obviously. So thought is limited. And thought is trying to find out the limitless. It can invent, it can imagine and build on that imagination. Or say there is something and have faith about that.

MZ: So many people turn to, or come up with what they would consider perhaps revelation.

K: A revelation.

MZ: Which is what in your view?

K: These are words which have to be very carefully considered. What do we mean by revelation? Revealing what? Either a conditioned experience and therefore limited experience. And if I am devout Catholic and believe in what they say, dogmas, and all that, saviour, my thought is limited with regard to religion, being a Catholic - or a Protestant or whatever you will. And that limited thought, limited enquiry can never put, understand, or grasp the immense significance of that which is immense, immeasurable.

MZ: Then what can a person who wants to make this very fundamental enquiry, what is a person to do?

K: That is what I would like to discuss. Suppose I am one of those who has put aside completely all the religious structure, and hierarchical authority and all spiritual authority - they have no meaning to me personally - and so if a man like me says, now I want to find out, I want to really find out if there is something which thought has not put together. Thought has put together the computer, thought has put together the whole church, the books, the rituals. They are all limited. So a man like me says is there something that is not measured by words, first. Right? Because words are an expression of thought.

RMc: And are limited.

K: And so words have themselves become very limited. So one has to be greatly aware of the limitation of thought, of the limitation of words. And is the brain free from all this? Or it is still conditioned by the tradition, by the past, the background, as a Christian, a Hindu, Buddhist, Islam and so on, is one free of all that? If one is not free from all that then your enquiry has no meaning. You are going round and round in circles.

MZ: How can that be determined by the person?

K: That requires another enquiry which is, to do something per se, for itself, not with a motive. I do something in order to get something else. That is a very limited attitude or activity. So can the brain of an enquirer who has put aside all this, not because of a reward or punishment, but sees the futility of all this, the utter meaninglessness of all this, if he puts that aside, deeply, not just verbally or intellectually, or be caught emotionally, hooked up, as they say, in a belief and pretend that he is free. That has no meaning.

MZ: But that is a very dangerous moment for the enquirer, it seems to me, because he is apparently giving up certainties and beliefs, etc. and yet the subtle danger of something else still in that category coming in is very great.

K: No, you are saying something that he has given up, which is a certainty. But belief isn't a certainty.

MZ: People think of it as so.

K: Look, if you face Islamic religion, Hindu, Tibetan, Christianity and so on, it is now being shattered. People are running away from all this. And there is no certainty in all this, no security in all this, one may pretend, one may hope for, but in actuality there is no security, certainty. So the urge for security, psychically, subjectively, is one of the most dangerous things because one wants security, one wants to be certain, and that is the pitfall because you can find something and stick to it and say, "I am certain. I have had marvellous experiences and I am quite sure it is so."

So one has to have this quality of doubt. Doubt everything, your own experience, your own thinking and all the inhibitions, all the aspirations, all the imagination, doubt all that because it is one of the strange factors in certain religions, like Buddhism and Hinduism, doubt is encouraged, doubt. They say you must doubt, you must question. In Christianity that is taboo altogether. If you doubted the whole thing would collapse. The heretics, those who doubted were burnt, destroyed and so on. We won't go into all the past.

So can a human being, who has been nurtured in all this, educated, conditioned in all this, put aside all that? That is the first question, to me. To have a brain that has no problems, because a problem that is not resolved totally creates other problems, so the brain is constantly faced with problems, and so it is in travail, it is in conflict, it is perpetually battling with itself. So not to have conflict, then the brain begins to be free, and then begin to enquire. Otherwise you can't enquire. If you are a student, or a research professor, or enquirer into any material thing, you enquire, you research, you don't cling to anything. You don't cling to a former knowledge, or former experience, that is limited, you move on. But we don't do that.

So religion then is an enquiry and that enquiry has no path, no direction - you follow - it becomes extraordinary subtle. There must be no motive. If you have a motive you have already set the course.

MZ: Sir, are you also saying that the enquiry must continue, that you don't arrive at a point where you stop enquiring, or where you have an answer, so-called, but that spirit of continuing the enquiry?

K: This is rather a difficult question to answer. Do you enquire further if you come to something that has no space, no time? Do you understand? When we talk about enquiry, who is the enquirer? We come back to that old thing. The enquirer is the enquired. I don't know if I am making myself clear on that point. That is, I enquire into matter, through telescopes, through all kinds of experiments, I enquire. But the person who enquires is different from the thing he is enquiring. Right? That's clear. But here, in the subjective world, in the world of the psyche, the enquirer is part of the psyche, he is not separate from the psyche. If that is clear, then the enquirer has quite a different meaning.

MZ: Are you saying that then there is only enquiry, there is no enquired, or enquirer?

K: No, I would say there is only infinite watching. There is no watcher in watching, but the extraordinary vitality, and the energy in watching, because you have watched the whole psychological world, subjective world before you come to that point. And now when you are watching there is no background which is watching, there is only watching 'as is'. I don't know if I am making myself clear? Because you see that means in great attention, in that attention there is no entity who is attending, there is only the attention that has space, the attention that is totally quiet, silent, attention that has tremendous gathering of energy, and therefore there is total absence of the self-interest. And is that possible for a human being to reach that point? And human beings find this is terribly difficult, therefore you come along and say, "Look my friend, do this, do this, do this and you get that. I am your guru," - you are my spiritual authority and I am lost, I am caught in again. This has been the process, you can see it wherever there are the saints, the spiritual hierarchy which recognizes the saint, and this process goes on all the time. So man has been incapable of standing on his own feet, he wants to rely on something, whether it is his wife, or in a job, or belief, or on some extraordinary experience that he may have had.

So we are saying, I am saying, there must be complete freedom. That freedom is not so complicated. There is that freedom when there is no self-interest at all. Because self-interest is very small, very petty, very narrow and unless there is complete freedom of that, truth becomes impossible. And truth cannot be through any path, it is a pathless land. You can't go through any system, through any method, through any form of meditation to reach that. There is really no reaching, it is.

BROCKWOOD PARK 1ST CONVERSATION WITH IRIS MURDOCH 18TH OCTOBER 1984

K: How are we going to start? Will you please ask?

IM: Well I have a lot of questions, I have got notes of them here which I will consult if I may from time to time.

K: I think you had better speak a little louder.

IM: All right. And I will just start with one that interests me and we will see where we go because there is a lot that I would like to ask.

It is about the word 'experience' which you sometimes use in your writings as representing something which you think we should in some sense overcome. And you seem to connect the idea of experience with the notion of preconceived attitudes or dogmas or beliefs, which impede a kind of being which you would connect with a creative present existence. I don't entirely understand this. It seems to me that it is impossible entirely to...

K: ...wipe out experience...

IM: ...discount or escape from experience. But I would like just to stick to the term experience because it is such a very general word, perhaps there is a particular sense you want to attach to it, it seems to describe the continuity of consciousness which is simply characteristic of being human. Perhaps you could say something about that.

K: I don't know quite what you mean by experience. One can experience what one desires.

IM: You mean imagining it?

K: Yes. And also one can experience according to your conditioning. If I am a Buddhist, and a devout Buddhist, I can experience the state of that consciousness which was supposed to have been Buddha's.

IM: Well this is a rather special sort of experience isn't it?

K: Yes. So I am just questioning what we mean by experience. I can experience anger. Is there a difference between the experience and the experiencer?

IM: Well this is a difficult question about how one is going to use the concept because the word experience in English describes something fairly vague. It can mean either, I had a strange experience yesterday, or it can mean the continuity of your conscious life and your relationship to your past. Or it can mean something momentarily. But I think what you are wanting to mean by it is something which connects your past as it were, and at one point I think you describe desire as experience, whereas love is not experience.

K: Love cannot be experienced.

IM: Could you just explain what the distinction is.

K: Could we go into the question of who experiences the whole thing, anything, whether it is the experience of something imagined, or experience your past tradition and images, past figures and so on? You understand?

IM: You say, who is the experiencer?

K: Who is experiencing?

IM: Well this is a difficult question too, isn't it? If one were to ask a passer-by in the street he would say the individual.

K: Yes, I am experiencing.

IM: Yes these experiences belong to me.

K: I had an experience of an accident this morning in a car. I experience so many things.

IM: But then, I mean, if one were to pursue the matter beyond that kind of answer, one might say well of course one must distinguish between different kinds of experience, and one would then, I think, I mean let's say I can think of say three kinds immediately: there is the experience of my past life, you say of somebody, "He is an experienced man" meaning he has lot of experiences of some kind perhaps, and then you would say that experience is just the continuity of my consciousness, going away into the past.

K: Or continuity of one's consciousness. What do you mean by the word 'consciousness'?

IM: Well then let's pursue the matter in this way, in that one would say consciousness differs at different times. And the word experience I would think would differ whether you were talking about just ordinary life. Let's put it this way: partly you were sort of imposing yourself on the world and you say "I am doing this", "I am doing that", and this would be perhaps experience. But also there could be an experience where you aren't really present.

K: That's it, that's just it. Where the experiencer is not is there an experience, which you can then remember and say "This is it"?

IM: Well I would think that people have what I would call selfless experience when - well for instance when they are looking at a great work of art.

K: Yes.

IM: I am not sure about whether if they are with somebody they loved very much, whether one could say this, perhaps. I think these two cases are very different. But what do you think?

K: I would like to go into this question, if I may, who is experiencing all this? Whether it is the ordinary things, or the most complicated forms of experiences, or so-called spiritual experiences. Right? Who is it that is always experiencing? Is the experiencer different from the experience?

IM: Well we would normally say so wouldn't we because one may believe in the continuity of an individual person.

K: Yes, that is what is commonly held. Now we are going to question that. That is, is the experiencer, or the thinker different from his thoughts?

IM: Well again we would usually say so because one could say. "I order my thoughts". This assumes that I am deciding, I collect my thoughts.

K: Yes. But is that I, who orders his thoughts, different from his thoughts? He may order them, he may discipline them, he may control them, he might say, "This is right", "This is wrong", "This must be done", "That must not be done", but is the controller, the person who disciplines, brings order, is he different from the things which he is ordering about?

IM: Well, let's make a distinction here between ordinary language where one speaks about, I mean in a Law Court, or something, somebody is responsible for something they have done. They can't say, "Well I am a different person now" or something. In the ordinary sense of the continuity of the individual and somebody being the subject. But leaving that aside, I mean one doesn't have to be philosopher or hold a religious view to think that one is divided, one is a divided person.

K: That's it.

IM: And there are times when one part of you disapproves of another part.

K: This dualistic process, is there a difference between - we come back to the old question - the good and the bad?

IM: Well nothing could be more fundamental, yes.

K: It comes to that.

IM: I mean this seems to me the nature of the real world.

K: I know. The real world is we have divided the good and the bad, and the thinker, the experiencer from the experience.

IM: Yes, this would follow in that if you condemn yourself for doing something then you are divided.

K: I should not, I must, I will become, and all the rest of it, it breeds division in oneself. I would like to ask, if I may, is that experiencer, or the thinker different from the thing he is experiencing or the thinker different from his thoughts?

IM: Well if this is an appeal - the word experience comes up to my mind - if this is an appeal to how I think about myself, I would say, leaving aside the common sense, the ordinary language, sometimes yes, and sometimes no. I mean that sometimes one is consciously judging oneself, dividing oneself, sometimes there is nothing except a single something or other.

K: A single movement.

IM: A single being or something.

K: So is not the experiencer the same as the experience?

IM: Well it sometimes seems so.

K: So when we say. "I am envious", then there is a division.

IM: Yes.

K: Then I try to control my envy, or rationalize my envy, or justify, or suppress and so on, but the 'I' is envy not separate from it.

IM: Well I would have thought it is and it isn't. There are two things that you say in what I have read and what I understood from our last conversation, perhaps I can put it this way. There are two things which you seem to me to say which I don't understand how they connect or harmonize. I mean one of the things is I think, which I liked very much, you said that if I think that I am - if I condemn myself - well put it this way: if I think that I am envious, say, now the word 'envy' suggests something which is bad so one wants not to be envious perhaps. If I see this I must start, not in a kind of ideal selfish way that doesn't exist but in my real being which is the envious person. I feel great sympathy with this. But then you also say that there is no process, I must be good, not become good, the idea of becoming good is in some way an illusion.

K: That's right.

IM: Perhaps you could explain, I mean it seems to me that in the one case you are suggesting that I must start from a goal which is a long way from my conclusion, my conclusion would be to become non-envious. The other way you are saying that there is no process of becoming.

K: For me there is no psychological becoming at all.

IM: Yes, well this is what I don't understand because... go on.

K: Go into it. First of all let's come to this point: we have divided the world, and in myself, the good and the bad - right?

IM: But you don't dispute this. You don't object to this?

K: I don't refute, I am just looking at it. Is the bad related to the good? Or is the good totally divorced from the bad? They are not related at all. If they are related the good is still part of the bad.

IM: Well if you are asking me would I agree with that, I am not sure. I mean I think we think about good and bad in several different ways, don't we? We think of bad weaving into good as if it were a spectrum, with goodness is here say and badness here.

K: Yes, a continuity of the bad.

IM: A continuity of the bad. We also think, I think, of good, if we think of it as perfection, of being really outside the world altogether.

K: I don't know perfection - being good, whole, good health, good man, good - you know the word 'good'.

IM: Well let's say good man then.

K: Is that good part of the bad? Does the good know the bad? Or the good is the outcome of the bad? Then if it is the outcome then it is still part of the bad. It's like a child being born, it is still part of the mother.

IM: Yes, some people would say that they are opposites which exist in relation to each other, yes.

K: Yes, now I say, are they opposite? Or they are totally, they have no relation?

IM: Well, there is a very clear different between a bad man and a good man. So in that sense they are very different. On the other hand in a human being good and bad grade into each other, and sometimes you don't know which is which.

K: No, that's what I am questioning. That is what I would like to discuss with you. I feel, I mean to me the good is totally divorced from the bad, like love is not related to hate.

IM: Yes, yes. I mean in ordinary fallen human conditions of course love often occasions hate.

K: Of course, of course.

IM: Whereas you say love is not related to hate, you mean that it is an entirely different kind of concept?

K: Love has no feeling about hate, it has no relation to hate, it is not encompassing or embracing hate.

IM: Wait a minute. Let me ask a supplementary question. Would you say the same about love and desire? If we took those two words.

K: Yes, I would.

IM: You say yes. You regard desire as something connected with psychological becoming?

K: Yes.

IM: Love is...

K: ...entirely something different.

IM: Well now, how does this different thing come to one? I might say now why should it concern me? What am I to do about it?

K: It is simple enough. There is conflict. If there is conflict, desire always brings conflict, but love can never bring conflict. Love has no conflict, it has no sense of conflict.

IM: Yes, you are using the word 'love' in an ideal sense, which is unusual.

K: No, I am using it, say for instance, I don't know if you want to go into it. The brain is the entire centre of desire, feeling, anxiety, pain, loneliness - you follow? The consciousness is all that. The belief, the fears, the sorrow, the loneliness, the anxiety, the whole - you know.

IM: The sort of psychological.

K: Yes. The psychological structure, confusion. That's the brain. And therefore love is not part of the brain because it is something outside.

IM: So yes, but this comes back to your saying you don't experience love in the way in which you experience desire.

K: I can't experience something which is so.

IM: I mean if I am loving, I mean again let's put this aside that in ordinary parlance you speak of jealous love or something, that is not what we are talking about. One's talking about some sort of absolute or, I can't think of the right word here. But then if I say I dearly love somebody as one might say in not a bad way but in a good way, as it were, would you want to say this is not part of any psychological process?

K: No. I would say: I say I love you, if I love somebody in that way. If there is any tinge of attachment, any tinge of jealousy, any shadow of conflict, then it is not the real thing.

IM: Yes, yes. All right. Yes. I mean I was brought up as a Christian so there is a lot of the Christian way of looking in me, although I don't believe in god or the divinity of Christ, but I can see in Christianity there would be an idea of divine love, or perfect love, which is something that we don't normally achieve at all perhaps.

K: I don't see why not. Because if I am not jealous, I won't be jealous. There is no sense of attachment to another person, which doesn't mean lack of love.

IM: Attachment and desire - well I think what in ordinary parlance we would call a virtuous love, not hurting anybody else by loving this person, and you are not possessive, unreasonable and so on, there is attachment. I mean particularly if the person dies...

K: Wait a minute. Now that is a different question. Why are we attached to anything? Attached. If I am attached to this house...

IM: I would take a different view I think of the notion of desire. I mean it seems to me I would think that becoming good, to use this phrase that perhaps you would want to exclude, is a matter of purifying one's desires, having good desires, desiring something which is good. Now in loving somebody I would have felt that the element of desire was present.

K: Let's look at desire. What is desire?

IM: Well, there again one would say well there are low desires and there are high desires.

K: No, I am asking, what is the origin, the beginning of desire? Why has desire become such an extraordinary important part of our life?

IM: Well desire is certainly connected with the future.

K: With the future.

IM: It is connected with time.

K: Of course, with time.

IM: Because I desire something which is absent. I mean let's take examples. I might desire to be frightfully rich, or I might desire to study a subject and become good at it.

K: Good at the piano.

IM: Well let's say good at mathematics, to acquire knowledge.

K: Yes, of course.

IM: Well wouldn't this - and I might say I love my subject, I love what I am studying.

K: No, what I am asking is: what is desire? How does it come? Why does it control us so strongly? I mean after all a monk, or one of the Indian sannyasis, their whole idea is to suppress desire, or transmute desire.

IM: Well transmute, yes. I would rather use the word 'transmute'.

K: That is, transmute, there is an entity who transmutes it.

IM: Yes. And there is a process of transmuting, a discipline or a training, or something like that.

K: Yes, which is not only a subtle form of suppression, subtle form of organizing desire, or saying desire for god is good.

IM: Desire for riches is bad.

K: And desire for possessions is bad. So we are not discussing the objects of desire, whether it is god, whether it is power, whether it is to become a rich man or a prime minister, but what is desire? How does it take shape in us?

IM: Well, whether there can be love without desire I am not sure. If one thinks perhaps of some kind of perfect love the notion of desire would have changed so much that perhaps you would have to exclude it. At a more ordinary but good level I mean if I desire to become well educated or something...

K: Yes, that is a different matter.

IM: ...then this is a tension between a condition which exists and a condition which does not exist.

K: But I am asking not desire to become a good human being, or desire to be a good scholar, and so on, but desire itself.

IM: Well I would, I think I would evade or reject this question because I don't see how one could explain what desire was without thinking of different kinds of desire.

K: I say I desire for a house, I desire for this and this, so many desires. But the movement of desire, the origin of it. Because we have either suppressed it, transmuted it, or escaped from it, or totally controlled it. But again who is the controller? Who says this is good desire, this is bad desire, this must be pursued because it is helpful, the other is not and so on. It is still desire. Desire for god, or desire for money, it is still desire.

IM: And if someone says one is good and the other is bad, you would come back to saying, all the same it is desire?

K: Yes. Desire is important to understand, not good desire and bad desire.

IM: Yes, I am not sure that I would be able to understand it without using that distinction. But let's shift our ground slightly, there is something behind what you are saying.

K: You just now said desire involves time.

IM: Yes. Well, all right. I am going to withdraw that now and modify it by saying that I think that there might be some kind of desire which does not involve time but where you are completely united with the object of your desire. I think this again is something in Christian mysticism, you might say, that if you desire god and if you are united with god, I mean I don't know what this would mean, then your desire is fulfilled and becomes perfect love.

K: Yes, but the man who says, "I must become a very rich man", powerful man, it is still desire.

IM: Yes.

K: One is for god and the unification with god, it is still desire.

IM: But you speak of desire as if it were something which you want to overcome or set aside.

K: No. I want to understand the movement of it, the process of it, the intolerable burden of it, or the pleasure of it.

IM: Yes, it is not always a burden, is it? I mean if you desire something, for instance if you are hungry and you know that you are going to have a good meal shortly, the intention of desire is pleasurable.

K: Yes, that's understood.

IM: But there is something behind what you are saying which I can't get.

K: I will go into it. Desire exists only when there is identification with sensation.

IM: By sensation you don't mean...

K: I see a lovely house, I want it, there is a desire for it.

IM: You don't mean that there is an actual physical concomitant but that there is a kind of imagery.

K: Both.

IM: You image yourself in the house, something like that.

K: Sensation, then thought creating the image of my owning the house, then desire begins.

IM: Yes, well all right, yes. There is a kind of sensory aspect.

K: Sensory aspect which thought then gives that sensory aspect an image.

IM: This doesn't mean of course - well one says one desires to be educated, it doesn't mean you are thinking about it all the time, or having sensations about it.

K: Of course not.

IM: It means you are carrying on your life. There would be moments when you have a sensory experience of desire, perhaps. You imagine what it would be like when your education is better.

K: The moment when sensation has given shape by thought, then it becomes desire. That is all I am saying.

IM: Yes but then...

K: I am not saying good, bad and all the rest of it, but desire, per se.

IM: But you say that love is different from desire.

K: Love is desire from pleasure.

IM: Sorry. Say it again.

K: Love is different. Love is not pleasure, love is not desire.

IM: Yes, all right. I would want to think that purified desire - sorry, this introduces another topic which I will just mention it and put it aside. I am also concerned with what you feel about motivation and energy. I think desire is a source of energy. Good desire is a source of good energy, but let's take this idea of love being different. There seems to me a contrast between a process and something which is not a process.

K: It is not a process.

IM: It is not a process, not. And you distinguish, you say something like, you used some word like creative being, which is to do with the present. And you would connect this with the possibility of love and truth.

K: Yes.

IM: Whereas desire is something restless which is outside.

K: Restless. But love doesn't mean it is static.

IM: No, static is probably the wrong word here. What would you say?

K: It's alive, it isn't just a...

IM: It is creative and...

K: It is not exclusive. I may love you but I also have this feeling of love. It is not just identified with one person.

IM: But the feeling of love is quite a different feeling from the feeling of desire.

K: Naturally.

IM: So you are not excluding the sensory aspect of course?

K: No wait a minute. Let's go into it slowly.

IM: Yes.

K: As we said just now, the brain is part of the senses, part of reactions, action, responses, beliefs, faith, fear, all that is the centre here, which is my consciousness. The content of my consciousness is all that, god, no god, my knowledge, my failure, my depression, my anxiety, all that is that. Now in that there is a great deal of confusion, contradiction, fears, and all the rest of it. Is love part of that?

IM: I don't know. You tell me.

K: To me, personally, it is not.

IM: But then if love is a condition, is a human condition, I mean it is, there is a state of being which is love, or creative being which is love and so a person is sometimes in this condition, are you suggesting that at that moment all the psychological stuff which that person consists of and has collected, is somehow absent?

K: Absent. Yes.

IM: But still he must know what the object of his love is.

K: No. Just a minute. I might love you. And it is not exclusive, it is not universal, or any of that. It is not exclusive, it is not limited.

IM: Yes, though in a sense it is and it isn't because I mean if one loves a person, you love that person and not another one. But it doesn't mean that you exclude anybody.

K: Anybody, no. Love is not exclusive.

IM: No, but it is selective, if one can put it that way.

K: No, that word selective, who then becomes the...

IM: One doesn't love everybody. Perhaps god does...

K: No, I don't want to add love to god or to somebody...

IM: I am using god as a figure of speech. There is an ideal love perhaps.

K: No, I wouldn't even use the word ideal. I don't know. I strongly object to ideas, ideals and all that nonsense. I see definitely love has no relationship to hate. Love has no relationship to jealousy, it is not attached. It is not desire, it is not pleasure.

IM: To ask very, very simple minded questions, I mean let's say that you are interested in another person. I mean after all people come to you.

K: I care. I care.

IM: Yes. But I ask, do you think there are certain times in one's life when one is - it is difficult - when one is expressing or being love? Should this be every moment of one's life?

K: I am not sure. I am not at all sure that it can be all the time there.

IM: Yes, good, good. Yes. And you think...

K: Can love exist where there is self-centred interest? That is the real question.

IM: No, it would be imperfect love. Let's leave out imperfect love which is not love.

K: All right. When there is self interest can the other exist? It obviously cannot because self interest is very, very small.

IM: You won't let me use the word perfect or ideal, but I'll use love in your sense then. All right. Love then excludes self interest.

K: Where there is self interest the other is not.

IM: Yes. Well you see something that I very much want to find out, and everybody wants to find out, is how to change.

K: Ah, well!

IM: How to become, well it is connected.

K: No, wait a minute. This is really an interesting question.

IM: How to move out of the situation, of being envious.

K: I am envious. There is no difference between I and envy. I am envious, envy is me.

IM: Yes. As we were saying earlier, the person is...

K: I mean envy is me. I cannot act on envy because it is me.

IM: Yes but you can become less envious.

K: But it is still me.

IM: Yes. Go on. Go on.

K: So there is no question of suppression, transmutation, or escaping from it, it is me.

IM: What do I do next?

K: Wait. Wait a minute. I will go into it. If it is me I watch it. I watch it very, very carefully, watch it, not try to act upon it.

IM: So there is a you who is watching the envy?

K: No, watching, there is no you. When you are watching a bird there is no you, you are just watching the bird.

IM: Well watching a bird is quite different from other kinds of watching.

K: That's just it.

IM: There are other kind of watching.

K: Of course. Is there a watching without the word, watching without condemnation, just watching, or agreeing, or rejecting, or resisting.

IM: Well there can be such watching, yes, it is difficult. Wait a minute. We have got this envious person, oneself, one is envious. Then one is aware of the envy, one watches it, but just watching.

K: Watching.

IM: Or being it if you like, put it in another way. Consciously being your envy. Would you accept that form of words?

K: You are envy.

IM: But you are consciously - when you enviously do something thoughtlessly you are not watching. But then for a moment perhaps...

K: That is what I am saying. Look, you are watching a precious, intricate jewel. Then you are looking at the extraordinary delicacy, the bright light and the beauty of the jewel.

IM: Yes, yes. In this care you are looking at envy.

K: Envy. I am doing exactly the same thing. Then I see the whole movement of envy, which is comparison and so on and so on.

IM: Yes, yes.

K: So I watch it without any thought interfering with my watching. That requires a great deal of attention, not concentration, real attention in which the self is not.

IM: But are you not making a judgement?

K: No.

IM: You are watching without judgement.

K: Oh no, I have no value. I don't say you must or must not have envy, it is immoral, or anything of that kind. Human beings have lived with envy for thousands of years.

IM: But then is not the result of this attention that envy disappears?

K: Watching with attention. Watching is attention.

IM: Yes. I like the word attention. You attend in you would say in some non-evaluating way, you are not making a moral judgement. You are not saying. "I ought not to be envious".

K: Oh no. That would be too...

IM: But is not, I wouldn't say the purpose, but certainly the result of this attention that the envy dissolves?

K: Yes, because in attention there is no self at all.

IM: Yes, good, good. OK. I mean I understand this state of being.

K: You can watch it, you know.

IM: But then...

K: It is great fun.

IM: I mean this connects with my question about how do I change? Is not this...

K: This is what we are saying.

IM: Then this is, if you like to use old fashioned language, a spiritual discipline. No, you don't like the word discipline.

K: I don't quite like the word discipline because discipline means really to learn. Not to compartmentalize, pursue. To learn watching, not memorize watching, but to see the whole implications of envy, comparison, and all the rest of it.

IM: And this state of attention would be something which - supposing somebody says, or I say, why not me, but does this happen only when you are meditating, for instance, to use a word which you yourself use? Or should it happen all the time?

K: All the time, if you are watching. That is, you don't let a single thought slip by without knowing what it is.

IM: Yes and this would co-exist with one being a ticket collector or whatever one's job in life is, that you could in fact - the idea of living at different levels, or different states, must I think come in. There would be a state of your being which was this constant attention.

K: Yes but you see also you introduce the word meditation.

IM: It is a word that you use yourself.

K: I know. I use that word but you see meditation is a very complex business. It is not - how shall we put it? In meditation there is no meditator at all.

IM: Yes.

K: But now what we do is, "I must mediate", "I must follow a system to mediate". "There must be practice", which is all exactly desire, which wants to achieve a certain state.

IM: Yes, this seems to me in a sense unavoidable. I mean I have been taught a system of meditation, a long time ago, and I have practised it to some extent, one practises something like meditation only in a very feeble sort of way. But it does seem to me that there is something which is trying to do it better.

K: Now when you use the word 'better' that means more, therefore measurable, more and more.

IM: More like when you say in meditation there is no duality, there is no subject.

K: Absolutely not.

IM: And I would say that something like this happens in the experience of art.

K: The moment you say experience you are already...

IM: All right. OK. Well I mean if I am looking at a great picture, if I am really looking I am not there.

K: Yes.

IM: The picture is there, yes.

K: That's all. When you are really looking at something there is the absence of the self.

IM: And this would be an image of love too, wouldn't it?

K: There is no image in it.

IM: No. There is no?

K: There is no image in love. Image is put together by thought.

IM: Yes. I think that in a certain way of loving, I mean unselfish love - this is difficult to talk about because love happens in time and you have to struggle and think and plan and do things for somebody you love, but you would be really selfless in all that you are doing, I mean there would be somebody there doing...

K: Of course. Of course.

IM: But the self would not be present, the object of attention would be absent. But it seems to me you have to try. You have given me the end but not the means.

K: Let's look at it.

IM: Go on.

K: The means is the end. The two are not different.

IM: May I just quote a remark made by Kafka to the effect that there is no way, there is only the end. What we call the way is just messing about.

K: Yes.

IM: Yes, I see and I don't see as it were.

K: Let's try something else. You see change implies future, as you pointed out - right? From this to that.

IM: Yes and imagining the future.

K: Yes, yes, the future. What is the future? The future is a continuity of the past, modified through the present, it is a movement.

IM: Yes, all right.

K: Right? So the future is in the present.

IM: Well, go on.

K: The future in the sense, I mean if I am learning a language...

IM: Yes, that's a good example.

K: ...if I am learning a language I need the future, I need time, I need...

IM: Yes, yes. Training, discipline.

K: Discipline, etc. etc. I have to learn a language. Now there it is all right, but psychologically, inwardly, subjectively, the past, which is me, my memories, my experiences, all the past, is being modified in the present and proceeds to the future - right? This is the whole movement of our evolution, of our psychological well being, or not well being, and so on. So the present is in the future because what I am now will be what I am tomorrow, unless I change now - right? So the present contains the past, the future is now. Right? The present. Now the present is what I am.

IM: Yes, in a sense there isn't anything else, but go on.

K: That's what I am. My memories, all that. And there is no future unless I continue. Is there an end to that?

IM: You mean is there an alternative state of being?

K: Yes. Ending this whole movement of becoming, struggling, achieving.

IM: Yes of course philosophers have always been worrying about the difference between being and becoming, and in Platonism, and in Christian theology, being is real and becoming is unreal. And I feel something of this in what you say. But I don't want to mislead myself by thinking about anything else. I mean I am trying to picture what you are speaking of would be like. Let's say you are spending your time learning a language and you don't know the irregular verbs today, next week you will know the irregular verbs. And this is human life and unavoidable and proper and quite right.

K: Quite right.

IM: However during this time you are also attending to everything that you do.

K: Of course. I am paying attention to everything I do now.

IM: Yes. Now...

K: So the now contains...

IM: ...in a particular manner.

K: The now contains all time.

IM: I mean you are picturing a possible human state...

K: No, I am not picturing. I am just saying see what has happened to the human psyche: it has moved in this direction always, past, modifying the present and the future. This is the chain - right? - in which we are caught. I won't even use the word 'caught'. This is what we are.

IM: Yes, the word 'caught' though suggests there is freedom, which is another word you use. Freedom which is connected with truth and with love.

K: Yes.

IM: And so somebody comes to you saying, "Well I am in a trap, how do I get out of the trap?"

K: If you are in a trap let's look at what is the trap first before you want to get out of it.

IM: Well I mean perhaps this is irrelevant to ask. I mean I don't want to get out of the trap in the sense that I don't want to stop wanting next week to know the irregular verbs.

K: That of course, next week...

IM: That goes on. But what I also want say, to achieve a state of being which is selfless.

K: Yes, which means what? Be careful. You desire for it. You have a concept of the future.

IM: Yes. I mean I know that now I am not selfless but I would like to become selfless.

K: Therefore let's understand what the self is. You can't change - or rather break down the self, or whatever it is, without understanding the movement of the self, not invent a goal.

IM: But in the situation where one was looking at one's envy, for instance, we agreed that one result of this attention would be that the envy would disappear. So the self is changing.

K: It matters not the ending of envy but attention matters.

IM: Well supposing I just attended to my envy but went on behaving enviously but with complete consciousness of what I was doing. Would that be a good state?

K: Then you see you being conscious - that is still part of the self.

IM: Well one is not postulating a kind of condition which is totally unlike the human condition. One is imagining a state in which human beings might be.

K: Yes, we are human beings. We live in this constant conflict, pain, sorrow and all that - right? This is our life. This is our condition. But somebody comes along, you come along and tell me, look, there is a different way of living, not be everlastingly in this business. And you listen to him, find out. You may say it is rubbish and drop it, but there must be a relationship to the speaker and yourself.

IM: Like now, I am asking you, of course.

K: Which means you tell me envy is not love, envy cannot be put aside, watch it, look at it, see it and let it unfold. Don't condemn it, transmute it or deny it or so on, escape. Just watch it, which means give your whole attention to it.

IM: But would this not result actually in my inhibiting it?

K: No.

IM: Well why not? All right, put it another way.

K: I am bringing it out.

IM: Wouldn't it be good for me to inhibit my envy?

K: No, it will come up again some other time if I inhibit.

IM: Yes, all right. But just meanwhile it might be better.

K: Ah, I don't want meanwhile!

IM: Ah well yes but you seem to me to exclude the element of training oneself. I mean you don't like the word discipline.

K: Discipline, Madame, as you know, comes from the word disciple who is learning. Learning. Learning, not memorizing. Learning to see the beauty of that jewel. I haven't looked at the jewel. I have always condemned it, rationalized, etc., but now there is only watching that jewel.

IM: Yes but what you are watching in this case is something precious, it doesn't matter if it costs a million pounds it is something which is pictured as absolutely precious. Now if I am looking at my envy it is the opposite of a jewel, it is something bad.

K: No, I don't condemn it. There is no spirit of condemnation, or judgement, or evaluation, just watch it. I watch my son. I don't say, "By Jove, he shouldn't be this", "He shouldn't be that". I just watch him. Don't you, say for instance when you look at a picture, I watch it. I see all the light, the proportions, the darkness...

IM: Looking at a picture is a good example for me at any rate in trying to understand what your fundamental idea is here. But it still troubles me that you are suggesting what I would, if I understand you, think was a kind of ideal mode of being, real mode of being in which you are connected with reality. But there remains the fact that one is not in this state, one is sunk in illusion, one is full of illusion.

K: That's all. Now I am an illusion. I am illusion. I live in illusion. My thinking, this is my belief, faith, is illusion. Now why does the word illusion, you know ludere is to play, ludere, to play.

I am playing with illusions.

IM: Why should I bother? Put it in another way. Why shouldn't I just watch my... if I am a clever person I can watch my envy and be amused by it and continue to behave enviously?

K: All right. Carry on. There is conflict in it. There is a certain sense of agony in it, there is pain.

IM: Wouldn't you wish, if you saw somebody that you loved in a state of illusion, wouldn't you wish for that person that they should change?

K: I would go and talk to him.

IM: Well then you are suggesting that he should change. You are suggesting moral values.

K: No, no. I would say to him, look, why do you have these illusions?

IM: Well to call them illusions is already to make them...

K: Don't even call it illusion. You believe in god, somebody believes, or some other thing.

IM: Yes, well let's stick to the case of envy because that's fairly straight forward. Somebody is consumed with envy, the way some people are you know absolutely, "Oh, he's got that, he's better than me", and so on.

K: I know all that.

IM: You watch somebody like that and say, "Look why waste your energy and your anxiety on something which is not deeply really important. And you should not be doing it."

K: That is if they are willing to listen to it.

IM: All right, yes.

K: The moment they are willing to listen to you you have already...

IM: But then you have taught them something.

K: Ah, no. No, no pressure. I don't want him to change.

IM: Well I know all good teachers refuse to call themselves teachers.

K: Conflict is the real root of all this.

IM: But supposing somebody was in a completely harmonious state, with lots and lots of vices, what we call vices, supposing they are envious, jealous, violent, angry, couldn't they be such an harmoniously connected person. Supposing they are very successful in everything that they do, would you say that this was impossible?

K: No, you can't be harmonious while with your right hand you are kicking Ireland and with the other hand you are being harmonious.

IM: Well, yes, I agree with you. I mean think people assume rightly that an evil man is in a state of conflict and that a good man is harmonious.

K: A good man has no conflict.

IM: Yes, and an evil man has conflict. Well this then suggests that there is something that the evil man has made a kind of mistake, there is something unreal about what he believes about the world. So then in making the distinction between good and bad one is making a distinction between...

K: No, you can see for instance a man who is a terrorist, a man who kills for the fun of killing, there is something wrong with the man.

IM: Yes.

K: I don't call him evil or good, there is some kind of aberration going on in the poor chap.

IM: So what you want to produce is an harmonious personality?

K: No, is it possible to end all conflict within oneself? That is the real root of the question. All conflict.

IM: And you would be prepared to drop the words 'good' and 'bad' then, and use the words 'harmony' and 'disharmony'.

K: In that sense, in that sense.

IM: Yes.

K: I wouldn't use harmony, or disharmony, because the moment when there is no conflict you are whole. There is an holistic way of living.

IM: Yes, but you are still talking about good and evil in the sense in which we normally understand them. You speak of the terrorist, let's picture a very bad man not just an envious man, but a very evil man, somebody who is cruel.

K: Yes, somebody who kills.

IM: Then one would want this person to...

K: If you will listen, if you will change, so much the better. But they generally don't listen.

IM: I think we are reaching the end of our reel.

K: Yes, we have.

IM: Perhaps we have reached it.

IM: Well I think I would like to go on with this.

K: Would you like to after lunch?

IM: Yes, perhaps we have to stop now.

K: Yes.

BROCKWOOD PARK 2ND CONVERSATION WITH IRIS MURDOCH 18TH OCTOBER 1984

K: You start.

IM: Well I am still trying to formulate some fundamental question which I can't grip or entirely see at the moment. Perhaps I could sort of walk round it a bit and ask one or two different sort of questions for a moment.

You feel - the idea of duty is a fundamental one in most moral systems, philosophers argue about it but there it is. People are taught when they are growing up they are taught duties that they ought to tell the truth for instance, and other things being equal, perhaps if they don't always tell the truth. You shy away from the idea of duty.

K: I feel responsibility is better than duty.

IM: Well, all right, then a sense of responsibility would be a sense of duty, under some circumstances, one could extend the two ideas in different directions, but you would rather call it a sense of responsibility?

K: Yes, responsibility because responsibility implies care, affection, a sense of communication with the other person, not doing something because you are obliged to do, or disciplined to do, or told to do, but be responsible. If I undertake to build a house, I am responsible for building a house. If I am responsible for my children, I would be responsible completely, not only until they pass out of my house, but I would see that they live properly, brought up, no killing, you follow?

IM: There would be no limits to responsibility.

K: No limits to responsibility.

IM: Yes, I mean perhaps one connects duty with very definite things which have to be done. On the other hand, if you take something like a duty to tell the truth, that's something so fundamental.

K: Telling the truth is part of my responsibility. I wouldn't be dishonest to myself.

IM: Well don't let's worry then about the word duty. But this is a case where one's dealing with an aspect of human life which belongs to the continuity of life. Would you say that just by that being so that it is an everyday notion, which is part of the decent moral continuity of a society's life, would you regard it as being essentially different from what we were talking about this morning, from the real thing, and from love?

K: Yes, yes. I would consider it different.

IM: But I don't see quite where the division comes. I mean I am always trying to build up structures, I want to see where the division comes between ordinary what we would call goodness, or moral behaviour and this fundamental thing.

K: Could we start: why are we fragmented? Why do we look at life and all our actions and our business, whatever it is, always this fragment, business, religion, love, hate, you follow? It is all so broken up. Why do we do this?

IM: Well life has to be dealt with every day.

K: Yes, but why should I accept life to be dealt with in this way?

IM: I think because to unify it, I mean to have a unitary. You seem to feel that we should have some kind of completely unitary selflessness, which then isn't divisible.

K: Yes, that's it.

IM: But then I mean let's say the words like truth and love...

K: ...are one. If there is love there is truth, there is beauty.

IM: Yes. This is so, if one is looking at it in a philosophical sense. But somebody...

K: No, in actual sense, I mean if I really love there is beauty in it. One can't be dishonest.

IM: Yes, beauty is a more difficult concept for this purpose, at least I feel. What worries me is the point of connection between the truth which is love, the fundamental truth, and ordinary conceptions of truth as in tell the truth.

K: Suppose I have lied. And I record that I have lied. I record if I have been angry. That is honesty. That is the truth in the ordinary sense of the word. I don't cover up my lie with lots of phoney stuff. I say I have lied, I have been angry, sorry I have been brutal. I think we are so trained to cover up all this kind of thing, to escape from all this, not being terribly honest to oneself.

IM: Yes, well how does this connect with - one of the things which I think you are very much concerned with, is overcoming conflict, and overcoming separatist, and so on, this then does suggest that you make these distinctions between desire and love, for instance, and you then bring truth into the centre by saying that love is truth.

K: Yes of course.

IM: But this doesn't seem to me to connect very easily, and this is where the idea of my idea of purifying desire, or something, would come in. This doesn't connect very easily with ordinary moral life. It looks as if one would have two judgements of morality, you would say he is a good man in the ordinary sense of the word, but is an imperfect man in your sense of the word. And isn't it important, I can't think of a way of putting this, for you, I am thinking of you as someone wishing well to men, isn't it important for you to make connections?

K: Yes, I see this. Look: I would ask myself, or I would ask my friend, why are we fragmented first.

IM: Oh, you want to go back to a metaphysical question first.

K: Of course, from there you have to start.

IM: This is your feeling that we must be right at the beginning all the time.

K: Yes, all the time.

IM: Yes, I like this too, in a way, what you say about new, what you want is something new, you used the word new, that is not the acquired collection of what one has but something new.

K: I mean I have asked the students in many of our discussions: why is it we are fragmented like this, broken up, what has gone wrong with us? After millions of years we are still fighting each other, killing each other, we are angry - you follow what I mean? What is wrong?

IM: Well there is a sense of conflict or fragmented, which is bad, which means fighting, but there is also ordinary discursive reason and how we set about getting to know things, which isn't necessarily bad.

K: Yes, yes, I use my reasons to see why the world is divided into these kind of things, like nationality, religion. You know what is happening in India, the Sikhs, and the Jews, the Arabs, why?

Why do we accept this way of living?

IM: Well, yes but I think there is a kind of empirical, ordinary answer to this that we can try and stop it by doing all sorts of things, like people do when they talk to other people.

K: But we don't madame, the fact is we have never done it, we haven't stopped this division. I mean if I had a son, or a woman had a son, a Jew with an Israeli woman, what am I to do, they are fighting?

IM: Yes, Part - you wouldn't deny this, would you - that part of what you want to communicate is something which would have practical effects in politics.

K: It has practical effects, yes. Politics, religion, daily life.

IM: Yes.

K: Which is, I would say look, don't let's start with theories and all that, let's start with why we human beings right throughout the world are so broken up, so divided now, so...

IM: But it seems to me it is partly an empirical question in that you could say we could find out why a certain religion held certain views at a certain time and separated off. One could study Christianity in this way, but there is a sort of metaphysical question, which I would think is partly unanswerable. I mean it is like saying why are there human beings? One must say, well I don't know. I mean people who believe in God would say that God created the world.

K: And the scientists have different reasons.

IM: If you exclude the empirical answer, you are asking a kind of metaphysical question which in a way can't be answered.

K: I think it is fairly simple. I would like to ask: is it that thought itself is fragmented?

IM: Well I think thought itself is fragmented. And it seems to me in a sense unavoidably so. I mean what we are doing now, using a natural language and concepts and using words, which we have learnt to understand and so on, this is something which depends on spreading out of interest to the world in many, many different ways. I mean the word discursive sort of covers this kind of notion that the intellect has to spread itself out, it has to emerge into language and so on. It can't be a compact, it can't be one, which many philosophers want. They want this one. But in your objection - you don't seem to me to allow... put it this way, the redemption of the world, I mean the bringing of the world into the centre, into goodness, into truth, love.

K: I say, yes it must be.

IM: Well yes, but then one can't get rid of all fragmentation. One has got to redeem it, if you see what I mean, to get rid of fragmentation.

K: All right, let's redeem it. Now human beings, why are they like this? Let's redeem that. Not intellectually explaining, but the fact, daily fact, why is it that there is such conflict, such violence?

IM: Well again there are many reasons. Take Ireland, for instance, I mean there are many reasons.

K: Of course.

IM: Historical reasons why there is a conflict in Ireland. But you are thinking of much deeper things.

K: Much deeper things, naturally.

IM: It seems to me, well if somebody asks me that I would say I can't answer the metaphysical question but what I can say is why ought it not to be so. And this uses the word 'ought' which you don't want. We have a conception of goodness from which we spread, as it were, all kinds of thought and action into the world - this is putting it very badly.

K: I understand.

IM: Hoping that gradually we can make the world better and remove conflict in the superficial sense, and in the deeper sense too.

K: We have lived on this earth, according to the scientists and all the rest of it, at least two or three million years, evolved. We are still at it.

IM: Yes, we are.

K: I mean just look what is happening.

IM: And who can say what the future holds?

K: The future is what we are now. If we don't do something now we will be exactly the same tomorrow.

IM: Yes but what we can do now is something very limited really. We can do something to ourselves and we can do something to a small number of people.

K: Yes, but ourselves is the world.

IM: And we can also take part in politics, which is a way of doing something in the world.

K: But I am the rest of the world, because my consciousness is like the rest of mankind.

IM: Yes, you mean that if you can do it other people can do it.

K: If I change I affect the rest.

IM: Yes, well there is also the fact that one has a very limited amount of time in which to achieve this insight.

K: That's why don't let time interfere with this question. I am a human being. My way of life, my way of thinking, my action, is comparatively like the rest of mankind. They may have outward differences, but deeply I am the rest of mankind. I am mankind.

IM: Well except that you are a very unusual person. But leaving that aside.

K: No, no. I am mankind because we all suffer, we all go through a hell of a time. So I am the rest of mankind, so I am humanity. That is real love.

IM: Yes but how does this...

K: Therefore, you see I will show you.

IM: If somebody says all right, you are just you, you are by yourself, I mean you may be showing what is a human potential.

K: Come and join me, come and join me.

IM: Yes, well.

K: Let go your petty little nationalisms and all the rest of it, and join me, let's be free and look at the world differently, and not always keep in conflict with each other. Every husband, wife, madame, this is happening every day of one's existence.

IM: Yes, but I can't help putting the problem in terms of how much influence...

K: Quite.

IM: ...can one have. And if one is going to teach people, don't let's think of you and me now, but if anybody wants to influence people in order to bring about the end of this period of conflict, they have to involve themselves in persuasion, in politics. And many people would say, many people do say now to worry about your own soul and whether you are selfless or not is a waste of time, you must simply go and help other people, go and stop them suffering.

K: Help other people. See what is happening with those people who are helping and those people who are helped.

IM: Well...

K: You can see it, there is very little. Hitler wanted to help. Buddha said too, mankind suffers, there must be an end to suffering. And look what they have done: suffering is going on.

IM: Yes. When you think... sorry I keep wanting to turn it round a bit so that I can get a bit more light. When you speak of overcoming conflict, overcoming suffering...

K: ...not overcoming, ending...

IM: ...ending, yes, are you thinking of a kind of - I mean is this anything like what a Buddhist would think of as Nirvana?

K: Apparently Nirvana means, from what I have discussed with people, a state in which the self is not. The self in the sense of... Come to that point, don't discuss what Nirvana is, you will find out.

IM: I would understand something like this as meaning that one is in a selfless condition and the denial of the world is the meaningless of all these other things.

K: That is what they have done. Deny the world. But I don't say deny the world. On the contrary, you have to live here.

IM: Yes. I mean if one thinks of Plato's image of the cave that you are in the darkness and then gradually you move out into the light. He also speaks about coming back into the cave, by which I think he means that you find some kind of liberation for yourself but then you have to liberate everybody else as well.

K: That's the point. You know the whole sense of Bodhisattva and all that, I won't go into all that, but if you change fundamentally, won't it affect the mankind?

IM: You will affect a certain number of people.

K: No. Look: Christianity has affected, how many, millions.

IM: Yes certainly. I was about to say there are cases, like the life of Christ, whether Christ really existed as an historical man or not, the image of Christ has changed people's lives.

K: Therefore I am saying through propaganda they have changed - right? They have etc. Now Buddhism has affected the whole of Asia.

IM: Yes, all right, but you would go on to say well nevertheless...

K: I say let a few of us work at this, then we will change the world.

IM: But I think we have had great teachers who have had a great deal of influence, who have, as far as I can see, advocated a kind of selflessness which is not unlike what you are speaking of.

K: Yes, freedom. Freedom from the self.

IM: What is one to do? It doesn't seem to me...

K: Oh no. What is one to do requires sitting down, talking about it, going into it - right? Naturally. And breaking down barriers between us.

IM: We have come perhaps onto a slightly different kind of question: a question about influence and...

K: I don't want to influence anybody. That is the worst thing to happen because if I influence you somebody else can come along and influence you too in another direction. But if you see something for yourself it is clear.

IM: Ah well yes, that again is something which we agree about, that you have to do the thing yourself. It is no good being told by somebody else.

K: Therefore no propaganda, no programming.

IM: This is some thing which I think theologians are realizing now that you can't have God thrust upon you. I mean whatever the spiritual life is it is something you have to discover for yourself.

K: In the spiritual world there is no authority.

IM: Yes, I...

K: But now everything is that. They want authority, people want some kind of security in authority.

IM: Yes, well I don't myself see any answer to the problem of how the discovery of spiritual truth, or whatever this may be, can change the world. You perhaps have more hope for the world than I have.

K: No, I am neither pessimistic nor optimistic, but I see that unless there are a few of us radically change the psychological structure we are going down the hill all the time. That's all.

IM: Well I agree with that too. If the world lost people who are concerned with what you are concerned with I think that it would lose its centre.

K: Yes, that is what I mean. There are very few people who are concerned to be totally free from all this.

IM: But then you want, to put it sort of bluntly as it were, you want there to be more of such people, but at the same time you reject traditional methods, for instance ideas of duty, ideas of asceticism and so on, which have been, as it were, part of the training of people who achieve perhaps this state.

K: No. Why should I be trained? If I see something to be true I stick to it. Why should I be trained?

IM: Yes, but I think you have probably had a gift of grace, of what a Christian would call grace, which a lot of people haven't had. What you achieve easily would be very, very difficult to achieve for the majority of people.

K: Perhaps that might be. But I mean after all there must be... all right, if you use the word grace, all right. Be in a state to receive that, which means don't be selfish, don't have conflict, have some kind of inward silence.

IM: Yes, I agree entirely, entirely with this. Yes, I think, I mean don't let's argue about the question of influence or politics, because I understand your position there. I would think, I mean I would feel it is perhaps important to try in certain ways to influence one's surroundings, but I know that this is full of difficulties. I would rather in a way stick to the question we were worrying at this morning, though I don't quite see how to find the way of enlightening myself on this subject. It is partly to do with the question of time and fragmentation, that time is fragmentation.

K: Yes, that's it.

IM: Yes.

K: To be free of time, that means no movement forward.

IM: Free and in the truth, and love, and not to be acquiring and not to be planning. Would one, if one had this kind of insight, or however you are going to put it, would one know that one had it?

K: I think one wouldn't know but it would show in your actions, in your daily life.

IM: But you do accept then that there are two - it seems to me that you are thinking in terms of two entirely different planes. And I am wanting to connect the two.

K: No. There is the physical plane.

IM: Well there is the psychological plane also. That is what we are talking about.

K: Psychological plane, why should there be division there? Why should there be superior psychology, or lower psychology, it is whole psychology.

IM: Yes. I mean some kind of redemption - I introduced the word redemption.

K: It doesn't matter, I understand.

IM: ...of the psychological hurly burly of one's mind seems to me can happen in a quite ordinary way. I mean people wouldn't be puzzled by it, it would just be a natural function.

K: You see, to be redeemed by whom? If I look to you to be redeemed I am lost.

IM: Yes, I not thinking of being redeemed in the Christian sense. I just mean by redeemed, I just mean that something which is fragmented is drawn in - I am using an image...

K: Yes, I understand.

IM:of a centre and of outlying parts. I mean picture - I am all the time trying to discover just where this divide is, you make a divide between say the life of a very good man in the ordinary sense, an ordinary very virtuous man who is being very unselfish in the ordinary sense and done a lot of good to people and so on, between that life and the life of truth.

K: Ah, that is totally different.

IM: Well why is it totally different?

K: Of course it is.

IM: I mean it seems to be a metaphysical remark to say it is totally different.

K: I know.

IM: You don't mind?

K: I don;t mind. And after all the self is a very subtle, cunning thing. It can hide under prayers.

IM: Oh absolutely.

K: It can hide under every little action thinking it is noble, I am helping mankind, I am influencing for the good.

IM: I am really a remarkable person admired by everybody - in brackets, as it were.

K: So to understand that, what the self is, requires such observation, such daily looking at it, not just say "I am free at one moment" and that is it, but it requires such attention to everything that you are doing.

IM: So you would think that if somebody was entirely absorbed in outward action, as it were, it wouldn't be in truth.

K: That is a most dangerous thing.

IM: So a certain amount of fundamental quietness, I mean this could be compatible with leading an active life, couldn't it?

K: That silence is not the product of thought.

IM: Yes. OK that is good.

K: That silence is not to be cultivated.

IM: Yes, I think I believe in that group silence too.

K: Silence, quietness, inside there is no movement.

IM: And this would connect with what you say about living in the present?

K: Yes.

IM: Yes, and timelessness.

K: You know meditation is an extraordinary thing if you know - I have talked to various types of people who meditate, Tibetan, Hindu, Buddhists, Zen, you know all the rest of it - it is all a conscious deliberate effect. It isn't something you do for the love of it. You can love and yet be selfish. But I mean in the sense to do meditation without conscious effort.

IM: Yes, I think any means that one adopts towards goodness is likely to become a barrier.

K: Absolutely.

IM: It is likely to because one seeks idols. I mean we are idol worshippers.

K: That is finished. That is not meditation.

IM: I mean if one seeks a consolation in the feeling that you are doing something. Yes, but nevertheless doing it could help you.

K: No, I have talked to people who have spent years - please, I mean it - twenty five years and a man came to me who was about seventy, much older than I was, and he said, "I have spent twenty five years in the jungle, wandering over and I have deceived myself all along."

IM: Well he should be congratulated, I suppose.

K: I know. That shows something.

IM: He was prepared to say something like that because people don't often admit.

K: To be really quiet is something you can't cultivate, you can't get it by practise and all the rest of it. It is your daily life you have to be quiet.

IM: It comes by a gift perhaps.

K: No, daily life madame, otherwise what is the value of your quietness, if your daily life is not affected, if your daily life isn't without conflict?

IM: Well, of course, I am constantly wanting to say that the connection with one's daily life is a fundamental idea. I mean if somebody claimed to have this quietness but behaved badly in ordinary life I would be sceptical.

K: I know, so am I.

IM: So I think my own thoughts on this subject are influenced by Plato and I think, or I feel perhaps that something that you are insisting on, which he also insisted on, is the absolute separateness of this idea of the timeless and eternal. That it is quite separate from what we ordinarily think of as goodness, which is a kind of idolatry.

K: Yes, idolatry.

IM: And he uses the images of destroying idols. If you destroy images you destroy idols and you go on. But of course he does picture life as a pilgrimage in a way in which I think you don't.

K: No. If I have no images in myself about anything, there is no self in that.

IM: Yes. You are really picturing what many spiritual people have thought of as the end of the journey. I mean at the end, except that you want to insist that of course one is already in a sense potentially at the end, that there is only...

K: One has to be careful of that too because the Hindus believe there is god, there is atman inside and that give him a chance, peel off your ignorance and then you will be like that! That is an assumption. I don't want to assume anything.

IM: Well I think there is a metaphysical - I wouldn't call it assumption because it is something I agree with.

K: It is an idea. It is an idea.

IM: Yes. This is a metaphysical assertion, or religious - only you wouldn't want to use the word religious because that might be misleading.

K: I am only suggesting: a concept which has been cultivated, which has been traditional, and that has no meaning, because, look, I have this concept 'the god is in me' and then I go and kill somebody.

IM: Well, yes, anything involving the idea of a god is of course already in a sense an idol.

K: That is all I am saying.

IM: Yes, yes.

K: We are idol-worshippers, whether it is handmade or mental, made by the mind.

IM: Yes. Yes, the absoluteness of the division for you, and I think I perhaps see what you mean, I am not quite sure, between the ordinary process of life and this being in the truth which is something which lives in the present in a way in which something eternal must live in the present, if you see what I mean. You must insist on it being quite separate from the worldly idols.

K: Absolutely, of course.

IM: Yes.

K: After all man's search has been for eternity. They make an idea of it...

IM: ...which is not a continuation of time. It is quite different.

K: It is the end of time.

IM: Yes. Yes. Well I think, thinking about Plato I come to some understanding of what you have been saying.

K: It is half past two.

IM: I think we must end here. Oh dear, thank you very much.

MADRAS 1ST PUBLIC TALK 31ST DECEMBER 1983

This is not entertainment, this is not a lecture either. A lecture is intended to convey information on a particular subject, to be informed about it. So this is not a lecture but a conversation between us, friendly, serious. And if it is possible to communicate with each other deeply and go if we can together for a long journey - a journey that covers, we hope, the entire human status, not with the view of a particular country or a particular group of people or community, nor are we concerned with any particular philosophy, and if one is waiting to be instructed, informed, told what to do, I am afraid you will be disappointed. So together we are going to take a very long journey, not only outwardly, in the physical world, but also in the psychological world, in the world that lies inside us, inside the skin, as it were. A world that few of us have taken seriously, or have gone into it very, very deeply. So together bearing in mind, that we are not giving a lecture nor a sermon, I hope, so don't get bored.

And also one would like to point out that in listening to someone, as to the speaker, one has to listen not only with the hearing of the ear, but also listen, and that is an art, to listen to somebody, freely, intelligently, but also today, without any interpretation, without any conclusion, but as two friends talking over together not only about the world situation, but also about their own problems, their own behaviour, their own ways of thinking, their prejudices, opinions, conclusions. So one hopes that you will so listen not only to the network of words, but also to the deeper issues of life.

It seems to one religion and to have peace in the world are the two most important things in one's life. Religion, the etymological meaning of that word is not very clear. But it is generally accepted religion to be that which is going on in the world, the Christian religion, the Muslim, the Islamic, the Hindu, the Buddhist, and so on, with their temples and mosques and churches or cathedrals and all the rituals that go on inside them. And all the things that are in the temples, churches, mosques, and having certain faiths, belief, and the repetition of certain phrases, doing puja, rituals and so on, the whole structure of superstition. But generally what is understood to be religion, to the speaker that is not religion, it is all put together by thought. Thought is a material process and that which thought has created, given sanctity, tradition, then that very thought turns to worship that which it has created. This is a fact not a theory. (We wait for that aeroplane).

And also there is no peace in the world. And the preparations for war by all nations, especially the present crisis, nuclear war and the destruction of the whole of mankind. So there is no peace in the world, nor is there peace in ourselves. To be a religious human being requires a great deal of intelligence and also to live peacefully in this world, without conflict, without problems, without this divisive process, that also requires a great deal of intelligence. Not repetition of some slogans, not following some guru. All that is gone, finished because man is no longer, if he is at all aware, intelligent and conscious of what is going on, he has put aside all that rubbish. You may not agree, but please listen to the very end of it if you have the patience and if you want to face facts.

Because facts do not need opinions, they are so. How you don't translate facts depends on your background, on your prejudices, on your conditioning, but facts remain facts. Like there is war in certain parts of the world, though they are preparing both sides, right and left, one hopes there will be no war.

And religion has no longer any meaning at all, except for sentimental, sensory excitement and emotional titivation, but otherwise religion in the deeper sense of that word, which is to live a righteous life, a life of freedom, responsibility for one's own actions, independent of environment and so on, which we will go into during these four talks. So please from the very beginning of these talks, if you are willing, listen not only to what the speaker is saying, but also listen to your own interpretations of what the speaker is saying, how you receive or accept or react to what is being said. So this requires a constant communication with each other to be aware of not only the word, the significance of the word of the speaker, but also to be aware of one's own responses. So you see responsibility (noise of music) - lovely, this is modern civilization. Shall we go on? Oh, let's shout a little more than they do.

So we are going to take a long friendly, not dogmatic, journey, both outwardly and inwardly. It is far more difficult to take a journey inwardly. It is fairly easy if you are well informed of what is going on in the world. But one must have a criteria to evaluate, as in a mirror, to see things as they are, to see what is happening in the world, in the outer world. It is really not an outward world at all, it is a world which we have created. It is like a tide, going out and coming in, it is the same water. But we have unfortunately divided the world as the outer and the inner, so it is this eternal movement of action and reaction, challenge and response, problem after problem. And these problems are increasing more and more, not only created by the politicians and also by all the religious people, but also the problems which we have created for ourselves. It is a society which we have created, it hasn't suddenly come into being. This is what we are. If our house is burning, disorderly, competitive, ruthless, we have created such a society where there is brutality, cruelty, injustice, and so on. It is our responsibility, not to change the society but to see in our journey which we are going to take together, whether in that very movement of taking that journey there is the possibility of changing ourselves fundamentally - a psychological revolution, not a physical revolution. So let us go together.

The world geographically, nationally, religiously is divided, economically, tribalism, the world is broken up, fragmented. That fragmentation has taken place through nationalism which is glorified traditionalism and each country is concerned with itself. But politicians and those people who are leaders forget that we are all human beings, we are one people, though you may call yourself a Muslim, or a Hindu, or a Buddhist, or a Christian, we are one humanity. You may belong to a certain sect, assert your own personal ambitions but behind all that we are one entity. The whole of humanity is us. But unfortunately for various reasons of security, our own search for security, through the family, through the community, through the nation, we have separated the world as the Americans, the Russians, the French, the Indian, the Arabs, the Jew and so on. This separation has been, this division, this fragmentation has been one of the causes of war, destroying each other in the name of god, in the name of religion, in the name of ideologies. We all know this. And this process has been going on from the most ancient of times, this division of tribalism, economic division, religious division, social division, and so on, traditions. So where there is division, fragmentation, there must be conflict, that is a fact. It is not the speaker's conclusion. This is what is going on: one ideology going against another ideology, the conservation ideology against the liberal, the socialist against the communist, the fascist against everybody else. There is racial division, linguistic division and so on.

So please, we are taking a journey together. Don't merely listen to the speaker, but see the facts, not according to the speaker, but what is taking place actually, daily in our life. Unless that division ceases completely, that you are no longer a Hindu, a Buddhist, a Muslim, a Christian or belonging to different ideologies, communist, socialist, capitalist and so on, you are bound to create war, that means killing other human beings by the thousands, by the millions. If this nuclear war is to take place we will all disappear, the earth will be burnt out. Probably you know all this if you have read the newspapers or talked to certain scientists, and the argument goes on. It has been like this for a million years or actually forty five thousand years, human beings have existed on this earth according to the archaeologist and the biologist. And man has struggled, struggled, struggled, fought, killed, and as it has been before, it shall be now, and also that is the future of mankind, everlasting struggle, everlasting quarrels, destruction. This is what you are facing, not only you but your grandchildren. And we accept it. If you are a Jew, you ascertain that you are a Jew, or a Hindu or some other stupid title. So we are sustaining, nourishing, the destruction of human beings. That is what is going on, and the politicians cannot solve this problem, on the contrary, they are adding more and more problems. In the very solution of one problem, they multiply a dozen other problems. You see all this.

And our brains are crowded with problems. And inwardly, that is the outward world, and inwardly if you have examined at all, if one is aware of what is going on, we are very primitive people. Though we have lived on this earth for 45,000 years, we are very barbarous people, cruel people. We have been more or less what we have been from the beginning of time, hating, jealous, frightened and in our fear create all kinds of horrors, and this is the world in which we live, outwardly and inwardly. No philosophy, no guru, no politicians, nobody has solved our human problems. You can escape from them by joining some monastery, by taking certain vows or joining some cult, and no authority has ever solved our human problems. We have reached a point where one does not believe in anything. We have reached a point when we are utterly confused, because those who are certain at the beginning end up with uncertainty. Do you understand all this? I wonder if you understand what the speaker is talking about. If I start believing firmly in god or in some kind of mystical affair, if I am intelligent, somewhat intelligent, as I grow up I begin to doubt everything. So one must begin with uncertainty, doubting, questioning, having a sceptical mind, then one comes to a place where there is absolute certainty. Because after all both outwardly and inwardly we are seeking security, that's why we have invented god, because that is the ultimate security. Don't be shocked please, you are all believers in god, probably the majority of you, god or some higher principle and so on. All that is invented by thought. Thought is a material process. So anything created by thought in the world of religion is still materialistic, as technology is.

So together we are taking the journey to find out if we human beings can radically bring about a change in ourselves, not through compulsion, not through some enticement or some promise, but seeing things as they are, the frightening, the desperate state man has reached, the confusion that really thinking man is in, because he has been told so many things all his life, all contradicting. So we are confused human beings, whether you admit it or not. Confused not only consciously but deeply, in the deep layers of the consciousness, we are confused. The world has reached that point, where you believe neither in the scientists nor in politicians, nor in any of the so-called these thoughtless gurus. Man has not changed and when one has reached this stage of confusion deeply, then that very confusion demands right action, that very confusion brings a crisis in our life. The crisis is not out there but the crisis is in our consciousness, in our being.

So we are asking ourselves whether it is possible to bring about a deep psychological revolution in ourselves, not an outward revolution. The outward revolutions have failed: the recent revolutions, the French and the communist revolution, they have failed utterly. What is important is that there should be a psychological mutation, a fundamental change in the very cells of the brain. Because our brains are conditioned, that is, the cells in the brain are conditioned. The speaker is not a specialist in the structure of the brain and so on, but he has discussed with a great many scientists and so on, it is not important. But one can watch it in oneself, much more important than talking to innumerable scientists and their authority, and their contradictions, one can see in oneself how our brains are conditioned as a Hindu, a tradition, as the Jew, as the Muslim, as the Christian. Nationally, linguistically, religiously, economically our brain is conditioned. And we are asking whether that very brain which has been conditioned through knowledge, through education, whether those very cells can bring about a mutation in themselves? You understand? Do we understand each other, the problem? Suppose the speaker has been trained as a Muslim, repeating the Koran from boyhood, and his brain naturally has adjusted itself to the words, to the content of the words, to the meaning of the words and so on, so the brain becomes conditioned by the climate, by the food, by the tradition, by your education. So knowledge itself becomes the conditioning factor. Right? I wonder if you see this. Do you see this? Are we meeting each other somewhere? Please tell me, otherwise we can't...

Knowledge is the outcome of experience and experience and knowledge are limited. Look at the scientists, what they are doing, after two hundred years they have gradually accumulated knowledge, bit by bit, through hypothesis, through various forms of experiments, acquired a great deal of knowledge about matter and so on. So knowledge is never complete, it is always limited, whether the knowledge of the Koran, or your sacred books, or the Bible because it is based on experience, and experience is always limited. When once you grasp that fact, the reality of that, then all thinking is limited. Right? All thinking, thinking is the reaction of memory, memory is stored in the brain, in the very cells and those cells have been conditioned through centuries of human living and experience and struggle, those cells are conditioned, limited. And we are asking whether those cells themselves can undergo a fundamental mutation so that a man, a human being is entirely different, no longer conditioned? You might say, that is not possible - that would be a natural reaction, it is not possible, we have lived this way for so many centuries and you are saying, how can that change take place, that mutation. That's what we are going to enquire together. That requires a great deal of enquiry, a great deal of attention, energy, passion to find out. But if you are lethargic, as most of us are, occupied with so many things, occupied with our living, frightened with what is going to happen, frightened of the past, frightened of the future, frightened of the present, and if our brain is so clogged up, as most brains are, then the first question is, is it possible to solve problems, to have no problems. We will go into that.

Our brains are conditioned from childhood to solve problems, the child goes to the school, he has got mathematical problems, how to read, write. Right? I am not saying anything strange, so don't look so surprised, or bored. From childhood through school, through college, through university if you are lucky, or unlucky, to go through all that, your brain, the physical brain, the cells, are trained, educated to solve problems. Right? So you treat the whole of living as a problem to be solved, and you approach everything as a problem - sexual problems, problems of relationship, economic problems, religious problems, political problems, you follow, and we are solving them with a brain that is conditioned to solve problems. So the problems are never solved. Have you realized that? These are facts. You may solve one problem happily, but in the very solution of that problem you have another problem. Look what is happening politically in the world, in the western world, in the communist world, they have got so many problems, economic problems, the political problem, the desire to be President, to be the top man, you know, they are all problems. You have problems with your wife and with your husband, you have problems with your children, you have problems with your guru. And we are not making a problem for you. The speaker is not creating a problem for you. All that he is saying is, look at things as they are, first, without any prejudice, without any conclusion, and if you have conclusions, opinions, judgements, put them aside because it is only a brain that is free that can look.

So can you put aside all those opinions, judgements, evaluation, tradition and look at things as they are? Not as a politician, not as a foreigner, not a person who has read a great deal and can speak endlessly, but as a human being. But our brains are conditioned to solve problems, so the brain itself has a problem. Do you understand this? Do understand this, please. And therefore whatever it meets turns into a problem. So our question is whether it is possible not to have a brain that is conditioned to the solution of problems. To have a brain that is free to look and not make a problem of what it looks at. Right?

So we are asking whether the brain cells themselves, without any compulsion, without any instigation, without any pressure, outwardly or inwardly, can bring about a change, a mutation in itself? So we are going to find out in these four discussions, conversations, really a dialogue - one can't have a dialogue with so many people but one can have a dialogue with you, not with all of you, with each one of you. And we are saying, religion is the most important thing in life, not the thing (noise of crows) - the crows are going to bed, the last trumpet. We were saying, a new culture, a new civilization cannot come about through economic adjustments, political action, through various forms of institutions and foundations. Religion is the only factor and that religion is our enquiry to find out whether the human brain can be really religious. We mean by religion, absolute freedom: freedom from fear, freedom from conflict, freedom from problems, freedom from sorrow, so that it is a brain that is completely free, it is only then there is that quality of love and compassion. Then that state alone can find out what is sacred. And in the understanding of that truth or that perception of that which is true then there is peace, peace in oneself, in one's own psyche. That means no conflict whatsoever. Now is this possible? If you say, it is not possible, then that becomes a block, that prevents you from looking at the possibility, the possibility of opening the door to look. Or if you say, it is possible, then you are merely talking theoretically, then you have shut the door. So you must have the quality of a brain that is enquiring, looking, searching, asking, questioning, doubting. Not only doubting of others, of your books and so on, but doubting what your own thinking is, questioning your own responses, your own reactions, that requires an alertness of mind.

So we are now on our journey going to enquire together the first thing, which is, what is thinking. Because we live by thinking, all our actions are based on thinking, our relationship with each other is part of thinking, the images that you have built about your wife or your husband, your guru, your leaders and so on, are put together by thought as an image. We will go into that presently. So thinking is our fundamental instrument. It may think devotionally, romantically, imaginatively, but it is still thinking, whether you are a scientist, or a philosopher, mathematician, biologist or just ordinary human beings, even the most uneducated person thinks, the villager. So our first enquiry on the journey is to find out what is thinking, why thinking has become so extraordinarily important, knowing that thinking is a material process because knowledge and memory and experience is stored up in the brain cells and that knowledge, experience, memory and so thought is limited. This is a fact. There is no complete knowledge about anything. You may think god is complete knowledge, or some extra principle, outside agency, and you all like to believe that in all of us there is something of that quality, which is again thought.

So we must understand very clearly the nature of our thinking. Please observe your own thinking, not what the speaker is telling you, but observe your own thoughts, how they arise, how limited they are. Each one of us is concerned about himself basically, self-centred and you may try to hide it behind all kinds of words, but it is still there. And that self-centred thinking is limited. When you think about yourself, your achievements, your desires, your purposes, your wanting to build temples in the west and temples here, it is still limited. Right? Whatever is limited must bring about conflict, must bring about division. That's a law. If I am divided against you, thinking about myself all day long, it is a very limited process. That's what we are all doing, happily, miserably, successfully, but that's what we are doing. So thinking being limited has made our whole outlook limited. Right? I wonder if you get all this? Are you getting tired? Or are you asleep? I don't mind if you go to sleep, it's your affair. And this thinking has created, because of its very limitation, nationalities, hoping to find security in nationalities, in tribalism, in tribal gods, and you haven't found security. And one thought there would be security in communities, there has been no security there either. So where is security? You follow? Where is security for us? Not through division, not through calling yourself a Hindu, Muslim and all the rest of it.

So when you see danger - you understand what I am talking about, for god's sake move, I don't mean get up and go; perhaps you want to get up and go, but I am talking of your outlook, your way of looking. What will make you change? You have had sorrow, you have had pain, you have had wars, you have had every kind of toil and travail, and yet we go on as we are. What will make us change? Reward? Reward in heaven, reward on this earth? When you are seeking for a reward there is always the other side of it, punishment. Reward and punishment is one of our principles. So it becomes very important to find out if thought is the only instrument that we have, and it has created such havoc in the world. Do you realized that? Look what the scientists have produced, not only medicine and surgery and fast communication, and those happy, convenient things, but also that produced most diabolical things, the nuclear war, nuclear instruments, the atom bomb, the submarine, you follow, the whole technological world of warfare is the product of thought - going to the moon is a product of thought, and putting a flag up there is a product of thought. And our relationship with each other is based on thought. So let's for the moment talk over together the question of relationship. Don't be nervous. I'm not going to attack you.

You are related, life is a process of relationship, living is relationship. You cannot possibly live by yourself even though you may retire for the rest of your life to the Himalayas or to a community or to a monastery you are still in contact with humanity, you are related. You may not be related to a person but you are related to a tradition, related to knowledge, related to all kinds of things. So relationship is one of the basic factors of life. The husband and the wife and the children. And in that relationship with their conflicts, with their sexual demands, with their pleasures, with their pains, with their flattery, with their insults, with their nagging, you know all that goes on in relationship. Don't you know all that? Or you pretend it doesn't exist? You are all so silent, aren't you? In that relationship you have created - thought has created the image about your wife and the wife has created an image about you. That's a fact. And the relationship is between these two images: I know my wife, and the wife says, 'I know my husband', you really don't know each other, all that you know is the image you have about her and she has an image about you. That is built through time. Right? These are facts, sir, don't dodge the issue. And where there is a relationship between two images there is actually no relationship at all. That's again a fact. And that's why there is such conflict in relationship. There are very, very, very few people living together who are really related, happy, not adjusting to each other, or tolerating each other, or exploiting each other.

So the question is whether it is possible to live without a single image, and who is it that creates the images? There you are, you are sitting there, all of you, and you have an image about the speaker, haven't you? Otherwise you wouldn't be here. That's a fact. Right? The image that you have built about the speaker is not the speaker. Right? But you worship that image. Or you may not worship it, or you might kick it, or disregard it but still you have created an image about the speaker and so your relationship is with the image and not with the speaker at all. Because to have a relationship with the speaker we must meet each other at the same level, at the same time, with the same intensity. Right? You understand my point? Isn't that love? When you meet somebody at the same level, at the same time, with the same intensity, not sexually, I am not talking of that, but with all your human being, with your whole being, then that is love. And there is no love if you have the images about each other. And where there is love there is no time. Where there is love there is no conflict. And to understand that extraordinary thing called love you must have great intelligence, and not fear, not ambition, not greed, not jealous, hatred.

So we are asking: why has thought become so important in our lives, realizing what thought has done, technologically what it has done, immense things, both appalling, fearful, dangerous, diabolical things and also thought has created medicine, surgery, communication, and also thought has created war, divided people as the Hindu, the Buddhist, and all that nonsense. Unless thought has been totally understood, and thought has its place, and thought may not have any place at all psychologically. Do you understand what I am saying? As we said, thought is limited because knowledge is limited, experience is limited, and in relationship if thought is the means of communication with each other there must be conflict. And also thought is necessary for you to get home, to take the bus, to go to your office, not tomorrow, Sunday, but Monday, and to go to the office for the rest of your life, day after day, day after day. This is all the product of thought. I know you have to go, one knows you have to go to your office, to your factory, to your business and so on, there thought is necessary, but is thought necessary in relationship? Enquire into it, go into it, and you will find out.

So as our brains are conditioned by thought, through thought, is it possible - please listen to this - is it possible to find a totally different movement which is not of thought, which is not put together by thought, thought being the activity of time, a material process? Don't go off into meditations and all that kind of stuff, we will deal with that presently. But to find out, if thought is the only instrument we have then we are condemned for ever. You understand this? Because then all our action becomes limited, then whatever we do, religiously, politically, economically, will always be limited and therefore perpetual conflict and more problems. But thought is necessary, if I want to write a letter to you I must employ thought, to go from here to your house you need thought and so on. So we are asking, is thought necessary in relationship with each other? And to discover for oneself, not be told everlastingly, but to discover for oneself an instrument - not an instrument - a process of living in which thought doesn't come in.

This requires enormous enquiry. This requires a great deal of your attention because knowledge has become so important to you - knowledge about the Gita, about the Upanishads, and all the Commentaries - you worship knowledge. You have goddesses of knowledge, don't you? But knowledge has its place. Truth isn't knowledge, it isn't something put together by thought, it is something that comes into being when the brain is totally free, uncontaminated, pristine, original. And to discover that is part of meditation, not this stupid repetition.

So we must stop now, we will continue. But please we are not talking about something theoretically, hypothetically but we are dealing with facts. Facts are that which is happening now, that which has happened before, not that which is going to happen, that is not a fact. The fact is what you are thinking, doing, now. And the fact of what you have done before. Those are facts. But ideals are not facts. But you all have ideals therefore you live in illusory worlds. When a brain lives in an illusory world you are bound to create conflict for yourself and for others. But when you are dealing with facts day after day, not supposition of facts, not saying, because to me my opinion is a fact and I stick to that fact - it's so obvious, your opinion like any other opinion is not a fact. But what you do out of that opinion, out of that conclusion, out of that theory is a fact. You understand? If you have an illusion and act according to that illusion that becomes a fact, and your illusion is a fact too. You understand?

So one has to be aware, look, question, doubt to find out. The other day in California, a few months ago when I was there, a car in front of us had on the bumper a sticker which said, `Question all authority'. Will you question all authority? Your own authority first and the authority of your religion, of your gods, of your temples, question the politicians, everything question, doubt so that your own brain begins to be active. But most of us don't question because we are frightened. We would rather be told what to do - you know better than I do so please tell me. And where there is authority, power, position, status, there is evil. It leads to such misery. But to have humility, that humility can only come naturally, uninvited, easily when you begin to question your own thoughts, your own relationship, your own desires, your own achievements, then out of that comes this quality of humility. When there is humility you are then learning. Learning is infinite, knowledge is limited. And that humility - not bowing down to somebody, that's not humility, not touching somebody's feet, that's not humility, going to the temple, all that is rubbish - to have humility, saying I don't know, let's find out. To be so free to look and to have that great simplicity, not the simplicity of a loin cloth but the simplicity of a clear mind and clear heart. Then only that which is beyond time comes into being.

MADRAS 2ND PUBLIC TALK 1ST JANUARY 1984

There are a lot of people, aren't there, large audience. I wonder why you come. It's very good of you to come but I wonder why. Do you take what is being said by the speaker seriously, or is it something that you attend for a weekend and forget the rest of the week? It would be rather interesting to find out why human beings are lectured to, why they attend meetings, why hearing so many things, contradictory, very learned, and full of information and knowledge, at the end of it all you remain more or less what you were before, with our own problems, with our own petty little lives, unhappy, and struggle from the moment we are born until we die, constant strife, conflict, struggle. I wonder if you come here just to pass the time of the day, or you come because of the reputation, or you are really serious people? Serious not in the sense, not easily convinced, for we are not doing any kind of propaganda, not trying to convince you of anything whatsoever. Nor is the speaker your guru. Thank god! Nor are you his followers. You are both the teacher and the person who learns. When we are learning that very act of learning makes you into a teacher. So you are both the disciple and the guru.

If you listen very seriously you should consider, if one may point out, we are going to talk about many things together this evening, and the next two meetings that are to follow next weekend, and you may hear so many things which probably you have not heard before, and if you have heard or read what the speaker has said, merely to repeat what he has said has very little meaning. But in the very act of listening, that very act helps one to understand and live, apply, not, 'I will try to apply', but one applies, as you do if you are a student in a college or university, you work. If you want to learn mathematics, history and so on, you have to study, you have to enquire, you have to have a good brain. But most unfortunately so-called religious people never use their brains. Am I saying something extravagant? They never enquire, they accept so easily, gullible, and specially when the world is in such a mess, so much destructive activity going on, we try to find someone who will help us to understand all this mess and so get entangled.

Whereas here, this evening and the following two evenings, we are going to talk over together, a conversation, to converse about the things that are quite common to mankind, quite accepted, which we are struggling to understand, to resolve and perhaps go beyond. So this evening we are going to talk over together why human beings right throughout the world are what they are actually after such a long duration of evolution, why we are so primitive psychologically, though technologically we may be marvellous, you may have excellent degrees and so on, but psychologically, inwardly, we are rather barbarous primitive people, brutal, violent, cruel, lacking any sense of great beauty, moral rectitude and so on. One wonders why we have become like this. Why we look to others to help. Why we want leaders. We have had leaders galore, and they have lead us to all kinds of troubles. So we are always looking for the best leader, for the super leader, both in the political, economic world and also in the religious world. And unfortunately we never find them, unless you have found your own particular little guru round the corner.

So this evening we are going to talk over together many problems. And one of the problems is, why human beings have ideals at all? This is really a quite important question: why human beings right throughout the world cling to some form of ideals. The ideals are not facts, they are not actuality. What is actuality is what is happening now. The `now' contains all the past, the present and the future. We will go into that.

So we are asking why we have become like this, so narrow, selfish, brutal, concerned with ourselves, you know all the rest of it, what we are. And we never seem to be free to look at the world and our own little world afresh, anew, unless we have the capacity to wipe out all the past, to have a clean slate and start from there. It would be a marvellous world but unfortunately we can't wipe out the past, and the past is a very complicated process of time. Time is one of the factors of our life, daily life: the time that has past, the time as the present, and the time as the future, both biologically as well as physically. All the remembrances, the remorse, the guilt, all that is a movement of time, which is the past. And the time of the past is the present in which - or the now - all time is contained.

This is going to be rather difficult, we will go into it step by step.

Because we live by time: I hope to see you tomorrow, I hope to achieve, I want to be better than I am, in my job, in my way of living and so on. There is always a becoming, a growing, and that which is always growing is always ending. Are we together in all this? And the future is now. You understand? What we are now we will be tomorrow, and a thousand tomorrows. That's a fact. But if we change radically now, psychologically, inwardly, then the future is now. Do you understand? We will go into it presently, in much more detail. You all look so puzzled, it's not so very complex, but we make everything terribly complex. We are not simple people, we are full of knowledge, and perhaps that's one of our difficulties. Knowledge conditions the brain, and knowledge is time. And to understand something like violence, which most human beings are, violent human beings, and to understand this whole process of violence the knowledge which you have acquired about violence and the knowledge - not knowledge - the theory of non-violence that is also part of knowledge and so we are never free from violence. Let me go into it a little bit more.

Let's take an example of violence. We are violent people. We may have a quiet life, you may not quarrel with your wife and husband, which is rather rare, but deeply we are violent people, anger, aggression. Violence isn't merely physical action, violence is part of imitation, conformity. And we have these opposites, non-violence. And in this country they are talking a lot about non-violence, and in the recent war which you have had in this country, there isn't one person, I was told, who stood up against war. But that's irrelevant. What is important is, is it possible to understand the whole nature of violence and be free of it, and not pursue non-violence? You understand? Are we meeting each other? Yes? I am violent, suppose. The speaker has only once been angry. It sounds rather strange. And at that moment when he was angry it seemed so absurd, so silly to be angry about something, and when you see the stupidity of anger it is gone, you don't try to control it, you don't try to suppress it, you say, yes, it's absurd getting angry about anything. And that's the end of it. You think about it. To observe, to be aware, to give your full attention that you are angry, at that moment you see the whole nature of anger.

So violence, for example, what is violence? It's a fact. The non-fact is non-violence. Right? Would you agree to that? The pursuit of non-violence which may take all your life, and in the pursuit of that ideal you are all the time being violent, you try to control it, you try to suppress it, you act upon it. But you are part of that violence. Aren't you? You, when you get angry, you are that, you are part of that anger, you are the anger. When you are greedy, that feeling is not separate from you. Right? You are that. But when we try to suppress or analyse or control, you separate yourself from the fact and then try to dominate it, or suppress it and all the rest of it. But one realizes you are that. I wonder if you see. When I realize completely that I am violent, then I remain with that fact, I don't pursue stupidly the idea of non-violence. It's a fact I am violent, mad, angry, brutal. And that's a fact and I realize there is no violence separate from me. I am violence, because I am angry, I am competitive, ambitious, brutal and so on. And also I imitate, I conform, that's part of anger, violence. So the observer who says, 'I am violent', the observer is part of that. So there is no contradiction. Where there is contradiction there must be conflict.

I wonder if you have ever gone into the question, not a problem, the question whether one can live in this world normally, healthily, sanely, not neurotically or in other directions, without a single shadow of conflict. I wonder if you have ever questioned to find out if you can live actually, whatever the circumstances are, whatever the environment, whatever the pressures, the limitations, whether one can live a life in which there is not a single conflict.

Have you ever questioned it? Oh, come on! Or it has never occurred to you, you accept conflict as the way of life, as corruption in this country, and other countries, is a way of life. So we accept it, it is past, we get on with it. So conflict makes the mind, the brain dull. The brain is a machine. Like a good car you must keep it in perfect condition, tuned, give proper oil and change the oil every two thousand miles, if you are lucky, to make the engine last long; so the brain is matter, a material thing, a machine, with all its extraordinary capacities, which is really quite infinite. But if that brain is in constant struggle, conflict, going round and round with its own problems, with its own miseries, that very conflict degenerates the brain. It's worn out. And so we are incapable of meeting life afresh.

I wonder if you get this? Are we together when the speaker is talking about all this? Are you taking an interest in it, or is it just another meeting you go to and you are being lectured at? Not understanding, investigating yourself, your own life, the way your live?

So it is possible to be free of total violence, not in the future, which is the ideal, and the pursuit of the ideal has lead people nowhere, but if one is taking violence and going into it, not analytically - that's another question: who is the analyser? Who is the entity that analyses any reaction that you have, like violence? Violence is a reaction, and who is the entity that analyses violence? Because you are violence, but when you separate yourself from violence then you can analyse it. Right? So the separation by the analyser away from the analysed creates a division and therefore in that division there must be conflict. Whereas - please listen to this, just even for fun, just listen to it - whereas the analyser is the analysed. Right? I am violent, the analyser is also part of me, who is also violent. And one violence examines, analyses another violence. So there is always this contradiction. There is no contradiction if there is no division. So the analyser is the analysed; like the thinker is the thought, the thought is not separate from the thinker. I wonder if you see this. The experiencer is not different from the experience, but we are always seeking experience as though experience is something different from me. So there is no duality at all. I wonder if you understand this, in spite of your adwaita and all that kind of business, in spite of all your philosophy and all your teachers about adwaita, is it, that's good enough that word. They have all theorized about duality, only the enlightened escape from all duality and all that kind of stuff. But the actual fact is if you go into it, there is only 'what is', there is only violence, there is no opposite to it. You understand? But our brains are conditioned to the opposite, therefore our brain is struggling to achieve the opposite. And therefore in that there is conflict, suppression and so on. But whereas the fact is there is only this, that is 'what is', which is violence. Right? And if you give your attention to the fact of violence and look at it without any analytical process then you will see it's like a map that is being slowly revealed, then you see the whole content of that word. Are we meeting each other? Are we together in this? All right, we'll go on.

Sir, we ought to talk over together fear because that is part of our life, probably the major part of our life. Fear, what's the cause of fear? Not the object which creates fear, not something the word evokes. You understand? The word may bring about fear, the word 'fear' may arouse fear, but when you have no word, but only observe the reaction which you call fear, what is the root of it? This requires a great deal of exploration, and one hopes that you are willing to go into this with the speaker. Fear is time. I am going to go into it. Fear is a movement in time. So first let us examine carefully what is time. Time as rising and setting, the sun rises and sets, the interval between the sun rising and the sun setting is time. There is time to cover a distance from point to point; there is time which is for you from here to go to your home, it takes time, whether an instant or an hour. So there is physical time, which is, to learn a language takes time, to learn to drive a car takes time, if you want to be a pilot, it takes months and so on. So there is physical time. Right? You understand? And also there is psychological time: I will be, I will become, I am a clerk but I will become the manager one day, I am ignorant but one day I will be enlightened. That is, I am this, I will be that. That is psychological time.

There is physical time, the sun rises and the sun setting, covering, moving from one point to another point, and there is psychological time, which is, I am, I will not be. I am living, but I will die. That's a tremendous interval. I am fifteen - I am not - I am fifteen but I will die one day when I am eighty, that is the movement of that long interval which is psychological time. Right? And also there is time as the future. I have a job now, I might lose that job; I am quarrelling with my wife but one day we will all be happy together. So there is time as the past, time as the present - please listen carefully, if you don't mind, if you are interested - there is the time as the past, time as the present, now, and time as the future. Right? But the time now is the future. Right? The time now is what I am now, but the future is what is present. Right? Got it? So in the now all the past and the future are contained. Right? So the future and the past exist now. I am the result of all the past, modifying itself in the present, and the future is the present. Right? Unless I radically bring about - or rather, there is a mutation in my brain cells, I will be what I am now, unless there is tremendous psychological revolution. Right? So the present is the past and the future, contained now. Right? That is time. Right?

What relationship has time to fear? Because that's what we are going to discuss, talk over together. Because most human beings are frightened, have innumerable forms of fear: fear of darkness, which is neurotic, psychopathic and so on, fear of dying, fear of living, fear that you might lose what you have, fear of your wife and your husband - is that rare in this country? I wonder if you are all saints! You don't seem to react to anything. If there is fear of what you possess, you might lose, fear of growing old and dying. So human beings right throughout the world have tremendous anxiety, which is part of fear: anxiety of not fulfilling, anxiety of not being yourself, anxiety what other people might do to you, and so on. All that is a form of fear. So what is the relationship between fear and time? And shall we in our conversation trim the branches of fear, take one branch after another, or shall we deal with the root of fear? Have you understood my question? I may be frightened of my wife, or I may be frightened of darkness, and I want that particular problem solved. But also I have other problems of fear, it is not just only one I have, fear of dying, fear of growing old, fear that my brain will degenerate, fear that god won't give me what I want unless I go to a particular temple. You know we were told the other day, there is a temple nearby, two hundred or one hundred and fifty miles away, where every three days they have a million dollars. God is very profitable! Yes, sir, you laugh at it. But your gods are very demanding of your pocket. That is, you give him something and he gives you something in return. Reward and punishment. And that's what you call worshipping god. You are a strange crowd all right.

So what is the relationship between fear and time? And also what is the relationship of fear with thought? You understand? I am afraid, afraid of so many things but I want to understand the root of it, because if I can understand, see the quality, the nature, the structure of fear then it is finished. But if I merely trim the branches then fear will continue. So our concern is not how to be rid of fear, that's one of our fallacies, but if one can go, delve deeply into the nature of fear then we shall be able to be free of it entirely. And we are going to talk about it this evening, and if you apply your brains, not the explanation which the speaker is going to give but the actual investigation on your part, not just listen or hear and forget all about it, but if you actually listen, apply as you are sitting there, and go with the speaker investigating it, not accepting what he is saying, but investigate it, question, asking yourself, then you might get up so utterly free of fear and then there will be no gods. When man is free of all fear he needs no comfort, he needs no reward, he doesn't seek something that will help him. This is the burden which mankind has carried for a million years, fear. So let's go into it.

We said time is a factor of fear. Time, again the remembrance of an incident which caused fear - please follow this if you don't mind, if you are interested in it - remembrance of an incident that caused fear which is registered or recorded in the brain, and that record is still there and I now have fear. So the record remembers the fact of fear. So from the past I recognize the fear. You understand? Am I making myself clear? The knowledge of a past incident which caused fear is registered in the brain, as on a tape. So the brain has knowledge of fear. Right? Knowledge of fear. So knowledge is fear. You understand this? Go into it, sir, see the beauty of it and then you will see what it means. So when fear arises now memory steps in and says, 'Yes, I know that is fear'. Right? Which means the knowledge which you have had with regard to fear, that knowledge says, 'That is fear'. So knowledge itself becomes fear. Right? You understand this? And the word, the word 'fear' may also contribute to fear. So knowledge is the word and the word may cause fear. So can you look - please listen to it - is there an observation of fear without the knowledge of other fears so that there is perception of fear without the movement of knowledge? You understand?

So fear is the movement of knowledge as the past, and that knowledge is time. Right? So fear is also part of thought: I might die tomorrow, I might lose my job, I am this but I will become that - it's all the movement of thought. Right? No? I have a job now, I work in a factory, or I am a cook, a carpenter, not your big top people, I am just an ordinary person, even the top people have a great deal of fears I assure you, and I am a carpenter and I might lose my job tomorrow. The 'tomorrow' is time and thought says, 'I might lose it, lose my job'. So thought, time are movements, movements of knowledge. I am discovering this myself as I am going along. Which is, can the brain not record? You understand? I'll show you. Listen to it. You flatter me, the brain immediately records it and you insult me, the brain again records. It's a machine that is recording all the time. Right? And that becomes our knowledge and from that knowledge we act. Now if you do not record, you flatter me the brain doesn't record, I don't say, you are a great friend of mine, or you insult me, neither insult nor flattery is recorded. You understand? Then knowledge is not necessary which might create fear. But I must have knowledge, how to write a letter, how do to do business, if I am crooked or otherwise, I must have knowledge. If I am an accountant I must have knowledge. I don't know if you are following all this? But the psychological knowledge which is recorded, is it possible not to record psychologically? You understand? Find out, sir, don't agree with me. Find out whether it is possible psychologically not to record. Which means the brain has seen the fact of it therefore it is unconditioning itself.

So fear is a movement of time and thought. Right? Now don't please ask, how am I to stop thinking. Now if the speaker is silly enough to give you a system, in that very system there is inherent decay, whether it is bureaucratic system or a particular system of meditation, system of thought. You understand? In the very structure of a system, inherent in it there is decay, it's called entropy, but I won't go into all that. The physicists know this, wastage of energy which can be measured. And the brain is now burdened with a great deal of knowledge and that knowledge has become our conditioning. And therefore that very knowledge prevents us from seeing something new, fresh. Whereas if you can look at fear as it arises for the first time, then it is something entirely different, it's a reaction, a physical reaction and a psychological reaction. So fear, the root of fear, is the movement of time and thought. But if you understand the nature of time, not intellectually but actually, the nature and the structure of time, and also understand the nature and the structure of thought - understand, that means investigate it, be completely familiar with the thing, the movement of time and the movement of thought, which are the basis of fear, then fear, because you are so completely holding this thing in your hands, as it were, it requires your attention, that very attention burns away fear. I wonder if you understand this?

Now how can you love if you have fear? You are all frightened of your gods, aren't you? You are all asking rewards of your god, you pray, you do puja, some rituals, all that indicates, doesn't it, I am just asking most respectfully, doesn't it indicate that you are frightened? Frightened of living, frightened of your problems and so you are asking the gods, which you have invented - right, do you agree to that? Your thought has invented these gods - would you agree to that? Or you are too holy to admit such a thing? You understand, sirs? Thought - please understand this thing for yourself, I am not dictating, I am not doing propaganda, it's your life - and out of this fear thought has created the most marvellous churches, cathedrals, marvellous, architecturally, great beauty, great weight and strength of a building, but thought has created the cathedrals, the temples, the mosques, and also thought has created all the things that are in it, the rituals, the dresses, the incense, the words, those are all the result of thought. And thought is a material process, isn't it? Because memory, the cells in the brain hold memory, that's a fact, and that memory is based on knowledge and experience, so this whole movement is a movement of matter. So thought has invented the god, or the goddesses, gods - I believe there are over three hundred thousand gods in India and only one or two in Europe, they are unfortunate people because you can choose any number of them because there are so many of them. You can have a great deal of fun going from one god to another. Don't think I am sacrilegious. Those gods that thought has created are not sacred, though we worship them. What is sacred is not in the temples, not in the mosques, or in the churches. What is sacred exists only in a mind that is free from fear, free from conflict, free from violence. But having violence, fear, anxiety, we only have a multiplication of these gods.

So thought and time are the same. Right? Because knowledge, to have knowledge, scientific knowledge or any kind of knowledge, requires time. And time and thought are the root of fear, and time and thought are now, are in the present. And out of this arises a very serious question, whether there is a time which does not belong to thought or the movement known as time. You understand?

So if one has listened, not merely heard what we have talked about for an hour, if you actually have listened, absorbed, as you absorb on a hot day a cold drink, if you have absorbed what has been said or listened to what has been said and seen the truth of it, that very perception - and perception is not of time. I wonder if you understand this. No, we must also talk over briefly - it is time to stop - perception, to see. You see that tree. Do you really see the tree at all ever? Do you really ever see the beauty of a sunrise? Or the sunset? Or you are too occupied with yourself that you never see the beauty of the earth? When you see that tree, what takes place? The word `tree' interferes so that you don't actually look at it. Have you noticed? All right, come much nearer: when you say, it is my wife, have you ever looked at your wife? You look at her, or your husband, your girl friend, whatever you have, you look with the word, with the image, with the pictures that you have about her or him, so this acts as a barrier, you never look. So you never become sensitive. Right? There is dirt and squalor all around Madras, you never look, do you? Or you are so accustomed to it you put up with anything, any government, any bureaucracy, any gods, anything goes. Sir, one has to have great sensitivity, that sensitivity is not to be cultivated, it comes into being when you look at the beauty of a single star in the sky, when you see the new moon, when you see the sea. But when you only employ one or two sensory responses, that very limitation creates narrow outlook. But if you look with all your senses, at a tree, at a sky, at a cloud of an evening full of light and great beauty, with all your senses, then in that observation there is no self, the `me'. It's only when there are partial responses of the senses, then that very partiality, limitation, creates the `me'.

So fear can come to an end completely when you understand the nature of time and thought.

MADRAS 3RD PUBLIC TALK 7TH JANUARY 1984

We ought to talk over together a great many things this evening. We should talk over why human beings get hurt, not biologically but psychologically, and that hurt they carry all through their life. And also we ought to talk over together the question of sorrow, whether that sorrow can ever end, and the implications that are involved in the ending of sorrow. And also as it is the last but one talk we ought to go into the question of what is death, because tomorrow if you are here, and I probably will be here too, we should talk about meditation and if there is anything that's really sacred in life. We will talk about that tomorrow, but today, this evening, it is rather lovely, marvellous clouds, I don't know if you have noticed it, we ought to talk over together, as I said, why human beings from their childhood until they die carry this burden, this pain of hurt, psychologically, inwardly. And whether it is possible never to be hurt, to have a brain that has never known hurt. You understand?

And as we also said in the last two talks, if you don't mind it being repeated, this is not a lecture, this is not a meeting, a gathering where one speaker instructs others or informs others; we are having a conversation, two friends sitting under a tree quietly, happily, relaxed, talking about their daily life, talking about the art of living, which is the greatest art. And neither of them is convincing the other, not doing any kind of propaganda of conviction or make the other yield to a certain argument, but two friends who have known each other for sometime, are talking about their lives, as you and the speaker are doing now. It's a form of dialogue. It's a very complex question, the word 'dialogue', a conversation between two people. I pose you a question, put you a question and you reply to that question, and to that reply the speaker challenges that reply, so this process of two people talking together and in the process of talking together both of them disappear but only the question and answer remains. You understand? Probably you have never done that kind of conversation, you have never had such a dialogue. We are going to try it. That is, you put a question, to that the speaker replies, and you respond to that reply, back and forth till you have exhausted your prejudices and the speaker also exhausts his convictions, so that both of us are free and therefore there is no you and the speaker remaining, but only the question remains. Have you understood a little bit of this? Probably you have never tried this kind of thing, because we are all so full of ready answers.

So we are going into first the art of living. The word 'art' means etymologically, join together, join things together, but I think we ought to give a totally different meaning to it. Art is to put everything where it belongs, to put things in their right place. So there is the art of listening, there is the art of learning, there is the art of perception. We are going to go into that briefly.

The art of listening, not merely hearing words. The hearing of the words is quite a different process than the art of listening. The art of listening implies you are actually listening, not interpreting, not agreeing, not putting up resistance but listening to what another has to say, so that you are not the translator of what is being said. You don't project your own conclusions, prejudices, opinions, judgements, you are actually listening. And that requires certain attention, and in that attention you as the listener disappear, there is just listening. If you are listening to those crows, to those birds, you are listening, you don't say, 'That's the noise of the crow calling', you just listen. And when we do so listen attentively there is neither agreement or non-agreement, you are just in a state of attention, not only to what the speaker is saying but also listen to your wife and husband, which is much more difficult because you have got used to each other. But fortunately you don't know the speaker, the speaker doesn't know you, so we can both listen without any prejudices. Which implies great sensitivity, to have your senses active so that you are listening so completely. And if one listens so attentively there is a certain miracle taking place. It's not a listening of one opinion against another opinion, or argument against another argument, however reasonable, however crooked, illusory, but a listening in which there is silence.

And there is an art of learning. You don't mind my talking like this? Don't so easily, if I may point out, agree so quickly. As the speaker is talking, do it. Listen to that crow, so you listen with your senses naturally, not just with the hearing of the ear but with all your senses awakened listening to that, then you don't exist, only the sound. Sound has an extraordinary importance in life. May I go on like this? You don't mind? The sound of the sea, the sound of the voice of your wife or husband, the sound among the leaves, the sound of the waves, the sound of a tree which is very still. Sound has extraordinary importance. And the art of learning is not the accumulation of memory. You go to school, there you are cultivating memory, mathematics, biology, physics and so on, you are being informed, your brain is gathering information, storing knowledge about mathematics or geography, history, whatever you like, and that knowledge remains stored in the brain to be used skilfully or not skilfully in earning a livelihood. So knowledge is static, you can add to it, you can take away from it but the core of it is static, it's not dynamic. That which is dynamic cannot be added to or taken away from, inherently it is dynamic, but knowledge is not. Knowledge is mere accumulation of information, of the result of many experiences stored. That which is kept is not dynamic, that which is moving like a river, that is dynamic.

So there is an art of learning. That is, to put everything in its right place. One has to learn mathematics, if you want to be an engineer, flier, or a physicist, you must accumulate knowledge, that is necessary; but he is adding to what he already knows. So knowledge gradually becomes static, whereas the act of learning you are moving, never remaining or holding in the same place. Am I conveying something? Are we understanding each other? Do work with me please, will you? We are working together, you are not just listening to the speaker, you and the speaker are working together, learning together, not learning, accumulating what the speaker has said and going home and saying, 'This is what he said'. That's not learning. Learning is the application now of what is being said and discovering for yourself whether it is true or false. If it is true, act.

In the world theory and action or life have nothing to do with each other. In this country specially you are full of theories, full of probabilities, possibilities. And say one thing, do another. You know the game you play. So learning is something that is whole, not fragmented as knowledge is. I wonder if you understand all this. It's a movement as a river, with tremendous volume moving, learning. That is the art of learning.

Then there is the art of perception. Perception is different from seeing. Perception is not of time, but the seeing and the translating what has been seen into action involves a certain period of time. Right? I see what I should do, and I will do it. The seeing and the doing, there is a gap, an interval which is time. Right? That's simple, right? The speaker is not saying something mysterious, this is what is happening. You see something that should be done and you think about it, you argue, probe, whether it is convenient, not convenient, profitable, not profitable and so on, all that implies an interval of time before action. Right? Whereas perception is seeing and the doing so that there is no interval between action and perception. I see, I perceive that I should not be a Hindu because one of the reasons for being a Hindu is for security purposes, and also it is one of the causes of war. Nationalism, tribalism is one of the causes of war. So I see that, I perceive it, sorry, I perceive it to be the truth and therefore I am no longer a Hindu. But whereas if I say, 'Why shouldn't I be a Hindu, it is convenient, it gives me a certain sense of security, I must go with the current, I am rather too weak to stand by myself' and so on, in those arguments and escapes you still remain at the end of it a Hindu. Whereas if you see the danger of being a Muslim, Hindu, Buddhist, Christian and so on, the seeing the danger of it, you act instantly. You act instantly when you see a cobra. If a cobra was amongst you now - my goodness how you would act! So see what is implied in perceiving which requires attention, care, watching things to find out.

So there is the art of listening, the art of learning and the art of perception. If one lives with this art then life becomes an extraordinary thing, because that requires great sensitivity, care, attention. So having said all that, let's enquire - enquire, because in enquiry you must be free to enquire, but if you are attached to your particular conclusions, it is not possible to enquire. Your conclusion then directs your enquiry. So to enquire there must be freedom.

We are going to enquire together why human beings throughout the world get hurt psychologically, get wounded, carry this burden of pain all their life. And when the brain is hurt it becomes neurotic, psychopathic, lives in all kinds of illusions, superstitions. And most human beings from their childhood are psychologically wounded. Aren't you all wounded? Do be a little honest to yourself. Aren't you wounded? In the school the teacher says, 'You are not as good as that boy', that hurts you, doesn't it. And the mother and the father says, 'You are not as good as your elder brother', you awaken jealousy, competition, hurt. Right? And those who are hurt deeply, psychologically, inwardly, all their life they have fear not to be hurt any more. And so they build a wall round themselves, isolate themselves. Don't you all do this? Are you all people who have never been hurt? Your husband, or the wife, says something cruel, a passing word, stinging and that remains, recorded in the brain, and that hurt breeds all kinds of fears, anxieties, pain. Most people are not aware of all these hurts. If one becomes aware that one is hurt, and one sees the consequences of that hurt, then what is it, we are asking, that is hurt? Who is it that is hurt? You are listening, I hope, learning. When I say, 'I am hurt by what you said yesterday', who is the 'I' that is hurt? Please, kindly listen to this because it's your life, not the speaker's life, but it's your personal life, and we are learning the art of living in which human beings are not hurt at all, so that they have a brain which has no hurt at all, therefore no resistance. You understand the consequences of not being hurt? So who is hurt? You say, 'I am hurt', the 'I' is the image that I have built about myself. Right? Are we together in this? You have images, haven't you, about yourself, that you are a Christian, that you are a Buddhist, you are a Hindu, or Muslim, you must be a great man, you are a great man - you have all kinds of images. If you are a professor you have got an image about yourself, if you are a scientist you have an image about yourself, if you are a housekeeper and so on, you have images. And it those images that get hurt, and the image is you. Right? Are we clear on this matter? You get hurt because you are the image that you have built about yourself. I sit on a platform - I have sat on a platform all my life, unfortunately - and somebody comes along and says, 'You are an ass, and you think you are a great man, you have got a reputation, you are rather a silly old man', if I have an image about myself as a great man that image is going to get hurt, and I say, I am hurt. So is it possible - please listen to this - is it possible not to create images at all? Not to have an image about yourself at all, that you are great and all that, that you are rather a shady politician, or that you are a religious man - not to have a single image. Have you ever tried it? Because the brain creates, thought creates these images because in those images there is security, at least thought thinks there is security in those images. Right? And these images get hurt therefore there is no security at all.

So is it possible not to have a single image? The image is the recording process in the brain: you say something to me which is pleasant, it is recorded, and when you say something very friendly you become my friend, recorded; but if you say something not pleasant you are my enemy. Right? That's recorded. So the recording process goes on all the time in the brain because if you don't record and depend on that record for security, where are you? You understand my question? Are you following all these questions? If you have no image, where are you? You are nothing. Right? You are absolutely nothing and because of that fear of being nothing you create images, because all of us want to be something. And so we create images, hoping that in those images there is security, and one finds those images get hurt and therefore security is gone. Now you have listened to this, listened, and in the listening you are becoming sensitive to the fact, and you see the truth of it, not the description, not the explanation, but you see the fact that you are hurt, and you are hurt because you have an image about yourself, and as long as you have an image it must inevitably get hurt. If you listen to this carefully, attentively, there will be no building of an image at all because you see the truth of it. It's up to you.

We ought to talk over together, or rather listen together, whether it is possible in life, living in the modern world with all the extraordinary things that are going on, and all the brutality, the violence, the beastliness of things that we are all doing, is it possible to end sorrow. Mankind has suffered for thousands and thousands of years, we have evolved in suffering, we have had wars for the last five to six thousand years historically - and imagine the number of people killed, wounded, maimed and all the people who have shed tears. And in our daily life we suffer a great deal. Suffering isn't merely physical. One has a disease, either it gets cured or it doesn't and you put up with it, if you can. But sorrow is much deeper than that. Sorrow is remorse, regret, guilt, feeling of guilt, pain, and the feeling of desperate loneliness. Sorrow isn't something that you casually put aside, like physical pain, if you can; but sorrow is something that is extraordinary. So we are together going to investigate it. It is not the speaker is going to investigate it and you just listen to it, but together so that both of us understand the depth, the extraordinary vitality of sorrow, the shock of sorrow. (Noise of engine) Do you listen to that noise, to the roar of that engine, or do you resist it? If you listen to the roar of that engine you will also listen carefully to the speaker because both are sounds.

So sorrow is a very, very complex affair. Sorrow that exists between a man and a woman; though they may be married and so on, there is a certain intimidation, certain fears. Where there is possession there must be fear. If the wife possesses her husband, and the husband possesses the wife, or the woman and the man, in that possession there is fear, there is sorrow. Sorrow isn't just a passing intermittent shadow on life, but it is there always in all of us. And is that sorrow, the pain, the loneliness - please you are not listening to me taking notes on a pad in your brain, we are examining together, so you are entirely involved in it, because we are talking about your sorrow, not my sorrow. And this burden, the pain, the anxiety, the loneliness, the despair, the depression, the guilt, the remorse, all that, all those feelings, all those reactions, contained, held in that one word. The pain that you can never become the head of something, the pain of your own incapacity, the pain of not being able to do certain things which you want to do, the pain of ignorance, not the ignorance of books but the pain of ignorance of oneself. All this is sorrow. And also the sorrow when the husband leaves the wife and has left the children, the sorrow of divorce, and the sorrow of loneliness.

Do you know loneliness? Or is that a strange reaction? You all know what loneliness is, you may be head of some institution, or you may have a great many friends, and when you are walking by yourself on the beach or in the wood you suddenly feel utterly unrelated to anything, alone, solitude, lonely. All this is contained in that word `sorrow: the pain, the grief, the tears, and the laughter too. And man has lived with it, he is conditioned by it. And after these fifty thousand years since man has come into being, man, which means woman too, man has carried this burden. He may go to temples, he may try to escape from it, pray, worship, but that sorrow is always there. My son dies, and I shed tears for the rest of my life. The wife has left me, or the husband, or my lover, if you know what love means, and that is enormous pain.

So we are asking, not casually, not merely verbally, but we are asking a question out of our heart, whether that sorrow can ever end. It can end completely, with the ending of sorrow there is passion. That very word `sorrow' contains that word `passion'. Where there is sorrow there cannot be passion, where there is sorrow there cannot be love, where there is sorrow there is cunning evasion, escape; with the ending of sorrow there is passion. And that passion is love. Where there is suffering you cannot love another, you may pity another, that sorrow is self-pity, self-concern, but the ending of it. Then you will ask, naturally: how is it to end? That's a wrong question because then you are asking - the word `how' means, show me a method, show me a practice, show what to do. But if we are investigating together, learning together about the whole phenomenon of sorrow, not escaping, not trying to find comfort, when that thing happens, sorrow when a friend with whom you have been very friendly dies of cancer, and there is the feeling that he is gone. Now sorrow is a challenge and it is a shock, both biologically and psychologically: my son is gone, it's a shock, and the fact is he is gone, and to hold that sorrow in your hands as you hold a beautiful flower so that the whole depth and significance and the strength and the beauty of that by holding it, not escaping from it, then you will see out of that holding in your hand, as it were, the whole movement, the reaction, then you will see that sorrow becomes something totally different.

And then there is love, then there is compassion. And love and compassion have their own intelligence. Not the intelligence of cunning thought, not the intelligence of human beings who can put machinery together to go to the moon, that intelligence is something entirely different, it is outside of the brain because love is not in the brain, love is not thought - we will talk of that later.

And also we ought to talk over together death. Some of us are getting old, aren't we, including the speaker. There are a lot of young people here: death is common to all of us, the old, the young, the about to be born, at the end of a journey death is there, you can't avoid it. That's one definite fact. Think if all the people who have lived on this earth had not died! You understand what I am saying. If all the people who existed before us had lived what kind of earth would it be?

It's a very complex question. Are you interested in it? Or you say, please, don't go into a morbid subject? You and the speaker are going to die, some day, through accident, through disease, through wearing the organism out. And slowly the decaying of the brain, gaga-ism, forgetting, becoming senile. We are using the word `senile' scientifically, not as an insult. So death is waiting. And why is it that all human beings are frightened of it? Please, this is a conversation between you and me and the speaker. Aren't you frightened, scared? If you are honest, and if you say, look, we are all getting old, terrible war may happen, nuclear war, if there is such a thing - one hopes there will be no such thing - the earth might cease to exist. The scientists have written about it. If there is a nuclear war that's the end of the earth. No demonstrations, nothing, if the politicians have their way, and if you are all nationalists, tribalists, broken up, you are helping that war to come into being, you are responsible for it. Don't escape from that fact. As long as you are a nationalist, belong to different religions you are inviting this war.

So death is a great phenomenon, like birth. So one asks, why have we, living, put death far from us? Right? You are asking that question. We are living, active, if you call acting going to the office every day, struggling, fighting, angry, bitter, cynical, and why is it that we have separated life as a thing and death as something else? Why is there this gap, long years? What is important, the ending or what? The ending, which is death. Which is important? Isn't the living more important than dying, isn't it? No? Right? You don't seem to react to anything. A most extraordinary phenomenon! We are asking seriously, not flippantly, not cynically, or just for argument: which is important living or dying? If you could reply, you would say, living, naturally. So what is living? What is your living, what's your life? Don't go off and say, what is living and make a theory of it, speculate and quote somebody or other, what's your life? That's what you call living. Your sensory responses, your sexual responses, your theories, going to the office from 9.0 o'clock until 5.0 o'clock for the rest of your life, the next sixty years - think of the horror of it. And you say, yes, that's my responsibility because I have got children, wife, uncle and aunt I must support, you know what you all say. Struggle, pain, sorrow, pleasure, laughter occasionally, joy occasionally, concern with yourself. Right? Accumulating knowledge, nothing new, nothing fresh, alive. This is your life. And to you that is far more important than dying. Face it, sirs, look at it.

So death comes to you, to us, to every living thing, even these marvellous trees will die some day. There is, in California, a tree, sequoia, which is over five thousand years, a marvellous tree, full of age, history and the beauty of it. That also comes to an end. We are always beginning and ending. Right? So death is something that's final and ending. But we don't want to end so drastically, finally, so we believe in reincarnation: I will live next life, a better chance, I will become the prime minister next life, I will be the guru of gurus next life, I will attain enlightenment next life. Right? So the organism, biologically there is an ending to it, the physical organism, and also biologically as a matter of fact the brain, matter, is also being worn out by constant struggle, constant conflict, degenerating. Knowledge is one of the factors of this deterioration of the brain because we depend so much on knowledge. We said the art of living is to put things in their right place. You need knowledge to write a letter, to do your business, you need knowledge to go to the temples, the knowledge has created the gods inside the temple and the mosques and churches. So one of the factors of the brain becoming old is the accumulation of knowledge. Take it sir, listen to it, find out. When you say, I know my wife, what have you done, you have never looked at her, you have already created images about her.

So there is death and there is living. The living is also becoming more and more dangerous, more and more painful, more and more uncertain, confused. This is our life - quarrelling, struggling, anxious, sorrow, pain, remorse, guilt and so on, this is what we call living. And we say, look, dying is the ending of all this. And we say, I, there is in me something permanent that will go on next life. But you never examine what is the 'me', what is the self. Actually, if you examine it, explore it, question it, doubt it, not accept the old tradition, what are you actually? Face it, sir, don't be nervous. You are your name, your body, your knowledge, your job, your anxiety, your pain, you are all that. You are the words, the picture, the images, and these words, the accumulation of this bundle, you want to carry on next life. Is there a next life, as you want it? Or is there no death at all? Oh, you don't understand this. I'll show you, we'll talk about it.

To live with death, not commit suicide, I am not talking about that, silly stuff - to live with death. Death means the ending, you can't take your money with you, you can't take your family with you, you can't take all your wealth with you, your house, your property, your knowledge, death is coming and wipes away all that because your brain, because it has not enough oxygen, withers. So is it possible - please listen to this - is it possible to live always ending? That is, you are attached: you are attached to your wife, you are attached to your money, you are attached to your ideas, conclusions, your ideals, you are terribly attached. And death comes along and says, wipe out all that my friend, you are dead. You have to wipe all that out unless you believe in next life. If you believe actually in next life you have to live correctly now. Right? Right, sirs? Because you are going to pay for it next life if you don't do it properly now. But you don't believe in reincarnation actually, it's just a lovely conceptual idea. But if you really believed in it you would be living a life of tremendous integrity, saying exactly what you mean and doing exactly what you think. But you don't believe in reincarnation, it's just a theory, as so many theories you have. You might ask the speaker, do you believe in it, as inevitably you are going to ask. I have no belief, the speaker has no belief about anything. Because where there is no fear, where there is no sorrow, there is something totally different, and that has no death. Compassion is not, my compassion, love is not, my love - love is love. Intelligence is not mine or yours, it is intelligence.

So where there is the ending of all this there is the other. So you are attached - not to your bank account, don't take that - you are attached to your wife, can you tell her or him, 'I am no longer attached to you'? What would happen if you told her or him this?

Do it, sir, find out. What would happen? Both of you would get terribly angry, or terribly jealous, or you are attached to somebody else. But death is going to free you from attachment. So while living daily to end attachment. You understand what I am saying? I am attached to this house, if I am, I am attached to my reputation, if I am, and to live is to end attachment. So I am living and at the same time dying. You understand that? So that the two are never separate. So that implies a movement which is not of time. Love is not of time, love isn't something put together by thought. Thought is of time. Love is not in the brain, love is something outside of the brain. And to live means also the ending. If you see the truth of this, not say, 'I will die, I will get unattached' - that means nothing - but if you see the truth of it, the depth of it, the beauty of it, the strength of it, then the brain becomes unconditioned, it's not conditioned then through attachment; it is conditioned as it is, as your brain is conditioned to be a Hindu, to be a Muslim, to be a Christian and so on, your brain is conditioned, a conditioned brain cannot possibly know what love is. You may have sympathy, you may have pity, you may have various expressions of communication, of affection. Love is not sentiment, love is not emotion. It is as strong as death.

And so to live at the highest level which is freedom, freedom from all the petty things of life, but I have to earn a livelihood. As society is put together, structured, I have to earn a livelihood, I will do it, but that's not the end as you make it, earning money, power, position. Have you ever considered whether power is evil, power of the politicians, your power over your children, your wife or husband, power in any form. The temples have power over you, so the temples are evil, or the churches because they have enormous power over your mind, over your brain, it's like a dictator, like those totalitarian states where you are not allowed to think and act and be a free human being.

So when you understand the whole way of living, the art of living, actually, daily, the art of living, not the theory of living, not the speculation, not the theories and all that, but the actual living of your daily life; not to be hurt, to end all sorrow and to understand and live with death, then life is something of an extraordinary thing that you can never imagine or think up. Life then is something eternal, which has no time, no beginning and no end.

MADRAS 4TH PUBLIC TALK 8TH JANUARY 1984

I suppose one must talk. We began these talks with the enquiry: religion and peace on earth require a great deal of intelligence. Peace on earth has not been possible for man for thousands and thousands of years, nor has religion, what is accepted as religion, brought peace to man. There have been religious wars, religions have killed people, blessed canons, war ships, religions have tortured, burnt people, humanity, and all religions talk about peace on earth. And apparently we never seem to have peace on earth. This is a fact. Neither in society nor in the environment, which we are slowly, carefully destroying, nor is there peace in ourselves. And we began these talks with enquiry into these two subjects.

And if one may again point out, without boring you, that this is not a lecture about religion, or philosophy or what is peace and so on. It is not how you should think or what you should think, but rather together you and the speaker enquire into this very complex question of what is religion and if it is possible not only to have peace in the world but primarily in oneself. If there is not peace in us, inwardly, psychologically, then we create a society which has no peace whatsoever. It is becoming more and more diabolical, more and more destructive. We human beings have become more and more cruel, more and more careless, indifferent. And religions have tried to tame man. There have been various commandments, various sanctions, the so-called religious books throughout the world have said, do this, don't do that. And fortunately, or unfortunately, we have never obeyed them, we just quote them, they become nice slogans for political or religious purposes and we carry on as we are, thoughtless, indifferent, callous and rather brutal in our own activities and thoughts. And the speaker has put religion and peace at the end of the talks, generally, because we have been through the whole complex problem of living, daily living; relationship we talked about, how important it is, without right relationship there will be perpetual conflict between man and woman, between society and each one of us, because society has been built together, put together, structured according to our desires, we have made it. And we have been through fear, whether it is at all possible for human beings to be utterly free of fear, and we said it is possible. And also we talked a great deal yesterday evening about suffering, the enormous suffering that man has borne throughout his life and past generations, and perhaps the future generations.

And we should talk over together as two friends, not trying to convince each other of anything, not trying to do any kind of propaganda, trying to convert one to one's own point of view, but together, sitting down under a tree, talking about not only their daily travail, their daily toil, their daily misfortunes and incidents and unhappiness and depression, but also the two friends are talking about their religion, what is religion, and whether it is possible for human beings who have lived so long on this beautiful earth, whether it is possible to have peace at all, not only in themselves, in their lives, in their attitudes, in their way of daily living, whether it is possible to have peace, quietness, without any conflict, without any problems. And we are together this nice evening going into all this.

Please bear in mind that the speaker most respectfully points it out to you that he is not investigating, together you and he are exploring into this very complex problem of what is religion and if there can be peace in the world. Because you are the world, the world is not separate from you. What you are the world is, what you are in daily life the world is. That is, whether you are an American, Russian, Chinese, or Indian or Muslim or whatever you are, each human being suffers, goes through a great deal of anxiety, always seeking security, both psychologically and outwardly. And that security is being gradually denied through wars, through terrorism, through all kinds of unspeakable things that are going on in the world. And fundamentally if we as human beings do not change our whole way of living, our attitudes and expressions and outlook, we are going to create a world that is going to be destroyed. I do not know if you have not read or talked to some top scientists, many of them are saying, the speaker has talked to some of them, if there is a nuclear war the whole earth will be destroyed, the whole earth, including your favourite country - India, Russia, America, the world will be totally destroyed. This is not a threat, this is what is taking place between politicians, how to juggle this. And there have been books and articles, in America specially, and I believe in Russia also, what would happen to man if a bomb fell in a particular city ten million people will disappear altogether, vaporized, a hundred million round the centre will be hopelessly ill, their eyes melting and so on, all the horrible things.

So we should as human beings, living in this world, controlled by scientists and politicians, shaped by our thinking, by newspapers, magazines, and by the owners of temples, whether it is government owned or individually owned, we ought to talk about all this together, and one believes that you are here for that purpose, not just to listen, just to hear a few words and go home and pursue the same thing that you have been doing, but rather thinking things out together, not intellectually or romantically or imaginatively, or theoretically, but actually find out.

So first what is religion? The root meaning of that word is not very clear. But we know, we have some perception of what religion is, as it is now; rituals, meaningless utterances, prayers, asking god to help you, and you pay in return something, either in coin or through some kind of sacrifice, take vows and so on - quid pro quo, you give me this and I'll give you that. And religions, as they are now, most of them believe in god, probably you all do. Right? Would the speaker be accurate if he asked you if you believe in god, most of you? Silence! Most of you believe in god, you never ask why. If there is no fear in your heart, absolutely no fear, would you have gods? And gods are created by thought. Go to any temple, any mosque, or any cathedral, and all the things apart from architecture - the great cathedrals of Europe have marvellous architecture, structures so enormous and so marvellous, great dignity, like some of the Indian temples and mosques, all those external things are created by thought, good architects - anonymous. You don't know who built the ancient temples of India, or the most beautiful mosques in the world or the cathedrals, but what is inside these temples of the world is put together by thought - their rituals, their costumes, their idols, are all put together by hand or by thought. And thought, as we said, is a material process. I do not know if you have gone into it, if you have you must have perceived for yourself. That thought is contained in the brain cells as memory, knowledge, experience. We went into that very carefully. And whatever thought has created, which is your gods, your rituals, your prayers, and all the books, religious books of the world have been put together by thought. You might say, they are divine revelations, straight from the horse's mouth, but it is still thought that has put those words in the book.

Thought is a material process because it is the result of experience, knowledge, memory stored in the brain. The cells of the brain carry these memories. So god, prayers, all the things that are contained in churches, temples and mosques are put together by thought, whether that thought be ancient or modern it is still thought. So what has thought done? Invented the image then worships the image. You understand? Through imagination, through fear, through longing, through this search for some eternity where there might be peace. Thought has done all this. So thought creating the images, whether by the hand or by the brain, then worships the very thing which it has created. Obvious. So you are playing a game, which doesn't affect your daily life at all.

So what has religion to do with your daily life? If religion is something in the temple and all that and your life is entirely different, what takes place? Theories, concepts, conclusions, which are entirely divorced from one's activities, business, science and so on. Naturally one becomes hypocritical. May I use that word without insulting? This is what we have become, say one thing, which is to prayer or worship, and do exactly the opposite. And such people call themselves religious, idealists, and they miss the enormous quality of straight thinking and acting.

So what is religion? Please ask yourselves as two friends talking over together this question, what is religion. Man from time immemorial has sought something beyond all this, beyond the daily travail, beyond his loneliness and despair, his conflicts and anxieties, his everlasting suffering, he sought to put outside all this to find something which is not put together by thought. The ancient Sumerians, the ancient Egyptians, and the five thousand, seven thousand years of Hurafba, you know Pakistan and so on, all sought something beyond. Because pain, suffering, one cannot endure too long, it dulls the mind, the brain, it dulls the quality of love. But man has sought that. And the priests come along, all over the world they are coming, to translate that into daily life. He becomes the interpreter, he becomes the guide, the guru, because we don't know what that is, but somebody says, I know, and we are so gullible - and I hope you are not gullible now - we are so gullible because we are suffering, we want comfort, we want safety, we want certainty, and we are caught by that. And this is what is happening throughout the world. If you are dissatisfied with one structure of religion you turn to the other, if you are a Christian you are fed up with it, if you are sufficiently intellectual - no, sorry, it's very romantic and sentimental, but go to India, there you will find light. You know what is happening here.

So this has been the long struggle throughout the centuries to find something which is not of time, which is not of thought, which is not put together by thought, something totally immeasurable. And you have imagined it, said there is heaven and hell, in heaven there is peace, not on earth, not in our daily life, but in heaven there is peace. So you have postponed or put away peace from daily life.

So together we ought to investigate this, if you are serious and interested because it's your life. Is there something beyond all this? Is there something that is sacred? We are going to investigate that very carefully. And also we ought to consider together what is peace. The obvious meaning is not to have conflict, not to have pain, not to suffer, not to have everlasting struggle from the moment you are born until you die. That is to have no problems at all, and no conflict. Is that possible? Is it possible to live in this world, not run away from the world, is it possible to live a life, a daily life without a single shadow of conflict? If you say it is not possible, then you have shut the door, or if you say, yes, it is possible, you have also shut the door. But if you begin to enquire, if you begin to explore, neither saying it is possible or not possible, to learn, to go very deeply into this question, whether man, you, living in this town, married or unmarried, family, and so on, job, responsibilities, whether you can live completely at peace with yourself. Of course you can if you are neurotic, psychopathic, you can imagine you are in heaven or believe in some fantastic thing and you live with that, and so you have closed yourself in a belief and imagine in that belief you are living in peace. But all that is rather childish, immature and mediocre.

The word `mediocre' means, the root meaning of that word is never going to the top of the hill but always part of the hill. That's the meaning of the word mediocre. You may be good at your business, as a great scientist, as a philosopher, as a professor, as a good carpenter, but your life may be mediocre. We are not talking of good professional careers, which you are all good at, but we are talking about mediocrity, a mediocre brain. And not to have a mediocre brain, which is to live at your highest capacity, not your capacity expressed in some business or in some profession, but to live inwardly a life of great austerity, integrity. The word 'austerity' comes from the Greek, which means to have a dry mouth. Which is, those people who are austere generally are very dry, hard, stern, one or two loin cloths, that is not austerity. Austerity is the quality of a brain that is whole, not broken up, that has great depth and integrity and there is no shadow of conflict.

We are going together to examine whether it is possible to live in the modern world without any conflict. What is conflict? Please bear in mind all the time that you and the speaker are having a friendly conversation. And as they are friends, talking about life. You are asking the question, not the speaker. So you are asking the question: what is conflict, why do we live in conflict, are we aware that we live in conflict, or we have become so hardened, so callous, indifferent that we accept everything, the squalor, the poverty, the misery, the confusion, and naturally conflict, we put up with it? But if you begin to enquire whether it is possible to live without conflict then you have to ask - I hope you are asking - what is contradiction? And also you have to ask, as long as there is measurement, which is comparison, there must be conflict. Right? Are we meeting each other? Our life is always based, most of our life is based on comparison; in schools, colleges, universities, you are always compared, your degrees are the result of comparison. And where there is comparison there must be conflict, measure - you are tall, I am short, or I am black and you are white, or pink. It is always comparison. You are bright, I am not, I want to be bright like you, you look so nice and I am not nice looking. So there is this conflict of comparison. So can you live without a single movement of comparison? Do it, sirs, you will see. Then you will see that what is important is what you are, not what you should be, or what you want to become.

And also conflict arises when there is separation, when there is duality, the opposite. I am this, I will be that; I am violent but I will pursue non-violence, which is the opposite. So is there opposite at all? Are you following all this? Are you interested in all this? Or have you gone to sleep? It's a comfortable place - I hope you are all comfortable. And you have been challenged, questioned, asked, you have to respond. Of course there are so many people you can't all respond at once, there would be too much noise, but if you respond to yourself, find out: is there an opposite at all. There is the opposite, man, woman, dark, light, sun rising, sun setting, but psychologically, inwardly is there an opposite? I know - no, I don't know - people have told me there are some theories that only the enlightened have no opposites. I don't believe it, no, I question it rather, I think that is nonsense. There is only `what is'. That is, violence is the fact, non-violence is non-fact. So the brain has created the non-fact because it is incapable of dealing with the fact. Right? If you know how to put an engine right then there is no problem but if you don't know how to deal with `what is', your violence or whatever it is, then you must invariably invent its opposite, because through the opposite you hope some day to achieve or change `what is'. I hope you are following all this.

So we are saying, there is no opposite, except you are tall, I am short and all that, physically we are different, but psychologically, inwardly there is only the fact, and how to deal with the fact. If you know how to deal with it there is no opposite. So we are going to investigate together whether we can look at the fact, the fact being violence, fear, sorrow, callousness, concern with oneself. These are all facts. Whether there is heaven, whether one day you will be enlightened - all that is non-fact, it has no meaning. But if that has a meaning and you hold on to it and you are avoiding 'what is' there must be conflict because there is duality. Right? There is conflict when you say one thing and do another, think one thing and act totally differently to what you think. It's what you are all doing. So is it possible to understand violence, fear, which is what we have, not create the opposite but comprehend, learn, investigate 'what is'? If you take any subject, any reaction, like violence, because that is fairly common to all of us, we are all rather violent people, aggressive, we may not be aggressive in one direction but in other directions we are. Now we are violent people, that's a fact. How do you look at violence? Is violence separate from you? If you say, non-violence we are pursuing, that is totally separate from you, because you have no relationship with it actually, but what you are is violence. So can you look at that violence and understand the nature and the structure and the depth of that violence? That is to perceive, apprehend, learn about the whole content of violence. Violence is not only physical but much more psychological, inward. Now what happens? I am going to go into it, if you are interested in it.

I am violent, suppose the speaker is violent, angry, irritated, imitating, conforming - all those are patterns of violence.

Conformity, comparison, anger, jealousy, and so on. That word 'violence' contains all that. Now I am violent, that's a fact. How do I look at it, how do I understand it, how do I explore it? Please do this as we are talking. First of all, is that violence different from me? You understand? Is anger, jealousy, fear, separate from me, or I am that? I know you will say, who is looking. We are going to go into that. First of all we must be very clear that violence is not something apart from me, I am violent. Right? Would you acknowledge that fact? Or you would say, who is it that is witnessing, observing violence? The observer is the past. Right? The observer who says, I am violent, and sees the nature of violence, the observer, the looker, the investigator, is the past, his memories of violence, the word 'violence' is part of memory and so on. The observer is the past. Clear? With the past you are looking at the present violence. Right? The present violence is a reaction, and that reaction you are looking from the past. The past is looking at that. So what takes place? You have used the word 'violence', which is the past, because you have been violent before, and you recognize it - please follow all this carefully - you recognize the new reaction and say, that's violence. So the past memory with its word recognizes the present reaction. So you have separated the present from the past. The observer is the past looking at the present. Right? So there is duality, and so there is conflict. And so they say, how am I to suppress violence, I'll pursue non-violence and all those tricks you play. But actually you are violent, that's a fact. Can you hold that fact, not move away from that fact, that is to observe without the observer. You understand? Therefore to observe without the knowledge of the past. Sir, don't agree, it requires great attention, great pause, silent observation, to look at violence without a single word, without the whole operation of the past interfering with your observation. The observer is the observed. Right? This is difficult for you to accept or see because all our life we have separated: we are Hindus, you are a Muslim - those are titles, the result of propaganda, but we are human beings.

So is it possible to live without duality? That is, to say one thing and keep to that, not double talk. Remain with violence, understand its nature, look at it, which is, to observe without the past. This requires, as I said, a great deal of attention, the urge to learn, not to condemn.

So we are asking: is it possible to live without conflict? The speaker is saying, it is possible. Which means - I'll make it a little more complex - which means never recording, never recording, whether insult, or flattery, or any incident, psychological incident, never record it. You understand? Are we understanding each other, even intellectually, verbally? The brain is recording, you are now recording what the speaker is saying. You may not be aware of it, you have been recording like a tape on which this talk is being registered. So the brain is recording. Can that recording stop? The recording is knowledge and the recording of knowledge is safety, security. And we are frightened to let go, to look at things afresh. So not to record, not to record when your wife or your husband says, 'You are a fool' - I hope your husband or wife say, you are a fool - not to record that word, or the feeling of that word.

Our brains have become like the computer. The scientists and the experts who are building computers are saying - pouring millions and billions of dollars, both in Japan and America, to create a computer which is ultra mechanical intelligence, which will think more rapidly than the human being - please follow all this. They are doing it now, India may be fifty years behind or ten years behind, but they are building a computer, computers where they take over most of man's activities, of course they cannot - probably they will - write a sonnet, an ode or a song - probably they will. So the computer is like our brain but not so dull, it's tremendously active, carrying on a small chip thousands of memories. And when the machine can do all the things that human beings do, what's going to happen to the human brain, your brain? You understand my question? For god's sake, react. On the television in America we saw a Japanese car being built: there was a computer and a robot, the computer was telling the robot how to build a car, and the robot was building a car, and the workmen were in white aprons and white gloves, and suddenly the whole machinery stopped, and then the computer says, to the robot, not verbally, that you didn't turn the screw tightly, so the robot immediately tightens the screw and the whole machine goes on. And this is what is happening in the computer world, that computer can outthink, it can invent gods, as you have invented gods, it can play chess, it can do the most extraordinary things. And what's going to happen to the human brain? You haven't thought about it; it's not worth going into because you are not interested.

The human brain requires activity, challenge, either that brain is going to be entertained, entertained when industry is going to take over that brain, as you are being taken over now, sports, cinema, magazines, temples, they are all entertainments, and football, you know, cricket and all the rest of it. Then what is going to happen.

Your brain is taken over by entertainment industry, and it is being done now though you may not be conscious of it. And gradually your brain becomes quite dull, if not already. And either you are going to be entertained, or you turn totally in a different direction, inwardly. If you turn inwardly there is immense infinite everlasting security.

So we are talking about peace. One can have complete peace within oneself, not peace of mind, which is silly, peace which is living, quality, depth, not just superficial quoting of peace. And that can only happen when there is no conflict whatsoever.

And also we ought to talk over together what is religion. And to find that out, go into it very, very deeply, we must talk over together, you and the speaker talk over, have a conversation, what is meditation. The word `meditation' means to ponder over, think over, and also that word `meditation' means measure. You understand? To think over, to ponder over, and also the capacity to measure. And religion has to be understood, not intellectually, not romantically and all that rubbish that is going on in the world, but to find out, to discover, to see the full meaning of that word, that can only take place when there is no fear, when there is no conflict. And to find out - not to find out - for that sacred, if there is anything sacred, to find that truth, not through search, not through various experiences, various gurus, going from one racket to another, but to see the truth of it there must be meditation.

What is meditation? Meditation is generally understood, whether it is Zen or any other form of meditation, Hindu, Tibetan, Buddhist, they all now have become systems, practices. Any system, any system whether it is bureaucratic, or religious, or a system of thought, philosophy, any system has inherently in it decay, degeneration. You see that happening. So one must be free from all systems to meditate. Right? Will you be free of systems to meditate, or you have your own particular pet method to bring about tranquillity of the brain? Which is, you may have found through meditation a sedation. You understand? Putting yourself to sleep, to hypnotize yourself through repetition. Right? So we are going to find out together what is meditation. The speaker is not telling you how to meditate. The word `how' doesn't exist in spiritual matters. The word `how' implies the method. You have had a thousand methods and that has left you where you are.

So what is meditation? Ask it, find out, we will help each other. Which is, first there must be no authority, no instructor, no one to guide you, therefore you cannot possibly rely on anyone. Right? You have relied all your life and past generations have relied on leaders, on politicians, on gurus, on priests, and where has that left man at the end of it? Still in confusion, still in conflict. So to find out the true significance of meditation is total abandonment of all authority, including the authority of knowledge. You understand this? So that your brain is completely unconditioned, totally free from all tradition, from all sense of becoming. Which is, our brain is conditioned through becoming: you are becoming from a clerk to a manager, from an apprentice to a master carpenter, from a university student in engineering you are becoming head of an engineering department. Physically you have tried to become there, and that same movement is extended psychologically, there we are trying to become something: I am not good but I will be good, I will become enlightened. Enlightenment is not of time, enlightenment isn't at the end of your life or through various practices, enlightenment is to have a clear brain, uncluttered, uncluttered by knowledge, by thought so that the brain is free. And that is meditation, so that there is no measurement.

I don't know if you have gone into the question of measurement, the whole of the West, the whole technological world of the West, which you are copying here, is based on measurement. If there was no measurement there would be no technology. And the Greeks, the ancient Greeks were concerned with measurement, and they exploded their philosophy, latest discoveries, mathematics and so on, exploded over the West. India said, the ancient people - if I have been told correctly, because the speaker doesn't read all these books, thank god! so he is not burdened with knowledge, with tradition, he can look at things as they are - India said that measurement is illusion. You cannot measure, the speaker is saying this - you cannot measure the universe, you cannot measure with words or thought the immeasurable, or that which is beyond all time. To understand the enormity of it, the grandeur, the beauty, the strength and the immense vitality of a brain that is utterly free, it's got tremendous energy, as in the technological world those who are inventing, searching, asking, exploring, they have immense energy there, but when the brain is free of the self, the 'me', which is essentially the wastage of energy, self-centred activity, when there is freedom from that the brain has got immense, incalculable energy, and there must be that energy, not put together by thought, not through various forms of awakening what you call centres in your brain, you know, kundalini and all that kind of stuff. The speaker knows something about all that. He disregards it totally.

Whereas if there is freedom from conflict, and inwardly there is great silence, and meditation is that, not contrived, manipulated, but silence which is not put together by thought. Silence implies space. The brain must have space, but it has no space when thought is operating, because thought is limited, as all knowledge is limited. So there must be absolute silence and space, which can only take place when there is no measurement, no becoming. And when there is that silence, not the silence between two noises, not the silence or peace between two wars, two conflicts, silence is something totally unrelated to noise. And when there is that silence then there is that which is sacred, which is not measurable by word. This is meditation, and this is religion which has total relationship with our daily life.

NEW YORK 1ST PUBLIC TALK 14TH APRIL 1984

If one may point out this is not an entertainment, this is not help stimulation, but rather it is a serious gathering. And we are not doing any kind of propaganda, or try to convince you of anything, new ideologies, new philosophies, new kind of esoteric nonsense. We are serious and it is important that we together think and observe together, and perhaps also listen together, not only to what the speaker is saying, but also to all the things that are happening in the world, the terrible things that are happening: the confusion, the chaos, politically and economically, and of course religiously it is just a matter of entertainment, stimulation based on belief, dogma, faith and a vast network of superstition. And there is always the threat of war. So we ought to be able together to observe these extraordinary phenomena that are taking place at the present time.

Thinking together is very important because we never meet, either intellectually at the same level, at the same time or meet, think together holistically. We are so individualistic in our opinions, in our conclusions, in our beliefs and dogmas, and so on, which prevent us from really thinking together. I do not know if you have noticed very few people think together, even a husband and wife find it impossible to think together. And even if there were a few of us who really thought together, putting aside our particular idiosyncrasies, particular reactions, and any form of repetitive reactions, if we could this morning at least for an hour or so, put aside our particular dogmatic, assertive, aggressive conclusions, then perhaps we could think together. We are not trying to convince you of anything. Please believe it. We are not trying to force you, point out, or even try to help you. But rather if we could actually think together. It would be a marvellous thing if we could; very few people have succeeded. Either we disagree or agree. This is not required, as agreement or disagreement, when we are thinking together, thinking, actually thinking together, not being instructed about what to think, or guided, which is the function of a lecture. A lecture is intended to inform and to instruct. But this is not that kind of affair.

If we could think together, listen together, and perhaps learn together, first what is actually happening in the world. We are responsible for all the mess, the confusion, the misery, and the terrible things that are happening. And what is the responsibility of those who observe, not merely intellectually, verbally, but observe with their whole being, with their mind and their heart. Observe, feel, understand and act. What is our responsibility? Are we American looking at the whole world, British, French, German, Russian, with their nationalistic divisions, tribal glorification which is nationalism. Or are we looking at this whole phenomenon as human beings first, not as a scientist or a philosopher or psychologists, and so on, as a Catholic, Protestant, Hindu, Buddhist, and all that business, but as human beings looking at this extraordinary world which human beings have created, the society in which we live with all the uncertainties, contradictions, poverty, injustice - to look at it as human beings. Could we do that this morning, forget your particular nationalistic, patriotic nonsense, all religious conclusions with certain faith, dogma and beliefs, not be anchored at all to any of this? To look at the world we have created, so freely, so intensely and perhaps passionately, so that we are together, not the speaker is saying something to which you agree or disagree, but together see what is happening?

As one travels around the world meeting so many people with all their different characteristics, with their superstitions, and beliefs and dogmas, and so on, one wonders why human beings, who have lived on this earth according to the archaeologists and so on for 45,000 years and more, why during all that duration of time we remain what we are. Though technologically we have advanced tremendously. But externally we have extended the capacity of the brain, which requires tremendous energy to build all the instruments of war, all the beneficial effects apart from war to help man to live more comfortably, more healthily, and so on. But when we look at ourselves after 45,000 or 50,000 years, after great evolution, not only biologically, externally, why is it that we are what we are now, worshipping tribalism which is called nationalism, frightened, insecure, killing each other in the name of god, in the name of peace, in the name of some ideologies, aggressive, brutal, violent, suspicious, and utterly insecure, carrying the great burden of sorrow? This is what we are now and very few have gone beyond all that, very, very few. And the vast majority of mankind lives in misery, starvation of which you know nothing about in this country. Perhaps those who are poor have a certain social security, but you go to the East there is no social security. The population is multiplying every year in India by about 15 million people. Poverty is extensive. Violence is spreading more and more. The world is becoming dangerous. And looking at all this, as probably you also look and listen, in newspapers, magazines, news broadcasts, and soon, what is our responsibility? What shall we do together, not one individual, or try to gather those people of the same perception and form an institution, an organization? We have had a great many institutions, a great many people who will tell us what to do, leaders, political, religious leaders and so on. We have had them by the thousands and yet we remain what we are. This is a fact. This is not some fantastic opinion of a particular speaker. This is so. This is actually what is going on.

So one looks around seriously, wanting to be committed to some kind of action, not for a day or two, or a month, or a year or so, but committed continuously for the rest of one's life, undeviated, not persuaded by demagogues or people who promise you heaven and so on, all that business, but a few, perhaps many even, who are seriously concerned and dedicated, giving one's life to find out what is right action, what is our responsibility to this society which we have created. Society is not different from us. We are society, because we are aggressive, brutal, violent, frightened not only of living, but frightened of death. And realizing all this, not superficially, and listening.

There is an art to listening, not only to what the speaker is saying, but to listen to one's own responses, to one's own fears, to listen, not only to the birds, and the ripple of water, and see the beautiful landscape, but to listen so completely that there is no barrier between you and that which you are listening. The art of living is far greater than any other art. And we never have spent perhaps a days or two, or a month or so, to find out what is the art of living. There is an art of living. One has spent years and years to become a scientist, you go to monasteries and spend all your life there, or spend one's whole life earning a livelihood, which is a vocation of imitation, to become a surgeon, a doctor, spend ten to fourteen years, and we never learn, or even spend a day to find out what is the art of living. And together, this morning, we are going to find out. Not that the speaker is going to point it out, and therefore you agree or disagree, but together find out. And we are going to talk together, not only about relationship between human beings, we are going to talk over together fear, whether there is an ending to fear, talk over together all the movement of pleasure, and whether there is an ending to sorrow. And also we are going to talk over together what is religion, and what is meditation, and to find out if there is something most sacred, which is untouched by thought, something that is infinite.

We are going to talk all these matters over together in these two talks, this morning and tomorrow morning. And merely talking about it has no value; one has written books and books and books, there have been a thousand gurus, which is the most silly form of profession! There have been thousands of priests, popes, every form of psychology, from the most ancient Sumerians to the present day. There have been a thousand gods, specially when you go to India, they have about 300,000 gods, and you can have fun with them, depending on your pleasure you can choose any one of them. And in the western world there is only one entity, which becomes rather tiresome. And we are going to talk all these matters over together. Please the speaker means together, which means you have to exercise your own brain, not just go to sleep. We are not persuading you, we are not trying to tell you what to think, or direct. We can only think together when we have no motive, which is extraordinarily difficult. Because all of us have motives of some kind or another, which ultimately prevents a communication. There is not only a verbal communication, which is what is going on now, but also a communication non-verbal, which requires, on the part of each one of us, not only to hear the word, the content of the word, the meaning, the significance of the word, not only etymologically, but what the word conveys to each one of us. And whether the word distorts our perception. So one has to be extraordinarily aware if we are going to investigate together into all this. So please, if one may remind you again, this is not an entertainment of any kind, but you are used to being entertained - every evening on the television, that is entertainment, you sit by the hour looking at the beastly thing. And you are being influenced, coerced, consciously and unconsciously. And to be aware of all this that is going on around us, not to be shaped, not to be conditioned, which we are conditioned. And that conditioning is being more and more emphasized, given strength. We are Americans, the American way of life; so do the English say, so do the French, Italians, the Russians, and the whole of the East is imitating the West. To be conscious of all this. Not as information, not as data accumulated, but as human beings. Can we together this morning be active, not only intellectually but also active with our innermost feelings?

So, first let us look at ourselves, because we are the result of thousands upon thousand of years. Our brains have been evolving and our brains have extraordinary capacity, as is shown in the technological and scientific world. Extraordinary things are happening, destructive, diabolical, and also helping man to live a better life. We never spend a day or even a few hours looking at ourselves actually as we are, not according to any psychologist, philosopher, or any book or any expert. I don't know if you have noticed what is happening in this country? There are so many specialists here. If you have a headache, you go to a specialist. If you have a sex problems, there are specialists. How to bring up a child, how to feed a child. I don't know if you realize all this. We are becoming slaves to specialists, experts, and so we are losing the real quality of freedom. So we are going to talk over together all this. Where shall we start, knowing that you as a human being have created this society and you are losing your relationship with nature. Where shall we begin? Something exotic, theoretical, problematical, or shall we begin with the nearest thing that we have, which is you and another, you and your relationship with another? Shall we begin there? Or do you want to begin with god? God is the invention of man - we'll go into it when we talk about religion.

So we must begin very near to go very far. The very far is not in time. Time is a very complex process. The now, the present, contains the past and the future. The future is what you are now. What we are now is the past, past memories and so on. Either we begin very near, that is me, you, and observe not in terms of time, either chronological or psychological, but observe, be sensitive, be alive to the actual fact of what you are. For if we do not bring about a mutation in the present, a mutation psychologically, so that the very brain cells themselves are deeply changed, if we do not do it now, the now being the whole of time, then the future is what we are now. I wonder if you understand? Right? Are we seeing this together? Not agreeing. Do we see this fact? The tomorrow is the today. Either it is repetitive, going to the office every day, from nine to five, or to the factory, and so on, labouring, and if there is no mutation now, there will again be the same repetitive action tomorrow. So the future is what is now. Right? Do we see this fact together? We all want to become something, either a successful businessman making lots of money, or begin to change ourselves into what we should be, the becoming. The becoming takes time. And is there any becoming at all? There is becoming physically, externally, from a clerk to an executive, from an ordinary man into a so-called saint and so on. Outwardly, there is becoming, but inwardly is there becoming at all? The becoming implies time and this quality of time distorts our thinking. I wonder if you are following this? May I go on with it or is it all that I am talking and you are just listening?

We are trying to find out together what is change, what is a mutation in the brain cells - the biologists are going into all this. Does change, mutation, demand time? Once you think or feel according to time, then the future is what we are and therefore there is no mutation, no radical change at all. So we are asking: seeing what we are, actually, that is our consciousness, which is what we are, our consciousness is all the biological and physiological responses, all our beliefs, faith, dogmas, rituals, and so on. Also all the network of fear. Observe it for yourself please. The expert is not talking. The speaker is not an expert, thank god! But we have investigated a great deal into this matter, for over sixty years. The speaker is not a learned person, he has not accumulated all this through books, but observing, listening.

And we are asking: I am this, my consciousness is this, fear, pain, pleasure, and all the varieties of fear, all the nationalistic, tribalistic responses, prejudices, black, white, pink and purple and all the rest of it, we are all that. Suffered, violent, cruel, bitter, cynical, and we are always trying to change that into something else like violence, trying to change violence into non-violence, which is to become. The becoming involves time. We are questioning seriously into this whole meaning of time. If there is no time at all as tomorrow or the next second, then what is change? You understand? Either that change is instantaneous or there is no change at all. That is what we are going to find out.

We said we would start with relationship between man, woman, between human beings whether they live here or far away in the Eastern world. What is relationship? Relationship is the most important thing in life. It is an art, and without relationship you cannot possibly live. The monk who goes off into a monastery is related to a belief, to a dogma, to a saviour, he is related. Or the man who is married with children, sex and all the rest of it, he is also related. The scientist is related; he specializes in one discipline that takes most of his life and all his thinking capacity, but also he is related to his wife or to his friend or his girl-friend and so on. So what is our relationship? Are we related at all? How can there be a relationship with another if you are individualistic? Go into it, sirs. If you are thinking about yourself all the time, which you are - your success, your business, your worries, your problems? And she is also doing the same thing, with ambition, greed, individualistic pursuits, individualistic fulfillments. This is what we call relationship - the pleasure, encouragement, dependence, possessiveness, jealousy, anxiety, irritation and noise and all the rest that goes on in relationship. If one is aware of all this, which I doubt very much if one is aware, if one is really actually concerned to find out what is actual relationship, apart from this. This obviously is not relationship. You may sleep with somebody, with all the pleasure and pain of it. So is relationship the building of images between you and another? You have built an image about another, wife, or girl, or whoever it is. You have built an image. A relationship may be of one day or twenty, thirty, forty years, and gradually you have built day after day an image about her and she about you. These images have a relationship with each other, but actually there is no relationship. We have to face all this if we are going to discover for ourselves whether there is a possibility of deep mutation in the very brain cells themselves. This is what the biologists are asking; they are experimenting with all this. But if we do not discover things for ourselves, we depend on chemistry, on specialists, and therefore we become so utterly insensitive and superficial. So, is it possible to live with another - please, go into it with me, we are thinking together - is it possible to live with another without a single image, picture, thought? Then only is there a direct relationship without any barrier. To find out the art of living, you have to enquire into the whole question of thinking. Probably you have never even asked that question.

What is thinking? Why has thought dominated the world and also in our relationship, however intimate it may be? What is thinking, not thinking along a particular line, or a particular discipline, thinking about something. We are not asking to think about something, but actually thinking per se? What is thinking? And thought has created the most extraordinary things in the world, all the great paintings, the great cathedrals, medicine, and all the destructive instruments of war. Thought has also brought about communication, surgery, and all the things that are in temples, churches and mosques. Thought has put all that together, the rituals and so on. One has to find out, not be instructed by another, which becomes so silly at the end of it, so superficial, but to find out for oneself what is thinking and why we have given such extraordinary importance to it.

Thinking, surely, is the outcome of memory; if there is no memory, there is no thinking. Memory is stored in the brain, among the cells, and memory is knowledge. Memory is born from knowledge. If you have no knowledge, you have no memory. And knowledge evolves from experience. Experience, knowledge, memory and thought are limited. Knowledge, future knowledge or knowledge expanding itself is still limited. All knowledge, whether in the infinite future, is still limited. There is no complete knowledge about anything, there never can be because knowledge is based on experience, collected, built gradually step by step. So thought is limited. I think we all agreed to that. That is obvious. You are thinking about yourself all day. Meditating is another form of thinking about yourself. I wonder if you realize all this. Thinking about yourself, your problems, your relationship, and so on, that very thinking, being limited, must inevitably create conflict. Anything that is limited is divisive. Are we thinking together, or are you saying: "No, it's not"? Thinking together, not agreeing together. So, thought in relationship is the building up of reaction step by step, day after day, day after day. That thought has created that image about yourself and about another. That thought with its image, with its picture is the divisive factor in the relationship. This is logical. And being limited it must inevitably create conflict between man, woman, child, and so on.

Geographically, you have divided the world, human beings, into Asia, Europe and America. Thought has divided human beings as Western, Eastern. Thought has divided people as Catholic, Protestant, Buddhist, Hindu, Tibetan. Thought has been responsible for all this. Thought, which is born of knowledge, memory, has its place; without thought you cannot go back to your home, you cannot write a letter. If you are a good carpenter, you must have a great deal of knowledge about wood, the quality of the wood and the grain and so on. And has thought any place in relationship with each other, knowing very clearly, logically, sanely that thought is limited and therefore divisive and separates, you and me, and hence everlasting conflict between you and another?

So we are asking, if you still awake and not gone to sleep, we are asking whether thought, being limited, producing, inventing a great many things which are beneficial to man and also inventing terrible things to destroy man - what shall we do with thought? You understand the question? Please ask this of yourself. Don't wait, please, for the speaker to tell you. Seeing what thought has done, beneficially, helpful, and so on in one direction, and also the extraordinary capacity of the brain in one direction, and also the extraordinary energy given to the destruction of man; different ideologies, communist, socialist, capitalist and so on. Ideologies, spending enormous energy. All this is the activity of thought.

So what place has thought with regard to love? Is love the operation of thought? Is love in the brain? Or is it totally outside the brain? One can only answer that question logically, sanely when we understand whether thought has any relationship - relationship, you may recognize the woman or the man, but when thought takes over the relationship then there is everlasting battle. Not that has been the condition, trained for thousands of years, to live with conflict. You all live in conflict. Meditation is a form of conflict, to go to business, everything that you do either contradicts what you are, or the very self is the contradiction. The 'me', the self, is put together by thought. The 'me' is memory. You may invent it as super me or the extraordinary ultimate me, but it is still put together by thought. Thought, the 'me', is a network or bundle of memories. And so is love memory? Please go into all this for yourself. If it is not, then what will you do with all your memories that you have about her, about him, the insults, the pleasure, you know all that business? What will you do? Just carry on day after day, day after day until you die? What is the factor that will end thought in relationship, if you see that thought is detrimental, dangerous, destructive in relationship? Because thought, being limited, must inevitably divide, separate. If you really see that, not as a verbal statement, but as an actual fact of life, everyday life, then you will inevitably ask what place has thought? Psychologically has it any place at all? And if it has no place in relationship psychologically, then what is love? Is love the factor - please listen - is love the factor that denies totally the separative element in relationship?

Then one has to ask, if you are at all serious, committed to find out all these matters: what is love? Is love desire, pleasure? Is love remembrance? If it is desire, as for most of us it is, you see it on the television everyday, in every book, desire and pleasure, then what is love? Is it a matter to be cultivated? Is it something to be achieved? Give me time and I will learn how to love? I'll go to college, to specialists, they know all about it; that is what you are doing in different ways, somebody is going to tell you what it is.

So we have to go into this question very, very deeply, not superficially just for the day, in passing by. Because that is what the biologists are seeking, a mutation in the brain cells. The brain cells contain all memories, knowledge, experience. The brain cells are the whole content of your consciousness. There must be a mutation in that, which means the brain cells themselves bring about a mutation in themselves. Is that a matter of time? If it is a matter of time, as we have lived for 40,000 or 50,000 years, or whatever the archeologists say we are, no mutation has taken place at all, given time. Time may be the enemy. Time may be the enemy of mutation.

So we have to understand is love desire? And what is desire? Not how to suppress desire, or how to transmute desire, or how to direct it along right channels, or identify desire with some symbol so as to ennoble desire - it sounds rather nonsensical, but you have to understand what is desire, to look at it, find out, go into it. What is desire? It is important to understand this, not verbally or theoretically, but actually, because we are driven by desire. Desire has become so extraordinarily dominant in our lives, desire to be President, desire to be something or other, you know, the whole worship of success in this country. I don't know if you have watched, know, America has become the symbol for the rest of the world; they want to be like Americans, rich, prosperous, plenty of cars, money; and so this country is the example, and if you take away the superficial layers of an affluent society, you are like the rest, full of desires, contradictions, pain, conflict, uncertainty, and all the rest.

So we must go into this question, if we have time: what is desire? You are still awake, I hope? What is desire? Do you understand how strong it is in our life; the desire for enlightenment, desire for more knowledge, desire for power, status, riches, desire to reach heaven? You know, desire, that extraordinary energy; desire to go to the moon, desire to invent the latest bomb that will destroy the whole of humanity. What relationship has desire to love? Or has it no relationship at all? What is desire? Please bear in mind we are not suppressing, we are not saying it must be translated or changed into some other thing. We are examining the very movement, the birth of desire. We are not analyzing, we are observing. Analysis is different from observation. Analysis implies there is an analyzer and the thing being analyzed. In observation, there is no analysis, just to observe how the thing is born. You understand? Are we clear on this matter? We are observing. In observation there is no observer. If there is an observer in observation, then the observer is directing, the observer is then the past - his memories, his idiosyncrasies and so on. So as long as there is the observer as the past, looking, then there is distortion taking place.

This is complex, you will understand it as we go along. So to observe without the observer, to observe without the 'me', the 'me' being all the complex memories and so on. We are observing the nature and the structure and the birth, the origin, of desire. There is no desire without sensation. Sensation is born through visual perception, visual seeing, touching, and so on. The sensory responses create the sensation, as in seeing a beautiful woman, man, clothes, cars and so on. The seeing, the contact, then the sensation. Then what takes place? Look at it for yourself. The speaker is not instructing you, we are not telling you; you are observing for yourself. Seeing, touching, contact, sensation - then what takes place? Then thought creates the image that you are in that car, or in that dress, or in that shirt; at that moment when thought with its images takes control or dominates sensation, at that second desire is born. Right? I wonder if you have understood this? One sees a beautiful shirt - a shirt, being a man, I hope you don't mind - one sees a shirt in a shop window, goes inside, touches it, says how nice that material is, how would it look on me. At that second desire begins. Right? Do you see this? Now the question then is: sensation is necessary, it is obvious, physically. If you have no sensations, biological, physical sensations, you are paralysed. There must be sensation; the whole physical organism exists on stimulation and sensation, but when thought gives shape to sensation, at that second desire is born. Right? is this clear? If it is clear then we can ask the next question.

Can there be a gap between sensation and thought giving shape to that sensation, so that there is an interval between the sensation and thought, which is not discipline. Discipline implies, the word discipline comes from the word disciple, disciple, the one who is learning, learning to see whether there can be a gap between sensation and thought giving shape to the sensation, a gap, and that gap extended? Do it and you will see the fun of it, and the seriousness of it, because we have completely changed the whole question of control.

So, thought giving shape to sensation is the origin of desire. That origin which is desire has nothing whatsoever to do with love. Love is not born of thought. Therefore love has its own intelligence. Thought has its own peculiar intelligence, but the intelligence of that compassion, love, is something totally outside the brain, which is not contained within the limitation of thought.

NEW YORK 2ND PUBLIC TALK 15TH APRIL 1984

It would be good if we could have a dialogue between two people, but as there is such a large audience, it would not be possible.

Because dialogue is very important, so that you ask a question and to that question there is a reply, and to that reply you ask another question and so keep that communication of question and answer going until the question remains without you or the speaker, only the question. That is really a dialogue. But that is not possible here this morning. So we are going to talk over things together, not you accept what the speaker says or disagree, but rather together, as we said yesterday morning, go into this whole problem of living our daily life, not according to any particular ideal or faith or belief, but taking things as they are and observing them very carefully. Perception without the perceiver, we talked about that yesterday morning also. So that when there is that pure perception, that which is observed undergoes a radical change.

We are going to talk over together this morning the art of living, as we said yesterday, which is to have complete freedom, not the freedom of choice, not the freedom of what one wants to do, or likes to do, for that freedom is limited by the environment, by society, by religious doctrines and so on, but freedom is something entirely different. It is not freedom about something or from something, but freedom per se. And when there is that freedom, which we are going to enquire presently, there is the supreme way of living without any conflict, without any problem, heightened intelligence when the brain is fully active, not active in a particular direction, either scientific or business, or the problems of daily live, but when there is that freedom there is great energy, tremendous energy. And the word freedom also, etymologically means love. And that freedom implies enquiry, as we did yesterday, into the problem of relationship. In that relationship, whether it is most intimate or with your neighbour or with the neighbour of a thousand miles away, as long as there is an image about the person with whom you are related or he has an image about you, when there is that image built, which we were talking about yesterday, there must be conflict.

We have lived with conflict for generation upon generation, not only conflict in our relationship, but conflict with society, conflict with other nations. Nationalism as we pointed out, is tribal worship and that is causing enormous despair, wars, divisions: the Jew and the Arab, the Hindu and the Muslim, the Communist, the Socialist, and the so-called Democrat. There is tremendous conflict going on in the world. This is the society, as we pointed out yesterday, which human beings have built. Society is not something that comes out of the air. Society in which we live is created by every human being, and that society, which is immoral, there is a great deal of injustice, and one questions whether there is any justice at all. You can hire an excellent lawyer for your crooked way, and he will protect you. So one has to question all these problems in life. Society is what we have made of it and we are caught by that thing we have made.

Unless there is a radical mutation, change, a fundamental psychological revolution, not physical revolutions which have led man nowhere, as is shown in the communist world, they have had many, many revolutions, physical revolutions, they have not changed the psychological quality of human beings. Unless there is fundamental, radical change society will remain as it is now. And we said yesterday too, change implies time, change from this to that, change from violence to non-violence - which is now used for political purposes, invented in India or before India by Tolstoy and others. To achieve, to change violence into non-violence is a long duration of time. Will time change human beings? That is a very basic, radical question. Has time, which is evolution, of 50,000 years or more, has man been changed during that long period psychologically? Obviously he has not. We are very primitive people, quarrelling with each other, wars, wars, endless wars, always in conflict. Psychologically, inwardly, we have not changed, we have changed very, very little. Perhaps, technologically we have advanced immensely, with the atom bomb, telecommunications, the extraordinary explosion of machinery, computers, and so on, but inwardly, deeply, we remain what we have been for ten thousand or more years. Time does not change man. Please, this is a very serious statement; don't reject it.

We are exploring this thing together. To explore deeply, there must be a great deal of scepticism, doubt, not only doubt about what you think, but doubt about your own experiences and prejudices and opinions - doubt about the whole psychological structure that human beings have built in themselves and around themselves. There must be constant questioning. Therefore out of questioning deeply comes freedom, not acceptance, not holding on to one's own prejudices and opinions. Opinions have no value. They are not facts. You can have opinion about a fact, but fact is a fact; you cannot have an opinion about it; it is so. You are sitting there and the speaker is sitting here, that's a fact.

So, as we said, without freedom - please we are using that word very, very carefully, not the freedom that you have in this country to do what you like, fulfil, you know the whole idea of freedom, choice, movement, status, position, achievement, success, that's only a very, very small part of freedom, it may perhaps be a most destructive freedom if everyone does what he likes, as is happening throughout the world, it will bring about great chaos, which is what is going on.

What is freedom? And as we said that very word, etymologically means, love, from the Ancient Greeks and so on. Freedom implies freedom from, freedom from, let us say, fear. Is it possible for human beings who have lived with fear of various kinds to be completely free of fear psychologically, inwardly? We are asking this question. Please, you are asking this question of yourself: not I put that question to you and then answer that question. You are putting that question to your self, whether human beings, who have lived on this earth for millennia upon millennia can ever be free from fear; fear of insecurity, and seeking security, fear of death and what happens after death, fear of god (god is invented by man, by thought. We will go into that when we talk about it a little later on, about religion.) Freedom from attachment. So let us examine together what is the cause of fear, what is the root of fear. This examination is not merely intellectual, logical, rational, sane; it is not an analysis; it is perception. When you perceive something very clearly and that perception is not guided by prejudice, by a motive or a particular direction, then that perception acts on the causes of fear. We haven't time to go into all these matters in detail, so we must briefly go into it. What is the cause of fear, the root cause? Not fear about something, or the fear of what might happen, or the fear of not succeeding, fame, you know, all the rest of it, what is the essence, the root of fear? Is it time? Is it thought? Or is there another factor which is neither thought nor time? So first let's examine together, I mean please together, not the speaker examines, then you accept or reject, but together, which has an extraordinary quality when we do things together. When we do things together there is no authority, there is no leader, there is no guru. In the matter of the psyche any kind of authority is destructive; in the field of the so-called - if I may use that rather well-worn and shoddy word, 'spiritual', in that field there is no leader and therefore there is no follower. But when there is an examination together, seeing things together, not according to your prejudice or according to the speaker's prejudice, bias and so on, but actually perceiving together, then there is no acceptance or denial, logical or illogical; it is so.

So we are asking: what is the root of fear? We said is it time? Time being not only chronological time by the watch, sun rise, sunset, but time as a movement. That is, time is the past, the present and the future. In the present all time is contained. If there is not radical change in the present, now, the future is what you are. This is logical, you can see it happening now. And time is a process of thinking also. I have had pain, I have not at present pain, but I might have pain. I am secure, but later on I might be insecure. This movement from the past through the present, modifying itself in the future, is the process of time. And is time different from thought?

Please, this is a serious question; it is not something to play with; it is not a hobby. Life means living at the highest excellence, at the highest capacity of intelligence and that implies intelligence is born out of love, not out of calculation, design, planned.

So is time, which is a movement from the past through the present and the future, having done something wrong, or having done something pleasant, modifying itself in the present, and going on in the future, I hope to have more pleasure, I hope to have more money. The whole movement is of time. And is thought time? Thought, as we pointed out yesterday, is born out of memory. If there is no memory, there is no thought, and memory is the accumulated knowledge, whether the accumulation be 10,000 years or one day, and that knowledge is based on experience. And as experience is very limited, so knowledge is limited. That is what the scientists are doing, adding more and more and more to their knowledge. Knowledge is never complete either now or in the future; it will always be limited. That is a fact; it is not an opinion of the speaker, or a conclusion; it is a fact, irrefutable. And so thought is limited. As time is limited, thought is also limited. They are both movements, both limited; and as we live human lives in time and thought, our lives are naturally very limited. You may expand it, knowledge may expand, but that which has growth must always be limited. Are we following each other?

Is thought, time, the root of fear? Obviously it is, and man has never been able to solve this question because we have lived with fear from the ape to now. Perhaps some of us are rather ape-ish. So we are asking a very serious question: is it possible to be totally psychologically free of fear? Do not please agree or disagree. Do not say it is possible; then it is just a theory; or, if you say it is not possible, then you have blocked yourself from further investigation. So, the very question if left untouched by thought - you understand? We have asked this question, whether fear, with which we have lived, with all its darkness, with all its pain and anxiety, fear of death and so on, is it possible to be totally psychologically free of it? It implies, do we actually perceive, not theoretically or verbally, the fact that thought and time are the same - time-thought; they are not two separate movements - to observe, to perceive the root of it which is thought-fear, perceive, not think about it, but to perceive it, which is perception without the perceiver, the perceiver being the past? So when there is the perceiver observing, he is colouring, distorting from his memory and so on. So perception is free from that which is the past as the perceiver. To perceive without the perceiver, that means giving total attention. When there is total attention, not concentration which is something different from attention - which we will go into a little later - when there is complete attention, that attention acts as a flame and destroys completely the root of fear.

Not how to stop thinking, you understand, which is causing fear. I wonder if you understand all this. I was told yesterday that perhaps about two or three per cent understand what you are talking about! I hope not! It is a waste of time on your part, and on the part of the speaker. But if we are moving together, there is an extraordinary movement. It is like a vast river with an enormous volume of water. But when you are working it out by yourself, you are like a little stream; then the river dries up very soon.

And also we ought to talk over together the question of pleasure; pleasure of possession, pleasure of status, sexual pleasure, pleasure of seeing a sunset, pleasure of seeing the beauty of land, the delight of seeing a great mountain with snow caps and the blue sky. It gives great pleasure. And also one has to look at whether beauty is pleasure. What is beauty? I hope you don't mind me talking about so many things. We have limited time therefore we have to include as briefly as possible all the things we have to talk about, yesterday and today. What is beauty? You go into any museum of the world where there is a collection of great pictures and statues, from ancient temples. You look at them, and it gives you, if you have studied art, and you know who painted it, you begin to compare, you see the proportions, the light, the shadow and the colour; all that is perceiving a sense of beauty. But that is only partial. So we are asking: what is the nature of beauty? Does beauty exist, not in the man or the woman, in a lovely face, good manners, dignity, a sense of proportion, the way he talks, the way he walks? In that also there is great beauty. Not in sloppiness - sorry! When you dig deeper, what is it? Is it a pleasure? Is it a delight? Is it something that you experience? Or has it nothing to do with experience, with pleasure? Please, we are asking this thing together, I am not asking and you listening. Because man has pursued beauty all the time, created great art, the Ancient Egyptians, the glory of Greece, and before them, the Ancient Hindus, and the Buddhists, the marvellous temples, the great cathedrals and the beauty of the Catholic mass - all that has been put together by thought. Do thought and the movement of thought show beauty? Or beauty has nothing whatsoever to do with thought and time? Not in the eye of the beholder: beauty exists only when there is no beholder, when there is no you. Which means when there is total freedom from you, from all your problems, your worries, your anxieties, insecurities, sorrow - when all that is not, the other is. And so beauty, not being of time and thought, is not a matter of pleasure. Pleasure is remembrance of things that have happened and so on.

And also, if you are not too tired, we ought to talk over together the question of sorrow. Man, every human being on earth has carried this burden of sorrow. Sorrow that wars have produced; and these wars have been going on for 5-6,000 years, practically every year there has been a war in this world and they are still going on, with greater destruction of man; ten million can be wiped away in a second. You know all this, you have read about it. And wars have produced great sorrow, tears, people maimed for life. Sorrow of ideologies, ideologies have killed people. This is what is happening now. Wars have been produced by religion. Perhaps, if I may most gently suggest, Christianity has killed more people than any other. Don't get angry, please. And we are still going on with killing each other in the name of god, in the name of country, in the name of some ideal, so-called nationalism which is really glorified tribalism. So there is a great deal of sorrow in the world and each one suffers in various ways. If you have no money, if you are very learned, you want more - so there is the constant struggle for the more. And there is the sorrow of death. Man throughout the world, from the most primitive to the most sophisticated human being, he has sorrow, and that sorrow has never ended. We have not been able to solve that problem. We have never ended the problem.

So we ought to talk over together, briefly for the moment, what is a problem? Why do we have problems - not only business problems, technological problems, problems with man and woman and so on? We have got so many problems. Why? And problems imply solutions; from childhood we are trained, educated, to solve problems. When a boy or girl goes to school they have problems immediately; how to write, how to read, how to learn mathematics, geography - it becomes a problem. Through college, university and so on, our whole life has become a problem. Why? We are seeking out of those problems solutions. Solutions are far more important than the problem. Why? Is it because - please we are thinking together, not the speaker talking about it, we are together in this. Either we drown together, or live together - that we have reached this state in the world? Why has man not been able to resolve problems? Is it that his brain is conditioned, moulded from childhood to solve problems? His brain is conditioned that way and therefore he makes of everything a problem. How to live properly becomes a problem. What is right action becomes a problem. To understand problems one must be free from the mechanical conditioning of the brain, otherwise you are perpetually solving problems, in the solution of problems more problems, as is happening politically, economically, legislation, more problems because our whole brain is structured, conditioned to solve problems. I will leave that question with you to think about - no, not think about, to look at it.

We are asking whether sorrow can end. This question was put long before Christianity, long before any kind of organized religion. Man has always asked this question while he is suffering:

is there an end to all this pain and loneliness, despair, anxiety, remorse, guilt? When asked a question of this kind, that is, is sorrow personal, is sorrow also universal and what is the relationship of personal sorrow to the universal sorrow of man? You understand? When you ask that question: can sorrow end, can the tears of a thousand years, can all that end? That's a question. Where there is sorrow, there is also self-pity. There is sorrow also at the loss of something precious, sorrow of seeing poverty in this world, the sorrow of the politicians who are creating wars - and you are the politicians who are creating wars, not just the politicians on top, we are creating wars. And this sorrow is shared by all humanity. Please, this is a very serious thing, by all humanity it is shared, that means our consciousness with all its biological, physiological responses, with all the beliefs, dogmas, rituals, fears and sorrows, anxieties, loneliness, despair and so on, all that is our consciousness. All that is what you are. What you think, what you feel, your beliefs, your superstitions - all that, the whole content, is what you are, put there by thought, by remembrance, by fear and so on. This consciousness is universal; it is not my consciousness, because wherever you go on this earth, which is so marvellously beautiful, which you are gradually destroying, wherever you go, to the remotest corners of the world, there is sorrow, with great pain, great anxiety and so on. So this consciousness is common to all of us. It is not my consciousness separate from yours, psychologically. You may be tall, you may be short, you may be this or that, you may be a woman or a man, black, white, purple, pink or whatever colour prejudice you have, but inwardly, deeply, we are, we share, the rest of the world. So we are humanity, not individuals psychologically, although religions have said, both Asiatic religions and Christianity have said separate souls, which is so extraordinarily unreal. The fact is we share, we are humanity, not verbally, intellectually, but in our heart and in our blood. And when there is a mutation you affect the whole of consciousness. This is what geneticists are seeking, how to effect, change man. Mutation implies, or if you don't like to use that word, radical deep psychological change, it affects, when you change radically, fundamentally, it affects the whole consciousness of man because you are humanity.

We are asking whether sorrow can end. Don't answer it, it cannot or it can. Let the question, if you put it vitally, if you put it with all your energy, not just intellectually play with it, when you put that question, with all your being, leave it alone. It's like a seed that you have planted in the earth, you don't pull it up everyday to see if it growing, you will destroy it. But if you put that question with all your seriousness, all your intensity, then that question has its own answer. But we are so eager for an answer. We want to be told how. When you put the question "How" then you are asking for a system, for a method. Then you will fall back into the old routine. Never ask how. If you ask how, then you create authority, a guru. This is very complicated. We are asking if there is an end to sorrow. There is, but not for you, do not say: "Yes, I accept that". You have to dig and leave it alone. Dig and leave it alone.

We ought to talk about death. Why are people frightened of death? Please, you are frightened, don't pass it off. As you get older, either you become a very religious, superstitious human being, or join some cult, or you begin to enquire into what is death, and why we have separated it from living - the living and the dying. And you postpone, put it far away. Why do we human beings do all this? Is it fear - fear of losing the known, entering into the unknown? So the question is, is it possible to live with death? Careful, please, don't answer this. I am living, you have to understand what is living. Living, as far as we know, is one constant travail, with occasional pleasure, occasional comfort, and if you have money you are more or less secure, but there is always insecurity threatening; going to the office every day for the rest of your life, from nine to five, struggling, competing, quarrelling, hating, loving which is called pleasure, all that: that is our way of living, that is what we know. And we are frightened to let that go. Death means the ending of all that, not only the organism coming to an end, but also all the attachments, all the knowledge, experience. So can one live - please, this is a serious question, not something to be played with - can one live with death and life together, not separate, which means can you live with death so that there is no attachment? Death is going to wipe away all your attachments; your family, your knowledge, your becoming, your fame, all that nonsense. Can we, as we live our daily life, live with death, which is to be free of attachment, of competition, of psychologically becoming, all that, so that there is no interval between living and dying? You understand what it does? You have tremendous freedom and energy. Not to do more mischief, not to get more money, to become famous, that is rather childish - forgive me - but when you live with something that has immense meaning, that is freedom.

And also we ought to talk over together what is religion and meditation. What is religion? Man from the most ancient of times has sought something beyond the daily existence with its monotony, with its routine, with mechanical habits both physical and inward. Man has said that there must be something beyond all this so he invented god. God - may I go into it without your getting annoyed, or being supercilious - god is invented by thought. If there is no fear of any kind psychologically, absolutely no fear, not a shadow of it, not a breath of it, then is god necessary? Then you ask, who created all this world? We can't go into creation, that requires an hour or so, we can't go into it. So man has sought this. And the priests came along and said: "We will interpret it for you; we will organize it for you; you are ignorant, but we are learned". And the process of that is to dress up, to impress, and also create a great deal of show, different costumes. The ancient Egyptians, and further back the Sumerians, 7-8,000 years ago, they had hell and heaven too. So they said you must believe, otherwise you will go to hell, and they persecuted, killed, tortured. Christianity has done this, you must believe in Jesus, or you are a heretic, doubt is not allowed in the Christian world. If you doubt, then the thing collapses. But the Asiatic world, specially in India, one of the teachings is, you must question, you must doubt, question not only your guru if you have a guru, but question yourself, have a dialogue, never accept. There is no authority except the authority of the truth; not the truth invented by books or by thought or by priests. So they always had dialogues, like the Greeks, the ancient Greeks. they discussed; but their discussion was questioning, Socrates questioned and so on. Now what is religion? If you wipe away all the nonsense and superstitions and beliefs, and that goes for organized modern religions whether you are a Baptist, Christian and all the rest of that business, wipe away all that and not be a Hindu, a Buddhist or a Christian; it does not mean that you become an atheist; it means you are enquiring, questioning, asking, discussing, pushing, driving, flowing.

Then, is there something sacred? Is there something eternal which is beyond time? Is there something totally untouched by thought? To find out, not you find out - for it to be, there must be meditation. Meditation is not just repeating some words, whether it is Ave Maria and all the rest of it, that is all too immature.

Meditation is something extraordinary. Meditation is the understanding of the whole of life, both external and inward, the understanding of your daily life, your relationships, freeing yourself from fear, and questioning what the self is, the 'me'. Is the 'me' merely a bundle of memories and therefore no actuality?

Please enquire into this, into all this. That is all part of meditation.

The very word meditation both in Sanskrit and in the ordinary dictionary means to measure, to free the mind from all measurement, that is from becoming. I am this, I will be that; that is a measure. Measure is necessary for the whole technological world. Without measure we could not create a dynamo or the atom bomb, or build a car, but psychologically, inwardly, to be free of all comparison, which is measurement. And meditation, when there is this freedom from fear, from all the hurts that one has had from childhood until now, the psychological wounds that one keeps precious, which distort our lives - to be free of all that, to be free of sorrow, pain loneliness, depression, anxiety, all that, that is to be free of the self, the 'me', not at the end of one's life, but right from the beginning, right from the moment you hear this to live it.

And meditation means an extraordinary activity of the brain, not silencing the brain. When the brain is at its highest quality, full of energy, there is silence, not the silence put together by thought, which is limited silence. In that silence which can only come when there is freedom, there is love and compassion with its intelligence. That intelligence is supreme, but there is no compassion or love if you are attached to some religious organization or belief in something. There must be complete freedom, and in that freedom there is a great, tremendous energy because there is an emptiness - not nothingness, emptiness. In that there is that which is beyond all time. This is meditation. This is religion.

NEW YORK UNITED NATIONS TALK 17TH APRIL 1984 'PEACE IN OUR TIME'

Probably since the beginning of man, human beings have had no peace at all. And there have been a great many organizations, including this organization, to bring about peace in the world, pacem in terris. But there has been no peace. For various obvious reasons: nationalism, which is glorified tribalism, various opposing religions, divisions of classes, races and so on. There have been divisions on the earth from the beginning of time: the family, the community, bigger community, the nation, and so on. And also from what one observes, religion has been one of the causes of wars. One sees the Israelis and the Arabs, the Hindus and the Muslims, the Americans and the Russians, ideas against ideas, ideologies opposing ideologies, the communist ideology and the so-called democratic ideologies. Why is it, after all these millenia upon millenia, why is it that human beings throughout the world don't live in peace? Why is it our society in which we live, whether it is the American society, the European, or Indian, or Japanese, that society has not given us peace either. That society, the culture, the tradition, is created by all human beings. We have created this society. We are responsible for this society, which is corrupt, immoral, violent, divisive, cruel and so on. We have created this, this society in which we live. We are the society.

Please the speaker is not a communist in the orthodox sense of that word. We are what we have made of the society. So we are society. That is a fact, not an exotic or stupid, irrational thought. We are society. Each one of us have made this terrible confusing, contradictory, brutal society. And until human beings, each one of us, radically transforms himself we will have perpetual wars, there will be no peace on earth. Religions have talked about it endlessly. The popes, the priests, local parish clergyman, have talked about peace. This Institution, with all its power, with its position, with its international grasp, this Institution has not brought about peace either. Forgive me for saying this, if you don't mind. And will institutions, foundations, will they ever bring peace on earth? Or it doesn't lie in that field at all - organisations or institutions, propaganda and all the rest of it? Or do we realize, each one of us, I am asking this most respectfully, do we realize that we are responsible for this? Not intellectually, or verbally, or just accepting a theory, but we are responsible for this horror that is going on in the world; every form of violence, terrorism, wars, we are responsible for it. War is not in Beirut, it is in our hearts and minds. This has been said so often, one is rather bored by all that. And we human beings seem to be incapable of living peacefully in our relationship with each other, living peacefully without any dogmatism, ideals, concepts. Because beliefs, faith, conclusions, ideals, have separated man. And man apparently has not been able to live without any of those bondages. Man is conditioned, human beings right throughout the world are conditioned. Their brains have been moulded according to a particular tradition, various forms of superstitions called religion. And is it possible for human beings wherever they live to be free of their conditioning? The conditioning as an American, as a European, Hindu and so on, is it possible for us, who are so advanced in technology, is it possible for us to radically, fundamentally, bring about psychological change? This is really a very, very serious question. This is what the biologists, bio-technologists are trying to do - trying to bring about a radical change in the very brain cells themselves so that human beings can live peacefully, not everlastingly fight each other.

So facing all this, not abstractly, as a human being, what is he to do actually? Form another group? Another religion? Another Institution? Or as a human being become aware of his conditioning? Be concerned with his conditioning and free the brain from that conditioning? Otherwise we are going to have perpetual wars, there will be no peace on earth in spite of all the religions, in spite of every institution. It must begin with us, not without somebody else out there. So is it possible to bring about a deep mutation in the very brain cells themselves? Why are human beings so conditioned - Germans, French, Russians, Italians, British, Americans, Hindus and so on, why? Is it because we want security, both external and inward? Is there such security inwardly, psychologically to be safe? Is there such security? Or psychological security is an illusion? We can go into all this in detail but our time is very, very limited.

So is there psychological security, either in the family, in a group, in a community, in a nation and internationalism and all that business? Is there any kind of security inwardly? And that is, if we are not sure about that, certain, clear, we try to seek security outwardly, externally, through nations, through religious organizations, through some ideologies. So it is very important, it seems to one, that we should talk over together now and discover for ourselves if there is an inner security - security in our relationships with each other, however intimate it may be, between man and woman, security in community and so on. Is there security in our relationship with each other, man and woman, wife and husband? If there is security why is there such contention between man and woman, wife and husband, such conflict in their relationship, each one pursuing his own ambitions, his own fulfilments, his own desires and so on. Is it not important to find out for ourselves if there is such security in relationship. If there is such security in this then that security is the beginning of peace. If there is no security in our relationship with each other that is the beginning of conflict, war.

So we ought to really seriously enquire into this question. That is, become aware, conscious, of our relationship with each other because to go very far we must begin very near. And the nearest is man and woman, wife and husband. In that relationship there is conflict as there is now, then that conflict is spread, ultimately war. We have never given thought to this, that as our house is burning, which is society is burning, declining, degenerating, are we all so degenerating? To slide, slip down, implies our whole life is a routine, our whole life is a series of battles, struggles, conflicts. If we don't alter there, how can you bring about peace on earth. It seems to logical, so rational, sane, but we don't do that.

So could we, as human beings, not as Americans and all the rest of that business, could we as human beings become aware, pay attention to our intimate relationship because unless the psychological world is quiet, sane, peaceful, that psychological state will always overcome every kind of organization, whether it be communist organization, totalitarian, or so-called democratic organization. The psyche is far more important than the external legislation, governments and so on. I wonder if one realizes all this? Do we, sitting here, peacefully, so-called peacefully, realize our responsibility as human beings? The wars that are going on in the world is our war, because our consciousness - if I can go into all this much more deeply - our human consciousness, which is made up of biological reactions, fears, hurts, pleasure, beliefs, dogmas, rituals and endless suffering, that is the content of our consciousness. If you observe this closely it is a fact that every human being throughout the world shares this, every human being suffers, every human being has fear, pleasure, sense of loneliness, despair, anxiety, confusion, every human being, whether they live in the Far East, or here, or in Russia, or in other places. We have been brought up, educated to consider ourselves as individuals. Is that so? Is that a fact? Because we share the consciousness of humanity, because we all suffer, we all go through great agonies, boredom, every form of uncertainty. You may have great talents, great capacities, but behind those capacities lies the ordinary, daily consciousness of all humanity. So each one is humanity, not separate individuals. I know you will not accept this because you have been conditioned from the beginning by religions, by society, by culture, that each one is separate individuals, separate soul. And therefore he must seek his own salvation, his own expression, his own fulfilment. And this so-called separate individuality is creating havoc in the world, which does not mean that we all become the same automatic, turned out in the same mould. On the contrary, freedom is the highest form of existence. It is the greatest art, to live freely. But we are not free. One thinks one is free to do what one likes, specially in this country, each individual thinks he is supreme to do what he wants. His own fulfilment, the expression of his own desires and so on. But if we examine closely and seriously, we share the consciousness of the entire humanity. Because this is a fact. Individuality may be an illusion. And to that illusion we are committed. But when you travel around and observe very closely, every human being, whether he has great position, great deal of money, status, power, he is like the rest of the world psychologically, he goes through great pain, desperate loneliness and all the rest of the psychological world of uncertainty, confusion. And we are the rest of humanity. We are not Africans and Europeans and all that nonsense. We are humanity. Unless we realize that one major fact in our life, we are the rest of humanity, black, white, purple or whatever colour they be, psychologically we are one. Unless human beings deeply realize that we are going to have wars, we are going to be eternally in conflict, as we are now. And no organization in the world is going to change that fact.

We have had religions all over, various types of religions, Catholic and Protestant, and the division in Protestantism. There have been religions of various types in Asia. All invented by thought. And thought has made man separate because thought is the result of experience, knowledge, memory and so thought is always limited. It is never complete, it can never be complete because it is based on knowledge and knowledge is always finite, limited. It can expand, it can change but it is still within the field of knowledge. And knowledge is always limited. And we try to change the world through our knowledge. And this experiment to change the world through knowledge has never succeeded.

So what is a human being to do, if you are serious, concerned, with the world, with your own life? What is a human being to do? Form innumerable organizations, with their bosses and their secretaries and so on? Or each one of us is responsible because we have created this society, we are responsible for every kind of war. So is it possible, not merely intellectually, but actually, in our daily life, radically to change, bring about a deep mutation? Unless we are capable of doing that we are going to have perpetual wars. No organization in the world has prevented any wars. For the last historical process there have been practically wars every year for the last five, six thousand years, all over the world. And man has been responsible for these wars. You may not have a war in America, in this part of the world, but you have wars in other parts of the world because we are divided, as Americans and Russians, and English and French and all the rest of it, not only nationally but religiously, Christians, Buddhists, Hindus. So there is this constant division, both outwardly and inwardly, it is bringing about great conflict. We are one human being, not separate. We don't seem to realize that. You suffer, you go through great anxieties, uncertainties, so does every other human being in the world. And we haven't been able to solve that basic issue, whether we can live with ourselves peacefully. Peace doesn't begin on the other side of the world, whether we live peacefully, without conflict.

And I think this is a very important question which we must put to ourselves: why is it that human beings who have lived on this earth perhaps fifty thousand years, we have done extraordinary things technologically, we have done practically nothing in our relationship with each other? We are perpetually in conflict with each other, man and woman, and this conflict is extended into war.

So we are asking a most fundamental question: why do human beings who have lived on this earth for so many millenia, who have done extraordinary things technologically, who have brought about good health for people, we have done the most incredible things externally, but inwardly we are savages. Forgive me for using that word. We are fighting each other, even in our most intimate relationships. So how can one have external peace in the world, pacem in terris, if one is not peaceful in oneself? We never answer that question, we are always trying to bring changes in the outer, but we never ask of ourselves why we live this way, perpetually in conflict. It is fairly obvious when you ask that question seriously, not casually, we never spend a day trying to find out why we live this way, building a vast network of escapes from this basic fact. And we are still going on. We never seem to realize that unless each one of us fundamentally changes radically there will be no peace on earth as long as you are an American, Russian, different ideologies, different concepts, different gods, and so on, we will never have peace on this earth.

So it behoves us, and each one of us, to find out why we live this way. And whether it is possible radically to change our whole psyche. If there is not a revolution there, mere outward revolutions have very little meaning. We have had communist revolution, French revolution, other forms of revolution throughout the world and we remain what we are, self-centred, cruel and all the rest of it.

I have finished sirs.

(Will you answer questions?)

K: Yes sir, ask any kind of question.

(Krishnaji will be glad to answer any kind of question that you might have.)

QUESTION: I have a question. You have given us a bleak and pessimistic picture of the world in which we live and of ourselves. Do you see any positive signs around? If you look around in this present world do you see any positive developments, something which gives you any hope? - not something inside us and hidden but something visible for all.

K: I don't know why you say, sir, you have only presented a negative side. What is actually going on throughout the world is a very positive thing. You may regard it as negative but the conflicts, the wars, the brutalities, and all those kinds of things are going on. And you ask what is the positive response to all this. Who has created all this? This mess in the world, this terrible killing, war after war, who has been responsible for all this? Aren't we each of us responsible? As long as we are nationalistic, as long as we are concerned with our own fulfilments, our own desires, aren't we responsible for all this mess that is going on? Or is it merely in Beirut that it is going on, not here? We have had two terrible wars and we are preparing for other wars, unless human beings, you and I, radically change, fundamentally, we are going to have wars all the time.

So your question, sir, is, if I have understood it correctly: what is a human being to do? Right sir?

Questioner: No, I asked whether you see anything positive.

K: Yes.

Questioner: If something positive is going on, not just what we have to do, but if you see signs that something right is being done.

K: Yes sir. Something positive. I don't know what you mean by that word 'positive'. I am not dodging the question. I am not evading it, but I would like to know if you would kindly explain what you mean by the positive.

Questioner: Well, let's assume you see some people, or even a group, I think you don't believe very much in groups, who are doing something which goes in the direction of this inner change that you deem necessary to bring peace in the world.

K: Yes sir. There are several organizations that talk about peace in the world, various groups that are talking about peace in the world - pacem in terris. The pope says it, other religious organizations assert it - you must have peace on earth. And you are asking, if I understand rightly, are there individuals, groups, organizations that are working for it. And that organizations, groups, people working for it may be considered positive action. I question that. Where does peace begin? In your heart, in your mind? Or in organizations? Where is there that man can live peacefully, not going to sleep like a vegetable, peacefully. To live peacefully demands tremendous intelligence in our daily life. And can organizations help each one of us to live peacefully? Or it must begin with us, each one of us?

QUESTION: How to go about the attainment of this internal security, psychological security within ourselves. I am just a common man, who hasn't been exposed to all these things, spiritual things, but I would wish to know how that is to be brought about, the basic transformation which you are hinting at - the attainment of peace within.

K: Sir, every religion has talked about it - right sir? Books have been written about it. Believe in god, you will have peace. Follow this path, you will have peace. Follow this guru, you will have peace. Follow this particular doctrine and so on. Mankind has done all this, various forms - be a Christian, be a - you know, all the rest of it. Man has not found peace.

So you are asking, if I understand rightly, how is one, a human being, to live psychologically, inwardly, peacefully. Sir that requires, not that the speaker is avoiding the question, that requires a great deal of enquiry, not just a few phrases. First of all why are we in conflict, not only in ourselves but externally? Why are we in conflict? Is it because there is this dualistic existence, the outer and the inner? Is there in each one of us opposing desires, opposing ideals, opposing sensations, opposing pursuits? Is conflict brought about by thought? Please this requires - I don't know if we have time to go into all this.

What is conflict, why do we have conflict psychologically? Is it brought about by contradictory desires? This whole concept of individuality, is that the basic cause of conflict? "I must fulfil." "I must do what I want to do." I am not advocating or suggesting that we all become communists, they have their own problems, their own misery, confusion, their own appalling - etc., I won't go into all that, you know all about it.

So why is there in the very psyche, in the very structure of our thinking, conflict? Can human beings live without conflict? And there are those who say conflict is necessary to evolve. And we have had conflicts for fifty thousand years, as human beings. Have we evolved tremendously? Perhaps externally we have but inwardly we are pretty poor specimens. So one has to become aware of what we are, of what each one of us is - aware. To be aware choicelessly. If you want to go into all that, which is very complex: to live a life without analysis but pure observation without the observer. It leads to all kinds of issues which we haven't time to go into.

Yes sir?

QUESTION: I am a member of the religious order of Quakers. And we believe, like you, that we must start with inner peace. But we also feel that our inner peace should affect what we do outwardly, that we should also be concerned with say reconciliation between warring people. But from our point of peace within why should there be a conflict between the inner and the outer peace?

K: Yes sir. Why is there conflict between the inner peace and the outer peace? Is that right sir? Am I putting it right?

Questioner: Or why if we are trying to attain inner peace why can't we also to that inner peace try to bring about outer peace in the world too?

K: Are we seeking a psychological state where there is no conflict? Are we really seeking it? If we are seeking it where must it begin? Mustn't it begin in our relationship? Without relationship you cannot exist. So our relationship is the most important thing. If in that relationship there is no peace externally, we will project that conflict externally. This is an obvious fact. If each one of us really basically lived with complete peace, pacem, then would we not create a world which is peaceful?

Yes sir?

QUESTION: I wonder what proportion of humanity would be able to respond to the very good sense of your comments. I have the uneasy feeling that most of the world is suffering from intense poverty, the kind of poverty that even makes people wonder what they will eat that week, whether such circumstances will permit the kind of reflection which will be necessary to proceed with this mutation is a highly questionable idea. And therefore leads me to the notion that perhaps institutions such as are sponsored by the United Nations and other non-governmental organizations may be necessary supplementary mechanisms to make the situation somewhat easier to allow the kind of change which is so necessary. We may have to wait fifty thousand years more otherwise.

K: We know personally a great deal of poverty, we have been brought up in it. The whole of India, multiplying fifteen million people every year. A great deal of poverty. How do we change that? Obviously from what one observes, as long as there is the economy based on one particular community, nation, it is a global problem, not nationalistic or any particular organization. It is a global problem of poverty. Unless we attack that, sir, I don't see how we are going to change the world, poverty, and over population. The European population is decreasing and in Asia it is increasing at an appalling rate and governments are unable to stop that, their own local governments. They have been talking about birth control, family control and all the rest of it, but it is having very little effect in India. So isn't it, sirs, the economic problem is a global problem, not of any particular group, any particular nation. Unless we have that global feeling for humanity we are going to continue for centuries, though this particular organization may be helpful, we are going to have poverty always.

QUESTION: Sir, you must excuse me but...

K: Would you like to come and sit here sir? I would be delighted, somebody to share the platform. Come and sit down, sir.

Questioner: I have been reporting this organization as a correspondent, unhappily an American correspondent, for thirty eight years, and during that time I have heard much about you. That was a great challenge to this organization now, happily only by ignorant people - hopefully I should have said. I went a long way to find out some answers to the questions that came up year after year in a monumental combination of minds from governments, from non governmental organizations, from scholars, educators like yourself - not too many like yourself.

K: I am not an educator.

Questioner: I am not either.

K: Thank god!

Questioner: And I wanted to find out what I can do to become educated because education in the slums where I was brought up, in New York, was a heaven to be devoutly pursued. So I got lost in a book one time and then to poetry and I pursued it further as the Colonies were breaking up and the tribes were breaking up with them, sir. It seems to me that I have made a discovery then which I am going to put to you now.

K: I am not the Delphic Oracle, sir.

Questioner: You need not apologize, sir. You have a very extraordinary audience here by past experiences. It suddenly occurred to me that the tribal man was peaceful compared to the highly civilized European who made two world wars.

K: Yes, sir. Agreed.

Questioner: And now as I listen to you I am beginning to understand why that thought came to me and that is, that in the tribe there is a psychological security, and the individual being conditioned, as you say, by the society in which he lives, is prone to be a psychologically peaceful man and that's how he was conquered by other peoples, the civilized peoples, the multi-lingual peoples. I do not suggest that we can go back to the tribal society but I am saying it only because you have deplored, rightly, the situation in which man after fifty million, or is it fifteen million, who knows, it's enough for him to have learned something, but he didn't.

K: Yes, sir.

Questioner: So I want to ask your comment on all I have said, which is quite a challenge, isn't it? May I sit for your answer?

K: The question being, sir, why hasn't man changed? Why hasn't he learned?

Questioner: That's right. The eternal question.

K: Yes, sir. Why has man remained inwardly primitive? Right sir?

Questioner: I used the word primitive in a complimentary sense.

K: Yes. Why? Is it because culturally, socially, we have looked for the outer to change the inner? You understand, the communists have done that. Change the structure, the outward structure of society, pass new laws, control thought and so on and you will then change the inner man. And it hasn't worked out. And shouldn't we, if we are educated, or even primitive in the most politest sense of that word, shouldn't we begin with understanding each one, with ourselves what we are, and there radically, fundamentally change? Unless we do that we will go on for the next fifty thousand years.

Questioner: You and I won't.

K: You and I won't but the common current of consciousness will go on. But if you and another change radically you affect that consciousness.

Questioner: I say, yes.

K: Therefore we must find people, small groups, whether in America, in Europe, in India and so on, who are concerned completely with this inner psychological fundamental change. And I think it is possible.

Questioner: Of course it is.

K: Therefore we are working on it.

Questioner: Or you wouldn't be sitting here.

K: Quite right.

Questioner: Excuse me. Thank you, sir.

Chairman: Dear friends, let me on your behalf, thank Krishnaji for the best results, and as he always does for sharing his thoughts with us. Please.

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC TALK 19TH MAY 1984

If I may I would like to point out that this is not an entertainment. This is a serious gathering as we are going to explore together the various issues of life. And also this is not a lecture as is generally understood. A lecture is to inform, to instruct and to persuade you to think in a particular way, or be so knowledgeable and be thoroughly informed. So this is not a lecture. Nor is it propaganda to propagate certain ideas, beliefs, or some romantic or reasonable conclusions. But rather we are going to think over together the many complex problems of our daily life. And in no way is the speaker trying to convince you of anything, nor to persuade you to accept some romantic, exotic or some philosophical concepts and ideals. This must be made perfectly clear that we are not encouraging or stimulating, or trying in any way to direct, but rather together you and the speaker go into the very many issues, problems that we have. It is not merely that you are listening to the speaker but though you are listening to him you are also watching, considering your own reactions, your own conclusions, your own experiences.

And we are going to question, doubt, have a great deal of scepticism, without cynicism, because most people are very gullible. We have been made gullible by experts, whether they be experts along philosophical lines, or psychological, or scientific, or biological and so on. We never seem to question ourselves or the authorities, the people who know, who assert, specially those people who come from the Asiatic countries with their peculiar beliefs and religious dogmas and superstitions. So please from the very beginning of these talks and question and answer meetings we are going to question everything. We are going to have a great deal of scepticism, including what the speaker is saying; question it, doubt it, find out, if one may respectfully point out, what is true, to be able to be sensitive enough so that one captures not only the verbal meaning but also what lies behind the words, the content of the words. Not only the etymological meaning of the words but also the quality, the beauty, the strength of a word. Because most of us are caught in a network of words, our whole thinking process is a verbalization, making pictures or images, and we are caught in all that, so we never actually are free from words and ready to go beyond the word, or the explanation, or the description.

If we could this morning and the following days, be very clear on these matters: that the speaker has no authority whatsoever, he is not a professional, not an expert of any kind, because to the speaker that is rather frightening, to be an expert about something. But if we could together, we mean together, take a very, very long journey, a timeless journey into the very complex structure of the human psyche, of what we are, why we are behaving the way we do, why we have all these crowding thoughts, one after the other ceaselessly chattering. If we could together amicably, as friends do, take a long walk into an area that superficially we have scratched, superficially we have had innumerable descriptions, explanations by the professionals and psychologists and psychiatrists, the biologists, the archaeologists and so on. But if we could put aside all that for the time being, though it may perhaps have a certain value at other times, but if we could this morning, like two friends talking over their problems.

We have problems, life is full of problems, from the moment we are born until we die. And we seem to be unable to resolve any of these problems. On the contrary, as a civilization, whatever that word may mean, grows we seem to be multiplying problems. And we never seem to be able to be free of all problems and to live a life that is without a single shadow of a problem. And into all this we are going to take a journey. You are responsible for taking the journey because you have come here, though it is rather hot, and I hope you will be careful not to smoke, because it is much too dangerous.

It's your responsibility as a human being to find out why after fifty thousand years or more or less we are what we are. During the long period of evolution from the most primitive brain to the highly sophisticated brain that we have, why during all this period of vast experience, knowledge, incidents, so-called revolution, why we are still what we are - primitive psychologically, violent, superstitious, killing each other, accepting one authority after another. I do not know if you have noticed in this country there are experts who tell you how to dress, how to make up your face, how to have sex, how to bring up babies, how to read. And all the politicians tell you what to do. If you have noticed, perhaps you have not noticed as you are too close to it, when you come to this country from abroad you notice all these things all over again. They are telling you, everybody, the newspapers, the magazines, the priests, the evangelists, the authorities, the specialists, the experts, all tell you what to do. And this is supposed to be a free country, you are supposed to be free people who are capable of thinking things out for themselves, capable of dealing with their own lives, either righteously or unrighteously. One wonders why a young nation like this is so caught up in the travail of experts, so we are losing our own inward stability, clarity and a sense of behaviour. I do not know if you have noticed all these things. Perhaps the speaker may be exaggerating, but I doubt it. When he comes from abroad for a week he listens to all the television, all the channels, talking channels, newspapers, magazines, talks to some of the experts, and listens to the evangelists - my god, what a crowd! And apparently this country is bent on fun and success, money, and a way of having pleasure superficially. You must have noticed all this too.

So this is the country that is becoming dominant throughout the world, from Asia, from India, from Europe, they all want go to America, to the States; not only to earn more money, to have the capacity of invention, and so on.

So please, if one may repeat it over again, we are not experts, we are not professionals, we are in no way instructing you, or telling you what to do. But rather with great simplicity, with great affection, let us walk together. Together either we walk very fast, or very slowly. But together explore into the injustices of this world, and enquire if there is justice at all, why human beings hurt each other, kill each other; why belief, faith, ideals are dividing people throughout the world. Like the ideology of Russia and the democratic ideology are at war. The piling up of armaments throughout the world, even the smallest country. You must surely be aware of all this. So everybody throughout the world is preparing to kill each other. Demonstrations to stop a particular kind of war, neutron or atomic wars. But nobody seems to be concerned with stopping all wars. There is no demonstration to stop wars, to kill human beings.

And after these forty, fifty thousand years, we are still what we are. What has happened? Why are we like this? Time is supposed to give us understanding, supposed to give us knowledge, supposed to give us a sense of right or true behaviour, accurate. But apparently time has not solved any of our problems. On the contrary.

So one asks, as one must, talking over together as two friends, why have we become like this? It is not only in this country, it is right throughout the world, from the most primitive village in Africa, or India, to the most highly civilized, so-called civilized people. What has happened to us? Some may be thoroughly satisfied with what we are, specially if you are rich, powerful, have status and position, then you don't question these things. But if one is thoroughly dissatisfied, not in revolt, dissatisfied - I hope one sees the difference between dissatisfaction and revolt. If you are dissatisfied and have come here observing things as they are actually, dissatisfied with all the things that man has put together, then you are beginning to enquire into it. But if you merely revolt against it, that revolt is merely a reaction. And we are full of reactions, and therefore we never get any further. But if you could, perhaps only this morning, see things as they are, not according to your particular prejudice or conclusion, or ideologies and faith, but things as they are, not only in your own particular backyard but throughout the world - the starving, the poor, the uneducated, the extraordinary rich people, tremendous power in the hands of the few, whether it is democratic or communist, totalitarian, power, money, with all that goes with it.

So if we could as friends, not opposed to each other, not contradicting each other, nor accepting what the other fellow says, but together take this journey. Which means you, each one of us, whatever speed you would like, walk, but walk, not let the other person do all the talking, all the explanations, all the reasons and descriptions; together look at it, observe it. To observe is one of the most difficult things to do. To observe without any direction, without any motive, without any word, just to observe that tree, for example, without being caught in the word tree, and all the implications of that word. If we are so able to observe ourselves and the world in which we live without any prejudice, without any conclusions, from any point of view, whether yours or mine or somebody else's. Just to look at it first.

We see there is a great deal of misery, a great deal of poverty; or else affluent societies like this country, though there is poverty in this country, there is war, nation against nation, tribe against tribe, ideologies against ideologies - the Catholic, the Protestant, the Hindu, the Buddhist, the Muslim and so on. Two thousands years of propaganda of the Christians, and fifteen or sixteen hundred years of propaganda of the Muslims, and two or three thousand years or more of the Hindus and the Buddhists. We are slaves to this propaganda called religion, called nations, and so on. The world is at war, not only in a particular part of the mediterranean but there are wars going on - I believe forty wars are going on, I have been told, perhaps it is a mistake.

So that's observed outwardly, this competition, each one out for himself in the name of god, in the name of psychology, in the name of science, each one is out for himself, for his success, for his fame, for his reputation, for his power, and so on.

And also in the world externally individuality is given tremendous importance, each one thinks he is the entire the world, to do exactly what he wants, to fulfil, to succeed, to compete, you know, all the rest of it. And also externally so-called religions have divided man too, the whole Christian world with all its subdivisions, and the Buddhist, the Muslim, the Hindu divide. And they are also perhaps so-called peacefully at war. Perhaps too, if you can listen, observe accurately, the Christians have killed more people than anybody else. Look at it carefully. I am not against Christians or Hindus, just observing all this.

So externally our society is in chaos. In that society we live, which is degenerating, and dangerously near. And so this is the external world in which we live. Obviously one asks, who created all this external world, the society in which we live. Surely no divine hand has moulded this society. Society is put together by each one of us, through our violence, through our pleasure, through our fears and beliefs and dogmas, through our search for security in the family, in the community, in the nation. We have created this society, each one of us, and there is no question about that. We have made the society in which we live. And there are the reformers, like the communists, who wish to alter the structure of the society externally. The socialists, the totalitarians, and also the democratic people who through legislation and all the rest of it want to alter the organization of society. When that organization fails they invent another organization. You must know all this. So organizations by re-organizing is called progress. Right? I do not know if you have noticed all these things: politically, religiously and socially. It happens in the universities, colleges, in professional areas; but we never question deeply, seriously why we live in the society which we have made, which we have structured, put together. And this is the result of forty, fifty thousand years of evolution.

Either it is altogether hopeless, man will everlastingly live this way because for forty thousand years he has lived this way. And if we look to time to change fundamentally the structure of the psyche, the inwardness of our ways, if we rely on time another forty thousand years we will still be the same. If forty thousand years has not changed us another forty thousand years is another game.

So one asks very seriously - my friend and I are talking together, walking in a shaded lane where there are a lot of birds and flowers and the beauty of the hills - is it possible to change the human behaviour? Is it possible for a human being who is so fragmented, so broken up, so contradictory, so much in conflict, is it possible to fundamentally, not superficially, through pressure, through reward and punishment, but deeply, can there be a mutation not only in the brain cells themselves but in the whole structure of the psyche, which is self-centred, egotistic, utterly concerned with itself? This has been the problem of some of the religious people from the ancient of times. And those very, very, very few, have perhaps broken the chain of self-centredness with all its limited selfish activity. And the vast majority of people carry on.

So we are asking, my friend and I together: is it possible for us to change? Not change to something else, that is only a becoming. When you change what you are to what you should be, that is a form of becoming. Right? So that is no change at all. I wonder if you understand this? If I am greedy, or schizophrenic, or utterly committed to some kind of amusement and fun and entertainment, to change from that particular form of entertainment to another form of entertainment is still entertainment. Right? But change implies an ending, not a continuity. Are we together in this? You are the friend walking with the speaker. If this is not clear we must go into it because it is very important to understand this.

We must enquire into what is ending. Take for example the word austerity, austere. The etymological meaning of that word is to have a dry tongue! Not take alcohol, the root meaning of that word in Greek and so on is to have a dry mouth. From that arises the word harsh, dry, a sense of cruel control, a sense of simplicity holding to a certain pattern. Now austerity, we are not talking in those terms of dryness, harsh, cruel, cruel discipline to be austere. I wonder if you understand all this. To have great simplicity inwardly, that can only happen when there is absolute clarity. And that can take place when there is an ending to constant indulgence, ending. Say for example, if you are a smoker, end it, not take a lozenge in its place, chew something else in its place. If you are greedy, violent and all the rest of it, end it, not say, "I will be something else". We will go into this much more deeply when we talk about death. You don't mind talking about death, do you? Americans are rather frightened about it, aren't they? There are books written now, recently I see - How to die happily. They are helping the people who are dying to die easily. But death is something extraordinary which we will talk about later on.

So there is the importance of understanding ending. Go into it for yourself and you will see the extraordinary thing that we never end anything, there is always the ending and the beginning of the same thing in a different form. We took the word austere, which is really extraordinary, inward austerity, great sense of simplicity, without any complexity. But we won't go into that now because that requires a great deal of understanding. Because we have the picture of a great many saints and so-called religious people who are very, very austere, at least they pretend. And there is no austerity without love. Love and simplicity is the essence of austerity.

So my friend and the speaker are talking over together, they say, is it possible for each one of us to fundamentally end greed and violence, the search everlastingly for some kind of pleasure, end fear and so on? So we will go into it now.

From childhood our brains have been conditioned to solve problems. A child goes to the school, he has a problem how to read and write. And as he grows older, mathematical problems, geographical problems and so on. So our brain - actually this is a fact, it is not the speaker's imagination, if you have observed yourself - our brains are conditioned to solve problems. The brain is conditioned. So throughout life we are trying to solve problems. Haven't you noticed this? So to solve a problem the brain must be free to solve it. But if it is full of problems itself it cannot solve problems. That is a logical, sane, observation. You can see it in politics, how it is happening, they solve one problem and in the solution of that problem there are multiple problems. Right? You see this - economically and so on.

So one of our first demands or first enquiry is to find out whether we can we free to investigate why we are always solving problems, why we have problems first. We have problems. Right? And you go to various places to resolve your problems. If you have never been alone in the world, wandering among the hills, they will teach you how to be alone in the woods. You pay five hundred dollars or more and they teach you. And you are willing to be taught. Right? So what we are saying is, a brain, your brain, when it is conditioned from childhood to the resolution of problems, you are only multiplying problems. But if one can understand, see the fact, not only the explanation, the reason, the logic of it, but see the fact that a brain that is trained, educated to solve problems, as you have been from childhood, you are bound to increase more and more problems. Right? This is logic, sane. So is it possible for us, for you, to approach a problem with a brain that has no problems? You understand? You understand this? I am afraid you don't.

See the fact first that if you have problems and your brain is trained to solve problems, as it is now, then you can't solve the problem. Right? It is only when the brain is free then it can resolve problems. This is logic, reason. And the lawyers and the professionals increase our problems. They are paid to do that! Whereas if you want to solve a problem one must look at the problem and how you approach the problem. How you approach it. To approach means to come near. How do you come near to a problem? You can't come near to a problem if your mind is seeking the solution of the problem. Right? You can only come near it, look at it, observe it when you are not wasting your energy searching for a solution. I wonder if you understand all this. It is very simple, don't get complicated.

I have a problem, suppose I have, with a friend, or with a wife or husband, how do I approach it? Freely, or with a conclusion which I would like to bring about? Or I have a motive? So a motive, a conclusion, a preconceived solution is a distorting factor, so I never solve the problem. Right? So our first enquiry into this is: can we look at problems in the world and in ourselves, and the world is not different from you, the world is what we have made of it, the society is not different from you, you are the society, you are the world and the world is you, and can we look at that? That is, to look, observe freely without any direction of a problem, whatever the problem be. Then in the observation you come very, very close to it. Then the problem itself becomes important not the answer. You understand? And therefore there is no problem. Oh, I can't go on into it; if you have understood it, so much the better.

So: which means why is it that our brains - because that is the centre of all our activity, all our thought, all our emotions, it is the centre of all our reactions, that brain is conditioned through long years, forty thousand years, it is conditioned as Christian, Buddhist, as a philosopher, as a scientist, as a psychologist, psychiatrist, you know the whole business of it. It is conditioned. That conditioning not only distorts action but also creates a great many problems in relationship, in communication, in looking at things without freedom. So we ought to enquire into that first. That is, why our consciousness - our consciousness is the whole content of our brain, it is what we are, what you think, what you feel, what your beliefs are, your pleasures, your faith, your prejudices, your experiences, your memories, your pleasures and so on, all that is what you are. All that is your consciousness with all its reactions. Right? It's nothing strange, it is very simple. You don't need to go to a professional to find all this out. You can look at yourself, you can know it, if you are capable of observing yourself very clearly, you will find this out much more deeply, truly than from a book or from a professional.

So this is what you are. And we are asking a very serious and fundamental question: this self-centred consciousness is the consciousness of the entire world because every human being throughout the world is self-centred, like you. He has pleasure, he has pain, he has sorrow, he has various superstitions, beliefs, he has invented gods, as you have invented gods. So this consciousness which you have, which you think is yours, personal, mine, is the consciousness of the entire world. They are trying to prove this in different ways scientifically. I won't go into all that. Then when science says so you will all say, yes! Because we have been taught to accept what the experts say. But we are not the experts here, we are together looking at this extraordinary phenomenon which is a human being.

And religion, society, our own pleasures, have made us think we are separate individuals. I know what we are saying goes against everything that you believe. On the contrary we are saying you are not individuals; you are the rest of humanity, you are humanity because you suffer, because you have fears, you have many illusions and superstitions and beliefs, you have one god or one saviour, and in Asia they have a thousand gods, perhaps that is more fun. So you are like the rest of the world. It is a tremendous realization, this fact. Then you will not kill another, then if you kill another you are killing yourself.

So that is the one thing, our conditioning has made us. Religions have said you have separate souls; in India too you have separate atmans and so on and so on. So can all this be radically changed, fundamentally so that we can live on this earth, which is so beautiful, only it is rather hot this morning, it is such a beautiful world, not in pictures, not in the museums but when you look around, the hills, the rivers, the valleys, there is a great sense of beauty in the world? Nature is not made by man; the tiger is not put together by thought. But apart from nature thought has put everything together, the structure of our own self. So thought is responsible, without thought and memory which is born of knowledge, you can't do a thing.

So we ought to enquire what is thought. We are going to enquire together, if you will. What is thinking? What is thought? Because thought has created the extraordinary world of technology - going to the Moon, the neutron bomb, missiles, the submarines, the computer, communication, the railways, the airports, thought has put together all that. And also thought has put together the whole business world. Thought has also put together all the cathedrals of the world, the temples, the mosques, the churches, and the magnificent, beautiful cathedrals of Europe. And also thought has put all the things that are in the churches, in the cathedrals, in the temples, in the mosques - their rituals, their garb, their clothes, their sceptres, you know all the things that show off the religious person. And also thought has invented god. So we should enquire very carefully into the nature of thought because everything we do is based on thought. Your relationship with another, intimate or not, is structured by thought. To write a letter, to drive a car, to be a first-class scientist or carpenter you must have thought.

So we should very carefully understand the nature of thought, why thought has become so extraordinarily important in our lives. And thought may be also one of the reasons why we destroy each other. So what is thought, what is thinking? When you are asked a question, what is your name, your answer is very quick, immediate - why? Because you have repeated it a hundred times, you are very familiar with it. If you are asked a more complicated question, there is a time interval before you answer it. During that time interval you are looking, you are searching, you are asking, and you are looking into books to find out the answer. There is an interval between the question and the answer. During that interval thought is enquiring. And also when you ask something much more complicated and you say, "I don't know" - I wonder if you ever say, "I don't know"? Do you? When you say, I don't know, you are waiting for an answer, or for somebody to tell you. So these are the stages of thinking. And also what is thinking? Perhaps you have heard the speaker talk about it, explain it. Forget, if I may request you, what the speaker has said, or what you have read about it, completely put aside all that, and let us look at thinking.

Your thinking may be crooked, or straight, or rational, or subtle, or neurotic, schizophrenic, but it is still thinking. The most erudite person and the most illiterate person, the man who doesn't know how to read or write, who lives in a small village, he also thinks. So there are these extreme forms of thinking - subtle, crude, and so on. So we should be very clear what is thinking when all our life is based on thinking - perverted, crooked, illogical, illusory, utterly stupid.

Thinking can only take place when there is memory. Without memory you cannot think. And this memory is stored in the brain cells, in the brain. Right? And memory is the accumulation of knowledge. And knowledge can only be, exist where there is experience. And experience is always limited. Right? And so knowledge can expand, be wide, but knowledge is always limited, either in the future or now, it is always limited. That's a fact. Scientists are adding more and more and more to what they already know. So knowledge has always been limited now or in the future, so thought or our memory is always limited, obviously. So thought is limited. Right? So action then born of thought will always be limited, therefore anything that is limited must create contradiction. Right? You understand all this? When you are thinking about yourself all day long, as most people do, it is very limited, isn't it? And action born of that limitation must create enormous problems, contradictions.

So to go into it more deeply which is as thought is limited, which is so, there is no complete thought about anything, there cannot be, it can think about completeness, it can think about measureless, but the thing that thought thinks about as being measureless is still limited because in itself thought is limited. Right? So thought being limited, everything it has done has created contradictions. That is, thought has created nationalities. Right? Because thought says, I must be secure. I am not secure with a family, but I will be secure with a greater community, and the ultimate greater community is the nation, which is born out of tribalism. Nationalism is merely another form of glorified tribalism. And so therefore you have divided the world into the Christian world, the Buddhist world, the Hindu world, the Islamic world, with their separate gods, it all seems so utterly silly. Pardon my saying so. And so where there is division there must be conflict. Right? There is conflict going on in the eastern end of the mediterranean between the Jew and the Arab, Iran and Iraq, fighting about what? The ideological gods and suppositions which each group has created.

So when one realizes not verbally or logically, but the reality that thought is everlastingly limited, there is no end to the limitation of thought, thought then is a material process. Because it is stored in the brain, it is a material process. Therefore anything that thought has created can never be sacred, holy, but only limited.

So one asks: if thought is limited and creates such havoc in the world, what is the place of thought? Are you asking these questions? Do you understand? Is the speaker working, or are you also working? Are you also thinking, enquiring, groping, pushing? Or are you merely sitting under the shade of dappled shade and enjoying the mountains and the hills and the quietness of this place, which is good too, but to listen to something that is true, listen to something which you yourself have found for yourself to be true. And then be committed to it, work for it. Not just let things go by. If you hear the truth and not act, then that truth acts as a poison. It creates more trouble, more problems.

So there must be the right place for thought. You cannot go from here to your house without thought. You cannot drive your car as soon as you leave this place, when you want to get home, you have to use thought. You have to use thought when you write a letter, you have to use thought when you do business and so on. So thought has a right place. But has thought any place at all - please listen to this - has it any place at all in the psychological area, any place at all in relationship with each other? You understand my question? Has thought in relationship a place at all? If it has then in that relationship there is a limitation, and therefore there is division, therefore there is conflict. Right? In my relationship to a wife, or to a husband, or to a girl, a boy and so on, if in that relationship thought plays a great part, thought being limited, then that very limitation creates a division between her and him; and therefore where there is division there must be conflict. As you know very well in all your relationships there is conflict, however much you may like another - I won't use the word love - however you may like the other, or have pleasure with the other, it is always limited, therefore breeding conflict. That's law, that's logic, that's truth.

So thought has its right place in the world of technology, in the ordinary world, but psychologically, inwardly, thought has no place at all. Then if there is a place that creates the self, the 'me'. And the 'me', the ego, the persona, is very limited. It can imagine that it is marvellous, it can imagine it can do extraordinary things. But that imagination, that picture is really still very, very limited, small. To see the truth of this, that's all, one has to do nothing but just see the fact of it. And that very fact, the perception of the fact, as you perceive something dangerous, like a dangerous animal, a dangerous precipice, if you see this as factually, as actually as that, then you break the whole chain of continuity of the self. Then only it is possible to live with another without a single shadow of conflict. Because conflict is the very essence of violence. We think violence is out there: the terrorist, the kidnappers, the wars, the people who carry guns, as in this country everybody is allowed to carry guns, a most extraordinary country! You go into a shop and you can buy a gun.

So violence is not only out there, but violence in relationship exists as long as there is division, as the 'me' and the 'you'. The 'me' pursuing my ambitions, my greed, my purposes, my achievements, and she also doing the same. And therefore we are always living in conflict. And realizing the conflict you say, how am I to solve it. So we come back: the brain being conditioned to the solution of problems from childhood, so we say, all right, let's see how I can resolve, or change, or bring about the ending of conflict. That becomes a problem. Right? That's what you are doing now: how am I to end conflict? But if you saw the root of it, the cause of it, whatever has a cause, that cause can be changed, it can be removed. The cause of conflict is the sense of division brought about by thought, which is limited. And whatever is limited - religions are limited, your beliefs are limited, anything that is put together by thought is limited and therefore it must always create conflict. If you see the fact of that, the truth of it, then that very truth is the catalyst that will end conflict.

I have finished for this morning. We shall continue tomorrow morning. If one may point out you must listen to the whole - not that I am inviting you to come again tomorrow, it's up to you, I am not interested if you come or don't come, and I mean it - but if you want to understand the whole issue, the whole totality of life, you must listen to the whole thing, it is a package, as you call it! Not just one chapter of it, it is a whole book you must read. It has got many chapters, many paragraphs. And that book is you. And as we are going to talk about all these matters during the next week, if you are willing, one must listen to the totality of it.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC TALK 20TH MAY 1984

If one may remind you again, this is not a lecture. Lectures are meant to convey or give instructions, information and guidance. So this is not a lecture, but we are going to take a journey together into an extensive field of the psyche in the psychological realm, though there have been a great many descriptions, investigations up to certain point, but in these talks, if one may remind you, we are going together as two friends to take a long journey into the area of the whole psychological states - if we have time and if we can go to the very end of it, not stop in the middle of something which you may not like, or dislike, one must take the journey to the very end of things.

We must also see that thought has done the most extraordinary things in the world, technological world: from the neutron bombs, missiles, the computers; and the whole area of communication, rapid travel and so on. Thought has been responsible for all that. Also great surgery, medicine, and health - if that is possible - and so on. But also thought has brought about great wars: in the last perhaps hundred years we have had two terrible wars, which is also the result of thought because thought has divided humanity, geographically and nationally. And also thought has divided humanity in the world as Christians, Buddhists, Hindus and Moslems. And as we were saying: where there is division as American and Russian, European and South Africans and so on there must be conflict, there must be war: people are killing by the thousands, killing has been going on for the last six thousand historical years, practically every year there is a war And man during all these forty, fifty thousand years, this long duration of evolution, has not stopped killing each other or destroying nature, more especially now.

Thought has not created nature - the tiger, the wolf and the marvellous trees and flowers. But thought has created division between man and woman. Though biologically they are different, thought in their relationship has brought about great conflict, misunderstanding, quarrels, disputes, antagonism, hatred. So thought has bred conflict not only externally, outwardly, in the world but also inwardly in the whole psychological world, which is far more important to understand than the reorganization of outward structure of society.

Society is what we have made of it. With our greed, with our ambitions, corruption, competition and all the rest of it. So we have made the society which is disintegrating, becoming dangerous as we are, as human beings are degenerating and becoming dangerous: killing, kidnapping, terrorizing. We went into this yesterday and we said also that thought, thinking, has been responsible for the religious divisions, as Christians with all the subdivisions, thought has been responsible for the things in all the temples, churches and mosques.

Thought is the result of memory: if we had no memory there would be no thinking. Memory is based on knowledge and experience. There is no complete experience about anything, there is always the more, and where there is more there is measurement and measurement is never complete, whole. So knowledge is limited, now and always in the future, you can add to it, expand it, but that very expansion is limited, so thought is limited. And being limited, as selfishness, egocentric activity is limited, so thought, whatever it does, must inevitably create conflict because anything that is limited, any concept whether religious or ideological, any ideal will always be limited and therefore it must breed extraordinary conflict between human beings.

We were talking about that, yesterday, and we must go on taking the journey together as two friends who are concerned with the way of life: to find out for themselves without any gurus' authority and all that rubbish; find out for themselves a way of life which is an art, an art that will bring about in human beings a great deal of quietude, affection and an art of life.

These two friends, you and the speaker, are taking a long extensive journey together, together. Please bear this in mind all the time. He is not speaking for his own pleasure, because if he does he can do that in his own room if he wants to, but as two friends exploring hesitantly without any bias, sceptically, doubting, questioning, exploring and observing objectively without any bias - together, because we are concerned with our own lives. And this enquiry into this psyche is not selfish activity, does not encourage or expand self-centred egotistic movement. On the contrary, both religiously and through education throughout the world the egocentric activity has been emphasized: Christians believe in souls, separate from the rest of humanity, so do the Hindus with their atman and so on. And this great emphasis on individuality has brought about great harm, great competition, cruelty. So one must - you and the speaker - are going to question all this: whether we are individuals at all, or we share the common humanity of sorrow, fear, pleasure, anxiety, depression, and the fear of the unknown - death. This is the common lot of every human being on this earth. Every human being on this earth has invented their own gods, hoping thereby there could be some kind of security, a way out of fear, praying in their own way to end their own complexity, their own pain and anxiety - this is shared by all human beings. Not by you as an American or an Italian or Russian or English or an Indian, but it is shared by every human being on this earth. You may intellectually, my friend, accept the logic of it: but what is logic, reason, is merely superficial, but when actually in one's blood, in one's whole being feels the truth of this, that our consciousness is shared by all humanity. You may believe in one kind of god, or in one kind of saviour and so on but that belief - believing - is shared by every human being: to believe in something. So you are humanity. This is a great truth. It is a great something when one actually, in one's heart and in one's blood and in one's guts - realizes this, then we would think of the world totally in a different way. To kill another is to kill oneself, to hate another is to hate oneself and so on.

And, as together - you and the speaker - are taking a journey, we ought to enquire into what is discipline and what is

OJAI 1ST PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 22ND MAY 1984

There have been a lot of questions sent in. And we have chosen some of those questions. We are going to examine the questions, not the answers. It's a dialogue; you ask a question, and the speaker replies to that question. Then you respond to that question. You ask a question, the speaker then responds to your question, then you respond to the speaker's response, and so keep this going till only the question remains and not the persons. You have understood this? Probably you have not gone into this question of dialogue. I think it is important to understand this because we are together going to investigate these questions. And in the process of investigation you ask a question, the speaker then replies to that question, and you respond to the reply, and then I pick up and reply to that - we go on this way - until only the question remains. You understand? So the question then has tremendous vitality, it is not tinged by any personal prejudice. Have you understood this? We are going to do it, we will see it for ourselves.

I wonder why we ask questions, and from whom do you expect a reply? It is good to ask questions, the more questions, enquiry, the better. But we expect someone else to answer the question. The question is really a problem. A problem, the root meaning of that word, is something thrown at you. The etymological meaning of the word problem means something hurled at you, thrown at you, it is a challenge. And we expect others to solve our problems - religious, economic, social, all kinds of problems that human beings have. And therefore it becomes one-sided. You ask the question and the speaker replies to it, if he is silly enough. But if we together investigated the question, the significance of the question, and not move away from the significance of the question, then the answer is in the question. Right? Do you understand this?

Most of us put questions and then wait for somebody to answer them. So what we are interested in is the answer and not in the question itself. Whereas the importance is in the question, not in the answer. You will discover this presently. Because this is a question put to the speaker, then the speaker responds to the question, then you pick up that response and reply to that response, we keep this going until the question remains, and not anything else. And when the question becomes extraordinarily important it has its own vitality, and therefore its own answer. We will see it in a minute.

1st QUESTION: I understand that all people have a similar consciousness, but it seems a vast jump to say that all people share the same consciousness. Could we walk together slowly between these two points?

This is a question that has been put. What is the significance of that question? The questioner says, I understand that all people have a similar consciousness. What do we mean by understand? I am not being facetious, hair splitting, but I would like to know what you mean by understand. I understand the nuclear bomb will kill ten million people in one blow. I understand it. I have seen the experiment, not the ten million people blown up, but have seen the mushroom cloud and all the rest of it. Is the understanding merely intellectual, verbal, or the understanding has tremendous significance, depth, and not merely a verbal understanding. Right?

I have asked that question. Then you reply to that question: you say, no, when I use the word understand, I don't mean logically, or merely verbally, but I understand it, the meaning, the significance of people having similar consciousness. Right?

"But it seems a vast jump to say that all people share the same consciousness. Could we walk together slowly between these two points?" What do we mean by consciousness? You reply to me - there are too many people, therefore I will reply for you. We mean by consciousness to be conscious of things, conscious of the trees round here, people round here, in their various dresses and hair and so on. I am aware of it. What do we mean by being conscious, being aware? In that awareness see what is happening around us, and the happening, or mere things as they are, and in that awareness there is a certain choice - I like, I don't like. I like oak trees, I don't like palm trees, or I wish it was something else. So in this awareness there is a sense of choice. Now is there an awareness, which is part of consciousness, in which there is no choice at all? So the speaker puts that question, and the speaker representing you answers that question: which is, in our awareness there is always choice, choice being I like, I don't like, I wish it were different and so on. So where there is choice there is a conflict. Right? Do we see this? Where there is a choice between this and that, this division breeds conflict. Now is there an awareness without choice? You understand my question? As you cannot reply, I am taking your part: it seems it is very difficult to be aware without choice. And the reply to that is, why? Why is it difficult? Is the word difficult preventing, throwing a barrier? The word difficult. You understand? When I use the word impossible, difficult, I am a failure, those words act as a barrier. So in using the word difficult you are already making it difficult.

So is it possible to be aware, conscious without any choice, just to observe? Right? And the reply to that, I will try. And to that reply the speaker says, don't try. The moment you try you are making an effort. And when you make an effort you don't understand anything. Whereas if you don't make effort, but just see, perceive the actual. Right? And then you may say, sorry, I don't understand it. So I say, let's go into it further.

I am having fun with this! I haven't read these questions before. I like to look at them first when I am speaking.

"But it is a vast jump to say that all people share the same consciousness". Is that so, or not? That all people throughout the world share the same consciousness, is that so? And you say, it is not the same, each one of us different, each one of us has his own peculiarities, his own idiosyncrasies, his different environment, different religious upbringing, or non-religious upbringing, educated in different ways, so we do not say all the same consciousness, you reply. And the speaker says, it is not like that, let's look into it, don't assert. You understand? Don't take a position, then it becomes battle. But if you are pliable, move, enquire, then we are together in this.

So I say, now let's examine this very closely, without any bias, taking up any position, that I believe in this, then you can't discuss, you can't explore. So let's examine this. You say, what do you mean examine, explore? Who is exploring? Your own attention, I am not using the word interest. Now we must go into the question of interest, and attention. I hope you are coming into this game.

Most educators are concerned with interest, to awaken the interest of children, students, be interested in mathematics, if you are not interested in mathematics be interested in history. The teacher is concerned with awakening the interest in the student. Right? Isn't that a fact? I want to play the violin. Don't play the violin, it's not worthwhile because you can't earn a good livelihood, but get interested in something else. And so on. Now where there is interest there is always a contradictory process going on within yourself. Clear? Oh no. All right, I'll explain again.

I am interested in climbing a mountain. And my teacher says, don't be interested in that, be interested in something much more serious. There is a contradiction immediately. I am interested in wanting to climb the mountain; and the educator says, don't climb the mountain, be interested in what I am saying. So in me there is already a contradiction taking place: wanting to do something else, I have been forced to do something else. Right? So don't use the word interest at all. Then what word would you use, you ask me. I say, find out what is the nature of attention. Right? Are you all so puzzled by all this? What is the nature of attention? The student is very interested in watching something very closely. And I want him to be interested in history, but he is watching the frog, or the lizard, or the bird, out of the window. He is paying much more attention to that than listening to my demand of history. So I would encourage him, or help him to watch much more carefully. You understand? Much more carefully so that his whole attention is given to his watching. When he does that then I can see and demand that he pay attention to everything slowly. Learn to pay attention, not interest. You have got it?

So let's examine, or explore, that we all share the same consciousness. Wherever we live, whether in the Far East, or in the Middle East, or here, human beings go through terrible times. There is great poverty in Africa and India, and parts of Asia. There is great suffering. People are anxious all over the world. People are afraid all over the world. And they all want security, both physical as well as psychological. Right? This is a fact. So the fact is common to all of us. Right? You suffer, the Indian in India suffers, the Russian suffers. So human beings, looking at all the inhabitants of the world, go through this extraordinary phenomenon. Right? All human beings have their own idiosyncrasies, their own way of doing things, their peculiar habits, their fears, their gods, their beliefs, right through the world this is a common factor. This is so. The speaker says so. And you say, no, it is not like that. I am different from my neighbour. The speaker then says, are you really? You may have a bigger car, a wider garden, beautifully kept, you work at that garden, you may have a bigger house, or a smaller house. Right? But the superficial difference both biologically and physically, is natural, it is there, it is a fact: you are tall, another is short, one is very, very clever, the other is not, and so on. But go beyond that, or go below that, which is in the psychological world. In the psychological world we all share the same sorrow, sorrow is common to all of us. You may have pleasure in one way but it is still pleasure. It is still fear. You may be afraid of the dark, another may be afraid of some other thing. Fear is common to all of us. Right?

So we all share the same consciousness. And you say to that, it sounds very logical, but is it true? Is it a fact, or are you making something to be a fact, because you want to bring about a non-individual existence, which is unreal? So I say, listen to what I am saying: are you an individual at all? Factually, are you? Because you have a different complexion, different upbringing, you are a Catholic, I am a Protestant, you are a Buddhist, I am a Hindu and so on. Externally you are different, obviously. That is a fact. But inwardly, are you different? Please. You say, yes, I am quite different. What makes you say that you are different? Is it because you think you are different? Or is it a fact that you are different? You understand? Thinking is one thing, and the fact is another. Thinking about a fact is something totally different from the fact. The fact is are you different? Not that you think you are different. Psychologically, inwardly? We cheat, we lie, we want success, we want money. This is a common thing to all human beings. Right? So we are saying there is no individual consciousness, it is not your consciousness. And you say, I don't believe it. It's your invention. I say, look, when you call yourself an individual, what is the meaning of that word individual, the meaning? The root meaning of that word, it means indivisible. Right? Are you indivisible, or fragmented? You understand? If you are fragmented, as you are, you are not an individual. Don't use that word. You are a fragmented human being, like all other fragmented human beings. Individual means unique. You are not. We would like to be unique, we think we are unique because we are clever, we are this, you know, which is a form of vanity.

So when you examine it very closely, unbiased, without any sense of egotism in this, you find we are humanity. We don't share the same consciousness, we are humanity. I wonder if you understand this? When you hear that statement, either you accept it as an idea, or hearing that statement you make an abstraction of it and say, it is a good ideal. Right? And you say, you are avoiding the fact when you make an ideal of the fact. Right? So please look at the fact that every human being in the world goes through all kinds of problems, misery, unhappiness, and if he is a clever man and wants to earn money he does all kinds of crooked things, you know, the whole game. And we all do the same thing in a different way, but the motive, the urge is the same. And you reply to all that, yes, I follow it all logically but I can't feel the depth of your statement that we are humanity, the feeling of it. Then the speaker says, why, why don't we feel this tremendous sense of wholeness in humanity? You understand? Not that we share the earth, the earth is our mother, and we are all born, etc., etc. I know that's the latest fashion, another fad in this country. Do you realize this, we move from fad to fad, the latest books we fall into.

So if one can look at the fact and not make an idea of it, or an abstraction of it as an ideal, but remain with the fact that we are really the whole of humanity, psychologically, then that feeling, when you remain with the fact, it gives a sense of tremendous energy, and there is no separation.

Let's move to the next question.

2nd QUESTION: Have you designated a special teacher, or a person, to carry on your Teachings after you have gone? Someone is claiming this position.

Have you designated a special teacher, or person, to carry on your Teachings after you have gone? - Where?! Someone is claiming this position.

I wonder why he is claiming this position. I know this is happening. I know the various people who are doing this kind of rubbish, but what are they claiming? Why do they want to follow somebody, after somebody. Suppose - not suppose - K is going to die. The speaker is going to die. That's certain, as all of us are going to die. That is one absolute, irrevocable fact, whether you like it or not. Fortunately, or unfortunately, he has said many things, written some books, and become somewhat - may I use the word notoriety - notorious, not as a criminal but some kind of freak, or religious teacher, another freak, or some kind of biological exception. And because of that, a sense of reputation in the world - which is so ugly, and it has no meaning, reputation - someone wants, or feels, or thinks himself that he is going to carry on K's work. Why? Probably it is very profitable, both financially, and you can say, well I can collect a lot of silly people. This is happening in the world. In the church there is the apostolic succession, you know, handed down. They have it too in India, in a different way.

So we all love authority. We all want to follow someone who says, I know. And you are all so gullible. We never say, look, I just want to live, I want to find out what you say, what you are, not what you represent, or your symbol, and all the rest of it. What you are. And you begin to doubt, question, what you are. And you soon discover that it is nothing very much.

So K is saying, the speaker is saying, he has designated no one, no teacher, or anyone to represent after he has gone to England, where he is going next week! It is all rather silly, isn't it?

3rd QUESTION: What do you mean by observing thought down to its very roots? I watch my thoughts but each one leads to another in an endless chain. What is the factor that ends this? What actually brings change?

We will answer this question. We will stop this back and forth. One of the questions is: can thought be aware of itself? One is thinking about what you will do when you get home. You are thinking what you will do when you get back. And you want to find out what is the quality of that thought, and can that thought be aware of itself? You understand my question? I am thinking of my next meal. Now can thought be aware that it is thinking of the next meal? Or is there an observer who says, I am thinking about my next meal? You understand? Right? Is the observer different from the observed? You understand? Is he different? Or both are thought? Isn't it? The observer is thought, and that which he is observing as thought is still thought. So the observer is thought. The observer is all the accumulated memories of the past. Right? And the observer then says, I am going to watch my thinking. I am going to watch what I think. I want to find out the root of my thinking. Right? The observer is saying this. But the observer is also thought. So two thoughts, one thought is watching the other thought. So the common factor between the two is thought. Right?

And what is the root of thought? That is the question. What is the root of it? What is the root of all our thinking, because we all think. The greatest scholar, the great scientists, and the most ignoramus, primitive person, thinks. So what is the root of thinking? And is it possible to find the root of thinking and is it also possible not to think at all? We are going to go into all that.

If I ask you a question, what is thinking, what is your reply?

Probably you would say, I have never thought about it, I have never gone into this question. And I say, why not, because all your life is based on thought - business, everything you do is based on thought? Why aren't you interested in finding out what is thinking? What's wrong with you? You explore so many things, you go under the sea, you go in the air, you do all kinds of things, exploring, but you have never given your energy, or your urge to find out what is thought. And you say, sorry, I have never done it. And so we say: look, carefully observe what thought is first, what it does, what it has done in the technological world, and also what it is doing psychologically, what it is doing in its relationship to others. This whole movement, the technological world, what is happening psychologically, inwardly, and what is happening in your relationship through thought. The movement of thought, from the extreme technological world to the personal psychological world, and the relationship between the psychological world and the next person. It's the same movement, thought.

Now what does it do in the relationship between you and another? Right? What does it do? You say, I don't know, because I have never thought about it. Even if I thought about it I don't know how to go into it. And you leave it like that, hoping somebody will come along and explain the whole thing. Which means that you are not - forgive me for pointing out - you are not really concerned. If you are concerned you work at it. You are concerned to earn a livelihood, and you jolly well work at it. But here you say, sorry, I am used to this, or my parents, past generations upon past generations, are used to thinking, they have never gone into this question at all. And so you brush it aside and go off.

But whereas if you begin to apply, look, perceive, committed to find out, you must find out, then you say, is it that I can answer certain things very quickly, instantly, other things I take time. Right? So an instant response, taking time before response, and ultimately saying, I really don't know, I don't know. Right? These are our states of thinking: instant reply, taking time to respond to a question, thinking, looking, watching, asking, reading about it and then say, this is the answer. And the other is to say, I really don't know. So these are the states we go through. Now when you answer quickly you are familiar with it, it's everyday. You know the way to your home, you know the way to turn on the heater and so on, wash the dishes. But if one asks you something much more complex you take time. And if there is a question like, is there eternity, you say, I don't know. When you say, "I don't know", either you are waiting for somebody to tell you, or you don't accept anything from anybody, but you say, I don't know. Right?

So let's examine what is the root of thinking. Please, you must work at this, otherwise there is no fun in this, just to listen and say, yes, this is so, and walk off. But to apply, find out, go into it, then it becomes extraordinarily interesting. Thought is surely memory, or rather the response of memory. Right? If there was no memory you can't think. That's obvious. If you are in a state of amnesia you can't think. So what is memory? Please, you are working, just don't listen, you are working to find out. What is memory? One is driving a car, going along, and you look in another direction and you have an accident - I hope not you, I. I am having an accident. And that accident causes pain and all the rest of it. So that accident has been recorded in the brain, as memory of that incident. Right?

So that accident has brought certain knowledge. Right? And that accident has been an experience. Right? So that accident is an experience, which has brought knowledge, and that knowledge has been stored in the brain as memory. Right? And the response to that memory is thought. Right? That's simple. Right? So my experience is limited, my knowledge is limited, my memory is limited, so my thought is limited. Right? These are facts. So whatever thought does is limited. Whatever it does, whether it imagines there is eternity, it's limited, whether god, invented by thought, that god will still be limited. I can give him various attributes, say he is omnipotent, he is all powerful, all compassion, but he is still limited because thought has put him there.

So thought is limited. Right? Do we see this fact? Not my explanation of the fact, but the fact that thought is always limited because it is based on knowledge. Knowledge can expand, more and more and more and more. When there is more, there is still more. You understand? More is a measurement. Right? So the 'more', which is measurement, and that measurement is limited. Whenever I say, I am better, it is limited. Right?

So thought is limited. And all our actions based on thought naturally must be limited. Clear? That's a fact. Now what does limitation do? When I am thinking about myself, which is very limited, I spend all my days thinking about myself, that limitation creates trouble for somebody else - to my wife, to my husband, to my children - because I am thinking about myself which is very small. So any action that is limited must breed conflict. Right? My country, small, the country may be enormous, many thousands of miles across, but my concept of my country is very small. I can imagine it is not, but it is still that imagination saying, it is very large, it is marvellous - it is still limited. So that limitation is creating conflict with another limitation, with a British limitation, or - which is your common enemy now? So it goes on.

So do we see this fact that limitation must create division and therefore conflict? And we have accepted conflict as inevitable, as part of our existence. And we have never asked: is it possible to live without conflict? And it is only possible if you understand the whole significance of thought. And to find out what place has thought and where thought has no place at all. You understand? Thought has a place - when you go from here to your house, drive a car, write a letter, do your business, the computer, and all the rest of it, thought there is necessary. And in the psychological world is it necessary at all, which is my relationship with another? Go into, sir, work it out. In your relationship with another, intimate or not, has thought a place, knowing that thought is limited, divisive, therefore conflict? If you see that as an actuality not just a theory, a concept, then that very perception, the seeing of it, then relationship means something entirely different. Right?

So one asks then further - perhaps this is not the moment - is love an attribute of thought? What is the relationship of love to thought? Has it any relationship, or no relationship at all? We will go into that when we talk about all this.

But the question is: what is the root of thought, and whether thought can bring about a change? Please understand, this is the question. What is the factor that ends this, the continuity, change, and what actually brings change? Can thought bring change? You understand? That which is limited thinks it can change. And therefore when it tries to change it will still be limited. I wonder if you see all this. This is not clever, logical conclusions but actuality. There must be change in human behaviour, human endeavour, human existence. That's obvious. But when thought organizes the change, that change is still limited, therefore no change at all. When thought says, I am going to create an organization, the new world, the new box you invent, that is created by thought. Therefore that organization, that foundation, that institution, is limited, and it is going to create conflict. Right?

So what is it that brings about change? You are following all this? Somewhat at least. Thought obviously cannot. It can organize change. Organization is put together by thought. It can plan change but the planning is limited. So when one realizes, sees the fact, the truth that thought cannot possibly bring about a change, because thought itself is limited, and therefore whatever it does is limited. Right? Therefore what will bring change?

The thing is laid before you very clearly. Verbally, the description is accurate, not exaggerated, and it's left to you to answer that question: as thought cannot possibly bring about change, mutation, total psychological revolution, then what will? So thought says, "Yes, god, I'll pray". This is happening. "I'll pray". Prayer again is invented by thought, therefore very limited. So if one sees the fact, the truth, that thought is absolutely limited, then what takes place in the brain? Answer it, examine. When one realizes actually the fact, and an enormous fact it is, it is a tremendous revolution to see the fact. Already revolution has taken place when you see the fact. Because we never accept thought can do anything; it can - it has gone to the Moon, and put a silly flag on there. It can do anything, but always limited. If you see that revolutionary fact there is already a mutation of the cells themselves in the brain. I wonder if you understand this?

One has walked all one's life north, going always north - suppose. And you come along and say, sorry, that leads nowhere, try going east or west. And I say, yes, I'll go south. The very movement, where you had been going north has now suddenly changed to going south. There is a mutation taking place, a change has taken place. You have been going north habitually day after day, so the brain is conditioned going north. Now you come and say, there is nothing there, you explain it, logically, sanely, so you say, quite right I'll go south. That movement away from the north has brought about a mutation in the very brain cells themselves. Right? You won't accept this, go into it, you will see it for yourself. The realization of a truth, that very realization brings a radical change. There is no, "I will meditate to change, I'll make an effort to change".

4th QUESTION: Please explain what you mean by saying that if one perceives truth and doesn't act, it acts as poison.

Do you need an explanation for that? All right. I have heard the truth that thought is limited. That's the truth, that's not an invention, that's not an exotic idea, something conceived by some idiot or other, it's a fact. And I listen to the fact, the truth of it. And I carry on my daily life. What takes place? I have realized something to be true and I am acting quite the opposite to that. What happens? Conflict increases more and more and more. It is much better not to hear the truth, then you can carry on in the old way. But the moment you hear something to be extraordinarily beautiful, and that beauty not just a mere description but the actuality of that beauty, when you do something ugly, and keep on repeating doing the ugly thing, obviously it is a poison. It not only affects you physically, inwardly, and also it affects a great deal the brain that has heard something to be true and does the contrary. Therefore it's much better not to hear if you want to carry on in your old way.

There is a very good story of two robbers. And they have been robbing, and their father has been praising god for his kindness, for their benefit - you understand, thieves have also gods, not only the rich people. So one day they have been robbing somebody or other, and they are coming back. In the square, there is a man giving a sermon, and he is saying you must never steal, you must never hurt another, be kind. The other brother closes his ears, he doesn't want to hear, and the other brother hears it. And for the rest of his life he is in pain.

I think this is a fact, really a great fact, and we don't seem to realize it; that when something enormously beautiful, you see, you are sensitive enough to see that beauty, and you do something ugly, it really tortures you, if you are sensitive. And that's why truth is such a dangerous thing.

5th QUESTION: Why is the observance of silence so important for seekers of truth?

Who said this? Who said that the observance of silence is necessary to perceive truth? Has the speaker said it? Or some other person said it? Or have you searched for truth and you have discovered silence is necessary? Can truth be searched? You understand my question? Can truth be sought after? If you seek truth you have already established what truth is. Right? You are already moving in that direction. Which means truth is something fixed, and you, in your search for truth you find it because you believe truth is already preconceived and you go after it.

Now why do you think silence is necessary? I don't know. Somebody says so. So I am not going to listen to another, however reputed, or has a great reputation and all that nonsense. I am going to find out. Can a chattering mind, brain, chattering, ever listen to anything? You are chattering, talking to your friend, and you come along and say, I want to tell you something. You don't listen because you are chattering. So can a chattering mind listen? Obviously not. So to listen you have to pay attention. Right? That's natural. To pay attention is rather difficult because we never attend to anything completely; we listen partially, partially talk, and partially do this. We never proceed to find out anything to its very end. I don't know where the end is but we will go on until we discover something. So can a chattering mind, can a mind that is occupied from morning until night, and during the night, can it ever be quiet? Not to find truth, good god! It's an ordinary question. Please answer it for oneself: can a brain that is occupied, with business, with sex, with pleasure, with fear, with its loneliness, you follow, occupied with something or other, with its hair, how it looks, how it doesn't look. You know, all the rest of it, it is occupied - with god, with Jesus, with saviours, with meditation - being occupied with meditation!

So the natural question then is: is it possible to stop this tremendous endless continuity of occupation? It would be natural to stop when you are attending to something. If you are attending to what the speaker is saying now, attend, which is listening, you are not occupied, you are listening. Not in that listening when you say, well I don't quite agree with that, I think you are right, I think you should put it differently, I understand this differently, why do I understand it differently, and so on. But if you actually listen you are attentive, and attention is silence. Right? I wonder why we make everything so complex. Life is complex, tremendously, like the computer, it is a tremendously complex thing. But to understand it one must have a very simple mind. To have a simple clear mind, uncluttered, then attention becomes extraordinarily simple.

That's enough for today.

OJAI 2ND PUBLIC QUESTION & ANSWER MEETING 24TH MAY 1984

Glancing through the questions we never seem to ask questions concerning our daily life. And there have been a lot of theoretical, ideological questions that really have no meaning at all. One wonders why one doesn't ask questions about one's own life, depression, anxiety, a sense of deep loneliness and so on. Aren't we really concerned with our daily life, or is it just that we live in a make-believe world, and try to find answers to some romantic, sentimental, idealistic, religious beliefs. I wonder why one asks, if I may, why don't we ask such questions directly, simply about oneself?

We all want to end war, at least some people do. And pacem in terris, that is, peace on earth, in Latin, is not possible, apparently, in this world, in spite of demonstrations, in spite of all the preaching of the priests and religious books and so on, we can never have peace in this world apparently. And we never ask if one can live peacefully in our daily life, without any violence, without all the innumerable multiplying problems, live a clear, simple, strong life. Apparently that is not possible, and we don't ask that question.

May I raise a question? Why do you come? Please, I really mean it, why are you all here? When the speaker is in India and talks to between five to eight thousand people at every meeting, they come there, most of them understand English, and most of them come to be in the presence of a religious person - at least quotes, 'religious person'. They don't quite understand what the speaker is talking about, I am sure they don't. But they must come as it is the tradition, it is the fashion, the reputation, the image, and all that nonsense - I was going to use a strong word! And perhaps you come here out of curiosity, or to spend a nice morning under the trees, and the dappled light, or take a sun bath and listen to the poor chap. And so you go on that way. All this doesn't actually deeply, profoundly change us. What makes human beings change? This is really a very serious question. Why do we behave as we do behave? Is it possible that suffering, pain, anxiety, a sense of desperate depression, out of which one finds oneself almost impossible to get out of; and with terrible ambitions, and the competitions, and all that kind of thing that is going on, can we change all that, each one? And you will inevitably ask, does it really matter if I change, if one changes, will it in any way affect the whole human endeavour, and their mischief, and their superstitions and violence? And one thinks that is a wrong question to put. That is, you will change only if it affects the rest of the world. And if it doesn't it doesn't matter very much how one lives.

One wonders if you have ever considered how one man can change the whole human consciousness, human beings. One man. As a bad example of a neurotic and insane person like Hitler, who has done such tremendous harm to the world, he has changed or affected the rest of the world, their consciousness, their behaviour. And you might also say, has the Buddha, 2,500 years ago, has he in any way affected the world? Or the Christians believe in the saviour, in Jesus and all that, have they really changed the world, changed human minds, human behaviour, endless suffering? Or have the priests throughout the world prevented this change? You understand my question? One has no direct - direct - teachings of the Buddha, or that of Jesus. His teachings apparently were interpreted after sixty years, so there is no direct teachings. And perhaps that has prevented human beings from acting rightly. So one wonders all along the long journey of one's life why profoundly human beings don't change their ways of life. Is more suffering necessary? Is more violence necessary? More experts and so on? Or we haven't got the energy, the drive, the passion, the intensity to change the pattern of one's deep behaviours?

Please do ask these questions of yourself. And here there are many questions given. Questions imply problems. And problems ought to be solved. Not in the resolution of one problem a dozen other problems arise. The ending of a problem of any kind. And apparently we don't seem able to do that, either politically, economically, socially and so on, or religiously. It is a perpetual reorganization. When that reorganization doesn't function properly, reorganize it, keep on reorganizing every organization. I don't know if you have not noticed this. And this is called progress. This is called bringing about order in the world. Can one put aside all organizations, spiritual specially, if one can use that word that has been so spoilt, not belong to anything at all, not be caught in any box, in any system, and work, look, observe, perceive one's own behaviour, change?

And why doesn't one do all this? Why does one depend on others? Please do ask these questions most seriously if one may request you.

1st QUESTION: There are moments of awareness in which there is great clarity, and fear, division, and the experiences are absent. But the moments are brief. What is necessary to allow a sustained clarity, intensity, and the wholeness of being?

Whom are you asking this question? This is apparently a serious question. It looks serious. Whom are you asking? And you want a reply from somebody. That somebody is the speaker here, for the moment. If the speaker doesn't satisfy you with the answer you will trot off to somebody else. And if that somebody else isn't good enough you will go after somebody else. You keep this going. And that means, doesn't it, we depend on others to tell us what to do, what to think, how to find clarity, sanity, a wholeness of life. Always, apparently, we depend on somebody. We never look into this question, ask ourselves, and see if we can, for ourselves, totally independent of others, find out if it is possible to be absolutely unconfused, to be absolutely clear, not momentarily, not occasionally when you have nothing else to do, but is it possible? Not the continuity of clarity - you understand? Suppose one is clear for a moment, and that clarity for a second banishes away fear, experiences and all that; then that memory of that clarity is not the fact of clarity. Right? I wonder if you see this? Suppose I am walking in the woods, not in California, here, it is too strong the sun, suppose one is walking among the woods and listening to the birds, and to the spot of light, and the beauty of the foliage, and for a moment there is absolute clarity. And that clarity has left an imprint on the brain, it says, "By Jove, how clear it was." Then one wants that clarity to continue, don't we? Like pleasure, you want it to continue. The continuity is the movement of memory. Right? I must go into all that.

It involves time, doesn't it? Anything that continues must have time, the implication of time. And time will not allow clarity. It is the freedom from time that is clarity. Let's go into this again, if we may.

Say for example one wants security, psychologically. And one for a few seconds, or for a few days, one has this feeling of being absolutely safe, protected, solidly secure. Then that disappears after a few days. But the memory of that feeling remains. And we want to continue that which has happened two days ago. Right? This is what we are all caught in. That is, the duration of an experience which has finished, and the memory of it we want - the memory wants continuity of that thing which has happened. Right? So if we could look at this question: time by the watch, by the sunset and sunrise, time as day and night, time of year and so on, that is there is time. And thought is also time. Right? You are following this? Time is a movement of thought from the past to the present and the future, which is a movement of time. This movement has its own continuity. Right? Are we together following this? And the brain, which has evolved through time, says, continuity is essential because for it to continue it is essential. Physically, biologically, it is necessary. But psychologically it wants also to continue. So the brain becomes confused when there is no continuity. Right? You are following this? Are we together somewhat in this?

And one questions whether there is psychological continuity at all. You understand my question? We are questioning, I am not stating: is there psychological continuity at all? That is, moments of clarity which banishes, puts aside all fear, all problems, and all the travail of life, it happens in a moment. And the brain says, it must continue. Because it only thinks in terms of time, a continuity. You understand? Biologically it is necessary to continue day after day. Right? The same house, same food, same clothes, same roof over the head. Psychologically also we want in relationship security to continue. Right? Are you following all this? Is there in relationship security at all? Which is a duration of long period of time. When there is the demand for that there is conflict. I wonder if you understand this.

Relationship, as it is very important, it is a tremendously important thing in life, relationship, one cannot possibly exist in this world without relationship, whether you are a monk, a sannyasi, a wanderer, you are always related to the past, or to a person, or to a concept of the future. It isn't just a mere physical relationship. As relationship is very seriously important in life there are moments in which relationship has great depth, silence and a sense of tremendous well-being. Don't you know all this? The speaker hasn't to go through all this, but he will go through it. And that, those moments of deep sense of fullness, wholeness, is registered, recorded in the brain, and the function of the brain is to record and keep it going. And so the memory begins to play an important part.

So one questions whether there is security at all in relationship? You understand my question? We want it. We think it is absolutely necessary, but is there any? - Please ask yourself. Security means permanency, and is there anything in life permanent? Death is always there, but let's leave death alone for the moment. Is there anything permanent in life? We want to have something permanent. Apparently religious people say god is permanent.

That's a marvellous invention but it has very little meaning. So we are seeking in relationship security and permanency. That very concept - please listen to this for a minute - that very concept of demanding security and permanency is translated as attachment. Right? So there is deep attachment to another. It may be for a month, or for a week, or for fifty years. And during this state of attachment there is all the conflict of jealousy, suspicion, fear, gain and loss, you know, you know all this, don't you. So the demand in relationship to have a sense of permanent continuity in which there is security leads to attachment and all the complexity of attachment. If one sees that, perceives the fact of that, perceiving it, as you perceive the tree and you don't, unless you are blind, you don't go against it, knock yourself. So if you see this fact that the demand in relationship for permanency, security which inevitably leads to a great deal of conflict and attachment, fear and so on, then that very perception burns away the demand for security. You understand? Is this clear, this question? That at the moment when we think in terms of time, a sense of continuity, then intensity, clarity and the feeling of wholeness disappears. You have understood, captured all this?

You have listened to this, is it all nonsense? Do you say, what the devil are you talking about? Or is it sanity, reason, logical, and if you, if I may most respectfully ask, if you see this very clearly, the fact that we do demand in our life, in our daily living, psychologically a sense of continuity, a sense of security, it must inevitably bring conflict. Right? Do we see this, perceive this fact? And we are saying if we perceive the truth of this, that very perception burns away the demand for security and permanency.

Therefore then what is our relationship with each other? You understand? You understand my question? Suppose the speaker or you have not this sense of security and permanency, that doesn't mean anything, suppose, then what is relationship? You understand? What is my wife and my husband, or girl friend, or boy friend, whatever it is? Do please ask this, think it out, let's work it out. What is one's relationship with another, intimate, or otherwise? Is there just, what, a gap? Or when there is no permanency, demand for permanency and security with all its complexity, is it possible a new awakening, a new sense of what is love? Do you understand my question? Permanency and attachment, with all its pain and pleasure and anxiety and fear, is not love. And in the absence of that entirely, deeply, profoundly, the other is like a flower that blooms. Right? Is this possible? It is possible when you hear all this, is it possible in your daily life? Love is not thought, desire, sensation; love has totally a different quality. And that is totally absent when the other, security and all the rest of that, is the demand of every human being.

2nd QUESTION: What is judgement? How is one to determine the line dividing opinion, and the perception of fact?

It's a good question. What is fact, and what is opinion? And where is the dividing line between the two? Why do we have opinions? The meaning of that word, opinion, means judgement, evaluation, preconceived concepts, you know, the whole assertive, dogmatic opinions that each one has. Why do we carry so many opinions? Please enquire into this. Why do we have opinions at all? We have opinions about everything. And apparently they are so strong, and we think that is freedom, to have a thousand opinions about everything. That gives you a sense of freedom, at least you think you are free, independence. It's my opinion, I am right. So we have a thousand opinions.

And what are facts? What is fact? Fact is that which has happened. Right? That which has happened. An incident or an accident is a fact, which took place yesterday. And fact is also what is happening now. Right? What is happening now, you and I are sitting here having a conversation, a dialogue, or a question and answer and so on, that's a fact. What is not a fact is what may happen tomorrow. Right? Are we coming together in this? What may happen when you leave this place and go off, go off to your car. So fact is that which happened, that which is happening; and fact is not what will happen. That's clear. What will happen is decided by what is happening now. Right? I wonder if you see this. The future is in the present. Right? The future, what you are now is the future, modified, but basically what you are now. So the future is in the present. Right? And the past is also in the present. Right? So the present contains all time. Please don't play with this as a theory, it is meaningless. It becomes a slogan if you repeat that, at least it loses its meaning. But if you see that the past has a continuity in the present, and the future is the past modified in the present, the past modified through the present, so the present, the now, contains all time. Right? And if you don't change now you will be exactly the same tomorrow, slightly modified. So the future is in the present. This is really quite important to understand because what is action? I mustn't go into that.

So why do human beings cling to opinions and not facts? You can conclude from a fact an opinion. Right? A fact can be made into an opinion, but the opinion is not the fact. I may have an accident in a car and you come along and see it, and have umpteen opinions about it, but the fact is I have an accident. So why do we have opinions at all, about government, about religion, about this, and about that, about literature, about poems, you follow? Why? Is it a kind of game? Is it a kind of wastage of energy? Is it another form of chattering? Which is all a waste of time, waste of energy. Whereas if you stick to facts, which is, what has happened, what is happening, that's only facts. I am looking at the tree. That's a fact. Why do I have to have an opinion about that? If I am a lumber merchant, thank god I am not, and I say, that's a valuable tree, let's cut it down - that's a different matter. But to have constant opinions about everything seems to one such a stupid waste of energy and time, you know, it is so useless.

And judgement, the question is: what is judgement? A judge passes a sentence on somebody, criminal, or some innocent man. There was a judge once whom the speaker happened to know. He was high up in law and became a judge. And one morning after many years of judgement, he said, "What am I judging? What is truth? I am passing a judgement about everything according to precedence and so on, what is truth? Unless I find that out judgement has no meaning". So as was customary in India in those days - about 50 or 80 years ago - he called his family and said, "I am going to withdraw from the world, go off into the forest, into some distant village, meditate and find out." We are telling you the facts of it, not opinions about it.

After 20 years or 40 years - I have forgotten the exact time - somebody brought him to listen to one of the talks that K was giving and he came to see the speaker afterwards, and he said, "You know what I have been doing these 40 years? I started out to find truth meditated, did all kinds of things and I see now that I have been mesmerizing myself. I have been living an illusion." Right? You understand all this? For an old man to acknowledge such statement and say that is a fact, that needs a great deal of perception.

So, What is judgement? What is justice? Is there justice in the world? Please ask this question of yourself. Is there justice in the world? You are born in a good family, money, education, prosperity, success, and the other lives in a small ghetto, no future except poverty, constant struggle. Right? Where is justice in that? The Indians have a very good explanation, the Hindus, which is Karma. You understand? Don't, please, that word Karma means to act. Not all these things ??? to it. To act rightly, at the now. If you act rightly now, the future is right. So, ought you act mischievously now, you pay for it next day or next life.

Now, is there justice in the world? A crook can employ a clever lawyer and get away with it. This is happening everyday. You are clever, I am not. You are beautiful, I am not. You are extraordinarily alive, I am not. This is facts. So, where is there justice? There is so called legal justice which is totally different from actual justice. Justice can only be found where there is freedom and compassion. Without that freedom and compassion which in its movement is intelligence there is justice. Otherwise, there is no justice in the world. This is, please, not an opinion, not a theory, but when you have this feeling of great compassion which is quite a deep question. Then there is, in that compassion, there is justice.

3rd Question: There are many people who have considerable difficulty with the fact of homosexuality. Teachers, for centuries have avoided this enquiry. Could please, even briefly put some light on this question? I have travelled 2000 miles to ask this question.

Krishnamurti: There are many people who have considerable difficulties with the fact of homosexuality. Teachers, for centuries have avoided this question. I have travelled, oh, Could you please, even briefly put some, answer this question? I have travelled 2000 years, miles (laughter) to ask this question? Sorry, quite right, I have travelled 2000 years. This has been a question for thousands and thousands and thousands of years. It isn't something new. How would you, we are not taking sides in this matter. We don't condemn it or approve it or disapprove it. These are facts. Right? As heterosexuality is a fact. Homosexuality exists in the world, in different parts of the world very common, other parts of the world it is practically unknown. So how do you answer this question? What is the question? Why do we make it into such an enormous problem? Apparently we don't make heterosexuality a problem at all, but we make this into a problem, why? It is a fact. So should we enquire into this question, into heterosexuality, and homosexuality differently? Not condemn one or the other, or approve one and deny the other, but enquire why sexuality, both, has become so colossally important. Right? Why? You answer this question. On television, in magazines, every best seller, has this element in it, in detail, every day. You are following? I don't have to tell you all this. Everyday it is emphasised - sexuality, I am not talking about homo or heterosexuality, just sexuality. Why have human beings given such great importance to this? And if it is not important you feel there is something wrong with you, that you are neurotic, that you have to fulfil, you know dozens and dozens of explanations by the psychologists, by the experts, by the sexualists. Why? Is it pleasure? Remembrance in the pictures of sexuality - you understand? Why has man given throughout the ages such extraordinary importance to this? If you are deprived of it you feel something terrible has happened. And you can voluntarily say, I won't have any, I will become a celibate, and join a monastery, or not join a monastery, or remain a celibate with all the problems of celibacy. Right?

So what is the question? Why has this thing been given such a place in life? It is part of life. Right? Part of walking, seeing, running, laughing, tears, it is part of life. But why has this one thing taken importance. And it is being encouraged very carefully. Right? By the entertaining industry. Please go into all this. And the psychologists have also encouraged this: fulfil. And some mothers feel there is something wrong with their daughter or son who doesn't have a boy or girl friend after the age of twelve, thirteen. This is all what is happening in the world, especially in this country. In the traditional countries like India, and others countries, there still they say, please wait, don't indulge, wait until you are twenty or twenty two, or whatever it is.

So seeing all this, what does one learn from all this? Learn, not morally, not morality, not celibacy and so on, but what does one learn from all this? Come on, sirs! Religions throughout the world, the ancient - I won't call them the very ancient - the Hindus, the Buddhists, Christianity, have always said, be a celibate, if you want to follow God be a celibate. Why? And they take vows of celibacy, join monasteries, become a monk, a wandering monk, as they do in India, and go through tortures with this. Right? They have taken a vow, they must stick to it. I don't know why they take a vow first but once you have taken a vow you have to follow that which you have accepted. But psychologically, inwardly, the glands, everything is functioning, and you have a terrible time. The speaker has talked to many, many of them. They go through hell. Religion has done that. You know all this, don't you?

And one asks: why has man said to himself, to achieve the most sublime you must be a celibate? Do you understand? That is, you must torture yourself, go through agonies and then you will be nearer god. It seems so childish, the whole thing. Sorry! I have met many, many sannyasis, in India, monks. I won't go into the details of it, they have tortured themselves in every way. Because the popular opinion is that to reach god, to reach the highest, you must live a life of absolute abstinence. Which means human beings have never understood what is austerity. May we go into that? You are not bored with all this? I don't mind if you are bored. Probably you don't want to go into all this, it may disturb you very much. Please don't be disturbed because we are dealing with facts.

What is austerity? You know the root meaning of that word, as we explained the other day, to be austere means to have, in Greek, a dry mouth, not from drinks, but a dry mouth, which is to be harsh, to be sharp, to be dry. And so gradually the human being has this idea it must be austere, and has made himself into ashes. You understand? When you are forcing yourself day after day, month after month, year after year, driving yourself you end up as dry human being. And if you indulge in the other direction you have the same problem.

So can one live a life without conflict? You understand? Neither extremes, which imply conflict, and the sensory demands and the suppression of sensory demands. Can one live without a single battle, effort, struggle between the two? You understand my question? That requires a great deal of enquiry into the whole problem of desire, will, wish, and the biological urges. Do you understand? Do you want to go on with this?

There is a very good question at the end - I just saw it! How is one to live on this earth - please listen to it - how is one to live on this earth without harm or destruction to its beauty, without bringing suffering and death to others?

But we must finish our question which we were talking about previously. Could we bear another quarter of an hour? Are you working the same as the speaker is working, or are you just listening? Is your brain as active, working, enquiring, doubting, intense to find out a way of living which is something totally different?

We were saying, to live a life without conflict requires an investigation into the whole question of desire, which is a very, very complex problem. Do you really want to go into all that? I am not asking out of encouragement, I am just asking. It is a very serious thing that we are undertaking. It is no good just merely listening and repeating, that has no meaning at all. But seeing what the facts are in this world, what is actually taking place in the world, not only in this country but in every country, in so-called every culture, and conflict in man is increasing more and more and more, not less and less. Man means woman and man, so please don't get excited about it - why don't I talk about women. Unless one understands very deeply the movement of desire, not the description of it, not the explanation of it, but to enquire why desire becomes so extraordinarily important: desire to become successful, desire to have money, desire for sex, for excitement, for amusement, the tremendous urge and the speed of it, and the demand for its fulfillment. Again religions have said you must suppress desire, which means another battle, another conflict, another torture. You know religion has played havoc with human beings. And they are still doing it, not only in the Christian world but in the whole world, the Islamic world, look what they are doing in Iran and Iraq. Don't talk of it.

So what is desire? Please understand we are not trying to suppress it, or encourage it, but it is a fact. The fact is that we are driven by desire. And to thwart it is pain. Right? A sense of not being able to fulfil, so at any cost, at any price we want the fulfillment of desire. You may say desire for god, desire for understanding, it is still desire. Shall I go into all this?

When you look at a tree and the beauty of the tree, the light upon the leaf, and the mountains beyond it, the valleys, the shades and the dappled light, and see that enormous beauty of the earth, that is sensation. Right? I won't go into the question, is beauty sensation, I am not going into that, that's another problem. No, not a problem, that is quite another thing, very interesting if you go into it: is beauty sensation? When you see all that, the earth and its beauty, it is a sensation. Right? Seeing with the optical eyes, with the eyes, and the seeing, the very seeing arouses the sensations. Right? Seeing a beautiful woman or a man arouses various kinds of sensations. Then that sensation is correct, isn't it, normal, healthy, natural, unless one is paralysed, blind, and deaf, dumb. That is when one is sensitive one is acutely aware of all this. And you see this. There is perception of all this. Then what takes place? You are looking at those hills. The seeing of those hills arouses certain sensations. Then what is the next step to that? Enquire, please, look at it. Does then thought come in and say, what a beautiful thing that is? Right? Thought then creates an image out of that sensation. Right? I am not saying anything that is not factual, this is not supposition or fictitious. Sensation - contact, sensation, then thought makes an image of that sensation. Right? Are you following? When thought makes an image out of that sensation then desire is born. Sensation is not desire. Sensation is sensation. But when thought comes and says, yes, what a lovely thing that is, what a lovely dress that is, nice shirt - being a man - nice shirt, or a woman says, nice dress. Goes inside, touches it, feels it, puts it on, and then thought says, how beautiful I look. That's a nice shirt on me. Then desire is born. You understand this? This is a fact. It is not something theoretical, it is a fact.

Now the question is, if you go into it much deeper, sensation, seeing a beautiful painting, beautifully framed and beautifully lit, marvellous, that is a sensation. Then the thought says, I wish I had that in my room. Then when the thought assumes the authority over sensation desire is born. Now the question is: can sensation and thought be kept apart? Go into this. Not through will, through compulsion, effort and all that, we are asking a very serious and simple question. Sensation is natural, thought is also somewhat natural, with its image. That's what happens. Now can there be a gap, an interval, a hiatus, so that sensation and thought are separate? You understand? See what is implied in it. It requires tremendous attention, great watchfulness. Seeing, sensation. The speaker has seen some most beautiful things in the world, beautiful cars, beautiful people - please I am not using that in the common sense - beautiful people. So it is natural to look at this world, this enormous beauty, the destruction, what human beings are doing to the earth, and see some of the most beautiful gardens in the world, houses, palaces, and so on, we have lived in them and all that. And never to be identified with any of it. Oh, you don't know all this. Never ask, I wish I had it. You understand? That requires great perception, watchfulness and clarity.

And all that implies a sense of great inward learning, which is discipline. Learning is discipline, not conformity.

3rd QUESTION: How is one to live on this earth without harm or destruction to its beauty, without bringing suffering and death to others?

Have you ever asked this question? Actually? Not theoretically but actually put that question, face it. Don't run away from it, not explain, it is necessary, and all the rest of it, but look at it, confront it. Have you ever asked such a question? Not en masse, make a demonstration against some politician who wants to destroy a National Park or this or that. To ask such a question, that means you are burning with it, it is something tremendously real, not just a fanciful question to pass the time of day. To live on this earth with its extraordinary beauty, and not to destroy it, and to end sorrow, and not kill another, not kill another human being, not kill a living human thing. There are those people in India, a certain sect: their transportation is to walk, they take no trains, no aeroplanes, no carriages, nothing but walk, and they put on a mask not to kill an insect by breathing. You understand? There is a whole group of them. Some of that group came to see the speaker and they walked 800 miles from April to January, and never taking any transportation except walking. And they won't kill.

And there are those who kill, kill for sport, kill for amusement, kill for profit - the whole meat industry. Right? Destroy the earth, to dump poisonous gas, you know all that is happening in this country, pollute the air, the waters, and pollute each other. This is what we are doing to the earth and to ourselves.

And the questioner asks: can we live on this earth with its great beauty and not bring suffering to others or death. It is a very, very serious question. To live a life without causing suffering to others, or causing death to others, that means not killing a human being, not killing any animal for sport, for your food. You understand all this? This is the question.

There were a certain class of people in India at a certain time, they never ate meat. They thought killing was wrong. They were called at the time, Brahmins. And the western civilization has never enquired into whether killing is right, whether killing any living thing is justified. The western world has destroyed whole races of people. Right? This country has destroyed the Indians of this country, wiped them out because they wanted land, and all that. So can we live on this earth without killing, without war? I can answer it, but what value has it to you, because you are killing?

I am not advocating vegetarianism. Some author wrote some time ago, a cutting was sent to me, he wrote saying: "vegetarianism is spreading like some foul disease in this country". Even if you kill a cabbage. So where do you draw the line? Do you make a problem of it? Do you understand my question? If you are against war, as certain human beings are, including myself, against war, killing other human beings for whatever reason, then you cannot post a letter. Right? The stamp you buy, the food you get, all that, part of it goes to defence, armament. If you buy petrol - gas in this country, part of that goes, your taxi, part of it goes, and so on and so on. So what will you do? If you don't pay taxes you are fined or sent to goal. If you don't buy stamps you can't write letters, you can't travel. Right? Are you following all this? It amuses you? So you drive yourself into a corner. And living in a corner seems rather futile. So what will you do? If you say, I won't travel, I won't write a letter, all this helps to maintain the army, and navy, and armaments - you follow the whole racket of it. Or would you approach it differently? Why do we kill? Religions, especially Christianity, have killed probably more people on earth, they have tortured people, called them heretics, burnt them. You know all the history of it. The Muslims have done it, the Islamic world has done it, probably the Hindus and the Buddhists are the only people - their religions forbid.

How can one live on this earth without killing another and causing suffering for another? To go into this question very deeply, really, it is a very, very serious question, is there that quality of love that answered this question? If you love another, if you love another human being, are you willing to kill that human being?

Would you then kill anything, except you need certain food, vegetables, nuts and so on, but apart from that would you kill anything? Go into all these questions, sir, and live it, for god's sake, don't talk about it.

What is dividing the world is ideals, the ideology of one group against another group. This eternal division, apparently an everlasting division, between man, woman, and so on. They have tried to bridge this through logic, through reason, through various institutions and foundations and organizations, and they have not succeeded in any way. This is a fact. Knowledge has not solved this problem either - knowledge in the sense, accumulated experience and so on. And thought has certainly not solved this problem.

So there is only one issue out of it: to discover or find out what is love. Love is not desire, love is not possession, love is not selfish, egocentric activity, me first and you second. And apparently that love has no meaning to most people. They may write books about it, but it has no meaning, so invent that quality, that perfume, that fire, that compassion, and compassion has its intelligence, that is supreme intelligence. When there is that intelligence which is born of compassion, love, then all these problems will be solved simply, quietly. But we never pursue the question to the very end. We may pursue it intellectually, verbally, but to do it with your heart, with your mind, with your passion, behind it, then the earth will remain beautiful. And then there is a great sense of beauty in oneself.

OJAI 3RD PUBLIC TALK 26TH MAY 1984

What a lot of people, aren't there! I suppose we are really concerned with what we are talking about and that's why you are here. This is not, as we have often repeated, an entertainment, either intellectual, verbal twistings and innuendos, nor romantic theories and speculations and sentimental nonsense. We are dealing with facts. As we said, facts are those which have happened, and that which is happening now - those are facts. And what is happening tomorrow is not a fact, or a thousand tomorrows. We are only dealing with facts. And if we can understand those facts profoundly, not from any particular point of view, or a particular bias or direction, then perhaps we can examine the facts closely, carefully, and not only superficially but also profoundly, deeply.

As we have been saying during these talks we are taking a journey together, you and the speaker, a very long, wide journey, not into the future, but into the present. The present, as we pointed out, contains all time. The present is not only the past, all the memories, all the incidents, stored in the brain, recorded, but that past is now also. It is fairly obvious. And the future is what is now. The future will be exactly, perhaps slightly modified, as in the present, in the now. So what one is now one will be tomorrow, a thousand tomorrows. And if there is no fundamental radical psychological revolution - not evolution - a revolution, a mutation, deep fundamental change, tomorrow will be exactly what we are now. So all time, the past, the present and the future is contained in the now. This is not a theory, not a speculative philosophical concept, but an actuality. If one looks at oneself very carefully what is happening, what is happening now is what we have carried through thousands and thousands of years, psychologically, and both biologically also. And that burden of the past with all its memories, experiences, knowledge is now, is what we are now. And we will be tomorrow what we are now. So please the now contains all time.

And in relation to that, what is action? And it is a fact that all time is in the now, in the present, what then is action? You understand? Can we go along with this for a while? Please, we are investigating together, the speaker is not instructing or informing. We are together, you and the speaker are investigating, exploring, examining, not analysing. There is a difference between analysis and perception. Analysis implies an analyser, the analyser is the past, and he is examining the present, what is happening now. What is happening now, or what is psychologically taking place, is what the observer has been, or is. Are we together in this? The observer, the analyser, is the result of a great many accumulations of information, knowledge, incidents, experiences, so the analyser is examining that which is happening now, or examining that which has happened. Right? So the analyser is the analysed, which is the present. Am I talking to myself, or are we somewhat together in this matter?

I think this is rather an important question to understand because when we divide the analyser as something separate from the analysed, then in that process of division there is contradiction, there is conflict; either there is suppression, or examination as something outside. But the analyser is the analysed. When one is violent, when there is violence and you analyse violence, one can easily analyse violence, from the distant cousins, the apes until now, we have inherited all the violence of all the thousand years of continuity of violence. We can easily examine and analyse violence. Is violence different from the examiner, the analyser? Is not the analyser also part of that violence? Right? So the analyser is the analysed, it is not something separate from the analyser, therefore there is no division between the analysis and the analyser, they are one. And when we understand that, conflict exists only when there is division - division between your ambition and somebody else's ambition, division between you and your wife, your husband, your neighbour and so on, division brought about through nationalities, through religions and so on - not only psychologically but linguistically also, and so on.

So the analyser is the analysed, and so we said we are not analysing, we are perceiving directly. Is this somewhat clear for us, can we go on from there? I wish one could talk this over together quite simply, not you sitting there and the speaker sitting on a platform, but two friends looking at the whole problem of existence, amicably, in a sense of affection and care, looking at all this travail of man, the travail of each one, it would be very simple to do that, have a good dialogue. But when there are so many people here that is not possible, unfortunately. But you as a person and the speaker can think together, not along any particular line, or a particular point of view, or strengthen one's own opinion which becomes obstinacy, but rather as two friends who have known each other for some time, not only understand the verbal significance but go beyond the words. If we could do that together then perception becomes very easy, to perceive. Not I perceive and the speaker is persuading you to perceive in a particular way: to perceive. In that perception you and the speaker disappear because we are only perceiving, but when there is a motive for that perception, a direction, a sense of bigotry, obstinacy, and then perception is distorted, and therefore you perceive differently from another. I hope this is clear.

So we are asking, when all time is in the present, now, which is a fact, not an abstraction or an ideology, or some ideal, but it is a fact, and when there is that fact what then is action? You understand? This is an important question to understand. We are also going to talk over together not only that but also the whole problem of becoming, psychologically. And what is action in relation to that becoming? And also if we have time we are going to talk over together suffering and perhaps, which is part of life, of our daily life, death - death not as a morbid incident but an extraordinarily important problem in one's life.

So we are going to talk over together: action, daily action, and the question of becoming. And in that becoming we all want to be secure. Security is very essential to all of us. The brain cannot function fully with all its capacity, energy and drive if the brain is not completely secure. Right? No? If one is confused, uncertain, with a thousand problems, how can the brain be secure? If you have many, many illusions, as most people do, the brain becomes then rattled, uncertain, confused. So the brain to function efficiently, not only technologically but much more seriously which is psychologically, the brain needs extraordinary stability, the brain needs to be absolutely clear, firm, unshakable. And we are going to go into all that if you have the patience. But if you are not interested because you are interested in so many things - boating, driving, interested in reading a book, but giving attention which is totally different from interest.

Most of us, perhaps almost all of us, are attempting to become something psychologically. Outwardly, externally you can understand a student becoming an engineer. He becomes an engineer, earns a livelihood and keeps becoming more and more expert in engineering. And psychologically we have the same concept that I am this now, but I will become that. Don't agree with the speaker: question, doubt, don't follow anybody psychologically, of course you have to follow a doctor's instructions if you are ill. But psychologically, inwardly to obey any kind of authority, any kind of expert, professional, destroys the integrity of one's own perception. Psychologically we are all attempting to become something. Right? That is an obvious fact. One is greedy, or violent and one is trying not to be, that is to become. There are wars, and through United Nations and all those organizations, we are trying to unify the world, to become something in the future. I won't go into the contradictory nature of various nations becoming united, which is impossible, but that is the political activity of those who are concerned with their own ambitions, the perpetuation of particular systems. But one can see that there is always an attempt on the part of each one of us that we want to change from this to that. The 'that', the future, is in time, far away or very near but it is still a movement of becoming, gaining, losing, getting reward or punishment. This whole process of becoming, always with the intention, with the motive, the better, the more, the gain, the fear of loss. That's clear.

Now is it a fact that to become something involves time? Right? I am this now but give me a year or two days I will be different. Which is, time is involved, but that time is now. You understand? The future is now. Is this a puzzle?

Q: Yes.

K: Yes? I am glad! Then we can go more slowly into it. As we said, sir, we are the past. Right? All our memories which have been recorded in the brain, all that we have done, not only fifty years ago but yesterday, so the past is now. Right? And what is now, if there is not a radical change, will be tomorrow, which is time. The future is therefore in the now. Right? So where is becoming then? You are following? Please, this is really fascinating, very serious. We are accustomed to the idea of evolution. That is, man has reached the stage now after forty, fifty or a million years ago, our brain has evolved from the ape until we are now so-called civilized people, which I question, but that doesn't matter. And that has taken immense time. That time of forty thousand years is now, because what you are now. And the future is what you are now, perhaps slightly modified, but the future is also in the now. So unless there is a radical change now the future will be what you have been tomorrow. It is simple enough. Now don't let's beat the dead horse, it is clear. If it isn't clear think it out if you have the time and the inclination, you know all the rest of it, you can't drop it. Probably you will, which is most convenient and easy. But if you are interested, if you really want to discover for yourself a radical psychological, deep change, that change cannot have time. It must happen now. Clear?

If you have got toothache, pain, you don't say, "I'll wait until next week, it is part of evolution", and all the rest of it, there is instant action. So if we don't realize the danger of allowing time to interfere with action, then that action breeds all kinds of complications, obviously. So our question is this: the brain to function efficiently, clearly, without any kind of confusion, must understand what is security, what is stability, a sense of firmness so that it is not wishy-washy, wobbling all over the place as most brains are. Right? So we must examine if there is any security at all, psychologically. Of course we must have security physically, which is becoming more and more difficult for economic reasons; and those economic reasons are, each country thinks, my economy first, as each individual person thinks, me first. The economic situation of the world is very serious, they tell you everyday about it on the television, if you have observed, or in the newspapers, and they are trying to solve these problems, and they have not succeeded so far, and they never will because each group, each community, each nation, thinks they are something separate from the rest of the world. And therefore the economic situation becomes very limited, small, ineffectual. It is the concern of the rest of humanity, because everybody throughout the world desires to be secure physically, economically, and that is not possible when there are wars, and the threat of war, when there is division as religious divisions, national divisions, ideological differences, dialectical dissection of history, coming to a conclusion as Marx, Engles, Lenin and Stalin on one side, and on the other side Democratic, and so on. I know you will get bored with this but unless we radically change this narrow pattern we are going to have more and more wars, economic problems, it is becoming more and more dangerous. It's up to you. And all this can end only when you drop your own particular conditioning as an American, Russian, Indian, French and British and so on, so that we are one humanity, as our consciousness is the rest of humanity. I have gone into that, I won't go into it now.

So the brain can only be stable, have complete security when we understand the whole process of becoming. Becoming implies duality, and where there is duality there must be conflict - the Arab and the Jew, the Muslim and the Hindu, the Catholic and the Protestant - you follow - the perpetual state of conflict human beings live in. So where there is becoming there is duality and therefore conflict. And the brain cannot perpetually live in conflict, it then becomes neurotic, psychotic and pursues every kind of illusion; and therefore the multiplication of psychologists, therapists and psychiatrists, you know they are multiplying all over the world. I am sorry there are psychologists here!

So to see that fact, not the idea of the fact, you understand the difference. One sees the fact and one then makes an abstraction of it which is called the idea of it, and we pursue the idea and not the fact. Right? Are we together in this? So we must be very clear in this matter, we are dealing with fact, not with idea, the symbol of the fact, or the word of the fact. When you see the fact that time is not the solution, or brings about a radical change, then you are stuck with the fact. Right? You are with the fact. And the fact is not different from you, you are the fact. You are the fact that you are violent, brutish, thoughtless, anxious, and all the rest of it, the whole content of one's consciousness which is in a turmoil, constantly in conflict - like the consciousness of every human being in the world. So we are essentially all humanity, each one of us is all humanity. And if you change, not tomorrow, there is no time, time is the enemy of change - I wish you could realize this. Do consider it seriously please, if you are at all serious - then what is action? If there is only all time contained now, then what is action in the now? You understand my question? Are you puzzled a little bit?

Q: Yes.

K: Good! So we can explore more. What is action - every day action, going to the office, going to the factory, talking to your wife or husband, rowing, walking, jumping, chasing ideas, or chasing gurus, which is the same thing? You are acting. Life is action, as relationship is action. So what is action? Our action is based on reward and punishment, to put it very, very simply. I like life if I can get something out of it. And I will be punished if I don't act rightly, therefore I attempt to act rightly. So our action is based on reward and punishment, our action is based on some futuristic concept, on an ideal, and action according to that ideal, conforming, adjusting to that ideal therefore conflict. All our action has a motive, a direction, selfish generally, self-interest, self-concern, which is reward and punishment - a reward in the future - if I do this I will get that. Right? If I don't it I might lose, therefore the fear of losing. So our action is always in this area of gain and reward, punishment and fear. Right? Reward is always in the future. Punishment is also that it might happen in the future. So there is never action per se. You understand? Action for itself. Like a good carpenter who will make you a marvellous cabinet, the love of it itself, not the reward, the punishment, the gain.

So action in relation to time breeds conflict. Right? Is this clear? And is there action which is for itself? Is love the action in itself? Not the love that has jealousy, hate, amusement, fun and excitement, sex, pleasure - love is not all that surely. You see when there is love there is action without conflict. And love is not a slave to time. So there it is. If you can understand that, explain and deeply grasp the truth of it, then the brain becomes extraordinarily vital, strong, not confused in any way because then you are living now completely, fear of the future and the past disappear.

We ought also to talk over together the question of suffering, which is part of our life. There isn't a single human being in the world, not a single human being, whether he is in a monastery, or a monk in the Himalayas, a man in the street, and you and every human being on earth suffers. And we make others suffer. That's our cycle. And there is the suffering brought about by war; wars have existed for six, seven or ten thousand years. And during that long duration of time, killing each other in the name of god, in the name of peace, in the name of gain and profit and so on, man has brought upon himself and others great sorrow, tears. There isn't one human being who has not cried, shed tears and the pain of loss. Millions maimed because we are so conditioned to stick to our own particular point of view, to our own particular religion, to our own particular ideology - I believe and I hold to that. And you believe something contrary, therefore I am willing to kill you. This is going on. The Russian ideology, the democratic ideology, and they are willing to kill each other, blow each other to smithereens. And this has been going on for thousands upon thousands of years, protecting my country, my god, my - oh not here, there is no king here! This is very serious, sir, you may laugh it off, but if one's wife or husband, son is destroyed by war then you will know what it means. We all know what it means but yet we go on in the same old pattern.

And so there is the sorrow of mankind, the sorrow of humanity. And also what we think is our own particular sorrow - my son is dead, my wife has left me, there is the sorrow of seeing another suffer, the sorrow of those who can never read or write, those who are extraordinarily poor. All that is sorrow, not only the sorrow of mankind but also the sorrow of each one. Each one thinks, it is my sorrow, not yours. But sorrow is sorrow, not yours or mine, it is sorrow. To understand this requires freedom to observe, to perceive, but we have become so individualistic, so narrow, so small, we reduce everything to our own limited backyard. Sorrow is sorrow of all humanity, it is not yours or mine.

And one asks: can that sorrow ever end? Or it is the lot of human beings to kill nature, animals, to kill each other? Not only kill verbally, kill by gesture, kill millions with one bomb, destroy millions and millions. So all this is sorrow. And sorrow of disease, pain, sorrow of not gaining, losing - take all that in, it isn't just the sorrow of my son dying. Can this sorrow ever end? Sorrow is not sentimental, sorrow is not something romantic, it is a dreadful thing. It is something that is so directly concerned with every human being, the loneliness of sorrow, the pain of it, the anxiety and so on. Can all that end? Probably we have never asked that question, we have never faced it, we all want to escape from it, take a drug in order not to suffer, get drunk, escape because we never actually have faced the problem, the seriousness of it, that is, to give our complete attention to sorrow. Not veil it through words, through some kind of speculative hope and so on, but actually live with it without becoming morbid. That is to give one's whole complete attention to it.

Attention is like a fire, when that attention is there that thing which is sorrow, the loneliness, the pain, the anxiety, the tears, when there is that complete attention all that goes, disappears. Attention is a flame.

Sorrow, the root meaning of that word, is also passion. The ending of sorrow is passion, not lust. And we never have passion, we want pleasure. Passion is something extraordinarily different. Where there is the ending of sorrow there is passion - it is not your passion or my passion, it is passion. And that's part of love. Where there is love there is compassion. And where there is this extraordinary passion of compassion there is intelligence, and that intelligence acts - that intelligence is not yours, or mine, or X Y Z's.

And if we have time we ought to talk over together a very serious problem, which is death. On a lovely morning like this, to talk about death seems absurd. I wonder if we can talk first about beauty. What is beauty? My friend says, "I am not interested in that, beauty doesn't much matter." Where there is love there is beauty, freedom, goodness - which has been one of the problems of humanity, freedom, justice, goodness. Where there is love, do what you will, it will be right. So let's leave beauty until tomorrow, it is too complex.

We ought to talk over together this enormous problem of death.

One thing is absolutely certain, irrevocable, that we are all going to die one day, that is a fact. And we have never gone into the question, because most people are afraid of it, what is death, what is it to die? And why have we made death something far away from life, living? Do you understand my question? We are living now, and death may come to us when we are ninety, or a hundred, or later, much, much later - I hope for you. So there is a long wide gap between the now - you understand what I am saying? - between the now and the future. Knowing the now contains the future, therefore death is the now. I wonder if you understand all this.

Let's go into it slowly. I just saw something which I have never seen before. What is it, and why is it that we are frightened of death? We are frightened of living obviously. What we call living is a fearful turmoil, conflict, struggle, pain, anxiety, economic stringency, perpetual disagreement with each other, one opinion opposed to another opinion, the everlasting, constant waking up in the morning and getting ready and rushing off to the office, or to the laboratory, or to a factory. I wonder if you realize how we spend our days and our years. One may call it a jolly life; if you are very successful, have plenty of money, and a great deal of amusement, you say, "I have had a jolly good life" - most people do when they have money, power, position, all the things they want. But those are very, very few in the world, fortunately. But the vast majority, all of us, rush off on Sundays to church, just to show up that we are there for god to look at us. And go to the office from the age of twenty until you die, work, work, work - the responsibilities, the duties, the pain, the fear, the anxiety, the loneliness. I wonder if one is aware of all this. You may be a successful actor, a lot of money, but there is always at the end of it too, death.

So what we call living is a very painful, confused, anxious life. Right? This is what we call living, and we cling to that because that is all we know. And we want to escape from that, so we have a tremendous industry of entertainment, sports, entertainment, football, you know the entertainment industry. And also the religious entertainment. Don't say, one is not an entertainment and the other is more holy, it is still entertainment. It is a sensation. Please don't think one is blasphemous, we are just facing facts.

So from the moment you are born until you die, problem after problem, and the solution of the problem, and in the solution of the problem you have ten different other problems. When a brain has been trained from childhood to resolve problems, mathematical problems, geographic problems, technological problems, engineering problems - you follow - so our brains are conditioned from childhood to resolve problems, not to understand problems, see what problems are, what is a problem, but to the resolution of them. And in the resolution of the problem it is organized in a different way. Right? One organization after another. This is our life - political, economic, social, and we are never for a moment free. And specially in this country you are talking about freedom all the time, freedom to choose, freedom to go from this little place to another place, change jobs, change wives. So choice we think is freedom. But it isn't, is it. Choice exists only when the brain is uncertain. When it is clear there is no choice at all. And so this very deep confusion, uncertainty, loneliness, despair, depression, you know the whole cycle of our living.

And when death comes we are blown off, there is nothing else. And so we invent reincarnation. Do you believe in reincarnation? If you do, then live rightly. Live now rightly, because if you don't live now rightly the next life will be exactly the same thing as you are now. Naturally, because time, whether it is a thousand years or now, there is no right action, which can only take place where there is this quality, this perfume, this extraordinary thing called love. If that is not there the next life will be exactly the same thing as you are now, only slightly modified, perhaps a bigger house - that is all what you want, bigger car, more pleasure, but it is the same thing continued.

So what is death? We have understood what life is, at least what we consider life is, a tremendous bondage to time. And what is death? There is death to the organism, we are all getting older every day, from the moment we are born we are getting older and older and then die. And we have never asked what is death, what does it mean, while living - not when we come to the end of it? While living we have never asked what is the meaning, the significance, the depth of death. We have never asked what is the depth of life, living. It must have something enormously significant living, but we have reduced it to such a potty little affair. So we have never asked there, and we never ask secondly what death is. And as two friends let's look at it, not frightened, because then you will never understand it.

So as we went into the question of fear last week, and the ending of fear, there must be the end of fear to understand the nature and the quality and the depth of death. As we said, biologically, organically, we are wasting, day after day, the organism. If we are living wrongly, all this travail, the misery, the confusion, the pleasures, the pain, tremendous wastage of energy, and that is coming to an end, that is part of death. And also what is it that is dying apart from the physical, biological existence, what is it that is dying? What is the 'me', that is the 'I', the ego, the person, the persona, the self - let's stick to that one word - what is that self, the 'me' that is going to die. Right? And that is what we are frightened of, not of death. The 'me' which has been accumulated in this life as memory, knowledge, experience, the 'me', my selfishness, my greed, my ambition, all the recording records, which is stored in the brain, the 'me', and we are frightened that me is going to come to an end. So we have to examine closely what is the 'me'. Who are you, apart from your name and your bank account, where you live and all that kind of stuff, apart from the physical me, the physical body, tall, short, apart from all that, what are you? Have you ever faced it? Let's face it now, don't be frightened.

What are you? Are you not all the accumulated memories - memories, pleasurable, pain, the fifty years, or thirty years, or ten days of memory, aren't you all that? Memories of your pleasure, the pain and anxiety of your desire, the loneliness, the depression, the struggle, aren't you all that? That is all memory. Right? Look at it as it is now, don't say, "Isn't there something superior beyond memory?" I know that game! You can invent something superior, that there is a soul, and the Hindus call it the atman, and so on, superior consciousness, something divine, something very, very clear. Those are all theories, absurdities; the actuality is what you are, that vast collection of humanity, of memories of human beings. If you are a great technician, putting the atom bomb together, the neutron bomb, you have to accumulate a great deal of knowledge and death comes along and you say, "Wait a minute, let me finish it." But it is all the process of gathering, dispensing, gathering. You are that. That's a fact. But we don't like to look at the fact. We say, "No, I am something more." This 'something more' is the desire, is thought saying, "That is too small, surely I am something much more important than that". So that too is the invention of thought. So you are the bundle of memories put together by thought. Face it! And death comes along and says, "My friend, that's the end." And you say, "Please, let me live a little longer."

So please follow this closely and you will see it for yourself. Time is now. Time is contained, the past, the future is now. So death is now. That means if I am attached to my wife, to my something or other, to my furniture - aren't you attached to something? - and death comes and says, "That is the end of it." Cuts it. So can you be free of the attachment? Therefore you are living then, living and dying at the same time. You understand this? Oh, no. Do it, sir, and you will see what an extraordinary thing it is then. If you are attached to your memories, to your experience, to your failure, to your ambition, all that is going to come to an end. So can you live with death, which is to end your ambitions now? And to live without ambition means tremendous energy - not to do more mischief.

So death and life are always together. And when this happens, actually, not theoretically, not imaginatively, not wishing for it but actually doing it, to whatever you are attached. I know it is difficult if the husband says to his wife, "Darling, I am not attached to you any more." - he will have a lot of trouble. And that is another problem, a tremendous problem. You may be free from attachment and she is not; or she is and you are not. Then what is relationship? Is relationship merely the accumulation of memory as pleasure, pain? Is relationship then merely a sensation? The image of each other, is that relationship? And so when there are these separate images there is conflict, pain, anxiety. So where there is pain, anxiety, fear, love is not.

So death and life always march together. Then there is that sense of absolute freedom from the little travail of myself. And that is necessary to understand that which is timeless, if there is such a thing as eternity. We will talk about it another time, but see all this as a movement of life, dying and living. Therefore in that sense you will never kill another, never deliberately hurt another. Right, sirs, finished.

OJAI 4TH PUBLIC TALK 27TH MAY 1984

This is the last talk, or conversation between two friends. We have been talking during the last three talks about various aspects of life. We said how important it is to have the capacity to doubt, to question everything that is taking place in the world, not only externally but also inwardly - all our thoughts, our feelings, if one aware of one's own illusions, to question all those. Because scepticism without cynicism has a great beneficial effect. Our brains have been programmed for two thousand years according to the Christian world, and the Hindus, and the Buddhists, three to five thousands years. They have been programmed like a computer - Catholics, Americans, Russians, believers, non-believers, specialists, psychoanalysts, psychiatrists and so on, scientists, doctors. We have been programmed, and of that there is no doubt, because this programming has resulted in our being conditioned. And unless we question, doubt, have a great deal of sane scepticism, the brain can never be free. And freedom, and to be free are two different things. If we may go into all that.

We are going to talk about various things this morning - freedom, desire, and the importance of thought, and what is religion upon which most civilizations are based, most cultures are born out of this religious aspect of life. And also we are going to talk over together the very complex problem of what is meditation. All this we are going to talk over together this morning. And also, if one may remind you again, if it is not too repetitive, that this is not in any way entertainment, not something you attend for a weekend and forget all about it afterwards. But rather it is concerned with our daily life which has become so disturbed, chaotic, uncertain, confused.

And this conditioning, this being programmed - one must understand the nature of it and see whether it is possible at all to be free of it, otherwise there can be no creation, it will all be invention. Invention is totally different from creation. A technical invention is the product of thought. Invention along any lines, poetic, religious, technological and so on, that's fairly comparatively easy; but to find out, as most religions have tried to find out, what is creation, and to understand the nature of it, and the depth of it, and the beauty of it, one must understand and be free from being programmed.

So what is it to be free? Freedom is from something - freedom from our own misery, from our own troubles and problems, free to have an economic society that is providing for all human beings, a society that is not too corrupt and so on. Freedom from our own bondage, from our own peculiar tendencies, opinions and judgements in which most of us are entangled. Opinion, judgement, conclusion, is so strong with each one of us, and that prevents perception, seeing clearing what is going on in the world both externally, outwardly, and much more so inwardly, the whole psychological complexity of one's own life.

So what is it to be free - not freedom from something which then becomes a reaction? Freedom from capitalism has led to totalitarianism, with all its misery and brutality. And freedom from our own particular fears is still in the area of a reaction - 'Oh if one had freedom from some peculiar urge' - or tendency - 'one could be so great' and so on. Whereas to be free is something entirely different. The word 'free' comes from - though etymologically it is not very clearly established - free, to be free, implies in that word love, amongst other meanings. Because we do not really comprehend in our own life what it is to love. And if love is the opposite of hate, if love is the opposite of jealousy, or if love is the opposite of attachment, every opposite has its roots in its own opposite. Are we understanding this? If one is greedy, as most of us are, and the urge not to be greedy, that contradiction is born out of one's own greed. You understand? Is this somewhat clear?

Look, we are having a conversation together. The speaker is not important. The speaker really means it, there is no personal worship in all this nonsense, all that kind of stuff is stupid. But what he said is very, very important, to be evaluated with scepticism, not accepting a thing that he says. He is not a professional expert, but together, as two friends, examining our whole life, one's own life, which is very complex, which demands attention, care, perception, observation, and as two friends talking over their life, so this is not a lecture, or a sermon. A lecture, the meaning of that word is to inform, to instruct; we are not instructing or informing, as though one knows all about life and the other fellow doesn't know about it. But rather together, and it is important to understand what it means to work, to think, together. Because very few of us think together about anything. You have got so many opinions, so many judgements, and so on, we never think together. We have opinions about thought, agreement, or disagreement, you are not right, I am right, and so on, but the capacity, the demand that thinking together about everything requires a freedom, a sense of affection, care, attention. Otherwise we cannot possibly think together. Then you become a follower, a listener to be informed, to be instructed, to obey. We are back again in the old pattern. Whereas if we could think together, what it is to be free, not what you think is to be free, or the speaker, but together find out. In that togetherness, if I may use that word, there is no you and the speaker. There is only the feeling that we are together examining, looking, sceptically, sanely into the whole question of one's own and the existence of everything around us.

The word free, to be free, has many meanings, but mostly free means to be a friend, to love. And love is not something that thought can evolve, put together, or can be cultivated. You can cultivate a garden, you can cultivate anything, to plough, to cultivate, to grow. But love is not something that thought can cultivate. So it is very, very important to understand altogether very deeply the nature of thought, thinking. If we really could understand that fundamentally then we shall be able to resolve most of our problems. Because we have dozens of problems - of relationship, economic problems, social problems, problems of every kind, human beings are burdened with them.

So not only to understand the nature of freedom from something, and to be free, completely free, not from something. And is that possible at all when thought is operating all the time? You understand my question? So it is important, isn't it, to understand not only verbally, or through explanations the whole movement of thought, because we live by thought, every action is based on thought, in every area, in every sector, in every field of our life both outwardly and inwardly thought is operating. We have given thought tremendous importance. And until we unravel the whole structure and nature, the movement of thought, merely trying to be free, which is to cultivate freedom, becomes impossible.

So we are concerned together, as two friends, what is freedom, and what is it to be totally free? And can there be this sense of wholeness in which there is freedom, free? So we are going to go into it.

As long as we are programmed - Catholic, Protestant, and the many thousand divisions of Protestantism, or Hinduism and the Islamic world, and the Buddhist world, we have been programmed - and as long as we are being programmed, our whole brain has been programmed for thousands of years, there can be no sense of total freedom. Is this clear? Are we together in this? So is it possible to be free? Or must we everlastingly be condemned to be programmed like a computer? Our brain functions, not that the speaker is a professional brain specialist, but he has observed many, many, in the course of sixty, seventy years, how people's brains work, observing them. And also observing one's own brain in operation. It has become so mechanical, repetitive, its very accumulation of knowledge is limiting it. I wonder if you understand this? When one has a great deal of knowledge about various disciplines like science, being an expert in surgery, medicine, telecommunication and so on, our brain actually becomes very small, it can expand along a particular line, but that expansion still is limited. I hope you are getting all this. Now is it possible to be totally free from all this? Otherwise we will never know what it is to be creative, something totally unthought of, totally new. "There is nothing new on the earth", but if we accept that slogan, then we will never find out what it is to be creative.

So to understand this programming, and why we accept it, one must go, not only as we went yesterday morning, into the whole desire to be secure. We went into that very carefully yesterday morning, we won't go in it again. But also we went into the nature of thought many, many times but most of us really haven't seen the depth of it, the quality of thought, how limited thought is, though it has done the most extraordinary things, in the technological world, and also in the psychological world. But whatever it has done it is still very limited because, as we pointed out yesterday, there is always the 'more', not only in the technological world but also inwardly, the 'more', the 'better'. The 'more', the 'better' is measurement, and where there is measurement there is limitation. This has been one of the problems of religious people. We have gone into this, that is, the Greeks, the ancient Greeks, were concerned with measurement, otherwise we wouldn't have this extraordinary technology in the western world, because the western world has its roots in the ancient Greeks. And in India, the ancient people said, measurement in any form is illusion. You cannot possibly measure the immeasurable. So there are two contradictory statements: technologically you must have measurement, and psychologically also we have accepted there is measurement as the 'more', the 'better', the 'becoming'. Whereas the ancient Hindus said, every form of measurement is limitation. And they said that and forgot all about it. But probably they never - the speaker does not know the full extent of their saying because he doesn't read books - measurement implies thought. Thought is based on knowledge, experience and memory, and knowledge is always limited now and in the future. So thought is always limited. It can imagine the immeasurable, it can invent all the gods on the earth, all the rituals, all that business, which is extraordinarily unreal.

So thought can never be free, or thought can never bring about a sense of being totally free. Right? I wonder if you understand this. Because thought itself is limited, and therefore whatever it does will still be limited. And thought is driven by desire - isn't it? Right? So we have to enquire into the nature and the structure of desire. The word 'desire' means longing for, in expression, which is wanting something more. The meaning of that word is that, longing for, not having, wanting. Right? So we are going together to understand what is desire.

I do not know if you have observed, not only yourself but all the people around you, the priests, the hierarchy of priests, the popes through history, and all the monks of the world, and all the human beings in the world, being dissatisfied with what they are they want something more, longing for something more. Aren't you all longing for something more? Aren't we all driven by desire - to be successful, to have money, to have position, famous, you know all that business. We are full of desires. And what is the relationship between desire and thought? Right? Please ask this question, as two friends talking together, the speaker is saying to the friend, look at it, he is asking, what is the relationship between the two, desire and thought. Why thought in the religious areas has insisted on suppression of desire. You understand? The monks throughout the world have said, you must have no desire, suppress it. Or identify that desire with something you call god, your saviour, you know, symbols. Right? So desire has an extraordinary importance in our life. And we are not trying to suppress it, or transcend it, or identify that desire with something nobler, symbolic, significant, all that stuff, we can wipe out all that.

So we are now trying to understand the nature of desire. You might have heard the speaker explain it before, but forget what he has said before. We are now afresh, anew, examining this thing. And to examine one must be not only free from personal worship, but also there must be freedom from the fear of not being without desire. You understand? There must be a sense of perception in which there is no distortion, no motive, but to observe very closely the whole movement of desire. Can we go on with that?

We are sitting under a tree, under several trees, and there is the blue sky through the leaves and the distant mountains, hills, the dappled light on all of us, and to see all this clearly and to see the beauty of all that, and what is the relationship of beauty to desire? You understand my question? So we must also enquire what is beauty? All right?

What is beauty? We are asking, what is beauty? A beautiful poem, a beautiful picture, a beautiful tree in a solitary field, the beauty of a wave, the quiet beauty of a blue sea, and the beauty of great mountains, the immensity, their dignity, their immovability, and the line against the blue sky, snow packed. And all the museums in the world with their ancient sculptures, modern paintings, and the classic statuary, most of have seen all these, and we say when we look at them, how extraordinarily beautiful they are. If you have seen the Parthenon in Greece for the first time you almost go on your knees to the beauty of the structure. And when you see a beautiful man, or a woman, or a child specially, and you are breathless for a moment with all the beauty of this world. And does beauty lie in the perceiver? You understand my question? Is beauty a matter of instruction, being well informed about all the paintings in the world, who painted it, from modern Picasso to the ancient (?) and so on, to be well informed, to talk about it, you know, play with it, is all that beauty?

So what is beauty? When do you perceive beauty? In the face, in the mountain, in a tree, or the slip of a moon when the first moon appears, just a sliver, and the quietness of a still evening, when do you perceive all this? And the word beauty seems to suffice for most of us, just to say, "How beautiful it is", and go on to the next thing. You see marvellous paintings of Leonardo da Vinci, or Michelangelo and so on, and then go off and have tea. Right? This is what we generally do. We never really go into the question of what is beauty. And when do you perceive this sense of immensity and the truth of beauty? When you see a great mountain, with the deep valleys and the snow against the blue sky, aren't you for a second, by the dignity and the majesty of the mountain, for a second you have forgotten all your problems, you have forgotten all your misery, confusion, sorrows, and all the rest of it, and that great immensity of a snowcapped peak drives you away, drives your self away. Right? Haven't you noticed all this?

So beauty can only exist when the self is not. You understand? When the mind, when the brain is not chattering, caught in a net of words, when it is really utterly quiet, when there is total absence of the 'me', the self, the ego, the persona, then you really see the extraordinary sense of beauty of the world, of the tree and the sky. And what is the relationship of that sense of extraordinary beauty to desire? We want to capture that beauty, we want to hold it, to live with it, to have this sense of utter... to be totally free of all the turmoil, the noise and the vulgarity of the world.

So we must enquire rationally, clearly and sanely, what is desire? Desire has built a great many things in life - great architecture, and also created wars and destruction and so on. So we must really understand this tremendous urge that human beings have, of which we are slaves. When you sit under these trees and look at the beauty of the light, although it is somewhat hot unfortunately, you have a great sense of sensation, don't you - your senses are awake if you are alert, your senses respond to all this. So the sensation of these trees, the light, the hills, the quietness, awakens sensation. When you see the Pacific as you go along the highway, can you look at all that water with all your senses? Have you ever done it, with all your senses fully alive, alert? Then in that total sensation with all your senses, not partially, one operating more than the other, but the whole organism, the nerves, the whole entity of a human, when you give such tremendous attention with your sensation, have you noticed there is no self at all, there is no me at all? We will come to that presently.

So we live with sensations. It is fairly obvious. These sensations are taken over by thought and given a shape, or an image. Right? To make it very simple: you see something beautiful in a shop, you go inside, touch it, contact with it, feel the quality of the silk, or the material, there is sensation. Right? Then thought comes along and says, "How marvellous if I had it, how nice it would look on me". Right? When thought creates the image out of the sensation desire is born. Right, have you got it? When thought builds, or makes out of that sensation an image which is having that beautiful shirt, or that robe, or that car, or that house, or the refrigerator, whatever you want, then at that moment desire is born. This is so clear and obvious if one perceives every second the whole movement of it, which requires great attention, not to miss a thing.

So the question is: giving shape to that sensation by thought, as an image, as a picture, a pleasure, at that second desire is born. Now the question is: can there be a wide interval between sensation and thought creating an image of that sensation? You understand? An interval? That requires tremendous attention, and where there is attention there is discipline. You understand? Oh come on, sirs, somebody. Are you all asleep, or what? This is important because as we live in conflict perpetually, to understand conflict is to see the fact and the conclusion of the fact. You understand? The fact, and what we make of that fact. What we make of that fact is an abstraction called idea, or ideal, and between the fact and the ideal there is always conflict. Right? Move sir. And if we see where there is sensation, which is natural, which is healthy, clear, unless one is totally paralysed, and thought giving shape to that sensation, the image it represents, if these two can be kept apart for a while, to keep them apart requires great attention. Right? And so there is never a suppression of desire but watchfulness of desire. I wonder if you understand this. Because if you suppress it, it then becomes a conflict. If you say, "I will transcend desire", that becomes also a means of conflict. Whereas if there is great attention and watchfulness, how thought shapes sensation, then that attention, that watchfulness has its own intelligence, and when it is necessary you go into the shop and buy it, and get on with it, but not make conflict about it. You understand? If you understand some of it at least, because this is really important to understand all this, whether man can live without conflict on this beautiful earth. We live with conflict all the days of our life, from the most ancient of times until now, it is our heritage, to live with conflict, not only externally as war and so on, but also much more inwardly, conflict with each other, conflict in our relationship with each other, intimate and so on, whether this conflict can ever end so that the brain is totally free. And that is why it is important to understand the nature of desire; and the nature of this sense of immense beauty of life, of this earth.

Then we should also go into the question of what is love. Don't let's become sentimental about it, or romantic, but when we say, "I love you", what do we mean by that? When a man, or a woman says to the man, or the man says to the woman, or friends say to each other, 'I love you', what does that mean? There is the love of a book, love of a poem, love of sports, love of sex, I love to be famous. We use this word so easily. But we have never apparently gone into the full meaning of it, what is it to love? Love apparently has become another means of conflict, one loves one's wife and there is conflict, quarrels, jealousy, antagonism, divorce, and all the pain of that relationship, and the pleasure of it too. So we should go into this question very carefully because that may be the solution of all our problems, it may be the one thing when we understand, whether it is in the brain, or outside the brain, whether love is contained in the brain as thought, anxiety, pain, depression, fear, loneliness, the whole content of our consciousness. Is love part of that consciousness? You understand? Oh come on sirs.

Q: Yes.

K: Or it is outside, totally outside consciousness, outside the brain. Probably we have never asked these questions even. One hopes you will not mind asking these questions.

So what is love as we know it? Love brings a great deal of conflict in our life, a great deal of pleasure, a great deal of anxiety, fear, jealousy, envy. Don't you know all this? So is desire love? Is pleasure love? Is love in the realm, or in the field of thought? And apparently for most of us it is in that field - conflict, pain, anxiety, and thought. And to understand what love is - not understand, you know, have the depth of it, the greatness of it, the flame of it, the beauty of it - how can there be jealousy, how can there be ambition, aggression, violence? And can one be free completely of all these things? Please do ask this question. Where there is love, then do what you will, it will be right action, but never bring conflict in one's life.

So it is important to see that jealousy, antagonism, conflict, and all the pain of relationship has no place in love, where there is love. And can one be free of all that, not tomorrow, now? You understand my question? Because as we pointed out yesterday, time which is the past, the present and the future, all time is contained in the now. We went into it carefully yesterday. And if we say, "I will cultivate love", or "I will try and get rid of my jealousy" and so on, then when you are trying to be free, trying, then you will never be free. Right? I wonder if you understand this? When you say, "I will do my best", which is so silly. Which means that one has really not fully perceived the truth that all time, the past, the present and the future are in the now, now, in the present actually. Because if you don't do something now it will be continued tomorrow, the future is in the now. You understand this? Oh come on!

So can one put aside completely all the causes of conflict, which is the self, the 'me', so that there is this sense of flame, the greatness of beauty, of love?

And also we should discuss, if time allows, we should talk over together, what is religion? All the organized religions of the world with their rituals and their fancy dresses and so on, with their symbols, with their myths and crosses over everything, is all that religion? The root meaning of that word etymologically is not clear, it has been said, religion is a binding, a bondage between man and god and so on. So when you examine, and to examine there must be scepticism, the questioning of one's faith, one's belief, otherwise you can't possibly examine, find out the truth about religion. Most of us live in illusions about religions. We never see that thought has been responsible for all the rituals, their dresses and their gods, and their ceremonies, their incense, the whole works are put together by thought.

So what is religion? And the thing is important to find out because man has always from the beginning of time, has always enquired into this: is there something more than the mere physical world with all its turmoil, with all its complexities, struggle, pain and so on, is there something far beyond all this? You are asking that question. And somebody comes along and says, "I know about it, I will tell you all about it" - that's how it began from the ancient Sumerians, from the ancient Egyptians, and the ancient Hindus, they said, we will tell you. They became the priests, the original people who wrote, read and so on. They became the interpreters of that to man, and it became a good profession, like any other profession. And that has continued from time immemorial.

Now to find out what is the religious mind, what is the truth of religion, one must be free from all authority, of all belief, faith, not belong to a thing. Right? There must be a sense of total being free.

Then one can enquire, or observe, or perceive what is truth - not the truth or the reality. Let's differentiate the two - gosh, a lot of things to explain, aren't there? I don't know why one has to explain all this. I am afraid you are all too learned, you have too much knowledge, have read too many books, listened to professors and all the rest of it. What is reality? Reality is that you are sitting there, and the speaker is up here. The reality is the trees, the reality is the nature, the birds, the ocean, the whales, the beauty of those enormous creatures in the deep depth of the sea. Reality is what is both externally and inwardly. Nature is a reality, and also reality is inwardly the illusion that you have created and hold on to that, the symbol, the picture, the idealized picture, however illusory you hold on to that, that is a reality. Right? So reality and truth are two different things. Truth is not a matter of conjecture, of speculation, of idealization. It is not the invention of thought. And to find that truth - not to find - for that truth to exist it has been said you must meditate to find that eternal thing which is beyond all measure and beyond all thought, beyond all words, you must meditate. And they said too, in order to meditate you must follow a system, a method, and we will tell you what the method and the system is. Right? The gurus have played upon this theme endlessly, coining money. Right?

So we are going to enquire not how to meditate, which seems to silly to ask, but what is meditation. Why is it necessary to meditate at all? Meditation, the meaning of that word, is to ponder over, think over. But also it has a deeper meaning, measure, to meditate also means to measure. Now meditation is being free completely from measurement - measurement being comparison: I am this, I will be that - to compare. To live a daily life without a shadow of comparison. Have you ever done it? To live like that, never having an example, never a goal, never an end, never having the future, which is comparison - I am this, I will be that - to live without becoming, which is comparison. When you go to a museum you compare, you compare between two materials, one cloth is better than the other cloth, you compare one car with another car. That's natural, that's necessary. But to have this sense of inward comparison all the time, to be completely free of that. That is part of meditation. So the brain then is free from all sense of comparison, except where it is necessary, physically, art, shirt, clothes and so on. Is this possible? Can one live that way, never comparing? See what happens if you don't compare. There is the end of conflict also. Right?

So meditation is not a practice, not a system, not repeating a mantra - you know that word? You know the meaning of that word? No. But you repeat it. This is a most marvellous country! The meaning of that word, mantra, means ponder over not becoming. And also it means end all self-centred activity. The root meaning of that word in Sanskrit - ponder, consider not becoming, the whole question of becoming. And also it means put away altogether all self-centred activity. And if you are given some words, and you repeat it, you are playing just a game. It is not worth it. And the speaker is not telling you not to do it. If you want to do it you will do it, if it pleases you, but it has no meaning, your repetition, Ave Maria by the dozen, or your particular mantra.

So meditation means to be free from fear, from all sense of conflict which we have been talking about, and also much more seriously the ending of thought. Whether thought, which is time, has a stop. You understand? And so because if there isn't a sense of being totally free the brain then becomes limited, and all its activity will be limited, and the limitless, the timeless can never exist.

So we are asking: can thought, which is of time, which is time itself, can that stop? Probably you have never asked this question. Not you stop it by will - that's silly, you cannot stop by will thought. Will is the essence of desire, and desire we explained earlier. So is there thought coming of its own accord to an end? Thought must be used naturally when you drive a car, when you go from here to your house, when you cook, when you wash dishes, and so on, thought must be there. What is the necessity of thought in the psychological world at all? If thought is really understood, all its activities, its beginnings, its origin. Its origin is experience, knowledge, memory stored in the brain, and the reaction to that memory is thought. All this process is limited because knowledge in the future or now is limited. When you see, perceive actually the limitation of thought, not the imagination of it, not the idea of ending, but actually see for yourself that thought, whatever it does, both in the technological world and in the psychological world, will always be limited. When you see the absolute fact of that, and the necessity of thought in a certain area, when you give your total attention to that, then you will find out for yourself thought can end. If you say, "What then?", then you are lost. Then if you say, "What is there if thought ends, is there something more?" - you follow how our brain works. That is, I will see if thought can end if you give me something in return. Right? If thought can end you will find out, there will be something totally different. And this is meditation. Not control, not control thought, because the controller is part of thought. Right? So the controller is playing a game. So there is always the controller trying to control thought. But the controller who is also thought is the controlled. There is no division between the controller and the controlled right through life, if one can understand this profoundly you will eliminate altogether conflict. Therefore the brain, which has been conditioned, narrowed down, has lost its tremendous vitality, its great immense capacity. If one has acted that way, as you get older and older it becomes much more active, not that you get senile. Do you understand all this?

So meditation is to be totally free from all bondage, from all measurement, from all conflict. So the brain becomes quiet, utterly still. And that silence, stillness, has its own beauty, its own truth, its absolute sense of immeasurable thing. So meditation is not a reward, it is not something that you get illumined by practising, which is all so childish. So truth is something which is not to be measured, and it has no path to it. And that is beauty, that's love.

RAJGHAT 1ST PUBLIC TALK 11TH NOVEMBER, 1984

It all looks so formidable, doesn't it? Just relax and let us talk about things. I think we should talk over together - I mean together - many things. Unfortunately we were not able to come earlier because of other events. And I am sorry to have kept you waiting here.

This is not a lecture. A lecture is meant to give information or direction on a particular subject. So, this is not a lecture, this is a conversation between you and the speaker. Both of us are going to explore together several problems that we have. The speaker may put it into words, but you have to also share, or investigate together, not only the meaning of the words, as we are speaking in English, but also the meaning of the word, the significance of the word, the content of the whole word so that there is a direct communication between us. I hope this is clear. This is not a lecture, or a sermon, or a guru talking to his silly disciples.

So, together we are going to first think together, see what we are examining together and go as far as possible into what we are investigating, so that we both of us understand the meaning and the significance in our daily life what we are investigating. I hope this is clear: that we are together investigating, having a conversation, a dialogue. Right?

First of all we should look together at why human beings who have lived on this earth for millions of years - and recently the scientists, biologists and the archeologists are saying we have lived on this earth as human beings for the last 50,000 years or more - why we have not been able to find, especially in this modern world, security, both psychological, inward security and outward security. That is one of the problems that not only this country but every country in the world is facing at the present time. Is that clear? Security: why socially, economically and physically we have not been able to find complete security for all human beings; not just for a few, not for the rich, not for those who live in a small commune or a committee. But ask ourselves why we have not found physical security. First, physical. There is murder going on of the most savage kind, terrorists, kidnapping, destroying and the ultimate violence is war. War is organized murder that is tolerated, considered highly respectable, blessed by religions, and so on. You know all this perhaps, some of you. So, we are asking why is it, however civilized we are, however cultured, we are still fighting, killing each other, why there is not security, and is it possible to not have to begin with psychological security, but inward security. Then, that inward security will express itself outwardly. That is, if we are not inwardly, psychologically, subjectively, completely secure, then whatever we do externally will also be insecure. I think this is clear.

So, we ought first to enquire, if we may, why inwardly, inside the skin, subjectively, psychologically, man has not found security at all. He has sought security in god, which is an idea invented by thought. Right? Am I shocking you - I hope I am! God is invented by thought, because we human beings are frightened, and so we want something on which we can rely, hold on to, look to somebody who will help us, and so we invent various illusions. I hope you are following all this. One invents various ways of seeking comfort, security. And all those ways, as one has observed, have utterly failed. You may have your guru in whom you have faith, and hope he will give you some kind of inward security - but even those gurus are failing. Right?

You are sure of all this? You are investigating. I am not - the speaker is not telling you what is right or what is wrong but together, we are going to find out what is true, what is right. So, can there be inward security first, and then that security will inevitably create a society that will be orderly, that will give security for all human beings, not only for the rich and well-to-do, but for the very, very poor. Right? Unless you are secure inwardly, outward expression of that insecurity is the present state of society. That is clear; this is all logical, reasonable, sane, not something fanciful. So, we must ask why haven't we inward security? What is it that is preventing us? Why? If the speaker asks you that question, why, what would be your answer? Why each one of us is not secure inwardly. Why are we so frightened? Why are we so subject to fanciful concepts? If one examines the cause of this uncertainty, insecurity, is it - please I am questioning it, please you question it - is it because each one of us is so self-centred? Each one of us is concerned with himself, concerned with his own fulfillment, concerned with his own success, concerned with his own advancement, achievement, his own pleasures, his own sorrows? That is, each one of us has this great self-interest. Would that be correct? That is one of the reasons, would you agree to that? Self-interest. What does that self-interest mean? Please question - what does self-interest imply? Does it not imply a separate, divided, narrow limited activity? Right? When I am concerned about myself from morning till night and even in my sleep, it becomes a very small affair. Doesn't it? Even one's meditation, if you are concerned with achieving something or other, it is a very small affair. No? It is a very limited activity. It is like keeping something to yourself all the time, worried, anxious, fearful, depressed; you know it all becomes such a petty little affair. Doesn't it? No, don't agree because it is very easy to agree verbally.

But to act actively be concerned, whether it is possible to live in this world with all the corruption, with all the bestiality of it, the brutality, the cruelty of all that, is it possible to live in this world without self-interest? Have you ever asked that question? Or is it something that we very carefully avoid. One may be married, children, family and that is our concern. We may pray, we may do some puja every morning. That is also a sort of self-concern. No? Also self-concern implies a separate, divided, fragmentary activity. Right? Which then brings about social division: the upper, the lower, the middle class and the lowest, this division - doesn't it? When you are concerned with yourself it becomes a dividing force in the world, which is nationalism, racial division, linguistic division, religious division, the Sikhs, the Hindus, the Muslims, the Buddhists, the Christians, fragmented, following one guru after another. Right? Haven't you noticed all this? Which is, the Arab and the Jew killing each other. nationalities are dividing people. Right? And we hope to find security in nationalism: in India, France and so on - America and Russia. So, this self-interest expresses itself in many subtle ways. So one has to be aware of all that, if you are interested, if you are serious and not carry on as we do day after day. If one is seriously concerned with life, with all the things that are happening, all the terrible things that are happening then one must ask, very deep fundamental questions, not be satisfied with superficial questions and superficial answers. Can one live in this world, in the modern world without belonging to any group, any nationality, any religion, following no guru?

Can you do all this? Or is it all a superficial talk and when you leave this hall you will follow your old ways. What is the point of all this then? Listening to something that is true, that is not invented by the speaker, but these are facts, daily facts of our life: our cruelty, our self-concern, our deep apparently abiding selfishness, and that is what is destroying the world. The Americans are concerned with America. And the Americans as separate human beings are concerned with themselves, as here, and so on. So one begins to understand not verbally but very deeply that where there is division, there must be conflict. Where there is division nationally, there must be conflict, the Muslim and the Hindu the Pakistani, and you know all that rubbish that is going on. And when you face facts, the realities, not just some imaginary, romantic concepts, but when you face daily facts, then you are confronted with a challenge that demands an answer, a challenge that you must accept and understand it and act.

So, there is only security, not in self-centredness and self-interest, but in seeing the fact, and understanding the fact and acting. That is intelligence. And in that intelligence there is security, not in some romantic concepts, sentimentality and all that superficial stuff.

So, we also ought to ask why is there so much corruption in the world? I know this is a rather tricky subject. Why is there so much corruption in the world? What is corruption? The word, the etymological meaning of that word from Latin and Greek and Italian means to break up. I won't go into all that. What is the root of corruption? Where does corruption begin? Passing money under the table, is that corruption? Bribing the porter to have your entrance into a big man? What is corruption, which is so prevalent, more so in this country - pulling wires for your friends, for your nephews, for your sons - is that corruption? Please think about it, look at it? Surely that is a very, very superficial form of corruption. But it is a deeper cause, a far deeper cause, this terrible corruption that is going on. Is it corruption when you follow a leader? Go on, answer this question sirs? When you follow your guru, is that not corruption, in the name of truth, in the name of bla, bla and all that stuff? When you follow somebody, or when you follow some ideal, is that not also corruption? Are you surprised at these questions, or are you just taking it? We are trying to find out together what is the cause of all this? Is it not corruption when each one of us is ambitious, envious, when each one is concerned with his own fulfilment, when he wants his own particular way, when human beings take a stand about something? Do you understand all this? I believe, and you take up a position on that. Another says, I believe quite the opposite. Right? Is that not also corruption?

So, does not corruption start when each one of us is not only concerned with themselves, but also deeply attached to some superstitious, ideological, imaginative belief? No? Isn't that the beginning of corruption? The Catholic believes very strongly in something; in some concept, in some belief, in some faith, and you take another stand in some faith, in some belief, in some god, and you are at war with each other - not actually at war, but you kind of separate yourselves from that silliness as though your silliness was totally different. Haven't you noticed all this? Doesn't corruption begin there? Doesn't corruption begin where there is essentially, deeply self-interest? (Skip it, sir. Leave it sir, will you. Leave it, sir, will you. He doesn't listen, and you don't listen either! That is a perfect example sir. He doesn't listen and you don't listen.) You know one must learn the art of listening. You get used to the voice of your wife or your husband, you never listen to each other. Do you? You get used to it. She might be telling you something real but you have already understood it. And so we never actually listen to somebody, and I am sure that is what is going on here, quite sure. I can take a bet on it! That you really are not listening. That is the pity of it, because if you really listened, not only to the words, but to capture the significance of the words. That is, to listen, not translate what you are hearing to confirm or contradict your ideas, but to find out what the other fellow is saying.

When you tell a story to a child, if you have ever done that, he is so extraordinarily attentive. He is thrilled by the story, he wants you to keep going because the child is curious, eager, wanting to find out what the story is about. Therefore he is paying attention to it. But apparently we don't. You are not actually listening to what the speaker is saying. The speaker has a certain reputation, unfortunately. You have a certain image about him - and you are satisfied with that, you don't question it. You don't say, what do you mean. You don't have deep suspicion, not suspicion, doubt, to question. But you know, it is like a good breath in bad air that passes by. So, please if one can request you, do listen, not only to what the speaker is saying but also to all the things, the whispers of the world: to your wife, to your husband, to the birds, the sound of the wind. You must have the quality of sensitivity to find out. So, if you will kindly pay attention, and that apparently is very difficult because most of us cannot pay attention for more than a couple of minutes - a few minutes and then you are off somewhere else.

There is never deep attentive listening to something. Because if we do listen deeply that is the greatest miracle, you don't have to do a thing. The very act of listening is an action.

We ought also to talk over together why there is so much poverty in the world. One can answer the reason for it, as in this country, over population, bad government - sorry, are there governments officials here? I am sure there are no government officials here. Bad government, corrupt government, it is so appalling what is happening. And poverty arises not only because of the over population, but because each country is concerned with its own economy, with its own problems, building up armaments. I do not know if you know all this. Each country is spending millions and millions on armaments, ready to kill each other. Right? And so where there is division there must be not only conflict but poverty. Do you understand this? If all the world felt it was our responsibility to wipe out poverty, we could. But you won't let America or India interfere with another country, each country is concerned with itself, each human being is concerned with himself. Right?

Now we also ought to talk over together - because we have only one more talk tomorrow morning, so we must bring everything quickly together - why are human beings frightened - fear. Aren't you afraid? Be simple sirs. To acknowledge what one is, is not a shameful act, it is 'what is'. We are frightened human beings. And we have carried this burden of fear for centuries, millions of years. Right? If you have observed historically, and also if you have observed without reading a book, all religions are based on fear. If there was no fear there would be no gods. Right? Do you see that? If you are not really frightened at all, subjectively, inwardly, would you have gods? Would you have puja? Would you have prayers? Would you follow somebody who says, 'I know the truth, you don't, I will help you'. So, we can look at fear? Can you look at your own fear?

You want to ask me something, madam?

Q: Yes, you were saying that pujas and all these things might be just coming from fear. But they might also be a celebration of life, not totally negative.

K: Just a minute, just a minute. What do you mean by love?

Q: It's a unity.

K: You see that is an immense question, madam. You can't say celebration of love.

Q: No, life, it is a celebration you know.

K: May we just go on first. May we just go on with enquiring, not only into fear, but what is life? What is living? That is life, the living. What is our living? Conflict. Right? Our life is a struggle, our life is a pleasure, sexual, pleasure of achieving something, pleasure of possessing something, and also fear, conflict, being hurt psychologically, sorrow, sympathy, kindness, generosity and so on. That is our life. That is life, in which there may be certain spurts of tenderness, kindness. Love is not pleasure. Love is not desire. Love has no reaction. So we won't go into all that at the present moment. So it is no good saying, live a happy life. One of the strange things is, India is a very sad country, but there is always a smile. Haven't you noticed it? The poor smile. They are starving - they smile. No? And that is the miracle of this country. They are starving, down trodden, no means of happiness and perpetually working, and yet as you go by on the street especially in the country, they smile at you. This happens nowhere else in the world. That is one of the great things of this country.

So, we were talking about fear. Can this fear end? Do you want to know what is the cause of fear? Not a particular form of fear; you may be frightened of your wife or your husband or your boss or this or that, that is only various branches of fear. As a tree has many, many branches, many leaves, and it is no good merely cutting off one branch, one must understand the root of fear, go into it very very deeply, what is the origin, the beginning, the causation of fear. I can explain - the speaker can explain the cause, can describe the origin of fear. But explanation, the description is not the actuality. Right? I can describe the Himalayas, but the description is not the actual beauty and grandeur of the Himalayas. Right? But most of us are satisfied with description. I can explain the cause of fear, you will agree or disagree but there it is. But if you can go into it for yourself deeply - not merely agree or disagree but go into it, put your teeth into it, then perhaps you will be free of it. But we have not the energy, or the inclination, or even the urge to be free of fear. Right? Because you do puja, believe in god and so on, but you never go to the root of anything and find out for yourselves. So may I go into the cause of it? Why human beings throughout the world after millennia upon millennia, have lived with fear.

I can't hear what you are saying, sir? Say it to me slowly, sir.
Don't get upset?

Q: Somebody has power, somebody else has property and somebody has position and is creating fear in those who have not.

K: Sir, I am asking, those who have positions, are afraid of losing. The fear death, the fear of their husbands and their wives, fear of public opinion, fear of losing something that they have, fear of not having affection, fear of loneliness, fear of not being somebody. So you have are many, many forms of fear. Now, do you want to take each subject, or go to the root of it?

Q: Go to the root of it.

K: Go to the root of it. Will you go to the root of it with me?

Q: Yes.

K: But go to it, not just play with it. Will you actually take the trouble, use your brains, your capacity, your energy to find out, and not be satisfied with description? One can paint a marvellous picture of the Himalayas, but the picture is not the Himalayas. The word is not the actual. So will you go beyond the word and work at it? What is the cause of fear, not the various forms of fear, but the root cause of it? Is it not thought? I am this, but I might not be that. I have a job, I might lose it. Right? Do you understand? So thinking is part of fear, isn't it? Right. Thinking: thinking I might not become a successful man in terms of the world; or in terms of religion I might not achieve enlightenment. Right? Thinking is one of the major causes of fear.

Q: Insecurity is the cause of fear.

K: We went into it madam, earlier we went into it. Perhaps you were not here when we began, or you didn't listen. We talked about insecurity. Why is there - I won't repeat it.

So is not thought the cause of fear? If you didn't think about death, would you be afraid of death? If death happens suddenly to me, now, that is the end of it. But if I begin to think, my god, what will happen to me, I might lose my house, my family, my bla bla, and I get frightened. Right? Would you agree to that? Not agree, see the fact? So thinking is perhaps the cause of fear. Right? So we have to enquire what is thinking. Do you understand? What is thinking? Because your actions are based on thinking. All the puja you do is based on thinking. All the technological advancement, marvellous advancement, is based on thinking. Right sir? Your business, your way of life, everything is based on thinking. And yet you would find thinking is one of the causes of fear. Right? So what is thinking? What is the process of thinking? Do you understand? The speaker can go into it, but if you merely follow the words, it will mean nothing. But if you put your brains to work on it - as you do when you want money, when you want sex, when you want anything you work at it - so will you also work on this? The speaker will show, will explain, knowing that explanation is not the thing.

What is thinking? Is it not born out of memory? If you had no memory, you would not think - would you? Be quite sure, don't accept anything the speaker says. If you had no memory, which means no knowledge - right - you couldn't think. Are you certain of that? Certain, not just play around with it. That is, experience brings knowledge, as is happening in the scientific world, in the biological world, in the world of genetic engineering. Perhaps you know all this. But I won't go into all that. There is thinking, this thinking is based on experience. Which is, experience gives you knowledge, brings accumulated knowledge step by step, as in the scientific world, more and more and more. Right? So knowledge and experience are limited, aren't they? No? Limited. Therefore thinking is limited. You may think of immensity, of illumination, of complete knowledge - you may think about it, but thinking itself is limited, therefore whatever you think is limited. Right?

Whatever you think about god - god is limited. You may give him all the attributes you like: kindness, all knowledge, all powerful, all this, all that, but your thinking being limited your gods are limited. No?

Q: Thinking about god is limited.

K: All right. Thinking about god is limited, but is god limited?

Q: No.

K: How do you know?

Q: God is unlimited.

K: How do you know? You love god, don't you? To you god is very important, but how do you know god exists? Because you have believed, it is part of your tradition, of your whole religious concept. Right? And you just follow, and say, god exists. And the scientists say quite the opposite, that man began from the sea, as a cell and built, built through centuries until he became man. You don't like that, but god you love, he made the world. And you say, god made us. He must be a very poor god to make you. No? So god must be very poor, you are not even logical.

So we said thinking is one of the causes of fear. I am alive now, but I might be dead tomorrow. Right? And I am afraid of that. So thinking, being limited, and that is limited because knowledge is always limited - right sir? Be quite sure of it, knowledge whether now or in the future, knowledge will always be limited, because it is based on experience. Within the last 150 years or more science has been accumulating. Right? More and more and more. Where there is more it must be limited. Where there is better it must be limited. So thought is limited, and where there is limitation there must be conflict. Thought has created war, and all the instruments of war. So we say thought is one of the causes of fear. Right? And also time is a cause of fear. Right? Time. Are you interested in all this stuff? Or is it just a kind of game? You have nothing better to do. Time is a factor of fear. Let us begin to find out what is time to you. What is time to you?

Q: Change.

K: What do you mean by that word change.

Q: One thing is passing into another. It is the movement of change.

K: Isn't time a series of movements? That is, I am not a scientist, I am not an expert on anything. Thank god. But I have watched, I lived, enquired. So time is the past. Isn't it? Is not time the past? Past memories. Yesterday was rather a cloudy day and cold - not here, in Delhi. So there is time as yesterday, time as now, time as the future. Right? So time is a movement from the past, to the present, to the future. So time is a series of movements. Right? So evolution is time. And we have lived on this earth for 50,000 years as homo sapiens, man, and during that long duration of 50,000 years we have been what we have in the past now, slightly modified - they were selfish then, we are selfish now. Right? You don't think about all this. So, what is the past? All your memories isn't it? All that you have acquired, all that you have felt, all the things that have hurt you both biologically as well as psychologically. The past is memory, isn't it? Isn't it? You are quiet sure? You are all so hesitant. The past is your father, your mother, your grandmother, your grandfather and up and up and up or down and down, if you like. The past is all that accumulated memory of the whole race, the community, the family, the one in that family. All that memory which includes tradition, knowledge, practise and all that, the skill, that is the past. And what is the present? Is not the present the modified past? No, you don't think so. Tell me what the present is.

Q: It is mainly the past.

K: Yes sir, modified, I said that, the past meeting the present, the challenge modifies itself or controls the present and goes on. So the past is modifying itself in the present, and goes on. So the past goes on modifying itself all the time. It is still the past. Right? Oh, my goodness! No? The past modifying itself becomes the future. The future therefore is now, because the past modifies itself in the future, so the future is now. No? Look, sir, if one is envious, one might modify. Suppose I am envious, because you have a better house, better car, better position. I am envious of you. And I struggle with it. But, tomorrow I will still be envious. Right? No? What is the difficulty? Unless I change now, tomorrow is still envy. Right sir? So tomorrow is now unless I change - right?

Q: Is it possible to listen - is this possible in the present?

K: Only in the present not in the future.

Q: Because the past is gone, the future is not in our hands.

K: You haven't listened, sir. You are the past, aren't you? You have been to college, university or if not to university something or other, all your skill. If you are a first class carpenter - not you, sir - if you are a bureaucrat, or a business person or something or other, if I want to be a good carpenter, I apprentice myself to a master carpenter, and I have to learn the quality of the wood, the grain, the beauty of the wood, and I have to learn how to use the instruments which I have on the wood. Right? That is, acquiring knowledge which becomes memory. Right? And then I am a carpenter. Do you understand? As you are a business man or a government official, you accumulate. So you are the past. There is no difficulty in this. I don't know why you are resisting it. You may think you are god, that is all right, that is also past, that is part of your tradition. So you are the past. And that past meets this challenge which I am challenging you now, and says, yes, may be, may be. And tomorrow you will be like this unless you change now. So the future is now.

Q: How do I know the future? I don't know whether I will be envious tomorrow or not, I don't know.

K: You will be, unless you have an accident. You are going home. You have your things at home. That is just a theory. You will be here tomorrow, unless you have an accident and I hope you don't. But you know the future because what you are now is the future. Of course. I know you don't like this. The future is in the present. Right? I am envious now and I will be envious tomorrow. Right? Tomorrow is the future. If I am envious now I will be envious tomorrow, but if I stop envy, therefore tomorrow is now.

For god's sake see this. So, is it possible to end envy now? You don't think about these things. I am violent now, as most human beings are violent. They talk about peace and all that nonsense but human beings are very violent. It is so. There is no question about it. Now, non-violence is in the future - because you are violent now. Therefore, non-violence has no meaning. Can you stop violence now? If you don't stop it now, tomorrow you will be violent. So tomorrow is now. Right? So is it possible to end time, which is tomorrow, now? I am violent - if I cannot end violence instantly now, I will be violent tomorrow, slightly modified, but I will still be violent. Right? And humanity has said, we'll gradually become violent, less violent. Right? Which is nonsense. Are you surprised at this?

So, can you end everything now? Say, you are attached, as you are, attached to your beliefs, your gods, to your family, attached, you know, hold on. If you are attached today you will be attached tomorrow, naturally. Right? Unless death comes and says, sorry, that's the end of it. I know you believe in reincarnation, that is a different matter. But even death comes and says, sorry, you can't carry things away with you. You have to drop them. So can you drop attachment now, to be utterly free from attachment? To your beliefs, to your gods, to everything you are attached to, otherwise tomorrow you will still be attached. So change is not through gradation, through gradual time. Change is instant, immediate. That is freedom; not to achieve freedom next life or two years later. This requires a great deal of application to your daily life. Therefore your ideas, your theories, your ideals have no meaning. You believe in non-violence, don't you? But you are all terribly violent people. So what does belief in an ideal matter at all? It has no meaning. What has meaning is what you are now, and that can be changed instantly, not tomorrow because tomorrow is now.

We should also talk over together very, very seriously - not that we have not been serious - what is a religious brain, mind. What is a religious mind? Sir, we have talked for an hour and a quarter. You want to go on with this?

Q: Yes.

K: It is easy for me to talk. Please this is a very serious subject, like fear it requires a great deal of enquiry. Because the religious brain - to find out what is a religious brain, one must be free of all organized religions. Naturally. Free of Buddhism, Hinduism, Jainism, Sikh, Christianity and all the variety of so-called religious attitudes and practices, and all that. Now, will you be free of all that - can you be free of all that? Really enquire very deeply what a religious brain is.

Q: Not be a Hindu or a Buddhist, one can be a broad-minded man.

K: It sounds very nice. That is what the United Nations say - you can all be nations together, but keep your own particular nonsense. Is that so, is that a fact?

Q: Yes.

K: Just listen to it sir, you say yes, is it a fact. I am a devout Christian, suppose - a devout practising Catholic. Do you know what that means? I believe in the Virgin Mary going physically to heaven. That is one of the dogmas, I believe in that. You would call it nonsense. Wouldn't you? Wouldn't you? Why are you nervous about it? You would, for god's sake. You would say, what kind of stupid belief that is: anybody physically going to heaven, what is heaven. It sounds so silly - but I believe it. I devoutly am concerned with it. And you would say, yes, we will tolerate it - that is all. You can live in this country, but you are a Hindu, you have your own beliefs. There is a division between us. No? Right sir?

Q: You can have your own belief and I can have my belief.

K: That is it. Lovely! I am an American, you are a Russian - keep it, and we are willing to kill each other. No? So I stick to my belief, you stick to your belief. And we call this religion. When you are faced with facts you doubt it, you keep quiet. So, sir, belief is dividing, will you drop your belief because division brings conflict between you and me? Because I have no belief. What is fact is important, not belief.

Q: Can non-belief be a belief?

K: Oh no, the end of belief is the end of belief. Not belief and the ending of it, I end it.

So to enquire very deeply into what is a religious brain, because the brain - the brain, that is that which is within the skull, is the centre of all thought. Right? The centre of all emotions. Centre of all your reactions. Centre of all your beliefs. All your fears, all your sorrow, all your depression. It is the centre of every physical activity. No? Right? Do you see that fact? I am not a scientist, a scientist would explain this to you very carefully. It is so, whether you like it or not. You may believe there is atman, there is soul, there is god in you, but it is still within the skull. You may imagine or say, god is perfect, it is still within the skull. Right? I am not trying to convince you of anything. Don't be convinced. I am not interested.

So, to enquire into what is a religious brain one must be free of all belief. If you have a belief you are attached to that belief, therefore, you are not free. It is like going out into the middle of the river with a rope around you. Right? I am attached to the bank and I go safely, then I am not free. So, we are tethered to a belief therefore there is no freedom in that - you are tethered to some concept. So there must be freedom from all religious concepts, beliefs, faiths, images, idols - all that man has put together through fear. Right? Will you do that? I am not asking you to do it. I don't care. If you are really enquiring into what is a religious mind, brain you have to be free. Obviously. It's like a man in prison wanting freedom. He can want it, but he must leave the prison. Then he will never ask what is freedom. Right? Unless we are free from the bondage which we have created for ourselves we cannot possibly enquire into something that demands tremendous energy and freedom. That is the first thing.

So the religious mind or brain must be free completely, from all attachment. And very, very few people want this kind of stuff. Very, very few people are serious enough to go into this matter. They would like to talk about it, play with it like children. But a childish mind can never understand this.

Perhaps we had better stop today, we will go on and enquire into what is a religious human being, what is a religious life, tomorrow, shall we? We had better stop now.

RAJGHAT 2ND PUBLIC TALK 12TH NOVEMBER, 1984

I will continue with what we were talking about yesterday morning. We were asking what is a religious life. What does the word religious mean? The word, what does that word mean to you or how do you react to that word? The origin of that word, the etymological meaning is not very clear. And in enquiring into a religious mind, if we are at all serious, and I hope we are, one can see obviously that the present structure, or the nature, or the organization of religions throughout the world, have really no meaning at all. They are just a jumble of words, either in Sanskrit, Latin, Greek and so on. They have really no meaning. The present ironical structure of Catholicism or Buddhism or the many aspects of Hinduism or Sikhism and so on, they have no depth. There are rituals, a kind of emotional stimulation and a lot of words that have no significance at all.

So can we in enquiring into what is a really religious mind, brain, could we put aside actually, not verbally, all the implications of organized, sectarian, limited religions of the world? Could we do that first? Not accept any guru, because in the world of religion there is no authority, neither of a book, nor of a person, nor of an idea, a concept. So could we put aside all that: the authority in spiritual matters, with all its tradition? And when we can put aside all that literally, not verbally, not follow any guru - sorry, this may be rather troublesome for most of you - not accept any book as the authority; according to the Christians the Bible, the Islamic world the Koran, or in India with their many other books.

I think it is important to realize that in spiritual matters, in matters of the psyche, in matters of the subjective understanding, there is no authority. Would you agree to that? Do we see the truth of it? You have to have the authority of a surgeon, of an expert in computers or the authority of a policeman, limited though they be, there we have to have the authority of one who knows technological subjects. But in the matter of the psyche, in the matter of the so-called spiritual world, there is no authority. The authority is only that which is true. And we are going to find out for ourselves in enquiring into what is a religious mind, we must discover for ourselves what is truth. And we are going to enquire into that.

You don't mind talking about all these matters? Or would you like to talk about politics, or yoga, or some particular idol you worship? But if we are serious and go into this question, which we must because religion has been the origin, the beginning of a new civilization, a new culture. And now all the present day cultures are falling apart, being destroyed. We must enquire. It seems so urgently important to understand, to discover and to live it - the truth of religion. If we go into it we must ask what is the first most important thing in a mind, in a brain. Here let us differentiate between the brain and the mind: the brain is all the reactions, nervous responses, biological urges and all the fears, human hurts, anxieties, loneliness. All the activities of thought are centred in that which is called the brain, which is within the skull - that is the brain. And the mind surely is not all that: the mind is something unrelated to the brain. That is what we are saying, what the speaker is saying. We have discussed this matter with many scientists, and biologists and so on, but they are rather hesitant about it. Naturally to them it must be a proof either under the microscope or destroying some animal and so on, and so on.

To the speaker the mind is entirely different. Please as we said, don't accept anything the speaker says. Question it, doubt it, but enquire, go into it. Otherwise it becomes meaningless. As we were saying, the first demand or necessity to have a religious mind, is beauty. Beauty, not in a particular form - a beautiful face, a beautiful way of living and so on. What is beauty? Without that there is no truth, there is no love; without beauty there is no sense of morality. Beauty in itself is virtue. Now, we are going to enquire together what is beauty. The speaker may put it into words, but you may have to take the responsibility of enquiring for yourself what is beauty. Is beauty in a painting, the marvellous old sculptures of the Egyptians, the Greeks, and Mahesha Murthi of Bombay and so on? What is beauty? What does it mean to you? The dress with the beautiful patterns of a sari, or the beautiful sky in the evening, or early in the morning, the beauty of the mountain, the fields and the valleys, the meadows, and the streams, the beauty of a bird, or the marvellous old trees. So does beauty depend on a particular culture or a particular tradition? The weavers of India have a tradition; they produce marvellous clothes, designs. Is that beauty? Or beauty is something totally different. When one observes great mountains with their snow-cap, the eternal snows, the glaciers and deep valleys, the outlines of a magnificent, majestic mountain against a blue sky, when you perceive that for the first time or the hundredth time, what actually takes place?

Are we going together or am I talking to myself. I don't mind talking to myself, but if we are listening to each other we must naturally ask this fundamental question: what takes place when you see the river in the morning light with the sun just coming up and making a golden path along the waters. When you look at it, what takes place, or are you repeating some mantra, or for the moment you are completely silent? The beauty of that light on the water pushes aside all your problems, all your anxieties, everything else for a few seconds or a few minutes or for an hour, which means the self is not there: the self, the egoistic, self centred activity, the self-interest. All that is banished by the great beauty of a cloud full of light and dignity - at that moment the self is absent. So, does not beauty exist when the self is not? Don't agree with it, or nod your head and say, he's quite right, how marvellous, and then go on with your ugly ways, go on with our selfishness and self-concern and then talk logistically or theoretically about beauty. Beauty is something that must be perceived, and not held in the mind as a remembrance. So, beauty is something far deeper, much more profound and extensive than a mere picture, a design, a beautiful face or graceful manners. There is beauty only when the self is not. And that is the first thing that is required in understanding what is a religious mind.

And also enquiring into it one can see it must be a global brain, not a provincial brain, not a sectarian, limited brain, it must be global, understanding the vast human, complex problem. That is, a holistic mind, a brain that comprehends the whole of existence. Not your particular existence, your particular problems, because everywhere you go, whether in America, Europe or in India, or in Asia, we human beings suffer - we human beings have so many destructive and creative problems. We are lonely people, we are anxious, fearful, seeking comfort, unhappy, sad, depressed, irritated: the whole human existence is this, with occasional their joy, their pleasures, sexual and so on. So to live with this feeling of wholeness - you understand all this, or are you being mesmerized by the speaker? Are you sure you are not being overwhelmed by words?

And we are saying a brain that is holistic is concerned with the whole of humanity, because we are all alike, whether we live in America or in England, or France or in Italy or in this country. We may express it differently - different gods, different angels, but we human beings suffer whether you suffer, or an American suffers, or Europeans, or Russians or Chinese; we all suffer. It is common to all of us. Therefore a religious brain is concerned with an holistic way of living.

And also we must find out for ourselves what is the relationship between nature and each of us. That is part of religion. You may not agree but consider it, go into it. Have you any relationship with nature, with the birds, with the water of that river - not that the river is holy, all rivers are holy, getting more and more polluted: you may call it Ganga, or the Thames, or the Nile, or the Rhine or the Mississippi, or the Volga, but they are still rivers. What is your relationship with all that - with the trees, with the birds, with all the living things which we call nature? Aren't we part of all that? So aren't we the environment? I wonder, am I talking nonsense and you are just listening casually? Does it mean anything to you - all this - or am I a stranger from Mars talking about something with which you are not really related at all. Does it mean anything, all this? It is up to you.

Q: Please explain relationship of nature and exploitation.

K: Obviously, that is nothing new. Nature has been exploited by man for thousands of years. They are destroying the forests, they are polluting the rivers, they are polluting the air, they are killing animals for pleasure, for food. This has been going on for millions of years. And so when one asks, what is your relationship with nature, is it merely exploitation that you are interested in? Digging coal, getting gold out of the earth or finding diamonds, or cutting down trees to build houses: is that all your relationship with nature? If you have no relationship with nature have you any relationship with your wife, with your husband, with your neighbour? Have you any relation at all? Have you enquired into that? Oh Lord, isn't that part of religion to find out what is true relationship? You all look so dazed. Are you asleep or what? I don't know why you sit here.

Let's enquire what is relationship. To be related to another. Not only with nature and all the beauty of the earth, but also what is relationship. What is your relationship with the speaker? What is your relationship with your neighbour, with your wife, with your daughter, with your husband? Have you any relationship? Have you ever asked this question? When you say, yes, she is my wife, or my husband, or my girl friend, what does it mean to be related? How can there be a relationship with another, however intimate or not, when each one of us is pursuing his own way? Right? The husband goes to the office. Aren't you all familiar with all this? Your husband goes to the office from nine to five, working, sweating, being bullied, insulted, adding up figures, or being bureaucratic, ambitious, seeking more money, a higher position, concerned with his own activity. Aren't you doing that? No? And the wife either is cooking, bearing sex and children, or going to an office too. So the husband and wife are running parallel lives. Perhaps they meet in bed. Don't be shocked. Or occasional or daily quarrels, nagging, bullying each other, saying, she is my wife, my husband, they mustn't look at anybody else - jealousy. This is your life. So where is your relationship with your wife, when each one is pursuing his own line of thought, ambitions and desires? In that is there any love? Oh, for God's sake what are we talking about.

Is there love in your life? If there is no love, there is no religion. You may go to the temple three times a day. If you are a Muslim, pray five times a day, and worship all kinds of silly gods, but if there is no love, life has no meaning. So, we also have to find out what is love. Is love desire? Is love pleasure? Is love sorrow and pain and anxiety, jealousy, hatred? Or is love something totally divorced from all this? You see you hear all this - if you do hear at all, all this - and you know this is a fact, not imagination, not something that thought has invented, and you will go back to your old life, to your old ways. You say it is too difficult, we cannot live in the modern world with all this. Right? And so you carry on. Then what is the point of listening to all this? Have you ever thought about all these matters? Or is all this something totally new? Somebody talking in Greek?

So, let's proceed. At least some of you will give your attention to what is being said. So, a religious mind, or religious brain, is that which has a great sense of beauty. Beauty is truth, beauty is morality, the way we behave, how you talk, how you walk. Beauty is that which is eternal, everlasting, beyond time. And also there is beauty in relationship, not attachment. There is no beauty in attachment. Do you understand? Probably you will repeat this saying, beauty has no attachment, love has no attachment. You will repeat it and it becomes a slogan. And you think by repeating you will reach heaven. It is quite funny, isn't it, all this? So, a religious brain has this quality of beauty. And it implies a relationship that is real, not selfish, not limited. I may love my wife, but that doesn't mean I only love my wife. I doubt if you love your wife. Again, without love there is no religion. Love has compassion. Where there is compassion there is intelligence; not the intellectual cunning intelligence of thought - which is limited. Where there is love, compassion, there is limitless intelligence. And when there is that intelligence, whatever it does is right, correct, precise.

And also, as we said, most human beings are frightened. And when there is fear there is no beauty. So, can human beings be free of fear? We went into it briefly yesterday morning. As we said, fear is time and thought. You know, just to look at it and not to say how, to stop time and thought. That is impossible, you can't stop time and thought, but you can observe it. Do you understand what the word 'observe' means. Have you ever observed, looked, looked at your wife? Have you ever done it? You shake your heads all the time. Have you ever looked at your wife? Now, you stop shaking your head? I am glad. Have you ever looked at a tree, the clouds, the rivers, the child on the road? Have you ever looked at this, observed it?

So one has to enquire into what is observation? Sir, please. To observe without prejudice, without opinion, without any judgement, without any value, just to observe. To observe how you sit. To observe your own thoughts, not condemn your thoughts, right or wrong, I shouldn't think this, this is ignoble thought, this is noble thought: just to observe your thinking. To observe the way you dress and so on. When you so observe your fear, not condemn it, not run away from it or transmute it to something else, but just to observe it, in that observation you bring all your attention in that. Observation means complete attention - can you so observe? Observe a tree completely, listen to the sound of the breeze in the trees, the birds fluttering, landing on the tree, calling of an evening. Just to listen, to observe. When you do that the implication in that observation is that you bring all your attention to it. It is like focussing strong light on something. Then that very light, that very flame destroys that which it is turned on. Do you understand what I am saying? Will you do it or just shake your head and carry on?

If you give your whole attention to fear, then you will find fear goes completely. But if you try to escape from it, try to run away from it, try to avoid it and say, how terrible to be afraid, then that activity is lacking attention. But when you give your complete attention, it is like turning on a great light. Then the whole pattern of fear is shown, the beginning and the ending of fear.

And attention is not something to be practised. Have you noticed how we are becoming mechanical? Does this interest you? Have you noticed in yourself how your brains are becoming mechanical? You repeat, don't you? You are traditionalists, aren't you? And where there is tradition in this limited sense, or in an extensive sense, it is constant repetition. You get up in the morning at a certain time, go to bed at a certain time, repeat, repeat, sexually, repeat, repeat, repeat. Are you acquainted with computers, some of you? The modern computer does almost everything that the human brain can do. It is a machine put together by thought. And that machine has mechanical intelligence. In certain ways it is far superior to the human intelligence. It can calculate, remember, analyse - a million memories. You people don't know all this. And the computers with robots are building cars. They can write poems, paint, do extraordinary things. I won't go into all that, because that is a different matter.

So our brains are becoming - are mechanical. This is a fact. You are a Hindu, you repeat that everlastingly, or you are English or French or this or that. So our brains have become mechanical. And as we said, thought is limited. And to find out, for ourselves, the limitations of thought and go beyond it; not imaginatively, fantastically or romantically, but actually find out. That is part of religious activity. We have to do certain things mechanically: all our biological, nervous responses are mechanical. I say something to you - you call me a fool - I react - or you put a pin in me - I react. That is mechanical, that is natural. Not when you call me a fool and I call you another, that is partly mechanical too. But to be aware of all this - not practise. Do you understand? You know - oh, for god's sake you are so childish. I mean, to pay attention to your toe and gradually become, you know... don't dome of you do all these kind of tricks? No? Awareness it is called, practising awareness. You are all smiling, some of you. Can you practise awareness? If you do, it becomes mechanical, when you sit down and concentrate on your toe, and then from your leg and all the rest of it, your breath, it is a kind of monkey trick. I am not insulting you, please. Practise for twelve hours a day: think of your brain, what is happening to your brain. You are becoming dull. Your brain has got extraordinary faculty. Look what they have done - they have gone to the moon. It is the activity of the brain. The extraordinary surgery that is going on, transforming hearts, limbs and so on. The brain has capacity, immense capacity. What they have done in the technological world is incredible. I am not going into all this. But if the brain becomes mechanical then that mechanical attitude limits the activity, and the faculty of the brain. It becomes conditioned, limited. And where there is limitation there must be conflict. Don't you know all this?

Would you like to discuss conflict, why human beings live perpetually in conflict, perpetually have problems? Have you gone into it? Shall I also sit like you, apathetically and just listen casually? Why do we live in conflict? What is conflict? Your lives are in conflict - aren't they? Honestly, be simple. Aren't you in conflict? Aren't you? Be honest and simple for once. Why? What is conflict? Opposing desires, right? Right sir? Opposing demands, opposing opinions: I think this, and you think that. Right? My prejudice against your prejudice. Right? My tradition against your tradition; and deeper still, my selfishness against your selfishness. No? Yes? My meditation against yours. My guru is better than your guru. So there is this contradictory process going on in us which is the dualistic attitude towards life. Right? The good and the bad. Right? Have you ever enquired whether there is a relationship between the good and the bad? Is this all something new? I am asking you gentleman and ladies: is there relationship between the good and the bad? That is duality, you understand, hate and not hate. Let's take one thing: violence and non-violence. Is there a relationship with violence and a brain that has no violence? Do you understand? Is there a relationship between the two? If there is relationship between violence and that which is not violent, then that relationship implies a connection between the two. Do you understand what I am saying? If there is a relationship between violence and that which is not violence - then one is born out of the other. Right? I wonder if you see this. Do give your mind to this for a while, will you? Two opposites: violence, or if you don't like violence, envy and not envy. If envy has relationship with non-envy - right - then one is born out of the other. Right? Is this clear? No. Is this clear, sir? Right?

Look sir, if love is related to hate or to jealousy - that is better. Let's take a very ordinary daily fact. If love is related to hate, then it is not love is it?

Q: (Inaudible)

K: That's just an idea, for god's sake, don't say things that you don't know what you are saying. Look sir, if violence is related to that which is not violent, violence is still part of that which is not violence. Do you understand some of this? So violence is something entirely different from that which is non-violence. So if you see the fact, then conflict ceases. Look: if I am blind, I accept it, I can't keep struggling, saying I must have more light, I must see. I am blind. But if I don't accept it and say I must see, I must see, I must see, then there is conflict. You understand this very simple fact? I accept I am blind. Then that acceptance that I am blind, the fact that I am blind, then I have to cultivate different senses. Right? I can feel how closely I come to a wall. Seeing the fact that I am blind has its own responsibility. But if I say constantly to myself, I must see, I must see, I am in conflict.

This is what you are doing. If I accept that I am dull. If I accept that I am dull, not because I compare myself with you who is clever. Do you understand what I am saying? I know only dullness through comparison, don't I? I see you, very bright, very clever, intelligent - all the rest of it, and I say, compared to her how dull I am. But if I don't compare, I am what I am. Right? I can then begin from there. But if I am comparing myself all the time with you who are bright, intelligent, nice looking, capable and all the rest of it - I am in perpetual conflict with you. But if I accept what I am - I am this and from there I can begin. Do you see this? So, conflict exists only when we deny the actual fact of 'what is'. Look: I am this but if I am trying all the time to become that, I am in conflict. Right? But you are like that because you all have a psychological becoming. You all want to become holy, saints or business men or meditate properly, don't you? So there is conflict. When you realize the fact and not move away from the fact: I am violent, but I pretend not to be violent, but when I pretend not to be violent, conflict begins. Right? So, will you stop pretending - and say, I am violent, let's deal with violence? It's like when you have a toothache, you go to a dentist, do something about it, but when you pretend I have no toothache... So conflict ends when you see things as they are, and not pretend something which is not. It is a much more complex problem, conflict, we won't go into it more deeply.

And so, we are saying, as this is the last talk here, the last discussion rather, communication, we ought to talk briefly about sorrow and meditation. Man has lived with sorrow from the beginning of time. Right? Man has suffered, he is in sorrow. And nobody has faced the fact, we are asking whether sorrow can end. Your sorrow, you understand sir? If I have lost a son, or a child whom I have loved or had affection for, I suffer. Don't you suffer? Is this something strange to you?

Q: No.

K: Then what do you do about it? Sir, this is a serious question, I am not trying to harass you. But, we suffer and we go on suffering, we never ask whether suffering can end. And when you suffer all the time, your brain becomes dull, your life becomes dark, ugly; when you suffer you can't love. So, can you find out whether sorrow can end? Part of sorrow is self-pity. Right? Isn't there in sorrow self-pity? That means you are concerned about yourself. I have lost my son, in whom I have invested a lot of money. My son and he dies. I am becoming old - nobody to look after me. I had hoped that my son would grow up and look after me. Don't you know all this? And he dies, and I suffer. In suffering there is loneliness, attachment, feeling that I have lost something that can never be replaced. And loneliness is emphasized, brought into my consciousness directly. All that is part of suffering.

So, can all that end? Can you end your attachment to your gods, to your beliefs, to your faith, to your house, to your attachments? You understand, sir? Can you end it? That is what death means doesn't it? Death means the ending. Not the continuity in the next life - that may just be theory. And if you like theories and that gives you comfort - all right, but there is nothing real about theories or beliefs. What has reality is your attachment to your family, to your beliefs, to your gods, to your tradition. And death comes along and says, wipe it. Right? So can you, while living, be free of attachment, to your guru, to your belief, to your bank account, if you are lucky enough, or unlucky enough to have a bank account? Can you be detached, free of all attachment, and live in this world? Be free of attachment, can you? That means living with death all the time - not fifty years later, or frightened of death. I won't go into the question of death because it is too complicated. We have no time this morning. But death means not only biological and physical ending of the organism, but to also to all the memories, attachments, your reputation, to your fulfillment, that all ends. So, can you live with death? Not commit suicide. I don't mean that. Live with death, ending every day all the things that you have psychologically accumulated. That requires tremendous care, attention, to every thought so that you are living all the time with that shadow, with that thing called death, then you have immense vitality. Not to do more mischief, not to get more money, more fame and all that rubbish, but a brain that becomes extraordinarily alive, free.

Also we have to talk for a few minutes about meditation. Do you want to talk about it? Are you sure?

Q: Yes.

K: Because what I am going to say about your meditation is, it is nonsense. What is the difference between a man who wants to accumulate money, working, working, working, getting richer and richer or poorer, whatever it is, working day after day to be rich, famous as a politician, guru or something or other - what is the difference between that and your practising daily to become something, to achieve enlightenment? What is the difference? Is there any difference? The man who pursues, day after day to acquire money, position, status - status, you know, as a big man, works, works, and the other man who says, I am going to meditate in order to achieve something or other? What is the difference between the two?

Q: None.

K: Then why do it? Don't agree with this, this is a very, very serious subject. Don't play around with this. I say, conscious meditation, deliberate meditation, which means daily practice, daily repetition of a mantra, all that is like any other business, like any other activity, nothing noble about it. So, deliberate, conscious practice, following a system, repeating some words, in order to pacify the mind, to become quiet, pay attention, is like any other man who says, I must have status. Right? So we are saying, please listen carefully, we are saying that any deliberate, conscious meditation is not meditation at all. Do you like what I am saying? No, you don't.

So we have to find out what is meditation, which is not deliberate action, sitting in a certain posture, breathing regularly and following a system. Have you observed what happens to your brain when you do all this? It becomes more and more mechanical. Right? You so easily agree, but you don't really agree at all, you just play with words. So, there is a meditation which is totally different, which is not if you put aside the deliberate activity of meditation, which is, to say, I will do this. Meditation is not the activity of will or determination. Right sir?

So is there a meditation that is not all this? We are saying there is, totally different, because this is all rather immature, rather obvious. And you have practised, practised for generations this kind of meditation, where are you at the end of it? Right? Where are you? On the contrary your brains have become extraordinarily dull. So we are saying, there is a meditation - meditation implies a state of the brain in which there is no measurement. Do you understand? No measurement. That means no comparison; that means no becoming - you don't become enlightened. That is a horrible idea: I am going to become enlightened. That is a reward. If I do this I will get rewarded. If I don't do it I will get punished. You see that brings in another: we live on reward and punishment.

Sir, after all to have great silence - and that silence is not brought about by deliberate, purposeful activity, without having a silent brain there is no meditation. Meditation is to give attention to everything daily, to everything that you do. You begin there: how you dress, how you talk, how you eat, how you walk - pay attention to all that. Then as you pay attention you will know what it means to give complete attention. That is, to observe, to watch, to listen. Thereby you become highly sensitive. Not 'become' - you are highly sensitive when there is attention. And that is why beauty is important.

Q: Will death automatically grant me freedom from pain and sorrow and attachments?

K: Who are you? Who are you sir? Are you different from sorrow? Are you different from your anger, are you different from your greed? So if you end your greed now, that is part of death. Are you different from all this?

Q: No, sir. Suppose I am not able to do that just now?

K: That is a wrong question. You are saying, if I don't do it now...

Q: I will never do it

K: Yes. The same thing. Are you unable to do this now - be honest sir, are you unable?

Q: I am trying.

K: When you have toothache or pain you go to the dentist, don't you? You don't say, I am trying to go to the dentist. Sir, you are all playing games. Sir, we have the idea, a concept, a tradition that I am different from my anger. I am the atman and all that kind of stuff, I am different from everything, I am the watcher. Right? I am the controller As that gentleman points out very clearly, that if I don't do anything now, that is, I won't do anything about my attachment, I won't do anything about my anger, envy, will death end all that? That is his question. Yes sir. That means that if I don't stop all that now, I will be like that tomorrow. I will be like that till I die. Right? Then what happens after that?

Q: That I don't know.

K: As you don't know, why don't you do this first? Do you understand my question sir? You don't know actually what happens after death. You may believe in reincarnation, you may believe in the future. Right? You may believe. Sir, please I am an ordinary person.

Q: It may be.

K: May be. You don't know, so why not begin now. Sir, if I don't know what I am going to be in a years time. I may die. And if I am going to die in two years time, why don't I begin to die now, which means, don't be attached Can you, will you? Not try - do it? This is our trouble, we always say we are going to try. You don't say that when you are hungry. When you are sexually demanding, you don't say, I will think about it. So, sir, don't play with these kinds of things.

Q: I have to become a dead body just now.

K: Do we realize what our life is?

Q: Yes, sir.

K: What is your life sir?

Q: Hunger, anxiety, fear.

K: All that, why not end it now?

Q: I can't end hunger.

K: I never said that, those are biological demands. But psychologically, anger, envy, jealousy, hate, attachment, can't you end all that? Of course one can, then do it. Talk to your wife or your husband, to your neighbour, gently, quietly, with affection, with care. Sir, you make me cry. You don't listen to all this. Well sirs, sit quietly, shall we, for a few minutes.

RISHI VALLEY 1ST TALK WITH STUDENTS

7TH DECEMBER 1984

K: What shall we talk about this morning? What would you like to talk about? No? What interests you? What would you like to do, or talk about?

S: Fear.

K: Fear? I thought you were rather fed up with that word. Do you really want to talk about fear? Yes? All of you want to talk about fear?

S: Comparison.

K: Comparison. Anything else? Fear, comparison and something else? Some of the older people there, the older boys.

S: Love.

K: Love. Good lord! Fear, comparison, love and what else?

S: Prejudice.

K: Prejudice. Fear, comparison, love, prejudice. Now which would you like to talk about first? Among those four questions, which would you like to talk about first? Go on. This is not an examination so you don't have to be afraid. Shall we talk about prejudice first? Do you know what that word means? Prejudice. That means you don't know me but you have already judged me. Right? You don't know something but you already have an opinion about it, a judgement about it. So out of that arises prejudice. Have you prejudices? Of course you have. You don't like certain people, or a certain class of people, because you are prejudiced against them. You mightn't like your teachers but you may be prejudiced against them. Right? Have you got prejudices? Have you? You are all very silent. Don't you talk? Would you all like to sit quietly? Then talk! Or have you lost your tongues? Good lord, don't you talk? All right, I'll also sit quietly. Until you talk to me I won't talk to you. There we are!

S: Why is it that one gets prejudiced?

K: You understand the word prejudice? You don't belong to my caste, to my group, to my ideological community, so I am prejudiced against you. It arises, doesn't it, from having an opinion about somebody. Do you know what opinion means? No? Yes? Have you opinions?

S: Yes.

K: Why? I have an opinion about the prime minister? Right? I have an opinion about the governor, or about the man next door, or about your educator, your teacher, or you might have an opinion about me. Right? Why do you have opinions? You don't know me so why have opinions about me? You really don't know your teacher, what he thinks, what he feels, what his life is, whether he is unhappy or happy, whether he is ambitious and so on. You don't know anything about him but you already have an opinion about him. Right? From that opinion you have a prejudice, you are prejudiced. So why do you have opinions at all?

S: It appears as though opinions are inherent in us.

K: Is there anything inherent in human beings? Why do we take anything for granted that there is something inherent? You know what that word inherent means? Something born, something established; inherent in, say for instance, a tamarind tree, it is inherent that tree is a tamarind. Right? Have we human beings anything inherent? Or it is cultivated? You understand? Or educated?

S: It is cultivated.

K: Cultivated. Who cultivates it?

S: We do.

K: We ourselves. Right? Why? Think it out. Don't say, just think it out. Why do you have inherent prejudice, who cultivated it? Your parents? Or you belong to that caste, your parents say, 'I don't like that man' and you say, 'I also don't like him.' Is there anything that is part of you, anything that is inherent, inborn, or is it cultivated? If it is cultivated, it is either cultivated by your friends, by your parents, by your community, by your society. Right? So why do your parents have them? Why does society educate you to have prejudices?

And would you ask also what is society? Discuss with me, come on!

S: Sir, society seems to depend on prejudices.

K: Prejudices. Yes. So have you asked what is society? What is the society? Don't go to sleep! Come on you older people up there: what is society? Who created this society? The social structure? You know what society is? The government, the bureaucracy, the community, the individuals in the community and their relationship with the community, with the government, with the whole bureaucratic, religious structure around us. That's generally called society. Agreed? Would you agree to that? Hey, don't you talk? I am sure you do, you chatter away like monkeys, but here you refuse to talk. Are you nervous? Are you shy? If you don't talk with me, how am I to talk with you? I won't hit you, I won't beat you, I won't bite you! Are you not used to asking questions, trying to find out? Or you just read books, memorize, and pass exams? Is that it? How am I to talk to you if you don't talk to me? Shall we keep silent again?

S: Sir, I'd like to know about prejudice which you create for yourself.

K: By all human beings.

S: By yourself, not by the others around you.

K: You have prejudices.

S: Because somebody has done something.

K: Somebody has done something to you and therefore what? You get prejudiced against him? Either that prejudice is friendly, or antagonistic. Right?

S: How can you have a friendly prejudice?

K: How can you have friendly prejudice - don't you have friendly prejudice about your friend? You say, he is a nice man, or a nice girl, nice boy. You see we all have prejudices, unfortunately. Those prejudices prevent us from looking, observing, understanding another. Right? If I have prejudices against you, I won't be able to understand what you are talking about, or what you want to tell me, I cut you off. So to find out what you are, what you are actually telling me, I mustn't have prejudices, I mustn't have opinions, I must be free to listen to you. And by listening to you very carefully I understand you, what you want to tell me. But you are frightened of me, then I can't communicate with you, or prejudiced, or you have opinions about me. What is important is not to have prejudices, not to have opinions, so that you can understand, look at people. If you have prejudice you can't love people.

S: Sir, after meeting the person and if you find he is very stubborn, not very nice, then you form an opinion.

K: Of course. But he may be very nice, you may think he is not nice, but he may be very nice, you have to find out. And if you want to find out whether he is nice or not you have to listen to what he has to say. You can't have prejudice beforehand. Or even after. One must have a free mind, a free brain to understand something.

S: When you say you understand a person, it is also a prejudice.

K: No. I want to understand you. I want to listen to what you are saying. I want to find out why you think this, or that. Right?

S: You can't say anything about anyone.

K: You come over here. Come out here. Come and sit down.

S: What I am saying, it is the same thing, I mean if I say I understand a person, then that is another prejudice again.

K: No, no. Is that a prejudice? I understand, not you because I don't know you, I understand, say for instance, Mr Narayan. I have known him for a number of years and I have talked to him and he has talked to me, he has told me his problems, and I have understood. I have talked to him, I have communicated with him.

S: Then you can't really describe a person as he is.

K: No, I can't. Therefore I am not prejudiced.

S: Is that all there is to it then?

K: No. There is much more to it. A human being is a very complex person. Right? Very complex. I have only understood Mr Narayan very, very little, and that little doesn't prejudice me. I say I understand a little. And I really don't know Mr Narayan.

S: So you can't say anything about him unless you know him.

K: That's all, that's all. So I have no prejudice. I can't say, I know Mr Narayan. That would be stupid on my part if I say, 'I know Mr Narayan'. Right? I only know a little bit, that which he has told me, which he has conveyed to me, and so on. Very little. But if I want to know him, and he will allow me to know him - you understand - then I can talk to him, I can discuss with him, I can spend days with him. Right? Then I begin to say, 'I know, somewhat, Narayan'. There is no prejudice involved. Agreed?

S: Sir, there is a friend of mine, whenever I talk to him, suppose he rebukes me or something, and the next time I don't talk to him, isn't that prejudice?

K: I wouldn't call that prejudice. You talk to me and I insult you, and you don't like it, that's not prejudice. I have been rude to you, unfortunately, that doesn't make a prejudice. You say, he has been rude to me.

S: Then in future he will always attribute the quality of rudeness to that person and then he will keep avoiding that person.

K: Why?

S: Because you have attributed rudeness to him.

K: No, just listen. I have been rude to you - suppose. Then you avoid me. Right? Why?

S: I am afraid of getting hurt by you again.

K: Wait a minute. You are afraid of getting hurt again. Right? Now what do you mean by getting hurt?

S: Well I don't like the way you have behaved to me. Therefore I avoid you.

K: Quite right. Now what is it that is getting hurt?

S: Well I don't like what you said about me.

K: I know. You don't like what I said about you. Right?

S: Yes. And I'm afraid it will be repeated and I don't want to be insulted again and therefore I avoid you.

K: What is it that is getting hurt? You understand my question?

S: My feelings.

K: No, your feelings - what do you mean by your feelings? What is it - listen carefully - what is it that is getting hurt? You said, me, my feelings. What is 'me'? Think it out.

S: Could it be my ego that is hurt?

K: You come out here! Come on. I am glad you are a boy, there is a girl here, so come and sit here. Now what do you mean by ego?

S: Say, like I think of myself as a person, like I think of myself as someone and someone says I am not that person, it hurts me.

K: That's right. What is that person? What are you? Sit comfortably.

S: Well I think myself to be.

K: I know. What do you think yourself to be? Go on, old boy. You said that you would get hurt if somebody was rude, your ego. Now what do you mean by your ego? Why do you mean you? What are you?

S: What I thought of myself.

K: Yes. What have you thought of yourself? You mightn't like to tell us but what have you thought about yourself? That you are a great man? That you are clever?

S: Yes sir.

K: That you are much more intelligent than me?

S: Yes.

K: Or somebody else.

S: Well I don't know that I compare my intelligence with another person. I mean I just know my own capacity to do something. That's all. But I don't think I have to compare myself with another.

K: I didn't say that. If you act according to your capacity then you don't compare yourself with anybody, do you? But when do you compare yourself with somebody?

S: When you think you are better than that person, or you are worse than that person.

K: You compare with somebody. Now, I compare myself with somebody here, and I feel very dull because he is much cleverer, much more beautiful, has much more capacity, he has travelled a great deal, etc., etc. So I compare myself with him, or her, and I feel dull. Right? Right?

S: Yes.

K: Why do you compare? Tell me.

S: Well you said in a person..

K: No, why do you compare? I compare myself with that person, and I feel because he is so clever, so intelligent, I feel dull. Right? So I ask myself why do I compare.

S: Sir, I think it is because I am bit insecure in myself.

K: Insecure?

S: Yes.

K: Would you come out here too?

S: OK!

K: You compare yourself with another because you are insecure.

S: Yes.

K: What do you mean by being insecure? Careful!

S: Sir, maybe something earlier has happened and I am a bit frightened by it, or a bit hurt by it. Say something happens, take for example if I do better than someone else, and then I compare my performance with that other person and I say, oh, I have done better. When I start thinking that I am not as bad as what I thought I was last evening, and it does give you a sense of security.

K: So what do you mean by having security? Careful! Careful, think it out. Look at it. A man has a lot of money, he feels secure, more or less, he is also frightened but he feels secure. A man who has great capacity, he feels secure. A man who has got a good position, like a good professor in a university, where he cannot be turned out, he feels completely safe. Like the prime minister, getting elected, he feels safe. Right?

S: You are better off than him.

K: You think so, good! You mean the prime minister or the businessman?

S: I think the prime minister would feel much less secure.

K: Much less secure? Yes, you are quite right. So what do you mean by being secure? Listen carefully, listen carefully. Everybody wants to be secure: your father, your mother, you, the prime minister, the guru, everybody, every human being on this earth wants to be secure. Now what do you mean by secure? Careful, think it out.

S: When you have no problems, and no worries.

K: That's right. No problems, no worries. That is one type. Is there a human being that has no problems?

S: No, sir.

K: Right. So he is not secure. Now go on. Who is secure in the world? Is anybody secure in the world?

S: No. Temporarily secure.

K: Temporarily secure - you are a good boy! Where have you come from?

S: Delhi, sir.

K: Delhi? Delhi is the most insecure place. Now, nobody is secure, are they? Nobody. Agree?

S: Nobody is totally secure.

K: Permanently. They may be secure for five years, or two years. There is insecurity because we are all going to die, we may lose our position, a war may come and destroy us, and so on and so on. And yet human beings all over the world want to be secure. Right? Agree? Everybody, including you, me, everybody wants to be secure. And there is no security because my wife may run away, I might fall ill, I might lose my money, I might lose my reputation. Yet the human brain - you understand, you know what the human brain is, do you? What is it? You agreed, old girl. You said, yes. What do you mean by the brain?

S: Whatever is inside our skull.

K: Yes, what is inside the skull. Quite right. Right? What is inside the skull. Now, what is inside the skull? Think it out. What is inside the skull?

S: Something that...

K: No, listen: what is inside your head, there. Be simple and then you will find out lots more if you begin simply. What is inside your skull.

S: Grey matter.

K: Grey matter. Go on. Apart from the matter, the cells, the atoms, and all the nervous - I won't go into all that. So the brain is what you think, what you feel, what you react to, what you act, what you think and so on, it is there. Now - what were we talking about?

S: About the same thing.

K: What do you mean, the same thing?

S: About feeling.

K: I know, but how did we come to the brain?

S: Sir when you were discussing prejudice.

K: Trace it.

S: From prejudice we went to discussing insecurity, from insecurity to what the brain actually is. We said insecurity makes us feel low.

K: Look old boy, you missed a step.

S: Understanding the other person.

K: I know, that's later, earlier you missed a step. Everybody wants to be secure. Right? And apparently there is no security. Right? In the temples, in the gods - Tirupati, or in bureaucracy of Delhi, or the prime minister, or the local chief minister, there is no security. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: But I said the brain, inside the skull, needs tremendous security, otherwise it can't function properly. You get it? Are you following this carefully? The brain, your brain, needs extraordinary security to function properly. That's natural, isn't it? If you want to function properly, physically, you must have a very good body, very healthy body. Right? You must eat properly, exercise properly, rest properly and so on. So similarly the brain which has sought security, has not found security out there, so where will it find security?

S: In itself.

K: Now, you say, in itself. Now careful, think it out. What do you mean by that?

S: The brain can think of itself as something and therefore find security.

K: Now, just think it out. Is thought secure?

S: Not always.

K: No, why? Go on. You began to talk, don't keep quiet now.

S: (Inaudible)

K: I know, old boy, he said to me - what's your name?

S: Ajit.

K: Ajit told me that the brain can think it is secure and therefore it is secure. Right? But I questioned, I said to him, is thought secure? You may think one day this, and the next day that, another something else. So is there security in thinking?

S: Sir, I think so.

K: Come in front then. At last you are all waking up.

S: Suppose you think, OK, suppose I get low marks and when I think, OK, I have the will power I can stand it, then I feel secure, OK I have the will power I can do it. I can say, it's OK. And then you feel secure.

K: I know. So I am asking you, will thinking make you secure, thinking that you are secure?

S: If you get less marks than the others you begin to compare.

K: So you find security through comparison. Right?

S: Sometimes.

K: Sometimes.

S: When you find that you are better - suppose you get more marks and you find you are better off than the other person in study.

K: All right, you get better marks than I do, suppose. You feel secure.

S: Yes.

K: But that person gets better marks than you.

S: Well I don't want to compare with the other person because I want to feel secure, and if I compare with the other person...

K: I know, old boy, that sounds nice but you are comparing.

S: Yes.

K: Yes. Therefore you are insecure when you compare.

S: I will avoid comparing with that person because I will feel insecure.

K: With anybody, not only with that person, will you stop comparing with everybody?

S: No.

K: If you compare with other people you become insecure. Right? Because somebody is much cleverer than you.

S: Yes, but what I am saying is that I won't compare with that person, I'll compare with people who less better off than me. I am looking for security.

K: I understand. So do you ever compare with somebody less than you, or always somebody better than you?

S: Well sometimes it's both ways.

K: Both ways. When do you do that?

S: Quite often.

K: Be honest.

S: Well I really don't know. Sometimes I don't even follow it up.

K: You are too lazy.

S: Well that may be the fact, sometimes I don't even think I am comparing. I don't realize it.

K: We said this, any form of comparison, any form, below or above, makes you insecure. You may compare yourself with me and feel very superior, but there is somebody else who is superior to you, therefore you are always - you follow? So through comparison, we said, there is no security. Right? Clear?

S: Yes, but then it gives you a temporary security. It gives you a temporary security.

K: A temporary security but it is not secure. Right? And I say, the brain, your brain needs security otherwise you can't function. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Carefully listen. We thought there is security in knowledge, passing exams, getting more information, gathering, you follow, getting a lot of knowledge one felt secure.

S: Why do you say that?

K: Why do I say that? That's what you are all doing.

S: Well then you just said that you are insecure.

K: First see what you are doing. You are being so-called educated, god knows what that means, you are all being educated to have more knowledge, aren't you, and you use that knowledge to be secure.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Yes, sir. So is knowledge secure? Will knowledge give you security?

S: That is also a temporary thing.

K: A temporary thing. But when the brain is in a temporary state, isn't it confused? Is this getting too difficult for you?

S: A little.

K: A little difficult. All right. Let's simplify it, shall we? Suppose I have studied, what, engineering, and I am good at engineering because I have passed exams and I have got a degree, whatever that stupid degree is, I have got a degree. And - listen - she has a better degree than me, so I am already insecure.

S: Yes, sir.

K: So my knowledge, however little, or however much, it doesn't give me security.

S: But if you have got the maximum knowledge possible.

K: There is no maximum knowledge. Think it out carefully. I'll show it to you. Are you getting tired of all this, a conversation between the four of us? Are you?

S: Thought makes you feel secure and insecure.

K: Wait, I'm coming to that. That's quite right, boy.

S: Let me ask you a question. Sir, it means you can't work properly unless you have proper security, you said the brain cannot function unless it has got security.

K: Got complete security.

S: Complete security.

K: Not temporary security.

S: Where can you get it?

K: Wait, wait, wait. First put the question clearly: if the brain has temporary security it is not secure.

S: What is security?

K: First see when the brain thinks it is secure, actually it is not secure. Right? It is not secure when it says, I have got knowledge, because you have got more knowledge than I have.

S: Then why do we compare?

K: I said because we are educated to compare. In all your schools, in this school you are given better marks, aren't you.

S: OK.

K: Not, OK. Just see what you are doing first. Here in this school somebody gives you better marks than the other fellow, and you feel a little superior and you get better exams and so on and so on. So we said very carefully, where there is comparison there must be insecurity. Right? So don't compare. Don't say, yes, and then keep on comparing.

S: What will stop us?

K: Stop it because it is silly, it is so.

S: So what we are talking we can't bring in to our daily lives. You have come twice before to Rishi Valley, you have talked, we understand but then we can't put it into our daily lives.

K: Why?

S: Like you are saying, don't compare.

K: Why don't you put things which you listen to in your daily life, why don't you?

S: Because it is something that I don't think is really possible, I don't think it is possible to stop comparing.

K: Wait a minute. Do you see the danger of comparison?

S: No.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Really see it?

S: Yes.

K: Do you see it as dangerous as a cobra?

S: No, sir.

S: No.

K: That's all. If you saw something dangerous you would stop it, wouldn't you? Why don't you see comparison is really a very dangerous business?

S: Sir, I think comparison is very dangerous.

K: We said so. We said it is very dangerous. We have pointed it out.

S: How can we stop comparing?

K: Don't stop it. Don't stop comparing but just see how dangerous it is, how meaningless it is, it doesn't give you security.

S: When we get down to stop comparing we can't do it. I mean understand that it is dangerous for my security and I want to be secure, so I want to stop comparing but I can't stop comparing.

K: Oh, yes you can if you see it really is dangerous to your security.

S: By now it has almost become a kind of built-in habit.

K: So break the habit. Look, if you are scratching your head and it becomes a habit, you stop it. Right? Now just a minute, go slowly. I said the brain which now lives in insecurity all the time, therefore whatever it does is confused, don't agree, see the facts, see that's a fact. The wall is a fact you don't hit your head against it.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Right? So see the brain which now lives in insecurity, without security, whatever it does will be confused. Right? Do you see that? Face it, old boy, don't take time over it. I'll put it another way. Gosh! Are you confused?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Now when you are confused whatever you do will be confused also.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Yes? Clear? Are you quite sure? Don't agree with me, I'm not important. S: Sir, you can have clarity in thinking in some field but then you needn't have it in another field.

K: Begin with one field and you will see what you mean by clarity. How can you be clear when you are confused? How can you be clear when you are seeking security in things that don't give you security? Right?

S: Then do you mean to say that our life is a confused life?

K: Yes, sir. That's just what I am telling you.

S: What do you do about it?

K: What do I do about your confusion? Or what do I do about confusion?

S: Sir, he means what does one do about one's own confusion.

K: Now, all right. That's much better. Now what do you do about your confusion? Do you know you are confused?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Wait, wait. Don't say, yes sir.

S: Well, it's a fact.

K: It's a fact. Now think it out carefully. You are confused. Right? Do you realize whatever you think will be confused?

S: Yes.

K: Of course. Whatever you do will be confused?

S: Yes.

K: Whatever your aunt tells you will be confused?

S: No.

K: She is confused too.

S: It seems if I am confused everything is.

S: No, I don't think that everything you do will have to be confused.

K: If your brain is confused, which you said yes, then whatever the brain does, think, feel, act, whatever it does it is confused. Right? Don't agree with me, think it out. Right?

S: I'm not really sure.

K: You don't understand?

S: No, it's not that. Now I feel confused so I don't know what I am doing.

K: That's it. Therefore let's find out why you are confused.

S: How can I get confused every time I am thinking about it?

K: I'm going to help you, we are going to find out whether we can clear up this confusion. Right?

S: Sir, are we capable of doing it if we are confused?

K: You are not.

S: So then...

K: Wait, wait. That's a good question you have put. You are too quick to answer it. How can a confused brain act unconfusedly? Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: First of all, what do you call confused, who is confused? The brain or the whole of you?

S: The whole of me.

K: Right. Except the physical organism.

S: Well the brain is me.

K: Darling, just listen. When the whole of your physical organism is confused you will be ill. You are not ill now. Right? Therefore the body has its own capacity, intelligence to function properly, the body. You eat, digest and so on, your heart functions, your liver functions and so on, there is the natural process going on. Right? Unless you fall ill, unless you catch a virus, then it becomes ill. Right? Now we are talking about the brain. The brain is confused.

S: Sir, is the confusion of the brain the cause of all these troubles?

K: Yes, sir.

S: So the brain controls the body, it helps us to do things, it tells us what do to, then how can we say that?

S: He is saying that the brain commands the body.

K: Wait, sir. If the brain is confused, as it is, the body is also getting confused, it doesn't know what to eat, it gets ill. They react on each other.

S: So what you mean is that the body is not confused but the actions of the body are confused.

K: Your body is healthy. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: For the moment. Your body is healthy but if your brain is not healthy it is affecting the body.

S: Yes, sir.

K: And the body will affect the brain.

S: Yes, sir.

K: It is an interrelationship between the brain and the body, it's all one.

S: Then how can you get out of that?

K: Yes, that's why I am telling you, asking you to find out whether the brain can clear itself of its confusion.

S: I don't think the brain can clear itself.

K: Don't come to any conclusion.

S: I said, I don't think.

K: Don't even say that. You say, I don't know.

S: But is it capable of doing so, a confused brain?

K: We are going to find out, sir. Right?

S: Let's go on.

K: Find out, don't say, it is capable, or, not capable.

S: If it is confused then how does it do so many things right?

K: What do you call right?

S: In some cases we don't know what to do but in many cases we know what to do.

K: You haven't got the real basis of it, old boy. You may do things out of habit, you may do things out of tradition, you may do something because your educator tells you to do something. And you think you are doing the right thing but you may not be. No, you haven't got the principle, you are going off.

S: But you mean to say that the right thing is right for only one person, for himself?

K: No, sir. If it is right, it is right for everybody.

S: No, what I mean to say is, what he thinks is right, won't be right for everybody.

K: Not necessarily.

S: So you can't say, it is right.

K: No, that's all. You can't say, this is right. Somebody will say, no, that's wrong. So find out for yourself, not what is right and wrong at present, but find out for yourself whether your brain can become clear, unconfused.

S: How do you find out?

K: I am going to show you, help, I am going to point out to you, but will you listen to it?

S: Yes.

K: Wait, don't say, yes. Have you listened to anybody?

S: Yes.

K: Partially.

S: Yes.

K: Yes. Right? So you have never actually, completely listened to somebody. Right? Correct? Now will you listen to me completely?

S: I'll try.

K: Don't try, do it!

S: I have listened to some people completely.

K: Are you sure?

S: Yes, sir.

K: What does it mean?

S: That is without any opinions.

K: Careful, careful. Don't just invent, do it, actually do it. You cannot listen to me or to somebody else if you have prejudices.

S: Yes, sir.

K: If you have opinions.

S: Well if I don't know anything about that...

K: About anything.

S: Well if I don't know anything then I will have to listen.

K: Just listen, old girl, I want to tell you something. Right? Will you listen to me without prejudice, without opinions?

S: Well I don't know anything about that so I can't have any prejudice, because I don't know what it is about.

K: So will you listen?

S: Yes, sir.

K: That means listen very, very carefully. Right? The brain is the centre of all your emotions, your thoughts, your feelings, your reactions, your fears and all that, your brain is that. Right? Your brain is the centre of all this. If you had no brain you wouldn't be able to think, if you had no brain you wouldn't be able to feel. Right? Are you listening?

S: Yes.

K: So the brain is the centre of all your feeling, your fears, your pain, your sorrow, your pleasure, your anxiety, fear, all that is there. Right? Now, so the brain is so confused with all this. Right? So the brain thinks this is right and this is wrong, and so it is creating more and more confusion for itself. Right? Are you listening to it, or are you asleep?

S: Sir, you are asking us to listen without any prejudice, but we know about the subject.

K: I am telling you the story, listen to the story. Right? Listen to the story. I am telling you, the brain is an extraordinary instrument. The brain has invented so many things - the aeroplane, the jet, the computer, the submarine, the quick communication and so on - the brain has got extraordinary capacity. But its capacity is very, very small when it turns to itself. That is, I am afraid, I don't know what to do. You understand? So thinking about itself the brain has become small.

S: Sir, the brain doesn't think of itself.

K: It does because you are selfish. Right? This is too much for these people. Is it too much? Is it too much for you, too complicated for you?

S: I don't know because I don't know what you are trying to get at.

K: Quite right. She says, I don't know what you are trying to get at. What I am trying to get at is, a brain confused, whether it can clear its own confusion. Right? I say to you, it is possible.

S: That one's brain can clear one's own confusion?

K: Do you know your brain is confused?

S: Yes.

K: Now I am telling you, pay attention to that confusion; don't try to say, I must get clear, pay attention to why it is confused. I draw the curtain to prevent the light and I know to draw the curtain back will give me light. So in the same way the brain has the capacity to find it can clear up its own confusion. It has got the capacity, we are not using it.

S: So if we want to we can.

K: Of course you can, of course the brain can. The brain can, being confused, it can find out for itself the cause of the confusion and break the confusion because it has got extraordinary capacity.

S: The brain is me.

K: The brain is you.

S: So I will be doing it.

K: You are the brain. You are not different from the brain.

S: Yes, sir.

K: What you think, what you feel, you are, your name, where you come from, your family, all that is memory, all that is thought. So the brain has this capacity to go in one direction to an extraordinary extent, technologically - you know what it has done technologically? And being self-centred, selfish, that capacity has been reduced to a very small affair. Thinking about oneself is a very small affair. Because it is small it gets confused. A technician is not confused in what he is doing. Right?

S: Yes, but that again is technology, that's another field.

K: No, it is the same brain. The brain can work there with an enormous capacity but it is not working here. You understand?

S: Sir, in the same way a philosopher will study himself but he won't be able to do the technician's work.

K: He may, why not?

S: So in the same way a technician...

K: It doesn't matter. He says, I can do that too, but I am not interested in that, I am interested in something else. Right? First of all, sir, just see your brain, which is my brain also - I won't go into all that, it's not your brain - the brain has an extraordinary capacity, capacity to kill people by the million, capacity, the means of killing people, capacity technologically to communicate between New York and Rishi Valley in a few seconds. That's an extraordinary thing to happen. Right? Now that extraordinary capacity of the brain is limited, made small by thinking about oneself.

S: That means I am limited.

K: Of course you are limited.

S: Sir, does that mean that out of one hundred per cent of our knowledge we use only around five per cent of it?

K: Yes, sir.

S: It is different to say, I am limited, and my capacity is limited?

K: The brain is limited by thinking about yourself.

S: Sir, what are we doing right now?

K: Just a minute, one thing at a time. If you are thinking about yourself as you are, as most people are, ninety-nine point nine per cent people are, thinking about themselves: their ideals, their hopes, their fears, their capacities, their success, their design. You follow, they are thinking about themselves. So thinking about oneself is a very small affair. Of course it is.

S: You can't think of everything all at once.

K: I did not say that. Thinking about yourself is a very small affair.

S: Sir, what you are doing now is a small affair, what you are talking about?

K: No.

S: But then we are talking about ourselves.

K: I am not talking about myself.

S: Well whatever we are saying is from what we hear.

S: Whatever we are talking is part of everyone, it is part of us.

K: Look, both of you are shouting at me. I'll come back to you. You asked me a question.

S: Yes, sir. What you are speaking right now is part of us.

K: Look, sir, we are examining together a human mind, a human brain. The human brain is yours, mine or hers. Right? And I said to you - listen carefully - I said to you, this brain has got extraordinary capacities, technologically, but it becomes very small when it is thinking about itself. Right? Each person thinking about himself, it becomes very small. Right? Therefore the capacity is limited there. And that limited capacity is destroying the world. When you are thinking about your own family, your own goodness, how much money you will have, and I think about myself, we are fighting each other. Right? So every human being is fighting another human being; in the business world, in the intellectual world.

S: Yes, sir.

K: So that becomes a very small affair. Right? Therefore that which is very small becomes the factor of confusion. This is a little bit difficult, leave it alone. Now you have listened to it?

S: I haven't followed the last part.

K: When you are looking after your own little room all day long, and all night long, and all the rest of your life, your own little room, and you don't look at all the marvel of this land, all the colours - look at it - all the colours, the beauty, the flowers, the poor people, but only concerned with your own little room, what does it do?

S: It makes me selfish because I am thinking of myself.

K: What does that do?

S: Sir, does it make us limited to ourselves?

K: Yes, sir. What does it do when you are thinking about yourself all day?

S: It makes us limited to ourselves.

K: Yes, sir, but what does that limitation result in?

S: Confusion.

S: Confusion of yourself, like you keep on thinking of yourself, and you feel confused of what you are.

K: Now just a minute. When you are thinking about your own country, India, India, India, India, what does that do?

S: It makes us insecure.

K: And the Pakistani is thinking, Pakistan, Pakistan, Pakistan. Right? What does it do?

S: It makes a conflict between the two countries.

K: That's right. Right? Conflict. So if I am thinking about myself and she is thinking about herself we are in conflict. Right? Right? Clear? Which means stop thinking about yourself. Will you?

S: I don't know.

K: That's it, nobody wants to.

S: Nobody wants to stop thinking about themselves.

K: That's right.

S: What do we think about then if we stop thinking about ourselves?

K: You will find out, first stop thinking about yourself.

S: Sir, we have to care for ourselves.

S: But if we care for others they will care for us.

K: What?

S: Sir, if we think about the other person, the other person will think about us.

K: Which is, thinking about a person is still limited. It's too complex, we won't go into all this. We have talked for an hour and a quarter. Isn't that enough? Right? I think that's enough for this morning, don't you? Don't be nervous.

So will you do something? Will you sit very quietly, comfortably, sit comfortably. Sit very quietly and find out, or watch every thought that comes into your brain, watch every thought.

All right, sirs.

RISHI VALLEY 2ND TALK WITH STUDENTS 18TH DECEMBER 1984

K: What shall we talk about? What would you like to talk about?

S: Death.

K: You want to talk about death? Aren't you too young to talk about death?

S: Let's continue with what we were talking about last time.

K: What were we talking about last time?

S: Prejudice and insecurity.

K: Oh yes. Have you got a lot of prejudices? You have, haven't you? Lots of them. Are they fun? Do you like them? You know what prejudice does? Suppose I am prejudiced against whom - for whom would you like me to have prejudices, against whom? Won't you suggest some? Suppose I have prejudices against Rajesh - there he is, I caught his eye! Do you know what happens if I have prejudices against him? I won't understand him, will I? My prejudices come in the way in understanding Rajesh.

S: Prejudices for him?

K: You come over here. Come on!

S: Prejudices for him?

K: Against him. Either I like him and therefore I have prejudices in his favour; or I don't like him I have prejudices against him. Right? Now what happens if I have prejudices?

S: You don't understand him.

K: I don't understand him, I don't see what he says clearly. I don't want to understand him. So it is like a dark glass - you understand? If I have a dark glass in the window I can't see the sun clearly, can I?

S: No.

K: So prejudices act that way. I have prejudices against him, they become a block. Right? So I don't understand him. Now will you drop your prejudices if I drop mine? Take time over it. Will all of you drop your prejudices and try to understand somebody? If you have prejudices in my favour you won't understand me. Right? If you have them against me you won't understand me either. Right? So will you drop your prejudices, will you? Have you opinions against me, for me? Have you?

S: Sir, if we expect something out of you do we have an opinion about you?

K: No, no. If you expect me to give you good marks because I like you then that is a prejudice.

S: Suppose I expect you to not make one hour boring. Is it a prejudice?

K: I don't understand the last word. Slowly.

S: Suppose I expect you not to make one hour boring. I have one hour with you in class, let's say. And I don't want it to be boring.

K: You don't want it to be boring - so what?

S: So is it a prejudice, like I am expecting it not to be boring?

K: That's not a prejudice, old boy.

S: Like when you prejudge.

K: Prejudge is not prejudice. It is almost a prejudice. If I prejudge you, I can't see you directly, can I?

S: Sir, isn't it a prejudice if I expect the class to be interesting?

K: Come over here, that's your punishment!

S: Isn't it a prejudice if I expect the class to be interesting and I find it isn't?

K: I saw you the other day, didn't I, here?

S: Yes.

K: Yes, all right. What were you saying?

S: Isn't a prejudice if I expect the class to be interesting and I find that it is boring.

K: That is not prejudice. I want to teach you something about the flowers. Look at all those flowers. Marvellous, isn't it. I want to talk to you about it, and you might find it boring. That's not prejudice.

S: But then it is prejudging the class.

K: No, I want to tell you: look at those beautiful flowers, how nice they look, and the green lawn, green hedge, I want to show you them.

S: But I am not expecting anything out of them.

K: I am asking you to look and you don't even look. That's not prejudice. I am asking you: look at all those flowers, the green, the different kinds of green, and the yellow flowers. And then I say, look at all the people all round you, all these boys and girls, look at them carefully. All of them: those boys who are sitting out there who won't talk, and all those people who are sitting here, watch them all. Is that a prejudice? Or you don't want to watch them, therefore you consider it is a terrible bore.

S: No, I don't know anything, so I just...

K: Just watch them. You don't know anything about those flowers, do you?

S: No.

K: You see the beauty of it. You see the beauty of it all? The green, the varieties of flowers, colours. Does colour mean anything to you?

S: Well it looks beautiful on trees and flowers.

K: No, I said colour, not the flower which is specially beautiful, just colour. Now who has got the brightest colour here? That girl with the red jersey. Does colour mean anything to you?

S: It can mean so many things.

K: No, I am asking you about one thing, old girl. I am asking you, sirs, out there, do all those colours in this valley and the rock on that hill, I don't know what you call that hill up there, and that rock early in the morning with the sunlight on it, does it mean anything to you? When you look at all this beauty around you, does it mean anything? Do you appreciate all this extraordinary valley?

S: (Inaudible)

K: Come over here, there is plenty of room! Sit up here, come on, old girl, don't be shy, there. That's good.

S: Like when you see them every morning you feel happy, it means you have seen something nice. So it really means something to you, your heart can rejoice.

K: But do you get used to it?

S: Yes, you get used to seeing it.

K: Why do you get used to it?

S: Because you see it everyday.

K: I know. Just listen: if you get used to me and I get used to you, what happens? I don't listen to what you are talking about, and you don't listen to what I am talking about. Will you?

S: I don't get that. Like, you can always listen to someone. I may be going with one person every day, but still I may know that person, it means not know that person.

K: Of course. Don't get used to anything. That way you keep alive. If you look at those flowers - look at them, turn round and look at them, carefully look at them. Look at Kabir, sitting out there, and Mrs Jayakar and Radhikaji, there, against the background. Isn't that beautiful? And do you get used to it?

S: Yes.

K: Yes, why?

S: Because I see it everyday.

K: No, beauty is not seeing something every day, that later in the day will be totally different, won't it?

S: Yes.

K: In the mid afternoon it will be much more bright, and towards the evening it will have totally different colours, won't it. Can you get used to it? You can't, can you? So don't get used to anything: don't get used to your father, your mother, or to your teachers.

S: But then we have a routine in school, then we get used to it, what is different in a routine every day?

K: Your mind then becomes routine, your mind then goes round and round like a gramophone.

S: Well that doesn't mean that I think along the same lines every day, but the routine, the things we do every day, we get up at 5.30, we go for breakfast, we go for classes, that's a routine.

K: No, wait a minute. Wait a minute. Why do you call it routine?

S: Because that's what happens every day.

K: Listen to what I am talking about, don't be so quick to answer. Why do you call it routine?

S: Because we do it every day.

K: Do you do everything every day and call it routine, or are you aware what you are doing every day? Know what you are doing? Get up in the morning at 5.30, cleaning and all the rest of it, are you aware that you are doing it? Do you pay attention to what you are doing? Or do you do it casually and get on?

S: Yes, I do it casually.

S: Not always.

K: I am asking you do you do this every day, conscious, aware, know what you are doing, when you are cleaning your teeth do you know you are cleaning your teeth? Do you watch very carefully?

S: I don't.

K: No. Why? If you watch carefully it never becomes routine. You understand what I am saying? Are you still here? Good! Do you watch carefully everything that you are doing every day? Why? If you watch everything you do every day it gives you much more, aware, you watch everything then. You watch all those tamarind trees with their fruit, and that rock over there. It is an extraordinary thing to watch.

S: It is.

K: Will you do it?

S: I do it.

K: Every day, every minute, not just casually one day. All the time watch, all the time watch people, watch what they say, how they dress, and all the rocks here, and the trees. You learn much more by watching. Will you do it? If you say to me you will do it, if you promise you must keep your promise. Otherwise don't promise. Right? Don't promise if you can't do it. Will you promise? Careful!

S: No.

K: Quite right! So when you don't watch carefully everything you are doing, what you say, how you dress, how you clean your teeth and so on, your mind becomes routine, mechanical. You understand? If your mind becomes watchful then everything you are doing becomes much more fun.

S: Isn't it something mechanical even if you watch it.

K: No, it depends how you watch. Nothing becomes mechanical if you know how to watch.

S: How do you watch?

K: I am going to tell you. Will you do it first?

S: I'll try.

K: Don't try, do it.

S: That's easy to say.

K: I know it is easy. You all want to be very comfortable, easy. But I will tell you how to watch - not 'how', what it means watching. I will tell you what it means to watch. Will you follow it carefully?

S: Sir, then won't it become a routine to watch?

K: Of course not. But I haven't told you what it means to watch. Then you can call it routine or not. Right? Will you learn from what I am saying? Learn, find out, will you? I have asked you, look at those flowers, see the beauty of it, see the colour of it, enjoy it, have fun with it. Don't hurt them. You know. I'll tell you.

Scientists, biologists, have discovered that trees communicate with each other. If one tree gets diseased - you understand - it tells the others, be careful, guard yourself against me. Do you understand? They are much more intelligent than human beings in some ways, because when you are ill you don't tell the others, keep away from me!

S: Of course you do, sir.

K: You do.

S: If you have conjunctivitis...

K: Wait a minute. Now I am going to show you how to watch, will you learn?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Good. First you watch with your eyes, don't you, look. Look at those almond, tamarind trees, look at them, look at them. Do you see them?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Now wait, watch it. And you see the rocks behind there?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Now how do you watch it? Are you thinking while you are watching?

S: No, sir.

K: You have learnt something, haven't you? That you are not thinking when you are watching.

S: Right.

K: Right? Then do you watch with your eyes only? Or do you watch altogether? Not only with your eyes, but the feel of it, the colour of it, the depth of the trees, the shadows, the little shadows, do you see them? Do you see those dragonflies flying?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So you see everything when you are watching. Right? Agree? So when you watch very carefully, that way I am showing you, then you watch me, or watch somebody else very carefully, what happens? You have a friend here, haven't you?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Watch him.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Now who is your friend, that boy?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Right. I thought so, I thought it was your friend, you two sat together and smiled together. Now watch him, or watch somebody else. Carefully watch them, how they sit, how they look.

S: I can't watch them, sir, they are smiling.

K: They are smiling, then see them smiling. So that when you watch very carefully you begin to see things you have never seen before. Right? If you watch that carefully, you saw all those dragonflies, you saw the shadows deep down, there is a man going by on a bicycle, do you see it?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So when you watch you begin to learn much more.

Now the next step is you not only watch with your eyes, but also listen to all the noise going on. Listen carefully. People coughing, people moving, never sitting still. Right? Watch and listen. Right? So watch, listen and learn.

S: Is there learning while you are watching and listening?

K: I haven't finished, old boy. Find out what learning is. Now listen carefully, listen carefully. When you watch and when you listen you are learning, not merely memorizing, you are learning to see all the things that are happening around you. Right? Are you doing it? Who is there? Look, you learn from books, don't you, or you learn mathematics?

S: Yes, sir.

K: What else are you learning?

S: History, we are learning biology, learning chemistry, learning geography.

K: So much already! English, mathematics, geography, history, chemistry.

S: Biology.

K: Biology.

S: Physics.

K: You must be a great man! Now - I am joking, right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: When you are learning what is happening? You have got a book, your educator points out, the teacher informs you. You are memorizing, aren't you?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Memorizing, which is what? You are recording as it is recorded on a gramophone plate. Right? You understand what I am saying?

S: Yes, sir.

K: You have a gramophone, haven't you in your school?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So you put on a plate and it repeats, repeats, repeats. Right?

S: Right.

K: Are you doing that?

S: While studying, yes.

K: You are memorizing, not learning. You are memorizing. Right? Because at the end of the school, at the end of the term you are going to be examined. And you must answer quickly so you memorize. Now memorizing is like a gramophone record repeating, repeating, repeating. Right?

S: Yes.

K: Is that learning?

S: I mean when you are beginning to memorize then you are learning.

K: No, at the beginning. Afterwards you repeat.

S: Yes, afterwards it is not learning.

K: At last. Have you got it? Have you learnt it? Do you see something? That is, I don't know, what language, German. I don't know German, I speak Italian, French, a little bit of English, a little bit of French, a little bit of Italian. If I want to learn German I have to study it, haven't I? I have to look at the words, how they are pronounced, the meaning of the word, and the irregular verbs and so on and so on, all that I study, memorize. Right? My brain records everything - all the German words, the syntax, the irregular verbs, it memorizes, that is, it records. The brain records, and then at the end of four months, three months, or whatever it is, you begin to speak German. Right? When you record like that all the time it is like a gramophone that is recording.

S: So it is just like memorizing, it is not learning.

K: That's it, that's all I am saying. Memorizing is not learning.

S: Then by watching you learn.

K: Wait, first see it. First see memorizing is not learning.

S: Until you finish...

K: Wait! You are too quick. But do you see this fact, that memorizing is not learning? Memorizing is repetition because you have to pass an exam, you have got to get a job. Right? So learning is not memorizing. So what is learning then?

S: Each time you watch you are learning something.

K: That's right. Right, you have said something true. Each time you watch you are learning, because things change. You understand? If you are watching those trees early in the morning they have quite a different light, haven't they? And later on in the day it has a different light, there is a different movement, different shades, different colour, you are learning.

S: Each time you...

K: Come over here! I am going to have all the class round here. Give her some room, old boy.

S: Sir, when you see people, when you see them every day...

K: Don't get used to seeing people every day. Watch them.

S: But there isn't anything new in them always.

K: How do you know?

S: Sir, I don't think so. Every time the same ones...

K: Do you know your body cells are changing, so people are changing. I am not the same as you saw me yesterday, I may have moved, I may have changed, I might do all kinds of things. I am a living being, it is only dead things that don't change.

S: And if we watch them then we can find out.

K: That's right. If you watch them you learn because then as you watch those trees the first thing in the morning they are different. Right? Different colour, different movement, different depth of light. Right? Different shadows. It is just like that human being.

S: Sir, I see the change in the trees and that, but I don't know why I don't see it in people.

K: Because you are lazy, because you don't want to look carefully at people. Right?

S: Yes.

K: So watching, listening, and therefore learning, not memorizing. Is that clear?

S: Yes.

K: But do it. Now in India specially they have a lot of theories, about god, about heaven, about - a lot of it, nothing to do with their daily life. Right? The daily life counts much more than your gods and theories. Right? So watch your life. When you promise something always keep it. So don't promise without realizing that you must keep it.

S: So you watch what you say, you watch what you are doing. Like when I watch a tamarind tree I must have that realization in myself that I am also watching.

K: Yes, you are watching yourself. I am watching those trees and I am also watching myself. I am watching what I am saying, whether I tell the truth or lie, I am watching my various annoyance, anger, jealousy, fear, I am aware of all that. You understand? As I am aware of those flowers, I am aware also of myself. Right? It is much more fun watching yourself because you are changing, you are different. One morning you are depressed, the next morning you are happy, the third morning you are irritated. Right? Will you do all this, or just say, yes, yes, and carry on?

S: I have watched myself.

K: Will you do it?

S: Yes.

K: Promise?

S: Yes, I will do it.

S: No. I will try.

K: You promise? Careful!

S: I think I will do it, sir.

K: Not, "you think you will do it". But do you promise to do it every day? That means you must keep it. Don't promise now.

S: I'll try to do it.

K: Not, try. Either do it, or don't do it.

S: But I want to do it.

K: Then do it. You see, just listen, if you do that you become extraordinarily alive, your brain becomes extraordinary, so sensitive. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: You are not sensitive. You are very young, you are not sensitive.

S: Sometimes when I am thinking of something I don't realize I am thinking, I am so caught up in that thinking. Whereas sometimes, suppose I am watching a tree, I know that I am watching a tree. I am aware that I am watching a tree, and I am watching it at the same time. Whereas sometimes I am thinking, I don't realize that I am thinking. So I am not watching myself at that time.

K: Wait, wait. Realize that you are thinking. Watch your thinking. Why you think, what makes you think that way, watch it, watch everything that you are doing.

S: Sir, but sometimes I am so caught up in that thinking.

K: Just listen carefully. Now listen. We are talking to each other, aren't we, so we are thinking too. Right? And we may think silently and put it into words. Right? That is what we are doing now. You think and you put it into words. And you want to tell me something, so I am very careful to convey what I want to say to you.

S: Sir, but sometimes you don't think and then put it into words, the words come.

K: Yes. Why is that?

S: Sir, doesn't it become mechanical again?

K: That's just what I am telling you: don't become mechanical. Don't become mechanical. You have got glasses, right? Find out if you can do without glasses.

S: I can't.

K: Don't say, you can't.

S: I can't see anything without my glasses.

K: Find out, old girl! I am supposed to be ninety, I don't have glasses. Do you know why?

S: Because you can do without them.

K: You are nuts!

S: Sir, but she knows she can't do without them, she has tried it all before.

S: Yes, that's why I got glasses.

K: Find out if you can see clearly without glasses. If you can't then find out if you can do eye exercises.

S: I am doing that.

K: That may improve it. But if you keep on saying, "I must have glasses, I must have glasses".

S: No, I don't do that.

K: But you are doing it, you say, "I can't see without glasses".

S: That's because it is a fact, but I am doing exercises to see without glasses.

K: So remove your glasses and make an effort.

S: One question sir: you asked us to start learning and stop memorizing.

K: Memorizing, as I explained to you, old boy - listen carefully - memorizing becomes mechanical. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: The brain that is inside the skull is always recording.

S: Yes, sir.

K: I say, that is yellow, that's green. Right? Those are trousers. It is recording. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: That recording becomes mechanical.

S: Yes, sir.

K: and then being mechanical your whole life becomes mechanical.

S: Sir, but isn't it a fact that...

K: Wait, darling, I haven't finished with this chap. You jump on me before I have finished. Right. Ask your question afterwards. Remember your question. You understand? If I all the time am recording - green, white, purple, yellow, he is my friend, he is not my friend - right - it is like a gramophone.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Right? So memorizing is not learning. Learning is all the time something new.

S: Like when you are studying something.

K: You have to learn that. You have to study it.

S: We have to memorize then.

K: Wait a minute. I am your teacher. And I want to teach you history. Right?

S: Yes.

K: I want to teach you history. You must know all the kings, and all the rest of all that silly rot. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: It is silly rot. You must know who was the king of India in the 15th century and so on and so on. Right?

S: Why do you call it silly rot?

K: It is silly. At the end of it it doesn't affect your life at all, does it?

S: But if you want to become something, or do a course.

K: That's it, you memorize in order to become a professor.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Yes, sir. You memorize in order to get more money.

S: Get what?

K: Money, better job.

S: Not necessarily, sir.

K: Ah, yes. If you don't have good memory you won't have a good job. Have you watched the carpenters? Those people who build beautiful furniture? I have. They must know the quality of the wood. Right? The quality of grain and so on, and the instrument they use. They are very careful so they memorize, they become an apprentice first from another carpenter, they learn by that, memorize, and then they become good carpenters. Right? Now I want to teach you history - just listen quietly, will you? Will you listen, or you are off somewhere else?

S: I am listening, yes.

K: Good. I want to teach you history. History means story. Right? It is a story of all the past kings, past queens, all the wars, etc. etc.

K: And also story means story about yourself.

S: Yes, sir.

K: Story about what is happening in the world, and story also about yourself. You are a much more interesting story than the story of all the kings.

S: I agree, sir.

K: Agree? Right, sir. So I am going to talk about not only the history according to the books, but also I am going to talk to you about the story of yourself.

S: But that is not what we do in class.

K: I know they don't. I said, if I was your teacher I would do that. You understand?

S: Yes, sir.

K: I would combine both - the book and also about yourself.

S: That is a very far possibility of your ever being a teacher.

K: What? Slowly, slowly.

S: Sir you couldn't ever be a teacher.

K: Why not?

S: Not on a subject as such.

K: Ah, I said I would combine both. I would combine the book.

Right? And also I would combine the history about oneself. The history about oneself is the history of all mankind. Right?

S: So the history of all mankind is the history of oneself.

K: Which is yourself.

S: So if you study the whole of mankind we are studying ourselves.

K: That's right.

S: So then we are studying the whole of mankind.

K: You are not listening to what I am saying, old boy. I am saying, telling you, if I was a teacher of history, the meaning of history from Latin is 'storia' - storia means history. In Italian it is called storia, it comes from Latin and so on. Now I am going to talk about what - who is your king in the 15th century.

S: There are so many kings, sir.

K: So many of them, quite right. Give me one of their names. Come on somebody.

S: Babu.

K: Barber?

S: No, B-a-b-u.

K: I thought you said a barber! I know, that's a joke. So I would teach you, I would say, Babu was the father of Humula, right? And Humula's son was Agba - right? So I would go into all that. Right. And also I would say, what about you, you are also story, you are a great story, much greater than Agba. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So I would talk to you about yourself. I would say, what are you? You have a book about yourself inside you. Learn to read that book, you understand?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Are you sure you understand what I am saying? Don't say, yes, sir. I am saying, the book about Agba, there are many volumes that have been written about Agba. And there is a volume also in yourself, what you are.

S: So you said that...

K: Are you listening to what I am saying?

S: Yes.

K: There is a book inside you which you must learn to read. But you neglect to read that book. So I am going to see that you learn to read that book - not only the book of Agba but the book about yourself. So I am going to go into that. I would teach you that way. That is a most marvellous way to learn: not only what is happening in the world outside you but the extraordinary book that you have inside you, the book that is the rest of mankind - not just Indian history.

S: Then why doesn't it happen?

K: Because your teachers don't do this.

S: Sir, well you are President of the Foundation, why don't you do something?

K: I am the President of the Foundation, he says, why don't you do something about it. You are quite right, sir. But they won't listen. Wait, they won't listen.

S: But they are like us.

K: Quite right.

S: Probably they...

K: Just listen carefully. The teachers are like you, only much more grown up. Right? I am not insulting them. You understand? I am very polite, respectful, I respect people, I don't insult them. They are like you, so learn from each other. You understand? I am learning now from you, why you say things and don't mean it. Do you understand? Why you say, yes, sir, yes, sir, and don't mean it at all.

S: Yes, I do mean it.

K: That means you live it.

S: My 'yes' meant that I understand it.

K: First understand but live it. Right?

S: So I don't...

K: Listen, old boy, don't say anything in your life if you don't live it. If you don't live it you become a hypocrite. Right? Say one thing and do something else, that is hypocrisy. Right?

S: Sir, I am not saying anything, I am saying I understand what you are saying.

K: I said to you, understand what I am saying, I said, don't say anything that you don't mean. If you mean it, say something, and if it is right, be honest. If you say, "I lie", say, "I lied, sir". That's honesty. Right? If you are angry, "Yes, I am angry", don't pretend. Grown-ups do. That is the only difference.

S: Everyone is different, no one can be the same.

K: Yes, sir.

S: I mean I tell everyone honestly like I am angry, I am this, everyone isn't going to say that they are angry also.

K: What?

S: Suppose I am having a fight with someone...

K: Why do you have a fight with someone?

S: Because he...

K: Hey! Why do you have a fight with someone?

S: Because we have come to a disagreement about something.

K: Why do you have disagreement? Learn, don't say, I have disagreement and fight him, learn. If you fight now, when you grow up also you will fight, that becomes violence. You know all over the world violence is spreading, you know that, don't you? They are killing each other, wars, terrorists, you know. You understand? They are killing each other, that is tremendous violence in the world. So don't be violent, don't get angry. When you get angry say, "I am angry, I apologise", don't fight.

S: If you don't fight someone else may take advantage of you and bash you up.

K: Perhaps not. If I don't get angry with the man who wants to get angry, he might quieten down.

S: Might.

K: Might, I said, might.

S: But then...

K: Wait, wait.

S: But suppose the other person is going to hit me, just because I am not angry with her?

K: If I don't react, you understand? You are angry with me - right? Suppose you are angry with me, I won't react to you, I won't get angry, I won't hit you back: see what happens.

S: Sir, sometimes it might aggravate the person.

K: Not 'sometimes'. See what happens if you get angry with me and I don't get angry with you in return, something happens between us. Right? If you call me a fool, I don't react by calling you another fool, I don't react, I keep quiet. So my keeping quiet affects you - not always because people are not gentle enough. So you learn. My god! I wanted to talk about something totally different from all this.

S: Sir, I don't understand where all this is leading us.

K: You don't understand - she has asked a question. She says, I don't know where you are leading us. I am not leading you anywhere.

S: What are we talking about?

K: What I am talking about is: learn to watch, which is one of the most difficult things to do. Learn to listen, and learn to find out the way of living, not just repeat, repeat. Right? That's what I am saying this morning: don't become mechanical.

S: Sir, you said you wanted to talk about something different. So why don't you start the topic. Why don't you start talking about something?

K: Because, sir, I wanted to find out what you were wanting first. Right? I wanted to find out - it's more polite, isn't it, to find out what you wanted to talk about.

S: Well we want to find out what you want to talk about.

K: Quite right. Now I can talk to you about it. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: First I ask you. Right? I serve you tea first, not myself.

S: Yes, sir.

K: In the same way I ask you first what you would like to talk about, and you jump, and say all kinds of things. After you have finished if there is time I will talk about what I want to talk about.

S: What do you want to talk about?

K: What I wanted to talk about this morning, if I remember rightly, was are you sensitive?

S: To what?

K: Sensitive. You see, your immediate answer is, to what? We are not talking about 'what'. But in yourself are you sensitive? You know what it means to be sensitive?

S: To feel.

K: To feel.

S: Alert.

K: Alert.

S: Understand.

K: You are sensitive to those flowers, aren't you? Are you sensitive to people?

S: People.

K: All around, these boys and girls, grown-up people, are you, sensitive to see what they are feeling, or how they look, what they do, sensitive?

S: Sir, only to people who are around me most of the time.

K: Yes. Not even that.

S: Not all the time.

K: No. So are you sensitive? You say, occasionally I am sensitive. That's not good enough. It's like having a bad potato. So I was going to talk about sensitivity. Then I was going to talk about what is your relationship - you understand the word - what is your relationship to what is happening in the world? You understand what I am asking? Your relationship. You are related to your father and mother. Right? Are you related in some way to the rest of the world, to what is happening in the world?

S: Yes.

K: Wait, wait, listen to me. Two thousand five hundred people were killed in Bhopal, and hundreds and thousands of people hurt, what do you feel about that?

S: I feel sad.

K: You feel sad, then what?

S: You feel that carelessness takes place everywhere. Just due to a small leak, sheer carelessness.

K: So are you - listen carefully what I am asking - are you sensitive to other people's suffering?

S: No, sir.

K: Wait, I have asked you a question. Are you sensitive to other people's suffering?

S: Sir, quite often I am the one who inflicts the suffering.

K: You are being very clever, old boy. I am asking you a question, you are also asking something else. I am asking you - I am as clever as you are - I am asking you, are you sensitive to other people's suffering, strangers?

S: Not as much as others.

K: You are not. That's it. You are not. Why? You know yesterday, the day before yesterday I was walking down there, there were two girls, blue with white stripes, students. They walk six miles that way, six miles that way, twelve miles a day. Are you sensitive to how they feel about walking all day?

S: No sir, because it doesn't affect me. It doesn't affect my life.

K: Quite right. So you are not sensitive to others.

S: Only myself.

K: You are selfish.

S: Sir, quite often you are sensitive. You feel sorry for a person, like when people died in Bhopal.

K: I said to you, look, don't be clever with me, are you aware of those boys and girls walking twelve miles a day, not having enough food, they are suffering, how do you feel about all that? You don't care?

S: I do care.

K: Then what do you do?

S: What can I do, sir?

K: You can't do very much, but you can tell Mrs Thomas and Mrs Radhikaji, and say, look, let's find out how we can help them, let's find out a bus for them, so that they can go there and come back. You work for it, you do something, you don't say, yes. Right? Right? Will you do it?

S: Sir...

K: Wait a minute, I am asking. Will you go to Mrs Thomas and Radhikaji, and say, please sirs, or ladies, we must do something about it. Will you? Hey, will you? Or you don't care?

S: I do care, sir.

K: Then go to them, as I am going to them. I want to have a bus for those children. I would pick them up and drive them there, or have a school for them all here, out there - not just out there! I am working, I am going to talk, I am going to raise trouble if they don't do it.

S: You can, sir.

K: You do it, you help me to do it, will you?

S: If you tell me, I will.

K: I won't tell you, you go and do it. That's where your independence is.

So I want to talk to you about sensitivity; I want to talk to you about your relationship to the world. You are growing up, you are going to leave this lovely place, Rishi Valley, and go to college, university, get married, children, and jobs, and quarrels, and misery, all that, which your life is going to be, and what is your relationship to the rest of the world, to violence, to politics, to the tremendous corruption in this country? Right?

S: Then you would become so selfish if you have all that...

K: You don't get selfish, you are concerned. You are concerned with this tremendous corruption.

S: Sir, what can we do about it?

K: Don't be corrupt.

S: Yes, but how...

K: Wait, you haven't listened, you are too quick. Don't you be corrupt, fight for it, stand for something that you think is wrong.

S: And if someone disagrees fight him?

K: I meant fight in the sense, you don't get corrupted.

S: So I don't get corrupted but...

K: It doesn't matter, leave the others, don't you get corrupted.

S: I do.

K: When you grow up, now you can say, yes, I won't get corrupt, but when you grow up and go into business.

S: It won't be any use if only one person is not corrupt.

K: Begin with yourself first.

S: OK, so you are not corrupt - I am just giving an example - and you go for a job and there is the managing director interviewing you, and he directly asks you for a bribe or you don't get the job.

K: Don't get a job. Why don't you stand for something?

S: Without a job I cannot live.

K: Don't live.

S: Then what is the purpose of coming into the world?

K: Find out. You see you are all so weak, you give in. Suppose you say, no, sorry, I won't be corrupt, and you collect people around you, you work for it.

S: Sir, but if there are only five people around me...

K: That's good enough. Begin.

S: Sir, suppose there is a person who is incorrupt, but like he is insensitive, and everybody around him is insensitive, how will they know what he is trying to do?

K: I will tell them. I am doing this. Listen to me. I am going round the world saying, religions as they are, are rubbish. Right? They don't like it, I don't mind. If they say to me, you can't come into this country, I don't mind. I can always come back to Rishi Valley - if they will allow me. I don't mind. But you people mind, you are all so frightened.

S: Sir, but we don't have anything else to do, if we go for a job and don't get it then we don't have anything else to do.

K: If you don't get a job...

S: You don't want to be corrupt and you don't want to accept the bribe, you don't get the job, then what can you do after that?

K: Become a gardener. What is wrong with becoming a gardener, what is wrong with being poor? Educatedly poor - what's wrong?

S: How do you live?

S: What is the use of this education?

K: What is the use of this education? Probably none at all.

S: Being literate you can't go for gardening.

K: Then you do something literate. You people never - you are all so - I won't use certain words - you are all so mediocre. That's what I am objecting to.

S: What does that mean?

K: Mediocre means - in the English language, mediocre means going up the hill half way, never going to the top of it. You understand that? Don't become mediocre.

S: Why have we given such positions to people, like a gardener, we say that he is something different from us, and none of us want to become gardeners because it will be something...

K: Because I don't mind being a gardener, I don't care what people think, whether I am a minister or somebody, I don't care. I do what I think is right.

S: So if we all do what we think is right.

K: No, that is very difficult to find out what is right, not what you think is right - what is right. That's very difficult. Right? I think this is right - it may be wrong.

S: Everyone around us tells us, you must do this because this is right.

K: That is just tradition, that is the authority. I want to find out what is right - don't you? How will you find out?

S: Sir. won't that be an opinion. Right for one person can be wrong for another.

K: I said to you, old boy, you didn't listen, you didn't listen. Everybody thinks he is right in his own way. Right? You think this is right, another thinks that is right, or wrong, but I want to find out what is right - listen carefully - under all circumstances, under all pressures, under all what the public says - I want to find out what is right. Don't you? And it is difficult to find out what is right. To find out what is right you cannot have opinions, judgements, convictions. Right? So if you perceive what is right when there is freedom...

S: Only when you have complete freedom.

K: Complete freedom, that's right. When you have complete freedom then you see what is right.

S: Sir, but how do you gain freedom?

K: How do you gain freedom? You don't gain freedom. Freedom exists, comes, if you are not attached, if you are not self-interested - you understand? If you are not selfish.

S: Then you are free.

K: Then there is freedom, then what you see then is right.

S: But I can't live alone in the world.

K: I don't mind living alone in the world.

S: No, sir.

K: You mind it, you are frightened.

S: So how do you get rid of selfishness?

K: How do you get rid of selfishness? Shall I tell you a very simple way? Don't be selfish!

S: It is not the same though.

K: Just listen girl. Don't be selfish. You know what selfishness is. Don't be. Don't say, I am going to get rid of it, don't be selfish. Therefore learn what it means to be selfish, watch.

S: Everything leads to watching.

K: Yes, sir. Watching. You learn an infinite lot watching. I learn a great deal by watching you walking down the road, how you walk, how you talk, what you say, whether you say exactly what you mean, or trying to double cross - you follow? - double talk. I learn, I watch. That's one of the things. First I wanted to find out if you are sensitive; then what is your relationship with the world; then are you different from the world? The world is violent, are you violent? The world is corrupt, are you corrupt? The world is violent, are you violent? Right? The world is saying, I am British, I am French, I am an Indian, I am a Russian, I am a Muslim. Right? Therefore there is conflict among us. So I won't be any of them.

S: Sir, the world is also saying I am Chi, I am Gotham.

K: Of course you are Gotham, you are a different name, that is natural. But don't be nationalistic.

S: Isn't it the same thing, sir, when I say my name is this, and I say that this is my country, isn't it the same thing?

K: Quite right. That is selfish. You identify yourself with something greater but selfishness still remains. Now wait a minute, it is now quarter to, nearly. Right, we have talked an hour and a quarter. They are all getting restless, so let's stop. Will you sit quietly now for five minutes, absolutely quiet? Don't move, take a comfortable position, then sit very quietly, really quietly, don't cough, close your eyes and see what you are thinking. (Long pause) All right sirs. Thank you for listening to me.

RISHI VALLEY 3RD TALK WITH STUDENTS 20TH DECEMBER 1984

K: What would you like to talk about?

S: Pride.

K: Pride. Are you proud?

S: Sometimes.

K: Sometimes. Why? What are you proud about?

S: Achieving something.

K: Achieving. What have you achieved? Or you are admiring people who have achieved, or do you want to achieve? Is that what you want to talk about - pride, achievement, success, money, position, power - is that what you all want? Probably you all do. Don't fool yourself, don't deceive yourself, you all want to have those things.

S: No, sir, we all want it because in this world we can't live without those things.

K: In these times, the boy says, we can't live without those things. How do you know?

S: Anyway you see a poor man...

K: You come out here!

S: Anywhere you see a poor man, or anything, sir, they'll argue if you don't give them anything, or if you try to make them a nice man, they won't give you any respect.

K: So what do you want to be?

S: Anything which we can have a respect for living a happy life, but not too much respect.

K: You are quite right - not too much respect but a fairly comfortable life, and a happy life. Is that it?

S: Yes.

K: Is that what you want?

S: Yes.

K: Then go after it.

S: Sir, but it is not so easy unless you try and achieve it.

K: Any other questions?

S: What is the difference between meditation and concentration?

K: Do you really want to talk about that, or is it a game, or just fun to talk about something I may be interested in, is that it? Do you really want to know what is meditation and concentration? All right, sir. If you really want to talk about that will you pay attention to what I am going to say?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Don't say, yes, sir, and fidget. Do you really want to talk about it? If you do it is a very, very serious subject. What do you think is concentration?

S: Something which you really want to think about, sir. Think about deeply, go into it deeply, think about it deeply.

K: Think about it deeply.

S: Think about it deeply.

K: Think about it deeply - what do you mean by that?

S: Something which we want to keep our minds on.

K: Come over here! Something you want to keep you mind on. Right? Have you tried it? You want to look at those flowers, or your book, or what your educator is saying. Have you ever looked very carefully, at those flowers, what the teacher is telling you, listen to him, and concentrate on a book, have you?

S: Sometimes.

K: Sometimes. When does that happen? When you like it - right?

S: Yes.

K: Now when you like something you put your attention, your thought, your energy in observing it. Right? And that is generally called concentration. That is, you concentrate on the book you are reading - right - or on something that you are looking very carefully at, those flowers, or what your friend, or your teacher is telling you. Right?

S: Yes.

K: Have you ever watched very carefully, concentrated on something for a long time? Not for a second or two but for a long time, have you done it?

S: I don't know, sir.

K: Try it now. Try now to listen very carefully to what somebody is saying to you, or look at those flowers for a long time, not allow any other thought to come in. That's what concentration means - focussing, giving all your attention to something that you are listening to, or reading a book, or watching something, a lizard going across the wall. Will you do it, are you doing it now?

S: Yes.

K: You are? Good! Now when that takes place what happens?

S: We understand it.

K: Not only you understand but what is happening? I'll explain to you presently, you think it out for yourself. Where do you come from?

S: Bangalore.

K: Bangalore, good. I have got two boys - now two girls?

Now he wants to know what is the difference between concentration and meditation. Right? You don't know the word meditation, do you, what it means, no. Nor do you know the meaning of the word concentration.

S: Now I do.

K: Now you know because I have pointed it out to you. So concentration means focussing your thought, your energy on something.

S: Sir...

K: Come over here! Move a bit so that we give her more room, she is a big girl. Right?

S: But isn't it difficult to concentrate on something without any thought in your mind?

K: That's it. Is it not difficult - listen to it carefully - is it not difficult to concentrate on something without thoughts coming in.

S: I think it is.

K: It is difficult, isn't it. So then what do you do?

S: We try and keep the other thoughts away.

K: Away. Then who keeps the - oh, I won't make it complicated for you. So you concentrate on a book and other thoughts come in. Right? Then what do you do?

S: You try to keep them away.

K: Yes, you try to push other thoughts away. Now what goes on in that process? I am concentrating on this, thoughts come in, then I try to push them away, and then thoughts come in. So I keep this, don't I. Right?

S: Yes.

K: Are you listening to what I am saying? If you are not interested don't bother.

S: I am thinking of an answer which you could give correctly.

K: I can't understand.

S: I am thinking of an answer which you could give correctly for it.

K: Look, sir, I was telling you when you concentrate on something other thoughts come in. Right? Then you try to push those thoughts away, and then you try to concentrate. So there is this going on all the time.

S: But why do those thoughts come in?

K: Wait, wait, I am coming to that presently. First see what is happening. You want to concentrate on something, then thoughts come in and then you push them out, again thoughts come in and again you push them out. So you really are not concentrating, are you? Because thoughts come in and disturb you. Now he asked, why do thoughts come in. Right?

S: Yes.

K: You tell me why thoughts come in. I will tell you.

S: I think it is because we think about those things. Because when we are doing something something else happens and you think about it.

K: Yes, that is, you are thinking about this, you are also thinking about something else. Is that it?

S: Yes.

K: Why does this happen?

S: Sir, if you are thinking, concentrating...

K: Come and sit here! Sorry, three boys and a girl.

S: Sir, as you try to concentrate, I keep thinking that I should not allow thoughts to come in and so they come in.

K: Yes, why do they come in?

S: Because you keep thinking about them.

K: But you are also thinking about this.

S: Because we are suppressing them.

K: That's right. You have got it. You have understood what you have said? Not quite. You are trying to concentrate on this, other thoughts come in, then you try to suppress thoughts, only the other thoughts except this. Right? So what is happening when you suppress? I suppress, I am uncomfortable, I have eaten bad food, and I am full, and I try to suppress my pain. Why do you do that, why do you have suppressions, why do you suppress?

S: Because we think it will be nicer, if you suppress they won't come again so you suppress it.

K: That's right. So he says, when you suppress them they come back again. So it is futile to suppress. Right? It would be wrong to suppress, futile to suppress. Then what will you do?

S: If you are really thinking about something very seriously, sir, there are no other thoughts.

K: But other thoughts come in, old boy.

S: But when you are really thinking without any other things why should they come in?

K: Now wouldn't you try to understand why thoughts are always moving back and forth? Right? Wouldn't you ask that question?

S: Because we suppress thoughts come in and we can't control them and we lose our concentration. So what should we do because, sir, is it possible that if we just leave it the other thoughts will go by themselves?

K: I haven't quite grasped it, have you?

S: If you don't do anything with the other thoughts, will they go away?

K: Would you come up here? Sit up here, don't be nervous. This is a very complex subject, isn't it? Most people, grown-up people, young people, are told from childhood - are you listening, listen carefully - from childhood you are told to concentrate. Right? You want to look out of the window and the teacher says, concentrate on your book. But you are really interested in watching that lizard on that wall. Right? And the teacher says, don't look, pay attention to the book. So from childhood you are interested in watching the lizard but the teacher says, do this.

S: Yes.

K: Now if I were your teacher I would say, let's both of us look at that lizard - you understand? Not try to force you to look at the book. You have understood what I am saying?

S: Yes, sir.

K: That is, you are watching that lizard - there is no lizard here! And your interest is in that lizard, not in the book. So I, as a teacher, would tell you, let both of us watch that lizard very, very carefully, see how it sticks to the wall, how many claws it has, see the head, see the eyes. Right? I would help you to watch much more than the book.

S: Sir but I have got a question, sir.

K: What?

S: If the teacher - OK, in a class children get distracted at different times, like I might get distracted at a certain time and another person might get distracted at another time. And if the teacher tends to all our distractions, sir, how will she cover the portion?

K: I am going to show you. You are all so very clever here, aren't you? First of all I have no distractions. Don't call it distractions. What is important is that you watch, pay attention, listen, that's important. But there are no distractions. Don't use the word 'distraction'. Right? Now, wait a minute, I help you to watch that lizard, or I help you to watch that boy sitting over there being restless, fiddling with his fingers. Right? What I am helping you - not helping - what I am showing you is when you pay attention to something, whether it is right or wrong, then you can pay attention to the book. You have got it?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Are you sure?

S: Yes, sir.

K: That is, when you pay attention to that lizard you have learnt the art of attention. And I am going to help all the boys, twenty or fifteen boys with me to pay attention. And when there is attention there is no distraction.

S: Then why don't teachers do that sir? Suppose we get distracted in the class.

K: There is no distraction, don't call it distraction.

S: Suppose we want to watch something, then why don't the teachers help us to watch that thing?

K: Ask them. I am telling you - come over here, two girls.

Come up here, that's better! All right? You are not shy?

S: No, sir.

K: That's better. You are asking why don't your teachers tell you all this. Right? Why don't they tell you?

S: Sir, I think they want to finish their particular whatever they wanted to teach us.

K: That's right. They want to get it over. They are bored, you are bored. Right? And they want to quickly finish what they have to say and get on to the next subject, or the next class. So they are bored with teaching. Right? Now find out from them why they are bored, why they want to finish quickly, why don't they help you to pay attention? You understand? If you pay attention to that lizard then you have learnt the art of attention. Right? Have you got it? Then you can pay attention to the book, then there is no distraction.

S: But...

K: Wait, wait, wait old boy. I haven't finished. If I were your teacher I would point out to you very carefully what attention is. Right? Attention is to pay complete energy, attention, to what you are watching. Right? And if you learn that you can learn how to pay attention to your book.

S: Yes, sir.

S: You might be interested in the lizard only, and you might not like studying, you won't be interested in your studies.

K: Somebody might not like to study. Then don't study.

S: Sir then...

K: Find out, sir, find out. Learn. Find out why you don't want to read books. Now you listen to me.

We have talked about concentration, that is, you are thinking, paying attention to something, then other thoughts come in, and you push those thoughts out. And so there is always this conflict - wanting to pay attention to that, thoughts come in, and so there is constant chattering of the brain - chattering, chattering, chattering. Right? Got it?

Now meditation, the word meditation, you know what that word is, you have heard about it?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Meditation in English means also to measure. Right? To measure. As in Sanskrit, if you ask Radhikaji, she will tell you, 'ma' is also to measure in Sanskrit. So meditation also means to measure. Now without measurement there is no technological advancement at all. Agree? See that? Do you see all this, what I am saying?

S: I didn't understand that word which you said.

K: You don't understand the word I am using?

S: No.

K: I am using to measure. You have a tape measure, haven't you? Meditation means also measurement.

S: I think he doesn't understand the word 'technology', technological.

K: Ah, you don't understand the word 'technology'. Technique - to do something, say for instance you want to build a car, and you must know all the parts, put them together, they must all work together. I have dismantled a car, put it all to pieces, and then put it all together hoping it will work. But it did work. Right? Learning about all the machinery, how it works, what are its components, what are its measurements, its metallic strength and so on, all that, learning about that is called technology, some of it.

Now meditation, concentration, for me, are two entirely different things.

S: Sir, quite often you concentrate without even trying to concentrate. Like you will be doing something, there is no need to concentrate, you will be concentrating.

K: You can do something - if you love something you don't have to concentrate. Have you understood that?

S: Yes, sir.

K: If you love something there is no concentration. Do you love something?

S: Quite a few things.

K: You love quite a few things. What are they?

S: Sir, I like reading books.

K: Flying kites?

S: Yes, sir. Flying kites.

K: Climbing mountains, climbing trees, chasing monkeys. What do you really love?

K: No, just a minute. This is too complex a subject for little boys. Meditation means to be free of measurement. This is too difficult for you all.

S: Concentration is something which you force and do something, and meditation might be where you don't force anything.

K: That's right. Meditation can only take place when there is no effort, when there is no contradiction. You know contradiction, saying one thing, doing another thing. Right?

S: Sir, suppose you like reading, then you are really concentrating on it, isn't that meditation, where you don't know you are concentrating?

K: No, no. You are then trying to understand what the book is saying.

S: You don't know you are concentrating. Like he said you don't know you are concentrating but you are concentrating.

K: That is when you like something, when you like to read a good detective story, you enjoy it, don't you. This is too difficult for you. Don't bother about meditation and concentration. It is much too difficult. Right?

S: Yes.

K: A little bit. Now I would like to talk about something else. May I?

S: Yes, sir.

K: I have asked you what you would like to talk about, and then after asking you all these questions I would like to talk to you about something else. May I?

S: Yes, sir.

K: All of you?

A: Yes, sir.

K: Yes, sir!

Human beings, like you, have capacity, have some kind of hidden talent. Talent, you understand, that is to paint, to play the violin, to play the flute, or to be a very good human being. You, human beings have hidden talents. Right? And your society, your parents, everybody says, become a business man - or become a doctor, or become an engineer, or become Indian Administrative person, the Service. So your brain, you understand, what is inside the skull, is conditioned by your parents, or by the society in which you live. You understand?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So your own talent is destroyed by this pressure. You might be a great painter. Right? Or a great singer, or a marvellous botanist, horticulturist. Right? But your parents, your society, say, no, that is not good enough, you must become a really good businessman, or a good doctor, or I.A.S. So you destroy your own talent. And what is important is to have your own talent, then you are happy with it. You understand what I am saying?

S: Sir...

K: Listen to what I am saying. I am talking. And you are listening to me. That is one thing: human beings have essentially hidden a certain talent. Right? Not always to become a businessman, or a captain in the army, or a flyer. So you have to discover your own talent, and stick to that talent, whether you become poor, rich, successful.

S: Sir, but if you want to be a businessman and by the side of it you can also sing, or paint, or whatever.

K: Clever boys - you have trained these boys beautifully! They say you can become a businessman, or a General, or an army captain, and also paint. Do you follow how his brain is working. You are quite right. Then you will do neither thing properly, fully, happily.

S: Why, sir?

K: Because you are torn between the two.

S: No.

K: I know this, I know this. You understand? Wait a minute, I am talking for a while. So it is very difficult also to discover your own talent. And it might not lead you to success. It doesn't matter then. You understand? Then you don't mind not having much money because you have got something in yourself. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So find out, all of you, find out your own talent, something of your own, not imposed by education, by your parents, by society, but find out something that you have for yourself.

S: But if our parents want us to do something.

K: I know your parents force you to become an engineer, force you to become something or other. But while you are young play the game and say, yes, I accept that, and find out for yourself.

S: But supposing something happens to you.

K: I know, just listen to what I am saying. Because I have got something more to say. Right?

S: Yes.

K: You don't mind?

S: No, sir.

K: And also you are going to enter into a world when you leave this marvellous valley, with all the rocks, and the shadows, and the trees, and the flowers, and the really peaceful campus, you are going to face a world that is terrible. Right? There is violence, kidnapping, shooting, bribing. The world is becoming more and more dangerous. Right? And the world is becoming corrupt, all over the world, not only in India, where it is quite blatant. You know what the word blatant means? Quite open. They say, give me something before I will do something else. There is corruption.

Right? All over the world, not only here in this country, but in America, in France, in England - political corruption, social corruption, black market and so on. There is tremendous corruption all over the world. We say that corruption is bribing, passing money under the table, paying cash without giving an account. All that is called corruption. Right? But that is only a symptom. Do you know what symptom means?

S: Yes, sir, signs.

K: Do you know what symptom is? Symptom is I have eaten something, very heavy food, and I have got tummy ache. The tummy ache is the symptom. But the cause is my eating the wrong food. Got it?

S: Yes, sir.

K: So I want to go into the cause of corruption. We say corruption - I hope you are all listening because you are all going to face the world when you leave Rishi Valley.

S: Sir, supposing if you don't take the money he is giving, sir, he might do something worse. If you take the money...

K: If I give you money under the table you become corrupt.

S: Yes, sir.

K: And then you also become corrupt because you are accepting money. Right?

S: Yes, sir. But if I don't take the money he might do something.

K: I know, I know. If you don't take it he will hurt you. Just listen, understand, what is the cause of corruption. You understand? Corruption isn't merely passing money under the table, bribing, black market, but the cause is something entirely different. Right? I am going to go into that if you are interested.

Corruption begins with self interest. Do you understand this?

S: Yes, sir.

K: If I am interested in myself, in what I want, what I must be, if I am greedy, envious, harsh, brutal, cruel, there is corruption. You understand? Corruption begins in your heart, in your mind, not just giving money - that also is corruption but the real cause of corruption is inside you. Unless you find that out and change that you will be a corrupt human being. Do you understand what I am saying? Corruption is when you are angry, when you are jealous, when you hate people, when you are lazy, when you say, this is right, and I feel this is right, and stick to it. You understand what I am saying?

S: Sir, it seems like everything comes under selfishness.

K: Everything comes under selfishness. You are quite right. Corruption begins there. You understand, old boy?

S: Yes.

K: So don't be corrupt. It doesn't matter if you die for it.

S: Sir...

K: Wait, listen to me. You understand? We are all so frightened. You say, how will I live, what will I do if I am not corrupt when all the people around me are corrupt? You understand what I mean by corruption, not just the outward sign but the deep inward sense of corruption that human beings live with - selfish, thinking about themselves, wanting their success, envious - you understand? So corruption is inside, in your heart, in your brain. So if you understand that very carefully, and you are really serious, not cynical, most of those grown up boys who are going to leave have become cynical, they see what the world is, they say, well I have got to accept it. That is a form of cynicism. But if you understand very carefully from now that corruption is not merely passing money under the table, bribing - bribing whether it is two rupees or ten million dollars, it is still bribing. And being violent is part of what is called corruption, terror, all that. That is what is happening in the world. You are a human being growing up, don't be like them. Don't become angry, don't be envious, don't always seek success.

S: Sir, how can we stop all that? How can we stop being envious?

K: If you want to be envious be envious and see what happens. You understand? But if you don't want to be envious, don't be envious. Don't say, how do I stop it? If you see something dangerous, like a cobra, nobody tells you, you run. Right? So corruption inside is most dangerous. Right? So don't be corrupt. Begin there first, not out there. You understand? Will you do it? Don't promise. Don't ever promise unless you are absolutely going to carry it out. Right? But if you see how important it is in life because you are all growing up, growing into this terrible world, this insane world. You understand? There is no sanity in the political world, in the religious world - right - in the economic world, there is no sanity.

So please, I am just pointing out to you, whether you are grown up, or leaving this marvellous valley, or staying here for another two, four years, don't be corrupt, inside, don't seek vanity, proud, pride, don't say, I am superior to somebody else. You know you learn a great deal when there humility. You know the word humility? You learn a great deal if you are really humble. But if you are merely seeking success, money, money, money, power, position, status, you understand, then you are beginning with corruption. You might be poor, be poor, who cares. That's why it is important for you, for all of you, to find your own talent and stick to it even though it doesn't bring you success, fame, and all that, which is all nonsense anyhow because we are all going to die. You understand, old boy? While you live, live, not with all the rubbish that is going on.

S: Sir, why don't people realize this?

K: Because they don't think, they don't feel, they are thinking about themselves all the time, their job, their administration, their work. You understand? They are not interested in this. But if you are...

S: How do you stop being selfish?

K: How do you stop being selfish. Don't be selfish. Just listen. Don't ever ask anybody, how. You understand? Then they will tell you how, then you are lost. That is the biggest corruption.

S: You mean we must find out for ourselves.

K: Find out, enquire, use your brain, doubt, question. Don't merely accept. I am your teacher, suppose I am your teacher, I want to see that you have a very good brain. Right? To have a good brain means not to have conflict in yourself or with somebody else. I think all this is too much.

S: I wanted to ask you, sir: supposing you are not selfish and somebody does something to you?

K: If someone does harm to you, what will you do? Hit him back?

S: It depends on the depth of what he has done.

K: Yes, you have said it. By jove, you are quite... If he hurts you deeply what will you do? Have you asked what it means to be hurt? Go on think with me, think with me.

S: Sir, is it corruption again to be hurt?

K: Just listen. Suppose I hurt you very deeply - suppose, I don't want to hurt you - suppose I want to hurt you very deeply. Now you say, I am hurt. Now what do you mean by that? Use your brain.

S: Sir...

K: Don't repeat.

S: Physically?

K: Yes, not only physically but inside, he hurts you. He calls you a fool.

S: Sir, I think...

K: Just listen carefully. All of you listen carefully. He calls you a fool, and you get hurt. Right? Have you found out what gets hurt? Careful, careful!

S: If you think you aren't a fool and then someone comes along and tells you that you are a fool...

K: Look, somebody calls you a fool and somebody calls you a great man - they are both the same, aren't they. Do you understand what I am saying? Somebody calls me a fool, an idiot, and I get hurt - suppose. What gets hurt? Careful, think it out, don't reply quickly, think it out. Think it out.

S: Sir...

K: No, I won't listen. I said think it out, carefully think it out. I am asking you - I call you an idiot - I hope I am not saying that. And you get hurt. What do you mean, you getting hurt? What is you?

S: Your ego.

K: Think it out, old girl, think it out.

S: It is me, my ego.

K: What is you?

S: I am one...

K: Come over here, old boy. Sit here. Come on, don't waste time. I know you, so go on.

S: Sir, what is hurt is me, what I have build of myself.

K: What you have built of yourself, which means what?

S: Sir, what has been achieved, what I have achieved, what I have done.

K: What you have done, what you have achieved. Why are you all so accustomed to achievement? You all talk about achievement. Like your father, your mother, your grandmothers, they have achieved. Right? They have become successful you mean.

S: No, sir, what they have done to themselves.

K: Yes. Say for instance, I have been all over some of the world. Right? I have talked to various thousands of people, I have been to the United Nations, all kinds of things I have done. Right? Which means what? I have built an image, a picture about myself. Right? Picture about myself. You come along and say, you are an idiot - and I get hurt - suppose. What gets hurt?

S: Your feelings.

K: My feelings, my image.

S: The image of yourself.

K: Yes, that's right. The image of myself because I have travelled, I am a great man, I have written books, I have seen Mrs Gandhi. You follow? I have built an image about myself; that image gets hurt.

Now the next step, listen carefully. Can I live without image, any image?

S: Can you, sir?

K: Can I? Yes. I wouldn't otherwise talk about it. That is dishonesty to talk about something that you yourself are not living.

S: Sir, but...

K: Wait, wait, listen to what I am saying, old boy. So have you an image at this age? Of course, all of you have images. And those images get hurt. And all through life you will get hurt as long as you have those images.

S: Should you forget them, sir?

K: Leave them, don't have them. Somebody - many people have flattered me and many people have insulted me. I have no image, I can't get hurt, it doesn't matter. You understand?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Be like that. Be - that is where corruption begins.

S: Sir, but how do you get rid of your images?

K: How do you get rid of images. If you see they are dangerous you will get rid of them immediately.

S: Sir, if you get rid of them, what is left of you?

K: Nothing!

S: Then what are you?

K: Wait. Listen to what I said. Be nothing and then you live.

S: Sir, those might have images of you but we shouldn't have images.

K: Let the others have images, don't you have them.

S: Sir, sometimes we don't have images...

K: Not 'sometimes'. Are you talking seriously, or theoretically?

S: No, suppose a person can...

K; Why do you suppose?

S: If a person doesn't have an image isn't he likely to feel insecure?

K: Be insecure. Know you are insecure. Then find out what is security. But if you are always seeking security you don't know whether you are insecure. But first find out for yourself if you are insecure, what it means, physically, inwardly, and so on.

S: Whether you have an image or not you are insecure.

K: Whether you have an image or not, you are insecure. I am asking you, have you found out if you are insecure, or are you just talking?

S: Sir, I feel insecure about some things.

K: Wait. Find out what it means - what it means to be insecure. Either you are insecure physically - right - or economically, or insecure in public opinion - right - or insecure in money matters, or insecure in your relationships. Find out.

S: And then what?

K: When you learn where there is insecurity then you are secure. Get that, old boy.

S: Sir, do you have an image?

K: Listen to what I said.

S: Yes, sir.

K: You get it? When you find out for yourself, what is insecure, where you are insecure - with your family, with your father, with your mother, with your wife or husband, with god? You understand? Find out, learn about it. The moment you know and have learnt a great deal about insecurity, then you are out of it, then you are secure.

S: Sir, if you learn a great deal about insecurity, you don't know the full insecurity.

K: Oh yes you will. Sir, if you begin rightly - you understand - then what is right is at the beginning. This is too difficult.

S: Sir, are you saying, live with insecurity to find out what it is.

K: You are insecure, not live with insecurity. You just now said, I am insecure. Live with it, find out. Use your brain to find out. Don't become mechanical.

S: Sir, to get rid of insecurity we have to get rid of fear first, no?

K: Fear. Right? Now I am going to show you, you have to learn, not from me, learn. What is fear?

S: Fear is the thing which we think about.

S: The thing you don't know about.

K: Wait, sir. You don't listen to somebody else first, you are always ready with your own questions. He said - do you know what he said? You don't because you didn't listen, because your own question was more important; that is selfishness. Right? He said, fear, how is one to be free of fear. You meant that, didn't you. Right? So first listen to that question. He said, what is fear, how is one to be free of it? Now do you know you are afraid?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Yes, sir! Why?

S: I think it is because I think of something which makes me feel afraid.

K: Now just a minute you have said something tremendous. I don't know if you are aware of it. You have said something very true.

S: Then if we don't think of something...

K: That's it. You have learnt the first thing, that thinking brings fear. Right?

S: Yes, sir.

K: Right? So you have to find out what is thinking, not how to stop fear. You understand? You just now said very carefully, that thinking brings fear, which is true. I might die tomorrow and I am frightened. I might lose my job, I am frightened. Right? So thinking brings fear. Then what is thinking? Now go step by step to find out. What is thinking?

S: Sir, is it that to get rid of fear we have to get rid of thinking?

K: No. I said never get rid of anything because it will come back.

S: Sir, OK, you said if anything is dangerous you wipe it out by yourself.

K: Yes.

S: So you see that fear is dangerous...

K: No, first listen carefully. I said to you, fear, he said, fear exists, comes when you think about something. Right? Fear I might die, fear I might lose my job, fear of my father, fear of my teachers. So as long as you are thinking about the future - right - there is fear. Right? Now you have to find out what is thinking.

S: It might be selfishness.

K: Yes, wait, wait. I am asking you something, first listen, old boy. I am not trying to stop you. What is thinking? Carefully. Use your brain.

S: What the brain does.

K: No, use your brain to find out what is thinking.

S: Imagination, sir.

K: Imagination, go on.

S: Sir, what you have seen you record and you think about it.

K: That is good, you are beginning. You are recording, aren't you. That is - oh lord! I'll show you. Our brain, what is inside the skull is recording. You are recording mathematics. You are recording geography, history, you are recording. A tape is recording. This is recording, down there. You understand? I am talking, electrically it is connected to that machine, and that is recording on the tape. Our brain acts exactly like that. It is recording. Right? Mathematics, history, geography, your father - it has recorded your father. Right? Now, wait a minute. What do you mean by recording? Think it out, use your brain.

S: If you recall something back.

K: What do you mean recording? Isn't it necessary to record?

S: Yes.

K: Why?

S: Sir, to...

K: No, isn't it necessary to record? I hope the older boys are paying attention to all this because it is their life. So recording is necessary when you write a letter, when you drive a car. Right? When you have to pass an exam - unfortunately - when you record that you have a father in some place, and a mother. All that is recording, that is necessary. Now there is also another recording. I get hurt - you get it?

S: Yes, sir.

K: There are two kinds of recording: the recording of driving a car, writing a letter, becoming I.A.S., becoming an engineer. Listen carefully, old boy, you are following? And there is also another recording, me first, I am selfish, I want this, I want success. Right? So these two are recording all the time. Which is recording is memory, isn't it? Memory of your father, memory of your mathematics. Right? So recording means memory, which is repeating. Do you see this? When you learn mathematics you are recording, you are repeating, memorizing - like that tape. So you become mechanical. Like that tape is mechanical, it repeats, repeats, repeats - I am a Brahmin, I am a Brahmin, I am a Brahmin. I am a Hindu, I am a Hindu, I am against Communist, Communist, Communist. And so on. Our brains then become conditioned, limited, small. Right?

So thinking is part of memory. You can't have memory if you haven't met your father, if you haven't seen your father, your mother. So you have seen the father and your mother, and that is stored in the brain as memory, and also that is knowledge, and knowledge is based on experience - of course.

S: I am memorizing.

K: You are memory. You understand? You are memory, the whole of your being is memory - memory that you are atman, memory you have got a soul, memory there is light inside you, memory that there is god. It is all still memory. You listen carefully, find out if it is true what the speaker is saying, or it is a lie. You understand, find out. You are memory, without memory you are nothing - memory of your name, memory of your family, memory of mathematics, memory of going up that hill, memory of your friend. Right? So you are memory. Memory is something dead, gone.

S: Then how are we alive?

K: Because the organ, you have food, you have air, water.

S: Then how can we...

K: Find out sir, that is the great point. You understand? Find out what is truth. Memory is not truth.

S: Sir, what do you mean by truth?

K: You can't describe it. What is the flower, what is that flower. Look at it. You never ask when you are looking at that flower, what is it, how did it come, the beauty of it. Please learn something. Beauty is truth. You understand? Beauty is truth - the beauty of a good life - good life, not successful life.

Now sirs, it is ten to eleven, will you sit quietly for minute? Sit quietly. (Long pause) All rights, sirs, thank you.

SAANEN 1ST PUBLIC TALK 8TH JULY 1984

What a lovely morning this is, isn't it? A great silence, specially very early in the morning, just as the sun is rising. All the snow capped mountains, the deep valleys, the vague shadows and the sense of great immensity that is beauty. Beauty is very important in our lives, not merely the romantic side of it, the imaginative side, but the sense of utter silence, specially when you wake up in the morning, looking out of the window when there is no car passing by, no chattering of people, and this great immensity can only be seen or appreciated when the self is not. What corrupts our daily life, as well as nature, and the beauty of the earth, is our narrow little minds, our selfishness, our brutality, violence and all the corruption, and the wars that human beings are preparing. All that denies the immensity of life, the goodness of life, the goodness of freedom and the beauty which is not romantic, that beauty that demands great austerity, a sense of a brain that is at rest, not chattering. This beauty is truth, this beauty is goodness. And we search for it all over the earth in different ways, following various leaders, scriptures and obeying and disobeying, pursuing various pleasures - all that denies surely the great beauty and the immensity of life. Why is it that we have reduced this immensity of life, which is immense, why is it that we have made it all so petty, personal, destructive, utterly meaningless? I wonder if one asks this question of ourselves, and one hopes that you will be doing this during all these talks, that we are together going to question everything in our life, doubt everything in our life.

Doubt is an extraordinarily important thing, not scepticism. To observe every experience that one has, doubt that very experience, doubt that very thought, doubt that very feeling, so the brain becomes extraordinarily cleansed of all our accumulated experiences, tradition and so on. This is what we are going to do during all these talks. This is no personal, or personality cult. Please understand this. We all want to cling or worship, or feel near some one person. We are accustomed to that. And we are saying this is not a personality cult at all. So please don't build an image about him, the speaker. The speaker is not very valuable. What is valuable, what has significance, is what he is saying. And to understand what he is saying you must question, not accept a thing. Which means you have to observe, one has to observe one's own reactions, one's own attitudes, justifications, defences and so on. Then it is possible for both of us to communicate with each other, not theoretically, not in abstraction but actually, because we are going to take a very long journey together, no detours at all. We are going together to watch this whole phenomenon of life, of which you are. And also please bear in mind that this is not an entertainment. Because we are used to being entertained, it is our habit; cinema, television, books, novels, we want to be entertained. And religions have become that too, a form of entertainment. So please bear in mind throughout these talks that this is not in any way entertainment. The speaker is not trying to help you. Please bear that in mind very seriously. Because if he is out to help you then he becomes the leader, a man who then conducts you, tells you what to do and so on.

So this is not entertainment, nor an intellectual feast. Because we must use our intellect, it is part of our daily life, it is part of our biological construction. But those of us rather neglect the intellectual capacity and treat the whole thing as a kind of romantic, theoretical, activity. So the speaker is not helping you but we are together, if you will, think, observe, feel the whole extraordinary complex phenomenon of daily living. Please be serious about this, that the speaker is in no way your guide, or the abomination of a guru. That means then you become merely a follower. And generally the followers destroy that which is truth.

So we are going together to think, and that is one of the most difficult things to do because each one of us has opinions, very strong opinions, very strong conclusions, biased, prejudices, conditioned according to our particular pleasure or experience. So one becomes isolated and thinking together becomes almost impossible. I do not know if you have not noticed this, even between the wife and husband, girl and a boy friend and so on, they can never think together, observe together the same thing, the same reaction, the same intensity, at the same time, but there is always this division: "I think, you think", "It is my opinion, my judgement" and so on. So please first see how difficult it is and arduous, it requires great attention to think together. Because thinking is very important in our life. All our action is based on thinking. And now as each one of us feels separate, individualistic, with his own gods, with his own experiences, with his own prejudices and so on, and thinking together, if we could do that, it would be a marvellous thing. If one could put aside, at least for this hour, put aside our prejudices, our opinions, our tendencies, idiosyncrasies and observe, not according to your observation or my observation but to observe the mountains together, the beauty, the majesty of those hills, the splendour of sunshine, the running waters, the extraordinary glory of the earth, together. And our difficulty is also that we have - we are caught in words. You have a certain meaning to words, or the speaker has a certain meaning to words. And we use the words to communicate, which we must. But also if one can realize our brain is caught, trapped, captured in words. I wonder if one realizes that, how words have become extraordinarily important. And so it becomes very superficial when we are constantly using words, which have become a slogan, repetitive, mechanical - I am British, I am French, I am German and so on. But to go much deeper, beyond and above the words requires an extraordinary alertness, not to be trapped by words. And then only it is possible to think together. Can we do this this morning? Actually be aware of one's own prejudices, opinions, dogmas, our own particular attitudes and put all those aside for a while at least, if you can do that. Then we can think together. Then we can work together.

And also it is important to realize that this is not an activity of stimulation. The speaker is not trying to stimulate you. He is not acting as a drug so that you are stimulated for this morning and let it peter out during the day. So it is not a stimulation. It is not a propaganda, to make you think in a certain way. He is not propagating any ideal, any theory, any belief, because theories, ideals, beliefs, dogmas, have separated human beings. There are the totalitarian ideals, and the ideals of the so-called world of freedom. They are at war with each other. And we are also at war with each other, this perpetual conflict in our life. If you cannot get on with one person either you break away from that person, divorce, all those extraordinary divisive processes that are going on in our daily life. Please listen to the words and see if they are true, if they are actual, if they have any meaning in our daily life, or these talks and gatherings are something separate, utterly unconnected with our existence, with our daily conduct. If this is possible, one hopes it is, we can then go into very, very complex problems of life.

To approach a complex problem - because our life is very, very complex, the society is very complex, relationship is very complex, our labour, going to the office, all that, the whole psychological as well as social, outward existence, is extraordinarily complex. There is no ready answer. There is a ready answer if one goes through with it, sees it clearly right from the beginning. Our life is complex therefore we must approach it very simply. That will be our difficulty, because our brains are very complex, they have had thousands of experiences, have accumulated great knowledge, both biologically, psychologically, externally. We have great knowledge about almost everything. I do not know if you have seen lately on the television the birth of a child, how it is conceived, all the complexity of the cells and so on. So our brain is a very complex machine. To understand that we must approach it very, very simply. But we have very complex minds - brains. We are never directly simple. Simplicity is not merely having one meal or few clothes, and so on, that is very complex too. Simplicity means to have no prejudice, like and dislike, no personality entering into it. To look at the beautiful sky of an evening, with the sun just over the hills, the radiance, the extraordinary light and the clarity, to observe all that requires great simplicity of brain, not chattering everlastingly. It requires that sense of silence to observe the great immensity of a sunset.

So if all this is fairly clear between us then we can proceed. But please this is just the foundation, the first couple of bricks. Unless we lay very deep foundations you cannot go very far. The first movement matters enormously. Whether that movement is precise - which is the brick - precise, correct, impersonal and it becomes impersonal when you are considering the whole of life, objective, non-romantic and sentimentally. And that is what we are doing now, laying the first brick. Having laid it, if you are willing, if you are pursuing it, then we must enquire into a very complex problem which is time.

We are together, I am not - the speaker is not telling you but we are together observing it. To observe is not through the words but just to look, to look with your eyes first so the perception is very clear. That perception is denied when you have problems; when you have problems you can't see clearly - right? So together be free for this morning at least to observe the whole content, the significance of time. Because we live by time - sunrise, sunset, the evening star, and the morning light, the dark and lightness. There is the time of yesterday, time as tomorrow, time as now. Time is now as you are sitting there. So there is time to cover a distance from here to there, time to learn a language, time to write a letter, time to acquire skills, time to experience. So we live by time, both outwardly, externally and inwardly. Please this is very important to understand because we are going into something which both of us must really understand, not just theoretically, not in an abstract sense but actually. Because if we understand the nature of time then perhaps there is a possibility of understanding that which is beyond time. That is much more complex. Don't jump to that. First we must understand what is, what actually is. And therefore we are enquiring into what is time. You are enquiring too. As we said, time to cover a distance from here to your home, to become an excellent carpenter, to become a great scientist, to write a great novel, requires time. And so on. And also there is time inwardly: I will be, I must be, I must achieve enlightenment - whatever that may mean! I must reach God, Heaven - you know all that implies time. I am this, violent, but give me time and I will be free of violence. Please see this actual fact in yourself. The speaker is acting merely as a mirror in which you can see yourself. When you see yourself clearly the mirror can be thrown away. The mirror is not important but what is important is what you see in the mirror. The mirror if it is clear, without any distortion, it shows exactly what your face - how you look and so on.

So we are together enquiring into time. We have described time outside, by the watch. We met here exactly at ten thirty, it was exact when I sat on the platform. And there is time also inwardly. One is an apprentice and gradually one becomes the master, that takes time. You are a business clerk in an organization and if you are good at it you become gradually the manager. That attitude, that way of thinking has spilled, has extended over into the psychological world - I am this, I will be that - right? We are understanding each other? So there is time outside, by the clock; time inwardly, time between now and death. Right? Now we are going to enquire much more deeply into the nature of time.

First of all one must use our brains to find out, not just accept.

The intellect's function is to discern, judge, evaluate, but if you brush aside the intellect as being too lop-sided - intellect is part of our structure, part of our being, as emotions. But if you merely cling to your emotions and say intellect doesn't matter, or if you are merely intellectual - so we must have the capacity to look at the whole of it with our brains, with our intellect, with our feelings, with our nerves and our entire being - right? If you can do it. That is why it requires great attention, watching every movement of thought. I don't know if you have ever done that. Watching without trying to distort every thought, never letting a single thought escape. That requires attention, watchfulness, great self awareness. So time there is as the past, the present and the future. Right? Time as the past, all the accumulated knowledge, experience, all the incidents, the things that we have done which we regret, the things we want to do, which is the future, the things that are being done now - right? So the present, the now, is the past - of course - is the present and also the future - right? Do we understand each other, this? Because it is important to understand in order to communicate what we are going to say still further.

We are saying, the speaker is saying that all time, all time is contained in the now. That is, the past is contained in the now - that is simple, you can see that. You are your past - right? Your memories, your incidents, your experiences, your failures, your regrets, your remorse, your guilts, all the tradition that you have been brought up in, both the religious and sectarian, the whole of the past is time. Right? We are supposed to be on this earth as human beings forty five thousand years, or more. Think of the vast accumulated knowledge that we have had. Forty five thousand years of striving, conflict, misery, unhappiness, joy, sorrow - right? All that is the past. Clear? All that is now, as you are sitting there, all that is what you are now. And the now also contains the future. I will show it to you. You see I am showing it to you - I don't - you understand, you are not meeting it. Like two friends walking along in a shady lane, talking about all this. Two great friends who have known each other for some time. There is no animosity between them, no defence, no aggression, two old friends who have known each other for many years, talked together, perhaps belong to the same club, same tie, same way of talking, they know each other extraordinarily well. And they are not trying to convince each other of anything, and they are asking this question: what is time, what is the now? The now, one says to the other, contains all time because what you are now you will be tomorrow - right? So tomorrow is now. Have you understood? I am prejudiced now, I like and dislike people, and tomorrow I will be prejudiced, I still will like and dislike - right? So tomorrow, the future is now. Is this clear? Have we understood each other? Please, this is very important to understand this. Not the speaker is putting an extraordinary, some kind of exotic, oriental nonsense. When the Orientals bring something it will be nonsense but if you can see this point for yourself, that all time, the past, the present and the future is contained now - right? I am what I have been, and what I will be is what I am now. If I don't change now I will be tomorrow exactly what I am - clear? Are we together in this? - not verbally, not theoretically but actually - that we now contain all time, apart from learning a language, learning a skill - you understand - writing a letter, that requires time, to come from one place to another, that requires time but psychologically, inwardly, all time is now. Right? See the difficulty of it, that there is no tomorrow, there is only now. That means there is no becoming - right? There is no psychological evolution at all. Now this is... you understand? It is not "I am going to achieve something" - that means time. Do you understand? Suppose I want to be illuminated - whatever that may mean, quotes! I want to find truth, all the rest of it. That means in the future - right? Clear? The future is now, what I am - right? If I don't fundamentally change the future is what I am tomorrow - right? What I am now tomorrow - clear?

Then from there we can go on to something very complex. If we see the truth of this, that there is no psychological evolution at all. There is no becoming, there is no what I am but what I will be. The future is now - if I don't radically change now I will be exactly tomorrow what I am. Right? That means seeing the truth that there is no psychological becoming. The psyche, which is the essence of the self, thinks in terms of becoming - right? Do you follow all this? This is not an intellectual feat. This is a simple, obvious fact. Christianity has one way of expressing it - resurrection, reaching God, attaining Heaven, which is expressed in the Asiatic world differently but it is the same movement - right? That is, I am this, I will gradually become that. That is, never to think in terms of graduality - gradualness. You understand all this? I need time gradually to learn a skill - right? I need many years to learn to dance well in a ballet, from childhood I must begin. To play the violin I must begin when I am very young, if I have got the talent, if I have got the passion behind it. And also I feel the same movement is carried over into the psychological area, I must one day reach. Right? That is why you belong to various groups, various gurus, you put on various dresses, robes to be different, because you want to achieve something. So if you see the truth, the absolute truth that all time is contained in the now, to realize the depth of it is rather frightening. When you say, "I hope to see you tomorrow", "I love you tomorrow" - you understand? So either that love is now in its entirety or not at all. If this is very clear, the absolute clarity of it, that the psyche has no future - you understand what - that you have no future. That is because what you are now you will be, unless fundamental mutation - which is a biological word but a good word to use - unless there is fundamental mutation now, you will be what you are tomorrow.

So, realizing that as an actuality, not a theory, not a supposition, not some ideal, all that nonsense, but fact, then we must begin to enquire into what is action? Into what is relationship? Into what is change? Right? Change, action and relationship - right? If I understand, if that truth that all time is now, then what is my action, what is then action? Please enquire, don't go to sleep. Sorry. Forgive me. If the speaker is emphatic please it is not that he is aggressive. The speaker feels very strongly about these matters. Humanity is destroying itself - right? All over the world terrible things are happening. They are preparing all kinds of horrors, the scientists throughout the world. Gas warfare, germ warfare, these terrible missiles, atom bombs, neutron bombs. We were at one of the centres where they are preparing all these, top scientists. We casually go on every day of our life not paying any attention to all that. When you are aware of all the things happening in the world, which is you, round you, you feel utterly responsible, not for yourself, for this whole humanity, not just for Switzerland. I know this means nothing to most of us because we just want to go on with our old traditions, our old habits, our old defensive mechanisms and so on. So when we realize all time is now, what a marvellous truth, then what is action? What is our present action? We must begin with the actual to find out what real action is, which has no future. You understand what I am saying?

What is our present action? Action, the doing? It is either based on memory, the past - right? Memory which has been accumulated through various experiments, experiences, so the past dictates action. Are you following? Please come on. Or the future dictates the action, the ideal, the theoretical concept of the communists, dialecticism, you know all that. So action is according to the past memories, past remembrances, past hates, past dislikes, past prejudices, past personal attitudes, that is all the past. According to that past there is action - right? Whether in the scientific world, or in the psychological world. Action there is invention - right? Do you understand? Are we together in all this, or am I going off ny myself? There is a collection of top scientists in a certain place, Los Alamos in New Mexico in America, they invited the speaker to talk to them. There were seven hundred top scientists of America creating all the things for war. They asked: what is creation in science? You understand? What is creation in science? I said there is no creation in science there is only invention. We will go into that apart. What the speaker wants to explain is that the past is so formidable, so strong that guides, controls, shapes our action - right? Or you have a future ideal, future theories, and act according to those theories as approximating as possible - right? Past memories and the future theories, ideals, concepts, dogmas, faith. So action is based on these two principles - right? Clear? Of course, this is simple. But when one realizes all action is now, there is no future action - you understand? Because the future is now. I must go over it. If that is not clear that all time is now, contained in the now - right? You agreed two minutes ago, at least you shook your heads, some of you, indicating that you were following, you saw the fact of it. Now if there is no future, because the future is now and the past is now, then what is action? We said action as we know it now is based on the past - memories, regrets, guilt, experience, which is all knowledge, or the future, the ideal, the concepts - right? Theories, faiths, you act according to that. So you are acting according to the past or to the future. But the past and the future are now - right? So what is action? You understand my question? Please do - don't give up. You have to exercise your brain, your intellect, your energy to find out, your passion to find out. What is action? If - no, what is action when all time is now? What is your answer? What is your deep truthful answer? When the brain - listen to it - when the brain is conditioned to act according to the past, or to the future, and when the truth is all time is now, therefore there is no future, but now. The future is contained in the now, and the past is contained in the now. You understand all this. So what is action?

I can tell you but you see you are waiting for me to tell you. Too bad, you are not really going into it. You are waiting for somebody to explain all this. Suppose there was nobody to explain to you, what will you do? You have seen the truth of something - the truth that all time, the past, the future, is in the now. You see.

And you meet a man who says, "Look, what is action?", and leaves you. And you have to find out because when once you have seen the truth that all time is now, that truth will never leave you. You understand? It is like a thorn, like an arrow in your body that will not be extracted, pulled out. So you have to answer it. And you won't answer it because you are incapable of answering it, because our brain is conditioned to the past action, action according to the past, or according to the future. So one has to tackle that problem first: whether the brain can be free from the past. Careful now. I need memory to function in the world - right? To go to my office, to work in the laboratory or in a factory, or some skill, I need a great deal of time, a great deal of knowledge. There, there is a becoming there - right? I don't know but I will know. That same movement, same - it is extended, that same thought is extended into the psychological world. I am this, I will be that - right? Now you perhaps have seen for yourself very clearly the truth that all time is now. And the speaker says, find out what is action. Right? Your action has been according to the past memories, past training, past experience, which has conditioned the brain, and also conditioned the brain to the future idea, ideal, concept, I must be, and so on. Can the brain be free of these two? You understand? Are you following all this? You understand my question sirs? (Yes).

Can the brain, which has been conditioned to act according to past memories, or thought has projected a concept, an ideal, a theory, according to which you are acting. The brain is conditioned that way. Can the brain be free of that, otherwise you will never find out what action now is - you understand? I can - somebody can explain but it won't be the depth of your own understanding. Clear? I'll explain it. I'll go into it. This will be a verbal explanation, naturally. It won't be something you yourself have discovered, and therefore truth and therefore live according to it.

We have to enquire into what is perception, seeing, perceiving. One perceives the fact actually that all time is now. That is a fact. Irrevocable fact. No other clever man comes along and say, "It is not like that." If what you have discovered is truth then you can meet any challenge. You won't be bowled over.

QUESTIONER: I don't know the answer but I can feel...

K: Listen Madame, you can ask your question, write it down and we will answer it, not now. I hope you don't mind.

What is action, which is totally independent of the past and the future? Right? What is action which is not dependent on the past or the future - right? Is there an action which is so complete now, not fragmented - you understand? That is my action - human action is based on the past or the future, therefore it is fragmented - right? It is broken up. So we are asking: is there an action which is totally free of fragmentation? I don't know if you see the beauty of the question itself? Therefore there is - the speaker says there is such an action. And that action is to see the seeing is the doing. There is no interval of time between the seeing, perceiving, understanding and the doing. The understanding, perceiving, the seeing, is action itself. Say for instance - I am working so hard, come on! One perceives very clearly, objectively, without any bias, that all organized religions throughout the world, all of them are based on superstition, faith, belief, tradition. Obviously. With their various forms of rituals, dresses, fancy dresses and so on and so on and so on. You see that is put together by thought, whether the ancient thought or present thought, it is put together by thought. Therefore as thought being limited it must be limited. Because thought - I will briefly explain it to you - thought is the outcome of memory. Memory is part of knowledge. Knowledge is the outcome of experience - right? There is no complete knowledge. In the scientific world they are adding knowledge - right? - bit by bit, by bit. A thousand people, or a hundred thousand people are adding to it day after day, day after day - right? Therefore the more is limited. Right? So experience is limited. The experience of a man who says, "I have reached God" is limited. Right? So knowledge, whether now or in the future, is limited. Therefore thought is limited - right? So anything that thought has put together both externally or inwardly is limited - right? So action based on thought is limited. Get it? Hear it for the first time for god's sake. All action, if it is based on thought, will always be limited.

Therefore that which is limited must invariably create conflict. If I am thinking about myself all day long, as most people do, it is a very small affair - right? I must practise, I must meditate, I must not do this, I must not do that - you follow? I must seek, I must have no conflict, I must meditate. It is all very self centred activity and therefore it is very limited - right? So thought is limited. Is there an action which is not based on thought? Thought is the past - all the memories, all the tradition, all that. And thought also has projected the future, the ideal, the communist theories - it is still limited. So if we are acting according to the past or to the future, it is still limited - right? Therefore breeding enormous conflict and confusion, obviously. So is there an action which is not based on the past or the future, because all time is now? Is there an action which is so complete now? You understand? Which means, seeing something clearly is to act instantly. I see very clearly, the speaker sees very clearly to belong to any organization, specially spiritual organizations, is utterly detrimental, limited, therefore don't belong to anything. Yes, sirs. Because to belong to something gives us security. We want to feel safe. The guru knows, I don't, therefore I will follow him, it is a form of self deception, insecurity. Right?

So one perceives that, and instant action. The whole thing, you are free of the whole so-called spiritual leadership. That requires - you understand, it is not strength - mere perception of seeing what is.

It is a quarter to twelve. An hour and a quarter. I hope you aren't tired. We will continue on Tuesday morning. Please if one may remind you one must - life is a complex, you can't take parts of it and say, "I understand" and go away, it requires the whole of it, not just part of it. We are only just beginning - a very small part of it. We are going to talk about fear, relationship, meditation, sorrow, the whole complex problem of our daily living. If you read a book you don't read the first chapter, you must go through to the very end of it. Not we are inviting you to come to all the meetings, I don't care - the speaker doesn't care if you come or don't come, but what is important is if you begin go to the very end of it, don't stop in the middle of it. Right? Put all your energy into it.

May I get up now?

SAANEN 2ND PUBLIC TALK 10TH JULY 1984

May we go on where we left off the day before yesterday morning? We were talking about time: time as the past, if I may briefly repeat, time as the past, time as the future, time now, at this second. We were saying also that all time, the past, the present and the future is contained in the now. We went into it fairly thoroughly, that the future is the present, because what we are now, our behaviour, our vulgarity, our - what? - our cruelty, bestiality, terror, and all the rest of it, what we are now, violent, tomorrow will also be violent if there is no fundamental change now. So the future is contained in the present. The future, though modified, is still violence. So please, as we pointed out yesterday, in greater detail, all time is in the present, is in the now. If one realizes the truth of that it has tremendous significance. I am using the word tremendous purposely, without exaggeration. It has a tremendous effect in our behaviour, in our relationship, in what we are actually doing every minute of the day. It has great significance. If one captures that, the truth of it, not the mere verbal expression, the intellectual, logical explanation, description, but the substance of it, the quality of it, the depth of it, the truth of it, then that perfume of that which is true affects the whole of our existence.

We would like this morning also in relation to time to enquire together, I mean together, not I explain, you just accept, or you deny or agree, but together investigate closely, both intellectually, logically, sanely, rationally, and also to go beyond it. Because logic, rationality has its own limitation because it is still within the field of thought. We went into that, I'll go into it again today. So if we capture the significance of time then we should also enquire into what is freedom, what is health and what is energy? Right?

Freedom, health and the quality of energy that comes when one captures or sees, perceives the truth of all time contained in the now. Right? What is freedom? All human beings throughout the ages have sought some kind of freedom, historically, religiously and so on. And freedom is translated now as doing exactly what one wants, which you are all doing obviously. Choice - one can choose to go from one place to another place, from one job to another job, unlike the totalitarian states where there is total dictatorship and everything is controlled. Even your thinking, feeling is moulded according to pattern. So there is a denial in the totalitarian states of freedom, therefore the totalitarian states are retrogressive - you understand? Going back, not moving.

So we must enquire into what is freedom? Is freedom choice? To choose between two cars, between two materials, to go where you want, to fulfil yourself at the expense of everybody else - right? I hope you are following all this. To try to become much more than what we are - better, nobler, wiser, more acquiring, more knowledge. So - which is the whole process of becoming, which is called fulfilling. I must fulfil. I must have roots somewhere. You follow? The implication of all that is becoming. Not only physical becoming, from an employee to the owner, from an apprentice to a master, but also we feel becoming inwardly. I am this, I will be that. I am envious, greedy, violent - we will use the word violence, that is good enough. We are violent. I will one day achieve non-violence, perhaps in a year or two, or perhaps at the end of my life when I am just about to die - right? And all this implies a psychological becoming. That's clear. And is there freedom in becoming? You understand my question? Or is freedom something entirely different? Please, together we are investigating, exploring. I am not explaining and you are just receiving. Together we are enquiring which demands that you exercise your brain, not accept a thing, not accept whatever the speaker says. Therefore the enquiry must be yours, not the speaker's. The speaker may just outline, put it into words but the activity, the penetration, must be on your part. So we are both sharing in this - right? Not I put something forward with which you agree or disagree - that implies no sharing. But if we are both enquiring, probing, asking, doubting everything we think and feel, and its relationship to time, and see if that becoming prevents freedom - right? Are we together in this a little bit? May I still more explain it?

That is, if one is a teacher who wants gradually to become a professor in a university, or an apprentice in any discipline, he is all the time attempting to become something - becoming more, becoming a greater expert, greater skill, greater knowledge. This limited energy given to a certain subject is limited. Therefore that denies freedom. You understand? Are we together in this somewhat?

You see we don't really demand freedom. We demand only within the limited area that I must do what I feel, I must act according to my like and dislike, and in that action I am free, I can choose between you and another, and so on. So all that activity is very, very limited, and that very limitation denies freedom. Of course. We are also verbally limited, linguistically - I won't go into the question of linguistics - linguistically we are limited. Let's find out whether language limits freedom. You understand all this? Language. That is words. Whether - the speaker is using English - whether that language, the words, condition the brain and therefore it becomes limited. Whether language conditions the brain - right? Are you getting this? Or language doesn't limit the brain, condition the brain? You are enquiring? Please go into it with me. I wish there were - sorry I don't wish - if there were only you and the speaker together and not such a large audience, together, my friend and myself, then we can discuss it very, very closely. And I am going to do that - right? That is you represent my friend and I represent the speaker. The speaker and the friend are discussing this question, which is: does freedom lie in becoming something all the time? Does freedom lie in expressing your ambition? Does freedom lie in trying to fulfil your own desires? And the friend says, "I really don't understand what the devil you are talking about." We are used to this, our conditioning, our habit, is this. We are always wanting to fulfil, to become, as in the outer world also in the inner world. We must achieve something otherwise there is no progress. And so on, my friend is saying this, countering everything I am saying, the speaker is saying. And the speaker says, don't get so excited about it, let's look at it together. When you are ambitious, both in the external world and in the psychological world, ambition is the same whether you are ambitious to become tremendously rich or ambitious to reach Nirvana, Heaven or illumination, or ambitious to become silent. Ambition is the same. And that ambition, the speaker is saying to his friend, is limited, is not freedom. And we have misused that word freedom. Which is, each person trying to assert himself, aggressively, holding on to his opinion, judgement, evaluation, dogmas, creed and so on. And all this we call freedom. And is that freedom? Right? My friend says, "I begin to understand what you are talking about. I agree". I say, don't agree but see the fact of it, the truth of it - right?

So freedom must be something entirely different. And is it possible to come to that, to realize that freedom? That is not to be ambitious at all. Go into it. Which doesn't prevent the love of doing - right? The scientists throughout the world are very ambitious too, like the rest of us. They want to achieve some superior armaments against the Russians and so on. All that game, that horrible game they are playing. So every human being in the world, however uneducated, stupid terribly intellectual, are always caught in this process. And that is called freedom generally. And the speaker says that is not freedom. And the friend says, "Does language prevent, or encourage the limited activity of the brain?" You are following all this? Does this interest you? Eh? Are you quite sure? Or is it that you are playing a game with me? Does language condition the brain? It does condition the brain if the words become important. Whether the words are English words, or French words, or German, or Italian or Russian, when the word has lost its depth, when the word is used casually, when the word has special significance to each one, when the words have become the network of the brain. You understand? Are you following? Then the words condition the brain. Right? But when the words, which are merely used to convey a certain... used for communication purposes, if you and I, and the speaker, which requires a certain sensitivity, attention, pliability, affection, then words can be used without their limiting quality. Then the brain is not conditioned by words. But now, as we are, words do condition our brain. When you say the totalitarian states - immediately I have a picture of it. You immediately see various dictators in different parts of the world, because their pictures have been in every newspaper for the last fifty years. The image springs up and that image conditions the brain. You are following all this? When I use the word guru (laughter) - there you are, you have a reaction immediately! Or when a word like the Christ is used to a Christian - immediately. Or to a Hindu with his particular word, or the Buddhist. Please see the importance of the linguistic conditioning, and whether in that conditioning all kinds of troubles arise, all kinds of conflicts arise - the Hindu conflict against the Muslim, the Muslim and the Arab against the Jew, the Christians who believe in God against the totalitarians - you follow? This is going on.

So is it possible to be free from the linguistic prison? You understand? Sirs, you don't put your minds to all this. Right? See if it is possible for you, sitting here now, to be entirely free of the image of words. So there is freedom - there is no freedom in becoming. There is no freedom when a man is ambitious, or a woman is ambitious, greedy, envious. He may think he is free because he expresses his ambition. So there is freedom - there is no freedom in becoming. And there is no freedom when the brain is caught or imprisoned in words with their images.

And also we ought to enquire: what is health? Does this interest you, health? Now, you all wake up! What is health? Can there be healthy organism, biological organism when there is constant conflict? - between each other, one opinion opposing the other, one
